ANTHONY TROLLOPE. The death at a comperatively early age of Mr. Trollope removes a landmark which connects the present generation of writers with Dickens and Thackeray. Anthony Trollope was one of the rare instances of Mrs. Trollope, was a society novelist with a speciality, like her more famous son, for describing clerical life. Her cleverest hit was "The Vicar of Wrexhill," a satire, drawn with no light hand on the fashionable evangelical popular preacher. Mrs. Trollope's books, amusing as they were, had too much of the coarseness of the Theodore Hook style. Nothing can be more ultra-resided than her son's novels. They err on the aide of absolute tameness of plot and dialogue, but photograph to the life the ladies and parsons of the day. In this respect they will have much value for the social historian, when the inevitable justice of disestablishment shall have shaken the English parson from the position which his Mrs. Trollope, was a society novelist with a

Even in Gotham, where the play is shortly to be produced, the press disparages the proposal, and designates the men as theatrical speculators and not religious enthusiasts. It is expected the speculators will meet with little success. Let them.

WORKINGMAN'S LETTER ON TEM-

(To the Editor of The World) SIR; I would like to say a few words on the subject of total abstinence I see in your paper this morning about the Church of England and temperance work. Some of the men say that it is only for drunkards New York is agitated over the new to sign the pledge, but why not sign it penal code. It was not so much a new before you get to be a drunkard. When measure as it was a codification of existing you do that you can get others to sign the pledge, and then ask God to help you and ture, and now when an indignant public are asking for explanations the members of that legislature are rising one after the other and admitting that they never read the code—that they passed it wholesale, contenting themselves with merely examined the code of the day I ever signed the pledge. Yorkville, Dec. 7, 1882. HOTEL MEN AND MASONS.

(To the Editor of The World.) SIR,-I read with inferest your pro and con statements regarding this subject. I am a hotel man and a mason, and I think I am no discredit to the order, whose traditions go back to Solomon and whose long roll of members had many worthy owners of hostelries therein. We hotel men pay our taxes and our debts, we are bringing up our families creditably, and we are not by any means the "toughs" that the temperance men try to make us out to be. It is the prohibitionist soreheads in our order that have started this movement. What would we not give for a similarly life-like presentation of the French abbes before the revolution, or of the augurs, who could not meet each other without laughing in Cicero's time?

THE PASSION PLAY.

While the license of the drama takes a wide range, there are some subjects which respect for popular sentiment teaches it to leave untouched. The life and death of the Redeemer of mankind are themes too sacred to be turned. Into a dramatic performance, even when made solemn by church music and assigned to actors who have reached the stage through the church, and who owe their conversions to similar representations.

The author of the play is Mr. Morse, who has been a diligent student of the life of our Saviour. But he might have turned his labor to better purpose than to produce a play which will tend to bring into ridicule sentiments which a large part of the community hold as the most sacred known to men. The part of the Saviour is to be played by Rev. Mr. Wannemacher, a one-time temperance lecturer. Even in Gotham, where the play is shortly to be produced, the press disparages the proposal, and going on in Canada since 1867. The de-mand for the appointment of a Canadian native or adopted, one whose destiny and interests are bound up with the country's, to the (nominally) highest position in the land, is a natural outcome of all this.
