This, Mr. Chairman, is the nub or focal point of the whole argument of the west in respect of this section, that is, that the provisions of the maxium rate formula as presently envisaged by this legislation militate against economy and efficiency in a normal business sense from the point of view of both the railways and the shipper. No account is taken of the possible economies or benefits which might accrue from the heavier loadings. In fact a mockery is made of the heavier loadings and the economies possible from such practice. The maximum rate formula as proposed in this legislation destroys any incentive for rail efficiency in this regard.

At this point I should like to refer to a specific argument which is incorporated in the Manitoba brief. I should like to quote this directly in order to emphasize the point:

> —the proposed formula in Bill C-231 would create a most inequitable situation. The formula includes a fixed percentage (150 per cent) above variable cost, which percentage is related to no known factor. If the costs of the railways increase by $1 the shipper's maximum rate will increase by $2.50 (150 per cent). It similarly would destroy any real incentive for improving rail efficiency since for each reduction in unit cost of $1 the railway would be subject to a $2.50 loss in revenue. This was not the decision of a commission directed to determine inequities in the railway freight rate structure—to relieve the burdens on captive shippers and to recommend policies for achieving more efficient operation of the transportation system of Canada.

There is extensive and intensive evidence and weight of argument contained in the submission by the province of Manitoba to which I have referred to buttress the argument I am attempting to advance on this occasion to the effect that section 336 with its provisions respecting the maximum rate formula and the captive shipper will militate against the best interests of the competitive economic system and the benefits which should accrue from that type of system to the shippers and the railroads of western Canada as a whole as well as to the economy of western Canada in general.

• (5:00 p.m.)

On the same subject the following is what Professor Ernest W. Williams had to say:

> The concept of a formula based upon a 30,000 pound carload—

This is the basis for the maximum rate formula in the legislation.

> —advanced by the royal commission is at variance with that commission's apparent objective to afford a measure of protection against the undue imposition of overhead burdens upon shippers where they lack an effective economic alternative to rail transport. It appears to me, also, as undesirable to incorporate in a statute a fixed percentage to be applied over variable costs. The relationship between variable and total cost in a railroad system is likely to change over time and it ought not to be necessary to amend a statute in order to recognize such a change. The origin of the 150 per cent is not adequately explained in the report of the royal commission but the mark-up over variable cost required by the railways ought to be related to their revenue requirements which will change over time. Bill C-231 is silent on this point.

Later Professor Williams submits:

> Shippers have traditionally been entitled to just and reasonable rates from common carriers without regard to the presence or absence of competition.

The following is also stated later in his submission:

> The proposition that competitive reductions in rail rates designed to meet competitive forces outside the control of the railways may be tied to an undertaking by shippers to forward traffic by rail is sound and is one of the important advantages of the Canadian agreed charge system. But it is far from equally clear that a shipper should be required to commit himself to the movement of his traffic by rail as a condition for securing a reasonable maximum rate in the place of one which exceeds the standard.

When I spoke on this and related subjects on December 21 I made the point that the maximum rate formula and its application were a source of considerable concern to a number of us on the standing committee because it seemed to us that under this particular clause of the proposed legislation the railways were being given carte blanche to charge whatever the traffic would bear in western Canada. It certainly seems to me and to those who worked on the preparation of the Manitoba brief that this is a situation and attitude which are hardly conducive to a healthy economy in western Canada.

I have a chart here from which I should like to quote to illustrate some of the tremendous advantages of mark-ups and profits which accrue to the railway company where heavier car load shipments are involved. The legislation as it is presently worded provides that the maximum rate imposed on a captive shipper shall consist of the variable cost plus 150 per cent on 30,000-pound carload lots. As the lots increase in size the variable costs really go down from the point of view of percentage. The maximum rate a shipper must pay also goes down fractionally, but the mark-up over the variable cost and the profit to the railway go up by astronomical amounts.

As the Manitoba brief pointed out, the maximum rate formula in Bill C-231 does not give the shipper the benefit accruing from the reduction in unit cost because of heavier loading. The committee might be interested in some of the percentages and specific mathematics which illustrate that point. Based on 150 per cent of variable costs on 30,000 pounds the proposed formula results in a 6.6 per cent reduction in rate on 50,000 pounds, 9.9 per cent on 70,000 pounds, 11.5 per cent on 90,000 pounds and 12.6 per cent on 110,000 pounds. These data are taken from the Interstate Commerce Commission figures for the United States, based on a 500-mile haul.

Under the maximum rate formula provided by Bill C-231 the maximum rate for 30,000 pounds is 1.82 cents per 100 pounds and the maximum rate for 120,000 pounds is 1.59 cents for 100 pounds. The rail revenue per car is, therefore, $546 for a 30,000-pound movement and $1,908 for a 120,000-pound movement. What should be particularly noted is that a shipper of a 30,000-pound carload is required to contribute only $328.20 per car toward the railway overhead whereas the shipper of a 120,000-pound carload is compelled to contribute $1,615.20 per car.

The production of a more equitable maximum rate formula requires that one or more of the assumptions on which Bill C-231 is founded must be changed. That is suggested by the Manitoba brief and is an argument to which I entirely subscribe. The brief states that it is necessary and that the formula requires revision both to reflect the economics of the heavier loading and the percentage relationship of the contribution to total variable costs.

As further illustration of that particular point I should like to refer to a chart which I have in front of me, prepared by Professor Borts. It is an assessment of the development of maximum rates and mark-ups over actual variable cost in Bill C-231 and is based on Canadian Pacific Railway costs in 1953, as derived from the royal commission report, on a 500-mile haul. It gives the following breakdown. On a 30,000-pound carload lot the variable cost, which includes the cost of money, is 50.2 cents; the mark-up over the actual variable cost in that case is 150 per cent. When the carload lot goes up to 50,000 pounds the variable cost goes down to 34.1 cents. The mark-up over the actual variable cost goes up to 246 per cent. At 70,000-pound carload lots the variable cost is reduced to 27.2 cents. One of the natural laws in business is that there is an economy to be derived from heavier loading, but the mark-up over actual variable cost and the profit to the railway goes up.

This chart pursues this argument through various levels of carload lots and finally demonstrates that a carload lot of 130,000 pounds has a variable cost of 19.4 cents—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. gentleman does not propose to continue at great length perhaps it would be desirable to allow him to complete his remarks in order that his argument will be all in one piece.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sherman: I thank the minister and members of the committee for their kindness in permitting me to continue. I really am coming to a conclusion and I will take only two or three more minutes of the committee's time.

I was making the point that in respect of a 130,000-pound carload lot the variable cost comes down to 19.4 cents. This is a reduction in the variable cost from that for a 30,000-pound load of 30.8 cents. The variable cost has been constant through all these figures at $1.26. The maximum rate is based on the 150 per cent formula. The mark-up over the actual variable cost and profit to the railway is 467 per cent.

The conclusion one must inevitably draw from these figures is that it is not worth the railway companies' time and, therefore, not in their best interests to strive for efficiency in rail loadings.

• (5:10 p.m.)

If their variable cost is reduced, under the formula as it is presently constituted and composed their mark-up, their margin of profit is reduced by a far more substantial amount. The degree and speed with which the mark-up rises would reflect itself in the reverse; the mark-up would be reduced in equally dramatic fashion if the railway were to reduce its costs and bring the figure for variable costs down to a more reasonable level and practice these rail efficiencies which are vital to the improvement of the transportation system of this county. Therefore we argue that the formula as it is designed militates against those economies and prevents the shippers and the railways themselves taking advantage of the economies of heavier loadings. There are not economies of heavier loadings in the section as now written.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I wish to return to the subject of the captive shipper and the definition of "captive shipper". It is a subject to which I referred in my initial remarks in this debate on December 21. The experts who prepared the Manitoba presentation and argument felt that the wording in new section 336 (1) is entirely unsatisfactory on the subject of the captive shipper and the definition of "captive shipper". They felt that it does not in fact properly define a captive shipper at all, and takes away and denies much of the protection that was supposed to be embedded in this legislation for various shippers in the country as a result of the studies undertaken by the MacPherson royal commission, which as we know really led to the developement of this legislation.

I would therefore propose, in line with the proposal that has already been made by the administration of Manitoba through its brief presented to the standing committee, that a new subsection be written into new section 336. I am not at this juncture proposing it as a formal amendment, but I suggest that while debate on this section continues it might be advantageous if hon. members on both sides of the house would give some thought to a subsection that would more clearly define a captive shipper. I request the continued good will of the minister in this respect and ask him to ponder the suggestion during the next few minutes while debate on this section continues. The amendment I suggest is that a new subsection be added as subsection (2) of section 336 as follows:

A shipper of goods in respect of which the rates in effect on the 1st day of January, 1965, were class and commodity rates subject to the Freight Rates Reduction Act, shall be deemed to have no alternative, effective and competitive service by a common carrier other than a rail carrier or carriers or combination of rail carriers.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I was keenly interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg South because I was wondering whether he had courage enough to try to alter new section 336 so it would serve some useful purpose in this bill. I have looked at this section very carefully and considered many ways and means of trying to improve it. I have considered moving amendments to the section which would provide some effective maximum rate control where it is needed. I am sorry to advise the commmittee that I do not believe the section can be repaired. Therefore I propose to move later that it be deleted from the bill. I say this knowing full well that there are shippers in Canada who are completely dependent on railway freight services for the operation of their business.

I suggest that there is no effective maximum rate control provided in section 336. I have reached this conclusion in view of the discussions we have had a number of times on this question. Fictitious loading factors are used, such as 30,000 pounds, and there is an allowance of 150 per cent above the unknown variable costs that goes into this formula. Therefore it seems to me we would be better off without it.

On December 20 I dealt with this matter very carefully and outlined what I thought to be the weaknesses in section 336. I gave those reasons to the house when the bill was first returned from the standing committee on transport and communications. I do not intend to repeat all those arguments because the minister and the members of that standing committee know that during the course of the debate in the committee I attempted to obtain certain cost date that I regarded as essential in order to calculate what would be the effect of the passage of this bill. I failed to convince the members of that committee that it was essential and that we had the power to send for it. I am sorry that happened but nevertheless that is the case.

Having considered this clause and compared it with clause 16, which has been dealt with during the course of this debate and was considered by the standing committee, I am convinced that if section 336 in clause 53 were deleted the entire reliance for maximum rate control would be placed in clause 16. In my opinion that would be far, far better than trying to make a shipper who thinks he may be captive prove captivity under the definition in this clause and, even if he did, to have this formula applied.

I believe this section is useless. If it were deleted the shippers of Canada would rely entirely on clause 16 if they wanted to appeal against a rate being demanded of or imposed on them. I think it would be well to draw the attention of hon. members of this committee to the wording of clause 16 so they will understand what I am arguing. I hope they will agree with me; I also hope the minister will agree with me. If it is proven that the public interest if affected there is, of course, authority under clause 16 given to the new transportation commission, first, to investigate the matter and then, under subclause (4) of clause 16, it has the power to make an order to remedy the situation. I would far, far rather rely on the wording in that clause than I would on the wording in section 336. Clause 16 (2) provides:

> Where a person has reason to believe—
>
> (b) that the effect of any rate established by a carrier or carriers pursuant to this act or the Railway Act after the commencement of this act, may prejudicially affect the public interest in respect of tolls for or conditions of the carriage of traffic—

And so on. In that event the shipper may make application to the transportation commission for leave to appeal the rate. If the commission is satisfied that a prima facie case has been made it is obliged to make an investigation of this matter. After that investigation is made the provisions of subclause (4) will apply. Subclause (4) reads as follows:

• (5:20 p.m.)

> If the commission, after a hearing, finds that the act, omission or rate in respect of which the appeal is made is prejudicial to the public interest, the commission may, notwithstanding the fixing of any rate pursuant to section 336 of the Railway Act but having regard to section 334 of that act, make an order requiring the carrier to remove the prejudicial feature in the relevant tolls—

We argued long and hard with the minister to have something of this nature included in the act, and now it is here. However, what I fear is that if the provisions of section 336 are left in the act and a shipper feels he is paying an unreasonably high rate, a rate which may be discriminatory or, in other words, a rate higher than that paid by another shipper on the same commodity and under similar conditions, the commission may refer him to section 336 in which a remedy may be found. But there is no effective remedy to be found in it. As far as we can determine the maximum rate in applying the formula and the factors included in section 336 would be of absolutely no benefit. We are unable to make any calculations because we have not been provided with data on the so-called variable costs so that we cannot establish what the rate might be on certain commodities in relation to the present rate.

As I said over and over again in the committee, I think that members of this house not only have the right but have the responsibility to ascertain what the effect of the legislation is likely to be. In other words, we should have sufficient information to enable us to anticipate what will be the various fluctuations in the rates, or at least some samples of the rates if the new law that we are being asked to pass is in fact applied. We cannot do that without all the factors used in the formula and the variable costs which were requested. There were some samples respecting sulphur, lumber, steel, dressed beef and so on, and I moved a motion in this regard. We were not asking for specific rates that were being charged by the railways to any specific shipper but we wanted to have samples so that we could use the 30,000-pound base, with changes in the loads to 50,000 pounds and 70,000 pounds, and add the 150 per cent provided under section 336 to see what the end result of these calculations would be. We cannot do this because we do not have the variable costs which are so essential in these calculations.

One other important reason in support of my argument is that the president of the C.P.R. and the chairman of the board of the C.P.R., as well as the minister himself, said before the standing committee that they could not think of anyone who would qualify as a captive shipper. The only point which the minister would concede was that someone who paid class rates might be considered a captive shipper. The minister knows very well that less than 5 per cent of the freight being moved at present is charged at class rates. He knows also that some of the other class rates in effect today are as much as five or six times the normal rate that is in effect. I can think of a few examples such as coal. I do not have the exact figures in front of me but it seems to me that the class rate on shipments of coal from Alberta to a point in Ontario is approximately $33 a ton and the rate that is being charged is around $8 a ton. This means that the class rate is 400 per cent higher than the normal rate being charged today. If only shippers who ship at class rates are able to qualify as captive shippers, whom is this clause going to protect? We know that less than 4 per cent of the traffic is being moved at class rates.

The section will not assist the western provinces and the maritimes in gaining access to the markets of central Canada. The minister and the senior officials of the railway companies have convinced me that section 336 will not be used. Therefore, as I said at the outset, I would far rather see maximum rate control vested under clause 16 than under section 336.

One of the problems regarding maximum rate control, in addition to those outlined by the hon. member for Winnipeg South, is that we are going to transfer to the rate-makers in the railway companies a far greater control over the economic expansion of Canada than they should have. I say that because this so-called complete freedom to set rates and to compete will be in the hands of these people. I can see nothing in this bill which will stop them from giving advantageous treatment to certain companies and certain areas to the disadvantage of other companies and areas, especially in light of the numerous investments they have.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether I could pose a question to the hon. gentleman? Is the opinion he has just expressed based on the assumption that if this legislation is passed and the railways are free to set their rates they can keep those rates secret?

Mr. Olson: No, Mr. Chairman, I do not assume that although I would feel relieved if I knew that all the rates charged to shippers would in fact be public knowledge.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman does not mind this interruption let me say that I had a feeling, during the earlier debate on clause 16 when the hon. gentleman was not in the committee, that several hon. members seemed to have some doubts on this point. I did not rely on my own knowledge of the law, although it turned out that my impression was correct, but checked with the law officers, not merely in my department but also in the Department of Justice, and was assured that under the existing law agreed charges or any other freight rates of the railways have to be published so that all shippers know what they are. Therefore it would appear to me to be quite impossible for a railway company to give an undue advantage to some company in which it had a pecuniary interest without another company being able to take advantage of the same rate, and if it could not do so it could have recourse under clause 16. That is the precise reason that it is there. I think I can safely assure the hon. gentleman that no freight toll now, under the new legislation, or under the Transport Act where agreed charges are authorized, is valid unless it is published. They all have to be published.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Olson: I am very pleased to hear that because at least other shippers will know about these rates. I thank the minister for that information.

Let us take the next step. Suppose a subsidiary of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has a lower rate for a like commodity for a like distance. What do other shippers do about that? Do they have to prove public interest or will they apply to the new transport commission under proposed section 336 to have a maximum rate applied to them?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think there would be no doubt that they would apply under clause 16. The hon. gentleman may not be aware that an amendment to clause 16 was adopted by the committee which, without attempting to define public interest in its totality, did define it to include the undue advantage provision that is in the latter part of the clause. Therefore all these shippers would need to allege—they would not need to prove it in order to get a hearing—would be that there was an undue advantage being given to some other shipper. Then they would have a case before the commission which would have to be heard.

Mr. Olson: This is very useful information. I am pleased to learn that clause 16 has been amended in such a way that it will restore, at least in part, the traditional and ancient claim of discrimination. The Board of Transport Commissioners has been dealing with these claims over the years. What the minister has just said with respect to the publishing of all rates, no matter to whom they are charged, and also the amendment to clause 16 under which shippers can make a plea on the basis of discrimination, as well as the fact the commission will have authority to make an order as to a remedy, add weight to my contention that proposed section 336 should not be in the bill.

Clause 16 has been amended in such a way as to restore some of the authority the Board of Transport Commissioners now has to deal with claims of discrimination but I think there should be other things included in that clause. For example, it should contain a provision that there shall be no rate higher for a shorter haul than for a longer haul for the same commodity in like circumstances. However, whether or not that is written into the law I hope this new commission, in its wisdom in deciding upon an order to remedy a situation, will take this factor into account. Perhaps in the initial stages we could rely on that.

I do not want to delay the committee any longer, Mr. Chairman. I have made the same argument in the standing committee. If hon. members would like to look at it they will find it in the proceedings for December 20. I argued that the provisions and formula contained in proposed section 336 afford no protection in so far as effective maximum rate control is concerned. I hope, therefore, that the minister and his colleagues, as well as members on this side of the house, will support this argument and the amendment I now intend to move. It is a very simple one. I move:

That section 336 of clause 53 be deleted.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I should like to repeat what I said earlier, that so far as effective maximum rate control is concerned it would be far more beneficial for shippers to rely exclusively on clause 16 than to have the new transport commission refer them to proposed section 336 and try to apply the formula there or use the calculations based on that formula.

Mr. Pickersgill: I just want to say very briefly that I could not support this amendment, although I must say that the hon. gentleman has made a very ingenious and rather effective argument. I agree with him that clause 16 of the bill, in the form in which it now is after amendment by this committee, will be of more interest to many more shippers who may feel that their competitive position does not enable them to negotiate a fair rate than would the proposed section 336. However, I do not believe the proposed section 336 is open to the objections the hon. member suggested as his reason for taking it out.

I say quite frankly, as I did in committee, that I do not believe many shippers who are now shipping under commodity rates would be likely to find much relief or much benefit from the proposed section 336. Someone will no doubt correct me if I am wrong, but if I recall correctly about 5 per cent of the volume and 1½ per cent of the value of railway revenue—it may be the reverse—is derived from class rates. Considering the enormous volume of goods carried on the railways of Canada, I do not believe we should even ignore this minority of shippers who are now paying the real maximum rates under the present law, that is, the class rates. Some of these shippers might be left unprotected because they would not be in a position really to compare themselves with anyone else. The rates they would be paying would probably be exactly the same as their neighbours would pay under like circumstances. I think it would be leaving a group of shippers with relatively small bargaining power without protection.

At the moment I am not going into the merits of the protection. However, the hon. member for Winnipeg South referred to the evidence given by Professor Borts. I am not going into that evidence at any length, but I suggest to hon. members who are particularly interested in this subject that they look at pages 2895, 2896 and 2897 of the proceedings of the committee for November 24. Professor Borts made a considerable analysis of the situation. It is true he did claim he did not have enough data to make his analysis, but he did make a considerable analysis. Perhaps I could just quote what he said:

Here we discovered that there were categories of high-rated traffic which might very well have an inducement to seek captivity under the bill. These consist of high-rated traffic in the tonnage category from 15 tons up to 35 tons.

• (5:40 p.m.)

These would be small shippers. I feel it would be a mistake, if there is some protection here, to take away that protection. I believe there is some protection in this section, though I agree with the hon. gentleman, not for shippers of bulk commodities. There might be in an isolated case but not in one that has been drawn to my attention. In areas where there are lines of railway but no roads and therefore no trucking service, a shipper would be at the mercy of the railways and the conditions under clause 16 might conceivably not be considered by the commission to apply.

Mr. Olson: May I ask a question? Clause 16 (4) says that the transportation commission shall have the authority to make an order removing the prejudicial feature in the relevant tolls or conditions which are specified. If the tolls were found to be over the 150 per cent of the variable cost, then under this provision does the commission not have authority to remedy the tolls and to move them below the 150 per cent?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly that is my opinion. Therefore I think that if we took this section out and deleted the reference to 150 per cent there would be no direction of any kind. It does not appear to me—

Mr. Olson: I was referring to clause 16, not the proposed section 336.

Mr. Pickersgill: I appreciate what the hon. gentleman says, but I do not think there is any conflict between the two clauses. I think they are both necessary to protect shippers. I do not think there would be any danger of the commission, in the case of someone who went before the board alleging, for example, that he was under an undue disadvantage, doing anything if it agreed with him, but insist that his rate be the same as the rate for the person who, in his opinion, had an undue advantage, if that was found to be the fact. This is now written into both parts of clause 16, the prima facie part and the second part. It might be that there would be some shippers who, because of their intrinsically captive shipper status and because they were small, could get a rate which in some cases would be even more favourable under section 336 than the rate they now pay under class rates. Professor Borts came to the conclusion that that was the probability in the case of some of these smaller shippers.

I should not like, by accepting the amendment to delete this clause, to take that potential advantage away when in fact I do not think it would prejudice anybody under clause 16. For that reason I would not care to support the amendment.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, I think there are some good reasons for supporting the amendment. One of the most important reasons for supporting the amendment to delete this section is that the provisions of section 336 are such as to give little real protection to shippers of commodities that are heavy loading. I think it can be said that the proposed section 336 gives a very misleading impression. It gives the illusion of some kind of regulatory control and protection for certain classes and kinds of shippers when the fact of the matter is that it does not. The reason it does not has already been put before the committee by the two previous speakers, the hon. member for Winnipeg South and the hon. member for Medicine Hat.

When this clause was being considered by the standing committee it was regarded in many ways as the storm centre of the whole bill, as being the nub of the regulatory features of the bill, such as they are. The fact is that in certain parts of the country it is obvious that there is still need for adequate regulatory provisions in our transportation legislation and transportation policies. It may be the case that in some parts of the country there has grown up in the past decade or two massive, pervasive, intermodal competition in transportation that enables the authorities, government, to relax or reduce their reliance on regulation. But in other parts of the country this so-called pervasive intermodal competition in transportation simply does not exist for many commodities.

We should certainly have more adequate regulatory provisions than those provided in section 336. In the final analysis I think it would be better to delete the section so that there would be no mistake, misunderstanding or self-deception, and the shippers who did seek some kind of protection would be able to fall back on clause 16. If there is any real, meaningful regulation in the bill at all in this regard it is to be found in clause 16, not in this clause. I think the hon. member for Medicine Hat was right in the main contention he put forward.

One of the main faults with section 336 is that it does not give an adequate definition of a captive shipper. The purpose of this section is to enable captive shippers to apply to the commission for a maximum rate or for rate control which will afford them some kind of protection against unduly high rate charges by the railway companies. If this is the purpose of this section it is deficient in that it does not go on to stipulate or adequately define just what a captive shipper shall be.

The minister has repeatedly refused to give any consideration to a more precise or adequate definition of the term "captive shipper". In the event that someone does succeed in demonstrating to the commission that he is a captive shipper and asks the commission to set a rate, the formula which the commission shall abide by in setting a rate is one which, I submit, this parliament is not in a position to evaluate. I have said that on at least two previous occasions during the debate on this bill, I think during the debate on clause 1, and I now repeat it.

The reason that this committee is not in a position to evaluate the effectiveness, fairness or justice of the formula is simply that the necessary costing data which the committee requested were refused. In the committee stage of the bill a formal motion was made asking that this data be made available by the railways but it was rejected. Who, therefore, is in a position to say that the formula, based as it is on the 30,000-pound carload standard and allowing for variables, can be computed on that arbitrary weight standard if you allow a 150 per cent mark-up on the variable cost? Who will say that is fair? Who will say that this will give us an effective formula and that it will protect shippers adequately with respect to railway rates?

• (5:50 p.m.)

It has been repeated many times that the railways are obtaining larger and larger equipment capable of hauling heavier loads. What justification is there for imposing a maximum rate formula based on a 30,000-pound carload standard? Often commodities are hauled by the railways in loads of 90,000, 120,000, 130,000 and 140,000 pounds. The tables the minister has seen show that. If we have a formula based on a 30,000-pound carload standard and if we allow variable costs plus 150 per cent, on that basis it will mean that the railways will make a 150 per cent mark-up on a shipment of 30,000 pounds, a 300 per cent mark-up on a shipment of 70,000 pounds and over 400 per cent on a shipment of 120,000 pounds.

Where is the realism? Where is the common sense in having in the bill a section with a maximum rate that will allow the railways, in some instances, a mark-up of over 400 per cent? I suggest that this section looked at in that light, and it must be looked at in that light, is absurd.

The minister heard practical suggestions in the briefs of counsel appearing for the three prairie provinces to the effect that the definition of captive shipper in section 336 be altered and redefined. The Manitoba and Alberta briefs recommended that the basis on which the formula shall be established shall not be an arbitrary 30,000-pound standard but the actual variable costs. It was suggested that the railways be allowed a mark-up consistent with a reasonable or permissible level of earnings. At this point in the committee hearings the minister made that famous remark, which on reflection I am sure he must regret, that the idea of a fair return being used as a basis for regulation is, and I quote his words, "a mediaeval notion".

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman mind quoting what I actually said?

Mr. Schreyer: Is the minister prepared to deny that he said that the notion of a fair return was mediaeval?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, but I do not recall having said any such thing. What I said, I think, was that the notion of a fair price as opposed to a price established in the market was a mediaeval notion. I am an old historian, sir, and when I used the term "mediaeval" I did not mean the nineteenth century. I was talking about the Thomist philosophy, the notion of a fair price. I said that it did not appear to me that you could determine a permissible earning in the competitive field, and I did not know how, when you allowed the railways to compete in a large sector and regulated them in a small sector, you could divide their profits, how you could segregate the profits from the market sector and the regulated sector to determine what would be permissible earnings in the regulated sector. That is a mathematical problem that is so complicated it would take at least until the year 2,000 to work it out.

You could determine that if the whole system were regulated, as with the Bell Telephone Company, for example. But how can you segregate earnings when you say that you will regulate in one sector and allow competition elsewhere? I do not know how you will achieve that. Permissible earnings would make nonsense of the concept of competition. How can you say that you will have competition but there must be only permissible earnings? You do not say that to the Aluminum Company; you do not say that to the western farmers. Surely the distinction is obvious.

I do not think the hon. gentleman should talk about two statements that I made on different occasions and put parts of them together, thereby representing them as though they were one statement.

Mr. Schreyer: I must confess that I did not hear the minister's reference to Thomist. The proper thing, I realize, is to accept the minister's word if he denies having made the statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have said some silly things, and I do not remember them all. What I said, to protect myself, was that I had no recollection of making the statement, and I gave the hon. gentleman the gist of the statements I recall having made.

Mr. Schreyer: May I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I could speak to you, sir, after you have taken the chair.

The Chairman: Order. It being six o'clock, pursuant to provisional standing order it is my duty to leave the chair so that the house may proceed with the consideration of private members' business.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty pursuant to standing order 39A to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock this day are as follows: the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette), Transport—steps to be taken by the government following the verdict returned about the tragedy at Dorion, Quebec; the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin), Natural Gas—Trans-Canada Pipe Lines—suggested twinning of line in Canada; the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken), Pollution—request for further research into detergents.

• (6:00 p.m.)

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I have been informed by the whip on this side that there has been consultation among hon. members and it was understood we would forgo private members' hour and return to the business that was under consideration when Your Honour took the chair. It was also understood that before we went back into committee it would be ordered that the committee would rise from seven to eight o'clock and the house would suspend its sittings during that hour. If that is a correct interpretation, perhaps it could be so ordered.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house agree, first, to suspend the private members' hour for today and, second, that the committee rise at seven o'clock until eight o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The business in committee will now be resumed.

TRANSPORTATION

PROVISION FOR DEFINITION AND IMPLEMENTATION OF NATIONAL POLICY

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-231, to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential provisions—Mr. Pickersgill—Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 53—

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, the deficiencies in new section 336 are such that they simply outrage one's feeling of what is common sense, what is fair and what is reasonable. Unless the minister can give us some assurances, which until now he has not, that certain major changes and amendments will be made, I fail to see any other course but to support the amendment to delete it completely.

In this instance I think there is ample reason for being repetitious. Much of the controversy has been about maximum rate control, and I repeat that unless we can get a more precise and comprehensive definition of a captive shipper this new section really is deficient. Further, unless the minister is prepared to change the formula by which maximum rate control will be applied and abandon the fictitious basis of an arbitrary 30,000-pound carload standard, then the formula will be impossible to apply with any degree of justice or fairness.

Not only should we abandon the arbitrary and fictitious 30,000-pound carload standard but also the formula of variable costs plus 150 per cent. It should be variable costs plus a permissible level of earning relative to cost. This is not something I am proposing off the top of my head on the spur of the moment. It is a concrete proposal put to the minister by counsel for the three prairie provinces and compared with the minister's proposal it is clear that theirs is far better.

I am sure the minister has read volume 40 containing the minutes of the proceedings of the committee on transport and communications on November 24, 1966. On the last page there appears a table of maximum rates prepared by the two experts hired by the prairie provinces to deal with the subject of maximum rate control. In this table they have computed that on the basis of the formula for maximum rate control incorporated in the bill it will work out that the railways will enjoy a mark-up of 150 per cent on a shipment, for 500 miles, of a 30,000-pound carload lot if the shipment comes under the provision of captive as set forth in new section 336. If, however, the commodity is shipped in a 90,000-pound carload lot and the formula is applied, the railways will enjoy a mark-up of 319 per cent, and if the commodity is shipped in a 110,000-pound carload lot and the shipper is captive and applies under this formula, the railways will enjoy a mark-up of over 426 per cent.

Wherein lies the common sense, wherein lies the reason, wherein lies the justice of this kind of legislation? It is actually worse than nothing because it purports to provide protection when in fact the protection provided is more mirage than reality. It will simply confuse shippers and cause a lot of trouble for nothing.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. gentleman wants to speak on the section and not on the amendment, would he agree to a vote being taken now on the amendment? We could then proceed in an orderly way, whereas we are apt to be rather embarrassed in the next hour if we have not disposed of the amendment.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I think the embarrassment will be on the other side of the house. We appreciate the newfound interest in this bill. There are 14 cabinet ministers now present. That is the way it should be but it is a little late. We have agreed to sit for part of the supper hour. This is not convenient to some people but we wish to make as much progress as we can. Some hon. members on this side wish to speak on the amendment and on the new section. The minister has changed his opinion, but this is still the heart of the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: The amendment seeks to knock out the whole clause, and if it is the heart of the bill I am sure the hon. gentleman would not be that heartless. I was going to suggest that we vote on the amendment. Then we would have the section before us and I think the hon. member for Winnipeg South, if the amendment is defeated, would like to move another one. I just thought it might be convenient to have the vote now.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): It looks as though some of the members behind the minister are getting a little hungry.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): We feel sorry for them but we have to make just as much sacrifice on this side.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, you can't blame me for trying.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, I am waiting to get the minister's attention since there seems to be a sort of caucus going on around him. I should like him to decode this new section so that I may understand what it means.

• (6:10 p.m.)

New section 336 in part reads as follows:

—to fix a rate for the carriage of the goods, and the commission may after such investigation as it deems necessary fix a rate equal to the variable cost of the carriage of the goods and an amount equal to one hundred and fifty per cent of the variable cost as the fixed rate applicable to the carriage of the goods in respect of which the application was made—

[Mr. Schreyer.]

Surely whoever wrote that could have made it plainer than that. Right from the beginning it is a stupid statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well—

Mr. Kindt: Let the minister tell me what variable cost means.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think perhaps I can do that. Of course, I do not have the advantage the hon. gentleman has. I know the hon. gentleman is a trained economist. I am just a historian. So I am sure he will correct me if I am wrong. However, I have had some instruction from economists. I understand that in the railway business, as well as in most other forms of transport, there are two types of costs, one of which is fixed costs. Very briefly, fixed costs are costs which are fixed. That means that they go on whether or not any traffic is moved. I might give an example, and I will stick to the railways. It will be simpler and I do not wish to be stupid and incur the wrath of the hon. gentleman. In the case of a railway I would say that the fixed costs are the rails, the rights of way generally, the telegraph lines which are placed alongside the railway, the stations, the staff which is necessary whether there are any trains at all, and all those persons who are there in any case whether or not traffic is moving.

The variable cost is the cost of moving any particular thing. In the case of a car of coal, for example, it would be the cost of loading the coal, unloading the coal if the railways do that, the pulling of that car from place A to place B or from the Crowsnest pass, if I may dare mention that place, to Vancouver. It would be the depreciation on that car, because the railway would have to obtain a new car eventually. It would include all the costs which could be attributed directly to the actual movement of the goods. These are the things which are called variable costs because they are not fixed; they vary. They go up and down depending on how much traffic there is.

Some people make a good living by arguing about these things. There could be a very nice argument about whether this or that item really should be attributed to fixed or variable cost. I know the hon. gentleman would not want me to go into that. He knows that the field of economics is filled with margins. This perhaps is not so much a margin as it is a potential overlap. Perhaps my explanation is more stupid than the one contained in the bill but I hope it will help the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Kindt: I thank the minister. In speaking of variable costs, anyone who knows anything about accounting or economics will know that there are many of these twilight items which can be slipped over into the variable cost along with the fixed cost, or a fixed cost can go into variable cost and vice versa. Another point is that one can change the interest rate on depreciation. The minister mentioned depreciation. This could be called a fair cost in one case and not in another. The minister also mentioned the fixed cost in respect of management. If the salaries of management personnel went up, then the fixed cost would have to be changed, if this is considered to be a fixed cost. Is it fixed or variable?

Mr. Pickersgill: I suppose a conductor would be variable and a sectionman would be fixed.

Mr. Kindt: This, my dear man, is the jungle you are in; you are in the forest and cannot see the trees.

Mr. Pickersgill: But I can see the ties.

Mr. Kindt: There is no doubt about it; we are writing an act which we will put into law and then we will expect somebody in the civil service to interpret what are variable costs. What does this mean? I have asked that they be defined. The minister mentioned fixed and variable costs, but there again this has not been nailed down. It is just as nebulous and inaccurate now as it was before he spoke. Yet we are being asked to approve of a section in which this is not defined. There is no definition in respect of these terms in the first part of this bill. There may be a time when someone in this assembly may wish to know what fixed, variable and other costs were taken into consideration in respect of the setting of these rates by the commission. How are they going to make a study and then multiply it by 150 per cent in order to arrive at a fixed rate?

Mr. Pickersgill: It is just a matter of adding 150 per cent.

Mr. Kindt: In other words, count the feet and divide by four. That is the statistical way to do it and that is what is in the bill. I have said sufficient to let the minister know that I am not alone in thinking that what I see here will cause no end of trouble. I am glad to see that the hon. member for Kootenay East is smiling. I do hope that he, who has the good ear, of the minister will fill that ear full of information concerning the trouble there will be in respect of moving coal from the Crowsnest pass to Vancouver and ports on the west coast for reshipment to Japan. I know that the hon. member for Kootenay East is very much concerned about this just as I am. There are some 8,000 people out there who depend on these shipments. The hon. member is a former miner. I know he would never hear the end of it if he went out there and said that something went through here and he did not raise his voice against it. These people out there depend on the shipment of this coal to Japan. The revenue which is coming into the country as a result of these shipments is helping in our balance of payments situation.

• (6:20 p.m.)

I had hoped that a clause would be included in this bill to give our coal shippers some assurance of protection against exorbitant rates, perhaps through determination of a method of defining a captive shipper. When arrangements were made to ship coal to Japan the railway companies gave the impression that when the volume increased to about one million tons per year they would lower the rates. About a year and a half ago the rates were increased by 15 cents and no explanation has been given for that increase. I suppose that when rates are increased following the passage of this measure there will be no explanation given either. The companies will state to the shippers that they must accept the increase. The government will then be asked to pay additional subsidies because the miners must live and to do so they must sell coal.

A great deal of trouble has been taken to obtain contracts in Japan for our coal. This industry is working fairly well under the present set-up, but these shippers must have some assurance that the cost of shipping coal to Japan will not be increased. They must know what the situation will be in order that they can make plans beforehand.

About a year ago I asked the minister to consult with the railway companies to see whether it would be possible to put on a commuter train to move coal from the Crowsnest pass area to the Pacific coast. We have facts and figures which prove that a commuter train could move the coal at a saving of approximately $1.50 per ton. The cost of shipping coal is $5.30 per ton, and the last time I checked a subsidy of $2.73 per ton was being paid. I hope, as do the coal companies, that we can do away with coal subsidies. This may be one step in accomplishing that. The C.P.R. has a monopoly in that area and has refused to make any concession or give any serious consideration to the establishment of a commuter train.

The minister has said nothing about whether he has made any progress with the C.P.R. in an effort to reduce costs and thereby reduce coal subsidies. The coal companies are interested in decreasing the cost of shipping coal to Japan but until they can do so nothing can be done to reduce subsidies. Perhaps the amount of the subsidies now being paid is considered to be the maximum. If the C.P.R. was anxious to obtain additional business it could do so by cutting the cost of coal $1.50 per ton by the operation of a commuter train.

Commuter systems have been operated in the United States to move coal from Pennsylvania and other parts of the United States to seaports, and it could be done from the Crowsnest pass to Vancouver. The coal operators have presented briefs in this regard to the C.P.R. but to no avail. The whole matter has been taken up with the Minister of Transport who said he would consult with the C.P.R., but apparently the whole idea has been shoved into the corner. In any event no action has been taken.

Those two hon. gentlemen opposite can smile if they like but if the hon. member for Kootenay East can tell me what has been accomplished in this regard I wish he would do so. Nothing has been done that I have heard in regard to lowering the cost of coal by instituting a commuter train operation. The people in these coal producing areas are worried because they feel they will be left holding the bag and not be able to do anything about the increasing costs. Something should be done to fix a maximum rate in respect of the cost of shipping coal.

The minister ought to take this bill back to his officials and have it decoded so that people can understand what it means. I do not understand this particular part and, in view of the explanation given by the minister, I venture to suggest that he does not understand it.

Mr. Schreyer: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Kindt: Yes.

Mr. Schreyer: Is the hon. member aware that during committee hearings on this bill the committee voted nine to eight against a motion to require the railway companies to produce certain cost data in order that it could ascertain what were variable and fixed costs? Had that information been produced perhaps we might understand the formula contained in new section 336. I wonder whether the minister is aware of that fact and what he thinks about it.

Mr. Kindt: Were they government members who voted against that motion?

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Kindt: That tells another story.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Where were you?

Mr. Kindt: I was not a member of the committee. I tried to get on the committee but could not because of the limitation on the number of members. It was a popular committee but I had to rely for my information on its reports. I was in attendance at several meetings.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): You should have put your experts on that committee.

Mr. Kindt: We now know why the minister wanted to put a time limit on the consideration of this bill in order to get it through before Christmas. He is now anxious to get it through at this time. We should like to see this measure dealt with before very long but surely we should not be asked to pass it as it now reads.

Perhaps I have said enough at this time. Although I have not received any answers to my questions I will yield the floor to the minister.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, as an old silicotic hardrock miner speaking to a doctor of political science and economics, let me say that I believe we are better informed and understand better what is meant by fixed and variable costs than the hon. gentleman does. Let me remind the hon. member for Springfield that the subject matter of the motion to which he referred did not relate to variable of fixed costs but rather to how the railway companies arrived at the determination of costs in these areas. The minister has outlined what are considered fixed and variable costs and I do not think there is any difficulty in this regard.

• (6:30 p.m.)

I must remind my hon. friend that the passing of this section would not in any way change the circumstance that prevails in respect of the Crowsnest pass coal rates. Hon. members will pardon me if I am a little hesitant to use the phrase "Crowsnest pass".

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): That's all right; we have heard it before.

Mr. Byrne: However, I have something of a commitment to some of my western colleagues not to give my impressions of what are known as the Crowsnest rates. I am referring specifically of course to the rates that apply to the movement of coal from the Crowsnest pass area and Canmore. Anything that is being done in this bill will not change the circumstance that prevails.

I am sure that if the hon. member were to reflect on the situation for a moment he would realize that this section could not possibly determine the final result of the negotiations between the coal companies and the railway in respect of the coal that is being shipped, and we hope will continue to be shipped, to Japan. The question of moving coal from the Crowsnest pass area to the seaboard is, and I am sure will have to remain, a matter for negotiation between the coal companies and the railway.

The hon. member indicated to the committee that the Japanese are reluctant to enter into long term contracts for coal from Canada because we are at the present time paying about $2.73 a ton in subsidy to the coal companies in order that they may market their coal in Japan. The hon. member has said it has been determined that with the use of integral unit trains coal may be transported for $1.50 per ton less then the going rate of $5.30 per ton. He has said the reduction could be brought about in this way. I would say that a reduction of $1.50 per ton is still not sufficient to make the coal marketable in Japan.

Were the government to determine that this was a freight figure that would make coal saleable, and were we in any way to direct the railways to undertake to carry the coal at a figure which they believe to be non-compensatory, it seems to me we would again be in the position of the government having provided a monetary vehicle upon which the coal would be moved to the seaboard and eventually to Japan. Therefore we would be back in relatively the same position.

In any event if the coal companies in the Crowsnest pass area are captive shippers, there is no relief for them in this section and would not be in any section we could write into the bill. It is a simple fact of economics that if the cost of transportation of coal to the coast, the bulk loading and water transportation, cannot be reduced to a very minimum figure, of course there will be no market. It is anticipated, or course, that an economic freight rate will be arrived at, and that the market will eventually reach 3 million to 5 million tons.

I believe we cannot dictate in this respect when the purpose of the bill is to relieve the railways and other modes of transportation from regulation, and provide for competition. I think the hon. member is aware of the proposal of Crowsnest Industries, which is one of the major shippers of coal to Japan. This company provides almost half of the coal exported from Canada to Japan. The proposal of Crowsnest Industries is to build a railway, which would remove them from the so-called captive shipper situation. They have asked permission of the provincial government to build 70 miles of line from Michel to the border near Eureka, Montana, where transportation would be carried out on the Great Northern Railway. This company has negotiated with the Great Northern Railway a rate which is substantially lower than the C.P.R. finds it possible to quote at this stage. But for the time being the alternative negotiations are being held up through lack of provincial authorization.

Last September during the period of a provincial general election, the government of British Columbia announced that they had brought the parties together, namely the Great Northern Railway, the C.P.R. and Crowsnest Industries, and had more or less settled the question. It was said that the coal would be carried on Canadian Pacific Railway lines to the coast and that everything had been agreed upon. But this was of course simply an election announcement; it just was not the fact. I understand there was some stipulation that seemed to amount to an understanding on the part of the provincial authorities that the federal government would pay a small direct subsidy to the railways. They had omitted to consult the very important fourth party in this undertaking.

The situation at the moment is that the Great Northern Railway Company have quoted Crowsnest Industries a rate for the carriage of coal. Crowsnest Industries have studied the economics of building a railway of their own and have worked out the actual tonnage cost in relation to the capitalization of that railway. They are prepared to go ahead on that basis, but the provincial government have not thus far given the authorization to do so. When the authorization is given, Canadian Pacific Railway may well decide on the rapid construction of integral or unit trains and the economic problem may be solved in that way. However, negotiations are progressing quite favourably at the moment and will be determined very quickly when the provincial government have decided whether they are prepared to issue a permit.

• (6:40 p.m.)

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the parliamentary secretary. I am familiar with those things he mentioned because I was concerned in most of the initial negotiations in respect of the shipment of this coal to Japan. I talked to the coal operators who were down here in Ottawa and they told me what the hon. member for Kootenay East has said. May I say that the Canadian Pacific Railway has no competition; it is a monopoly. It is in facing that fact that we will find the answer to many of the difficulties of the coal shippers. Let me go one step further and tell you that when arrangements were made for coal to be sent to Japan, port facilities were set up to load and unload the coal and our thought was that these facilities would not only be used for the loading of coal but also for loading potash shipped from Saskatchewan, and a lot of other bulk products which would spread the cost over the various types of commodities and therefore reduce the cost of loading coal. We were quite willing to agree to a certain rate on bulk loading and we were quite willing to assume that when the volume increased the cost of loading should drop. We had statistics on the cost of moving this coal from the ports on the West coast to Japan. However, now that the Japanese are using their own ships, the rates on the hauling of coal have declined, but the saving is unknown.

The miners said they would not strike and agreed to the $16 or $18 a day which they were getting at that time. We thought that if a chip could be taken off the cost of loading at Vancouver, a chip taken off the profits of the operators when the volume was increased, and a chip taken here and there all along the line, together it would amount to the government subsidy.

The hon. member for Kootenay East said that a difference of $2.73 cannot be made up. Let me remind him that in the beginning it was $4.50. When the former government set the exchange rate on the dollar, that reduced the subsidy substantially. I think that if the government took the bull by the horns and really tried to get rid of the $2.73, they could do so. Let the hon. member for Kootenay East mark my words when I say that in less than a year's time the C.P.R. will be setting rates on captive shippers, who in turn will be asking the commission to fix rates which will be much higher than the $5.30 which is being paid today. I think the hon. member for Kootenay East will agree with me that we are striving to increase our import trade.

Slightly under a billion tons of coal are being shipped to Japan, and a lot of thought, labour and effort has gone into arranging these shipments. We want to expand this trade. If the hon. member for Kootenay East were as successful in getting a commuter train so as to reduce the costs, and get the C.P.R. to put into effect more modern methods, then the people in the Crowsnest pass would be in clover. The only way in which he thinks it can be done is by threatening to establish a railway which would be hooked up to the Northern Pacific. More than once I have been at meetings where that has been discussed, and I agree that this proposal has some merit; but the feeling of everyone, including the government of British Columbia, is that the C.P.R. should put in a commuter train, if there was a clause in the bill which froze the rates. If the C.P.R. rates were frozen until such time as they put in a commuter train, they would have to do it, but until that is done no action will be taken by the C.P.R. For those who are not familiar with the situation let me explain that box cars are loaded with coal in the Crowsnest pass and then wait a few days until a train comes along. They are then hooked on to the train, which may take a week of bumping along before it arrives at its destination at a port on the west coast. The cost of moving coal in that way is very high.

Is the C.P.R. going to modernize and change this obsolete method of moving coal or do they intend to ask the commission to accept the rates and costs as they exist today? These are the problems that I see in the bill. These are the obstacles to doing what I think should be done, namely to facilitate our export trade. But no, embedded in the bill is the provision which enables the C.P.R. to go on refusing to improve their shipping facilities, and as a result we will disappoint those people who are relying upon us as their representatives to find a solution to this problem. We have not got to first base on it. I would be very pleased to hear the hon. member for Kootenay East say that we have.

Mr. Byrne: I believe the negotiations have reached a point where they are very close to a settlement. Certainly the C.P.R. have in mind much more modern equipment than the 1903 gondolas which they are using at the present time. Any such agreement must require more modern equipment, such as the unit trains suggested by the hon. member.

Mr. Cantelon: Mr. Chairman, first of all I should preface my remarks by saying that I do not agree with the basic premise of the bill; otherwise it might be doubtful as to just why I disagree with section 336. I think that the MacPherson commission, in making its recommendations some years ago, completely misread the conditions existing in our country today. Perhaps I should not say that they misread the conditions, because the commission could not know what they would be today. I do not feel that competition in transportation—certainly in the west and on the Atlantic coast—is sufficient to warrant the conditions that we have set up in the bill, and here I am referring to section 336 in particular.

• (6:50 p.m.)

This afternoon the hon. member for Winnipeg South set forth very pertinent and concise information which I think gives conclusive proof that section 336 is not satisfactory to a great portion of this country.

The views of Manitoba, and those of Professors Borts and Williams, are very well set forth indeed. I must say that I agree with those gentlemen in their consideration of this particular problem. The difficulty with which they were faced was a matter of costing figures. They pointed out that it was impossible to get accurate cost figures because the committee and these gentlemen were unable to get up-to-date costing figures from the Canadian Pacific. The only figures that they could use were those the MacPherson commission had obtained. They then tried to bring those figures up to date as well as they could. They were able to get information from the United States on cost figures, and they tried to relate this information to the situation in Canada. This is one of the reasons we felt that the bill is ineffectual, and that proposed section 336 in particular will not do what it is intended to do.

In particular, I object to this section because it uses the basis of a carload of 30,000 pounds. Having sat in the committee for weeks on end, I know the explanation for the use of this 30,000 pounds. It was used, we were told, because it is a suitable truckload. In my opinion this is a fallacious argument because a railway is not going to use a 30,000-pound load just because the trucking people find it efficient to operate on that basis. I believe therefore the whole of the proposed section 336 is rendered ineffective because that 30,000 pound weight is established as the standard carload weight.

As I said a moment ago, the hon. member for Winnipeg South has pointed out the effect of this on loads of a greater weight, and it could be as much as 400 per cent. The hon. member was only using loads of up to 130,000 pounds, so what the effect would be on the potash shipper who now uses something like 200,000-pound cars beggars description. It certainly would allow the railroads, if they were using this as a basis on which to cost their potash shipments, to charge astronomical rates. I know that they do not do that because they negotiate with the potash shipper, who gets an agreed charge. The trouble there is that there is in effect only one thing that controls the cost to the potash shipper, and that is the law of charging all that the traffic can bear. I do not believe that that is good for the country. I do not believe this is a logical law to apply.

It could be argued that it is better for the railways to make large profits than for the potash shipper in our country, most of whom are financed by United States capital. Some people would argue it is better for the railways to make the profits than for United States capital to make money. I disagree, because if we are going to develop this country we must not have the profits going to the transportation means; they must go to those who are risking their money to develop the country. I am not one of those who feel it is wise for us to restrict the flow of capital to this country by allowing the railways to have the bulk of the profits as a result of charging all the traffic will bear. I would much prefer those profits to go to the potash mine, the iron mine, the copper developer and to the man who is boring the wildcat well. It is far better to have these people get the profits, so they will continue development.

I hope the Chairman does not believe I am away from the topic when I introduce these points, because I do not believe I am. The point I am trying to make is that this proposed section 336 is not a good section and that the 30,000-pounds stipulation should be eliminated. I will go so far as to support the hon. member for Medicine Hat who believes the best thing to do is to get rid of the whole section. I believe that this would be advisable. I agree with him that clause 16 does do everything that this proposed section would do. I do not agree, though, that the phrase "public interest" which is found in clause 16 should remain in that clause. I believe that phrase needs to be changed, and instead of public interest—

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the hon. gentleman will permit me to ask him a question? Has he had an opportunity, since he came back, to inform himself of the amendment that was made to clause 16 since we were considering it in committee? I believe it largely meets the point he has in mind.

Mr. Cantelon: Is the minister saying that this phrase "public interest" has been removed from clause 16?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, but there has been some definition of it in the amendment agreed to last week.

Mr. Cantelon: If my fears are groundless because of a definition which clarifies the meaning of "public interest", then this does not change the validity of my argument on clause 16. This clause could take over completely from proposed section 336. In fact the amendment would make it all the more certain that the clause would do what I suggest.

I listened to the minister with great interest as he tried to answer some of the objections of the hon. member for Medicine Hat. The first part of his explanation was, as his explanations usually are, crystal clear. I listened to it with enjoyment. Then the hon. member for Medicine Hat asked him a question which seemed to be contrary to what the minister was saying. I found that the minister did not seem to follow along with a clear explanation from that point. As he sometimes does, I think when his argument is weak, he became very obtuse and difficult to follow. I was not able to follow him at all. I consider the minister one of my better friends amongst the friendly enemies we have on the other side, and I always listen with a great deal of interest to his explanations. I usually find them clear, but this time he had me lost completely.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Before the hon. gentleman resumes his seat, may I ask him whether, since his return, he has become aware of the fact that the minister, his good friend, tried to wipe out the Crowsnest pass rates yesterday?

Mr. Cantelon: I do not believe I had better say anything about that or he may cease to be my friend. It is seven o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Pursuant to the order passed earlier this day, I do now leave the chair and the committee will resume at eight o'clock.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. House again in committee of the whole on Bill No. C-231. When the committee rose at seven o'clock it was considering clause 336 and an amendment moved by the hon. member for Medicine Hat.

Mr. Cantelon: Mr. Chairman, I had probably made the main points in my argument, but there are a couple of subsidiary ones I should like to emphasize and to which I want to direct the attention of the committee.

As I said before, I feel it unnecessary to repeat the arguments that the hon. member for Winnipeg South so ably presented. It has never been my feeling that as a member of parliament I should just parrot ideas that have already been expressed. Unless I have something new to say, then I do not feel it is necessary for me to say anything at all. However, I believe that there could be a little time spent looking at this proposed section 336, particularly at subsection (2) in which 150 per cent of the variable cost figure is set as a fixed rate applicable to the carriage of goods.

I think it ought to be understood by everyone that this figure of 150 per cent is a pragmatic one arrived at in actual fact by the MacPherson commission. The commission merely took a large number of cases, considered what they thought would be the normal cost factor, and then added to this 150 per cent of the variable cost, feeling that this would set a rather fair rate on which to evaluate total costs. But as I say, it is a pragmatic figure and consequently is open to the usual complaint which may be levelled against such figures. That is to say, it is a judgment figure and depends on the people who make the judgment. Therefore there is no reason why we should arrive at the same judgment.

While I hesitate to set any figure, I do think that we should very much qualify this figure in our minds in view of the fact that it is pragmatic and today, some years after the recommendations made by the MacPherson commission, could well be a figure that is not suitable at all.

The other point I have already made, and which I want to re-emphasize before I sit down, is that in subsection 3(C) the "cost of carriage of the goods concerned" is calculated on the basis of carloads of 30,000 pounds. Let me once more emphasize that I think that this is a completely fictitious figure, one that was arrived at in a manner that was not appropriate, and as a result I think it invalidates practically the whole of the section. For these reasons I find myself compelled to agree with the hon. member for Medicine Hat that this section should be eliminated; I also agree with him that clause 16 would discharge all of the functions described in this section, and I think would discharge them better and with less difficulty.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, I will be only a few minutes. I am going to re-emphasize some of the thoughts expressed by the hon. member for Kindersley, who has just taken his seat. In one of his frequent interventions this afternoon—we appreciate, of course, that after yesterday there is some excitement—the minister referred to the evidence of Professor George Borts and Professor Ernest Williams. These two experts were brought to the hearings by the provinces of Alberta and Manitoba, and the maritime provinces, They were said to be the main spokesmen on this proposed section 336; at least that was their billing. Mr. Frawley and others deferred most of their questions because they said that these two professors would provide the technical answers on this very important section.

• (8:10 p.m.)

I am not going to go through their evidence, Mr. Chairman, or to place anything but a very small paragraph on the record. Let me take, for example, the beginning of Mr. Williams' evidence. He talked of this new legislation eliminating control over the rate level, and he referred to the level of earnings not being provided for in the legislation. I am not quarreling with anything; I am mentioning this as one of the dangers that it was mentioned was contained in this legislation. Then he talked about the inadequate protection that section 336 gives the captive shippers, those who do not have competitive alternatives. He mentioned an old favourite of mine—it of course has reference to the maritimes—when he said that truck competition alone is not an effective competitive alternative for the large bulk shippers. That of course brings up the main topic of my brief intervention.

I have another matter about which I want to speak. The professor said that the railroads will not of their own volition adopt a policy that will impede economic growth, but where competition is increasing they are compelled to take action to look after their own interests.

Having paraphrased Professor Williams' remarks I want to state my objection to this section. I have already stated it before the committee, and it applies to the large, bulk, captive shipper. I had an opportunity during the last two weeks to speak at some length with two large, bulk shippers in Canada, and what they said reinforced my view. To start with, we know that the 30,000 pound level has been the basis of this legislation. It was evidently brought about because of some simliar figure in the trucking world. But, Mr. Chairman, we have gone above the 140,000 or 150,000 pound level.

An hon. Member: It is 30,000.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): It is 30,000; but I know that large bulk shippers out west are up to 130,000 pounds or more in their shipments.

An hon. Member: They are up to 200,000 pounds.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): As the hon. member for Kindersley has said, they are up to 200,000 pounds. I want to put a table on the record. It is in minutes of proceedings No. 40, of November 24, 1966, of the committee on transport and communications. The table I refer to is a table of maximum rates that Professor Borts put on the record, with projections he was able to gather from previous evidence. He admitted it was not completely accurate but it was the basis of discussion. The professor got up to 130,000 pounds in his comparative weights, and he referred to the variable costs and the formula employed.

The fifth column is significant because in this he dealt with the percentage of mark-up over actual variable costs, and he went up to a mark-up of 467 per cent. I hope hon. members note that; this is the crux of the bill in my opinion. To this provision the province of Manitoba objected. I know that the hon. member for Winnipeg South dealt extensively and well with this.

If there is a mark-up of 467 per cent on 130,000 pounds, how great is the mark up on 200,000 pounds? Where is the saving from bulk shipments? The province of Manitoba claims that the bulk shippers—and I have verified this privately—will negotiate with the railways, the Canadian National or the Canadian Pacific in the competitive way the minister and the railways have said is desirable. Rates will be set and bulk products, of which we hold a near monopoly in world markets, will be shipped. That could continue successfully for two or three years. But supposing competition sets in from other sources, and the shippers look at their balance sheets at the end of the year; and supposing they see that they did not lose money, but that they did not make as much as they ought to have made: What will happen, Mr. Chairman? The shippers will not declare themselves captive or go through the other remedies of this legislation; they are in day-to-day communication with the railways. The shippers will attempt to pass their losses down through the line, and their losses will affect labour, the municipalities, and the economy of the west.

This is the big objection to this bill, and its great weakness. Hon. members may say, "Well, what can we do? We have provided the means for these bulk shippers; what can we do? They can declare themselves captive or go to clause 16, which is now available for captive shippers." Perhaps if they did that it would be enough for this committee. I say, however, that that will not take place, except in theory. That is why the province of Manitoba could not say it knew of shippers who will declare themselves captive and who will be aggrieved under the section. As I say, losses will filter through the economy of the west and this section will mean a false use being made of the resources in Canada.

To finish this argument, I asked a question of Professor Borts at the committee hearing —I am still referring to minutes of proceedings No. 40—which embodied the argument I am trying to advance tonight, and the professor said this at page 2871:

> Well, this has been one of the major reasons that the railways have traditionally been able to charge certain high burdens for certain classes of shippers. In other words, that they have always been in a position where—depending on the nature of the regulatory environment, of course, they have always been in a position where they can bargain with a shipper over the rate, and try to bargain in a way where they do the best in terms of the revenue of the railway. Now, this is the traditional way in which railway overheads have been recovered. I think the difficulty with that—there are two difficulties with that; one I have already stated —is that it does lead to a degree of economic inefficiency in the economy in a sense that different shippers are paying different mark-ups. Secondly, it does not allow for the possibility that over time as the shippers markets get more competitive themselves, the shippers are less able to pass these rates on to their own customers.

That is the end of the quotation. He goes on to talk of how the railways collect a burden, and there is sympathy for the railway in this regard. The point is that the burden is passed on to the general economy, perhaps more to western Canada than to eastern Canada.

[Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert).]

• (8:20 p.m.)

This is the great evil caused by new section 336. The C.P.R. and the C.N.R. have made a great case about our misuse of Canadian resources and about the responsibility they have to develop resources to the best advantage of the country, some of these resources having been given to them in perpetuity during the early days of confederation. But if this new section is going to result in misuse of resources and an unhealthy competitive position for industry, it will affect the economy of the country both in the west and in the east.

The minister may talk as much as he likes, but the remedies we have are not going to deal with the situation. I shall support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Medicine Hat and I hope that further amendments will be offered to deal with this anomaly.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Chairman, following our months of hard work to arrive at a new transportation policy it is regrettable that we have not been able to agree on changes to this clause. Many of the briefs presented to our standing committee dealt with this part of the bill, which is one of the most important portions of it.

The old legislation provided that there would be no discrimination caused by freight rates and provided for equalization of rates, but the brief presented by the Alberta government has shown how we are giving up that protection. As recorded in volume 23 of the standing committee proceedings, even the Minister of Transport himself said he had some doubt about the wisdom of allowing the railways to charge as much as they liked in those areas where they had a monopoly.

This clause, and clause 16, deal with the protection a shipper may receive. Under the Railway Act the onus was placed on the railways to prove that a freight rate increase was necessary, would not be discriminatory and would apply equally to all shippers. This clause now places that onus on the shippers. A shipper must prove that he is being charged an unfair, discriminatory rate, a rate unequal to that given his competitor. He must prove he is a captive shipper and that 100 per cent of his goods have to be transported by rail.

Until this bill is passed, whenever that may be, next week, next month or three months from now, the onus remains on the railways to prove that rate increases will not be discriminatory. But as I say, when this bill becomes law, the shipper must prove he is being charged a discriminatory rate and one that is unequal to that which is charged his competitor. Instead of powerful corporations like the railways having to prove something, it will be an individual, or an individual company, which will have to prove he or it is a captive shipper, that the rate he or it is charged is discriminatory, and should be examined by the commission.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the hon. gentleman is really right in his second assertion. If anyone is a captive shipper he is surely entitled to ask to have a maximum rate set, if he wants to, under this clause, regardless of whether there is any discrimination. Discrimination is covered in clause 16 but not in this clause.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): The minister is confusing the issue. Surely he is not arguing that under this clause one can apply to be a captive shipper. Does not a person have to prove he is a captive shipper?

Mr. Pickersgill: He has to assert he is, that is all. He can say, "I live on a railway line. There is no other way of transporting my goods except by railway line". That, by definition, makes him a captive shipper. He does not have to prove anything else.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. Horner (Acadia): The minister and I are disagreeing on the definitions of the words "assert" and "prove". There is not much variation between these two words when it comes to a matter that is reviewed in court, and this bill will be setting up one of the highest courts in the land. A shipper cannot apply and say, "I want to be a captive shipper".

Mr. Pickersgill: He just says he is.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): To quote the minister's exact words, he has to assert that he is, and I said he has to prove he is, in the practical sense. I do not think there is so much difference between the two words. For example, if one did a poor job in proving oneself to be a captive shipper, he would fail in asserting that he was a captive shipper.

The Manitoba government presented a very detailed brief, over 200 pages long, attacking various clauses in this bill, and this particular one at length. I know some hon. members have referred to the brief prepared on behalf of the Alberta and maritime governments and presented by Dr. Borts and Dr. Ernest W. Williams, and I think it would be worth while putting on record why these two professors were accepted as experts by the standing committee. Dr. Ernest W. Williams was Professor of Transportation of the Graduate School of Business at Columbia University, New York, where he has been teaching transportation since 1947. He holds the degrees of B.S., M.S. and Ph.D. from Columbia University. His United States government employment has been principally as follows: 1940 to 1942, general editor of the study of transportation and national policy for the United States National Resources Planning Board; 1942 to 1944, program bureau, United States War Production Board in the matter of materiel requirements claimed by the office of defence transportation; 1945 to 1947, fiscal analyst, United States Bureau of the Budget, specializing in transportation matters; 1954 to 1955, member of the task force, cabinet committee on transportation policy and organization; 1959 to 1960, chief, transportation policy survey, United States Department of Commerce. Here is a man who can go anywhere and state categorically that he is a proven expert in the field of transportation.

What did Dr. Williams think of this particular clause? He thought, as the amendment suggests, that it should be thrown out. You do not have to take the word of the mover of the amendment or my word that this be thrown out. Here is an expert who says that this clause offers no protection to anyone who could assert or prove that he is a captive shipper. Perhaps in fairness to the other expert, Dr. Borts, I should read the statement in respect of his experience in this field. He is equally as distinguished. There is no doubt that he arrived at the same conclusion.

In his brief Dr. Williams outlined a number of reasons for his view that this particular part of the clause should not be accepted. It is interesting to note what the mining association had to say with regard to this particular clause. The minister said that this clause offers a protection to all concerned, even to those who find themselves in the position of what might be characterized as captive shipper. I should like to read briefly a series of questions and answers which appear at page 2483 of minutes of proceedings and evidence No. 37 of the standing committee on transport and communications when Mr. J. C. Coyne was appearing on behalf of the Mining Association of Canada. Certainly one would expect Mr. Coyne to give a fair and equitable appraisal of a bill to be passed by this government. Mr. Coyne was asked this question:

Mr. Coyne, your general brief deals with your concern about the mining industry and the captive position of the mining industry.

The railroads told the committee that the competition in the marketplace would take care of your mining, or industries like yours. What do you think of this competition at the marketplace? You suggest that competition is not present throughout the country, or something like that. You made that statement.

Mr. Coyne replied "yes" and then the questioning by Mr. Horner continued:

What about the competition at the marketplace using the railroad's expression?

Perhaps I should explain that both railways have pointed out at great length that it was unlikely that anyone really would qualify as a captive shipper. It is all well and good for the minister to say that anyone can apply for protection under this clause if he can assert that he is a captive shipper, but here we have the representatives of the railways saying they would be very surprised if there are any captive shippers or that anyone could be declared to be a captive shipper under this clause. The railways also said that if such a case arose and there were captive shippers, they could then exert their pressure in the marketplace and that by the volume of goods it could be deemed that there was competition in the marketplace. Mr. Coyne fully understood this and said:

I think I can make a comment on that, Mr. Horner, although you will appreciate that I, personally, am neither a miner nor a traffic man.

I think the members of this association understand and recognize the point which has been made, I believe, by the railways, and also, perhaps, by the minister—

The minister also referred a number of times to the marketplace. Mr. Coyne continued:

—to the effect that some of the large diversified mining companies, by virtue of what I think Mr. Gordon called market competition, have been, and will likely continue to be, able to negotiate with the railways and to receive rates under which they can ship their products to market.

If all companies were of this size, or had particular advantages of location, or were diversified to the extent of some of the enormous integrated companies, then I think one could say that the point had been made. But I think what we are emphasizing here is that the category of mining company which has been referred to in this context, does not by any means cover all of the mining companies, and particularly the members of this association.

[Mr. Horner (Acadia).]

Mr. Horner (Acadia): In other words, you are saying that your association is afraid that there may not be competition at the marketplace to take care of all the mining companies which may be wanting to start up or have already started?

Mr. Coyne: Precisely; and we also take the position that the formula as proposed provides a ceiling so far up in the sky that it would provide no protection.

This is what Mr. Coyne, a spokesman for the mining association, had to say. In recent years mining has become a major part of the economy of Canada. Mines have been opened up in the prairie provinces. A potash mine has opened up in Saskatchewan. We have the iron ore in Labrador and northern Quebec. New mines have opened up in northern Quebec and also in northern Manitoba. Today mining plays a very necessary part in the economy of Canada. Mining always has played an important part in our economy but today it is doing so in a bigger way.

I notice that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is paying particular attention to this. I am pleased that he is here. He knows the worth of the minerals which are mined in Canada today. This industry to a certain extent must be protected because many mines are located in isolated areas. What protection does this offer? In the interpretation of Mr. Gordon and Mr. Sinclair it offers the protection that if a mine is as powerful and influential as a big major railway company, it can say to this railway company that it is going to ship a certain amount of goods over the railway line from its parent company. Therefore it can say, "Either you give the new mine we are opening up in northern Quebec a favourable rate, or we will find some other way of transporting the product of the parent company." This is what Mr. Gordon referred to as competition in the marketplace.

• (8:40 p.m.)

What about a new mine that does not have a parent company? The former minister of finance said that there should be new companies in this country and that they should be controlled by Canadians. What about a situation like that? What power could such new companies bring to bear in so far as competition in the marketplace is concerned? It would be very little. This is the question Mr. Coyne is answering in this committee as reported in proceedings No. 37. He is speaking on behalf of the Mining Association of Canada. At the bottom of page 2483 he is reported as saying:

Precisely; and we also take the position that the formula as proposed provides a ceiling so far up in the sky that it would provide no protection.

It is very clear that the ceiling is so far up in the sky it would provide no protection. Now, that is exactly the amount of protection this clause provides for our new-found mineral wealth in this country.

Let us look at this a little more closely. The onus has been shifted from the railway companies to the shippers. We have the protection of the marketplace provided for those mining companies which have huge parent companies. However we find there is no protection whatever for the new, budding mining companies. We find that the individual shipper has to prove he is a captive shipper and he must designate that 100 per cent of his commodity has to move by that railroad.

At this point I think it is worth while to emphasize what we are giving up in the old act, and what we are to receive under this new bill. I should like to refer to four points that are set out on page 12 of the Alberta government brief. The first point is:

> That tolls shall always be charged equally to all persons if circumstances and conditions are substantially similar;

This was what was written into the old section 317 of the Railway Act. In other words, if two companies are manufacturing similar commodities and those commodities are hauled equal distances, then the rates would have to be the same. There could be no discrimination. The second point is:

> That there be no discriminatory increase or reduction in tolls in favour of or against any user;

In other words, if you are going to give one company an agreed charge you must give the other company the same rate or that agreed charge is out. The third point is:

> That tolls must not unjustly discriminate between different localities;

In other words, if you have a manufacturing company in southern Ontario and one in northern Ontario whose products are hauled over the same railroad for the same distance, those rates shall be the same. There shall not be a preferred rate for one company in one locality and a discriminatory rate for the other. The fourth point is:

> That, unless the board is satisfied, no toll must be higher for a shorter than for a longer distance.

These four points which were contained in the old section 317 have been practically wiped out in clause 16 and this proposed section. I mentioned the fact that a shipper must prove that 100 per cent of his commodity is captive. Let us remember that under this particular formula, if one asserts that he is a captive shipper, the board may then set a rate which could be 150 per cent of the variable cost. What is the railway trying to prove when this rate is set as high as that? Dr. Borts and Mr. Williams both said that nowhere in the MacPherson report could they ascertain why the MacPherson commission established this 150 per cent formula. Why was it not 100 per cent? What was the purpose in setting it at 150 per cent? Well, Dr. Borts and Mr. Williams, who have made exhaustive studies in the transport field throughout the years, could not find anything in the MacPherson report to tell them why the 150 per cent figure was chosen.

Before I leave the subject of discriminatory rates being eliminated by this clause, perhaps I should read what Mr. Williams has said about a similar situation in the United States. We in this country must learn from those who have gone ahead and from those who have perhaps had more experience in this particular field in which we are trying to break new ground with this legislation. Mr. Williams said this, as reported in proceedings No. 40, page 2849, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert:

> Well, the situation in the United States is certainly very different because we have varieties of competition within the railroad orbit that you do not have in Canada, and could not have, with two railroads principally operating and serving transcontinentally and very largely the same territories. We have a great deal of competition between railroads, not necessarily in parallel traffic, but competition in which one railroad serving shippers in one area of the country seems to put them into competition with another railroad serving shippers elsewhere; and that has been a very forceful type of competition, which was part of the reason that we thought that perhaps we could dispense with exact rate control.
>
> On the other hand, we have never had any confidence that we could dispense with control of discrimination, since discrimination is the kind of thing that is generated by differences in the force of competition, or by the absence of competition in one circumstance and its presence in others, and we still have a variety of circumstances of that kind.

What Mr. Williams was saying in that paragraph was that the United States has more railroads, so the competition is greater and they have done away with exact rate control. This bill does away with exact rate control. It also does away, to some extent, with the right to claim discrimination which was provided in the old act. Mr. Williams says that they have more competition and more railroads, that they have a greater variety of shipments from different localities, but in the United States they have not done away with any control over discrimination. There is no question about this man being an expert because he has spent practically his whole life in the field of transportation in that country.

• (8:50 p.m.)

This is what gives rise to a great deal of my concern about whether or not this legislation is moving in the right direction. The MacPherson commission studied the whole question and their report deals at some length with the fact the railroads need financial help. The railroads were in a serious financial position and needed to be helped out. Yesterday I said that without a doubt, on January 9 when the minister outlined this proposal an arrangement had been made with the railroads that if they would do this they would be given greater leeway with regard to freight rates, and would be allowed to improve their financial position. I think it is only right to bear these remarks in mind when one considers what the MacPherson report really had in mind in setting out its objectives in respect of maximum rate control. The summary of those objectives is to be found at page 98 of volume II of the report. The objectives of a maximum rate control formula were as follows:

1. It must limit the impact of railway monopoly upon shippers.

2. It fails in its purpose if it is seriously detrimental to the revenue position of the railways.

That objective really needs no more emphasis. Perhaps that is why the government made the maximum rate formula very high and set it at 150 per cent above variable costs. Perhaps they did not want to come near any position which would be detrimental to the revenue position of the railroads. The third objective is stated as follows:

It must be flexible enough to reflect at intervals the changes in railway costs which will occur with the rationalization of plant and services.

This formula is very, very flexible. It is so high in the sky, to quote Mr. Coyne, that it will have no effect whatsoever. Therefore it is flexible enough, and we can check that requisite off in this summary of objectives. The fourth objective is:

It should leave incentives for efficiency with the railways and offer incentives to the captive shippers to use transportation as economically as they would in a competitive environment.

This clause encourages captive shippers to do everything but seek the protection of the maximum rate control formula; that is what it means. In order for this formula to offer any protection, a shipper must assert and prove that he is captive. With the passage of this clause the onus is on the shipper to apply, assert and prove that he is captive. This bill takes away a great deal of incentive in this area.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted for his speech has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. gentleman has a few more observations to make, and we should like to hear them.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to continue his speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I find the committee very co-operative tonight and I will try to limit my remarks. I know very well that I shall be making another speech on this clause anyway. The fifth objective in respect of the maximum rate control formula, which is to be found at page 99 of the report of the MacPherson royal commission, is as follows:

It must be in keeping with newer ratemaking practices.

The whole philosophy of this bill is competition. The root hogs that are big enough to live, will survive; those that are not big enough to do so will die. I suppose this is in keeping with the helter-skelter, come-hell-or-high-water philosophy of competition. Freight rates are going up and up. The only people who can survive are those who use air transport, can afford to buy a truck of their own or can make use of the intervention of a pipe line. The sixth objective in respect of this formula reads this way:

It must not be in conflict with the optimum allocation of resources in transportation.

This formula will not affect those people who are located in the right place. If you are not located in the right place, you are out of luck. That is the summary of the objectives of the MacPherson royal commission. I will not re-read them; I will just emphasize that the summary of the objectives of a maximum rate formula was, first, to remove all control that would seriously affect the revenue position of the railroads. This objective has been stated as plainly as possible. The purpose is that it should not be seriously detrimental to the revenue position of the railways. I say to the minister that after reading the whole of the second volume of the report of the MacPherson royal commission I could find nothing to substantiate the allowance of 150 per cent above variable costs that is set out in this formula.

The committee on transportation listened to the evidence of Dr. Borts and Dr. Williams, who said they had read the report of the MacPherson royal commission and they, too, could find nothing to substantiate why this formula was arrived at. In fact, I think Dr. Borts suggested that there should be another provision in this bill rather than the 150 per cent, some formula that would gauge the permissive level of earnings in respect of a person declared to be a captive shipper.

I do not want to continue at length with this question, Mr. Chairman, although I could do so. I do not want to engender any animosity in the house. I raise these matters because I am greatly concerned about this particular clause. I could find nothing to substantiate the inclusion of the 30,000 pounds figure in this clause, other than the fact that the trucking industry was accepted as the competitor of the railway industry. I notice that the Chairman is giving me some sceptical looks, so I shall be very brief.

In the economic swirl in which Canada finds itself today with regard to the transportation industry, the railroads set the rates and the trucking industry stays at a figure just below those rates. The trucking industry does not set the rates; the railways do. So the 30,000 pounds figure, related to trucking, was wrong and should never have been accepted. There should be competitive rate setting in the transportation field. We have made great strides forward in air transport in recent years. We have seen the intervention of DC-8 jets. We shall in the very near future see the intervention of DC-10 jets. The top half of these planes will be filled with passengers and the bottom half with air freight. These airplanes represent a large investment for the air line companies. Air lines are the only people who will bring any kind of honesty into the rate setting procedures of freight rates in this day and age.

We should not set a fictitious figure of 30,000 pounds in connection with this formula. The railways rarely have one box car hauling 30,000 pounds. If anyone doubts this statement he has only to look at the C.N.R. equipment catalogues and study the tonnage hauled by their cars. Thirty thousand pounds is 15 tons. These cars can carry up to a maximum of 170 tons. The smallest car of the C.N.R. hauls something like 45,000 pounds. Why accept a figure of 30,000 pounds and provide for an allowance of 150 per cent above the variable cost figure? The inclusion of these figures in a formula cannot be substantiated, as was suggested by Dr. Borts and Dr. Williams.

Why does the minister doggedly hold on and maintain this particular clause in the bill? No one in the committee who was involved in the examination of the witnesses who testified before it on this aspect of the matter can understand why the minister does not amend the clause.

The only conclusion I can reach is that the matter was so difficult and complicated that he did not know where to start to improve it, and did not like to lose face by wiping it out altogether. I am grateful to you, Mr. Chairman, and the committee for having allowed me to continue my remarks. Hon. members may rest assured that we are not prepared to accept this clause as it now stands. We will be speaking to it again. I will certainly be speaking further in this regard, because this is a very important part of the transportation legislation.

• (9:00 p.m.)

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Amendment (Mr. Olson) negatived: yeas, 33; nays, 56.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Sherman: Mr. Chairman, a good deal has already been said in the debate on this particular clause about captive shippers and the application of the maximum rate control formula. I was considerably interested in the proposed amendment that was just moved by the hon. member for Medicine Hat and in his presentation of the facts in support of that amendment. I was in favour of that amendment because I believe that on balance the legislation would have been improved. In view of the fact that the amendment has failed, it is my intention at this juncture to submit an amendment of my own. It pertains to the subject of the captive shipper and his identification. I think the hon. member for Acadia isolated the key issue contained in this particular clause of the proposed legislation when he said that Professors Borts and Williams, and other experts who contributed to the highly reasoned briefs submitted to the standing committee by officials of the provinces of Manitoba, Alberta and other provinces, could find no reason whatever for selecting either the 150 per cent formula or the arbitrary 30,000 pound carload lot figure. Both those elements in the proposed legislation are insupportable, and so is the nebulous, vague and indefinable way in which we are supposed to arrive at a conclusion as to the identity of the captive shipper under this legislation.

The Freight Rates Reduction Act, as was pointed out by officials of the province of Manitoba, was introduced after the last general freight rate increase to alleviate the burdens carried by class and non-competitive commodities shippers. As was pointed out by officials of my province, to exclude these shippers from the category of captive shipper would be a retrograde step. I submit that that is what the proposed legislation does. It excludes the class and non-competitive commodities shippers from the category of captive shippers. It makes it necessary for them to assert, as the hon. member for Acadia said, or to prove—if you prefer this word—that they are indeed captive shippers.

It is therefore my intention to move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa:

That the following new subsection be added, as subsection (1) (b), to section 336, as follows:

A shipper of goods in respect of which the rates in effect on the 1st day of January 1965, were class and commodity rates subject to the Freight Rates Reduction Act, shall be deemed to have no alternative, effective and competitive service by a common carrier other than a rail carrier or carriers or combination of rail carriers.

The minister was aware, from the remarks I made earlier this afternoon, that I intended to move this amendment unless advised otherwise. It was my contention at the time that perhaps I should give the minister time to ponder it. I have taken the liberty of acting now on the intention that I made known at that time. If the minister is in a position to speak on my amendment, I would appreciate hearing from him at this time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not taking exception to the amendment being moved, so perhaps it should be put and then I would like to speak on it.

The Chairman: It is moved by Mr. Sherman that the following new subsection be added as subsection (1) (b) to section 336 of clause 53:

A shipper of goods in respect of which the rates in effect on the 1st day of January 1965, were class and commodity rates subject to the Freight Rates Reduction Act, shall be deemed to have no alternative, effective and competitive service by a common carrier other than a rail carrier or carriers or combination of rail carriers.

[Mr. Sherman.]

May I point out to the committee that this would necessitate the renumbering of the present subclause 1 as subclause 1(a).

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to speak at length on this proposed amendment. The government of Manitoba submitted a voluminous and interesting brief. As the hon. gentleman pointed out when he spoke this afternoon, the position it took was supported by at least two expert witnesses from the United States whose testimony is recorded in proceedings No. 40 of the committee, to which I myself alluded this afternoon.

• (9:10 p.m.)

I hope I will not be considered to be reflecting in any way upon the expertise of those two expert witnesses when I say they were fundamentally opposed to the whole principle of the bill. They both indicated very clearly they did not believe in competition, but rather in the United States system of regulation and setting of rates by regulatory bodies. Since they entirely rejected the very concept of the bill it is perhaps not very surprising that they found fault with individual features of it.

Notwithstanding that fact Professor Borts made some calculations, to which I referred before—and I do not want to be repetitive but I will likely refer to them again—by which he indicated that small shippers from 15 to 35 tons would be very apt under the maximum rate formula to pay a lower rate, even with the freight rate reduction principle in effect, than they are now paying. It would indicate they would be paying a much lower rate than they would be paying if the rollback had not taken place and higher rates were established.

I am very glad the committee did not see fit to accept the amendment to wipe out this clause altogether, because we should have some regard for these small shippers, even though this maximum rate formula will not give any particular advantage to bulk shippers. It was never designed or intended to do that, and I made that very clear at the time the committee was sitting. All the bulk commodity rates will be rates below present maximum rates, and for that reason one would not expect the new maximum rate formula to apply to shippers who are not paying the maximum rate now. Therefore I cannot see any logic or reason in the suggestion that we should have a maximum rate formula which would apply to a group of shippers who are not now paying maximum rates.

Perhaps I should also point out that by accepting the hon. gentleman's definition we would also make this bill meaningless, because anyone who wished to do so could become a captive shipper if his rate was now frozen, and that would take in about half the shippers. The other shippers whose rates are not frozen are now paying competitive rates.

The whole purpose of this bill, in so far as it extends competition and enables the railway companies to go out and look for business, would be lost if indeed anyone took advantage of the definition the hon. gentleman has offered. Of course this would depend upon whether the shipper thought that other parts of the bill, which someone probably intends to attempt to amend, were amended.

The hon. member for Acadia and the hon. member for Medicine Hat made it very clear earlier that the maximum rate formula envisaged here would not offer an alternative which would be more attractive to the bulk shippers than the rates they are now paying. Therefore I do not think any maximum rate formula we could possibly write into the legislation would meet the situation of bulk shippers. I recognize that there appears to be some strengthening required of the protection given to bulk shippers over and above that which was in the law as originally drafted and sent back by the committee. I did accept an amendment to clause 16 which I think generally met with the satisfaction of the committee.

I am in agreement with the hon. member for Medicine Hat, that far and away the greater number of those shippers whose rates are not frozen will, by the amendment to clause 16, be afforded the kind of protection which I think will be effective, and as a result of which they will have no recourse to this section. I might point out that there were more than 1,400,000 carload shipments in the year 1965 which moved under class and commodity rates. Many of those carloads would be duplicates and I am not suggesting for a minute there were 1,400,000 different applications to the commission. I am suggesting, however, that if the maximum rate formula itself was made attractive, and it looked more attractive than the rate which could be bargained for, the amount of rate fixing that would be required would be almost beyond the capacity of any commission.

The only conclusion that I can come to from all of this is that we might just as well scrap all the rate making provisions of the bill and leave the law as it is, and just allow horizontal increases, rather than attempt that bureaucratic task of an overwhelming magnitude that would be involved if the hon. gentleman's amendment were accepted. In other words, I believe it would provide no real protection for shippers at all, but rather would create a state of administrative delay which would be totally intolerable. For that reason I think it is very undesirable.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I should like to ask a question on this general subject. I do so because the minister seems to be in an expensive mood. He probably had a turkey sandwich for supper.

Mr. Pickersgill: I ate beef.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Perhaps he is full of himself because he finally won a vote. I want to ask the minister whether he would answer the specific question I asked earlier, and about which I made a full speech. Supposing a large bulk shipper did not go captive or take advantage of the other remedy, what is the minister's answer to the high rate which would be set for western Canada? How are we going to justify that to Canadian people as parliamentarians?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not have much difficulty in that regard, because practically all shippers of bulk commodities in this country today have rates which are below the present maximum rates. They have obtained these rates at one time or another in one way or another from the railway companies, and I do not see why the railway companies would be apt to change that pattern. A great many of these shippers have agreed charges. If the hon. member will look at the transport act he will see that any agreed charge given to one shipper must be published and, in like circumstances, must be given to another shipper. Under the new section 16, if a shipper alleges and can make a prima facie case that an undue advantage has been given to a shipper in like circumstances, he can have his rate altered by the commission following a hearing.

As a result of those two provisions it is my view that there is adequate protection for shippers of bulk commodities, but I do not think without clause 16 there would be adequate protection. It may be that there will be very few shippers who actually apply for a rate as a captive shipper. The fact that they can apply and that that ceiling is known to be there will, I think, induce the railways in most cases to set rates rather below these maximum rates. I think in that way it will provide protection in isolated areas where there is a genuine state of captivity on the part of small shippers.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Sherman: The minister says that shippers can apply for captive status. My interpretation of this is that these shippers have to apply. It is not a case of their being able to apply; it is mandatory and they must apply.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, no. If the hon. gentleman reads the clause carefully he will see that no shipper can apply until he has first gone to the railway and asked for a rate. If he is dissatisfied with the rate or thinks it is too high, and if he has no alternative way of shipping his goods, then he can apply. It could well be that a shipper is shipping two commodities, one of which is, say, packaged goods or something of that sort for which there is a trucking service he could use. He might also be shipping something else which was not economical to ship by truck and he could become captive in respect of one commodity and not in respect of the other.

All he would have to do to establish his captive status is to show that there is no other carrier to carry his goods at a reasonable rate. This would be an assertion of captivity. He would then furnish the rate which the railway company had offered him and say that it is too high and that he would like a rate established under the maximum rate formula. If his assertions are accurate—and they are not very complicated things to prove—then it is the duty of the commission to set a maximum rate for him.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I will be very brief. I think the minister made an assertion which was a little unfair and perhaps he did not mean it. If I understood him correctly, he said that Professor Borts and Professor Williams, who I suggest were the chief cost accountant advisers to the provinces at the hearings, were in fact against the principle of the bill; that they were against having rates set by competition and in fact were in favour of having rates set by an authority that has control.

I do not think it is fair to say this. I think what they said was that section 336 did not provide any effective maximum rate control; that in areas where there was no economic competition in the transportation field it was desirable to have an authority that could impose this kind of control. As far as I am concerned they certainly did not say that they were against competition in the field of transportation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, my other point briefly is this. I am in a quandary about what to do with this amendment to section 336. I think the section should have been taken out completely and that all the shippers in Canada should rely on the provisions of clause 16. I say that for the reason given by the hon. member for Springfield, namely that as long as section 336 is in the bill we will be under some illusion that there is a formula for setting a maximum rate control. I am really worried about this. As long as it is in the bill the board may be tempted to use this formula rather than the old basis of fairness, being just, and so on. The figure of 150 per cent based on a carload weight of 30,000 pounds is a fictitious figure; the weight of 30,000 pounds may not be the weight used, and to this extent the figure is not fair. In view of this, Mr. Chairman, and having regard to the vote that was just taken, I suppose that the next best thing to do, if we are to have section 336 in the bill, is to try to repair it, amend it or modify it so that it does have some use.

The minister worries about the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg South, in that it may make the clause useless to a small group of shippers who are now shipping under class rates. I do not think that this is the case because, as I read the amendment—and I admit that I may not have understood the different shades of meaning of its interpretation—it does not appear to me that this is the only way in which a shipper can plead for captive status. It partly defines what is a captive shipper, but surely this is not the only basis on which a shipper may attempt to claim captivity and ask the board to invoke the provisions of the bill.

So far as commodity rates being included in the definition under the provisions of section 336 are concerned, I agree with the minister. I do not think this would have any practical value whatever, first of all because the formula, once you get up into 100,000 or 150,000 pound carloads, or in some cases up to 300,000 pound carloads, would simply be quite unrealistic and would have no practical effect.

I am not going to become involved in any further debate on this matter, Mr. Chairman, but I do believe that the core and heart of this bill has now been transferred to clause 16. When this bill was first introduced in the house and debated in the standing committee, I believe that all of the maximum rate control which is so essential to bulk commodities moving into and out of western Canada, northern Quebec and the maritimes hinged on section 336. This is the case no longer. When we began our hearings in the standing committee there was no clause 16, at least in its present form; I am sure the minister agrees with that. Therefore, although we used to talk about the most essential part of the bill being section 336, I believe it is now clause 16, at least as far as bulk shipments or what are usually referred to as commodity rates are concerned.

Perhaps we ought to try to fix this thing up; but even if this section 336 is fixed up so as to provide a better definition of what is meant by captive status, as long as the figure of 150 per cent and the weights used in this section remain, I do not believe the section would have any practical value in respect to the heavier carload shipments in which we are primarily interested.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Would the minister look at the last page of No. 40 of the minutes of proceedings of the committee, where he will see the projections put on the record by the professors. This has a bearing on the point I am trying to make. Would the minister look at the figure of 130,000 pounds. The mark-up over actual variable cost amounts to 467 per cent. The minister said that all of these special arrangements are always made at low levels, etc.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Going on the basis that there is validity to these mark-ups, considering that we are well above the 130,000 pound figure, with mark-ups up to 700 per cent, where is the protection for the Canadian economy if the shipper does not declare himself captive? What will happen then? I admit perhaps that this instance is not fully our responsibility; we have provided a remedy, and I do not disagree with the hon. member for Medicine Hat. Let us hope the remedy works. Supposing the shipper does not declare himself captive, how shall we make certain that that does not completely disrupt the economy of the country, bringing about a corresponding misuse of our resources?

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to try to answer the hon. gentleman's question. I think the hon. member for Medicine Hat has already answered it. Once of the great advantages of having the proceedings in the standing committee was that all of us, I think, knew more about this subject when those proceedings were over than when they started. Certainly I knew more. I learned many things in that committee and much from the arguments of hon. gentleman opposite, and particularly the very persistent arguments on this clause by the hon. member for Medicine Hat, who persisted, I might say on one or two occasions in a way I thought exasperating—and I say that, as a former member of this house used to say, in a kindly way.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I hope he gets the blame if this does not work.

Mr. Pickersgill: The other evening in the committee the hon. member for Peace River raised some doubt about whether clause 16, as it came out of the committee, still was strong enough. We further strengthened that clause, here.

I believe the hon. member for Medicine Hat is perfectly right when he says that clause 16 protects commodity shippers. I have never pretended that this table is anything more significant than an arithmetic exercise. It is no more significant than an arithmetic exercise showing that 50 per cent of all savings effected by the larger shippers goes to the shippers and not the railway. I do not believe those things are relevant, because I do not think the shippers of bulk commodities will use section 336 at all. I do not think they will need to use it.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Then why did the minister ask from the province of Manitoba the names of captive shippers, when he admits that no shippers will use the section?

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not take the position, and I never have said that no one would use section 336. All I say is I do not know of any shipper who will use it. I think, had there been many shippers who were really worried about this legislation, we should have heard from them.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Every brief presented has shouted this.

Mr. Pickersgill: There were a few briefs from the mining association, and from the Wabush Company and one or two others who were captive shippers in the—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I wish the minister—

Mr. Pickersgill: I wish the hon. member would allow me to be as consecutive as I allow him to be. Four or five shippers in the whole country asserted they were captive shippers, and they were, in the sense in which they asserted their claim—that they had no alternative to shipping by rail. I do not think any of them were the kinds of shippers for whom it would be possible to devise any realistic maximum under a formula. Instead of trying to find a maximum rate formula for shippers of huge quantities of bulk commodities, you would have to say that you were giving the commission the power to set such rates.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): That is the weakness of the philosophy.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is the difference between those who believe in competition and those who believe in regulation. There are many people in this country and quite a few in this house who do not honestly believe that competition should be permitted in transport, in any commodity in which they are interested. They think competition is fine for somebody else, but not for themselves. I think, if we examine ourselves, we shall find that an awful lot of us really take that attitude.

Mr. Sherman: With the experience of bulk commodity shipments on the prairies, would the minister say what competition there is for the railroads?

Mr. Pickersgill: I will tell the hon. gentleman. The railways, you know, do not want to haul empty trains back and forth across the country. And they do not want to stop hauling trains, because a large part of their costs are—if I dare say so with the hon. member for Macleod in the chamber—fixed costs. Unless the railways have something moving on their lines to pay part of the fixed costs they will be in a hopeless state, as they were during the depression.

They do not want to be in that state. They want the traffic. Often the only way to get traffic is to give shippers of bulk commodities, who are not exactly without bargaining power, favourable rates. It is not as though those shippers are individual farmers or small shopkeepers; some are among the biggest companies in the world, with far greater economic power than the Canadian railways have.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Some of them.

Mr. Pickersgill: A lot of them have that power. Unless the railways give them a rate that it is worth the while of these shippers to ship, there will not be any traffic. That is why I believe the competitive position, or the bargaining position—I prefer to call it the bargaining position—of the shippers is not ill matched. But to make sure there is a back stop to the shippers bargaining position we have strengthened, I believe, clause 16. We have said that if any shipper alleges that another shipper under similar circumstances, with a similar commodity, is given undue preference, he can go before a board; and if he can convince the board that this has happened, his rate will be disallowed.

That is a protection for the shippers of bulk commodities and I believe it is a very effective protection indeed; and the committee seemed to be satisfied with that clause as amended, and supported that view.

Mr. Kindt: I wish to bring to the attention of the minister and committee the situation now facing two captive shippers. I mention them because the minister thinks that this type of shipper presents competition, and that the competition will keep rates in line.

As he may know, Crowsnest Industries Limited of Fernie, British Columbia and Coleman Collieries Limited, of Coleman, Alberta, are expected to send representatives shortly, if they have not already done so, to Japan to negotiate for large coal shipments to Japan. Let me read to you a pamphlet I have in my hand issued in January, 1967. It is the Canada-Japan Trade Council Newsletter, and I quote as follows:

• (9:40 p.m.)

The Yawata firm indicated railway coal transportation costs to a port on the Pacific coast would become a major subject in the negotiations, as the Canadian government is expected to stop supplying subsidies to cover high railway freight costs for coal exports after 1969.

A deciding factor for these two industries in trying to increase exports to Japan is the freight rates now in existence for the shipment of coal from the Crowsnest pass to the Pacific coast. These are captive shippers. They must depend on the C.P.R., and one bad move by the government will place this arrangement with the Japanese in jeopardy and prevent these industries from making arrangements to export coal to the country. The minister should re-examine some of these proposed new sections.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Chairman, I think we should try to ascertain who is being protected by this clause and what a captive shipper is. The clause attempts to be generous, to broaden the term "captive shipper". It is all well and good for the minister to say that a captive shipper does not have to prove that he is a captive shipper. A little while ago the minister said such a person had only to assert that he was.

I have looked up the Oxford dictionary for the definitions of the two words "assert" and "prove" and it can be seen that there is not much difference between the two. The definition of assert is "insist upon one's rights," and proof is defined as "evidence sufficing or helping to establish a fact." They are very similar. New section 317 in clause 44 says that a captive shipper is one who in a sense has "no alternative, effective and competitive service by a common carrier". To understand this one can look up the definition of the word "alternative" and place the word "no" in front of it. Everyone knows the meaning of the word no.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Alternative means "an interchange, alternating with another, succeeding each other by turns, consisting of alternating things." Effective is the key word in this phrase. We know that the key word in the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission legislation is "unduly," and under that legislation proof must be given that something is affecting the economy of the country unduly. In this phrase the key word is "effective," and its definition is, "having an effect, powerful in effect," and so on. One may have an alternative, but if that alternative has no effect then it does not have much use. The amendment sets out to remedy this deficiency, and states:

> A shipper of goods in respect of which the rates in effect on the 1st day of January, 1965, were class and commodity rates subject to the Freight Rates Reduction Act, shall be deemed to have no alternative, effective and competitive service by a common carrier other than a rail carrier or carriers or combination of rail carriers.

The Freight Rates Reduction Act which came into effect in 1959 placed a freeze on freight rate increases on class and non-competitive rates. Anyone benefiting from that legislation could logically be expected to receive some protection in this clause of the amending bill, and should be accepted as a captive shipper. This is the whole essence of the argument.

The minister may declare that he is not particularly concerned about these things and that very few people will qualify as captive shippers. He can lecture us a great deal on the essence of competition, but I do not think anyone in Canada will say that the railways are 100 per cent public utilities. Surely the government must accept the fact that the railways have a duty to perform in those areas in which they have a monopoly, in which there is no effective alternative service. Shippers in those areas should be able to receive some protection under this clause.

A very noted transportation economist hired by the Manitoba government, Mr. Morrow, dealt at great length with the history of the Canadian transportation system. Our early governments aided the establishment of a railway system in order that it might provide a public service. I do not want to go into the history at length, but it is a fact that back in the early 1900's a public service was established. We set up the Board of Transport Commissioners to regulate and rule in respect of the public service provided by the railways.

• (9:50 p.m.)

We have seen competition grow. We have seen Canada grow. There no longer is the same need for some of the protection which was given. No longer do we accept the fact that the railways are 100 per cent public utilities. Also we will not accept the fact that the railways are absolutely free corporate entities, because there still are areas in which they operate within a monopoly. In this area they still must be declared to be public utilities. There is a regulatory board which has some control over the Bell Telephone Company. Every other similar company generally is ruled by a public utilities board. The National Energy Board regulates the pipe line companies, because we give the pipe line companies a monopoly in respect of their operations within a given area. At one time these monopolies were in effect across Canada. Now we accept the fact that they are not monopolies in respect of the whole of Canada, but are monopolies in some areas.

The people who are producing goods, providing for the welfare of their families and contributing to the economy of Canada should be able to look to the government for protection, because the railroads were built with the intention that they would provide a public service. The railways accepted this obligation. This amendment says in effect that if there were non-competitive areas in 1959 there now may be non-competitive areas today, that these areas should be accepted as captive areas, and that they should come under the definition which relates to a captive shipper. It is all very well for the minister to tell us that they do not have to prove they are captive shippers, that they merely have to assert it. This is not good enough, because in many areas of Canada goods are being shipped at rates which are 150 per cent above the variable costs. In committee we heard evidence to the effect that in some cases the railways were charging 400 per cent above the variable costs.

If one takes the general definition of the word "assert", he would think that the people merely would have to apply for the maximum formula; but that is not the case. They must assert and prove under the definition as set out by the minister and as accepted by the railways that they have no alternative rate and are prepared to move 100 per cent of their goods by this one mode of transportation. This is the point I wish to make. I believe this is the crux of the problem in respect of the bill. It is all well and good for the hon. member for Medicine Hat and the minister to be willing to allow this bill to pass hurriedly, but I think there is a great deal at stake in respect of this clause and clause 16.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question. If he thinks there is a great deal at stake in respect of this clause, then why did he vote a while ago to knock it out of the bill?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Because I hope that there will be an alternative amendment to place some protection in the bill for shippers in what I would consider to be captive areas, so that they could apply for captive status under this legislation. I have found this particular formula nonsensical. I found it so nonsensical that I did not consider it was any good at all. Therefore it is my belief that it should be deleted in the hope that something else which would have some meat in it would be accepted by the minister.

I should like to explain the reason I believe there is a necessity for this amendment. One has only to go back a bit to realize what we are talking about. Something like 4 per cent of the goods moved by the railways are moved under class rates and therefore in respect of this amendment we are referring only to 4 per cent of the goods moved. We are asking the minister to accept the fact that in many isolated areas in Canada something like 34 per cent of the revenue of the railways is derived from areas where in effect there is no effective alternative to the railways, and that the goods must move under non-competitive or class rates, which are the highest possible rates.

[Mr. Horner (Acadia).]

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether we might continue long enough to dispose of the amendment.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I should like to call it ten o'clock. Although I have only a few more minutes left to speak, I would rather complete my speech tomorrow morning when the house resumes, because at that time I might have a more attentive audience, a more agreeable minister, and then perhaps the house would accept the amendment to this clause.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, I do not think the government has all its members in line, and it would have plenty of time to get them in line by tomorrow.

Progress reported.

• (10:00 p.m.)

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

[Translation]

TRANSPORT—DORION, QUE.—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON LEVEL CROSSING ACCIDENT

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I am deeply grateful to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), for his kindness in accepting to remain in the house a little while longer, to consider a matter with which he is very familiar, but to which I would again like to draw his attention, since this is a very urgent question and one of deep concern, from the standpoint of public safety.

Every day we are faced with an increasing number of highway tragedies. In addition to these, we have accidents occurring at grade crossings and, among others, we note the tragedy which occurred at St. Clair, in Dorchester county. Not too long ago, two similar calamities occurred within a few days: one at Montmagny and another at St-Francois-de-Bellechasse. The people are getting more and more alarmed.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I am renewing my efforts and asking the minister if something even more specific could be done, so as to eliminate what I would call deadly road hazards.

If that is not possible, I would like to suggest, in the first place, that we should seek additional funds. In 1954, we had $5 million in the Railway Grade Crossing Fund. If I remember right, this amount was increased to $15 million in 1958, which represents quite a short lapse of time. Why? Because it was realized that traffic was increasing at a frightening rate and additional funds were required to satisfy the newly created needs of ever-increasing traffic.

We are now in the year 1967 and nothing has been added to the Railway Grade Crossing Fund since 1958. In order to even begin solving the problem, our Railway Grade Crossing Fund desperately needs replenishing. I feel it is imperative that the Railway Grade Crossing Fund should be increased: $15 million is no longer enough.

Second, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to an editorial by Mr. Maurice Champoux, correspondent for La Presse. Mr. Champoux is an excellent newspaperman and I always enjoy reading his articles, because he has a very rich vocabulary and exceptional writing ability. However, upon reading his comments about one of my recent statements, I noted that he had not quite grasped the full meaning of my observations. I said, amongst other things, that the municipalities cannot afford to apply for safety devices for their grade crossings because, as everyone knows, and above all the minister, the fund contributes 80 per cent of the cost in the case of a new safety device, the railway, 7½ per cent, and the municipality or the local authority to which the road belongs, 12½ per cent.

Many municipalities do not have the means to do so. I discussed the matter, not long ago, with the former president of the Union of Municipalities, the member for Rivière-du-Loup-Témiscouata (Mr. Gendron), who is well known as an authority on the matter. He confirmed the fact by saying that, out of the 1,700 municipalities in the province of Quebec, at least 1,200 are poor. The municipalities cannot afford to make the application.

Consequently, the act should be amended in this regard.

Third, Mr. Speaker, the procedure is too long before grade crossings can be obtained. In fact, the report of the Board of Transport Commissioners for the year ending December 31, 1965 says:

During 1965, the board received 2,584 applications under the various legal provisions related to the jurisdiction of the said board.

The Board of Transport Commissioners lacks the time to deal with such problems, because it is too slow in answering these applications. I am asking the minister whether there is a way to change this jurisdiction and, when grade crossings are being sought, to make it possible to seek them from somebody other than the Board of Transport Commissioners which is unable to reply rapidly to applications in accordance with safety requirements.

This procedure should be changed, as I said, Mr. Speaker, to expedite matters. How do we proceed now? Municipalities make an application and the Board of Transport Commissioners consult with the railway company concerned. An inspection is made. Time is lost. Efforts are made to find money, and when it is found that no money is left, the application is finally held in abeyance. That is why many cases could have been settled if the procedure had been amended or changed to expedite things. I am appealing to the minister to improve the situation and I understand that he is sincere and well disposed toward me, because he knows that we must fight unmercifully against—I repeat—those deadly road hazards.

[English]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if there are any delays in dealing with inquiries of the kind the hon. gentleman suggested there might be, in the procedures of the Board of Transport Commissioners, I will ask them to make every effort to eliminate such delays. I think everyone realizes how desirable and important it is to eliminate really dangerous level crossings and to protect other level crossings. I do not think we adequately appreciate yet how much has been accomplished in this country in the last 15 years. The progress has been absolutely extraordinary. I was given some figures today that astonished me, though I probably ought to have known them; but one does not keep all these figures in one's head all the time.

As of September last year—these are the latest figures available—Ontario had 8,603 railway-highway crossings, and Quebec had 3,598. In Ontario 12.2 per cent of the crossings were grade separated, that is to say they were not level crossings at all, and in Quebec the figure was 12.3 per cent. In Ontario 22.9 per cent of the level crossings were protected; in Quebec, 30.5 per cent. If you add the two together you find that the percentage in Ontario that we protected either by grade separation or other protection was 35.1 per cent; in Quebec, 42.8 per cent. This means it is getting very close to half for those in Quebec that are already protected. In Canada as a whole, unfortunately, the record is not so good. The only province better than Quebec in this regard is Nova Scotia; that happens to be the best province in the whole country.

• (10:10 p.m.)

I do not believe this parliament would hesitate to vote any funds needed in order to eliminate these hazards. I gave some figures the other evening, which I have not with me at the moment, but I think we should realize that while the rate of fatalities and serious accidents on the highways is going up steadily in Canada, in recent years, it has gone down steadily in respect of level crossings. The percentage has gone down very markedly, as have the absolute numbers in recent years. This means that in view of the fact that motor traffic is increasing constantly, this is perhaps the area—the area of avoiding accidents—in which most progress has been made. However that does not mean that we should not go on doing everything we can to get more protection.

NATURAL GAS—TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—SUGGESTED TWINNING OF LINE IN CANADA

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, the matter that I raised yesterday is not a new one to be raised in the house, but it throws some new information on the matter I had occasion to raise before. I am referring to the proposal of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines to build a trans Canada pipe line through the United States, a proposal which unfortunately has received the blessing of this government. My objections, the objections of my party and of many other Canadians to this proposal are no secret. We are opposed to it for three major reasons: first, because it will starve and blight the north country; second, because it will place the necks of the Canadian customers in the noose, in that the decisions, rules and regulations concerning a resource as vital as natural gas and upon which Canadian industry will depend will be subject to rules, regulations and decisions made in a foreign country, and we do not think this is any favour to Canadian customers. Our third objection is to the fact that we will be accepting a very bad precedent—pipe lines being the transportation of the future—and setting a very bad example by building our transcontinental pipe lines through a foreign country.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

I was very surprised this week to hear officials of the ministers' department claim that there is no objection, particularly in the north country, to this proposal of the government. I have here partial returns of a questionnaire which we sent out across the country to see what the people felt about this proposal. I can make it available to the minister and to any of his officials, if they wish to have it. I would like to list a few of these returns. From the riding of Cochrane, out of 377 returns only two were in favour. In Timmins out of 488 there was only one in favour. In Fort William out of 456, three were in favour. In Port Arthur out of 674, two were in favour. In Kenora Rainy River, out of 366, one was in favour. In Algoma East—the riding of the Prime Minister—out of 205 replies, three were in support of the government stand. In Algoma West, out of 355 replies, 15 were in favour. I discovered that this was due to the fact that they had been misinformed to the extent that they were told that the only hope of getting Canadian gas was through the American line, and yet for the last five years Canadian gas was only 80 miles away, at Blind River. In Sudbury and Nickel Belt, out of 542 replies there were three favouring the government stand, and while the returns are not compiled completely from Timiskaming and Nipissing, out of approximately 1,000 replies, four favoured the government. This means that out of 4,500 replies less than three-quarters of 1 per cent backed the government stand on this particular proposal.

I think it would be of benefit to the minister and to hon. members if I put on the record an excerpt from a letter which was sent to the Sault Star on December 7 dealing with this proposal. It is somewhat of a fantasy, but it shows what would have happened if the same kind of thinking that goes on today had been in effect 100 years ago. This is the story:

> It is the year 1878 and Prime Minister Sir John A. Macdonald has just announced that instead of building the proposed Canadian Pacific Railway over the frozen wasteland and rocks of Canada as originally proposed, it would be built through the United States at a great saving. The railway will now be called the Atchison, Topeka and the C.P.R.
>
> It is the year 1937 and Prime Minister Mackenzie King has announced that a coast to coast airline has been founded. Terminals will be built in the United States at a great saving on heating costs. He stated that it was a wonderful achievement for a country with a population of a hundred thousand people. The new airline will be known as the Minnesota, Michigan and Air Canada Ltd. Passengers may transfer from Detroit by dog team to the unspoiled, uninhabited area known as Sault Ste. Marie.

News Bulletin. Dateline has stated that since Canada has refused to accede to his demand that they (Canada) cease sending wheat to Lower Slobovia, action will immediately be taken.

President Silverwater reaches for a button in his office which controls the pump for the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines...

Maybe this is somewhat fantastic but this is exactly what would have happened 100 years ago if the thinking of the present government had been adopted at that time. However, Mr. Speaker, it would appear we are going to be saved by the bell from our own foolishness. If we look at the Globe and Mail of yesterday we find it reports that the holding of additional hearings will result in postponement of the final decision by the United States Federal Power Commission until late this year. Then the article says that when the commission finally disposes of the issue, first taken up more than two years ago, there is a possibility any ruling it would make would be challenged in the United States courts, causing still further long delays.

This means of course that we can confidently expect to wait two years before any decision is made. Trans-Canada has committed itself to this government to the effect that by 1970, three years from now, they are prepared to start looping the northern line. We say that they should start this now. We say that this government should urge and insist that they start it now. There is no denying the fact that this government has made out a case, and the energy board has given proof, of the desperate need that is growing in southern Ontario and Quebec for gas. It is well known that the north is short of it now. You can ask any industry from Kenora, to Dryden, to Kapuskasing or Sudbury, and they will all say they are short of gas.

The energy board has been telling Trans-Canada for the last three years that they should increase the gas supply. There is no excuse for any postponement. There is no excuse for waiting another two years, only to be turned down by the United States power commission and then try to repair the damage. This article in yesterday's Globe and Mail asserts again what we have been saying before the energy board, that Trans-Canada officials have said they would never join Northern Gas in any gas exchange scheme, insisting that they would enlarge their line in Canada rather than accept this alternative.

I should like to impress upon the minister that the responsibility toward Canadian customers in the north and south is not the responsibility of Trans-Canada. Their responsibility is only to their own company and their own shareholders. It is only the government of Canada that has responsibility to the Canadian people and responsibility for our resources. Let us accept that responsibility. Let us start now. Let this government tell Trans-Canada to get on with the job. If they are short of money, we will lend them money. We did it before, and they paid it back.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I am not going to argue the substance of the Great Lakes case. I have done this before, and the hon. member is aware of it as are other members of this house. In a number of speeches and letters to unions and associations of all kinds, I have explained the position of the government. I am rather amused, though, by the fact that the hon. member took great pains to give the detailed results of the questionnaire his party circulated. He only forgot to mention the number of copies of the questionnaire that were sent out. I presume this is not too favourable to his case and he preferred not to mention it. I am sure that if the hon. member had been asked about the value of the questionnaire sent out by the hon. member for Lapointe to his constituents, asking whether or not he should remain in the house as a separatist, he would have said it was not worth the paper on which it was written.

I have read the article to which the hon. member referred. The last part is a historical review, while the first part describes the attack made by Northern Natural Gas Company, a United States company on the Great Lakes project. The reason for this attack is obvious; Northern also has a project in opposition to the Trans-Canada project. You would not expect anything else from them, would you? I have the impression that the headline of the article is quite a bit wider than the article itself, as is often the case.

We could not start twinning the existing Canadian line now because that would be illegal. The authorization of the National Energy Board would have to be obtained first, and no request has been made for such authorization. I am sure the hon. member is the first one who would want us to respect the law.

• (10:20 p.m.)

There is, however, something worth while in what the hon. member says. It has to do with the responsibility of the government to make sure—I think this is what he really meant —that the necessary precautions are taken by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, in case the Great Lakes project is not accepted by the Federal Power Commission. I can guarantee the hon. member that we are taking these precautions. We have asked the company to keep us informed on alternative planning—which it is doing now—in case the Federal Power Commission refuses to accept the Great Lakes project in its present form. This is our duty, and I am quite as responsible, I believe, as the hon. member would be if he were sitting in my chair.

The company has in fact kept the National Energy Board informed on discussions with its customers on what could be done in case the project is refused. This does not imply on our part a lack of approval of the project. I have said a number of times that this was the best project available at the moment. Neither does it imply on our part lack of hope that the U.S. Federal Power Commission will recognize that this project is in the interest of Canada and the United States. Ours are simply normal precautions taken by prudent men, which in such instances are necessary.

POLLUTION—REQUEST FOR FURTHER RESEARCH INTO DETERGENTS

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, one of the first conditions which drew the attention of the public to water pollution was the appearance of foam or suds on the surface of the water. While this was not the most dangerous type, it was the most noticeable. Much of it was caused by detergents used in the home for washing, and in industry in the manufacture of textiles, paints and other products.

In Canada a campaign was put on by the manufacturers of detergents to reduce the sudsing effect. A completely new ingredient known as LAS, or linear alkylate sulfonate, was substituted for the sudsing component. This new chemical is bio-degradable; in other words, it decomposes in sewage plants to a degree of about 95 per cent and eliminates foaming to all intents and purposes. The Canadian Manufacturers of Chemical Specialties have confirmed that the Canadian manufacturers of detergents have now completely converted to this new product. A word of commendation is due to them for their effort in this regard, effected at considerable expense. The appearance of Canadian waters should noticeably improve in 1967.

My question to the minister related to the continuation of research in this field. Although the appearance of waters may improve, the nutrient component is still there. Detergents have not been made pure, because they will still provide the nutrients which induce algae growth. In a way the situation may be more dangerous because public fears may subside when the foaming is no longer visible. Furthermore, there are other sources of water pollution than detergents. I am asking for confirmation from the minister that research in this very important area will be pressed forward even more strongly in 1967.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am quite willing to agree with my hon. friend on the progress that industry has made in this field, but I am very eager to agree with him that the changeover to non-frothing detergent soaps by the manufacturers merely corrects the ugly formation of foam in the receiving waters. This change has, unfortunately, as the hon. member said, no effect on the phosphate content of detergents or on the removal of this constituent in waste water treatment. The government, through the co-operation of several departments and the International Joint Commission, is continuing to conduct research on the phosphate problem through the programs of investigations on the great lakes. The hon. member is aware of that. He is also aware that I consider the research presently done by the federal government on the great lakes, where the federal government has clear jurisdiction, a symbol of the government's willingness to contribute to the solution of the pollution problem. In the coming years the great lakes will be our great federal laboratory—if you put it this way—the laboratory in which we shall find the answer to pollution problems.

Requests for research grants totalling about $40,000 to universities and research institutes relating to phosphates are currently being considered by one government department. I can assure my hon. friend that we shall do our best. I am grateful, as usual, for his constant prompting.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.29 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, January 20, 1967

The house met at 11 a.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HOWARD—PRESS REPORT OF SPEECH BY MINISTER WITHOUT PORTFOLIO

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise on a question of privilege concerning an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen yesterday, January 19, written by Charles Lynch, an old and dear friend of mine I might say, entitled "Speeches we can do without".

Part of Mr. Lynch's article reads as follows:

But there are ministers whose speeches are approached with expectation—and such a one is John Turner, the Minister without Portfolio—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Howard: The article then continues:

—by general agreement a rising star in the ranks of the Liberal government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Howard: The next paragraph reads:

Alas, even the youthful Mr. Turner, the supposed swinger of the treasury benches, can go dead on us.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Lynch's article indicates that a particular speech which the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George made at a meeting of the Dominion Marine Association was in effect a cream puff speech which contained nothing of substance. The speech made by the minister the other evening at that meeting in Montreal contained one of the most important declarations regarding the field of shipping and the shipping industry to be made in Canada. In that speech the minister declared that for the first time in Canada's history, even though the authority has been in the Canada Shipping Act probably since confederation, the government is going to establish manning scales for ships plying the lakes, and will concentrate in the first instance on departmental ships and large modern lakers used by private industry.

This declaration will serve the purpose of saving the lives of many Canadian sailors and will prevent a great deal of damage to the industry itself.

I will not conclude my question of privilege by moving a motion, but if I were to do so I would do so by paraphrasing the words of Mr. Lynch and say "Please, Charlie baby, from now on read all the words of the speeches".

• (11:10 a.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to prevent the minister from replying to the speech just just made by the hon. member for Skeena, but on reflection I am sure he will recognize that there is no valid question of privilege. I shall not refer to the citiations which might be to the point. Considering also that the matter was not followed by a motion, I suggest to hon. members that we should not proceed further with the matter.

MR. BENSON—NEWSPAPER PICTURE BEARING WRONG NAME

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Benson: In yesterday's Le Droit a picture of me appeared, and underneath it was the name of Dalton Camp.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Benson: I would simply like to say that there is no similarity whatsoever between Mr. Camp and myself. He hasn't any hair.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

Fourth report of standing committee on northern affairs and national resources—Mr. Badanai.

[Note: Text of the foregoing report appears in today's Votes and Proceedings.]

TRADE

TABLING OF LIST OF MEMBERS OF EXPORT ADVISORY COUNCIL

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to table the list, in alphabetical order, of members of the newly established export advisory council, and pro forma copies in English and French of the letters of invitation which were sent to the members. The first meeting of the council has been called for February 6.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table these documents?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STEPS BY U.S. TO WITHHOLD SUPPLIES FROM NORTH VIET NAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Yesterday I drew his attention to a Washington dispatch which quoted Ross Flannigan, chairman of a Quaker action group, alleging that Air Canada had refused to accept shipments of medical supplies which the Quakers wanted to send to North Viet Nam. I asked the minister at that time if he would make inquiries of Air Canada and find out whether these allegations were correct.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I had inquiries made of Air Canada and was informed that they had received a request for free or reduced rate transportation for medical supplies to be shipped by Air Canada to Moscow destined for North Viet Nam.

Under the IATA regulations, resolution 200, paragraph 2c, member air lines are allowed to send "any person or supplies to provide relief in case of general epidemic, disaster or other calamitous visitation but not transportation to or from zones of military operation". Air Canada as a common carrier cannot refuse and has not refused to accept revenue shipments of this nature, but it is prohibited from providing free or reduced transportation under the IATA regulations. The Russian air line Aeroflot is not a member of IATA and therefore I assume would not be limited in the same way.

Mr. Douglas: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is my understanding of what the minister said correct, that the only reason for refusing to handle these medical supplies was the request that they be shipped either free or at a reduced rate, and that if the Quakers were willing to pay the regular rate Air Canada would be willing to carry these supplies?

[Mr. Winters.]

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. gentleman was not listening very attentively because, as I said, there was no refusal by Air Canada. Air Canada was requested to provide free or reduced transportation. The goods were not offered for transport at the regular rates, and I indicated in my answer that if they were Air Canada, as a common carrier, would have accepted them.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether his attention had been drawn to a report in the Toronto Star in which it was alleged that Mr. Somerfield, chief counsel of the treasury department, foreign assets control, of the United States has said that his department has forbidden Canadian subsidiaries of United States pharmaceutical organizations to sell anything to the Quakers for shipment to North Viet Nam. The minister said that he had not seen the report, and I will quote him from page 11976 of yesterday's Hansard:

> I have not seen the report, Mr. Speaker. When I do see it I will judge what action, if any, should be taken.

May I ask the minister now whether he has seen the report and what action, if any, he intends to take.

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have seen the report, in fact I have a copy of it before me now. I got in touch at once with our embassy in Washington through the regular channels. The embassy then was in touch with the United States government, and has been advised that neither the department of state nor the department of treasury of the United States government has issued any special directives to United States drug companies to instruct their subsidiary companies in Canada to refuse to sell medical supplies for transmission to North Viet Nam. As the hon. member knows, in the United States there are foreign assets control regulations and North Viet Nam is one of the prohibited areas. However, there have been no recent developments with respect to trading by Canadian companies, and the United States is well aware of our attitude in this regard. It is understood that the Canadian Friends' Service Committee finds no difficulty in obtaining from Canadian companies the medical supplies which it needs.

Mr. Lewis: I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister may have noticed in the report which he says he has in his hands an alleged statement by Mr. Somerfield that there are regulations on the books prohibiting United States pharmaceutical firms in Canada or elsewhere from selling supplies to North Viet Nam without permission. The report apparently uses the words "from us", which I assume means from the United States' authorities. If so, is the minister or the government prepared to make representations to the United States authorities that we expect corporations in Canada to act in accordance with Canadian laws and not in accordance with the laws of a foreign country?

Mr. Winters: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The United States government is well aware of the attitude of the Canadian government on this matter, as I have stated on previous occasions. This is one of the subjects we brought up in a very forceful way at the time we met with the United States ministers early last year. They know very well our point of view on extraterritoriality. In this instance no harm appears to have been done to Canadian interests. Nevertheless it is something which we regard as very serious and which we intend to keep before the United States authorities.

Mr. Lewis: So far without results.

RHODESIA—REPORTED WITHHOLDING OF MEDICAL INFORMATION AND SUPPLIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): My question is for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to ask if he has had an opportunity of looking into the story concerning the World Health Organization sanction against Rhodesia?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the question as asked can be accepted at the present time.

Mr. Johnston: I asked this question of the Prime Minister yesterday. At that time he said he had not had an opportunity to look into the matter, but he would do so and report to the house. My question today follows upon that, so I am asking if he has done so.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I have not received the report yet. Just as soon as I have I will make it available to the the house.

[Translation]

PUBLIC SERVICE

MINES AND ENERGY DEPARTMENT—PROPORTION OF FRENCH SPEAKING EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

My question stems from the reply given to me on January 11 last by the parliamentary secretary to the minister when I asked how many French speaking and English speaking civil servants there were in the department.

Can the minister tell us whether he intends to foster the hiring of French speaking employees in his department; can he also tell us—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Laprise:— whether he intends to increase the number of mining news being published in French?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is general in character and may not be asked at the present time.

[English]

FINANCE

BANK ACT REVISION—POSSIBLE RETALIATION BY UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): I have a question for the Prime Minister. Can he inform the house what action he expects to take with respect to the government's revision of the Bank Act and possible retaliation by the government of the United States?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Bank Act is before a committee of this house, and that committee is dealing with it. It will proceed in the normal way, I hope, and will reach this house before long. We are not concerned with what my hon. friend has mentioned in our consideration of this matter.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): My question arises out of the Prime Minister's answer. He has said he is not concerned. Can he inform the house whether there have been any repercussions from the amendments to the Bank Act which are before the committee in so far as our own chartered banks are concerned which are doing business in states like California, where they hold quite a share of the business?

Mr. Pearson: The matter is before the committee and this aspect of the problem can undoubtedly be brought before that committee by those concerned. I do not feel I should comment on it in the house while the matter is before the committee.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

PRESENTATION OF CERTIFICATES TO CITIZENS 100 YEARS OLD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Melfort-Humboldt-Tisdale): I have a question for the Secretary of State. Can the hon. lady inform the house what procedure will be followed in presenting certificates to citizens who are 100 years old? Will the certificates be presented on a certain day, or at the time those citizens reach their one hundredth birthday?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question should be placed on the order paper.

[Later:]

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Speaker, would you allow me to rephrase my question to the Secretary of State. Will certificates be presented to those citizens I have mentioned at the end of this month?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the certificates will be delivered to all hon. members of the house on and after the 23rd of the month, when they have been signed by the Governor General and framed. It is then up to individual members of parliament to arrange an appropriate presentation time convenient for them, for the press, and particularly for the honoured individual who has reached the age of 100 years.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR CONTINUATION OF PROGRAM "QUENTIN DURGENS"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): My question is for the Secretary of State. In view of the recent renewal of the television series "Wojeck" by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the overwhelming response to the succeeding series "Quentin Durgens", with the additional great good it is doing for parliament and the country, will the Secretary of State convey to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation the keen desire of many to see this series renewed as well for next season?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry I am preventing the Secretary of State from making statements today, but this question should be placed on the order paper.

[Translation]

BROADCASTING

REQUEST FOR REVISION OF POLITICAL BROADCAST REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State, and I am ready to raise the matter at ten o'clock, should the minister want to give a more elaborate answer.

Here is my question: does the government intend to implement the recommendations of the Canadian Association of Broadcasters to amend sections 17 and 18 of the Broadcasting Act regarding political programs that private stations pass up because they are not technical enough to be interesting?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member admitted himself that this question could be discussed more properly at ten o'clock.

[English]

IMMIGRATION

ADOLF VON THADDEN—REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING ENTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Acting Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I have been requested to ask this question by a number of persons across Canada, including some well known members of our party and trade unionists.

In view of the fact that the official publication of the German National Democratic Party extols the accomplishments of Hitler, who according to this newspaper was defeated by "war criminal Churchill", does the minister consider this statement grounds for the refusal of admission to Canada of Adolf von Thadden in the interest of national security?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Acting Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would just point out that most of the material quoted by the hon. member is argumentative but as acting minister, I will be pleased to pass on the question to my colleague, the minister, and have him consider it immediately.

[Translation]

EXPO '67

SUGGESTED INVITATION TO HIS HOLINESS THE POPE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Allard: I thank the members of the Liberal party for their applause; it is probably a follow-up to the applause given the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) a few days ago.

My question is as follows: In view of the fact that reports from Vatican City seem to indicate that Pope Paul VI may come to the World's Fair between June 11 and 15 next, would the government agree to extend an official invitation to His Holiness to come to Ottawa, not only as a religious leader and as head of the Vatican state but also as a major advocate of world peace?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member should be very well aware, we were recently informed by the Apostolic Delegate that it would be impossible for His Holiness the Pope to come to Canada this year.

[English]

LABOUR RELATIONS

AVAILABILITY OF ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT ON AUSTRALIAN LABOUR COURTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is he aware that royal commissioner Ivan C. Rand will be going to Australia on February 1 for a month long study of the labour arbitration courts in that country as an alternative to strikes? If so, is anything being done or suggested by the federal Department of Labour so that the findings and recommendations of this highly respected authority on labour-management matters can be made available to the house when considering new labour disputes legislation?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): I shall take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF TASK FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Just before the Christmas recess the Prime Minister indicated that he might be considering asking Dean Woods for an interim report on this particular subject in reference to employer-employee relations and management-labour disputes. Has he anything to report on that now?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope the task force which has been set up to deal with this matter will be able to make an interim report on certain important aspects of their work. Their final report will take a good deal of time. I hope it will be possible to get an interim report, but they are not in a position to submit one yet.

MARITIME UNIONS TRUSTEES—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I have a question to ask of the Minister of Labour. On motions the other day when the minister made his announcement about the extension of the life of the maritime unions trustees I asked him if he would not be willing to outline to the house the projects the trustees had not yet completed, and whether he would be prepared to table correspondence between himself and the trustees relating to their reappointment.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member is asking for a lengthy and protracted statement from the minister. Perhaps that part of the question relating to the tabling of documents is in order.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): There is no reason that I know of why the documents should not be tabled. The trustees file an annual report each year, and we have had an interim report. If the house is interested, I could table the interim report and my two letters including the one of acknowledgement. I shall be pleased to do so early next week.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR INCREASED ALLOWANCES FOR WIDOWS AND DEPENDANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Because widows and dependants were not included in the minister's announcement of November 14, many hon. members are receiving an ever-increasing amount of mail and inquiries regarding a possible increase in the allowances for the widows and dependants of veterans. Would the minister please advise the house what are the plans of the government?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): In the first instance, Mr. Speaker, widows of course are included in the increase. There is no question about that. The basic rate is increased, and it applies to widows. The exceptions in this particular case were the dependants of living veterans, and as I indicated in reply to a question earlier, we are making a study of this. We granted the interim increase pending completion of that study, and I cannot give an indication at this time of when the study will be completed.

Mr. F. J. W. Fane (Vegreville): As a supplementary question, may I ask the minister does he realize that the increase which was given to married veterans amounts to about 7½ per cent or 8 per cent, and not the 15 per cent that it was supposed to be?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN MAXIMUM BENEFITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour with reference to the maximum rates of benefit under the Unemployment Insurance Act. It is eight years since the maximum rates were set and five years since the Gill committee recommended an increase. Can the minister say whether an increase will be proposed this year by the government?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have stated on at least two occasions that the interdepartmental committee established by the Prime Minister some months ago has turned in its report and that I am now studying it. The report contains a great many recommendations. I cannot say whether the report deals with the hon. member's point but I have said that I was hopeful that we might be able to introduce by regulation—not by legislation—during 1967 certain changes based on the report. If any such changes are to be made they will be reflecting government policy, which will be made known in due course.

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the benefits be raised by regulation? Would that not require an amendment to the act?

Mr. Nicholson: That Mr. Speaker, I am afraid, is a question of law which I am not in a position to answer.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION RESPECTING WIRE TAPPING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Stanbury (York-Scarborough): I have a question for the Solicitor General. Has the government received a request from the chairman of the metropolitan Toronto police commission for federal legislation to control wire tapping, which the chairman as reported in this morning's Globe and Mail describes as a growing peril to personal freedom?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to say that I have received such a communication, but I should be glad to look into it and advise the hon. member.

Mr. Stanbury: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of this report and reports of recent United States action in this field, and today's report that Senator Robert Kennedy intends to introduce legislation to reform the entire United States approach to this problem of eavesdropping, will the government not consider referring to the justice committee the subject matter of my Bill No. C-45, that there may be a full public review of the seriousness and extent of electronic intrusions into the lives of our citizens?

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, this is a large problem that may relate not only to criminal investigation but also to security matters. A royal commission has been appointed to look into security measures. Discussions are continuing between the departments of the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General, and I am not prepared to commit myself on the proposition put forth by the hon. member.

DEATHS OF PRISONERS BY SUICIDE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): I have a question for the Solicitor General. Inasmuch as a prisoner in Cornwall committed suicide by hanging, another prisoner in Stratford committed suicide by hanging, and two prisoners in federal penitentiaries in Canada committed suicide by hanging during the Christmas holidays, I ask if the cabinet is taking extra precautions to see that convicted murderers serving life sentences have extra guards so they will not be able to double cross the cabinet by hanging themselves.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF BILL RESPECTING FILM INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): My question is to the right hon. the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister tell the house what action his government will take as the result of the telegram he recently received from leading representatives of the Canadian film industry which asks for immediate attention and action with respect to Bill C-204, which has been sitting on the order paper since June 20?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, one reason for the difficulty in giving immediate attention to this and other matters will be made clear in a few minutes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

RESEARCH

REQUEST FOR INCREASED GRANTS FOR MEDICAL RESEARCH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry and ask him whether in the light of representations made this past week by the Ontario Medical College about the critical shortage of medical teaching staff caused by lack of research funds the government will give new consideration to sharply increasing the grants for medical research.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister has said a number of times the government in the next period intends to increase substantially grants for research in medical and other fields.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HIGHWAY SAFETY

REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON SNOW TIRE STUDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): My question is for the Minister of Industry and relates to motoring safety. Has the minister's department on file research information about the beneficial effects of snow tire studs? If so, when will this information be given to the general public?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what research information may be on file, but I shall have inquiries made.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

COMPLAINTS RESPECTING PRODUCTION OF FILM FOR C.B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): I have a question for the Secretary of State of which I gave her notice. Has the minister received a protest from the international union of motion picture photographers complaining that the National Film Board is going beyond its mandate in making a full length feature film for the C.B.C? If so, what reply has she made?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that question should be put on the order paper.

[Later:]

Mr. Prittie: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether you would reconsider your ruling on the question I asked earlier of the Secretary of State. It has to do with an important matter, since the union in question is threatening to boycott production of this National Film Board feature in theatres throughout North America because it believes the board is in competition with private industry. I believe the Secretary of State has an answer in this regard.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question. I have seen Mr. Cole of I.A.T.S.E. and listened to his complaints. He did complain that the present activities of the National Film Board were not within the provisions of the act. As the hon. member knows, as a minister of the crown I am not in a position to give a legal opinion, but anyone may look at sections 9 and 10 of the National Film Board Act and see that this sort of endeavour falls within them.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Cole has demanded that a collective agreement be signed with his local in Toronto, a demand which the film board has rejected on the grounds that the board will not instruct its employees to join any particular union. In fact, I am informed that the employees of the film board have joined other unions, particularly Le Syndicat Général du Cinéma.

Mr. Cole has also threatened to prevent distribution of the film now being prepared, and has even threatened to disrupt further an infant industry which all hon. members have indicated they would wish to see flourish in this country. It seems to me that it would be a most short sighted approach on the part of cameramen and other individuals associated with film making, to cause a disruption which would sabotage the efforts of government and prospects for the industry to grow in Canada.

AGRICULTURE

PRINCE RUPERT, B.C.—SUGGESTED VISIT BY HOUSE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wish to direct a question to the hon. member for Essex South in his capacity as chairman of the agriculture committee and ask him whether, in the preparation of the tour the agriculture committee will make, consideration was given to taking the committee to Prince Rupert that it might see the lack of grain loading facilities there—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member would like to ask that question at ten o'clock.

SPORTS

SKIING—RETURN OF NANCY GREENE THROUGH LACK OF FUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, In view of the assurances given to the house by the Minister of National Health and Welfare with respect to funds being made available for the national ski team in Europe, and in view of the UPI press report in the Journal of yesterday from Austria which states that Miss Greene will miss the next alpine ski classics as she has to return home next Monday because her ski association does not have enough money to support her season long stay in Europe—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Can the hon. member ask the question?

[Miss LaMarsh.]

Mr. Herridge: I have just reached that point, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister mind taking up the subject of this rather disturbing press report?

[Later:]

Mr. Herridge: A question supplementary to the one I addressed earlier to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Would the hon. gentleman mind checking into this somewhat disturbing story?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I will be glad to check, but I am sure the situation is as I stated the other day. The national ski team made a request for assistance to finance its competitions in Europe. The request was fully met, and since the first report appeared in the newspapers we have checked further with the national ski association whose president has confirmed that funds were made available as requested and that the team will complete its competition schedule. I will make a further check because of the hon. member's keen interest in the success of Miss Nancy Greene.

TRANSPORT

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—OPPORTUNITY TO PROTEST INCREASE IN TOLLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has received a telegram from the council of the city of Sept Îles, Quebec, expressing outrage at the proposed increase in the tolls on the St. Lawrence seaway and asking the government for some assurance that before any action is taken in this regard they, and other interested parties, will be permitted to make representations.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, I have received that telegram couched in very firm language, and a reply is being sent.

Mr. Douglas: Can the Prime Minister tell the house the nature of the government's reply?

Mr. Pearson: I will be able to do that after the reply has been made. It will be made very shortly.

Mr. Douglas: Can the Prime Minister give the house the assurance which is being asked by the council of Sept Îles, that an opportunity will be provided for public hearings or for representations to be made by interested parties?

Mr. Pearson: I shall have to deal with that matter in my reply; I do not have the telegram with me. I hope the hon. member can wait for a short time; later I will be in a position to answer his question.

GRAIN

OATS AND BARLEY—INQUIRY AS TO FINAL PAYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): My question is addressed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister indicate when we may expect an announcement on the closing of the oats and barley pools and the amount of the final payment?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I expect to be in a position to do that very shortly.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): I want to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question. Has he any comment to make on the statement which appeared in the press within the last couple of days—I believe it was in the Ottawa Journal—that he had conceded that he may have made a statement at a public meeting to the effect that in certain circumstances and with certain reservations, on some occasions at least, two and two might make four?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I would concede that kind of point.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUGGESTED PROVISIONS RESPECTING PRIVATE MEMBERS' HOUR AND LUNCHEON ADJOURNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersill (Minister of Transport): Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker —I have been advised that there would be general agreement to forgoing the private members' hour today, and to an adjournment of the committee for lunch from 1.30 p.m. to 2.00 p.m. Perhaps, for the convenience of hon. members, so they might know the arrangements, this could be so ordered now, if my interpretation is correct.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): There is some uncertainty with regard to this. The house leader on this side is unavoidably absent today. I was not informed about these arrangements. I appreciate that we should have a lunch hour; the minister's health is sufficient reason for that. But whether we should forgo private members' hour week after week is another matter. Private members are surrendering their rights in this house by so doing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was advised by the whip that the usual discussions had taken place among the whips and that there was an understanding. I am sorry if there was no such understanding reached. The hon. gentleman's chief whip is not here at the moment.

Mr. Churchill: The whips may reach understandings like this, but the people who have to speak in the house are not always the whips; that is the trouble.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is obviously no agreement. It is my understanding that no order is made by the house either as to an adjournment at noon or as to the forgoing of the private members' hour.

TRANSPORTATION

PROVISION FOR DEFINITION AND IMPLEMENTATION OF NATIONAL POLICY

The house resumed, from Thursday, January 19, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-231, to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential provisions—Mr. Pickersgill—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose last evening, new section 336 of clause 53 of the bill, with an amendment by the hon. member for Winnipeg South, was under consideration. The proposed amendment is as follows:

That a new subsection be added as subsection (2) of section 336 as follows:

A shipper of goods in respect of which the rates in effect on the 1st day of January, 1965, were class and commodity rates subject to the Freight Rates Reduction Act, shall be deemed to have no alternative, effective and competitive service by a common carrier other than a rail carrier or carriers or combination of rail carriers.

Transportation

On clause 53—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I was speaking when the time came for adjournment last night, and I should like now to continue my remarks and summarize what I believe the effect of this amendment would be.

• (11:50 a.m.)

In order to benefit from this particular clause one must have no alternative effective competition. He then must apply to this board and assert and prove that he is in a captive position. I should like to make this very clear. This is what caused the minister to be in difficulty yesterday. A person cannot just apply in order to be classed as a captive shipper. His rate may be 300 per cent above the variable cost so he would very much benefit if his rate was governed by this particular clause; but he cannot just apply, say that he wishes to become a captive shipper, and all of a sudden become one. He must assert and prove that he is in a captive position. In order to prove this he must declare that 100 per cent of his commodity will move by a given railway.

The effect this amendment has on this clause is that it broadens the definition of captive shipper and broadens the definition of captive locality. I think it is a very worth while amendment because of the phrase "alternative effective competition". In effect the clause says "Let us accept everybody who had to ship goods under class and non-competitive rates when the Freight Rates Reduction Act came in; let us accept them as being in a captive position, and let us accept them as being captive shippers". This then would allow these people and these areas to apply for and receive the maximum formula, if it would benefit them.

Last evening the minister said he thought this maximum formula clause would benefit very few. He said in effect that it is of very little benefit. If the clause were broadened as suggested by this amendment a greater degree of protection would be given to the western parts of Canada and the maritime region. I say this because if one goes back to the 1964-65 committee reports at page 968 it will be found from the waybill analysis which is set out there that, apart from grain moving under Crowsnest pass rates, nearly 60 per cent of all the freight moving into and out of western Canada moves under class and non-competitive rates. The same is true in respect of the maritime area.

From a study of the same report one can ascertain that from eastern to western Canada 44.4 per cent of the freight moves under class and non-competitive rates which were frozen under the Freight Rates Reduction Act. Without this broadening amendment this clause in the bill has the effect of throwing to the wolves the freight rates of western Canada and the maritimes. It has the effect of saying that we now think there is competition out there but it has not been proven.

[The Chairman.]

The government has been convinced by the railways. This is part of the agreement the minister made with the C.P.R., and which he read out on January 12. Not too long ago, in outlining this point, the minister mentioned that he felt the C.P.R. now should pay taxes on various property out there. This is part of the agreement the minister made. He said we are not worried about western Canada and the maritimes any more. He said we accept the fact that there is competition there. There is not absolute competition there, because they still are shipping goods under non-competitive rates.

If this amendment is not accepted the effect will be that freight rates will go up 50 per cent within five years on goods moving into and out of western Canada and on goods moving into and out of the maritimes. It will even have the effect of increasing the freight rates in and around the maritimes. Some 55.8 per cent of the goods shipped on railways moving in and around the maritimes moves under class and non-competitive rates. Without this amendment to this clause those rates will go up and up because in this bill there is no protection for this area. We all know that in the period between 1948 and 1958 freight rates increased 157 per cent. If this amendment is not accepted I predict that within five years from the passage of this bill freight rates in Canada in these particular areas at least will go up by 50 per cent.

Every member in this house should be aware of the fact that transportation plays a major part in the final cost of any goods. The mining association said that transportation accounts for 50 per cent to 70 per cent of the cost in respect of the final product. We have seen in the past year the effect of inflation. With the passage of this bill we would be adding fuel to the inflationary fires. If this amendment were accepted there would be some protection. The inflationary fires still would be there, but they would be smoking rather than burning brightly. I urge the members of this committee to consider this amendment very seriously, because it gives some protection to the areas of Canada which are still being developed, namely western Canada and the maritimes. Without this amendment freight rates will go up and the inflationary fires will burn.

Mr. Sherman: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to prolong the debate in respect of this clause any longer than is absolutely necessary. I think the clause and the proposed amendment have had a fair hearing by the government side of the house. I submit that most of us are prepared to have the question put in respect of this amendment without any further delay.

I should like, however, to say two or three things in support of the amendment I have moved. I do not intend to recapitulate the argument I have made on this subject. I first articulated it on December 21, buttressed it on Tuesday of this past week, and elaborated on it further yesterday. It would be unnecessarily repetitive and redundant for me to go into it in further detail on this occasion.

The province of Manitoba has stated its case. The key to the issue is the definition of captive shipper. The hon. member for Acadia has said that the proposed amendment broadens the definition of captive shipper. At the same time he says the proposed amendment provides a definition of captive shipper which at the present time is missing from the proposed legislation. I was interested to hear the hon. member for Medicine Hat say last night that since the amendment he proposed failed it now is necessary to patch up the clause as it is written in order to make the best possible job out of a bad thing.

This is a laudable sentiment and one to which I subscribe. I submit, however, that this is the whole purpose of the amendment I have put forward. The purpose of the amendment is to patch up this part of the legislation in order to make clear and precise what the legislation is talking about when it refers to captive shippers and the difficulty in respect of the application of the maximum rate formula. That is precisely the purpose of the amendment.

The greatest weakness is the lack of a proper definition of the term "captive shipper". Expert after expert, such as the professors who were retained by the provinces of Manitoba and Alberta, when appearing before the committee on transport and communications, made the same point.

• (12 noon)

The western provinces themselves in their submission, and witness after witness who appeared before the committee, made the same point, that the legislation fails to define adequately a captive shipper. The minister has said, and I subscribe to his views, that competition is a vital and desirable thing. He has indicated that he and his colleagues are attempting by this legislation to provide a healthier climate for competition in western Canada. We on this side of the house subscribe to the same philosophy, but perhaps to a greater degree than the minister. I am certainly in favour of competition.

What we are arguing is that in this particular context the prairies, where the regions are disparate and scattered, so far as bulk commodity shippers are concerned, there is virtually no such thing as competition. We are not talking about an environment of competition or a competitive climate; we are talking in large part about a monopoly situation enjoyed by the railway companies.

What we are attempting to do here is build in some protection for the bulk shippers in western Canada who, in that particular region of this country and on this continent, since the beginning of our existence as a nation have been dependent on and captive to the railway companies. That is the entire purport and philosophy behind the amendment I have moved. We want competition, but at the present time in the climate of commercial enterprise and regional settlement which exists in the west there is not an adequate environment for competition. The railway companies do not have competition; they have this entire business in the palms of their hands.

Under those circumstances and in that context we say bulk commodity shippers on the prairies deserve, indeed vitally require, some protection, and we suggest that by this amendment some of that protection would be provided.

Let me refer once again to the case made by the province of Manitoba in respect of this point when it referred to the fact that during its deliberations and in its pronouncements the royal commission on a number of occasions referred to the Freight Rates Reduction Act is evidence of the determination of the parliament of Canada that the class of non-competitive commodity shippers were shippers to whom the term "captive" could apply. Those are the shippers that the parliament of Canada determined should be relieved of the excessive burden caused by the last general freight rate increase in 1958.

We say in effect that virtually all western shippers of bulk commodity goods are captive shippers, and we suggest they should not have to manifestly establish that fact before this commission because the Freight Rates Reduction Act of 1958 already affords them that status. We say they should be able to maintain that status and enjoy whatever benefits accrue to them.

That is the purport and intent of the amendment I propose, and I heartily endorse it to the minister and his colleagues on the government side of the house. I thank the minister for his kind attention to my argument.

Mr. Southam: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intent to put off the vote on this amendment, but not having been able to participate in the debate on this new section until now, and because I was a member of the standing committee on transportation and communication, I feel compelled to say I support the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg South. Suffice it to say that other hon. members of the committee, including the hon. member for Medicine Hat, the hon. member for Acadia, the hon. member for Saint John-Albert and the hon. member for Winnipeg South in his strong argument have elaborated in great detail on the reasons we should seriously consider new section 336 of Bill C-231.

It has been pointed out and emphasized how important it is that some consideration be given to that large percentage of people using our transportation system in western Canada who are considered as captive shippers. To emphasize this fact I should like to refer to the summary of recommendations presented by the standing committee. Many witnesses supported this contention during evidence given to the committee.

Let me list some of the associations and bodies which were represented by witnesses during the hearings of that committee. The list includes the British Columbia Federation of Agriculture, Canadian Co-operative Wheat Producers Limited, Canadian Industrial Association, Canadian National Railways, Traffic League, Canadian Manufacturers', Canadian Pacific Railway, Canada Steamship Lines, Canadian Trucking Association, Coal Operators Association of Western Canada, the Liberal party of Manitoba, the Manitoba Branch Lines Association, the Maritime Transportation Commission, the Mining Association of Canada, the National Farmers' Union, the province of British Columbia, the province of Saskatchewan, Shell Canada Ltd., the Windsor Chamber of Commerce, the Winnipeg Chamber of Commerce and Wabush Mines.

That is not the complete list, because this summary of recommendations only covers hearings to November 8. It is very interesting to note that of the witnesses representing these 20 organizations, almost half put particular emphasis on new section 336. This new section was referred to at pages 5 and 6 of the summary of recommendations by the Canadian Traffic League; at page 9 by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association; at page 13 by the Canadian National Railways; at page 15 by the Canadian Pacific Railway and at page 24 by the Canadian Trucking Association. Very strong recommendations were made by individuals representing these associations. Many references have been made to the very worth-while brief presented by the province of Manitoba, and that brief gives a great deal of detail in respect of the importance of this new section.

At pages 29 and 40 the province of British Columbia dealt at some length with this new section, and it was dealt with by the government of Saskatchewan at page 41. At page 45 it was referred to by the Winnipeg Chamber of Commerce, and by Wabush Mines at page 46. I could go on at great length listing these references but I do not wish to take up any more time of the committee. I do appeal to the minister and members on the government side of this house to give serious consideration to the implication of and the basis for amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg South. Thank you very much Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

• (12:10 p.m.)

Amendment (Mr. Sherman) negatived: Yeas, 40; Nays, 68.

The Chairman: Order. I declare the amendment lost. Does this complete the discussion of new section 336?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): No.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, I should like very briefly to put to the minister the suggestion that even though the amendment just proposed to subsection 1 of new section 336 has been defeated, it is still not too late to make other improvements to the section so it will be more fair in its effect and more effective. I suggest to the minister that even if he did not see fit to accept the amendment which would have given a more comprehensive definition to the term "captive shipper," that is one thing; but he should still give serious thought to the formula itself which will be applied by the commission in giving some protection to those, presumably very few, shippers who will be regarded as captive under the terms of this legislation.

Obviously, under subsection 2 of new section 336 the formula is that the commission shall set as a maximum a rate determined by taking the variable cost to the railways and adding 150 per cent to that variable cost. The rate shall be determined in this way. It was aptly demonstrated yesterday by other speakers and myself that it is very possible, in fact likely, that the railways, in the majority of cases where they are hauling commodities shipped by captive shippers, will be enjoying a mark-up in the order of 300 per cent and 400 per cent. I say this because the maximum rate formula, based as it is on variable cost plus 150 per cent and determined from a standard of a 30,000 pounds carload lot, will mean that in instances where the haulage is in carload lots of 70,000 pounds, 80,000 pounds, 90,000 pounds, 100,000 pounds or heavier, the mark-up will in fact be 300 per cent or 400 per cent.

In no case these days do the railways haul commodities in full carload lots of a weight less than 60,000 pounds or 70,000 pounds. When we look at the table given to the committee by the Manitoba council, and by Professors Williams and Borts, we find that the mark-up of the railways when they are hauling, under this formula, 70,000 pounds or 80,000 pounds carload lots is, as I said and I repeat again and again, in the order of 300 per cent, 400 per cent or even more. To have a maximum rate formula which allows for this kind of mark-up is simply incredible; there is no other word to describe it. It is unacceptable in every respect.

I hope the minister will see fit to accept the proposition that the formula ought to be changed so that the mark-up of the railways, when hauling goods for captive shippers, will be of an order that is deemed reasonable, just and permissible. A mark-up that is hovering around 300 per cent and 400 per cent is certainly not reasonable or just, and should not be regarded as permissible by members of this committee who are here to protect the public interest and the interest of shippers, particularly those shippers who are captive to the railways because of location or any other circumstance.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, in order to bring this matter to a head and get the sense of members of the committee, I move:

> That clause 336 subclause (2) be amended by deleting the words "150 per cent of the variable cost as the fixed rate applicable to the carriage of the goods" in lines 21 and 22 and substituting the following: "the percentage difference that total permissive earnings are to freight variable costs plus an amount computed as being the cost of capital applicable to the carriage of such goods."

Speaking to the amendment, I wish to say that if accepted it would do two things. It would remove this fictitious formula which, as I have already said, would have the effect of giving the railways the opportunity to derive unconscionable mark-ups—and I think that is the proper word—on the carriage of commodities hauled for captive shippers. In addition, it would remove what I consider to be a rather basic anomaly in this section. The basic anomaly, in my opinion, is that under the terms of this formula the railways will be able to consider the cost of capital to be a variable cost and will be able to obtain a mark-up of 150 per cent on the cost of capital. The railways are not in the banking business, and it seems to me strange that they should be able to take advantage of a formula to actually make money on money. I thought this was a function of our banking institutions and not our transportation companies.

If the cost of money is to be computed into variable cost, that is fine; but the railways should not be allowed to earn a mark-up of 150 per cent, and it may be even more, on the cost of money to them. To try and articulate this point a little more precisely I would say that the cost of the money to the railways, which is deemed to be part of their variable cost, should be treated in this way; the railways should be allowed to recover the cost of money to them, but they should not be allowed to charge a rate that will give them 150 per cent of the cost of money to them. If my amendment were accepted it would remove this anomaly.

During the committee stage and the ensuing discussion in this chamber I did not hear the minister put forward any defence of the proposition that the cost of money to the railways should be brought into this formula so the railways could receive a return of 150 per cent of the cost of money to them.

• (12:20 p.m.)

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I do not see anything in the amendment which would be out of order, but that is about the only thing I can say in its favour. In the first place I do not think that without some kind of definition of permissive earnings, which is not in the bill at all, it would be a very workable amendment, and I indicated last night how difficult I thought it was to determine permissible earnings in a situation that was part competitive and part regulated. I thought there were great difficulties about that.

My real objection—and I can put it in one sentence—is that the recommendation is based upon careful studies of the royal commission, and I am not yet satisfied that the hon. member for Springfield and whoever may be his advisers should be substituted for the people on whose advice the bill is based.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, the minister may very well be right when he says that he has more confidence in his advisers than in my advice or in that of the people who advise me. But I say to the minister that he has not as yet come to grips with the argument that a formula which allows for a mark-up of 300 or 400 per cent to the railways is unacceptable.

The minister has seen the projections which have been made by those who have studied the likely effects of this particular formula. It has been said by several speakers that if this section passes as it is now worded its effect will be that maximum rates will be set by the commission which will allow the railways to charge a rate giving them a mark-up up to and beyond 400 per cent. Does the minister think that just because this formula happened to have been recommended by a royal commission, that in itself is sufficient reason to consider it as the right formula? Does the mere ipse dixit of a royal commission make something right in itself?

Let us hear from the minister some logic and reasoning in defence of this formula. To hide behind the skirts of a royal commission report is something which I did not think this particular minister would want to do. The minister has a long career behind him and an impressive reputation as one who has demonstrated on many occasions in the past the ability to defend his position. He has not shown any logic or just cause why we should accept this formula except to say that the commission recommended it. I say that the mere ipse dixit of a royal commission is not in itself sufficient reason to accept a clause of the bill.

[Mr. Schreyer.]

I do not suppose the minister is disposed to do it, but I would like him to defend the position that we should accept a maximum rate formula which would allow mark-ups up to and beyond 400 per cent. This is the crux of the matter.

Mr. Sherman: I would like to support the argument put forward by my colleague from Manitoba, the hon. member for Springfield. Surely the day of the robber baron is over. It seems to me that there is no place in this commercial and competitive context for profit mark-ups in the neighbourhood of 400 per cent, 500 per cent and even 600 per cent.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman is not really serious when he speaks about profit mark-ups. He will appreciate, as I am sure all hon. members do, that the reason for the 150 per cent is to make a contrbiution to fixed costs. Hon. members must be aware that very frequently bulk commodities are the only commodities carried on a particular railway line. If one takes the ratio of 30 per cent of variable costs and 70 per cent of fixed costs, it is not a question of profits but of paying the expenses of the railway.

I am not here to defend the railways; I am here to try to get a decent bill. But I do not think we should call things by names that suggest something different from what they are.

Mr. Sherman: It is all very well for the minister to say that these are not profits, but according to the frustrations we have encountered when we have tried to find out the costing figures involved in the arguments advanced by the railways it was impossible to tell whether or not these are profits. However, I will accept the minister's interjection and call maximum rates mark-ups over actual variable costs. The fact remains that the figure of 150 per cent is not substantiated in any of the testimony that was brought forward before the standing committee. The figure of 150 per cent appears in the royal commission report and, as officials of the province of Manitoba pointed out, it was an arbitrary determinant which is nowhere supported in the commission report, nor is it contained in the published studies of the commission. The province of Manitoba was denied railway cost data to verify the accuracy of the figure or the impact of an alternate percentage factor subsequently dealt with in the Manitoba brief. This is the nub of the argument advanced by the hon. member for Springfield in his amendment, that nowhere in any of the evidence presented to the standing committee or to the committee of the whole house has any reasonable justification been given for the selection of the figure of 150 per cent.

I know the minister does not have much faith in the philosophical argument brought to these deliberations by Professor George Borts, who was one of the witnesses appearing on behalf of the province of Manitoba. Although I know the minister has profound respect for the arguments and presentation of Professor Borts, he does not seem to subscribe to the philosophical basis from which the professor started. That is his prerogative. However, I would like to read into the record a recommendation which was made by Professor Borts as a possible alternative to the cost formula. He made several recommendations, but one of them was the following. He recommended a cost formula which specified a percentage mark-up over the variable cost of carrying the traffic at its actual weight. He would use the actual weight of the traffic, not the fictional 30,000 pounds shipment. The percentage mark-up over variable cost would then relate the desired revenues of the railways to their actual variable costs. He said that whether the right mark-up is 50 per cent or 150 per cent he does not know; it would depend on the level of earnings the commission specified for the railways. He said:

> As part of this alternative, one might also rewrite into the bill the non-discriminatory rate provisions, and treat these as an additional protection to the captive shipper over and above the protection which he is already receiving from the maximum rate.

• (12:30 p.m.)

> These provisions would assure the captive shipper a percentage mark-up over variable costs which did not place him at a competitive disadvantage with traffic of similar competitive circumstances. It would be a matter for regulatory procedure—

This gets back to the philosophical point mentioned a moment ago.

> —to define in each case, but it would nevertheless provide captive shippers with more protection than they are likely to receive under the present bill.

That is one man's opinion, and I am the first to concede that the minister's opinion may be a more valid one, a more practical one. However, I wanted to put that opinion on the record because it was part of the peripheral argument advanced by the province of Manitoba. It relates to the crux of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Springfield, and the fact that the 150 per cent figure is entirely arbitrary, unsupported by any evidence or any documentation. This is the point at issue in the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Springfield, and I support the proposal he has offered to the committee.

Mr. Olson: During the course of the committee hearings there were many instances in which the hon. member for Springfield and I agreed on the desirability of imposing some form of maximum rate control on a basis that would be reasonable and fair, not only to the shipper but also to the railroads involved. I agree also that there should be a relationship to permissive earnings in so far as these captive shippers are concerned so these earnings will not make a disproportionately high contribution toward capital and profit of the railways.

I am afraid, on reading this amendment and taking the words substituted for the 150 per cent, that I find it very difficult to understand how this provision could be applied. I do not believe it would be a good thing for the house to pass a law that would be difficult if not impossible to apply.

I agree with the member, too, that this arbitrary figure of 150 per cent over variable costs on a 30,000 pound car, for example, is not fair. It is an arbitrary figure and in some cases, by the use of the balance of the formula contained in new section 336, as has been pointed out so well by the hon. member for Springfield, one finds it may reach even 300 per cent or 400 per cent over variable costs. At the moment I do not understand the meaning of the substituted words, "the percentage difference that total permissive earnings are to variable costs".

I do not quite understand how these words could be applied. Perhaps the hon. member can give us some additional explanation. If these words simply mean that the variable costs for this particular movement would be met, that is one thing. If they mean that there will be some permissive earnings over and above variable costs, that is quite another thing. Then, of course, he adds "plus an amount computed as being the cost of capital on the carriage of goods". If this wording means the railways would be able to set a rate or the commission would be authorized to set a rate that would only meet the variable costs plus an amount computed as being the cost of the capital, then in my opinion that is not fair.

I do not hold any brief for the railways or any other company. However, I believe that any company in Canada, whether it is a railroad or any other kind of company, should have the right to make a profit on its investment for the shareholders. I believe also that it is desirable for the company to earn a profit so it can take care of expansion and keep up with what we hope will be a growing Canadian economy. If there is no accumulation of profit going into the capital fund there will be no incentive to expand or to modernize by purchasing new equipment.

Unless there is some additional explanation that will satisfy me that this clause can in fact be applied fairly and without too much difficulty, I am afraid I cannot support it. I would not like to be a party to including in a bill something that just cannot be applied with fairness to both the shipper and the railway.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I want to indicate my support for this amendment. As has been stated, this is the crux of the bill and is the great weakness inherent in this legislation based on the MacPherson commission report. Hon. members will recall that last night many of us put on the record our fears that excessively high rates will probably take effect for these bulk shippers, mainly in the western part of Canada. While there may be some argument about the details, I think this is the best amendment that has been suggested. I know I tried to think of some amendment that would deal with this problem, so I commend the hon. member for Springfield for bringing forward this suggestion. He has my support.

First of all, the main point made by the professors in their brief, before they even began their detailed discussion, was that this was a measure that did away completely with rate control. In doing so, however, no account has been taken in any way in the bill of the level of earnings the railway company should have. The hon. member for Medicine Hat has just mentioned he is not against the railways making a profit, therefore we should not get into any sort of formula that ties them down in this regard. I agree, generally, that the railways should be allowed to make a profit; it is necessary for their shareholders. However, we are referring to a particular part of the operation of these railways. I do not think they should go hog wild and make all their profit on this type of activity alone. This is the reason I support some sort of limit. I believe this formula is the best that has been put forward.

The hon. member for Springfield and others who have spoken have made reference to the figures. The minister cannot get around the figures that were put on the record by the professors. I referred to them last night. There was a 400 per cent mark-up on a 30,000 pound load, which we have admitted certainly is a small load for a bulk shipper today. What the percentage would be when you got around 200,000 pounds, I do not know. This is where the money is going to be made. The province of Manitoba made this as clear as possible. The one big objection to this measure is that there is no limit on these excessive rates. I have asked the minister three times what protection there is for the western economy and misused resources. The only answer he has really given has been that these rates are not even up to the maximum now, as though that were the end of the argument.

We had testimony from the hon. member for Macleod, one of the great economists in this house, who pointed out in very precise language how any economist could juggle these costing figures back and forth between fixed and variable costs. I do not think anybody knowing his experience would challenge what he said in this regard. I support the amendment. Mention has been made of the 150 per cent, which has no substance. There has been no defence of it. It has been pulled out of the air.

• (12:40 p.m.)

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the hon. gentleman does not want to refer to the late Mr. MacPherson and the other eminent commissioners as pulling something out of the air. That gentleman was charged by the government which was supported by the hon. member with advising the government to the best of his ability, as were the other commissioners, after getting a lot of expert help; and one of the experts was the same expert who helped our standing committee. Mr. MacPherson was one of the greatest westerners of our time and he certainly was not against the west. He and his fellow commissioners gave as their judgment that this was a reasonable formula, and I do not think that it is unreasonable for me to feel impressed by that argument. I have not seen anybody produce a formula that is better.

I am not an economist or a mathematician but I can do simple arithmetic, and I say that if you vastly reduce the variable costs by having heavy car loadings instead of light car loadings, the contribution to constant costs or fixed costs would have to be a much higher percentage of the variable costs in order to be the same absolute amount. That is why these percentages are very fine as propaganda but no accountant would accept them as an accurate reflection of the ratio between two things.

The percentages depend on what you start from but I have never pretended, and I do not pretend now, that there is likely to be any very great protection for bulk shippers in the maximum rate formula. That is why we strengthened clause 16 in order to provide what most hon. members thought was a pretty adequate protection.

Mr. Sherman: Would the minister not concede that when the MacPherson commission, arbitrarily or otherwise, accepted this figure of 150 per cent the future of the railroads was clouded in considerable doubt, at least their financial future, and that the situation has sharply changed in the intervening nine years?

Mr. Pickersgill: There is no doubt that what the hon. gentleman has said is quite correct. There is also no doubt that in the intervening nine years the constant costs of the railways have gone up tremendously. That is why we are asking for $100 million subsidy to be paid by the taxpayers of Canada at the present time, something which was not being paid at the time that commission was appointed.

Those constant costs have to be met by somebody, either by the taxpayers or by some shippers, and I suggest that the shippers of bulk commodities, most of whom are large corporations whose own business is not regulated by boards and commissions and who are allowed to make whatever profit they can, should make some contribution to those constant costs and not leave it all to the small shippers or the taxpayers.

In the strengthened clause 16 I think we have given pretty adequate protection to the shippers of bulk commodities but I do say, and Professor Borts agreed with me, that there probably is some protection in this maximum rate formula. I read the testimony previously and I am not going to repeat it. It is that kind of shipper, the shipper who is now paying the maximum rate, who I believe will get some protection from this clause as it stands at present. I have not argued that the bulk shippers will, since they are not paying the maximum rates now.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): By continuing to speak the minister has answered the argument he made to me. He has admitted that the MacPherson commission report is already nearly ten years old—

Mr. Pickersgill: No, about six.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): —and parts of it are even much older than that.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, it was only appointed nine years ago and it did not report for about four years.

Mr. Bell (Saint-John-Albert): I have great respect for the ability and experience of Mr. MacPherson, but I also have my suspicions about which member of the commission arbitrarily set these figures of 150 per cent and 30,000 pound load. From our discussions today and last night we know that the increase with respect to a 30,000 pound load is about 700 per cent. We are now talking about 200,000 pound loads. Surely there must be a little bit of error in the 150 per cent.

It is true that some of these figures may have to be set arbitrarily, but since parts of the MacPherson report are nearly ten years old the minister should recognize that in the interim we have perfected computers and there would be no trouble in feeding information into them and finding out more of the truth with respect to these matters. It was computers which enabled the professors to determine this 467 per cent mark-up figure. We discussed this matter with the professors at length during hearings held by the standing committee.

The minister has mentioned the cost of money. This also is a problem. A full limit cannot be placed on that, but I do not see why, with modern methods, some figure cannot be computed that would be reasonable and satisfy the requirements of this amendment. I have asked the minister this question four times already and have not received a direct answer. Again I ask, and this is the crux of the complaint by the province of Manitoba, how are we going to limit these rates that will rise sky high for bulk shippers and drastically affect the economy of western Canada?

Mr. Schreyer: Obviously there will be no meeting of minds with the minister on this matter, but I would like to assure the hon. member for Medicine Hat that the amendment is not designed to deny any reasonable level of profit to the railways. Obviously if a privately owned corporation is to be allowed to continue in operation it must not be deliberately starved by government policy. What would be the point of that? If the government wished to take it into public ownership that would be another thing, but if it is a matter of public policy to allow it to continue in private operation then it would be sheer madness for any government to starve it to the point where its resources and assets are so dissipated that it cannot operate with efficiency and economy.

What the amendment intends is really along the line of the arguments and recommendations made to the standing committee by counsel for Manitoba and by Mr. Frawley, counsel for the province of Alberta. I would refer the hon. member for Medicine Hat to pages 2770 and 2771 of the minutes of the standing committee, where the meaning of the concept of permissive earnings and reasonable returns was discussed with Mr. Frawley.

• (12:50 p.m.)

The amendment intends to expunge from the legislation the formula which is based on a mythical foundation, and to substitute for this mythical, fictitious, arbitrary formula one that will reflect variable costs plus—and I emphasize this—plus an amount which would show a reasonable level of return. There is a reliance here on the good judgment of the commission, but I would sooner have it this way than be put in the untenable position of agreeing to a clause setting up a formula for the charging of rates, the basis of which it is completely impossible to evaluate.

Judging by the likely effect of the formula, it allows for an unconscionable mark-up. The minister is right in saying that clause 16 is more important than this clause. He says we should not be too concerned with the formula; but it is in the bill, and it will be looked to as offering a measure of protection that is almost completely non-existent.

Mr. Cantelon: Mr. Chairman, while I am not in entire agreement with the suggested amendment, because I think it has faults, I think it is better than section 336 which is based on the arbitrary 150 per cent and the equally arbitrary 30,000 pound limit for cars. Arguments have been repeated. We have tried to show that conditions on which this section are founded are unfair and unsatisfactory, especially in the way they attempt to control the rates the railways can charge. We all feel that a railway, being a public business and in essence a monopoly, requires regulating. We also feel, as this bill tries to show, that railways ought to be allowed a legitimate profit. The problem arises in the use of the word "legitimate".

The minister told us carefully that the 150 per cent will not create hardship because it will not affect the large bulk shipper. I wonder if his interpretation is correct. That figure, it is almost certain, will have an indirect effect on rates charged and on the negotiating of those rates between large bulk shippers and the railways. For that reason I do not believe that 150 per cent is a wise figure to select. But I find it difficult to determine what figure should be selected. Perhaps it would be better to eliminate the percentage and adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for Springfield. This, of course, will entail difficulties, and undoubtedly there will be difficulty in regulating the figures he selects. The real problem is, what shall be the total permissive earnings? This has been considered in the past and a rough percentage has been used. We can use those, I think, when we try to set up total permissive earnings.

I think the last part of the amendment is wise; I do not think there is anything wrong with it at all. The provision—> —plus an amount computed as being the cost of capital applicable to the carriage of such goods.

—is logical and legitimate.

In the committee we tried to obtain information from the railway. We wanted to know what it considered should be the cost of capital. The railway has been as intractable in that regard as it has been in giving figures about its variable costs. As the railway has refused those figures, the committee found difficulty in arriving at a proper figure. As a committee we had not the power to insist on being given these figures. I doubt if it would have done serious harm to the railway, as the railway suggested, had we been given them.

I think the large shipper, the one who will negotiate with the railway, probably has a fair idea of what the costs of the railways are in moving his goods, and the railway has a fair idea of how much it can charge without eliminating the profit of the shipper completely. The railway knows it cannot charge more than the traffic will bear, but it can charge all that the traffic will bear. Under these circumstances it is better that we have this type of amendment which does not work on that basis. The 150 per cent figure will allow the railways to charge all that the traffic will bear.

As has been stated, there are large bulk shipments of up to 200,000 pounds, such as you have in the product industry, and the percentage figure becomes astronomical. The present section enables the traffic to be charged an exorbitant rate.

Those are my reasons, stated in a general way, for supporting the amendment. I have not quoted the opinions of Professors Borts and Williams, the opinion of Mr. Frawley appearing for Alberta, or the Manitoba submissions. These gentlemen had opinions similar to those I have stated. As specific arguments have been advanced there is no purpose in my repeating them. I would take up time and I do not want the minister to feel I am doing that.

Again I want to say that I do not like the original section 336. I do not like the 150 per cent and I do not like the way it is arrived at; I do not like the 30,000 pounds, and I do not like the way that was arrived at. I like none of these things even though they were derived from the MacPherson commission report.

To say that that commission was appointed by another government is to draw a red herring over the path of its results. Surely, no matter what government appoints a commission, the findings of that commission, which is an impartial body, ought to be accepted by any party. Either we agree with the results or we disagree. I may be in a minority, but I cannot agree with the results of the MacPherson commission. I do not feel that sufficient competition exists on the prairies and in the maritimes to justify section 336. For that reason I continue to express my displeasure with that section, and I am prepared to espouse this amendment. If we cannot completely rid ourselves of new section 336, perhaps we can emasculate it to the point at which something more drastic will be done. On this ground alone I am prepared to support the amendment.

• (1:00 p.m.)

Mr. Dinsdale: I was not a member of the committee which studied this subject so I do not have the broad background of information which many hon. members possess, but the conclusion I have reached from this discussion is that we are all in agreement here that it is difficult even for the experts to determine the cost variables in the transportation industry. The minister has indicated as much in his comments.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think I have ever indicated anything of that sort, and I do not share that view.

Mr. Dinsdale: The minister has denied it, but his earlier comments gave me that impression. This impression is confirmed by the fact that even the so-called experts who appeared before the committee had difficulty in assessing the cost factors and the cost variables. The figure of 150 per cent in this section seems to be an arbitrary one which was recommended in the initial MacPherson commission report. It is for this reason that I support the amendment which is before the committee at the present time.

The transportation picture, particularly the railway picture, has changed substantially in recent years and it would seem to me that the statutes governing it should contain more flexible features such as the one recommended in the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Springfield. In the second place, the arbitrary figure flies in the face of government policy as expressed not only by the present government and the previous government but by all the governments of the prairie provinces, which have as one of their objectives the diversification and decentralization of industry in the prairie region. Transportation represents a major cost factor and has been one of the major causes of difficulty in the past, as the minister knows, and if there is so much uncertainty about determining the precise cost pattern of the railways it would be much wiser, I suggest, to err in favour of the developing new industries on the prairies.

The present government has set up a designated area program.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I would not normally wish to restrict the hon. gentleman from making a general speech on this bill, but we have been discussing this measure for a long time. There is an amendment before us and it seems to me we might stick to the amendment which involves a choice between two ways of measuring a maximum rate formula and which has really nothing to do with designated areas or anything of that sort.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am surprised at this attempt by the minister to restrict my comments. This is the first time I have taken part in the discussion. I am amazed at the minister's attempt to limit my freedom of speech in this regard, particularly when the subject concerns my own province of Manitoba in a vital way and when the minister himself has indicated that there is uncertainty as to the actual cost picture. I do not intend to make a speech. I merely wish to indicate my support for the amendment which, I believe, deals as effectively as possible with section 336 in an attempt to make it at least reasonable in relation to the objectives of the legislation before the committee.

This section is actually the heart of the bill, and if we fail to do something about it now in terms of the amendment a further opportunity is unlikely to occur for a long time to come. I suggest that the minister should take his stand in terms of the best interests of western Canada which will depend so largely on the effects of this new transportation legislation.

Mr. Olson: I understand that the hon. member for Springfield wishes the commission to have authority to fix a rate equal to the variable cost of the carriage of the goods plus a percentage for permitted earnings plus the capital cost. With this whole concept I agree. But when I look at the words "the percentage difference that total permissive earnings are to freight variable costs" it appears there is a relationship between the percentage difference which permissive earnings bear to freight variable costs, and with all due respect to the hon. member's intentions, which I think are good, I cannot apprehend that this amendment would in fact do what it is intended to do. I would not like to play any part in placing upon the statute books of Canada something which would not be interpreted as intended, notwithstanding my agreement with the intent of the hon. member.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): This is my final question. What is the minister's answer to the suggested C.P.R. formula with regard to the cost of money? He has drawn attention to the difficulty attaching to his whole formula in connection with the cost of money and the like.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think this is an abstruse question to get into and I hope the hon. member is not trying to lead me down any garden path. I have always understood that in variable cost certain capital is used and in constant costs certain capital is used. That capital costs something. Rail cars are part of variable cost and they cost something, and railway lines, which are an element of constant cost, also cost something. In each case they cost something to put there and they would cost something to replace when depreciated. It is a proper element of variable cost to charge what the capital is worth, not the value of the capital in capital terms but a rent for the capital which is used. Anyone who has bought or sold a motor car knows that part of the cost of operating the car is depreciation. The total costs have to be apportioned between the variable and constant costs. I am sure accountants might argue about this. Here, however, it is a matter for arbitration. But I submit that this is not something which is in issue between the two amendments. The hon. member for Springfield is an intelligent and clear-headed member of the house—

• (1:10 p.m.)

Mr. Woolliams: Do not flatter him like that.

Mr. Pickersgill: He is. I also think he is sometimes wrong-headed, but that is another matter. I am sure the hon. member for Springfield would agree that his amendment depends as much on a determination of the variable cost as does the clause which at present is in the bill. So there is no issue in respect of variable cost as between the amendment and the bill.

Mr. Churchill: The minister is aware that the hon. member's constituency is being eliminated before the next election. Is he now opening the door for him to join the Liberal party and take the first step toward the Senate?

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre could be appointed to the Senate along with me and then the hon. member for Springfield could run in his constituency.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, there is one point I might make about the minister complimenting certain members. I hope I do not fall in the category of those who receive too many compliments because I know the minister's strategy. He is attempting to drag them in and give them credit for these points in the bill, but when the complaints come in he will say that the hon. member for Springfield and the hon. member for Medicine Hat are the ones who are to blame.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, if I can only get this bill through the house I will take all the blame for it and will not blame any hon. member.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): So far as I am concerned we can now have the vote on this subject. I should like, however, to make a point as to the formula for the variable costs with regard to investment. I wish I had the hon. member for Macleod here to help me in respect of the difficulty I have concerning economics.

There are times when we wish to go into the matter of the cost of money and the return on investment and it is impossible to obtain this information. We are told that the figures fluctuate and so on. In this day and age when facts can be thrown into a computer and an answer obtained I do not see why we cannot obtain answers in respect of costs.

Mr. Pickersgill: The difficulty is that you must know what the question is.

Amendment (Mr. Schreyer) negatived: Yeas 16; nays 46.

The Deputy Chairman: Does this conclude consideration of new section 336?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I have the old bill before me and I would refer to section 336(10) concerning the matter of reporting to the governor in council. I think the minister might say something about his hopes and aspirations in respect of this part of the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: If it is understood that we are not reopening the matter, I might say I agree to a certain extent with hon. gentlemen who have criticized the formula. I should like to see how it works and see what the experience will be. In such a review I would hope that the commission would also review the experience under clause 16 of the bill to make sure that there is adequate protection for shippers who do not have the competition of the market place or the competition of another carrier. I am sure that is the intent in this new section.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): During the committee sessions the minister made quite a case in respect of the matter of costing techniques.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is a later clause on that.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee will now proceed to the consideration of new section 337.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to move an amendment to new section 337, but I should like the minister to take into consideration that all through the hearings of the committee we were denied costing data and information in respect of the variable costs with regard to the movement of commodities on the railways. This is the section which deals with exchange of information between carriers. I make a plea to the minister that he take another good hard look at the reasons that were advanced for the withholding of this costing data. I do not think the committee performed its function well because members did not have available to them all the factors in the formula. The most important of these is the variable cost data. I would hope that the minister would take a further look at this matter to determine whether there is any valid claim that the variable cost data in some way are the property of the railways and that it would be wrong for this information to be produced.

We know, for example, that the variable costs concerning a passenger train, the Dominion, were in fact made public; there was no problem about that. I do not think this harmed the railway. A certain amount of this data was made public during the hearings before the MacPherson commission, particularly with reference to the movement of grain. I still cannot understand the reason there is objection to this information being made available. After all, if there are to be committee hearings in respect of this matter, then under our system someone must appear and argue the other side of the case. Surely this person should have this information. Usually it is the provinces who appear on the other side. If they are not supplied in advance with this information from the railways, then surely they will be at a severe disadvantage when really what they are attempting to do is stand up for the public interest as they see it. I am making the plea that the minister take a close look at this situation to see whether there is any valid reason for the withholding of this costing data.

• (1:20 p.m.)

Mr. Pickersgill: This matter can be discussed when we are on another clause. I have made a very careful examination of the whole bill to see whether there is any case in which a railway company might be seeking financial assistance or support or might be seeking to have a rate established publicly where these costs would not be made public, and there is none. The bill provides that the only kind of information that should be kept confidential is that information in respect of matters about which a railway company or anybody else was not seeking to have action taken. If there was a prima facie case made under clause 16, for example, and the commission decided that was so, all the relevant information would have to be made public at the hearing.

The only defence I know of for keeping cost data confidential would be the situation where there is what I in my simple-minded way prefer to call a bargaining factor, but which is called competition in the market. I do not see why the Aluminum company would be entitled to know what the railway companies costs are, and the railway companies would not be entitled to know the financial circumstances of the Aluminum company. I do not think that would be a fair burden to place on the railway company. If the Aluminum company was a captive shipper and was seeking protection under this law then no information the commission obtained relevant to its determination of that question should be kept confidential.

Mr. Olson: I should like to discuss one point which possibly should be discussed during our consideration of another clause but perhaps I can discuss it now and avoid the necessity of referring to it again. I hope there will be a much expanded cost accounting division under the transport commission than exists under the Board of Transport Commissioners. When I say "expanded" I mean a far greater and larger division. If the new branch obtains figures regarding what it considers variable costs, will that information be proprietary to the railway company or will that be regarded as public information?

Mr. Pickersgill: Any information obtained by the commission would be the property of the commission. I think it would be better to discuss this situation when we are considering another clause which contains an express provision dealing with this matter. Perhaps instead of attempting to answer the question now I should deal with it during our consideration of that clause.

The commission might have information it was not willing to disclose to the railway company, and I can conceive of circumstances under which the companies would not be entitled to that information. For example, the commission might want information from shippers and those shippers might have a perfect right to have that information kept confidential so far as the railway companies are concerned. That kind of situation could arise. However, I think the point should be dealt with when we are considering the appropriate clause.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I should like to ask the minister one question now that he has referred to this subject. While we have not been assessing our position in the last two days as we did originally, in looking ahead I can see that our main discussion will be relevant to costing. That is the main item to be considered before we reach the important part of this bill which deals with port parity.

Mr. Pickersgill: Costing will be considered under clause 70.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): In view of the fact this subject has been mentioned I thought perhaps we could deal with it before taking a break. The minister does look as though he needs a sandwich. Perhaps we could finish this part and discuss port parity this afternoon.

Mr. Pickersgill: I certainly would like to have clause 53 completed before we talk about sandwiches or anything else.

Mr. Southam: The hon. member for Medicine Hat has referred to one of the most sensitive areas so far as this new transport bill is concerned, that of variable cost information. Before this clause passes there should be general agreement in the house that an amendment or a recommendation by the minister should be made to satisfy people in general that when we set up this legislation which is perhaps 30 years overdue certain problems will be solved.

The Interstate Commerce Commission has managed to solve certain problems and I think we should take more leaves out of their book. We are not the only country in the world with transportation problems. Professor Borts and Professor Williams, two of the most competent experts in this field on the North American continent, have spent half their lives studying these problems. I asked them a question as a member of the committee and in their answers they said the United States commission does have access to costing data which is kept confidential in the interests of private enterprise. If that commission finds this type of formula workable we should think seriously of applying the same principle here.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I could interrupt the hon. gentleman and suggest that we discuss this during our consideration of clause 70 which relates directly to this subject of costing. New section 377 is really not related to costs except in the sense that it empowers the two railway companies to meet the provisions of this act to exchange cost data. It has nothing to do fundamentally with costs.

Mr. Sherman: I should like to ask the minister whether or not this subject should be dealt with under new section 387C which comes within clause 70. It seems to me the whole subject of cost data is dealt with there in detail.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is exactly what I was referring to in my suggestion which I hope is agreeable to the committee.

Mr. Southam: I am agreeable to that suggestion, but I felt that while I was in the chamber I should not like the opportunity to pass of expressing my opinion on this very important and sensitive part of the legislation.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clauses 54 to 58 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 59—

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, I should just like to say—

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. member does not mind, perhaps before he speaks I should offer an amendment to clause 59, the nature of which I indicated the other day.

• (1:30 p.m.)

My faithful colleague the Postmaster General is here to move this amendment. I must say I am becoming increasingly grateful to the Postmaster General. The purpose of this amendment is to make obsolutely sure that everything now in the law of Canada in any act of parliament with respect to the rates and the traffic through the Atlantic ports, the ports of Halifax and Saint John, continues to be part of the law. Therefore there will be no question that by any kind of inadvertence any act of parliament will have been repealed by some provision of this law. I think I should read the amendment:

That Bill C-231, an act to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the railway act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential provisions, be amended

(a) by renumbering clauses 58 and 59 on page 54 thereof, as subclauses (1) and (2), respectively, of clause 58; and

(b) by inserting immediately after clause 58, as renumbered, the following new clause 59;—

It is done in this way to avoid renumbering all the clauses in the bill. The present clauses 58 and 59 repeal something and they are just being combined into one clause. This is the substantive part of the amendment:

"59. Section 343 of the said act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:
Preference on export rates.

"(2) Nothing in this act except section 334 shall be construed to affect any obligation imposed upon any railway company subject to the jurisdiction of parliament by any other act or any agreement made pursuant thereto requiring the company

(a) to maintain rates on export traffic moving through any Canadian seaport located in the 'select territory' as defined by sections 2, 7 and 12 of the Maritime Freight Rates Act at a specified level, or at a level specified in relation to other rates; or

(b) to route export traffic through Canadian seaports."

I think that does the two things that I suggested it was the desire of the government to make sure were done, that is, to safeguard any rates that exist by statute or exist pursuant to any statute, and to safeguard any routing that is required by the law at the present time. In other words, it is to make amply sure that no rights that now exist are taken away from any of the ports in the select territory. Of course, the ports principally affected and principally concerned are those of Halifax and Saint John.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): I so move, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Order. A few moments ago the committee passed clause 58. The amendment now before us deals with clauses 58 and 59. Perhaps the committee would agree to reconsidering clauses 58 and 59 for the purposes of the amendment now proposed. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Therefore I shall read the amendment proposed by the Postmaster General.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether you could dispense with reading the amendment.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, I wish to raise a point in connection with the amendment. I wonder whether the minister has any flexibility left in him. I know this has been a tough bill. However, we have just seen this amendment for the first time and it is impossible to comment on it now in the way we would like. Could we not have a half hour, or even 22½ minutes until two o'clock, in order that we may have a chance to assess the amendment? It is quite complicated, this is the first time we have seen it, and it is important to Halifax and Saint John. I do not know how we can deal with it intelligently on such short notice.

Mr. Pickersgill: I had hoped, of course, that the proposition I understood was agreed to, and that I was rather disconcerted to find was not, which was made originally would have ensured this. We really have spent a long, long time on this bill and I am very anxious to make progress on it. If I could have got the hour between five o'clock and six o'clock, to which I thought everyone was at one stage agreeable. I would have been very happy to have an adjournment. But I just hate to lose all that time.

Mr. Knowles: Twenty minutes?

Mr. Pickersgill: A great deal has happened in this house in 20 minutes, and not very long ago.

Mr. Churchill: That was good for the Liberal party.

Mr. Pickersgill: We will have to go through a great deal of paraphernalia to do it, but if hon. members would be agreeable to coming back at two o'clock I would not wish to appear to be stubborn and unreasonable.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, the minister is now getting into a better frame of mind. He is worried about the passage of this bill but over 70 per cent of the bill has now gone through.

Mr. Pickersgill: No.

An hon. Member: Three weeks.

Mr. Churchill: No, it is two weeks, and we have passed over 70 per cent of the pages of the bill. What more can the minister expect with respect to a bill of this importance that is transforming the transportation policy of this country?

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Churchill: Let the minister stop talking and listen for a little while. He talks too much. He is always talking and will not listen to others, and if we want to say something he complains. I support the hon. member for Saint John-Albert in suggesting that we should have an opportunity to examine this amendment and the clauses should stand. It is fantastic for a minister to rise and read a complete change in the bill and then want us to pass it without any debate or examination. We have responsibilities here just as he has. I do not think we should be asked to pass this amendment after the expiration of only 20 minutes. I believe the clauses should stand until much later when we have had an opportunity to consider this matter and what the effect of the amendment will be.

We have to look at the bill as it is now written, see the changes that this amendment implies, and discuss with our colleagues what should be done. The minister is going too far in asking us to give way and pass something now because we have spent so many days on this bill. Suppose we spend four weeks on the bill? We would be justified in so doing because of its effect on the transportation policy of Canada. The idea that everything must be done instantly is just nonsense. Therefore I suggest to the minister that he use a little common sense.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: Groan if you like, Postmaster General. I say, use a little common sense and take some time off for a luncheon adjournment. It puts people in better humour. Then let us get on with the bill. If we complete this bill early next week the minister and the government should be thoroughly satisfied. We have our responsibility to the people of this country and we are going to assert that responsibility. I for one will not consent to passing this amendment after the short space of 20 minutes.

Mr. Pickersgill: I made no such suggestion, Mr. Chairman. I suggested that we agree to rise for 20 minutes.

Mr. Churchill: Why just 20 minutes? Why don't we take 30 minutes?

Mr. Pickersgill: I thought I was being agreeable; I was accepting the suggestion made by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

• (1:40 p.m.)

Mr. Pickersgill: After all, I understood that in so far as this particular part of the bill was concerned the hon. member was leading the house for his party, which seemed to be quite agreeable to the suggestion I made until the intervention of the hon. gentleman. I really think that in this particular context it was a little gratuitous of him to do so because I had agreed precisely to what the hon. gentleman had asked for. I am not suggesting that one minute after we come back we can expect to have this clause passed, and indeed if the hon. member for Saint John-Albert and his colleagues who are particularly interested in this matter, because of the interests of their constituencies, would prefer to stand this clause and go on to consideration of some other clauses, that would also be quite agreeable to me. However, what I was doing was to concede that I would not rely on the rules of the house and that we would take a little time off if that was generally agreeable. I still hope we can do that.

Mr. Churchill: I just want to say, in view of the minister's reference to it, that there was a misunderstanding this morning and I offer my apology to the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, to the whip of our party and to the minister if he wants it, since I was not aware of the arrangement that had been made. I do not think it was a very good arrangement and I thought it had been made some other way. I think the house should not be pressed too hard, particularly on a Friday, just because the Liberal party slipped up the other day. I will resist such pressure.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I offer the suggestion that after we recess, and the time of that recess is fast dwindling away, we stand this clause and proceed to the consideration of other clauses such as the one on tolls for example. The minister is so eager that he did not understand the implication of my suggestion to him that we could deal with the matter of tolls and costing techniques.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am quite willing to let the clause stand and to come back to it at such time as the gentlemen opposite would like after some other clause is passed.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I have checked with the hon. members for Halifax and we are agreed on our dissatisfaction with this section. The result will be an all-afternoon filibuster. If there is any threat in what I said, the minister can take it as he likes.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not know what more I can do. I have accepted every suggestion that hon. gentlemen have made but they insist on being rude to me. I have said that I would let this clause stand and go on to other clauses. When the hon. gentlemen are ready to come back to it, I will be quite agreeable to doing so. I do not know what more I can do. If there is any way in which I can humble myself further I would be very glad to try.

Mr. Patterson: Would it not be wise to follow the suggestion that has been made, namely, to stand this particular clause, proceed to others and at a later hour come back to it.

The Chairman: May I suggest to the committee that pursuant to the agreement made a few moments ago we stand clauses 58 and 59 since the amendment deals with both? Is there agreement to that?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I think it is the wish of the house to recess for refreshments and for an improvement of our general dispositions. If it would be generally agreeable I think we could come back at 2.15.

Mr. Speaker: Is there agreement with that suggestion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TRANSPORTATION

PROVISION FOR DEFINITION AND IMPLEMENTATION OF NATIONAL POLICY

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-231, to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential provisions—Mr. Pickersgill—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: Pursuant to the order just passed, I do now leave the chair.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The committee resumed at 2.15 p.m.

The Chairman: Before the committee rose at 1.45 an amendment had been moved by the Postmaster General dealing with clauses 58 and 59. It was agreed at that time to stand those two clauses. Is it the wish of the committee to proceed with the amendment or to proceed to clause 60?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it was understood that the proposed amendment would stand until such time as hon. gentlemen opposite were willing to come back to it at the conclusion of some other clause. I suggest, therefore, we should go ahead with clause 60.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Clauses 60 to 69 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 70—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should draw attention to the fact that clause 70 deals with costing and I understand there are a number of hon. members who wish to make some observations about it.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, the new cost accounting department or branch that will be set up by the transportation commission will be very desirable. The minister answered some questions about this when we were dealing with new section 337, and I think he said that any data gathered by the new costing division would not necessarily be made public if it were only for the use of the commission. Can we be assured that in any case where provinces or other public authorities have an argument to advance on costs, the cost data gathered by the new cost accounting branch will be made available to them so that they may have an opportunity of examining it prior to the hearing before the commission?

Mr. Pickersgill: That actually is not covered by this clause but in one of the clauses dealing with the commission. There is a provision, notwithstanding the fact that normally certain information would be kept confidential, information that the commission required for its own purposes, that it may nevertheless make that information public. I can assure the hon. gentleman that the commission has the power to make public any information that is given to it if it considers that it is in the public interest to do so. However, there might be occasions where the commission, in order to reach its own conclusions, wished to get some information and it would not feel it was necessary to make it public. But where there is anything in contention obviously no decision could be reached on the basis of information that was not available to both parties involved in the dispute.

Mr. Olson: In the past the provinces have had to go to great expense to arrive at variable costs. The minister knows the story well of how the railways appeared before the MacPherson royal commission and claimed a short-fall or deficit of $17 million with respect to the movement of grain from the prairies under the Crowsnest rates. In order to challenge those costs the provinces of Manitoba and Alberta hired experts to examine the figures, and those experts claimed that instead of a $17 million short-fall there was in fact a $500,000 net profit. I am not saying that the MacPherson commission accepted the experts' figures, but I think it decided on a short-fall of about $2 million instead of the railway's claim of $17 million. If the provinces have to establish cost figures will they have to go through that kind of performance again?

The minister has said that if the figures were given in evidence then obviously the information would be made public, but I think the commission should make the figures available to provinces, municipalities or any other organizations vitally interested before the hearing is held. It should not be left to the discretion of the commission to decide whether this information should be released to such parties. I believe there should be a provision in the bill stating that the results of this cost accounting shall be made available to parties seriously concerned if they wish to challenge costs advanced by the railways.

Mr. Pickersgill: Without knowing the actual circumstances it would be very hard to make a specific statement, but I do assert that where any information which the railways submitted to the commission was in any way in contention, or directly relevant to any contention properly before the commission, then that information would have to be available to any interested party. But it is conceivable that, for example, the commission itself may try to establish some point in relation to the railways in which no other party is interested. The commission could insist that the railways provide it with information in order to reach its own conclusions of its own motion in such a case, and in those circumstances if the railways wanted the information kept confidential, and there was good reason for that, the commission would not release it. There is no question about a matter which would be essential evidence coming before the commission. I am told that section 387C allows the commission to use cost information and to reveal it if it is kept in a form which could not be used to the disadvantage of the railway.

• (2:30 p.m.)

The hon. gentleman may recall that at the time of the MacPherson commission, and perhaps he followed these things more closely than I did, a good deal of information was made available to the provincial governments that was not made public. I had a fairly recent experience myself with a commission that I had caused to be appointed in Winnipeg with respect to the air maintenance base. We had an understanding that certain information would be made available to the government of Manitoba, information of a proprietary character which the government, by agreement with us, was not to make public. They could use that information for the preparation of their case. It is quite conceivable that some situation like that might arise where a matter was not directly in contention, where the information was not directly required but where it was required by way of an analogy, comparison or something like that. The information might be made available to a party on the understanding that it would not be published to the advantage of third persons not interested in the case. I do not even envisage that as being likely to happen.

Mr. Olson: My question may be hypothetical but I can think of cases where the arithmetic is very real. Let us take the case of the potash producers in Saskatchewan or the people who ship sulphur to the west coast from Alberta. If they appeared before the commission and claimed that they were paying a disproportionately high contribution under their toll to capital and profit, because of the provision in the bill affecting this matter the transportation commission has the power to deal with it. They have the power to remedy it.

I am told that potash shippers at Esterhazy, Saskatchewan, are paying approximately $9 a ton from their shipping point to the seaport at Vancouver or wherever the product is loaded. The variable cost for the movement of grain from points in this area to Vancouver is around $3 or slightly less than $3 a ton for the same movement. Let us assume that the variable costs for moving potash and grain are approximately the same, because there is about the same weight per carload. It might be argued that the variable costs for moving grain are slightly higher than the costs for moving potash because of the differences in cars, and so on. Following up my assumption it appears that potash shippers are paying for variable costs plus 200 per cent.

I think it can be argued by the province of Saskatchewan that such a charge is prejudicial to the economy of that province and that the contribution above variable costs is unreasonable. If the figures will not be made available how is the province to make a case in defending its economy? Will it do what Manitoba did, hire cost analysts to do the job that the transportation commission has already done? This thinking holds true for shippers of sulphur in Alberta. Sulphur may be shipped by pipe line but it is not being so shipped now. If the province of Alberta is of the opinion that on this commodity too high a contribution is being paid to the railway, that too much is being paid toward capital and profits above variable costs, then I think it has a justifiable case because the province wants to see its sulphur industry expanding.

The minister will agree with me that any commodity, potash, sulphur or lumber, must get to market at competitive prices. That is vital to the economy of the area in which the industry is. The provinces, therefore, have a justifiable right to get the most favourable rate for shipping that is available.

I come back to section 387C which reads in part:

> Where information concerning the costs of a railway company or other information that is by its nature confidential—

The point is that the Aluminum Company of Canada, to use the minister's example, may be in a better negotiating position if it knows the costs of the railway and the railway does not know its costs. What I am trying to say is that we do not know what is meant by the words "by its nature confidential". I am concerned that some cost data to be gathered on a continuing basis, I presume, by the costing department of the transportation commission may not be made available to interested parties because the railway may say that such information by its nature is confidential.

I have no amendment ready to move but I hope the minister will say to the transportation commission that the government feels that costs of this nature should be made available to interested parties who act in the public interest of a community, a province or a region.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can conceive of several kinds of situations arising under the legislation—and I know the hon. gentleman will say that this is a totally unrealistic case—where a shipper with no way of shipping goods except rail would get a rate from the railway he was dissatisfied with and apply to the commission to have a rate set. The commission, if it were satisfied that he had no alternative economical way of shipping goods except by rail—this would not be hard to determine—would have the duty of determining what the maximum rate should be, and it would be a matter of simple arithmetic for the shipper who would have the right, even though he did not exercise it, to have the rate determined, to ascertain certain figures. All he would need to take is two-fifths, if my arithmetic is correct, of the rate that was set and that would determine the basis of the variable costs. It would not be a big problem. Even if the board did not give him the variable costs the 150 per cent would be put on. Even if the resulting rate is astronomically high, as some hon. members have suggested it would be, the shipper would still know what the variable costs were as established by the commission. In a case like that there would not be a complicated way of finding out costs.

• (2:40 p.m.)

The other case, the only specifically defined aspect of the public interest, is where someone alleges that the rate he is given places him at an undue disadvantage having regard to geography and things of that sort. Here all the rates are public anyway. The shipper takes one rate and compares it with another, then goes to the commission and says he is at an undue disadvantage. The question of costs does not really enter into this at all; it is a question of whether the rate in one case, having regard to the conditions, is lower than in another case. I cannot easily envisage a situation where there would be costs relevant to a contentious issue in which it was sought to establish a rate and where the information could be kept confidential. Such information, it seems to me, would be essential to the determination of the issue. However, it is never possible, especially for someone who has never presided over a tribunal in his life, to envisage all the contingencies which might arise.

Mr. Olson: The minister has given us the best possible argument in favour of the point I am trying to make. He is saying that if someone wishes to find out the variable cost of moving his goods he can do so by applying for a maximum rate under section 336. In my opinion a person would be stupid to try to have such a rate applied to bulk shipments because he would be both—

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman did not understand me. The shipper could apply for a rate but he would not have to accept a rate. It would be a very easy way of finding out what he wished to know, if there were no other way.

Mr. Olson: But this is not the kind of legislation we should have on the books. The only way in which a shipper or a municipality or a province can find out what these variable costs are, so that they can make a case under clause 16, is to apply for a rate to be set under section 336. Why should it be necessary for these people to go through various motions which take a great deal of time and cause a great deal of involvement, when they do not want the rate anyway. I suggest that the wording of clause 16 is such that if any shipper is paying a rate which returns to the railway the variable cost plus 2 or 3 hundred per cent, he has a valid case for arguing that the public interest in his region or area is prejudiced, not in relation to some other rate but simply because the rate in excess of the variable cost is too high.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Consider the effect in the world market—I am thinking particularly of potash and sulphur—when the freight rate from the point of origin to the shipping point amounts in many cases to 50 per cent of the sale price of the commodity at seaboard. Any unreasonable charge above the variable cost is in fact prejudicial to the industry concerned and to the area in which the industry is located.

The minister has told us that one way in which a shipper can find out facts which concern him would be to ask for a maximum rate to be set under section 336. We have to take account of the experience in the United States where the basis of these rates, whether for the movement of grain or passengers, is not treated as secret information.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman is quite wrong. In the United States, if I recollect correctly, the figure given is a composite one based on a whole lot of rates. In normal circumstances the variable costs of a particular railway in relation to a particular shipment are never given unless required by law for some specific purpose.

Mr. Olson: I do not disagree with that. But the minister knows well that these composite averages do not vary very much and can be relied on to a great extent even though they do not spell out the actual movement in which a particular shipment may be involved. The fact is that the information is made available. And, of course, the Interstate Commerce Commission which looks after these matters has its own accounting staff and the commission itself challenges the data as well as the arguments which are advanced by the railways. This is not the case in Canada, or at least it has not been the case in the past in hearings before the Board of Transport Commissioners and I have to presume that similar practices will be followed in the future. I can see no provision in this bill for the appointment of a "devil's advocate" to challenge these assertions.

In the past it has been the responsibility of the provinces in particular, as well as of other interested parties, to act as adversaries in these hearings. I do not have an amendment to offer but I ask the minister once again to make sure that responsible people such as the representatives of regions, provinces and municipalities, as well as other organizations which represent a large section of the public interest, will not be faced with the necessity of gathering information as to cost entirely on their own. The information which the railway has, as well as the information available to the costing department of the new commission, should be made available to them. We are talking about section 387C. I trust the minister will appreciate the justice of getting the commission to co-operate with such bodies as I have mentioned. After all there is no point in duplicating the effort and expense which will be necessary in order to obtain this information. When a rate is being challenged and a hearing is to be held, surely all this information should be made available to the parties concerned.

I suggest also that the railways be given the benefit of any figures which might be in the possession of the commission's costing department in advance of the hearing so that they can study them and state their case if they do not agree with them. I hope the minister can assure us that there will be no duplication in the work of gathering this information.

• (2:50 p.m.)

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, may I break up this tête-à-tête. If the hon. member for Winnipeg South could be heard, we might supply an amendment.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman; I did not hear the hon. member.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): The hon. member for Medicine Hat has been complaining that he does not have an amendent to bring forward regarding the matter. If the hon. member for Winnipeg South might be heard, we would supply an amendment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before he is heard, perhaps I might make any amendment unnecessary by the sufficiency of my explanation. I would doubt this, but I might attempt it. Because of the change which is envisaged in the bill we find it hard to accept emotionally the fact that the minister of finance, whoever he may be, under the terms of this legislation will have the most profound interest in seeing that these figures are accurate. Throughout the whole of this bill we have the principle recommended by the MacPherson commission that what is to be provided in the national interest should be paid for out of the national treasury.

Therefore the Minister of Finance, if he is to be a responsible minister, will have quite an incentive to do this because he would not wish to collect and pay out tens and hundreds of millions of dollars unless there is thorough justification for it. One element of railway costing will not be sufficient. There must be knowledge in respect of every aspect of the cost. Therefore I doubt that any situation would arise in which the commission would not feel it had a duty in this regard or would not be prodded by the representatives of the executive into discharging that duty in the interest of protecting the federal treasury. This will create a situation different from the situation which has prevailed up to now. Mind you, that does not mean that a shipper or a provincial government may not challenge the commission's figures or the railway's figures. Should they do so, I do not think in those circumstances anyone would suggest that the federal treasury should subsidize them to be devil's advocates. At least I am not prepared to introduce legislation to that effect.

The second point is that we are charging the commission with the responsibility of seeing that the information given to it by the railways is audited and checked. The commission can require from the railways any information it wishes. There is one other thing which the hon. gentleman mentioned that we should think about. We do not say to a wheat farmer that he should be allowed to make only a reasonable profit. He can make just as much profit as is possible in all the circumstances. I admit that most of the time it is not adequate. Still there is no law which limits it. Also, there is no law limiting what profit the International Nickel Company can make, what profit the sulphur producers can make or what profit the potash companies can make. In the case of these exporters we say they should sell their product for all that the traffic will bear, because this helps our balance of payments. We want them to do this.

In the competitive sector it seems we are telling the railways that we do not want to be handing out millions of dollars to them in the form of subsidies. We are telling them we want them to go out and make their own living. We cannot at the same time say that if they earn more than a certain amount in these competitive activities, it is unreasonable. In the situation where the shipper has no choice but to use the railway, then that is another matter and in this case the railways are treated as a public utility. We know the difficulty; all of us have been troubled by it. The hon. member for Winnipeg South, the hon. member for Medicine Hat and the hon. member for Springfield took up a good deal of time this morning on this matter. I am not criticizing them because this is the very essence of the whole thing, that is, where the line should be drawn between those shippers who have no bargaining power vis-à-vis the railways and those who have.

I think many of us, because we are adults or old men like I am, have formed our habits when we were young and therefore do not realize that today the Canadian railways do not have anything like the bargaining power they had in the period between the first and second world wars and in the period before the first world war. Had the situation not changed, there would have been no justification for the whole MacPherson approach to this matter. Most of the shippers in the country today can drive a harder bargain with the railways than the railways can with them. That is a fact in our economic life with which most of us have not caught up because we were brought up in an environment when this was not true. Therefore, in our desire to protect those who need protection we must not prevent the railways earning what they can when they are providing a service to those who do not need to be protected, because if we are to be able to provide reasonable freight rates for those people who are at the mercy of the railways, and if we are to be able to insist on reasonable freight rates without placing an undue cost on the treasury, we must let the railways earn their living in the other area where the protection is not needed.

That seems to be the whole basis of this very complicated double concept. We could do what the United States authorities are still doing. They profess to be the greatest exponents of private enterprise in the world but they still treat their railways as though they had to be regulated. The hon. member for Medicine Hat thought that I was a little unfair yesterday. Perhaps I was a little extreme, but one of the difficulties in respect of bringing in American experts to talk about the Canadian approach to this matter is that they speak in terms of the context of an entirely regulated railway system.

Mr. Sherman: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Sherman: On the point concerning regulations, does the minister not agree that new section 387C is unnecessarily regulatory and paternalistic because it says that the commission, when it obtains cost information from any railway company in the course of any investigation under the act, shall ensure that such information shall not be published or revealed in such a manner as to be avaiable for the use of any other person? It is my understanding that under the Railway Act as presently written—and I think the Manitoba government made this point in its submission to the standing committee—there are no prohibitions placed on the discretion of the commission or any regulatory authority where this type of information is concerned.

• (3:00 p.m.)

No one is recommending or insisting that this cost data must be published, and certainly I am not demanding that it necessarily be made available to shippers. In order for a shipper to understand adequately and intelligently commercial problems with which he is confronted, I think that this cost data in many instances should be made available to him. I do object, however, to the fact that this particular part of the bill regulates the commission in respect of the discretion it must employ so far as cost information is concerned.

I suggest to the minister that new section 387C be eliminated and that the discretionary powers of the commission in respect of this kind of data or information be preserved as they are now preserved under the Railway Act. That act does not prohibit the commission from using its discretion so far as cost information is concerned. Obviously the legislators of the Railway Act anticipated that the commission or regulatory authority would exercise discretion and responsibility where cost data which might be inequitable in a competitive situation was concerned. The Railway Act leaves this whole matter up to the discretion of the regulatory authority or the commission, if you like. This proposed legislation says that the commission must do such and such with this information and make sure that such and such else is not done. In other words, it prohibits the commission from doing certain things and actually regulates the exercise of the commission's discretion.

The minister has placed a great deal of emphasis on regulation and the difference between the United States system and ours. I respect those differences and say, Vive la difference so far as Canada is concerned, because there is a great deal about those differences which I would like to see preserved. There are benefits which accrue to our society because of those differences. In this case there seems to be a clear case of paternalism of requirement. The commission is being inhibited and prohibited from exercising its own discretion where cost information is concerned.

I do not know whether I am in order but if I am I will again refer to the question I originally posed. If I am out of order I will yield the floor to the minister.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. member rose to ask a question when I had the floor. I suggest it was a rhetorical question, but I should like to point out that new section 387C relates only to information which by its nature is confidential. Any information which the law requires the railway companies to furnish, or the commission to obtain, is not by its nature confidential and therefore this provision does not apply. It would only apply to information which was of a confidential nature.

I am sure the hon. gentleman is aware of the arrangement which was made in respect of the royal commission which studied the situation regarding the overhaul base at Winnipeg. Under an agreement proprietary information which belonged to Air Canada was made available to the government of Manitoba on the understanding that it would read it in order to prepare its case but would not use it or reveal it.

This commission may need certain information about the competitive activities of a railway company in order to compare that information with information relating to captive shippers. For example, the commission might want to know the cost of some competitive operations in order to make a comparison with the cost of a non-competitive operation. Information in respect of the cost of a non-competitive operation would be information which ought to be made available to a shipper or other interested party in order that they could see whether they were being fairly treated.

It would not be fair to the railway companies in their relations with their customers to make public information about some other situation which the commission may need in order to form a reasonable judgment. That is not the kind of situation we envisaged in respect of this provision. It does not in the least inhibit the commission from making any information public that the railway companies are required to make public under the law.

Mr. Sherman: I have virtually outlined my reasons for moving the amendment I now intend to move in the rhetorical question I asked the minister. I accept at face value and in good faith everything the minister has said about cost information so far as the commission is concerned, but it seems to me, and probably I am again acting as a sort of advocate for the position the Manitoba government took on this issue, that new section 387C reflects the attitude toward making cost data available for public information that the railways have taken since their beginning and since confederation.

At every turn the railway companies have resisted legitimate requests for certain cost data. I need not remind anyone in this house of that fact, but for the sake of getting things straight I should like to refer directly to the Manitoba brief. I want to emphasize this point and place it on the record, and I do so by referring to the dispute over cost data which took place a few years ago.

During the sittings of the royal commission the railway companies resisted all attempts by the provinces of Manitoba and Alberta to obtain the cost data which would have permitted a critical analysis of a grain cost study submitted by the railway company. In its submission to the standing committee the province of Manitoba had this to say:

> The commission ordered the railways to make full disclosure of costs relative to the export grain study and required that data be submitted regarding passenger service losses. The committee will recall—

That was the standing committee, but the same could apply here. Let me continue:

> —that because rail cost data was made available the alleged variable cost was reduced from $98.1 million to $70 million. Since any losses were to be met by the federal government the availability of data resulted in direct savings to the federal treasury of many millions of dollars.

I do not think I need labour the point as it has been well made and I am sure is appreciated and understood by everyone on both sides of this house. The whole question of the availability of cost data from railway companies has stuck in the craws of members of this committee for a considerable number of years, particularly when studies, investigations and legislation of this kind have been concerned. Let me reiterate my opinion that new section 387C reflects the attitude that the railway companies have adopted all along to requests to furnish and publish cost data. Frankly I cannot see how any harm would be done by making this cost data available to shippers who depend so critically on the railways for the conduct of their commercial enterprises.

With that in view and in support of the argument I put forward in my rhetorical question to the minister I move:

> That Bill C-231 be amended by the elimination from clause 70 of section 387C.

I have already spoken about this amendment but I should like once again to voice my contention that there is an unnecessarily paternalistic quality regarding the regulatory measures contained in this particular section so far as such information is concerned. It is my opinion that the legislation would be strengthened, the position of shippers in this country would be strengthened, and in general the economy of the west would be better served if this section were eliminated from the bill.

• (3:10 p.m.)

I was interested in the attitude of the hon. member for Medicine Hat toward this particular section and subject. When we were discussing section 336 yesterday I noticed that after listening to my remarks he wondered whether I would have the courage to offer any kind of improvement or amendment to repair that faulty section of the bill. I did make an attempt to repair it with the amendment I moved earlier which was defeated today, as the committee knows.

In this context, I would have been interested in seeing the hon. member for Medicine Hat recommend some particular in which this section of the bill could be improved. He made no such suggestion; he said he had no such amendment to offer. That leaves the way clear for me to offer this amendment as a means of repairing this section of the bill which I feel militates against the best interests of the shippers in western Canada.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It is moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg South that Bill C-231 be amended by the elimination from clause 70 of new section 387C.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I do not think it would matter a very great deal, in practical effect, whether this amendment was accepted or not. As long as we appointed competent and responsible members to the commission. I would assume that they would respect the confidence of anything they received in confidence and that they regarded as properly and appropriately confidential, whether or not they were expressly told by parliament to do so.

I think, however, it is not unreasonable for us, in seeking to be fair to one section of the community also to seek to be fair to another section of the community. I believe that when we are telling the railways that we do not want to subsidize them, that we want them to earn their own living, we should not do anything that will give them the feeling that they will be inhibited in doing so. I do not agree with hon. gentlemen opposite who say that they think a shipper, in his bargaining with the railway, should be told what the railway's costs are to help him make his bargain to obtain a lower rate unless the railways are told what the shipper's financial position is so that the railways can decide how much he can afford to pay. The idea that the International Nickel Company needs to be protected from the railways is something that I find a little hard to swallow. Even in Thompson, Manitoba, I do not think they need protection; I think they are pretty well able to look after themselves. In fact, I think their bargaining power is probably greater than that of Canadian National Railways.

I believe the presence of this clause in the bill would reassure the railways in this respect. There would be less resistance to providing this kind of informaton, which the commission really must have if it is to do its duty properly, if the railways knew this information was protected by statute. For that reason, and because I cannot see any circumstances in which this clause would inhibit the publication of anything that was properly in contention—because there is no question that information will not be confidential when it is a matter of a subsidy being paid to the railways for any particular purpose—I do not feel disposed to accept this amendment. If it is decided that a subsidy should be paid to the railways, we in this house would have to know, for example, what was the cost of passenger services before this measure would permit the Minister of Finance in certain circumstances to subsidize the railways to some degree. We would have to know what the costs were or we would not pay the subsidy; that is for sure.

In any case where there is any payment made by the treasury, or in any case where the rate will be determined under clause 16, it obviously cannot be determined in any reasonable fashion without the knowledge that is essential for the determination of this question. In this regard, if it was shown that a rate was contrary to the public interest, and the commission was satisfied that there was a prima facie case, that information would not be confidential because the railway would have to establish its case and provide this information publicly.

The only thing this clause seeks to do is afford protection in the case where there is bargaining between the railway and a shipper. We do not think it is fair to insist upon information being available in one case and not in another. I do not feel very strongly about it, but on balance I have a feeling that if we removed this provision it might create a presumption and feeling that we were not concerned about it. I am concerned about confidentiality being maintained, and for that reason I am not disposed to accept the hon. member's amendment.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, I support the amendment but not for the reasons the hon. member for Winnipeg South gave in proposing it. I do not see anything wrong with parliament giving specific terms of reference to a regulatory agency or a quasi-judicial body. New section 387C gives to the commission, to the regulatory agency, specific terms of reference with respect to the question that certain information shall be made public. I do not see anything wrong with our giving such instructions. But the reason I support the amendment is that I think the kind of instructions we are giving to the commission here are wrong. I do not, on very basic, philosophical grounds, agree with the premise that we can justify a growing amount of administrative secrecy. I believe that if an administrative agency or quasi-judicial body is to arrive at decisions and make orders, it should do so, but it should make the basis for its decisions as widely known to the public as is possible.

It is quite a few decades ago since a former president of the United States said he believed in open covenants openly arrived at. While the analogy may not be perfect, I think it is certainly a guide line that we should be following in large part in this chamber. What possible reason can there be for an administrative agency deriving and soliciting information, accumulating it, looking at it, appraising it, coming to a decision, and refusing to make public the foundation information upon which it based its decision or order?

The minister likes to repeat his argument that the railways should not be obliged to give information to the shippers any more than shippers should be obliged to give their profit and cost position to the railways. But I suggest that there is a fairly important difference. On the one hand the shippers are to be regarded as entrepreneurs and on the other hand the railways are to be regarded more in the nature of providers of a utility service. I suppose that this philosophic difference between the minister and certain hon. members on this side of the house is the reason that we have taken rather important opposing positions with regard to many clauses of the bill. I submit that the railways are providing a service that is in the nature of a utility service and as such they do not have proprietary rights to the same extent as would entrepreneurs under our economic system.

• (3:20 p.m.)

I should also like to say that the minister could offer a compromise. Half an hour ago or more he referred to the fact that when he appointed a special committee to investigate the reasons for the removal of the air maintenance base at Winnipeg it was understood that the special commission of investigation would make certain information otherwise confidential available to the government of the province of Manitoba. I suggest to the minister that it would be better to have the provision in the bill—although I do not like this I still think it is an improvement and I offer it as a compromise—stating that information which is to be regarded as confidential cannot be made available to any other person, qualified or modified so as not to apply to the crown acting in the right of any province. I do not think it is a good idea to make these special arrangements and accommodations with the government of a particular province. I strongly feel that the crown, acting in the right of a province, has the right to demand information which is available to an agency of the federal government if the provincial government is to be able to exercise its functions.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member accept the converse of that proposition?

Mr. Schreyer: Yes, I do, Mr. Chairman. I suppose this may lead us into quite a protracted debate but I suggest that if we are to practise co-operative federalism we should try a little harder to respect the legitimate demands of the provinces when they ask for information so that the governments of the provinces can act in the best interests of the people. One need only look at the briefs submitted by the governments of Manitoba and Alberta to see that time and time again reference is made to the fact that in investigating or evaluating the legislation now before us they were unable to do a proper job because they did not have certain crucial information. The submission of the Manitoba government, which I believe is over 200 pages long is simply replete with references to the fact that that government was not able to get the information which they required.

I do not suppose that the minister at this stage is likely to accept any compromise suggestions, but in choosing between keeping this section intact and deleting it entirely perhaps it would be a sensible compromise to keep it but at the same time to make special provision ensuring the right of the crown acting for a province to receive certain information. In any event I shall vote for the amendment because I support it on basic philosophic grounds, namely, that the less administrative secrecy there is the better.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Transport said that the Minister of Finance would be keenly interested in seeing that all of the costs are accurate because any inaccuracies may result in losses to the public treasury. I accept this. I am sure that both the federal government and the provincial governments will wish to protect the interests of the taxpayers. However, the variable costs to which I am referring may relate to freight for which there is no subsidy and yet the rates may still be prejudicial to the public interest of a province, a community or a region.

The second point I wish to make is that so far as section 387C is concerned it deals with all kinds of information, not only cost information, and there may be some validity in the minister's contention that some of the information given by the railways to the commission does not necessarily have to do with cost data and should not be made public. What troubles me is that variable costs have been proven to be confidential. Even the standing committee of the House of Commons could not get variable cost data from the railways. In my opinion the present Board of Transport Commissioners does not have the facilities for gathering and computing this data itself without the support of the cost accounting departments of the railways. The railways refuse to give it. This is the point in question. After the commission is set up we hope that it will not have to rely completely on the information supplied to it by the costing departments of the railways. We hope that when there is a particular problem under study the commission will not have to rely entirely on the railways but will have sufficient competent staff to do the job itself. This is one reason that I think we should have this amendment, because so far all that the minister has said, in support of the railways' contention, is that they regard variable costs as confidential.

Another point which troubles me is that if this section becomes law we may be putting the commission in a very difficult position because the section states in part:

[Mr. Schreyer.]

> —such information shall not be published or revealed in such a manner as to be available for the use of any other person.

If some information supplied by the railways were published by the commission, even if it were stated in doing so that it could not be used to the advantage of some other person the railways could say later that they had provided this information and had reason to believe, or in fact could prove, that this or that customer or even their competitor had used this information for their benefit. If such a case occurred the commission would have acted in contravention of this legislation.

For that reason I wonder whether we should not rely on the good judgment of the commission rather than on this section and not force the commission to take extra precautions in publishing or making available any information. I think that this may be a good reason for accepting the amendment because if the section as it is presently worded is left in the bill the commission will be forced to be overcautious. I think it would be better if we relied on the minister's capability to appoint competent men to the commission and then relied on their ability to decide what should or should not be revealed.

Mr. Cantelon: I wish to say immediately that I support this amendment and that I find the arguments advanced by some hon. members to be most appropriate. In the first place I agree with the philosophy on which the hon. member for Springfield based his arguments. Since the railway is a monopoly in some areas, particularly in the maritimes, I feel that the MacPherson royal commission was in error in allowing it to set its own rates. I feel we ought to have a reasonable opportunity to know upon what basis the railway sets its rates, so I support the philosophical basis put forward by the hon. member for Springfield a few moments ago.

• (3:30 p.m.)

There is another factor which I believe is important in this connection, and that is if the railway is allowed to charge any rate that it likes, according to competition, this could result in area discrimination. I hope the railway would not do this. As a responsible public operation, of course, I feel that the Canadian National would not do this. However I believe it would be possible, perhaps through lack of good judgment, to discriminate against an area. This could be done more easily if the costing information of the railway company were not open to consideration by people who were interested. This is another reason why the proposed section 387C is bad. The railway figures will not be given consideration if this proposed section is approved.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman would not mind my interrupting, I may say he would not be correct in that assumption. If someone alleged under clause 16 that there was area discrimination, and made out a prima facie case, any information the railways had to produce to disprove that case would not be confidential information. It would be information the railways would produce to prove their case, and they would produce it in open court.

Mr. Cantelon: I am glad to have that explanation from the minister, but I think it adds further weight to what I have been saying. If this is true, then why do we really need proposed section 387C? If there is any injustice, we can consider it under clause 16, so surely there would be no need for this new section 387C.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think I can answer that in one sentence. The commission, itself, may want confidential information for its own purposes about the competitive operations of the railways, operations that are not in contention by anybody. The railway, when it is directed to provide that information, is surely entitled, just as income tax payers are entitled, to have this confidential information about their business operations kept confidential. This is the only reason for the provision, and absolutely the only reason.

Mr. Cantelon: I am glad to have that explanation from the minister. I do not believe it violates the basic principle upon which I am arguing that the railway is, in effect, a monopoly so it is unwise for us to have such information kept confidential. In this connection, I should like to quote briefly from one of the briefs presented to the committee. I do not believe it was a particularly good brief in many respects. I refer to the one presented by the province of Saskatchewan. In very few instances does it in any way quarrel with the bill. I should like to quote from page 2241 of the committee report dealing with costing procedures, sections 387 to 387C of this bill:

> Bill C-120 recognized that the recommendation by the royal commission on transportation revising costing procedures would have to be developed by a regulatory authority. The government of Saskatchewan reiterated in its 1965 policy statement that it was not satisfied with the grain costing study carried out by the royal commission on transportation;—

Here, I should like to interject that this is the kind of statement we meet again and again. The people concerned with costing studies were not satisfied with those studies. I continue:

> —nor was it satisfied with the study carried out by the railways.

I would say they were probably even less satisfied with those studies.

> Saskatchewan strongly supported development of new and improved standard costing procedures. These procedures were to be established, in the view of Saskatchewan, not only for the movement of commodities such as export grain but, as the bulk of traffic on prairie branch lines is export grain, would also have direct application in the determination of whether or not a branch line of railway was operating at a loss. Saskatchewan took the view that public hearings by the Board of Transport Commissioners to establish the fundamental principles, or procedures of costing, should be held at which all interested parties would be heard.

I take it this is the provision to which the minister was referring when he referred to clause 16 and said there would be public hearings.

> Bill C-231 provides for determination of costing procedures by the new commission, after which the commission may receive submissions and conduct hearings on those procedures.

Here is the crux of the whole of this recommendation.

> Saskatchewan, however, holds to the view that when costing procedures are being reviewed all interested groups must be given a hearing on this very vital aspect of the legislation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, that is required by the bill, as the hon. gentleman knows.

Mr. Cantelon: Yes, that is correct; it is required. The point is, if this information is going to be kept completely confidential, I cannot see how it can be given.

Mr. Pickersgill: There would be absolutely nothing confidential about costing procedures. What we are talking about here is information about specific costs in relation to some particular situation; that is all that this clause relates to. It certainly relates in no way to costing procedures, which have to be the subject of a public hearing and open to cross-examination. The commission, you see, has to decide the procedures for calculating costs, and in that way we will get a final decision on what is a variable cost and what is a fixed cost.

This is one of the first things the new commission will have to do when it is set up. This is going to be the subject of a separate public hearing. Moreover if the railway contends that some fixed rate is non-compensatory, they have to produce information to prove it, and that would not be confidential. The information that would be confidential would be information about transactions between the railway and its individual customers. If you destroy the confidentiality of that, you will not just destroy the confidentiality of the railway's information but you will also destroy the confidentiality of the customer's information.

Mr. Cantelon: I listened to this explanation with a great deal of interest. I wonder if we might just refer to what, in my opinion, is a different attitude. I should like to refer to page 2250 of the committee report where the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway offered a rather complicated set of figures to support its argument. These figures indicate the effect a particular type of traffic would have on costing figures. In that connection they were particularly interested in the 30,000 pound load and the difference this would cause in the operation of the railways. They offered figures to show what it would mean if there were a load of 190,000 pounds. Here we have a similar case to that which the minister mentioned a moment ago. This is a particular type of traffic. In fact it deals with a particular segment of that traffic, and they gave us figures whereby we could determine what the effect of the load would be. If they did not consider it necessary to keep these figures confidential, then I would like to know why should any other figures that the railways offer—

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not recall the particular circumstances. Was the Quebec North Shore Railway before the committee? It must have been some day when I was not there. I remember representatives of Wabush Mines appearing before the committee and making representations about the Quebec North Shore Railway, but I do not recall the railway appearing.

Mr. Cantelon: This was Wabush Mines, and its representatives were giving figures from the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Pickersgill: Those must have been published figures, or figures that the railway had no objection to releasing. In effect that railway has only two customers, one the Iron Ore Company, which is owned by the same people who own the railway, and the other the Wabush Mining Company. Therefore it is probably not too difficult to arrive at the figures.

Mr. Cantelon: The point is that Wabush Mines is a captive shipper of that railway, but in spite of that it was able to get these figures and submit them to us. If they could do that without hurting the railway, then with respect to new section 387C there is an analogy and there is really no reason why, in the national interest, we could not have the figures disclosed to enable the customer to determine whether he is being overcharged or not. It is for this reason I feel that new section 387C should be eliminated.

Mr. Nowlan: I have just one question for the minister. In his view, what would be wrong with having some disclosure to other government boards like the Atlantic Development Board, the Halifax Port Authority or the National Harbours Board? There will be an interrelationship between these boards, which are also creatures of the federal government, and the work being done by the new transport commission. I wonder why the new section is so restrictive. The information will go only to the transport commission and that commission will often, I am sure, work in conjunction with these other agencies. There should be a relationship between it and the Atlantic Development Board and the National Harbours Board. What is the objection to giving the information to them?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it is the usual objection to disclosing people's private business to somebody else. Where governments require citizens—and even railway companies are citizens—to disclose their private transactions, such as for income tax purposes, it has been the practice in this parliament and this country generally that that information is treated as confidential.

The hon. gentleman will notice that this new section refers to information that is by its nature confidential, and it is the commission which will determine whether the information is by its nature confidential. For example, if a railway had to show its costs in some competitive traffic it might be very helpful to the competing trucking company to know exactly what those costs are, so that it would know how far it could go to undercut the railway in getting the traffic. That, by its nature, would be confidential information, and it has always been our custom, when such information is required by a public body for some public purpose, to treat it as confidential. Any information that is required with respect to a railway's functions, that affect a third person, would not be confidential.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, since this is the first time I have had the floor after the lunch recess I would like to take this opportunity to thank the minister for the few moments he allowed us to get a bite to eat. If there were any doubts in his mind about the value of the recess, I would like to point out that the minister himself was so rejuvenated by it that he talked almost incessantly for almost a full hour after the recess. Surely therefore there was some value in the recess that we had.

Mr. Pickersgill: A negative value.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I must also commend the government for the fine attendance of its members in this chamber on a Friday afternoon. The 68 members who are present and who voted on the last two amendments deserve credit for making the sacrifice of being present. It proves that we have finally convinced them of the importance of this bill. When I see such big wheels as the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Secretary of State for External Affairs here on a Friday afternoon, it leads me to wonder who were bawled out the most two days ago, members of the cabinet or backbenchers.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, the strict relevancy of this to the amendment is apparent to all of us.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Well, the minister knows that I am reluctant to venture into western matters when speaking on this bill. I have a particular interest in maritime affairs and I do not wish to make extended remarks on an amendment that, though it has some application generally, affects the west the most.

However, the confidentiality of documents and information is a big subject. It is one that we consider quite frequently in parliament on motions for the production of papers. Some years ago when I had a deep interest in this subject I formed a firmly held opinion about it, but considering the present matter before us I think we need to bring our thoughts up to date. In the old days we used to say, "Oh well, it is of a confidential nature and might do damage to the competitive position of a private company. Therefore we cannot disclose it."

Both when in government and in opposition I have always avoided voting for any motion that would cause the production of confidential information. When the Conservatives were in office I recall that on two or three occasions the hon. member for York South forced motions that would have meant production of information from the C.P.R., when discussing a railway bill, information that I thought would have been detrimental to its business and that we did not have the right to disclose because it was a private, independent company. I also recall that a former minister of transport, who was then in opposition, supported the government at that time. But even having that background, I believe that the old role of automatically falling back upon the confidentiality of documents needs further examination.

With respect to this matter of costing figures I think that the words of Professor Borts, as recorded in volume No. 40 of our standing committee proceedings, are significant. He says this at page 2864, dealing with the section we are asking to be deleted:

> • (3:50 p.m.)
>
> Section 387C proposes to protect the confidential nature of cost data obtained from a railway company. The hearing procedure would be hampered by the inability of interested parties to obtain information from railways affecting questions of cost. It is not clear how a fair and impartial hearing can be held when a chief party to the hearings, namely the railways, can withhold cost information from interested parties outside the commission. This issue of confidentiality becomes of immediate importance whenever an interested party before the commission has a complaint involving cost. Cost enters into considerations of abandonment of uneconomic branch lines, the determination of deficits in the grain traffic, compensatory rate levels passenger deficits, and so on. In each case, interested parties must be able to examine commission staff and examine statements and testimony presented by other interested parties.

That excerpt speaks for itself.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it does. I would say, in none of those instances would the information be confidential, notwithstanding Professor Borts.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I wish to mention something we have already debated and I shall be interested in hearing an explanation about this. Professor Borts goes on to speak about the situation in the United States. Other hon. members have already referred to this. If in the United States, with keener competition between the railways than in this country, cost data is made available, why cannot it be made available here?

The final point Professor Borts made is that this section will hamper the method by which the commission can deal with this matter. As I have said when speaking on other amendments, the minister and the government are giving the commission great authority to do many things. It will have bureaucratic power, but essentially it will not have our trust and confidence. In little ways the commission is being denuded of important powers which would create greater confidence in it. Perhaps the minister can speak about this if he is so excited, and so rejuvenated from his sandwich of a few minutes ago. I would refer the minister to section 314D at page 30 of the bill, which is as follows:

> The commission may, ... publish ... the traffic figures ... regardless of whether the figures pertain to branch lines for which applications for abandonment of operations have been filed with the commission but protecting, so far as it is practicable to do so, information that is by its nature confidential—

Is this not an open invitation for someone to disclose figures, and receive protection in that disclosure? Yet in the section we are now considering there is a blanket refusal to do this. We cannot get any figures from the commission.

Mr. Pickersgill: In the one instance they are traffic figures, and in the other they are figures of cost. I have said again and again, in my opinion the only kinds of cost figures envisaged here that are in their nature confidential are those figures of so specific a character that they would or might provide an advantage to the customers or competitors of a railway. Information required for the determination of public matters, such as whether a subsidy should be paid to a railway, or the fairness of a rate, would not be confidential and would be published.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): We have asked the railways and we have asked many experts if there might be some way for costing figures to be made available. We ought to have some assurance about techniques being used. I feel that the amendment might be useful; it might provide some compromise.

Mr. Pickersgill: That would be possible. The hon. member is speaking of information that would not be confidential. If you have a composite of a number of things that would be fabricated by the commission itself, you would not be disclosing confidential information. At least you would have to be a smart fellow to draw any conclusions from that. This is to protect specific information that all businesses, regardless of their nature, consider confidential.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): If a principle is involved, why does the minister in one instance say, "so far as it is practicable to do so" the commission may do some things, and then in the other instance, not give an opportunity to do this.

Mr. Pickersgill: Because traffic figures, generally speaking, are not confidential. There is no important element of confidence in them, except where there is one shipper only on a line. Then the figures might be important. Normally traffic figures are different from cost figures.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): At least the minister is attempting to answer the question. The phrase I referred to is an open invitation for disclosure, even if only of traffic figures.

Mr. Pickersgill: Sure.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I shall close now. The minister has admitted that there might be some possibility in the future of opening up this subject, that needs a new look. The amendment does not necessarily mean that all figures will come out, but it takes this section out and enables the commission to do what it wants to do. I feel we must have more trust and confidence in the commission.

Mr. Southam: I do not want to belabour the point under debate. As a former member of the committee on transport and communication I have listened to many witnesses who time after time have stressed what this sensitive area of cost accounting means to the legislation before the house, and to the shippers using the transportation systems of Canada. The hon. member for Saint John-Albert stole my thunder because he quoted what Professor Borts had said, and I had intended quoting the same words.

As I think I said earlier today, Professors Borts and Williams were two of the most competent witnesses before the committee. They had spent many years preparing themselves academically for the role in transportation they play on this continent. Manitoba was fortunate in having them as witnesses.

In supporting the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg South, to section 387C, let me follow the quotation of the hon. member for Saint John-Albert with another quotation, to emphasize the need of getting away from the confidentiality aspect. Nine years ago when the MacPherson royal commission studied the problems of transportation and prepared recommendations, an argument arose about actual techniques of costing. Professor Borts goes on to say this—and this follows what the hon. member for Saint John-Albert has mentioned:

> Much has been made in the past of the need to protect the confidential nature of operating cost data of the railways. The railways have argued that public knowledge of such information would place them at a competitive disadvantage with respect to other modes, namely truckers. The competitive position of the railways vis-à-vis the trucks is supposedly defended by a general ignorance of rail variable costs. The railways feel that if the trucks had such knowledge, they would know which areas of rail traffic are vulnerable to rate competition. Following this argument, the trucks would speedily act to cut rates on such traffic and drive the rail service out.
>
> I find this to be ludicrous and a coloured picture of competition in the marketplace. The rails over time have lost high-rated traffic to the trucks because of the constant pressure of competition pushing both shippers and truckers to find those commodities and services where truck can displace rail. It has not been necessary for these parties to know rail costs. All that is needed is a truck rate and truck service which is better than the rail rate and rail service. That a more perfect knowledge of rail costs would cause additional loss of traffic to the trucks is a hypothetical statement without empirical foundation.
>
> • (4:00 p.m.)
>
> It will not be possible to carry out the costing activities required in this act if rail costs are to be kept confidential. For the costing activities required in this act will necessitate the determination of system average cost scales for the railways, as well as the determination of long-run variable cost for particular items of traffic and branch lines. How can the commission make such information publicly available without revealing rail cost information? How can it carry out its mandate without making such information publicly available?

This is a positive statement made by a man who is highly qualified to comment on this type of legislation. He says that it will not be possible to carry out the costing activities required under this act if railway costs are to be kept confidential. "Is the commission to operate in secret?" he asks. This is a most pertinent question.

Mr. Pickersgill: I believe the hon. gentleman is repeating a mistake to which I referred a moment or two ago. I think Professor Borts did not understand what is intended by this clause at all. Information of a general character which is required for the general purposes of the commission is not information which is, in its nature, confidential; it is information required in the public interest and it simply would not be covered by this clause at all.

Mr. Southam: I am sure the minister is perfectly serious when he advances that point of view, but on several occasions in the committee when questioning witnesses, particularly from the C.P.R. we noticed that they stated emphatically that they did not wish to give certain information. Professor Borts expresses his point of view very strongly, even though the minister does not agree with it. With reference to this very section, he goes on to say—and I believe this is worth putting on record for the benefit of the minister and of the officials responsible for the drafting of this legislation—

> 1. The commission should be instructed to carry out costing procedures necessary to satisfy the requirements of sections 314, 329, 334 and 336. In addition, the commission should be instructed to determine the profitability of any undertaking by comparing the revenues from that undertaking with the long-run variable costs.
>
> 2. Such cost information is to be made freely available to all interested parties in matters relating to commission hearings under sections 314, 329, 334 and 336.
>
> 3. Interested parties will have the right to examine material prepared by commission staff and examine material presented by other interested parties.

His fourth recommendation, squarely stated, was that section 387C should be deleted altogether.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest to the hon. gentleman that Professor Borts is an economist and a railway expert, but he is not a legislator and he is not a lawyer, and what the hon. member has just read to the committee is a perversion of the clause—a total perversion of it. In all the hearings with respect to branch line abandonment, and with respect to anything the treasury may have to put up, and in any contention about the facts of a particular situation which might come before the commission, the information would not be confidential at all. But the commission might require some further explanation about an analogous or different situation which was not en jeu, which was not at issue, and which there was no earthly reason to make public. This is all that was envisaged.

Sometimes I almost wish we had never put the clause in at all. If we took it out now, people reading this debate would be bound to argue that nothing was confidential, and that is where my difficulty arises, the only difficulty I have with regard to the amendment.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South is not here, but he might have left power of attorney with somebody, and if he would withdraw his amendment for the total removal of the clause we might be able to put in a phrase which would meet the situation, words which would indicate clearly that this confidentiality would apply only where the matter in dispute was one purely between two parties, and had no bearing on the public issue involved—something of that sort. I do not think there is really much difference between us here in the committee, and we seem to be spending a lot of time on something which is really a minor point.

Mr. Southam: I can sympathize with the minister's point of view and I can understand his anxiety to make progress. On the other hand, we must realize that after 60 years we are studying one of the most complicated, far-reaching and important pieces of legislation which this government, or any government has introduced, and when the minister says he almost wishes he had left this clause out he is exemplifying the thoughts and suspicions felt by a great many people.

The minister referred to railway branch line abandonment. In western Canada we are faced with a rash of applications for the abandonment of branch lines, and the problem to which I have referred is bound to arise, in future, in this connection—how the railroad arrives at certain figures for profits and losses. Incidentally I should like the minister to tell me upon the basis of which formula the government arrives at this map of railway lines which are to be retained until 1975. Were these lines chosen for retention on the basis of the volume of grain carried over them? Was the figure of 50,000 bushels a mile the figure used in reaching this determination? I should also like to ask the minister where he got this information. Was it confidential? Did he accept the figures offered by the railway companies? How logical is this formula? Is it to become a rule of thumb, as some have suggested, or has there been a secret agreement between the government and the railways?

Mr. Pickersgill: It was not even discussed with the railways. This is covered in a clause which has already been passed, and I gave an extensive answer to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle the other day on the point which the hon. member has raised. I know that the hon. member for Moose Mountain would not mind looking at Hansard to find out what was said, and if he is not entirely satisfied with my statement, well, we still have clause 1 to consider and on that clause I will be glad to elaborate on any point which has not been covered.

But as I say, this was not even discussed with the railways. It was discussed with officials of the wheat pools and with representatives of some farm organizations, and there was indirect discussion with representatives of the provincial governments as well as with people who were interested in preserving the lines. It just so happens it was never discussed with the railways at all. We did not see that it was really any of their business, because in the case of any of these lines which are not going to pay we are asking parliament to make up the losses, anyway. What we were concerned about were the social and economic factors involved.

• (4:10 p.m.)

While we should not get away from what is immediately before us, I think what is before us is a very narrow clause. If there should be some way in which to deal with this so as to indicate that in no way should the public interest be allowed to suffer, I would be prepared to put something in this clause to this effect, if someone could find a suitable wording. I wonder whether this would be a possibility.

Mr. Southam: I thank the minister for informing me that he already has answered some of my questions when answering a question asked by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. Of course the hon. member for Qu'Appelle represents a constituency adjacent to mine, and probably he was expressing the same fears the people there had expressed to him. I do not wish to be repetitive. I could go back and quote the evidence given by dozens of witnesses on this point. When I rose to speak it was my intention to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg South. I am ready to support that amendment when it is put to a vote.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, if the amendment which is now before this committee should be voted on, I would enthusiastically support it. I do not, however, hold the view held by many members in this house with regard to confidentiality. I believe that if the practices and the facts relating to business transactions in this country were more known by the people of Canada, a great many of the difficulties with which we have been faced in this parliament and in other legislatures would be avoided. The hon. member for Saint John-Albert was quite right in saying that back in 1952-1953 I moved a motion during the sittings of one of the standing committees of this house to the effect that the C.P.R. produce a contract. I remember that the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, at that time supported the C.P.R. in its stand that it ought not to file that contract with the committee, even though the very thing we were discussing—the building of another line—depended upon it.

It seems that we are spending a great deal of time on this, when perhaps there is not as much disagreement as there may on the surface appear to be. I have spoken to one or two hon. members about this. After the amendment is voted on I should like to ask the minister whether he would agree, as a compromise, to the addition of certain words to the present new section 387C. I do not usually go in for compromises.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thought the hon. gentleman was a professional mediator.

Mr. Lewis: I am not sure I am a professional mediator, but I have mediated. In some situations mediation is useful, I am not sure that it is in matters of principle. One of the things which worries me about the wording in this section as it now stands is what is meant by the words "information that is by its nature confidential". The minister continually says that a matter which is not by its nature confidential is not going to be effective. What is by its nature confidential, except what somebody thinks is by its nature confidential? That somebody ought to be the commission, and of course it will be the commission. I am wondering whether members of the committee might find the following suggestion acceptable: "Unless in the opinion of the commission such publication is necessary in the public interest".

What we would have then would be a general prohibition against such information being revealed in such a manner that it would be available for the use of any other person. This would provide even in such a case, if in the opinion of the commission the information is necessary in the public interest, that the commission would be empowered to publish it. Assuming my amendment is as sensible to others as it appears to be to me, perhaps we could end the discussion and reach agreement.

Mr. Pickersgill: It so happens that simultaneously with the hon. gentleman's suggestion I have received advice from a higher realm that we might add the words, "unless publication in the opinion of the commission is necessary in the public interest". There seems to be a meeting of legal minds here. I wish that I had been bright enough to have put this suggestion forward in the first place. Unfortunately the hon. member for Winnipeg South is not here. I wonder whether there might be agreement to defeat the amendment on division so that we do not have to have a count. I will then be very happy indeed to accept this amendment which has been suggested by the hon. member for York South.

Mr. Lewis: I should like to know, when the minister said that he had received advice from a higher place, whether he was speaking merely in physical terms.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes; in physical terms. The remark may have been made in levity, but there was no sense of levitation.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to oppose what has been suggested by the minister, but I do think this would leave the commission open to a great deal of controversy. What is a matter of public interest in the mind of one person, may not be a matter of public interest in the mind of another person, or may not be a matter of public interest in the minds of those in another section of the House of Commons. This would bring about a wide difference of opinion. The persons making the decision would have to be very wise persons in order to be able to make the decision without finding themselves in a controversial position.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right. Judges always have to be wise persons.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I agree with the hon. member for Rosthern that there will be a great deal of pressure on the commission in making a decision. The members of the commission will have to decide what definition of public interest they will use. They will have to decide whether they will use the one we have here, some common law definition, or some judicial definition which has been on the books for some time. I think we should give the hon. member for York South credit in respect of his suggestion. Whenever there is a discussion like this in parliament, although the board may not pay any attention to what we say, I think a discussion like this might scare them so much that they may not publish anything. We might derive some good from it in that regard.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Amendment (Mr. Sherman) negatived on division.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I hate to take this away from the minister's advisers who are not on the floor. However, I move as follows:

That clause 70 of Bill No. C-231 be amended by deleting the period at the end of section 387C on line 33, page 55 of the bill and substituting therefor a comma and adding thereto the following words:

"unless in the opinion of the commission such publication is necessary in the public interest".

Mr. Chairman, I wrote this out by hand on a piece of paper, so I am afraid I do not have copies of it.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the question is put, sir, let me say that I am not sure the hon. member has the right copy of the bill. As I look at new section 387C his amendment would refer to page 61, line 35.

Mr. Lewis: I may be looking at the original bill, and I apologize for that error.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the amendment could be corrected by changing it to read page 61 and line 35.

The Chairman: Would the hon. member for York South permit the Chair to make the necessary changes?

Mr. Lewis: Certainly, sir, and I apologize for having had the original copy.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for York South has a copy of the original bill I suggest he should hang on to it, because they are becoming valuable these days.

Mr. Lewis: If I have one, Mr. Chairman, it is a document that is confidential in its nature.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would be glad to autograph it for you.

The Chairman: The amendment has now been corrected to read in part "in line 35 at page 61 of the bill".

Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the said amendment.

[Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert).]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Lewis) agreed to.

Clause 70 as amended agreed to.

Clauses 71, 72 and 73 agreed to.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the committee would agree to stand clause 74 for the moment. I have an amendment I wish to propose to this clause. It is not quite ready as yet but I hope to have it shortly.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that clause 74 stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clauses 75 to 82 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 83—Status of former chairman of Air Transport Board.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, a number of members are very interested in this vital aspect of transportation in Canada. Because this is the only clause which would permit questions relating to air transport, would the minister agree to stand this clause? I am sure this would not involve much discussion.

Mr. Pickersgill: Let me make an alternative suggestion to the hon. member. Clause 1 has been stood, and it sets out the general provisions of transport policy. Clause 83 is a very limited and technical clause. I am sure that any question which would be in order during our discussion of either clause 82 or clause 83 would be more likely in order when we return to a discussion of clause 1. I would not take exception to a reasonable discussion on that clause.

Mr. Forrestall: On that understanding I am agreeable to the passage of this clause. I thank the minister for his concern and charity.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 84—Members of Canadian Maritime Commission.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Just to slow things down for a minute, Mr. Chairman, let me say that this clause refers to the Canadian Maritime Commission. There has been reference to railway companies, pipe lines and other modes of transportation but we have not had much discussion about water transportation. Perhaps we will be discussing export rates in the maritimes before we conclude this afternoon, but I should like to ask the minister to indicate the duties of the Canadian Maritime Commission because they have been revised recently. Perhaps the minister, as an old Newfoundlander who can get nostalgic about the sea, could tell us what he envisages in the future for Canada in respect of matters concerning the merchant navy and the Maritime Commission. Perhaps he could assume that the house is full of landlubbers and expound on this subject for a moment or two.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman overwhelms me. First he gets up and says I must have had too much lunch because I talked for an hour afterwards. Now when I am trying to keep quiet he invites me to say something that would be entirely out of order.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): It is a matter of timing.

Mr. Pickersgill: No doubt it is and—I very nearly said something I would have regretted.

Mr. Byrne: That is what he wanted you to do.

Mr. Pickersgill: As the hon. gentleman knows, the Maritime Commission formerly had the function of dealing with subsidies for shipbuilding. It was felt at the time the subsidies were revised that it would be more appropriate to have this function transferred to the Department of Industry, where it now rests. The result is that some staff of the Maritime Commission will be transferred to the Department of Industry for this purpose.

The Maritimes Commission will continue to carry out all its functions which relate to transport. It advises the government in respect of subsidies for ferry and other services. It is engaged in one activity at the present time, and I am sure this will warm the heart of the hon. member for Saint John-Albert. The chairman of the Maritime Commission is actively engaged in discussions with the Canadian Pacific Railway in relation to a certain water crossing that is very important to the hon. gentleman and to the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings. I hope we will be able to make concrete proposals to parliament before too long in this regard.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, I thank the minister for that encouraging news about the ferry in the Bay of Fundy. If Canada moved ahead in merchant shipping matters, if we realized that we had a destiny in the sea, and it was possible to make plans for a merchant fleet and the like, would the new commission with its usurpation of the function of the Maritime Commission, and the other authority it may pick up, have the power to deal with the question of conference rates and matters of that kind? I am not speaking now of matters that may come under the Maritime Freight Rates Act, port parity, and the like; but I have always felt that because Canada has not had the ships with which to back up our case at conference tables when negotiating water conference rates, and so on, we have always got the short end of the stick.

I wonder whether the minister envisages a greater interest in water conference rates and the like, on behalf of Canada, because of the institution of this new commission. I express the hope that this new, massive bureaucratic agency will be active in this area. We have some fears about what may result and what may even take place in a detailed way within the new commission, but I think all hon. members of the committee generally agree that something had to be done about our transportation system. There is approval at least of the part that sets up the commission, but I hasten to add this qualification. This matter comes to mind because I noticed in the paper the other day that there are moves afoot again to break up the ministry of transport. I see the Minister without Portfolio is in the chamber, who has some interest in transport. He is acting minister of everything, as well as being junior minister of transport. I hope he will understand when I say—this is not meant to slight him—that I think we should still have, particularly in view of this legislation, one Minister of Transport.

Mr. Pickersgill: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Perhaps both ministers will be glad to hear that, but I did not want to appear to be against either one of them. I still believe there should be a single ministry. I believe that this new commission, with its great powers in respect of all modes of transport, must be under one minister. I think this will keep in line the element of competition amongst the members of the commission, for one thing. They will take over their new duties, I hope with handsome salaries. They will all be experts, but they will be oriented toward one mode of transport in nearly every case. I would be afraid that a real tug-of-war might ensue between different members of the commission in an effort to obtain concessions in their particular field. I refer to the old, civil service Parkinsonian attitude wherein they will all be trying to build up their own field of interest and activity. Therefore I hope that in this regard there is still only one Minister of Transport.

We are in the dying days of this legislation. I notice the smiling face of the minister. I hope he is still with us for a while after this legislation is passed.

Mr. Nesbitt: He is going to take a long time to die.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I am not sure whether the hon. member for Oxford said "he" or "it" is going to take a long time to die. I am not sure whether he meant the minister or the legislation.

Mr. Nesbitt: Like Charles II. Not the minister, though.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): We are in a much better mood in the late hours of this afternoon than we were before we had that sandwich. Having said what I wanted to say about the make-up of the commission, and the worry I have of competition among the different modes of transport, I want to repeat what I said at the beginning of my remarks, namely that this nation, which has such a large coastline—it is about the second longest in the world—should pay greater attention to our shipping industry. The minister took some action, and rightly so, in setting up a Canadian coast guard. This is all to the good. It is true that the government is involved in most of the vessels that we have, and it is unfortunate that private enterprise should not play a larger part in this development. All through our discussion of this legislation we have detected a great concern on the part of the minister for private enterprise. I may have disagreed with the minister in detail, but I am pleased to see this attitude; I think it is what we want in a country such as Canada. But let us give all forms of transport a chance to develop. In closing, Mr. Chairman, I merely express the hope that the new transportation commission, the 17-man board, will be strong, forceful and will bring to the fore that sector of our transportation system that for some reason or another has been sorrowfully neglected in Canada.

The Chairman: Shall clause 84 carry?

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 85 to 88 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 89—Pending proceedings.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, in my opinion clause 89 reads in a rather disturbing way. I believe this feeling is shared by other hon. members who have received letters from organizations in western Canada that are concerned about the procedure to be followed with regard to the abandonment of lines that are not part of the protected grid. I know the minister has on several occasions been asked to clarify this point, and each time he has been asked to clarify it once and for all. I refer to the practice that will be followed once this bill passes. Will those applications for abandonment which are before the board at the present time be heard and considered under this bill, or will they be considered under the existing legislation? As I read clause 89, it seems to indicate that, notwithstanding the new procedures that are to be followed with respect to abandonment, those applications already in the works shall be heard under the old procedures.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I have answered that question before, but I am glad the hon. gentleman has raised it because I can give the assurance on this clause that I gave before. I do not think it would be reasonable, since these applications have been in for years, to ask the railways to start all over again making the applications and to ask the commission to start all over again, thus causing delays in the gathering of information. I gave an undertaking, and I hereby repeat it, that as soon as possible and before any hearings are held, after this bill has received royal assent I will ask my colleagues, and I already have their approval, to accept my advice to cause an order in council to be passed to prescribe that the procedures under the new act with respect to the hearing and disposition of these applications will be followed. That means that the actual applications will not have to be re-made and any technical requirements that have been met up to now will not have to be wastefully repeated, but that any and all hearings will be held under the new procedures prescribed in this act.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, the minister's compromise is one that will neither satisfy nor anger anyone. On balance I think that perhaps it may please to a small degree those who have been concerned.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 90—Continuation of orders, etc.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, I had a reference on my desk which I cannot find for the moment—there is so much propaganda coming and going on this legislation. During the hearings the minister, in answer to a question about costing techniques—this might not refer to the clause which we are now considering, but it is only a brief matter and I think the minister would want to clarify it—spoke about a guarantee to set up public hearings on costing techniques. I think the minister would want to take this opportunity to state in a general way what he has in mind for those who watch these things in detail.

It may be that the bill incorporates some direction with regard to this matter. Without opening a debate I would like to hear the minister repeat to the house what he said in the committee.

Mr. Pickersgill: The committee concentrated so much of its attention on section 387C of clause 70 that it did not pay much attention to sections 387A and B, and I am not inviting anyone to do so now. The procedures for costing are prescribed in clause 70 and I think that what will be contained in the bill itself if it is passed—and I am beginning to be a little more hopeful—is far more useful than any assurance I gave in the committee. However, I did give an assurance that there will be public hearings to establish costing techniques at which every interested party will be represented. This is contained in the bill.

Clause agreed to

Clauses 91, 92 and 93 agreed to.

On clause 94—Coming into force.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have an amendment to offer on clause 94. There are some highly technical amendments that are required to clause 94 consequent upon the amendments that we have made to clauses 20 and 21. I will read this amendment and if any elucidation is required I will be glad to supply it. The amendment reads as follows:

That Bill C-231, an act to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential provisions, be amended

(a) by inserting immediately after clause 93 on page 71 of the bill, as reprinted, the following:

Amendments and repeals

"94. The acts and portions of acts set out in the schedule are repealed or amended in the manner and to the extent indicated in tne schedule.";

(b) by renumbering clause 94 thereof as clause 95; and

(c) by striking out line 29 on page 71 of the bill, as reprinted, and by substituting therefor the following:

"Sections 80 to 90 and section 94 shall come into force on".

Unless hon. members wish an explanation of that amendment I can assure them that this is a purely technical drafting matter.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I so move.

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the said motion?

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 94 as amended agreed to.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before we go on I wonder if the committee would be willing to go back to clauses 58 and 59. The hon. member for Saint John-Albert promised us a real feast of reason and flow of soul. Could we take part II of the bill which we omitted earlier, and on which I doubt there will be much debate, and dispose of it?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, we have made good progress and we are in a better mood now, but the pipe line experts in our party did not think this matter would be coming up at the present time. Therefore I would ask the minister to stand that part of the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is quite agreeable. There is one other clause in the early part of the bill that was held over because we did not want to pass it until section 336 was passed, and that is clause 16.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I think clause 16 deserves to be held over until Monday. If the minister wishes us to express ourselves on clauses 58 and 59, this would be quite agreeable, as we are very unhappy with the matter of port parity. I think it would be of some help to the minister to hear the thoughts of the hon. member for Halifax with regard to this matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: That would be agreeable to me. I thought there was some reluctance on the part of the hon. gentlemen to go on with this matter this afternoon, but if that is not the case I would be agreeable to reverting to clauses 58 and 59.

On clause 58:

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, the minister's suggested amendment was outlined to us earlier and I will not go into it in depth, except to put on the record for week end study the shortcomings which we see in it as it is now worded. It seems to us that in his amendment the minister has taken the line of least protection of some of the traditional rights in ordinary times. To state it very briefly, let me say that I see four obvious shortcomings in the bill. I would hope that the minister might give thought to what I will say, together with the senior officials of his department. The first one deals only with export traffic and we are well aware of the arguments on both sides, although we wish that exports were included.

The second shortcoming of the amendment is that it accepts the provisions of section 334 which, by any stretch of the imagination, does nothing more than negate the provisions which we are trying to preserve.

• (4:50 p.m.)

The third shortfall is that it deals in no way at all with port parity with northeastern Atlantic ports in the United States, such as Portland, Boston and Baltimore.

The fourth shortcoming in it, which we can see from a cursory examination, is that it restricts any protection to those ports as defined within the select territory areas. We feel that now is the time for the maritimes to stand up on their hind feet and ask for that to which not only are they entitled, but without which the economic end of our port facilities is in sight, and that is the inclusion or extension of select territory definition which may well come under proposed section 329A, the definition of eastern ports. I just throw these suggestions out to the minister in the hope he will consider them. In other words, so that the minister will know to what lofty heights we aspire, we would like to see total port parity of all eastern ports.

When we start a study in depth of this provision on Monday, the minister will know the heights to which some of us, in our ignorance, are going to aspire. He will know it is not born out of malice. Since it is close to five o'clock, perhaps we should leave this for the minister's consideration over the week end. There is one other point I should like to mention, so the minister will be aware of it. We intend over the week end to attempt to draft at least two amendments and possibly three, one of which will possibly be a substitute for the shortcomings in this bill. It is not possible to draft one amendment, so we will have to go into a whole series of amendments in order to bring the provision into line with the desires of eastern Canada.

There is no way of even beginning to touch the basis upon which we will make our appeal to the minister, and to those on the other side of the house, particularly those who represent maritime constituencies. We have only seen a small number of these representatives in the house during the last two or three days. We hope that when we begin this study in depth on Monday we will hear from some of the other maritime members, particularly those from Newfoundland who are vitally concerned, although they do have special protection. I hope the minister will not take these remarks in other than a spirit of generosity, but we serve notice that he cannot expect any reading from scripture but rather some hard-nosed facts, which we feel he should acknowledge.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I should like to support the hon. member for Halifax on this matter. Halifax and Saint John stand together in this instance, even though they compete for port business. The minister has brought forward an amendment, and I must confess I have only had a chance to look at it hastily. We were concerned this afternoon with some of the other important sections of the bill. I think everyone will admit that we made good progress and we all discharged our responsibilities. One could consider that the minister brought forward this amendment merely to start a debate, and that he really was not serious about it. This is what the hon. member for Halifax and I choose to believe at the moment.

As a result of a quick look at this amendment, we believe it falls very far short of what we expected. At this late hour, I do not want to go into the history of the difficulty of our ports. Everyone knows that Halifax and Saint John, as well as the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, went into confederation on the promises that were made in confederation speeches to the effect that these ports would be preserved. This promise has been incorporated in various ways into statute law.

In so far as this amendment is concerned, the minister says that if there is anything by way of port parity protection for Halifax and Saint John in the existing law, he hopes nothing in this legislation will interfere with it. If the minister were sincere about this matter, then he should have caused a full review of every statute in this country, every board of transport decision and every related matter, to ascertain just what there was in our existing law which provided protection for our ports. Having done that, and having seen as I am sure he would have seen, certain built-in protection, I think he should have gone on from there.

The St. Lawrence seaway made our competitive position worse. Business is going farther inland in this country. We see business going by our door, and this is not a happy situation. This winter the ports of Saint John and Halifax have had a bad year, their worst year so far. Some of the tonnage figures are not bad, but they relate to bulk cargo. There is no trans-shipment activity, which is lucrative for our longshoremen and for the economy of this area.

When the minister is relaxing this week end and mulling over the success he has had in putting through the different clauses of the bill, he should give consideration to bringing forward something better for port parity, otherwise Monday is going to be another sorrowful day, such as he had two days ago when the Liberal party was humiliated in its move to wipe out the Crowsnest pass rates.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if, in the same conciliatory spirit in which the hon. gentleman has just been speaking, there might be any disposition on the part of the committee not to see the clock so that he may continue in his seductive vein? I am sure the rest of us would love to hear him.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): No, we have had a good day and I think the rights of private members should be preserved. If the minister does feel we are a little hard on him, I have fairly good news for him. I can tell him that the hon. member for Acadia may not be coming in until later on Monday night. The conclusion from that is that the minister had better be good in the early part of Monday, otherwise we will speak to the hon. member.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the committee would bear with me for just one minute to make a suggestion which I would like hon. members from the Atlantic provinces and particularly the hon. members for Halifax and the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, to ponder. It will be recalled that we made certain amendments to clause 16(3). Perhaps I should read them so they will be in Hansard:

(a) whether the tolls or conditions specified for the carriage of traffic under the rate so established are such as to create

(i) an unfair disadvantage—

• (5:00 p.m.)

Perhaps I do not need to read subparagraph (i), but subparagraph (ii) reads:

(ii) an undue obstacle to the interchange of commodities between points in Canada or an unreasonable discouragement to the development of primary or secondary industries or to export trade in or from any region of Canada or—

And this is really the new part.

—or to the movement of commodities through Canadian ports; or"

This would mean that if there were any undue obstacle or if it were alleged there were any undue obstacle to the movement of commodities through Canadian ports, by tolls or conditions specified for the carriage of traffic, this matter could be taken before the commission, and a hearing be held, following which the commission would have power to issue an order to correct that situation.

I think that the hon. member for Halifax who has spoken might feel that if I had not done this, probably I should have done it; but since I have done everything that the law officers can think of to preserve all the rights that there are under the law, it would seem to me that in these principles we are setting out in clause 16, which enable the commission to interfere with competitive rates, or rates set by the carriers, and to establish tolls or other conditions, this would be something that would give the shippers, and those communities and provinces, something more than just the existing law on which they could rely, and that certain other advantages might be had or might be of interest.

I would be prepared to have one of my colleagues make such a motion on Monday if, upon reflection over the week end, hon. members seemed to think that this would be a useful addition to the bill. I myself am inclined to think that it would be.

The Chairman: I would like to crave the indulgence of the committee for a moment to refer to the work done in committee last Monday. When there was a discussion on clause 20 an amendment was moved to introduce a new clause 20 and to renumber old clause 20 as clause 21. As the procedure appears in Hansard at page 11861 it would appear that the new clause 20 was introduced but no consideration was given to paragraphs (b) and (c) of the amendment to renumber the clauses.

I apologize to the committee for allowing this to slip by me, and I think it would tidy up our procedure if I now asked the committee to agree to these two paragraphs.

On clause 20.

The Chairman: Does the committee agree now that clause 20 on page 12 of the bill, as reprinted, be renumbered as clause 21?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Also, will the committee agree that clause 21 and the heading thereto on page 13 of the bill, as reprinted, be struck out?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On clause 42.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I could have the same indulgence for just a minute to have a similar technical change made. It will be recalled that an amendment was moved by an hon. member on the other side—for the moment I cannot recall who it was—to clause 42 which read in part:

—the governor in council may take such legislative or other action—

When I accepted the amendment, entirely without advice, I entered the reservation that I thought it could be tidied up by the Chair, but I am told that the Chair can only tidy up punctuation. Could it be agreed that instead of reading "the governor in council may take such legislative or other action" it should read "may cause to be taken such legislative or other action"? It would save a little time on Monday if we could agree to that now.

The Chairman: Does the committee agree to the suggested change as put forward by the minister?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members business as listed on today's order, namely, public bills and private bills.

JUVENILE DELINQUENTS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PLACES OF CONFINEMENT

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-13, to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

[The Chairman.]

He said: Admittedly, Mr. Speaker, this bill only tackles one of the many problems relating to our younger people and the relationship they have with the law. Last year an interdepartmental committee report, dealing with many other aspects of the situation, was made public. The bill before us is one that was prepared some time ago. If you look at its front page you will notice that we are now only four days from the anniversary of its first reading, and it was prepared long before then.

The Fauteux committee which examined certain penology matters more than ten years ago made a certain comment which is reprinted in the explanatory notes to this bill, and I think I would be unable to put things more succinctly than did Mr. Justice Fauteux in his report. I quote the following comment from page 27 of his report, as reproduced in the explanatory notes:

Young Offenders

It is an astonishing fact that under the present law in Canada, it is possible for a child under the age of sixteen to be convicted of a criminal offence in an adult court and be sentenced to a lengthy term of imprisonment in a penitentiary. This can happen in any of the many areas where the Juvenile Delinquents Act is not in force ... In our opinion legislative changes are needed immediately to provide that no person under the age of sixteen years shall be committed to penal institutions where adult prisoners are confined, and we recommend accordingly.

The force of that recommendation is underlined by reference to "immediately." That committee saw no reason why immediate action should not be taken.

• (5:10 p.m.)

In 1956 this committee reported to the minister of justice. Though many recommendations of the Fauteux committee have gone by the board, and have in some cases been ignored by successive ministers of justice, it is a sad commentary on the government, on parliament, on sociologists and on anybody who has any real concern for the position of our younger people in our society that the report and recommendations of Mr. Justice Fauteux have been ignored for so long, when he himself said that legislative changes were needed immediately. They were needed in 1956, and before then.

The purpose of this bill is to put into legislative effect the recommendations of Mr. Justice Fauteux, that it will not be possible for a child to be committed or confined to a penitentiary where adults are imprisoned. No one will argue that it benefits younger people to be incarcerated in a penitentiary with hardened criminals who have committed crimes of all varieties and intensities. The general consensus throughout the nation, throughout the western world, is that it is undesirable to place younger persons in contact with people who have spent many years of their lives following the pursuits of crime, and in the penitentiaries. If for nothing else, penitentiaries are excellent places for an apprenticeship in crime. As I have said earlier, it is sad that this situation should prevail for such a long time without legislative action being taken about it.

We have had for some time the report of the committee on juvenile delinquency. I had postponed proceedings with respect to this bill since the committee made its report, hoping that the study which I thought the Solicitor General said would take place would reach a conclusion. I hoped that we should see the beneficial results of that study come to the fore in a legislative way in the relations with the various provinces. It seems that the study has not yet been completed, because we have not heard anything about it. It would appear that the study will not yield full or partial results during this year. There is no reference to action being taken on the report of the committee on juvenile delinquency in the legislative program which parliament has been asked to consider.

The report of the committee on juvenile delinquency is one of the most urgent problems confronting this nation. The Bank Act, which we are to deal with at some time in this session, is inconsequential when compared with the value that our younger people have in this society, and with the manner in which we treat them, and the things we do in disregard of their legitimate interests in this nation. The current bill before us, the transportation bill, vital through it is, is inconsequential when balanced against the needs of the younger people, and the need of this parliament to do something worth while with respect to young people who come in conflict with the law.

There is a crucial time in a person's life, the formative years, when society can help that individual. At that time society can help a younger person to overcome difficulties. That is the time when young people need help, because their paths either will lead to crime and successive years in penitentiaries, or down what we call the straight and narrow—in other words, into the main stream of social action. If we miss that crucial moment, all the successive attempts at rehabilitation come to naught. The statistics on recidivism in our penitentiaries, the efforts which, with little effect, we make toward rehabilitation, the attempts we make at penological reform, whether in connection with the construction of institutions or practices within those institutions, show that there can be relatively little beneficial effect once a person becomes confirmed in his attitude toward society and toward the law.

That is why I say that, important as the transport bill may be to some, important as the Bank Act is, these are matters of no consequence when balanced against the value we should place on our young people, and the assistance we ought to give them at that crucial moment in their lives when they may overcome whatever psychological barriers or difficulties are confronting them.

This is why we have waited impatiently to hear what the government plans to do constructively with the extensive report of the committee on juvenile delinquency. I do not expect this bill will receive a fate different from that of other bills which have come up during this hour. In fact I feel it might be desirable if it were not given second reading, because the problem is much broader than this particular aspect of it. I hope however that at least we may be able to have a full round of comment about the general situation confronting our younger people, and their relationship with the law, as well as the application of law enforcement and penological methods. I hope the Solicitor General may say something with respect to the study taking place within his department about this important committee report.

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, I have waited for some weeks to speak in the house during private members hour on this item of legislation. We should be thankful to the hon. member for Skeena for putting it on the order paper and for drawing this particular aspect of the problem of penology to our attention.

While I would support his bill heartily, let me say at the outset, as the hon. member said a few moments ago, that we are looking at just one aspect of a large problem. We are trying to straighten out what has become an increasingly bad social anomaly. If there is any area today in our country which has been kept very much in the dark and allowed to proceed at a slow rate of progress, in terms of our understanding of man, it is the area of what we do with social or criminal offenders.

Juvenile Delinquents Act

• (5:20 p.m.)

I feel strongly, as does the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) that by and large we have ignored all the new concepts which have come within our grasp during the last half century; we have made virtually no use of our new understanding of the best ways in which to deal with those who offend against our laws. Of course, I realize that we are dealing this evening with young people under the age of 16 who—though most people in Canada would find it hard to believe—are at this moment in prison side by side with some of the most hardened criminals who operate in this country. And this is done in the name of justice, or in the naïve hope that we may be able to return to society young men who have somehow been chastened and reformed as a result of their experience. If there are those in this country today who are wondering where criminals are trained, developed and further motivated, they will find the major source not on the street corners or in the poolrooms, or in the shady lounges, but in institutions operated by federal and provincial governments —jails, prisons and penitentiaries.

I can speak about this from personal experience, for it was my duty during my student days in theology to work as a prison chaplain, to meet and talk with men in prison and watch some of them in their progress toward a full-time life of crime. I think a lot of nonsense has been written and produced on television screens to illustrate the ways in which people embark on a criminal way of life. From time to time we are told in lurid detail about people who come from good homes and who, because of some quirk, or unexplained desire, commit some act of crime. However interesting this may be, it is not a realistic picture.

At least 90 per cent of those who opt for a criminal way of life usually come from homes which are not very well organized, homes which are not strongly held together and which afford little support for an individual. In the beginning, very often, the crime is nothing more than a foolish act which led to a sentence of, perhaps, 30 days. It is during the serving of this first sentence that a life of crime is seriously contemplated.

I am sure that if one entered the great majority of county and provincial prisons this evening he would find young fellows barely old enough to shave, sitting on wooden benches talking to men of 45 and 50, men who have "been around," who know what the score is, who have discovered the short cuts and who have become habituated to a life of crime punctuated by frequent sporadic terms of imprisonment. This is the situation which prevails not only in provincial prisons but in federal penitentiaries. Not only do we persist in causing relatively innocent offenders to associate with hardened three-time, six-time and ten-time losers, but we place them in an environment where it is almost impossible for them to avoid learning from their associates what further crimes might be perpetrated upon release. When we talk blandly about putting people behind bars to protect the rest of society, it is shocking to think that three out of every four of those who are presently behind bars will commit some further offence after their release, and be locked up once again.

I ask: What in God's name is the use of a system which affords almost no degree of protection for those who are free in society or to those who are now in prison and will at some point be released? We do all this in the name of justice. We have the extremely naïve belief that through an arrangement of this kind men will be reformed, though it has been shown again and again in our era that hostility produces hostility, and that punishment produces reaction and violence. What do we gain by teaching young people in their teens that if they commit some anti-social act expressing their hostility to society, society will turn on the heat by exposing them to hostility exerted by social pressure?

This is why I say that in dealing with the bill sponsored by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) it would be folly on our part to ignore the wider problem which exists—the increasing pressure on our society because our prisons, as the figures tell us, are in most cases becoming increasingly occupied, our penitentiaries swollen to overflowing.

Yet we have not dealt with the nub of the problem. The nub of the problem is as old as our civilization itself. We are supposed to believe that when a person commits a criminal act in this ocuntry, the essential thing is that he must be punished. A good deal of the feeling which prevails in our country toward those who commit crimes was expressed during this session when we were discussing whether or not to abolish capital punishment. We did not take that opportunity. Speeches were made ad nauseam to the effect that we must always be sure we punish people who perpetrate crimes in our society. For what reason? Ought we to do this because it is our intention to teach them a lesson? Well, if three out of four people who enter prison commit further crimes after their release, we have not taught them much of a lesson in my opinion. Is it because we intend to wreak a little vengeance upon them, just as might be done in private confrontations? If we feel that way, that is fine, but we should recognize that these people are being confined not for an altruistic reason, or in order to reform them, but simply because public vengeance must be taken. If this is the limit of our understanding of the problem, then all I can say is that I am sorry indeed for our society.

It was interesting to relate this attitude to the attitude of mind of our society 100 years ago toward the mentally deranged. Hon. members may have read in books or magazines that a mentally deranged person a hundred years ago was considered to be filled with an evil spirit, and it was thought that the best thing to do was to whip him, or otherwise torment him, in order that he should come to his senses. Hon. members may recall some of the horrible things which were done to people who were incurably insane in the name of medicine, and of good health.

Is this the level of understanding we have reached today when dealing with the mentally sick? It is not. When a person has a nervous breakdown or loses touch with reality, do we punish him? No; we are anxious to secure the best medical attention at the earliest moment so that, if at all possible, he can be restored to health. With the knowledge and expertise now available to us I hope we are coming quickly to the realization that in dealing with those who offend against society it is no longer enough to punish them or lock them away in some dark corner.

• (5:30 p.m.)

We must come to the realization that those who commit crimes are sick. They are not sick in the sense one is sick when a thermometer is put in his mouth and it is found that he has a high temperature. They are not sick in the sense that you can submit them to a questionnaire, and if they answer too many questions in a strange way you know their minds are not functioning properly. They are, however, sick in terms of not being able to live in a healthy way with the rest of society. This is a new kind of sickness which we must come to understand. It is a type of sickness which may start whith a young boy of six years of age when he decides that he wants to pick things off a shelf in a store because he wants something. Or it may be the type of sickness which develops in a man 55 years of age when he decides he can alter the ledger books in some way and escape with thousands of dollars. Nonetheless, this is a sickness.

When we start to think in this enlightened way we will be able to do away with these damp, dark, infested holes that we call centres of justice and reform. We will be able to do away with these drab grey buildings which we think in some way protect society and reform the individual. I would hope that this bill would give us the opportunity to wrestle with this very deep social problem. I would hope that we would not run away from it and that we would not just tinker with it. I would hope we would use in an enlightened way the very best methods available to us today to help people who are socially sick, whether they be young or old. Then we might not have the situation in this country, as has been said again and again, where a young man who is 19 years of age is locked up for two years because he broke into a gas station, is let out again after 18 months, decides to steal a couple of cars, is locked up for another five years until he is 26 years of age, is let out again when he is 26, steals another car, and then is locked up again for nine years. This person's life at this stage has become a life of living like a common animal between four walls, and with bars on the windows.

This is not the type of life that was intended for any human being. It is not the life which was intended for you or me. I would hope that the government would take both this bill which is before us, and the thoughts I have expressed, under very serious consideration. In closing I might say I would hope that the penitentiary committee which was set up during this session, would become more active than it has been to date. Certainly very few meetings have been held since this session began, and now this session has gone on for 190 days. There does not seem to be any indication that they have taken this problem seriously.

I for one will look forward to a great deal of attention and a great deal of interest being given to this problem, because it stands as one of the greatest social problems which faces our country today.

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew North): The social problem which is dealt with in Bill C-13 and the recommendation in respect of the repeal of subsection 2 of section 26 of the Juvenile Delinquents Act I am sure are topics which will appeal to all members of this house. All of us have a humanitarian interest in this. What shocks me greatly about this whole situation is the fact that there are many fields in respect of which we impose laws governing youths of a certain age, but in what other fields do we have laws to protect our youth from certain aspects of our society? At the provincial level of government our laws provide for a curfew in certain cases, so that youths of a certain age must be off the street at a certain hour. We have laws which say that with some exceptions, they must attend school until they are 16 years of age. We have laws which state that youths cannot possess alcoholic beverages. They cannot purchase alcoholic beverages until they reach age 18 or age 21. They must be a certain age before they are entitled to hold a driver's licence. They must be a certain age before they can qualify for elective office. They must be a certain age before they are entitled to handle firearms.

We have not, however, placed a limit on the age at which they can be placed in a prison or other institution with adults who, as the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacDonald) has mentioned, are hardened criminals. I should like to compliment the hon. member for Prince for bringing out many of the social problems which are involved in dealing with these people in our modern society.

I think there are five major areas which should be considered when we discuss juvenile delinquency. One is the home. I am very much inclined to agree with the hon. member for Prince in this regard. I think that in these television programs the youths who become involved in crime in the first place are portrayed as being persons who have come from good homes. I believe the greatest enemy of our youth today possibly is poverty and the slum areas which exist in our cities across Canada. Where children are brought up in homes under responsible parents, and where there is an obvious communication between the parents and their children, one does not find that these children go very far astray.

I remember one particular case which arose during my teaching career. A young boy ran away from home. The father and mother did not seem to have any particular interest in locating him because they thought it would do him a lot of good to stay out all night, so that he would get hungry and perhaps want to come back home again. This was a case where there obviously was no communication.

Then there is the church in our society. I think this is a very important aspect, so far as juvenile delinquency is concerned, because every person in our society must have a certain faith, something to lean on in time of trouble. Youths who are brought up in good homes usually are those who have attended church regularly, and they receive some excellent guidance there. At this point I should like to say that I have no respect for some of the television programs and some of the individuals who appear on television programs. Some of these people are agnostics who in our modern day society seem to think that it is important to knock religion on every possible occasion. When we knock religion and knock our traditions, we are knocking the base from under our society.

The third aspect is the school. Education is a very important factor. We must train our youth to play a useful role in society. I think our teachers could play a very important role in dealing with student problems by keeping in close contact with the home. The friends and associates, not just inside the prison walls, as was mentioned by the previous speaker, which the youth has in every-day society are very important to him. The youth can help those friends and associates, and they in turn can help him. Another important aspect is the society in which the youth lives. Advances in science and technology in the last few years have had a tremendous impact on our way of life. These advances have also had a great effect upon our humanitarian efforts.

• (5:40 p.m.)

An hon. member mentioned that some laws which existed 100 years ago, both in England and here, were laws of persecution. No one in this house has a persecution complex, I am sure, but laws change more slowly than scientific approaches and technological understanding. My point is that when we adopt legislation of the kind now before us we should make sure that facilities and institutions are available to effectively take advantage of such legislation.

Like the hon. member for Prince, I want to compliment the hon. member who placed this bill before us. It always does us good to look seriously at situations and bring them to the attention of the individuals concerned. In support of the Solicitor General who has taken a great deal of interest in this matter, despite what some people may think, it was almost five years after the parliamentary committee studied juvenile delinquency before the report was tabled in the house. One should not be surprised that a final decision has not been made by the government.

Many conflicts of interest are involved in this matter of juvenile delinquency. Many aspects are outside the constitutional authority of the federal government. During the past few years we have observed many examples of the difficulties involved in governing a country on a federal basis. Many things must be dealt with jointly by the federal and provincial governments. Before the recommendations of the report of that committee can be implemented a great deal of consultation will be required, and I may say that considerable consultation has already taken place. Many financial problems will have to be solved, including those in relation to financial assistance to provinces.

The report is divided basically into three parts. The first part deals with the Juvenile Delinquents Act, which is a federal statute; yet the administration of juvenile courts falls within provincial jurisdiction. The second part deals with federal-provincial relations. Part III deals with a research department which can be administered by either the federal or provincial governments. This presents another problem which must be solved. Plans and arrangements must be made so that programs dealing with juvenile delinquency and related prison reform can work effectively and efficiently in practice as well as in theory.

Let me quote from the final report of the Committee on Remission Service of 1956. This particular part is referred to in the bill now before us. I quote from page 27 of this report, which states in part:

> It is an astonishing fact that under the present law in Canada, it is possible for a child under the age of sixteen to be convicted of a criminal offence in an adult court and be sentenced to a lengthy term of imprisonment in a penitentiary. This can happen in any of the many areas where the Juvenile Delinquents Act is not in force. Some provincial authorities have been authorized by the Prisons and Reformatories Act to make limited efforts to deal with this class of offender but the situation in Canada is, however, far from satisfactory.

The next paragraph indicates that in the year 1955, 14 persons under the age of 16 years were admitted to Canadian penitentiaries. Those 14 individuals are important to our society, and particularly important to other individuals of the same age group.

A very important paragraph of this report can be found at page 60, reading as follows:

> A person who is sentenced to penitentiary does not begin to earn statutory remission until he arrives at the institution. Cases frequently occur where such persons are detained in the county jail so that they will be available as witnesses, or for some other reason, who will not earn remission while so detained.

Certain recommendations appear at page 87 of the report in respect of this very important subject. I should like to quote several of these recommendations or goals to be achieved, and I will begin with (c) which refers to—> —a concentration of effort on treatment by way of training, rather than the near imposition of punishment; this is especially so in the case of special classes of offenders, particularly youthful offenders and persistent offenders;

Recommendation (d) sets forth as another goal the—> —specialization of institutions and specialization of methods of treatment, with a concentration of professional staff in the areas where it is most needed.

That is the very crux of this matter. We must employ sufficient number of specialists to work with these individuals so that these offenders do not continue to return to our prisons.

Another goal is set forth in (f) which calls for—> —a planned policy of recruitment and training of professional staff.

That is a necessary supplement to (d). The final goal or feature set out in this recommendation is (g) which asks for—> —a willingness to make full-scale experiments in all phases of the correctional system.

Let me turn to page 88 of this report and read several of the recommendations which appear there. I shall begin by reading No. 13 which states:

> In any case where a convicted person is between the ages of 16 and 21 or where a maximum term of imprisonment of two years or more may be imposed, no offender should be sentenced to any term of imprisonment without consideration, by the court, of a pre-sentence report.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Then No. 16 reads as follows:

> Appropriate legislative amendments should be made immediately to provide that no person under the age of 16 years shall be committed to penal institutions where adult prisoners are confined.

Here I should like to refer back to something I said a few moments ago, namely that we make laws to keep out teenagers out of pool rooms, we make laws to keep our teenagers out of beverage rooms and other phases of our society, but we must implement a law that does not allow our people under the age of 16 years to associate, within the bounds of prison walls, with hardened criminals. Recommendation No. 20 reads as follows:

> The federal and the provincial governments should give serious consideration, in expanding their systems of penal institutions, to the establishment, on a medium security basis, of such additional institutions as may be required.

Then No. 38:

Some means should be found to provide specialized after-care for particular types of parolees, such as sex offenders, drug addicts, alcoholics and psychopaths.

In my concluding remarks, Mr. Speaker, I should like to again pay tribute to the hon. member who brought this private bill before us and to the Solicitor General, who is in every sense a humanitarian individual, who is deeply interested in this matter and is doing a great deal of work in this regard. I know it will not be long before this problem is cured in our society. We cannot build schools to educate youth and at the same time have prisons which contain hardened criminals in which our youth are educated in a different direction from the way we want them educated in our society.

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I should like at the outset to compliment the sponsor of Bill No. C-13. I feel that his moral and social aim in this connection is very commendable. but when, in his concise fashion he aims at only section 26(2) of the Juvenile Delinquents Act, perhaps his aim is not so good, at least in my humble opinion.

During the third session of the last parliament a somewhat similar attack on the Juvenile Delinquents Act was launched by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) in Bill No. C-89. In that bill he attacked the act with respect to eight sections, I believe.

Mr. Peters: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would contend that the purpose of this bill is not an attack upon the Juvenile Delinquents Act. All it says is that the Juvenile Delinquents Act has a section in it which permits those charged under the Criminal Code to be removed from the protection of the Juvenile Delinquents Act. All this bill does is raise the age from 14 to 16 years, to give them this protection.

I doubt whether any member of parliament would deny the protection of the Juvenile Delinquents Act to a 16-year-old, rather than subjecting him to the mercy of the Criminal Code. I believe this is what we should be voting on in the next few minutes, and I do not think it should be the policy of the government to oppose this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): I would remind the hon. member who raised the point of order that the question has been very general up to this time. If some hon. members insist upon the discussion being more direct, perhaps this should be done; but I do not think it is appropriate to raise that point at this time since the discussion has ranged from the beginnings of crime in youth as evidenced in the speech of the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacDonald). However, I am sure the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Ryan) will want to keep to the point.

Mr. Peters: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I did not raise it against the wideness of debate. I was suggesting that the hon. member appeared to be saying that the purpose of this amendment was to launch an attack upon the Juvenile Delinquents Act, and I think this is not in keeping with the fact.

Mr. Ryan: Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand why Bill No. C-13 does not deal with section 13 (3) of the Juvenile Delinquents Act, which is a pretty analogous section. Recently a case was argued before the Supreme Court of Canada. I believe this case was from the province of Alberta. It attacked the constitutional validity of the Juvenile Delinquents Act. I think the judgment in that case has been reserved. In that event it is probable that our Department of Justice, our Solicitor General and our Minister of Justice are somewhat embarrassed at the present time with respect to doing anything in the way of amending the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

As I understand it, in that case there was a minor, quasi-criminal offence committed—I believe it was under the Highway Traffic Act—and a charge was laid under the Juvenile Delinquents Act, a federal statute, instead of by way of summary conviction. This is what started the whole question of whether the Juvenile Delinquents Act was ultra vires. A great problem is posed at the present time for our ministry in this connection. The report of the Department of Justice, which has been so much referred to, was brought down in the year 1965, I believe, but was not tabled until February, 1966. I see here the library filing mark which says "February 22, 1966." I understand that report took about five years to prepare; therefore hon. members will understand that a great deal is involved in this question.

The aim of Bill No. C-13 is to ensure that no child who has committed an offence shall, upon conviction, be confined in a place of imprisonment for adults. Of course no one disagrees with that. Section 26 of the Juvenile Delinquents Act already contains a provision to this effect. It goes on to say, in subsection 2:

This section does not apply to a child who has been proceeded against under the provisions of section 9.

Bill No. C-13 would repeal subsection 2 of section 26 of the Juvenile Delinquents Act. Section 9 of that act provides that where the child is accused of an indictable offence and is apparently or actually over 14 years old, the court may order that the child be tried by indictment in the ordinary courts if the court believes—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order.

Mr. Peters: You have succeeded in talking it out.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

• (6:00 p.m.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I wonder whether the acting house leader could inform us of the order of the business to be considered in the house next week?

Mr. Turner: Mr. Speaker, next week after the completion of the consideration of Bill C-231 we will deal with the following items: Order No. 117, an act to amend the Judges Act; order No. 79, An act to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways System; order No. 104, proposed resolution that the standing committee on privileges and elections be empowered to study the Canada Elections Act and to report to the house such proposals as the committee may deem advisable; order No. 105, proposed resolution that the report of the committee on election expenses tabled October 11 last be referred to the standing committee on privileges and elections; and order No. 83, second reading of Bill C-220, an act to make provision for appeals to an immigration appeal board in respect of certain matters relating to immigration. These items will not be necessarily taken in that order, except of course for Bill C-231, consideration of which will be continued.

It being five minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, January 23, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

RETURNING OFFICER, SHERBROOKE CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 2,021—Mr. Allard:

1. Referring to the answer to question No. 1,935, who is or are the person or persons or the association or associations from Sherbrooke or elsewhere who made representations for the appointment of Mr. Denis Proteau as returning officer for the electoral district of Sherbrooke?

2. What are the necessary qualifications which were considered for the appointment of Mr. Denis Proteau?

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): 1. No records are being kept of any representations made.

2. The usual qualifications required by the law.

CULTURAL AND INFORMATION AGREEMENTS WITH NATO COUNTRIES

Question No. 2,253—Mr. Irvine:

1. With which NATO member countries has Canada reached bilateral cultural and information agreements and which fields do these agreements cover?

2. Where there are no such agreements or limited agreements only, what is Canada's policy in the following fields (a) exchanges of cultural programs (theatres, films, television exhibitions) (b) exchanges of students—number planned—exchange procedure (c) exchanges of teachers and research workers—number planned—exchange procedure (fellowship) (d) equivalence of diplomas—system used and future plans (e) exchange of young workers—numbers—procedure used (f) exchanges through leisure activities—holiday camps—travel?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In so far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned: 1. The only country with which Canada has signed a general cultural agreement is France. This agreement which was signed on November 17, 1965, covers the fields of academic, scientific, technical and cultural exchanges. In 1963 Canada and France signed an agreement on the co-production of films.

The government's policy, now that a general cultural agreement has been signed with France, is to develop cultural programs and explore the possibilities of entering into similar cultural agreements with a number of other countries, many of which are members of NATO, particularly those from which substantial groups in the population of Canada have come. However, because of the cultural heritage English speaking Canada shares with Britain and the U.S.A., our cultural relations with these countries are characterized by informality and it has not been felt necessary to have them formalized through agreements.

2. Where no agreement exists, the initiative is left entirely to public and private organizations of a cultural or educational character such as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the National Film Board, the Canada Council, the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, etc.

CANADIAN CULTURAL ACTIVITIES UNDER NATO

Question No. 2,254—Mr. Irvine:

What part is being played by Canada in the cultural field, with regard to member countries of NATO, by private cultural associations (a) of a general nature (b) of a more specifically Atlantic nature?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Numerous Canadians of European origin, many of whom have come from countries which are members of NATO, seek to maintain cultural links with their European home country. There are consequently an enormous number of private cultural associations in Canada which have as their main purpose the pursuit of cultural relations and exchanges with countries of Europe including NATO countries. In addition there are Canadian associations with a wide range of interests and activities which have international connections. Because of the similarities of Canadian background and traditions with the countries of western Europe and the United States, by far the greater part of the international connections of these associations are with the countries of the Atlantic area.

The activities of the very large number of associations involved are their own concern. Since they are not subject to governmental supervision, reports on their activities are not made to the government.

Questions

NATO RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING CULTURE

Question No. 2,255—Mr. Irvine:

Were recommendations concerning NATO and culture, issued in 1964, transmitted to Canada and, if so, what response was given by Canadian authorities to these recommendations?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In so far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned: The recommendations concerning NATO and culture which, it is assumed are those adopted by the NATO parliamentarians' conference of 1964, were transmitted to the Canadian government. Such recommendations do not call for an official response. However, it should be noted that the proposals made by the conference correspond, by and large, to the government's policy in this field.

CULTURAL AGREEMENTS WITH UNCOMMITTED COUNTRIES

Question No. 2,256—Mr. Irvine:

1. With which uncommitted countries has Canada established cultural agreements, bilateral and/or multilateral?

2. What are the general subjects of these agreements with regard to (a) technical aid for education (b) number of experts lent (c) establishments built or run (d) expenditure (e) field of application (primary, university, technical) (f) cultural exchanges (theatre groups, exhibitions) (g) students from uncommitted countries received in Canada—number—breakdown by subject studied (h) teachers and research workers from uncommitted countries received in Canada (i) young workers invited as trainees (j) young people received through spare time activities, holiday camps, sports meetings?

3. What are the activities, in this field, of private associations (a) of a general nature (b) of a more specifically Atlantic nature?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In so far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned: The information relating to this question is contained in my answers to question Nos. 2,253 and 2,254.

CANADIAN FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS OPERATING IN U.S.

Question No. 2,269—Mr. Reid:

1. To the knowledge of the government, what Canadian financial institutions have operations in the United States and for what length of time have they operated in the United States?

2. What types of operation do these Canadian financial institutions carry on in the United States and how do they differ from their operations in Canada?

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

3. What are the United States federal and state regulations governing the operation of foreign financial institutions in the United States?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): 1. Canadian banks and insurance companies which, to the knowledge of the inspector general of banks and the superintendent of insurance, have operations in the United States, are listed in table I, attached.

2. See table II, attached.

3. Foreign banks operating in the United States do so under the state banking laws and regulations of the states in which they operate.

The activities of foreign insurance companies in the United States are regulated by the insurance laws of each state in which the company operates. The regulations are essentially similar to those in Canada. Companies are required to file annual statements, to maintain assets in the United States, to cover their United States liabilities, and are subject to examination by state supervisory officials.

Table I

Five Canadian banks have banking offices and/or representatives located in the United States. These are:

Bank	Approximate year commenced operations in United States
Bank of Montreal	These banks, or earlier banks which have merged with them at some stage, have been operating in the United States for many years, in some cases for more than 100 years.
Bank of Nova Scotia
Toronto-Dominion Bank
Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce
Royal Bank of Canada

The following Canadian registered insurance companies transacted fire and casualty insurance in the United States during 1965:

Company	Approximate year commenced operations in United States
British America Assurance Co.	1874
British Northwestern Insurance Co.	1954
Canada Health and Accident Assurance Corporation	1961

The Canadian Indemnity Company	1930
Canadian Reinsurance Company	1959
Consolidated Fire and Casualty Insurance Company	1960
Co-operative Fire and Casualty Co.	1960
Elite Insurance Company	1955
Federal Fire Insurance Co. of Canada	1960
Fidelity Insurance Company of Canada	1957
The Globe Indemnity Company of Canada	1928
Gore Mutual Insurance Company	1937
The Great Eastern Insurance Company	1953
The Guarantee Co. of North America	1881
The Hudson Bay Insurance Company	1937
The London and Lancashire Guarantee and Accident Company of Canada	1963
Merit Insurance Company	1964
The Pacific Coast Fire Insurance Co.	1926
Quebec Assurance Company	1965
Security National Insurance Company	1960
Victoria Insurance Company of Canada	1965
Wellington Fire Insurance Company	1960
The Western Assurance Company	1874

The following Canadian registered insurance companies transacted life insurance and personal accident and sickness insurance in the United States during 1965:

Company	Approximate year commenced operation in United States
Alliance Mutual Life Insurance Co.	1919
The Canada Life Assurance Company	1926
Canadian Reassurance Co. (A & S only)	1961
Confederation Life Association	1926
Crown Life Insurance Company	1924
The Dominion Life Assurance Company	1930
The Excelsior Life Insurance Company (A & S only)	1964
The Great-West Life Assurance Co.	1906
The Imperial Life Assurance Co. of Canada	1926
The Manufacturers Life Insurance Co.	1903
The National Life Assurance Co. of Canada	1924
North American Life Assurance Company	1900
The Northern Life Assurance Co. of Canada	1936
Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada	1895
The Western Life Assurance Company	1959

Table II

Operations of Canadian banks in the United States are carried out through the following channels: 1. "Subsidiaries" which are incorporated under state banking laws, can accept deposits and engage in trust activities. They must in general conform to the same requirements as other banks in the same state. 2. "Branches" which are licensed under state banking laws, can accept deposits and must maintain a surplus of assets over liabilities. 3. "Agencies" which primarily handle financial transactions arising out of trade between Canada and the U.S. and make money market loans and investments in the U.S. for the parent bank. They also engage in foreign exchange business. In general they are not permitted to accept deposits or to exercise trust powers. They are not required to maintain cash reserves. 4. "Representatives" who are persons located in the U.S. who are not authorized to enter into actual banking transactions, but who facilitate banking transactions through correspondent banks and who develop and protect the parent banks' interests.

In Canada the banks do not carry out trust functions but engage in a wider range of banking activities than in their U.S. operations.

The insurance companies listed in table I transact the business of insurance, although a number of the companies accept reinsurance of United States business only and do not maintain offices in that country. There is no basic difference from their operations in Canada.

STAFF OF BOARD OF BROADCAST GOVERNORS

Question No. 2,280—Mr. Reid:

1. What is the size of the staff complement of the Board of Broadcast Governors as of December 6, 1966?

2. How are members of the staff appointed?

3. What is the basis of their salary scale?

4. How many of the B.B.G. staff are engaged in research in (a) radio (b) television programming (c) television technical research (d) educational television (ETV) (e) community antenna television systems (CATV)?

5. How many of the B.B.G. staff are engaged in regulating private and public radio stations and private and public television stations?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Board of Broadcast Governors as follows: 1. Including the three permanent members of the board, the authorized staff effective December 6, 1966, is 44.

2. By the Civil Service Commission.

3. The grade of each position is set by the bureau of classification revision of the Civil Service Commission. The salary range of each grade is set by the Treasury Board.

4. Within the current establishment of the board, each member of the staff becomes involved from time to time in some aspect of each activity of the board.

5. 44.

USE OF GOVERNMENT FACILITIES BY BROADCAST GOVERNORS

Question No. 2,285—Mr. Reid:

1. Does the Board of Broadcast Governors use the functions and/or facilities of the federal government or any provincial government to any purpose and, if so, what are these purposes and what are the functions performed and/or facilities provided by the federal government or any provincial government?

2. Does the Board of Broadcast Governors use the functions and/or facilities of universities or foundations for any purposes and what are the functions performed and/or facilities provided by these institutions?

3. Does the Board of Broadcast Governors commission special studies relating to its duties as set out by parliament to private individuals or to private organizations and, if so, how many of such studies have been commissioned since the board was established, and what subjects have these studies investigated?

[Mr. Sharp.]

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Board of Broadcast Governors as follows: 1. The Department of Transport has the responsibility for the technical operation and technical standards of broadcasting stations. The technical adviser of the board is in constant touch with the transport department on technical matters. The board uses the services of the Civil Service Commission and of the Treasury Board; and has used the data processing services of the Department of National Revenue.

2. No.

3. Yes, seven studies are now in process. These are studies in connection with E.T.V., study of library and documentation services, study of the market areas in which one television service only is being offered regarding costs of introducing and maintaining two services and of the advertising revenue which might be available; study on the possible use of computers as a management—information service for the board; to review and analyse the financial operating results of the privately owned Canadian television stations and C.T.V. network: Study on multiple ownership; study of monitoring processes.

DEDUCTION FROM WAGE ARREARS BY RAILWAY COMPANIES

Question No. 2,293—Mr. Allard:

Are the railway companies withholding 15 per cent of the 18 per cent raise for arrears, plus deductions for the government and company pension plans and, if so, is this 15 per cent deduction justified under the Income Tax Act as it relates to individuals?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): The railway companies are withholding 15 per cent of the dollar amount of the 18 per cent retroactive pay increase in addition to deductions for the government and company pension plans. This is justified and in accordance with the relevant income tax acts and regulations.

MOTOR CAR PRICE DIFFERENTIAL BETWEEN CANADA AND U.S.

Question No. 2,314—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Has the government taken or is it taking any act to remove the price differential, reported to be as much as $3,000 on the more expensive models, between similar cars sold in the U.S.A. and in Canada and, if so, what action?

2. Are cars manufactured in Canada sold at a lower price in the U.S.A. than they are in Canada and, if so (a) for what reason (b) who benefits from the extra cost of the ones sold in Canada?

3. Are cars manufactured in the U.S.A. sold at a lower price in the U.S.A. than they are in Canada and, if so (a) for what reason (b) who benefits from the extra cost of the ones sold in Canada?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): 1. Traditionally there has been a sizeable price differential between similar cars sold in the United States and in Canada. This situation arose because of the fact that the market for motor vehicles is much larger in the United States than in Canada. Consequently, vehicle manufacturers in the United States were able to realize the economies of large scale production and specialization. On the other hand, because of the limited size of the Canadian market, it was not possible to specialize and costs and prices reflected the disadvantages of shorter production runs in Canada.

The government has taken positive steps to substantially reduce the differential in prices between Canada and the United States. One of the central features of the Canada-United States automotive agreement has been the elimination of the tariff barriers which prevented Canadian companies from gaining access to wider markets. Consequently, Canadian companies are now able to rationalize production and achieve significant increases in growth and efficiency. Although differentials in prices still exist, progress achieved under the automotive program has already resulted in a very significant reduction of these differentials.

In 1965, prices of volume models of motor vehicles made in Canada were reduced and the average level of the price differential was diminished from 8 per cent to less than 5 per cent. In 1966, the differentials were again reduced. As the economies of volume production are more fully realized, it is anticipated that the forces of competition will bring about a further diminution of the remaining price differentials.

2. If the Canadian companies wish to export their vehicles to the United States, they must sell at a competitive price in that market, otherwise they would have to forego the extensive exports which have been made possible by the automotive program. The loss of these exports would, in turn, reverse the rationalization which has taken place in Canada and could result in an increase in costs and prices in this country. The terms and conditions of sales of Canadian made vehicles in other countries are, of course, private commercial transactions between sellers and buyers. Prices in these markets, which may vary considerably depending on local market conditions, are determined by competitive forces in the particular area.

Although costs and prices have been substantially reduced in Canada, it has not yet been possible to realize the full cost benefits of increased production and rationalization. It is doubtful that anyone benefits from the remaining higher costs of production in Canada.

3. International price comparisons, to be meaningful and valid, have to be based on an examination of actual sales under identical or very similar conditions. In the case of automobiles sold in Canada and the United States it is exceedingly difficult to find such closely comparable actual transactions. There are a number of factors which influence and determine the levels of prices and which have differential effects in the two countries. One of the most obvious is the rate of exchange between the currencies of the two countries. Other factors include variations in transportation costs between the factory and the retailers, the levels of sales tax, which vary from state to state and province to province, dealer margins differ from agency to agency and the range of options normally differs from car to car. Even a single dealer's price for the same model may differ according to the circumstances of a specific sale. It is possible to say, however, that prices of practically all motor vehicles sold in Canada, whether of domestic manufacture or imported, are now much closer to the price levels prevailing in the United States.

EXPO '67—VISITS BY LOW INCOME AND HANDICAPPED PEOPLE

Question No. 2,379—Mr. Basford:

1. Are provisions being made to permit people with low incomes, or those having large families, to visit Expo '67?

2. What plans is Expo making to permit handicapped people to visit the exhibition?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): 1. Expo Express, which is an electric train capable of carrying up to 30,000 passengers an hour, is free and visitors can travel on this train as long and as often as they wish.

Entrance to all pavilions, including all theme exhibits, is free. This also includes national pavilions and those sponsored by private participants. There is no charge to see the various displays. The Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition is sponsoring free entertainment in the band shells and plazas which are located at strategic points in the various sectors. There are six Expo service areas where food and drink can be purchased at controlled and reasonable rates. There are also three large parks with tables and benches where visitors can have picnics and bring their own food and drinks.

2. Provision has been made for a special transportation system for persons in wheel chairs to be used in place of the free of charge Expo Express. The majority of the pavilions and restaurants are equipped with ramps and will thus be easily accessible to wheel chairs. Where possible, Expo '67 projects have adhered to the national building code for the handicapped which provides exterior ramps, interior ramps or elevators, rest room facilities and so forth. A list of accessible areas will be issued in the official guide book. Wheel chairs may be rented in several locations.

Sponsorship is presently being requested for a Braille map of the site to familiarize blind visitors to their surroundings before and during their visit.

PERSONAL INCOME TAX, 1965

Question No. 2,386—Mr. Mather:

What, in 1965, was the total in dollars of personal income tax?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): Tax collection figures are maintained on a fiscal year basis. For the fiscal year April 1, 1965, to March 31, 1966, inclusive, the total personal income tax revenue, net of refunds, was $3,166,638,662. This amount includes federal income tax of $2,142,510,735, old age security tax of $494,900,000 and provincial income tax of $529,227,927.

DEFENCE EXPENDITURES, 1965

Question No. 2,387—Mr. Mather:

What, in 1965, was the total in dollars of defence expenditures?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): Defence expenditures for the fiscal year 1965-66 amounted to $1,548,446,784.

[Mr. Cantin.]

C.N.R. SALARIES TO MANAGEMENT AND TECHNICAL STAFF

Question No. 2,391—Mr. Godin:

In 1965, what salaries were paid by the Canadian National Railways to (a) the 4,764 members of the management and supervising staff (b) the 3,003 professional and technical assistants?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: The total figures which are derived from those contained in "Part VI (Employment Statistics) of Railway Transport" published annually by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics are as follows: (a) $37,973,939; (b) $21,177,518.

REIMBURSEMENT OF EXPENSES OF C.N.R. EMPLOYEES

Question No. 2,392—Mr. Godin:

1. Has the Canadian National Railways ceased to record expenses for which its employees seek reimbursement?

2. If so (a) in what year (b) is it the company's intention to re-establish a records section for this purpose?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. and 2. No. See also answer to question No. 1,887 in Hansard of October 5, 1966, page 8,334.

CONSTRUCTION CONTRACT, PENAL INSTITUTION SPRINGHILL, N.S.

Question No. 2,394—Mr. Coates:

1. What was the original amount of the contract awarded to the Foundation Company for the construction of the young offender's penal institution at Springhill, Nova Scotia?

2. Was a clause included in the contract to the Foundation Company as to a completion date and, if so, what was the completion date stipulated?

3. What has been the total amount paid to the Foundation Company to date and if this is in excess of the original amount, for what purpose were the additional monies paid?

4. Has the problem associated with the supplying of water to the institution been solved and, if so, what agreement has been reached and with whom for the supplying of water to the institution?

5. Who constructed the fence around the institution, what was the original cost of constructing this fence, how much damage was done to the fence by the recent storm, who has assumed responsibility for repairing the damage, and what is the cost of repairing the damage?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): 1. $8,890,800.

2. Yes, May 9, 1966.

3. $8,825,438.67.

4. No.

5. Foundation Maritime Limited at a cost of $99,000. An investigation is under way to ascertain the extent of damage, responsibility and cost of repairs.

SHARED COST HIGHWAY PROJECTS, NOVA SCOTIA

Question No. 2,395—Mr. Jamieson:

1. How many shared-cost highway projects were active in Nova Scotia in 1966 under (a) the trans-Canada highway agreement (b) the Atlantic Development Board agreement No. 1 (c) the Atlantic Development Board agreement No. 2?

2. What is the total value of these projects?

3. What is the estimated value of the work done in 1966 under (a) the trans-Canada highway agreement (b) the Atlantic development agreement No. 1 (c) the Atlantic development agreement No. 2?

4. What is the estimated total of Canada's share of the cost of the work done in 1966 under each of these agreements?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Departments of Public Works and Transport as follows: 1. (a) 64, (b) 11, (c) 14.

2. Trans-Canada highway, $33,823,103, Atlantic Development Board agreement No. 1, $5,842,650, Atlantic Development Board agreement No. 2, $9,513,088.

3. (a) $18,812,500. (b) $2,365,037. (c) $4,506,089.

4. Trans-Canada highway, $16,931,250, Atlantic Development Board agreement No. 1, $1,182,518, Atlantic Development Board agreement No. 2, $2,253,045.

POPULATION OF YELLOWKNIFE, N. W. T.

Question No. 2,404—Mr. Laprise:

What is the present population of Yellowknife?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): The preliminary count of the 1966 census of Canada shows a population of 3,674 for the town of Yellowknife.

[English]

GANDER AIRPORT—CONTRACT OF COMMERCIAL CATERERS

Question No. 2,408—Mr. MacEwan:

1. Do Commercial Caterers Ltd. pay to the government or any agency thereof any part of their employees' rent in houses at the Gander Airport, and, if so, what amount of the monthly rent?

Questions

2. What is the time period contained in the present contract of Commercial Caterers Ltd. with the Department of Transport at Gander Airport?

3. Is this contract on a cost plus basis?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Yes. Employees of Commercial Caterers pay rent to C.M.H.C. calculated on a percentage of their salary as follows: 20 per cent of the first $3,000 of annual salary, and 30 per cent of annual salary in excess of $3,000. When the rent so calculated is not sufficient to cover the economic rent of the unit occupied Commercial Caterers pays the difference. The average monthly rental subsidy per employee paid by Commercial Caterers is $33.14.

2. Five years, May 12, 1964 to May 11, 1969.

3. No. Commercial Caterers is paid a management fee. The company pays all expenses and turns over to the department each month all revenue in excess of expenses.

RELATIONS BETWEEN FEDERAL AND QUEBEC EMPLOYMENT SERVICES

Question No. 2,409—Mr. Godin:

Will the Canadian Manpower Centre offices have official relations with the Quebec provincial employment offices?

[Translation]

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The Department of Manpower and Immigration and the Canada Manpower Centres maintain working relations with several departments and agencies of the provincial governments. In Quebec, these working relations are with the Department of Education, the Department of Family and Social Welfare, the Department of Labour, the Eastern Quebec Planning Bureau, and other agencies.

Similar relations are also maintained with the Quebec Provincial Employment Offices as the need arises.

[English]

DISTRIBUTION OF NEW ZEALAND BUTTER

Question No. 2,411—Mr. Godin:

By what Canadian companies will the butter now being imported from New Zealand be distributed, and what was the purchase price of that product?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): The butter will be distributed by the Canadian Dairy Commission to firms in need of supplies at the same price as Canadian butter. It is not considered to be in the interest of the commercial operations of the Canadian Dairy Commission to disclose the price at which this butter was purchased.

Questions

PURCHASE AND DISTRIBUTION OF NEW ZEALAND BUTTER

Question No. 2,416—Mr. Howe (Wellington-Huron):

1. Did the newly established Dairy Commission purchase the 2,240,000 lbs. of butter from New Zealand directly or through an agent and, if through an agent, who was the agent and was he acting on his own behalf or for a Canadian company?

2. Will this butter be brought into Canada duty free and, if not, what is the duty?

3. Will this butter be labelled to indicate that it is imported from New Zealand?

4. Will this butter be sold to the consumer at the same price as Canadian butter?

5. Was this action taken because of the decrease in butter production?

6. Will the government consult with the cream producers before announcing the dairy policy for 1967, in order that this segment of the dairy industry will receive returns equal to all other dairy farmers?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): 1. The butter is being purchased by the Canadian Dairy Commission directly from the New Zealand dairy board.

2. The duty is five cents per pound.

3. The containers in which the butter is imported will carry a New Zealand designation. There is no requirement for it to be so labelled in print form.

4. It will be sold to Canadian wholesalers at the same price as that at which Canadian butter is sold by the agricultural stabilization board.

5. The action was taken to supplement the limited stocks available for sale by the stabilization board to ensure adequate supplies and prevent an escalation of butter prices in the latter part of the winter.

6. Representations with respect to dairy policy are welcomed from any segment of the dairy industry. Cream producers now receive identically the same federal subsidy payment per pound of butterfat as is paid to manufacturing milk shippers.

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS, OROMOCTO, N.B.

Question No. 2,429—Mr. MacRae:

1. Were representations made by any member of the government of the province of New Brunswick to the federal government in the months of May or September, or any other time in the year 1966, relative to elected representation on the board of commissioners of the town of Oromocto?

2. If so, who made such representations?

3. If representations were made, what answer was given by the government?

[Mr. Greene.]

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes.

2. Hon. William Duffie.

3. The matter is under study.

ENCOURAGEMENT TO CANADIANS TO HOLIDAY IN CANADA

Question No. 2,459—Mr. Laniel:

Does the Canadian government travel bureau encourage Canadians to vacation in their own country and, if so, how?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): Increased attention is being given to interprovincial travel promotion to encourage Canadians to see more of their own country. This campaign, called "Know Canada Better", is being actively supported by the travel bureau, the provinces and the transportation companies. In particular, federal matching grants totalling $250,000 for provincial advertising expenditures in Canada, which were provided by the travel bureau in 1966-67, are having a decided impact in stimulating travel by Canadians in Canada. During 1967, it is expected that this travel will be unusually large.

[English]

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

PROCEDURES AT PRISON FOR WOMEN, KINGSTON

Question No. 2,118—Mr. Orlikow:

1. What is the reception procedure for inmates at the prison for women in Kingston?

2. Where do they go after reception and how is this determined?

3. (a) On what basis do inmates go to the new building and (b) are new inmates, particularly first offenders, kept apart from inmates who have a long record?

4. How are behaviour problems met?

5. (a) When is solitary confinement used and (b) in the past three years, how many of the inmates have been given solidtary confinement, and of those given solitary confinement, how many have been on solitary confinement once, twice, three times, more than three times?

6. How long can inmates be held in solitary confinement?

7. Is there a limit on the number of days in a month or a year that an inmate can be held in solitary confinement?

8. What are the physical facilities in solitary?

9. Under what circumstances is the mattress removed?

10. In how many cases have mattresses been removed from the cells of inmates in solitary confinement, and what are the facilities for sleeping when the mattresses are removed?

11. What is the menu in solitary confinement?

12. Under what circumstances is the menu changed in solitary confinement?

13. What provision is made for supervision of those in solitary confinement?

14. Are the senior department officials and prison staff familiar with studies of psychological effects of solitary confinement?

15. Are any provisions made to help persons in solitary confinement to avoid any harmful psychological effects of complete isolation, as is done at Ontario provincial institutions for women, where special efforts are made to maintain close contact with inmates during their short stay in solitary confinement, and, if so, what are they?

16. What treatment facilities are available for inmates who are (a) ill physically (b) ill mentally?

17. (a) Under what conditions are handcuffs used on inmates and (b) in each of the past three years, on how many occasions were handcuffs used on inmates, and in how many cases were handcuffs used on more than one occasion on any inmate?

18. What kind of clothing does an inmate wear for trips outside of the building while still serving sentence i.e., to court, to see a child?

Return tabled.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPLY TO U.S. PROTEST RESPECTING MERCANTILE BANK—SALE OF DRUGS FOR NORTH VIET NAM

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister say whether a reply has been made by the government of Canada to the administration in Washington in connection with the Mercantile Bank? At the same time will he advise whether in that communication or in another a protest is being made by the Canadian government to the United States administration against the tightening of rules in respect of the purchase of drugs, whereby Canadian subsidiary corporations engaged in the drug business have been specifically directed that they must not make any sales of drugs which will find their ultimate home in North Viet Nam?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as far as the first question is concerned, it is expected that the reply in question will be considered and dealt with by the cabinet tomorrow, and I hope it will be delivered to the United States government later in the day or on Wednesday morning.

In reply to the second question, the Minister of Trade and Commerce made a statement on this matter on Friday morning, and in the light of the fact made public by the minister at that time in which he emphasized that Canadian companies, whether subsidiary or otherwise, obey only Canadian laws, and as there is no deposition in Washington to quarrel with that statement, I do not think the circumstances require a protest on the part of this government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister say whether in the two notes received from the United States in connection with the Mercantile Bank matter there was implicit a threat that the proposed acion by the government or parliament of Canada to limit operations of the Mercantile Bank would place the administration of the United States in a position where restrictive or restraining legislation might be introduced in the congress of the United States by way of reprisal?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, of course I cannot state to the house what is in the United States note, especially since no reply has been sent to that note as yet, although I hope it will be tomorrow. The publication of the note and the reply would depend on agreement between the two governments. Of course I cannot give any assurance on what the congress of the United States may or may not do in respect of any legislation introduced into that assembly, but I can assure the house that there is nothing in the position we have taken which would warrant any action of the kind suggested as possible by my right hon. friend. Our attitude in that regard is well known by the government of the United States.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have just one more question. Has the Prime Minister's attention been drawn to a very lengthy article in today's Gazette under the byline of Arch MacKenzie in which it is stated in effect that there is a danger that congress will take this action by way of reprisal?

Mr. Pearson: I have seen that article and I do not propose to comment on it, because we feel there is no situation which would require any action of that kind by the United States congress or the United States government, and we can only hope and expect that no such action will be taken.

VIET NAM—REQUESTS FOR AID TO WAR VICTIMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): In the absence of the Secretary of State for

Inquiries of the Ministry

External Affairs, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Before doing so, may I wonder out loud if the Prime Minister and the cabinet saw the report of the remarks of Mr. Robert Mackenzie to the effect that our question period is much better than that of the British House of Commons.

My question is this. On January 9 I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the Canadian government had received from the Canadian Quakers a request for aid in the shipment of medical supplies to both North and South Viet Nam. I ask now whether that request has been received and what reply has been made.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson(Prime Minister): So far as the first part of the question is concerned, professor Mackenzie lives in London and does not have the privilege of attending this house. I do not know if that might alter his opinion.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs may have received a letter on this point. I will look into it right away.

REQUEST FOR INCREASED AID TO DEVELOPING COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the well deserved tributes being paid these days to the memory of the late Nik Cavell, I wonder if the government would not agree that this would be a good time to make a substantial increase in Canadian contributions to developing countries.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is not one that can be asked now. It should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Knowles: Then may I try to phrase it in a different way Mr. Speaker? Can the Prime Minister say whether any statement will be made to the house during this session as to any increase in aid to developing countries planned by the government?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Perhaps Mr. Speaker, you will permit me to say that I do not believe anyone in the house is in a better position to appreciate the distinguished service of Nik Cavell to his country and to developing countries through external aid than I am. I lament, with other members, his loss.

[Mr. Prittie.]

So far as the second part of the question is concerned, the government increased our external aid very considerably this year. We aim to reach a total of 1 per cent of the national income within a short period of time.

[Later:]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a question supplementary to one I asked earlier this afternoon. Could he arrange for the tabling in the house, either by himself or by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, of a document showing the contributions that add up to the 1 per cent of our national income which the Prime Minister says we will be making by way of external aid this year, or very shortly?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I think the detailed figures of our contributions to external aid during the current year have been made available to the house. If there is anything to be added to what has already been said in the house I shall be glad to put it on the record.

POSSIBLE FORMATION OF FRENCH SPEAKING PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): My question is also directed to the Prime Minister and relates to the proposed visit to Africa by the Prime Minister's parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Mount Royal. I ask the Prime Minister when he expects a parliamentary association will be established for the French language nations, and what nations would comprise it?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I doubt if the question is of an urgent nature, and I suggest the hon. member cannot ask it at this time.

[Later:]

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, I should like to restate my question and hope it will be acceptable. I ask the Prime Minister simply if his parliamentary assistant is in Africa attempting to form a parliamentary association of French speaking nations.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my parliamentary assistant is visiting a number of capitals in French speaking Africa including Dakar and Tunis, where resident Canadian embassies were opened during 1966. This visit will serve to mark Canadian interest in the further development of bilateral relations with French speaking Africa and will, it is hoped, provide opportunities for informal discussions with African leaders regarding the various proposals put forth in recent months for increased contacts amongst the Francophone countries. My parliamentary assistant will, of course, wish to examine on the spot the progress being achieved in the development of the Canadian aid program in these countries.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the Prime Minister's answer can he also tell us whether it is planned for the provinces to participate in the fashion that they participate in the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think this question is acceptable.

FINANCE

MEETING IN BRITAIN OF FINANCE MINISTERS RESPECTING INTEREST RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address my question to the Minister of Finance. It is twofold in nature. Now that the so-called high powered five nation monetary meeting in Britain has concluded with the recommendation that interest rates on international borrowing should be lowered, could the minister state his own policy regarding the decision of this meeting?

Second, in view of the fact that the group of ten, along with the officials of the world monetary conference, begin their sessions tomorrow, can the minister inform the house what will be the policy of Canada at this meeting?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): In reply to the first question asked by the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, Canada has welcomed —and I have said this quite specifically—the recent relaxation of credit stringency that has prevailed throughout the world. I think it would be very much in the interests of the world as a whole, including Canada, if interest rates were to be lowered. This is one of the aims of Canadian policy.

In so far as the second question is concerned, our delegates to the group of ten deputies, which include my deputy and the deputy of the governor of the Bank of Canada, I understand will be concerned mainly with questions of international liquidity. Our position in that respect is as I have publicly stated it in this house and otherwise.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST THAT CHAMPIONSHIP SKI PICTURES BE SHOWN IN INTERIOR B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State of Canada based on an urgent telegram from the mayor of Trail, British Columbia, supported by the mayors of all other cities in the interior of British Columbia. In view of the fact that the national ski team including Miss Nancy Greene will be taking part in the du-Maurier championship events being held at Mount Garibaldi on January 28, 29 and 30, and in view of the fact that pictures of this event will be shown to all British Columbia residents in the coastal area after the eleven o'clock news on these days but not in the interior of British Columbia, will the minister bring this matter to the attention of the appropriate officials of the C.B.C. so that arrangements can be made for this very interesting program to be shown on all interior British Columbia T.V. stations?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

APPEARANCE OF MR. VON THADDEN ON PROGRAM "SUNDAY"

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether the fact that so important and influential a minister as the Minister of National Health and Welfare appeared on the program "Sunday", at the time when Mr. von Thadden also appeared, is any indication of the approval by cabinet of this gentleman's appearance on C.B.C.

Second, was the question of von Thadden being allowed to appear or not appear considered by the C.B.C. board, and did Maxwell Cohen, a distinguished member of that board, approve of von Thadden's appearance?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, my colleague in health and welfare did not ask me for permission, and neither did the C.B.C., to air what I thought was a very entertaining section of the program last night, if my views are important. Nor, I might say, did anyone ask my permission with respect to broadcasting the rest of the program. I do not know whether the matter was considered by the board of the C.B.C., but I shall be happy to direct an inquiry to the management in this regard.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the Secretary of State in a position to indicate what was the response of the C.B.C. to the suggestion of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam that she said a week ago today she would pass on, namely that other spokesmen from Germany might also be aired by the C.B.C. so that we might have a balanced picture of the political scene in that country?

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, that request was conveyed by sending a copy of the daily Hansard to the C.B.C. management. There was no formal response, and I have not had any discussions with the management since then.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO USE OF ELECTRONIC VOTING MACHINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works in his capacity as house leader. It is prompted by recent reports of the public statement of his colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare in connection with voting procedures in this chamber and the desire to bring us all into the twentieth century. In this connection will the house leader advise whether serious consideration is being given to the installation of that twentieth century device, the electronic voting machine?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the question is extremely urgent or requires an urgent answer. I suggest that the hon. member might wish to put the matter on the order paper or perhaps discuss it later in the day, if he so wishes.

Mr. Macquarrie: Ten o'clock, sir.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

PROTESTS RESPECTING B.C. SCHEDULE FOR CENTENNIAL TRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. May I ask him whether he has received telegrams from the Kitimat-Terrace and district labour council and the Kitimat building trades council protesting the schedule of the centennial train through their part of the country. If so, what action did he take with respect to those telegrams?

[Miss LaMarsh.]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I did receive the telegram in question just before lunch. I have made inquiries and I find that the centennial train itinerary in each province was worked out by the centennial commission jointly with the provinces concerned after extensive consultation with both railway companies. In each case the itinerary has received the full approval of the province concerned.

I am also informed that a number of factors had to be taken into account, such as accessibility to as great a population as possible, availability of spur lines on which to park the train, time to be spent in the province, the visit of a caravan to follow in the area, and other considerations. I can only express my own regret that the train is not able to visit all communities in Canada, including that from which the telegram has come, Kitimat, British Columbia.

PORTAGE LA PRAIRIE—AVAILABILITY OF CENTENNIAL TRAIN TO SCHOOL CHILDREN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Enns (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State, and I ask this in connection with the schedule of the centennial train. It is understandable, of course, that in some communities the train will have to be stationed for week ends only. At Portage la Prairie where the train is to spend a Saturday, Sunday and Monday, the community has been told that it will not be available for display on the Monday, and no organized school tours therefore will be possible. Will the Secretary of State please inquire to make certain that the train will have the best possible exposure in our community.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder if it is the wish of the house to have questions asked about the progress of the centennial train across Canada. I suggest to hon. members that they might make representations directly to the minister; or if they feel that the question is particularly urgent though normally it would be ruled out of order at this time, it could be discussed perhaps at ten o'clock.

Mr. Enns: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I accept your ruling readily on the general question, but I have another question which I believe is of wide concern. Must the train be serviced or maintained during school hours, so that children are prevented from touring through it?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I was not aware that it would be closed any day. I thought it would be open seven days a week. I shall be glad to look into the matter and advise the house.

[Translation]

PUBLIC SERVICE

MINES AND ENERGY DEPARTMENT—PROPORTION OF FRENCH SPEAKING EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, may I correct the interpretation of my answer to question No. 2,358 put by the hon. member for Chapleau (Mr. Laprise), who asked:

What is the present number of (a) English speaking (b) French speaking (c) bilingual, civil servants in each division of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources?

My answer must be construed as follows:

There are 2,841 civil servants who say they speak English only; five, French only; and 672, bilingual. It must not be surmised that there are only five French speaking Canadians in my department.

[English]

TRANSPORT

SECOND FERRY BETWEEN NOVA SCOTIA AND NEW ENGLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Since it is obvious now that the existing ferry Bluenose is unable to handle all traffic between Yarmouth and Bar Harbor, has the minister any information to give the house regarding progress in establishing a second ferry between Gloucester and Nova Scotia?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I have the same information that I am sure the hon. gentleman has. I have also read the Halifax Chronicle-Herald.

Mr. Crouse: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I thank the minister for implying that I have as much information about his department as he should have. In view of the importance of this problem to the tourist industry of Nova Scotia and to the Atlantic provinces generally, I ask the minister to study this situation and give the house and members for the Atlantic provinces a report as soon as possible.

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand that the initiative in this matter is coming entirely from the United States. A colleague in the house this morning asked me if I would see a delegation at an early date. I have agreed to do so. After I have seen this delegation I might be more communicative than I can be at this moment.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON SNOW TIRE STUDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): May I ask the Minister of Industry a question. Can he now reply to the question asked by the hon. member for New Westminster on Friday regarding the report of a national research organization on the safety effects of steel studs in snow tires?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): At the behest of and for the Department of National Defence an analysis was made of the effectiveness of steel studs in snow tires. I should be glad to see that a report on the matter is made available to all those who are interested.

BILL OF RIGHTS

RESUMPTION OF PRINTING OF ENGLISH VERSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. In the absence of the hon. lady some time ago, I asked the Prime Minister, considering the continuing heavy demand for copies of the Canadian Bill of Rights, whether he would look into the matter of having it reprinted to meet the demand. He suggested at that time that he would take up the matter with the Secretary of State. Perhaps we might be told what conclusion has been reached.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Some time last summer, I think it was, the supply of copies of the English version of the bill of rights ran out. I was informed of this some weeks afterward. We have been looking at the situation; it would seem to me that the demand should be checked. There was not a very heavy demand for it in the latter part of 1966, but we anticipate that 1967 will stimulate a greater demand. Instructions were therefore given that the document should be reprinted. I have not yet seen a copy; it is not yet off the press, though it should be very shortly.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FINANCE

PROPOSED REDUCTION OF U.S. INVESTMENT IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): I have a question for the Minister of Finance. I would ask the minister whether he is aware of the estimate made by the United States Department of Finance which would seem to indicate a reduction in the year 1967 in the order of $100 million in United States investment in Canada? Is he also aware of less official estimates which predict a reduction of $400 million or $500 million in United States investment in Canada and a corresponding increase in investment in Europe? If the minister is aware of this, does he consider that any extraordinary action on his part is warranted?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): I have seen those estimates. I cannot confirm that the information offered is accurate, but I see no reason arising out of those estimates for the Canadian government to change its present policies.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

INQUIRY AS TO DEFERMENT APPLICATION BY C.B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): May I direct a question to the Secretary of State. A week ago Thursday, I believe, I raised a question of privilege in relation to correspondence between the Candian Broadcasting Corporation and other people having to do with the application of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code. I would inquire whether some comment might be forthcoming in reply to that question of privilege.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am sorry, but the matter was not brought to my attention. I will look into it right away.

[Translation]

SPORTS

REFUSAL OF HOCKEY ASSOCIATION TO SEND TEAMS TO EUROPE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister about the refusal by the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association to recognize two Expo '67 Pee-Wee hockey teams and to authorize them to make a European tour during 1967.

In view of the fact that both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters) have appealed to this sports organization, is the Prime Minister in a position to tell us whether the reply he expects shortly and which he will communicate to the house will be favourable and if not, whether legislative action is contemplated to enable these hockey teams to undertake this European tour?

[English]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): All I can say is that the strong feelings of certain members of this house, both on the government side and on the other side, with regard to this matter have been passed on by the minister and myself to the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association. However, I do not know what official position they will take. I hope this is something which can be done without government intervention.

Mr. Valade: This morning's Montreal Matin said the hockey association had refused to consider the demand of the Prime Minister. In these circumstances would the Prime Minister consider legislation to make this organization more democratic than it is right now?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North.

Mr. Valade: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not think my question is in any way contrary to the rules, and I believe the Prime Minister was ready to give this information in connection with what I believe to be an important matter.

HOCKEY—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO CONTROL OF PLAYERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Arising out of the question asked by my hon. friend with regard to hockey teams, I would ask the Prime Minister whether complaints have been received from the Quebec Aces regarding the present draft system whereby N.H.L. clubs get first choice of Canadian players, and complaining also that Canadian clubs spend millions of dollars training and encouraging boys who are later picked up by American teams.

The request is that there should be a full and complete investigation into the manner of recruiting and control of hockey players, to the end that no monopoly in the United States may have any direction or power over the recruitment of Canadians into Canadian teams. I ask the Prime Minister whether he will look into this and give consideration to an investigation into a matter which is believed by some to be a gross exercise of monopolistic privilege.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): It is my recollection that some consideration was given to this matter a few months ago when the National Hockey League was expanded to take in certain United States cities. At that time the monopolistic aspect of professional hockey was, I believe, examined. But I will be glad to look into this in so far as the government has any authority in the matter, in the light of the right hon. gentleman's question.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SUBMISSION RESPECTING HUNTING AND FISHING RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): My question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The day after he met the Ontario Union of Indians I asked him in the house whether his department was checking a statement made at that meeting to the effect that the United States government did not prosecute Indians who hunted on their own reserves. The minister indicated he would look into this question and answer later. I wonder whether he has done so.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I apologize to the hon. member for not having answered earlier, but I have been out of town. We have now checked with the United States authorities, and we find that the rules with respect to taking migratory game as applied to people on Indian reserves are identical with those which exist in Canada. It is illegal to do so.

UNITED NATIONS

STATEMENT ON RATIFICATION OF INTERNATIONAL COVENANTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): May I take this opportunity to reply to a question asked by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition on Friday last regarding the ratification of the international covenants on human rights. The three covenants which were adopted at the last session of the general assembly were (1) an international covenant on economic, social and cultural rights; (2) an international covenant on civil and political rights; and (3) an optional protocol to the latter covenant concerning the right of petition by individuals for the redress of alleged violations of the rights described in the civil and political covenant.

Basically these covenants are designed to give effect, by means of the binding obligations of international treaties, to the principles embodied in the universal declaration of human rights which was adopted by the general assembly in 1948. They represent a major piece of work by the United Nations and have been under consideration for 14 years.

Their adoption last year by the assembly represented, I believe, a significant step forward by the international community in the field of human rights. Canada voted for the adoption of all three instruments, and over the years during which they have been under consideration we have been privileged to make some constructive contributions to the drafting of those instruments.

A substantial number of the provisions of the covenants fall within provincial jurisdiction, so we are consulting the governments of the provinces in order to obtain their views. This is, I think, an essential step with regard to the implementation of these provisions. In addition we have set up an interdepartmental committee to review the covenants as finally approved last December from the federal point of view to the end of ensuring signature and ratification by Canada at the earliest possible date. However, before the covenants can be submitted to the House of Commons I believe we should consult with the provinces with respect to those provisions which concern the provinces from the standpoint of implementation, and await the report of the interdepartmental committee.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): If I may be allowed to say so, in view of the lengthy statement made by the Prime Minister, I agree with him that these agreements are of far reaching significance and that they represent a distinct step forward in the preservation of fundamental freedoms in all parts of the world.

However, in view of the important decision I think in 1936, when the Privy Council decided that while these undertakings have treaty obligations they do not in any way cause a signatory nation, such as Canada, to be bound in respect of those things that are within provincial jurisdiction, I ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the great importance of the two treaty arrangements and the third protocol arrangement, he would convene a dominion-provincial conference on this question so the provinces, realizing the importance of these treaty obligations, would be prepared, in so far as the treaties themselves are concerned, to accept them as necessary and material to peace in the world?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I think the right hon. gentleman's suggestion might be a very useful one indeed, but I suggest that before a conference is called we could perhaps deal with this matter at the next federal-provincial conference of heads of governments. The provinces then would have a chance to examine the conventions and give us their views in writing, with more consideration than at this time. We have taken that initial step, and I hope that before long we can take the step suggested by the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): As a supplementary question I would ask the Prime Minister whether he would discuss with the provincial governments, and also refer to the interdepartmental committee, the question of whether some of these basic freedoms to which he has referred might be appropriately incorporated into the fundamental law of Canada, which is the constitution of Canada.

Mr. Pearson: That is another question, Mr. Speaker, and it will have to be considered when we have reached the point when we are considering the present constitution, its amendment and revision. Undoubtedly one of the matters to be reviewed at that time will be the role of the federal government in the whole field of external affairs. I would not like to consider that matter in relation to these particular conventions at this time. I would hope it could wait until we get to the general subject of constitutional amendment and revision, and we hope that will not be too long.

NATIONAL PARKS

USE OF EXPROPRIATION TO HALT COURT CASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, in view of the Prime Minister's statement on human rights and civil rights I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, which he can take as notice, with reference to parks. Would he investigate whether his department is now using the law of expropriation to halt cases brought to test his policy on leases? I put this question because it has to do with civil rights and the ownership of property. Is his department now using the law of expropriation to halt cases brought to test his policy on leases in national parks? The particular case I have in mind is the case of Mr. Gourlay.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may wish to place this question on the order paper. I do not see how the hon. member can require an answer urgently.

Mr. Woolliams: With the greatest respect, Mr. Speaker, the security of tenure of land is at stake. By the time I get an answer to a question on the order paper this man's civil rights, putting it mildly, will be sabotaged by the minister and his department. However, if that is your suggestion I would like to debate the question at ten o'clock.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice and ask whether his prospects of being promoted, shall we say, from his present cabinet post, have caused him to lose some interest in matters coming under his jurisdiction, and is that the reason he has not answered several letters of mine?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that I have not lost interest in the Department of Justice or in my work in this house. As to the letters he has referred to, I shall look into them and see that he gets an answer as soon as possible.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

INQUIRY AS TO IMPLEMENTATION BY PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare may I put this question on record. Have any provinces concluded agreements with the federal government to implement the Canada Assistance Plan, which has been on the statute books for about eight months now?

TRANSPORTATION

PROVISION FOR DEFINITION AND IMPLEMENTATION OF NATIONAL POLICY

The house resumed, from Friday, January 20, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-231, to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other acts in consequence thereof, and to enact other consequential provisions—Mr. Pickersgill—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. Clauses 1, 16 as amended, 22 to 28 inclusive, 50, 58, 59 and 74, together with the schedule, have yet to be disposed of by the committee. When the committee rose on Friday last clause 58 was under discussion.

On clause 58.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, when we rose on Friday afternoon we had spent only 10 or 15 minutes on what, within the next two or three hours, will be a last ditch stand made on behalf of the ports of Halifax and Saint John. I am glad to see that the Minister of Finance is in the chamber, because it is money that we will be talking about.

First of all I should like to deal in depth with the amendment moved by the minister on Friday providing for protection or certain clauses that have been long standing on Canadian statutes, going back to 1903, 1911 and 1914. On behalf of those directly associated with the ports of Halifax and Saint John I want to tell the minister that his amendment is not adequate.

Earlier the minister chided me by saying that I spoke from ignorance on matters of transportation. I am prepared to accept that I do. I have never pretended to be an expert on transportation. Anything I say this afternoon will not be born of malice, and if it arises from ignorance I only hope the minister will be kind enough to overlook my very junior position. Despite the assurances the minister gave us two or three weeks ago that the amendment he would move would be adequate, now that we have read it we can see that it is not at all adequate.

• (3:20 p.m.)

I intend to propose a substitute amendment to that of the minister which will have to be dealt with at the proper time and place. The minister's amendment to clauses 58 and 59 states in part:

Nothing in this act except section 334—

We agree with that first part, but we are then hauled up short because of the exception in respect of section 334. Without going into detail let me be brutally honest with the minister by telling him that the reaction in Halifax has been expressed in the form of the question "When do we quit?" The amendment continues:

—shall be construed to affect any obligation imposed upon any railway company subject to the jurisdiction of parliament by any other act or any agreement made pursuant thereto requiring the company

(a) to maintain rates on export traffic—

There is no mention of import traffic. The amendment continues:

—moving through any Canadian seaport located in the "select territory"—

Again I suggest to the minister that the select territory provision does not go far enough so far as those who are most directly involved in Halifax are concerned. The amendment continues:

—as defined by sections 2, 7 and 12 of the Maritime Freight Rates Act at a specified level, or at a level specified in relation to other rates; or

(b) to route export traffic through Canadian seaports.

The minister will have to explain the relationship between (a) and (b) before we will know whether they should be included in our proposed amendment.

There are four areas in which this amendment appears to fall seriously short of our intent. First it fails to mention import traffic but deals only with export traffic. We are not unmindful of the fact that perhaps Canadian dollars and cents are going to foreign countries in subsidization of traffic which—

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Forrestall: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: The purpose of this amendment, as the hon. gentleman properly pointed out, is to maintain the law which now exists and to make sure that it is not touched in any way except in that one respect. I will have a word to say about that later. Does the hon. member know of any statute at all that applies to import traffic? I do not know of any statute that does so.

Mr. Forrestall: The minister is absolutely right. What I am saying is that some concern exists because it does not. Perhaps there is good reason for this not covering import traffic, but I simply ask why it does not, and I hope the minister will provide that answer in a few minutes.

There is an exception in section 334 in relation to export traffic. All it provides is that as long as the rates are compensatory, traffic going to United States ports will be the same as to Saint John and Halifax. That is based on the general position which existed when the statutes were placed on the books in the first 15 or 20 years of this century, or some 45 to 50 years ago. That general proposition may have been valid at that time but it is no longer valid today. The minister knows that in order for the rates to be economically feasible the C.N.R. will have to lower its rates, particularly if it is to adhere to the principle of the bill that is before us. We will refer to that situation at some length.

The third shortcoming of this amendment is its lack of reference to North Atlantic-United States ports. The closest it comes to any reference of that kind is in (b) which states:

(b) to route export traffic through Canadian seaports.

Perhaps that was the intent of the old act, but the most charitable thing that can be said about it is that it is not clear what areas are to be protected or how they are to be protected. As the minister agrees, all we are protecting are the old sections of the act. They are being put in proper context.

Perhaps it would be wise at this point to review them briefly. There are three, the first dating from 1903 and the second from 1911. They can be found in the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the transport and communications committee, at page 2537 in volume No. 37.

These three sections appear in the brief presented by the maritimes transportation commission. The first refers to the agreement with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway company in 1903, which provided that——the through rate on export traffic from the point of origin to the point of destination, shall at no time be greater via Canadian ports than via United States ports.

This was renewed in 1911 by section 13, chapter 6 which refers to the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company. This particular section provided that:

—the through rate on export traffic from the point of origin to the point of destination shall at no time be greater via Canadian ports than via United States ports.

Again we find that chapter 20, acts of 1914, re the Canadian Northern Railway System provided that:

[Mr. Forrestall.]

—the through rate on export traffic from the point of origin to the point of destination shall not be greater via Canadian ports than it would be via United States ports; ... and that the Canadian Northern and the several constituent and subsidiary companies shall not in any manner within its power or control directly or indirectly advise or encourage the transportation of any such freight by routes other than those above provided.

These statutes were valid 50 years ago and, indeed, their concept is not only valid today but absolutely essential to the survival of the ports of Saint John and Halifax. We suggest that by just going that far the job which must be done will not be done.

We intend to deal with the fourth shortcoming of this amendment at some length this afternoon. It is, of course, the fact that there is a restriction as to "select ports" as defined in sections 2, 7 and 12 of the Maritime Freight Rates Act. As the minister well knows, the select area is simply that area which encompasses the two meaningful ports in the maritimes, Halifax and Saint John.

We have all observed the erosion and whittling away of the effects of t he Maritime Freight Rates Act on traffic into and out of those two ports. Halifax no longer enjoys parity with Saint John. It is about time we stopped this game in the maritimes, as someone put it not long ago, of an indigent taking from an indigent to form a greater needy area. What we are doing is taking away from each other, and there is nothing to protect us in this regard. The economy of our area and the ports of Halifax and Saint John depend almost entirely on transportation. The minister does not need to be told this. In no small way this is the basis of the principle upon which we will propose an amendment.

• (3:30 p.m.)

We have heard the arguments about the effect on our secondary manufacturing industry of the national transportation system. We have been told over and over and over again for 150 years how absolutely necessary it has been and is to have an adequate transportation system. In the old days it used to be water; now it is our rail system. On the basis of our rail system, what secondary manufacturing industry we enjoy has survived and grown economically.

The whole basis of this bill seems to be cutting away from that principle. If we are to survive at all economically, if we are to foster and encourage the development of secondary industry, our national transportation system must continue to be a viable instrument of not only national but regional development. It must not die; it must remain. As a matter of fact, it must be something very precious, close and dear to us, particularly during the next 10 or 15 years.

The underlying assumption, I suppose, to set the background in this respect, is that the interests of Canada as a whole demand that there remain in the maritime provinces a substantial number of people who are able and capable of putting their talents and brains to work in the development of secondary industry. If we lose sight of this principle and assumption, and indeed we seem to be heading toward that position now with this new piece of legislation, the federal authority will have to find something else to embrace and make use of to assist the economy of this area.

It has been said recently by meaningful and very responsible people in the maritime area that we have on the one hand the federal authority, through the Atlantic Development Board, pouring millions and millions of dollars into the development of the Atlantic economy, the study of methods of development, the encouragement through certain services of industrial parks and so on, the area incentive program under which God only knows how much money is being spent in the maritimes, and then we depart from that principle in respect of the one thing that is absolutely necessary—as a matter of fact, it is the only thing that is absolutely necessary—to the orderly and economic development of secondary manufacturing. I refer to rail transportation. We come along with this measure and cut the ground out from under that orderly and economic development.

It is not enough to stand here today and make these remarks without suggesting improvements in this area. We now understand that the special study has been completed and should be in the minister's hands very soon, much sooner than we anticipated. Perhaps the minister could shed more light on that subject. We thought this study would be handed down some time next month and placed before us. The study might clarify many of the doubts in our minds. However, I expect we will wait considerably longer before receiving it. I say again that it is not enough for us to accept what might be in eight, ten months' or a year's time a very profitable position for us to adopt. I believe these principles have to be built in and safeguarded in the bill itself. They should be built in in terms of positive and very clear statements.

In case the minister has not bothered to look at the shipping tonnages recently, it is rather interesting to note the figures for Halifax, Saint John, Montreal, and Quebec. They show what has happened to foreign traffic coming into Canada in the last ten years. I will not go through all the statistics but just refer to seven or eight years. I take first the 1957-58 shipping season. I am taking the total of the eight winter months for those two years. I have included December because it is a part month, as is March, but essentially the months are January, February, March and December. In the 1957-58 season Halifax and Saint John enjoyed 1,627,000 tons of shipping. In that same four-month period covering December, January, February and March, Montreal and Quebec enjoyed 309,000 tons, every last ounce of which was handled in the first ten days of December and the last ten days of March.

I should now like to quote the figures for the 1961, 1963 and 1964 shipping seasons, the same eight months. They are for general tonnage and do not include petroleum, wheat or anything like that. They refer to general cargo, which is the only type of cargo meaningful to our economy, in terms of dollar impact. The ports of Halifax and Saint John handled 1,437,000 tons of cargo. That figure is down 200,000 tons. What do we see in regard to Montreal and Quebec? We see a rise from 309,000 tons to over 518,000 tons. In 1965-66, taking those eight months, Halifax and Saint John dropped off to 1,377,000 tons while Montreal and Quebec went up to 648,000 tons. The minister knows the 1966 figures. I think there has been more traffic in and out of the port of Montreal in the last six weeks than has been in and out of both the ports of Halifax and Saint John in the last two years. There is no work on our waterfront.

But look at the position of Montreal and Quebec. Go back 100 years. At that time there was no traffic in and out of the ports of Montreal and Quebec, absolutely none. But in 1966, in the period I have quoted, 233 foreign-going ships cleared the port of Montreal. And these figures are already two weeks old. How many have been in and out since then? I cite these figures because they show so dramatically what has happened. Traffic is not coming to the port of Halifax; it is going to the ports of Montreal and Quebec.

There is good reason for this and it is an understandable one. Perhaps because of my very junior and ignorant position in the house I have never been in a position where I could criticize the minister or the government about winter navigation on the St. Lawrence river. However, I do not believe criticism is necessarily the proper attitude. Indeed, I could go much further and ask the minister to give us a few dollars so that we may convert the port of Halifax to deep water shipping. There is need right now for positive planning in this regard. It has been done in connection with the Delaware estuary running into Maryland, where it was found that for a piddling $200 million ships could be moved into that area. The government does not necessarily have to assign an icebreaker to the port of Halifax. If they wanted to they could put a crew in there with picks and shovels to keep the slush out. They could make it a free port up to the lakehead if they wished. But we should get something in return, and quickly. I do not want to go into these other points in any detail, but I draw these matters to the attention of the minister for his consideration.

• (3:40 p.m.)

The amendment I have before me is not typed but I have many amendments in front of me which I propose to move one at a time. I will start with the least line of resistance. A little later I will move an amendment along these general lines. It reads as follows:

> Notwithstanding anything contained in this or any other act, rail rates (to and from shipside) on export and import traffic to or from eastern ports, as defined in section 329A of this act, from or to the points of origin or destination shall at no time be greater via any such Canadian port than via any other such Canadian port or via United States north Atlantic ports.

We do not intend to move this amendment lightly. The minister grins. I should like to ask him whether in commenting on the amendment he could suggest what else can be done in order to save the ports of Halifax and Saint John. Unless the government expends money to re-equip these ports, and particularly to equip the port of Halifax for the advent of the deep-water mammoth ships about which people, are talking these days, unless the minister has something he can suggest and is prepared to do immediately, then some action in the nature of the amendment which I read will have to be seriously considered.

No less an authority than Mr. Mingo, who for a long time has been chairman of the port of Halifax commission and who does not pretend to be an expert on rail rates, port parity or port structures—and since he does not share my particular political pursuasion I can quote him as being an objective authority—has said that unless something is done now the end is in sight for the ports of Halifax and Saint John. The minister was good enough to stand this section, and we took his amendment home to Halifax to let the people there see it because they are the ones who are concerned. The opinion which was voiced there was that the amendment did not do anything. If that is all we are going to get we might as well give up. Indeed, I think the minister probably heard Mr. Mingo's opinion when he was in Halifax on the annual ports day.

Mr. Mingo in his address to that august gathering of shipping people from Halifax and Saint John suggested that indeed it is perhaps time that the minister and the government gave consideration to the establishment of a board, either within the present context of the new transportation commission or outside it. He did not elaborate on the suggestion but he made it quite plain that unless a board composed of people living in the area who have dealt with rail and water transportation over the years is established, all we will be doing is treading water. I suggest that treading water in any field is tantamount to becoming stagnant and in fact going backwards. The minister is very much aware of these points.

The other things that come immediately to mind are so obvious that they do not need repeating at this time so I will not go into them in any depth. The minister is aware of the fact that the unemployment situation in the maritimes is very serious at present. The figures which were published on January 15 showed that the national average is 4.5 or 4.6 per cent while the figure for the maritimes is 10.7 per cent. One does not have to spell out the effects resulting from the loss of winter traffic, the loss to longshoremen, ship brokers and stevedoring companies and the loss to the port of Halifax in fees and costs. One does not have to point out the urgency of correcting this situation before it hits rock bottom. I suggest that we are close to rock bottom and the only way to avoid reaching it is to move meaningfully in the direction of an adequate port parity structure which would involve not only the ports of Halifax and Saint John but also the United States north Atlantic ports and all the ports up to and including Montreal.

We realize that this will cost the government a lot of money and we are not making suggestions without being aware of the effects they might have. Somehow or other we have to create an atmosphere in which we can keep people in the maritimes, in which we can keep their intelligence and their brains at home. We must keep our labour pools fluid and accessible to new industry which might want to come in. The only way in which we can do so is through transportation. It surprises me, now that we are discussing port parity, to see so few people here from the maritimes. Perhaps they are not interested. Perhaps the minister has made sure that they are not too far away and possibly during the course of the afternoon they may come in and contribute in a small way toward making the minister a little more pliant than he appears to be. We would welcome any comments he might have.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, may I be permitted to raise a point of order which may contribute to the orderly consideration of the balance of the amendments that are before us, particularly amendments to clause 50. Does the minister propose to move any more amendments to the clauses that have been stood, and particularly to clause 50 with regard to repairing the damage which was done to the definition of grain and ports under section 329, so that we may know what amendments, if any, he intends to move? I think this would assist the committee in dealing with these clauses as we come to them.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not believe, sir, it would be proper for me to interrupt the discussion now to do more than say that I did indicate an amendment I would like to make to clause 16. A similar amendment would be required to clause 1. The other day I indicated that my disposition would be to go ahead with that, and that with respect to the definition of grain rates and other related matters I hope to be in a position when we have disposed of this matter now before us to move an amendment to clause 74 which I think would deal with the problem.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I should like to support the hon. member for Halifax. I have a few thoughts I want to put on the record which will bring the matter up to date so far as I am concerned. I could speak at length but I feel that a quick review will give the minister an idea of how serious I at least think this matter is. Perhaps after he has replied we can then decide whether it is going to be necessary to indulge in a serious and lengthy debate on this subject.

First of all, I want to compliment the hon. member for Halifax upon the work he has done on this clause. I think it is commendable that a newer member has taken this interest and has made himself quite knowledgeable on the subject. I believe he has devised an amendment that expresses the feeling of everyone in Saint John and Halifax, if not in the whole of both of those provinces. I know that this week end the hon. member for Halifax made the arduous journey to Halifax in order to secure first hand information. I hope the minister realizes that anything the previous speaker put forward was from the horse's mouth, so to speak, in so far as this matter is concerned.

The history of this subject is quite well known and it goes back to confederation. I am not going to bore the committee with quotations from all the speeches that were made at the time guarantees were given to New Brunswick and Nova Scotia concerning ports and other matters when they joined confederation. We were located away off on the edge of the Atlantic ocean, far from the source of activities in the main hinterland. Over a period of time from about the turn of the century a port parity structure was built up by which the eastern ports were guaranteed that export and import rates would be maintained at parity with rates to United States ports. This fact is acknowledged in many of the statutes, but I realize it is not possible to find a specific reference to it in the Railway Act.

A moment ago the minister asked the hon. member to give the reference to port parity in the Railway Act. The minister asked if the hon. member had any further knowledge of these guarantees. I suggest that the onus is on the minister in this regard. He is the one who is introducing this bill which is taking something from the ports which they enjoyed at a bad time in their history and which we understood was a solemn confederation promise. These guarantees are in some of the statutes of Canada, but I will not put them on the record now.

The Maritime Transportation Commission presented a brief on Bill No. C-231 to the standing committee. The commission was worried about the new cost oriented scheme of rate structure. I know the minister does not like that phrase but this is what we are faced with, a cost oriented scheme. Perhaps it is based on a recommendation of the MacPherson commission, but the scheme takes away the old equalization rates. We know this is going to be detrimental to us and will put the maritime ports at a disadvantage in relation to other ports.

If one can give an example of how easily one can be fooled, during the committee hearings I had assumed in my naïveté that the statement of the minister and others that there would not be any change was true. I asked Mr. Craig Dickson of the Maritime Transportation Commission a question on this subject. It is recorded at page 2501 of committee proceedings No. 37 as follows:

> There has not been any indication yet of readjustments?

Mr. Dickson replied:

> Well, yes there has, Mr. Bell, although I want to be fair to the railways.

Perhaps I should put the whole paragraph on the record in order to be fair and because it explains the situation better than I could.

> I think in instances up until this year at least, they had been quite fair in attempting to maintain this parity rate structure. We have had rates adjusted to Halifax and Saint John to equal the rates to New York or other American ports when we could show them there was traffic to move.
>
> There have been instances in those negotiations where the railways have put this qualification on it: We are prepared to publish rates to Halifax and Saint John the same as to New York provided they cover our costs.

This is a reference to the old compensatory rate that was in section 120 and has been redrafted almost exactly in section 231.

> I cannot think of an example at the moment where they said it did not cover costs, but there have been some, I think, that were rather questionable. Oh yes, there was an ore movement, I believe, from down around the Niagara Falls area, where the cost of handling this via the maritime ports was not sufficient, the railways alleged, to cover their cost and they could not meet the competition of the United States ports. We rather fear from several recent developments that there may be a move to get away more and more from this parity rate structure.

Whether we like it or not, this matter has been taken out of the position in which it was under the old act and is now within the discretion of the railways. This has nothing to do with the Maritime Freight Rates Act. These rates are now at the discretion of the railway. I believe all maritime members should stand in complete unity on this subject. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough knows a great deal about the problem of freight rates in the maritimes. I know he agrees that the Maritime Freight Rates Act is not working very well. I believe there is still some value in the act but from what I have read I understand the hon. member feels there is no value in it. However, neither of us likes the way the Maritime Freight Rates Act is working now, although he may be more discouraged than I am. I would be interested in hearing what he has to say about the matter of parity for Halifax and Saint John.

[Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert).]

Another matter of importance is the subject of winter navigation. I am not going into the whole history. We know there has been progress, but the figures placed on the record by the hon. member for Halifax concerning the movement this year are very disturbing. On Friday we learned that the Department of Transport is instituting a five-year study of winter navigation.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to make a correction. I think the hon. gentleman misconstrued, and perhaps he was right in misconstruing, what I said. There is to be a study of the ship channel in the St. Lawrence but it has nothing to do directly with winter navigation. It has to do with navigation. The channel through Lake St. Peter is not satisfactory for the volume of navigation there is in the summertime, and this is the reason for the institution of this study. It is not primarily or directly related to winter navigation but to navigation itself.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I appreciate the minister's explanation. This shows the problem we have always had in regard to exaggerated stories about what is taking place on the St. Lawrence. However, I think the minister should know that the heading in the Montreal Star on Saturday was "Ice Study Under Way", and the first paragraph of the story read:

> The federal government has embarked upon a five-year study of ice conditions which could lead to a new era of year-round navigation on the St. Lawrence River.

So this is what we are up against, Mr. Chairman. Timing is all important, and this is why we feel so strongly about the matter.

In addition, further inroads are being made by way of containerization. Everyone in the transportation business knows how this is going to revoltionize port activity and the transportation of goods. I believe that if we do not move quickly on this matter in regard to the eastern ports of Canada we are going to lose a lot of business to New York. Owing to mass production and other economies the port of New York is in a better financial position to modernize its facilities and institute containerization right away. We are all aware of the fight we have had for many years to compete with Portland in Maine. The C.N.R. have full facilities there and we lose a lot of business to that port. We do not want to see this problem resuscitated.

I hope that when the minister replies he will be able to give us some further information in this regard. I should like to ask him whether he pointed out to the officials who framed the bill how important this matter is to us, and how carefully they considered this amendment. Did these officials search through the files and examine previous decisions of the board and the like? Did the minister charge them with the importance of this matter?

I hope that in a matter so important to the maritimes the officials did not say: "Let us get through with the big part of the bill which affects the west so that we can ride along with that, and the maritimes part will be tagged on. We will hope that everyone will then be tired and fed up with the bill, so we will stick a few words in one of the clauses to make them feel happy".

This feeling has caught on in the maritimes, Mr. Chairman, and the minister is not going to be very popular in that area. He did have a pretty good image but lately it has begun to suffer. For example, this is one of the newspaper headlines: "Mr. Pickersgill Looks At Us Through Rose Coloured glasses".

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman would like me to use blue ones, I suppose.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I certainly think the glasses the minister is looking through are becoming a bit tinted and that he is being too optimistic. He is being too much of a Pollyanna, I think the phrase is, in looking at our future through rose tinted glasses. I have another report here reading in part, "They are having another gay party on the St. Lawrence with icebreaking and we are picking up the tab".

This is the point, Mr. Chairman. It is not so much that the maritimes are against progress but that we are paying part of the price to bring about our own funeral. In all the talk about progress and moving ahead the significant factor is that we are paying our share. The seaway cost $500 million or more and a formula was established by which it would pay for itself within a few years. It was the seaway that was the beginning of our downfall. It took business further inland and yet it is not even beginning to pay. So far the minister has taken a hard line on tolls and I hope he will continue to do so; he will certainly have my support. But in all this progress the poor old maritimes are paying their share.

Let me end with this quotation. I have put this statement on the record before, but it does give the minister an illustration of the classic problem that we are up against. It is a statement made by a shipping official in Quebec, taken from the Ottawa Journal for December 22, 1966. This official is promoting shipping activity at Quebec and says that the government should do more icebreaking in that area. He goes on:

> They have to think about the voters in the maritimes too. But the fact is that this discouraging policy hurts the whole country, not only Quebec. Ships that do not come to Quebec and Montreal do not always go to Saint John or Halifax. They may just as well go to New York.

Then he goes on to say:

> Newsprint, for example, loaded in Saint John costs $14 more a ton than it does loaded in Quebec.

The two points that I am making are contained in that statement. I do not blame this fellow for trying to promote activity in his own port because that is what he is paid to do, but this is a classic example. Newsprint costs $14 a ton more going through Saint John than if it were loaded at Quebec, and even then some business might not go through the St. Lawrence but instead go down to New York. Why do we have a freight rate structure in Canada, Mr. Chairman? We came into confederation because we wanted parity of treatment with the ports in the United States and along the St. Lawrence. It is that simple.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I believe it was the Secretary of State who moved the amendment which is now before the committee, and the hon. lady is not here at the present time. However, I am sure she would agree if she were here that I should substitute a new amendment. If it is agreeable to the committee I should like to substitute for the amendment that she moved another amendment which I am sure the Minister of Fisheries would be very glad to move. I pick the Minister of Fisheries deliberately in this context because of his province. I should like to strike out of the previous amendment the exception relating to the proposed section 334. This amendment would mean that instead of the amendment that has been moved reading as it did the other day, it would read:

> Nothing in this act shall be construed to affect any obligation imposed upon any railway company.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, whether or not a rate was compensatory it would remain the law if it is in the law now.

I may say that I am willing to do this the more readily because I am going to propose an amendment to clause 74 which would make it possible, if a rate is not compensatory, for the railways to make representations to the commission, and it would enable the commission, if it so wished, to recommend to the Governor in Council that the loss be paid out of the treasury.

There seems to be no reason whatever for making this exception. The hon. member for Halifax indicated that this exception could conceivably be a very serious gap in the protection offered. If the exception is taken out then there can be no such gap. In other words, instead of having to get somebody, after the amendment has been adopted, to move another amendment to that amendment, I think it would save the time of the committee if we had unanimous consent to substitute this new amendment for the one now before the committee, if that course is agreeable to the committee.

Mr. Robichaud: I would so move, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether hon. members want the amendment read. There is only the one change in it and that is that these words to which I have referred are struck out. May we deem the amendment to have been moved?

• (4:10 p.m.)

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that the hon. minister may substitute this amendment for the other amendment presented on Friday by the Secretary of State?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment, as I explained originally is to ensure that every statutory protection that exists in the law of Canada at the present time to provide for specific rates, parity in rates or the routing of traffic through the ports of Halifax and Saint John shall remain in force notwithstanding anything in this bill.

The hon. member for Halifax properly said earlier this afternoon that some of these rates which might at one time have been compensatory might conceivably be argued to be not compensatory now and we might therefore be eroding this protection. Hon. members can tell that I thought the same way the hon. member thought because I anticipated his objection and had this mimeographed copy of the amendment ready. I confess that I woke in the middle of the night, the night after I moved this amendment, and began thinking about it. I thought what I really should have said is, "notwithstanding section 334" instead of having made the exception. When I talked about this with the law officer advising me he said, "You know, there is a much simpler way to do it and that is to strike the words out". In any event it seems to me that there can be no doubt whatever that everything that is now in the law protecting those ports will remain in the law. This amendment will remove any possible doubt.

The hon. member for Saint John-Albert asked whether I had asked the law officers of my department to check the law, to ascertain what the various laws having to do with the matter were. I think it would have been much better if we had been able to spell all of them out. The hon. member also rightly said that some of these laws have been interpreted by the courts. It is very easy, if you try to specify these things and you do not know for sure what all of them are, to leave something out. A compilation is being made. All the law is being thoroughly searched at the present time, and this search has been going on for several months. It involves searching a great proportion of all the statutes of Canada enacted since confederation and many legal decisions.

To be absolutely sure that nothing is left out, if we say that everything that is part of the law of Canada remains the law of Canada there can be no danger of any kind of mistake. As soon as this compilation has been completed I intend to make it available to hon. members and other interested parties for their information and to bring it to the attention of the new commission as soon as possible so that it may have an opportunity to peruse it.

I do not think hon. members will expect me to say anything more about winter navigation on the St. Lawrence than has been said already. It is a subject on which there are continuing differences of view. I can only commend the very reasonable and sensible attitude taken by the hon. members for Halifax and Saint John-Albert. They do not believe, if navigation during winter becomes technically feasible, that it can be stopped by law. They do not expect it to be, and I am sure all reasonable people take this view. That does not mean, of course, that we should not do everything possible to maximize traffic through the ports of Saint John and Halifax and other eastern ports where we can maximize traffic.

Though this is strictly not relevant to the clause, I wish to reiterate the position I have taken. Since I have been Minister of Transport the National Harbours Board has been given tangible evidence of my disposition, because I am the minister who has to take responsibility for its budget. My position has been that in every instance where we have had any sound reason to believe that improvements either to the port of Halifax or the port of Saint John would result in increased traffic or would attract more traffic—and sometimes it was a bit of a gamble—we have been willing to go ahead with those improvements, and considerable improvements have been made and are being made in both ports. Some of the most notable improvements in both ports have been to the grain handling facilities and to the facilities for handling general cargo.

I assure the hon. member for Halifax that as long as I am Minister of Transport—and I believe this will be the attitude of any government—if there is any reasonable prospect, and I believe there is, that the new superships will come into service and if, with the proper facilities, they can use the port of Halifax which perhaps is the only port on the east coast with sufficient depth of water and other conditions to make it possible for these ships to be used, the facilities will be put there. They can be built faster than the ships. I do not think we can have any doubts that these developments will take place as rapidly as possible.

With respect to the point raised by the hon. gentleman about imports, quite frankly I know of no statute that now protects anything having to do with import traffic. I know of no statutory requirement—and it is rather difficult to see how one would do what the hon. member has suggested—which gives statutory protection to import traffic. I would hesitate to import the word "import" into the law, if I might make an inexcusable pun, without considering carefully what its real effect might be.

I think that the suggested amendment, which I am glad was not moved, of the hon. member for Halifax might raise difficulties. I think the committee would find it difficult to understand its import correctly. It reads:

> Notwithstanding anything contained in this or any other act, rail rates (to and from shipside) on export and import traffic to or from eastern ports, as defined in section 329A of this act, from or to the point of origin or destination shall at no time be greater via any such Canadian port than via any other such Canadian port or via United States north Atlantic ports.

• (4:20 p.m.)

I do not know precisely what the effect of this proposed amendment would be but my guess is that the freight rate from, say, Ottawa to Montreal would also be the freight rate from Ottawa to Halifax. Of course, that has never been the situation at any time in the history of Canada. We would be saying in effect that any advantage as far as location is concerned would be destroyed by legislative action. We would be saying that the people of Canada generally must pay the cost, because the railways, obviously, could not bear these costs. The hon. gentleman himself has suggested they would be substantial. The taxpayers would have to pay the additional cost of carrying to Halifax goods which anyone wanted to send through the port of Halifax, notwithstanding the fact that all this money could be saved by shipping them through Montreal. I really think this would be going far beyond anything which it would be reasonable to ask the Canadian taxpayer to bear, no matter how strongly any hon. member favoured his own community.

If one happened to represent Montreal instead of Halifax, would it be argued that any shipper who wished to ship goods from Amherst could direct that they be shipped at the same rate via Montreal instead of via Halifax, or from Yarmouth? That would be importing the same kind of principle.

Mr. Forrestall: That is going to the extreme.

Mr. Pickersgill: My whole point is that the amendment, if it means what I think it does, does go to the extreme, and I do not think you could possibly expect parliament to legislate to that extreme. It is another matter to say that the rate from any place outside the select territory to any place inside the select territory should bear some relation to rates to United States ports, because there will be comparable distances—

Mr. Forrestall: That is the major part of our contention.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is the next point I should like to deal with. I have a feeling that we are unlikely in this committee to be able to patch up the situation without the benefit of the studies which are now going on in this field. The hon. gentleman is right in saying I am hopeful the results of the study on Atlantic transportation will be to hand some time in March, maybe in February. It would not, I think, be very profitable for us to do a little patchwork and try to change the law as it now stands. We could not be sure we were accomplishing anything very substantial, because we do not really have much evidence that there is a significant amount of traffic through New England ports, or New York, which would be likely to go through Saint John or Halifax. I think it is vitally important that we preserve the law as it now is so that there is no erosion on any kind, and that is why I asked my colleague the Minister of Fisheries to move the amendment to which I have referred. But I do think it would be very much better to deal with this question in a thoroughgoing manner on the basis of the study than to attempt a little piece of patchwork at this stage.

I am very happy indeed to make the vital amendment for which the hon. member for Halifax has asked. I am also happy to undertake to put forward the other amendments to which I have referred, the amendments to clause 1 and clause 16. I feel these amendments go a good deal of the way toward meeting the situation he has in mind. I refer to "an undue obstacle to the movement of commodities through Canadian ports", and the inclusion of this principle as one of the principles of the legislation for the guidance of the commission and of the government in working out the policies which will be laid down, I hope, in 1968. I say "in 1968" because I do not want to hold out false hopes; I do not think we will get legislation ready in the autumn of this year, because after we get the results of the study it seems to me there must be an opportunity for hearings and for public debate. But I sincerely hope we shall have legislation on a fairly large scale in 1968, not dealing exclusively with freight rates but with the whole of the transport complex of the Atlantic provinces.

Having regard to the statement of principle in clause 1 and clause 16, and in the knowledge that the transportation study is virtually completed and that action to deal with Atlantic transport generally will be the next big job of whoever is Minister of Transport—I hope there will not be a sudden change—I hope the hon. member will not feel it is necessary to divide the committee on any further amendment.

Mr. Robichaud: Before this amendment is carried may I rise on a point of order? The amendment referred to by the Minister of Transport is the amendment reported at page 12053 of Hansard for January 20 and moved by the Postmaster General. May I say I have been authorized by the Postmaster General to ask leave to withdraw the amendment he introduced on Friday last and replace it by the amendment which I moved a few moments ago?

The Deputy Chairman: Is it unanimously agreed that the amendment which was moved by the Postmaster General be withdrawn?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it unanimously agreed to consider in substitution for that amendment the amendment now before the committee which was moved by the Minister of Fisheries?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Before we discuss the substance of the amendment I wish to complete the record in connection with this subject of ice-breaking, because our position is misunderstood by many people. The question in the minds of many people in the maritimes is not whether they accept the inevitability of winter navigation. They are concerned about the fact that, according to the minister the other day, it will cost $100 million.

Mr. Pickersgill: That was just a guess.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I appreciate that, but the hon. member for Halifax and I do not wish to be misunderstood. We are completely opposed to winter navigation, though we accept that moves are being made toward it. But in the light of the tremendous cost involved, we want to know what is to be the quid pro quo for Halifax and Saint John. I do not wish to provoke a debate on the subject. I want to explain our position.

• (4:30 p.m.)

As to what the minister said about new facilities for Saint John, we need better facilities but what is the use of them when the traffic is drastically dwindling. That is why we are hoping to get something a little more than we had. I am glad the minister threw out that horrible abortion of Friday which we said at the time we did not feel he was really serious about. He has thought about it over the week end and has come up with something better. At least everything that we had previously will still be given to us under this new amendment. I had hoped for something a little more definite but we are glad that the week end helped.

Mr. Pickersgill: The week end weakened me.

Mr. Forrestall: I join with the hon. member for Saint John-Albert in thanking the minister for taking out what was referred to as an abortion. He has now dealt with two of the four shortcomings that we saw in the amendment.

I accept the minister's position on import traffic. In effect we would be subsidizing people in any of 150 countries, and Canadian funds can be used for a better purpose than that. Therefore I am content to remove that part from my suggested amendment but not for the reason that the minister spoke of, namely, that it is not dealt with in any present statute. Just because it has not been dealt with by statute previously is no reason why at this stage of our development, when we are 100 years and some 23 days old—

Mr. Pickersgill: We don't become 100 years old until July.

Mr. Forrestall: Anyway, the minister knows our position in Halifax. The special transportation study is almost completed. It will require detailed consideration by the department and the government, and in addition representatives of the area and of industry there will need an opportunity to express their views on it.

I feel strongly about the necessity to extend the select area. As the hon. member for Saint John-Albert has pointed out, the parity structure of Saint John and Halifax has been so whittled away that, for example, the largest mover of newsprint has stopped picking it up in Halifax and is taking delivery at Saint John. This makes economic sense but we must maintain the principle of creating an atmosphere in which people can still live in the maritimes.

We have been told by the Economic Council of Canada and other bodies which have examined maritime problems that our future, particularly in Nova Scotia, will be based on secondary industry. Progress has been made in that direction in recent years, aided by successive governments, but we need to do a little more if we are to keep the maritimes in the Canadian picture. We are so far behind because of distance, geography and, I suppose, history that there is no way we can catch up and so drastic measures are required.

I am sure everybody in Halifax will welcome the minister's assurance that the government can move quicker to provide the facilities to accommodate the new super ships than those ships can be built. I would hope this could extend to the concept of the integral train and all the problems involved as between privately owned rolling stock and our old transportation system equipment. We need to keep the ports of Halifax and Saint John alive but the amendment which the minister has moved today will not accomplish that. They are still going downhill.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the hon. gentleman will admit that a year ago the government put an item in the estimates, which is now included in this bill under new section 329A, that underwrites the reduced rates that the Board of Transport Commissioners said were too low for wheat and flour going through the Atlantic ports. Those rates are safeguarded for good in this legislation. In a sense those are the only new rates that are being established by this legislation.

Mr. Forrestall: I appreciate that. We welcome it as something absolutely necessary, but who in the name of all that is holy is going to ship flour from the port of Halifax when it can be shipped from Saint John?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. gentleman will find that a good deal will be shipped from Halifax.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Forrestall: That is excellent, but it is a bulk commodity like oil and gypsum which do not provide much employment at the port. We must attract the type of business that will sustain the stevedoring companies which employ hundreds and hundreds of men. Perhaps it is not a matter of particular concern, but I have had a card entitling me to work on the waterfront in Halifax for many years. There are only 15 or 20 men as young as I who have card numbers lower than mine. My card number is 9,060.

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope the hon. gentleman is not doing any moonlighting on his week ends.

Mr. Forrestall: No. I am not like the minister who can find time to lie in bed and think up amendments to earlier amendments. Perhaps we should encourage him to do that.

The whole concept of our waterfront industry has changed in the last three or four years. At one time a great number of stevedores came from the ports of Montreal and Quebec to work in Halifax. They not only earned money there but spent it in that community for rent, food, clothing and other things that longshoremen enjoy. As was pointed out once, in the fraternity of spirit of Sir John A. they spend money. These men no longer come to Halifax because work is not available.

Tonnage statistics still show that the volume of traffic is being maintained. This is true because of the bulk shipment of wheat, gypsum and oil. General cargo traffic, on the other hand, is dropping off to practically nothing. Hundreds and hundreds of jobs are being eliminated. This is becoming a serious problem as indicated by the fact that the maritimes now have 10.5 per cent of their workers unemployed. Even in the minister's own province the unemployment situation is not as bad as it is in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

We must have new and drastic action. Perhaps we should extend the select territory, although I realize this would be costly and would involve many ramifications.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit a question? I do not understand what he means by extending the select territory.

Mr. Forrestall: To use the terminology of section 329A, perhaps there could be some parity of ports including the three eastern ports and Montreal. It is understandable that this would involve a tremendous subsidy, but unless there is some form of parity in relation to the select territory nothing is going to change in respect of the movement of traffic. We suggest that the next step should be taken. We might be assured if the minister would say that in two years' time following the special study something will be done regarding a viable port parity structure to assist the ports of Halifax and Saint John. Perhaps we could be assured that if nothing appears in the report following the special study in this regard the government will take some action.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am certainly prepared to undertake that if this subject is not dealt with adequately during the special study, and I feel sure it will be, it will be one of the first subjects the research side of the new commission will be specifically asked to look at.

We have made great investments in the ports of Halifax and Saint John, a great deal of which is of recent origin, and we intend to put those ports to maximum use. I have no hesitation in assuring the hon. gentleman and the committee that if perchance this subject does not appear to be dealt with adequately in the transportation study the research side of the new commission will be asked to undertake this as one of its first and most urgent tasks.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

Mr. Nowlan: I am sure the minister's last remarks will shorten the length of my remarks. I am particularly concerned about the situation referred to by the hon. member for Halifax because, although I am not from a seaport, I represent a part of an eastern province. I hope the minister will give consideration to the suggestion of the hon. member for Halifax, even though it may involve tremendous ramifications in respect of export and import traffic. Surely the fact that the minister proposed one thing in the house on Friday to eliminate an abortion, a phrase which has been used in the connotation of a pun, and has suggested something quite contradictory on Monday is an indication that serious consideration should be given to this subject.

So far as the suggestion about the operation of icebreakers in the St. Lawrence Seaway is concerned, I agree with the minister that we cannot legislate against the use of icebreakers. I am sure the people in the eastern provinces are aware of that fact. On the other hand, the two main ports in the maritimes can be assisted by legislation. While we cannot restrict the economic use of the ports of Montreal and Quebec, we can certainly help the ports of Saint John and Halifax by taking the bold step of bringing the ports of Montreal and Quebec under the port parity concept. I do not think any discrimination would result from the inclusion of the ports of Montreal and Quebec within the port parity formula.

There may be no specific reference to this formula in many acts but the formula is to some extent in practice. By including the ports of Montreal and Quebec perhaps the two eastern ports could take advantage of the benefits provided through increased facilities by the National Harbours Board. This would also remove the handicaps suffered at the present time by the two eastern ports.

• (4:50 p.m.)

We are very pleased with the assurance given by the minister that if this subject is not dealt with by the transportation commission it will be looked into by the research branch of the new commission. Certain people in the east have had doubts whether this matter would be investigated adequately. From what the minister has said in the house in the last few days, and certainly from what he said today, I know that he is very much aware of this problem. The minister is aware of it, although perhaps other hon. members cannot understand why there is such anguish and consternation over this clause. It seems fairly harmless on the face of it. In effect, in a small way this particular clause, especially as it was worded on Friday, is as important to the ports of Saint John and Halifax as the Crowsnest pass clause was to the west. I may be making more of an analogy here than I made a few days ago when attempting to write very euphemistic phrases to put into the legislation with respect to the Maritime Freight Rates Act. I admit the handicap under which I was suffering in putting my intention into legislation.

We wish that the draftsmen had exercised themselves earlier and suggested to the minister what was suggested today. We could have just deleted the freeze altogether and have had no freeze at all for two years rather having the freeze to continue until the transport study has been made and the government is ready to move in this respect. But that is the question for yesterday. The question for today is of as much concern to these ports, and therefore to the two provinces concerned, as the Crowsnest pass rates are to the west.

It gave me a great deal of pleasure to see the minister rise at the beginning of the debate today and, in confession and repentance, take out a contradictory phrase in a clause which on the face of it seems pretty innocuous to the majority of hon. members but which in effect would not have reserved but destroyed the rights which are enjoyed in this area. The only thing I can say in extension of what has been said by the two hon. members for Halifax and the hon. member for Saint John-Albert is that the government is establishing a new concept in grain rates under new section 329, and in the context of the remarks I have made I hope it is clear that it became evident, upon reflection over the week end which is a period of somnolence and dreams, that an error was being made which was corrected this afternoon.

In the same context, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the minister and his draftsmen accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Halifax, take it under advisement and not necessarily be so bold as to extend this provision to imports but at least extend it to exports to include the ports of Montreal and Quebec so that the handicap of distance vis-à-vis the four ports of Montreal, Quebec, Saint John and Halifax will be removed. In this connection there are still obvious handicaps. Industry will settle in Montreal, Toronto and Quebec whereas it may never settle in Saint John or Halifax. The problem is not simply distance. The MacPherson commission points out that perhaps transportation is the real reason that the maritimes have not blossomed and bloomed in the economy of Canada. But there are other factors which will prevent the maritimes experiencing any great growth of industry. If we can only eliminate the handicap of distance we will see a stimulus to the economies of the ports of Halifax and Saint John. The figures presented to us by the hon. members from those two ports show that their economies have not only not been holding on but have been declining.

If we eliminate the problems of distance and bring the port of Montreal into the port parity situation, I for one, without living in the past, will have to face the consequences of what I have said in this connection. If we could eliminate the distance factor by reason of port parity the question of icebreaking would not be of such concern. Let the other ports have the icebreaking facilities. If we had port parity the ports of Halifax and Saint John would be used much more than they are at the present time. The ports of Montreal and Quebec will certainly be used more with the extension of icebreaking services, which are there as a fact of life.

Frankly, Mr. Chairman, hope springs eternal. Whether hope is good enough here I do not know and I am somewhat reluctant to accept that philosophy. But we are faced with the fact of this section. We will see the results of the transportation study. The minister is certainly very aware of the problems. I do not wish to say anything further at this stage in view of the assurance of the minister, but I hope the whole question of port parity will be looked into and we shall see the elimination of the abortion—this may be a pun on words —that is creating havoc in our ports. This would resolve my own dilemma and difficulty in this regard. On the basis of the minister's assurance, those are the only remarks I shall make at this time.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word or two here. I wish to ask the minister a question and to commend the hon. members from the Atlantic provinces for bringing to our attention a subject which, while it is of more particular concern to the Atlantic coast ports, is of concern to Canada.

In the course of his remarks the minister said that to ask the taxpayers of Canada to make up the difference in freight charges between, say, Ottawa and Halifax and Ottawa and Montreal would be asking rather too much provided the charge was the same to the two ports from the point of origin at Ottawa. In following the debate and listening to the discussion carried on by hon. members from the Atlantic provinces, and recalling to mind the many questions asked over the last several years, particularly by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, with regard to icebreaking in the St. Lawrence river, it has become very clear that the minister will have to consider very seriously something in the nature of compensation for the Atlantic ports if he is going to ask the taxpayers of Canada to provide millions of dollars for icebreaking facilities to keep the St. Lawrence river ports open in winter. I do not think there has been any disagreement with this icebreaking policy in other parts of Canada.

However, Mr. Chairman, what caught my attention was the minister's reference to the taxpayers as a whole. Being a taxpayer, it occurred to me that I should ask him, not necessarily to elaborate at this moment in this respect because he has been elaborating too much for the last two weeks but to have his study groups look into this situation very carefully, because I believe hon. members from the maritimes have made their point. If, as the minister says, the geographical advantage enjoyed by Montreal over Halifax would be destroyed by having a freight rate which was the same from Ottawa to Montreal as from Ottawa to Halifax, the minister is destroying the geographical advantage of the ports on the Atlantic coast by keeping the St. Lawrence river open the year round. That being the case, the maritime provinces will suffer accordingly and the general taxpayers of Canada will benefit the ports on the St. Lawrence and the business of central Canada at the expense of the people who live in the maritime provinces. I wonder whether this will appear to be quite fair to people generally, much as we want to see the development of year-round navigation.

I recall a few years ago a distinguished scientist and engineer pointing out to me that it might be possible to keep the St. Lawrence open not by icebreakers but by another system.

Mr. Pickersgill: Blowing bubbles.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Churchill: Yes, by blowing air bubbles, which I thought should be considered, or by the introduction of warmer water to prevent the freezing of the river. In any event, an expense of some millions of dollars, as I recall, would be involved. Perhaps the experimentation is still going on. Whatever is done the taxpayers generally will pay for the cost and the ports on the Atlantic will have decreased income and traffic. Over the years we have been trying to give the Atlantic provinces fair treatment with regard to their development along with the rest of Canada. Being a westerner and understanding the problems of the Atlantic provinces better than people who live in central Canada I sympathize with their position. I know that the maritimers and the westerners have always joined forces in encouraging the development of central Canada but not at the expense of either the west or the east. So I suggest to the minister that the argument advanced by hon. members from the east coast had had its effect on all members of the house. They have been logical and reasonable in their arguments. We hope that the minister will be convinced that any disadvantage which may accrue to the Atlantic ports by the maintenance of year-round navigation on the St. Lawrence river will be offset in some way so that the Atlantic provinces will not be placed at any further disadvantage.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman has thrown real terror into my heart, not so much by the fact that he spoke as by the content of his speech. Having come from Manitoba I went to the Atlantic provinces to find a seat, and I hope the hon. gentleman is not thinking of moving down there to try to defeat me because I really would be terrified if that was why he had intervened in the debate. However, that is probably not the case.

To speak quite seriously about the points raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, and very briefly, bearing in mind his admonition that I explain too much and start new debates, I want to reiterate my view that the problem of making the most effective and fullest possible use of the ports of Halifax and Saint John and of the vast national investment in capital facilities in these ports is a national problem. It is not just a problem of the Atlantic ports. I have great hopes that with the development of superships and of integral trains for traffic that is not rated quite high enough to go by air but where the greatest possible speed of delivery is important, there will be a great future for Halifax in particular because of the great natural advantages of that port. One of the most interesting possibilities of this kind of traffic going through the port of Halifax is the number of days that could be saved, and this may come about in the not too remote future. The hon. gentleman and I heard a little about this from some of the people who are conducting studies on the matter.

I wish to say generally that I feel that this subject is one which needs urgent, pressing and full research. Since I have substantially met two of the points put forward by the hon. gentlemen and since I really do not think that at the present time, here in the committee without really expert assistance and quite a lot more study, we could improve this bill in any way, I would hope that perhaps the hon. gentlemen would not feel it necessary to press any further amendments.

Mr. Forrestall: I think possibly what the minister has said in the last hour makes a fair amount of sense. I think we will lick our wounds and lay us down for a while. I wish the minister had found some way to write into the bill a meaningful guarantee that the parity structure with regard to export traffic at least through Halifax and Saint John and within the select territory would not only be maintained but would be designed in such a way as not to discourage their full use. I am referring to a guarantee that in no way would a shipper in a manufacturing concern somewhere in central Canada find it necessary to give consideration whether he should use the port of Saint John or the port of Halifax that indeed he would feel quite free to look at the pool of available foreign-going ships and regardless of whether they left from Halifax or Saint John would use the one that suited him best.

I am not suggesting I am an expert but I am not satisfied that these things are happening in a controlled manner. Port parity between Halifax and Saint John does exist but I think it is there more in word and spirit than in actual fact.

As was pointed out on Friday when we first read the amendment, we thought that the minister had been away from Newfoundland too long and had completely lost his senses. We are pleased that he has removed the very cumbersome section 334 qualification from his amendment. We hope he will keep his word in regard to the special study. If there is nothing in it about port parity he had better go back to Newfoundland because this will be no fit place for him to live when we finish with him.

We are now approaching the culmination of what must be many months of dreaming, hoping, praying, sweating and working on the part of the minister, and therefore we believe it is not incumbent on those representing the ports of Halifax and Saint John to frustrate him further. We will give him the assurance that we will not move further amendments dealing with this matter. I simply reiterate and re-emphasize the fact that we still believe very strongly that now is the time to do something drastic. I do not think that the government should wait for integral trains and superships. Now is the time we should be moving. I caution the minister that unless something is done very quickly to retain the longshoring and stevedoring capacity, the skills and understanding that have been built up in Halifax since 1749 and also in Saint John and unless the government does it now, these ports will not have the men with the skills to cope with greater traffic and the advantages that flow therefrom should traffic increase.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question on the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Forrestall: On division.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

• (5:10 p.m.)

The Chairman: Shall the present clause 59 as amended and renumbered carry?

Clause as amended agreed to.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would you now call clause 74, Mr. Chairman?

On clause 74—Cessation of "bridge subsidy".

Mr. Pickersgill: Notwithstanding what the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has said, and I appreciate the spirit in which he said it, I will have to make fairly extensive observations on this clause. It is the clause that provides basically for the transitional subsidies to the railways. It provides that these transitional subsidies shall be reduced year by year by a certain fraction until they ultimately disappear. There is provision also for certain specific payments that would be made to the railways in respect of certain services that may be imposed upon them in the national interest. These payments would replace some part of these subsidies at a time when the subsidies were sufficiently reduced so that the railways would require the other money to make up the difference.

In other words, the railways will not get both the transitional subsidies and the specific payments for specific services. When the total of the specific payments equals the transitional subsidies, the transitional subsidies would not be paid any longer—at least, the amount would not be paid twice. The other day the committee saw fit to disregard my entreaties and knocked out of clause 50 the proposed new section 329 of the Railway Act. I believe, sir, that in so doing what the committee was seeking to assert was that they did not feel parliament should direct the new commission to conduct a mandatory review of the revenues and costs connected with grain rates. Although I did not like the decision of the committee, I respect it. If my interpretation of the decision made by the committee is a correct one, I am not going to suggest that this basic decision be reversed. In other words, I am not going to ask hon. members to insist upon a mandatory review by the commission of the financial effects of the carriage of grain as prescribed in this bill.

However, the adoption of the amendment had some perhaps not incidental but ancillary effects that are quite important. It had the effect, for example, of removing the protection for freight rates on a great many grain products other than wheat and flour, which I am sure most hon. members who voted for that amendment had no intention or desire of removing. It is quite true the hon. member for York South made a statement that in clause 15 of the bill there was adequate power of review of any matter that the government might wish to have reviewed. I feel I would prefer not to rely upon clause 15, particularly when the committee has expressed the view that it does not want a mandatory review of these matters.

The hon. member for Acadia, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam and others pointed out, and I thought there was some substance to their argument, that by asking parliament to require the commission to make this review a presumption was being created that the rates on grain were not compensatory. I have no desire to ask a committee or the house to create any such presumption. Indeed, in this matter I was seeking to be completely neutral and to leave it to the commission to determine what the facts were. I do agree that in perhaps a sentimental or a notional way it might be said, if you demand a mandatory review of something, you imply a certain conclusion even before the review is made. I believe we should not do anything that would leave any such implication because I know how strongly people feel about this in western Canada.

I do not want to do anything that is going to look to anybody as though there is any bias in this matter because I assure hon. members there is not. I do believe that one or two members—I have not reviewed the debates sufficiently to recall who they were—felt it would always be open to the railway to ask for such a review. Then the onus of asking for it, the onus of proving the case, would be entirely on the railways. I accept that as a reasonable proposition. It occurred to me, therefore, that one way in which we could accomplish all the incidental things that I feel need to be accomplished in this bill without asking the committee to reverse itself on the main point that there should not be a mandatory review imposed upon the commission, would be by an amendment I am going to suggest. There are one or two minor technical points, but so far as the main point is concerned the amendment would provide that in the case of any statutory rate, not merely grain rates but any statutory rate, provided in this bill, the railways, not earlier than two years after the coming into force of the bill, could apply to have any statutory rate reviewed by the commission. The rates we have just dealt with in the new clause 59 would come within this category too.

The fact that the rate would be reviewed could not mean a change in the rate. This would be a review of revenues and costs. Then there would be a recommendation to the governor in council on whether any relief should be afforded to the railways. The way this would work would be that the railways would have to ask for the review. They would have to take the onus and provide the proof. They would have to make their case, and if they made their case there would be no obligation on the government to provide the relief. The government would be told what relief, in the opinion of the commission, would be desirable. Then the government would have to exercise its discretion whether to bring something before parliament.

It seems to me that this procedure would meet all the objections that were voiced to the other procedure. This procedure applies to all statutory rates, and it would apply also to all rates that are set by the commission. If under clause 16 the commission sets aside a rate and substitutes its own judgment, then two years and not less than two years after such substituted rate was set a railway could claim it was not compensatory and ask to have the results of it assessed.

• (5:20 p.m.)

We have made fairly adequate provision for appeals by shippers against the unfairness of rates. We have said that one of the principles of this bill is that if statutory and regulatory obligations are placed upon the railways they are entitled to be compensated for those things out of the treasury. Here we have something that does not appear to me to be open to any of the objections to which section 329 may have been open, though personally I did not think it was objectionable. However, the committee chose to think it was. But here at any rate no one can say that there is any presumption. The government does not have to take any initiative, nor does the commission; it is the railways themselves that have to make the application. Therefore there is no presumption placed in the bill, any more than there is a presumption in giving a shipper the right under clause 16 to say that the railways are taking an undue advantage of him in one case as opposed to another.

In the same amendment in a new section 471 I also propose to replace the definition of grain rates, which I believe was inadvertently thrown out like the baby with the bath water. I do not think any hon. member in any part of this chamber would want this situation to persist.

I am also going to make another suggestion. A very eloquent and persuasive plea was made by my hon. friend from Vancouver Quadra, which found an echo on the other side of the house, if I may so describe the venerable member for Kootenay West, in connection with rates on grain into British Columbia for domestic purposes. I feel about this subject in the same way that I said a few moments ago in another context I felt about a possible amendment that the hon. member for Halifax was going to move, namely, that we could not try to devise here and now a solution to this problem which would not create other problems that would also be very serious. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I am going to ask the committee to agree that we direct the commission in this bill, not later than six months after the coming into force of the act, to embark upon a study of this question.

There are also a couple of small technical matters, one of which just corrects a misprint, but if the Minister of Fisheries would now move this amendment I would be very grateful.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, I so move.

The Chairman: It has been moved by the Minister of Fisheries that clause 74 of Bill No. C-231 be amended:

(a) by striking out lines 35 to 38, inclusive, on page 62 of the Bill, as reprinted, and by substituting therefor the following:

Reductions continued.

"468A. (1) The reductions in rates that, immediately before the coming into force of Part V of the National Transportation Act, were in force by virtue of section 468 continue in force subject to subsections (2) to (4)."

(b) by striking out line 30 on page 63 of the Bill, as reprinted, and by substituting therefor the following:

"that are subject to Order No. 96300 of the"

(c) by adding immediately at the end of page 64 of the Bill, as reprinted, the following:

Definitions.

"470. (1) In this section,

"Statutory rate."

(a) "statutory rate" means a rate for the carriage of any commodity between points in Canada maintained for the public benefit at a rate or level of rates specified in this or any other Act of the Parliament of Canada; and

"Substituted rate."

(b) "substituted rate" means a rate fixed by the Commission under this Act or substituted for any rate disallowed by the Commission pursuant to this Act.

Application.

(2) Subject to subsection (3), a railway company under the jurisdiction of Parliament may make an application to the Commission to investigate the revenues and costs attributable to the carriage of any commodity by the company at a statutory rate or substituted rate.

(3) No application shall be made under subsection (2)

Limitation.

(a) in the case of a statutory rate, until after the expiration of two years from the coming into force of this section, and

(b) in the case of a substituted rate, until after the expiration of two years from the day that the substituted rate became effective.

Report and recommendation.

(4) After an investigation under this section, the Commission shall report its findings thereon to the Governor in Council and shall recommend in its report the amount of payments, if any required in the opinion of the Commission to assist the company to meet its costs of operation in respect of the carriage of any commodity at a statutory rate or substituted rate.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Would it not be better for all members of the committee to have a copy of this amendment so that we can follow it? I am not getting anything from the reading of the amendment and I am not going to vote in favour of any of it until I have had the chance to read it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I will do my best to get more copies. I concluded the preparation of these amendments just before I came into the house, because it was a very difficult problem. I do have a number of copies but I hope that in a few minutes I will have some more. Meanwhile I can lend the hon. gentleman the only copy I have left.

Mr. Kindt: That is all right. Your intentions are good, Jack.

Mr. Pickersgill: My heart is in the right place.

The Chairman: Does the committee wish me to continue?

Mr. Knowles: Continue.

The Chairman:

Presumption. (5) Where, pursuant to any action taken by the Governor in Council following receipt of a report from the Commission under subsection (4), financial assistance is provided a railway company in any year from moneys appropriated by Parliament therefor, the payment to the company of such assistance shall be deemed for the purposes of sections 314E and 469 to be a payment under this section.

Crown representative. (6) Where in any proceedings before the Commission under this Act the matter of the revenues or costs of a railway company under the jurisdiction of Parliament is under investigation, any Minister of the Crown in right of Canada may cause representations to be made thereon to the Commission by persons having knowledge of costing principles or matters that appear to such Minister to be relevant to the determination of railway revenues and costs.

"Grain products" defined. 471. (1) In this section "grain products" means any commodities to which, under the freight tariffs of the company in effect on the 1st day of January, 1966, the rates known as grain products rates, flaxseed products rates or rapeseed products rates applied on that date.

Maintaining related rates. (2) No action shall be taken under section 470 in respect of any railway company unless the company has maintained, at the level of rates prevailing on the 31st day of December, 1966, the level of rates

(a) on grain products other than flour moving from any point west of Fort William to Fort William or to Port Arthur over any lines of railway of the company;

(b) on grain products other than flour moving for export from any point west of Fort William or Armstrong to Churchill over any line of railway of the company;

(c) on grain or grain products moving for export from any point west of Fort William to a Canadian port on the Pacific coast, other than Vancouver or Prince Rupert, over any line of railway of the company;

(d) on grain products other than flour moving for export from any point west of Fort William to Vancouver or Prince Rupert over any line of railway of the company; and

(e) on grain or grain products moving from any point west of Armstrong to Armstrong over any line of railway of the company

Rapeseed. (3) For the purposes of this section and section 328 and the Act and agreements therein referred to, the expression "grain" includes, rapeseed and the rates applicable to the movement of rapeseed from any point referred to in subsection (2) or section 328 after the coming into force of this section shall not exceed the rates applicable to flaxseed.

Rate differential study. 472. Not later than six months after the coming into force of Part I of the National Transportation Act, or this section, whichever last occurs, the Commission shall undertake a study of the differences between rates on grain moving for export to ports in British Columbia and rates on grain moving otherwise to such ports, and shall report to the Governor-in-Council for such action as he deems desirable or expedient in the public interest."

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Would the Minister of Fisheries explain his amendment?

Mr. Robichaud: I shall leave that to the Minister of Transport.

Mr. McIntosh: It seems to me that this is bringing the Crowsnest matter in by the back door. Would the minister stand the amendment until we have had a chance to study what it does?

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall be happy to get more copies so that hon. members may look at them. I apologize for not having them earlier, but I think that notwithstanding the length of the amendment it will be found that it really is quite simple. It restores, beyond peradventure, the protection for all grain rates. Instead of requiring the commission, as the original bill did, to conduct a review of the financial consequences of the carriage of grain it obliges a railway company, if it wants such review, to apply for it. The company cannot apply for it for two years. Two years have to go by before the application can be entertained. Of course, since such an application cannot be disposed of today or tomorrow, so to speak, there would be very lengthy hearings, and the time required for any review would be at least as long as under the previous act.

The railway company would have the right to ask for a review of the financial consequences not just of grain rates but of any statutory rate and of any substituted rate. Those rates have to be in operation for two full years before any such review can be applied for. That is all there is to it.

Mr. McIntosh: How does this differ from the section that was in the bill before it was defeated in the house?

Mr. Pickersgill: The provision in the bill before related only to rates on grain. It did not relate to all statutory and regulated rates. The previous bill required the commission on its own to start an investigation, whether the railways asked for it or not. That, I think, was what most hon. members from western Canada objected to. They said that by putting this obligation on the commission the government was saying that it believed these rates were not compensatory.

The commission will be under no obligation to examine rates unless the railway makes an application for a review and makes a case. In that respect there is a fundamentally different principle here. I felt it was only right that I should respect the view of the committee in this matter and that I should not ask it to reverse its position. I do not think anyone will object to correcting the position with respect to the definition of grain and the protecting of these rates.

Mr. Kindt: In other words, judging from what the minister has said, in a backhanded way the baby thrown out with the dirty water is back in again.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right.

Mr. Kindt: I thought so.

Mr. Pickersgill: And I hope it is completely uninjured.

Mr. Kindt: May we have a chance to study this amendment?

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the reading of this complicated amendment and I will not thoroughly understand it until we have copies. I am pleased that the minister has listened to the representations made by the members for Vancouver Quadra and Kootenay West, based on the representations made by the B.C. Federation of Agriculture before the standing committee on transport and communications, and is going to anthorize a study of the problem they brought before the standing committee. I think that will provide useful information and will be of value to all those concerned about the cost of grain for domestic use in British Columbia under the present circumstances.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It may be dangerous for an easterner to get into the subject of the Crowsnest rates, but if I understand what the minister has proposed he intends to substitute for the mandatory proposal that the commission shall in three years examine the rates a provision whereby the railway companies two years hence may examine all statutory rates.

Mr. Pickersgill: Any statutory rate.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Any?

Mr. Pickersgill: They apply to have that done.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): If that is a concession to what the house voted on, then I confess it is totally the reverse of what I should have thought such a concession might be. Here the former mandatory situation becomes wide open after only two years; it is wide open to any railway company to make an application. I confess that as an easterner I find the minister's attitude extraordinary. Perhaps I should consult with my colleagues before expressing an opinion but I think the minister has done something that opens the matter more widely and more immediately than was originally intended.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. gentleman is quite wrong about that. I think that perhaps because he is an easterner he does not appreciate that in all the debate we had on this subject there was one problem and one problem only that seemed to be exercising the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite. I understood it very well. Hon. gentlemen opposite maintained that because the government was asking parliament to say that there must be a mandatory review of the effects of the rates on grain, we were ourselves creating a presumption that these rates were not compensatory. I could see why they felt that way and I could see why there was the opposition there was.

Here we have something very different, it seems to me. The railways have always maintained that the rates are non compensatory. They maintained that before the MacPherson commission. It seems to me that we cannot give shippers a wide right of appeal against rates set by the railways and not give the railways a chance to come before the commission. The hon. member for York South and the hon. member for Acadia argued they would be able to do it anyway if they wanted to, whether it was expressed in the bill or not. All we are saying here is that it cannot be done for two years. They cannot even make an application before two years have passed in respect of any rate which is statutory or any rate which has been altered by the commission substituting a regulated rate for a rate fixed by the railway. The rate has to be in operation for two years before it can be argued that it is not compensatory.

• (5:40 p.m.)

The approach I am taking in this amendment is exactly the kind of approach to the matter which hon. members opposite argued could be taken. They said they just did not want this parliament to instruct that there had to be a review of these things. I think this is now a fundamentally different position, and for this reason I feel it meets the objections which were raised.

Mr. Olson: I should like the minister to give a fuller explanation of what is meant by a substitute rate. Section 470 (1) (b) says:

> "substituted rate" means a rate fixed by the commission under this act or substituted for any rate disallowed by the commission pursuant to this act.

Then the bill goes on to say in subsection 2 of the same section:

> —a railway company under the jurisdiction of parliament may make application to the commission to investigate the revenues and costs applicable to the carriage of any commodity by the company at a statutory rate or substituted rate.

There are further references to this in section 471 (2) where it is pointed out that no action can be taken under section 470 unless the railways have maintained for two years the rates prevailing on December 31, 1966.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

The minister will appreciate that we have only had this document for a few minutes. Taking all these things together, may I ask whether the commission will have any power to substitute a rate for a statutory rate and then call it the substituted rate?

Mr. Pickersgill: No. Statutory rates cannot be changed except by statute. What is meant by a substituted rate is a rate established under clause 16 after someone says there is discrimination or something of that sort, and the commission sets a rate different from that which the railway had originally set, or any rate which might be set under the maximum rate formula. Such a rate would be in operation for two full years and only at the end of those two years could the company claim that it was not compensatory and that the commission should investigate revenues and costs. There is no provision anywhere in the bill for the commission to substitute its judgment for the judgment of parliament in setting statutory rates.

Mr. Olson: As I followed the amendment, several paragraphs of the section which was deleted have been reproduced almost in their entirety in the new section. As far as I can see, the minister has reintroduced all the definitions of grain products which were previously contained in three paragraphs of section 329.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes. Not only have we done that but the definition of rapeseed which was previously arrived at by a reference to some order of the board, I believe, has been expanded a little. It was thought that the phrase originally in the bill necessitated a reference to documents and that it would be better to spell out the definition in the legislation.

Mr. Olson: The wording of section 471 (3) seems to require some explanation. The subsection says that the rates applicable to the movement of rapeseed after the coming into force of this section "shall not exceed the rates applicable to flaxseed". The reference here is to a rate applicable to flaxseed. Is there some other place in the bill where the rates applicable to flaxseed are more specifically laid down than they are in this subsection?

Mr. Pickersgill: The reason for that is simple. Flaxseed is described as a grain or a grain product and is covered by one of the definitions. But rapeseed was not described as a grain; it was described as "comparable to flaxseed". Although it was directly stated to be a grain product, it was said that the rate for rapeseed should be the same as the rate for flaxseed so as to make absolutely sure that both were covered.

Mr. Churchill: The minister has done in part what I expected he would have to do after what took place last Wednesday. In order to explain the amendment which I moved then may I say that I endeavoured, first of all, to frame a complicated amendment such as the minister has provided but I decided subsequently that it would be better to put forward a very short amendment, about whose details there would be no dispute in the committee at all, and then let the minister bring in any changes which would have to be made. In other words, when amending a bill it is possible to strike out or to add words, or it is possible to strike out and substitute. I thought it was simpler to strike out. Then, if something had to be substituted the minister, with his officials, would bring in the substitution. This is what has happened on the present occasion.

I believe the members of this committee will need to study the proposed amendment with some care to see whether it is altogether satisfactory. The minister correctly summarized our arguments the other day as to the mandatory nature of the original provision in the bill making it obligatory on the commission to investigate the Crowsnest rates. Now he is suggesting that, instead, permission should be given to the railway companies to state their case with regard to statutory rates. We shall have to look at that proposal to decide whether it is really a satisfactory solution.

I would grant offhand that it is a neat way around the problem. The reference to the review of Crowsnest rates has been struck out of the bill, and that is one of the things which we were asking. But whether or not the back door has been left open too wide is one of the things we have to consider during the course of the day, possibly during the supper adjournment if there is to be one.

We did not intend to discuss the Crowsnest rates during the passage of this bill but perhaps this aspect of the debate has not been without useful result because we have had a look at these rates and considered various definitions. I challenge anyone to find in any of the relevant acts, whether the Railway Act or the Grain Act or the act pertaining to the Board of Transport Commissioners, a satisfactory definition of grain and grain products. In fact, I myself was not able to find anything with regard to grain products. Grain itself is not very carefully defined, perhaps for a good reason.

• (5:50 p.m.)

As new cereals are developed unknown ones may come into use and be included under grain, whereas if grain were defined very carefully there might be an exclusion of newly developed cereal production. Therefore there may be a very good reason for not defining grain clearly.

Grain products seems to have crept in by way of the Board of Transport Commissioners. The Turgeon commission reported in February, 1951, and had this to say at page 238, chapter 9:

> The scope and application of the Crowsnest pass rates have been greatly altered since they first became effective. They are at present in force (partly by statute, partly by order of the Board of Transport Commissioners, and partly by action of the railways themselves, as will appear) in respect only to shipments of grain and flour and certain other grain products, and they are held at a level which is three cents per 100 pounds less than the rates charged by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in September, 1897, on shipments of grain and flour from all points on its main line on the prairies west of Fort William to Fort William and Port Arthur, and they apply as follows:

Then the commission goes on to mention grain and flour moving from point to point and in subparagraph (e) says that the Crowsnest pass rates apply:

> To shipments of certain by-products of the milling, distilling and brewing industries, and also certain feed products, not included by strict interpretation within the meaning of "grain" and "flour" in the foregoing paragraphs—

That commission took note of grain and flour, and grain products. The minister said on Tuesday, January 17, as recorded at page 11927 of Hansard:

> —the effect of striking the whole of section 329 would be to destroy a part of the legal foundation of the Crowsnest pass rates, because it is in this section that there is a definition of grain, and without that definition the safeguards for those rates would disappear—

I think that was incorrect. Perhaps the minister was not feeling his best at that particular moment. Then on Thursday, January 19, as recorded at page 11986 of Hansard, the minister said:

> The amendment for which hon. gentlemen voted yesterday removes the protective rates for barley screenings, barley meal, bran, buckwheat flour, chopped feed, crushed barley, crushed oats, feed grain, grits and groats, flaxseed screenings, linseed meal, linseed oil, cake meal and cake linseed oil.

Mr. Pickersgill: That was not the whole list because I was interrupted by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and I never finished it.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, the minister's officials provided him with a lot of material and members of his staff rushed to get in touch with press representatives. As a result the Winnipeg Tribune of Friday, January 20, carried an article with a great big headline which I will not bother to read—

Mr. Olson: Read it.

Mr. Churchill: All right. The headline reads "Pickersgill Says Tory Crowsnest Victory Costly," and one paragraph reads as follows:

His staff was passing around today a list of 36 grain products which would no longer be protected by the Crowsnest pass rates agreement, as a result of the opposition elimination of a clause calling for a study of that agreement.

Then the paper did a little interpreting of the news, I presume with the assistance of the minister's staff, and again I quote:

This could mean an increase of anywhere between 10 and 50 per cent on these "Crowsnest related rates" involving everything from barley screenings, flax and rapeseed to crushed oats, rye flour and wheat germ.

I object to this attempt by the minister to scare the public. He says here in this chamber that we have taken away some of the legal basis for the Crowsnest pass rates, something which we did not do at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: Related rates.

Mr. Churchill: We did not affect the agreement and act of 1897 or the act of 1925. But the minister through his staff has word placed in the press in order to alarm the public, hoping to counteract what I called his political inept move with regard to western Canada, and so we got this headline in the Winnipeg Tribune. I hope that through the amendments which the minister will present, if this one is not satisfactory, that we can settle what the Crowsnest pass rates govern. The Turgeon commission said not only grain and flour but certain by-products.

Mr. Olson: Flax and rapeseed.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, flax and rapeseed are all considered here. Over the years the Board of Transport Commissioners has been dealing with this matter. The minister now has us terribly confused. He says that the section we eliminated destroyed the definition of grain and that without that definition the Crowsnest pass rates would not be effective. Those rates have been in effect for 70 years and I would point out that in new section 329A of this bill another definition of grain is given. It is as follows:

"grain" means the commodities referred to in paragraph (6) of Order No. 121416 of the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada dated the 18th day of July, 1966.

In effect there were two definitions of grain in the bill, one of which we struck out, and the minister is now trying to bring it back in again.

All through the years the Board of Transport Commissioners has treated grain and products derived from grain as grain, and the rates have been applied accordingly. If the rates have not been applied under the Crowsnest agreement why would the minister say that because his definition was not accepted these rates would become ineffective? How can they become ineffective if they had been applied all these years under the authority of the Board of Transport Commissioners? There may be an explanation for that but at present I do not know what it is. I found another definition of grain in the interpretation section of the Canada Grain Act of 1925. It reads as follows:

"grain" means and includes all kinds of varieties of grain, the inspection of which is provided for by this act;

And also:

"western grain" means grain grown in the western inspection division.

There is a section in the Canada Grain Act dealing with grades and samples which talks about statutory grades, commercial grades, off grades and screenings. Then there are two schedules to the Canada Grain Act, chapter 25 of the Revised Statutes of 1952, which list the various grade names for western grain. There is reference to red spring wheat, white spring wheat, winter wheat, amber Durum, mixed wheat, oats, barley, rye, mixed grain, flaxseed, buckwheat, corn and sunflower seed. Perhaps that has reference to the eastern division, but there is a slight difference between western and eastern grain. I am afraid I am wrong because there is reference to flaxseed, sunflower seed, soybeans and peas in schedule 1 which is entitled "statutory grades of western grain".

• (6:00 p.m.)

That is the way in which grain has been defined, and that is how all these types have come under the Crowsnest rates. When it came to our attention in 1961 that rapeseed was becoming an important agricultural product in western Canada the act was amended to include rapeseed in the general category of "grain". In the last paragraph on page 12 the minister has incorporated the wording of the amendment moved to the Railway Act on July 13, 1961 and has used the phrase, grain includes rapeseed, and the rates are the same—they shall not exceed the rates applicable to flaxseed.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think that resulted from a bill sponsored by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, and until he did so we were not aware of the importance of rapeseed in western Canada. He has kept us aware of that fact ever since. It was at his insistence that the amendment was brought in, after which the wheat board began to take notice of rapeseed.

The Crowsnest rates have been applicable by statute or regulation of the Board of Transport Commissioners, or by action of the railway companies themselves, to grain of the types I mentioned, to flour and by-products of the various grains. Unless the minister can produce other evidence I think he is wrong in suggesting that we are striking out advantages which accrue to people shipping grain, flour and products of grain in those areas of western Canada to which reference is made in the act. I hope the definitions proposed by the minister will be satisfactory, but I wonder whether or not they are really necessary. Perhaps that does not really matter if in the future parliamentarians 20 years from now, who I am sure will be dealing with this subject, find it easier than we have to understand this act. If that is so I am prepared to accept the minister's definition of grain and grain products.

We must be very clear in future regarding grain and grain products. It strikes me as being very odd that a grain product such as flour should be treated in a different way than products of grain are treated, and I refer to wheat germ, bran or any other type of grain product. They all come from grain, including wheat, oats, barley and so on.

It is after six o'clock and I have nothing more to say about the detail of the amendment the minister has put forward, but let me conclude by saying that I had intended to be rather severe with the minister but changed my mind. I felt that I should treat him rather gently. If we have a proper supper adjournment and maintain our good humour perhaps we can pass some of these clauses. I have exercised a great deal of restraint. I should like to examine some of the words of this amendment and discuss them with my colleagues. Before doing so let me say the minister has made a real effort to meet most of the objections we raised last week, and he now admits that we were correct in raising those objections.

At this time I should like to know whether by granting permission to the railway companies to raise the issue of statutory rates with the commission we are going a little bit too far. In the past the railway companies have been able to complain, grumble and groan about these things, and the answer of the government has been to appoint a commission periodically to consider the alleged complaints by shippers or producers or the complaints of the railway companies. That was perhaps a more difficult process than the one to follow the adoption of this bill which says that within two years the company may raise this issue. Why should we not wait until pressure builds up on a government to appoint another royal commission? Perhaps we should just leave the statutory rates entirely alone. In any event that is what I should like to consider before we accept or reject this amendment.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert: I am prompted by the question posed by the hon. member for Carleton to ask another question. Can the minister give us a list of the statutory rates? I have noted the definition but is there a list of all the rates which have been incorporated in our statutes at certain levels now available to hon. members?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is precisely the difficulty we faced in respect of clause 59. When statutes are revised, as every lawyer knows every change does not find its way into the revised statutes. Some are left out by inadvertence, but they still remain the law of Canada. I think we all know pretty well what most of these rates are.

By this bill we are saying in principle that the railway companies set their own rates but that under clause 16 there can be an appeal to the commission from those rates. The commission can then set a rate to be called a substitute rate. We are also saying that the commission cannot touch certain rates which are fixed by statute but that the railways are entitled to ask for compensation for carrying goods when parliament imposes the duty upon the railways to carry those goods at a rate to which they do not consent. One of the principles of this bill is that they may receive compensation under those circumstances.

In this bill we are saying that the railway companies should carry goods in respect of which the rate is statutory for a period of two years without making any kind of appeal. We are stating that they cannot have a review of those rates for two years but that after two years they may allege that the rates are not compensatory and ask the commission to review them.

Mr. McIntosh: May I ask a question on that one point? What is the significance of the two year term? Why is it not five years, ten years or one year?

• (6:10 p.m.)

Mr. Pickersgill: I think there are many reasons why one might pick two years. For example, wage agreements on the railways usually run for two years. In recent years the railways' costs have pretty nearly always gone up after each one of these wage adjustments. A rate that was compensatory in 1966 may not be compensatory in 1968. If it is a rate set by the railways it is up to them to look after their own affairs, but if it is a rate set by parliament, when the commission has the power that is given under this bill to review the matter it does not seem unreasonable to have this provision. We have also asserted the principle that the railways are entitled to compensation for obligations imposed on them as national obligations, and have also said that after there has been enough experience to enable some data to be gathered so as to know what the effects are there can be a review on application by the railway. It is just a matter of trying to be reasonably fair to everyone concerned.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, I know that the Crowsnest pass rates are fixed at statutory levels. There is no problem there. But I do not think this provision satisfies the Maritime Freight Rates Act. I refer to the percentage reduction on a fluctuating basis.

Mr. Pickersgill: This provision would not apply to the Maritime Freight Rates Act at all. The 20 per cent and 30 per cent apply to rates on which the reductions are made. It would not apply to the Maritime Freight Rates Act because the payments under that act are specifically for the purpose of compensating the railways, so they could not argue that they were not being compensated in respect of the Maritime Freight Rates Act. This provision might apply to the rates that will continue to be frozen. That is one good reason why there is a limit of two years. There cannot be any review for two years, so those particular rates cannot be reviewed at all. We intend them to continue for two years until parliament reviews them, which we hope it will.

It could also apply to some of the rates that were referred to in clause 59 and to the At and East rates. The railways are getting some compensation from them now, but two years from the passage of this act it might be said that the compensation was no longer adequate in respect of the At and East rates; and it might not be adequate. We admit, because of the judgment of the Board of Transport Commissioners, that they are entitled to be paid something in respect of those rates.

However, two years or less than two years once the commission had set a rate seemed to be a ridiculously short period. I would guess that in most of these cases it would take at least three years, and probably more, to get a determination. You have to consider the time taken from an application being made and advertised. It has to be made known to everyone so that anyone who wants to object to it, including the Minister of Finance, has the opportunity to do so.

This is one thing I should have pointed out, but did not do so, in respect of the amendment. I am sure this will be particularly interesting to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. He will recall that several hon. members asked who was going to make the case for the other side. Therefore I caused to be put into this amendment subsection 6 of new section 470, which says:

> Where in any proceedings before the commission under this act the matter of the revenues or casts of a railway company under the jurisdiction of parliament is under investigation, any minister of the crown in right of Canada may cause representations to be made thereon to the commission by persons having knowledge of costing principles or matters that appear to such minister to be relevant to the determination of railway revenues and costs.

It was always my thought that if the subsidy was going to be paid the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Transport or both would want to be represented anyway, but I thought we should put it beyond any shadow of doubt by including this provision. I think it will help many hon. members who said that the provincial governments in the past had been under an obligation to spend a great deal of money on these matters. They may wish to make representations too but they will know now that under this law, in order to protect the treasury, representations are bound to be made by a minister of the crown. I think it is a good thing to have this provision in the bill.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the minister a question.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Before the committee hears the hon. member for Medicine Hat may I ask the indulgence of the committee to give information concerning the proceedings on the adjournment motion at ten o'clock tonight. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: It is my duty, pursuant to standing order 39A, to inform the committee that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock this evening are as follows: the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin)—Education—Toronto—Possible closing of schools for immigrant children; the hon. member for Chapleau (Mr. Laprise)—Agriculture—Quebec—Proposed compensated discount on milk; the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams)—National parks—Use of expropriation to halt court cases.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask the minister this question. Will the crown's representative be asked by the Minister of Transport to appear before the commission only in cases where there is a possibility that a subsidy will be paid in respect of any statutory or so-called substituted rate, or will there be other cases with regard to which the federal government will take on the burden of establishing the costs that are relevant to the movement of the commodity involved, where large regions or large industrial shipments of primary goods would be involved and it would be in the public interest that someone appear on behalf of the crown?

Mr. Pickersgill: I would think that in any case where there was a possibility of a subsidy any government would be guilty of negligence in not being represented in order to see that as far as possible all the costs that were alleged by a carrier, whoever he might be, were properly checked and audited. I would think that when the commission undertakes its first big job it will be the job of establishing the costing techniques, on which there will be public hearings. I am quite sure that the Minister of Finance, probably the Minister of Transport also and maybe other ministers, will wish to be represented at the hearings on costing procedures and costing techniques. As the hon. member for Medicine Hat well knows, the costing procedures and techniques are almost as important, and perhaps more important, than determining the costs of individual shipments. Once the techniques are established, the other things are perhaps a matter of rather complicated computing, but arriving at the right techniques is the essential thing. In this respect we would want there to be no doubt.

In the case of a dispute involving, say, a big mining company which was asserting that the railway company was taking an undue advantage in connection with its own rate, I think one would be governed by the circumstances. If the issue seemed to be purely a matter between the shipper and the carrier, in which no obvious interest of the government of Canada was involved, it might not be necessary for the crown to be represented. But I would think, since all these things tend to be related one to another, the government would want to be represented all the time at all these hearings.

There is another reason for the government being represented at these hearings. There is an appeal from the commission to the governor in council. If the government is represented by an expert, by counsel so to speak, at the hearing, the minister and other ministers would have the advantage of consultation with counsel who would understand what had transpired at the hearing before the commission. This would apply in those cases where appeals have to be heard. So I would think that in all these cases it would be desirable, but even here it does not say so because it is not customary to order the crown. It just says that the crown may be represented, but there is no doubt as to the intention.

• (6:20 p.m.)

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): If there are no other questions I would like to ask the minister whether we can interpret the look on his face as a hungry look and whether he thinks we could have a supper recess at this time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think both the hon. members for Medicine Hat and Swift Current have other questions to ask, but any moment that we feel we do not want to discuss this matter further until we have had a chance to consider it I will be quite willing to have this clause stood and perhaps we could take part II and make some progress on it. We might even reserve one clause there in case any hon. member who is not here now wanted to comment on it. I really want to make progress. In any event I understand that the committee wishes to rise between 7 and 8 p.m.

Mr. Olson: There is one more comment I should like to make. First, I want to say to the minister that he has said something for which I have waited for months and months, and that is that the federal government, in the name of the Minister of Transport in particular but also perhaps in the name of other ministers, will assume the role which I think they should have assumed in the past. I am referring to the fact that as long as we have the adversary system which is used before the Board of Transport Commissioners and which it appears will be used before the new transport commission, it is necessary for some large public bodies such as the federal government to take the side of the public interest. The minister said that the government would be guilty of neglect of the public interest if it did not assume this role, particularly when subsidies are involved. I agree with him but I think I would go one step further and say that this government in some cases and the previous government in other cases have been in my opinion somewhat guilty of negligence in not taking the side of the public interest in the case of substantial public service involving passenger trains or the abandonment of railway lines being withdrawn provided the railways were successful in their applications.

All I want to say with respect to section 470(6) is that we have waited a long time for the Minister of Transport to say what he has just said, that the government will take an active interest in presenting the case for the public before these hearings. I have been to some hearings in which the public interest was involved and at which a municipality or other interested party did not feel it was strong enough or had sufficient resources behind it to take on such powerful bodies as the railway companies, especially in the gathering of evidence and the presentation of the case for the public interest. Therefore I am very pleased to have heard this statement from the minister finally and I commend him for it. I hope that in the future we will see this being done in the spirit which was indicated by the minister a few minutes ago.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, I would like to endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Carleton. I think this is a very confusing amendment and it is much broader than the one which was defeated. There is one point to which I should like to draw the minister's attention. I refer to the wording in the fifth line in section 471(1) on page 2 of the amendment where it is said that grain products include rapeseed products. Therefore we can say that rapeseed is grain and that the by-product of grain would include rapeseed products. However, the section reads in part as follows:

> —the rates known as grain products rates, flaxseed products rates or rapeseed products rates—

Why are rapeseed products rates not the same as grain products rates? The minister said that rapeseed is a grain. This is rather confusing.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. gentleman heard the very excellent exposition on this subject of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre in which he pointed out that the original Crowsnest agreement applied only to the C.P.R. and only to wheat and flour. Through the years it had been extended by the Board of Transport Commissioners—the hon. member read from the report of the Turgeon Commission—and in some cases extended by the railways to other commodities. I think the latest extension was through a bill introduced by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale which was passed in 1961. Over the years other grains and grain products have been added and given the same statutory, regulatory or board order or in some cases have been recognized as grain by the railway companies themselves. What we are seeking to do, and the lawyers have done their best to do it, is to ensure that every grain and grain product now covered by the rates which we usually call the Crowsnest rates will still be covered under the new legislation. I have accepted the view of the lawyers that the language used here seems to them to be desirable to make sure that we protect all the rates which everyone wants to protect and certainly which every western farmer wants to protect.

Mr. McIntosh: I should like to point out to the minister that the hon. member for Carleton is also a lawyer and the argument advanced by the minister did not seem to me to meet the remarks of the hon. member a few moments ago.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think the hon. member for Carleton said anything about the definition of grain. He was talking about the possibility of making an appeal, and that is a different matter.

Mr. McIntosh: The reason I rose when the amendment was first presented and asked the minister if we could stand this section was so that we could study this matter further.

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course I am quite prepared to do that.

Mr. Schreyer: I certainly do not intend to speak at length on the amendment except to say in all fairness to the minister that I do not think this amendment can in any way be construed as impinging on the continuation of the Crowsnest rates. I did not feel that the original clause in the bill had that effect. However, an argument arose about whether this might be the likely effect after the holding of the study, and objection was also raised to the fact that the Crowsnest rates were being singled out for special and in the opinion of some, undesirable attention. In this respect this amendment is less offensive and possibly should receive the support of the members of the committee.

I am rising at this time to ask the minister for clarification with respect to section 471(2) of the amendment which appeared in the same form in the original section 329 and I could have asked the question at the time when we were considering it. I am puzzled by the wording in paragraph (c) of section 471(2) which reads as follows:

on grain or grain products moving for export from any point west of Fort William to a Canadian port on the Pacific coast.

These rates are statutory and I really do not understand the wording "unless the company has maintained...the level of rates". There can be no question about it since the company must maintain that level of rates because they are statutory. Can the minister explain the use of the word "unless"?

• (6:30 p.m.)

Mr. Pickersgill: The point is that not all rates are statutory. That is precisely the reason. The rates set out in proposed section 328, which are covered by the statutes of 1925 and some other statutes, are statutory. Some of these other grain rates which are set at the same level as the statutory rates, have been set by orders of the board and are not statutory. Some others have been set by the railways themselves and have never been embodied in any order of the Board of Transport Commissioners. Therefore, what we are saying here is that if the railways disturb those rates in any way, then they can never receive any compensation even if they can show that the rates at which they are carrying the products are non-compensatory. I believe that is an accurate explanation.

Mr. Schreyer: I think it would be worth while to take another 30 seconds to follow this up. I realize that some of the rates applied to certain grain products are not statutory in the exact sense of the word "statutory". If these rates are not set by statute, then surely they must be set either by order in council or by an order of the commission, in which case they are still legislative or quasi legislative rates, are they not?

Mr. Pickersgill: They are rates that are in force now. It was never suggested by me that anything we had done here would take these rates away. I said the provision would remove the protection. This is the device by which we will be sure, or as sure as we possibly can be, that the railways after the passage of this bill will not touch any of these rates. This is the purpose.

Mr. Schreyer: There is one last point for clarification. I understand the minister's reasoning in large part, although I must confess not completely. Let us take for example the reference in proposed section 471, subsection 2, paragraph (c), to a level of rates on grain moving for export from any point west of Fort William to the Pacific coast. Surely that category of movement comes under statutory rates?

Mr. Pickersgill: Wheat does, but I am not sure about all grains. In some cases, this provision makes the same doubly sure.

Mr. Rapp: Actually, sir, rapeseed is better defined under the heading "grain" now than it was in the original.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thought the monument to the hon. gentleman should not be lost.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I thought the minister was very skilful in the way he avoided answering the question raised by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, particularly as to what additional statutory rates were being swept into this clause. When the committee voted, it voted in relation to the Crowsnest rates. The minister has come back with a proposal under which all statutory rates are to be in this new section. The hon. member for Saint John-Albert asked what are the statutory rates? The minister said: Well, because of the difficulty when we consolidate statutes I do not want to outline these in the house.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is a very well known rule of the courts that what is said in this House of Commons is never a matter which is before the court or before the Board of Transport Commissioners. The minister therefore is not under any inhibition. I agree with him completely that he should not enumerate them in the legislation. I think his definition of statutory rates is a good definition. However, I think the committee is entitled to know from the minister the list he has in front of him from his officials outlining just what he has brought under this provision. This will not prejudice the matter in any way when it comes before the new commission or before the courts for interpretation. What he enumerates are just words which have been uttered in the House of Commons. They are not matters of evidence before the courts.

I think before we vote we ought to know what the minister believes he is now including by way of rates in this definition, which were not included in the old section which was defeated in the committee. I think it is a simple matter for the minister to outline. This list does not have to be all inclusive. If the minister misses one or two, that will not prejudice anything. The list would provide a basis upon which the members of this committee could exercise intelligent judgment.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think that is a good suggestion. I do not believe I could give the list now, and I will not pretend to. I will have to produce a list when I come back after eight o'clock. I do not believe I should try to do that without the advice of my officials and, notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman says, I do not have a list in front of me. There are quite a number of them and I do not know the correct name. If we are prepared to stand this clause now and go on to something else, I should like to say one word about another aspect of it before we do so.

I am just making this as a declaration of the position of the government on this matter, and it will not affect this bill directly at all. I think I owe it to hon. members to make this statement. It was represented to us in the standing committee by the Canada Steamship Lines that their rates had been frozen at the time of the rate freeze put on by the previous government in 1959, and that they had participated in consequence in the payments that were made to the railways. However, since they are not a railway they are not included in this bill. Since the company has had to keep these rates at that level for all these years, they could not suddenly adjust them upward, and it was represented they were entitled to some transitional subsidy.

I have given a lot of thought to this matter, and I felt perhaps we might amend the bill to do that. However, I have come to the conclusion that because the transitional subsidies for the railways are made up of a number of different things, upon some of which Canada Steamship Lines has no claim to any share, this computation should be made very carefully. I have consulted my colleagues and it will be our intention to make a suitable provision in the supplementary estimates for what we deem to be a fair and equitable transitional payment to the Canada Steamship Lines based on the same principle of payment as in this bill. I thought it was only fair to say that now, while the bill was before the committee, since the matter had been brought before the standing committee, so there would not be any misunderstanding about it. This is the appropriate clause on which to make the statement.

If hon. gentlemen would prefer to stand clause 74 now, perhaps we can make some progress with the next part until seven o'clock.

Mr. Olson: I have one question which relates to proposed section 470, subsections 2 and 4. These deal with applications the railways may make after two years. These subsections refer to the railway making an application to the commission to investigate the revenues and costs, and then, after the investigation, the commission shall report its findings. There is no provision there requiring a public hearing. Perhaps the minister can tell me if there is such a provision somewhere else. An investigation may or may not necessitate a hearing before the commission. If there were interested parties who wanted to present their case, where would they find the right to demand, if I may put it that way, a hearing?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the draftsmen are listening. My view is that it is provided in part I of the bill that there must be a hearing on any of these matters whenever any interested parties want a hearing. If there is any doubt about that I will bring forward a suggestion to remove it. But in fact I do not think there is; I think there has to be a hearing.

• (6:40 p.m.)

Mr. Olson: I am concerned about this because it would be possible for the railways very quietly to apply for an investigation, and for the investigation to go forward without general public knowledge that it was under way, if there was no hearing. I would not like to see that happen.

Mr. Pickersgill: Neither would I. I certainly do not want to see the commission suddenly present to the government a bill for X millions of dollars without the government having had the chance to be heard in the matter. That is what is involved here. There is no doubt about our objective, and I think there is no doubt that the bill as it now stands provides for that. However, I will verify the matter.

I wonder whether we could now go to part II, Mr. Chairman, on the understanding that we try to complete part II and then come back to clause 74 after part II had been completed. We would also rise between seven and eight.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, before we go on to part II, the minister brought in a reference to Canada Steamships. Can he say anything now about the progress which has been made on the subject of St. Lawrence seaway tolls? Is there any danger of those tolls being increased?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think I would be breaking the rules of the house if I did so, and everyone knows how reluctant I am to do that.

The Chairman: Does the committee now agree to stand clause 74 and the amendment moved thereto by the Minister of Fisheries?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

The Chairman: Is it the wish of the committee to revert now to part II of the bill, clause 22 to be found on page 13?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Ballard: Mr. Chairman, part II of Bill No. C-231 has to do with commodity pipe lines. I believe this is the first time that commodity pipe lines have become the subject of government regulation. Commodity pipe lining is a new endeavour in Canada, indeed in any country in the world.

I notice that the revised bill brings a new definition into the proposed act of a combined pipe line; this is to be found in paragraph (a) of clause 22. The original act had no such definition or made no reference to a combined pipe line. I believe it was I who first raised this question in the transport committee hearings, when I asked the minister what body would have jurisdiction over a solid pipe line where the fluid of transmission was oil. Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment the minister has made to the bill has gone about the matter in the wrong way. I would rather have seen combined pipe lines taken out of the bill altogether, instead of subjecting them to the provisions of the act.

As I said before, Mr. Chairman, pipe lining is a relatively new concept of materials handling. As a matter of fact, only two briefs were presented before the transport and communications committee, one of them by the C.N.R. which did not appear to be very interested in pipe lining. The C.N.R. seemed to be well enough satisfied to subject pipe lining to the provisions of the bill, provided the act made it as uncomfortable for the pipe lines to operate as it did for the railways.

The sum and substance of the presentation of the C.N.R. is to be found at page 1839 of report No. 24 of the committee on transport and communications. One of the paragraphs of the brief was as follows:

> If all modes of transport are to be treated alike then commodity pipe line companies should also report to the transport commission in the same fashion.
>
> The information filed with the transport commission by all modes should either be available to all or to none—

It is interesting to note that the recommendation of the C.N.R. was that the pipe lining companies' activities and accounts should be open to the same scrutiny as the activities and accounts of the railways themselves.

I think that the legislation before us is good. The minister and his officials drew up the terms of the bill with not too much background on this type of movement of goods. As a matter of fact, the MacPherson report did not consider commodity pipe lines at all.

The other brief which was presented to the transport committee was much more sophisticated and informative. It was presented by the Shell Oil Company and appears at page 2089 and following of report No. 29 of the transport and communications committee. Incidentally Shell Oil Company have quite an interest in pipe lining because they are considering construction of a pipe line from Alberta to the west coast for the movement of sulphur from Alberta to the seaboard. This is going to be a $50 million project and will mean a lot to the economy of Alberta. The manufacture of sulphur involves the use of large quantities of the surplus natural gas we have in that part of the country

In their brief the Shell Oil Company pointed out that pipe lining is going to be the means of transportation in the future for quite a number of different primary products. Some of these now come to mind. I mentioned sulphur; others are potash, coal, wheat, and wood chips for the pulp and paper industry. Another interesting point the company make is that the experience of pipe lining is that the unit cost has gone down over the years, whereas the cost of moving similar goods by rail transport has steadily increased.

One of the objections I have to this clause, in the first instance, is the definition given of combined pipe lines. According to clause 22 (a):

"combined pipe line" means a commodity pipe line through which oil and gas, or either, can be moved;—

The key word there, Mr. Chairman, is "can". I should point out to the minister that any pipe line can move oil, but not all pipe lines necessarily can move gas. They can be adapted from one kind to the other very easily. Really, what the minister is saying in this definition is that all pipe lines are combined pipe lines.

• (6:50 p.m.)

Mr. Pickersgill: Does not the hon. gentleman think that perhaps what the draftsman meant was not "can", in the sense that it would be theoretically possible but in the sense that the pipe line would be built from the place where there was oil to be moved? While in an abstract sense, the hon. gentleman is correct, in what he says, there might be a situation for example where there was no oil within several hundred miles of the pipe line. However, a pipe line which was used for some other liquid would theoretically be capable of carrying oil though in practice it might not carry oil.

Mr. Ballard: I thank the minister for making this explanation. What he is saying is that it is within the realm of possibility that all pipe lines originating in the prairie provinces, all of which produce oil, will come under the provision of this bill regardless of the fact that they transport commodities other than oil.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I think the hon. gentleman has misunderstood this. Any pipe line that does not carry a commodity, other than oil or gas, cannot be a commodity pipe line and therefore does not come under this at all. There must be both oil or gas, and some other commodities as well; it does not matter whether it is oil or gas, but it must be some other commodity before it is a combined pipe line. If that is not so, it is just an oil or gas pipe line and comes under the National Energy Board, and this commission has nothing to do with it.

[Mr. Ballard.]

Mr. Ballard: I appreciate what the minister says, and this is what I understand by "combined pipe line". But it does not say that in the bill. I still contend, according to this definition, that any commodity pipe line originating in any of the prairie provinces would of necessity be called a commodity pipe line. I bring this to the minister's attention in the hope that he will produce a better definition of a combined pipe line, a definition more in line with the explanation he has just given.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will consult the lawyers about it, but I am sure they must have thought of this point.

Mr. Ballard: I leave that with the minister. I thought that was one of the things wrong with the provisions of the bill. Do I understand, Mr. Chairman, that we are dealing with part II as a whole, and that it is permissible to refer to other sections?

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder, if the hon. gentleman has nothing more to say about clause 22, if we could not hold that clause and go on with clause 23. I wish to see as many clauses adopted as possible.

Mr. Ballard: I wish to object in any case to the inclusion of a combined pipe line in this bill. The minister in later clauses of the bill has built up a super bureaucracy which makes it almost impossible for a commodity pipe line to get started. We know of the cost and the time consumed by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines to make a presentation to the National Energy Board, in the recent hearings involving the Great Lakes pipe line. The cost was approximately $1,800,000. Over two years was spent in the preparation of the report, and that report was put before the National Energy Board and the Federal Power Commission of the United States almost one year ago.

It is the type of preliminary cost I have mentioned which is necessary to impress these commissions. Much time is involved, and it would be almost impossible for a new company to get started in this field. Certainly the obstacles will discourage people from going into the business. They will be discouraged even more when faced with a board twice as large as it ordinarily would have been. I suggest to the minister that commodity pipe lines be placed under one board or the other, under the Transport Commission or under the National Energy Board. For goodness sake do not let us fall into the trap where companies must have approval from both these organizations before they can begin construction or expansion.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman looks at clause 25, as I am sure he has, he will see in paragraph 3 that there is no requirement that a company should appear before both boards. There has to be a combined hearing at which, I would guess, probably one or two members of the Transport Commission would sit with members from the National Energy Board. They have to make a combined report to the governor in council. It could not happen that one board could accept the application and the other refuse it; it just could not happen.

The reason that it will be unacceptable to the gas and oil company generally if these pipe lines, these combined pipe lines were taken out of the purview of the National Energy Board, so far as gas and oil are concerned—and I am saying a word about this, so that the hon. gentleman may reflect about it—is that it would mean a regime might be applied to gas and oil different from the regime that was applied to gas and oil pipe lines which did not carry some other commodity.

The Transport Commission will not be concerned at all with the carriage of the oil or of the gas. It will be concerned only with the carriage of the commodity, the other commodity that is in line. If the hon. gentleman will not mind looking at page 2, clause 3(b) of part I he will see that a commodity pipe line is defined there. I think when that definition is looked at in relation to the other one he referred to, it does seem that there must be the fact—not just the theoretical possibility—but the fact of having oil or gas as well as some other commodity before it would be a combined pipe line.

It was understood that the committee would rise for one hour at 7 o'clock—unless the hon. member wishes to go on for a moment or two.

Mr. Ballard: Mr. Chairman, may I call it seven o'clock?

Progress reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand that the house wishes to suspend sitting from now until eight o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that at eight o'clock the work of the committee shall resume?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

23033—767½

Transportation

TRANSPORTATION

PROVISION FOR DEFINITION AND IMPLEMENTATION OF NATIONAL POLICY

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-231, to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential provisions—Mr. Pickersgill—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: I do now leave the chair.

SITTING SUSPENDED

• (8:00 p.m.)

SITTING RESUMED

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: House again in committee of the whole to consider Bill C-231.

Mr. Pickersgill: We are on clause 22, I think.

Mr. Ballard: When we suspended the sitting at seven o'clock I was putting forward the contention that, first of all, the phrase "combined pipe lines" was not properly defined in clause 22. I hope the minister and his staff can arrive at a more appropriate definition than the one which is now in the bill.

I should also like to say in connection with clause 22 that the minister might well consider exempting combined pipe lines from the provision of this bill altogether. In other words, in my opinion an undue hardship is imposed on anyone trying to construct or operate a combined pipe line by making such pipe lines subject to the regulations of both the National Energy Board and the Transport Commission.

The minister's argument that an application need only to be made to a combination of these two boards, in other words, one submission, was not convincing. I would expect the National Energy Board and the Transport Commission to have a different outlook on the movement of goods; they would have differing regulations which might even be in conflict one with the other. I can foresee that it will be almost impossible for an applicant to satisfy the members of both boards.

The Shell Oil Company, in making its presentation to the committee on transport took the same view and recommendeded that commodity pipe lines—that is a newer description —should come under one board or the other, but that they should not be subjected to the regulations of both boards. In fact, Mr. Ritchie, who presented the brief for Shell Oil, summed it up in this way as reported on page 2903 of the minutes and proceedings of the transport and communications committee, volume 29:

> If sole jurisdiction over commodity pipe lines were placed under the National Energy Board there would be no duplication of effort in administering these lines together with hydrocarbon pipe lines. On the other hand, should commodity pipe lines be placed under the Canadian Transport Commission, then in order to avoid dual jurisdiction, it would seem necessary that the commission also should be responsible for hydrocarbon as well as commodity pipe lines.

I submit that we already have a group of experts serving as members of the National Energy Board—people who are familiar with pipe lines, the possibilities and pitfalls of this type of transmission. I suggest they are quite capable of handling all questions concerning combined pipe lines.

There will not be many pipe lines built in the near future. The one which Shell Oil proposes to build will be the longest commodity pipe line in the world—from southern Alberta to the west coast. I believe the longest pipe line in existence at the present time is about 107 miles long. Another is about 70 miles long. All the other commodity pipe lines in North America run for only very short distances.

I suggest it would be more practical for the National Energy Board to handle all pipe lines where hydrocarbons are the commodities being transmitted, also that it would be more practical for that board to have jurisdiction over pipe lines which use hydrocarbons merely as a carrier for other solids, whether in capsules or in slurry.

I trust the minister will take note of my suggestion that a better definition of combine pipe lines be given, also that he will note my proposal that combined pipe lines be excluded from the provisions of this legislation and that combined pipe lines as well as oil pipe lines be administered by the National Energy Board.

• (8:10 p.m.)

Mr. Olson: I wish to support the contention of the hon. member for Calgary South, that there will be much division in jurisdiction so far as regulatory bodies are concerned. Provincial governments also have their own agencies to deal with pipe lines. The minister has said that since there are no pipe lines which would presently come under the jurisdiction of the new Transport Commission, this is only enabling legislation granting that commission power to make and enforce regulations if and when the need arises.

In the foreseeable future it is only pipe lines built for the transmission of oil that will carry other commodities. In other words they will be combined pipe lines, and under Part II of the bill the new Transport Commission would be involved with them. On the other hand, in certain cases clause 27 allows the governor in council to give sole jurisdiction over a combined pipe line to the National Energy Board. Since the National Energy Board is the only agency with experience of pipe lines, save for certain provincial bodies which govern pipe lines within a province, perhaps it should be given all the authority necessary to see that the federal law with respect to pipe lines is carried out.

Mr. Pickersgill: What the hon. member for Calgary South and the hon. member for Medicine Hat have said is largely true. The only such pipe line project that has received much discussion is the one mentioned by the Shell Company, about which it made representations to the committee. As a result of those representations we changed the bill quite markedly.

The only interest that the Transport Commission would have in a pipe line that used oil as the carrying medium for the carriage of some other commodity, would be in relation to the rates or tolls charged for the carriage of that other commodity. As the hon. member for Medicine Hat has said, apart from certain provincial bodies the National Energy Board is the only one with any experience of dealing with pipe lines. I cannot conceive the Transport Commission would in the slightest degree be interested in dealing with matters relating to the construction of a pipe line, but the National Energy Board at present has no power under the law to regulate the tolls for commodities other than oil and gas. Thus there is a gap in the law.

This question was discussed at length both at the official level and between ministers, and in deciding where the division should come it seemed to us that if we were serious about our attempt to co-ordinate all forms of transport under one body, then the new Transport Commission should be given power over toll charges for commodities carried by pipe line.

The hon. member for Calgary South spoke rather eloquently on the subject. Before long pipe lines may become serious competitors of the railways. I would not mind if they did, because anything that improves our transport by increasing its efficiency and decreasing its costs, although it may be temporarily inconvenient for a competitor, would give a net dividend to the whole Canadian people and we should all welcome it. There should be no problem so far as combined pipe lines are concerned.

When someone comes to incorporate a company and get a charter for a pipe line, all that will happen is that one or two members of the Transport Commission will sit with the National Energy Board pro forma to hear his application, so that they will know what other commodity or commodities are proposed to be carried through the pipe line and under what sort of conditions. They will not be in the least concerned with the carriage of oil, nor will they have any right to say anything about it. Quite frankly, unless one assumes that these bodies are going to be negative and obstructive in their attitude and try to prevent progress, something which our Canadian experience does not suggest they are likely to be, then I do not anticipate any greater difficulties than if only the National Energy Board or the Transport Commission dealt with the matter.

It would be quite impossible to think of splitting the jurisdiction over the carriage of oil between the National Energy Board and the Transport Commission. That has to be under one board. On the other hand we would fail to achieve the kind of co-ordination we hope for if, with respect to the regulation of the traffic in other commodities, the new Transport Commission, which will deal with all other forms of transport, did not have jurisdiction over that.

Mr. Ballard: At present we have several oil pipe lines in Canada operated under the direction and the watchful eye of the National Energy Board. If as the result of technological improvement these oil pipe lines in the future can be made to carry capsulized solids, would the minister consider that the new Transport Commission would be committed to honour the decisions laid down in the past by the National Energy Board in terms of construction and operation?

• (8:20 p.m.)

Mr. Pickersgill: If this involves a question of existing lines carrying commodities, let me state that, so far as I am aware, no existing line can carry commodities without some adaptation in respect of valves and pumps. I am not particularly familiar with the actual operation of pipe lines, though, as a listener, during a previous parliament I had a great deal to do with that subject in this place. It is my information that all existing pipe lines would have to be adapted to the transportation of commodities such as oil.

It is inconceivable that the commission world be any more anxious than the board to impede progress of that kind. Surely that kind of progress is so patently in the national interest, the development of economic modes of transportation will not be impeded. I do not anticipate any trouble at all in this context.

We are putting the general provision in our law that no carrier may carry commodities at non-compensatory rates, and that seems to be a reasonable position. We do not want these pipe lines to carry commodities at non-compensatory rates, to put some competitor out of business. I do not envisage the likelihood of such a thing happening because it would not make sense. It is only those aspects which relate to the transportation of similar commodities by other modes of transportation which would be in the interest of the new Transport Commission.

Mr. Korchinski: I should like to ask one question arising from the minister's reply. Will there be any obligation on transportation companies to make transportation as low in cost as possible? I have in mind such things as the transportation of grain in capsule form, or perhaps coal or other solid commodities. Is there any obligation under this bill on transportation companies to develop economic modes of transport? As I read the bill before us, there is no obligation on anyone to go out and develop a cheaper method of transporting goods. The only obligation to do so results from public pressure. Can the minister give us some explanation in this regard.

Mr. Pickersgill: At the present time there is no contemplation, though there may be at some time in the future, of having the government build a pipe line. It is our hope, and frankly it is my expectation, that before very long we will observe one, two or perhaps three enterprising firms putting private capital into these lines. As a government we want to be in a position to assist them in order that they can make a go of things. We want to have a law in effect under which they may operate, and that is the only reason for Part II of the bill.

Mr. Korchinski: You see no incentive at this time?

Mr. Pickersgill: There are no commodity pipe lines in existence now.

Mr. Cantelon: Mr. Chairman, I intend to follow a course entirely different from that followed by those who have spoken so far today. I am one of those individuals who would perhaps impede progress, as the minister has put it, or obstruct progress. I am not enthusiastic about the development of commodity pipe lines because in western Canada, and in particular in the province of Saskatchewan, a great deal of industrial development is required.

In this field of industrial development we in western Canada have not done too badly, but there is a great more that must be done, and done as quickly as possible. In my opinion the development of commodity pipe lines will not add to the industrial development of my province. My feeling is that such development will accomplish exactly the opposite. Transportation will become efficient and economic to the point that products such as potash and sulphur will be moved to other areas where development will take place. I have no objection to this development taking place in Vancouver, for example. What does bother me is the thought that a great deal of the potash produced in Saskatchewan, which by 1970 will amount to about half of the world's production, will be moved to areas such as Minneapolis-St. Paul or Chicago, where it will be turned into fertilizers and other chemical products.

Germany founded its chemical industry on the production of KC1, or potash, as it is commonly known. I should like to see that same kind of chemical industry developed in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta where the natural products are in abundance. We have potash and coal in tremendous quantity. Those provinces have the power to develop a tremendous chemical industry in western Canada. For that reason I do not want to see this natural product moved south by means of commodity pipe lines.

Let me hasten to add that I would not mind this product being shipped to the Pacific coast for processing, but I certainly would object to its being shipped south by cheap commodity pipe line transportation systems. If that were done there would be no incentive whatsoever for the development of this industry in those places in Canada which lend themselves to such development.

For those reasons I cannot support the provisions of Part II of this bill in respect of commodity pipe lines. I should prefer to have a provision to the effect that commodity pipe lines should be developed only when they do not obstruct the development of those areas from which the product is removed. That is perhaps Utopia, but that is my hope.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I will be in direct conflict with the hon. member who has just spoken, but there are certain things we have in common. We are both concerned with the interests of Canadian people. The hon. member for Kindersley was interested in obtaining information, knowing that certain commodities are transportable by commodity pipe line.

• (8:30 p.m.)

I know there are rumours as to certain possibilities. For example, I know there are rumours of the possibility of wheat being transported via pipe line. In this regard I do not think the hon. member who has just spoken, the Minister of Transport, or even his sneering parliamentary secretary, would argue with me. I do not know why the parliamentary secretary to the minister insists on adopting this attitude. He does it continuously. I wonder whether he is doing it in the form of a joke or whether he thinks it makes him look more serious. However, Mr. Chairman, I hope he will understand that the difficulties presented by certain sections of the bill are not of the type that can be passed off in an easy manner.

I know that avenues are opening whereby some commodities can be transported via pipe line. I very much wish that certain other commodities could be transported in this way. In this regard I am thinking of the parliamentary secretary; I wish we could dispose of him by this means of transportation. I do not include the minister in these remarks, because I think he really wants to be serious about these matters. However, Mr. Chairman, I think that every one of us must realize that we may eventually be transported via pipe line. I hope this will be so.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Korchinski: Laugh as you like; but I wish the time would come when we would not have to depend upon the minister, or any parliamentary secretary to the minister who sneers all the time, for improvements in our transportation system, because they should realize the seriousness of the problem. We must transport our commodities to the markets that are available to us. There are commodities that are very important to the economy of the country. We have to realize that there may be a new Nova Scotia coal mine that will be producing coal that needs to be transported.

Mr. Chairman, I wish the Minister of Transport would pay a little more attention to my remarks, because I am not putting forward just a western-oriented problem; in my estimation, this is a national transportation problem. The minister and I may be subjected to a great deal of ridicule in this regard, but I think one must realize that a problem in transportation is not just the concern of western members or involved with western products but is one of transporting as a country whatever products are available from whatever part of Canada. We as a unit want to say: This is Canada, and we want to do these things. I do not know whether what I have said makes too much sense. I would point out that I did not read it from any notes. Like the Minister of Transport, I want to make a speech off-the-cuff. Perhaps because of this I will be subjected to the same type of criticism as the minister.

I admire the minister for the way in which he has been able to overcome this type of criticism. Perhaps over the years I have not been able to overcome it to the same extent. But the fact is that we have a large, common problem. Whether the problem concerns a pipe line that will bring our wheat from the western part of Canada to our ports, or whether the problem is in bringing coal from Nova Scotia to our ports, I do not know. I do not know what will be necessary to make this bill and, as a result, Canada function more effectively.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Transport is taking these matters into account. I do not want him to think that because I am a member on the opposition side of the house, representing Mackenzie, I should be sloughed off with respect to the arguments I present. I do not want him to think that because there is another hon. member in another part of the house who may be interested in these matters, I should be slighted. Quite frankly, I do not know exactly what technical knowledge is available today to our technicians upon which they can decide how best wheat can be transported to the lakehead. I do not know what technical knowledge is available today to improve the transportation of coal from Nova Scotia to central Canada, where we need it.

All I say, Mr. Chairman, is that if this information is available, whether I explain it in the way the minister wants or whether I gesticulate in a manner that he dislikes, it does not matter to me at all as long as we make use of the information. I want the minister and the department to know that people are thinking about these problems and how we can best improve our economy in transporting commodities. I do not care whether the newspapers ridicule me. I have had the doubtful benefit of being ridiculed by the newspapers. If we have available a method of transportation that is cheaper than the method now used, and the minister is informed of it, he should tell this house today.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps I could help the hon. gentleman quite a bit if he would allow me to interrupt him for a second. I believe that one of the advantages of passing this section of the bill would be that the commission would then be clearly told that the subject of commodity pipe lines was one of the matters under its jurisdiction. This would encourage the research side of this new commission to study the very problems that the hon. gentleman quite rightly thinks ought to be studied, and ought to be studied urgently. I think therefore he has made a very useful contribution in drawing this point to our attention.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Chairman, I very much appreciate what the minister has said. I do not know whether he is trying to build me up as one the useful members of the opposition; but I do not think the minister's contribution was warranted in the sense of what I really think is necessary in this connection. I believe that this type of research has always been necessary. I do not know whether the department will think this type of research is necessary because of the speech I have made. Whatever the result of these remarks upon the department, I hope for better things for the minister, as the newspapers have forecast for him.

The point is, Mr. Chairman, that I do not think the research necessary in this field is encompassed in this bill. I do not think anything is envisioned in the bill that is capable of accomplishment in the next 10 years.

Even though we hope that certain things will be accomplished, even though the government might direct research bodies to conduct research in this direction, I do not think we will really accomplish what should be accomplished in this area. I am pointing out that what should be accomplished for the one commodity with which I am very familiar, namely wheat, will not be accomplished.

• (8:40 p.m.)

The government does not do anything for bulk commodities such as coal or motorcars. I do not care how they are shipped, the point is that the cost of transportation should be cheaper. The point I am trying to make is that a cheaper method of shipping commodities must be found. I am not familiar with the technical language; I am sure that the minister is better versed in it than I am. In fact I am sure he can talk circles around me. Can he tell me whether commodities such as wheat, shirts, coal, or even politicians can be shipped east in a cheaper capsule. I do not know how to express this, and I apologize to the house. We want the cheapest transportation possible and we are not sure that this legislation will provide it. I wall ask the minister to tell us the exact way in which this legislation will affect bulk commodities.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, there are a few questions I should like to ask the minister. Can he clarify for us the meaning of the wording in clause 23 which reads:

No person, other than a company, shall construct or operate a commodity pipe line to which this act applies.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before we consider clause 23 perhaps we can agree to pass clause 22.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 22 carry?

Clause agreed to.

On clause 23—Construction and operation of commodity pipe line.

Mr. Kindt: Can the minister clarify the wording of clause 23? Perhaps I could elaborate on my question. In the construction of gas and oil pipe lines I have seen situations where a pipe line was constructed by a Canadian firm down to the boundary line, and another pipe line would come up from the United States. In that case another company would have to be established to build a pipe line about half a mile long to join the other two. In some cases pipe lines constructed within a province are built by individuals, not companies. As a matter of fact a co-operative pipe line is being started in my area to distribute natural gas to a number of farmers.

[Mr. Korchinski.]

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question, which would save us both a lot of time. Such a pipe line is entirely constructed within Alberta, I understand. Any pipe line that was constructed entirely within any province would not come under this legislation but would be incorporated by the provincial authorities. It is only if it goes beyond the boundaries of a province or of Canada that the company would have to come to parliament to get an incorporation, so that any local pipe line carrying commodities would be in the same position as one carrying gas or oil. If it is entirely within the province it would not come under this law.

Mr. Kindt: The other question which I should like to put to the minister is to ask why it should be spelled out in the act that no person other than a company shall construct a commodity pipe line? We have a lot of men who have built their fortunes on oil and it is probably true that they would establish a company before they built a pipe line.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman would look back to clause 22 he would see there a definition of a company. It says there that "company" or "commodity pipe line company" means a person named in an act of parliament. Under this law he would be a company. I know this sounds kind of silly and Irish, but that would be the effect of it. All that it means is that no one who has not been authorized to construct a pipe line may do so. He cannot do so without getting prior authority.

Mr. Keays: I wonder if the minister really meant what he said when he used the words "kind of silly and Irish"?

Mr. Pickersgill: All I was suggesting was that the Irish have a gift for words that some of the rest of us are not given.

Mr. Kindt: There are one or two other points which I should like to make. There are several instances in the bill where the phrase mutatis mutandis is used. I should like to ask the minister first of all what is the meaning of this Latin legal term. Second, can the minister tell us whether there are no other words that could be used, so that the public can understand the bill without having to resort to a dictionary. These are concepts, and unless one has taken a course in law he would not know what they meant. Can the minister give us an explanation as to why simpler words are not used in this bill?

Mr. Pickersgill: The expression to which the hon. member referred is in clause 26. If we could pass on to consideration of other clauses I could get an explanation from the lawyers, because I would not want to give one on my own. Can we pass clause 23?

Mr. Harkness: I must apologize to the committee for not being here while the discussion on pipe lines was taking place, but I wonder whether any simple definition has been given as to what pipe lines would come under this act and what pipe lines would come under the National Energy Board Act?

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman would not mind reading clause 26 while we are dealing with the other clauses I think he would find that three quarters of the explanation are there, and I can do my best to give him the remaining quarter when we come to that clause.

Mr. Harkness: I have read the section but I am still not completely clear as to the distinction. Would the minister mind giving me one quarter of his explanation?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, if the hon. member does not mind waiting until we get to clause 26.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Mr. Bower: I think we are still on clause 22—

Mr. Pickersgill: No, 23.

The Chairman: Shall clause 23 carry?

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 24 and 25 agreed to.

On clause 26—Tolls and tariffs.

Mr. Pickersgill: While I am awaiting the explanation of mutatis mutandis, perhaps I could answer the question asked by the hon. member for Calgary North. We had some discussions on this point before the hon. member came into the committee in response to questions from the hon. member for Calgary South and the hon. member for Medicine Hat. Nevertheless I think I should repeat what I said, as nearly as I can, because this is very important.

Under the law, if an application is made for a commodity pipe line in which oil or gas is being used as the medium through which the commodity is transported, then under this act it would be a combined pipe line. Any application with respect to it, in order to save the time of the applicants and everyone concerned, would have to be heard at a joint hearing of the National Energy Board and the Transport Commission.

Now, the National Energy Board has exclusive jurisdiction over the transport of oil or gas through a line. The Transport Commission will have no authority over that whatever. The authority of the Transport Commission will extend only to the transport of the other commodity. It is my expectation, since the National Energy Board has had considerable experience in dealing with these applications, that in so far as the building of the pipe line is concerned, the specifications and everything of that sort, the new commission will rely entirely upon the National Energy Board. All the new commission would, in fact, really concern itself with would be the actual operation of the line, and only with that aspect of the operation which related to the other commodity being carried in the line.

Mr. Harkness: May I ask the minister if it is spelled out definitely either in this bill or in the National Energy Act, as he stated, that the new commission will rely entirely on the findings of the National Energy Board with regard to a pipe line of this type?

Mr. Pickersgill: Regarding the construction and specifications?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would think it would be very difficult to spell that out absolutely because a problem would arise if there were a pipe line that carried no oil or gas at all. I believe that the first thing that would be done by the two agencies in respect of the first application would be to lay down certain general principles that would be followed, so that when an application came forward, if one did, for a pipe line that would not carry oil or gas, the commission would know how to deal with the matter. I suspect that for a long time to come the Transport Commission would be apt to consult, perhaps even invite a member of the board to be present at any hearing for a pipe line that did not carry oil or gas, in so far as the construction and specifications were concerned. These are matters on which the National Energy Board has a great deal of knowledge. Fundamentally, all that the Transport Commission needs to be interested in, beyond making sure that proper specifications are made for safety and things of that sort, is the transport of the commodity and not the building of a line.

It is our desire, and the bill has been so framed after the closest consultation at the official level and the ministerial level between my department and the National Energy Board, that we have a practical method of doing this which is not going to incommode the public.

Mr. Harkness: I appreciate that the authority for the construction of the pipe line should rest with the National Energy Board. However, as indicated by the first question I asked, there is an ambiguous area here. I think it would be advisable, since it is not spelled out in the National Energy Act, that it should be spelled out in this bill when the committee is considering it. I wonder if the minister, and the expert draftsmen who are available to him, could produce some type of wording which would make this matter absolutely clear and definite?

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest to the hon. member for Calgary North that clause 26(2), does precisely that. In effect, the clause says that any company operating a combined pipe line shall not charge tolls except tolls specified and approved by and filed with both the commission and the National Energy Board. Then, the provisions of sections 50 to 59 of the National Energy Act shall apply mutatis mutandis—I will say a word on that in a moment—in respect of the carriage by the combined pipe line of any commodity, as if the commission were referred to in those provisions instead of the National Energy Board.

I interpret that to mean that the rules that have been laid down in the National Energy Act for the governing of tolls are applied as though they were the provisions of this bill for the purpose of making tolls with respect to the commodity referred to here.

Mr. Harkness: The minister says he interprets this provision in a certain way. As he has indicated in the house on many occasions, he is not a lawyer and neither am I. Has he asked the law officers of the crown for their interpretation of this clause? I know some of the law officers have drafted this particular section, but has he asked the deputy minister of justice for his interpretation of it?

Mr. Pickersgill: The whole of this part of the bill respecting commodity pipe lines was drafted, as the hon. gentleman knows, by the Department of Justice in consultation with the officers of my department and the National Energy Board. They were specifically instructed to make sure that there was a clear definition of the functions of each, with no possibility of conflict on these matters, in so far as could be foreseen. I simply have to rely in this connection on the advice I receive. I am advised that both my department and the National Energy Board are completely satisfied we have dealt with this problem in a manner that will work. Of course, you can never tell, as the hon. gentleman knows, until you put this to the test.

Mr. Harkness: You cannot tell what the courts will do.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right. I am advised that mutatis mutandis indicates that the provisions will be read with the necessary changes being made in the actual language to make the provisions apply. I think this is the reason they use Latin, they can say in two words what it means. If I could put that in my rather vulgar, colloquial English, I would think the mutatis meant change and mutandis meant changing. This means you change the clauses from one bill to the other and you make the necessary changes in words so that they will make sense without changing the fundamental meaning. I am sure the hon. gentleman understands completely.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Kindt: It is as clear as mud.

Mr. Harkness: As far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I would be quite happy to leave this matter at this point. I am not talking about mutatis mutandis; I am talking about the statement the minister has just made and am merely expressing the hope that his interpretation of this clause is that given him by the law officers of the crown and will be accepted in the future as the meaning of the phrase, which has not always been the case with other legislation we have passed in this house.

Mr. Pickersgill: I join in the prayer.

Mr. Bower: Mr. Chairman, I would have preferred to speak on clause 22, but apparently I missed it. However, I think the kind of questions I have to raise are relevant to clause 26.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would mind, but the hon. member for Macleod was half way through a question when I interrupted him. Would the hon. member mind letting him finish his question first?

Mr. Kindt: I thank the hon. gentleman for permitting me to complete my question. I still did not understand from the minister whether a change was going to be made, or is the wording going to remain exactly as it is? I realize that he can always consult a dictionary and find the meaning of these Latin words—and some of us here have taken Latin. But it rubs me the wrong way, as I am sure it does the people of Canada, when I pick up a statute and find certain Latin phrases used in it. Even the Roman Catholic religion is changing from Latin to English. Surely the minister does not want to allow his legal advisers to use words in an act of which the minister has to send out for the meaning. In other words, he himself is not too sure what they mean.

The reason he does not know is because they are a concept that the lawyers may interpret one way, that the minister may interpret another and that somebody else may interpret yet another way. It is like many of these economic concepts; there are legal interpretations there too.

I contend that in this kind of public statute this sort of language should not be used. I do not believe that the legal officers of the justice department should be permitted to put Latin words into this bill which the general public do not understand. I understand that the minister is going to change them; is that the thought?

Mr. Pickersgill: No; I am going to appeal to the hon. gentleman's better nature. I am trying to make what is an almost desperate effort to get a new transport bill through. I think it is asking a little more than one human being should be asked to do, all at once, to change the whole system of legal drafting at this time. If the hon. gentleman would give me 48 hours to get my bill through I will then have a hassle with the Department of Justice to see whether I can get them to go as far into the twentieth century as the Catholic Church is going. But please do not ask me to do that on this bill.

Mr. Bower: Mr. Chairman, I would have preferred to speak on clause 22, the definitions clause, which I find very puzzling. However, I think that what I am about to say is relevant to clause 26. I am puzzled about the distinction made between commodity and hydrocarbon lines. Apparently a commodity line means a line that transports solids, presumably in air or in some other medium. To me a hydrocarbon is also a commodity. I should like to point out—

Mr. Pickersgill: I think I can save the hon. gentleman and perhaps the committee a lot of time if I point out that a commodity as defined by this bill is what the bill says it is, not what the dictionary says it is. The bill says it is a commodity other than oil or gas. So it could not be a hydrocarbon; it would have to be something else. If it is just a hydrocarbon, then it does not count, as far as the way the word "commodity" as defined in the bill is concerned.

Mr. Bower: I have another point that I should like to make, Mr. Chairman. There are hydrocarbons which are solids, and the bill distinguishes between hydrocarbons and solids. There are solid hydrocarbons; for example, there is Grahamite, Gilsonite and Albertite. I know a pipe line that is presently transporting Gilsonite. A hydrocarbon can be as solid as a chunk of coal. This material is being refined in Salt Lake City. If we do not have some understanding of these terms well in hand, then later on when the act which we all hope is going to bring about a better transportation system in Canada comes into effect, we will run into difficulties of interpretation.

I should like to hear what the minister has to say about this question. How do we distinguish between a hydrocarbon which is in gaseous or liquid form and one in a solid form, which is something quite distinct? You can have solid hydrocarbons.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think I made a terrible mistake when I allowed the hon. member to lead me down this particular garden path. It is quite obvious that I am faced with an expert, and I am just a simple country lad. I think the governing words are "oil and gas", not "hydrocarbon", so far as the definition section is concerned. I think we all know pretty well what is meant by oil and gas.

If the problem became too difficult I think the governor in council would take advantage of the clause that enables him to exempt the material in question from the jurisdiction of the transport board, and to leave it entirely to the National Energy Board, the problem being too hard for both of them to solve. I think that is the way to deal with the situation, should it become that difficult. These things are usually a lot easier to solve in practice than when we are theorizing about them beforehand.

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Just a word, Mr. Chairman. I will not draw out the debate, because I am one of those who are beginning to admire the heroism of the minister who is enduring that marathon or talkathon with exemplary patience.

I noted earlier that an hon. member of the opposition tried to create a scandal about the use of the expression mutatis mutandis and even tried to insinuate that the minister was guilty of heresy, at least according to the new principle of the Catholic church. To quiet the conscience of that hon. colleague, I would like to remind him that, in all the French dictionaries—the small ones, not the big ones—as well as in all the English dictionaries—the small ones, not the big ones—he will find the expression mutatis mutandis; it is a Latin term which has found its place in the French and English languages. He will also find a quite simple and short explanation of it: with due alteration of details in comparing cases.

Therefore, I feel that the minister must not waste his time scolding and taking his legal advisers to task, because they used a word which is apparently too learned. It is quite a simple word and, as I said, it is used both in French and in English. I am of the opinion, therefore, that the minister does not have to go to confession.

[English]

Clause agreed to.

• (9:10 p.m.)

On clause 27—Application of National Energy Board Act.

Mr. Olson: The minister has tried to give us an absolute assurance that the operation, construction and all those other specifications for combined pipe lines will be under the jurisdiction of the National Energy Board. Subclause 1 of clause 27 says:

> The commission has and shall exercise in respect of a commodity pipe line company and its works and undertakings the like jurisdiction, duties and powers as are vested in or exercisable by the National Energy Board—

Then, in subclause 4 we find:

> The commission may, with the approval of the governor in council, by order, upon such terms and conditions as it considers advisable, require a company operating a commodity pipe line, according to its powers, without delay and with due care and diligence, to receive, transport and deliver through its pipe line any substance capable of being transmitted therein.

This contradicts the assurance that the minister has given. We are not saying that the governor in council has not the power to confer these responsibilities on the National Energy Board; all clause 27 says is that the commission shall have authority, in so far as commodity pipe lines are concerned. Then a commodity pipe line becomes a combined pipe line if gas, oil or hydrocarbons are used in it.

I am not moving an amendment, but I draw attention to subclause 4 of clause 27. We know that there will be regulations respecting all the things involved in the standards and specifications for capsules, etc., and the terms and conditions under which a pipe line company as a common carrier will have to receive, transport and deliver things coming into its care, when this part becomes operative. Part II of the act, when it becomes operative, says that the commission will make all regulations, and it is authorized to do this under clause 27, with respect to all specifications, etc., in the way the National Energy Board makes these regulations. All I am saying is that what appears in clause 27, in so far as there will be this authority, seems at variance with the assurance the minister has tried to give this committee, saving the one part where the governor in council has the right to transfer the jurisdiction with respect to a combined pipe line, in certain cases, exclusively to the National Energy Board. The fact remains, however, that when this bill is passed parliament will have said that the commission shall have this authority, and I am apprehensive about that.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think I can clear the hon. gentleman's point quickly. Paragraph 1 refers to a commodity pipe line, not to a combined pipe line. Nobody has any jurisdiction at the present time over a commodity pipe line, and this part refers to a commodity pipe line as one in which there is no oil or gas. Somebody must have authority over a commodity pipe line. Even subclause 2 says that the commission may use the rules laid down by the National Energy Board. My opinion is that having no other rules, they would almost be bound to do that as a matter of common sense.

Mr. Olson: A few minutes ago the minister said that all these things other than pipe lines—and I refer to specifications for construction, for maintenance, for terms and conditions, and the like—would be left with the authority that has the experience with them, namely, the National Energy Board. This disturbs me.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it would be true. I am sure that the pattern with respect to combined pipe lines would be used by the commission in so far as it would operate in respect of a commodity pipe line that was not a combined pipe line. There must be some authority to make rulings. What I said was, not that the bill gives the National Energy Board the exclusive jurisdiction, because it does not—it quite expressly says that they must both act—but that I was sure that with a case of a combined pipe line they would follow all the rules which the National Energy Board has adopted, which are working very well. I also expressed the view, and it is supported by clause 27, that even in the case of the commodity pipe line the National Energy Board has nothing to do with it, because it does not carry oil or gas.

Even in that case they would still be almost certain, as far as possible, to use the same pattern, because it would be quite ridiculous to waste time and energy by establishing a different pattern. I am quite convinced that this sort of thing will happen. I am also pretty sure that in respect of a combined pipe line the governor in council would very likely, so far as construction and all these other matters are concerned, insist that the rules worked out by the National Energy Board be followed.

Mr. Olson: I will accept that for the moment because there is not in operation in Canada today anything to which the rules respecting commodity and combined pipe lines will apply. I accept the minister's explanation with this reservation; notwithstanding the minister's assurance, what he says does not accord completely with the written words of the clause. I hope the minister will understand that reservation.

Mr. Schreyer: I do not know if the hon. member for Medicine Hat is opposed to the substance of clause 27, but I want to express to the minister complete support for the provisions of that clause. In fact I support all that part of part II lying between clauses 22 to 28 inclusive. It seems to me that the minister and his department have succeeded here in providing for almost all contingencies. Not covered is the unforeseeable, and who can blame the minister for not dealing with that.

I am concerned with that part of the bill which will provide for an awkward or cumbersome administration of these matters. Nevertheless on a close reading of the clause it seems to me that there is sufficient flexibility here, through joint hearings and transfer of jurisdiction by order in council, to enable the commission and the government at some future date to take steps to see that there is no unnecessary bureaucratic delay. I think this part of the bill ought to be supported.

Mr. Harkness: I wish to ask a question of the minister about subclause 4, which appears to enable the commission to regulate a company to carry anything through a pipe line which is capable of being carried.

Quite a few commodities are capable of being carried through a pipe line, but some of them could be very incompatible with other commodities being normally carried. Were such a situation to arise does this legislation force the commission to say you must carry that commodity even though it will foul your pipe line and make more or less impossible the carrying of what you normally carry in your pipe line?

Mr. Pickersgill: To avoid that risk this section says that there must be the approval of the governor in council for such a requirement. The commission cannot do it of its own volition; it can only make a submission to the governor in council. If he decides to agree with this then, as the hon. gentleman knows, because he has sat on this side of the house, the minister would make that kind of regulation. But he would only make it if he were sure he was right. This applies only to common carriers. It is to make sure that a pipe line company will not refuse to carry a commodity of its competitors while carrying its own to their detriment, that is, fail to be a common carrier.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Bower: Further to the question asked previously by an hon. member on this side, I should like to ask the minister whether the approval of the governor in council would be necessary in the case of a combined pipe line when the introduction of another product, while not physically fouling the line, would add substantially to the cost of whatever was hitherto being transported. How could this type of incompatibility be resolved?

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, this is, to me, an extreme and unreasonable situation. We shall have to assume that no government would be so silly or so careless as to allow that kind of situation to arise. The hon. member for Springfield was very charitable a few minutes ago when he said we had foreseen all that could be foreseen. I think the hon. and ingenious member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare, who has embarrassed me once already, has done so for a second time. He seems to know too much. But I think there would be an appeal as far as rates are concerned if the commission attempted to set a rate which was unfair, having regard to the rate for another commodity. There would be an appeal to the governor in council and this would have to be dealt with.

I really do not think the kind of situation which the hon. member envisages could arise. If it did, I think there would be such an awful row, politically, that the government which had been foolish enough to do this, would get its due desserts.

Mr. Bower: Would it not be possible to express the terms of this clause so as not to invite these awful rows five, ten or 15 years from now?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think one could ever devise any legislation which would meet every conceivable and, above all, inconceivable situation. I think I have done just about the best I can in this matter.

Mr. Bower: Is it not possible to put it in another way so as not to invite difficulties later?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think it is, sir.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 28—Exemption.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to ask the minister to tell us the purpose of this clause. Is it designed to take care of any difficulties of the kind to which I was referring a few minutes ago? The powers conferred here are broad and I am wondering whether the clause is really necessary.

Mr. Pickersgill: Where a pipe line is wholly owned by a company, and intended to carry only its own products it would need to be exempted from the provisions of 27(4). We do not wish to prevent pipe lines of this kind from operating if there is good economic reason for having them. That is one of the reasons we put in this clause. There might be any number of combinations of circumstances in which some of the provisions would be unreasonable. The hon. member will note that this, again, requires the approval of the governor in council. Obviously, anything of this sort would have to be done in public and be subject to public scrutiny so I do not think there could be any arbitrary exercise of power.

Clause agreed to.

The Chairman: The committee will now proceed to the discussion of clause 74.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

On clause 74—Cessation of "bridge subsidy".

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I have gone through the clauses which are still left in an effort to be helpful. There is some indication on this side of the house that we would be willing to pass anything that is left—I imagine we will want to move on to clause 16—but that we should hold over clause 74 and clause 1 until tomorrow. The minister will recall that we had only one hour for supper. We talked about getting more than an hour, but it was still just the meagre hour we have had for the last three weeks. The members interested in this matter were not able to study the amendment fully; it is extremely complicated.

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall not attempt to resist. I accept at once. Would it be possible, then, to take clause 16 and also clause 50. Perhaps we could take clause 50 first. I do not think there will be any discussion of it.

On clause 50—

Mr. Pickersgill: I would just like the Minister of Fisheries to move that in clause 50, section 329A be renumbered 329. If my hon. friend would make that amendment and the committee would accept it, I think we could dispose of clause 50.

Mr. Robichaud: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Olson: Are there any other clauses in the bill which relate to 329?

Mr. Pickersgill: No. I think this would have to be done, anyway. Once we have dealt with clause 74 there are some other technical changes, editorial changes, which I think we could agree to allow the law clerks to make.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 16—Definition of "carrier".

Mr. Pickersgill: Now, if we can proceed to clause 16 I should like to ask my colleague to move another amendment and this time, fortunately, I have it drafted. It affects page 9 and it changes a couple of "of's" to "to's" where the English was bad in 3(a) and it adds "or to the movement of commodities through Canadian ports".

Mr. Robichaud: I move:

That Bill C-231 be amended by striking out paragraph (a) of subclause (3) of clause 16 on pages 9 and 10 thereof and substituting therefor the following:

"(a) whether the tolls or conditions specified for the carriage of traffic under the rate so established are such as to create

(i) an unfair disadvantage beyond any disadvantage that may be deemed to be inherent in the location or volume of the traffic, the scale of operation connected therewith or the type of traffic or service involved, or

(ii) an undue obstacle to the interchange of commodities between points in Canada or an unreasonable discouragement to the development of primary or secondary industries or to export trade in or from any region of Canada or to the movement of commodities through Canadian ports; or

• (9:30 p.m.)

This is the amendment which on Friday I indicated I would like to move and that I said this afternoon I would ask the Minister of Fisheries to move.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, I so move.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): This is part of the package deal that the minister offered in lieu of other amendments that were proposed and, although we were more ambitious in our aim, this is a statement of intention that helps to call attention to our problems.

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall clause 16 as amended carry.

Mr. Barnett: I wish to ask the minister one or two questions before the clause carries. I am sure he will agree that much time has been spent discussing railway matters but I do not want to pursue that aspect of the bill. He will recall that on the first clause I raised some matters in connection with water transportation which have been of concern to me for quite some time. As I said on previous occasions in this chamber, by and large transportation by water is the only form of public transportation that appears not to have fallen under the normal form of public jurisdiction that has been applied to other modes of transportation.

To people who are virtually dependant on water transportation, proper facilities and proper rates are just as important as any of the questions that have been discussed at length with respect to rail traffic. So far as I can see the only amendment dealing with the Transport Act in this bill is a purely incidental one which would provide that the name Canadian Transport Commission be used or changed to comply with the terms of this new bill. The question I ask is what changes in substance, if any, are being brought about with regard to regulation of water transport under the provisions of this bill?

The general purpose of the bill with respect to railways is to relax some of the more rigid controls which heretofore have applied with respect to their operations. I am not going to debate the pros and cons of that question. The minister and other hon. members have done so at length, but what changes does the bill introduce to provide public jurisdiction over water transport so that there may be some degree of parity in that respect?

Clause 16 and the immediate preceding clauses make some reference to transportation by water, and although the new commission will have some powers of investigation, of keeping records, making reports, and possibly making recommendations to the governor in council, powers such as existing regulatory bodies have had, I have not been able to see any alteration in real substance with respect to regulation of the carriage of goods and passengers by water. Can the minister indicate what he has in mind on this subject? If he can satisfy me, that may be the end of the matter?

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman was quite right in speaking about this matter on clause 16 because it is really the only clause of the bill to which it is strictly relevant. As the hon. gentleman knows, the clause has been substantially amended in committee. It applies to all carriers under the jurisdiction of parliament, and not solely to railways.

Although it does not establish a system for the setting of rates, it does provide that anyone who feels that a rate which has been set is not in the public interest would have the right to appear before the board and, if he can make a case, get the rate changed. An amendment has provided a definition of certain aspects of the public interest that will be taken into account, such as the giving of undue advantage to one shipper over another where other conditions are similar.

It may well be that with the experience which the Transport Commission will gain it may feel it will have to go more deeply into this matter than has been the case in the past. As the hon. gentleman knows, up until now in most parts of Canada water transport rates, generally speaking, have been less expensive than other transport rates and thus have created no great problem, except perhaps with respect to the carriage of passengers in certain cases, of which I have had some experience myself. There is no question but that any rate represented to be contrary to the public interest would come within the purview of this clause.

Transportation

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Barnett: I quite agree that in a broad and general way what the minister has said is perfectly true, but when I look at this bill I see that many of the clauses, particularly those amending existing provisions of the Railway Act, include methods by which rates are to be set and procedures are to be followed having regard to the withdrawal of existing services. I still have not been able to find where there is any means for an effective functioning of machinery in these other areas.

Let me illustrate my point by referring to paragraph (d) of subclause (1) of clause 15 which says that the commission may perform such other duties as may from time to time be imposed by law on the commission in respect of any mode of transportation in Canada, including the regulation and licensing of such mode of transportation, and so on.

As I relate that to the provisions set out in clause 16, which suggests that persons who have reason to believe they are adversely affected have the right to make representations, there does not seem to be that kind of protection set forth in respect of transportation by water as is set forth in respect of the maintenance and operation of rail services.

The minister represents a constituency in Newfoundland. When that province decided to become part of Canada one of the concerns of the people had regard to the maintenance of coastal shipping services. If my understanding is correct, in order to honour that undertaking an agreement was made that services would be maintained through the agency of the Canadian National Railways, a publicly owned transportation corporation. If it were not for that fact I think the minister might have more concern about services in other parts of Canada than he appears to have.

Certainly that is not the kind of situation which exists on the Pacific coast. The operations of the Canadian National are virtually non-existent in that part of the country. At one time there were some Canadian National steamers operating there. As one of my constituents said in a recent letter, the only service that they receive, as recently announced is to be increased by 10 per cent in cost. That is a Christmas bonus in reverse. As my constituent suggested, perhaps they should be thankful that the proposed increase is not 50 per cent.

What kind of ground rules does this bill provide whereby the 10 per cent or 15 per cent increase in cost can be justified in the interests of the carrier or its customers? These are practical concerns which I have in mind. There seems to be very little reference to this sort of thing in the bill in contrast to the very expensive consideration attached to the maintenance or withdrawal of services as far as railway companies are concerned.

Could the minister be a little more specific as to what procedures he or the governor in council has in mind, that the new commission will follow when this bill comes into effect? Will a few citizens in a community have to fight for five years in order to get a hearing regarding a local situation? Will there be any modification in substance in this regard? I hope there is something more than just window dressing here.

Mr. Pickersgill: I trust that the hon. gentleman will recognize the history of this bill. The previous bill was merely an amendment to the Railway Act. The concept of the present bill evolved between 1964 and 1966. When this matter was originally being considered by the standing committee, what is now clause 16 applied only to the railway companies. That seemed to me to be an unnecessarily restrictive way of dealing with the situation. This provision was included in the first part of the bill so that it would apply to all forms of transportation.

Having regard to the case referred to by the hon. gentleman, if the people can show that this 10 per cent freight rate increase is contrary to public interest, I am sure they would be heard by the commission. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that this aspect of transportation has been neglected. It is my view that a thorough review of the regulations in respect of water transportation should be one of the first major research projects to be undertaken by the commission. Until work of that kind has been done—perhaps not on as broad a scale as the MacPherson report—I think we would be venturing into unknown waters in attempting to legislate beyond the very considerable advance in the law represented in this bill.

Mr. Barnett: The minister has referred to unknown waters. Perhaps we should consult a hydrographic expert in this regard. I do not wish to pursue this matter because I want to give the minister and the commission an opportunity to find out what sort of job they can do in carrying out the expressed intent of this bill.

There is one other aspect I should like to refer to. This arises from an increase in freight rates in coastal areas of British Columbia, or at least a contemplated increase. As the minister probably knows, there have been some constitutional questions regarding the status of Vancouver Island, probably arising out of the fact that it was formerly a crown colony which joined the mainland, for better or for worse. One of the persuasive arguments for that joining was the promise that a railway would be built to Esquimalt.

It is my understanding that an application will be made within the next few days to the Board of Public Utilities in British Columbia in respect of a proposed 10 per cent increase in truck freight rates to Vancouver Island. One issue that has been raised, and I have been asked to get some information in this regard, relates to jurisdiction over transportation to Vancouver Island by water.

• (9:50 p.m.)

It has been alleged, as I understand it, that the need for this increase in truck freight rates on Vancouver Island arises in part from the cost of transporting by water from the mainland to Vancouver Island. I was informed that the Board of Transport Commissioners exercises jurisdiction in respect of railway freight moving from Vancouver Island to other ports, and that the tariffs of the railway companies are filed with the board in respect of those rates. But to the best of my ability to determine, this has not very much relationship to the freight rates. Some people say that the Canadian Pacific line across there should be regarded strictly as part of the railway and subject to jurisdiction directly in regard to all forms of goods or modes of carrying goods on their lines. But I understand this is not a matter that has, strictly speaking, been established under federal law.

Can the minister give me any clarification as to the application necessary, if any, in terms of this bill and the activities of the new Transport Commission in dealing with a situation such as this, which in part lies, and I presume will still lie, with the Public Utilities Commission of British Columbia, the body which deals with intraprovincial trucking rates?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think the only answer I can give to the hon. gentleman, and I do it sadly, is no. I do not think I could give him any opinion that would be worth what it would cost, and that would be nothing. The conundrum the hon. gentleman has put is so complicated that it is completely beyond my capacity to explain. But it is something that I think the new Transport Commission would have to wrestle with.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, the minister knows that Vancouver Island has been an island for quite a long time. Until the minister follows through with a suggestion that we discussed earlier about a causeway or tunnel to Vancouver Island, this is a pretty important question to some 300,000 people who live on that island. I hope the minister means it when he says he will have the new Transport Commission look into this problem. I would not quarrel with his suggestion that it is a complicated matter. I have been baffled by it and do not suggest that I have a constitutional or legal answer to the problem. Nevertheless it is a very real problem to these people, and I am sure that the minister, representing people who live on an island, appreciates the problem and will have this matter studied by the new Transport Commission, perhaps in consultation with bodies like the Public Utilities Commission of British Columbia.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I have just one question to ask the minister. I think I have asked only one other question in connection with this whole bill. I believe this one was dealt with previously in regard to clause 16(1) which concerns commodity pipe lines. I notice that the definition of commodity pipe lines excludes oil and gas, which is under the jurisdiction of the National Energy Board. I take it the minister can say definitely that it does not apply to oil and gas. I would point out that I am being brief with my question. As I understand it, this clause will not apply to oil and gas transmission lines, or one or the other.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, I am trying to get some problems unravelled and I think the minister may be able to help. The amendments made—I am going back in Hansard now—by the hon. member for Springfield and the hon. member for Acadia were dealt with in what way? What happened to them?

Mr. Pickersgill: They have been passed. One of them has been further amended by my hon. friend the Minister of Fisheries to include the amendment; but that was really an amendment to the clause as amended. So that we passed the amendments that were put in when we were dealing with this clause before, and one of them has been further amended to include the reference to ports. This is the amendment the committee just adopted.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the discussion as to ports that was brought on originally by the amendment to clause 1. I want to say something about that later. But I should like to straighten my thinking on the situation. My question is really prompted by a question of the hon. member for Kindersley who asked about the Manitoba amendments. I would point out that if I had the whole of new clause 16, it would be helpful. Could I ask merely what happened to the two amendments that were made, first by the hon. member for Springfield and second by the hon. member for Acadia?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I thought I had with me the clause as amended up to now. I am sure I have it somewhere; but I am getting to the stage of having such an accumulation of papers that I cannot find it.

Mr. Cantelon: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I might clarify the point we have in mind. As reported at page 11623, the hon. member for Acadia wanted to make an amendment. This is to be found in the right hand column of that page, about two thirds of the way down the page, as follows:

> That after the words "may prejudicially affect" in line 32 of clause 16 (b) the following words be inserted "the business of the complainant or"

This was before the words "the public interest." I asked a question at the time in connection with this matter, namely whether the question of the public interest was protected.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, that amendment was withdrawn; it was not pressed by the hon. member, if I remember correctly. A consolidated amendment was adopted by the committee and passed upon the suggestion of the hon. member for Acadia, the hon. member for Peace River and the hon. member for Springfield. These changes were all put together into a single amendment. I am speaking from memory, and I wish someone would send me a copy of the clause as revised. I ought to have it here. These changes were all put into one amendment, and that clause as amended has been tonight further amended by adding a few words at the bottom with respect to the ports, as part of the previous amendment.

Mr. Cantelon: That is the matter in which I am particularly interested, Mr. Chairman. I hope we can have those amendments before us before this clause is finally passed.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the document is on its way to me now, Mr. Chairman. I am sure it is in Hansard, if someone could find it.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Springfield was concerned in this amendment. The problem is that I cannot find the record in Hansard. Of course, it may appear in later editions of Hansard; I have only looked at three or four days. It may be that the record shows the withdrawal of the amendment. This is the difficulty with a bill of this complexity.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, while the minister is waiting for the document to arrive I think I can explain what happened with respect to clause 16. As is shown at page 11623 of Hansard, I was about to move an amendment to clause 16 and found that at the time an amendment was apparently before us. Therefore I did not move my amendment. Later I was dissuaded from doing so by the minister, who assured the committee that the intent of the proposed amendment would be incorporated in the wording of clause 16. Could I suggest to the minister that, as we have to hold the bill over for clauses 1 and 74, he undertake to show us the revised clause 16 tomorrow, rather than passing it now?

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. Pickersgill: If that is the desire of the committee, I hope it will not breed another debate on clause 16, but I can only express my hope. I will be very glad to have a copy made of it as it was amended previously and as it has been amended further tonight and I will have enough copies tomorrow to be circulated generally. Perhaps I should not ask to have it passed but I could make a deal. Perhaps hon. members could agree to pass the schedule which we forgot the other day after we reached clause 94.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the schedule carry?

Schedule agreed to.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, may we revert to clause 1?

On clause 1—National transportation policy.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to move an amendment on clause 1 which is the same as the amendment to clause 16.

Mr. Churchill: Will the minister have exhausted all his amendments by the time we pass the bill? He seems to have a whole sheaf of them.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have here a new printing of clause 1 and I would suggest that it be inserted in Hansard.

Mr. Woolliams: Can the minister inform us whether the amendment to clause 1 will have any effect on clause 74?

Mr. Pickersgill: None whatsoever, but I wish to put it on record so that everyone can see it. Perhaps the simplest way would be to ask that clause 1 be withdrawn and the new clause substituted in its place.

Mr. McIlraith: I move:

That Bill C-231, An Act to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other Acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential provisions, be amended by striking out Clause 1 on page 1 thereof and substituting therefor the following:

National transportation policy.

"1. It is hereby declared that an economic, efficient and adequate transportation system making the best use of all available modes of transportation at the lowest total cost is essential to protect the interests of the users of transportation and to maintain the economic well-being and growth of Canada, and that these objectives are most likely to be achieved when all modes of transport are able to compete under conditions ensuring that having due regard to national policy and to legal and constitutional requirements

(a) regulation of all modes of transport will not be of such a nature as to restrict the ability of any mode of transport to compete freely with any other modes of transport;

(b) each mode of transport, so far as practicable, bears a fair proportion of the real costs of the resources, facilities and services provided that mode of transport at public expense;

(c) each mode of transport, so far as practicable, receives compensation for the resources, facilities and services that it is required to provide as an imposed public duty; and

(d) each mode of transport so far practicable carries traffic to or from any point in Canada under tolls and conditions that do not constitute

(i) an unfair disadvantage in respect of any such traffic beyond that disadvantage inherent in the location or volume of the traffic, the scale of operation connected therewith or the type of traffic or service involved, or

(ii) an undue obstacle to the interchange of commodities between points in Canada or unreasonable discouragement to the development of primary or secondary industries or to export trade in or from any region of Canada or to the movement of commodities through Canadian ports; and this Act is enacted in accordance with and for the attainment of so much of these objectives as fall within the purview of subject matters under the jurisdiction of Parliament relating to transportation."

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that the new clause 1 be substituted for the original clause in the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 1 as amended stands.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, there is a point which I should like to make, because it may forestall debate on clause 1 tomorrow, it also has implications on clause 16 and, as I have mentioned before, this amendment is partly the result of representations we made. I do not wish to leave an impression on the record that my comment is very profound but I would point out to the minister that some phrases such as "undue obstacle" and "unreasonable discouragement" leave me cold. These phrases somehow create the impression that the maritimes will be getting something that they did not have before. We still have the same geographic difficulties. I agree with what the minister is doing regarding the setting up of the final debate for tomorrow and I do not think it will be a long debate.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I comprehended correctly the wishes of the committee, the order in which we will take the clauses tomorrow will be to take first, clause 74, second, clause 16 and finally clause 1. If that is the general wish of the committee perhaps that could be understood so that there will be no difficulty tomorrow.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it so understood?

Mr. Schreyer: I have one last question with regard to procedure on this bill. There was a certain amendment made to proposed section 314D, subsection 4 of the bill, and the amendment was accepted. I believe it was referred to the law officers for what you would call drafting amendments. Before we actually pass the bill in committee tomorrow, I am wondering if the minister would agree to circulate a few copies of the new subsection 4 of section 314D?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, I would be glad to do that. I think we did actually tidy it up at the very end on Friday, in that exercise we went through.

Mr. Schreyer: I could check Hansard, but I do not believe it is in there.

Mr. Pickersgill: In any case, I will do what the hon. gentleman has suggested and get some copies. I trust that someone is making notes of these things that are to be available tomorrow. The clause was passed, and I do not believe there is any question about that.

I am grateful to hon. gentlemen for the tidying up of these last few items. Perhaps there is one other thing upon which we might have an understanding tonight. I am informed by the draftsmen that there are changes in the numbering of the clauses consequent upon the amendment to clause 74. If it could be agreed by the committee that these editorial changes could be made by the Law Clerk and the draftsmen before the bill is printed for third reading, I think that would save a lot of time, rather than going through a lot of minor, technical amendments that would have no consequence other than making the bill intelligible.

Mr. McCleave: The repository of the third super-authority in this area, the Law Clerk of the House of Commons, Dr. Ollivier, exercises that right all the time and says it is inherent in his office. We had this out in the committee earlier, so I think that can be done without making a specific request.

Mr. Pickersgill: I just did it for greater certainty.

Mr. Deachman: In so far as providing copies for tomorrow is concerned of some of the lengthier amendments, I wonder if several copies could be made for this side of the house? There are some of us who are following the bill with keen interest, mutatis mutandis, with members on the other side.

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall endeavour to anticipate the unforeseeable and get copies for everybody.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it understood that tomorrow when the committee resumes the order of consideration of clauses will be 74, with an amendment; 16 as amended, and clause 1 as amended?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: Tomorrow?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we propose to continue, and I hope complete, the committee stage of the legislation which was occupying the time of the house today. Then we will proceed to order No. 117, the bill to amend the Judges Act. Then there are two references to the committee on privileges and elections. Then there is the Canadian National financing bill, order No. 79 on the order paper.

• (10:10 p.m.)

Then there is item 62 on the order paper, a bill to provide for the establishment of a Canadian Film Development Corporation; the resolution in relation to the adoption of "O Canada" as the national anthem of Canada and "God Save the Queen" as the royal anthem; the resolution to set up a special committee to deal with the temporary rules and other related reforms. That will be enough for tomorrow.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Mr. Speaker: Before putting the adjournment motion to the house, earlier this evening it was announced that one of the questions to be considered during the adjournment debate, in the name of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams), was allowed to stand. By agreement a question standing in the name of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) has been substituted, with the agreement of course of the hon. member for Bow River.

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

EDUCATION—TORONTO—POSSIBLE CLOSING OF SCHOOLS FOR IMMIGRANT CHILDREN

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, on January 13 I inquired of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration about a request presented to the government from the Toronto board of education for financial support from the federal government for language schools for immigrant children which were threatened with closure for lack of funds.

One such school is known as the Main Street school in the east end of the city of Toronto. This one school alone provides accommodation for 132 pupils at a time. It gives special training to children of immigrants in the 13 to 17 year old bracket, so that they can be integrated into the regular school system. They stay at this special school as long as necessary so as to be able later to take full advantage of education in the ordinary system. The average stay of these pupils is six months, and in one year roughly 250 children of immigrants are taught English in order to fit them for ordinary schooling. The additional cost per pupil is roughly $538 per year, nearly double the ordinary cost of schooling. The total additional cost per year, therefore, is in the neighbourhood of $134,000.

I am raising this question, Mr. Speaker, as a matter of principle. It is my contention that the federal government, by reason of its responsibility in the field of immigration, has a duty to encourage and assist local authorities to shoulder this burden. In his reply the minister once again hid behind the tattered cloak of constitutional lack of responsibility, and as reported at page 11755 of Hansard said:

> I think there is no federal responsibility in the field of language training in schools, even for immigrants.

I think the minister is wrong.

No one denies that the field of education generally belongs to the provinces. No one, at least not I, is suggesting that this be taken away. But it is the federal authority that seeks to encourage the admission of suitable immigrants to this country and that controls the flow of immigrants. It is the federal government that quite properly provides that immigrants are entitled and encouraged to bring their children and their families to this country. It is the federal government that recently published a white paper on Canada's immigration policy.

At page 139 of the white paper it is stated that people who come to Canada should receive the kind of services that they need to start productive employment in Canada. This, it says, means that they need language training. I suggest that obviously this does not apply to adults only; the entire white paper on immigration is geared to the idea that productive employment in the future will be based on literacy, education and adaptability.

If children between the age of 13 and 17 years who come to Canada as immigrants with their parents are to be handicapped in their education by a deficiency in or lack of knowledge of the English language, this will affect their contribution to productive employment very likely throughout the whole of their working lives.

• (10:20 p.m.)

Chapter 6 of the white paper, which starts by extolling the virtues of co-operation, ends with these words:

> Above all, satisfactory ways of improving language teaching facilities will be sought.

They will be sought by the government.

I suggest that one is entitled to wonder whether the Minister of Manpower and Immigration has read the white paper put out by his department. Discussing this matter, the Globe and Mail in an editorial on January 7 said this:

> Manpower Minister Jean Marchand should be, if necessary, shamed into a similar position.

The editorial refers to a position of giving financial support to the maintenance of such schools.

Mr. Speaker, I hope even if my words are not sufficient to shame the minister, some members of his own party coming from constituencies where there are many immigrants and children of immigrants will shame the minister into changing his position. Certainly a government which trains adult immigrants and teaches them English, a government which accepts responsibility for training children of persons in the armed services, a government which I understand spends roughly $50 million a year on the education of Indian children, cannot shirk its responsibility for assisting immigrant children under the pretext of some imagined constitutional impotence. I hope the minister will consider this question carefully and announce a change of policy.

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the reply of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration given on Friday, January 13, 1967, is so clear and reasonable that I must confess some surprise that the hon. member for Greenwood should raise this question here tonight. The hon. member has chosen to demonstrate that he is a lawyer, by scoffing at the law of the constitution as a tattered veil.

The minister is eager that all residents of Canada have the education or training they need to lead good lives in this country. This of course is obvious. I think even the hon. member for Greenwood would admit that a line must be drawn between those areas in which the government of Canada has a right to act and those in which the provinces have a right to act. The fact that a course of training or education will enable the person to enter into productive work in the economy sooner or later simply will not suffice as a definition of the federal area, because such a test—and this I think is what the hon. member proposes —would permit the federal government to swallow up all training and education.

I am told that the Department of Manpower and Immigration recognizes that the training of adult immigrants who are members of the labour force, and who need such language training to improve their opportunities for employment, is its responsibility. I am also told that the department takes the view that language training for children, whether immigrants or persons born in Canada, is not its responsibility.

There is no doubt that language schools for immigrant children are especially desirable. Consequently I think the chairman of the Toronto Board of Education ought to take this matter up with his provincial government. Recognizing that the government of Canada may have some special interest in immigrants, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration would be willing, once the board had raised the matter with the province and if the province decided to take the initiative, to discuss the matter with the appropriate provincial authorities.

[Translation]

AGRICULTURE—QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR PRICE DISCOUNT TO MILK CONSUMERS

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, on January 19 last I put the following question to the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene):

> The minister is undoubtedly aware that the Quebec government has decided to increase the price of class I milk starting on February 1, 1967. Therefore, would he study the possibility of granting consumers a compensated discount of 10 cents per quart of milk to allow Canadian families to consume the milk they need for their health, especially that of their children?

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the Quebec government has just issued orders increasing the price of fluid milk for consumption purposes to $6 per hundredweight and, in certain areas, to as much as $6.65 per hundredweight, which will put the retail price up to 35 cents a quart.

[Mr. Stewart.]

It is not that producers are overpaid, far from it, because farmers have to satisfy milk production requirements that are becoming more and more exacting. They had to invest large amounts of money in order to improve their herds, and we all know that the cost of equipment, machinery and services required by farmers is constantly increasing, and we want farming to become a profitable undertaking.

But can the consumers bear the burden of this new increase in food cost? Each increase in the cost of living means a decrease in purchasing power, which is even now at a very low level. It is my fear that, as a result of this increase in the price of milk. consumption of the product will decrease considerably and children may be deprived of this commodity, so essential to their development. The October 1966 issue of Canadian Farm Economics contains the following statement at the bottom of page 3:

> In the first semester of 1966, fluid milk consumption increased by about 1 per cent. Sales vary considerably from one area to another. A steady increase is expected in British Columbia, Alberta, New Brunswick and Ontario. In the other provinces, there has either been no change at all, or a very slight increase in sales. Consumption in Quebec has decreased, however.

The total sales of fluid milk in 1966 will probably not exceed the 5.2 billion pounds, I repeat, the 5.2 billion pounds sold last year.

Now, if the consumption of fluid milk decreases—no later than in 1962, 19.4 billion pounds of fluid milk were produced, whereas the expected production for 1967 will only be 18.2 billion pounds—producers will not be any better for it and everybody will lose by it.

Under a truly human and orderly economy, the purpose of production is consumption, and the latter must normally absorb the former. In order that milk production may reach the consumer and the latter may consume all he needs, the price must be within his means.

It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that the spread between the price required by the milk producers—and the same could be said of many other products—and the price the consumer is in a position to pay is increasing more and more, and a reduction on fluid milk consumption will force the farmers either to reduce their production or to ship it to processing, which will reduce the returns. Let us avoid the grievous mistake of irritating the consumers and diverting them to less valuable products which will be accepted to the detriment of dairy farm sales and income.

To balance production and consumption prices and to enable the consumers to purchase milk at a reasonable price, the government should grant a compensated discount of 10 cents a quart on milk sold for fluid consumption, which would bring the price down to a reasonable level without reducing the producers' profits.

It will be remembered that, at the beginning of the 40's, a subsidy was granted on fluid milk. This had allowed an increase in the income of dairy farms and had promoted a greater consumption.

The minister will perhaps answer that this will cost many millions of dollars, but I would point out that consumers need milk, that it is produced that production could be increased. If the minister is short of credit, he needs only to turn to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) and ask him to open the doors of the Bank of Canada. Thus, he will not have to levy new taxes. I will remind the minister that we give every year many millions of dollars to underdeveloped countries; while we are ourselves are becoming an underfed country. We can produce more and there is no reason why our people should be deprived of an essential commodity because of a lack of purchasing power.

When any area is prevented from producing according to the needs—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time put at his disposal by the standing order is now over.

Mr. Patrick-T. Asselin (Richmond-Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, the minister has asked me to answer this question in his absence and in the absence of his parliamentary secretary.

The matter raised by the hon. member for Chapleau (Mr. Laprise) comes exclusively under the jurisdiction of the provincial government.

This matter stems, of course, from the announcement made by the Quebec Control Board that the price of bottled milk will be $6 per hundredweight.

Naturally, the policy to be followed by the federal government in this regard will be announced before the dairy year begins, that is before April 1 next.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Now that the hon. member has completed his remarks, I must inform the house that, according to standing orders, only the minister, or a parliamentary secretary speaking on behalf of a minister, can answer a question put on the motion for adjournment.

I am sure the hon. member for Chapleau, who put the question, was satisfied with the answer provided by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat, but I think I have to inform members present of this rule.

[English]

INDIAN AFFAIRS—BRANTFORD, ONT.—DECIDING VOTE CAST BY RETURNING OFFICER

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, on January 13 I addressed this question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, as recorded at page 11759 of Hansard:

> I should like to ask the minister whether he has been made aware of the unhappiness and concern that have arisen over the situation of an Indian agency superintendent acting as returning officer, having to cast a deciding ballot in the Brantford reserve elections. If so, can he inform the house what steps he has in mind to avoid a recurrence of this unfortunate incident?

On the assumption that I wanted some detailed information about the situation on the Brantford reserve Your Honour suggested that I put the question on the order paper. However, since what I really had in mind were the broader questions which arose from the occurrence of this incident, I asked that the matter be put down for discussion at this time.

The fact that this expression of interest and concern took place is symptomatic of two things, first the growing desire of the Indian people for a broader and more complete measure of self-government within their bands, and second a growing awareness on the part of non-Indian people that this broader measure of self-government is something that the Indians of Canada should have.

When I read the report of this incident it seemed to me it was one of those rather unusual events which my own returning officer once told me was a nightmare for all returning officers, namely having to cast a deciding ballot in an election. In this case it must have been particularly embarrassing for the Indian agency superintendent, because obviously there was balanced opinion between members of the band as to who should be their chief councillor and he, as a non-Indian and public servant of Canada, was placed in the position of declaring in which direction he himself felt the choice should be made.

• (10:30 p.m.)

It does seem to me that the Indian agency superintendent was acting in this capacity in line with the symbolic and traditional status of Indians; that is, wards of the Queen. In this regard I think the situation is not all it might be.

I will agree that during a transitional period, directed toward increased self-government within Indian bands, some help and assistance in the techniques of elections and the exercise of what is considered by non-Indians to be the process of democracy, should be made available. However, I do believe that some steps should be taken to avoid the possible recurrence of this kind of situation.

It is my hope that the minister will consider that in the matter of band elections it would be desirable to select someone not engaged in the Indian affairs branch of his department as a returning officer, preferably someone chosen by the members of the band, and preferably an Indian—either a member of that band or of some other band.

It does seem to me that such a step would be a step toward making it clear that those of us here in parliament, and particularly those of us who hope that the functions of the Indian affairs branch will in the present and foreseeable future undergo a rather rapid transformation in its basic functions, have a desire that Indians should become self-governing. I am interested now in hearing a reply from the minister as to what steps he has in mind regarding the situation which has developed on this particular reserve.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, this matter raised by the hon. member for Commox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) relates to a vote which took place for the position of band chief of the Six Nations Reserve on December 17 last. As a result of that election Mr. Richard Isaac and Mr. Keith Martin were tied with 123 votes each.

I am of the opinion, as the hon. member indicated, that in such cases the lot of a returning officer, like that of a policeman, is not a happy one. That is no doubt why successive governments have been extremely careful in appointing returning officers for our elections, so that if a situation like this arose they would know enough to do the right thing.

The situation here was unfortunate, in that we had foreseen this difficulty as a result of a similar tie vote and had circularized all Indian bands in Canada with the suggestion that we did not want our people involved. We asked them to see to it that an Indian be appointed as the returning officer.

The band met on this point on December 1. The result was that they insisted that our agency superintendent, Mr. Cassie, act as returning officer, which he did. We are now trying to break the tie by having a recount of ballots, and we have asked for an identification of the difficulties experienced in respect of those ballots that were spoiled.

In the meantime we have suggested to our superintendents that wherever possible an Indian should be appointed as a returning officer and, if necessary, the superintendent should act as deputy returning officer in order to give the required assistance. We have also asked the National Indian Advisory Board for its views of the suggestion that we enact a regulation to make this procedure mandatory; in other words make it mandatory that a member of the band be appointed as the returning officer.

In the case now under review, Mr. Keith Martin, the unsuccessful candidate for chief, has submitted an official appeal. This is currently under consideration, and as one preliminary step we have asked that the ballots be re-examined by the electoral officer who will provide a physical description of the spoiled ballots. As an adjunct of the re-examination, all the ballots will again be tabulated and recorded before appropriate witnesses.

In conclusion, I might mention that a similar situation arose in the Six Nations election in December, 1963. At that time Mr. Keith Martin, who is appealing the latest by-election, ran as a councillor in district No. 4. On that previous occasion Mr. Martin tied with another candidate for councillor and it was necessary for the electoral officer to cast a deciding vote to break the tie. In that instance the then superintendent, in his capacity as electoral officer, voted in favour of Mr. Martin.

I think our people would very much like to be rid of this responsibility, and we think we can bring this about by amending the regulations. In this regard we want the approval of the National Indian Advisory Board. I thank the hon. member for raising this matter.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.38 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, January 24, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

STATEMENT RESPECTING INCORRECT INFORMATION REGARDING MOTION FOR PAPERS

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, January 12 the hon. member for Skeena raised a question of privilege in connection with notice of motion for the production of papers No. 191.

I have investigated the complaints made by the hon. member on that occasion and again yesterday, and I should like to apologize on behalf of the C.B.C. for the misunderstanding which led the hon. member to raise his question of privilege. The C.B.C. erroneously understood that the motion applied only to correspondence between the C.B.C. and other employers not associated with the corporation. This information was conveyed to the hon. member in perfectly good faith by my colleague the Associate Minister of National Defence on January 11. I regret the confusion this situation created.

As to the notice of motion for the production of papers, the C.B.C. has submitted that it has not been customary to require the corporation to produce such correspondence which is basically related to its detailed management and administration, and for that reason had not considered such correspondence was covered by the motion.

Since I have a ministerial responsibility to report for the C.B.C. I wish to express to the hon. member for Skeena and to the house my regrets for this inadvertent situation which has arisen.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, that statement is quite acceptable, but I do not know whether the apology should be directed to me any more than to this house as a whole. However, I assume a responsibility now falls on me to do something with this motion which I moved on the basis of my earlier information. Before I do so perhaps we could get an indication as to whether the government intends to accept the original motion for the production of correspondence.

Miss LaMarsh: As I said, it appears that this involves a matter of internal management, and it has not been the custom in the past to produce such documentation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that he now has an opportunity to put the motion again, if he wishes to do so. Insofar as the question of privilege is concerned, in view of the explanation given by the minister it is obvious that there was no intent to mislead the house in any way. Therefore there is no prima facie case of privilege.

Mr. Howard: Perhaps I could raise another matter, Mr. Speaker. The situation being as it is, perhaps the notice of motion should automatically be restored to the order paper, since it was withdrawn as the result of a misunderstanding.

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid I cannot agree with the suggestion. The hon. member can very easily put this motion again on the order paper.

Mr. Howard: With all respect, Mr. Speaker, today is Tuesday and tomorrow is the next opportunity to put notices for papers on the order paper. This does not allow 48 hours in order that we can deal with this motion. In light of the comment by the hon. minister perhaps—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. gentleman's point is quite clear. Perhaps we can solve the problem in this way. With the unanimous consent of the house, and I am sure there will be no difficulty in this regard, the motion can be placed on the order paper without notice. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DIVORCE

SUBSTITUTION OF NEW PRINCIPLE FOR DISSOLUTION OF MARRIAGE

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-264, entitled Divorce Act 1967.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Inquiries of the Ministry

• (2:40 p.m.)

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is to substitute a totally new principle as the basis for dissolution of marriage. The bill substitutes for the concept of matrimonial offences the concept of the irretrievable break-up of a marriage. As the house knows, generally speaking adultery is still the sole ground for divorce. There are a number of bills before the joint committee on divorce which would expand the grounds. It is proposed in this bill to substitute a new principle altogether which has been put forward to the committee by the United Church of Canada. The purpose of the bill is to codify this new approach.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FINANCE

TERMS OF REFERENCE OF TASK FORCE TO STUDY FOREIGN OWNERSHIP

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the order in council setting up the task force under the chairmanship of the Minister without Portfolio, the former minister of finance, has been tabled as yet. Is the Prime Minister able to say whether the order of reference will be wide enough to enable this task force to study foreign ownership and foreign investment in Canada, and in particular whether the infringement of sovereignty represented by this government's agreement to the guide lines laid down in Washington will form part of the investigation?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No order in council has been passed setting up the task force. Indeed, I doubt whether an order in council is required for an inquiry of this type. However, I will look into that. In any event, none has been passed yet.

As to the terms of reference of the proposed inquiry being supervised by the committee of ministers, perhaps I could read the sentence which covers this matter:

As a further measure,—

Following the steps that have been taken in respect of guide lines.

—a committee of ministers has now been set up to examine the structure of Canadian industry, with special reference to foreign ownership and control—

The study will include the significance—both political and economic—of foreign investment in the development of our country, as well as ways to encourage greater Canadian ownership of our industrial resources while retaining a climate favourable to the inflow of foreign investment—

[Mr. Brewin.]

These are the terms of reference which will guide the committee in its work, and the interdepartmental committee has a task force which will be working with it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, is the press correct in its belief that in this set-up the Minister of Finance will occupy a supernumerary position that he may watch over the former minister of finance, the present Minister without Portfolio? If so, who then is charged with watching the present Minister of Finance.

Mr. Pearson: The right hon. gentleman seems to have a very suspicious mind these days.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask a supplementary question in two parts, Mr. Speaker. Are there to be any more specific terms of reference for the cabinet committee or task force? Second, does the appointment of this cabinet committee in any way involve any delay in proceeding with legislation to set up the Canada Development Corporation, or can the Prime Minister assure the house it is the intention of the government to proceed with this legislation either at this session or during the new session?

Mr. Pearson: On the first point, I think the terms of reference are quite adequate for the kind of inquiry the cabinet, through a committee of ministers wishes to make. In answer to the second part of the question, I will be making a statement on motions tomorrow about a program of legislation for the rest of this session and after prorogation for the new session, which will probably go some way to answer my hon. friend's inquiry.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question. May I ask the Prime Minister, first, whether the task force referred to which is to work in turn with an interdepartmental committee of senior civil servants, will be made up of economists from outside the government service, and how soon we may expect a report as to the personnel of this task force. Second, when is the white paper resulting from this investigation likely to be placed before the House of Commons?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the task force, which has not yet been set up but which will be very shortly, will consist of economists from outside the government service, experts in this field, who will be able to give their full time to this inquiry, working with an interdepartmental committee. I have no idea how long they will require for their initial investigations, which will then be submitted to the committee of ministers. However, I hope this will be done with the least possible delay.

I should add, because perhaps my previous answer did not cover the question, that there is nothing in this work which would interfere with any program of legislation we already have in mind, including the item mentioned by my hon. friend.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that it is not customary or in accordance with our practice to announce the personnel of cabinet committees, I should like to ask the Prime Minister why this ordinary practice has been departed from in this case.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the reason is that this is not a cabinet committee, as the statement made clear. This is a committee of ministers. This action has been taken in the past, as distinct from an ad hoc or permanent cabinet committee, in which case the names of the members are not announced.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): A supplementary question. May I ask the Prime Minister whether the hon. member for Davenport is the same individual who headed up a royal commission on Canada's economic prospects, and did he not deal extensively with that situation at that time?

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—PROPOSED FURTHER DEVELOPMENT BY U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources; I know he is looking forward to it. In view of glowing press statements in Washington with respect to the proposed increase in power at the Grand Coulee dam and of criticism of this unexpected development by hydro engineers in Canada and in various articles in professional magazines, would the minister ask the engineers of the water resources branch to appear before the standing committee on industry, research and energy development for questioning on this subject by members of the committee?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I presume a consultation would have to be had with the chairman of that committee. I hereby promise to do this.

TRANSPORT

IMPROVEMENT OF FERRY SERVICE, DIGBY-SAINT JOHN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Guy Crossman (Kent (N.B.)): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Could he inform the house if the government has decided to give financial encouragement for the establishment of a new ferry service from southwestern Nova Scotia before improvements have been made in the present service between Digby and Saint John, New Brunswick? I ask this question because of the keen interest in this matter of many people in New Brunswick and the rest of Canada who look forward to the establishment of a true ferry service between Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure whether there is real urgency to this question. If there is not, perhaps the hon. member would want to discuss the matter at ten o'clock.

Mr. Crossman: Ten o'clock, sir.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REQUEST THAT MUNICIPAL TAXES BE PAID FOR FULL YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister and is a follow-up to one I asked of the right hon. gentleman last Thursday. Is the Prime Minister yet in a position to assure the city of Halifax and other Canadian municipalities that Canadian National Railways will pay the equivalent of municipal taxes at full rates for all of 1967?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I took this matter up with the Minister of Transport who will be able to deal with it shortly, I hope.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

INQUIRY AS TO CONTRIBUTIONS BY FARMERS AND FISHERMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. S. Smallwood (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue concerning the Canada Pension Plan. Could the minister inform the house whether the farmers and fishermen of this country are called upon to contribute to the Canada Pension Plan out of their gross income or net income?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again it is difficult for the Chair to decide whether this is a matter of urgency.

Mr. Smallwood: Mr. Speaker, this is of great concern to the people of Canada. I went to the department last week. One official tells me that it is based on net income and another fellow tells me it is on gross income. I have come to the conclusion that these people do not know the difference between gross and net income, and I should like to have it made clear for the people of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the minister might say whether he knows.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we have a very comprehensive booklet explaining exactly how the contributions should be calculated. I shall be very pleased to send my hon. friend a copy of it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Smallwood: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the minister and his officials do not know how to interpret their own book, how can the people of Canada know?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I disagree entirely. We know how to interpret what is in it, and I should be pleased to take my hon. friend aside and explain it to him.

Mr. Smallwood: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, this is ridiculous. I want someone to tell the people of Canada about this, and the minister does not seem to know about it himself.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, in answer to a question put a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose I said I had intended to give him a copy of the information given to the self-employed with respect to the Canada Pension Plan. However, I have not been able to get a French copy, and I would refer him to section 13 of the Canada Pension Plan, which makes quite clear that the amount of contribution is determined on the net income exclusive of investment income.

Mr. Smallwood: Would the minister clarify that with his department, because one official told me it was net income and a second one told me it was gross income.

INQUIRY AS TO REFUNDS TO EMPLOYERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of National Revenue.

An hon. Member: He has gone to get the book.

Mr. Chatterton: In that case he can take this question as notice. Has the minister found a way of refunding to employers the excess contributions they are making under the Canada Pension Plan?

Mr. J. E. Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): I shall be glad to bring this question to the attention of the minister.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Prosper Boulanger (Mercier): I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Public Works in his capacity as house leader. Can the hon. minister tell me on how many days the hon. member for Lapointe has sat in the house since being named leader or chairman of the separatist movement?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of some urgency for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the minister's publicly expressed and commendable interest in urban redevelopment and the building of new cities, is he preparing for an early retirement from the Department of National Defence so that all Canada may benefit?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): No, I was just making plans to prepare a suitable environment for the retirement of my hon. friend.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

REPORT OF YOUTH COUNCIL ON PROPOSED YOUTH SEMINAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): I direct my question to the Secretary of State and ask the hon. lady if she has yet received from the Canadian Youth Council a supplementary report with a recommendation on the holding of a seminar next year. If so, has any action yet been taken, or has any decision been arrived at?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised and disappointed to say that I have not received anything yet. I had promised the hon. member the other day that I would have the ad hoc committee meet as soon as I received anything.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR CESSATION OF SUGGESTED ANTI-U.S. PROPAGANDA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I direct my question to the Secretary of State, who I understand is responsible for the various centennial programs throughout the country and who also replies in the house on behalf of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The question is as follows. Would the minister suggest to those responsible for the public affairs and news programs in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, in view of the fact that a seven day truce is likely to take place soon in the Viet Nam war, that the C.B.C. might likewise declare a seven day truce in the flood of "hate the United States" propaganda that issues forth daily from that organization. I might also suggest that such a seven day remission might be a suitable centennial project as a gesture of good will to our good friends to the south.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should recognize that this is not a question. He is making a submission to the minister.

FINANCE

ROYAL BANK—APPOINTMENT TO BOARD OF BAHAMIAN FINANCE MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): My question, Mr. Speaker, is directed to the Minister of Finance. I ask the minister if he is aware that on January 13, 1966, the Royal Bank of Canada appointed to its board of directors the minister of finance of the Bahamian government, Sir Stafford Sands. Does the Minister of Finance believe that the appointment to the board of directors of the Royal Bank of the minister of finance of another country is proper?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking for an expression of opinion from the minister. This is not the type of question which may be asked at this time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NORTH VIET NAM—USE OF FUNDS GIVEN FOR AID

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. He may be able to answer the question, or he may have made some research into the matter I raised on January 19. To review my question, it referred to $50,000 of aid to Viet Nam of which 90 per cent was going to North Viet Nam, to the Viet Cong, for purposes other than to assist civilian victims. I said I had seen the report that made this statement. Has the Prime Minister anything to report on the matter now?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the position in respect of the matter referred to by my hon. friend in his question was set out by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on April 19 last in reply to a question by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. In brief, that reply was that there was no obstacle to the transfer of funds to North Viet Nam or similar destinations, provided appropriate arrangements could be made through banking channels. As regards permission for the shipment of medical and other supplies, these come under the provisions of the Export and Import Permits Act. However, as far as medical supplies are concerned the act does not require the issue of a specific licence provided the drugs are of Canadian origin and are being sent in individual dosage form.

As to the second aspect of the question, concerning the use made of supplies or funds sent to North Viet Nam once they have reached their destination, we have no knowledge in that regard and I doubt whether the government of North Viet Nam would regard it as within the responsibilities of our representative on the international commission to seek such information. I understand that the international committee of the Red Cross has endeavoured to obtain this kind of information with respect to its own consignments to North Viet Nam, so far without avail. I understand, however, that a representative of the Canadian Friends service committee was in Hanoi recently and did have an opportunity at that time to talk to representatives of the North Vietnamese Red Cross.

Mr. Woolliams: I wish to thank the Prime Minister for his answer. But in this case, if he would review the report I gave him, he will see that of the $50,000 raised in Vancouver, 90 per cent of the money was handed over through Dr. Inglis to someone in Moscow for use in North Viet Nam, other than for the purchase of medical supplies and so on. Did the Prime Minister investigate this situation and, if so, what was the result?

Mr. Pearson: We do not know the details of the shipment. I understand it was medical supplies and that 90 per cent of the money used for this purpose did go to North Viet Nam.

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): May I direct a related question to the Prime Minister. On January 9 I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the Canadian government had received from the Canadian Quakers a request for aid in the provision of medical supplies to both North and South Viet Nam. Has such a request been received and, if so, what reply has been given?

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps I can answer that question, since it was addressed to me. I can inform the hon. member that such a request from the general secretary of the Canadian Friends service committee was received last month by an official of the external affairs department and was acknowledged at that time. The matter is now under consideration, and a substantive reply will be made to the general secretary of the committee in the very near future.

DRAFTING OF CANADIAN CITIZENS INTO U.S. ARMY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs with reference to a previous question I asked him about the drafting of young Canadians in the United States into the United States forces. What will be the position of the government with respect to these young Canadians who are drafted into the United States army if they stay in the United States?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is really possible, unless I misunderstood it, to answer the question in the form in which it has been put. My hon. friend brought a particular case to my attention. We have been in touch with my hon. friend about it, and I am sure he would not want me to discuss that particular case on the floor of the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why not?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Because I think my hon. friend who put the question would not want to embarrass his constituent.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is a Canadian who was picked up in the United States and forced into its army.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My right hon. friend is wrong again.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is what the minister denied the other day, and now he is wrong again.

ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT BOARD

CURTAILMENT OF PROJECTS RESULTING FROM STAFF SHORTAGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): My question is directed to the Minister of Transport and relates to a question I asked him two weeks ago in this house concerning the curtailment of certain projects by the Atlantic Development Board because of staff shortages. The minister said at that time he would look into this matter and report. Can he tell us now which projects have in fact been curtailed?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I had a document dealing with this subject and I hoped to use it to refresh my memory. Unfortunately it is in another spot. Perhaps the hon. member would not put me on the spot again until tomorrow.

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF AUTOMOBILE AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Industry. In the light of uneasiness in the automobile industry as a result of permanent lay-offs and stoppages of work for stated periods, would the minister consider referring the automobile pact to a standing committee of the House of Commons or to a joint committee of this house and the other place, so as to ascertain whether these lay-offs and cessations of work for stated periods are due to this pact or whether they have been brought about by other circumstances?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): It has been fairly clearly established that in the current year, as compared with previous years, there has been a decline in the public demand for automobiles. A decline in public demand obviously leads to a decline in production, and a decline in production normally calls for lay-offs. This appears to be the chronology of the present situation, and I do not think any useful purpose would be served by trying to re-explore this particular chronology.

As the hon. member is aware, a comprehensive review of the automobile pact is to be undertaken in the current year, and perhaps that could be a more useful way of proceeding.

Mr. Starr: As a supplementary question, when the minister says a comprehensive review will be made may I ask whether it will be done in committee where witnesses could be called?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, the review of which I speak and of which the results will be made public will be by the governments of the two countries.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

NEW WATERFORD, N.S.—REQUEST FOR PARDON FOR DISQUALIFIED COUNCILLOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Solicitor General and I would ask him to take into consideration the fact that there has been very little background exchanged between us in this matter. It is with respect to a councillor in the town of New Waterford who was recently disqualified from taking his seat because of an incident which happened years ago, when he was a juvenile. Would the minister consider a pardon for this gentleman in view of the exemplary life he has led since that time? I am not quite sure whether this could be done, but the people of New Waterford have indicated their decision by electing him.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I doubt whether the question can be asked at this time. There may be an aspect of urgency to it that I do not see, but generally speaking that type of question should be placed on the order paper.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there is urgency because this young man committed an offence as a prank some ten years ago, and since the particular offence carries with it the possibility of a penitentiary sentence he is now hounded out of public life. I think the minister would want to speak on this, particularly in centennial year when so much is being said about amnesty. Will the government give consideration to providing free pardons to those who, having made mistakes, after a period of years have entirely lived them down, to the end that the detrimental effect of such mistakes on their records will not bar them from those things that good citizens normally can achieve?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I still have some doubt as to the urgency of the particular case raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, but as the minister seems anxious to give a reply to both hon. gentlemen I am sure he should be recognized.

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to give immediate attention to the particular case raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, and I would like to assure the right hon. Leader of the Opposition that we are dealing with a considerable number of applications for pardon. There has been a substantial increase in them over the last few months.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to remind the house that there is a certain amount of urgency involved. The citizens of this town feel that they are deprived of representation for which they voted. There is a by-election coming up which would also indicate there is urgency in qualifying this man to hold the office which the people granted him.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FISHERIES

SUGGESTED ABOLITION OF SEAL HUNTING IN GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Does he intend to follow up the recommendations made by the Canadian Humane Society for the protection of animals by abolishing the yearly massacre caused by seal hunting, the season for which is about to open pretty soon; or can he advise of better ways of killing the seals?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker I believe I have made it very clear on many occasions in the past that it is not my intention to recommend the abolition of the sealing operations in the gulf of St. Lawrence. I have said that the regulations were being amended. They have now been amended. I hope they will be enforced, and that all inhumane methods used in this operation will be prevented.

IMMIGRATION

WARNING TO IMMIGRANTS RESPECTING HOUSING IN LARGER CITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It is one I would have asked yesterday but neither the minister nor his parliamentary secretary was in the house. In view of the week end report that the Department of Manpower and Immigration is warning prospective immigrants with more than three children and less than $7,500 annual income to stay away from Toronto, Hamilton, Windsor, London and Vancouver because of the acute housing shortage, what plans has the minister to provide such immigrants with jobs in the smaller centres?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I shall have to take this question as notice and inquire into it, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION TO IMPLEMENT WHITE PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I should like to ask the minister whether he is now in a position to inform the house when he intends to bring in legislation to give effect to the recommendations and findings outlined in the immigration white paper, particularly with regard to part IV.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, part IV will not be brought before the house separately. Apparently it will have to come with the entire bill. As you know, the white paper is being studied now by the joint committee of the house and Senate. As soon as we have the report of the committee we will prepare the legislation. I hope this will be done this year. It will be done as soon as possible, but I cannot be more precise than that.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RHODESIA—REPORTED WITHHOLDING OF MEDICAL INFORMATION AND SUPPLIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and is in reference to answers to several questions which I asked last week. Has he had an opportunity to investigate the complaint made by the secretary of health in Rhodesia stating that the World Health Organization had cut off assistance given through that organization's schemes for the benefit of the African population in that country?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have not been able to obtain all the information we are seeking on this matter. Meantime I can inform my hon. friend that the World Health Organization has denied charges by the Smith régime in Rhodesia that it had abandoned health projects for the African population in Rhodesia and had failed to pass on warnings of the danger to women of antihistamine drugs. However, we are asking for further information on the matter from WHO.

[Translation]

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO MEMBERS OF FEED GRAIN COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development. Is he in a position to give the house the names of those who will be appointed to sit on the proposed Canadian Livestock Feed Board.

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): No, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

QUEBEC—DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING JURISDICTION OVER INDIANS AND ESKIMOS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Is there presently being undertaken or has there just been completed a study by officials in his department, or by someone appointed for that purpose, in conjunction with the province of Quebec or directly through his department, into the question of jurisdiction relating to native Indian people and Eskimos in the province of Quebec?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am rather happy that the hon. member has raised this question, because I read a press report which spoke of a secret document having been exchanged between or delivered to both the federal government and the government of Quebec. There were other sinister suggestions that an arrangement was going to be made, and I want to assure my hon. friend that there is simply no justification whatever for the inferences included in the report.

At present all this consists of is a working paper which has been delivered to each government as a basis for financial considerations in the transfer to Quebec of those services which are necessary in that part of Quebec due to the very considerable mining and other developments that are proceeding in that part of the province. The work of my officials and that of the officials of the province of Quebec is entirely consistent with the last statement I made in the house on this matter on March 4, 1964, at page 505, where I said provision was made to refer these principles and conditions to a joint committee of federal and provincial officials who are charged with the responsibility of preparing a draft agreement as well as the terms of reference for the commission which will be asked to receive the views and comments of the Eskimos. At that time we discussed—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am afraid I must interrupt the minister. It seems to me the answer he is now giving is rather lengthy and more in the form of a statement which ought to be made on motions. Perhaps he might restrict the remainder of the answer he wishes to give to the hon. member.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, in a supplementary way may I ask the minister, because of the extreme importance of the matter and the necessity always of consulting the people affected, whether the minister would make a statement on motions tomorrow or at some reasonable time in the future so we could go into this question in as much detail as is possible.

Mr. Laing: This would be entirely agreeable to me, but I would have to make some study of the question because as yet I have not even seen the paper.

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Has the minister received the report which is being prepared by Professor Hawthorn of the University of British Columbia, and if so would he table this in the house?

Mr. Laing: Yes; part 1.

FINANCE

MERCANTILE BANK—INQUIRY AS TO REPLY TO U.S. NOTES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Prime Minister informed the house that he expected the cabinet today would approve of the reply to the two notes of the United States government in reference to the Mercantile Bank. Would the Prime Minister say whether the reply consititutes acceptance or rejection by Canada of the claim of the United States that the legislation ought not to be passed? Also will the Prime Minister say whether there has been any alteration in the expected nature of the reply to the notes in view of the evidence given by Mr. Rockefeller today, that the letter of intent to purchase the Mercantile Bank from the Dutch interests was given on June 26, 1963, 22 days prior to the warning given by the then minister of finance, the new Minister without Portfolio and chairman of the task force?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the first note was replied to many months ago. The reply to the second note was considered and agreed to by the government this morning and will be delivered to the United States authorities this afternoon. All I can say is that the Canadian government maintains the position which already has been stated in this house. With reference to the hearing before the committee of the house on this matter, I believe it would be quite inappropriate for me to discuss this.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the Prime Minister table the two notes from the United States and the reply by Canada, after securing the permission of the United States government? I think this is a matter upon which parliament has a right to know the true facts.

Mr. Pearson: I think the house has taken a decision regarding the tabling of the diplomatic correspondence in respect of this matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why? Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he will ask the United States government for permission.

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker. This diplomatic correspondence will be treated as such.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You do not want the facts to be elucidated.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, did the Prime Minister inquire into the effect this matter might have on Canadian banks in the United States?

Mr. Pearson: Naturally all factors were taken into consideration before this note was drafted and agreed on.

TRADE

ENTRY OF U.K. INTO COMMON MARKET—PROTECTION FOR CANADIAN TRADING INTERESTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that Prime Minister Wilson is making a new attempt to gain entry into the European common market, I should like to know whether Canada has been made aware of the terms and conditions and whether there is any protection for our trading interests with the United Kingdom, particularly in respect of agricultural products such as wheat.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter which primarily concerns the government of Great Britain and the common market countries. At various times, however, Canada has had discussions with members of the present British government with regard to Britain's intentions, and we have likewise noted observations made by common market countries regarding the British desire to participate.

Mr. Olson: Will the minister tell us, in view of the information Canada has, whether this will create any problem in respect of the trading relations we now have with regard to the export of wheat from Canada to Britain?

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that this is hardly the kind of question which should be asked on the orders of the day.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am in full agreement with the minister. He rose just a little faster than I did. I think the hon. member for Medicine Hat recognizes the point.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I will pursue the matter at ten o'clock.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

STEPS TO MEET INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that from August to December the price index has risen so that the cost of living now stands at the all time high of 145.9, is the government planning to take any action to cope with the steady increase in the cost of living?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is a question of a very general nature which I do not think it is appropriate to deal with here. I might just say that the government has been taking measures which have in fact resulted in a smaller increase in prices than otherwise would have taken place, and certainly smaller than would have taken place had we followed the advice of the opposition.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the suggestions made to the minister from time to time, has any progress been made with regard to the setting up of a prices review board? Also, what progress has been made in respect of the income progress study which the Economic Council of Canada has undertaken?

Mr. Sharp: I am sure the hon. gentleman will recall that in the last annual report of the Economic Council of Canada the council recommended that measures of this kind would not be effective for Canada.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SUCCESSOR TO PRESIDENT—SHOWING OF CHAMPIONSHIP SKI PICTURES IN INTERIOR B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. In view of the deep concern which the hon. lady has in respect of having a competent president of the C.B.C., and in view of her admiration for one of the candidates, could the minister tell us whether the name of Mr. Max Ferguson is still before the cabinet for consideration?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State. Has the minister any reply to the question I asked yesterday with regard to certain C.B.C. programs which now are available to the coastal areas of British Columbia after 11 p.m. and which are denied to the interior of British Columbia?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer the question in general, but yesterday the hon. member asked me about the C.B.C. and its coverage of the du Maurier ski championships in British Columbia. I am informed by the C.B.C. that it plans to film a 30 minute program of the highlights of the du Maurier championships and to carry it on CBUT, Vancouver, and its immediate rebroadcasting stations at Courtenay, Comox and Alberni-Chilliwack following the late night news and sports on January 30.

Unfortunately it is not possible, because of technical reasons, to feed this film from Vancouver to C.B.C. outlets in the interior of the province at the same time it is being shown in Vancouver. However, arrangements have been made to have these highlights, featuring members of our national ski team, carried on the night of February 1 on the C.B.C. relay stations at Rossland-Trail, Nelson, Castelgar and Cranbrook-Kimberley. The program also is available at the same time to private affiliates of the C.B.C. in British Columbia on their request.

I should like to say in response to the last question that I understand the gentleman in question is quite happy with his position in the C.B.C. I have not at any time, to anybody, publicly or privately, indicated that I am in favour of any candidate for the C.B.C. presidency.

TRANSPORTATION

PROVISION FOR DEFINITION AND IMPLEMENTATION OF NATIONAL POLICY

The house resumed, from Monday, January 23, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-231, to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other acts in consequence thereof, and to enact other consequential provisions—Mr. Pickersgill—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. An understanding was reached yesterday that the remaining clauses of this bill be considered in the following order: clause 74, with an amendment; clause 16 as amended, and clause 1 as amended.

On clause 74.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, at the conclusion of the sitting yesterday an amendment to clause 74 was brought in and read but has not yet been moved. I rise now on a point of order as to the validity of the amendment to clause 74.

My point of order is put forward on the ground that the Minister of Transport has violated an important rule of the House of Commons, so well understood and known that reference to it is hardly necessary. I might quote the rule at the outset. It is that a matter once dealt with and disposed of by the house cannot be raised again when dealing with the same subject matter in the same bill. I emphasize that rule because it is very important in understanding the point of order upon which Your Honour will have to decide.

What is the matter in question? We had in the bill new section 329 (1) which was voted on by the house in committee of the whole. The vote was negative and the section in question was struck out. In its place the minister is now attempting to move an amendment to clause 74. He is endeavouring to substitute a new clause 74 for section 329 of Bill No. C-231 which was voted on by the House of Commons and struck out of the bill. The vote was a close one, as hon. members know. The minister, I repeat, is substituting clause 74 for section 329.

An amendment was introduced last night but no motion has been moved in respect of it. The amendment to clause 74 was merely read; and the record, which is to be found at page 12119 of Hansard, will disclose this fact. First of all, I object to the moving of this motion on a procedural basis. I object to this amendment because I question its validity. The minister is trying to deal again with the same matter when it has already been disposed of by the house. In brief, he is trying to take two bites at the same apple, in violation of our rules.

The rule in this regard is very clear. I will read the rule as written in our original procedures in 1953 and as amended in 1958. It is to be found in Beauchesne's third and fourth editions. I shall refer to both rules because there has been an historical development as far as our procedure in this regard is concerned.

I said that in brief the minister is trying to take two bites at the same apple, when the rules say he cannot do this. He is trying to take two cracks at the same cat, when he is entitled to only one. What does the rule say in this regard? It is very clear. It is that a question being put once and carried in the affirmative or negative—in this case it was the negative—cannot be questioned again, but must stand as a judgment of the house, particularly in respect of one bill and more particularly in respect of one clause.

The minister by his amendment to clause 74 is really trying to repeat what was set out in section 329. The principle is identical in these two cases. Before I go into the meat of the amendment and section 329 I should like to refer to the rules. I would refer first of all to the third edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, 1943, page 113. I shall read from citation 284:

> A resolution may be rescinded and an order of the house discharged, notwithstanding a rule urged—

I have quoted this rule.

> —"that a question, being once made and carried in the affirmative or negative cannot be questioned again, but must stand as a judgment of the house."

My first submission on this point of order is that section 329 provided that the Crowsnest pass freight rates be investigated with a view to ascertaining whether the railways were showing a profit or loss in regard to the hauling of grain within the definition of "grain" in Canada. In this respect a decision of the house was arrived at; a vote was taken on the section and it was struck out of the bill.

Last night the minister asked us to consider an amendment to clause 74, wherein is contained the same principle as there was in section 329. All the minister has done is replace the words "Crowsnest pass freight rates" with another term. I should like to quote from the amendment to clause 74. It says in part:

> Subject to subsection (3), a railway company under the jurisdiction of parliament may make an application to the commission to investigate the revenues and costs attributable to the carriage of any commodity by the company at a statutory rate or substituted rate.

The statutory rate is the Crowsnest pass freight rate. The amendment to clause 74 deals with the identical matter; it means the same thing in principle. In order that the committee may fully understand my point of order I would read further from the rules. This passage is to be found in our former rules of 1943, at page 113 of Beauchesne's third edition:

> To rescind a negative vote, except on the different stages of bills, is a proceeding of greater difficulty—

Beauchesne says that to attempt to do this puts one in great difficulty. You cannot substitute the same principle with similar words. In other words, if the minister wishes to bring in an amendment he will have to bring in a brand new amendment on a brand new principle. He has failed to do this. On these grounds I say that the amendment is not valid and cannot be accepted. The citation from Beauchesne's third edition continues:

> The only means, therefore, by which a negative vote can be revoked, is by proposing another question, similar in its general purport to that which has been rejected, but with sufficient variance to constitute a new question—

It will take but a few moments to deal with that matter. There is not sufficient variance in this amendment to constitute a new question. The principle is the same. To permit the minister now to move the amendment to clause 74 would allow him to do through the back door that which he could not do through the front door when he was unable to call into the chamber sufficient hon. members to support the government's position in respect of section 329.

I should like to read further from the rules. I think it is necessary to do so in order that the record be straight. This is a most serious matter, in that the minister is trying to put something over on the people of western Canada. Citation 285 of Beauchesne's third edition says in part:

• (3:30 p.m.)

A mere alteration of the words of a question, without any substantial change in its object will not be sufficient to evade the rule—

Let me repeat that statement:

A mere alteration of the words of a question, without any substantial change in its object will not be sufficient to evade the rule—

There has been no substantial change. What the minister is doing by this amendment to clause 74 is merely suggesting that under the old section 329 the commission will look into the Crowsnest pass freight rates within a certain period of time to determine whether the railway companies are making or losing money. That was the object of the old section. What is the object of the new section as set forth in the amendment to clause 74? The object now is that the commission will, on the application of a railway company, look into those costs.

Let me say that section 329 was mandatory and that clause 74 is also mandatory because once a railway company makes an application under clause 74 the commission shall review these freight rates. For that reason the Conservative party voted against the inclusion of new section 329. The object was for the commission to review the Crowsnest pass freight rates and pit the western farmers against the other taxpayers of Canada. The minister is aware of that fact and he has made certain strange statements as reported in the press since that vote was taken.

Last night the minister, with his nice personality and approach, proposed an amendment to clause 74. All he has done or suggested is the substitution of one word. The object is the same, the motives are the same and the result will be the same. For that reason I say at the outset that this amendment is invalid and cannot now be put a second time. The subject of the amendment was voted on and stricken from the bill.

Let us see what the new rules say in this regard. It is my suggestion that they are even stronger. Let me refer to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, 1958, at page 136, citations 162 and 163. In view of the fact this is an important matter regarding validity, I hope the committee will bear with me while I place on the record the citation. Citation 162 states:

A resolution may be rescinded and an order of the house discharged, notwithstanding a rule urged, "that a question, being once made and carried in the affirmative or negative cannot be questioned again, but must stand as a judgment of the house."

We have had a judgment of the house. We have said that this cannot be done because the country does not want it and we are the representatives of the country.

The minister, by intellectual trickery, has moved an amendment to clause 74 under the guise of attempting to define grain but what he is actually doing is setting up a committee to look into these freight rates. He is forced to do so because he failed to have a sufficient number of his members left to carry the question in the house. I might add that the hon. member for Medicine Hat abstained during that vote.

It is my suggestion, Mr. Chairman, that in spite of the minister's intellectual trickery this amendment must be ruled out as being invalid. In this connection it is interesting to note what the minister admitted was his fault last night. We do not very often hear a plea of guilty from the Minister of Transport but we did so last night. He knows exactly what happened. Last night he let the cat out of the bag when he attempted to perpetrate his intellectual trickery on the house. After the amendment was moved the hon. member for Macleod stated:

—judging from what the minister has said, in a backhanded way the baby thrown out with the dirty water is back in again.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Woolliams: What did the minister then say? He said:

That is right.

What the hon. member for Macleod said in effect was that the nurse washing the baby forgot herself and threw it out with the dirty water but now the baby has been carried back in for another bath by the government.

We have made a decision and we have a judgment. The Conservative party has fought for western Canada so far as the Crowsnest pass rates are concerned. What the minister is now trying to do by his amendment to clause 74 is exactly the same in principle as what he could not do on an earlier occasion. The rules are clear in this regard as pointed out in Beauchesne's third and fourth editions, citations 284 and 285, and 162 and 163.

Let us compare the two suggested sections to see how they differ, if they differ at all. New section 329 made reference to the Crowsnest pass freight rates whereas in the amendment to clause 74 reference is made to statutory rates. In all intellectual honesty I now ask the minister what difference there is between statutory rates and the Crowsnest pass freight rates. The Crowsnest pass freight rates by agreement have become law. Therefore the minister must be referring to the Crowsnest pass freight rates when defining statutory rates.

When the minister referred to statutory rates last night he said they included other rates but indicated he did not know what they were because the statutes had been amended. We all know that apart from the Crowsnest pass freight rates, statutory rates represent an infinitesimal amount of railway revenue. The minister's explanation in this regard is nothing but hogwash.

We have suggested to the minister over and over again that he is pitting the western farmer against the other taxpayers of Canada. Surely that will be the result of his attempt to amend this clause. Canada is the only wheat exporting nation in the world which does not subsidize the farmer for his wheat. Parliament has thrown out the section but the minister now wants to give this baby another bath.

I ask the minister to withdraw his amendment at this point. Failing that I ask you, Mr. Chairman, to rule the amendment out of order on the ground that it violates a fundamental rule of the house to the effect that a question having been once moved and carried in the affirmative or negatived cannot be put again but must remain as the judgment of this house.

Let us examine the language of the proposed amendment. It states in part:

—the commission to investigate the revenues and costs attributable to the carriage of any commodity by the company at a statutory rate or substituted rate.

This involves a matter of semantics. It obviously refers to the Crowsnest pass rates. Old section 329 and clause 74 as proposed by the amendment are identical, mean the same thing and would result in the same thing. The investigation would be the same and the decision would be the same. All the minister is really saying is that the defeat of the government in the vote has put him in an embarrassing and difficult position. It is my impression that the minister has made some deal with the railway and as a result of his defeat has let the railways down. He is not sure now how to get off the hook but is attempting to do so by violating a rule. I ask you, Mr. Chairman, to rule that this amendment is invalid and unacceptable at this time.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to reply immediately to those parts of the hon. gentleman's remarks which deal with the rules. Those parts of the speech relating to my reputation I will simply ignore until a later time.

There was a considerable debate held in respect of new section 329 during our consideration of clause 50. That debate took place before the vote on that section. As the hon. gentleman quite rightly pointed out, the committee decided that the section should be stricken from the bill. I suppose I could take the technical position, sir, that the question of order should have been raised immediately, but I do not take that position.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not so.

Mr. Pickersgill: There was a debate on it, and during the debate the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre indicated quite clearly that in moving the amendment to strike the whole clause he had counted on me to produce other amendments which would repair any damage that might have been done. This, of course, is precisely what I was seeking to do in this amendment. If anyone will fairly examine all the debate, and particularly examine the very learned observations of the learned and hon. member for York South which will be found on pages 11958 and 11959 of Hansard, and examine the arguments of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, the hon. member for Acadia and the hon. member for Peace River, I think it will be found the objection everyone took to proposed section 329 was not to any of the ancillary features such as the inclusion of the definition of types of grain and grain products, which in order to have an adequate bill need to be included somewhere, but to the provision for a mandatory review.

This is what I referred to as "the baby" and what I understood the hon. member for Macleod was referring to as "the baby". I thought what he meant by the "bath water" was what I have not made any attempt to ask the committee to reverse itself upon. My understanding was that the principle in the clause to which hon. members objected was that there was to be a mandatory review of revenues and costs in regard to these rates on grain whether or not anyone asked for it.

Mr. Woolliams: No, no, that is wrong.

Mr. Churchill: That was only one objection.

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam made that very clear, and I could quote his words. He made an argument which impressed me.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): But not the rest of us.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not interrupt the hon. gentleman, and we are talking about a very serious matter. As I understood it, the argument was that by this declaration by parliament that there must be a mandatory review of these rates we were creating the presumption that the rates were not compensatory. Hon. gentlemen opposite said this was not the type of neutral attitude which should be taken.

Most hon. members opposite argued eloquently that the rates were compensatory and there was no need for such a review. I decided, therefore, that I would not ask that these rates be reviewed, and I would not seek unanimous consent or anything else that required the commission to make a review unless there was an application for such a review. This is the first point.

The second point is that I realized there were other rates than the rates on grain which were also statutory.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): List them.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, the port parity rates about which we had a considerable discussion yesterday would come into that category; the frozen rates for the Atlantic region would also come into that category. One of the reasons I could not give a more detailed answer yesterday to the hon. member for Saint John-Albert was that there are, I am informed, some 2,700 railway acts of one kind or another that have been passed since confederation. I am sure that perhaps 95 per cent of them do not set any statutory rates, but in order to be certain they all have to be examined.

I decided also that the principle which underlies the whole bill, that if a duty is imposed upon the railways by parliament the railways should be compensated for carrying out that duty if the revenues they receive do not compensate for that purpose, should be followed. This principle runs through the whole bill in reference to branch lines, passenger service and everything else. It seemed to me that to be consistent we should cover all these contingencies in the present bill. In addition, there is a provision that power should be given to the commission to set aside rates and to substitute its own rates. It seemed to me that any such rates which are set, to some degree arbitrarily by the commission, should be capable of being reviewed upon application.

Mr. Woolliams: That is only an argument. Deal with the question.

Mr. Pickersgill: My point is that the amendment which is before us now is different in principle and in nature from the clause that was taken out. Hon. gentlemen argued that it was not. I have already made three points on which it differs. In the first place, proposed section 329 required the commission to conduct a review whether or not anyone asked for it. This was a duty put upon the commission by parliament. This amendment does not require any review to be made of any of these rates unless an application is made by a railway company. This is a fundamental difference.

The second point is that proposed section 329 applied only to the Crowsnest rates and related grain rates, while this amendment applies to the whole gamut of statutory rates. It does not apply merely to statutory rates. It applies also, at such time as two years may have elapsed after any decision is made by the commission, to any substituted rate. In other words, this provision is part of the permanent scheme of the legislation. Proposed section 329 would have caused an investigation once and then it would have been over. This is a permanent part of the structure of the commission.

In the same way as clause 16 gives the shipper and other interested parties the right to appeal against any carrier on the grounds that the rates are not in the public interest because they give an undue advantage or for any number of reasons, the railways, having imposed on them a duty by parliament, are to be given the opportunity, but not earlier than two years after the bill comes into effect in respect of statutory rates or two years after a substituted rate may come into effect, to ask for an investigation into the revenues and costs so that these revenues and costs can be determined. Now, it seems to me that is a fundamental difference.

• (3:50 p.m.)

There is one part of the clause that is similar to the proposed amendment, that is to say, that part of the clause which enumerates various categories and kinds of grain and grain products that are not covered strictly by statute but to which this bill is designed to continue to give protection.

If the hon. gentleman had concentrated on that part of the amendment I think he might have argued that that part came pretty close to the line, but I was quite sure that everyone wanted those definitions put back in and that there would be no question about putting them back in. I am sure that the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale wants them back in, and so do I and I believe everybody else. However, I gather that is not the point raised by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the hon. gentleman answer a question at this stage?

Mr. Pickersgill: I would be glad to.

Mr. Woolliams: Under the new amendment when an application is made by a railway for a review of the rates that application must be heard by the commission in the same way that the former section 329 was mandatory in the matter of a review. In this respect both of these sections demand that there be a review. In other words, they are both mandatory. Would the minister not be fair and answer yes to that question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I certainly will not answer yes to that question. In the one case parliament is saying that there must be a review whether anyone asks for it or not. In the other case there will be no review at all unless by the voluntary act of the railway company a review is asked for. This is as different in principle as any two procedures could possibly be. It is one thing to set up a court and to say that certain people may apply to the court for relief; it is another thing to say that the court must look into the situation regardless of whether anybody asks any questions.

As I understood it, hon. gentlemen objected to all the presumptions that they said were involved in the government asking parliament to direct the commission to have a mandatory review. They did not want any conceivable presumptions of that sort created.

I confess that this argument did impress me. Mind you, Mr. Chairman, I did not think that in fact it did create a presumption, but I could see how people might feel that it did. It seemed to me that it was very much better to have a provision that threw the complete onus on the railway of saying that they had a case that they wanted to put. Once that case has been put, of course, the commission hears it and makes whatever finding the facts justify.

This, Mr. Chairman, is an entirely different thing from creating any kind of presumption whatever. You might just as well say that because a shipper under clause 16 is permitted to go to the commission and allege there is some undue disadvantage or some other factor that is contrary to the public interest, this is creating the presumption that the railways are setting rates which put one person at an undue disadvantage compared with another. All this amendment does, Mr. Chairman, is to provide a remedy in the event that a wrong of this nature is committed. For these reasons I suggest that the amendment is, in its essential nature, quite different from the clause that was stricken out by the vote, and I therefore submit it is in order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, we have no amendment before us, it not having been moved yet. What we are doing in effect is discussing in anticipation an amendment—

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the right hon. gentleman is not wrong. My hon. friend the Minister of Fisheries moved the amendment yesterday afternoon and it is before the committee.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Even though it appears in Hansard that the Minister of Fisheries indicated he moved it, I took it from the minister that in fact it had not been moved. Be that as it may, we have listened to the minister working with Herculean effort to explain the unexplainable. He quite frankly admits he was deeply impressed by the argument made by members of the opposition in support of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, namely, that what was being done in the original section was in fact to bring about a mandatory declaration that in three years there should be a review. So impressed was he by that argument, Mr. Chairman, which he now admits was effective, that he and every Liberal member voted against the amendment. This indicates either that today he is telling us the facts or that when he voted he was voting against what he believed was proper and fitting.

What concerns me most is that the Crowsnest agreement will indeed be placed in jeopardy by any amendments that can be made thereto. It is very well to say that they are ratified by section 328 as being in effect, but by this process of infiltration and erosion the government is actually asking parliament to place its approval on potential measures that may ultimately spell the extinction of the Crowsnest rates.

All we have before us today is a declaration by parliament that the provisions of the agreement made pursuant to chapter V of the Statutes of Canada, 1897, will remain in effect. I am very concerned about what is taking place here. All through the years the Crowsnest pass rates have been challenged. Looking back to the elections of 1925 and 1926, the stand taken at that time by the leader of the Conservative party, Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, was that freight rates ought not to be fixed by parliament, that this was a dangerous step to take, that their revision should be subject to the regular application of recognized principles.

I was a candidate in those elections, and all over western Canada the guiding inspiration of the minister of transport moved from meeting to meeting. I can get the quotations, Mr. Chairman; Right Hon. Mackenzie King in lachrymose words spoke of the danger to the Crowsnest rates. He stood against any interference or intervention with respect to those rates; through the succeeding years the people of western Canada have similarly stood. The rates have remained unchanged. The stand of these people has been that these rates are inviolate and shall so remain. We cannot permit that stand to be challenged.

• (4:00 p.m.)

I am not in any way casting doubts or reflections on the vote that took place on the amendment by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, but the Liberal party today is in the position where it cannot answer the criticism of having opened the door, while pretending not to, to that which ultimately can destroy these rates. In effect that is what that party is asking parliament to do.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has placed before me quotations to be found in Hansard of June 16, 1925, at page 4330. No doubt he will be referring to them when he speaks. The fact is that I know from personal experience, without reading what somebody else said, what the reaction of the people was. And what has happened?

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the right hon. gentleman permit me to ask a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No. The hon. gentleman may as soon as I have developed this point. The Minister of Transport comes in with beaming face and gives credit to everybody, even the hon. member for Macleod whose interruption last night debunked the minister's argument. Even that hon. member was the recipient of encomiums which the minister handed out, with his eyes at the same time on the objective of weakening what has been called the Magna Carta of the western economy.

I say to the minister, you will not get away with it. You may succeed in having here those in the Liberal ranks who were absent without leave when the vote took place the other day, but you will not get away with this. This is simply an operation whereby you introduce into the law a recognition by parliament that these rates shall be subject to examination from time to time, though not mandatorily as originally provided for in the legislation.

The minister said, "Don't you see the change I have made? Previously I provided that there should be a mandatory examination but now it is all different. I leave it to the railways to apply." They do not need any mandatory provision. They will be there. After all, the door is open for them. Do you think that at the very first opportunity they will not take advantage of this provision? Why, it is like putting a weasel in a chicken pen and saying, "Be good to the chickens". Here we are providing for a welcome in advance to the railways to make an application to show they are not fairly treated, something they have been claiming for years.

The hon. gentleman is steeped in the classics, but the story of the Trojan horse is nothing compared to what the minister is attempting to do here. He spent a long time explaining what had taken place and the reasons for it. Why have these provisions at all? Why weaken and undermine the Crowsnest pass rates? Those rates were fixed not for one hour, not for one year, but for all time. That was the understanding.

Mr. Churchill: That is right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: At the first opportunity after passage of this legislation the railways will rush in. There can be no condemnation of that because they will say, "Parliament gave us the right." The Minister of Transport found he could not do it mandatorily, so the mandatory principle goes out and magnanimously the minister provides for a voluntary initiative by the railway companies. Will they not take advantage of it? The minister shrugs his shoulders.

Mr. Woolliams: This is ridiculous.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The companies are given an invitation: "Come in, the water is fine, provision has been made by parliament." The minister shrugs his shoulders. He cannot believe that the railway companies would ever think of doing that.

Mr. Woolliams: That is his deal.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is a preposterous posture on his part. He shrugs his shoulders. This action is dangerous. This is doing what the rules provide shall not be done. I know with what heavy hearts the minister and those associated with him viewed the vote the other night. If that had happened when we were in office they would have howled to high heaven, "Resign". I can just hear the refrain. They are trying to get away from what happened the other night. It was one of the sharpest blows this government has had. Judging from the number of members on the government side now it would seem that it had its beneficial results.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think, sir—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Sir, the ruling is clear. Surely, Mr. Chairman, you will not allow the Minister of Fisheries, by a subterfuge in wording, to do what this committee turned down.

The same argument has been made by the hon. member for Calgary—

Mr. Woolliams: Bow River.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I beg your pardon. I mean the argument of the hon. member for Bow River. The names of constituencies have been changed so much that it is difficult to know exactly what each constituency is in Alberta and elsewhere.

We challenge the right of the minister by casuistry to do that which the rules deny. I say to the members of the Liberal party that what they are doing in this connection shows their purpose in the original section 329(1) which was turned down. They are trying to put themselves in a position whereby these rates can be challenged not mandatorily but at will.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the right hon. gentleman would permit me to say something. I know he does not want to mislead. He realizes that the rates cannot be challenged at all, that the investigation provided for has nothing to do with the rates. It has to do with the revenues and costs.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, that is no question. This is another of those dolled up arguments of the hon. gentleman. He is trying to explain something about which he has a bad conscience, and with some reason. If this amendment is carried I say to the government that they will have even greater difficulty in western Canada explaining why they deserve support. Indeed, I would think that that paragon of political perfection—I say that in the most commending way—the premier of Saskatchewan, may again find it necessary to utter words of criticism regarding this government.

• (4:10 p.m.)

How dangerous this amendment is is shown by the western agricultural conference meeting at the Fort Garry Hotel in Winnipeg at the present time. The annual meeting of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture will conclude on Thursday, January 26, and I have received a message underlining precisely the point I am trying to make. Ever since his defeat in the committee the minister has been trying to explain. He had some of his departmental officials in Winnipeg explain how beneficial section 329 would be. They had not read it or they would not have been misled. The telegram I have received, and I leave out no portion of it, reads as follows:

> Western agricultural conference of CFA in session in Winnipeg disturbed by press reports about parliamentary vote on section 329 of the transport Bill C-231 and urges all parties assure that final draft of the bill provide that statutory freight rates continue to apply on all prairie grains including rapeseed and grain products moving from prairie points to export positions at all terminal locations at Lakehead, Vancouver, Prince Rupert and Churchill at levels which existed on December 31, 1966. Please find opportunity to assure western farmers on this matter before Canadian Federation of Agriculture annual meeting adjourns on Thursday, January 26.
>
> James R. McFall, Secretary, Western Agricultural Conference, Fort Garry Hotel, Winnipeg.

That is what we are trying to do by means of arguments such as those advanced by my hon. friend from Bow River. We are trying to assure the western farmer that this kind of monkey business will not be countenanced. That is the reason I rose today, to point out to you, sir, that if an amendment of this type can be allowed, then all that is necessary, when the government has been defeated on an amendment, is for it to make a few changes and then come back and say, whether it is almost the same or not, we have something new; there are more words in it. However many more words there are may be the danger is still there.

Beauchesne's third edition, citation 285 on page 113, states:

A mere alteration of the words of a question, without any substantial change in its object will not be sufficient to evade the rule that no question shall be offered which is substantially the same as one which has already been expressed in the current session.

We have the minister's own admission—I take it from his argument—that no substantial change has been introduced. The citation goes on:

It is possible, however, so far to vary the character of a motion as to withdraw it from the operation of the rule.

That has not been done. The rule is clear. What is being sought by the minister today is an opportunity to repair the damage done to the government as the result of their amendment having been voted down by the substitution of an amendment containing a few extra words but with the same intent, thereby endeavouring to save face in consequence of the inexcusable failure of the membership supporting the government to be present to assist the valiant efforts of the minister. There were times when he stood over there like the boy on the burning deck whence all others had fled. He wants another opportunity to get the boys back so that he can save himself.

Mr. Pickersgill: I don't want the deck to burn.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak in support of the point of order raised initially this afternoon by the hon. member for Bow River. At the outset may I deal briefly with the point which has been mentioned, though admittedly not pressed, to the effect that this point of order was not raised at the earliest possible opportunity, which would have been yesterday. I recognize that the minister did not press the point, but it was mentioned and the Chair might be thinking of it. May I, therefore, draw Your Honour's attention to citation 405(1) on page 285 of Beauchesne's fourth edition. It reads as follows:

If it should appear in the course of discussion that an amendment which has been allowed to be moved and which has not yet been agreed to, is out of order, the Chair directs the committee's attention to the fact and withdraws the amendment from the consideration of the committee.

It seems to me we are in that position. The amendment was moved yesterday, but for the obvious reason that time was needed in order to consider such a lengthy amendment the point of order was not raised until today. There has been some discussion of the amendment but it has not been agreed to and I therefore submit that it is in order to question its validity at this time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw your attention to a few citations which I believe to be relevant in this case. One or two have already been noted. I have two or three which have not yet been quoted. Having presented to you citations which in my opinion make it crystal clear that one cannot in committee seek to reverse a decision which has already been made, I will deal with the question whether or not the amendment now proposed by the Minister of Fisheries is substantially the same as the proposition which was defeated on Wednesday of last week.

Under the first heading, namely citations which should guide us in our discussion, may I first read from Beauchesne's fourth edition citation 200 (1) which is to be found on page 167.

An old rule of parliament reads: "That a question being once made and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again but must stand as the judgment of the house." Unless such a rule were in existence, the time of the house might be used in the discussion of motions of the same nature and contradictory decisions would be sometimes arrived at in the course of the same session.

And there is, of course, citation 288 which makes it clear that the rules that apply in the house apply also in committee of the whole house. Therefore the rule I have quoted, though it refers to the house, applies also to the committee of the whole.

But let me go on to quote from citation 402 (2). I ask that particular attention be paid to these words:

A new clause will not be entertained if it is beyond the scope of a bill, inconsistent with clauses agreed to by the committee, or substantially the same as a clause previously negatived.

That is brief, to the point, and as clear as it can be. I believe even the Minister of Transport must realize how clear it is. That citation is to be found on page 284 of Beauchesne's fourth edition. It is one which has not been quoted so far.

A new clause will not be entertained if it is beyond the scope of the bill—

I do not allege that.

—inconsistent with clauses agreed to by the committee—

I do not think I would allege that either, though one might say it was inconsistent with what was done when we were on clause 50.

—or substantially the same as a clause previously negatived.

That last phrase is clearly applicable. It is our contention that the new clause which the Minister of Fisheries is now seeking to put into the bill is substantially the same as section 329 which was negatived when we were dealing with clause 50.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Let me give you another citation, Mr. Chairman, No. 406 on page 285 of Beauchesne's fourth edition. There are five parts to this citation but it is part (c) which is appropriate:

Amendments are out of order if they are...

(c) inconsistent with a decision which the committee has given upon a former amendment.

There was an amendment to clause 50 which took out the proposed review of certain statutory rates and it seems to me that this proposition, which brings in by another amendment something that is inconsistent with the decision we took when we were on clause 50, is therefore clearly out of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Knowles: Certainly.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has he considered the point raised by the hon. member for York South that that provision was redundant because the house had already taken a decision on the same point in clause 15? If that is the case, surely it could not be argued that it was inconsistent with a decision taken by the house in one case rather than the other?

Mr. Knowles: The minister strikes me as a drowning man grasping for a straw in trying to see the problem as between clause 15 and clause 50 as having any relationship to the problem now before us.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for York South argued that the clause was quite unnecessary because we had already accepted exactly the same proposition in clause 15.

Mr. Knowles: If the minister is going to rely on that argument—

Mr. Pickersgill: I just thought the hon. member would try to be consistent with the hon. member for York South.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Knowles: If the minister is putting that argument forward then he should argue that what he is now proposing in clause 74 is not necessary at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am arguing that what I am proposing is different. That is the precise point.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, when I started to speak I said I would divide my remarks under two headings, the first dealing with the citations which lay down the law on this point and the second dealing with the question of whether the new proposal is substantially the same as the one which was rejected the other day.

I would refer hon. members to Bourinot's fourth edition. On page 329 there is a fair amount of material on the question of reversing a former decision. Bourinot says:

But when a question has once been negatived, it is not allowable to propose it again, even if the form and words of the motion are different from those of the previous motion.

A few moments ago the Leader of the Opposition quoted something from Beauchesne's third edition which is also in the fourth edition. It is citation 63 in the fourth edition. I think it is extremely relevant and it is similar to what I have just quoted from Bourinot. It says:

A mere alteration of the words of a question, without any substantial change in its object, will not be sufficient to evade the rule that no question shall be offered which is substantially the same as one which has already been expressed in the current session.

I want to come back to that language again when I compare the two motions, because I think the word "object" in the citation which the Leader of the Opposition read, and which I have reread, is crucial to the discussion.

Let me go back again to Bourinot and point out that on pages 328, 329 and 330 of this fourth edition he deals with this matter and points out that it is something which comes up very often in committee of the whole on a bill. In other words, these citations deal precisely with the kind of situation in which we now find ourselves. At one point Bourinot says:

The English journals are full of examples of the evasion of the rule which the house has permitted. In all such cases, the character of the motion has been changed sufficiently to enable the member interested to bring it before the house. Such motions, however, must be very carefully considered, in order to guard against a palpable violation of a wholesome rule.

Bourinot must have known who was going to be Minister of Transport some day when he used that language, that one has to be very careful "in order to guard against a palpable violation of a wholesome rule."

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I submit for your consideration that there cannot be any argument as to what the citations say is the rule. The rule is that when we are in committee of the whole on a bill and we have negatived a proposition we cannot be asked to vote again on that some proposition by another amendment somewhere else in the bill. This is precisely what the government is asking, and it is clearly out of order.

There may be ways to get around this. There is the device which the opposition frequently uses of an amendment on third reading to refer back to the committee of the whole for reconsideration, and there is the device under which a vote that has been taken can be rescinded. However, the minister does not seem willing to try these devices that are provided in the rules. Rather, he seems to want to try to do something which some of us contend is against the rules.

I said that the first part of my remarks would deal with the citations and I think that those of us who have dealt with this matter, the hon. member for Bow River, the Leader of the Opposition and I, in giving these citations have made it clear that an amendment at another place in the bill to reverse a decision already made, an amendment to put in something that has already been negatived, is clearly out of order. It is perfectly proper, however, to ask whether the amendment now proposed by the Minister of Fisheries is substantially the same as what was thrown out in the 59-58 vote that took place in the committee last Wednesday. I draw Your Honour's attention to all the citations we have read. They all refer to language that is similar, that is substantially the same. They do not just say that an amendment is out of order only if it uses exactly the same words. They say clearly that, even though the words may be changed, if the object is the same then the amendment violates the rule.

What was the object of new section 329 in clause 50? The object was to provide for a review by the Canadian Transportation Commission of the Crowsnest pass rates.

Mr. Woolliams: Right.

Mr. Pickersgill: No.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, yes. And what is the object of the proposed amendment to clause 74? The object is to make possible a review of the Crowsnest pass rates.

Mr. Woolliams: Right.

Mr. Knowles: In the former case it was compulsory in the sense that parliament was directing the commission to take the action of holding a review. Is there any difference now? Sometimes the more things are different the more they are the same. Now the railways have to ask for a review, but having asked for it the language of the amendment moved yesterday by the Minister of Fisheries makes it clear that an investigation will be held and so the net result is precisely the same.

I suppose it might be argued that there is a slight difference. In the former case a review could not take place until after three years. Now it can take place after two years.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman should get his facts right. In the amendment which was thrown out a compulsory review was required within three years.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles: I accept the correction. In the former case a review was compulsory within three years. In other words, it was not necessary to have it until two years and 11 months had gone by. Now, it is possible to have it when two years have gone by. So we are arguing about a few months. Surely the net result is precisely the same, namely, a review of the Crowsnest pass rates. The minister says that this is different. He said that the commission could go into all the other statutory regulations and other rates which might be set between now and some future date. If Your Honour will again look at some of the citations you will see that it is in order to bring in an amendment which relates to something which has been before the house previously when it comprises only a part and not the whole of the resolution previously voted on by the house. The minister attempts to say that this is different because there are a lot of other things in it which were not in the previous one, that is, that all the statutory rates are in it and not just the Crowsnest pass rates. But that does not bring it within the exceptions which Bourinot provides. So far as what was there before is concerned it is there again in the amendment which is now before us.

The minister said that what the house was arguing against when section 329 was before us was a presumption that because it was in the act these rates were possibly not compensatory. Yesterday when he was indulging in a fine example of Pickersgilliana he told us he was not trying to get the house to reverse itself at all. He said he understood that what the house did not like was the presumption in the legislation that this review should be made because the rates were perhaps not compensatory. I submit that the same fault still pertains. It is in the legislation that the companies can ask for a review. They do not need it in the bill to be able to ask for it. They have been askng for this sort of thing for months. Now, if this amendment is in order and should it go through this—

Mr. Woolliams: It is an invitation.

Mr. Knowles: It is an invitation, as the hon. member for Bow River says, for the companies to go before the transportation commission with the blessing of the act behind them and with the guarantee that they can get a hearing.

I submit that all the elements of presumption that were there before are there now. I do not know how anyone can argue that this is a different proposition and therefore that it can get under the wire. In the light of some of the things suggested by Bourinot and Beauchesne this is beyond my capacity to understand. To use the language of the authorities concerning the word "object", the object is the same. The companies wanted this. No doubt this is what they indicated to the government last fall when the railway strike was on. One of the things they wanted was a review of the Crowsnest pass rates. Section 329 was designed to give them that review; it was defeated. Clause 74 which is now before us is asking that that review be given. It is precisely the same thing. Furthermore, the element of presumption is there in that if this motion were to pass it would give to the actions the companies would take all the sanctity of an act of parliament. I submit that in effect the Minister of Transport who spent time in halls of the same institution of learning in which I learned a few—

Mr. Pickersgill: I taught, but I did not teach the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Douglas: That is the reason the hon. member learned a few things.

Mr. Knowles: I sometimes wonder what he learned there. I submit that the minister was teaching things secular while I was studying things theological. I think the wires got crossed a bit. I believe he learned a few tricks. The minister found it possible yesterday to stand up in this house and to say with all the charm of which he is capable, to say in his suave convincing way, that he was not asking us to reverse our position. But that is precisely what he is doing. He cannot argue himself out of that. I submit, Your Honour, that you should find that this proposed amendment to clause 74 is substantially the same as the proposition that was negatived when we took the vote on the amendment to clause 50 and that therefore it is in violation of the clearly stated rules which govern the procedures of this house.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Bow River has raised a very important point of order and one that I mentioned briefly at the time the vote was taken. I believe that the Minister of Transport, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre who moved the amendment which deleted section 329, and some other members of the house including the member for Medicine Hat, have some explaining to do. I say that for this reason. In the debate led by the Minister of Transport many of the other members who were involved were led to believe immediately after the vote was taken that the definition of grain and other parts of subsection 2 of section 329 were in effect essential for the continued functioning and operation of the Crowsnest pass rates as they are applied today. Now, after much more careful examination of section 329 which was deleted I am led to believe—if I was somewhat led astray before perhaps it could happen again—that all of the subsequent subsections after subsection 1 are in fact the rules under which subsection 1 shall apply and relate to nothing else at all. It is unnecessary to have those other provisions in the bill for the continued operation of the Crowsnest pass rates. They cover all grain and grain products such as flour and so on.

Mr. Baldwin: Except rapeseed.

Mr. Olson: The hon. member says "except rapeseed". I would think they apply even to rapeseed. If one takes all these subsections together as I have done very carefully, it will be found that subsection 2 of the same section simply says that no action shall be taken under subsection 1 in respect of any railway company that has increased the level of rates prevailing on the 31st day of December, 1966. Then it goes on to spell out the products which can be hauled. It does not say and does not need to say that they are to be hauled at the lowest rate for grain and grain products.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Medicine Hat is speaking on a point of order.

Mr. Nugent: The hon. member rose to speak on a point of order but he is not speaking on the point of order. He is giving an alibi for not voting.

Mr. Olson: I am not giving any alibi for anything. I am simply pointing out there were some members who based their argument, immediately following and preceding the vote, on the fact that the definitions were required in the new bill. I suggest that all of the subsections which followed subsection 1 in section 329 were in fact the rules and regulations, but that subsection 1 was the operative provision and it was deleted. The reason I say this is that if hon. members are convinced they perhaps voted inadvertently to delete something that they want in the bill, this is dealt with in Beauchesne's fourth edition at page 137. The third paragraph of citation 162 reads:

• (4:40 p.m.)

Sometimes the house may not be prepared to rescind a resolution, but may be willing to modify its judgment by considering and agreeing to another resolution relating to the same object.

Therefore the committee, if it inadvertently acted to destroy something essential in the bill, under this rule need not necessarily have rescinded the whole section because it wanted to get rid of subsection 1 but could have modified its judgment to retain those provisions essential to the bill and particularly to other sections of the bill. Having carefully considered the whole of section 329, which was deleted and the new clause 74 now before the committee, I find I am in a measure of agreement with the hon. member for Bow River and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in saying that the minister is coming back with what is in some ways the same objective that was contained in section 329.

I agree with the minister that there are some differences. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that you take these differences into consideration in ascertaining whether in your judgment they are sufficient to justify the amendment of the Minister of Fisheries to clause 74. One thing the amendment does is to change the time, although the discussion between the minister and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre did not seem to determine that there was any significant change in the time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I could put a question to the hon. gentleman? Has he considered the matter of the substituted rates? Surely this is a very substantial difference from anything that was in section 329.

Mr. Olson: I did consider that matter because, as I said, I have looked at section 329 and the amendment rather carefully since this matter arose. There is no doubt that the substituted rates now included in new clause 74 constitute an addition to what was contained in section 329. There are also some other changes. For example, this amendment includes a provision for a representative of the Crown to attend hearings before the commission. This provision was not contained in section 329. A representative of the Crown may attend hearings before the commission to defend and promote the case for the public interest.

The amendment brings back almost in identical words the definitions of grain products, maintaining related rates, and so on. The minister has also argued that the committee took a decision with respect to clause 15 which provides that the Governor in Council with the new transport commission would in fact have the authority to initiate and undertake an investigation of these very matters. I refer Your Honour and the minister to clause 15 (1) (e) which provides as follows:

In addition to its powers, duties and functions under the Railway Act, the Aeronautics Act and the Transport Act, the commission shall

(e) inquire into and report to the minister upon possible financial measures required for direct assistance to any mode of transport and the method of administration of any measures that may be approved;

I suggest that this clause could be interpreted in a way that would in fact give the minister and the new transport commission the power to do exactly what is proposed in so far as clause 74 is concerned and in so far as section 329 was concerned. There are some minor changes but the difference between clause 74, as I see it, and clause 15 (1) (e) is that if the minister were to invoke the provisions of clause 15 (1) (e) as soon as this legislation is proclaimed he could ask the transport commission to get a study under way. If clause 74—this is the difference in the clause—were passed, the minister and the transport commission would be prevented from making any inquiry of this nature for at least two years and the railway companies would be prevented from making application for a hearing for at least two years. Therefore, if we are to have this provision in clause 15 (1) (e) it would perhaps be an improvement if a similar provision were in clause 74 so that the minister and the transport commission could not initiate such an investigation for at least two years.

This does not change the argument that has been advanced by the hon. member for Bow River and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, namely, that it would appear that the objective contained in section 329, on which the committee has made its decision, and that contained in clause 74 are so identical that we need to consider very carefully the reintroduction of this principle or we will violate the rule that disallows the reintroduction of essentially the same subject matter in the same session.

Mr. Woolliams: Right.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I want to deal specifically with the problem before us and the rule which I think is being violated, but may I first make an introductory remark or two. Last week I read what I thought was a very interesting and amusing article by Mr. Charles Lynch in which he mentioned that he was a watcher. He said that in the mornings he watched Mao in China, and in the afternoons he watched Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker and reached conclusions with regard to both gentlemen. He acknowledged the error in his conclusions with regard to both. I am a watcher but I watch, morning, noon and night, the Minister of Transport.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: I have been doing this for years.

Mr. Pickersgill: Not at night, thank heaven.

Mr. Churchill: I have warned my colleagues about this. I find it an interesting occupation. It consumes quite a bit of time. But I have always paid tribute to the Minister of Transport in that he keeps us alert because he is quite sharp. I am not going to say he is tricky; I will not use that word. His movements are rapid and sometimes are concealed from casual view. Therefore we have to be very alert in the House of Commons. We have to examine with care what he puts in front of us. We have to listen carefully to his words, because sometimes there is an additional meaning that is not noticeable to those who are not following the debate very carefully. Therefore, as I have said before, I shall miss him when he goes to the Senate. He keeps me young here in the house because I am constantly mentally alert watching what he is doing.

We have watched the minister in regard to this matter. Last night when the amendment was introduced we carefully reserved our position and said we would have to study it overnight to see whether it was satisfactory. That is why we did not immediately challenge the amendment. The minister, very kindly—and he can be quite a good parliamentarian on occasion—said: Well, we will stand this matter until tomorrow.

That is the situation in which we find ourselves. We have made our examination, we have studied the rules, and we are approaching the subject today. I hope there will be no complaint, sir, about our spending time on this particular rule. There are people who criticize and say that now and again the house gets involved in procedural wrangles, as they call them. We are dealing today with one of the fundamental rules affecting parliament. I believe that this rule has a history of 350 years. Just because a rule is old it is not necessarily good, but this rule has been renewed and re-emphasized during the last three and a half centuries so there must be some substance to it.

• (4:50 p.m.)

If you examine it even casually I think you will see that parliament could not operate if a decision reached by the house could be almost immediately reversed on the basis of a slip on the part of a member of one party or another or because additional members were available an hour or two after a vote was taken. If decisions could be reversed easily then parliament would gradually lose a great deal of its importance. I make no apology at all for entering this debate or for asking the committee and the chairman to give this matter careful consideration.

When I was explaining yesterday why I moved the amendment in respect of section 329 in short form I indicated that there was complexity involved and that I selected a short form with the expectation that the minister and his officials would bring forward any substitution required. It was my expectation that the substitution to be brought forward by the minister would apply only to section 329, subsection 4, which was the one causing some difficulty. The marginal note refers to the meaning of grain and grain products. At the time I moved the amendment I was not at all certain as to the definition of grain and grain products. I said yesterday that after a considerable search of the statutes I could not find a comprehensive definition of grain or any definition at all of grain products. At the time I moved the amendment I was not in a position to phrase it in such a way that those references would be retained in the bill. That is what I thought the minister and his officials would consider. I did not anticipate that they would attempt to bring back the whole section in a modified form.

In the course of the remarks of those who preceded me attention was drawn to a number of references which I will not repeat. However, I should like to direct your attention, Mr. Chairman, to one or two more references because, in view of the importance attached to this fundamental matter, I think there should be a record in Hansard for the benefit of those who may wish to refer to this debate and the ruling of the Chair.

I direct your attention to Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, fourth edition, page 328, paragraph IX, which is headed "Renewal of a question during a session". It states in part:

> It is, however, an ancient rule of parliament that "no question or motion can regularly be offered if it is substantially the same with one on which the judgment of the house has already been expressed during the current session. "The old rule of parliament reads: "That a question being once made, and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again, but must stand as a judgment of the house". Unless such a rule were in existence, the time of the house might be used in the discussion of motions of the same nature and contradictory decisions would be sometimes arrived at in the course of the same session.

On page 329 of Bourinot appears those comments which were referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Another reference appears in Bourinot at page 545. It is headed "A bill, once rejected, not to be again offered in the same session—Exceptions to rule." I hope the chairman will look at this reference. I should like to read one sentence which appears about half way down the page. It reads:

> But if an amendment has been rejected in a committee of the whole on a bill, it cannot be proposed again during the pendency of the bill in the committee.

In order that the chairman may have the benefit of any research we on this side of the house have been able to carry out, let me place on record a statement from May's fifteenth edition at page 380 under the heading "Matters already decided during the same session". The following is stated:

> A motion or an amendment may not be brought forward which is the same, in substance, as a question which has been decided in the affirmative or negative during the current session. The rule may be fully stated as follows: —No question or bill shall be offered in either house that is substantially the same as one on which its judgment has already been expressed in the current session.

At page 382 there appears a paragraph headed "Repetition of motions which have been negatived". It states:

> The most frequent attempt against the rule is to seek to evade it by raising again with verbal alterations the essential portions of motions which have been negatived.

Let me read this paragraph which appears at page 397:

> With regard to the whole matter it may be stated generally that the reason why motions for open rescission are so rare and why the rules of procedure carefully guard against the indirect rescission of votes, is that both houses instinctively realize, as a precedent referred to above shows, that parliamentary government requires the majority to abide by a decision regularly come to, however unexpected, and that it is unfair to resort to methods, whether direct or indirect, to reverse such a decision. The practice, resulting from this feeling, is essentially a safeguard for the rights of the minority, and a contrary practice is not normally resorted to, unless in the circumstances of a particular case those rights are in no way threatened.

Those are the references which I draw to the attention of the Chair. In light of those references and the importance which Beauchesne, Bourinot and May attach to this fundamental question, I hope the chairman will be assisted in reaching his decision.

I will not repeat the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Bow River and the right hon. Leader of the Opposition on the substance of this matter. I will not go into other particulars concerning the debate we had the other day because I think our case in that regard has been presented. I have attempted to deal solely with the rule by presenting supporting authority. It is my belief that the house made a decision in respect of a review of the Crowsnest rates. The minister, by using different words, is attempting indirectly to reverse that decision. The object of his amendment is exactly the same. It is in support of the rule which prohibits that indirect method of reversing a decision of the house that I have presented my argument.

Transportation

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Chairman, in dealing with whether or not the amendment to clause 74 meets the rules of the house some remarks were made by the hon. member for Medicine Hat in which he drew attention to the various items in the new clause 74 which were not a part of the original proposed section 329. I did not hear the hon. member refer specifically to proposed section 472 of clause 74. This particular section is not related to the old section 329 but refers specifically to the matter which I raised in connection with proposed section 328, subsection 2, in respect of domestic grain rates between prairie points and British Columbia.

There was discussion between me and the minister in respect of how the same provision could be maintained in the bill. I wanted to make sure that before the bill passed we had placed in the bill some arrangement whereby the problem facing the farmers of British Columbia could be adequately reviewed and the results of that review drawn to the attention of the cabinet for action.

My only purpose in rising at this moment is to protect the clause I have fought for in interviews with the minister and on the floor of this house, although the provision is not really associated with the Crowsnest rates but with domestic rates on grain into British Columbia. This is a problem which faces the farmers of British Columbia but does not face farmers in other parts of Canada. I simply want to be on record at this moment as indicating that this particular clause is specifically related to proposed section 328(2) which I believe has not been passed yet. I believe it will be voted upon eventually when clause 50 is brought before the committee to be tidied up.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to speak too long on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Bow River. I did notice with interest the remarks made by the hon. member for Medicine Hat who tried to explain why, a few days after this party had shown him the action that should be taken to defend his people, he had weasled on the appropriate occasion but now wants to defend his action. This did not throw much light on the point of order.

I was amazed at the minister's smooth defence of the significance of the change in wording, since there is not much difference between the amendment and the proposed section we threw out last week. I had hoped the minister would entertain a question from me but he declined to do so. One of the essential differences the minister mentioned between this amendment and the deleted section was that the deleted section contained an obligatory provision while the amendment does not. In other words, the old section we threw out required a review within three years while the amendment permits a review after two years.

In listening to the minister one might be led to believe that the members of this chamber are not in touch with the realities of life, are not supposed to know of the anxiety of the railways to open up the question of the Crowsnest rates. We are not supposed to know how anxious the railways are to use every device they can to get at these rates. We are not supposed to have listened to the debate on this question last week.

I was going to ask the minister, since there is no one in this house who has any doubt that given the slightest opportunity the railways will immediately make an application to review these rates, what he is suggesting in this amendment that is really new. He is suggesting an inevitable inquiry and therefore is saying that the huge difference between the amendment and the old section is the difference between mandatory and inevitable. I really believe it boils down to that, and if we are to be honest about it the minister's argument amounts to sophistry.

The second point the minister made was that this amendment is wider than the original section because it refers to other rates and not just the Crowsnest rates. It was pointed out earlier in the debate that clause 15, of course, covers other rates. Argument was advanced on whether the deleted section was really necessary in view of clause 15. I cannot, therefore, see much force in the minister's argument that the amendment broadens the old section, especially in view of the presence of clause 15. No one who has listened to the debate or to the minister's remarks could find any essential difference between what he said with reference to this amendment and what he said about the deleted section.

He has said that this provision could not be construed as an attack upon the Crowsnest rates and is only designed to have a look at the revenues and costs. This is precisely the argument he used all last week, that the provision was not an attack on the Crowsnest rates and did not open the door for an attack upon those rates. He was puzzled as to why members of the committee could not seem to understand his argument. He persisted in advancing it as though committee members were under some misapprehension and did not seem to understand that the commission would just be looking for information on revenues and costs.

The essence of the decision taken by the committee last week, in the light of that argument, was simply that the committee decided that no one should be invited or allowed to look into the question of revenues and costs because that could be interpreted as a springboard from which the Crowsnest rates could be attacked. The decision went that far, Mr. Chairman. Time after time when members on this side of the house advanced that argument, the argument was rejected. Since the minister is using the same argument in favour of the amendment before us today, I submit that the Chair must reject this amendment. There is no difference in his approach to the problem.

The minister is hoping that by changing the wording the committee will accept his version that this amendment is not an attack on the Crowsnest rates and that a review of costs and revenues should be allowed. However, the committee rejected that argument last week by a decisive vote. Once voted upon, that point should be dead. I must confess that I admire the ingenuity of the minister in the manner in which he attempts to introduce this amendment. I admire his ingenious arguments. I admire his effrontery when he tries to convince us that what is not so is so.

• (5:10 p.m.)

As I have said before in the house, the minister's arguments have convinced me, to use an old Newfoundland saying, that he has, in common with the Minister of National Defence, that trait of character that handles the truth most awkward. I think it would be a very sorry day for our parliamentary rules, especially those governing orderly debate in the house and which state that once a question has been settled it cannot be revived, certainly not by this sort of stratagem, if we ever allowed so blatant a move as this, which merely amounts to a twisting of words, to achieve its objective. If this were the case it would render meaningless from this time on any vote taken in committee. It would mean that by twisting words a little later when the government had all its members present it could reverse a previous decision.

I submit there is nothing more telling against the minister than his own words which he used when debating this matter last week. He said that we should not look at revenues and costs because in doing so it might be used as a springboard to attack the rates. For this reason alone, Mr. Chairman, I ask you to disallow this amendment.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I have been sitting here waiting for understanding and comprehension to light up the face of the minister and for him to rise and say that he accepts the very valid arguments that have been advanced from this side of the house, on the assumption that not only would he have been thrilled by their quality but also excited by their quantity. However, I see that that is not the case so I must pursue for a brief period an extension of some of the propositions which have been made. I do so, Mr. Chairman, because this is a tremendously important issue. I think the minister is attempting in a very ingenious way to superimpose upon a previously accepted rule of the house what could be a very grave exception.

I do not propose to go over the statements made by the hon. member for Bow River, the Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and others relating to the rules as contained within the four corners of Beauchesne, Bourinot and May. The rules are there and the minister is not quarrelling with them. The issue is the application of those rules to the fairly specific facts of this case. With this in mind, Mr. Chairman, what is the real pith and substance, the core or the root of what the amendment is trying to achieve? I submit we must compare the amendment with what the proposed section 32 which was struck out attempted to do. I believe there are three points to bear in mind. First, what are the subject matters to be dealt with? Second, what are they going to deal with? Third, what will be the results?

I think we can say there have been some additions to the subject matters. But I suggest that if Your Honour holds that this is the basis upon which you can distinguish this present amendment from others, then we are in for a lot of trouble.

Let me put the matter in concrete terms. Let us assume that there was a clause of this bill which provided that the sum of $100 million would be paid to the railway companies for subsidies by reason of their carrying grain at the Crowsnest rates. Let us assume that that clause was put to a vote and defeated in committee of the whole house. This having happened, Mr. Chairman, surely it would be impossible for the minister or the government to come back with another clause which proposed to grant $100 million in subsidies to the railways for carrying grain under the Crowsnest rates and a further $20 million in subsidies in regard to some other statutory rates, and for the minister to contend that this proposition was different as a result of the addition of other moneys or the addition of other subject matters involving recipients of the bounty of the people of Canada.

The entire subject matter of this amendment covers in specific terms, as it must, the subject matter dealt with in the proposed section 329 which was rejected. Consequently I submit that it is not a sound argument to say that because the government has added additional subject matters which can be dealt with by the transport commission it has changed in quality and in substance the original subject matter which was before the committee.

As to the third point, what can be achieved, very simply it is that the transport commission may examine and investigate and as a result of its investigation may make a recommendation to the governor in council in terms of money that certain payments be made in respect of the continuing carriage of grain by the railway companies at the Crowsnest rates. That end result, Mr. Chairman, is precisely the same as the end result of the first subject matter which was before the committee, the proposed section 329 which was rejected.

This leaves us, Mr. Chairman, with only the consideration of the third point, namely, the method by which the parties can go before the commission and by which the investigation is carried out. I suggest that whether the review is mandatory or whether it is permissive is immaterial. If this bill dealt exclusively with procedural matters, then the minister's argument would be sound. But it does not; it deals with matters of substance. One of the matters of substance is an investigation by the board of whether or not under certain conditions a recommendation will be made to the governor in council for the payment of certain moneys. That is the pith and substance of that part of clause 74 that we are attacking, as it was the pith and substance of the proposed section 329.

So far as the actual grain is concerned I think there has been some misconception. As the minister realizes, when we talk of statutory rates we mean a number of things. We mean the rates applicable to the carriage of grain that were originally provided for in the act of 1897 and extended in 1925. We mean the railway lines which were covered by that act and by the orders made by the Board of Transport Commissioners, as well as by subsequent voluntary action by the railway companies themselves for economic purposes in extending the benefits to other lines.

Grain also includes flax, which was interpreted by the Board of Transport Commissioners to be grain—this was a judicial decision as the minister knows—and it also includes rapeseed which was brought in by amendment in 1960 or 1961. So I do not think that there is any question as to the subject matters being identical.

I suggest that this is the point which the Chair must consider most carefully. In making this suggestion I suppose that we on this side are raising arguments which might well be used against us in opposition. After all, in most cases it is the opposition that attempts to introduce amendments and also tries to distinguish the amendments and rules under which they are brought in from other cases which have arisen in the past. I think it is some measure of the independence, integrity and honesty of this opposition that it is prepared to make a case on arguments that may be used against its members at some other time.

An hon. Member: When we shortly form the next government.

Mr. Baldwin: As someone suggests, they may be used against us when we shortly form the government. However, Mr. Chairman, this is the point that I ask Your Honour to consider most carefully. If you can make a distinction on a basis of this sort, then it seems to me that with a little ingenuity—and this house is full of ingenuity, as I have found—there will be no stopping the methods by which amendments can be moved despite the fact that at some previous time during the session this house may have come to a contrary decision on the same subject matter. It is on that basis that I ask Your Honour to consider this matter most carefully when making your ruling.

• (5:20 p.m.)

May I say a word to the minister, not on the point of order but as a suggestion. If the ruling is to the effect that the amendment is not properly made, all the minister has to do is to bring to an end all of clause 50 which includes the repealing of sections 328 and 329 of the old act. We would be back under the old act with respect to the carriage of grain at the Crowsnest rates and all consequent and ancillary provisions would apply.

Under section 38 of the Railway Act the government can direct a reference to the new transport commission envisaged under clause 74. I say this quite sincerely, because I think a proper case can be made out for what I say. The government can direct an inquiry and if the transport commission as a result of the inquiry comes to the conclusion that the rates are not compensatory, that something ought to be done about them, the matter comes back to parliament. This has nothing to do with the point of order but I suggest to the minister that if his amendment is ruled out of order the position is not hopeless. There is a way out and that way I have suggested.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Chairman, if I may add a word on the point of order I wish to say something about the amendment to clause 74 proposed by the minister. I will not go into details about the rules as they have already been dealt with by others more able than I am. I say to you, sir, that you will be in difficulty if you accept this amendment as proper. The committee has already voted on the question of a review of the Crowsnest pass rates and has decided not to permit such a review. If the amendment before the committee is accepted as being in order it could mean that an amendment could be proposed to it and the committee once again could vote on the very question it decided last Wednesday. If this happens we can see that on other pieces of legislation there will be amendments to amendments to amendments, and votes on votes. In fact, this would destroy our parliamentary procedure in committee.

If the minister wishes this amendment to be accepted he should alter subsection 2 of section 470, which reads as follows:

> Subject to subsection (3), a railway company under the jurisdiction of parliament may make an application to the commission to investigate the revenues and costs attributable to the carriage of any commodity—

After the words "any commodity" he should add "other than grain under the Crowsnest pass rates".

Mr. Woolliams: I agree.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): The committee has already ruled on the question before it and it cannot be introduced again. If the minister is worried about other statutory rates all he has to do is include the words "other than grain under the Crowsnest pass rates" after "any commodity" in subsection 2.

Surely he knows the difficulty the committee will be in if this amendment is included in the bill. It will make a mockery of procedure. We ruled out by the vote last Wednesday a specific review of a specific statutory rate. The minister now wants to widen the base for a review. Other members have said that there is provision for that under clauses 15 and 38. This amendment is not necessary. It must be ruled out of order or the whole procedure in committees of parliament will be made a mockery. I urge you, sir, to rule the amendment out of order until such time as the minister redrafts it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Two or three points have been made and I feel I ought to say something about them. Perhaps I can deal with the point made by the hon. member for Peace River first. He suggested we might solve all problems by dropping clause 50. The hon. gentleman obviously has not read the last few pages of Hansard for last evening, because clause 50 has been adopted. In the argument he advances today he would ask the committee to reverse a decision already taken.

Mr. Baldwin: By unanimous consent.

Mr. Pickersgill: We could have the committee by unanimous consent accept my clause, which is as easy as reversing clause 50. I am not the least impressed by the hon. member's point.

Before dealing with anything else I must deal with a point raised by the hon. member for Medicine Hat because it has troubled me. The hon. member suggested that because these references to grain were in section 329, or whatever the appropriate section number is, an amendment might not be necessary. To clear that point I might say that the new section 328 adopted yesterday deals with grain and flour, including flaxseed, to Vancouver, Prince Rupert, Fort William and Churchill, and no place else. We have added Churchill to the statutory rates. Under section 371, rapeseed is included, to Vancouver Prince Rupert, Fort William and Churchill.

Under section 471 there are a number of other grain products which are not in the present statutes of Canada at all but are simply determined by orders of the board or decisions of the railway. We want them in the bill; we want them put into the law. They are grain and flour, including flaxseed and rapeseed, to Victoria, New Westminster and to Armstrong, and grain products to all delivery points specified in all these various categories. I think these are essential and therefore I make no apology for asking this committee to put this classification back in. All I meant was that these are really essential. I know that the Chair and nobody else takes seriously this baby and the bath water argument. The sense in which it should be taken seriously is with respect to what I said about grain and grain products.

Mr. Woolliams: It does not say that at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman will agree with me that I know what I meant even if I did not say it very well. Perhaps I had better get away from the baby and the bath water.

Mr. Woolliams: The minister made mistakes about babies in Vancouver before.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Pickersgill: That was Victoria. The hon. gentleman reminds me of my past. I think it would be well to draw a veil over that. I now come to the argument of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and particularly to one observation he made. He said, if I did not mistake his meaning, that the railways could ask for a review at any time. If this is the case, of course, the only real substance in the proposed amendment is the provision that the railways cannot ask for a review until two years after the bill is passed in the case of statutory rates and until two years after a substituted rate may have been put into effect. So what we are doing in this amendment is abridging the general power of review.

The argument put forward by the hon. member for Acadia was, I thought, in some ways, the most ingenious of all. Despite its ingenuity, I still think it is wrong. The weakness of the argument, it seems to me, is this: he suggested that what we voted against was a review of the Crowsnest rates.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): That is right.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not so, of course.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): It is.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. member would allow me to finish my argument. It is not so if the hon. member for York South was correct in his interpretation.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): If "ifs and ands were pots and pans."

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I could be allowed to continue. The hon. member for York South said that under clause 25 the governor in council could direct this review anyhow.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Woolliams: He might have been worried about the labour vote.

Mr. Pickersgill: Whatever his motives were, he is a pretty good lawyer, as the hon. member for Bow River will admit, and he is a good judge of good lawyers. The hon. member for York South argued strongly that section 329 was not necessary because the governor in council could ask the commission to make a review at any time. I said I would not like to rely on that kind of power. Moreover, I did not think there should be any review for two years. I did not think that was a satisfactory way in which to proceed.

To come back to the point, I do not contest all these citations. Indeed, I sometimes wonder whether we could not abridge all these discussions on procedure by simply leaving out reference to the things on which both sides are agreed and confining our arguments to those matters which are in dispute.

I admit that if the amendment moved by my colleague the Minister of Fisheries is the same as the one which was defeated, it is out of order. But I contend that it is not. I contend that it does not deal with precisely the same subject matter inasmuch as it deals with all statutory rates, and all substituted rates which there may be in the future. I contend that it is different because it does not require the commission to carry out a review of a particular set of rates but that instead it gives the commission the faculty of doing so if an application is made to it by the railways. I contend that this is the most important difference of all. Instead of parliament saying that something should be reviewed, a railway company has to apply. Whether or not it will apply is a matter of opinion, though the right hon. gentleman made a lot of that point. Whatever the presumptions in that area may be, they have nothing to do with the pith and substance of an amendment of this kind.

I say there is all the difference in the world between establishing a tribunal before which one party may ask to be heard and establishing a commission which is ordered by parliament to carry out a review. This, I maintain, amounts to a substantial difference of principle between the two amendments and for this reason I suggest that my hon. friend the Minister of Fisheries was quite within the rules in moving the amendment.

Mr. Woolliams: I will be brief because I spoke fairly extensively when I first rose on this point of order. But with the greatest respect to the minister I say to him now that he is dragging a red herring through the discussion of this subject. The principle at issue is not the way in which a review is to be brought about. The principle at issue is what the subject of the review should be, and the subject of the inquiry is to be the Crowsnest pass freight rate, a statutory rate.

You will have noticed, Mr. Chairman, that while the minister was dragging this red herring across the path in an effort to make something which is bad and invalid appear good, he never once dealt with the arguments which have been advanced from this side of the committee. Let him admit now that 99 per cent of the statutory rates are represented by the Crowsnest pass freight rates. We have almost a billion bushels of wheat this year on the prairies and it is transported by the railways at the Crowsnest freight rates. No other commodity shipped on the railways compares in volume of shipment.

Is the minister trying to tell us that if he has, shall I say, a hair and a body and he fits the hair to the body he has constructed something which is essentially different? The minister has never come to grips with our arguments, especially our contention that this amendment is substantially the same as what was intended in section 329. The review would be the same. The evidence would be the same. The results would be the same. The decision would be the same.

I say to the Chair, with the greatest respect, that I do not see how it is possible to get around this situation. To do so would ruin the rules of the house. We would see the same thing being done day after day and the responsibility for it would rest upon the shoulders of the minister. What is this section all about? The one question it raises is whether the Crowsnest pass rates should be reviewed or not. With his genius, and only he has that kind of genius, the minister has added a reference to the other statutory rates. But when someone asked him last night what those rates were, do you know what the minister said? He replied: "I do not know what they are." Mr. Chairman, they amount to only a hair on that body of which I spoke a few moments ago. Yet the minister says it adds up to a difference in principle.

Mr. Bigg: I do not like to waste the time of the committee on questions of procedure and rules but it was only on Friday last that the minister reminded me that we might make a little progress by following the rules which we set down for ourselves. I should like to take this wonderful opportunity to throw that observation back at him.

An hon. Member: Did you catch it, Jack?

Mr. Bigg: This should not be an occasion for argument. It should be an occasion for guaranteeing to western Canada and the maritimes the historic rights which belong to them and which are required by them in order that they may exist. It is a matter of survival.

I can only reach the conclusion that pressure has not come from the C.N.R., because if the C.N.R. makes a loss we have to pick up the tab. The only possible reason for such an amendment as we now have before us is that the minister is being pressured by other vested interests which wish to see all our rail rates revised and some of them thrown down the drain. The railways have more than been repaid by the generosity of the government in land, mineral rights, rights of way through cities, and monopolies in carrying the mail.

• (5:40 p.m.)

We all know that when this omnibus bill becomes law those who interpret it will not be able to go behind the statute and say, "This is what the members of parliament wanted and intended." Instead they will read it and take it word for word. This amendment seeks to do through the back door what parliament refused to allow to be done through the front door.

We are not going to buy a pig in a poke. We want this legislation to be specific in as many of the clauses as we can make specific. We do not want a review of the Crowsnest pass rates to the detriment of the people in western Canada and the people in the maritimes. Those rates are the foundation of our survival in the economic life of Canada.

If the minister is bona fide in his intention to have more consideration given to rapeseed, flour and other products which will be shipped through Churchill and other ports, then instead of accusing us of stimying our own farmers why can he not put a provision in the bill, in plain, simple words that everyone can understand, that the Crowsnest pass rates will be honoured forever? There is great wisdom in the suggestion made by the hon. member for Acadia that if the minister does not intend to attack those rates then let it be spelled out in this amendment. There would then be no argument about it.

The procedural point is clear and plain. That which we ruled on last week we certainly do not have to rule on again this week. If this amendment is to be allowed at all it should contain something very specific, something which any layman can understand, stating that our prerogatives under the Crowsnest pass rates are defended.

The Chairman: If there are no further comments maybe the committee would allow me to make a short statement now. I want to thank members of the committee who have taken part in the discussion on this point of order. It has been an extremely interesting one.

May I read from Beauchesne citation 163 at page 137, which has been referred to by different members of the committee but which for my own purposes I would like to read now.

> A mere alteration of the words of a question, without any substantial change in its object will not be sufficient to evade the rule that no question shall be offered which is substantially the same as one which has already been expressed in the current session.

Then the final sentence of that citation states:

> It is possible, however, so far to vary the character of a motion as to withdraw it from the operation of the rule.

The question before the Chair is to decide whether or not, if the present amendment were passed, it would be in contradiction to the decision made by the house last Wednesday or, putting it another way, would the amendment be inconsistent with the decision that the committee made on new section 329 in clause 50 last Wednesday?

I think that the point which the Chair has to decide is this: is the amendment proposed by the Minister of Fisheries sufficiently different from new section 329 as to constitute a different question? This is not an easy question to decide. Your Chairman has been in the committee for most of the time when the transport bill has been under discussion, and while I do not profess to know anything about transportation I have followed hon. members' arguments very carefully, particularly on section 329 last week.

I consider the question that is before me an extremely important one not only so far as this particular bill is concerned but also so far as our procedure in this chamber is concerned. I would therefore crave the indulgence of the committee to allow me some time to consider this matter and to bring back a decision to the committee when I have made one that satisfies me in my own mind.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: It now remains for the committee to decide what further action it prefers to take this afternoon.

Mr. Pickersgill: It would be profitless to go on discussing the amendment before we know whether it is in order, so in the circumstances may I ask whether we can agree to take clause 16 and dispose of it?

The Chairman: Does the committee agree to stand clause 74 until the Chair is able to present a decision on the question of order and to proceed with discussion of clause 16 as amended?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 74 stands.

On clause 16—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Clause 16 deals with the discriminatory aspects of the legislation. If a person can prove he is being discriminated against by any means of transportation he can appeal to the new commission. One has to study carefully the minister's suggested amendment to this clause to understand its actual meaning in relation to shippers who may be discriminated against by the railways.

Earlier I suggested that in line 32 following the words "may prejudicially affect the public interest" there should be inserted the words "or the business" or "a person's business." Under the clause as it now stands a person must prove that his business is large enough to affect the community in which he lives, or part of the province in which he lives, or possibly the whole of the country.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would allow me to ask him whether he has a copy of clause 16 as it has been twice amended. It was amended a few days ago and again yesterday. It seems to me we ought to be discussing it as amended. I do not seem to have an extra copy at the moment but I could send my own copy over to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I would appreciate that.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I thought the minister said last evening that there would be copies for all of us.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have had copies made of all these amended clauses but they have not reached me yet. I will have them distributed as soon as possible, but in the meantime the hon. gentleman may use my copy.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): In respect of this particular clause it is difficult to ascertain just what the minister meant by this proposed amendment which apparently has been accepted.

Mr. Pickersgill: The amendment has been adopted; it is not proposed.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I said "which has been accepted", if the minister would contain himself. In looking at it I still wonder whether the definition of "public interest" is clear and concise enough to include a company, such as a small vegetable oil plant, which is affected only by a specific railway rate which it feels is too high. This company might feel it is being discriminated against and might wish to appeal to the commission. In my interpretation of the amendment the definition of "public interest" is still too broad. It does not seem to aid a small manufacturing plant which employs perhaps six or ten persons if that plant is being discriminated against because of a particular freight rate and wishes to appeal. This really does not give this plant the right to appeal. It must be proven that the rate is discriminatory to such an extent that the public interest is affected.

This is a point to which I think members should pay particular attention because the definition really is not clear enough, in my quick appraisal of it, to suggest that an individual or a company would have any real right to prove that his business is affected. Not too many persons or companies in the area might be affected and therefore he would have difficulty in proving he had the right to appeal and should be heard by the transport commission. I should like the minister to explain briefly whether an individual who felt he was affected and was being discriminated against, although the public interest was not affected to any greater extent than represented by himself or his company, would have the right to appeal under this particular clause as amended.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes. The hon. gentleman probably has a set of the clauses now. This involves clause 1 as well as clause 16. If you read paragraph (b) of subclause (1) of clause 16 you will see that the expression "public interest" includes, without limiting the generality thereof, public interest as described in clause 1(d) which reads as follows:

> each mode of transport so far as practicable carries traffic to or from any point in Canada under tolls and conditions that do not constitute
>
> (i) an unfair disadvantage in respect of any such traffic beyond that disadvantage inherent in the location or volume of the traffic, the scale of operation connected therewith or the type of traffic or service involved—

Therefore I would say that any shipper who could allege that he was at an unfair disadvantage in comparison to some other shipper under similar circumstances would have a prima facie case and would have the right to be heard. If he convinced the commission, he would then have the right to have his rate changed to a substituted rate.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): The minister has suggested that we consider the amendment to clause 16 in conjunction with the amendment to clause 1 and that a person may have a prima facie case to appear before the commission if he can prove that another party is getting a better rate. For the sake of argument let us suppose that there is no other party engaged in a similar business in a similar location.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think he must be in a similar location. I think this requires only that the general conditions have to be similar. If there should be two shippers shipping over a distance of about 300 miles under the same kind of conditions generally and in the same quantities, then I do not think the one shipper would have to be in the same place as the other.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): If the minister is saying in effect that an individual will be able to build a prima facie case and appear before the commission if he is subject to a discriminatory rate, then I take it that the minister is accepting a fair interpretation of the words "public interest". What objection would the minister have to the addition, as was suggested in the committee proceedings, after the words "public interest", of the words "or his business"?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think we are just traversing ground which we have traversed before. This is almost precisely the same question that was put to me by the hon. gentleman previously. I have no new answer. The answer I gave previously was to the effect that if any transport costs affect his business I do not see how any tribunal on that basis could reach any kind of conclusion at all. Surely if one were to decide that someone is at an undue disadvantage one would have to have somebody else to make a comparison with. If this can be assumed, then it seems to me you are home free.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I do not accept that.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry the weather prevented my presence here yesterday when there was considerable debate on the matter of protection for the maritime provinces. I have, however, had an opportunity to read what the minister said yesterday and to give further study to the statutory law on this subject. Perhaps it is just as well that I was not here, because I have had an opportunity to have a fresh, second look at it. Even with the changes which have been brought about in the committee so far I think there is absolutely no protection for export traffic through any port in Canada or at least in eastern Canada. The argument I am going to make is not confined strictly to Halifax, Saint John or any Atlantic port but will embrace other ports as well, namely, those on the St. Lawrence river and the Great Lakes. I make the indictment of this particular bill, which is supposed to spell out some kind of a national transportation policy, that it is landlubber-minded. Despite the fact that the minister represents a constituency beside the Atlantic ocean, he has followed the landlubberliness of his colleagues in this present government.

• (6:00 p.m.)

There are four or five sections of various acts, including the present bill, that I should quote in making my argument. With such a wealth of material to choose from one hardly knows where to begin but perhaps I should re-emphasize what has been said by my colleague from Halifax, which really originated with the letter I wrote to the Minister of Transport on October 6 in which I listed the protection given to Canadian ports in various acts in the past.

Section 42 of the agreement with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company in 1903, section 13 of chapter 6 of the acts of 1911 regarding the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company, and chapter 20 of the acts of 1914 regarding the Canadian Northern Railway System provided, I think without a change of wording anywhere along the line, as follows:

—the through rate on export traffic from the point of origin to the point of destination shall at no time be greater via Canadian ports than via United States ports.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

I presume that whatever rights were conferred there persist to this day because after reading and re-reading the legislation we have before us I cannot find where those acts are swallowed up. But there is one section which particularly applies to eastern Canada where both the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific have railway lines. I refer to section 14 (2) of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act as set forth in chapter 39 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952. This is what section 14 (2) states:

The board of directors shall so direct, provide and procure that all freight destined for export by sea that is consigned within Canada for carriage to National Railways either at point of origin or between that and the sea shall, unless it has been by its shippers specifically routed otherwise, be exported through Canadian seaports.

In other words, the railways of Canada are told that unless shippers express another preference they have to carry the export shipments of the industry of this country to Canadian seaports. Surely that is a laudable thing and is part of any rational national transportation policy which tries to give as much as possible to all areas of the country. But that provision, sir, is no longer in the law because quite recently this committee passed clause 76 of Bill No. C-231, which provides that the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act is repealed. Therefore section 14 (2) of that act, which I have just read to the committee, will be one with the dodo when parliament has given its approval to Bill No. C-231.

Is there anything else to provide a substitute? The minister has made two attempts to arrive at a solution in this respect, one of which is, I think, quite relevant to this section or I would be ruled out of order. To clause 16 (3) (a) he has added the words "or to the movement of commodities through Canadian ports." I do not know what effect this provision will have on the law. Having read the whole of clause 16, I do not think it is suggested that one could successfully make a case before this commission that one would be aggrieved if the railways, for example, started to transport exports through American seaports.

Whatever the intention of the minister, and I do not fault him for his intention but for the way he is carrying it out, the fact is that in my opinion and in the opinion of others with whom I have talked, including experts on matters of railway freight, this is simply not enough to carry out the laudable purpose embodied in a requirement that goods be shipped through Montreal, Quebec, Halifax, Saint John, or any port you wish to name, if the railways decide otherwise.

The other question about which there was some whoop-de-doo yesterday—I am sorry I was not here to take part in it but the weather prevented my being here—was the new clause 59 presented by the Minister of Transport. The relevant part of it is that the bill be amended by inserting a new clause 59 and that new section 343 of this bill is amended by adding another subsection. The relevant part of the amendment is:

> —nothing in this act shall be construed to affect any obligation imposed upon any railway company subject to the jurisdiction of parliament by any other act or any agreement made pursuant thereto requiring the company (b) to route export traffic through Canadian seaports.

That also looks all well and good, but what is its effect? I suggest the effect is that if there is any obligation in the law after Bill No. C-231 is passed that obligation under the law is not altered or changed by the bill. But the rub is that the provisions which gave us protection are repealed by Bill No. C-231. The section of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act which I quoted, for example, goes out the window as soon as Bill No. C-231 takes effect.

I will read the relevant section again. To my mind this is just as vital an issue as the one we have grappled with all afternoon dealing with the Crowsnest pass rates. It is as vital to the maritimes to have something to promote—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I could perhaps assist the hon. gentleman a little?

Mr. McCleave: I do not know whether I will be assisted by what the minister has to say but I am perfectly willing to let him speak.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am informed that the provision with respect to routing which was originally in part I of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act was transferred in 1955 to section 21 of the Canadian National Railways Act and is therefore still in full force and effect.

Mr. McCleave: It may be in full force and effect with regard to Canadian National Railways. I would want to read that section before accepting what the minister has said. I presume that this advice came to the minister from his officials in the gallery. As far as I can see, there is no requirement in the bill we are now considering that imposes an obligation on the other great railway system to use Canadian seaports for its routing of export traffic. I say that Bill No. C-231 is deficient in this aspect. I also fear that by repealing a large chunk of previous legislation in this field there is really no obligation that will exist in any other act once we pass Bill No. C-231, because an act that is dead and gone imposes no obligation whatsoever on anybody. One cannot take an act that has been repealed and single out any particular section and say that somehow or another it is still alive, unless that section is specifically preserved.

• (6:10 p.m.)

I hope the minister and his advisors, in dealing with the problems involved in the formation of a national transportation policy, will look to the seaports of Canada and particularly those on the east coast which are faced with difficulties that have built up over a period of years to the peak which exists this winter.

The difficulties faced on the Atlantic coast were thoroughly presented by the hon. members for Saint John-Albert and Halifax. They presented figures which show a substantial loss of tonnage in these ports, almost equally matched by a substantial increase in tonnage at the St. Lawrence River ports. This is of concern to us and I do not think any measure such as that embodied in clause 1 of this bill will help much. It is only a pious proclamation of hope rather than a definitive injunction in law against the railways, requiring them to follow a certain course of conduct.

By reading Hansard I have followed closely the arguments presented during the last two or three days in respect of clause 59. I have read and reread that clause. It does not reassure me that something new will be done to assist the maritime transportation situation, particularly the port aspect. I am not satisfied that anything new has been added to give that area protection.

The minister may follow one of two courses of action. I understand that the final report of the study on maritime transportation problems will shortly be on the minister's desk for consideration. Perhaps some "i's" have to be dotted and some "t's" have to be crossed, but if my information is correct that report is about complete. I hope the minister can move quickly in adopting its recommendations so that transportation problems in the maritimes, which have not been touched to any extent by this bill, can be solved during this session or during the next session which one hopes will commence in a month or so.

Perhaps during the dinner recess the minister and his officials can come up with a more effective plan to assist the Atlantic seaports. We are not satisfied with Bill C-231. The seaports of Halifax and Saint John have suffered grievously. The minister has uttered warm words in this regard but warm words cannot provide work for the longshoremen of those cities.

When the government is considering the report on the special maritime transportation study I hope it will remember what has been said here in the last couple of days, and I hope it will not be satisfied that Bill C-231 will provide the assistance the Atlantic area needs to solve its transportation problems.

Finally I should like to make a prediction. A great deal has been said about compensatory rates. Let me suggest in the most Cassandra-like way possible that a transportation policy cannot be based on compensatory rates. If we are to expect development in western Canada and in Atlantic Canada some other method must be devised.

[Translation]

The Deputy Chairman: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised on the adjournment motion tonight are as follows: the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin), Trade—repercussions of the importation of shoes on the Canadian industry; the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie), House of Commons—inquiry as to use of electronic voting machine; the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams), National Parks —use of expropriation to halt court cases.

[English]

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): The hon. member for Halifax now has me worried, particularly because of his reference to the minister's answer. The minister stated by amendment in 1955 the Canadian National Railways Act now protects what formerly was in the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act in this regard. My obvious question is, what will happen in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway in those areas in the maritimes serviced by the Canadian Pacific? I am particularly anxious to hear the minister's reply.

[Mr. McCleave.]

Mr. Pickersgill: I intend to reply to that question but I will not do so until I have received a little more advice than I have received up to this time.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I hope careful consideration will be given to this matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not want to argue about it but I do want to have the facts.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): While we are dealing with clause 16 I should like to intervene for the last time. At the insistence of members on this side there has been an addition to clause 16 in respect of matters that shall be considered by the commission. We appreciate the co-operation which has been shown although we feel it falls short of what we had desired.

I should like to make a few remarks in respect of this clause. Perhaps I will not do any harm by repeating my objections and thoughts. Someone will have to interpret the new phrases and words which appear in this clause in respect of the actions of the commission. We now have a lot of interpretations established over the years and certain words and phrases have taken on certain connotations. Let me point out that the phrase "undue obstacle" represents only a hope, because it will not solve the problem which exists as a result of the geographical location of the eastern provinces. I hope that the commission will give a generous interpretation to the words "undue obstacle", and that it will include our geographic disabilities. If this is done, we will have something more than we had when this provision was first drafted.

• (6:20 p.m.)

In so far as the last part of the amendment which the minister made last night is concerned, I have looked at it three or four times and I think it is good. It adds something more. I refer to the phrase, "to the movement of commodities through Canadian ports". If this phrase is generously interpreted by the commission, then we will have something which, while not as much as we wanted, will at least give us some hope. This concludes my remarks on clause 16, provided the minister's advice is good.

Mr. Kindt: I should like to make some remarks in the spirit of trying to be helpful to the minister. In so far as this special appeal and investigation is concerned, the minister and anyone who has had experience with commissions knows that it is far easier for the commission to say no than to say yes to a request for a special investigation. In fact, my experience has been that the weighting is about 75 per cent in favour of no and 25 per cent in favour of yes. In other words, after a certain period of time has passed the commission will develop patterns of thinking and sort of get into a rut. With all due respect to the minister and his desire to give fair treatment to those who may be requesting special investigations or making appeals, I am afraid that those making those requests will be out on a limb, so to speak, without very much opportunity of obtaining any redress.

Perhaps the minister is of the opinion that what he is doing here is the answer for those who wish to have their rates investigated. However, in my view I think the chances of a person accomplishing what he is setting out to accomplish by having a special appeal are thwarted by the way in which the provision has been written into the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the hon. member for Saint John-Albert could pay attention to me now, and I think it would be a good idea if he stayed with the hon. member for Halifax so that they could both hear what I am about to say. I am happy to say I do not seem to have lost all my faculties because I guessed the answer to this question. However, I have it now in black and white. The Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act never applied to Canadian Pacific Railway reroutings but only to the Canadian National. The Canadian Pacific rates have been kept the same because of competitive factors.

Perhaps I should not try to interpret the mind of the late Prime Minister Bennett who introduced this legislation, but I suspect the reason was that while Canadian National has some choice of routes to United States ports the Canadian Pacific does not. The Canadian National could use Canadian National lines in Canada or the Grand Trunk line to Portland. The Canadian National could, therefore, protect Canadian ports in this respect. As I have already indicated, the Canadian Pacific has no choice. They have no line going to any United States port, and if they want to keep the traffic they have to send it over their own line. They do that. In any event, the repeal of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act will take nothing away because the obligation was never imposed on the Canadian Pacific at any time.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I appreciate the minister's explanation of these circumstances. Provided the minister's advice that the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act only covered the Canadian National with regard to matter of shipping to Canadian ports, then my fears are unfounded. It might be that I will be ambitious enough to check that and make certain.

Mr. Pickersgill: As the hon. gentleman knows, I did not check it myself. I would not have too much confidence in the result if I did. I have sought the advice of the draftsmen and law officers, and this is the advice I am given. I feel quite sure it is correct.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): This is no reason for the minister not putting something in the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think that the hon. gentleman has a point there. If as a result of the studies that are now being made we find there would be any practical effect in doing so, then I think it would be a good thing to do. Quite honestly, I nearly answered on impulse when the hon. gentleman was speaking because, having the map pretty well in my own mind, I could see that line to Portland and I could see how the Canadian National could circumvent this provision. However, I could not see how the Canadian Pacific could without losing the traffic altogether to United States railroads. I do not imagine they would want to do that.

If there were some useful purpose to be served, there would be no reason for not doing this, particularly once we accept the principle that if we impose an obligation like this on the railways and it is not compensatory, then they should be compensated. Perhaps I should say that I accept quite cheerfully the admonitions of the senior member for Halifax. He is quite right when he says we should never have a national transportation policy at any foreseeable time in the future in this country if it is based exclusively on compensatory rates. We are not trying to do that. What we are trying to do is to make the various carriers earn their living if they can, but above all to make sure there is adequate transportation for Canadians in every part of Canada. If some part of that transportation system has to be paid for by the taxpayers, then it will not be the first time that has happened in Canada. We would not have confederaion without it.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I do not mind saying to the minister that I am still a bit worried about the final effect of the removal of the exception in section 334, the compensatory one. I hope we accomplish what we wanted to accomplish when we had it. I close now by saying that I hope hon. members have gained the impression it is not a case of the maritime ports asking for something they did not have. They are in such desperate shape now that they are fighting a rearguard action. They are just trying to hang on to something they had and are not having too much success in doing that.

Mr. Cantelon: Yesterday, Mr. Chairman, I asked for a statement on just what the situation was with respect to the phrase "public interest" in clause 16. I find that the new clause 16 retains this phrase. While I realize that according to clause 16 public interest includes, without limiting the generality thereof, the public interest as described in clause 1, I am still left in some fear that the interpretation of that phrase by the courts may be harmful to private business and certain individuals. For that reason I feel it would be wise if we had a modifying statement with respect to this phrase. The new section very much enlarges the original section 317, and it now includes not only railways, but water carriers, motor vehicle transport, air lines and even commodity pipe lines. However, it is my opinion that even the new section, which I suppose will be the final new section, is almost as unacceptable and objectionable as the original section 317, and the difficulty lies in use of the phrase "public interest", a phrase which the minister stubbornly insists on retaining.

• (6:30 p.m.)

I really cannot understand this insistence, Mr. Chairman, because this is the first time in the history of rate regulation dating back to 1903 that the government has decided to require the shipper to prove that the rate he is complaining about prejudicially affects the public interests. Nor can I find any attempt that has been made, which in my view is complete, to define the phrase "public interest". There is still difficulty in it, in my view.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the hon. gentleman considered the reference to clause 1 that is in what he calls the new clause 16 which, at the time it was adopted, seemed to satisfy the hon. member for Peace River and most of the other hon. members, and was indeed put in very largely at their suggestion?

[Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert).]

Mr. Cantelon: I do not know whether it satisfied the hon. member for Peace River or the other members who were interested in it, but I can say that it does not satisfy me, and it is on that basis that I am speaking. I think there are others who have the same feeling that I have.

Under the sections of the present Railway Act which are being repealed, a shipper was required to prove only that the rate prejudicially affected his own personal interest or the interest of his business. Now, Mr. Chairman, just why should that be changed? This is a long way from the public interest by any definition.

This was the burden of the criticism that we heard in the committee of the original section 317, and in effect of the new clause 16 which was then proposed, though not of course, of this last new clause 16. I believe, as I have already said to the minister, that this criticism is justified, and it is most regrettable that the phrase was not modified. In my opinion an amendment is appropriate here, and this amendment I intend to move later.

In arguing this point it is notable that Alberta's submission, which was made by Mr. Frawley, placed a great deal of emphasis on this particular phrase "public interest" and objected very strongly to it. He argued, if in order to compress them a little, I may be forgiven for paraphrasing his submissions, that the shipper will be complaining about the rate that his business must pay. He must justify his complaint on the ground that the rate affects his interests. How then can he be expected to prove that his complaint is justified on the ground of public interest when the business in his own that is being discriminated against?

I will come back to Mr. Frawley's argument in a moment, Mr. Chairman. It seems to me that the phrase "public interest" was introduced as one more concession to the railways. It also seems to me that it is quite obvious that applications by single shippers on this ground will certainly fail because of inability to discharge the quite impossible onus of proving prejudice to public interest, whatever that may be. Nor do I think that clause 1 eliminates this responsibility; it gives too much right of interpretation to the commission and to the law officers. In my view, the result will be confirmation by the commission of rates which prejudicially affect a shipper's own business.

The submission of Manitoba was presented by Mr. Mauro, and he did not like the phrase "public interest" either. Mr. Mauro put it this way in reply to a direct question from the hon. member for Medicine Hat, as reported at page 2597 of the proceedings before the transport and communications committee:

We are suggesting the amendment that appears in our submission, because we could find no indication of criteria for determination of injury to the public interest. We could find the negative one, that private interest was not public interest. We can find certain jurisprudence that would indicate that private interest is definitely not public interest. We do not seem to be able to find the positive side of what is public interest, short of what the party who has the authority to determine it decides upon.

That is the exact point I want to make, Mr. Chairman—"short of what the party who has the authority to determine it decides upon". In this case, of course, it would be the commission.

To return to Mr. Frawley's submission on behalf of Alberta, at page 2766 of report No. 39 of the committee proceedings on November 22 one finds a question which Mr. Frawley put to the Minister of Transport with respect to this particular matter, namely the question of public interest. Mr. Frawley asked:

What in the world is the connection between public interest and this man in southern Alberta complaining about his rate?

The minister thought that over and, of course, came out with the usual expert reply—and he does make excellent replies—in these words:

If Mr. Olson would permit me, this is one point I meant to make and forgot. It was never intended, of course, that appeals under section 317—

I interject here to say that section 317 is now, in effect, clause 16.

—should be limited just to shippers. There is no reason why the government of Alberta should not complain that a certain rate was not in the public interest.

Mr. Frawley: I would expect that the government of Alberta would be taking up the instance of this shipper and that shipper, and it would just be the sum of the part. I do not quite know how we would get away from the obstacle of proving public interest.

Then Mr. Frawley, who is a lawyer and who has been very much concerned with railway matters for quite a few years, said he felt that his question of public interest was not one that a shipper could easily prove. Certainly the minister's suggestion that the government of Alberta should fight his battles for him is a rather strange one, and I am rather surprised that he makes it because usually he does not make strange suggestions. However, it seems to me it confirms the objection that Mr. Frawley was making; that is, that it is going to be very difficult for an individual shipper to prove that his business is in the public interest.

The minister's last minute attempt to equate public interest with the position of a provincial government in freight rates matters is not very convincing. In fact it is almost an admission that the shipper, the one most concerned, would find it impossible to prove that his rate violated the public interest. Is the minister, then, saying that a shipper complaining about unjust discrimination must get his provincial government to take his case to the commission, and if he does not succeed in interesting the province to retain counsel and take up all the individual cases which arise, then this highly praised section 16, the one that the minister puts such faith in, is just a complete failure? In my view, the public interest requirement destroys section 16 completely.

Professor Williams' views on the old section 317, which is almost the same as the new clause 16, are set out at page 2844 of the proceedings of the transport committee for November 24. I will not quote his words because anyone can look them up if he so wishes, but his opinion is that section 317 is unacceptable and objectionable. His opinion is the same with regard to the new clause 16. He is certain that it is no substitute for the present provisions of the law—that is, the present sections 317, 319, 323, etc.—of the existing Railway Act.

The principal reason for Professor Williams' opinion is based on this question of public interest, with which the section deals. He believes it does not deal with the effects of a discriminatory rate adjustment on the business of the individual shipper. Professor Williams, a man of international reputation in transportation economics, is squarely of the opinion that the public interest requirement makes the new section a useless substitute for the existing prohibitions against unjust discrimination in rate making.

• (6:40 p.m.)

That being so—and I am assured that these gentlemen have not changed their ideas—I feel certain that much difficulty will come about if we leave clause 16 unamended. For that reason I am about to move an amendment seconded by the hon. member for

Acadia. I am not certain, in quoting, the actual line numbers, and so on, as in the mimeographed part we have no lines. I move:

That clause 16 (2) (b) be amended as follows: In the line "may prejudicially affect the public interest in respect".

After the word "affect" insert the following words "the business of the complainant or". The line would then read: "May prejudicially affect the business of the complainant or the public interest in respect of."

I am sorry I have only one copy of the amendment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the Chairman puts that amendment I wonder if I might ask a question of the hon. member for Acadia. I wonder whether this was not moved before and rejected by the house. I am not quite sure. Could that be verified, perhaps? I know the hon. member brought up the point and suggested he would move an amendment.

Mr. Cantelon: Before the hon. member for Acadia answers, this is the point about which I asked the minister yesterday. I heard no answer. So far as I can see there has been no definite treatment of this amendment, and that is why I have now presented it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure there must be a record at the table. This debate has gone on for so long that I am sure the hon. gentleman will not fault me for not remembering everything. I remember the point being raised by the hon. mmber for Acadia, who suggested he might move an amendment. Quite frankly, I have forgotten whether he moved it. It may be, in the light of the extensive amendments fabricated as the result of the observations of the hon. members for Peace River and Springfield, if I remember correctly, that the hon. member decided not to move his amendment.

While the matter is being looked up I might direct a question to the hon. gentleman about the relationship between clause 16 and clause 1. I would ask him whether he feels that this amendment will add much to the rights the shipper would have. If he looks at clause 16 (1) (b) he will see this:

the expression "public interest" includes, without limiting the generality thereof, the public interest as described in section 1.

If you look at clause 1 (d) you will see where the public interest is described. It says:

—each mode of transport so far as practicable carries traffic to or from any point in Canada under tolls and conditions that do not constitute

(i) an unfair disadvantage—

And so on.

[Mr. Cantelon.]

All a shipper needs to do, it seems to me, is to look at the rate someone else is getting in like circumstances and say that the rate he has been offered constitutes an unfair disadvantage. While the words here are not precisely the same as the word "prejudiced" they are, I think, much more specific and would enable someone to make a much better case. How do you prejudice somebody's business? You could perhaps prejudice somebody's business by charging any tolls at all, if you get a situation—as came up in one suggestion yesterday—where the rate from Ottawa to Halifax and the rate from Ottawa to Montreal would be the same. In that case could not someone in Canada say that his business was being prejudiced because a low rate was given for this longer distance to someone, somewhere else?

Mr. Forrestall: You are picking on us again.

Mr. Pickersgill: I just picked the first illustration I thought of. Perhaps I should take an illustration from western Canada. Suppose for example the rate from Medicine Hat to Winnipeg was the same as from Brandon to Winnipeg. Would not a businessman in that case be able to say that one rate was giving an undue disadvantage to someone in Medicine Hat over someone in Brandon? It seems to me that the words the hon. member for Peace River suggested should be included as part of the definition of public interest, so that there would be no question of undue disadvantage, except that inherent in different volumes of traffic and all the other things set out here which are almost taken from the Manitoba brief, as the hon. member for Kindersley will undoubtedly recall. I have been filling in time, but I did so to ascertain whether any such amendment was ever moved.

Mr. Olson: Could we not have copies, so that we may understand it?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): The minister asked a question, and I ought to answer it.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Shall I read the proposed amendment?

Mr. Pickersgill: I ask Your Honour not to read it until we settle the question of whether it has been moved before.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I suggested something similar to this on January 10, or when this clause was first debated, but I did not move the amendment. I did not move it because the minister late in the evening of January 10 suggested an amendment which I said went a long way towards the objective we wanted in the bill. I wanted to study it, and that is why I did not pursue the question. The next day we went on to study clause 16.

I do not see what harm would be done by the amendment, and I shall have more to say about it when it is moved. Perhaps that has answered the minister's question. I ought to allow someone else, who wishes to, to speak.

Mr. Pickersgill: Since my objection has been removed perhaps the Chairman could put the amendment, if the hon. gentleman wants to persist.

• (6:50 p.m.)

The Deputy Chairman: May I inform the committee that we have sent the one and only copy of the amendment to be copied, so that copies will be available to hon. members within a few minutes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. gentleman could repeat it from memory, because I wish to say a word about it.

Mr. Cantelon: That is quite a burden on my poor memory, but I will do my best. It dealt with clause 16(2)(b) and asked that after the word "affect" in the line "may prejudicially affect the public interests in respect..." the following words should be inserted—"the business of the complainant or", making the line read: "may prejudicially affect the business of the complainant or the public interest in respect of".

Mr. Pickersgill: I think I could put my objection to this amendment in a single phrase. I would think that those words are so wide as to open the door to a whole mass of frivolous complaints and would be bringing in by the back door all the bureaucratic disadvantages of a system of regulated rates as opposed to competitive rates. I believe that the "undue disadvantage" protection which can be invoked in order to get a case before the commission does provide adequate protection for shippers in specific terms.

I very much fear that if shippers were just allowed to allege that something was prejudicially affecting their business the commission would be required to exercise a discretion far beyond the phrase "public interest", unless it was very tough and paid almost no attention to the complaints. For these reasons I am not prepared to accept the amendment.

Mr. Olson: I wish to say at the outset that clause 16 is very different from the clause first introduced. The minister and the members of the standing committee know very well that when we began work on this bill there was no such clause at all. I wanted to say to the minister that what we have here is a substantial improvement.

At the same time I do not see the validity of the hon. gentleman's objection to the amendment which has been moved. The hon. member for Kindersley has inserted the amendment into a paragraph which says that the commission should make an investigation if it is satisfied that a prima facie case has been shown. In other words, the possibility of frivolous complaints being made is removed, since an applicant must establish a prima facie case before the commission is obliged to make any investigation.

I am sure the minister must understand this. I share the concern felt by the hon. member for Kindersley about the removal of the protection which used to be in section 317. I was concerned about this while the bill was before the standing committee and at that time I questioned some of the people I believed to be familiar with freight rates and their application. There have been many cases before the Board of Transport Commissioners in which pleas were made on the basis of discrimination. Such pleas could only be founded on the fact that the rate had an effect prejudicial to the complainant's business. In some of these cases no attempt was made to argue that it had a prejudicial effect on public interest.

Now the safeguarding phrase does not appear. In the light of the protection to which I referred a few moments ago, perhaps the minister will consider restoring the right, or the traditional privilege, which has been removed along with the old clause 317 of the Railway Act. I agree to some extent that if a shipper has reason to believe that a rate established by a carrier does predudicially affect him it will be possible to argue that the public interest also would be affected, since he would have employees and others depending on him whose interests would suffer, and that these circumstances are provided for in the definition of public interest in relation to clause 11.

However, it does not seem to me that any harm would be done by leaving the phrase "the business of the complainant" in the bill. After all, if a shipper had a complaint he would first of all go to the new transport commission, either personally or through counsel, and if the commission immediately said to him: "We do not believe there is a prima facie case of prejudice here" then no further action would be taken anyway.

Does the minister not think it would be better to bring this provision a little nearer to individual cases rather than leave room for arguments to develop later as to whether or not the public interest is involved, and having cases which do not affect public interest dismissed out of hand? The counsel for Manitoba, Mr. Morrow, said he could find jurisprudence to the effect that private business is not public business. There is an order in council which I quoted to the minister not long ago in which it is specifically stated that an applicant could not claim that the public interest was affected on the ground that his private business was prejudicially affected.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman will admit, after reading clause 1, that in clause 16 an undue disadvantage is defined as part of the public interest, so there could be no question in that case. I do not know what other kind of prejudice there could be. This is what really puzzles me. I can see that undue disadvantage, discrimination as between one shipper and another, is certainly prejudicial. I do not know what other form of prejudice the hon. gentleman has in mind. If I were given some concrete example I might be able to form some opinion as to what the commission is being invited to do.

• (7:00 p.m.)

Mr. Olson: I admit that clause 16, read together with clause 1, taking into account the relationship that is now in the wording, is a great improvement on what we had previously. I am not denying that, but I believe there may be another area where a shipper may have reason to believe that he is paying a disproportionately high contribution in the rate above the variable costs.

New section 336 will be all right in some cases dealing with light car loadings up to 30,000 pounds or under 30,000 pounds, but it has no value in the old formula on heavy loadings. There may be cases where no comparison can be made, where no other shipper is shipping nearly the same thing from nearly the same point. In such a case a shipper should be able to go to the commission and declare that he is paying a disproportionately high contribution over and above the variable costs, say 200 per cent or 300 per cent, on the basis of loadings. He may be able to convince the commission that the rate is high and he may be able to argue that it is prejudicial to the best interests of the region in which he operates.

That is why I say there is another area in which it may be a little difficult to prove public interest, but a shipper may be able to prove that a rate is prejudicial to his business. I am not going to speak on this matter again and, as I say, I think this is an improvement on what we had previously.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think, sir, there was a general feeling that we were going to rise at this time until eight o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: May I inform the committee that the Chair wishes to confirm that the amendment was not moved previously.

Progress reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order. I understand a wish has been expressed by the committee that we suspend sittings between now and eight o'clock. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): And is it agreed that we resume the work of the committee at eight o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TRANSPORTATION

PROVISION FOR DEFINITION AND IMPLEMENTATION OF NATIONAL POLICY

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-231, to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential provisions—Mr. Pickersgill—Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Pursuant to the order just made by the house I do now leave the chair.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. House again in committee of the whole to consider Bill C-231. When the committee rose at seven o'clock we were considering an amendment submitted by the hon. member for Kindersley. For the information of the committee perhaps I should read the amendment. The hon. member for Kindersley moved:

That clause 16 (as amended) be amended as follows: In subclause (2) (b), in the line "may prejudicially affect the public interest in respect of", after the word "affect" insert the following words "the business of the complainant or". The line would then read: "May prejudicially affect the business of the complainant or the public interest in respect of".

The hon. member for Acadia.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Chairman, as I suggested previously I have a few more words to say in respect of clause 16 and its proposed amendment. Actually there are two major clauses in the bill having to do with the discriminatory aspect of rate setting which this bill allows the railways to be involved in. In respect of new section 336 which was dealt with earlier, we were not able to convince the minister that it should be amended or that a broader definition should be drawn up with regard to the interpretation of "captive shipper" or a captive area. Since we have been unable to convince the minister that there should be an amendment made to section 336, it becomes more evident that clause 16 should at least be strengthened. I should like to say quickly that it certainly is strengthened by the minister's amendment, but the question remains whether it is strengthened enough in view of the fact that we were not able to amend section 336 in any shape or form.

I believe this amendment strengthens clause 16. It gives an individual a right to appear before the board in an effort to establish a prima facie case that the railways are discriminating against his business. This means that he would not have to establish there was discrimination against the public interest or the community in which he lives, or in half the province or in the whole province in which he lives, but merely against his business.

In order to clearly understand this one would have to go back to the old railway act and the principles enunciated in this transportation bill. The old railway act established the Board of Transport Commissioners in, I think, 1903. That board was set up because of a monopolistic atmosphere which prevailed across Canada in respect of the railways in those days. There were a number of specific clauses which outlined what the railways could and could not do. The act went on, in effect, to suggest to the railways that they could not increase their rates unless they established a prima facie case that their rates were in need of being increased to assure their remaining in business. The whole onus at that time was on the railways to present arguments to the effect that the rates should be increased, that the rates were not discriminatory and so on.

In this bill the whole onus is placed on the shipper. He must prove he is a captive shipper. In this case he must prove not only that he is being discriminated against by a mode of transportation but also that it is in the public interest that he and his business be not discriminated against. It is not good enough to prove that he himself is being discriminated against by a railway company; he must prove that it is in the public interest that he be not discriminated against.

I think one must look at the whole concept of this bill. In it the railways are being allowed to bring in any rate they like. The minister has suggested that clause 16 offers insurance. Actually it goes quite a bit further than the original bill. In looking at the original bill, I notice that there have been something like 65 or 70 amendments. In the committee hearings we urged the minister to do something about this discriminatory aspect of the matter. He came up with the suggested new clause 16 which took the place of old section 17 in the Railway Act. But once again one must ask oneself what protection is being given to an individual, a captive individual or an individual who is being discriminated against. It is all well and good to give the railways the right to set any rates they like, but we must also remember that the minister admitted there still are some errors where a monopolistic atmosphere exists. In the minutes of proceedings and evidence No. 23 of the committee on transport and communications he stated he had difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the industry would be better off if the railways were allowed to set their own rates. He admitted that he had difficulty in finding areas in which a person would be in a monopolistic position.

We have arrived at the position where the railways are to be given the right to set their own rates. We have also arrived at the position where we realize monopolistic situations exist and that there are areas where the railways may be discriminating against a shipper. We must ask what protection we are giving an individual shipper who finds himself in either a monopolistic position or in a position where he is suffering from a discriminatory rate set by a railway. As legislators we must be prepared for this. I suggest earnestly to the minister that his only argument against this amendment is that it will open wide the door to a mass of frivolous complaints. I suggest that the minister reconsider that statement. Surely he knows that a person who appears before the board will have to prove that the rates are discriminatory against his business. In other words he must prove that the freight rates are putting him out of business.

The representative of the mining association appeared before the committee and quite conclusively pointed out that freight rates could and did affect their business, that they accounted for something like 50 per cent of the cost of their final commodity. Dr. Borts, when appearing before the committee, said that the formula instead of being 150 per cent above the variable cost, is something like 350 per cent above the variable cost.

• (8:10 p.m.)

If one projects the thinking in this regard and reads the committee proceedings, one finds that the mining association said that in a particular case transportation constitutes 70 per cent of the cost of their product. I asked the mining association officials whether they had any protection under this bill, and they said no. I then asked whether it would be conceivable that they could in fact be priced out of business. They assured me that this could very, very easily happen. Their commodities are sold all over the world. As everyone knows, ocean freight rates are far cheaper than rail. As I say, they assured me they could very, very easily be priced out of business by a competitor in another country. The officials of this association told me that if we did not give them some protection, this could happen.

The minister can talk all he likes about a provision with regard to discrimination being included in this clause. He says there must be two like industries hauling a similar commodity a similar distance, and if one rate is higher than the other, one must be discriminatory. This argument does not hold water. It is not conclusive because in many, many cases there will be only one industry, and the competitor may be in another country and moving goods into this country under ocean freight rates.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman has looked at subclause 3(ii) of the clause we are discussing. It seems to me that this is another ground on which there would be no problem, because this provision is also in clause 1 and is one of the factors connected with the public interest. This part of the clause reads as follows:

> an undue obstacle to the interchange of commodities between points in Canada or an unreasonable discouragement to the development of primary or secondary industries or to export trade—

The hon. gentleman was talking about the competitor being in another country and there being no other shipper in Canada. If a shipper could show that the rate the railway was setting was such as to prevent his entry into the export market, he would certainly have a prima facie case to be heard by the commission.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I am not particularly worried about whether a person will be able to present a prima facie case. I would like to give him the right to appear and appeal under this clause. He should not have to prove that he has that right; I believe that we as legislators should give him the right. Whether when he appears before the commission he can prove his case is a horse of another colour. But we must give him that right. I am not condemning the whole of clause 16. I think it is good, although it could be better. I believe this amendment would make it a better clause.

The only argument the minister has put forward in saying that he cannot accept the amendment is that it will open the door to a whole mass of frivolous complaints. I do not believe this. I do not believe anyone will prepare a case, hire counsel and go to the expense of coming to Ottawa to appear before this commission in order to put forward a frivolous complaint. Therefore I think the argument advanced by the minister in respect of this amendment is very, very weak indeed.

If the minister says that all these rights are preserved and an individual will, under clause 16, have the opportunity to appear before the commission if he considers the rate to be discriminatory, why not make it clear in the clause? In the committee study of this bill the minister wanted to make a great many other things clear. He wants to nail down the definition of "grain". There has never been in the Crowsnest pass agreement a definition of grain; the definition has been built up over the years and is now accepted by the courts. The minister wants the definition to be clear in the case of grain, but he does not want to state emphatically that if the business of an individual is affected he may appear before the commission to put forward his case. In our opinion he should not have to prove that he has a right to appear.

I wholeheartedly support the amendment after carefully studying clause 16 as put forward by the minister. I urge the minister to put up a better argument than he has up to now with regard to the open-door philosophy and a whole mass of frivolous complaints being brought before the commission. I urge the minister to accept the amendment. I know how congenial he has been in this debate. He should accept the amendment because according to his interpretation everything has already been taken care of in clause 16, and therefore we are really adding very little if we include the amendment. In our interpretation of the clause the amendment will give an individual the inherent right, if he feels he is being discriminated against, to prepare a case, hire counsel if necessary, come to Ottawa and attempt to prove that case. I do not intend to say any more with regard to this amendment. Once again I urge the minister to consider it very carefully, put up a better defence against it or accept it.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question on the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Amendment (Mr. Cantelon) negatived.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, you won that one, Jack.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost, on division. Shall clause 16 as amended carry?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, we are agreeable to clause 16 passing. In this respect I think there is agreement on this side of the house. We should like an idea of what we have to accomplish in regard to this bill. I understand that the Chairman's ruling will be made fairly soon this evening. There has been some indication of this, I believe.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could correct the hon. gentleman. I believe some of us have been advised that there will be no ruling this evening. I hope I am correct in saying this. I understand that there will not be this evening any ruling in respect of clause 74. In that event, I believe it would be a very good idea if we could deal with clause 1, which is the only clause left, and conclude some of the general speeches in respect of that clause. After we have dealt with clause 1 perhaps we could take up some other business, because there does not seem to be any prospect of making much progress until we have the ruling in respect of clause 74. I do not see any reason why we should not deal with clause 1, if any hon. member has any general statement to make on it.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 16 as amended carry?

Clause 16 as amended agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the committee consider clause 1 as amended?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On clause 1—National transportation policy.

Mr. Cantelon: Mr. Chairman, there are a few observations I desire to make on clause 1. We have spent a great deal of time on this bill both in committee and in the house. In fact, we spent two months on it before the Christmas recess, and every day since resuming this session. It is an extremely complex bill which had a long involved history before it reached the stage at which it is today—almost passed.

• (8:20 p.m.)

A royal commission appointed in 1958 submitted its last report in 1961. The first draft, C-120, was withdrawn in 1964, and this edition, C-231, is unique in having been considered by the transport committee before being given second reading in the house.

The MacPherson report gave us the principle on which the minister has based Bill C-231, namely that the railroads should be free to set competitive rates. As I have said before, I do not agree with this principle, and everything I have heard throughout this debate has not changed that thought.

The first edition of the bill was so roughly handled outside the house in an impromptu committee meeting of the transport committee that the minister withdrew it, and has now had it completely rewritten. Perhaps I should say he has had it rerewritten.

The second edition which came out some two years later had some 70 amendments made to it in committee before reaching the house. I confess that I am not sure just how many amendments have been made to it by the committee of the whole house since, and I doubt if anyone knows how many there were.

One can readily understand why caution should be exercised before attacking this bill, particularly in view of the number of modifications. However, I intend to do so as many others have. My remarks on this occasion will be of a general nature since there have been ample opportunities to make more specific ones as we dealt with the terms of the bill clause by clause.

The bill meets the intent of the minister to let competition between the various modes of transportation—rail, truck, air and ship—set the rates to be charged. Indeed, this was recommended by the MacPherson commission set up for this purpose; a commission of experts who might be expected to know what they were talking about. But are we to accept uncritically the views of these experts? In my view we should certainly not do so, because experts are often wrong.

Richard J. Needham, columnist for the Toronto Globe and Mail, put it much better than I can in this article he wrote for the Canadian Churchman of December 1966.

> I've spent some 50 years listening to the experts, and each year my respect for them dwindles. The experts assured me there wouldn't be a second world war. There was. The experts assured me the second world war would be followed by a calamitous depression. It wasn't. For some years now, the experts have been assuring me that the new machine—automation, they called it—would put millions of Canadians out of work. And what's happened? In most parts of Canada, employers are screaming for help. There's a serious shortage of workers, with no letup in sight.
>
> Modern labour has its battalions of experts, so has management, so have governments and their proliferating agencies. These experts all talk at once, they usually say different things, they are wrong much of the time, and how could it be otherwise? For all their charts and graphs and statistics and projections, they are dealing with two immeasurables—a future which is, and always will be known only to God; and that elusive contradictory, unreliable factor, human nature.

However, for those who might consider these views cardinal heresy, I will refer later to some experts whose views are quite different from those of the MacPherson commission.

The minister is deceived if he thinks the rates the railways set will be fair. The railway will charge all it can get. If he carries out his intentions as set out in this bill he will create grave injustices—grave injustices, because all regions of this very large country will not be fairly treated if we free the railways to charge whatever rate the traffic will bear. The minister apparently believes that clause 16 of the bill, new clause 16, and sections 1 and 336 will provide safeguards to prevent the railways overcharging the shipper. They will not, in my view, nor in the view of many others.

[Mr. Cantelon.]

We ought not to delude ourselves that the railways will charge less or that they will even maintain rates. They will certainly raise them. This bill will give them the power to do so and they intend to use it.

The passage of this bill leaves only one safeguard for Canadians. It is the safeguard of adequate competition. Competition the minister hopes can and will exert pressure on the railways so effectively that they will be compelled to charge a rate that is in the national interest, not the rate that is in the railways' interest. In my view this competition does not exist in certain areas of the country today and it will not exist in the near future. Hence my contention that there will be discrimination. Furthermore, for certain products it is not certain that competition will ever be effective to regulate rates.

The minister, because of the objections of the opposition, has rewritten clause 1 and hopes he has eliminated areas of discrimination by the railways. I hope he has too, but I doubt it. I doubt it simply because the competitive principle is supposed to operate, and I do not think it can operate effectively.

I said "national interest" very deliberately. When Sir John A. Macdonald had the first national railway built he did so because without it he knew the western half of Canada would fall by default into the orbit of the United States. The Liberals in those days could not see the truth of this fact. Today I doubt if the Minister of Transport can see any more clearly. Does he not know that the railways are still instruments of national policy and that in this large diverse country we must keep them so?

The minister's main argument is that by freeing the railways to set their own rates the country will escape the $100 million annual subsidy which this country pays to the railways. Perhaps we will, but it will cost the people of this country as a whole much more than that to do it. What is worse, the cost will be so unevenly and inequitably distributed that some sections of the country are going to want to shift their freight to a north-south pattern to escape from the injustice.

There is one thing that might prevent this from happening. That is a tariff policy which is so severe it would be impossible to import goods through the western railways into Canada from the United States at an economic price. It is conceivable that the same directional shift would take place in the maritimes. However, we understand that one of the new facets of Liberal policy is to have an approximation to free trade, this is an argument that has been noticeable in their ranks lately. If this comes about then there will be nothing at all to prevent the north-south pattern from growing apace.

Once this pattern is set up the hurt to the nation will not be restricted to the west and the maritimes, although these regions will feel the immediate effect. It will mean a much lower level of growth for central Canada when that region loses the future business which I say it will inevitably lose. It will mean, too, that this economic handicap, coupled with all the bilingual and bicultural controversy that western Canada has been subjected to, and which, I am sorry to say, I think they are beginning to resent, will foster a tendency to look to the United States as a greater friend than central Canada.

What the end result will be of a policy which will force us to trade with the United States first and eastern Canada second I do not know, but this lies in the future. I am no prophet but, as a Canadian, what I think I see I do not like.

It may be argued that this shifting of trading pattern is a form of competition. Indeed it is, but I hesitate to trust the railways to give up the immediate advantage of a high rate and present profits for the long term advantages of more future business and greater profits in that future. Neither do I think they are so altruistic as to consider the national interest ahead of those of their own railroads.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Let us pass from this hypothetical view and get the concrete opinions of those who believe that the idea of freeing the railways to set their own rates can do great harm. The Saskatoon Star Phoenix of November 25 reported the views of Dr. E. W. Williams, Professor of Transportation at Columbia University, who has had extensive experience in the transport field. A few days ago the hon. member for Acadia listed the qualifications of this gentleman and the views he expressed. I merely say that he has testified before many transport committees in the United States as well as before the MacPherson royal commission in this country. Dr. Williams was speaking to the transport committee of this house and giving his views on the effect of competition on our railways. This is what he said:

> The bill is without precedent in any country.

Now, what does Dr. Williams mean by that? I think he is saying rather bluntly that we are being stupid. I continue to quote:

> The pressures of competition on Canadian railways were limited and in many instances completely ineffective.

Here you have a statement by an expert in the field, a statement that there is no adequate competition in this country to regulate rates. No other country in the world believes that the railways should be free to set their own rates regulated entirely by competition. In no other country in the world, so far as I have been able to find out, is this practice followed. These other countries do not believe adequate competition could ever regulate their railways, so why should we believe it will work in Canada?

The very great danger to our western and maritime regions was pointed out by A. V. Mauro, counsel for the province of Manitoba, who said in his brief to the transport committee that the railways, through rate regulation, could say what areas of the country would be developed. If I may, I should like to quote his own words as reported in the Western Producer of December 1, 1966:

> One of the urgent questions in the new era of railway legislation is the danger that the railways, freed of almost all rate control, might begin to dictate through rates the areas of Canada to be developed and the companies that would develop them. That is the chief reason we're here.

I know the bill has been modified to try completely to eliminate this effect of area discrimination. The minister, of course, does not agree that the bill would permit such rate discrimination now, but Mr. Mauro's fear was natural and not to be lightly passed off, even now. The minister stated then that he felt the amendments to be brought in would correct Mr. Mauro's fears. I confess my fears have not been completely eliminated, and from conversations I had with Mr. Mauro in mid December I am reasonably certain he feels as I do, that the amended bill does not do this.

The provinces of Alberta, Manitoba and the maritimes all fear area discrimination. Why is this so? It is so because the bill removes all the old sections and acts which protected these areas against unjust rate discrimination.

Mr. Mauro of Manitoba, Mr. Frawley of Alberta and Mr. Dickson for the maritimes made their fears very clear. Professors Williams and Borts re-emphasized these fears. If you wonder where Saskatchewan stands, I can only point out that their brief, as presented to the transport committee, was an innocuous compendium which indicated that the Liberals in Saskatchewan hesitated to tread on Liberal toes in Ottawa. Quite a different attitude was taken by the official opposition in Saskatchewan and by Saskatchewan members of parliament in Ottawa who do not like this bill and do not share the views of the Liberal government in Saskatchewan.

The clause which provided for a study of the Crowsnest pass rates, which was to be made within three years, of course has been eliminated. However, we are faced with a new clause 74 which brings in through the back door what went out through the front door. Since we have not had the ruling of Mr. Speaker on this amendment, I feel I should not comment on it further. It is odd, however, that in the years when the railroads move large volumes of grain their profit picture is better than in the years when the movement is lower. Since the railroads claim that they lose money on moving grain, one would logically suppose that the more grain they move the larger their losses would be. If the minister is so certain that there is adequate competition now in transportation in our country, why is it necessary to make this notable exception in his policy of freeing the railroads to set their own rates? It is very strange indeed, although perhaps not quite so strange when we realize the attitude of the west toward these Crowsnest pass rates.

The bill sets up, in part I, a transport commission which is to carry out the intent of the bill and regulate the various modes of transport to which the bill refers. To do so, the commission is given very broad powers. These powers are so broad that parliament will have very little if any control, except through the annual report the commission will make. While it may be that the commission will discharge its duties properly and well, there is a possibility that it will not.

If the appointments to the commission are good and the minister exercises firm control, this scheme may work well. However, if the appointments are not good, parliament and the country will be in for trouble. If the appointments are good, even a good board may be perverted through time. It may have some strong personalities who—and this is a common fault—believe that they know more about what policies should be followed then either the minister or parliament. With an uninformed or weak minister,—and perhaps ten years from now the present minister will be gone,—no one can tell what mistakes may be made. I consider the present transport committee in parliament will be quite incapable of fully evaluating the action this large transport commission may take. It has neither the staff nor the expertise to be able to evaluate the actions of the transport commission. Some steps must be taken to control this many-headed monster or parliament or the country may regret it.

However, this minister and his party have refused our suggestions and I suppose we will have to live with the control of the commission. Provision is made in the bill for attention to be given to research. I think this is something we have needed for a long time, particularly in respect of rail lines. There is no doubt the railways have been content to slog along in the same old way, on the same old track and, I might say, in the same old cars. I suggest to the minister that he set up a chair of transportation in one of the universities. We would then develop some Dr. Williams and Dr. Borts of our own, men who thoroughly understand the operations of transport.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I could ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Cantelon: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Was he not just as much impressed by Dr. Armstrong of McGill as with either of these gentlemen who came from another country?

Mr. Cantelon: I was indeed, and I probably should have mentioned his name. However, I think we have too few of these experts. I would hope that the action I suggested would enable us to have many more experts in the field of transport. What I was trying to point out more specifically was that if we had a chair of transportation there would be direct research and a direct developmental policy that would be to the advantage of the whole country. Is such a chair were set up, it should be given adequate money so that it might carry out research into all phases of transport, not the least of which might be the economics of rate setting.

I am compelled to this interest in transportion research because of the feeling I have that we are rapidly falling behind in the way in which we handle our grain today. When we began to market large quantities of grain over 50 years ago, we had the most modern system in the world for handling it. Today this once modern system is not keeping abreast of progress. We are moving much larger quantities of grain, so I think we need research to investigate all the phases of grain handling from the standpoint of the railway, and not only from the standpoint of the railway but from the standpoint of the elevator and the terminal.

• (8:40 p.m.)

A transportation research chair set up in one of the universities, and provided with adequate funds, could investigate fully the ways in which the railways are operating today and I am sure could come up with more modern, more efficient and economical ways of getting our products, and particularly our grain products, to the markets of the world. I strongly commend the bill for the opportunity it provides for such research to be done. I sincerely hope the fullest opportunity will be taken to implement this provision in the bill, and especially that sufficient funds are made available so research can be vigorously pursued.

Rail line abandonments have been a subject which has aroused a great deal of concern in my area of the country, and in particular in my constituency. When the original abandonments were proposed I believe there were more miles of track to be abandoned in the constituency of Kindersley than in any other constituency in the Dominion of Canada. The interest of the people of my constituency is, then, understandable and so of course is my interest. As these abandonments began to be listed in large numbers there was great satisfaction when the previous Conservative ministry, in January 1962, put a stop to the processing of all abandonments until a thorough investigation had taken place.

It is notable that the present government has continued this freeze and that no abandonments have been proceeded with since that date. A great many abandonments have been listed and now there is a quite comprehensive map which shows the abandonments or suggested abandonments.

When Bill No. C-120 was proposed in September 1964 there were provisions for abandonment in the bill which were extremely unsatisfactory. Those of you who are familiar with it will remember that a rationalization authority was proposed, and that this rationalization authority actually had no authority. If a line were proved to be uneconomic, and so said to be by the Board of Transport Commissioners, all that the so-called authority could do was to say when the line was to be abandoned within a time period of five years. The only discretionary power it had was to set a date for abandonment. We fought this very strongly in the informal meetings that were held in the fall of 1964 and the minister withdrew the bill. He must have considered seriously our representations.

In the new Bill No. C-231 the rationalization authority has been eliminated. Instead the new Transport Commission has power to consider the rationalization proposals, and after thorough investigation may order abandonment, but only if the line is uneconomic. It has very wide powers to consider not only the report of the railway company on the profit-making position of the branch line, but also the effect the abandonment will have on the community. So there is a quite notable improvement in the bill in this respect.

The minister on several occasions, in answer to my question whether funds will be provided, has clearly indicated that moneys will be available under certain conditions to assist the provinces to build roads which might take the place of lines which are abandoned. This has been done already in one instance.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that I have succeeded in making the following points: First of all, that a railway is an instrument of national policy; second, that in my view a railway is still a monopoly, and this demands control of rail rates; third, that a railroad might practise area discrimination; fourth, that there must be a way to evaluate the work of the new transport commission; fifth, that research is needed and that funds must be sufficient to do a good job and sixth, that assistance for road building must be provided where a rail line is abandoned.

I do not suggest, Mr. Chairman, that this to any degree exhausts what can be said about this bill and the policies of the minister with respect to it. The minister and the government have been fortunate in that the opposition has vigorously opposed the suggested railway legislation. It may have taken two and a half years to get this legislation through, but in consequence of our opposition I feel that some bad faults have been corrected. The minister has now come up with an over-all policy for transportation. Rail line abandonment policy has been radically changed and the rights of communities are, I hope, now to be more fully considered. But—and it is a large "but"—the basic principle of competition is going to cause great damage to many areas of this country, I very much fear.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest for a goodly number of days to the very interesting and constructive debate we have had on this very important bill, which I know has received a great deal of consideration by the committee. I do want to compliment the minister. In all my 21 years in this house never have I seen him exercise such flexibility of approach, have such patience, or respond on occasion with such spontaneous humour. I think he has excelled himself on the occasion of this very important bill.

I have listened to the arguments which have been put forward, particularly by the representatives of the prairie provinces, knowing what a great deal this transportation policy means to them, even though on occasion it may have been somewhat tiring to hear arguments repeated even as many as three times—and I think that is quite a modest estimate. I also think that all members of the opposition have taken a very constructive approach to this bill, in moving their amendments, and so on.

Before we conclude the study of this bill in the committee stage, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words on behalf on my constituents. I want to emphasize that in speaking for my constituents on this question I do so regardless of party. I also speak on behalf of practically all the organizations of any consequence and size in the constituency of Kootenay West. I am taking a particularly non-partisan approach to this question.

Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, during the consideration of the proposed section 314J (1) (c), which reads

> —"uneconomic service" means a passenger-train service that has been determined to be uneconomic by the commission under section 314I—

—I was called out of the house rather hurriedly and when I returned this section had been passed. Therefore I have to take the opportunity which is provided on clause 1 to say what I wish to say.

I think that clause 1 does provide this opportunity, Mr. Chairman. The first paragraph reads:

> It is hereby declared that an economic and efficient transportation system making the best use of all available modes of transportation at the lowest total cost is essential to protect the interests of the users of transportation and to maintain the economic well-being and growth of Canada, and that these objectives are most likely to be achieved when all modes of transport are able to compete under conditions——that are stated in succeeding clauses.

I know that the hon. member for Kootenay East, the minister's parliamentary secretary, is interested in this question because he took a very active part in the original fight for the retention of passenger service on the Kettle Valley railway. There may be some new members of the house who have not heard of this railway before. I think it is quite truthful to say that I speak with some spirit of conviction on this matter. I should also like to make mention of the Minister without Portfolio.

An hon. Member: Which one?

Mr. Herridge: I am referring to the younger and better looking one from Montreal. He was born in my constituency and I am sure that he is with me in spirit in what I have to say this evening, though he is not here at the moment. As I say, I am sure we have his sympathy.

In passing, Mr. Chairman, I should like to mention that I am very pleased to know that some airport development is taking place in the constituency of Kootenay East. I understand this is being undertaken this year and that in the near future it will be the second best airport, next to Castlegar, in the Kootenays. I am sure everyone is pleased to see an airport being developed in the hon. gentleman's constituency. The airport at Castlegar has developed over a period of ten years as a result of grants by the federal government, which everyone in the district appreciates.

• (8:50 p.m.)

While passenger services were abandoned on the Kettle Valley Railway by the Canadian Pacific in 1964, I have been asked by my constituents to make another plea for the reconsideration of this important question. Numbers of people have spoken to me about this, because their attention has been attracted by all this talk on the transportation bill. I say, without hesitation, at all, that I speak for a vast majority of people I have the honour to represent, regardless of party.

Many people, Mr. Chairman, do not realize that at the present time about 150,000 people in southeastern British Columbia are denied passenger service because the Canadian Pacific refuses to accept its responsibilities to these people, and to this great wealth producing area from where large quantities of minerals are shipped. There are large shipments of coal, forest products, fertilizers and other commodities from the smelter, pulp products and other things produced in this district.

I know the hon. member for Kootenay East has been interested in this question for some time, because I have read the reports of the committees. In minutes of proceedings of evidence of Tuesday, March 8, No. 4, of the standing committee on transport and communications I noticed the hon. gentleman showed his interest by the questions he asked. At page 170 I see the following:

Mr. Byrne: Some years ago—two years I believe, to be exact—the Canadian Pacific Railway abandoned, if I may use the term loosely—

I am not clear what that means —the passenger service on what is known as the Crowsnest-Kettle valley railway line. I am particularly interested in this because it runs to the East Kootenay and, incidentally, the West Kootenay—

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, I know exactly where those are. I know why you put in "incidentally" in regard to the West Kootenay.

I should like to know what Mr. Sinclair means by that. Continuing:

Mr. Byrne: At that time there was, of course, great consternation; but again we heard the charge that the Canadian Pacific Railway was given large mineral, land and forest grants to provide the building of the famous Crowsnest railway.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Byrne: And we heard that for that reason they should continue to give railway passenger service until perhaps the end of time or until there was some indication that there was absolutely no requirement whatsoever.

Later in the same hearing I read this:

Mr. Byrne: I am quite in agreement with that. My purpose in asking the question is and was to identify this story that I and many others in politics had to contend with at the time of the abandonment of the railway.

The Chairman: Of what, Mr. Byrne?

Mr. Byrne: Passenger service on the now famous Kettle valley and Crowsnest line. I think it is important that we hear both sides of the story. I have not been able to get these figures straight in the past and I am glad to have them on the record.

Mr. Sinclair: There was no obligation, Mr. Byrne, by statute; there was no obligation by any agreement to provide passenger service. That line, like all other lines, became a part of the Canadian Pacific Railway and became subject to the jurisdiction of the Board of Transport Commissioners when it was formulated in the early 1900's. I think the first board was set up in 1903. Therefore, before passenger service could be withdrawn in the Kootenay it required the approval of the Board of Transport Commissioners and that was secured and received after hearings held in the Kootenays and elsewhere before the service was discontinued. If I may go on for one moment, Mr. Chairman, the service was discontinued and I have been in the Kootenays. I have not seen, as I said earlier, any withering on the vine of such places as Cranbrook, Castlegar, Nelson.

Mr. Byrne: The members are withering.

Mr. Sinclair: The members are withering?

Mr. Byrne: The members of parliament.

Mr. Sinclair: They are maturing.

I wonder what Mr. Sinclair means by that. By maturing, does he mean that hon. members accept the policy of the Canadian Pacific?

On page 173 we find the following:

Mr. Byrne: One final question, sir. How much land does the railway still maintain under the original grant, not any new acquisition?

Mr. Sinclair: Well, Mr. Byrne, there are some townsite lands which have never been sold; some of them have come back on our hands; I would suggest about 600,000 acres, including what is being referred to by some people unkindly as moose pastures.

I now want to quote briefly from a brief. This is from the brief presented at the hearings when the question of the abandonment of the line was being considered by the Board of Transport Commissioners, and I quote this to show what the public attitude was, Mr. Chairman. As I said before over 150,000 people are denied passenger service over this line which runs from Vancouver, in effect, to Medicine Hat. These are the people who appeared: F. C. Hislop for Fernie and District Chamber of Commerce; J. H. Ward, alderman, city of Cranbrook; Lloyd J. Hoole, representing Cranbrook Chamber of Commerce; C. W. Sims, representing the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers; W. H. Towey, representing the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen; E. B. Ferguson, Industrial Co-ordinator, city of Lethbridge; S. Cimolini, representing the village of Natal; H. C. McKay, M.L.A., Fernie; L. M. McBride, Q.C., for the Nelson Chamber of Commerce; Leo Gansner, for the city of Nelson; J. G. Flanagan, representing Local 480 of International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers; Mrs. Mae Johnston, representing Tye, B.C.; Rev. Ernest Hanson, representing Kootenay Lake Bible Camp; C. W. Brazier, Q.C., representing the government of British Columbia, and F. H. Herbert, for the city of Penticton.

That shows the interest there was in this problem at that time. The representations made before the Board of Transport Commissioners were on a very wide scale indeed.

Transportation

The following is a condensation of some, although not necessarily all, of the testimony given and the submissions filed:

1. That the present service is inadequate by reason of:

(a) the curtailed service between Penticton and Vancouver;

(b) the stopovers required at Penticton and Nelson;

(c) the excessive length of time necessary to travel to and from Vancouver;

(d) the lack of provision of meals or any catering service.

2. That the railway company has failed to develop and promote passenger traffic.

3. That the deficiencies mentioned above are the reasons for the decline in passenger traffic.

4. That the actions or inaction of the railway company has been part of a design to drive away an unwanted passenger business.

5. That the alternative means of transportation are inadequate. In particular, that the occasions when planes are unable to land at Castlegar airport are so numerous in the winter months as to make that service unreliable.

6. That the cost of travel by airplane is prohibitive for some persons.

7. That the bus service is an impossible means of travel for disabled veterans who have to report at Shaughnessy hospital for treatment; that they can travel by air but would on occasion report to Castlegar airport in sufficient time to be in Vancouver on the required date only to find that the plane could not land.

8. That the train service is necessary generally for aged, sick and infirm persons who require treatment at Calgary or Vancouver.

9. That the losses on passenger travel should be absorbed by the presumably profitable freight traffic on the line. (In this connection I should mention that the board stated at the hearing that, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, it would assume that the freight traffic on the line is profitable).

10. That the railway company should promote the passenger service actively and that the results should be assessed again in one year's time.

11. That the value of the service should be considered from the standpoint of civil defence or disaster.

12. That the removal of the trains would be a setback to the areas.

13. That the services ancillary to the train are poor, as for example the inability at certain places to find out whether or not the train is on time, the waiting room facilities, etc.

14. That the presumably profitable operations of Canadian Pacific Airlines and the railway company's highway services should be weighed.

15. That the schedules of trains could be changed to improve arrival and departure times and to connect more closely with the arrivals and departures of other means of public transportation.

● (9:00 p.m.)

16. That the service between Lethbridge and Calgary be changed to coincide with the arrival of trains 45 and 46 in Lethbridge.

[Mr. Herridge.]

17. That no action be taken by the board until a complete and co-ordinated national transportation policy has been worked out.

That is why I am making these representations on clause 1 of the bill. To continue:

18. That by reason of certain anticipated developments the areas are on the threshold of great expansion, which would promote more passenger travel.

There are many other reasons given in opposition to the abandonment of this service. I wish now to deal briefly with the history of the line. The history of the Kettle Valley railway is an interesting and colourful one. There is no purpose in going into it in detail here. It is sufficient to say that the line, in its several portions and as a whole, has played an important part in retaining for Canada those parts of southern British Columbia which were falling under the influence of the United States through their dependence upon American transportation.

I have been very interested in the development of rail transportation in the interior of British Columbia. I have read the history of the struggle between Canadian and United States railroads which at one time tried to secure a monopoly of rail transportation in southeastern British Columbia. I might say in passing that in 1914 a survey was made at the instigation of the federal government of the possibility of transporting prairie grain from Revelstoke to the sea, down the Columbia, and this was found to be feasible, given boats of a certain size. However, grants were made available by the federal government for the extension of the Kettle Valley railroad in order to maintain the east-west flow of traffic in Canada which was so greatly to Canada's advantage. Therefore the report resulting from the investigation which I mentioned has not been accepted by the government of the day.

I think it is most unfair that the C.P.R. should decline to continue its passenger service because the company lost, I understand, close on half a million dollars at the time the railway was abandoned between Vancouver and Medicine Hat. I think it is most unfair to separate freight receipts from passenger receipts. The company should be obliged to provide figures to show profits on freight receipts as well as any losses on passenger traffic.

I have mentioned that traffic was discouraged. This was done in several ways. First of all there was an unfortunate incident related to the action of the Sons of Freedom in blowing up the railway. That was not as serious as it sounded. I spoke to some of them on occasions. I asked them how they reconciled blowing up a railway track with their philosophy of life. They told me: "Mr. Herridge, we wait until the train goes by and then we blow up the tracks". However, these incidents were seized on at once by the C.P.R. as one of the reasons for discontinuing the service, though at the same time freight trains were moving every day from our district to coastal ports. I cannot see any great difference between running passenger trains and running freight trains.

Then the train service was split at Penticton. Passengers had to lie there overnight before going on with their journey the next day. This discouraged passengers and in my opinion that timetable was set by the company in order to lower its passenger receipts. This is also the opinion of a great many people with whom I have discussed this question in the constituency I have the honour to represent.

There are good reasons for the maintenance of passenger service here. The people are not asking much. They would like a daily passenger service between Vancouver and Medicine Hat. All that is required to give that service is an engine, a day coach and a café sleeper car. I am sure that if the service were resumed and if people knew they could travel from Vancouver to Medicine Hat or vice versa in one day, the line would soon receive patronage.

What are the reasons for requiring this passenger service in addition to those which have been mentioned? First, there are the severe weather conditions experienced in this area in the winter. We have heavy snowfalls in British Columbia, and certain portions of the road are unsafe for travel, particularly along the Salmo-Creston cut-off and the Hope-Princeton highway. These portions are often closed to traffic because they are unsafe. The road from Princeton to Hope is extremely dangerous at certain times of the winter. Then again, air travel from Castlegar and other points in the interior is uncertain in wintertime.

Our people—and I am sure I am speaking for many of those who live in Kootenay East—have asked me to draw these matters to the attention of the committee and to urge that there should be due consideration of this question by the Board of Transport Commissioners and by those who are responsible for transport policy. I urge that this question be reconsidered in order that the passenger service of the Kettle Valley railway may be resumed and the company persuaded to accept its responsibility to the 150,000 people in southeastern British Columbia who at the present time are denied the benefit of a passenger service because of the ruling of the Board of Transport Commissioners. This is the ruling:

> The Canadian Pacific Railway Company, on or after the 16th day of January, 1964, is authorized to discontinue operations of trains 45 and 46 between Lethbridge, Alberta, and Spence's Bridge, British Columbia, upon sixty days' prior notice filed with the board and posted in each railway station served by the said trains.
>
> The said notice shall also be published in one issue of a newspaper published or having general circulation in each of Fernie, Cranbrook, Creston, Nelson, Trail, Penticton, Princeton and Merritt.
>
> H. H. GRIFFIN,
>
> Assistant Chief Commissioner,
> The Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada.

The district which I have the honour to represent is in strong opposition to this order for the discontinuance of passenger service of the Kettle Valley railway, and the people who live there trust that this important matter will receive the consideration of those who are responsible for the administration of transport policy in Canada.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Mr. Hugh: Has the line been completely abandoned for passenger service? There are no passenger trains running through Penticton now, nor have there been for some time. Can the hon. member give the date of the last Kettle Valley train to run in his area?

Mr. Herridge: I think it was some time in the spring of 1964.

Mr. Webb: May I ask the hon. member whether the C.B.C. covers the entire area he represents?

Mr. Pickersgill: I really wonder what this has to do with the transport bill.

Mr. Webb: In reply to the minister I would just say that the railways are heavily subsidized by the taxpayers, as is the C.B.C., and I was just wondering if it would be fair to give both services to that area.

Mr. Ballard: When this bill was being discussed in the standing committee, one term that was used over and over again was rationalization of the modes of transport in Canada. It was the avowed interest of everybody concerned that we should make transportation a rational thing, and I must compliment the minister on fairly well achieving a rationality of transportation. I also have to congratulate him on his method of piloting this bill through the house, but he has received, as I am sure he admits, a lot of help from members of the opposition in making it a viable and acceptable piece of legislation.

I believe that rationalization means that the railways should be recompensed for all of the services they give, and also that they should be put in a position to pay for all the services they buy. Clause 1 emphasizes this fact when it states that—> —an economic, efficient and adequate transportation system making the best use of all available modes of transportation at the lowest total cost is essential to protect the interests of the users of transportation and to maintain the economic well-being and growth of Canada.

As I say, I think the minister has pretty well achieved this objective. He has made sure that under this bill the railways and other means of transportation will be adequately recompensed for the services that they offer and be put in a position to be able to pay for the services they get. But the one exception to this is the oversight on the minister's part in not requiring the Canadian Pacific Railway to pay municipal taxes to the municipalities of both western and maritime Canada.

As a result of this oversight I propose to move an amendment later on which will read:

> That clause 1 be amended by re-numbering (b) of clause 1 as clause 1(b)(i) and inserting a new sub-clause (ii) as follows:
>
> (ii) each mode of transport, so far as practicable and without prejudice to any single mode, bears a fair proportion of the costs of local government services in those municipalities in which the mode of transport operates; and

This would provide that the Canadian Pacific Railway would pay normal municipal taxes to all of the municipalities through which that line passes. The minister has recognized that this type of thing should be done because back in September last year, when speaking of the C.N.R., the government owned railway, he said, as recorded at page 8210 of Hansard for September 8:

> It has been the custom in the case of government owned railways, as distinguished from other parts of the Canadian National system, for the Canadian National to make some grants in lieu of taxes. It will be the intention of the government when this legislation has been passed, as a contribution toward the process of rationalization and equal treatment for all parts of Canada, to instruct the Canadian National Railways to make payments to these municipalities as though they were taxable. We have the power to do that without express legislation.

The minister has acknowledged the responsibility of the government owned railway, and by accepting my amendment I hope he will acknowledge that the same responsibility rests on the C.P.R. to pay taxes to the municipalities through which it passes.

The exemption of the C.P.R. from municipal taxes goes back to the 1881 agreement between the federal government and the C.P.R. The provinces of western Canada had no part in the signing of that agreement. It was inherited by the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan from the federal government when the Northwest Territories were divided into the two provinces in 1905. As a result the municipalities are stuck with a situation over which they have no control.

A study made by the Federation of Mayors and Municipalities has calculated that the city of Moncton, New Brunswick, which is served by the C.N.R., is short changed in taxes paid by the C.N.R. by some $115,249. That is the difference between what the C.N.R. will be paying in taxes after this bill has been passed as compared with the grants it made in the past. The city of Saint John is short changed $97,058, Sydney, Nova Scotia, $18,516, Halifax $311,210, and the situation is not much different in cities through which the Canadian Pacific Railway passes.

• (9:20 p.m.)

I might say in connection with my home city of Calgary that if the C.P.R. were to pay normal taxes—that is, the taxes any other taxpayer in the city of Calgary would pay—they would pay approximately $739,000. In other words, with the grants in lieu of taxes amounting to $49,000 the city of Calgary loses a total tax collection from the railway of $690,000. If this amendment should pass, it is estimated that across the western provinces the taxes to be collected from the Canadian Pacific Railway alone will amount to between two and a half million and three million dollars. This will have a tremendous effect on some of these municipalities. I might say that Calgary forgoes a greater amount in taxes than any other municipality which would be affected by this amendment. Not only are we concerned with the number of dollars we have been losing since 1881 but also the lack of any incentive to force the railways to develop their property in a manner becoming to the city through which the railway passes.

The situation is that these areas contiguous to the railway property now are the areas of the city which are subject to blight. In many of these cities these are the areas where the land value is at a minimum in comparison to the other districts. They also are the areas which will be subject to urban renewal. They are the areas in respect of which there will be demands made upon the government for tremendous amounts of money for the financing of urban renewal programs.

I realize the Minister of Transport received a letter from the president of the C.P.R. in which the president agreed that possibly the C.P.R. had some responsibility to the municipalities through which the railway passed. He accepted the suggestion that possibly the C.P.R. should try to be a good citizen in these municipalities. He agreed that if the government, through this transportation bill, should rationalize the freight rates they would condescend to make some sort of deal whereby they would pay taxes.

I should like to quote part of the letter from Ian D. Sinclair, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway. This letter is dated August 29, 1966. It was tabled in the House of Commons, appears at page 8210 of Hansard for Thursday, September 8, 1966, and reads in part as follows:

> The company is prepared to forgo voluntarily perpetual exemption from taxation by the local authorities on our main line in the prairie provinces in three equal stages: one third for the year commencing January 1 after legislation is enacted modernizing and rationalizing existing legislation and taking into account, among other things, the effective changed conditions on freight rates otherwise fixed; a further one third in the succeeding year; the balance in the third year from the commencement of the period as stated.

There are two or three things wrong with this offer which is being made by the president of the C.P.R. There are conditions even in this offer which he has made. He says that the offer stands, provided the legislation is enacted to modernize and rationalize the existing legislation. In no place in his letter does he say what he means by "modernizing and rationalizing existing legislation". If some portion of this legislation should not convey the meaning which the president of the C.P.R. had in mind when he made this offer, I wonder whether his offer would be withdrawn. He mentions also "the effective changed conditions on freight rates otherwise fixed".

When he mentions fixed freight rates does he include the Crowsnest pass rates, for example? In other words, since August 29, 1966 have we changed the transportation bill to such an extent that this offer no longer stands? This is the reason I believe it is essential that if we are to have an act that is fully rational this amendment must be considered by the Minister of Transport and must be accepted by the house.

I might say that ample provision has been made in the bill to take care of any increase in taxes that the C.P.R. must pay. According to this letter the C.P.R would not have to pay taxes for the year 1967. It would not have to start paying taxes until January 1, 1968. In my humble opinion this means that if this legislation is not passed it is quite possible that we will be giving the C.P.R. a free ride for another year so far as taxes are concerned. When we speak of rationalization I understand this to mean that the modes of transportation shall be given a fair enough schedule of freight rates that they will be in a position to make a reasonable profit, but also that they will have to shoulder the responsibility of paying their way. Surely municipal taxes are something the railways must pay in order to pay their way. I should like to move therefore, that clause 1 be amended by renumbering subclause (b) of clause 1 as clause 1(b)(i) and inserting a new subclause (ii) as follows:

> each mode of transport, so far as practicable and without prejudice to any single mode, bears a fair proportion of the costs of local government services in those municipalities in which the mode of transport operates; and—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words in respect of this amendment. I hope you will not put the question this evening because I should like to reserve the right to present an argument concerning whether or not it is in order. I have been taken somewhat by surprise and I should like an opportunity to examine this suggested amendment. I suspect it is out of order. I think also that it is ultra vires. I am not sure, however, about these things, because this is in respect of a declaratory part of the bill which may have no real consequence, except to declare a broad general principle. I should like to reserve the right to argue this matter when we next come back to the bill.

I understand there has been consultation among hon. members on both sides and that there is general agreement that we would make more progress if I were to move that we rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house, so that we might get on with some other business pending the decision of the Chair which has been reserved. If I am correct in this understanding, I so move.

• (9:30 p.m.)

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think the hon. member for Roberval wishes to speak on clause 1.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the hon. member for Roberval was told about this agreement. I said that I thought there was an understanding among all groups that the committee would rise at this time, without dealing with this amendment, passing the clause or doing anything further in connection with the bill, so we could get on with some other business. I believe my understanding is correct. I have made a motion in this regard. I do not want to be disrespectful in any way to the hon. gentleman, but I wonder whether it would suit him equally well to speak to clause 1 when we come back to the bill tomorrow. I believe this course would be more convenient for the house generally.

The Deputy Chairman: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Agreed, Mr. Chairman.

[English]

Progress reported.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT

PROVISION FOR ADDITIONAL COUNTY COURT APPOINTMENTS

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-262, to amend the Judges Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the Solicitor General whether he can tell us what areas are concerned in the appointment of judges. I know the areas are in the provinces of Ontario and British Columbia, but what particular districts in those provinces are concerned?

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, I would be pleased to answer this question, but I was only acting in the absence of the Minister of Justice, who is now in the chamber, and I feel the question should be directed to him.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, with respect to Ontario the appointment now being considered is judge at large, otherwise known as a roving judge. In British Columbia it is for the appointment of a judge in the county of Westminster.

Mr. Prittie: Mr. Chairman, I shall not take very many minutes in speaking to this bill. No one has any desire to hold up its passage, because judges are necessary in this country. The judge whom it is proposed to appoint to the county court in British Columbia will be appointed to an area that is in my riding. I am surprised that more judges are not included in this bill. I realize they are necessary in some other provinces, but I know the provinces have to make a request before the appointment of judges can be included in a bill.

I did rise to speak on this matter when the Speaker was in the chair. My remarks will be general but I can assure the committee that they will be very brief. When the Judges Act is before the house for amendment the debate is almost predictable. Someone in the New Democratic Party will rise and say we should not have the appointment of judges in the field of political patronage, and someone else will rise and defend the judiciary. Very often it is the hon. member for Carleton. The hon. member adopted this approach when we were discussing a similar amendment on March 30, 1966, and again on January 13 this year, just over a week ago. He said that the statement had to be made on every occasion that amendments to this act are before the house, namely that we have in Canada a very fine judiciary.

I should like to say that there is something else that has to be said again and again. The element of politics comes into the appointment of our judges, and some day we will have to change this approach. Let me say again that I think we all recognize the fact that we have good judges in this country, and that because a man has had a political career or political affiliations is no reason at all why he should be disqualified from becoming a member of the bench. Having said that, I think it is also fair to say that many appointments to the bench of this country have not been of the best. If this were not the case we would not now have on the order paper an item which deals with a joint committee of the house and Senate in respect of Mr. Justice Landreville.

I am not going into the details of that case; I merely point out that such a thing exists. I point out, too, that other members of the bench of Canada have been under a cloud in very recent years. If someone says that these are exceptions, I would say there should be no exceptions. There are in all the provinces of Canada sufficient lawyers, outstanding in their profession and recognized so by their colleagues, respected by the public, to fill these vacancies. These people could be appointed and there would never be any question about our judiciary.

This sort of criticism has been valid too frequently in the past. The Solicitor General said on January 13, as reported at page 11798 of Hansard, that in this connection there are unofficial consultations with the law societies of each province. This may well be so; I do not know. But I would suggest they are of a negative character and that the federal officials may go to the law societies and say: Have you any complaints about this man? I say this because it seems that after these consultations the result is nearly always the same: When a Liberal government is in power, Liberals become judges; when a Conservative government is in power, Conservatives become judges, regardless of any consultation with the law societies. This does not need to be the case.

I said that on almost every occasion when we had this type of debate a member of the New Democratic Party makes a complaint; but I am pleased to say that other hon. members have similar doubts. There is on the order paper a bill presented by the hon. member for York-Scarborough, Bill No. C-236, which calls for consultation with the Canadian Bar Association when judges are to be appointed. In this regard I have been procrastinating for a year; I intended to introduce such a bill. However, I am very glad the hon. member for York-Scarborough has done so. I should like to refer to his bill for a moment and point out the kind of reform it proposes. The bill says:

> Before proceeding to the appointment of any judge, the Governor General shall consult the judiciary committee of the Canadian Bar Association.

In the explanatory notes we see the following:

> At its 1966 annual meeting the Canadian Bar Association passed a resolution calling for the appointment of a committee of the association to assist the Minister of Justice in the exercise of his authority and responsibility to make appointments to the judiciary.
>
> Accordingly it appears desirable before any appointment is made to the bench that the federal authorities consult a committee of the Canadian Bar Association so that they may have the benefit of the opinion of the legal profession on the suitability and qualifications of persons being considered for judicial appointment.
>
> This proposition does not take away the prerogative of appointment which, under our constitution, is vested in the Governor General.

• (9:40 p.m.)

> The purpose of this bill is to give effect to the proposal of the Canadian Bar Association.

This bill is a step in the right direction. I would go even further and say that the appointment of judges is too important to be left entirely to lawyers. I like the suggestion made by Professor William Angus of the law faculty of the University of Alberta, that lay persons be involved in these selections.

To conclude my remarks in respect of this clause of the bill I should like to read a few words from the paper which Professor William Angus delivered to the Association of Canadian Law Teachers at Sherbrooke, Quebec, on June 10 last year. In this paper, which is lengthy, he dealt with the methods of appointment in the United Kingdom and Canada and gave a history of appointments. I will read his last few words about how we might change our system, where he said:

> A practical solution might well take the form of an independent committee in each province, similar to the electoral boundaries commissions recently established for redistribution of parliamentary seats. Broad representation from various segments of the legal community and the inclusion of a few lay persons on the committee would ensure public confidence in the fairness of the selection procedure. When a vacancy on the Bench occurs, the committee could consider potential appointees and present a list of qualified persons to the Minister of Justice. The minister could then either recommend one of the qualified nominees from the list to the cabinet, or if he wishes to consider other prospects, submit their names to the committee for an appraisal of their qualifications. When the committee's view has been returned, the minister would then be in a position to make his recommendation and the cabinet to exercise its choice. If questioned in parliament, the minister could be required to disclose the committee's evaluation of the appointee and to defend the appointment. A plan of this nature clearly falls within the boundaries of our present constitutional framework and has much to recommend it.
>
> Some encouraging signs have appeared recently. A little over a year ago, the then minister of justice stated "that it would be a valuable step if various provincial bar associations would voluntarily send in regular panels of names of lawyers who would make good judges, regardless of political affiliation." Earlier this year, the Ontario section of the Canadian Bar Association at its annual mid-winter meeting held an enlightening panel discussion on judicial selection during which the need for some check on the qualifications of prospective appointees was generally acknowledged. Only a couple of months ago, the issue was debated once again in the House of Commons where both the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General expressed a sympathetic attitude towards the problem.

Every major Commonwealth country except Canada now selects judges on the basis of merit. Surely the time has come for Canada to follow suit.

That is all I have to say tonight in that respect. Let me assure the government that this matter will come up again and again for consideration.

I am pleased to see that an hon. member of another party, the hon. member for York-Scarborough, has shown some interest in this subject. I hope that before too long we will see someone in the Conservative party present a bill on this subject. This would indicate that members on all sides of the house are interested in seeing a change made in our system of selecting judges.

• (9:50 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Chairman, just a few words to tell the hon. member who has just resumed his seat that I do not entirely agree with him when he says that in most cases politicians should not be appointed judges.

Experience has proven, I think, that even if the legal knowledge of the persons to be appointed has to be taken into account, certain other social factors must also enter into the picture. As a matter of fact, those selected must be very human and have a great deal of knowledge of both men and things. I think the method used for the appointment of judges guarantees against serious mistakes. I am happy to say that former governments have appointed as judges persons who were able to perform their duties and assume their responsibilities. In fact, once appointed, they proved beyond doubt that they were impartial.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Prittie) has, of course, raised a point that his political party has been advocating for a few years in its election platform. I do feel, however, that it is not entirely well-founded and before changing our system, I would ask the Minister of Justice and Attorney General (Mr. Cardin) to look fully into it.

I should also like to point out, as I already did when the bill was introduced in the house, that the rolls of our superior courts are very heavy, which in many cases causes serious prejudice to the people under our jurisdiction.

[Mr. Prittie.]

It has happened, even in my private practice, that some cases entered on the rolls had to wait four years before coming before the court. Now, it often happens that during those four years of waiting, one or two witnesses for the defence or for the prosecution disappear, thus depriving a taxpayer of some evidence he could have brought before the court.

It is a fact that the Superior Court rolls are very heavy.

I recently pleaded, before the Court of Appeal, a case that had been entered in 1958. I pleaded the case in 1966. After five, seven or eight years, the memory of a lawyer, or his case, may not be as clear as it would have been had he pleaded the case within two years after it was entered.

I know that the number of judges is set by the provincial authorities and that the federal government has no responsibility in this regard. But I would ask the Minister of Justice and Attorney General to bring some pressure on the various provincial governments to let the federal government appoint a sufficient number of judges to satisfy the requirements of the taxpayers.

The minister, I think, also received last year a brief from the conference of Quebec judges which emphasized the importance of a revision of the salaries of Superior Court judges which are now pitiful. Although a judge may live a more solitary life after being sworn in, he is often called upon to represent his colleagues and give lectures on cultural matters, on a social basis. He is also called upon to travel and he should be given security and protection from all financial worries.

There are judges in the province of Quebec who can hardly make both ends meet with the salary they are getting at present. Those people find themselves in a difficult position, as they have to limit their social activities and I believe that the fact their salary is not increased lowers their prestige and dignity.

The brief makes a comparison with the deputy ministers of the various federal departments. On looking at the scale of salaries of deputy ministers, we find that some of them earn $25,000 per year, whereas we still have judges who earn $21,000 per year. If we allow for the income tax paid by those judges, we realize that they finally get about only $1,100 per month. How can a judge carry out his responsibilities and fulfil his duties with such remuneration, especially in 1967?

In concluding my remarks, this is what I ask the hon. minister. He obviously received this brief; perhaps his officials have considered it and he has studied it himself. I should like to know when the conference of judges that submitted the brief to the hon. Minister of Justice can expect to receive comments from him concerning the salary of our Superior Court judges?

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the question put by the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin), I may say that I have received representations not only from the conference of judges, but also from the chief justice of the province of Quebec who, in fact, was spokesman for all the judges in Canada, with respect to the salary increase. These representations were made at the end of last summer and, as a matter of fact, a very detailed study has been made in regard to the salaries of judges; I believe legislation will be introduced before the house in a not too distant future.

[English]

Mr. Herridge: I will be very brief indeed, Mr. Chairman. I see the house leader has a rather strange look on his face. For a number of years I have been interested in this question. I have discussed with judges I have known and lawyers throughout the district the matter of the appointment of judges. I find there is no agreement amongst the lawyers. Many lawyers do not agree with the recommendations of the law societies on this matter. I must say that, on the whole, our experience in Canada has been very fortunate indeed in so far as these appointments are concerned.

However, I do want to support the suggestions made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond to the effect that a committee could be appointed on a provincial basis including members of the legal fraternity and lay persons. I should like to suggest that if lay persons are included then farmers, that good, honest breed, should be included in the committee as well as some representation from the working people. We must remember that judges are human. It does not matter what scheme is devised to make certain they do not err; they are human like other people. Even in countries which have other systems of appointment for judges, such as Great Britain and Australia, judges err on occasion to the discomfort of the government that appointed them.

Clause agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, ISSUE OF SECURITIES, ETC.

The house resumed from Tuesday, December 6, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-299, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system for the period from the 1st day of January, 1965 to the 30th day of June, 1967, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company—Mr. Sharp—Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Clause 3 agreed to.

Clauses 4 to 13 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Deputy Chairman: When shall the said bill be read a third time, now?

Mr. Starr: By leave, now.

Mr. McIlraith (for Mr. Sharp) moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON ELECTION EXPENSES

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (for Miss LaMarsh) moved:

That the report of the committee on election expenses tabled October 11 last be referred to the standing committee on privileges and elections.

Motion agreed to.

Business of the House

REFERENCE OF ACT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (for Miss LaMarsh) moved:

That the standing committee on privileges and elections be empowered to study the Canada Elections Act and to report to the house such proposals as the committee may deem advisable.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McIlraith: Item No. 84 on today's order paper was not indicated as business for today, but it is a bill we propose to refer to the justice committee. If the house were agreeable, we would go on with second reading now, but I would not press the matter if anyone wishes to debate it.

Mr. Starr: We have not looked at that bill, Mr. Speaker. It is now ten o'clock. We would have been prepared to pass item No. 120, Bill S-55, but since it is ten o'clock I think we have done very well today.

Mr. McIlraith: Tomorrow we propose to continue consideration of the transport bill. After the completion of it, we propose to call item 62 on today's order paper; item 84; item 120; item 124 and item 125. Depending on the time available, I might vary the order of calling any of these measures, but that variation would take place only after discussion with the house leaders of the other parties.

Mr. Starr: If I understand the house leader correctly, if we finish the transport bill, then for the balance of the day we will take these items. However, this does not necessarily mean we will continue taking these items on Thursday?

Mr. McIlraith: No, we would not propose to continue them into Thursday. We would propose for Thursday consideration of item 107, which is the armed forces unification bill.

• (10:00 p.m.)

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

[Translation]

TRADE—REQUEST FOR TARIFF PROTECTION AGAINST SHOE IMPORTS

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, January 16 last I asked the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters) if he was aware of the difficult situation in which the Canadian shoe manufacturers found themselves, due to excessive imports of these products. The minister's answer, appearing on page 11824 of Hansard, read as follows:

—this matter has been brought to my attention before and it is under consideration. It is a fact that imports of shoes have increased, but domestic production has substantially increased too.

In making such a statement, the minister proved one of two things: either he was taking advantage of his position to mislead the public, or he did not have enough information.

I chose to believe that the minister was not well informed. That is why, on January 19 last I mentioned to the house the brief which the manufacturers association of that industry had sent every member of parliament.

Allow me, at this point, to quote a few paragraphs of the covering letter.

Dear Sir,

Enclosed herewith please find copy of a brief we have sent the Canadian committee on tariffs and trade to acquaint its members with the serious situation of the shoe industry.

The brief is the fifth we have sent the committee since May 15, 1964 and, as you will note, shoe imports are still increasing at an alarming rate.

And the brief contains a table based on Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures.

In 1951, for instance, we find that Canada, with a population of 14 million people, produced 48 million pair of shoes as compared to imports of 2 million pairs.

In 1956, with 16 million people, our production had increased to 56 million, with imports reaching 6 million.

In 1966, with nearly 20 million people, we produced 66 million pairs of shoes, as compared to imports of 31 million pairs.

In short, Canada's population increased by 42 per cent from 1951 to 1966, while the production of shoes in Canada went up by only 35 per cent and imports soared to 1,048 per cent. That means that 1966 imports represent 47 per cent of the Canadian production, which is more than needed to bring about the closing of several factories.

In fact, the brief precisely contains the list of manufacturers who have disappeared from the commercial scene in Canada since 1963. They number 26, 13 in Ontario and 13 in Quebec. The city of Montreal has lost four of its plants while the city of Quebec and suburbs have lost six.

Surprisingly, among the lost plants, some were founded or established at such various times as 1914, 1907, 1961, 1940, and 1912.

There must surely be professionals among those people, I imagine, cultivated persons who are experts in their profession.

The brief further states:

> Since our delegation appeared for the first time before the committee on tariffs and trade in June 1964, our manufacturers have shown growing concern at the shoe imports from socialist countries of central Europe, in particular.

Some shoe manufacturers of those countries bring out lines designed especially for export.

Mr. Speaker, last summer I had the opportunity to spend two weeks in a socialist republic. In that country a suit cost between $50 and $70; shoes cost from $10 to $15, depending on quality. All that while the carpenters and welders working in one of the world's biggest shipyards earned only $35 a month and an engineer, a university professor earned only $75 a month.

Since those workers do not earn enough money to buy their own production, it is obvious that the governments of those countries must look toward the export market if they want to keep their policy of full employment going.

As concerns the Asian countries, it has been well known for a long time that their shoe factories belong to foreign financiers. For the last few years, these gentlemen seem to have chosen Canada as a dumping ground for their products of dubious quality.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, for the Canadian government to allow the entry of commodities from the Asian countries is to bow before the financiers who are hiding in Europe and particularly in England. To allow the importation of shoes from communist countries is to encourage slavery, and to tolerate the present volume of imports is to create unemployment in our country.

In many small towns and communities, the shoe industry is the main source of employment of the local workers.

According to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, this industry provides direct employment for 10,000 persons in Ontario and 14,000 in Quebec, while another 15,000 are employed in allied industries.

All those people are quite concerned about the increased imports and rightly feel that their future is in danger.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, could we be informed now as to what action the department intends to take to correct this deplorable situation which affects directly or indirectly about 150,000 Canadian citizens.

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): Surely, the hon. member is not implying that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters) intended to deceive anyone.

Such a statement would be contrary to facts, especially since the minister wants very much to protect this Canadian industry.

The brief submitted to the Canadian committee on tariffs and trade by the Canadian Shoe Manufacturers Association was given careful consideration by officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Then it was referred to the Canadian delegation at the GATT conference on tariffs; negotiations are presently under way at Geneva.

This shows the minister's efforts to find a solution to the plight of our shoe manufacturers.

[English]

HOUSE OF COMMONS—INQUIRY AS TO THE USE OF ELECTRONIC VOTING MACHINE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, we in this house are given to expressing concern over our procedures. Indeed some of the longest arguments I have heard in this chamber have been about time saving and improving our procedures. This of course is not unusual in deliberative bodies. But we have noted of late a public expression of concern about what is fashionably called our image. I have noted the speeches of the Minister of National Health and Welfare and his expressed desire that procedurally we move into the twentieth century.

When one considers that it is now over one year since this session began on January 18, 1966 we are faced with a situation where the calendar year is not long enough for the parliamentary year, if I may express it that way, and there is some reason for concern. I do not worship the goddess of ultra efficiency. We must never make any change which would diminish by one jot or tittle the democratic ingredients of this chamber in the interests of speed, smoothness or efficiency. Some of our procedures are traditional and old fashioned and some think them not functional. Many traditional procedures are valuable, and indeed essential.

Little can be said in defence of our voting procedure, and much can be said against it. The charge of time wasting is often heard. The government accuses the opposition of wasting time, and I suppose many people who have spoken think that the other fellow who is speaking is wasting time. That is the usual attitude.

I think, however, that our voting procedure here is a complete anachronism. The observer of our chamber hears Mr. Speaker use the time worn expression "call in the members", and he watches the members leave the chamber. What happens in the interval? The members wait, and wait, and wait until a vote is taken. This voting process is laborious and difficult for the officials of the house, and time consuming in the extreme.

• (10:10 p.m.)

I have been watching during the few years I have been here—now close to ten—the number of hours which have been spent in waiting for votes to be called and taken. In the twenty third parliament we spent five hours and 40 minutes. In the fourth session of the twenty fourth parliament we spent 24 hours sitting, waiting, and waiting. I have calculated that since I came to this house we have spent the equivalent of 30 sitting days waiting for votes and having the votes counted. This is a serious factor, and one which should be considered by those who are anxious to improve our procedures.

Lovers of tradition may say we should not lay careless hands on matters of this kind. But our method of voting here is not part of the procedure at Westminster, the mother of parliaments. There, they literally divide the house and their voting process is much quicker than ours. Of course, we tend to wait for members to come in. An example of the ludicrous nature of that procedure occurred not long ago when one ambulance arrived bearing a member of the opposition and another brought a supporter of the government, and both men were carried in to cast their votes. It would have been much better had they obeyed their doctors' orders and stayed in bed.

An electronic device would make possible the instant recording, counting and revealing of the votes of all members. It would be a great time saver. It would be a magnificent aid to making the time we spend here more useful and valuable. If such device were installed, I believe that one of the rights available should be a right which would allow for an abstention. Abstentions have taken place for many years in the British parliament. Though it is hard to believe that any Irishman would not take part in a discussion or an argument, the Irishmen under Parnell abstained from time to time. Certainly in a house where there are several parties there should be a means by which a member could register his presence but indicate that he supported neither the amendment, say, nor the motion which was before the chamber.

So, in the words which the Secretary of State is said to have used in connection with the new Member of the Administration (Mr. Gordon), I would ask the leader of the house to "get with it", and move in the direction I am suggesting. If he cannot take steps to introduce an electronic voting machine now, then at least let him place before the committee on procedure, which I hope the house will soon set up, sample machines whose efficiency may be studied in the interest of their adoption and the improvement of our technique, so that all of us here may spend our time better than in waiting and waiting for a vote to be taken.

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): The hon. member for Queens is urging that electronic voting machines be installed for the purpose of recording votes in this chamber. He is concerned mainly about the time consumed by our practice of calling in the members and then having the members rise in their places to be recognized and counted. I must say that this may seem ponderous and a waste of time in an era when party loyalty normally leads all members of all parties to follow their leaders. It is not easy to see how the installation of electronic voting machines would overcome the principal time-consuming phase of this process—the phase in which the members are being called in. The machine could speed up the actual counting of members, but that would save only a small part of the total time now taken.

Moreover, sir, I think the hon. member would agree that if we were to resort immediately to the use of electronic voting machines we would hardly be beginning the modernization of our procedure. I doubt that we shall achieve a genuine improvement in our procedure in the house until most members have cause to feel that they are damaging themselves or their party, or both, by long, rambling and repetitious speeches. If the notion got abroad that such speeches, no matter from what quarter of the chamber they originate, are an affront to the electorate, a spirit that would inspire and energize genuine reform might develop.

Since January 11, 1967, the government has had a motion on the order paper for the establishment of a special committee on procedure. We were told at ten o'clock this evening that if the house moves expeditiously tomorrow, that item of business may be called. The government hopes that it will pass tomorrow. That motion will give a special committee wide power to recommend procedural improvements to the house; and I am sure the committee would not want to overlook the arguments in favour of electronic voting machines, even though I suspect that such machines would not work a very great improvement in time saving in this chamber.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.18 p.m.

END OF VOLUME XI