There is a cool statement of opinion by a government supporter who has imbibed from his leader the pleasant draught of independence. Mr. McLean is one of those ripe fruits ready to drop from the parent tree and the sooner he drops and out of public life the better it will be for all concerned. It is a sign of the British liberty of free speech that such statements could be made. To begin with they are false, and in the second place a man who cherishes so little appreciation of what Cananda owes to England is a mental weakling and ought not to occupy a seat in this or any other legislative body. But Mr. McLean was not permitted to get away with such reasonable talk,

He was sharply criticised by Mr. Armstrong of East Lambton who pointed out that we had always had the pro tection of the greatest navy afloat, England has loaned us in addition to giving us that protection hundreds of miliions of pounds for the development of our waterways and railways. It is worthy of note that between 1852 and 1902 Great Britain spent $85 000.000 on military expenditures in Canada. By going back 100 years it will be found that in addition she spent $170.000.000 making a total of $225.000.000 in 150 McARDLE - in Faichaven, Mass., years. In addition to this England spent $35.000,000 on the citadel and public works at Quebec, and no less than $81. 000.000 on our canals before we took them over. Before confederation she spent $56.000.000 on all kinds of public works.

Denis, and an eloquent 'Oh !' from the proprietor told him the recommendation was sufficient. And thus began Denis acquaintance with Dan.

To the casual observer Dan was only a bay horse for light drayage, but at the close of the first day Denis had found qualities undreamed of by others in the quiet, industrious an imal. There were certain marks around his shoulders that further told Denis the collars had not always been properly selected, and a pathetic tremor of his flesh when an obstruction proclaimed that he was not a stranger to the whip that stood in the wagon.

"Don't you have any fear, my boy, at first, strenuously objected to the flowers. of Denis ever hurting you," he whispered to the borse as he led him to change in his method of travelling When, however, the town lay far bethe stall, and Dan rubbed his nozzle against the driver's sleeve as if he understood. turned Dan out to graze along the

"I couldn't part with you, Dan," he explained to the horse, after telling him of the offer, for he had fallen into the habit of talking to the horse as he had never been able to bring himself to talk to his fellow-man. Perhaps Dan understood and appreciated the sacrific that had been made for him; anyhow, Denis chose to think that he did, and found a confirmation to his belief in the excellent service the horse did that day-"beating bimself out and out 1" the driver declared.

It is a scientific fact that much brings more; and this is true of love as of other things. The one, who loves an object simply and unselfishly will find other objects to love, receiving the benediction of their love in return. Denis thought that Dan had filled his life until Beauty came into it; then, had Dan not possessed horse sense he might have been jealous. Evening was sending home tired man and horse, when the attention of Denis was drawn to a crowd of boys in an alley. With their cries mingled the yelping of a dog, and as he drew near he preceived a big dog standing over a small one, lying on its back seeming to plead for mercy. This the larger brute appeared inclined to show, but the urging of his cruel little master and his companions to continue the bloody work to the death, left him undecided. Snatching the whip from its holder-the first time that he had done so-Denis sprang from the wagon, his blue eyes ablaze with indignation. It first fell with stinging effect on the bare legs of the then descended on the back of the
