My submission is that many of these burnt-out veterans for whom this legislation is designed, while not capable of performing a hard day's work, a full day's work, and for that reason unable to compete successfully in the labour market, are nevertheless capable of maintaining themselves if work of a certain kind is available. For instance, many of them could maintain themselves as elevator operators, night watchmen, caretakers, timekeepers, if such work were available. But of course there are very few such jobs available. It seems to me that by that subsection we are not only making it possible for the board to refuse allowances to men in that category but actually tying the hands of the board, preventing the board from giving relief in many cases in which relief should be given. It seems to me that the board will have to ask itself, if work were available, Could this man maintain himself? As I say, a man might be capable of maintaining himself as an elevator operator or caretaker or in some other form of sheltered employment if it were available. If the board decided that he was fitted for that type of work, it seems to me that they would be compelled to refuse him the allowance.

I should also like to hear from the minister as to subsection 3, which provides that an allowance shall not be awarded or continued to a veteran while such veteran is in receipt of an old age pension. That comes as somewhat of a surprise. I do not think there was any mention at Fort William of a provision of that sort, and I do not think legislation containing such a provision can be said to fulfil to the utmost the requests of the returned soldiers themselves as expressed through the dominion convention of the Canadian Legion held at Fort William. I am hoping that the minister will be able to dispense with that provision.

Mr. GREEN: In endorsing the remarks of the hon. member for London (Mr. Betts), I would point out that when the special committee on returned soldiers' problems considered this paragraph so carefully two years ago, we expressly distinguished between veterans permanently unemployable and temporarily unemployable, the idea being that a man of fifty-five to sixty need not show that he was permanently unemployable. I suggest that the intention is to give the board very wide discretion, and that these words, "unlikely to become capable," in paragraph (c) should be cut out, and subsection 2 be cut out also. There will be then no question at all of the powers of the board, and we need have no fear that the act will not be fairly administered.

Mr. MacNEIL: Will the minister be good enough to outline how the board would proceed to determine eligibility under paragraph (c) of subsection 1? How would he define "economic handicaps"?

Mr. POWER: Possibly a man who has not had a job for four or five years and could not get one; that would perhaps be an economic handicap. I do not like attempting to define these things. The trouble with most of our pension legislation has been that we have defined either too much or too little. If we define too much we sometimes let in a large class of people who are not entitled at all. If we restrict the powers of the boards or commission and do not allow them the widest possible discretion, many hardships are incurred.

It has nothing to do with this, but by way of digression may I say that if at the inception of this pension legislation we had appointed a board, such as the veterans' allowance board, and given them the widest possible discretion in the awarding of pensions, I think we would not have got into all the snarls that we have since been in with respect to pension legislation. Every time we introduce legislation which specifies distinctly a class or classes we get into trouble, either by excluding someone or by including too many. The officers of the department and myself have given a great deal of thought to the phraseology of this section for the past four or five months, we have written and rewritten it not once but many times, and this is the best we can submit to the committee. I have no objection whatever to any hon. member trying his hand at drafting, and if he can make a better job I am quite willing to adopt it. It must be borne in mind, however, that this is not a relief measure, it is not intended to give relief to people who are only temporarily out of employment. That is a municipal and provincial matter. There would be no proper way for this department to administer an act which provided that a man would get the allowance for a short period of time merely because he is out of work. This is intended to deal with people who are burnt-out, and we have purposely made it as broad as possible, leaving the fullest possible discretion to the members of the board.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister consider inserting the word "fully" before the words "physically and mentally capable," so that it would read, "who is, in the opinion of the board, fully physically and mentally capable"?

Mr. POWER: In the first place I think it would not be good English, although I have not much regard for literature in making legislation. But I do not think it would help. If he is physically and mentally capable, I suggest he is fully physically and mentally capable.

Mr. NEILL: No; he might be physically and mentally capable of running an elevator, but not of doing heavy manual work.

Mr. POWER: I do not think the word "fully" should go in there.

Mr. CLARK (York-Sunbury): Does the expression, "theatre of actual war," in paragraph (c) include England?

Mr. POWER: No.

Mr. CLARK (York-Sunbury): Or the ocean?

Mr. POWER: No. In the act "theatre of actual war" in the naval force is described in this way:

> In the case of the naval forces, the high seas or wherever contact has been made with hostile forces of the enemy, or wherever the veteran has sustained injury or contracted disease directly by a hostile act of the enemy.

Mr. MUTCH: What about the Royal Canadian Air Force? Is not England an "actual theatre" for them?

Mr. POWER: We can determine from the War Office whether it is or not, according to the nature of their service. The War Office has laid down certain regulations.

Mr. MUTCH: I know there were men on the North Sea patrol who were stationed all the time on the island.

Mr. POWER: Yes, quite true.

Mr. BETTS: Was much difficulty experienced by the board in complying with and construing the definition in the former act? I refer to the definition which reads:

> —in the opinion of the board, incapable of maintaining himself because of disability, preaging and general unfitness, and in either case is—

And so on.

Mr. POWER: Perhaps I am not quite clear, but do I understand the hon. member to suggest that we should use the phraseology of the former act, and leave out only the words "fifty-five"? Does he believe the phraseology of the former act is preferable to the suggested phraseology?

Mr. BETTS: I have not expressed an opinion.

Mr. POWER: I am asking, purely for the sake of information, and to gain assistance.

Mr. BETTS: If that is as far as the minister will go, I would say that that definition would, in my opinion, be preferable to the one now suggested. But the suggestion I make is that the words, "unlikely to become capable," be dropped. At the risk of repeating myself, I would say my objection to the section as it now stands is that in the former definition no attention was paid to what was going to become of the veteran in the future. That was not a matter which came under consideration by the board at all. The question for determination was: Is he capable now of maintaining himself? By introducing the words, "unlikely to become capable," I suggest we are narrowing the clause.

Mr. POWER: I am not prepared to agree that we are narrowing the clause by the language used in the amendment. But perhaps this might appeal to the committee: In the case of a man who has just suffered a broken leg, I do not think it is the intention of the committee—certainly it is not the intention of the board—that he shall be eligible under the act. There must be some kind of permanency, and the word "likely" does not bar him. Surely the board has the right to use its discretion as to whether he is likely. Perhaps that is not a good word; it may not be a proper expression, but certainly it means probability. I think all hon. members will agree that there should not be any intention of making a person eligible who has a mere temporary disability.

Mr. BENNETT: I have read the section carefully and have listened to the observations of the hon. member for London. It does seem to me that it divides itself into three classes, and the governing word in the third class is the word "combined." First, the veteran gets an allowance if he is sixty years of age. Second, if he is not sixty years of age, but in the opinion of the board is unemployable, permanently, because of physical and mental disability, he gets consideration. The third case refers to any age, but not qualifying for age or disability provided under the two preceding paragraphs. However he has served in a theatre of war, and in the opinion of the board is incapable or unlikely to become capable of maintaining himself, because of economic handicaps, combined with physical or mental disability or insufficiency. That certainly makes the physical or mental disability or insufficiency the governing factor, when linked with the other provisions of that subsection. I cannot see it any other way.

Mr. STIRLING: He has to have all those things.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; as the section reads, apparently he has to have all those things. Is that the intention of the government?

Mr. POWER: It is intended to apply to a man with partial disability, but who, as well, has certain economic handicaps.

Mr. BENNETT: But it must be combined with physical or mental disability or insufficiency. The word "combined" would worry me.

Mr. POWER: He should really have the two; he should be incapable of obtaining work, owing to his physical or mental insufficiency.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. POWER: The economic handicap is his incapacity to obtain work owing to his physical or mental incapacity. The danger in making this section too broad would be that immediately it would be used by every veteran out of employment. It is not intended that that man should be covered. I am free to admit, as I have already done, that this is a most difficult clause to draft, and I would welcome assistance from anybody.

The only thing I can do is suggest to the committee that, in view of the manner in which the War Veterans' Allowance Act has been administered in the past, and in view particularly of the manner in which this particular section has been administered since 1936, it might take my present recommendation. Hon. members will recall that there were some doubts as to just what the language meant, and under what category veterans would come, in view of the language then proposed. But I am quite free to say that apart from what I might call the first rush of applications from people who had the idea, through newspaper reports, that every veteran over fifty-five years was eligible, the board has had no difficulty whatsoever in administering the section as it stood after the 1936 amendment. It is for that reason I am convinced that we must allow the widest possible discretion to the board, and it seems to me that we should not load on their shoulders the onus of having discretion in refusing people who quite clearly should not be entitled, owing to the fact that, although they are out of employment, they are not suffering from other tangible or intangible disability. It is the best we can do, under the circumstances, by way of language.

Mr. BENNETT: How would the minister like this: "Does not qualify by age or disability under the two preceding paragraphs, but having served in a theatre of actual war, is, in the opinion of the board, suffering from such physical or mental disability or insufficiency as renders him incapable of maintaining himself."

Mr. POWER: That was the wording we had at one time, but I forget why we changed it. I need not tell the right hon. gentleman that the section was written and rewritten; many drafts were torn up. However, I have no objection to considering the suggested wording.

Mr. NEILL: There are three paragraphs in this section, but paragraph (c) is the only one which specifies that a man must have served in a theatre of war. Am I right in supposing that this stipulation does not apply to those coming under paragraph (a) and (b)?

Mr. BENNETT: The definition of "veteran" covers that.

Mr. POWER: The definition would cover that. The only man eligible under the War Veterans' Allowance Act is the man who served in a theatre of actual war, with the exception that if a man has obtained a pension, even though he served only in Canada, he would be eligible.

Mr. NEILL: Then, why put those words in the paragraph? They are superfluous and calculated to make one misunderstand it.

Mr. POWER: It is to cover the man who does not qualify by age or disability but who has served in a theatre of actual war. On that account, because of his service, he is entitled to come under the provisions of the act without having to be either permanently unemployable or sixty years of age.

Mr. NEILL: You have stated that "veteran" means a man who served in a theatre of war, and it seems to me superfluous to find it again in paragraph (c). It gives the impression that service in a theatre of war applies only to paragraph (c). If a veteran is defined in the act to mean a man who served in a theatre of war, what is the need of mentioning that service in paragraph (c)?

Mr. POWER: The principal thing was to make it clear to the soldiers themselves that only those who served in a theatre of war would be eligible.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. NEILL: Why not put it in (a) and (b)?

Mr. POWER: That is well understood in connection with (a) and (b). I do not want there to be any doubt in the mind of anyone as to those benefiting having served in a theatre of actual war.

Mr. NEILL: That is just what I want to avoid and I suggest that it should be in (a) and (b). That will be the first question asked.

Mr. POWER: We cannot put it in (a) and (b) because some of those men may be pensioners.

Mr. GREEN: I think we are all agreed that what we are aiming at is to take care of the 5,100 odd veterans who served in a theatre of actual war, who are unemployed and are wholly or partly unfit.

Mr. POWER: Quite.

Mr. GREEN: Many of these men may be only forty or forty-five years of age, and it would obviously be unfair to insist that the board must find that such a man is unlikely to be capable of working again. We all hope the younger men in this group will be capable of working again. Surely the department is amply protected by the two provisions that an applicant must be suffering from economic handicaps—in other words, he must have been out of work for two or three years—and in addition must have a physical or mental disability or insufficiency. Surely those qualifying words are strict enough; they go a good deal further than the recommendations of the veterans' assistance commission.

Mr. POWER: There is nothing strict about the word at all. With the provisions as suggested by my hon. friend, a man who had an acute case of pneumonia would be qualified, and that is the man we do not want to qualify. There must be some degree of permanency about it. I think the committee will understand that we could not hope to administer this act with men going on and off as they obtained employment. This is legislation for the burnt-out veteran, and the implication is that those who qualify are no longer able to work or are not in a position to hope ever to work. I do not want to go quite that far and I do not think it will be interpreted in that way, but I certainly want to avoid having the benefits go to those who are only temporarily unemployed.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: Would paragraph (c) cover a man who was incapable of continuing in his ordinary occupation or vocation? I have in mind a farmer who is a returned man but whose health does not permit him to do the heavy work of farming. Would he be expected to go away from home to look for some easier work?

Mr. POWER: If he is not capable of any gainful employment he would be eligible.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: I do not think that answers my question. As someone said this afternoon, he might be capable of running an elevator, but to get such employment he would have to leave home and go fifty miles away to a town or city. Would he be expected to leave his family?

Mr. POWER: That would be his economic handicap. That is why those words are in the section.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: "Incapable of maintaining himself at his ordinary occupation"—is that the way it would be interpreted?

Mr. POWER: Yes, broadly speaking.

Mr. MacNEIL: I should like to inquire as to the eligibility of a man, say forty-five or forty-nine years of age, the average age, who is too old to be accepted in the employment for which he has been trained. The minister is well aware that a large number of veterans are considered to be too old to continue in employment in certain important industries in this country. Would the fact that they are unable to resume the vocation for which they were trained qualify them under this clause?

Mr. POWER: If a man of forty-five was as physically fit as a man of that age would normally be, he would not be eligible under this clause even though there was no work available at the moment.

Mr. BENNETT: How would the minister think this would do in place of paragraph (c)? We have dealt with paragraphs (a) and (b), and could we not say this:

(c) does not qualify by age or disability under the two preceding paragraphs, but having served in a theatre of actual war, is, in the opinion of the board, suffering from such physical or mental disability or insufficiency as would entitle him to such allowance if he were not disqualified by reason of age and otherwise as provided by the preceding subsections.

I have not written it out, but I just wanted to get the sense of it. This is the comprehensive clause as it covers every class not covered by the two preceding paragraphs. It has the one rider, namely, physical or mental disability or insufficiency in the opinion of the board. That is, first of all the board must satisfy itself that the man is not sixty years of age; second, that he is not permanently unemployable because of physical or mental disability.

Mr. POWER: That means total disability.

Mr. BENNETT: Permanent unemployability means total incapacity. Let us take the third paragraph, which covers everything:

Does not qualify by age or disability under the two preceding paragraphs, but having served in a theatre of actual war, is, in the opinion of the board, suffering from such physical or mental disability or insufficiency as would entitle him to an allowance to the same extent as though he was qualified under the two preceding paragraphs of this section.

Mr. POWER: May I just repeat it.

Mr. BENNETT: Here it is:

Does not qualify by age or disability under the two preceding paragraphs, but having served in a theatre of actual war, is, in the opinion of the board, suffering from such physical or mental disability or insufficiency as would entitle him to the benefits of this allowance were it not for the provisions of paragraphs (a) and (b).

Mr. POWER: Perhaps if I repeated it—"Is in the opinion of the board suffering from such physical or mental disability—"

Mr. BENNETT: Or insufficiency.

Mr. POWER: "—or insufficiency to such an extent as would qualify him—"

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, under the preceding paragraphs, if it were not for the restriction of age or permanent disability. Is that too broad?

Mr. POWER: No; I do not think it is broad enough.

Mr. BENNETT: That covers every case except those two.

Mr. POWER: I shall be glad to read it in Hansard, but I think it would narrow it. Did I understand my right hon. friend to say it would cover the economic handicap?

Mr. BENNETT: I think it covers everything. It is intended to cover every other kind of case that would qualify him were it not for the distinct provisions of (a) and (b); that is, his lack of age, his lack of permanent disability. Then if he is physically unfit and mentally unfit, he would be entitled to the allowance as though he fell within (a) and (b) but for the disqualification of age and permanent incapacity which he is not suffering.

Mr. POWER: The first difficulty I see is over the word "suffering." That would imply medical examination of some kind. We would have to change that language, for the idea is to get away as far as possible from medical examination. We hope there will be no necessity for medical examination except so far as to exclude the man as being fit under the next subsection, but I shall be very glad to let this section stand and come back to it on another occasion.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps we will sit down and write a section before the next sitting.

Mr. NEILL: Will the minister give us his opinion about the veterans' allowance in connection with old age pension. Cannot he make provision that the amount shall be only less any amount he receives from old age pension?

Mr. POWER: No; I think this is all right. I do not think there is any danger of the man being deprived of his old age pension or of this allowance, but I think we are all in agreement that he should not have the two. The paragraph reads:

An allowance shall not be awarded or continued under this act to a veteran or a recipient while such veteran or recipient is in receipt of an old age pension.

If he is in receipt of an old age pension and prefers to come under our act, all he has to do is to abandon the old age pension and we will give him the allowance; but what we will not do, and do not propose to do, is to allow him to come under our act and also allow him to draw $10 under the old age pension in addition to $10 under this act. As the members of the committee know, there is an exemption up to $240, which is counted as exempted income. Cases have arisen where a man drawing $20 under the War Veterans' Allowance Act maintains he has a right to draw $10 more from the provincial government in old age pension, and some provincial governments were only too glad to show their generosity when they were dealing with seventy-five per cent of somebody else's money, some insisting that they be allowed to give the man this $10. Our reply was: "All right, you can give him the whole amount, and we will not give him the war veterans' allowance."

Mr. NEILL: I have known a case where a man's application for war veterans' allowance was refused, and he was told: "You are seventy years of age; go and take the old age pension." There would be that disposition. The words in the section are:

An allowance shall not be awarded or continued—

They may say: "You are in receipt of an old age pension, and therefore you will receive nothing under this act."

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. POWER: If he wants to fool us he can drop his old age pension and come to us and say: "Please give me the war veterans' allowance."

Mr. BENNETT: And the provincial government may aid him in doing so.

Mr. DUNNING: That is what will inevitably happen.

Mr. POWER: We did not think of it in 1930 when the act was first passed; but had parliament of that day known that old age pensions would be extended on such a scale as they have been, arrangements would have been made so that anybody qualifying for old age pension at the age of seventy would go on the old age pension and not have the war veterans' allowance.

Mr. BENNETT: Too near an election at that time.

Mr. POWER: Possibly, and no amendments were made after the election. Of course, there was always the hope that there would be an early and successful appeal to the people. At the present time, when the federal government is paying a war veterans' allowance to people who are entitled to war veterans' allowance and to people who are entitled to old age pension, I suppose if we shifted them on to the province we would save twenty-five per cent, but there has been never any disposition of that kind under any administration.

Mr. BENNETT: No; it has always been regarded as our responsibility under defence.

Mr. GREEN: There is no intention that this section will be used to force veterans onto the old age pension?

Mr. POWER: No, the other way round.

Mr. POTTIER: Is "maintaining himself" interpreted to mean under the old section maintaining himself and dependents or maintaining himself only?

Mr. POWER: It had some reference to dependents.

Mr. BETTS: Before we leave paragraph (c) of section 3, the minister said that his main preoccupation was to give the board the most unfettered, the widest possible discretion. I think we all want that. He also said that under the former section which it is now proposed to repeal, after the first rush of applications that came in there was very little difficulty experienced by the board in dealing with the applications and in construing the legislation. I would point out that under the former definition all that the board had to do was to form an opinion that the applicant, provided he was fifty-five, was incapable of maintaining himself because of disability, pre-ageing and general unfitness. The board had to form no opinion whatever as to what would become of the applicant in the future, as to the probability of the applicant being unable to maintain himself in the future. But by amending the section in the manner proposed we are casting on the board the necessity of making up its mind in every case whether the applicant will be capable of maintaining himself in the future. So the minister is doing just what he says he does not want to do, hampering and fettering the board, clipping their wings.

Mr. POWER: We say, "if in the opinion of the board." We do not fetter or hamper them. We say: "If a man is, in the opinion of the board, incapable and unlikely to become capable." The board decides whether he is likely or unlikely to become capable of maintaining himself.

Mr. BETTS: The minister is asking the board to decide something it was not required to decide before, the probability of the applicant becoming capable or incapable. That is an added restriction on the board. That is my objection.

Mr. GREEN: If the minister is not willing to change paragraph (c) of subsection 1, would he consider wiping out subsection 2, which further restricts the board?

Mr. POWER: I do not think I can consider wiping out subsection 2. That is the safeguarding provision to prevent this from being an unemployed relief act.

Mr. GREEN: Yes, but the minister said with regard to paragraph (c) that economic handicaps meant, for example, that a man had been out of work for, say a year. Yet subsection 2 is contradictory. It says, "physically and mentally capable of maintaining himself if work were available". The two do not fit in. I suggest that subsection 2 come out. The department is amply protected by the wide terminology of paragraph (c).

Mr. POWER: I would not like to ask the board to carry on under this act without having at least this safeguard in it, to make it quite clear that it is not the intention of parliament that mere lack of work would be a qualification.

Mr. GREEN: But you have also the qualification in paragraph (c) that the veteran must be "unlikely to become capable of maintaining himself". If that is left in, surely it is sufficient protection.

Mr. POWER: I am sorry, but I cannot agree.

Mr. QUELCH: How would this affect a farmer on some marginal land who is incapable of working the farm himself? Would he be allowed to turn the farm over to his son to maintain himself?

Mr. POWER: I suppose that if his action were construed as fraud or evasion, he would not be eligible. But otherwise I imagine—

Mr. QUELCH: He could not run the farm himself, and if it is sub-marginal land he could not afford to hire a man to work for him. Would he not be eligible for the allowance?

Mr. POWER: Some men who are on farms are now in receipt of veterans' allowance, and some deduction is made owing to the fact that such a man is not obliged to pay rent and he gets some subsistence from his farm. But there is a section in the act, section 8, which states that when it appears to the board that——any veteran has made a voluntary assignment or transfer of property for the purpose of qualifying for an allowance or for a larger allowance than he might otherwise have been entitled to receive, the income derivable from such property shall, in determining the allowance, if any, which such veteran should receive, be taken in account as if the assignment or transfer had not been made.

Mr. MacNEIL: Will the minister explain what procedure will be followed to determine what degree of physical or mental disability or insufficiency would enable a man to qualify? Would the man be subjected to an examination? The reason I ask is this—

Mr. POWER: He would have to have a medical examination to determine whether he is fit. I have already said that.

Mr. MacNEIL: Will the pre-aging be a definite factor?

Mr. POWER: In tangible or intangible handicaps. What an intangible handicap is I do not know; I cannot define it. But if a man is not just able to work or cannot hold a job because his physical and mental condition is such that he is not capable of doing it, then he comes under the act. I cannot explain it any more than that. If it is just a case of his being out of work because the mill or the plant is closed down, he does not come under it.

Mr. DUNNING: Or if he is lazy.

Mr. POWER: The Minister of Finance says that if he is lazy he does not come under it. I say unfortunately in most cases he does.

Mr. LAWSON: As the minister has intimated that it is his intention to reserve this section for further consideration, despite his opinion as expressed this evening in answer to questions of the hon. member for Yale, I am going to ask the minister to reconsider the views he has expressed with respect to the interpretation given by the justice department to the words, "served in an actual theatre of war."

Mr. POWER: Will my hon. friend try his hand at drafting something to cover his case, and I shall see what I can do.

Mr. LAWSON: Yes, I shall be very glad to do so. I do not know whether it was last session or the session before that I personally went before a committee of the house over which the minister was presiding, and I thought I had the minister's sympathetic consideration of the situation. One of the cases I then had in mind was that of a sergeant who had been on conducting parties and had actually been under fire. There is no necessity of my repeating the circumstances as the minister is thoroughly familiar with the facts; but I feel that, in view of some cases which have come to my attention, and as we are now extending this war veterans' allowance to practically the limit to which it can be extended, an injustice is done in many cases by adhering to the interpretation given by the justice department. I welcome the suggestion of the minister and I shall try my hand at drafting something to meet the situation.

Mr. POWER: In any case the bill will not pass this evening; certain sections of it have been held over, and I shall be glad to consider any amendment which my hon. friend suggests. But I warn him that I would not like him to make it so broad as to cover those who have not actually had fairly meritorious service.

Mr. LAWSON: Oh, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: But if the man is an enlisted man acting under orders and he is a casualty, surely he should be entitled to it.

Mr. POWER: This factor has to be taken into account: The Department of National Defence decided which men were to have medals. I think that is perhaps the determining factor in this whole situation; and as I understand, conducting officers were not awarded the victory medal. The election men should have been awarded a victory medal, because they won the election, but I do not know about the war.

Mr. STIRLING: That is another feature.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. BENNETT: After all, the test should be, Was he an enlisted man; if he was an enlisted man, did he suffer a disaster in a theatre of war?

Mr. POWER: Well, he did not. This man did not suffer disaster during the war. This is not a wounded man.

Mr. BENNETT: The one I am talking about is one who did. It was in a minor capacity.

Mr. POWER: I believe that those who did suffer any disability in a theatre of actual war would be pensionable.

Mr. BENNETT: I should think so.

Mr. POWER: He is eligible under the War Veterans' Allowance Act if he suffered injury. But this is the case of a man who suffered no injury whatever; he had a short and rather uneventful service, in that he crossed over in one case conducting troops, as a conducting officer.

Mr. BENNETT: Was he an enlisted man?

Mr. POWER: Presumably he was an officer.

Mr. LAWSON: He was a sergeant. My recollection is that he actually did suffer some injury, but I would not like to state that for a certainty.

Mr. POWER: If he had any injury due to his war service or to service in the army during the war he would be entitled to a pension.

Mr. LAWSON: No, because he cannot prove his present incapacity is attributable to the injury.

Mr. POWER: Ah, that is another point. But I imagine if he had any injury incurred on or attributable to service, he would have entitlement under the Pension Act.

Mr. BENNETT: That has always been my understanding.

Mr. POWER: And there would be no difficulty about getting war veterans' allowance. But as I understand it, this is the case of a man who is now disabled owing to illness or to incapacity which has occurred since the war.

Mr. BENNETT: Not necessarily referable to his wounds.

Mr. POWER: Not referable to his wounds at all. That man is not entitled normally to the benefits of this act. But as I said, I should like to consider the matter. There cannot be very many such cases. I should like to consider an amendment which would not broaden the act to the extent of covering persons who did not serve in a theatre of war, yet might cover cases such as are mentioned by my hon. friend.

Mr. MUTCH: We have been wandering more or less all over section 4 of the act, which, is being amended, and as the minister is going to reconsider various subsections, I suggest that subsection 3 might work a hardship on the married man. This subsection provides that the allowance shall not be awarded or continued under the act to a veteran or the recipient of an old age pension. As is well known, the old age pension is $20 a month, and, if a man is married $40. But if, as is usually the case, there is a gap of five or ten years between the ages of husband and wife, it might happen that refusal to give the veterans' allowance to a married man might reduce his potential income by half. I do not believe there is provision for a man who is drawing the old age pension to waive it.

Mr. POWER: Yes. The moment he drops it he is eligible.

Mr. MUTCH: So long as it is clearly established that he may do so, it is all right. This subsection says that the allowance cannot be awarded or continued—

Mr. POWER: "While such veteran or recipient is in receipt of an old age pension."

Mr. MUTCH: It is clearly the intention that a man need not sacrifice $40 a month because he is already in receipt of $20?

Mr. NEILL: Can he be allowed to give up the $20?

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. BETTS: Before leaving section 3 I hope that the minister will see fit to drop, or at any rate to modify, subsection 2. However, if he does not do so, I believe he will agree with me that we ought to endeavour to write king's English into the statutes. I am no purist, but in subsection 2, it seems to me, if I may trust my ear, we have made a mistake, and I am ashamed to say I do not know whether it is in mood or tense. Let me read it:

> The provisions of paragraph (c) of subsection one shall not be construed to apply to any veteran who is, in the opinion of the board, physically and mentally capable of maintaining himself if work were available.

My submission is that "were" is not correct; it should be "be" or "is." There are some schoolmasters in the chamber. Perhaps they can tell us.

Mr. POWER: I am informed that this very point was submitted to the law clerk—though I refuse to accept the authority of the law clerk on this particular point—who stated that "were" was good English. Personally I think it is, but I shall not start a controversy with my hon. friend. If he can find an authority among the schoolmasters in the chamber justifying the change to "be" or "is," I shall be glad to consider the suggestion.

Mr. MacNEIL: Can the minister tell us by what method economic handicaps are measured? In committee we endeavoured to devise a formula to deal with the industrially unfit. In disqualifying those who are physically and mentally capable of maintaining themselves where work is available, no reference is made to the particular vocation for which such men have been trained. I submit that subsection 2 imposes too severe a restriction, because there are men who are industrially unfit to undertake work of a sort that might be available; that work might be such as they could not be reasonably expected to perform, and yet it could not be said that work had been absolutely denied them.

Mr. POWER: If he has a disability or if he is suffering from an insufficiency he is qualified for consideration.

Mr. DUNNING: You cannot go much further than "insufficiency."

Mr. MacNEIL: I am referring to the restriction contained in subsection 2. "Physically and mentally capable of maintaining himself if work was available" seems to me to contradict the intention of paragraph (c) of subsection 1. The ex-service men would like some assurance that this deals with those commonly designated as the industrially unfit.

Mr. POWER: It is no use trying to get me into a hole on this. What the ex-service men wanted was provision with respect to men who were out of work, and this is not intended to cover men who are simply not employed. My hon. friend will remember the discussions in the committee, and there is no question that representations were made to cover people who were unemployed without any question whatever of disability. This bill is not intended for that purpose.

Mr. PELLETIER: Inasmuch as "economic handicaps" is not defined, the minister might perhaps insert some such words as these: "Lack of opportunities provided by the economic system, combined with. . . .".

Mr. BROOKS: Is there any set amount which the board considers sufficient for a man to maintain himself. Suppose he has an income of $150; would that preclude him from the war veterans' allowance?

Mr. POWER: The act fixes a maximum of $730 for a married man.

Mr. BROOKS: If he received $200 from some other source he could still receive the war veterans' allowance?

Mr. POWER: We allow him the maximum including that. There are a very large number who are receiving $10 a month pension and they still receive the war veterans' allowance.

Mr. MacNEIL: Will a nursing sister who is married, whose husband is out of employment and who is otherwise eligible, be allowed to qualify?

Mr. POWER: There is no double standard. The nursing sister who is married is as much entitled to support her husband as her husband is entitled to support her. I do not see any difficulty about that.

Mr. LENNARD: Suppose a man was entitled to assistance under the act but died before he had either applied for or received assistance: would his widow be entitled to temporary assistance?

Mr. POWER: No.

Mr. McNIVEN (Regina): I understood the minister to say that the maximum receivable under the War Veterans' Allowance Act was $40 for a man and his wife, and that earnings were permitted up to $250.

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. McNIVEN (Regina): Would that $250 include a pension?

Mr. POWER: Anything.

Mr. McNIVEN (Regina): If he received a pension of $250, that would be his maximum?

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. McNIVEN (Regina): I have a complaint from the disabled veterans' association, indicating a good deal of dissatisfaction among the veterans in the west, on the part of pensioners receiving very small pensions of $5, $10 and $15 a month. Many of them are in receipt of a governmental allowance varying from $480 to $730 a year, and these men are having difficulty in getting along. Their degree of unemployability is the same; they are living under identically the same conditions, and they are protesting against that difference between the amounts payable to individuals of approximately the same pension rate. I wondered whether the minister had received any complaints in regard to that situation and whether there is any possibility of remedying it.

Mr. POWER: Perhaps my hon. friend is referring to certain pensioners receiving small pensions who complain that the unemployment assistance given by the department is not adequate. It has no reference to this bill. But if the organization to which my hon. friend refers is that which I have in mind, having its headquarters at Regina—

Mr. McNIVEN (Regina): Yes.

Mr. POWER: —its program calls for $45 per month for each single veteran; for each married veteran, $65 and $12.50 for every dependent child, so that under that program a man, his wife and three children might receive over $100 a month. That would be for all veterans. I am sure that parliament will not support the proposals of that association.

Mr. McNIVEN (Regina): They have greatly modified their proposal, because in their letter to me they asked only for a maximum under the War Veterans' Allowance Act of $50 a month; that is an increase from $40 to $50.

Mr. POWER: Is it the same organization?

Mr. McNIVEN (Regina): This is the disabled veterans' association of Saskatchewan, incorporated under provincial charter in 1934. They point out that this allowance is just a bare subsistence, and that returned men, as other married men, have furniture, kitchen equipment, etc., continually going out of repair, and that they have no funds to replace these. They therefore suggest that this allowance be increased. It is a very modest request in comparison with that to which the minister has referred, and undoubtedly will receive more favourable consideration from him on account of its modesty.

Mr. CLEAVER: We have had a good deal of discussion in regard to subsection 2, and I think some of us feel that this subsection may not be interpreted by the commission as generously as the minister has indicated to-night it should be. Would the minister care to consider the feasibility of defining the word "work," somewhat in this way: "The word "work" referred to in this subsection shall not be intended to mean sheltered positions." My reason for that suggestion is that the commission, if they wanted to construe the section strictly, would not be able to trump up the old well-remembered example of the elevator operator, a job which is not available. Would the minister consider defining the word "work"?

Mr. POWER: I shall give it consideration.

Section stands.

On section 4—Certain deductions not to be made.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain this section?

Mr. POWER: Heretofore in arriving at the allowance payable to a veteran, and having in mind the maximum income of $365 and $730 per annum respectively to single and married men, the board has taken into consideration income from all sources except that exempt under the War Veterans' Allowance Act. It is now proposed to exempt pensions or grants which accompany the awards of the Victoria Cross, the Military Cross or the Distinguished Conduct Medal. The government is of the opinion that these grants should not be taken into consideration. These grants are sixpence per day to a holder of the Victoria Cross, plus £10 per annum if he is a pensioner, the total of which would not exceed $100 per annum. In the case of the Distinguished Conduct Medal the grant is sixpence per day if he is a pensioner, or around $45 per annum, but nothing if he is not a pensioner. The grant accompanying the Military Cross is the same as that accompanying the Distinguished Conduct Medal itself, but this grant is available only from the rank of captain to that of warrant officer. The grants are payable only in case of necessity.

Mr. BENNETT: They follow as a matter of course if there is a pension.

Mr. POWER: There are certain regulations, and it is only in case of necessity.

Mr. BENNETT: First, there must be a pension.

Mr. POWER: Certainly in the case of the Military Cross it must be a case of necessity, and, I think of the Distinguished Conduct Medal also, but not the Victoria Cross.

Mr. GREEN: Are those grants paid by the government of the United Kingdom?

Mr. POWER: Yes; we have nothing to do with it.

Mr. McNIVEN (Regina): The minister has frequently emphasized during the course of the debate that this is not an unemployment relief measure. I am anxious to know whether there will be any other bill before the house or anything in the estimates in which unemployed returned soldiers will be under consideration. I have in mind a resolution passed by the conference of mayors held in this city on March 16, at which it was resolved that the dominion government be asked to assume immediate full responsibility for administration and financing of public assistance, including medical and hospital service, to ex-service men and their dependents, such assistance to be on at least as high a scale as municipal relief.

On June 1, 1937, at Saskatoon the urban municipalities association for the province of Saskatchewan at their annual meeting passed a resolution in similar terms; a conference which is now in progress had a similar matter under consideration and, I believe, arrived at a similar conclusion. The matter is very urgent—

Mr. POWER: I do not like to interrupt, but I do not think this has any connection with this bill, and I am in hopes that I may be able to go into supply later in the evening and probably be able to reach an item in the estimates under the title of unemployment assistance. It would be appropriate if the hon. member would make his observations on that item.

Mr. McNIVEN (Regina): Thank you very much.

PENITENTIARY ACT AMENDMENT

COMPUTATION OF TIME SERVED BY CONVICTED PRISONERS PENDING APPEAL

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 36, to amend the Penitentiary Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This bill has only one clause and it is very simple. It reads:

1. Subsection four of section forty-four of the Penitentiary Act, chapter one hundred and fifty-four of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, as enacted by section nine, chapter twenty-seven of the statutes of 1932-33, is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(4) Subject to the provisions of subsection two of section one thousand and nineteen of the criminal code, any period during which a convict is detained in the gaol or other place of confinement pursuant to the authority of this section shall not be computed as time served in the execution of his sentence, unless he be so detained pending an appeal by the attorney general or counsel for the crown."

While section 1019 of the criminal code states that this is subject to any direction the court of appeal may make to the contrary, the amendment is merely to add to the section in the Penitentiary Act the words, "subject to the provisions of subsection 2 of section 1019 of the criminal code." The intention is to harmonize the two.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps this affords me an opportunity to make one observation I should like the minister to consider. Some months ago there was a criminal trial in the county of Renfrew. Upon an appeal being taken, the court ordered a new trial in any event, and the execution that had been ordered was of course vacated. But no judgment has been given on the question as to whether or not the case should not be discharged on the ground that there, in any event, was no evidence to go to a jury. This matter is causing a good deal of comment, because it has been long delayed.

I do not know that the minister can do anything, but I suggest that in a case of this kind it might be desirable to do something to expedite the delivery of judgment. This is now the month of March, and it is a long time since the trial took place. I venture to mention this now because this bill may be the only vehicle which would enable me to do so. I had intended to do it at some other time, but perhaps the minister would go into the matter to see if something can be done to have judgment given without further delay.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I shall look into the case.

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT

HUSBAND OR WIFE COMPETENT WITNESSES IN CERTAIN PROSECUTIONS—SUBMISSION OF CERTAIN PROOF OF AFFIDAVIT

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 37, to amend the Canada Evidence Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

On section 1—Wife or husband competent and compellable witnesses for prosecution.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is to add to the exceptions under section 4 of the Canada Evidence Act one whereby the wife or husband may be a competent and compellable witness, one against the other, when one is charged for the theft of property belonging to the other.

[Mr. Ernest Lapointe.]

Mr. STEWART: While they are living apart.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, when they are living apart. This has been recommended by some magistrates, and more particularly by the late commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Already there are eight cases excepted from the general rule, and this will be another one. For instance, witnesses may be compellable one against the other in cases of seduction, vagrancy, the abandonment of a child, and so on. I believe this is a proper change to make.

Mr. BENNETT: It really extends the exceptions to the general rule that the husband and wife are one, and permits either to be called against the other where one has stolen from the other while they have been living apart.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is correct.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that is desirable.

Mr. BETTS: Are the husband and wife competent and compellable witnesses under these circumstances by the law in England?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I do not know. Under our own law they are competent and compellable when one or the other is charged with an infamous offence, such as seduction, vagrancy, neglect to provide the necessaries of life, the abandonment of a child under two years, unlawful carnal knowledge, rape, bigamy and abduction. I do not know whether under the English law this provision appears.

Mr. BENNETT: I think so, although I am only speaking subject to correction. I believe there was not long since a case in which an action was brought by a wife against her husband for stealing from her while they were living apart. She gave evidence. However, my memory may be at fault in this connection.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Reception in evidence.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This suggestion has been made more particularly by Mr. J. W. McFadden, K.C., crown attorney in Toronto, who wrote me as follows:

Section 29 of the evidence act should be redrafted. Our courts are flooded with prosecutions of cases where bad cheques are given. Some of these cheques are given on banks ranging from Halifax to Vancouver. Most of these cheques are for small amounts. We cannot go to the cost of bringing a banker but by section 29 we are able to prove the statement of the man's account by affidavit. The section, however, is deficient in that it only provides for cases where the man has got some account in the bank. Where, however, cheques have been given and there is no account at all there is no provision made and the consequence is that we cannot think of launching a prosecution.

I have taken this matter up with Mr. Rogers, secretary of the bankers' association, and he is quite alive to the necessity of some amendment. Some time ago I drafted an affidavit for use in the courts. This has been a real boon to bankers in that they are not wasting three or four mornings in court and incidentally it has saved the city several hundreds of dollars in money. Where, however, there is no account we still have to subpoena these bankers.

This is to make the law apply when there is nothing in the books showing an account, in the event of a charge being laid. Under the law as it is, if there is a charge in the books it can be proved by affidavit, but when there is nothing we have had to bring witnesses to court.

Mr. BENNETT: It is only prima facie, in any event.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. PELLETIER: It is not intended to apply to cases where there are not sufficient funds.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is correct.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PERMANENT MILITARY AND AIR FORCE SERVICE TO BE INCLUDED FOR PENSION PURPOSES

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act to provide that time served in the permanent naval, military and air forces of Canada may be included in the term of service of an officer or a constable for pension purposes; and to restrict the application of the act in respect to members of the reserve.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There are two main amendments in the bill which will be introduced. As the law now stands, it provides that the time served in the permanent forces of Canada may be included in the term of service of an officer for the purposes of pension under this part. This amendment inserts the words, "naval, military or air" in the expression, "permanent forces of Canada." It has not been clear under existing statutory definitions that the expression "permanent forces of Canada" included the naval and air forces as well as the military. It has always been the intention to include this service.

The other amendment has to do with reservists of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. BENNETT: They were provided for last year.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We enacted the following clause:

Every member of such reserve on being called up for duty or training will be subject to this act, and all rules and regulations made thereunder from the date of his being called up, which date shall be the day on which he is advised by registered letter to report himself for duty.

We desire to restrict the application of this section. For instance, it is not desired that a reservist should be entitled to all the benefits of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act such as pensions, etc., unless he is injured or killed on duty. Under the section enacted last year the reservists were entitled to all the privileges of the permanent police force, and this is to restrict the application of the section to when they are injured or killed on duty.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 40, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, what are the rules with respect to going into supply when there is an amendment pending. I just forget the practice.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is suspended until Monday.

Mr. BENNETT: Does it require a motion?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The rule has been changed to meet such a case as this.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought we made a motion to suspend. Has the rule been amended to the extent that we can go into supply without a motion being made with respect to suspension?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: My understanding of the rules is that a motion is necessary for Mr. Speaker to leave the chair on Mondays or Tuesdays, but such a motion is not necessary on Thursdays. This being Thursday, I should think that the amendment moved on March 8 would not be considered to-day.

Mr. NEILL: On the point of order. This same thing happened some years ago, and the Prime Minister moved a motion to the effect that the procedure on Thursday or Friday, as the case may be, would be the same as on Monday or Tuesday. I remember his moving a motion to that effect in order that the debate could be continued.

Mr. DUNNING: When the debate was adjourned on the first occasion, I inquired into the matter in order that our proceedings might be regularized. I found it was quite competent to leave the adjournment of the debate on the order paper until a day upon which it could be resumed, without affecting in any way the right of the house to continue in committee of supply on those days of the week upon which under the rules Mr. Speaker might leave the chair without question put.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought some motion was necessary.

Mr. DUNNING: Under the old rule, yes, but under the amended rule, no. However, we can check that up. I would point out that the committee has acted already in accordance with that understanding. This is not the first occasion on which the debate has stood over.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not want to delay the proceedings in any sense; I just wanted to be certain about the practice. I can remember some difficulty arising on one occasion. I was not in the chamber the other evening when the matter came up or I would have mentioned it then. I am still uncertain about it. Obviously Mr. Speaker cannot leave the chair without a motion being put with an amendment pending.

Mr. DUNNING: The debate will continue on the amendment.

Mr. BENNETT: There should be some form to regularize it.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Standing order 28 reads:

On Thursdays and Fridays when the order of the day is called for the house to go into committee of supply, or of ways and means, Mr. Speaker shall leave the chair without putting any question provided that, except by the unanimous consent of the house, the estimates of each department shall be first taken up on a day other than Thursday or Friday.

Mr. BENNETT: That does not cover this at all.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: This is Thursday, and the Speaker leaves the chair without question put.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But not when an amendment is before the chair. I submit that that rule applies only on the initiation, and not to-day.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: We are going into supply without the need of a motion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Not when there has been an amendment to a motion for going into supply.

Mr. BENNETT: Beauchesne deals with the the question in citation 233.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was just going to read that citation:

The adjournment of debate on an amendment to the motion for the Speaker's leaving the chair may create an exceptional result, owing to the direction contained in standing order 28 that on Thursdays and Fridays when the order of the day is called for the house to go into committee of supply or of ways and means, Mr. Speaker shall leave the chair without putting any question, provided that, except with the consent of the house, the estimates of each department shall be first taken on a day other than Thursday or Friday. If an adjourned debate on such an amendment is standing upon the order paper when supply, for consideration of which in committee it is not necessary to propose the question for the Speaker's leaving the chair, is to be taken, the order of the day for resuming the adjourned debate is removed, and procedure on the amendment lapses, in order that the Speaker in obedience to standing order 28 may leave the chair without question put. See May, p. 476. Such a situation may arise at the end of the session when all the estimates have first been taken up on a day other than Thursday or Friday.

It simply means that the motion is suspended until we reach the day when we move to go into supply. Then we cannot go into supply until this motion is disposed of. It will appear on the order paper on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday of next week, and it will be impossible for the government to proceed with supply on any of these three days until it has disposed of the motion.

Mr. BENNETT: The difficulty arises from the use of the word "lapse." It will be observed that Doctor Beauchesne's citation says:

—it is not necessary to propose the question for the Speaker's leaving the chair, is to be taken, the order of the day for resuming the adjourned debate is removed, and procedure on the amendment lapses.

It was that which induced me, thinking it over this morning, to raise the question, and I did not have time to-day to look up the rules. I had intended to speak of the matter earlier in the day. If procedure on the amendment lapses, I think a motion is necessary to the effect that it shall not lapse, or something tantamount to that, because if the procedure on the amendment lapses the situation which the editor of this volume indicates might happen has happened.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is only when all departments have been in supply that any difficulty will arise, because the government would then be free to take supply only on Thursday and Friday. But if there remained one department to go into supply, that department could not be proceeded with until any amendment to the motion for supply had been disposed of. Only when all departments are in supply would a motion be necessary to prevent any amendment of the sort from lapsing.

Mr. BENNETT: As long as we understand the situation, it does not make any difference. It might be that the question would be raised, and I thought it was desirable to anticipate it.

Mr. PELLETIER: Would it be possible for the government to go into supply on Thursdays and Fridays only and in that way evade resuming the debate on the amendment?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We cannot take on Thursdays and Fridays the estimates of any department which has not previously been called on a Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday. It is only towards the end of the session when we might reach a time when all departments would have been already in supply and then the situation my hon. friend suggests might happen. But if we took supply only on Thursdays and Fridays, we would want something else to do on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday.

Mr. PELLETIER: I just wanted an explanation.

Pensions branch—War veterans' allowances, $4,500,000.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain how this vote is divided between the three classes of recipients, those over sixty, the permanently unemployable, and those incapable of maintaining themselves?

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health): While I have not the exact figures, there would be approximately two-thirds over sixty and one-third under sixty.

Mr. GREEN: Does the one-third include the class incapable of maintaining themselves?

Mr. POWER: Yes, that class amounted to about 1,100, and it is now about 1,200 since the amendments of 1936 came into effect.

Mr. BETTS: Will the additional $300,000 take care of the new classes eligible under the amendments we have been discussing to-night?

Mr. POWER: Certainly not. I have hopes of being able to obtain a supplementary vote of something approaching $1,250,000 to $1,500,000. It is estimated that the total expenditure involved under the act we have been discussing to-night is about $2,000,000, but in view of the fact that all the applicants will not come in at the same time or all during the one year, about $1,250,000 to $1,500,000 will be sufficient this year.

Mr. McNIVEN (Regina): What is the amount paid out in each province and the number of recipients in each province?

Mr. POWER: That will be found at page 83 of the annual report. It is as follows: Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, number of veterans 629; New Brunswick, 295; Quebec, 1,076; Ontario, 3,997; Manitoba, 1,104; Saskatchewan, 572; Alberta, 870 and British Columbia, 2,763. Those are the figures as of March 31, 1937. There are a great many more since then.

Mr. McNIVEN (Regina): Does the report also show the amount paid in each province?

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. BETTS: In estimating the additional amount required the minister spoke of asking for $1,250,000.

Mr. POWER: Approximately.

Mr. BETTS: Can the minister tell us whether the effect of the new section 4 he is proposing in the War Veterans' Allowance Act will be to enable the board to grant an allowance to any man who, in the opinion of the board, is incapable of maintaining himself because of disability, pre-ageing or general unfitness? Does the minister think the proposed wording of section 4 of the act will give the board the same power to grant allowances as they would have had under the old act with the fifty-five year dead-line removed?

Mr. POWER: More power.

Mr. GREEN: Are expenditures in line with the estimates that were made some years ago of the cost of the war veterans' allowance?

Mr. POWER: Very closely. I cannot guarantee anything regarding the bill which we have been discussing after the amendments proposed this year have been passed.

Item agreed to.

War veterans' allowance board, $86,595.

Mr. MacNEIL: Would it be possible to carry out a very simple suggestion? A number of men apply for disability pensions and their claim is rejected. They feel then that they are through with all applications for consideration by the federal government. Would it not be possible in cases where it is apparent that, even though the claim for disability pension is rejected, the applicants might be considered for war veterans' allowance, the file would automatically pass to the war veterans' allowance board and be considered by it? In a number of instances men have written to me with regard, for example, to disability pensions. It appears to me that they are eligible for war veterans' allowance. I take the matter up and find possibly that their cases have been overlooked for a considerable period by reason of a lack of correlation of activities between the two departments.

Mr. POWER: As a matter of fact there is the very closest collaboration. For instance, in my own office, where, as my hon. friend can guess, I receive a very large number of letters dealing with pensions and war veterans' allowances, when I find that for some reason or another the man who has written cannot be awarded a pension, I turn the letter over to the war veterans' allowance board. I know that is being done in the district, and I hope it will be done in an increasing degree in the future.

Mr. MacNEIL: May I also refer to the section of the act dealing with separation, where the wife and husband are not residing together. On what grounds is that separation considered? If, for instance, they are separated because of circumstances over which they have no control, for example, because of some temporary inconvenience, probably some difficulty in securing a house for which arrangements have been made upon removal from one point to another, is that considered to be "separation" within the meaning of the act?

Mr. POWER: The board has the right of discrimination, and I am told that there has not been very much difficulty about the matter. There have been cases, where a separation is of a more permanent nature than my hon. friend mentions, where perhaps some trouble has arisen, but generally speaking there has been no trouble.

Mr. MacNEIL: I am anxious to have the point cleared up. It is a matter of interpretation. I have had every consideration from the board. But I have in mind the concrete case of a man who removed from Regina to Vancouver. He intended to arrange for his wife to follow him; but it was impossible to complete arrangements for the house he had intended to secure, and through no fault of his own his wife remained for six months in Regina while he was in Vancouver. An inspector reported the facts and circumstances; it was decided that the couple had been separated for that period, and steps were taken to recover overpayments made during the period of separation. I should like to have some assurance if possible as to whether that interpretation will be continued in respect of separation under such circumstances, through no fault of the parties themselves, they not residing together although the husband continues to support his wife.

Mr. POWER: I understand the matter was adjusted when all the facts were brought to the attention of the board. Even though I gave my hon. friend an interpretation of what I thought this act meant, after the amendments which I propose to-night to give the board full discretion and authority to deal with all applications my interpretation would not be worth very much.

Mr. BROOKS: Has the department any arrangement with representatives of the soldier settlement board for collecting information in the different districts, and if so, what are those arrangements?

Mr. POWER: They do all the investigation in rural districts.

Mr. BROOKS: What compensation, if any, do they receive?

Mr. POWER: None. Do not press that matter; the minister of Mines and Resources might ask to get some. They do not get any from us.

Mr. BROOKS: Do headquarters check up on information from the representatives of the soldier settlement board, or do they take their information as final?

Mr. POWER: Which headquarters?

Mr. BROOKS: Headquarters at Ottawa of the war veterans' allowance board.

Mr. POWER: We send there to get the information. We have no facilities available; we have no employees in those districts. It would be impossible for us to have employees in all the rural districts of the country: so the investigations are made at our request by the soldier settlement board.

Mr. BROOKS: And the information they send the department is regarded as final, I assume?

Mr. POWER: Not necessarily. There is an inquiry, such as any other inquiry might be, and there is information.

Mr. BETTS: I notice that the grant for temporary assistance is about three times as great as last year. What is the explanation of that?

Mr. POWER: I suppose it can be explained by the ruling that twenty per cent of the staff of this board, like twenty per cent of the staff of every department, must be temporary. Only eighty per cent are allowed to be permanent. All these people, of course, are appointed by the civil service commission.

Mr. LENNARD: Would the minister refresh my memory as to just what is covered by "sundries"?

Mr. POWER: I shall get the information for the hon. member. It is really a contingent reserve of $1,500 to cover all unforeseen expenditure in connection with the board. There is $100 miscellaneous.

Mr. LENNARD: Would that apply to replacement of office fixtures or, for instance, slightly used carpets?

Mr. POWER: That comes under equipment and maintenance, which is $300.

Mr. GREEN: What facilities have the board for having applicants examined medically, or for giving treatment to recipients of an allowance?

Mr. POWER: Departmental facilities.

Mr. GREEN: Can the board ask to have a recipient given treatment at one of the military hospitals?

Mr. POWER: The act does not provide for treatment privileges anywhere. Of course, if the man is a pensioner, he is entitled to the same kind of treatment as any other person.

Mr. GREEN: Would it not be possible to have some extension of treatment facilities for war veterans' allowance recipients?

Mr. POWER: I prefer to take that up when we come to the discussion of treatment. I should not like to introduce any legislation to that effect.

Item agreed to.

Veterans Bureau, $194,435.

Mr. MacNEIL: What is the reason for the reduction?

Mr. POWER: The work is decreasing, and there is a decrease in staff. The decrease in staff and salaries amounts to $14,200.

Mr. ESLING: Originally there were three soldiers' advocates on the mainland in British Columbia. One resigned. We always hoped that there would be one permanently located in the eastern portion of the province. He was appointed from that district and had given much of his time as secretary of a branch of the legion, having appeared on behalf of ex-service men before various bodies that came along. Then, when the resignation of the advocate in Kamloops took place, and with the vast number of cases at Vancouver, his time has been so fully occupied in assisting in the Vancouver office that he is seldom able to go to the interior. In other words, when there is a sitting of a quorum he hurries in two or three days ahead of time, and it is absolutely impossible for him to prepare the cases of men in the interior. He goes to a central point and endeavours to reach those men. Perhaps he has to cover cases within a radius of 100 miles. It is an impossibility, and the various legions feel that the interior applicants are suffering an injustice by reason of not having a proper presentation of their cases. I brought the matter up at the last session, and we thought the minister was sympathetic to the suggestion, but thus far nothing has been done. The minister can readily appreciate the fact that with four-fifths of the ex-service men located at the coast, in Vancouver and adjacent cities, the time of both advocates in Vancouver is so fully occupied that it is impossible for proper service to be given to the applicants in the interior. Will the minister be kind enough to give the matter further sympathetic and favourable consideration for the benefit of applicants all the way from the Okanagan to the Alberta border, who are without representation?

Mr. POWER: I have every sympathy for the request made by my hon. friend. I know no man in this house has taken more interest in the veterans generally than he has, and I know he wants to see something done particularly for those in the interior. Since he last brought the matter to our attention we have given it considerable study and we find that we are up to date in the work in British Columbia. A quorum has been in session at Vancouver and Victoria for several months and is just now about to proceed to points in the interior. This quorum will hold a session at Kamloops on April 6, after which it will visit Revelstoke, Vernon, Nelson and Cranbrook. Some fifteen entitlement applications will be heard at these points together with a few miscellaneous cases. On completion of these sittings, the only entitlement cases awaiting quorum hearing in the interior of British Columbia will be one at Prince George and two at Prince Rupert.

The work in hand in British Columbia does not warrant the appointment of an additional advocate. We already have Mr. Walter Drinnan and Mr. D. F. Markland at Vancouver and Mr. G. H. Sedger at Victoria. We formerly had four advocates in British Columbia, Mr. E. S. Keeling having been on the staff at Vancouver. This advocate, however, resigned some little time ago and has not been replaced because the work in hand did not warrant his replacement. Mr. Markland, who formerly lived at Fernie, has been specially detailed to look after the work at interior points. He is in the interior at the present time interviewing applicants and witnesses and otherwise making arrangements for the quorum sittings mentioned above. We have constantly sent Mr. Markland on trips through the interior to interview applicants, to give information and generally to render any service he can. His visits are always organized in advance; the officials of veterans' organizations at each point are notified of proposed visits; lists of applicants who want to interview the advocate are compiled, and the advocate takes with him a summary of the record. In this way, I think the requirements of the applicants in the interior of British Columbia have been given effective attention.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister said there were fifteen cases; does he mean fifteen at each of these places?

Mr. POWER: Fifteen all told.

Mr. STIRLING: Mr. Markland's headquarters are at Kamloops?

Mr. POWER: No. Vancouver. He is working around the interior now.

[Mr. Esling.]

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Are the services of the advocates available to those imperials who do not come under the Pension Act? If the imperials could be helped in some way to obtain the pensions they seek from the British government, this would be of great service to them.

Mr. POWER: I do not know that the advocates would be recognized by the British ministry. We recognize them so far as our department is concerned, but we have made no arrangement for their recognition by the British government.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The plight of the imperial veterans is a sorry one, and if the services of the advocates were available to them this might be of great assistance and a good deal of suffering might be avoided. Could something not be done to have the services of the advocates made available to the imperials who are not looked after at the present time?

Mr. BROOKS: A few minutes ago the minister gave the figures of those receiving the war veterans' allowance in the different military districts. I was struck at the time by the great discrepancy in number between my own province of New Brunswick and British Columbia. There is a difference in population between New Brunswick and British Columbia of about two to one, but we have 295 and British Columbia has 2,763. This seems to be a very great difference between the two, and I should like to have an explanation.

Mr. POWER: Perhaps some British Columbia member would be only too glad to describe the charms of that province.

Mr. GREEN: The veterans know a good province when they see it.

Mr. POWER: About twenty-five per cent of the war veterans' allowance men live in British Columbia at the present time. I can only say that they drift to that province.

Mr. NEILL: And there is no more land west of British Columbia.

Mr. BROOKS: Twenty-five per cent of all those receiving the allowance are in British Columbia?

Mr. POWER: Yes. We are not surprised that some of the British Columbia members are vocal.

Mr. BETTS: Where are these pensions advocates of various grades employed? For instance, where is the pensions advocate grade V, and eight of them of grade IV:

Mr. POWER: The chief pensions advocate is employed in Ottawa. The grade V advocate would be employed in Toronto, that would be Mr. Harry Bray. I have the information here by districts, if that would serve.

Mr. BETTS: Yes; that would serve my purpose.

Mr. POWER: At headquarters there are three of grade IV and one of grade III.

In "A" district, that is the province of Quebec, there is one grade III and one part time.

In "B" district, Nova Scotia, there are three part time.

In "C" district, eastern Ontario, there is one grade IV.

In "D" district, central Ontario, there is one grade V, one grade III and one part time.

In "F" district, London, the position is vacant at present. No permanent appointment has been made since the vacancy was created by the retirement of Colonel Shannon about a year ago.

In "G" district, there is one grade IV, one grade III and another part time, who is in the branch at Port Arthur.

In Saskatchewan there is one grade IV who is retiring at the end of this month, one grade I and one part time.

In Alberta there is one grade II and one part time.

In British Columbia there is one grade IV, one grade I and one part time.

In New Brunswick there is one grade II.

Mr. LENNARD: Under what grade does the pensions advocate at Hamilton come?

Mr. POWER: That is Mr. Flett, is it not? He is part time.

Mr. BETTS: When is it proposed to fill the vacancy left by Colonel Shannon's retirement, and what grade is it?

Mr. POWER: I cannot say at the moment. It depends on what work there is.

Mr. BETTS: Who is doing the work at London now?

Mr. POWER: I cannot remember his name, but the work is being done very efficiently, I believe, by a man who was a clerk.

Mr. BETTS: Potter is his name. How is he rated?

Mr. POWER: I think he is a clerk, and may be advanced to a higher grade. Recently there has been some consideration regarding promotion or some advancement.

Mr. BETTS: Before this item is carried could the miinster give me exact information on that point?

Mr. POWER: I cannot do so offhand, because whatever happened happened within the last month or two and my book is made up only to January 1. I am under the impression that some recognition has been made of the efficient service which he has been giving, but I would not like to commit myself definitely.

Mr. BETTS: Would the minister allow this item to stand until that information is available?

Mr. POWER: I think that request is hardly reasonable on the part of my hon. friend. I shall be only too glad to give him all the information he wants, but does he think that the item should stand on account of one employee?

Mr. BETTS: If the minister will undertake to give the information before his estimates are closed.

Mr. POWER: Certainly.

Mr. McNIVEN: The minister said that the pensions advocate in Regina is retiring. Does he contemplate filling that position?

Mr. POWER: No.

Mr. McNIVEN: Why not?

Mr. POWER: One pensions advocate in Saskatchewan, Mr. Adams, has been here for the past year, because there is not enough work for him there and there is some work here. At present that work is wound up and it is not necessary to replace him.

Mr. PERLEY: Will this be permanent or temporary?

Mr. POWER: This will be permanent.

Item agreed to.

Unemployment assistance, $2,350,000.

Mr. POWER: It is under this item that I am prepared to discuss anything connected with unemployment of ex-service men, and incidentally discuss the veterans' assistance commission report, the so-called Rattray report. I understand some of my hon. friends would like me to make some statement with respect to the attitude which we intend to adopt in connection with the report. I do not want to lead the committee into error. Properly speaking, as is known to most hon. members, the unemployment assistance provided under this vote really applies only to pensioners, but in order to have an appropriate item under which to discuss the case of non-pensioners who are unemployed I have suggested to certain hon. members that that discussion take place on this item.

The veterans' assistance commission was set up in July, 1936. It operated until January 6, 1938. It toured the whole country and obtained all available information with respect to unemployment and kindred matters as relating to ex-service men. A report was filed with the department, which has been printed in blue-book form and has been tabled and placed in the hands of all hon. members.

The commission in that report made a number of recommendations. I propose to deal with them one by one. The first recommendation, found on page 65, deals with workshops. It recommends:

Workshops

Whilst it is agreed that the operation of workshops can be considered only as in its experimental stages and whilst appreciating the fact that owing to local conditions it might not be possible to establish workshops in all the important cities in Canada, yet the commission believes that it is justified in recommending:

That favourable consideration be given to any applications for assistance that might be received from the management of any workshop now in existence, or under consideration, providing that it can be shown that the workshop is justifying its existence in the community and that the continued employment of veterans in the workshop is necessary and the objective of revolving labour is being carried out.

This recommendation has been implemented as provision has been made in the estimates for the continuation of the workshops which were commenced by the veterans' assistance commission in Montreal and Regina; also for limited assistance, if necessary, to the workshop project in operation at Moose Jaw.

Montreal

The Montreal workshop was started in January, 1937, and the grants to date to finance its operations amount to $55,000. Eighty men are at present on the pay roll, and 329 men have graduated, through the workshop, to permanent employment in other organizations. This is the valuable feature and the primary objective of the workshop.

An employment division is operated in connection with the workshop and the honorary local committee, with the following results:

Total placements to February 28, 1938
Permanent	300
Semi-permanent	234
Casual	436
Probational training	86
	1,056

Regina

A grant of $10,000 was made to assist in the development of a workshop at Regina. This was established on the 1st September, 1937, and operating quite successfully, the principal development being the salvaging of building materials. At the present time, a contract is in hand with the city for the demolition of a three-storey hotel building, and the erection of a one-storey store at a contract price of $1,480.

Moose Jaw

A grant of $1,000 was made to a board of trustees at Moose Jaw for the purpose of assisting the operations of a workshop, which has been going for two or three years.

The next recommendation was with respect to probational training:

Probational Training

Recommended that an application be made so as to permit the continuance of the probational training scheme beyond the end of the present fiscal year;

And that the Minister of Pensions and National Health be given discretion:

(a) In the matter of granting training to the younger type of veteran, even if a prospective employer is not in sight, providing that the honorary local committee and the department are satisfied that such training will more readily fit him for suitable employment.

(b) That discretion also be given to the Minister of Pensions and National Health whereby he may authorize the payment of tuition fees for any veteran, otherwise qualified, who may require a short period of coaching, or training, for the employment he seeks, providing that the applicant is willing to study in his own time and without any other expense to the government.

This recommendation of the commission has been implemented as provision has been made in the estimates of the department for the amount considered necessary to allow of the continuation of probational training for the next fiscal year.

Regarding the added recommendations (a) and (b), it is considered that the enabling authority P.C. 1004, dated the 5th May, 1937, allows the department to carry out these recommendations of the commission in special cases.

The recommendations with respect to tools, equipment, transportation and repayment fund comes next:

Tools, Equipment, Transportation, Repayment Fund

That as long as the honorary local committees remain in active operation, a sum of money be placed at their disposal through the local units of the Department of Pensions and National Health, this to provide for:

(a) Supply of tools, equipment and transportation to unemployed veterans qualified to follow some recognized trade such as carpenter, mason, plasterer, tinsmith, plumber, et cetera.

(b) Where transportation only is required it is recommended that this be supplied to unemployed veterans proceeding to definite employment in any occupation.

This recommendation has been implemented as provision is being made for the continuation of this assistance, although it has only been taken advantage of to a very limited extent.

With respect to the Canadian corps of commissionaires:

Canadian Corps of Commissionaires

As it is very unlikely that organization of the Canadian corps of commissionaires can be satisfactorily completed throughout Canada by March 31, 1938,

It is recommended:

That favourable consideration be given to the matter of financing the corps' national headquarters' activities beyond the end of the present fiscal year.

This recommendation has been implemented, and limited assistance will be given to the headquarters organization of the corps for next fiscal year, for the reason that it is considered that the success of this scheme depends to a very great extent on its becoming self-supporting.

The next recommendation was with respect to a survey of departments of federal government in connection with employment of veterans:

Survey of Departments of Federal Government in connection with employment of veterans

The commission reaffirms the recommendation contained in its interim report covering a survey of government departments in connection with the employment of ex-service men:

That each department of the federal government be requested to make a complete survey at Ottawa and all branches in the provinces of:

(a) The possibility of absorbing a further number of veterans into government service;

(b) All positions under the jurisdiction of the civil service commission;

(c) All positions that are exempt from the procedure of the civil service commission;

(d) The survey to include harbours, canals, et cetera;

(e) The departments to supply information in the form of a report stating percentage of veterans employed in positions exempt from the provisions of the civil service commission;

That employment upon the projects conducted under the Department of National Defence should be reserved to veterans of the great war and members of the Canadian militia forces, with a preference given to the former;

That in order to promote the employment of a large number of veterans by contractors doing business with the federal government, such contractors be required to supply information as to the percentage of veterans employed, when tendering for government supplies of any kind whatsoever;

That all things being equal, the contractor who employs the largest proportion of ex-service men should have preference in the awarding of the contract;

That in order to set an example to private business firms, the government agree not to dismiss any ex-service men, except for misdemeanour, inability to perform duties in a satisfactory manner, or upon reaching the age limit for retirement.

I am afraid I am not quite clear as to what that recommendation meant. In so far as positions which come under the Civil Service Act are concerned, veterans already have a preference. I do not know what inquiry could be made to ascertain what further preference could be obtained. In any event the committee of this house now dealing with the civil service commission, if it so desired, could make an inquiry into that matter.

With respect to small holdings the commission recommends:

Small Holdings

The commission would not recommend that any more unemployed, either pensioners or non-pensioners, be placed on small holdings until sufficient time has passed to determine whether projects of this kind have a reasonable chance of being successful by making unemployed veterans self-supporting.

If these projects prove successful, and it is decided to increase the numbers,
The commission recommends:

That these be settled under the same control, conditions, supervision, and selection as those with which an experiment is now being made.

The following settlement schemes which are initiated under the direction of the commission are actively under way:

Toronto

Amount granted: $48,000.

This was intended to provide for the placement of 20 veterans and their families on small holdings. Fourteen veterans have been settled so far, and the committee are now investigating and arranging for the purchase of the balance of six holdings.

Windsor

Amount granted: $37,400.

The amount is intended to provide for the settlement of twenty families, and a section of land amounting to approximately 125 acres. Six families have already been settled, and it is expected that the full quota of twenty will be on the property by the 15th April, 1938.

Winnipeg

Amount granted: $16,000.

The Winnipeg committee have settled twelve veteran families, representing fifty-three individuals, on separate holdings. These vary from three to forty acres, and are situated from five to twenty-seven miles from the centre of Winnipeg.

[Mr. Power.]

The next heading is "employment of older type of veteran with dominion, provincial, municipal governments, also private business firms:"

Employment of Older Type of Veteran With Dominion Provincial, Municipal Governments, Also Private Business Firms

That the dominion and provincial governments, cities, municipalities and business firms, who operate superannuation and pension schemes for their employees, be urged to give sympathetic consideration to the employment of the older type of veteran who may have the requisite qualifications for certain positions less suitable for the younger men and yet who cannot fulfil the age qualification; these men to be accepted for employment on the understanding that they will sign a "waiver" of all claim to pension or superannuation on retirement or discharge.

As already indicated in this report, if men, who saw service in a theatre of actual war and who were domiciled in Canada at time of enlistment for service in the great war, should be accepted for these positions. they may on retirement or discharge, providing they are otherwise qualified, be granted war veterans' allowance.

That I take to be a more or less general recommendation, and I do not know just what specific implementation would be called for.

In connection with the employment of veterans on dominion-provincial projects it is recommended:

Employment of Veterans on Dominion-Provincial Projects

It is recommended:

That provision be made in all agreements, covering projects to which the dominion government contributes part of the cost, for the employment of a reasonable quota of veterans, irrespective of whether they have been in receipt of relief during the first three months of the year or not.

It is further recommended:

That veterans in receipt of small disability pensions and relief assistance from the Department of Pensions and National Health be not debarred from employment on these projects.

That provision be made in all agreements, covering projects to which the dominion government contributes part of the cost, for the employment of a reasonable quota of veterans, irrespective of whether they have been in receipt of relief during the first three months of the year or not.

That is being studied; I cannot just say how it would be worked out.

Mr. BROOKS: Is there provision now for a certain percentage to be taken on contract work?

Mr. POWER: Dominion-provincial arrangement?

Mr. BROOKS: Yes.

Mr. POWER: I do not think so.

Mr. BROOKS: I understood there was.

Mr. POWER: No, I do not think so, but I shall look it up. There is a provision, of course, that no man shall be barred from employment on account of political affiliations, race or creed. But I do not know that in connection with dominion-provincial projects there is any special preference or quota for veterans.

Collection of Radio Licences

That the sale and collection of radio licences be assigned to veterans and that post offices, stores and others cease to handle the sale of these licences wherever it is possible to secure the services of ex-service men for this purpose.

In connection with the collection of radio licences I have made certain representations to the Minister of Transport. The subject is receiving consideration by his department. I should like to deal with it at a later date, because it requires further explanation. Briefly I would say this, as I have already said to various veteran organizations, that the best way for them to obtain their preference is to go together as veterans and put up some kind of proposition to the Minister of Transport whereby they would undertake the collection of all radio licences in Canada. I would have the combined veteran organizations lay before the Minister of Transport some specific plan. That would be in the interests of the soldiers and of the government, because the government would have only one person to deal with in connection with all radio licences. That suggestion has been made to the soldiers, and those to whom I mentioned it thought it was well worthy of consideration. So far, however, no specific action has been taken in the matter by any of the veterans' organizations.

With respect to the civil service preference to non-pensioners:

Civil Service Preference to Non-Pensioners

That veterans of the great war not in receipt of pension, but who are otherwise qualified and who served in His Majesty's forces, providing they saw service in a theatre of actual war, be given preference for positions in the civil service of Canada on an equal basis with pensioners when granted marks in the civil service examinations.

This recommendation will do away with the special preference granted to pensioners under the Civil Service Act, as it at present exists. I have referred this recommendation to the Secretary of State, in order that he might pass it on to the committee dealing with the civil service. I imagine it has already reached them.

In connection with superannuation or pension of federal civil servants and service in the great war, the commission recommends:

Superannuation or pension of federal civil servants and service in the great war

The commission recommends:

That the Civil Service Superannuation Act, being chapter 24 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, should be so amended as to provide that the time spent on active service by members of the civil service of Canada, who saw service in the armed forces of the country during the great war, 1914-1918, may be counted for the purposes of superannuation.

This recommendation has been implemented to the extent that reference has been made to the Minister of Finance, for the reason that a change would be necessary to the superannuation act. The suggestion has been offered to him that he might refer the recommendation for the consideration of the parliamentary committee on the superannuation act.

With respect to the unemployed imperial veterans it is recommended:

Unemployed imperial veterans

That notwithstanding representations already made by the government of Canada to the British government, in connection with the problem of unemployed imperial veterans, now resident in this country,

It is recommended:

That a conference be arranged between representatives of both governments, this for the purpose of devising ways and means whereby these unemployed ex-service men who served in His Majesty's forces may be permanently rehabilitated in the land of their adoption or repatriated, if they so desire, to the British isles.

The commission feels that the position in which the unemployed ex-imperial soldier or sailor finds himself in Canada justifies immediate action on his behalf.

The commission stated they felt that the position in which the unemployed ex-imperial soldier or sailor found himself in Canada justified immediate action on his behalf.

Without any government intervention, towards the end of 1937, and I believe at the request of the Canadian legion, a representative of the British legion visited Canada in order to discuss with imperial veterans in this country problems affecting those veterans. I cannot say whether a report has yet been made, but I expect a report will be made to the Canadian legion, and should be published shortly.

With respect to hospitalization of imperial veterans I find this recommendation:

Hospitalization of Imperial Veterans

That, in view of the fact that the number of Canadian veterans resident in the old country who are in receipt of disability pensions is about equal to the number of imperial veterans now resident in Canada who draw pensions for war disabilities from the imperial government.

It is recommended:

That consideration be given to the matter by the Canadian government with a view to arriving at a reciprocal arrangement with the British government whereby hospitalization and medical treatment will be extended by the British government to Canadian pensioners resident in the old country and by the Canadian government to imperial pensioners resident in Canada.

If a reciprocal arrangement could be arrived at, it would, in our opinion, do away with the necessity of rendering accounts for hospitalization and treatment in this connection and facilitate more prompt attention being given when treatment or hospitalization is required.

I can see no possibility of implementing this recommendation.

The British Ministry of Pensions has an office in Ottawa, which deals with all affairs relating to pensions and treatment for imperial veterans in Canada and the United States; and treatment is arranged, on repayment, through hospital facilities provided for by this department. The affairs of Canadian pensioners resident in Great Britain are dealt with through the office of the overseas representative of the department in London, England.

By order in council, P.C. 948, dated the 23rd April, 1937, provision has been made for class 2 treatment, at the expense of the Canadian government, for veterans who were pre-war residents of Canada and in receipt of pension for a disability due to service with His Majesty's forces during the late war.

The next recommendation is:

Indigent Veterans Who Served in a Theatre of Actual War in a Campaign Prior to the Great War

That a sum of money be provided each year to permit payment of a monthly allowance to indigent veterans, who have reached the age of sixty years and who were domiciled in Canada at time of enlistment for service in a war prior to the great war, providing that they saw service in a theatre of actual war and are in possession of an honourable discharge.

This recommendation has been implemented to the extent that an amendment was introduced to the War Veterans' Allowance Act to provide for the admission of veterans of the South African war, on the same basis as veterans who served in the great war.

The next recommendation had to do with soldiers' clubs or hostels and reads:

Soldiers' Clubs or Hostels

The commission made a survey of the operation of a number of soldiers' clubs or hostels in Canada but has not yet had the opportunity of obtaining information covering the activities of the United States government in this connection.

[Mr. Power.]

Soldiers' homes in the United States are operated directly under the supervision of the government.

We recommend, therefore, that, in order that a complete report may be made available, a survey should be made of the United States system of handling soldiers' homes, and upon completion of which, a definite recommendation be forwarded by the commission, in the form of a supplementary report, to the Minister of Pensions and National Health not later than December 31, 1937.

This recommendation has been implemented to the extent that the commission was requested to make a survey and to submit recommendations. The recommendations which are contained in the report of the commission, dated the 5th January, 1938, are receiving the consideration of the department.

By order in council, P.C. 139, dated the 19th January, 1938, a grant of $2,500 was authorized to be paid to the Ottawa Branch of the Canadian Legion, B.E.S.L., for improvements and repairs to the property, or the purchase of equipment for the legion shelter at Ottawa.

By order in council, P.C. 138, dated the 19th January, 1938, approval was given for the payment of a grant of $10,000 to the Red Cross Society of Vancouver, such grant to be used for alterations to and equipment of any building that the red cross may secure for the purpose of a hostel for homeless ex-service men in Vancouver.

The next recommendation had to do with unfit veterans, and reads:

Unfit Veterans

That the War Veterans' Allowance Act be amended by removal of "age 55 years," where it refers to the granting of an allowance because of disability, preaging and general unfitness;

And further, that the act be amended so as to permit a more liberal interpretation of legislation covering the granting of the allowance at any age to a veteran who saw service in a theatre of actual war and who, because of his unfit condition, or other handicaps, is unable to maintain himself.

This recommendation has been implemented by the introduction of an amendment to the War Veterans' Allowance Act.

In connection with a provisional economic allowance for unemployed non-pensioned veterans, the recommendation reads:

Provisional Economic Allowance for Unemployed Non-Pensioned Veterans

That in the case of unemployed indigent veterans who are not in receipt of disability pension and who served in His Majesty's forces in a theatre of actual war and were domiciled in Canada at time of enlistment, unemployment assistance in the form of a provisional economic allowance be granted during such time as they are unemployed, through the Department of Pensions and National Health.

It is recommended:

That the maximum basic rate of allowance be:

Single men, $18.75 per month.

Man and dependent wife, $30 per month.

It is considered that dependent children are and should remain a responsibility of the provincial or municipal government concerned.

We also recommend:

That no allowance should be paid on behalf of the children of unemployed non-pensioned veterans who would benefit under this recommendation;

That it be understood that no unemployment assistance shall be granted by the department to an unemployed veteran unless he is registered with the Employment Service of Canada, or that evidence is produced to the department that work has been sought and is not available.

Should any veteran, without valid reason, refuse employment for which, in the opinion of medical officers, he is medically fit, he should be denied any allowance.

We strongly recommend that any veteran obtaining, or attempting to obtain, assistance from the Department of Pensions and National Health by fraudulent means should be prosecuted.

It is the opinion of the commission that no ex-service man or his dependents should forfeit their provincial or municipal rights as citizens because of the fact that the veteran concerned has or, if he is married, he and his wife have, been granted an allowance by the dominion government.

We further recommend:

That where application is made by a veteran for an allowance, such allowance shall be granted by the dominion government on the understanding that if he and his family are in receipt of relief, or are eligible for relief, from a provincial government or municipality, the granting and the acceptance of an allowance from the dominion government shall not relieve the province or municipality, in which he may be domiciled, from the responsibility of any obligations to the veteran or his family not covered by the payment of an allowance from dominion government sources;

And that it shall be understood and agreed that the province or municipality concerned will continue to accept responsibility for the payment of relief on behalf of any of the dependents of the veteran, not included in the allowance received from the dominion government;

And also that the provincial government or municipality shall in all cases provide such other welfare services to the veteran or, if he is married, to his dependents, as are unprovided for in the federal regulations covering the granting of the allowance or pension.

That is the main recommendation. An amendment which has been introduced to the War Veterans' Allowance Act is intended to provide for those who have been classified as partly fit and unfit by the commission, but it is not the intention of the government to make any provision for the payment of a grant to those who have been classified by the commission as fit. As I stated the other day, the government prefers to proceed by way of endeavouring to find employment for these men. I want to repeat that the government does not think it should accept responsibility for the care and maintenance, whether by way of an economic allowance or otherwise, of 100 per cent fit men.

I should like to go a little further and say that in so far as I have been able to understand this particular recommendation of the veterans' assistance commission, it has not met with the support of the returned men themselves. I think I have received only one resolution favouring the implementation of this recommendation as made. Every other returned soldier organization has said that they did not want it because it was not enough. They have stated in specific terms that they will take this as a minimum, but they do not want it unless it is specifically understood by the department that the allowance of $18.75 for single men and $30 for married men is the minimum and not the maximum. They go beyond that and ask that non-pensioned unemployed men, not disabled, be given full relief at the expense of the dominion government. In the case of a married man with five or six or more children, that would mean $60 or $70 per month or more on the basis of the Winnipeg rates which are considered to be fairly good. So far as I am aware, there is no demand for the exact implementation of the report of the veterans' assistance commission by any large body of returned soldiers. So far as I am aware, it has only served for the apparent justification for greater demands being made on the treasury. If those demands were acceded to, the very purpose for which this economic allowance was recommended would disappear. The exact words of the recommendation are:

In recommending a basic rate, the commission does so because while it is enough to give them food and lodging, it is not enough to take from them the incentive to take work.

The reason for recommending this economic allowance was in order that the men might have an incentive to obtain work and not that they be maintained in anything like comfort. Every returned soldier organization has requested that at least a reasonably fair rate be granted to these unemployed, non-pensioned, non-disabled ex-soldiers.

I could go on at some greater length to discuss the policy of the department with respect to these men, but in view of the shortness of the time at my disposal this evening I would be quite prepared to discuss it further at another time. I should like to state to the committee what I believe is the policy that should be followed, generally speaking, by this department, and which I believe has been the aim and object of all governments and of all ministers in the past. This is the formula which has been evolved by the officers of the department, which I think I can say I explained to gatherings of returned soldiers in every section of the country since the last session of parliament and which, so far as the principle is concerned, has not met with any objection:

The first duty of the government is to those of the Canadian army who suffered injuries during service, and to the dependents of those who died.

Second, to those who have given service overseas and are now unable to earn a living owing to age or physical infirmity.

Third, to those yet capable of working but of themselves unable to find employment, by endeavouring to provide facilities and by obtaining the local cooperation and support which will assist in their return to the industrial life of the country.

These provide for consideration, first, to those who served in the Canadian forces; second, to those who were in Canada at the outbreak of the war; and, third, in a more limited degree, to those who came to Canada within a reasonable time after the termination of the war.

I think that statement covers pretty well the general policy not only of myself but of previous ministers with respect to returned soldiers generally, and I think if I remain within the four corners of that I am substantially following what I believe the Canadian people want. I do not think that at present the people of this country are prepared to support and take as a direct responsibility the care of men who are now a municipal responsibility and are not being left to starve because they are being looked after by the municipalities—men who are physically fit and might be forty or forty-five years of age; in fact, two thirds of those reported by the commission as unemployed and fit are below fifty. I do not believe the country wants to pay these fit men an allowance for the rest of their lives.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

FIRST REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE OF BOTH HOUSES CONCURRED IN

Mr. E. C. St. PERE (Hochelaga) moved that the first report of the joint committee of both houses on the printing of parliament be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

NIAGARA RIVER BRIDGE

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, in tabling a return to an order of the house passed on February 23 last with respect to Niagara River bridge, I would point out that all the correspondence has been brought down; but no reply has been given to the third question asked by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), because it relates to a matter of policy, which it is not customary for the government to indicate in advance.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 39, respecting the Dominion Association of Chartered Accountants.—Mr. Plaxton.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

SETTLERS FROM SASKATCHEWAN DROUGHT AREA IN LOWER MAINLAND OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), which arises out of a problem facing the municipalities of the lower mainland of British Columbia. During the last three years a considerable number of families from the dried-out areas of Saskatchewan have been settling in that part of our province. Apparently they have sufficient to enable them to make small payments on property, but soon find themselves without any means of support and make application to the municipalities for relief.

According to statistics supplied to me by the Reeves' Association of Fraser Valley and which I have communicated to the minister, during the last three years fifteen municipalities have looked after 1,745 of these people, some municipalities looking after as many as 400. The problem is this: These families were on relief in Saskatchewan, paid I believe one hundred per cent by a federal department, and the government of British Columbia will not contribute toward relief until the applicant has been domiciled within the province for twelve months. The result is the burden falls 100 per cent on the municipalities; they must provide relief or pay transportation for these people back to their homes. Would it not be possible to continue the federal aid, through proper channels, until these families become settled and in a position to provide for themselves? There is no doubt that a large percentage of them will make good settlers if they are only given an opportunity.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to give me notice of this question. I shall be very glad to obtain the information and supply him with it as soon as possible.

SEED GRAIN

GUARANTEE OF LOANS FOR PURCHASE OF SEED IN WESTERN PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). I wonder if the government contemplates action early enough this year to provide seed grain for the farmers on the prairies, or will it be necessary to wait until the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has finished campaigning in Edmonton East?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That is a smart remark.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): The intentions of the government in that regard are set out in an item already on the order paper, of which I am sure my hon. friend is well aware.

WAR VETERANS' ALLOWANCES

EXTENSION OF ALLOWANCES TO INCLUDE CERTAIN OTHER CLASSES—ENLARGEMENT OF MEMBERSHIP OF BOARD

The house resumed from Thursday, March 17, consideration in committee of Bill No. 35, to amend the War Veterans' Allowance Act—Mr. Power—Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

On section 1—The South African war.

Mr. POWER: Section 1 was allowed to stand as the result of certain representations to the effect that persons domiciled in Canada who served in the South African war in units other than Canadian contingents might properly be brought under the provisions of this bill. I have now drafted two amendments to cover the matter. One is a substitute for paragraph (iii) of subsection 2. Paragraph (iii) reads:

(iii) In the case of the Canadian contingents serving in the South African war, the zone of military operations in South Africa in which Canadian contingents were engaged prior to the first day of June, 1902.

I have substituted:

(iii) In the case of the South African war, the zone of military operations in South Africa in which the forces of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland were engaged prior to the first day of June, 1902.

That is in order to permit persons who served in units other than the Canadian contingents to come under the bill. It is proposed also to amend subsection 2 of the act by adding after subparagraph (ii) of paragraph (j) the following as (ii) (a):

Any person domiciled and resident in Canada immediately prior to the eleventh day of October, 1899, who served with the forces of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in South Africa during the South African war; provided that such person landed in South Africa prior to the first day of June, 1902.

Mr. BENNETT: I suggest that it might be desirable to use, instead of the words in paragraph (hh) "the war waged by the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. . .," as there is a great difference of opinion as to who started that war, the words "the war between the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the Dutch republics." Does the minister not think that that change would be desirable?

Mr. POWER: I think it would be eminently desirable.

Mr. NEILL: Will not the word "domiciled" promote confusion? Wouldn't "resident" be better? The question will arise, what is "domiciled"?

Mr. BENNETT: That is the whole point.

Mr. POWER: That is a very old question. The legal authorities in this chamber might very readily get into some kind of snarl if we started discussing the difference between residence and domicile. We have had the question up time and time again in connection with election acts, and I do not believe it has ever been settled to the satisfaction of everyone. But in this case we should, in my opinion, endeavour to stand by a fairly strict interpretation of "domicile." In its broadest sense I believe it would mean a person who was settled here with his family with the intention of remaining a citizen of this country, whereas residence would apply to a man who perhaps was here only temporarily while his family was living in some other country. In view of the fact that this is beneficial legislation and not intended to be too wide, we should restrict it to those who were really citizens of this country. Under the circumstances I believe that "domiciled" is the better word to use.

Mr. NEILL: The object was, I understood, to provide for those who went to war, rather than to put it on the basis of domicile in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: We could not justify this amendment at all if it were based on residence. As I have explained, the theory was that a man left Canada to go to the war and with the intention of returning to Canada. There are two elements which constitute domicile; the first is residence, and the second is the animus manendi, to use the language of the books. In other words there must be the intention on the part of the person who has resided in the country to make it his permanent home. The leading authority is the case of a very rich man from the United States who went to England and lived there for over twenty years. The House of Lords held that he was domiciled in the United States, because he always had the intention, as evidenced by his writings and his statements, of going back to the United States, and that was his home. The question there was one of succession duties. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) with his usual legal astuteness, will grasp the point at once. The reason we are proposing to do something for a man who joined a force that was not a Canadian force is that he had resided here and went away with the intention of returning to Canada as his permanent home—these are the two factors that create domicile. He was therefore domiciled in Canada. If he had been a mere resident in Canada I fear we should have great difficulty in justifying the grant; we should find ourselves in a maze of complex difficulties. The language the minister has employed in the amendment is slightly different from that which I proposed to offer him, but I think his language is better calculated to indicate the thought I had in view. The action taken by the government will be appreciated by many who left here in good faith—because we were not then sending a contingent—joined British forces, and at the end of the war returned to Canada. The test of their ability to get money will be, did they come back to Canada at the end of the war or shortly after?

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. GREEN: The words used in (ii) (a), "any person, domiciled and resident in Canada immediately prior to the eleventh day of October 1899," would not cover the man who went to England and enlisted in 1900 or 1901. Perhaps the wording should be the same as that used in the original War Veterans' Allowance Act: "who was domiciled in Canada at the time that he joined any such force." I think it would be better to have the wording the same for each class.

Mr. POWER: I do not understand the hon. member's objection. Does he mean to try to cover the case of the man who for some reason came to Canada say in 1900 after the war broke out and then decided to go back to England and joined a contingent there? That, I should say, is a very remote occurrence.

Mr. GREEN: That is the way the present act reads with regard to the great war.

Mr. POWER: Is it worth while, for about perhaps ten people, probably not more, to make an amendment?

Mr. GREEN: There may be only ten who are covered by the amendment, but surely they should receive consideration.

Mr. POWER: I do not think there is necessity for the amendment. The case suggested by my hon. friend would not arise. It would involve a man having been resident outside Canada, in England, let us say, at the time the war broke out, then coming here and remaining for a few months and returning to England to join the troops that were proceeding to South Africa, and then coming back to Canada. It is hardly likely that he would have the animus manendi, that my right hon. friend speaks of.

Mr. BENNETT: Those are the only words the books do use to cover it.

Mr. POWER: I can remember pleading a case before the circuit court in Quebec when I endeavoured to show that a man who was employed as a cigar maker in Toronto and had been so employed for twenty years was still entitled to be on the electoral list in Quebec, that since he had that animus he remained on the list. Some will say that he voted though he was absent.

Mr. BENNETT: His political predilections were fairly well defined. May I suggest that the words "and resident" would have to come out, because domicile involves residence.

Mr. POWER: No. My cigar maker was resident in Toronto but was domiciled in Quebec.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not wish to join in any legal argument with my hon. friend, but I would point out that there can be no such thing as domicile without residence; there must be residence to constitute domicile. I remember Lord Haldane discussing the point once in a case in the Privy Council.

Mr. POWER: He does not know Canadian law.

Mr. BENNETT: But it goes beyond that; it is a matter of international law. The leading discussion of it is by a German named Savigny. The Winans case is one I had in mind, another being the case of Vanderbilt, who, it will be remembered, used to drive a four-in-hand to Brighton. The question of his domicile arose. The point I am making is that residence is a first essential; the man must reside in Canada. My hon. friend is dealing with the question of domicile in an interprovincial matter, but in the matter that we are now discussing the veteran must reside in Canada and must have had the intention, evidenced by expression from time to time, of making Canada his permanent home.

Mr. POWER: I still have some doubts as to the interpretation of residence and domicile given by my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: I will get the authority and show it.

Mr. POWER: However, I am prepared to have the words "and resident" omitted from the amendment, so that it will read: "Any person domiciled in Canada. . .".

Mr. GREEN: The South African war lasted two or three years, and at that time there was extensive immigration to Canada from the British isles. Should we not cover those few men while dealing with the others?

Mr. POWER: Does my hon. friend know one man who would come under any amendment that he would like to propose?

Mr. GREEN: I do not know of any who would come under such an amendment, but perhaps the minister knows of some. Surely, however, the two sections I have referred to should be worded in the same way.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I do not think there would be any.

Mr. BENNETT: There are some in the west.

Sir EUGENE FISET: No. Most of those who did join the imperial units were attached at some time to Canadian units and therefore would come under the law.

Mr. BENNETT: The Strathcona Horse was a Canadian unit in one sense, though not in another. I remember a number of Englishmen joined that unit long after 1899.

Mr. LOCKHART: The minister seems to appreciate the fact that there are many unusual circumstances, and hon. members have pointed out some of the exceptions that might arise. After all, this legislation is intended to cover as broadly as possible all cases that might come under the act. I could relate the unusual situation of one man who was in the South African war. Can the minister suggest under what clause the board has the opportunity of dealing with such exceptional cases?

Mr. POWER: What is the case my hon. friend is referring to?

Mr. LOCKHART: I am referring to some of the possible cases that have been suggested.

Mr. POWER: I do not know of any such cases.

Mr. LOCKHART: Possibilities have been brought to the attention of the minister. The hon. member (Mr. Green) suggested one case and I know of one pretty much along the same lines. Is there any provision in this bill empowering the board to deal with such cases? They are not being given that opportunity. The minister is hewing to the line as closely as possible.

Mr. POWER: That is not quite fair. In the first place, it was brought to my attention last year that a certain number of veterans who served in the Canadian contingent in the South African war might be indigent and might need to be looked after under the act, and in consequence of those representations I brought in amendments this year. Yesterday afternoon my hon. friend from Vancouver South (Mr. Green) stated a hypothetical case of men, resident or domiciled in Canada prior to the war, who served in some imperial unit. I said that I would take the matter into consideration and to-day I have brought in an amendment to cover that case. Now he brings to my attention a very remote hypothetical case of a man who had been travelling between Canada and England during the South African war, and whom he suggests we should cover. I do not know how to do it, and none of my hon. friends have suggested in what way the act should be amended to cover such a man. I submit that we have gone as far as possible.

Mr. GREEN: I simply suggest that we use the same language as is now used in paragraph (j) (ii) of the original act.

Mr. POWER: We agreed to that half an hour ago.

Mr. GREEN: No, the wording is different. In the original act it is provided:

> Any former member of any of His Majesty's forces or of any of the forces of any of His Majesty's allies who was domiciled in Canada at the time at which he joined any such force for the purpose of the war and who served during such war in a theatre of actual war, . . .

In other words, an Englishman might have come to Canada in 1915 and in 1917 have gone back and joined an imperial unit; he is eligible for the allowance.

Mr. POWER: We are talking about the South African war.

Mr. GREEN: I am asking that the same provision be made for the South African veterans.

Mr. POWER: We have done so as far as we are able.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Neepawa): I wish to congratulate the minister on having brought in this legislation. Sometimes it is difficult to decide who is eligible. I want to state a case that has come to my own notice and ask the minister whether he can give an assurance that it is covered. The man in question is No. 447, No. 4 squadron, Strathcona Horse. He went to South Africa in 1899 and returned in 1901. He was wounded in the foot and hand and has a shrapnel wound in the forehead. He also suffered from dysentery and other sicknesses. Could the minister give any assurance that, if the facts are as I have stated, this man is eligible?

Mr. POWER: Certainly he is eligible, if he served with the Canadians in South Africa.

Mr. BETTS: As to the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) the minister said that no member of the committee had suggested any way in which what my colleague wants could be done. But I can suggest a very simple way. If in the new paragraph (iii), subsection 2, which now reads "any person domiciled in Canada immediately prior to the eleventh day of October, 1899" the words "domiciled in Canada at the date of his joining any such force" were substituted, or words conformable, the effect the hon. member seeks would be achieved. Even if it touches only one case, or does not touch any, it would bring the new provision into conformity with the present section, and in any event would do no harm.

Mr. POWER: I am afraid it might deprive some who benefit under this amendment of some of their rights.

Mr. BETTS: How could it do that?

Mr. POWER: If the section passes as it is, I do not think there will be any great hardship.

Mr. BETTS: I am simply trying to get better legislation, as we all are, including the minister.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 3—Veterans to whom allowance is payable.

Mr. BENNETT: I have no suggestions to offer to improve the language of subsection (c) as it now stands, except that the term "veteran" in the governing paragraph of the section would perhaps render unnecessary the repetition involved in some of the words in paragraph (c). But they are mere repetition, and cannot detract from the value.

Mr. POWER: I did take the opinion of the Department of Justice on my right hon. friend's suggestion, and they pointed out that he had perhaps inadvertently left out reference to "economic handicaps."

Mr. BENNETT: That is true. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) directed my attention to that.

Mr. POWER: And that possibly it might still further restrict rather than broaden the paragraph.

The objection was made by the hon. member for London (Mr. Betts) that in the section as it is in the act at present dealing with persons over fifty-five years of age there is not the same reference to the unlikelihood of these people ever being able to maintain themselves in the future. I discussed that also with representatives of the Department of Justice, and they pointed out that in the paragraph to which he refers in the legislation as it exists at present it was not necessary to mention the unlikelihood of their being able to maintain themselves, because we specifically said that the veteran, in order to profit by that legislation, had to be pre-aged, disabled or generally unfit, and if he were all of those three it naturally followed that he was not likely to be able to maintain himself in the future. For that reason they advised that it would not have been necessary under the former act to add those particular words in order to get the effect which was desired, either broadening or restricting. The justice department is of the opinion that the amendment as submitted gives to the board ample scope to grant allowance to any veteran who cannot maintain himself and is unlikely in the future to be able to do so, regardless of the nature of his handicaps. That is, I think, the objective which we all want to reach. We all want to cover the case of the man who is incapable of looking after himself and who is partly disabled from obtaining work in highly competitive fields such as we have in Canada. I believe the suggested amendments as brought down in the bill cover that case.

We must leave something to the discretion of the board. Every hon. member who has spoken has told us that the board has in the past carried out its duties to the satisfaction of everyone, has been broad and generous and at the same time just. The greatest compliment we could pay to them would be to allow them to continue to carry on the work which they have been doing in the past without restricting them by any act of this parliament, by any change in phraseology. I think it is giving away no secret to say that the drafting of this legislation, which took considerable time and much thought and consideration, was done in collaboration with the chairman of the war veterans' allowance board.

Mr. GREEN: May we be quite certain that it is the intention of the government that all of the 5,100 odd men who were found to be wholly or partially unfit by the veterans' assistance commission are to be covered by this section as drawn?

Mr. POWER: Subject to investigation. I will not say that every one of those men will immediately get a war veterans' allowance, but it is the intention of the government to take in all the partially fit and the unfit. Whether an individual, Tom Jones, who was categorized as partially fit will come under this legislation, I cannot say. He should, but if for some particular and special reason known to the board he does not, I am not going to be responsible.

Mr. GREEN: But the intention is that that whole group will be covered?

Mr. POWER: Absolutely. This bill is drafted with that intention.

Mr. MacNEIL: Because of the point raised by the minister a few minutes ago I suggest the elimination of the last few words of subsection 2. They appear to be a direction to the board which limits the discretionary power to which he has referred. I am content to see the board have ample discretionary power, but this is in the nature of a direction to use a certain test as to the availability of work. It seems to nullify provisions of paragraph (c) of the preceding subsection. Would not the minister be content to use the very language he used in committee yesterday, when he said he did not intend this act to apply to any veteran who in the opinion of the board is physically and mentally fit?

Mr. POWER: That is exactly what the paragraph says. Let me read it:

(2) The provisions of paragraph (c) of subsection 1 shall not be construed to apply to any veteran who is, in the opinion of the board—

Full discretion is given to the board.

—physically and mentally capable of maintaining himself if work were available.

That puts it on the shoulders of the board and the board only to decide whether the man is physically and mentally capable. We are giving them the widest possible discretion.

Mr. MacNEIL: Would it not be possible to leave out the phrase "if work were available"?

Mr. POWER: No, really we should have something like this in order that ex-service men generally will not be deceived by this legislation. I want it to be clear beyond the shadow of doubt what the legislation means; that it does not cover the man who is able to work, and the only way to do that is to write it into the bill. It would have been much easier for me, and the bill would perhaps have had a far better reception throughout the country, had we left that provision out. But I think we have to be fair to the ex-service men by telling them just who is to benefit and who is not, and it is for that reason this is inserted in the bill.

Mr. BETTS: I am very appreciative of the trouble the minister has taken with this bill in holding over this section and in consulting the Department of Justice. I have the greatest respect for the opinion of the officers of that department, but in this particular case I do not agree with them. I do not think the new section 4 will give the board nearly as wide a scope as the old section. I hold that view because of the reasons advanced just now by my two friends from Vancouver. Therefore, I propose to move an amendment to the bill. In order that the record may be absolutely clear, I shall read the old section, the section which the government is now proposing, and the amendment I intend to suggest.

The section dealt with by this bill is section 4 of the War Veterans' Allowance Act, which is chapter 48 of the statutes of 1930, as amended by chapter 48 of the statutes of 1936. This section reads:

Subject as hereinafter provided, allowances under this act shall be payable with the approval of the board to any veteran who, at the date of the proposed commencement of the allowance, has attained the age of sixty years or is, in the opinion of the board, permanently unemployable by reason of physical or mental disability, or having served in a theatre of actual war, has attained the age of fifty-five years and is, in the opinion of the board, incapable of maintaining himself because of disability, pre-aging and general unfitness, and in either case is, and has for the six months immediately preceding been domiciled in Canada.

Under that section the board is asked to consider whether an applicant is in its opinion incapable of maintaining himself for various reasons. There is no duty cast upon the board of considering the likelihood of an applicant becoming capable of maintaining himself. I turn next to the section proposed by the minister, being section 3 of the present bill, which reads:

(1) Subject as hereinafter provided allowances under this act shall be payable with the approval of the board to any veteran who has been domiciled in Canada for the six months immediately preceding the date of the proposed commencement of the allowance, and who

(a) has attained the age of sixty years, or

(b) has not attained the age of sixty years, but is, in the opinion of the board, permanently unemployable because of physical or mental disability, or

(c) does not qualify by age or disability under the two preceding paragraphs, but having served in a theatre of actual war, is in the opinion of the board incapable and unlikely to become capable of maintaining himself because of economic handicaps combined with physical or mental disability or insufficiency.

I am critical also of subsection 2, which reads:

The provisions of paragraph (c) of subsection one shall not be construed to apply to any veteran who is, in the opinion of the board, physically and mentally capable of maintaining himself if work were available.

I shall not read subsection 3, because I have no quarrel with it. Allow me to review my objections. My submission is that the board is asked in every case to form an opinion whether an applicant is likely to become capable of maintaining himself. I submit that the board will find it far more difficult to grant allowances under these circumstances than it does under the present legislation. At present all they have to decide is whether an applicant is incapable of maintaining himself. This new phraseology makes it necessary for the board to find in addition, as a matter of carefully considered opinion, that the applicant is unlikely to become capable of maintaining himself. The minister has said on more than one occasion that he is particularly desirous of giving the board the widest possible discretion. I agree that that is eminently desirable, but it seems to me that the only possible interpretation we can place upon this language is that it will have the effect of restricting the discretion of the board. It gives them one more point to consider and one more matter in connection with which they will have to form an opinion. Therefore, I say that it is not implementing what the minister has told us is his desire in the matter, nor is it in conformity with the recommendations of the veterans' assistance commission, as found on page 69 of their report. The recommendation in connection with unfit veterans reads:

That the War Veterans' Allowance Act be amended by removal of "age 55 years," where it refers to the granting of an allowance because of disability, pre-aging and general unfitness;

And further:

That the act be amended so as to permit a more liberal interpretation of legislation covering the granting of the allowance at any age to a veteran who saw service in a theatre of actual war and who, because of his unfit condition, or other handicaps, is unable to maintain himself.

There is nothing in that recommendation about the likelihood or probability of a veteran becoming capable of maintaining himself. I submit that the present section is out of line with the recommendations of the veterans' assistance commission. It is also out of line with the resolution passed at the convention of the legion held in Fort William in February of this year. That resolution reads in part:

—and to ensure adequate assistance for those who saw service in a theatre of actual war and who are now by reason of economic conditions combined with their disability, tangible and intangible, resulting from war service, unable through no fault of their own to secure employment.

The minister had this to say in connection with that resolution, as reported on page 1039 of Hansard:

It may be said that in passing this legislation we shall be fulfilling to the utmost the requests of the returned soldiers themselves as expressed through the dominion convention of the Canadian legion held in Fort William early in February—

My submission is that by reason of the phraseology which obligates the board in every case to consider whether a veteran is unlikely to become capable of maintaining himself, the minister's statement is incorrect.

I should like to repeat that I am extremely appreciative of the work of the war veterans' allowance board and I am just as anxious as the minister that this board shall be enabled to operate in the future with completely unfettered discretion. But I do not want to place a board which has been doing good work in an embarrassing position. It has protected the interests of the soldiers and the treasury. It has held the scales in a nice balance between the two interests, and I say that a board constituted as is the present one would be very much embarrassed by regulations placing upon it the duty to consider in each case whether an applicant is likely to become in the future capable of maintaining himself. So far as veterans between the ages of fifty-five and sixty years are concerned, this provision undoubtedly narrows the benefits of the act. It makes the act more restrictive.

So much for a board seized of the right idea in dealing with veterans' administration. Suppose we were to put this legislation in the hands of a board unsympathetic towards veterans, as have been some boards and commissions of which we have had knowledge. I say we are placing in the hands of the board an instrument which would make it very easy for them to grant no allowances at all to the class of men the measure is intended to benefit. I would remind the minister that the personnel of boards changes from time to time, but the provisions we place on the statute books will stay there for some considerable time, and the removal of that which is not in the interests of returned soldiers would involve a great deal of difficulty and expense.

Therefore I move, seconded by Mr. Brooks:

That section 3 of the bill as printed, be amended by deleting the words "and unlikely to become capable" where the said words appear in line 33 thereof;

And by deleting subsection (2) of the new section 4, lines 36 to 39 inclusive of the bill as printed;

And by changing the number of the last subsection of the said new section 4 from (3) to (2).

That amendment, if accepted, would make the new section 4 read as follows:

4. (1) Subject as hereinafter provided allowances under this act shall be payable with the approval of the board to any veteran who has been domiciled in Canada for the six months immediately preceding the date of the proposed commencement of the allowance, and who

(a) has attained the age of sixty years, or

(b) has not attained the age of sixty years, but is, in the opinion of the board, permanently unemployable because of physical or mental disability, or

(c) does not qualify by age or disability under the two preceding paragraphs, but having served in a theatre of actual war, is in the opinion of the board incapable of maintaining himself because of economic handicaps combined with physical or mental disability or insufficiency.

(2) An allowance shall not be awarded or continued under this act to a veteran or a recipient while such veteran or recipient is in receipt of an old age pension awarded under any provincial old age pension legislation adopted in pursuance of an agreement made under the authority of the Old Age Pensions Act.

My submission is that if the present section is so amended the intention of parliament, of the legion convention, and of the minister will be fully carried out.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The question is on the amendment.

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 24; nays, 61.

Mr. LOCKHART: The amendment has now been declared lost.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

Mr. LOCKHART: There is no reason to be proud of it, and I shall give the reason why.

An hon. MEMBER: Nothing to be ashamed of, either.

Mr. LOCKHART: The amendment as proposed by the hon. member for London—

Mr. DUNNING: On a point of order, there has been a vote on the question the hon. member is discussing.

Mr. LOCKHART: I am not speaking to the amendment. The amendment has been decided upon, and we are now speaking to the original section.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. LOCKHART: These words still appear in the section: "—in the opinion of the board, physically and mentally capable of maintaining himself if work were available." If the minister will listen for a moment I shall give details with respect to the point I am trying to make, although I cannot give exact dates. We are attempting to take care of a large number of South African veterans. I do not recall the number; the minister has stated the number.

The two men I have in mind are partially disabled. They have never had relief or assistance of any kind, but through the influence of friends they have been able to earn a livelihood for themselves and their families. I am of the opinion that they will now come under the section of this act which we have been largely discussing. I am not so sure that these men could have obtained employment if it had not been for influential friends helping them. Now if in the opinion of the board such work was available for these men, they may not be ligible under this act. That is the point I want to make clear. These two men, now fifty-seven years of age, have been able to get work of a certain kind up to the present, but if they are unable to obtain this certain type of work in the future, I am afraid that in the opinion of the board they may not be eligible. The minister said earlier in the session that the board had not discretionary powers, that they had no latitude, but he has said since that they have latitude. I do hope that borderline cases of this kind, where the men are fifty-seven years of age or thereabouts will be able to get the benefit of the act even in the face of the wording of this section.

Section agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the bill?

Mr. BETTS: No, Mr. Chairman, I have a further amendment to move. I move that a section be added to the bill dealing with the treatment in departmental hospitals of recipients of an allowance under the War Veterans' Allowance Act who are not in receipt of a pension.

Mr. POWER: I would point out that such an amendment would not be in order, because it would involve the expenditure of money.

Mr. BETTS: I think the point is well taken, Mr. Chairman.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

BOARDS OF REVIEW, TIME LIMIT FOR FILING PROPOSALS, ETC.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 25, to amend the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

On section 1—Interpretation.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, in connection with section 1, I am proposing an amendment which, for the convenience of members of the committee, I arranged to have printed in the votes and proceedings of yesterday. It is the only house amendment I intend to propose, and it is for the object of making it quite clear that with respect to lack of privity of contract, cases which have been before the board and have not been dealt with because of lack of privity of contract will not be debarred from being dealt with by the board from now on. Also it is intended to cover cases where the board refused to deal with and dismissed cases on account of lack of privity of contract, and with a third case where the board of review declined to deal with non-privity mortgages but did actually deal with the farmer's other debts. I will ask my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, to move the amendment.

Mr. CARDIN: I move, Mr. Chairman:

That clause 1 of the bill be amended by adding thereto as subsections (2) and (3) thereof the following:

"(2) If, in the case of a proposal filed prior to the commencement of this act, a debt secured by mortgage, hypothec, pledge, charge, lien or privilege on or against any property of the farmer (hereinafter referred to as the secured debt) has not, by reason of the absence of privity of contract between the farmer and a secured creditor as herein defined, been dealt with by way of a composition, extension of time or scheme of arrangement, the farmer shall be entitled to have the proposal proceeded with or to file a new proposal, in either case, for the purpose of having the secured debt dealt with by way of composition, extension of time or scheme of arrangement in the like manner and with the like results as if this act had been in force at the date of the filing of the original proposal.

(3) In the case of a proposal formulated by a board of review prior to the commencement of this act whereby a secured debt was dealt with, the farmer shall, notwithstanding the absence of privity of contract between himself and a secured creditor as herein defined, be entitled to have such proposal confirmed by the board of review in the like manner and with the like results as if this act had been in force at the date of the filing of his proposal by the farmer."

Mr. DONNELLY: There is one point on which I am not clear. A farmer owns five quarter-sections, against which there is a mortgage of eight or ten thousand dollars. He sells one quarter-section to another farmer for $1,700. The farmer who buys it pays up to a thousand dollars on this quarter-section; he is willing to pay the other seven hundred dollars and wants to get title to the land, but the mortgage company refuses to release it. Does this cover a case of that kind, or not?

Mr. DUNNING: The question is a difficult one to answer, because it presumes a set of circumstances which relate not only to lack of privity of contract but to other conditions which are not dealt with by this section. A simple case of lack of privity of contract is that of a farmer who has bought a farm subject to a mortgage. The mortgagor, however, the one who has real relationships with the mortgagee by virtue of the mortgage document, is not before the board of review. The party before the board of review is the farmer at present living on that piece of land and trying to make his livelihood there. It has been held that the board of review has no authority in connection with a proposal by the farmer who is living on the land to deal with that mortgage, because the farmer who is living on the land is not the mortgagor.

Mr. DONNELLY: He is not in this case, either.

Mr. DUNNING: That, I think, is the simplest explanation of the law of privity of contract and the sort of case which causes most frequent difficulty. It is that difficulty which we are seeking to overcome in the section now under discussion; I do not know that I can go into the legal position of the case my hon. friend is assuming.

Mr. DONNELLY: Many cases of the kind I have just mentioned come before the board which they are unable to deal with. Take for example a man who buys a quarter-section of land and agrees to pay $1,700. There is a general mortgage against five quarters. The mortgage company refuses to release that quarter-section when the farmer is willing to pay the purchase price. I do not know how such a case is to be dealt with.

Mr. BOTHWELL: It seems to me that the question referred to by the hon. member for Wood Mountain is easy to answer. The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act does not deal in any way with the situation presented by the hon. member. It is simply a matter of contract. In the first place the individual who bought that quarter-section had the opportunity of searching the title to the land, and had he done so he would have found the mortgage registered against five quarter-sections. He took his own chances when he bought a quarter with a mortgage sufficient to cover five quarters. The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act does not deal with that situation.

Mr. TUCKER: I believe that by the amendment it does, because it is specifically stated, "a person holding a mortgage ... on or against the property of the debtor." It seems clear to me that if a person buys a piece of land covered by a mortgage and the mortgage covers other land besides the piece he bought, the mortgagee "holds the mortgage against the property of the debtor" within the meaning of the act and so is a "creditor" as defined by the amendment. In a case such as mentioned by the hon. member for Wood Mountain the board of review would, I feel satisfied, have full jurisdiction and could make an order separating the obligation and cutting it down to the amount it regarded as proper against the particular parcel owned by the farmer. I do not think there can be any doubt about that.

I should like to bring another matter to the attention of the minister. I do not know whether in the opinion of the law officers it is covered, but I read over the whole amendment to section 1 changing the definition of "creditor" and I doubt whether it would be held to cover such a case as this. A person might sell a parcel of land to A, A might assign the agreement to B, and B might have been farming that land for the last ten years and might have made substantial payments, but with no privity of contract between the vendor and B I doubt whether the definition as given in the proposed amendment covers the vendor in an agreement for sale in such a case, and I think it should, because he is in the same position as a person who buys land subject to a mortgage. To make it abundantly plain, I suggest there should be some such amendment as adding after "thereof" in the fourth line the following words, "or a vendor or his assign in an agreement of sale of property in which the debtor has an interest." Otherwise you are dealing with only half the problem, because many people who have bought land under agreement of sale need the benefit of this bill as much as people who took over land subject to a mortgage.

Mr. STEWART: I think I see two serious objections to this amendment. In the first place it is retroactive; as I understand it, it applies to any farmer whose case has been before the board of review and whose application has not been dealt with because the relation of creditor and debtor did not exist between him and the mortgage indebtedness—he has purchased a farm with a mortgage on it; it is not his debt. Where such cases have been dealt with by a judge and he has taken the application out from under the act because there was no relation between debtor and creditor, or where the application or proposal has been rejected by the board of review or by any tribunal before which it came, can we go back and review all these from the beginning of this act, in 1934? That is the first question.

Mr. DUNNING: Now, I have several questions. I dealt as well as I could with that of the hon. member for Wood Mountain. With regard to that of the hon. member for Rosthern, I can only say that I am advised by the law officers that there is no difficulty whatever along the line that he indicates. As a matter of fact the boards of review have been dealing with agreements of sale cases, very many of them. We have hundreds of cases where—

Mr. TUCKER: Not in Saskatchewan, where there is no privity.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, in cases where there is no privity also in some of the provinces. That is my difficulty in dealing with this act; it has so many different phases in different parts of Canada. But I can assure my hon. friend that the view of the law officers is that the case which he has cited can be dealt with under the language here employed. I think I can dispose of the matter to his satisfaction by telling him that I will give instructions that his remarks shall be noted and the bill will not be passed a third time before consideration has been given to the point which he raised.

With reference to the question of the hon. member for Leeds, the intention is, as I stated, to give the farmer who on account of lack of privity of contract, has been denied approval of a proposal before the board of review, an opportunity to present his proposal again. It is intended also to give to the farmer in connection with whose proposal an adjustment has been made with respect to that part of his debts which could be dealt with by the board, but the board not having dealt with the part affected by reason of lack of privity of contract, the opportunity to go back again and say, "I was denied the full benefit of the act because of lack of privity of contract with respect to my secured indebtedness. Although I did get an adjustment in respect of my unsecured debts I want to come back, now that this amendment has been passed, and have the board consider what should be done with my secured debts which were barred from consideration previously because of lack of privity of contract." It is intended to cover that case and cases also where the board declined entirely to deal with applications because a lack of privity of contract existed. In other words, it is intended to put all farmers, from the commencement of the act, in the same position with respect to this question of lack of privity of contract.

Mr. GLEN: I find that the amendments as now proposed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) do not cover any proposed amendments to the act in general. It happens that I have a case which is of particular concern to me, but which has dominion-wide application in the administration of the act; and what I am anxious to know is whether under the amendments we now have I may discuss that case and deal with the rules as formulated under the act. When the discussion took place on the second reading it revolved around the question whether or not the bill should be sent to a committee. The idea was that it should pass the second reading and the Minister of Finance would take into consideration whether or not it should go to a committee. Now we are in committee of the whole, and because I had not an opportunity on second reading to discuss the case I have in mind I should like to know whether I shall be given that opportunity now. I should like to state this case because I must admit that what I have to say is not entirely relevant to the amendments that are now before the house. At the same time I must ask for an opportunity to submit what I consider is a very important matter regarding the administration of the act in Manitoba.

Mr. BENNETT: It was understood that we would be able to discuss any proposals if the bill did not go to a committee.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no doubt that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has stated correctly the understanding, and perhaps the proper time to discuss such proposals as do not fall within the four corners of the amendments just suggested would be when the chairman asks us to approve the title, after we have considered the amendments now before the committee. If that is suitable it will facilitate the committee's proceedings and enable us to confine discussion to each section as it is taken up, the understanding being that general discussion of matters not within the scope of the proposed amendments may be had on the title.

Mr. TOMLINSON: This is the first opportunity I have had of noting this particular amendment, and I must say that I cannot agree with it. I know of one particular case—there may be many of them—where proposals have already been made, applications having been made to the official receiver under a conditional sales agreement with respect to farm stock and implements. The vendor, after the application had been made by the farmer, proceeded under his lien, in a legal and proper manner, and sold the goods. This amendment, as I see it, would allow that farmer to make a further proposal as to that lien note or conditional sales agreement, after the sale or the repossession has taken place. I should like to be sure on that point because we have such a case, and I do not think it is fair to the vendor that he should be placed in this position. In my opinion it is one more notch in driving down the price of farms in Ontario. I cannot agree with this amendment, which makes it retroactive.

Mr. STEWART: I mentioned the retroactive feature of the amendment, which is very objectionable and will add to the confusion that exists and the dissatisfaction that prevails in Ontario with the administration of the act. I do not want to go into details of the administration, which I think the minister knows is different in different sections. Some abuses have grown up in connection with the administration. Can the minister give us any idea how many cases would be reopened if this section were passed?

Another feature I had in mind is this. A man buys a farm subject to a mortgage which he has not made, a mortgage made by the man from whom he has purchased, and under this amendment he is entitled to come before the board and have that written down, have it considered, compromised. What position is the original mortgagee in with respect to the man who made the mortgage? His right, I submit, remains, assuming that the original mortgagor is worth the amount, to go to him on his covenant and recover on the covenant in that mortgage. A very nasty complication may arise in connection with that. In one case the debt is written down; the mortgagee gets only fifty per cent and he turns around and says, "All right, I will go back to the man who originally made the mortgage and get my other fifty per cent from him." That man is not before the board of review. The man who is liable on the covenant is not before the board; he is not asking that his debt be compromised. There is a complication there. I do not know in how many cases it might arise, but it is worthy of consideration in this connection, and I do strongly point out again the objection to retroactive legislation of this kind in such cases. In view of the dissatisfaction that exists in Ontario in connection with this act, the effects of it having been pointed out by members of this house on another occasion, the minister would be going a long way and probably counter to the majority of public opinion in Ontario if he enacted this legislation to be effective from this time only; and I am convinced that if he goes back and permits the opening up of those cases that have been disposed of he is certainly going counter to public opinion generally and to the opinion of a good many of the farmers themselves.

Mr. DUNNING: In answer to the question regarding the number of cases that would be affected, our information is that there are about 3,000; that is to say, there have been 3,000 which have not been dealt with by boards of review owing to absence of privity of contract. There is, however, a further difficulty. I am advised that in Ontario some 400 cases have been dealt with notwithstanding lack of privity of contract and those 400 cases are now in the position of being affected by—I had almost said upset by—a judicial decision of which my hon. friend is aware. In Manitoba by the same judicial decision some 150 cases which have been dealt with by the board of review would presumably be affected. That gives an idea of the magnitude and the variety of this problem. At present there are 3,000 cases which could be revived, if revival is the proper word, under the amendment now being considered by the committee. If this amendment does not carry there are about 550 cases which have already been settled by boards of review which will be upset by the effect of judicial decisions in Manitoba and Ontario. That is my understanding.

Mr. TUCKER: In order to get away from this objection about retroactive legislation, was consideration given to the suggestion that the right be given in such cases to make a second application? If that right were given it would also take care of the case of the farmer whose condition had changed or who did not get an order which he could carry out, say in Saskatchewan; it would give him a chance to have his case reviewed. While the act is in force there is no reason why people who did not get the same consideration as others should not have a right to apply again, if they make out a case to have their position reviewed. After all, a person can go through bankruptcy a second time, and I do not see why, subject to getting an order showing that one has a reasonable case for it, he should not be able to have a second order from the board of review under this act, while it is in force.

Mr. DUNNING: There is one piece of information which I did not give to the committee a moment ago, which I should give now as illustrating the problem. In addition to the figures I gave I am advised by the administrator of the act that no less than forty applications for foreclosure were made during the week following the giving of the decision of the Ontario appeal court.

With respect to the suggestion of the hon. member for Rosthern regarding second applications, rather than proceeding in this manner, the government has had to give consideration of course to the possibility of providing for second applications. And we had to give consideration to very many representations from creditors that they also would like a second chance, to upset orders already made by the boards of review. As usual there are two sides to the matter. The government has decided that endless confusion would result and the act be rendered useless if on the one hand we permitted second applications, or on the other hand gave a right of appeal to a creditor which might upset an order of the board. This kind of legislation, as I said on a previous occasion, is most difficult legislation, but it is at the present time undeniably useful in parts of Canada, and we are all desirous of continuing its benefits, but, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) said the other day, it is predicated upon bankruptcy. We must not forget that it is based upon the bankruptcy powers of the federal government, and in dealing with it we must be very careful not to assume that it is entirely for the benefit of debtors. It is not. I think we cannot possibly entertain, much as we would like to do so in connection with individual problems which have arisen, any thought of second applications or on the other hand any thought of providing for appeals from the decisions of the board in the ordinary sense. Of course there are proper grounds for appeal, if in the opinion of any creditor the board has exceeded its jurisdiction or anything like that; I am dealing not with that kind of thing, but with appeals as ordinarily presented to me.

As illustrating the difficulties which do occur in connection with this matter, as to the farm which was the subject of the appeal in Ontario and on the basis of which the judgment was given with respect to the lack of privity of contract feature, that farmer has lost his farm to-day. It is gone and apparently there is no help for it. We have to our knowledge 3,000 cases in which lack of privity of contract constitutes a bar to the privileges of the act, 400 cases in Ontario alone where if this amendment is not passed the settlements made will be invalidated, and 150 cases in Manitoba would be put in the same position. As I say, illustrating the difficulty, over forty foreclosures were applied for in Canada in the week following the decision. We have tried to take into account all the factors on both sides, and while legislation of this kind is always extraordinary, we are dealing with a very extraordinary condition. The amendment proposed is, I think, moderate and reasonable, and, having regard to all the circumstances, the wisest thing this committee can do. I am not saying that we will not consider any suggestions which are made; I hope the committee will advance other suggestions, but I should like the committee to be fully aware of all the difficulties and the magnitude of them.

Mr. BENNETT: What would happen to those foreclosure cases? Would they all be opened up?

Mr. DUNNING: Presumably they are opened up.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. BENNETT: But if this proposed legislation is enacted, what will happen to the actual foreclosure actions?

Mr. LAWSON: Although the minister may have a very sincere desire to help those whose cases have already been determined and who are in a situation where as a result of judicial decision the effect of those determinations is in doubt, I suggest that the amendment now proposed will create confusion more confounded.

Let me give an illustration. The hon. member for Leeds carried the point so far, I should like to take it a little further. What this amendment proposes to do is to remove the bar of lack of privity of contract so that a mortgagee is made a creditor under this act in the field of bankruptcy legislation and therefore within our jurisdiction, where the original mortgagor—we will call him a covenantor to distinguish him from the present owner—where the original covenantor is no longer the present owner. Then the case cited by the hon. member for Leeds arises. The mortgagee now, by virtue of this amendment, being a creditor within the meaning of this act, avails himself first of what he can get under this act, and then sues the original covenantor. Under the law of Ontario the original covenantor then has a right of action—a property and civil right—to claim over against the person who purchased the property from him who was the original covenantor, with whom he has a covenant, either direct or implied, to assume his obligation under that mortgage. Cases have not been unknown in Ontario. I have one in mind—I cannot think of the citation—where a property passed from the original covenantor A to B, from B to C, and from C to D. Then your mortgagee brings an action. In that case the minister will see that here we would have the mortgagee getting say fifty per cent of his mortgage by an adjustment under this act, then suing the original covenantor for the balance, and getting judgment against him. Then the original covenantor may sue the person who purchased from him, and so on down the line. You have five persons involved whom you did not want to hurt, but you have hurt them all by your effort to help someone. Because of the four persons I have mentioned the one who happens to have enough assets to pay the mortgage is going to be stuck in the long run, with no redress. I am sure the minister does not want to introduce legislation which would impose an unfair burden on one class in order to relieve the situation for another class. I suggest that his advisory law officers have hardly thought their way through this proposed amendment to the end. The minister might give serious consideration to the situation which the hon. member for Leeds has suggested.

Mr. DUNNING: I admit at once that the whole thing is a headache; I do not deny that at all.

Mr. TOMLINSON: Might I suggest that this matter could be handled by the local judge who would know the particular circumstances. Why could these farmers who wish to make a second application not apply to the judge of the local court? If, in his opinion, they had not received justice under the original proposal, he could then grant an order. This would take away the possibility of a case arising such as I mentioned where money had disappeared and property had changed hands.

Mr. STEWART: Let us assume that a farmer has got a compromise under this act and has not carried it out; can he, under this amendment, go back and ask for a second hearing when he has not carried out the one made before?

Mr. DUNNING: I am quite sure the board of review would take into account the manner in which he had carried out the arrangement which had been made previously. We must remember that from that point of view this is a judicial proceeding presided over by a judge of the high court of the province. We must not assume that these judges would knowingly do an injustice. I think, when dealing with a difficult procedure, they would approach the matter from a high sense of duty. They cannot have all the matters before them at all times. Creditors do not always take the steps that they should to get all the facts before the board of review. That occasionally happens, although it is not so common with respect to corporate creditors who are usually well represented. Individual creditors are more common in the eastern provinces than they are in the west and sometimes they do not get all the facts before the board of review. Generally speaking, the creditor is well represented now that the act is thoroughly known.

With regard to the suggestion of the hon. member for Bruce, I doubt very much if making the right to go back in cases of lack of privity of contract subject to the decision of a county court judge would be really useful. I would point out that what my hon. friend says about the county court judge in Ontario knowing the people and so on would not be true generally of all Canada. The district court judges in the west have wide areas to serve, and they do not have that intimate local knowledge to anything like the degree my hon. friend points out may exist in some of the older counties of Ontario. It is difficult to make legislation of this kind cover widely divergent conditions in various parts of the country.

Mr. THORSON: The hon. member for York South has raised a serious objection to the amendment as it now stands and I submit that his objection should receive serious consideration. It might be dealt with by making some provision for the satisfaction or discharge of the mortgage when the farmer has paid the amount of the compromise settled by the board of review. In that way there would not be the chain of litigation pointed out by the hon. member. Some general provision might be made to cover similar cases of agreements and assignments of agreements. There could be a general provision to the effect that when a farmer has made a proposal and the proposal has been formulated by the board of review and he has paid the debt as fixed by the board of review, such payment shall operate as a discharge of the mortgage and of all the covenants contained in the mortgage. I think some such suggestion as that should be acted upon. Some such amendment should be made so that the chain of events pointed out by the hon. member for York South cannot happen. If it is decided that the amendment as printed in the bill will remove the bar of lack of privity of contract, then I think it follows automatically and as a matter of justice that all farmers should be dealt with in the same way. If from now on farmers are to have an opportunity of dealing with the person who holds a mortgage against their land, other farmers who have been denied that right in the past should be given an opportunity of taking the same action.

Mr. LAWSON: In view of the support given to my suggestion by the hon. member for Selkirk, it may seem ungrateful on my part when I do not support his, but I am compelled to point out that the whole basis of the jurisdiction of this parliament in connection with this matter is insolvency and bankruptcy. In such legislation as this we are constantly trespassing on property and civil rights, but by virtue of the provisions of the British North America Act we have jurisdiction only when those rights come into the field of bankruptcy and insolvency.

Mr. THORSON: Or when they are ancillary or necessarily incidental.

Mr. LAWSON: I am not so sure they go that far.

Mr. THORSON: I think so.

Mr. LAWSON: In the illustration I gave of the four men, A, B, C, and D, insolvency or bankruptcy would relate only to the debtor and the one who is defined by this act as the creditor. There would be no element of insolvency or bankruptcy with respect to the intermediate men. Consequently I am afraid that if you try to legislate them, into either the loss of their rights or the removal of their obligations, you immediately get into the field of property and civil rights. Then your whole amendment or section would become ultra vires.

Mr. McNIVEN (Regina): Does the order made by the board of review not contain the provision that the creditor shall accept the settlement in full satisfaction of his mortgage?

Mr. LAWSON: That is beside the point.

Mr. McNIVEN (Regina): How could he proceed all along the line against A, B, C and D? Before any action under the mortgage can be taken in Saskatchewan, a permit must be obtained from the debt adjustment board. The common practice is to permit foreclosure proceedings, but on the personal covenant no judgment can be obtained.

Mr. LAWSON: By reason of provincial legislation.

Mr. DUNNING: That is not the case in Ontario.

Mr. McNIVEN (Regina): I understand there is a moratorium in Ontario. I saw in either the Toronto Star or the Globe and Mail yesterday where the legislation had been extended. Mr. Macauley protested when this legislation was extended to the end of 1939.

Mr. STEWART: Not in the same terms.

Mr. McNIVEN (Regina): He said we were jumping too fast. They also dealt with interest up to October 1 of this year. I thought the necessity for legislation of that kind had long since passed in Ontario. It seems to me that in the case cited by the hon. member for York South, he as mortgagee could sue one or other of the covenantors only if he still retained the property and was able to transfer it upon payment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. THORSON: No; that is only the case in Manitoba and Saskatchewan, by special legislation.

Mr. McNIVEN (Regina): It is inherent in mortgage law.

[Mr. Thorson.]

Mr. LAWSON: No. If the hon. member will permit me, he will agree with me when I state this: The mortgagee must always be in a position to deliver the mortgaged property to the mortgagor, if the mortgagor comes in and pays the debt. But where a mortgagee has proceeded by public sale, and he realizes so much out of the mortgage, after due notice to the mortgagor he can still sue the original covenantor on the covenant.

Mr. McNIVEN (Regina): But not on foreclosure.

Mr. LAWSON: I shall first answer the question asked by the hon. member, and I am somewhat loath to do this, because I dread trying to give legal opinions extemporaneously. I would rather look them up.

Mr. STEWART: And without a fee, too.

Mr. LAWSON: Yes; but one has to do this in the public interest. I should like to draw these facts to the attention of the hon. member: A mortgage in Ontario is a combination of at least two, if not three things. It is a combination of pledge and hypothecation whereby you transfer a fee simple. The mortgagor has nothing left but the equity. Second, it is a contract, in which contract the mortgagor gives a personal covenant under seal to repay the mortgage money. The mere disposition of the hypothecation, or transfer of the fee simple, does not, of itself, wipe out the liability of the covenant under seal, unless it is done in a manner prescribed by the statutes of the province, in which event it may amount to a discharge of the obligations of the covenantor, as well as a discharge of the mortgage itself, and automatically a retransfer of the fee simple.

Mr. McNIVEN (Regina): You have to foreclose his equity of redemption.

Mr. LAWSON: If you want the equity as well as the fee simple.

Mr. DUNNING: There are three speaking at once.

Mr. STEWART: The more one considers this legislation, the more difficulty arises.

Mr. DUNNING: And the more you live with it, as I do.

Mr. STEWART: We have to live with it, too, but from a different angle. To my personal knowledge judges have on two or three occasions made orders that a mortgagee can proceed with the foreclosure of his mortgage because the relation of debtor and creditor did not exist between the farmer who bought the farm with the mortgage on it, and who did not therefore come under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and the other party to the contract. That mortgagee has proceeded to foreclose his mortgage and to sell his property. If this legislation passes, what position is he in?

Mr. PERLEY: A few moments ago the hon. member for Leeds made reference to a case where a debtor had not been living up to the terms of settlement. This brings to my mind many cases in Saskatchewan where, debtors having taken their cases to the board of review, decisions have been handed down and settlements made. But through no fault of their own those people have not been able to live up to the terms of settlement. They have not been making any effort to beat their creditors, but they have been placed in that position because of climatic conditions in the province, and because they have had no crops. Would the minister be willing to insert an amendment whereby such debtor would not be considered in default, and might have the privilege to—

Mr. DUNNING: Would the hon. member permit me to interrupt? Possibly he was not in the chamber when we made the mutual agreement that we would endeavour to stick to the matter dealt with in the sections of the bill, on the understanding that when we came to pass the title, matters which were not dealt with in the bill, but which members believe should be dealt with, might be considered. To discuss that point again at this time would be confusing, and an opportunity will be afforded at the time I have indicated.

Mr. PERLEY: I spoke because the hon. member for Leeds had opened the matter.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am in favour of the purpose behind the amendment, but its legal terminology has me almost as much confused as was the Minister of Finance a few moments ago when the hon. member for York South was mortgagoring and mortgageeing.

Mr. LAWSON: Well, that is scarcely a tribute to my clarity.

Mr. DUNNING: I think the hon. member for York South was particularly lucid, if I may say so.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It may be necessary for the law officers of the crown, in company with the Minister of Finance, to make certain changes in order to meet the problems which have been raised in connection with litigation against mortgagees. But in any change which may be made I do hope the minister will not forsake the principle stated in the amendment, namely to give the benefit of these amendments establishing a privity of contract, even if there is no relationship between debtor and creditor. I trust he will not permit that benefit to be taken out, and the retroactive value of the section lost.

There are two classes of people to be kept in mind. First of all there is the farmer whose case was not dealt with or whose case was rejected, who did not have a proposal formulated, who has had none of the benefits of the legislation and who through no fault of his own, but simply because certain provisions were not in the act which are now to be in it, is now debarred from the protection of the act. It would be manifestly unfair to refuse a man protection under the act merely because in days gone by it did not provide certain provisions it will now contain.

The other class of persons to be kept in mind are those who did have a proposal formulated under the act, but where there was no established privity of contract and who, as the Minister of Finance has said, are now in danger of having their cases upset. Although I believe the boards of review are sufficiently familiar with the circumstances with which they are dealing to make provision for the sort of thing I have indicated, when they are formulating a proposal, I hope the Minister of Finance will not remove the retroactive feature in the amendment he now proposes to the committee.

Mr. TUCKER: Right along we have had in the act the difficulties raised by the hon. members for York South and Leeds. We might have a farmer who owed money on a note to a bank. The note would have an endorser, and the farmer would apply for an adjustment of his debt. The debt would be cut down, say fifty per cent, and the bank would immediately turn round and demand payment of the balance from the endorser. Of course, that is the inevitable result of legislation like this.

Listening to some hon. members one is led to the conclusion that they must believe they can make an omelet without breaking an egg. No one would suggest you could give relief to certain debtors without seemingly injuring creditors, endorsers and guarantors. But there may be something in what the hon. member for Selkirk has said. I realize there must be grave doubts as to whether you can provide that the order of the board of review, when carried out, should discharge the entire obligation—even if it were also owed by a third party—and whether that might be regarded as an encroachment on the field of property and civil rights and so beyond our jurisdiction.

There is something, however, in what the hon. member for Selkirk says, that one might say that it was necessarily ancillary to giving effect to intentions under bankruptcy powers. For an example that has brought home the situation to me in the last couple of years: Practically every farmer owing money to a bank has one or two endorsers, and the result is that so far as the banks are concerned the act is not helping them as much as it should, because those banks immediately turn round and demand payment from the endorsers. If they are substantial endorsers, the banks do not care to what extent the debtor's obligation is written down. If you are prevented from legislating effectively in the field of bankruptcy, as you are, by that situation, it seems to me it must necessarily follow that you would be held to have the power to enter that field in order to make good your intention in regard to legislating in connection with bankruptcy. In other words, you might be held to have that power as necessarily ancillary to your powers to legislate in bankruptcy. It is, I realize, a matter of grave doubt, and if it is to be considered at all I think it should be considered as well in regard to endorsers of notes, and so on, with respect to every individual who is liable under an obligation which is written down by the board of review. It would be a very fine thing if you could provide that the obligation so written down is the limit of the amount of the obligation of every party to the transaction. There was some suggestion that that was the effect of the law until we got decisions from the courts to the contrary; in other words, if a debt of $100 was written down to $50, that was the total amount which was owed by anybody, and if that note had been paid, there was no obligation on the endorser any more than the maker to pay any more than the $50. In other words, the face of the debt was written down to that amount. But the courts decided otherwise. Now if it was thought seriously by the courts that the legislation already passed possibly had that effect, they must have thought that parliament had the power to pass such legislation, and so I suggest that it is worth while giving consideration to the question whether, when a debt is written down, it should not be provided that that is the total amount of the debt owing by anybody, and there should be no recourse for any further amount against anyone.

[Mr. Tucker.]

Mr. LAWSON: If I might be given just two more minutes, I promise to take no more time of the committee, but I should like to clarify my position. The hon. member for Rosthern has the happy or unhappy faculty of using terms which would leave on the country the impression that I was endeavouring, in the objections I have raised, to worry about the creditors instead of the debtors. My hon. friend has missed the point. The whole point I am raising is: Do we gain anything by relieving one debtor in order to pile all the debt on to another debtor? My hon. friend used the illustration that we cannot make an omelet without breaking eggs. That is not the point. All I was trying to point out was that you have the omelet and you cannot unscramble the eggs in the omelet and put the eggs back into their respective shells.

Mr. THORSON: I think the hon. member for York South has made a valuable contribution to the debate because he has pointed out a situation that will undoubtedly develop. I should like to endorse the proposal of the hon. member for Rosthern that the suggestion made by me a moment ago should be very carefully considered by the law officers of the crown. I submit that it cannot be reasonably contemplated that our legislation should result in the chaos that the hon. member for York South envisages, and therefore we must have power under our bankruptcy and insolvency jurisdiction to invade what would otherwise be the provincial field, so that chaos and confusion would not result. Consequently we must incidentally touch upon what would otherwise be property and civil rights. I make the submission with deference that the amendment that I suggested would be within our jurisdiction as being ancillary or necessarily incidental to bankruptcy or insolvency legislation.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, I do not think I should press this section as amended to a vote to-day. This is one of the most difficult matters, and I should like to have the opportunity of submitting to the law officers of the crown the suggestions that have been made by various legal members here this afternoon.

With respect to the chaotic condition portrayed so clearly by the hon. member for York South, I disagree entirely that he mixed us all up. I admit that these matters are a little confusing to the lay mind, and in that respect I sympathize with the hon. member for Weyburn, but the situation delineated by the hon. member for York South was crystal clear. I would point out that section 5A of the existing act does clarify the position of this legislation with respect to any possible infringement on property and civil rights. Section 5A reads:

> No proposal under this act nor the approval or confirmation thereof shall release any person who, under the Bankruptcy Act, would not be released by an order of discharge if the debtor had been adjudged bankrupt nor shall the approval or confirmation of a proposal release any security given by any third person.

It is quite evident that the framers of the act had in mind the desirability of keeping clear of any possibility of unconstitutionality by invading the sphere of property and civil rights, but section 5A is not at all affected by what we are proposing. I merely suggest that.

With respect to the other suggestion from the hon. member for Selkirk and the hon. member for Rosthern in regard to drafting something based upon our old friend the ancillary powers' feature of the constitution, this, as is well known is always introduced by those of us who desire to make what we deem to be constitutional progress but are barred by what looks like the plain intention of the constitution. My hon. friends will forgive me for saying that; but I have been listening for twenty years to attorneys-general and others arguing about the constitution and the extent to which the ancillary powers' section of the constitution goes, and always those who want to do a certain thing like to see if we cannot make it ancillary to something which we have undoubtedly power to do.

The discussion this afternoon has been informative from the legal point of view. The government do not desire to depart from the intention expressed in this amendment for the reason that we are convinced that by and large the greatest good for the greatest number will result from some such action as is here proposed; or perhaps I should put it another way, that the least harm to the least number will result, after having examined all the practical circumstances we can and what has come to our attention in the reports from various provinces and from the boards of review. At the same time I should like to have the discussion of this afternoon submitted to the law officers of the crown and the section now under discussion held over to a future occasion, and therefore unless someone has something further to contribute on this particular point I would suggest that the section stand.

Mr. THORSON: The minister has made reference to section 5A of the act. It is section 5A which has caused some of the grief to which the hon. member for York South has made reference, and I should like to suggest that section 5A might also be reconsidered by the law officers of the crown with a view to amendment of it.

Mr. LAWSON: Section 5A as it stands, as the hon. member for Selkirk I think will agree, really and distinctly puts the secured creditor beyond interference, because it extends the whole power under this act only to the same extent that we have it under the Bankruptcy Act, and secured creditors are not interfered with under the Bankruptcy Act.

Mr. THORSON: That is why I made the suggestion.

Section stands.

On section 2—Deceased farmers.

Mr. THORSON: Mr. Chairman, I doubt the wisdom of section 2. It would seem to me that section 2 proposes to make a drastic interference with the general law relating to the administration of estates. Under this proposal it might happen that an insolvent estate which would leave nothing to any beneficiary of the estate would be dealt with by a board of review in such a way as to create for a beneficiary something to which he is not now entitled at all.

Mr. BENNETT: How would that happen?

Mr. THORSON: This was pointed out in a case in Saskatchewan—I have it here—in re Hockley, which was decided in 1936 and is to be found in volume 2 of the Western Weekly Reports of that year. It came before chief commissioner Maclean of the board of review of Saskatchewan. In that case the liabilities disclosed amounted to $20,843. The only assets of the estate were the land in question, five shares in a telephone company, and two townsite lots. The administrator had valuated all these assets at $10,700. The board of review points out that the estate is clearly insolvent; that there is no surplus over and above liabilities and therefore nothing left for division amongst the next of kin, and the board goes on to say that it is not one of the purposes of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934, to reduce the liabilities of an insolvent estate to a point which would create some estate for division among the next of kin. This section would therefore, I respectfully submit, provide an estate for someone who might not be a farmer, for somebody who under the existing law is not entitled to any part of the estate. I think this goes beyond the essential and basic purpose of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

Mr. STEWART: I agree with the statements made by the hon. member for Selkirk. The original intention of the act was perfectly clear, namely to keep a farmer living and working and carrying on upon the farm under such conditions that he might be able to continue and to pay his debts, and it would be in the interest of creditors that that should be done. But a reasonable compromise should be made. This goes a step further than the original intention of the act.

Mr. TUCKER: The preamble of the act provides that "it is essential in the interest of the dominion to retain the farmers on the land as efficient producers." The amendment specifically proposes that it shall apply only where one of the beneficiaries is remaining on the land. It reads, "being satisfied that a member of the family of the decedent resides and will continue to reside upon the farm of the decedent and intends and is able to operate the same." That brings it strictly within the terms and intentions of the original act. In Saskatchewan, time after time, when farmers have died the family carries on upon the farm; it is known as practically a family farm, and the family, the head of the farm being dead, need help more urgently in order to carry on than they did when the head of the household was alive. It is just as important to keep that family there on the farm, farming it, as it was to keep them there when the head of the household was alive. That was the essential purpose of the act, and it is being carried out by this amendment.

I suggest, however, that there should be an amendment in order to carry the intention of the act fully into effect. The present amendment refers to the farmer who "was at the date of his death unable to meet his liabilities as they became due." The essential part was "at the date of his death." There are many cases throughout the country of farmers who died, probably in 1929 or 1930, in fairly good circumstances. The family carried on upon the land, endeavouring to farm it, and in many cases getting along fairly well; but at the present time they, like their neighbours, are unable to meet their debts as they become due. I submit that they should have the right to have their case considered so that they can remain on the land as "efficient producers," and the amendment I suggest to the minister is that the subsection should read in this way, "whose legal representative from the assets of the said farmer's estate is unable to meet the liabilities of said estate as they become due." That would mean that all they would have to show would be that, when the legal representative applied under the act, at the time of application, which might be to-morrow, the legal representative is unable to meet, from the assets of the estate, the obligations of the estate as they fall due. If the clause is left as it is now, many people who should have the benefit of this amendment will not get it, because there are many estates which cannot meet their obligations as they fall due to-day which could have met them in 1929 or 1930 when the estate came into being. While I suggest that consideration should be given to some such amendment, I commend the government most earnestly for the amendments they have proposed; they will certainly be very gratefully received by the farmers and people generally, at any rate in the province of Saskatchewan.

[Mr. Stewart.]

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am in hearty agreement with the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Rosthern. This act was passed, as has been said, to take care of insolvent farmers, and for that reason was found by the judicial committee of the privy council to be intra vires. There seems to me no reason, then, why families of deceased farmers or the legal representatives of such families should not receive the same benefits. A number of cases could be mentioned—the Hockley case, cited by the hon. member for Selkirk, is one in point—where a family endeavouring to carry on farming operations are denied the protection of this act by virtue of the fact that they do not come under the definition of "a farmer" as it is now contained in the act. I believe the amendment suggested by the minister would cover such cases. I know a number of cases where the husband has died, leaving the wife with a family of children none of whom is old enough to come under the definition of the act or to own the property, and to deny them the privileges of this act would be to make it impossible for them to continue as efficient producers on the soil, which is the object of this act.

Mr. BENNETT: Under the amendment the widow would be the member of the family who, residing on the place, would be entitled to the possession.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes. That is why I am in favour of the amendment. The widow or her legal representative would be able, under this amendment, to carry on with her young family the operation of the farm. That is why I support this amendment. But there is nothing in the section to say that this will be retroactive in the same way as the former amendment.

Mr. DUNNING: Automatically so.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That covers the point. I have in mind this Hockley case and several others. These people would now, as I understand the situation, be permitted to remain on the land in view of the fact that the bar which affected them before is now removed. Is that correct?

Mr. DUNNING: There is no doubt about that. I am advised that that is the opinion of the Department of Justice.

Mr. TUCKER: I think there is a very real point in what I stated a moment ago.

Mr. DUNNING: I am in very grave doubt about that. The hon. member supposes a case in which a man was solvent when he died, whenever that may have been. The estate may have been carried on by virtue of the terms of the will for twenty years or more, or any length of time, during a long period in which this act was not in force. The act came into being only in 1934, but we are asked to open the way for the executors of that estate to take advantage of these provisions because in their operation of the business they have arrived at a point where they need some adjustment. I am much more anxious to deal with the sort of cases that are familiar to all of us, where the farmer has died with an application before the board. That is the hardest kind of case. The widow has enough trouble anyway, particularly when she has small children and finds that all the proceedings which have been taken hitherto have become null and void. We want to cover that sort of case. Do we not also want to cover the other type of case where the man died insolvent but had not yet made an application. He died insolvent since—

Mr. BENNETT: He was within the act.

Mr. DUNNING: He himself was within the act, but he died. To extend the act to the class of cases mentioned by my hon. friend from Rosthern would open up the field, and I cannot see the necessity for that. Certainly the important thing is to deal with cases of real hardship. It is not the intention at all to make the benefits of this act available to heirs who are not resident on the farm. The whole intent of the act is preserved in the proposed amendment. The widow or member of the family—and "member of the family" is defined—must satisfy the court that they can and will live on the farm, and in such case the court can make an order enabling them to do so. In all conscience, if we are willing by this legislation to provide means whereby a court can make an order that a farmer may stay on his farm and operate it, surely it is even more important that when he is dead and gone we should make it possible for his wife or son or somebody to have the advantage which the father would have had, had he lived. I earnestly hope the committee will see eye to eye with me, and adopt this amendment.

Mr. THORSON: I am in sympathy with the object sought by the amendment, but I point out that the amendment will confer benefits upon persons who were not contemplated originally by the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

Mr. BENNETT: Do you mean section 6A?

Mr. THORSON: Yes. There is the difficulty that, as a result of the operation of this amendment, estates will be created for persons who are quite outside the original scope of the act, which was to help efficient producers to remain on the land.

Mr. TUCKER: In reply to the minister, there is this discrepancy which I would bring to his attention. If a person twenty years ago was insolvent and died, his personal representative could apply under this act; but if the man died five years ago and his estate was perfectly solvent when he died but became insolvent owing to recent conditions, his representative could not apply under the act. That is an inconsistency which, in my opinion, should be given consideration. There is no doubt that even if a man died thirty years ago and was insolvent when he died, his personal representative could apply under this act as it stands. But if he died five years ago, being solvent at the time, and his estate became insolvent subsequently owing to conditions that had arisen, application could not be made. I think some consideration should be given to this point and an effort made to extend the scope of the amendment and make it more consistent in this regard.

There is another point I would mention. It is provided that the legal representative of the decedent may apply to the court. I suggest that in order to cut down expenses the words "ex parte" should be inserted, so that there would be no necessity of proceeding by the more expensive method of notice of motion.

Mr. BENNETT: I agree with the observations of the hon. member for Rosthern. I was going to make a suggestion, not as regards the widening of the section but with respect to its inconsistency, which he has pointed out. Paragraph (b) of section 6A would have to read: "Was at the date of his death, since the coming into force of this act, unable to meet his liabilities as they became due." The main act came into force in 1934, and it is clear that there is no answer to what the hon. member for Rosthern and the hon. member for Selkirk have said. You create a new class of those who died prior to 1934 and whose descendants can now take advantage of the act. I do not think that was intended; it would be manifestly unfair. I appreciate the intention, but there is no answer to what both hon. gentlemen have said in that regard. The minister will see the force of that at once.

On the second point which the hon. member for Rosthern has raised, I was going to suggest that there should not be any application at all to the court. I do not see why there should be an application to the court for the purpose of enabling the representative of the decedent to carry on his proceedings. He might use the authority of this act, rather than an order of the court. Should we add the expense of an order of the court? I agree with what was said by the hon. member for Rosthern in that connection. I wonder if it would be proper at the moment to make a few observations with respect to this statute? I might point out that there is no title to the bill. I did not call the attention of the minister to that fact when he suggested that general discussion might be had upon the title being passed. I know he did not intend by that observation that there should not be further discussion.

Mr. DUNNING: I should have said, "at the conclusion."

Mr. BENNETT: Does the minister not think the section should stand to be dealt with further?

Mr. DUNNING: The important question raised by the leader of the opposition, based upon the remarks of the hon. members for Selkirk and Rosthern, is in connection with paragraph (b):

Was at the date of his death unable to meet his liabilities as they became due.

The crux of the question is: Should we put in at that point, after the word "death," the words "since the coming into force of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act," or should we amend the section in the manner suggested by the hon. member for Rosthern so as to make it applicable to all estates whenever and however created?

Mr. BENNETT: I hardly think we should adopt the latter suggestion.

Mr. DUNNING: That is my point. My right hon. friend agrees with the hon. member for Rosthern as to the presence of the difficulty but not as to the extension of the remedy.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think so. I agree with what the hon. member for Selkirk says in that regard.

Mr. DUNNING: If I gathered correctly the view of the hon. member for Selkirk, the difficulty would be met by making the paragraph read "since the coming into force of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act."

Mr. THORSON: I think it was the hon. member for Rosthern who spoke of that.

Mr. DUNNING: That would not meet the hon. member's point?

Mr. BENNETT: It would meet it as to the rights of those not intended to be dealt with.

Mr. THORSON: Yes, it would meet that.

Mr. DUNNING: As to the application to a court, it was thought that it would be better to have an ordinary court decision as to the question of intention to reside and all those matters which would constitute entitlement to apply to the board of review. The board of review being constantly engaged on matters of adjustment, it would be set by this to try a new sort of thing, as to intention and ability and all that. It was thought better to send the applicant to the court.

I think, however, in the light of the discussion so far, I had better let this stand for further consideration. I have not yet got an expression of opinion as to whether the words "ex parte" as suggested by the hon. member for Rosthern would cover that point as to application to the court.

Mr. BENNETT: If it is only a matter of procedure, there are no rights to be affected, I think the hon. member for Rosthern is right; it should be done ex parte as a matter of saving expense. No one in particular is interested in that phase except the family itself and the board. If the minister concludes that an order of the court is essential—frankly I do not agree with him in that, but it is not a matter of importance—if we are to have an order of the court I think it should be done ex parte.

Mr. DUNNING: The question of convenience enters in. "Court" here means district court or county court, and therefore is easily accessible to the party, whereas the mere business of getting before the board of review, when there is only one board in the province, is rather difficult. However, we shall let the section stand; the discussion has been enlightening and helpful.

Mr. TUCKER: Before we pass on, I support the leader of the opposition in regard to the suggestion that perhaps it is not necessary to have a court application at all; for if anyone applies under this section who has no right to come under it, that point could be raised before the board of review itself, which is presided over by a high court judge, and if he cannot justify his position as having a right to be there, no order will be made by the board of review. Even if you permit it to be done ex parte, it is putting people to unnecessary expense. I did not venture to suggest such a great change as the leader of the opposition has suggested, but I would be in favour of it if it could be considered.

On the other point, if you think of limiting this section to people who died after the coming into force of the act, which was July 3, 1934, you very seriously limit the effect of this section, because that is limiting it to people who died within a period starting a little over three years ago. I suggest that there is no particular reason to be so hard on people the head of whose family died during the period of this depression. If the suggested amendment were made, the family of someone who died in 1930, no matter how much he left his family in need of help by an act like this they would not be able to get the benefit of this amendment. I suggest that the whole purpose of the amendment is to make the act apply to estates as well as to individuals. All that an individual has to show is that at the time when he is applying he cannot pay his debts as they fall due. We should put the same test upon the representative of an estate, to show that when he is applying he cannot out of the estate pay the debts of the estate as they fall due. The limitation proposed by the minister would, I feel, sweep away practically half the benefit of this amendment.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not agree with that. However, we shall let the section stand.

Section stands.

On section 3—Stay of proceedings.

Mr. BENNETT: A recent decision of the court of appeal in Alberta indicates that the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act with respect to failure on the part of a farmer or his successors to implement the terms of the composition create a situation which has led to some difficulty. Mr. Justice Ford dissented from the judgment of the court, which was delivered by the chief justice and concurred in by the other three justices of appeal. I have no doubt the department is familiar with that decision; the case was The Commercial Life Assurance Company of Canada v. Makary Strynadka.

Could not section 11 be extended so as to make it clear that there would be no difficulty about the point? The district court judge dealt with the matter in question. Payments had been ordered by the board to be made in 1936 and the farmer did make some payments, but defaulted in 1937; notice was given for a receiving order, and an order annulling the composition, extension or scheme of arrangement. The question that had to be decided was whether or not such application should be made under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act or under the provisions of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. The judgment of the court sets out at considerable length the relevant statutes, and concludes that the district court judge was right in refusing the order under the Bankruptcy Act. Mr. Justice Ford came to the conclusion that under the provisions of the act itself there was power to annul the composition. Now I have a clear appreciation—if one might rely on one's own memory about the matter—of what we intended to do by that act. It was intended that if the debtor did not carry into effect the provisions of the arrangement with his creditors, he might be placed in bankruptcy, and it was intended that it should be done under the provisions of the statute itself. Mr. Justice Ford put the matter very fairly when he said:

> The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act is the principal act and the Bankruptcy Act is the auxiliary. From the time when the farmer makes a proposal for a composition, extension of time or scheme of arrangement, his property is deemed to be under the authority of the court, limited of course within the terms provided, pending the final disposition of any proceedings in connection therewith, including the proceedings which may be taken in the case of failure to carry out the terms of a confirmed proposal. It seems to me that no other construction can adequately protect a farmer who has failed to carry out the terms of a confirmed proposal from being "put into bankruptcy" by reason of an uncontrollable default on his part. That, in my view, is the reason for the adding of subsection 3 to subsection 2 of section 2 and the only construction which gives subsection 3 its full limiting effect in favour of the farmer.

The result is that no proceedings can be taken under the Bankruptcy Act unless there is an unsecured creditor for $500. That situation does not develop in some of these cases. I think it should be made abundantly clear that the Bankruptcy Act does not apply in determining that question. The complaint which has been made by many people against the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act has been that there has never been a single payment made under compositions that were arrived at, and as those payments had not been made and no bankruptcy followed the result was that merchants and small retailers complained very bitterly about the act itself. Might it not be possible in the section with which we are now dealing to make it clear that the application for the annulment of the composition is to be made under the provisions of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and not under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, which imposes limitations upon that right? I submit that is rather an important matter to consider because we do not want, on the one hand, to have it thought that we have accorded these extraordinary benefits and, on the other hand, that we are placing a premium upon a disregard of the obligations created by the person for whose benefit they were made. I think the minister will agree fully with that view. I think everyone wants to see the fair thing done between the farmer and his creditors. I suggest that possibly the minister might not be averse to the section standing in order to see whether or not a few words could be added at the end, as I think they could, to make it abundantly clear that in the event of failure this action would be taken. You will observe that an application could be made under the main act to deal with the situation in the manner provided, and recourse would not be had to the Bankruptcy Act for that purpose.

Mr. DUNNING: The main reason for the delay in proceeding with the consideration of this bill was the fact that we learned of the Alberta judgment, just discussed by the leader of the opposition, and I felt it unwise to proceed in committee, particularly with the section now under discussion, without first having the best advice possible with regard to the bearing of the Alberta judgment upon what we were doing. The whole material and the reasons for judgment in the Alberta case of Commercial Life Assurance Company of Canada v. Strynadka were submitted to the Department of Justice. In order that the legal members of the committee may study it, perhaps I should place on Hansard the letter from the deputy minister of justice. It reads:

> At the request of Mr. Gordon, I have studied the reasons for judgment of the court of appeal of Alberta in the case of the Commercial Life Assurance Company of Canada versus Strynadka with the object of advising you whether, in view of these reasons, an amendment should be made to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.
> First, I have come to the conclusion that the reasons of Chief Justice Harvey are substantially correct. I do not think it was ever contemplated by parliament that a secured creditor should, in the case of failure to carry out the terms of a confirmed proposal, have the right to proceed under section 19 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act; a secured creditor never had the right, under the Bankruptcy Act, to proceed under section 19 (2) in respect of his secured debt.
> Secondly, the rights and remedies of the secured creditor, once the proposal becomes binding upon all parties, are regulated by the law of the province; upon failure to carry out the terms of the proposal, the remedy of the secured creditor, in respect of his secured debt, is to resort to his civil rights as provided by the provincial law.
> Thirdly, or, upon failure to carry out the terms of the proposal, the secured creditor may proceed by petition under subsection 3 of section 2 of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, but only, of course, in respect of that part of his claim which is not secured This unsecured claim must amount to $500 and the failure to carry out the terms of the proposal must have been due to causes within the control of the farmer.

I am advised that in the light of all circumstances the judgment in the Alberta case does not render necessary any amendment to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. Perhaps my right hon. friend would like time to consider this.

Mr. BENNETT: I read the judgment, and I cannot say that I differ with the view expressed by the deputy minister. As a matter of fact, I do not think we can avoid coming to the conclusion that inasmuch as the Bankruptcy Act does not provide that a secured creditor may make a declaration for bankruptcy, there is no doubt as to the soundness of the view he has expressed. On the other hand, I think it was the intention of parliament that where there had been a failure to carry out the terms of a settlement, any person affected by it might take steps to have the debtor declared a bankrupt. I am sure those connected with the department will remember the discussion which took place when we had the bill in hand. I remember there was some difficulty in drawing the statute and the rules so as to make it clear that default meant action to declare the farmer a bankrupt. That was the intention at any rate.

Mr. DUNNING: I think that is the intention as expressed by my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: From the debates.

Mr. DUNNING: I am reading from the act.

Mr. BENNETT: According to the judgment of the chief justice, the rights of the secured creditor have not been changed. That is really the basis of judgment. Mr. Justice Ford took the view—it was from his judgment I should have said I was reading and not the judgment of the chief justice—that the act was a charter within itself and that there was a right to apply, even though it was a secured creditor, to have the debtor declared insolvent.

Mr. DUNNING: In other words, the creditor has under this act rights which he did not have under the Bankruptcy Act.

Mr. BENNETT: Because he was subject to the reduction of his rights.

Mr. THORSON: A reduction of the debt; otherwise his rights remain.

Mr. BENNETT: A reduction of his debt; that is the correct term. The really extraordinary nature of this legislation is not that which deals with the ordinary creditor but that which deals with the secured creditor. There is no doubt about that. I do not think anyone will question for a moment that it was a most extraordinary thing to do. But it was done under extraordinary circumstances. The rights of the secured creditor are affected. There may be a reduction of his debt and the period within which the debt may be paid is extended. Having had that situation forced upon him, he now has conferred upon him the right to have the farmer declared an insolvent and bankrupt if he fails to carry out his obligations without due excuse. You will remember there is a provision to excuse him where the causes are beyond his control.

It is the secured creditors who feel that they have been dealt with harshly. Under the Bankruptcy Act they can value their security, but here they just have to take their chance with everybody. I must say that I have had brought to my attention a few cases which have caused me deep concern. As an example, a man may have saved $4,000 or $5,000 and loaned it to the least efficient farmer in his district. He who was the most efficient farmer now finds himself compelled to lose his money, sometimes to the extent of half, to the inefficient man who borrowed the money and who is now laughing at him. That certainly was never the intention of the legislation.

Mr. DUNNING: And in many cases the efficient man has been deprived of his own wealth which he had saved, through causes with which his efficiency had nothing to do.

Mr. BENNETT: I agree.

Mr. DUNNING: There are many tragic cases.

Mr. BENNETT: The bank, the loan company, the mortgage company and the private individual at times have had their debts slashed in two. The period of time within which payment is to be made is extended sometimes from five to ten years. Under the circumstances should we not make it clear, beyond peradventure, that this provision is the one that governs? I do not think there is any answer to what the chief justice has said; the judgment of the chief justice is a matter of strict law. But I do not believe that was ever the intention of this parliament when dealing with the matter, because we have said that if we take away from a man something, then we also confer upon him a right.

Having taken away from him his property to the extent of $1,000 or $2,000, we have said that if the proposal formulated and accepted is not carried into effect, in the absence of good reason to the contrary, the debtor shall be subject instanter to bankruptcy. That was the theory of it. Automatically that result followed.

Mr. DUNNING: Would it, in practical fact, be of much use to the creditor, in the great bulk of cases?

Mr. BENNETT: I am frank to say to the minister that at first I could not see why they were so anxious about it. My correspondent at one time—well, I can see no reason why I should not use his name—was Mr. McCuaig, who was a member of the former board. He was greatly perturbed about the matter, as it affected some interest with which he was familiar. The answer to the minister is this: If he is driven back to the position of foreclosure, he cannot foreclose, because the law of the province prevents him.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, exactly, and by changing this we are circumventing that provincial law.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, quite, which, of course, is the price paid for taking advantage of those facts, and a very proper price it is too. There never before was such a statute placed upon the statute books of this country.

Mr. DUNNING: Quite right; I agree.

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact, when we are dealing with the statute I shall tell the committee the story of it, because it is a very interesting one. But there never was a statute such as this placed on our statute books before. It goes much farther than bankruptcy. If the benefits accrue, surely there must be corresponding responsibilities; and sometimes the only intention has been just to get an order.

Mr. DUNNING: Some time there will be a day of reckoning.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, quite. I had presented to me a letter signed by a very large number of persons saying that in a given locality in Alberta—not the drought area of Saskatchewan—not a single proposal had been carried into effect by even the first payment being made. That is pretty hard, is it not?

Mark you, I remember very clearly the circumstances which brought about our adding to the statute a provision whereby if a man gave a good reason why he could not pay, he was relieved from payment. But in the absence of a good reason, when a man's debt is cut in two—some of them have been; I know of one in my locality in which it was cut down to forty per cent of the whole—when that happens, should not the other liability attach?

Mr. THORSON: If I remember correctly, the court of appeal in Manitoba has held that all that proposal does is to cut down the amount of the indebtedness, and that if the farmer does not live up to the terms of the proposal, the secured creditor may take whatever steps against his security he could have taken before the proposal was made. Apparently that seems to be the case in Alberta. In our province foreclosure may take place if there is default under the terms of the proposal.

Mr. TUCKER: I take it from what the leader of the opposition has suggested that what they had in mind when they passed the law was that a creditor, even if he had only $10 coming to him, could plunge a man into bankruptcy. Surely there must have been some intention to place a limit upon such action, because under the present Bankruptcy Act a secured creditor must have $500 owing over and above the value of his security, or unsecured creditors coming together in launching proceedings must have $500 owing to them. Otherwise a man could be launched into a bankruptcy court for a $5 obligation.

Mr. BENNETT: That well might be, and that is the reason the provision was there—if he could be so treated.

Mr. TUCKER: But I submit that a man who has a very small obligation owing him should not be able to set in motion bankruptcy provisions, as he could do if the amendment suggested by the leader of the opposition were carried. If the purpose is to get around provincial moratoria laws, you of course do not get around them much by throwing a man into bankruptcy, because the moment a man is thrown into bankruptcy and an attempt is made to vest his land in the secured creditor under bankruptcy provisions, he can immediately claim his exemption. Then they have to resort to foreclosure proceedings anyway.

Mr. DUNNING: I believe we are on section 3.

Mr. BENNETT: The last section.

Mr. DUNNING: No, section 3, and it might be permitted to stand. We have made some progress in developing points this afternoon. Sections 2 and 3 will stand. We have not yet passed a section. Then, section 4 provides for the appointment of one or more boards of review.

Section stands.

On section 4—Board of review.

Mr. DONNELLY: I wish to repeat what I said the other day with respect to the necessity for uniformity of decisions.

Mr. DUNNING: We will take that into account.

Mr. DONNELLY: And whether to have the members of the board interchangeable, or to have—

Mr. DUNNING: It is a matter of administration, and it can be arranged.

Mr. DONNELLY: There should be regulations along that line.

Mr. DUNNING: I wish we could do it as between provinces, but that is rather more than we can hope.

Section 4 agreed to.

On section 5—No new proposal after a certain date.

Mr. DUNNING: This provision embodies one of the principles of the bill, one which everyone commended, and gives power to the governor in council to state by proclamation a date after which no new proposal shall be made or filed by any farmer, or accepted by any official receiver in any province. It is a provision similar to the one which brought the act into force by proclamation in the various provinces. It is thought to be the best solution of one of the worst difficulties we have.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): How would a government decide as to whether or not a board of review should continue to operate in a certain province? Would there be consultation with the government of that province, or representations made to the board of review in that province?

Mr. DUNNING: Well, Mr. Chairman, I have given a great deal of consideration to the qualifications which could be put into the act with respect to this power, and I find it difficult to evolve any which could possibly be of sound application under the various circumstances which will prevail. I think I shall ask that section 5 be permitted to stand, because evidently one or two members wish to speak to it.

Before calling it six o'clock I should like to finish my answer to the hon. member for Weyburn. I think ultimately there is no other way than for the government to accept responsibility, undertaking such investigations as it may be able to, within a province, as to the circumstances prevailing there. In some provinces the governments do not wish to give an opinion on the matter. In other provinces they are quite emphatic. In some provinces the counties are expressing themselves vigorously in the matter. In other provinces farmers' organizations are expressing themselves. I think we must leave it—

Mr. BENNETT: And in all provinces individuals are expressing themselves.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, in all provinces, and most vociferously. I believe it is impossible to lay down any rule as to the considerations which would guide the government. I believe there will be sufficient check in this chamber on the possibility of making mistakes along that line.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

LANGUAGE QUALIFICATION OF PERSONS APPOINTED OR TRANSFERRED

Mr. WILFRID LACROIX (Quebec-Montmorency) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 3, to amend the Civil Service Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

On section 1—Method and tenure of appointments.

Mr. BENNETT: The bill has been settled in the special committee, but I am afraid it has not been reprinted. I have the old bill here, but I think we can put it through very quickly as an agreement has been arrived at.

Mr. POULIOT: Efficiency and good work.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have just been handed a copy of the reprinted bill. The explanatory note explains the changes that have been made in the committee.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The amendment that was made in the committee appears in the seventeenth line. After the word "the" these words have been inserted, "persons with whom it is required to do business: provided that such language shall be the French or the English language."

Mr. REID: This is the first time I have seen the reprinted bill, and on a cursory examination it seems to me the question might arise whether it is the locality or the province that is intended.

Mr. RINFRET: I might explain that this bill was sent to the special committee on the civil service, where several projected amendments were discussed by the members of the committee, and a subcommittee was appointed to go over them. This amendment was finally adopted by the committee, upon the recommendation of the chairman of the civil service commission, was approved by the sub-committee and subsequently by the committee itself. I am quite satisfied that the bill in its present form will attain the end we all have in view.

Mr. HEAPS: This is the first time I have seen the amendment, and going over it casually I do not think it will make very much difference in the conditions that prevail at the present time. It is for the civil service commission to appoint people to positions requiring to be filled in various parts of Canada, and we are really attempting to do here by legislative action what should be done by those responsible for the administration of the acts of parliament. I do not like to mix up administrative with legislative functions. If the civil service commission is not appointing fit and proper persons to occupy these positions, that is not the fault of the legislation on the statute books, but the fault of the commission, and if representations were made to the commission that there should be appointed to these positions in the province of Quebec and other parts of Canada people speaking the language required in those districts, I think that is all that should be necessary. I think it is a mistake to have this kind of thing in the form of legislation, and personally I would have been much better satisfied if the committee inquiring into the matter had made representations to the commission to see that appointments such as have been complained of in the past were not repeated, and that persons were appointed who could speak the language required.

Mr. BROOKS: The hon. member for Winnipeg North has expressed pretty well the exception that was taken by some members of the committee, but not very many. We all agreed on the principle of the bill, but some of us felt that this matter could be better dealt with by regulation than by an act of parliament which is restrictive in character. The main point brought out in the committee was that very often to some English-speaking districts a French-speaking representative of some department would be sent, and vice versa to the French-speaking districts an English representative of the agriculture department or some other department would be sent, who would be unable to look after the business properly because of being unable to speak the language of the district. But the representative of the civil service commission advised us that the departments and the commission always endeavoured to see that the person sent was conversant with the language of the people with whom he would come in contact. Some of us felt that this could be done much better by regulation, and that this would be much more flexible than a bill of this kind.

Another point brought up was that some of these positions required technical men who did not have to come in contact with the people, and so the language requirement was not so necessary; but under a bill of this kind you may not get the best technical men because you are restricted in making appointments. As a member of the committee I did take exception because I felt this matter could be dealt with better by regulation than by a restrictive bill of this kind, but the committee was almost unanimously in favour of this amendment.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I desire to congratulate the members of the committee upon having come to a conclusion which will meet the views of both the committee and the house. Even those who have expressed some little dissent agree on the principle, and object only to the method, believing the matter could be dealt with better by regulation, and that it was not necessary to express the wish of the house in a bill. I am reminded of the words of a famous French diplomat of former days, Talleyrand, who, when negotiating a treaty of some importance, insisted on certain words being put in the treaty, but others said, "It is not necessary because it goes without saying." Talleyrand replied, "Yes, it goes without saying, but it goes still better if we say it." I think it is practically the same here; and if everybody agrees that the principle is right, why should there be any objection to our stating in a bill what we want?

Mr. HEAPS: I am not opposing the principle. I do not object to its being stated in the regulations; but that is different from its being included in an act of parliament, and I am afraid that in practice it may have an effect the very reverse of what has been stated by the Minister of Justice. For instance, take a district where sixty per cent of the population is English-speaking and forty per cent French-speaking; districts containing approximately that proportion of the two races can be found in various parts of the dominion. Suppose an English-speaking person is placed in a district like that and he has to meet the forty per cent of French people; the letter of the act would be carried out, but the spirit would be lacking. Personally I would rather see in such a district a person who can speak both languages than to have an appointee who is capable of speaking only one language. Although the letter of the act would in such a case have been carried out, the official would be under a handicap in meeting a large number of persons in that area.

Mr. MacINNIS: I believe it has already been stated that this bill was referred to the special committee on the civil service, and that committee referred it to a subcommittee. The subcommittee, after considering the matter several times, drew up this amendment, which I believe was passed unanimously; and when it was placed before the special committee I believe it was assented to by all who happened to be in the room at the time. I was present and voted for the amendment, and while I am not quite sure that it is the best thing that could have been done, I shall vote for it to-night. I think we can easily understand the reasons for the introduction of such a bill as this. It is an effort to meet conditions which do not exist in my province of British Columbia. I never had the experience of trying to converse in my province with an official who could not speak my language, but possibly the hon. member who brought this measure forward found himself or some of his acquaintances in that situation. For that reason we should give careful consideration to the bill. The only thought in my mind of wherein it might be detrimental is that too much emphasis might be placed on language and not enough upon other qualifications necessary to fill a position. However, that is a matter which must be left to the good judgment of the civil service commission and the heads of the departments concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a difficulty, and it is a very real one. The other evening I pointed out that, to my mind, the principle of this legislation was sound; but I should have preferred that it be provided that whoever was appointed to a position in which there were varying numbers of people speaking two languages should be a bilingualist. That would be the sound thing to do. But I understand that certain difficulties have arisen in getting people qualified in that way. This substitutes, for a knowledge of languages adequate to communicate with the whole community, knowledge of the language of the majority, which is not the general purpose of the legislation in the Civil Service Act. I fear it will be found after practical experience with this provision that it will have to be repealed, because it substitutes for ability to use the languages of the community, the language of the majority, and if it should happen that that majority was English and there was a minority of forty per cent who could speak only French, you would have a very difficult situation; e converso, if the population were forty per cent English-speaking and sixty per cent French-speaking, the situation would be extremely difficult. It will be observed that the last section is the one which contemplates examinations being given in one language or the other, so that what would be required is proficiency not in both languages but only in the language of the majority with which the official is to do business. I gathered when the hon. member introduced his measure—and I certainly feel that he presented it with great moderation—that what he had in mind was that whoever was appointed should be able to speak the language of the community but that he should be by choice one whose natural language, if I may use that word, is the language of the majority. The proposal which has been approved by the special committee will not, I am afraid, meet the difficulty he had in mind but will rather accentuate it. I may be wrong. I know that this is not what the hon. gentleman had in mind when he introduced his measure. His purpose was an absolutely sound one. If an appointment is to be made to the position of supervising inspector of agriculture in a community along the river St. Lawrence where seventy-five per cent of the population is French and twenty-five per cent English, the man who goes there should be able to speak to all those people, French and English, so as to make himself understood for the purpose of giving adequate directions. Under this legislation you will appoint one who is qualified by examination in the French language only, and twenty-five per cent will not be able to communicate with him.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not necessarily.

Mr. BENNETT: Not necessarily, but that is what the bill contemplates.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not agree.

Mr. BENNETT: All the minister has to do is to look at the last section. Candidates have the choice of which language they pass in, French or English.

Mr. RINFRET: I appreciate the spirit in which my right hon. friend approaches this bill, but he seems to be under the impression that from now on this is going to constitute the only qualification.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no.

Mr. RINFRET: It is added to other qualifications. What I like most about this bill is that it should create a new spirit in relation to these matters. I understand that when a position is open and comes under the provisions of this law, this requirement will not detract from the other qualifications demanded of candidates. If, for instance, an official is to operate in a French centre where there is an important English-speaking minority, I would say that it would be the duty of the commission to see that the candidate speaks both French and English and has other qualifications as well. This bill does not subtract anything from the present act or from the present qualifications required of candidates, but merely adds this additional requisite, that a candidate to be appointed must be able to speak the language of the people with whom he comes in contact. But he must have other qualifications as well.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, of course. But lest for one moment it should be thought that I was labouring under any such misapprehension, I desire at once to disabuse my hon. friend's mind of that impression. This does not in any sense deal with a question of qualifications as determined by the examinations. The technical qualifications remain as they were; but it is provided that instead of writing his examination in or having a knowledge of both English and French, he may select at his option in which language he will write, and if he writes it in French he will not by any chance be a bilinguist; if he writes it in English he will not by any chance be a bilinguist. The minister sees the point? The candidate has to qualify by examination.

If the Minister of National Revenue will look at the clause he will see that unless and until the candidate to be employed is qualified by examination in the knowledge and use of the language—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is quite opposite to being belingual.

Mr. BENNETT: That is exactly what I wanted to say. I shall not labour the point. I am afraid it does not meet the purpose that the mover of the bill had in mind. I think he was trying to say that appointments should be made under which a person otherwise qualified would be able to communicate with the residents of all the community with whom he came in contact. As the bill reads now, it substitutes for that a majority, which I do not think is the purpose intended.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROVISION AGAINST REFUSAL TO EMPLOY OR DISMISSAL FOR MEMBERSHIP IN TRADE UNIONS

The house resumed, from Friday, February 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Woodsworth for the second reading of Bill No. 4, to amend the criminal code.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): In rising to say a few words in support of this bill I hope that what I may have to say will help the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) to change his attitude towards the bill. I have no doubt at all that in the narrow legal sense the minister's position is quite correct, but I believe that the principle underlying the bill is sound. I maintain that although legally the workers have the right to organize to-day into trade unions and trade associations, in many instances actually they have not that right, because it does not make very much difference what the legal right is if the individuals concerned are unable, owing to certain economic factors, to exercise that right. And that is true to-day in many instances, as I shall prove before I sit down.

I have some little knowledge of the struggles made by the workers to secure the right to organize and to bargain collectively. As every hon. member who knows anything of the history of the working class is aware, that right has been strenuously opposed. Society, however, has been compelled to recognize the need for collective bargaining; that is, the need for negotiation between employers and employees on a basis of equality. It is, I think, becoming clear to thoughtful people even outside the labour movement that trade unions are a powerful factor for social betterment, and even for social stability; consequently I am not taking the minister's statement as the last word on this question. I have heard it said on many occasions in this house that certain things could not be done and I have seen those things done later on with all the sanctions of law behind them. The most striking fact in history is that the impossibilities of to-day become the actualities of to-morrow.

When the Minister of Justice spoke on this measure a few weeks ago, he read from a circular sent to all the provincial legislatures last year by the executive of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada. The circular urged the provinces to pass legislation similar to that asked for in this bill. It seemed to me that the minister in referring to the circular wanted to convey the impression that the Trades and Labour Congress considered that no action outside the provinces was possible in this matter. That, however, is not so. I shall quote very briefly from the circular referred to. It is a part of the submission made to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the members of the dominion cabinet this year by the executive of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is not the circular.

Mr. MacINNIS: I quote:

> We realize that jurisdiction in these matters rests with the provinces at present, rather than with parliament, and in the past year we have approached the several legislatures seeking protective legislation, with success in some cases. We firmly believe, however, that the dominion parliament also should recognize the rights of the workers to freedom of association and collective bargaining in as far as its jurisdiction extends, by providing suitable penalties for proven cases of interference with those rights.

That is exactly what this bill asks the government to do.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is not the circular from which I quoted. I quoted from the circular which was sent to the legislatures of the provinces.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is quite correct, and I am quoting from this submission to show that the executive of the trades and labour congress did not consider that action by the provinces was the last word in the matter. Let me give a line or two more from the same submission:

> It is a fact that the workers are not interfered with by the law in their desire to organize, but experience has shown that that is not enough.

We say that, because experience has shown that there is interference with the workers in their endeavours to organize, and because the provinces so far have not passed legislation to prevent such interference, this bill has become necessary. That is why it has been introduced.

With further reference to legal rights, I believe it was Anatole France who said that the majestic equality of the law recognized that it was illegal for the rich as well as for the poor to sleep under bridges, but he also noted that the rich were not very often prosecuted for sleeping under bridges. The majestic equality of the law in this instance allows the workers to organize; but if the employer says they must not, they are in a very difficult position, and we say that the law should be amended so as to guarantee that right to them. The law says that the employees as well as the employer have the right to organize; but if the employer objects it becomes very difficult for the worker to exercise his legal right. It becomes almost impossible, without great sacrifice on the part of someone. Someone must sacrifice his job; on many occasions someone must sacrifice his hope of improving his future position, must sacrifice the future of his family.

I should like to draw to the attention of the house a case which I think I drew to the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) last year, a case in which the Department of Labour tried to get a settlement. Burns & Company, Limited, in Vancouver had a dispute with its employees. Late in 1936 the workers of this company formed a trade union. This was discovered by the company, and nineteen employees were dismissed, including the ten who were the executive of the union. After many attempts had been made by the provincial Department of Labour and the federal Department of Labour to effect a settlement, the provincial department appointed Mr. Justice J. C. McIntosh of Victoria as commissioner to investigate. The commissioner held sittings extending, I think, over ten or fifteen days, at which numerous witnesses were heard. I should like to read briefly from his report, which states the conditions he found and the recommendations he made. This report is to be found in the June, 1937, issue of the Labour Gazette. He said:

The situation disclosed is unusual in labour disputes in Canada. No question of wage scale, hours of work or working conditions has arisen or is involved, as all such conditions were and are satisfactory to those affected, but consisted wholly of the activities of the newly formed labour union to which the majority of the employees belonged and the retaliatory reaction of the employing company's manager in relation thereto.

This union was formed with the sole purpose of advancing and protecting the interests of the company's employees and to improve the conditions of the workers, and with no ulterior motive.

No complaint was made by the manager of the services rendered by the employees, and an increase in pay was promised and later put into effect. He also informed the employees that they should seek to deal with the company in matters of mutual concern only through the medium of a plant or company union with no outside affiliations, this being the method adopted by most packing plants of consequence in Canada and the United States, of bargaining between the employees and employer, functioning in many cases side by side with a local union in such plants.

When the nineteen employees referred to were dismissed, a strike was called, and in referring to those dismissals the commissioner made this statement:

The intermingling of those nine employees against whom cause could be assigned, and those ten against whom no cause could be assigned except their activities as executives of their union, left only one implication. The manager must have known and anticipated that his action would culminate in a walkout of the employees, being members of the union.

As the commissioner could not get the parties concerned to agree, he proposed a plan of settlement himself. The report continues:

It is submitted as a reasonable plan for the reinstating in employment of the 131 employees affected—

For after the employees went on strike all of them were dismissed.

—apart from the nine mentioned, that the company shall reemploy fifty of those former employees in April, 1937, forty-one in May, 1937, and the remainder, being forty, in June, 1937, accelerating the numbers if the opportunity offers, at the scale of wages and working conditions now existing with the following provisoes:

Then he offers some suggestions for more harmonious working relations in future:

(a) The selection of such employees shall be by some arrangement agreeable to the parties, married men in any event to be first selected when possible.

(b) Upon this settlement being made effective the union shall immediately return the products of the company to the fair list.

(c) There shall be no discrimination on the part of the company towards returning employees because of their former union activities.

(d) The employees shall have the right to belong to any organization or association of their own choosing, and the company shall recognize a committee elected by all of its employees to represent them in their dealings with the company's management.

(e) The nine employees objected to by the company for cause shall have the privilege of appearing before the management of the company and being heard.

What I wish to bring particularly to the attention of the house is that despite the recommendations of the commissioner, very few of these employees have yet been taken back.

There is another point in this report which I think is very important. The commissioner stated that most, if not all, of the trouble developed because, first, the management did not understand trade union organization, and, second, the men themselves were not accustomed to trade union organization and their business agent did not approach his duties in the way that a more experienced trade union official would have done. And he made this recommendation or suggestion.

It is not submitted but suggested for obvious reasons, having regard to the future harmony of all concerned, that both the business agent of the union and the manager of the company be transplanted by their respective employers to other fields of endeavour.

Mr. ROGERS: Will the hon. member permit a question? I have not that report before me at the moment, but was it alleged by the company at that time that some of these employees were discharged for reasons other than their connection with a trade union?

Mr. MacINNIS: From the report I would take it that nine employees were discharged for cause.

Mr. ROGERS: And the others because of their connection with the union?

Mr. MacINNIS: The others because of their connection with the union. That is what I would take from reading the report. What I want to point out again is that despite the fact that these employees had the right to organize under the laws of Canada; despite the fact that a commissioner had found that they had that right and that there was no case against them; despite the fact that he recommended that they be put back in their positions, up to the present time only a very few of them have been permitted to go back to work.

I am sure the Minister of Labour will pardon me for quoting from a New Year's message he delivered at the end of 1936, published in the Labour Gazette of January, 1937. The minister expressed the right of association much better than I could when he said:

In connection with recent strikes in Canada there have been frequent complaints that certain employers have denied to their employees the right of association and have summarily discharged men and women who have been active in the organization of labour unions. It is necessary to state in the clearest terms that the right of association is a civil right, long established by law and usage.

That established law did not help the employees of the Burns company who lost their jobs and are still out of employment. I continue:

It was affirmed with special reference to Canada by an order in council of July 11, 1918 (P.C. 1743). It was proclaimed explicitly in the treaty of Versailles at the close of the world war. To deny the right of workmen to combine in any lawful organization they desire for the promotion of their common welfare is an open invitation to extremists to preach the futility of collective bargaining as an alternative to direct action.

In other words, to deny the right of organization tends toward a breaking of the law in other directions. If that is true—and I maintain it is—then it is incumbent upon this house to see that what the law allows, the law shall guarantee. I quote:

The right of association for legitimate purposes should be respected in the national interest and labour should not be denied the means of organizing for collective bargaining. The right of employers to organize for all lawful purposes is not questioned in any quarter. Employers are not entitled in the same breath to protest against governmental regulation of industry and to deny to labour its right to resort to legitimate measures of self-help to voluntary association.

I submit that the Minister of Labour has stated our position very clearly in that paragraph. These days we hear a great deal about democracy. Very few liberal speakers—I do not use the word "liberal" in a party sense—speak on this subject without referring to the necessity of maintaining democracy. May I say that I am in full accord with that. I believe that people have come to recognize the value of democracy as they have never done before, even if it is not as complete as we would like it to be. But democracy is impossible without freedom of organization. We measure our political democracy by the extent to which various classes in society are represented in government, and to make our political democracy worth while we must have economic democracy. Our economic democracy will be measured by the extent to which the various factors in our economic life share in its direction. The workers cannot share in the direction of industry until such time as they are organized. The industrial union by means of which the worker has some share in arranging the terms upon which he gives his labour, either of hand or brain, is the first step to that fuller democracy to which I hope we are travelling.

Whenever I think of democracy my mind goes back to a visit to the Scandinavian countries about a year and a half ago. I was impressed with the reality of democracy in those countries, and I am convinced that their democracy and to a large extent the stability of their social structure are dependent upon the organization of the various economic groups within the countries. In Sweden the employers are organized; labour is organized; the farmers have their organization and, what may be equally important, the consumers are organized. I believe we would solve many of the problems created in this country by monopolistic industry if in some way or another we could organize the consumers. As one writer has put it, "The Swedish road to democracy is through organization. The fundamental units of this organization are economic; their political parties reflect these alignments." Sweden with a population of a little over 6,000,000 people has 650,000 trade unionists. Canada with a population of something over 11,000,000, with about 2,000,000 workers who could organize, has not more than 250,000 trade unionists.

Mr. REID: Is the number of trade unionists in Sweden greater than the number in the old country?

Mr. MacINNIS: My information is that a greater proportion of the workers in Sweden are organized in trade unions than in any other country. I am not stating that definitely; it is simply the information I have at the moment. Mr. Justice McIntosh, the commissioner in the Burns dispute, stated that a possible cause of the dispute was the inexperience of the management in dealing with trade unions. May I say that the use of the instruments of democratic procedure does not differ from the use of any other instruments. We must learn to use them before we can use them efficiently. The old saying that practice makes perfect is just as true of trade union organization and negotiation as it is of anything else. When a union is well organized; when a union has had considerable experience in negotiating with employers, it is very seldom that there is a strike; it does happen the odd time, but not very often.

I should like to quote briefly from an article which appeared in Harper's Monthly Magazine, of November, 1936, by Mr. Hubert Herring. This deals with trade union organization in Sweden. It seems so good to me that I think it worth while to read it to the house:

> The Swedish labour union serves to make some six hundred and fifty thousand individuals, representing perhaps one-third of the population of Sweden, partners in democratic control. These members study, they debate, and they participate. Knowing that the local union is a unit in the national union movement which dominates the social democratic party and that the social democratic party is the dominant party in the national parliament makes for responsibility and realism. The fantastic loses its charm. The Doctor Townsends and the Huey Longs and the Father Coughlins have the ground cut out from under them. The Swedish worker has no prejudice against the promised land of plenty, but he knows that the way is beset with practical problems.

When you find a trade union organized and dealing with practical problems, and when the employees meet their employers and know the practical problems with which the employer has to deal, then you find people who are open to reason and, as I said before, it is not very often one finds strikes and disorders developing under those conditions.

I notice that in his message in 1937 the Minister of Labour expressed the same sentiments as he had expressed in 1936, pointing out that many of the strikes during the year which had just closed were caused by workers wishing to bargain collectively, and employers refusing to meet them. May I quote these few words from that message:

> Once these relations—

That is collective bargaining.

> —are established between employers and employees, they supply the best possible guarantee of industrial peace. They facilitate the discussion of particular disputes in a spirit of tolerance and forbearance. They also encourage a sense of obligation on the part of both to the community at large.

I agree with that, too. In effect he is saying that collective bargaining makes for good citizenship, and that it makes both employer and employee more socially minded. They recognize that a social interest is involved and that industry is not something which concerns only those actually engaged in it, but that it also concerns the community at large.

In the light of what I have said I would ask the government to give the most careful consideration to the bill before it decides that nothing can be done. If the bill is not acceptable because of its construction, we shall be only too happy to support any measure which would accomplish the end in view, namely to give the workers the right to associate in organizations of their own choice, in fact, as well as in law.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, while I have no reason to doubt the accuracy of the law cited by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), or the soundness of his statement when he says that this bill is ultra vires because it intrudes on provincial jurisdiction, yet I intend to vote for the bill, if it is only as a friendly gesture towards trying to do away with the principle of what is known as the black list on the Pacific coast.

It is true that last fall there was a bill passed in the provincial house, known as the Industrial Conciliation and Arbitration Act, which was supposed to be a universal cure-all, but it appears to be more spectacular than useful from the working man's point of view. That the black list still exists is indicated by statements I have under my hand. Some trouble arose in a lumber camp, and submissions were made to the government. One comment is as follows:

> One affidavit stated, among other things, the boss told me that as far as my work was concerned there was none better, but that it was impossible for him to rehire me. In giving his reason for not hiring me, he said, "there is no use of telling you there is no black list, because you know better."
> A second affidavit states: "Upon asking if my work was satisfactory he said it was very satisfactory, and that he had nothing against my work whatsoever. He informed me that I would not be hired on account of my union activities in the camp in the previous year."

I also find that the employment office which sends lumber workers to the camps makes those workers sign a slip, one clause of which reads as follows:

> It is understood I will not invite or allow any person in the camp or on the premises without the owner's consent.

The paper from which I quote, the B.C. Lumber Worker, goes on to say that that is rank intimidation. I do not know whether it is that or not, but certainly it is an interference with the liberty of the people. It would be just the same for a man to rent a house, and tell his tenant that he, the owner, would prescribe as to who would or would not be entertained in that house.

There is no doubt that, despite the provincial bill, the black list is still in existence. It is a very fruitful source of profound dissatisfaction on the part of many loggers. Therefore, if it is only a gesture along this line, I shall support the bill if it ever comes to a vote.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I cannot do more than give a brief introduction of what I had hoped to say on this bill to-night. As it has been presented to the house, the bill has taken the form of an amendment to the criminal code. As such it was dealt with by my colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) when it was before the house some little time ago. It was stated then by the Minister of Justice—and I repeat it now—that the right of workers to form or to join trade unions has the full support of this government.

Freedom of association has been proclaimed on several occasions by the dominion government.

It may be within the memory of some hon. members in the house to-night that during the great war, in order to meet rather grave conditions of industrial unrest, an order in council was passed which very clearly affirmed the right to organize. It took the form of an assertion of the existence of the right to organize, and there was no suggestion at the time that the dominion parliament had power to deal with the question in any way other than by declaration.

Mr. Speaker, it is nine o'clock.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

BOARDS OF REVIEW, TIME LIMIT FOR FILING PROPOSALS, ETC.

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 25, to amend the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

On section 5—No new proposal after a certain date.

Mr. DUNNING: I believe we are on section 5 of the bill, the last section. The leader of the opposition called my attention to the fact that my previous suggestion, namely that on the title we might discuss general matters connected with the bill, would be of little avail, because there is no title. I therefore suggest it would be appropriate for hon. members, such as the hon. member for Marquette and other hon. members who wish to make observations on the general workings of the act, observations which would not come directly under any of the sections of the bill, to make those observations on section 5, which deals with the method of terminating the act in the various provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: A very appropriate place.

Mr. GLEN: Mr. Chairman, what I say will probably be misinterpreted, no matter how carefully I may choose my language; nevertheless, I shall take the risk, if risk there be. I therefore state I am not attacking or impugning the principle of the act. I realize there is no intention in the amendment before the committee to impugn the principle of the act; it is simply to place the responsibility perhaps where it should belong, namely on the provinces, by proclamation.

What I wish to discuss is the question of deliberate default on the part of a debtor, and to suggest what I am sure every member of this house will agree on, that some remedy should be applied to deprive any person of the benefits of the act who is entitled to and does receive them and who thereafter wilfully evades the corresponding obligations and undertakings and defeats the very purpose of the act itself. What I say cannot be applied to an honest debtor, but certainly it may be applied to a dishonest debtor. In order that I may draw my conclusion I shall have to inform the house of a case which, I think, can hardly be duplicated in the dominion, and one which, I believe, justifies the remedy that I shall propose at the end of my remarks. Therefore I shall have to ask the house to bear with me if I am a little lengthy.

The case concerns a property in Manitoba which was sold under an agreement of sale in 1930. The price was $10,000, interest 6 per cent, and the payments were spread over a period of years. There was no cash payment. The purchaser entered into possession of the land but did not make any payments for some considerable time, and ultimately the estate, which was in the hands of executors, decided that they must take steps to protect their interests. In Manitoba the first thing to be done is to obtain a certificate from the provincial debt adjustment board. After sixteen months I was able, on behalf of the estate, to obtain that certificate. As soon as I obtained it, an appeal was taken by the purchaser of the farm to the county court judge. The appeal was heard and dismissed, and proceedings were therefore taken by way of foreclosure in the court of king's bench, Manitoba. When the action was before the court a dispute note was filed. It was purely a bogus dispute note. The whole intent of the agreement of sale, as they said, was that the proceeds of the farm would pay for the purchase price. When the matter was brought before Mr. Justice Adamson no representations were made by the defendant except for the purpose of obtaining time in which to redeem. I pointed out to the judge at the time that to give time for redemption would mean that this man would just wait until the period had almost elapsed, and then would apply under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. Six months was given to redeem. This expired on March 16, 1935, and on that date the purchaser filed a proposal with the official receiver. The matter was heard before the official receiver and no agreement was arrived at. An appeal was then taken to the board of review, and after a hearing the board of review formulated a proposal. That proposal was objected to strenuously on the part of the estate because it was felt it amounted to a confiscation of the estate under the sanction of law. We had a strong case; but apparently it was not strong enough, for the board of review still maintained their proposal, and ultimately it was filed in accordance with the act.

In order that the house may fully understand the position, the only payments which this man made under this $10,000 agreement amounted to $616.42 over a period of seven years, or an average of $88 a year, and the estate, in order to protect the farm, had to pay taxes to keep it out of tax sale, and had to pay insurance to the amount of $370.98, and on October 31, 1937, there were taxes due amounting to $387.53. In other words, the money paid by this farmer from 1930 to 1937 was less than the amount paid by the estate, including taxes for which the estate is liable. He had had the farm about seven years, and all that the estate has received is the amount stated.

When the matter was before the board of review the position was that this man actually owed, including the purchase price of the land, $19,000, and against that he had assets of $540 for stock, and the most meagre line of equipment to carry on operations. I do not suppose the assets, including stock and equipment, would realize more than $1,500. Yet the board of review made the order, and in that order they stated that the purchase price shall be reduced. First, they take upon themselves to reduce the purchase price. There was a total indebtedness of about $15,000 at the time of the foreclosure action. The board of review reduced that to $7,500, almost fifty per cent of a cut. At that time it was shown that the defendant had $19,000 of debts. All the unsecured creditors except those with lien notes were absolutely wiped out, and after that the farmer continued with his operations under the board of review order. That board of review order is a precious thing in its way. It provides for the payment of this $7,500, which was the amount arrived at by one of the officers of the soldier settlement board. The board in Manitoba take this position, that they would arrive at the value of the land themselves and give no indication to the parties interested of how that amount was arrived at, and in consequence there is nothing you can say about the matter.

The farmer continued with his operations. During 1935, 1936 and 1937 he was bound under the order to deliver one-third share of the crop, and under the orders of the board that one-third share of the crop was to take care of all the obligations which he had to pay for the purchase price of the land. In 1935 that one-third share of the crop amounted to $49.80; in 1936 it amounted to $247.48, and in 1937, last year, it amounted to $16.47.

Provision is made by the board's order that the money received from the crop shall first be applied to municipal taxes; at all events the Manitoba act provides that one-third share of the crop shall be applied first to taxes; the purchaser has the right to pay the taxes and to hand over the receipt to the vendors, and that fulfils his obligation. As a matter of fact, all the money which the estate has received in three years has been paid out on account of taxes, and yet at the present moment there is $387.53 still owing in taxes.

When the year 1937 came we were astounded to learn that this gentleman had leased the farm to another man altogether. He had left the farm and gone to the town of Virden in Manitoba, and is now, I am told, selling stock for an oil company from Brandon. I verified the facts and found that there was a lease of the farm given for three years. You talk of privity of contract, but there certainly is no privity of contract between the vendors and the present lessee. He is on the farm. In the meantime the old lady to whom the estate belongs, a very dear and beautiful English lady of seventy-five, is living in a small cottage on an adjoining quarter section belonging to her son, and looking over the fence at her beautiful home occupied by a stranger who has no interest in it.

Naturally one felt annoyed at circumstances such as these, and I was endeavouring to do all I could; so I communicated then with the board of review, pointed out the circumstances, told them of the hardship, and they realized it, but they said they could do nothing. And why? Because they had already given their proposal; it was filed in the court, and therefore they were functus officio and could deal no further with the matter. I communicated with officials in Ottawa and got the same answer from them. In fact, the letter I received indicates two widely different points of view with regard to certain matters of which I shall speak shortly. At all events, after all the efforts in order to get some place where the estate could regain the farm, we came to the question whether what we should do would be done under the rules and regulations of the act. In these rules and regulations there are two clauses, 48 and 49, which I am going to read.

48. The official receiver or any creditor may, after giving such notice to the debtor as the court may in the circumstances require, apply to the court for an order setting aside a proposal because the debtor has—

There are four reasons.

(a) made a fraudulent or preferential conveyance, gift, delivery or transfer of any of his property;

(b) with intent to defeat or delay his creditors, departed or remained out of Canada;

(c) assigned, removed, secreted or disposed of any of his property with intent to defraud, defeat or delay his creditors;

(d) conducted himself to the satisfaction of the official receiver in such manner as indicates bad faith towards his creditors.

49. In the case of any application made under the next preceding paragraph, the court may order that the proposal be annulled, and such an order shall be deemed to be a final disposition of the proceedings.

Would it not be imagined, reading that, that these words mean exactly what they say, and that the official receiver or a creditor may, after giving such notice to the debtor, apply to the court for an order setting aside the proposal? But when I make the request of the official receiver of the district in which this land is situate, and ask him to make the application to the court, which in this case would be the county court, he, with instructions from the board of review in Winnipeg and also perhaps from the officers in Ottawa, takes the position that that refers only to a proposal which is either before the official receiver or the board of review. I cannot understand the reasoning of it and I cannot convince the other side that my reasoning is correct.

For instance, an application is made to the official receiver. The hearing is set; the witnesses appear, and then if necessary it goes on to the board of review. What in the world is the use of making an application to the court to prevent the issuance of an order when it is at that moment before the official receiver and before the board of review? If there are evidences that any of the four subsections which I have read have been contravened by the applicant, the farmer who is applying, all that need be done is to bring that matter before either the official receiver or the board of review and he will not get the order or the composition that he is seeking. That would seem self-evident, and I am informed it is the fact that there have been applications to the court in that particular district on that very ground. But why the necessity for it I do not know, because surely if a litigant comes before the court with impure and unclean hands, those who are in the position of authority and to whom he must appeal would certainly not formulate any proposal but would simply refuse to do anything with it. If it only means that, that remedy is in the hands of the official receiver or the board of review; why should this be placed in the act at all? They say, of course, that lawyers always disagree, when they are paid for it. I submit that there are many differences of opinion in the courts with regard to the matter. It arose in one case in Manitoba, the Manitoba farm loan case, where one of the judges, Judge Richards came out and stated categorically that rules 48 and 49 did not apply to a proposal that had already been formulated by the board and had reference only to the proposal when it was before either the official receiver or the board of review. As against that, in the same judgment, Judge Prendergast takes the position that rules 48 and 49 are applicable. Judge Dennistoun made only a casual remark, and the other two judges made none. But it has happened that in other cases, in Alberta and also in Saskatchewan, there is a direct conflict of opinion among the judges as to whether rules 48 and 49 apply, and the consequence is that to-day the law is so muddled that no one knows where he is at. It happened in the course of my negotiations that it was suggested to me by a very high authority in Winnipeg—I do not mind saying that it was Mr. Justice Montague, judge of the board of review—when dealing with this matter, that he thought, his board of review being functus officio, their jurisdiction ended as soon as the proposal had been formulated, but we might invoke bankruptcy proceedings and thereby attain the object for which we were applying. The leader of the opposition referred to a case which I have read, the case of the Commercial Life Assurance company v. Strynadka, 1 Western Weekly Reports (1938), page 479. That decision states that where a debtor has defaulted in complying with the terms of the proposal confirmed by the board of review under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934, chapter 53 (dominion), section 19 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1927, chapter 11, cannot be invoked to support an application to the court to have the proposal annulled and the debtor adjudged a bankrupt. The advice I received from the head of the board of review in Winnipeg has been nullified—naturally must be—by the judgment of the appellate court in Alberta; and to-day we are in this state, that there are no judgments before the court as to how a creditor can arrive at a place where he can annul a proposal.

It may be suggested that I might take another action of foreclosure after default had taken place; but the unfortunate thing about that is this, that default has not taken place under the terms of the order of the board of review. The man has delivered the one-third share of the crop each year; in consequence he has lived up to that order and therefore we cannot invoke that procedure. We are apparently debarred from invoking rules 48 and 49 by reason of the dictum of the judge of the board of review in Winnipeg and also of the officers of the crown here. Where are we to go? I submit to the Minister of Finance that such a situation cannot be allowed to continue. The procedure in order to file a proposal and to have it formulated by the board of review is an informal proceeding, the cost of which is so little that there can be no objection to it. But I submit that no creditor should be obliged to make the law in courts when we here are dealing with the act, and we can remedy the act and make it so clear and unmistakable that there can be no doubt in the minds either of creditors or of the courts as to what exactly is intended. I submit that a creditor who is being defrauded by a debtor should surely have the same rights—inexpensive, informal, if you like—as are accorded to the defrauding debtor when he makes his proposal.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is not alleging fraud in this case.

Mr. GLEN: I am alleging that the man is defaulting.

Mr. DUNNING: You say he delivered one-third of the crop as the order called for?

Mr. GLEN: Yes; but he has left the farm and gone off and is not a farmer now. The whole spirit of the act is defeated by the fact that the man is off the farm. He has left it to the lessee, and if that is not conducting himself in such a manner as to indicate bad faith towards his creditor I do not know what it is. I therefore suggest that rules 48 and 49 be amended and that it should be clearly stated that "the official receiver or any creditor may, after giving such notice to the debtor as the court may in the circumstances require, apply to the court for an order setting aside a proposal," either before or after a proposal has been formulated by the board of review. I make that suggestion to the Minister of Finance, and I ask him to take the matter up with the law officers of the crown and clarify the act so that the man who is endeavouring to defeat the principle of it shall be subject to the same remedies as he has invoked under the act, and that the act itself shall supply that simple and inexpensive remedy to the honest creditor endeavouring to retain his property as against a debtor defaulting by his own act.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be glad to have the suggestion examined. As I understand it, it would involve an amendment not to the act but to the rules. I shall have it looked into.

Mr. BETTS: I wish to say a few words applicable particularly to section 5 of the bill, which is the section that enables the governor in council by proclamation to provide that no proposal shall be filed in any province after a date fixed in such proclamation. I should like to add my remarks to those that have already been made urging the minister to cause the operation of this act to cease in the province of Ontario at as early a date as possible. I am unable to state, except from what I read in the newspapers and hear in this chamber, anything about the operation of the act in any of the other provinces; but I can state, from observation and first-hand knowledge of a good many of these cases, that whatever may have been the usefulness of the act when it was first passed, whatever necessity may have existed for its passage, it has entirely outlived its usefulness in this province.

The hon. member for Marquette gave a striking case in which a creditor in the west has been subjected to considerable hardship as a result of the operation of the act. I should like to put on record a somewhat similar case in which a creditor in Ontario has been defrauded—I do not think the term is too strong—and I do not adduce the details because they are of any particular interest in themselves; I cite them simply because the case is entirely typical of many such cases that have been dealt with by the board of review particularly in the course of the past three years or so. This is a case arising in the county of Essex in which the mortgage under consideration was made in April, 1923. It was a mortgage for $2,000, for ten years, at what was then the prevailing rate of interest, seven per cent, and the security was fifty acres of land, all of which was tillable. The repayments of principal were at the rate of $100 a year. At the time the mortgage was made the mortgagor was a young farmer, twenty-four years of age, apparently quite capable of carrying on and making a go of his undertaking. He borrowed the $2,000 to retire a former mortgage, and the mortgage of which I am now speaking then became the first and only mortgage. The amount invested in the mortgage represented the savings of an elderly woman, savings that had been accumulated as a result of very many years of hard work at low wages. From the date on which the mortgage was made in 1923 until 1926 the principal was reduced from $2,000 to $1,600, and the interest was paid promptly. After 1926 there were no further reductions in principal, but the interest was paid in full until the first of April, 1935. At that date the mortgagor owed nothing for taxes and he had some other debts, comparatively small. Having paid his interest up to the first of April, 1935, from which it might fairly be said that he had continued his interest payments throughout the worst of the depression, in the spring of 1935 he evidently learned of the act with which we are dealing, because from that date onward he ceased paying his interest and his other debts, and in the latter part of 1937 he applied under the act, his application coming on for hearing in January, 1938.

This is what was done. The two years of interest which he owed were wiped out; the mortgage was ordered renewed at the sum of $1,600 for a term of ten years from January 18, 1938 and the interest rate was reduced to three per cent. No repayments on account of principal were ordered until 1944, that is, five years in advance, and from 1944 on it was ordered that $75 on the principal should be paid annually. His unsecured debts were reduced by seventy-five per cent; it was ordered that the creditors must accept twenty-five per cent of their claims in full. As a result of that order great hardship was worked on this elderly lady who held the mortgage. Orders of that sort are becoming increasingly common.

My submission is that through the operation and administration of this act in recent years, most of those whom it was designed to benefit; most of those who are worth keeping on the land and who are making an honest attempt to make a go of their farming operations, have been dealt with. They are either carrying on or else they have got off. And the present result of the continuance of the act is that many creditors whose sole investment takes the form of farm mortgages have become impoverished; and on the other side of the picture, many men who should not be on the land at all, who are not making an honest endeavour to meet their obligations, are occupying farms which would be taken up by young, energetic and qualified farmers who cannot find a place. As a result of this situation the supply of mortgage money in Ontario has almost dried up, land values have been greatly reduced; young men who would otherwise go on the farm cannot get accommodation to buy stock, to make an initial payment on a farm, to buy a few implements; and exactly the reverse situation to that which was intended to be created by the act has developed. I know of many such cases in London, because in that city, which is the centre of a very rich mixed farming and dairying community, there are many retired farmers who have come into the city with just enough money to see them through their declining years and who, as is common I think with most farmers in Ontario, have chosen mortgages for their investments. Many of them are in great destitution, some actually on relief, while a few miles out of London, occupying the premises on which they hold mortgages, are shiftless and, in many instances, dishonest farmers who have only sufficient energy and ability to convince the board of review that they have a right to stay on and a right to have their debts periodically pared down.

Therefore, in the interests of the very class for which this act was designed—the farmers —and in furtherance of the very object for which it was passed, namely, to keep as many farmers as possible on the farm, operating it and making a go of farming, I submit that in Ontario the act should be repealed at the earliest possible date.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I have listened all afternoon to some hon. members complaining about the number of creditors who have been adversely affected by this act. When one remembers that more than 26,000 cases have been handled, it would imply more than human wisdom if there were not some cases in which there may have been unfair treatment. I personally could cite cases of people who invested their money, and now find that there has been a reduction which seems to them too drastic. But I would ask hon. members to remember first that this act deals with insolvency, with cases of bankruptcy in which the security against which the debts were placed has, in many instances, practically disappeared. When any concern goes into bankruptcy everyone connected with it has to take a loss. I am not suggesting that the creditors should take all the loss, nor yet should the debtor take all the loss. If the security has been reduced in value, the loss must be shared by both sides. And the figures speak for themselves. In the 26,365 cases that were dealt with under this act the average debt per farmer was $9,281.79. The total indebtedness—I shall just use round figures—was $158,000,000 registered against farms the value of which was only $112,000,000. In other words, the indebtedness was more than $46,000,000 in excess of the value of the farms.

Mr. BENNETT: That is present values.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes, present values; of course that is all you can go on. And even where the debt has been reduced 44·38 per cent—and that is a drastic reduction—the debt is still ninety-three per cent of the total value of the property, still leaving the debtor with a tremendous burden. I cannot speak for Ontario; but even in the figures for Ontario which were placed on Hansard the other day by the Minister of Finance, the indebtedness was $34,000,000 and the value of the farms affected $30,000,000. So evidently someone had to take a loss. While I am not denying that there may have been cases of hardship, I hope the minister will not allow himself to be too greatly influenced by the recital of individual cases in which someone thinks the amount he had invested has been cut too drastically. The fact is that this act was designed to meet a critical situation of bankruptcy in agriculture, and that losses have been sustained by the farmers, and consequently losses have to be sustained by the creditors as well. Therefore I say to the minister just this, although I think it is not necessary, because I think I know how the minister feels about this act: I agree with this new section 20 in principle, although I am a little worried about the method by which the end is to be accomplished. I agree that if in any province the government decide after careful consideration that it is no longer in the best interest of all concerned that the act should continue to operate, it ought to be discontinued; but I hope that very careful investigation will be made and that the investigation will not consist entirely of hearing creditors and creditor corporations, with the debtor class, who are not so vociferous, being overlooked.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, pardon me; they are vociferous.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Well, they have not been as vociferous this afternoon and evening.

Mr. DUNNING: They are merely taking second wind.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): As this new section stands, I do not object to it, except that there is no safeguard at all beyond the good judgment of the governor in council. But the governor in council, if they wish, may in essence repeal this act. Although it may still be on the statute books, they could by making it inoperative in each province cause it to cease to function.

Mr. BENNETT: They would probably refer it to parliament!

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is a tremendous power to give to the governor in council, in essence the power to repeal a statute passed by this parliament. I hope that if there be any way by which the minister could provide some safeguard to protect the provinces which still desire the operation of this act, it will be put in, and if it is not, that at least the minister will give the committee assurance that every precaution will be taken to consult all parties concerned before the working of this act, which in my opinion has been invaluable, is discontinued in any province.

Mr. McDONALD (Souris): In criticizing this act a few weeks ago I am afraid I left a rather unfortunate impression, that is that it was not working well in Manitoba. The impression I meant to leave was that in the early stages great hardship was done, and I am sure that is quite true even yet. But I believe the commissioners in Manitoba are doing their best now and are making the act work as well as one can expect a bad act to work. I wonder if the government will ever know how much damage has been done to credit in Manitoba and the other provinces. I believe that the act will be more workable when it is amended so that when adjustments are made, the debtor will be made to live up to them.

I would suggest this plan to the government, although I do not know whether it will work. As hon. members know, the agreement of sale in Manitoba is on a crop basis. A man holding a mortgage to-day feels rather insecure. All these people are asking is that they get their share in those years when there are good crops. They suggest that when crops are poor the interest be cancelled for that year. Surely this is worthy of consideration. The crops are the security behind the agreement, and I think it would be only fair if the debts were adjusted along these lines. I would be glad if the Minister of Finance would put this plan before the board of review.

Mr. DUNNING: It is under consideration now.

Mr. CLARK (York-Sunbury): I quite agree with the hon. members from Ontario who have referred to the damage that has been done to credit in that province as applying also to New Brunswick. Under the present working of the act, the board of review sits upon a case and gives judgment, and in many instances that is the end of the matter. The people do not have to pay anything to come to the board of review; they figure they will not have to pay anything thereafter and many of them do not pay anything. I know of one case that came before the board recently where a farmer owed only $232 in addition to a mortgage. His proposal was to pay $150 on the mortgage. The matter came before the board of review and the judgment was that he would pay only $125. The judgment was worded so that he would not have to pay anything for three years. Upon protest being made to the board, the judgment was changed so that he would have to pay interest every six months, but even this has not been carried out. Then there are those cases where farmers apply who are not bankrupt or insolvent and cannot be said to be.

Mr. BENNETT: Then the board has no jurisdiction.

Mr. CLARK (York-Sunbury): Such a farmer comes to the board and makes a proposal that if the government will lend him money on his farm, he will compromise with his creditors. Surely it is not a good plan when that can be done. Then the man who was loaned money on mortgage, especially the one who received it for the purpose of making a compromise under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, is looked upon with disfavour because his getting the money was an incident in his practically cheating his neighbours, in that they were forced to accept a compromise on the debts the man owed. That sort of thing leads to communism. The mortgagor getting money in that way, from his experience with the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act looks upon this as a debt that he will never have to pay because it is from the government, so that the spirit of several people has possibly been changed by the one loan from a desire to work out their own problems to one of enmity for or a feeling of dependence upon the state. In connection with one case, the man's neighbour writes about him as follows:

> He owes me too $98. I know he is able to pay for all his debts if he wants to. He is my first neighbour. He is about the biggest farmer of the place but he drinks and sports too much. He told me himself he had done $1,800 the first fall he had the hay press. But it's a scheme for not paying his debts.

Then in another letter the neighbour states:

> He bought a car about a month and a half ago again and runs that car every day up and down.

This man went before the board of review and got the board to require his creditors—there were only a few—to accept a compromise. I understand that he got money from the farm loan board, but that is what his next door neighbour says about him.

I have had a good deal to do with cases and I know that most of the money goes for administration. This act is not in the interests of the people of the province generally and it ought to be discontinued. Surely there is no demand for the continued operation of the act. It would be better for the people if the announcement was made that after a certain date no more cases would be considered in the province. That would be better for New Brunswick and it would restore credit generally to where it has been in the past. As things are now, the people who have money will not lend it on farm mortgages because they fear that they will not get it back in full.

Mr. McNIVEN: The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act has been assailed vigorously in many parts of Canada, but I want to assure the committee that so far as Saskatchewan is concerned the act has been beneficial. In fact, I think it is regarded as one of the most beneficial pieces of legislation we have on our statute books to-day. The reason for its introduction in 1934, and its nation-wide application, is just as apparent in Saskatchewan to-day—even more so—than it was then. That condition need not be repeated, as it is well understood by members of the committee.

Parliament has recognized its responsibility in the matter of debt towards the people of Canada, and has taken certain steps to maintain a national equilibrium, and to enable business to continue. In the last revision of the Bank Act, for example, the rate was definitely fixed at seven per cent, with penalties attached for any infringements. That was made necessary because of the tendency—in fact, the practice—of the banks to charge whatever the traffic would bear—seven per cent, seven and a half per cent, eight per cent, eight and a half per cent and nine per cent. Western Canada, in particular Saskatchewan, was the victim of that practice.

Then, too, parliament has recognized its obligation towards debtors by its adjustment from time to time of arrangements with the soldier settler. Practically ever since the original arrangements were made, adjustments of one kind or another have been brought about. There has been a reduction in interest. Adjustments have been made in principal. Now we have before us a plan granting a dollar for dollar bonus to soldier settlers, which is to be offered them until 1941. With that plan I have no quarrel; I approve and endorse it.

Then, we have the Bankruptcy Act and its adjunct, the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act. The Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, which was discussed here the other evening, provides a ready method for companies to adjust their indebtedness with their creditors, without the necessity of going through bankruptcy, retaining their good will, preserving something of their assets, and keeping the company away from the most destructive agency which we have, namely bankruptcy proceedings. I do not wish to enlarge upon the benefits of that act, but I say now that it has performed a very real service, and that it is a distinct advance in the administration of affairs between debtor and creditor.

Then, too, we have the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. The preamble to that measure asserts as its purpose enabling farmers to continue on the land and to support agriculture as the basic industry of the country. I am quite prepared to admit that it is predicated upon the bankruptcy of the individual farmer. So far as we are concerned, may I repeat that that act has been of beneficial effect, and has performed a very useful service. A good many have indicated to the committee the desirability of repealing the act, and have indicated some of the features in which it has worked a hardship. It has been stated that it is no longer serving a useful purpose. But the committee will observe from the recitation which I have just made, that no provision is made in any law to relieve the urban residents. There is nothing for the artisan. Is there any group of men who in the last six or seven years have suffered more than the artisans, the people identified with the building trade?

In Saskatchewan the situation is such that we have had only two loans under the Dominion Housing Act, notwithstanding the fact that last spring, during the months of January, February and March, certain loan companies advertised their willingness to take loans on that plan. But when applications were received, so many difficulties were placed in the way that it was not possible to effect a loan.

It may be said that legislation of this kind has been responsible for that situation. I am rather inclined to think, however, that it is the desire of those engaged in the money lending business to preserve western Canada, and Saskatchewan in particular, as a seven per cent, or better, loaning area, and not to permit any invasion by five per cent money.

Because of conditions, we were not able to take advantage of the home improvement plan. Under that excellent plan a smaller amount of money was loaned in Saskatchewan than in any other province of Canada, with the exception of Prince Edward Island. Therefore it will be observed that there has been practically nothing in the province by way of work or wages for the benefit of the artisan.

Then, we must consider the clerk in the store, the office man and the commercial traveller. The commercial traveller has seen his living whittled away by degrees, has seen his commissions cut and his routes shortened, and has had to contend against competition of one kind or another—all of which meant a reduced income to the traveller.

Then we have the railway employees, thousands of whom have had to accept unemployment, or shorter hours and comparatively few working days per month. Those railway employees incurred obligations by building homes back in the days when agriculture was a thriving industry in western Canada, back in the days of 1927, 1928 and 1929. We must remember 1928, the year in which Saskatchewan alone produced 330,000,000 bushels of wheat, and when railway trains in the fall of the year were passing through Regina at the rate of one every twenty minutes, carrying complete train loads of grain to Fort William. It was during that period that these men incurred obligations by building their homes. Since that time they have passed through a period of intermittent employment, and find that the result of their efforts of bygone days is being gradually whittled away.

Then, too, we must remember the small business man in our towns, villages and cities, the man who finds that his business is being whittled away by the chain store, the great corporation, and that he is being gradually engulfed by their competition.

In addition to these, we have the civil servant who, like the railroad man, incurred similar obligations. In Saskatchewan the civil service has taken its share of the depression. Were the civil service of Saskatchewan put upon the same schedule of pay as the dominion service, it would cost that province nearly $2,500,000 more than it does at the present time. The civil service is a group of men and women who have borne their share of the depression.

Then we have the professional men, the lawyer, the doctor, the dentist, the veterinary surgeon, the surveyor, many of whom have been legislated out of business and who find their practices gone. That, Mr. Chairman, means that this very large group of responsible, honest and well-meaning citizens, desirous of fulfilling their obligations but finding themselves unable so to do, has been left to voluntary or provincial plans for debt adjustment. The provincial debt adjustment plan does what it can; but it is negative rather than affirmative; all that can be accomplished there is to bring the parties together, and if no agreement is reached which the board considers fair, just and reasonable, the board may refuse the creditor the right to take foreclosure proceedings in the courts.

Our provincial government in conjunction with the dominion government made with the mortgage companies an arrangement applicable to the drought areas which provided for the wiping off of certain liens for seed grain, certain dominion liens, and also certain taxes, and the mortgage companies agreed to write off all the interest in arrears prior to January 1, 1935. They also agreed that there should be a six per cent rate of interest for ensuing years. But nothing was done with regard to the urban resident. I thought at the time it was intended that the six per cent rate of interest should apply to all mortgages, but such is not the fact. Mortgage companies are to-day in our larger centres collecting interest at the original rates under agreements which were made back in 1925, 1926, 1927, 1928 and 1929 or thereabouts. That leaves that great group of men and women the one alternative of bankruptcy. And, Mr. Chairman, you will recall the scathing indictment of bankruptcy that was delivered the other evening by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). It is little wonder that the fear of the farming population with regard to bankruptcy proceedings is shared by the urban resident, and that they are resorted to only as a last resort. If anything were needed to complete the indictment of bankruptcy and bankruptcy proceedings in addition to what was said by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George the other evening, it was supplied by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) when, speaking on the second reading of this legislation on June 11, 1934, he said:

> One of the difficulties that gave me the gravest concern about the legislation is the very circumstance to which attention has now been directed. There has grown up such resentment against some of the corporate trustees, on the part of those who have had to deal with them, that I say to the committee frankly I was amazed at the vigour of the protest that came to me from time to time, and during the last few months, in connection with matters of this kind. One of them has been discussed in a legislature, and one of them was discussed the other day in one of the courts of the country, and in the most vigorous terms the judge said that he intended to report the matter to the superintendent in bankruptcy. My experience has been, in connection with the farming population—that is in respect of voluntary assignment; and it does not apply to the province of Quebec at all—that they have complained, first, of expense, and secondly, that corporate trustees are without a soul, without any sympathetic attitude towards them at all.

Such is the indictment of bankruptcy proceedings from two very prominent men, and there are many others who could add their testimony to that which has been already cited. May I say that it is to the tender mercies of the Bankruptcy Act, which has been described in such eloquent terms, that we are leaving this very large group of urban residents.

It is true that some results are achieved from time to time by voluntary adjustment. It is also true in Saskatchewan, under our voluntary debt adjustment board, that some seven hundred foreclosures of urban property have been permitted. I should in fairness to the board say that in many of these cases, possibly all of them, there was an accumulation of principal, interest and taxes far beyond the present-day value of the property and that it was not possible to work out an adjustment.

Just a year ago there was presented to the Saskatchewan legislature a petition bearing some thirteen thousand names, and that petition is abundant evidence of the fact that there was in the urban centres of that province a real need for the application of the provisions of this act. There is need for the creation of tribunals where those who had in the good days incurred obligations might go and have them adjusted on a basis on which they could pay and which would give them a new hope for the future. On the basis of that petition the matter was debated in the Saskatchewan legislature and a resolution was passed containing a number of clauses, of which I should like to refer to numbers three and five. Clause three reads:

> That the scope of the said act be widened to permit of home owners in cities, towns, villages and hamlets making proposals under the act to obtain adjustment of mortgages, agreements for sale, liens and other encumbrances on their homes.

And five:

> That the provisions of the act be extended to make it applicable to retail merchants and traders so as to enable them to claim the benefit of the act.

You will notice, Mr. Chairman, that the resolution asks for the application of the provisions of this act to urban home owners and also to retail dealers, and in making that recommendation the legislature had in mind just the very fear which has agitated the mind of the urban resident with regard to bankruptcy proceedings and what he has come through during the last seven years.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am very much in agreement with the two proposals which the hon. gentleman has just read. As a lawyer would he tell us how one should go about amending the act to effect these two purposes?

Mr. McNIVEN: Which act?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

Mr. McNIVEN: That is the problem for us at this time.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I wonder if the hon. member has any suggestion as to how one would go about amending the act. I am very much interested.

Mr. McNIVEN: I shall come to that in just a moment, if I may.

It may be asked why we should protect these people and to what extent the protection should apply. I hope that hon. members will not think I am narrow or parochial in my discussion of this matter; but as it is one of the principles of this bill that its jurisdiction be limited to provinces, I am dealing with my own province only. In that province there are seven cities, eighty towns and three hundred and eighty-five villages, with a population something over three hundred thousand. The function that those cities, towns and villages serve is a service to agriculture. It is true that their prosperity depends upon a prosperous agriculture, but likewise a prosperous agriculture depends upon the service which those towns, cities and villages give. They are complementary; they are interlocking; and just as any country depends for its future upon a prosperous agriculture, an agriculture that is carried on by farmers who own and have a substantial interest in the farms which they are cultivating, so, too, a prosperous town, city or village can only be and remain such where a substantial number of its residents own and occupy their own homes.

The results of the situation which I have outlined are these, that those people have experienced a period of drought and all the climatic disasters which have visited our province; they have also been victims of the depression; they have to maintain themselves to-day on a basis where the rentals are 25·7 per cent higher than they were in 1913, where the cost of everything that enters into their households is 11½ per cent higher than it was in 1913; and these very people cannot collect the accounts that are owing to them by the agricultural population, by reason of conditions, by reason of legislation. Under this act and by voluntary adjustments they find that their own accounts have been substantially reduced. They find their ratio of profit in the carrying on of their business is greatly reduced or has gone altogether. They find that on mortgages and on agreements for sale of which they are covenantors the interest has piled up; and may I say this to eastern Canada, that it is not at the rates of interest which are enjoyed and regarded as commonplace here.

A few minutes ago the hon. member for London said that there was no money available for loans on farms in Ontario. Within the last few days I have had several conversations with a gentleman in Ottawa who informed me that there is active competition to-day in this city for loans on city properties. He also volunteered the information that they had not known in the last fifteen years a loan exceeding 6 per cent interest, and that most of the loans during that period had been on a basis of 5 and 5½ per cent. I have seen mortgages on western homes varying all the way from 7 per cent to as high as 22 per cent. It is no wonder that on such a basis interest has piled up. Likewise taxes have increased. Urban centres have a relief problem. Our own city pays 20 per cent of the entire cost of relief, pays all of the administrative expense, carries the medical bills for relief recipients, as well as dental bills, opticians' bills, hospital bills, and a hundred matters of that kind. In the last five years we have seen our assessment grow from forty mills to fifty-one mills; and I sometimes wonder when I hear our Toronto friends complain about an assessment of around thirty-two or thirty-three mills and complain very bitterly because there is a possibility of that assessment increasing during the next year on account of relief.

There is also a tendency, in fact a very marked effort on the part of mortgage companies to recoup as far as possible some percentage of their losses in agricultural loans by continuing the prevailing rates of interest and insisting upon the letter of the bargain from their urban mortgagors. Then, too, farmers have moved into the city, and I could give the committee a number of distressing cases of that type, where farmers have sold their land, taken the cash payment, bought a home in the city and assumed a mortgage on that home. They now find themselves without any revenue from their farms, and are unable to get any adjustment with or any protection from the mortgagees who have the mortgages on their homes. They are without revenue and are about to lose what interest they have in their own homes.

There is another reason for the situation that has arisen. Times without number during the years 1920 to 1930 mortgagees refused to accept prepayment of their mortgages. They have also refused to accept payment of instalments in arrears unless accompanied by a bonus of three months' interest. If mortgagees had been willing during those years to accept prepayment of their mortgages there would not be nearly so much difficulty or trouble to-day, but they refused so to do, and are now lamenting the results of that refusal.

In addition to this increased overhead, these accumulations of interest and taxes, every one of these men and women in employment in our urban centres, irrespective of their location, has had to accept a substantially reduced income. It is not possible for these men and women on the basis of their present-day income to meet obligations that were incurred in 1928 and 1929. It therefore seems to me to be part of our obligation that we should seriously consider a workable plan for the relief of these people who have accomplished so much, put up with so much, and faced a difficult period so valiantly.

I know that one of the difficulties is to work out a plan whereby the provisions of this act would be applicable to urban centres. In that regard I am going to refer to the original debate on June 18, 1934, in which the leader of the opposition, discussing this bill, and in reply to a question by Mr. Hanbury, made the following statement:

> Offhand one would say, considering the kind of cases that will have to be dealt with, that here the whole arrangement is predicated on the ability of the man to pay. There need be no plan at all. If the board concludes that the man will never pay they should not make an arrangement. This is predicated on the assumption that the man has indicated, by his past history or by his present surroundings and conditions, his ability to pay something. He makes a compromise accordingly. . . .

The right hon. gentleman said that there need not be any plan at all, and perusal of many of the adjustments that have already been made under this act will show that quite evidently there was no plan at all. Because of past experience with the productivity of the soil, the board arrives at a basis on which it thought the man could pay. As I say, the leader of the opposition said that there need not be any plan at all, and then we find a number of others for whom a plan has been formulated. Prior to that there was a crop failure for some four or five years. It seems to me, therefore, that we can very well adapt the principle of this act to the urban residents, and that can be done by drafting a new part in language similar to that contained in the original act, making it applicable to urban centres. The principle of the bill would be the same; the purpose would be complementary to the original purpose of the act. I say, Mr. Chairman, that the responsibility stands out as a challenge to us as members of the House of Commons to take some action with regard to the situation in which 300,000 people find themselves, and which was emphasized in the petition executed by 13,000 of them. They are the victims of depression, the victims of drought. They find an accumulated liability which it is impossible to meet, and any attempt to meet that liability in full will result only in an impairment of their future, so that they will approach the next economic cycle with assets diminished to such an extent that for them life in the future will amount to nothing more than one continuous chain of depressions. I ask that the committee and the minister in particular give serious and careful consideration to the formulation of a plan which will give some relief to urban residents.

Mr. TOMLINSON: I would feel remiss in my duty if I did not place on Hansard my objections in general to this bill. I listened to the very capable speech of the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McNiven), and I noticed his reference to adjustments made by the soldier settlement board in connection with reductions in interest and so on. That is all right; but I would ask, Who reimbursed the government for any reduction in interest or in principal? Naturally, the government. I never could quite understand, when this act was first passed, why they singled out the farmer and said to him, "With your particular creditor we are going to allow you to make application to have your debt adjusted, your interest and principal if necessary, and the creditor alone must stand the loss." I realize that in 1934 the farmers were in a very serious condition. The prices of their crops and of their live stock were very low; they were compelled to accumulate debts, and probably at that time something had to be done to assist them. But it is my contention that if we desired to save the credit of the farmer, it should, as a government, have agreed to pay the loss that any single creditor would have to sustain on the principal sum. That has always been my contention. I might say further that if that had been the case, boards of review, especially in Ontario, would have made much more careful decisions and reports. They would not have been so free to say to the debtor, "We shall cut your principal in half regardless of the creditor's situation."

I cannot help it, but it is impossible for me to illustrate my contention without citing a certain case. On one application in Bruce county the debtor did appear before the official receiver first and then before the board of review. The board of review decided first to cut the unsecured creditors fifty cents on the dollar and do away with all interest, and they also decided that the principal of the mortgage should be reduced. But what did the debtor do after receiving his order? His first desire was to retain his credit in the town in which he dealt. The next day after the order was issued he came into town and paid in full his debts in that one particular place. He had only one idea—he wished to retain his credit. And this is what this act is doing to-day in Ontario; it is destroying the credit of our farmers.

Another case I have in mind was one in the county of York where the board of review had decided that payment of principal and interest should be made on the thirty-first of December in each year. The first payment was due on December 31, 1937. This farmer decided that he would realize all he possibly could before December 31. So he had a sale of his farm stock and implements on December 30, and the creditors had no right of action until January 1. Of course in that case the creditors lost all.

That is one reason why I say that the proclamation of this act should be dealt with in the very near future. I quite realize that to do away with it immediately might cause confusion. I can also realize the plight of the people of Saskatchewan, and why they desire this act; it is because of the high rates of interest and the drought, and probably people in the cities as well as on the farms desire it. But in regard to the extension of this act to town and village residents, I would say that the statement made by the hon. member for Regina is quite correct, that in our towns and cities in Ontario we can borrow money. Transactions and transfers are taking place. But if the act be extended, we shall certainly have greater confusion, loss of credit and loss of value in our homes and real estate.

I believe the minister has on file a resolution from the county council of the county of Bruce; I think I forwarded it to him last year. That county council consists of a reeve from each township and each municipality in the county. Those reeves in turn represent the residents of their townships. Having spoken of this last year, and placed on Hansard the cost of this act, the way it was administered and the doubt it has caused in the minds of men who might desire to lend money on farm properties, I believe that it would be in the best interests of the farmers to have this act declared in the near future not in force in Ontario. I believe this would increase the values of our farms and would give our young men and women an opportunity to borrow money when they desire to start out in life. To-day they have not that opportunity. unless they go to the Canadian farm loan board, and the restrictions in the act under which that board operates are very harsh. I hope the minister will give this matter his serious consideration in the near future.

Mr. WEIR: Apparently the popularity of this act depends upon where you live. As far as western Canada is concerned, I think sufficient evidence has been presented this afternoon definitely to impress on the committee that this legislation was necessary, at least at the time it was enacted. I think all the western provinces already had debt adjustment legislation, which, however, could not adjust anything; it really only stayed proceedings, and adjustments were made in which voluntary concessions were given on both sides. Then this legislation came along and provided the necessary machinery to complete settlements. It has served a useful purpose. As far as the act generally is concerned, I would not hazard a guess as to what percentage of cases have been actually dealt with by the board of review itself, but I think it furnished an incentive for a great many voluntary adjustments made by individuals without going to either the official receiver or the board of review. That is all to the good. In the part of the country from which I come a great many of the adjustments, as far as the farmer and his creditors were concerned, were made voluntarily through the official receiver. That is the cooperative concession which has been made on all sides.

A great deal has been said about the effect the act had on the farmer's credit. I honestly believe that the credit of the farmer is better to-day after he has gone through the board of review than it was before, for the simple reason that he did not have any credit or he would not have gone through the board. Therefore, I think it is correct to say that his credit has not been affected. It is true the act has created some hardships and dissatisfaction, and there have been some abuses. Some of our merchants have suffered unduly; some of them have been treated unfairly, or at least it would appear that way. At the same time I think it is only fair to ask what they would have got anyway had the farmer not gone through the board of review. In most cases there would have been nothing.

I understand that ordinary bunkruptcy legislation, if it could have been made applicable to farmers, would have achieved practically the same result as this legislation has. But when it was not applicable to the farmer, then something else was necessary, some cheap form of procedure for adjustment of these debts. Had the farmer been able to avail himself of ordinary bankruptcy legislation, these creditors who are making such a cry to-day about the manner in which they have been used would have been in exactly the same position as they are under this board of review. So in that respect I do not think they have suffered. I just wish to emphasize again that the legislation has assisted in bringing about many voluntary settlements which otherwise might not have taken place. And strange as it may seem, instead of requests coming from western Canada to have the operation of the act discontinued, we are actually receiving requests to have it extended to other classes of people, particularly those in towns and villages, and merchants to some extent.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, it hardly seems nearly four years since I stood in my place across the chamber and introduced this bill in the house. It was predicated upon two considerations. The first was that it was desirable to keep the farmers on the land. That was part of the preamble of the act, that they should be retained in possession of their farms. The second was that inasmuch as under section 7 of the Bankruptcy Act a farmer could not take advantage of the provisions of that statute, we should without making him bankrupt give him all the benefits which would accrue if he were able to take advantage of that statute.

The delay in introducing that measure, from 1930, was owing to the fact that there was grave doubt on the part of lawyers as to our right to introduce it at all. It was felt by many that it was within the sole jurisdiction of provincial legislatures and not of this parliament. However, in the session of 1932-33 we introduced the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, and on reference to the court it was held to be intra vires. There was pending in the courts a case known as Larue and the Royal Bank of Canada which went to the privy council, and it was held that legislation of a certain kind was intra vires. Therefore, we concluded that we had the jurisdiction to introduce this statute as a bill, which we did.

I have been very much impressed with the criticisms which have been urged against this measure. They have been urged by the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Tomlinson) to-night. But I submit that there has been a complete misunderstanding of the basis of this legislation. Once it is understood, I cannot think for a single minute that there would be any objection to it so far as principle is concerned. The hon. member for Macdonald has referred to that principle. It is hardly necessary at this time to refer to the fact that legislation dealing with bankruptcy is very old in the British Empire. The theory of bankruptcy goes back almost to prehistoric days, to the dawn of civilization. When men began to make arrangements and to have institutions, they began to realize that an honest man should have another chance and that if his assets were divided ratably among his creditors, he should be discharged from further liability and given another opportunity to start in life. That is the theory of bankruptcy legislation.

Bankruptcy measures have been on the statute books of Great Britain for many years. We had a Bankruptcy Act in this country in the early days, but it was not found to be satisfactory and was repealed. In 1919 we placed upon the statute books what is now known as the Bankruptcy Act. The theory of bankruptcy is that all the assets of the individual shall be liquidated and his creditors shall receive ratably among themselves the proceeds of the sale of the assets. Obviously we could not keep the farmer on the land and follow that principle, so we provided that instead of his being sold out when he could not pay his debts, instead of his assets being realized upon and divided ratably among his creditors, he should be permitted to work out his own salvation on some scheme or plan which would be effective, having regard to all the circumstances of each case.

The hon. member for Macdonald pointed out quite properly a moment ago that voluntary arrangements have been made in a great many cases. Just as soon as it was apparent that this legislation was on the statute books, these voluntary arrangements became the order of the day. As soon as it was apparent that by voluntary effort and cooperation these arrangements could be carried out, when the extent to which the statute went was not generally known, these settlements were made; but when it became apparent that the statute was of much wider consequence, then appeals to the boards of review became more numerous. It is for this very reason that the board of review is presided over by a judge. This is in order that judicial procedure shall mark the operation and conduct of the proceedings under the act. In other words, the true bankruptcy significance of the act should be apparent in the acts of the judge who presides over the board of review.

In many cases it was quite clear—this was particularly so in one province—that the official receivers went around soliciting business. That was done when they were paid on the basis of so much for each case. I looked at a return supplied by the Minister of Finance for all provinces, and I saw one community with less than 90,000 people where the activities of the official receivers were marked indeed. I am sure that if hon. members have looked at this return they will be struck with, shall I say the versatility of the official receivers and their great ability in getting business.

But what happened in other cases? First of all, we have the official receivers; then we have our board of review consisting of a judge and representatives of the creditors and the debtor. I wish I had the time to refer to the circumstances under which those provisions became part of the law of the country. However, I will say to the hon. member for Bruce that representatives of the loan and lending companies of this dominion came together here at Ottawa. I met them personally and spent the major part of half a day with them in the first instance, and later on a lesser time. They realized the situation was such that while it was not desirable that the farmer should come under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, some proceeding in the nature of bankruptcy should be resorted to if we were to keep the farmer on the land and give him an opportunity to work out his own salvation.

Now, having gone that far, having had the official receiver and having had the board of review, we found that this question at once arose: Can you deal with the secured creditors? Here is a situation where you have a mortgage, where you have a bank with security, sometimes in the form of a chattel mortgage—could we deal with the secured creditor? Under a voluntary arrangement, except by consent, the secured creditors were not made subject to the provisions of the act; but just as soon as they went to the board of review where steps were taken by the board to formulate a scheme, jurisdiction was conferred to deal with secured creditors. The result was and is that in many instances the secured creditors have had their security cut in half. There have been instances in which it has gone that far. Why? Because the value of the assets on which the mortgage was given was less than half the amount of the mortgage. In other words, the present value and the possible improvements that might take place determine the action of the board of review. In other words, the board's action was based upon the present value plus probable improvement in value.

Mr. DUNNING: That is where the matter of opinion enters which gives so much difficulty.

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to the first factor, there has always been a little difficulty; with respect to the second factor, there has always been much difficulty, for the simple and obvious reason that it was always most difficult for men to arrive at unanimity as to what the probable future would be. For instance, I have known cases in which opinions were expressed that the future would be rosy and bright, but unfortunately there was no rain the next year and the future became darker than the past. That position has arisen frequently in western Canada.

I put this question to the hon. member for Bruce: Why should a farmer be denied the benefits of the principle of the bankruptcy law? Bankruptcy law is one of the oldest marks of civilization. I said a moment ago that it is predicated upon the thought that an honest man who was willing to hand over all his assets to be divided among his creditors should be entitled to be discharged to start again free from judgment or action against him. Owing to economic conditions, the assets of the farmer had changed in value so that it was quite impossible to realize upon them anything like the amount of his indebtedness. He is now receiving the same measure of justice as though he were a trader; but instead of selling out his assets, he is retained in possession of them and he works out over a period of years his economic salvation. That is the purpose of the act. Why should we say that he is not entitled to it as much as the trader? Why should we say that we have a bankruptcy law passed in this country in 1919 for the benefit of all those who seek to avail themselves of it, and not make it available to the farmer?

But the farmer of course, did not wish to go through bankruptcy in the way in which that term is technically and legally used. So we provided that instead of his making an assignment under those circumstances, instead of his having an assignee in bankruptcy, or a trustee in bankruptcy, we provided this simple machinery at the cost of the state to enable the farmer who creates new wealth—the greatest creator of new wealth outside of those who discover gold and petroleum, the greatest continuous producer of new wealth—to have his assets—including mortgages, and including his secured creditors—ratably divided among them, not on the realization of his assets, but on the estimate of their present value, together with an opinion—which is an estimate—of what the future would bring to that man. That was the theory.

Mr. DUNNING: As a going concern.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, his living on the property. Obviously this involved a tremendous amount of worry and anxiety as to how it would be possible to effect that purpose. The drafting of this measure was not a simple thing; it involved a tremendous amount of work. I think I can say in no spirit of egotism that I drew some of those sections myself, with great deliberation, toil and care. Well, we put the act in force, and appointed trustees. Then difficulties arose; in 1935 before we went out of office, we made amendments to meet that situation, and the act has operated, I think, fairly successfully.

When I heard the hon. member for Weyburn to-night talking about $158,000,000, I thought one must realize how vast a sum that is. It is a sum equal to half or practically half the national debt of Canada before the war. If I remember correctly, the reduction was something over forty-four per cent. Have I misstated the figure?

Mr. DUNNING: That is approximately correct.

Mr. BENNETT: That was not an arbitrary act of arbitrary individuals. That was an act taken after due consideration either by agreement on one hand, or by the action of a board headed by a judge, on the other.

Mr. DUNNING: In each individual case?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, not in the mass, but in each individual case. Someone has said that it injured the credit of the farmer. Why should it injure the credit of the farmer? Does it injure the credit of traders in this country that they one day may be subject to bankruptcy? That was the argument which was made when we placed upon the statute books of this country a bankruptcy act. That is still the reason why many people are opposed to bankruptcy legislation.

Mr. DUNNING: Would my right hon. friend permit me to correct a figure? It is thirty-one per cent in the whole of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. I took the word of the hon. member for Weyburn but did not look up the figures.

Mr. DUNNING: It is forty-four per cent in Saskatchewan.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, forty-four per cent in Saskatchewan and thirty-one per cent in the whole of Canada. What is the sum total for the whole of Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: The amount of reduction is $50,189,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, over $50,000,000. Now, this was not an arbitrary act. I have said that it is done by this board, in the ultimate analysis, and each case is dealt with on its merits. Would it be possible to have 26,000 cases dealt with, Mr. Chairman, by any group of men, without cases arising where there would be bitter criticism as to something with which they had dealt? I admit this, that when men deal with these things continuously they develop a bent to their minds either favourably disposed or otherwise to the creditor or debtor class. In this instance throughout Canada I think it is fair to say that the sympathy of the board is given to the farmer.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no doubt about that.

Mr. BENNETT: I think there is no doubt about it. And in the light of that sympathy, it may have created in the minds of some of us the idea that the law has not been strictly enforced; for the basis of the legislation, as I said in the house four years ago, and again to-night, was insolvency. Let there be no misunderstanding about that, because we could not be here at all if it were not for the fact that the basis of it is insolvency.

Look at the statute. The statute itself makes it perfectly clear in section 6, that it must be that. It states:

(1) A farmer who is unable to meet his liabilities as they become due may make a proposal for a composition, extension of time or scheme of arrangement either before or after an assignment has been made.

(2) Such proposal shall be filed with the official receiver who shall forthwith convene a meeting of the creditors and perform the duties and functions required by the bankruptcy act to be performed by a trustee in the case of a proposal for a composition, extension of time or scheme of arrangement.

And the chief justice of Canada, when this statute was before the court, summarized it as follows:

The provisions of the statute are made a part of the general system for the administration of the assets of bankrupts and insolvents established by the Bankruptcy Act, and they come into operation only where a farmer who is unable to meet his liabilities as they become due makes a proposal for a composition, extension of time or scheme of arrangement.

That is the language of the Supreme Court of Canada. Bearing in mind that that is the basis of all these proposals, the basis of this legislation, can one for a single moment say that, as was said by the hon. member for York-Sunbury, these men were not insolvent? If they were not insolvent the board had no jurisdiction, and the courts of the country could issue a prohibition against them proceeding. But when you hear an hon. member of this house or elsewhere say that men were not insolvent, I say: Who has failed in the discharge of his duty? The board had no right to hear such cases. If they did so, that is not because the law is bad, but because it is administered badly. It is because those who had no right to hear have heard. But I am bound to say my examination led me to the conclusion that I have not yet been able to find a single case where an allegation was made that the man was not insolvent that the evidence did not disclose that he was hopelessly insolvent. How could he be otherwise? He files there a statement of his debts, and you see at once what they are.

Mr. DUNNING: There are occasionally different cases.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but those usually depend upon the question of arriving at values.

Mr. DUNNING: No, in some cases in the absence of mortgage indebtedness.

Mr. BENNETT: You can put it in that way if you wish. I agree that if there are no secured creditors the difficulty is greater than in dealing with cases where there are secured creditors, by way of mortgage or otherwise. There is no question about that, because you have the valuation placed upon the property at the time the mortgage was made that usually represents about sixty per cent of such appraised value—very often about fifty per cent.

There are some further matters I desire to deal with, I am sorry to say, but—

Mr. DUNNING: We will permit the section to stand, if my right hon. friend wishes to speak.

Mr. BENNETT: There are two or three things I should like to suggest should be done with this statute. I have in mind the case which arose in Alberta. I think it should be made abundantly clear that the statute is within itself a charter which controls and governs the whole administration, and that it should not be a question of any application being made under a bankruptcy act, which, of course, if applied, does not apply in the case that arose in Alberta, for the reasons given by the chief justice. I think we should deal with that.

Then, we should deal more broadly than has been done, with the question of who is a farmer, because we followed largely the definition in the Bankruptcy Act when we were dealing with that. We should deal with the case in which farmers are incorporated. For instance, many families have incorporated themselves as limited companies, those families living on the land. We should not deny them the benefit of this because they have studied the problem and have taken this form of conducting their business.

There are two or three other cases to which I should like to make reference, but it is now eleven o'clock.

Mr. DUNNING: Before the committee rises and reports progress I might say that following the discussions of this afternoon and this evening on various sections I want to have an opportunity of again consulting the law officers with regard to some suggestions which have been made. I do not intend to bring the bill into committee of the whole again without having a thorough examination made of all the suggestions which have been put forward this afternoon, including those summarized by the right hon. leader of the opposition in his closing remarks. When I come back I hope to be able to indicate finally the length to which the government is prepared to go in regard to all matters discussed to-day.

Section stands.

The house met at three o'clock.

RADIO BROADCASTING

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE CONCURRED IN

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher) moved that the first report of the standing committee on radio broadcasting, presented to the house on Friday, March 11, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT TO DISCUSS MATTER OF URGENT PUBLIC IMPORTANCE—PROPOSED LAY-OFF OF SHOP EMPLOYEES

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, under standing order 31 I desire to ask leave to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent public importance namely, the proposed lay-off of large numbers of employees of the Canadian National Railway shops throughout Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce his motion?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, just before my hon. friend proceeds, may I ask your honour whether notice of his intention has been brought to your honour's attention and if you agree that the matter is one of urgent public importance?

Mr. SPEAKER: The matter was brought to my attention this morning by the hon. member, and I think it would be in order for him to proceed to discuss the matter if he has a sufficient number of members to support him.

And leave having been granted:

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to discuss the general question of unemployment; I shall confine myself to the terms of the motion to adjourn the house for the purpose of discussing the proposed lay-off in the Canadian National Railway shops, not only in the greater Winnipeg area, but as I understand it, throughout the whole Dominion of Canada. The lay-offs are to take place within the next few days, when, according to my information, many thousands of employees of the Canadian National Railways will find themselves without employment, and many without the means of subsistence.

It is rather a serious thing, Mr. Speaker, that the government, who are really, in a sense, the owners of the Canadian National Railway shops—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not the government.

Mr. HEAPS: The Prime Minister is quite right, I should have said the management of the railways. It is a serious step for the management to take, and reduce the personnel by approximately fifteen per cent. I am not entirely blaming the management of the railway for the drastic step they are taking, probably by reason of falling revenues and the falling business barometer. Nevertheless we have a responsibility in this house when we find that employment conditions are becoming worse and that the management of the government railway propose to discharge a large number of employees at a time when there is very little opportunity for the men to find employment in any other part of the dominion.

I maintain that the government have a responsibility for two reasons: first, because the railways are a government owned institution; and second, because large orders have been placed by the railways with private concerns for the manufacture of railway equipment which, I have been told by employees of the railways, could have been produced in the railway shops themselves. That may not be a very important factor if we discuss the unemployment situation from the dominion standpoint, but in so far as the government shops are concerned it is indeed a most important consideration.

I wish to draw the attention of the government also to the fact that if numbers of men are laid off, as stated, it is going to throw upon the municipalities a burden which it is almost impossible for them to bear. We have been told time and time again in this house that unemployment is in part a municipal as well as a federal responsibility, but in a matter of this kind I do not think that any member of this house would care to suggest that the municipalities ought to be burdened with the additional cost that would no doubt be thrown upon them if this large number of men were without employment.

I have received, as no doubt other hon. members have, communications from the municipalities showing how apprehensive they are of the existing situation with regard to this proposed lay-off. I will not do more than quote a part of one communication from the Winnipeg Suburban Municipal Association. Under date of March 12, they have written a letter—I have no doubt the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and other members have received a similar communication—which reads in part as follows:

> The Winnipeg Suburban Municipal Association view with very serious alarm the announced policy of the Canadian National Railways to lay off a large number of their employees in the Transcona and Fort Rouge shops which would result in increasing considerably the relief burden of municipalities already taxed beyond their limit, and which measure would also constitute an incentive to other large employers of labour to follow suit.

This is signed by Ernest Gagnon, secretary of the Winnipeg Suburban Municipal Association.

Perhaps it would not be out of place for me to indicate what it means to the municipalities when a large number of men are thrown upon public relief. I will give the figures for the city of Winnipeg covering the seven year period from 1931 to 1937 inclusive. During that period the total cost of relief in Winnipeg was $24,162,191. Of that amount the share which the city of Winnipeg had to carry was $9,944,083. The peak of this load was in the year 1935, when Winnipeg had a burden on its own account of $1,886,504. The estimate for 1937—the fiscal year and the calendar year in Winnipeg being identical—was $1,520,000 for unemployment relief. While it is true that unemployment has decreased by a small percentage, about ten per cent as regards relief, the burden is practically the same as it was in the peak years, for the reason, as I am informed by those who administer relief in Winnipeg, that owing to the increased cost of living the reduction in the number of unemployed makes little difference, and the burden is therefore more or less the same from the standpoint of the municipalities.

The city of Winnipeg had to provide this amount by borrowings; it could not do it out of taxation. I am further informed by an alderman who was here last week to interview the government that Winnipeg has now to provide annual interest charges to the extent of over half a million dollars as a result of capital expenditures incurred for unemployment relief during the past seven years.

At this time, when unemployment relief expenditures are breaking the back, not only of Winnipeg, but of many another municipality in Canada, it becomes a very serious matter to have a further load placed on municipalities in consequence of any large lay-off in the railway shops, whether they belong to the government or are privately controlled; and the government should either see that the thousands of men laid off obtain employment, or, if it is said that this cannot be done, see to it that they shall not be thrown upon the municipalities, thus adding to the cost of relief.

I do not want to go further into the question at this time. We have been hearing a good deal in this chamber about the more prosperous conditions that prevail in Canada, but I am inclined to think that the proposed lay-off in the railway shops is indicative of conditions that are beginning to manifest themselves in various parts of the country. I understand that in other large industrial establishments employing considerable numbers of men the same conditions are becoming apparent. This ought to act as a warning to the government of what may happen in the immediate future. We as the elected representatives of the people cannot allow a condition of this kind to prevail without taking definite steps to meet it. My only object in bringing this matter to the attention of the government and of the house is to ask that definite steps be taken to meet the conditions that have arisen and are likely to arise in other industries, to the end that the men involved will not become a public charge. These men do not want to be the recipients of public relief; they ask for an opportunity to work and to earn their own living.

Without going into the greater question of unemployment at large, which no doubt will be taken up later in the session, I should like to see the government take definite action to avert the threatened catastrophe so far as thousands of men on government railways are concerned.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): I am glad that the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) has raised this question, but sorry that it was necessary for him to do so. I had not been aware that the lay-off he has been speaking of was to be so widespread. I had rather had intimation that it would take place only in the neighbourhood of my own city; it is all the more serious if it is to apply over the entire country. I look at the matter, of course, from the point of view of my own city. It is a sad and serious circumstance, and if anything at all can be done to avert the calamity I urge most earnestly that it be done.

I do not propose to speak at length on the subject. I believe that the main point with reference to this tragedy—one can call it nothing less—was very well covered by the hon. member who has just spoken. It seems strange that remarks should be made about men going on relief coupled with the incident of a short, or relatively short, lay-off. It might be thought that persons who have been at work a considerable length of time would not immediately reach the relief rolls. But the situation in railway life is briefly this. In the first place, men work according to their seniority; those who are junior in the service will be laid off first, and all the men to be laid off, variously estimated at from 500 to 1,000, will be junior men. For the last several years they have not had any opportunity of saving money. The matter came home to me most pointedly when I received in the mail a letter signed by a large number of men—I estimate at least about 350. It was the original document, with the actual signatures —not a copy. I was pained and greatly surprised to see included in the list such a large number of men I know personally, and of whose circumstances I am keenly aware. If men such as these are put out of work at this time they are bound to reach the relief rolls almost immediately, and they will be a charge upon the dominion government, the provincial government and the municipality. The city of Winnipeg and the surrounding municipalities are simply unable to carry the load which may thus be imposed upon them. Winnipeg itself is in a very difficult situation financially at the present time and cannot carry any more. If there is anything the government can do to avert such a catastrophe, I urge most earnestly that it be done.

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): A large number of the men to be laid off if this proposal is carried through are my own people, a large percentage of whom live in the constituency which I represent, in which the Fort Rouge shops are located. It occurs to me, knowing the conditions which have obtained with respect to railway workers generally in that locality for a number of years, that at this time, the government-owned railway can hardly afford to lead the procession in creating unemployment. We have had a situation in our city which amounts to the maintenance of what I call a labour pool. As far back as last September or October I had some communication with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) with respect to this labour pool. Last summer we had a lay-off on the other railway, some 590 men, and about that number of families found themselves on relief within thirty days. A few of the men found some kind of temporary employment. The situation on the other railroad has been more or less similar, and I fear that this is the beginning of it, or rather a renewal of it, on the Canadian National. The taxpayers of the greater Winnipeg area have been maintaining 500 to 600 trained railway workers for about nine months of each year for the last four or five years in order that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company might enjoy their services for the remaining part of the year; last year I think they worked about nine weeks. We have been congratulating ourselves that the city was not asked to bear that kind of burden imposed upon it by the government-owned railway.

The situation is made even worse by the fact that those who should know tell us that there is enough outstanding work to keep everyone who has been trained in railway shops working. The men have been gratified at the measure of employment and the sense of security they have had in their jobs; and then this kind of thing comes along and spoils it all.

Frankly, I am more interested in the humanitarian aspect than any other. I know a large percentage of these people; many of them have been working only part time for the last six or seven years. They have had barely enough work to keep themselves going, and their resources and their household goods have been constantly diminishing. Whenever they got work they had to do a certain amount of replenishing, so that there have been no savings over their daily needs. If, therefore anything can be done to avoid a repetition of what happened last summer on the other railroad in respect to the laying off of men, I hope the government will do it.

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface): I could not very well claim to represent the constituency that sent me here if I failed to say a word on this occasion. The shop that will perhaps be most largely affected by this lay-off is the Transcona shop. When the Grand Trunk Pacific railway was built the starting point was made at a point about five miles from Winnipeg, called Transcona. Extensive shops were built there, and a plant established covering between a quarter- and a half-section of land. A town of about 7,000 inhabitants grew up around the shops. As Ottawa depends on the seat of government and the civil service for maintenance, so the town of Transcona depends on the shops of the Canadian National Railways. North Winnipeg and south Winnipeg, and to a very large degree the city of St. Boniface, from which I come, also have considerable numbers of men working in the Transcona shops.

The government have stated time and again that there shall be no political interference with the management of the Canadian National Railways. But years ago the government assumed the role of government ownership of this railway, and it makes little difference what attitude may be proclaimed from this house or elsewhere; the government is in some degree held responsible for the welfare of the railway. When the last administration was in office an advance of some $15,000,000 was made to the two railway systems for the purchase of equipment. We naturally thought that this money would be expended largely by the railways directly in their own shops, but a very large proportion of it went to contract shops. I have heard quite recently that the Canadian National Railways are expending a further $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 in railway contract shops. The government ought to be consistent in this matter; having adopted government ownership of the railway, they should see it through. It is true that the men who work in the contract railway shops need to live, the same as the employees of the Canadian National Railways. But that is not so much a direct concern of the government as the continued operation of the shops of the government owned railway.

As has been already pointed out by previous speakers, if these men are thrown out of employment there will be thrown on Transcona and St. Boniface and Winnipeg and other municipalities an insupportable burden. I feel that this matter can be readily adjusted, and therefore I wish to add my word of protest and appeal to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) and the government in this connection.

Mr. A. MacG. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, so far we have heard from hon. members who live in or near the city of Winnipeg. I represent a constituency in which there is a very large group of Canadian National railway workers, and I might add that I know of no finer group of people anywhere. It has been and must be recognized that the government has not direct control in connection with this matter. This railway is under a board of management, who in turn have under them officials of the road, and I have always been very proud to think that by and large there has not been political interference at any time in the management of the Canadian National Railways. I do not think we should urge the government or the management of the company to do something that should not be done, but I do believe that in times like these, particularly in western Canada, to take away employment from men under the conditions which exist there is something which, if at all possible, unquestionably should be avoided.

In regard to Saskatchewan in general we have heard in this house very much about the general difficulties that exist, and it will be recognized that when men are laid off work it is going to add to an already intolerable burden. My suggestion to the government is that if there is work that can properly be done, particularly in these western provinces, by all means let us advance to the railways whatever money will be required in order that such useful and proper work may be carried on. I would very much rather see public works constructed than have men receiving the dole. I have never advocated the construction of public works merely for something to do; they must be of a type and kind which will be useful, and which will not thereafter add to the burden on the state. I believe that in these railway shops useful work can be done, and I am going so far as to ask the government to urge the officials of the Canadian National Railways to go the limit in providing work during these very difficult periods for the men who are engaged by that company.

Mr. J. M. TURNER (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I rise to endorse what has been already said, and particularly the remarks of the last speaker. In my constituency there are a great many employees of the Canadian National Railways at Transcona and Fort Rouge. These men live in East Kildonan, but work in the Canadian National shops. I have received many complaints from them in regard to this matter, and I urge the government to do whatever can be done for these men.

Mr. R. E. FINN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps), and the other hon. gentlemen who have spoken. It does seem to me that at a time in the history of Canada when there is so much unemployment—though it has been largely reduced—the government through the management of the Canadian National Railways, should not set a new pace in regard to further unemployment. In my own constituency of Halifax there are very many men out of employment under the National Harbours Board, which comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe). I regret that the minister is not in his place to-day to deal with the question that is before the house for consideration.

Some hon. MEMBERS: He is here.

Mr. FINN: I am very glad he is here and that he will hear what I am going to say. It seems to me that, since seniority counts, it is the juniors who will be put out on the sidewalk if this retirement is carried out, and while we have not direct responsibility in connection with the Canadian National Railways, which are under Mr. Hungerford and a board of directors, something should be done. Not long ago there was appointed to that board a gentleman from Cumberland county, Nova Scotia, the president of the Liberal association of that province. It seems to me things are coming to a pretty pass when we pick a political friend, the active head of the Liberal party in Nova Scotia, and put him on the board of management of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. BRADETTE: What about Mr. Guthrie?

Mr. FINN: Who is that?

Mr. BRADETTE: I was not speaking to the hon. member.

Mr. FINN: I am speaking now, and my hon. friend has no right to speak. I do not desire to embarrass the government or the opposition. The opposition have nothing to do with it. It is a pity they are not a little stronger; then perhaps they would be heard more, and greater attention would be paid to them.

[Mr. Turner.]

An hon. MEMBER: What about Mr. Guthrie?

Mr. FINN: Does my hon. friend mean the chairman of the board of railway commissioners? He has nothing to do with employment on the Canadian National Railway system; he has to do with rates on all railways as chairman of that board. If my hon. friend did not know that he knows it now.

With reference to conditions in Halifax, the gentleman who is chairman of the National harbours board, Mr. Campney, went to Halifax together with the coterie that surrounds him. I believe my colleague went down also. His efforts were absolutely in vain. Men who were police officers were reduced to watchmen, at watchmen's pay, when that should not have been done. That cannot be defended, and that wrong must be righted.

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. member has made the statement that I went to Halifax with the national harbours board. I must ask him to withdraw that statement, because it is incorrect.

Mr. FINN: Then I will say this, that my hon. colleague was in Halifax while the board were there, whether or not they went on the same train I do not know, but he was present at some of the meetings that were held.

Mr. ISNOR: That also is incorrect.

Mr. FINN: Then I will say that my hon. colleague was present and found out just what was what.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is not discussing the matter before the house. We are concerned with the laying off of certain employees of the Canadian National Railways, and that is all.

Mr. FINN: It is not only a matter of the men being laid off at Winnipeg.

Mr. BRADETTE: Oh, yes it is.

Mr. FINN: Oh, no; it is a question of men being laid off over the whole system, including Nova Scotia, particularly in Halifax. Do not let us narrow the question or bind ourselves to conditions that exist in only one place, Winnipeg and other parts of Manitoba. If we do, the electors will not be blind when they go to the polls—we will not return as many members, and we will probably be sitting over there instead of over here. We must deal with matters openly and aboveboard.

Mr. Hungerford is the head of the Canadian National Railway management. I understand that he is to retire shortly, and the gentleman mentioned to fill his position is the purchasing agent of that railway system, Mr. Vaughan. If you can tell me that a purchasing agent of a railway of twenty-two thousand miles is the right man to be president of the Canadian National Railways, then I will go to a phrenologist and have my head examined, to find out whether I am right or wrong. I am loyal to my party, and it is that loyalty which makes me say what I am saying to-day. I do not know what my colleague is going to say, but he can speak for himself. All I do say in reference to him is that the arrival of the centralized harbour board synchronized with his arrival in Halifax, and I had no knowledge of his going or arrival until I received a letter stating that he was there. I have not interfered in matters affecting the policy of the harbour board, but I intend to do so in parliament at the proper time. I have discussed—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member, as I pointed out, to discuss the affairs of the Canadian National Railways from the standpoint of the lay-off of employees, and not the affairs of the harbours board.

Mr. FINN: I apologize, Mr. Speaker, and I believe you are correct, but the Minister of Transport controls six branches and they are all interlocked. However, I bow to your ruling and will discuss the lay-off, which comes within the purview of the motion for adjournment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps).

Already there has been a reduction in the staff of the Canadian National Railways. The management and the president and directors are mute, so far as any information given to the house is concerned. No information can be obtained. In the language of the Minister of Transport they are a separate corporation—and a corporation is supposed to have no soul. From the motion of the hon. member it would seem that their soul is not as big as I thought it was. I would go farther and say this: Start from the top—the executive—to reduce their salaries, and see how they would like it. Do not start with the juniors who have wives and families to keep, and who would be put on the street with no opportunity of receiving employment. The city of Halifax is about to stop giving relief on May 1. Where are the unemployed to go? To the city home in Halifax? Would that be a desirable thing?

We had a commission headed by Mr. Purvis which dealt with the question of unemployment, but to-day it would seem that Mr. Purvis has lost interest in unemployment. His attention is devoted to his position as director of the Canadian Pacific Railway, to which he was just appointed, and to that alone he owes his allegiance.

Mr. ROGERS: That was after the commission dissolved.

Mr. FINN: I did not say it was not; but it synchronized with his going. Further, the board of management, which is made up of lawyers, like myself—perhaps better lawyers than I am—some laymen, and Mr. Hungerford, sit in judgment. They are the men who want to be able to present to parliament a smaller deficit, and want to bring it about by a reduction of the wages of the poor men. They are putting the juniors on the street in order that the deficit may not be as large as it otherwise would be.

I believe the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and my leader, has always taken the stand that parliament is supreme and must settle all questions. I appeal to him as my leader, for whom I have the greatest respect both as to leadership and ability, to join with the Minister of Transport and to see to it that Mr. Hungerford does not make other people hungry while he and the board of directors enjoy good meals, amusements, and are happy and contented.

These are the only statements I have to make. Perhaps some hon. members on this side of the house may think me disloyal.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Not at all; you are speaking the truth.

Mr. FINN: But I have a strong recollection with respect to an hon. gentleman who in 1924 crossed the floor of the house and sat on the opposite side—there were not many over there then—

Mr. PELLETIER: The numbers are growing all the time.

Mr. FINN: If it is the wish of the people that they grow, like a plant, then I hope they do grow; if it is not, I hope they dwindle. But let nature take its course, and the will of the people reign supreme.

Finally let me say to the Prime Minister that in the early days when I was in the house, two other gentlemen voted against us on the budget; and one, who voted against a government measure, sits in the cabinet of the Prime Minister to-day. So if I am disloyal, there are others in the same position, and they will have to cross the floor of the house before I do. That is all I have to say respecting those hon. gentlemen. I am more interested in the railwaymen from the Atlantic to the Pacific who will be placed on the sidewalk and will not know in a few weeks where their next meals are coming from.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): Mr. Speaker, if the minister will forgive me, I believe what I have to say might better be said before he speaks. I cannot miss this opportunity of saying a word in support of the observations made here this afternoon. After all, there is something bigger than one's party, or bigger than the likelihood of coming back or the danger of not coming back to this house as a member. There is something of far greater importance, of supreme importance—the homes and livelihood of our people. For that reason I am offering these few remarks. This proposed lay-off will affect railway men not only in the city of Winnipeg but throughout the whole dominion. It will affect my own city of Portage la Prairie. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) made a remark which to me was significant. He said that if the government allow this lay-off to take place they will be setting an example to industry in general to do likewise. It is possible that we are on the verge of another recession, and I think it behooves the government to do everything possible to maintain employment at least at its present level.

We have a flour milling industry in the city of Portage la Prairie which has been established for forty-five years. The mill was remodelled recently but to-day it is standing idle. It was reported last summer that the mill was likely to close. The board of trade got busy and made every effort and advanced every argument to induce the milling company not to close the mill. I made a special trip to Montreal to interview the head officials, and they told me it was impossible to continue to run the mill, because they could make flour cheaper somewhere else. The mill was closed in the latter part of February, I have a letter here from the board of trade which gives the true significance of that move. They tell me that forty heads of families have been laid off; they are still out of work and are now an additional burden on the rest of the taxpayers of that city. This is just an example of what might happen, and I urge the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) and this government to do everything in their power to see that unemployment is not increased.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should confine his remarks to the question before the house, which has to do with the laying off of certain employees in the shops of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. LEADER: May I be allowed to conclude with one or two sentences which I think are significant? To-day the world is standing upon the brink of war—cruel, devastating war which will ruin the bodies and souls not only of the present generation but of generations still unborn. Why has the world gone mad? The foul seeds of war are being sown by such deeds as those of which I have spoken. The causes of war are founded upon the ungodly principle of bigger dividends for shareholders and unemployment for the working man, all of which results in poverty for him and his family.

[Mr. Leader.]

Mr. T. J. O'NEILL (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be fair to the people of the city of Kamloops, whom I represent, if I did not rise to speak on this motion. I do not believe there should be government interference with the Canadian National Railways, but I submit that industry generally is not carrying its fair share of the burden. During the war it was found that the shops of the two great railway companies, ordinarily used for the manufacture of locomotives, cars and so on, could be readily adapted to the manufacture of munitions. It seems to me that instead of the railway companies farming out the building of new locomotives and cars, the work should be done in their own shops, thus giving work to a certain number of employees the year round rather than taking on a hundred men for three months at a time and then laying them off for the rest of the year.

Many people have the mistaken idea that all those who work for the railroad companies are highly paid; indeed some think they are overpaid. But for the past five or six years many men in the shops have been working only fourteen or eighteen days a month, and most of these men do not earn more than $100 or $120 a month. When a man who is trying to keep a family on that wage is thrown out of employment, he simply has to go on relief. If there is any suggestion the government could make to the Canadian National Railways to avoid the laying off of a large number of men, I urge that it be made immediately.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, it is the contention of the government that unemployment insurance is a federal responsibility; surely unemployment should be a greater federal responsibility. A condition is now arising that will affect thousands of people all over this country. It will affect a goodly number of homes in my own constituency. These people have absolutely no other means of maintaining themselves than the remuneration they receive for working in the shops. We know that in these trying times it is exceedingly difficult for heads of households in western Canada to keep going, without having to face the misfortune of losing their jobs. I cannot fathom how the cities of Calgary and Winnipeg can possibly assume the additional responsibility that will be placed upon them if these employees are thrown out of work. The minister himself has been spending some of his valuable time electioneering in the west when no doubt he should have been looking after the business of the department. If that had been done, it is possible that such a situation would not have arisen. Now that he is back in his place I hope he will consider this proposed lay-off as a matter of national responsibility and do everything in his power to see that it is not carried out.

Mr. J. T. THORSON (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I should like to support the suggestion made by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. O'Neill) as I think it is particularly important at this time. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) has brought a very serious matter to the attention of this house. At this time the city of Winnipeg and the surrounding municipalities are making a special effort to carry the heavy load that rests upon their shoulders in providing unemployment relief, and it seems unfortunate that the Canadian National Railways should now be contemplating this extensive lay-off. After all, the government does own the Canadian National Railways and it should not be setting such an example at this time. I hope the suggestion of the hon. member for Kamloops will receive the serious consideration of the government, and that an effort will be made by the Canadian National Railways to find work for the men so that they will not be laid off.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, so far the discussion has been carried on exclusively by representatives of the larger centres, but this matter affects also both directly and indirectly, men employed in the smaller centres. I should just like to draw to the attention of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) this fact, that the smaller municipalities are to-day in a position where they cannot finance the relief obligations now placed upon them, and that in quite recent days the railway men in the smaller towns have suffered most acutely.

I believe the suggestion made by the member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) and other members that a great deal more work could be done in our larger shops is worthy of consideration. I do not know to what extent to-day the Canadian National Railways buy equipment from corporations nor to what extent the financing of this equipment is undertaken by United States financial corporations, such for example, as the Chase National bank, whose plates I notice on some of the equipment of our railway company. If the building of this equipment could be undertaken in the dominion it would have a beneficial effect.

I should also like to associate myself with those who have said that this is setting a bad example to private corporations. If a government-owned institution lays off hundreds of men—and my colleague says thousands—undoubtedly that will be taken as a signal for private corporations in this country to lay off men also.

Last night we heard over the air two excellent speeches on the railway problem. The president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) discussed the matter, and I noted that even the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in discussing lay-offs made the point that they should not occur, even if his proposals were carried out, without compensation for the men. Now if the head of what is sometimes called a heartless business corporation can make that plea in the course of an address with which in the main I disagreed—

An hon. MEMBER: He may not practise it.

Mr. COLDWELL: He may not practise it; nevertheless the suggestion was made, there surely we might expect something better from the government-owned institution, the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. J. C. LANDERYOU (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I notice that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) is in his seat. I feel sure that when he visited the people of Edmonton East he did not tell the electors there that it was his intention to support the lay-off of a number of men in the city of Winnipeg. The city of Winnipeg and the province of Manitoba are on the verge of bankruptcy. The laying off of a number of men in Winnipeg will mean that the city will have more people to support on relief, the volume of business will drop, and the people of Manitoba will greatly resent the action of the government, particularly in view of the government's promise to the people of western Canada that they would issue money and credit to meet the needs of the people. That is what they promised, and yet they have not the money to meet the needs of the Canadian National Railways, one of their own institutions. Never mind about the needs of municipalities or of provinces; this government was going to issue money to meet the needs of all people.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member should confine his remarks to the matter now before the house, the proposed laying off of men from Canadian National railway shops in Canada. He should not discuss theories about the issuing of money.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I realize, Mr. Speaker, that to maintain and operate efficiently the Canadian National railway requires money, and I was suggesting that as the government had promised to issue money and credit to meet the needs of all the people, they might issue it to meet the needs of the Canadian National Railways. Again, there are many high-priced officials on the Canadian National railways, and if there is to be any cutting down I suggest that you cut down their salaries. Then again, if you are going to cut down, you might cut down the interest on perpetual bonds; if there is anything else to be cut, reduce the interest on the other bonds, and, as a colleague behind me now suggests, cut down possibly on some of those levies on contracts that we have heard so much about.

This laying off of men would set a bad example to private industry in Canada, and I therefore hope that the minister will not see fit to carry out the proposed lay-off.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that this debate has taken place at this time, because at this very time the management of the Canadian National Railways is negotiating with the representatives of their shop employees to determine whether there shall be any lay-off whatever.

Ever since railroading began in America there have been seasonal fluctuations in business and seasonal fluctuations in employment. The number of conductors employed on trains depends upon the number of train miles being operated from week to week, and similarly with the number of brakemen employed and the number of locomotive engineers. Every railroad man in Canada understands that, and the schedules governing employment provide for such fluctuations.

The situation of the shop men is this. During the depression years there was no class of railway labour that suffered so heavily as the shop men. As the number of train miles was reduced the use of equipment decreased, and it was perhaps only natural that the railways should retire equipment in need of repairs and continue to use a better class of equipment. I think that the average time of employment of shop men over considerable periods was two days of employment per week. However early in 1936 the Canadian National Railways undertook a rehabilitation program and since then down to the present time I think practically every shop man in Canada, having seniority on the Canadian National railway, has been employed eight hours a day and five days a week, which under the schedules is regarded as full time for shop men. In that period the equipment of the railway has been brought up to a standard which places all the useful equipment in a condition to operate. At the same time the railway management has placed in the shops all the capital expenditures for equipment which the shops were equipped to construct efficiently, and so by a combination of the rehabilitation work, and the capital work that has been put in the shops, it has been possible to maintain the shops on full time for the last eighteen months or more.

The Canadian National Railways are now facing a condition under which they have not sufficient work to continue to maintain those shops at full time and the directors of the railway have decided that it is necessary to curtail shop hours by about twenty per cent. The schedules provide, and have provided for many years, that the shop employees shall work full time, but throughout the years the shop men have cooperated with each other and with the management to provide that instead of a lay-off in times of short work there shall be a general reduction in hours. The management fully expected to meet the present situation by a reduction in hours; that is to say, instead of a five day week there would be a four day week. And that is all that is involved in the present situation. Much to the surprise of the management, the shop unions have taken the position that they will not accept a reduction of hours and that if there is to be a reduction in shop work it must be at the expense of the junior employees, who must be thrown out of work. Negotiations between the management and the shop men are continuing, the management taking the position strongly that the shop men should cooperate as they have done in the past and meet the situation—which we hope is only a temporary one—by accomplishing the reduction through a reduction in hours rather than by means of a lay-off of men.

The wages of the ordinary shop men are about $30 a week—a little more, I believe—and this proposed reduction in hours would mean that the employees, for the period of short work, would work four days a week and have their income reduced to about $24 a week. Under this arrangement there would be no lay-off whatever.

No one regrets the circumstances more than the management of the railway. The matter is one for the management and not for the government, the latter having no right to interfere in matters of management. It is most unfortunate, however, that while these negotiations are going on and the railways are meeting a situation which they have had to face every year since railroading began in this country, a political debate should be precipitated in the House of Commons. Reference has been made to the debate last evening over the radio. Every hon. member knows that there is a terrific drive at this time for a program which is called unified management under private control, and the strongest argument in its favour is the contention that it is impossible for the government to own a railway and have it operated without political interference. I think that this debate to-day is one of the strongest indications that there may be a measure of truth in such representations; but I have always taken the view that it is possible for the Canadian National Railways to operate without political interference, and I have endeavoured during the time I have been Minister of Transport to give it an opportunity so to operate.

It has been suggested that the Canadian National Railway system is taking the lead in reducing the hours of shop employees. Every hon. member who has spoken here to-day must know that, with the privately owned road, this reduction took place last August, or as soon as it became generally known that the last crop would be a failure. The Canadian National Railways considered the matter at that time; as a matter of fact its management discussed the situation with me, and they decided then that every effort should be made to anticipate work. Wherever work required to be done, the management decided that it should be done, and that no lay-off should take place until the winter months were over and they had a chance to see how the traffic level would hold up during that period. The traffic level has not held up; there has been a very serious recession since the turn of the year. The result is that the wear and tear on equipment is not taking place to the same extent as in the early months of last year and consequently we have not the work to be done in the shops to enable the shops to operate at the capacity that would provide full time employment for every employee who has seniority on the Canadian National Railways. I trust, however, that the common sense of the shop men through their union heads will prevail; that this situation can be met in the future as it has been in the past, and that no general lay-off of the type that has been discussed in this house will take place. I sincerely hope that that will be the result of the negotiations now continuing between the management and the men.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I did not say anything earlier because I thought that my colleague from Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) had adequately covered the ground. But I would urge even more now, since the minister has spoken, the necessity for the government considering the matter more seriously than the minister seems inclined to do. Some of us from Winnipeg are particularly concerned; but it is only a few days ago that I had a very strong representation from the city of Montreal with regard to the position in which the workers will be placed in that city, especially since the city administration is apparently not going to continue relief.

I cannot quite follow the logic of the minister when he expresses regret that a discussion of this kind should take place to-day; and more, I absolutely fail to understand his position when he suggests that such a debate might indicate that there was something in the suggestion made by Sir Edward Beatty with regard to amalgamation. That is a great disappointment to me. I had thought that the minister stood foursquare for the idea of the Canadian National.

An hon. MEMBER: So he does.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, I cannot understand the remark he made a few minutes ago.

Mr. TURGEON: He only said that there might be difficulty in running it without political interference.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think we ought to know very distinctly where the minister stands. If there are difficulties in running the Canadian National Railways it does not necessarily mean that we have to plunge into an amalgamation, involving still greater difficulties, under private ownership. And if private ownership has shown its heartlessness in turning off a number of its men last fall, I fail to see why we should turn off Canadian National employees a few months later.

Again I wish to protest against the minister apparently taking the ground that the government had no direct concern or responsibility in this matter. Surely the Canadian National is a government concern. It is all very well to have a board set up so that the railway will not be dragged into partisan politics

It is very well to have that board set up for that purpose—though even then apparently a good deal of patronage manages to creep in. But that is altogether different from taking the position that the government can divorce itself from responsibility.

The government took over the road largely to save the system financially, and now a proposal is brought forward that the government ought to stand behind the employees financially. If it is not right, from the standpoint of the national welfare, that the shareholders of the Canadian National Railways should suffer, surely it is not right that the employees of the system should be made to suffer.

The minister pointed out that there had been seasonal fluctuations and that men in the running trades had from time to time been laid off. Surely that is a different problem from that of the shop men. He admitted that the shop men have suffered severely for a number of years. For a number of years, according to the minister's own statement, they have been carrying the load. Their regular time was lessened from six days a week to five, which means a reduction in wages, because wages did not go up to offset that shorter working time. Their standard of living has been reduced for a number of years, and now what do we find? According to the minister there appear to be two alternatives: either the junior men must be laid off altogether or the whole staff of the shops must have their wages still further reduced. So that instead of getting what they really need to live decently, a working week of six days, eight hours a day, they are being told that they ought to spread the work so that they will get only four days a week.

Mr. HOWE: May I ask the hon. member a question? Is he advocating a six day week for shop men?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, I said that a few years ago the men had been getting six eight-hour days a week and that that had been reduced to five days. Now the proposal is to reduce their time still further until it becomes only a four day week.

Mr. ROGERS: On a temporary basis.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister says, on a temporary basis, but this temporary basis of a five day week has lasted some years now, and I do not know that there is any guarantee that the proposed four day week will be any more temporary. The next thing I suppose will be a three day week.

If there were an increase in wages, it would be a different matter. And why not an increase? If every time there is a depression the government step in and government money is given in order that shareholders shall not suffer, why should not government money be given that the wage-earner should not suffer?

Mr. DUNNING: Who are the shareholders of the Canadian National Railways? They are the people of Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: And who are the bondholders?

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member said shareholders.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, let me correct myself.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a very important difference.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, there is, and I thank the minister for correcting me. But I say that the bondholders have been helped again and again; finance has been helped again and again. Now the government apparently are going to permit a definite degradation of the standard of living of large numbers of railway employees. I cannot see why the employees and workers should suffer and the shareholders and bondholders not suffer. To me the reply of the minister—and I presume he gave a reply which is satisfactory to the whole government—is far from satisfactory to the workers concerned, very far from being satisfactory to them. Imagine the feelings of nearly a thousand people in Winnipeg when they read the response of the government to their plea as brought before the house—people for whom the five day week has meant a struggle just to keep going, to keep their families fed and clothed, in many cases being unable to send their children to school to get proper education, at least in the higher grades. Some of us know very intimately the homes concerned in this matter and what the lay-off will mean to these homes. But all we can get from the government is that they have no direct responsibility, that they hope this is a temporary arrangement and that really we should not talk about the matter in parliament. I cannot understand that. Where else should we talk about these matters?

An hon. MEMBER: East Edmonton.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, I am not going to make it a question of politics. We were particularly careful not to make this a political question as we introduced it. There was not a word by my colleague to make it a political question, although we might readily have done so. But if parliament amounts to anything it is in parliament that great national questions of this kind ought to be dealt with. Although we want action in this case, we instance this as a part of the greater problem that is facing this country. We are told that we cannot discuss unemployment or cannot hope for very much in the way of a solution until some commission reports.

I shall make this a party question right away. The government are evading responsibility. They say, "The Canadian National is under a board; we are not responsible." Again they say, "A commission has been appointed; we are not responsible." Surely this parliament still has responsibilities. If there is coming what is called a recession, or another depression, across this country, surely it is time now that the government indicated to the country at large where they stand with regard to matters of this kind. I instance my own city of Winnipeg again; everyone knows the condition of that city—almost bankrupt, unable to get assistance from the province, and doubtful how much will be forthcoming from the dominion in the matter of relief. This large number of people involved are not ne'er-do-wells, not people who do not want to work. I am not holding the government wholly responsible for the depression; it is in part due to world-wide conditions, but I do urge that governments exist in order to meet depressions and other economic problems. The government cannot escape that responsibility.

The poor individual, whether he be railway employee or other employee, is to-day almost helpless. In the pioneer days if a man could not find a job in one place he could go to another. If he could not find a job in one occupation he could change to another. If he could not find a job in the city he could go to the country. But to-day if he goes to the country he is met by an army of people coming into the cities looking for work. Under these circumstances we have a right to introduce a question of this kind here. I resent the implication of the minister that such a question should not be introduced into this house, which primarily is charged with maintaining the welfare of the people of Canada.

Mr. R. J. DEACHMAN (Huron North): I rise merely to correct an error in the statement of the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Woodsworth). The intensity of bitterness of his speech is probably because he is unaware of certain facts which should be called to his attention.

My hon. friend suggested that there has been no cut in the wages of money. I would point out that the cut in the wages of money has been greater than the cut in wages of railway men. In 1920 the average rate of interest upon the bonds and treasury bills of the dominion government was 5·121 per cent. In 1937 the average rate had fallen to 3·748 per cent. The reduction therefore in the wages of money—I figured it out rather hastily—appears to be twenty-seven per cent. I am going to ask my hon. friend if he will be good enough to check something which I have not the opportunity of checking because I have not the material available here. I should like him to check up the real wages of the men employed on the railways of Canada from 1920 to 1937. I read some time ago—speaking from memory—that when the cost of living is taken into consideration those wages have gone up thirty-six per cent since 1920. My authority is a book which was published from McGill university, and I think I can get it for my hon. friend. I should like this dealt with purely as a matter of fact—not of discussion, not of anger, not of antagonism; I should like to know exactly what the facts are as to the issue raised by my friend of the relative wages of money and of men.

There is another thing which I think should be called to the attention of this house. I want as much as anyone to see railway men get a high wage, a fair wage, a wage in relation to the wage which other men get for similar work. But it must be remembered that when their wages are raised it is a charge upon the cost of moving goods. In addition I point out to my hon. friend that it is a basic charge and, as there are sometimes three, four or five different freight rates imposed upon the movement of goods, the added cost is pyramided. I question if those who seek to advance the rate of wages paid in particular industries are in reality producing an increase in the real wages of the people of the country. When you raise the wages of the railway men either freight rates must go up or the deficit of the railway must increase, which causes taxes to go up. Then it falls particularly upon one class in the community, the farmers; for they pay the freight rate both ways, and, as I pointed out in this house a short time ago, the average wage rate of the farmer, if you can put it in the form of wages, is much lower than that of the other classes of the community. I think this should receive some consideration when we are discussing a proposition such as this.

I go on to ask my hon. friend this further question. I want to know what the Canadian National Railways is expected to do. It has a certain amount of repairs to make. Is it to make repairs which are not needed, in order to provide employment? If the railway is forced into that position there was substance in the argument of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) when he suggested that people will eventually come to the conclusion that there is something in amalgamation and that we ought to consider seriously some different method of approach. I suggest to you that we want to handle the affairs of the Canadian National Railways as the affairs of a business institution are handled; that we want to be careful in spending our dollars; that we want to have some regard not only for the wages of the men but also for the wages of those who are paying the freight bills; that these things must receive some consideration from the house, far beyond a mere statement that men shall be employed whether or not there is work for them to do. There are principles of sound economy in the administration of a business enterprise, even when it is under the control of the government, and I suggest that after all these principles are very much the same as those followed by ordinary business concerns in their transactions. We should try to look at things from the broad viewpoint, not in the interest of one section of the community, as my hon. friend appears to do, but in the interests of every section of the community. Only in that way can we reach the natural balance in our economic institutions which will permit the progress being made in this country that ought to be made.

Mr. L. P. A. ROBICHAUD (Kent, N. B.): Mr. Speaker, while I agree with most of the previous speakers that at this time the railways should not lay off men, not only for the sake of the men themselves but also because of the bad moral influence it would have on the business of the country, since we are endeavouring to prevent the invasion of business recession from the country to the south of us, permit me to express my amusement at the wild enthusiasm of some of the speakers in behalf of government interference at this time. Those same members would be the first to rise, in a week or a month, and criticize and upbraid the government for interfering with the management of the railways. We have heard that in this house before. On the other hand I can well imagine the enthusiasts for amalgamation being tickled to death over the debate which has occurred to-day. They will say, "It will help us. They are not going to effect economies, therefore they cannot reduce their deficit, and that is a mighty good thing for our argument in favour of amalgamation."

I really do not think we should interfere. We have a board of directors and railway officials who are endeavouring to carry on their business as a private business should be conducted. We have been saying in the press and in this house that there should not be any government interference; we have heard some very severe criticism of the government because they allegedly had interfered, but to-day the same hon. gentlemen are upbraiding the government and the minister because they are not interfering. I hope I am not being rude to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), but I cannot help saying that in the three years I have been in this house I have marvelled at the apparent inconsistency of some hon. members here. We heard them on the question of sanctions against Italy, for instance. They rose in their places and upbraided the government because they did not take a certain stand which naturally would have implied a certain line of action. Then the next day or the next week they rose again and denounced some other stand on the part of the government that would have been the natural consequence of the first action they suggested. A man should be consistent in this house, and I do not think an hon. member with the experience of my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre should set such a bad example to the new members.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to find that the farmers have an advocate and friend in this house in the person of the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman). But as time goes on I am afraid he is going to have difficulty in reconciling his advocacy of agriculture with his defence of the poor bondholders. One of the difficulties I find in connection with the farmers of my constituency, and I dare say it is true in other constituencies in Ontario at least, is that they tend too much to think that an increase in wages means a loss to them, while actually it is a fact that the wages received by the workers buy the eggs, butter, wool and beefsteak they have to sell. On the other hand it is true that for the most part the bondholders already have enough money to buy all these things they need. The worker never has sufficient to buy the best or the highest quality of food. The letting out of men employed by the Canadian National, which is the question now before the house, would at once affect the amount of farm products consumed by the families concerned. There is no doubt of that, and I think people who pose as friends of the farmer ought to make it very clear that a fairly even spread of purchasing power to all the people of Canada would be the best thing that could happen for agriculture.

Then may I ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) what is parliament for? We cannot talk about foreign policy because it is going to start or stop a war, whichever it may be. We cannot talk about the Canadian National Railway letting out men. We cannot talk about unemployment, because a commission has not reported, and it always takes a commission so long to report. What can we do?

Mr. ROGERS: Already there have been three or four debates on unemployment, and there will be more.

Miss MACPHAIL: Then they must have been out of order.

Mr. ROGERS: Not at all.

Miss MACPHAIL: Since parliament, during this session at least, has done nothing but talk, it is going to be a serious matter if we cannot do even that.

I feel that the greatest extravagance Canada has permitted herself in the last six or seven years has been the vast amounts of money spent on relief. The amount has been great, and it has been detrimental to the people who received it. For very many years to come we will be paying large sums of money resulting from the deterioration of people who have received relief. So that it will pay us to keep away from it, and to keep people by giving them useful work, even though at the time it may seem to cost more. The relief business is bad—and we know it; at least in private conversation everybody admits it. And may I say to the gentleman sitting at the rear, in the rump of the Liberal party and with the hon. member for Halifax—

Mr. FINN: Which one?

Miss MACPHAIL: The senior member—that it is to be hoped that the day may speedily come when the government members may all sit on one side of the house. That will be very much better.

The hon. member for Kent, New Brunswick (Mr. Robichaud) seemed very much upset about the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre needs no one to help him defend himself, but I must point out that there has been no hon. member in the House of Commons who, over a long period of years, has given more unselfish service for the masses of the people. It ill behooves a member who has been here only three years to get excited about this matter when there are so many other matters which he might helpfully excite himself about.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as a consequence of some of the observations made this afternoon by some hon. gentlemen opposite, there is a danger of the position of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) being greatly misrepresented. It is only to remove that possibility that I say a word or two at this time.

It must be recognized by hon. members that, while the Minister of Transport is a member of the government and therefore when speaking, speaks on behalf of the government, he is also the only person in the house who is in a position to place before the house the views of the management of the Canadian National Railways, when any question bearing upon the conduct of the railways comes up for discussion in parliament. This afternoon the minister has necessarily been in a difficult position in presenting the views of the management, as distinguished from those of the government. During the course of his remarks I believe he has made quite plain where he was presenting the views of the management of the Canadian National Railways and the views of the government. Because of a reference to the matter being the concern of the railways, one or two hon. members have construed the minister's remarks as meaning that the government was not concerned with the question of the dismissal or the lay-off of a large number of employees. May I say at once what I know the minister was equally anxious to say, that there is no concern of the government which is greater than that affecting the livelihood of numbers of men and women. We all realize that there is no other single question which can affect so intimately the well-being of the citizens of our country as the question of unemployment. For years past this problem has been with us, on a very large scale. The mere mention of the possibility of any increase in the numbers of unemployed, especially at a time when we have hopes that matters are going to improve materially, makes the question one of the deepest concern to members of parliament generally, and particularly to the government. So I wish to point out that when the minister spoke of the question as one which was not the concern of the government, he did not mean the government was not concerned about it; he meant that the question of what men should be laid off or what men should be retained in the employ of the Canadian National Railways was a matter for which the management and officers of the railway had a primary responsibility, and that it was not the primary responsibility of the government.

May I point out that the minister's remarks with reference to the bearing of this debate on what is taking place at the moment have also been misconstrued. They were not intended in any way to imply that the government did not wish all hon. members to feel free to discuss this question, or any other question. May I say to the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) who has just taken her seat, that, far from showing any evidence of a desire to stop discussion, only one member of the government has spoken thus far, and the debate has been in progress for nearly two hours. There has been no suggestion that the subject should not be fully discussed.

When the minister voiced a regret that the discussion had taken place at the moment, he made his meaning perfectly clear by stating that at this particular time the unions were negotiating with the management of the railways in connection with the lay-off of some of the men. He said he felt it was unfortunate that, at a time when the matter was being discussed between the two parties concerned, a debate should be taking place in the house, which might lead to some misunderstanding on the position of the Canadian National Railways, a publicly owned railway vis-a-vis the Canadian Pacific, a privately owned railway. The minister's remark, as I understood it, and as I believe the house understood it, far from being an argument in favour of unification, was an argument directly the opposite. What the minister stated was that the Canadian Pacific railway, a privately owned company, can apparently take up these questions—as it did a question similar to this one some months ago—and settle them without any discussion in parliament. But the moment the Canadian National Railways, under similar conditions and for similar reasons, follow a like course of action, immediately that course of action becomes the subject of a political debate, or of a debate in the parliament of Canada which, to a certain extent, seems or seeks to bring the railways under political control.

The concern of the government is not only with the well-being of railway employees, but with the success of the operation of government owned railways. That is the phase of the question to which the minister had special reference when he mentioned the debate which had taken place last night respecting the merits of government and privately owned systems. His point was that the management of a privately owned system appeared to be free to act in accordance with what they believed to be in the best interests of the road, from the economic point of view, and that it would seem from the discussion in parliament that the government road could not be operated in the same way, without the possibility of political interference.

With respect to all government owned enterprises I believe we must recognize that we cannot have it both ways; we cannot have political control and at the same time complete absence of political control. That is something which has to be kept in mind in connection with all government owned enterprises. If they are to be operated as privately owned business organizations are, then they must be operated free from political influence and control. There is always the possibility, in connection with any government owned enterprise, that there will be more in the way of criticism and of interference than would ever occur in connection with a company under private management.

Coming back to the immediate matter before us, I personally do not complain of the discussion which has taken place. Rather, I see as a result of what has been said the possibility of further and even more careful consideration of the question by the management itself. I am sure the management of the Canadian National Railways have no desire to be indifferent to the wishes of the government and members of parliament with respect to refraining, wherever justified in so doing, from increasing the numbers of unemployed. I am sure, too, that the management will be the first to take cognizance of what has been said in the discussion this afternoon with respect to the serious nature of any change at the present time which might affect employment.

I remember that some years ago, with respect to the same organization, we had the same question before us. For economic reasons, a number of employees were being laid off. I believe hon. members who were in the house at the time will recall that I told the house of having personally spoken to Sir Henry Thornton, the then president of the railways, about the situation. But I had pointed out to Sir Henry that, while it was perfectly true that the government had no desire to interfere with the management of the railways in the discharge of its duty, nevertheless we were directly and vitally concerned with the all-important question of unemployment in Canada. I said we hoped that, as one of the great employers of labour in this country, we might, without being guilty of anything in the nature of political interference, say to him what we would say to all other employers and all other enterprises, namely, that so far as it was possible, his company should seek to cooperate with the government in helping to meet the difficult situation of unemployment. I believe that such will be the case of the present management of the national railways with respect to the present situation, and I hope that hon. members will understand that such also was what the minister sought to convey in the remarks which he made.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the debate this afternoon has served one very useful purpose: it has brought home to every hon. member a sense of the tremendous responsibility resting upon us as the representatives of the people in this house. All who are familiar with the conditions and circumstances alluded to this afternoon must have had their sympathies stirred and their emotions quickened as they realized the plight in which so many people find themselves. It was my sad lot, perhaps you will say, to have had to deal with this problem from much the same angle as has the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I can recall how hon. gentlemen who then sat on this side of the house thundered anathemas against the government of the day for not having taken steps to deal with this problem as it should have been dealt with. Hon. members who were in the house in those days will recall the bitterness of some of the observations then made, but to-day another set of men are charged with responsibility. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) is new to this house. He was not a member of parliament in the days from 1930 to 1935, and we now have the Prime Minister interpreting his remarks. It reminded me of the interpretation which Pharaoh sought amidst great difficulties because he felt that his dream had not been properly understood. I looked this up and find it is as follows:

> And it came to pass in the morning that his spirit was troubled; and he sent and called for all the magicians of Egypt, and all the wise men thereof: and Pharaoh told them his dream; but there was none that could interpret them unto Pharaoh.

But the Prime Minister is now interpreting the observations of the Minister of Transport, and all is well in Israel. He has made it quite clear that the Minister of Transport did not mean what he said, that "what he meant to say is what I now say, speaking as Prime Minister," and that you must draw an acute and sharp difference between what he said as Minister of Transport and what he said to this house as interpreter for the management of the Canadian National Railways. This dual capacity in which he found himself is rather difficult, and it was a kindly act on the part of his Prime Minister to interpret his vision to the house in the terms in which he has. I am sure it will be appreciated both in and out of this house that an interpreter of dreams has arisen, so that there will be no difficulty hereafter, when the Minister of Transport speaks, in the matter of attaching any importance to it until his remarks are interpreted to us by the Prime Minister.

The real reason why this matter is of tremendous importance to the House of Commons lies in the fact that this government and this parliament must provide all the capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways. Not only the deficits but also the capital expenditures must be provided in some way by the Minister of Finance. I looked up the statute a few moments ago and I found that in years gone by we did anticipate some of the capital requirements of this road as well as of the Canadian Pacific in order that there might be some form of regular employment—not that it should continue at forty-eight hours a week. The Minister of Transport was quite correct when he observed a few moments ago that the men in many of the shops found their time seriously cut down during the period of greatest depression; but this country did anticipate capital requirements, and in anticipating them, employment was furnished. I am quite sure from what the Minister of Transport said—I hardly thought it was correct, but he must know and I do not—that all the maintenance requirements in connection with equipment had been taken care of. Certainly that was not my understanding of it, but if it is right, it creates a condition of very great difficulty. If all the requirements with respect to equipment have been met and provided for, of course it creates a much more serious situation than if there were—

Mr. DUNNING: Maintenance requirements.

Mr. BENNETT: The situation is much more difficult than it otherwise would be. The fact is that there are only two great shops in the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific systems capable of constructing locomotives and certain kinds of equipment.

I understand that both these shops are in Montreal, the one at Point St. Charles and the other the Angus shops. The complete building of cars is possible at other shops, such as the one at Calgary. It has always been considered important by those having to do with the economic situation in that locality that provision should be made to produce a limited number, however small it might be, of cars. The same thing can be said with respect to Transcona and the other shops in the Canadian National system.

There need be no apology for bringing up this matter in the house; parliament has always had to do with the capital expenditures of this railway and has had to find the money for them. It may well be, as the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) has said, that it would be desirable to ascertain at the earliest possible moment what would be involved in relief expenditures, based on the facts as stated by hon. members from Winnipeg, Calgary and elsewhere, and what additional sums would be required if the work were carried on in the shops as indicated. However, if there is no work to do, that is a different thing.

Mr. HOWE: May I just repeat what I said before with regard to relief expenditures? It is the earnest hope and the real expectation of the management that no one will be laid off in any shop in Canada. If the work is distributed, as it has been for years, there is no question of relief. It is a question of an income of $130 per month being cut to about $105 per month, so that there is no question of relief.

Mr. BENNETT: The observations of the Minister of Transport will relieve us all of a great sense of anxiety. If, as he says, there is no likelihood of anyone being laid off, then we need have no further cause for apprehension. That is what his last remark amounts to, so it seems to me to be undesirable and unnecessary to traverse further this phase of it. I am sure it will come as a matter of great satisfaction to the hon. member who moved this motion and to those who have spoken to know that such is the case. I certainly had thought that a situation had arisen where owing to a shortage of traffic the railway companies had found it desirable or necessary from a purely economic standpoint to lay off some of their employees, but the assurance given by the Minister of Transport relieves me of any anxiety on that score. I am sure we are all very happy to know that that difficulty has been overcome.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I might make myself clear. Negotiations are under way between the company and the men to decide whether the strict letter of the schedule, which has not been observed for years, shall be adhered to. The men are saying that they will insist upon those men who are retained, working the full forty hours per week. This would mean a twenty per cent reduction in the personnel, whereas the management are pressing for the continuation of the system which has been applied for years, under which there would be a twenty per cent reduction in the working time and no reduction in personnel.

Mr. BENNETT: That would mean instead of the junior men being laid off, both the senior and junior men would continue to work, but for shorter hours?

Mr. HOWE: That is it.

Mr. BENNETT: It is purely a question whether the distribution takes place through the lessening of hours, on the one hand, or the maintenance of hours with the dismissal of some men, on the other. That is the story, as I understand it from the minister, and I must congratulate him upon making it clear.

There is one observation that should be made with respect to the wages of money, and I am sure that the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) did not intend to leave a wrong impression. What was said in this house is strictly accurate. The wages of money with respect to railway securities has continued at a high rate on those securities outstanding and not callable. Unfortunately during the dark days after the war the railways emitted large amounts of securities that bore a moderately high rate of interest and were not callable. The result is that the wages of money has been maintained at a high rate with respect to them, and will so continue unless the owners voluntarily accept a security bearing a lower rate. It is that circumstance to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) referred.

Mr. DUNNING: The reduction in rates of interest on railway securities is not as rapid as in those on government securities.

Mr. BENNETT: It cannot possibly be unless they are callable or unless the owners are willing to accept a lower rate. With respect to certain Grand Trunk Pacific securities and with respect to the income bonds of the Canadian Northern, a settlement was made by the management of the Canadian National and 4 per cent securities were issued. It would be difficult to anticipate that those securities would bear a lower rate than the 4 per cent they now carry. With respect to the other securities bearing a rate of 4½ and 5 per cent which do not mature for some time, it is difficult to expect that the owners would voluntarily surrender them for securities bearing interest at 3, 3¼ or 3½ per cent. That is the position to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has referred on more than one occasion in this house, and the hon. member for Huron North will admit that he is strictly accurate in what he said to-day.

Mr. EULER: Is the right hon. gentleman now interpreting the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre?

Mr. BENNETT: No. I am delighted to think that that affords the only amusement hon. gentlemen opposite have had this afternoon.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: If hon. members would learn a little better manners in this house, it would be desirable. I am delighted, Mr. Speaker, that hon. gentlemen opposite have had a little amusement in consequence of the observation made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The only point I desire to make is that I was endeavouring not to interpret the observations of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre but to express my appreciation of what he said. He has said it on more than one occasion, and if the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not so understand my remark I very much regret it.

I do not think it serves any useful purpose to discuss at this particular time the pros and cons of government and private ownership. That is not the issue before us, nor is the rate of wages paid the issue, nor the wages of money. Those are not the questions which have to be considered at the present moment. The question is whether or not this house could take any appropriate action to lessen unemployment among that class of people who have been accustomed to security of employment in the work in which they were engaged. The observations made by the Minister of Transport indicate that if the views of the management prevail, there will be no lay-off of anybody in the shops of the Canadian National in this country, but if on the other hand certain other views prevail, the junior men will have to sacrifice their positions. I know this from personal discussion with a large number of men who may be senior employees in the shops of the railway. They have had during the last seven or eight years almost a minimum of employment. During part of that time their employment has been as low as three days a week. It rose to four and then to five days a week, and during a limited period has been six days a week, or, I believe, forty-four hours in all. Under those circumstances their surplus, if they had any, has long since gone, and they have been endeavouring to save their homes, to pay the interest on their mortgages, and to pay back taxes; in other words, they have been endeavouring to save what they put their money into, their homes, from loss. In Calgary—and I do not think the situation in that city is different from that in almost any other part of Canada—the average railway employee usually puts his money into a home, on which he gives a mortgage. During the dark days these employees were unable to make sufficient money to pay off the mortgage or, sometimes, even the interest, and often they found it difficult to pay the taxes. During the last year or so they have been able to come up more nearly level with their obligations, and now they approach the whole situation with feelings of great apprehension because of their difficult financial position. I think the average man in the city does not realize the plight of many of the employees of the railway. Feeling a certain sense of security in their employment they have built homes and mortgaged them, undertaking to pay certain sums per annum to enable them ultimately to own their homes. One part of the city in which I live was built entirely in that way, and it is certainly an extremely difficult situation that is facing them. But I am hopeful, in the light of what has been said by the minister, it may be possible that none of these men will be laid off; and as we have to find money for capital expenditures it may be possible—I do not know to what extent—to anticipate some of the requirements in order to provide employment for these skilled artisans without whose services this country would be lost. They are skilled shop men; from what I have been told, they are the equal as machinists and otherwise of skilled artisans anywhere else in the world. We cannot afford to lose them, even if there was any place elsewhere for them to find work, and there is none at the present time; nor can we afford to let that deterioration come about which is often the result of long absence from employment.

I do not wish to add anything controversial to this discussion. My attitude in this respect may differ from that of our hon. friends opposite in days long since past; but I have learned from discussion and observation how very acute indeed are conditions in some parts of this country, and anything that this parliament can do to diffuse a little sunshine among these people we must do, not only on their account, but because unless we do it the very fabric of our confederation itself will be destroyed.

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to take part in this debate particularly because I am obliged to follow such an eloquent speaker as the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), but in fairness to the employment situation on the Canadian National Railways in the province of Nova Scotia, I think I should say a word or two. I do not know the situation at Winnipeg, and therefore I hesitate to mention that city; but I know the situation in our own province, and more particularly in the city of Halifax, and I cannot but express my surprise that some hon. members who have taken part in the debate to-day apparently do not know what the situation is in regard to employment.

Mr. FINN: Hear, hear.

Mr. ISNOR: I do not know whether the hon. gentleman who says, "hear, hear," knows what the situation is at the present time in regard to employment on the Canadian National Railways in the city of Halifax.

Mr. FINN: Better than you do.

Mr. ISNOR: I certainly do not wish to bring personalities into this discussion; this is not the place for such tactics, and I would not do so if I had not been more or less put on the spot by the hon. member who is referred to as the senior member of a certain constituency. It is immaterial whether he is senior or junior; I do not think that matters very much, because the members are not interested in it.

Mr. FINN: I never said so.

Mr. ISNOR: The fact that the member speaking at the present time managed to procure 840 votes more than the senior member does not make the junior member any the less important in the eyes of his constituents.

Mr. FINN: Where did you get them?

Mr. ISNOR: I have said enough on that point.

Mr. FINN: Hear, hear.

Mr. ISNOR: I am sure, Mr. Speaker, you do not wish to hear as much from the junior member as from the senior member, and I do not want to bother you with the recital of events of long ago. I believe, however, that we are dealing with an important subject. I am considering the question whether there are fewer Canadian National employees in the Halifax constituency than there were a few years ago, and I am happy to say that there are not. Without introducing any political consideration, I believe it is due largely to the policy of the present government that there has been increased employment in the ranks of Canadian National railway employees. I can refer to almost every constituency in Nova Scotia, and believe hon. members will support me in the statement that not only are there as many employees in each constituency as there were a year ago, but there has been an increase. The junior men have been taken off the spare roll and new men have been put on in addition. I make this statement so that the rest of Canada will not think that the maritimes are trying to paint a picture as dark as some would like to have it.

Mr. FINN: It is pretty dark.

Mr. ISNOR: While it is not as promising as we should like, we hope that the discussion introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) will do some good. I am not going to go over the ground already covered by different speakers, but I would make a constructive suggestion. If the conditions outlined by different hon. members do exist, I suggest that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) make greater use of Canadian National lines in an effort to carry more goods from the extreme eastern section of Canada to the central parts, now being served, I understand, by lines other than the Canadian National. With that idea in mind I put on the order paper a question as to the amount of freight, grain in particular, which was being carried by the Canadian National Railways, so that we might have a comparison between the Canadian National and its competitor, the Canadian Pacific Railway. I believe that in the answer to that question lies to some extent the solution of this problem.

Mr. FINN: Oh, oh.

Mr. ISNOR: Mr. Speaker, I endeavour, when other speakers are trying to take part in debate, to give them my attention, and not to interrupt, and I trust that my hon. friend and senior colleague will pay the respect that years of experience such as he has had should warrant towards a junior who is inexperienced.

Mr. FINN: That is camouflage.

Mr. ISNOR: I should perhaps analyse the situation and make a comparison between the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National, because, after all, the Canadian Pacific is a privately owned company.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the question under consideration, which has to do with the lay-off of a certain number of employees in the Canadian National railway shops.

Mr. ISNOR: I was going to show how, by a greater use of the Canadian National lines as compared with the Canadian Pacific, the problem before us could be solved in part. However, Mr. Speaker, if you rule that I must not introduce the Canadian Pacific, railway into this discussion I shall not do so.

May I come back now to the question of unemployment. So far as the Atlantic region is concerned, not only has the Canadian National added to its employment, but I believe that we in the maritime provinces appreciate the efforts which have been made to keep certain industries moving at almost one hundred per cent of efficiency. Last year—something that had not been done for many years—there was spent on equipment the sum of $6,000,000, and that was undoubtedly a wonderful help to the county of Pictou. Moreover, a total of $17,000,000 in purchases was made. Wages to employees on eastern lines amounted to $15,000,000. In view of these figures, instead of feeling that there has been a recession in the railways we have reason to look on the bright side of things and to say, "Thank God we have an efficient management which has brought about the results that the people of Canada and the chambers of commerce from one end of the country to the other have been looking for". Instead of condemning the government and the Canadian National management we ought to appreciate the fact that they are trying to conduct the business of this great system in a businesslike way. But as soon as they bring in a measure of economy they are criticized.

The reduction from six to five days, which I believe took place in 1929, was, if my memory serves me correctly, at the request of the railway men themselves. I believe the principle behind it at the time was sound, rather than have a large number of men laid off it was decided, in a spirit of loyalty to the junior men, to accept a five day shift instead of the regular six days. And the plan which the minister has indicated to-day in connection with the present situation is based on the same principle. The question then arises, as stated by the leader of the opposition, whether all employees including the juniors should have part time employment, or whether only the senior men should be kept on and the junior men laid off. With conditions as they are now I think the older men should be quite willing to allow all employees to participate in the employment.

I should like to quote some words used by the president of the Canadian National Railways at a banquet tendered to him by the Halifax board of trade. He expressed a thought which, I believe, is endorsed by practically every sound thinking person in the dominion. He said:

> It is the aim of the Canadian National management to make the system serve to the maximum extent its owners, who are at the same time the principal users of its service; so to conduct the enterprise that it will aid, in so far as possible, in the development of every industry, including agriculture, and in every activity of business life. It must be operated with the greatest economy but it must also be ready to meet the development needs of the communities it serves; it must render transportation service to Canada of as high a standard and at as low a price as is available to producers of other countries which are competing with the dominion in the world's markets.
> That is the aim of the management. We are but stewards of your property, and it is the aim also of the railway's staff of more than 80,000 workers.

I think that answers the question whether the management are trying to meet the problems of unemployment as far as their system is concerned. I believe they are making an honest effort to carry out the wishes of the people of Canada, to give them efficient railway service and to carry on in such a way that they will not be termed a political organization but will rather be considered as one serving the best interests of the whole of Canada.

Mr. FINN: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not know whether I have a right to say a word or two before I ask leave—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has no reply.

Mr. HEAPS: If I have no right to say a word in reply, now that the discussion is over I ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

RADIO BROADCASTING

REPEAL AND REVISION OF RADIOTELEGRAPH ACT—CLARIFYING AND STRENGTHENING SECTIONS DEALING WITH LICENSING RADIO RECEIVING SETS USED FOR BROADCAST RECEPTION

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 52, respecting radio in Canada.

He said: This bill involves no new principle of radio regulation. The Radiotelegraph Act which governs the regulation of wireless telegraphy and broadcasting in its more technical aspects requires amendment by reason of the fact that control of radio communication as affecting shipping has been transferred to the shipping act. While the necessary changes are being made, it is the intention to modernize the wording of the Radiotelegraph Act, which was passed many years ago, and to strengthen a few of its provisions without in any way changing the principles of the act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

BAINSVILLE, LAKE ST. FRANCIS, BREAKWATER

Mr. MacRAE:

1. Was there a breakwater constructed on the north shore of lake St. Francis in the vicinity of Bainsville in the year 1935?

[Mr. Heaps.]

2. If so, was there an appropriation voted by parliament for this purpose?

3. Under what department was the work constructed?

4. What amount was spent on it, and was this amount sufficient to complete the work?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. No; repairs were made to existing breakwater.

2. Funds were provided from item No. 5, Supplementary Public Works Act 1935-36.

3. Department of Railways and Canals.

4. The expenditure was $2,490, which was sufficient to complete the work.

*WELLAND SHIP CANAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. LOCKHART:

1. Were Messrs. Edward Steel, William Liscomb, William Loosemore and Edward Walker employed on the Welland ship canal?

2. If so, how many years was each employed, at what work, and what salary was paid to each of them?

3. In the way of special leave, with pay, or otherwise, what allowance, if any, was paid to each of these men upon retirement?

Mr. HOWE: Three of the names given in this question were incorrect. In order to straighten the matter out my department has been in touch with Mr. Lockhart, and it is my understanding that he has been given in writing the desired information, so I suggest that the question be dropped.

Question dropped.

PRINCE ALBERT, SASK., SUBMERGED WEIR

Mr. PERLEY:

1. Is the submerged weir or dam at Prince Albert satisfactorily impounding the water, and is any trouble anticipated when the ice goes out of the south Saskatchewan river?

2. Who were or are the present engineers in charge of the construction of this dam?

3. How much has been expended on the scheme to date?

4. How much will it require to complete the dam, and is the federal government providing all the money or is the city of Prince Albert making a contribution?

Mr. CRERAR: The submerged weir at Prince Albert is on the North Saskatchewan river. From information so far received it appears that the weir is satisfactorily impounding the water. No trouble is anticipated when the ice goes out of the river.

2. Provincial engineers.

3. The dominion has contributed $47,253.02 to a total expenditure of $75,555.20. This covers work carried out prior to November 15, 1937. No subsequent claims have as yet been received from the province.

4. The weir or dam has been practically completed. Final costs are expected to be about $128,000 to which the dominion will probably contribute a total of about $82,300. The province will bear a portion of the cost. The city of Prince Albert has provided some material.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—INCOME AND DEFICITS

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley):

What is the comparative income results of the Canadian National Railways for the years 1934, 1935, 1936, 1937, under headings: (a) net income available for interest; (b) interest in the funded debt in the hands of the public; (c) net deficit or income of interest on funded debt; (d) interest on government loans; (e) total deficit?

Mr. HOWE:

	1934	1935	1936
Net income available for interest (after taxes, rentals, hotel operations and all other income charges)	$ 6,305,051	$ 4,590,610	$ 5,987,277
Interest on funded debt in hands of public	55,811,746	53,468,792	49,184,623
Net deficit on current year's operations	$49,506,695	$48,878,182	$43,197,346
Profit and loss adjustments (principally abandonments of property, equipment, etc., not chargeable to current year)	4,161,080	30,453,831	12,684,818
Interest on government loans (since cancelled by C.N.R. Capital Revision Act of 1937)	35,994,578	35,949,677	36,428,874
Total deficit	$89,662,353	$115,281,690	$92,311,038

Note: 1937 figures not yet published.

SALES OF BUFFALO

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. Were any buffalo sold by the government during the years 1936 and 1937?
2. If so, how many were sold and to whom?
3. Were such buffalo sold on the hoof?
4. At what points were deliveries taken?
5. Were tenders called for such sales?
6. If so, who tendered and what were the respective amounts of tenders?
7. Were the hides retained by the government?
8. Who were the successful tenderers?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. A number were slaughtered and the meat and hides from same sold.

2. 1936—1,500 slaughtered.
   Meat sold to Messrs. Burns and Company Limited, Calgary, Alberta.
   No tender received at time of slaughter for hides. The hides were sold later to different furriers.

   Alternative tender for meat and hides.
   Choice quality, 4½ cents per pound.

All other saleable, good and top medium, 3½ cents per pound.
Aged and boner for processing only 1 cent per pound.
All hides from the above animals slaughtered, $7 each.

Canada Packers Limited, Toronto, Ontario.
For meat only:
Choice quality, $3.05 per cwt.
All other saleable, good and top medium, $2.05 per cwt.
Aged and boner for processing only, 65 cents per cwt.

Alternative tender for meat and hides,
Choice quality, $3.05 per cwt.
All other saleable, good and top medium, $2.05 per cwt.
Aged and boner for processing only, 65 cents per cwt.
Hides—$3.50 each f.o.b. slaughter house, Buffalo national park, Wainwright, Alberta.

F. Scrase & Sons, Dauphin, Manitoba.
Choice quality, 3 cents per pound.
All other saleable, good and top medium, 2 cents per pound.
For processing only, ½ cent per pound.

Note—(a) Tenders included certain slaughtering services.

(b) F. Scrase & Sons were the only bidders on the 23 animals slaughtered at Riding Mountain national park.

7 and 8. Answered by No. 2.

SEED GRAIN PURCHASE GUARANTEES

Mr. PURDY:

1. What is the amount, if any, by provinces, that the federal government has been called upon to pay with respect to guarantees given for the purchase of seed grain or for providing other assistance to farmers in connection with seeding operations?

2. What is the present liability, if any, of the federal government, by provinces, with respect to guarantees given for the purchase of seed grain or for providing other assistance to farmers in connection with seeding operations?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. Nil.

2. Guarantees given to banks under authority of "The Saskatchewan Seed Grain Loans Guarantee Act, 1936"—$2,555,113. Under "The Seed Grain Loans and Guarantee Act, 1937," no guarantees have as yet been given, but the act authorizes maximum amounts as follows: Manitoba, $750,000; Saskatchewan, $6,600,000; Alberta, $1,600,000.

[Mr. Crerar.]

UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICULTURAL ASSISTANCE ACT

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn):

1. How many applications have been accepted under the farm improvement and employment plan: (a) by provinces; (b) total?

2. How many employees have received notice of the cancellation of their applications: (a) by provinces; (b) total?

3. How many of these applications were cancelled during the months of February and March: (a) by provinces; (b) total?

Mr. ROGERS:

1 (a) and (b). The provinces report the following placements under the Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act, 1937, as of March 14, 1938:—

CANADIAN FARM LOAN BOARD—LOANS IN SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. COLDWELL:

What amounts, if any, were paid to Messrs. Davis and Davis, of Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, in connection with loans granted by the farm loan board in 1936 and 1937, for: (a) fees; (b) as disbursements out of moneys loaned by the said farm loan board?

Mr. DUNNING: The following information is furnished by the Canadian Farm Loan Board:

(a) Answered in reply to question on February 21, 1938.

(b) The Canadian Farm Loan Board does not maintain a system of accounts covering items of this nature as the borrower is responsible for the payment of same.

The scale of fees payable as disbursements out of monies loaned, is set by the board.

LIVE STOCK PRICES AND EXPORTS

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. During the years 1933, 1934, 1935, 1936, 1937 and 1938, what were the prices paid for animals for slaughter such as cattle, calves, swine and lambs?

2. During the same period, what were the exports of such animals from Canada: (a) to the United States; (b) to England?

Mr. EULER:

DETLOR-BOULTER, ONT., MAIL CARRIER

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. Who is the mail carrier between Detlor and Boulter, Ontario?
2. Whom did he succeed?
3. Was his predecessor dismissed?
4. If so, for what cause?

Mr. EULER:

1. Elvin Whyte.
2. J. W. Hudson.
3. & 4. No. His contract expired in ordinary course on 31st December, 1937.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY, ISLAND OF MONTREAL

Mr. MALLETTE:

1. What was the original route of the Trans-Canada highway on the island of Montreal?
2. Have there been any official requests for changes in the route of said highway since the original plans were first deposited?
3. What changes have been made in the route following such requests?
4. What is the exact route which has been decided upon on the island of Montreal?
5. What are the prospects of completing such highway during 1938?

Mr. ROGERS: The trans-Canada highway is a series of provincial highways forming a continuous route across the dominion. The federal government has, at the request of the provinces, contributed under relief legislation to the provinces' cost of constructing and improving provincial highways which have been designated by provincial executive order as trans-Canada highway. The actual construction and matters pertaining to the so-called trans-Canada highway are however a provincial responsibility.

A report of a committee of the honourable the executive council of the province of Quebec, dated October 1, 1931, approved by the lieutenant-governor on October 2, 1931, designated the trans-Canada highway in part as follows:—

"Highway No. 2, from Quebec city to Montreal following the river road connecting Saint-Sulpice and Charlemagne.

Highway No. 8, from Montreal to Hull."

While changes in the route of the trans-Canada highway in the province of Quebec, as designated by the above referred to provincial executive order, have been made by amending executive orders, those submitted to the dominion do not affect the route on the island of Montreal.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—
CAPITAL EXPENDITURES

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

1. What were the amounts of the advances made and for what purpose were they made, to the Canadian National Railways for capital expenditures: (1) during the year 1936; (2) during the year 1937?

2. What is the estimate by the government as to the amounts of advances to be made to the Canadian National Railways for capital expenditure during each of the following years: (a) 1938; (b) 1929; (c) 1940?

Mr. HOWE:

1.

(1) 1936-Nil.

(2) 1937-$7,252,283.97

General Additions and Betterments	$3,798,461.43
Construction of Senneterre-Rouyn Branch Line	2,603,822.54
Trans-Canada Air Lines-Purchase of Stock	850,000,00
	$7,252,283.97

2. Estimates for 1938 not yet presented to parliament. Estimates are not prepared beyond one year in advance.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

1. What were the amounts of the government guarantees of the Canadian National Railway's securities issued for the Canadian National Railway's capital expenditures and for what purpose were these securities issued: (1) in the year 1936; (2) in the year 1937?

2. What is the government's estimate of the amounts of the government's guarantees required for the Canadian National Railway's securities to be issued for the Canadian National Railway's capital expenditures and for what purpose will these securities be issued: (a) in the year 1938; (b) in the year 1939; (c) in the year 1940?

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. DUNNING:

1. No issues of Canadian National Railway Company dominion guaranteed bonds were made in the years 1936 and 1937 for capital purposes. Capital expenditures in 1937 were financed temporarily by way of loans from the government.

2. Details of the capital requirements of the Canadian National Railways will be submitted annually to parliament and it is impossible to forecast the amount of capital expenditures to be financed by guaranteed bond issues.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

Mr. BLANCHETTE:

1. When was the Royal Canadian Aviation Corps established?

2. What is the total number of its present officer staff?

3. How many students are there now enrolled?

4. How many were enrolled in the corps in 1936 and 1937?

5. Where are these training schools located?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. The Royal Canadian Air Force was established on April 1st, 1924.

2. The total number of officers at present on the strength of the Royal Canadian Air Force (permanent) is 143.

3 and 4. Fiscal year 1936-37: Seventeen (17) officers underwent training for permanent commissions in the Royal Canadian Air Force, and eighty-one (81) airmen underwent initial training.

Fiscal year 1937-38: Thirty-five (35) officers are undergoing training for permanent commissions in the Royal Canadian Air Force. Three hundred and eighty-seven (387) airmen are undergoing initial training, and fifty-nine (59) airmen have graduated.

5. The training is carried out at Royal Canadian Air Force Stations at Trenton, Ont., and Camp Borden, Ont.

BROADVIEW, SASK., TELEPHONE AND RADIO RECEPTION

Mr. PERLEY:

1. Have any protests been made to the Department of Transport by residents in the district south of Broadview, tributary to the power line leading to the landing field south of Broadview, Saskatchewan, with respect to interference with their telephone and radio reception?

2. If so, will consideration be given to such protests and steps taken to find a remedy for the interference?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Only one complaint received to date, and that from a householder within eighty-five feet of location of new power line.

2. Matter being investigated with a view to eliminating interference.

RED CLOVER SEED EXPORTS AND IMPORTS

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott):

1. How many pounds of domestic red clover seed were exported from Canada during the year 1937: (a) to what countries; (b) what quantity each month?

2. How many pounds of red clover seed were imported into Canada during the year 1937: (a) from what countries; (b) what quantity each month?

NOVA SCOTIA FISH HATCHERIES

Mr. PURDY:

1. At what points in Nova Scotia does the federal government operate fish hatcheries?

2. To what per cent of its capacity did each of these operate during the past two years?

3. What species of fish is reared in each hatchery?

4. What was the total distribution by species during the past two years in: (a) Nova Scotia; (b) other points, from the above hatcheries?

5. Was there any stock produced outside of Nova Scotia distributed in the province during the above period?

6. What is the annual cost to the government of maintaining the above hatcheries?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Antigonish hatchery, South River, Antigonish county; Bedford hatchery, Bedford, Halifax county; Cobequid hatchery, Second River, Cumberland county; Grand Lake Ponds, Grand Lake, Halifax county; Kejimkujik Ponds, Grafton lake, Queens county; Lindloff hatchery, Lindloff lake, Richmond county; Margaree hatchery, N.E. Margaree, Inverness county; Middleton hatchery, Middleton, Annapolis county; Nictaux Falls pond, Nictaux river, Annapolis county; Yarmouth hatchery, South Ohio, Yarmouth county.

2. 100 per cent.

3. QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

LANDING FIELDS AND AIRPORTS— EXPENDITURES

Mr. ISNOR:

1. What amount of money has been expended on air-landing fields in Canada?

2. What are the names of the fields, where are they located, and what amounts were expended in each case?

3. What proportions were expended by the municipalities and the dominion in each case?

4. Have any negotiations been carried on in connection with the city of Halifax and the government of Canada or any branch of the government relating to the use of the Halifax airport as a landing field?

5. What amount has been expended in connection with the airport at Halifax?

6. What amount, if any, has been expended by the Dominion of Canada on this airport?

7. If no amount has been expended, what proportion or amount is the dominion prepared to expend on this airport?

8. Who corresponded with the government, with date of last communication, in connection with this airport?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

MORDEN WHARF, N.S.

Mr. PERLEY (for Mr. Brooks):

For a copy of all payrolls in connection with repairs to Morden wharf—so called—Kings county, Nova Scotia, during the years 1936 and 1937.

CHIBOUGAMAU MINING ROAD

Sir EUGENE FISET (for Mr. Sylvestre):

For a copy of all letters, reports, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the Department of Mines and Resources or any officer thereof and the Department of Mines in Quebec or any officer thereof relating to an agreement for the construction of the mining road at Chibougamau during the summer of 1937.

CANADIAN MERCHANT MARINE—SALES OF SHIPS

Mr. BENNETT:

For a copy of all orders in council, letters, telegrams, reports, and other documents, relating to the sale of any ships of the Canadian merchant marine since the date of the present government assuming office.

ELECTIONS AND FRANCHISE

MEASURE RESPECTING FRANCHISE OF ELECTORS, ELECTION OF MEMBERS OF HOUSE OF COMMONS AND PRINTING AND PUBLICATION OF ELECTION DOCUMENTS

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence—for the Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the franchise of electors and the election of members of the House of Commons and to make provision for the printing and publication of the Dominion Elections Act and instructions issued thereunder, the printing of voters' lists and other election documents, including forms and ballot papers, and to provide for the salaries or other remuneration of certain officers and employees.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, commends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

BATTLEFIELDS COMMISSION

AUTHORIZATION OF PAYMENT TO COMMISSION OF $75,000 A YEAR FOR PERIOD NOT EXCEEDING TEN YEARS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Minister of Finance to pay to the National Battlefields Commission the sum of $75,000 a year for a period not exceeding ten years from the first day of April, 1938, to be expended by the commission for the purposes and subject to the provisions of the act respecting the national battlefields at Quebec.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

AUTHORITY FOR EXTENSION BEYOND THE CONFINES OF CANADA—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of and concurrence in an amendment made by the senate to Bill No. 29, to amend the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act, 1937.

[Mr. Bennett.]

He said: The amendment by the senate was to strike out the word "mail" which was introduced by amendment in this house when the bill was being considered in committee. A subsequent study of the bill has indicated that the word "mail" was not appropriate in section 15 where we placed it. Section 15 deals with the agreement between the Department of Transport and the air line company affecting the movement of goods and passengers, while section 16, which is not included in Bill No. 29, deals with the agreement for the carriage of mail as between the air lines company and the Postmaster General.

Motion agreed to; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO STATUTORY GRADES OF WESTERN GRAIN

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 27, to amend the Canada Grain Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

Sections 1 to 3 inclusive agreed to.

On section 4—Commencement of act.

Mr. BENNETT: What do the words "without amendment" mean, as they appear on the order paper?

Mr. EULER: The standing committee considered the bill and agreed to report it without amendment.

Mr. BENNETT: If the grain act is to be amended, why should we provide that this act shall come into force on the first day of August? If we are going to draw up a new act this session, why should this be a separate act coming into force on that date?

Mr. EULER: I suppose because by the first day of August the crop will be harvested.

Mr. BENNETT: But presumably the new act will have this in it.

Mr. EULER: Yes, but this amendment is passed now in order to give such information as might be possible to the farmers who are going to plant seed. They can adapt themselves to the new conditions laid down in this bill.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT

INTEREST RATE ON REPAYMENTS OF TAXES AND INSURANCE PREMIUMS—ARREARS OR INSTALMENTS SUBJECT TO BONUS PRIVILEGES

The house resumed from Friday, March 11, consideration in committee of Bill No. 33, to amend the Soldier Settlement Act—Mr. Crerar—Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

On section 2—Time extended for credit on payments of arrears.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: When the bill was before the committee on the last occasion, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) moved in amendment:

That after the word "arrears" in line one, page two, there be inserted the words "or of any instalment" and that the figures "1938" in line two, page two, be struck out and the figures "1941" substituted therefor.

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Chairman, when on the last occasion the bill was before the committee and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni moved his amendment, there was a doubt in my mind as to whether his amendment was in order. Since then I have had an opportunity of looking further into the matter, and as a result my submission is that his amendment enlarges the purpose as exposed or set out in the resolution preceding the bill, and for that reason, is not in order and should be dropped.

Mr. NEILL: Although I have not the book in my hand, I have the observations in May clearly in my mind. When the bill was first introduced I was proposing to move that it was out of order on the ground that it did not comply with the resolution which had passed the house, and, further, that it did not comply with the terms set forth in that resolution. Upon looking into the matter I realized that the argument following the principle that the greater contains the lesser would be used against me. The argument would then have been that the bill was out of order because it did not spend as much money as the resolution provided for, and as the greater contained the lesser the resolution did take care of any lesser expenditure.

The very opposite is the argument I now propose to use and, I believe, legitimately. So long as the amendment I proposed does not exceed the terms of the original resolution, which contained consent of the crown to the expenditure of public money, my amendment is in order. And as the bill was so very much less, in its proposed expenditures, than the original resolution, there is an ample margin—far greater than that I now propose—to allow the expenditure still to come within the terms of the original resolution.

The principle is set forth at page 510 of May's Parliamentary Practice, Thirteenth edition, in these words:

. . . the constitutional principle which vests in the crown the sole responsibility of incurring national expenditure, forbids an increase by the commons of a sum demanded on behalf of the crown for the service of the state.

That is all right, so far. Then:

This principle, however, is apparently disregarded when the recommendation of the crown is given to a resolution empowering the expenditure of public money which, framed in general terms,—

And that is the way the resolution here in question was framed.

—places no limitation on the amount of expenditure to be authorized by the resolution.

That is exactly the case here. The resolution was framed in general terms, and placed no limitation upon the amount of expenditure authorized.

As I stated previously, the amendment I proposed will not, by a long way, come within the measure of the total expenditure authorized by the resolution, and therefore it is in order. My own argument might be considered poor and insufficient; but here we find May setting forth the principle that the statement that the crown must sanction the payment of public money is disregarded when the recommendation of the crown is given to a resolution empowering the expenditure of public money which, framed in general terms, places no limitation on the amount of expenditure. May then goes on to amplify the point.

I submit that the proposed expenditure in my amendment does not exceed the terms set forth in the original resolution, and that it is in order. May, which is founded on British procedure, bears me out, as the minister will see.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not propose to argue the point at length, but I believe it must be clear to the committee that the amendment does enlarge the powers conferred by the resolution and, consequently, I submit it is out of order. When we were discussing the resolution on a former occasion the hon. member for Comox-Alberni argued that it covered his amendment.

Mr. PELLETIER: Would the minister read the resolution? That might help to solve the point of order.

Mr. NEILL: While the minister is looking up the resolution, perhaps I might be permitted to read further from May.

Mr. CRERAR: Perhaps the hon. member would permit me to finish. The resolution is in these words:

That it is expedient to amend the Soldier Settlement Act for the purpose of reducing from seven per centum to five per centum the interest rate charged on certain repayments to the board of taxes and insurance premiums paid by the board in respect to soldier settlement lands in case of default on the part of the settler, and to provide further—

And this is the important point—

—that the period during which payments of arrears or instalments at present subject to bonus privileges may be made, be further extended to the 31st day of March, 1941.

Quite clearly, and certainly in the opinion of the legal advisers who drafted the resolution, that limited the extension of the bonus to those who were in arrears on March 31 of this year.

Mr. NEILL: No.

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. member says no, but I shall have to accept the advice given by the law officers of parliament. I repeat that the application of the bonus privilege is limited under the bill to those who have not been able to take advantage of it up to March 31 of this year.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, but not under the resolution.

Mr. CRERAR: That is in the resolution.

Mr. NEILL: No.

Mr. CRERAR: It is in the resolution, and the bill corresponds with the resolution in that respect. In his amendment the hon. member seeks to enlarge the scope, and to make the bonus privilege apply to an additional group. That is where I submit the amendment is out of order.

Mr. NEILL: Speaking on the last day the bill was before the house, the minister admitted the resolution was poorly drawn, and did not express his intention.

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. NEILL: The resolution clearly states —he who runs may read—that it applies to every one of the settlers. I contended that at the time and it has not been combated successfully. Let me read from May to make it clear:

As the resolution sanctions, without any specific limitation, the application of money to be provided by parliament to certain purposes, when the clauses in a bill founded upon such a resolution are before the committee, the freedom of action sanctioned by that resolution can be exercised. The committee is not bound by the terms of the provisions which the ministers of the crown have inserted in the bill; and any member may propose to increase the grants specified in these clauses or to extend the application of the provisions of the bill, whatever may be the cost resulting therefrom, so long as the power conferred by the royal recommendation is not exceeded.

There is the item, and it could not be more clearly put if this particular case had been before May when he wrote that. There is no question that the scope of the resolution is not exceeded and, therefore, my amendment is in order.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say that I think this amendment is in order. I wonder if the minister has looked at the terms of the resolution, which are:

That it is expedient to amend the Soldier Settlement Act for the purpose of reducing from seven per centum to five per centum the interest rate charged on certain repayments to the board of taxes and insurance premiums paid by the board in respect to soldier settlement lands in case of default on the part of the settler, and to provide further that the period during which payments of arrears or instalments at present subject to bonus privileges may be made, be further extended to the 31st day of March, 1941.

The motion is to substitute "1941" for "1938."

Mr. DUNNING: No; "at present subject to."

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly, because the law is always speaking. If you look at the section as it reads and substitute "1941" for "1938," that is all you need to do. The section reads:

Any settler or person indebted in respect of any contract or agreement made prior to the first day of January, 1933, under the provisions of this act, who after the thirty-first day of March, 1933, and up to and including the thirty-first day of March, 1938—

It would now be 1941.

—makes payment in respect of any arrears or of any instalment due and payable within the said period shall, subject to the provisions of this section, receive credit toward payment of arrears or on the balance of such instalment or on any other such instalment for a further sum equal to the payment made.

The amendment is after the word "arrears" in line one, page two, there be inserted the words "or of any instalment", and that the figures "1938" in line two, page two, be struck out and the figures "1941" substituted therefor. The trouble is that it is open to two constructions. We are submitting "1941" for "1938", and this would apply to anything that comes due in the interval.

Mr. DUNNING: No; "at present subject to."

Mr. BENNETT: It is ambiguous.

Mr. DUNNING: That might be admitted.

Mr. BENNETT: The question is as to the right of a private member to move an amendment involving the expenditure of public money. That right is subject to only one limitation, that the amendment must not be in terms in excess of the amount stated in the resolution. An amendment usually states, "not exceeding so many dollars." It is some time since I looked up the authorities, but I am quite clear as to that. No private member has a right to move a motion which would be a charge upon the public revenue, but here it is quite clear that the amendment proposed is in the terms of the resolution. If one reads the resolution in the terms of the section to which it refers, namely, section 73, it seems to me to be quite clear that all that is necessary to be done is to change "1938" to "1941."

Mr. DUNNING: The other words are important to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. BENNETT: If you take the statute as it is and just amend it by substituting "1941" for "1938", you meet the situation. That is, in connection with anything that falls due between now and 1941 there would be a credit of two dollars given for every payment of a dollar made.

Mr. CRERAR: That is precisely the thing it does not provide for.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what the resolution provides for.

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. BENNETT: The section reads:

Any settler or person indebted in respect of any contract or agreement made prior to the first day of January, 1933, under the provisions of this act, who after the thirty-first day of March, 1933, and up to and including the thirty-first day of March, 1938—

It would now be "1941."

—makes payment in respect of any arrears or of any instalment due and payable within the said period shall, subject to the provisions of this section, receive credit toward payment of arrears or on the balance of such instalment or on any other such instalment for a further sum equal to the payment made.

Look at the resolution, which reads in part:

—and to provide further that the period during which payments of arrears or instalments at present subject to bonus privileges—

That means everything.

—may be made, be further extended to the 31st day of March, 1941.

I do not want to make it more complex than necessary, because after all it is a simple question. The law is always speaking, and you are taking a section of the statute and striking out the figures "1938" and substituting the figures "1941" in their place. That is what the resolution says.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. CRERAR: I may be wrong but—

Mr. BENNETT: I do not say you are wrong at all; I am simply saying it is open to this construction. You are providing further that the period during which payments of arrears or instalments at present subject to bonus privileges—that would be all of them, everything—

Mr. DUNNING: Everything at present subject to bonus privileges.

Mr. BENNETT: You substitute "1941" for "1938," and everything is subject to a dollar for dollar credit.

Mr. NEILL: There cannot be any arrears until April 1, 1938.

Mr. BENNETT: The section of the statute will be found on the opposite page of the bill. We are substituting "1941" for "1938," and if we do that the effect is to make it apply to everything.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On section 2—Time extended for credit on payments of arrears.

Mr. CRERAR: I rise with great deference to differ from the right hon. leader of the opposition. The position is this: If no amendment were brought in, the existing legislation would lapse on the 31st of this month and no bonus would be applicable after that date. I think that is clear. What the resolution proposed to do, and what it did, was to extend the bonus privilege on arrears or instalments at present subject to bonus privilege; that means to those who have not been able in the past five years, for one reason or another, to take advantage of this privilege. The amendment of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni proposes that the privilege should be extended not only to those who have not been able to take advantage of it until the 31st of the month, but also to all those who have been able to take advantage of it, and therefore I submit that unquestionably it enlarges the power conferred by the resolution and for that reason is out of order. I have to ask you, Mr. Chairman, to give your ruling on the amendment.

Mr. PELLETIER: There is one point which the minister has failed to consider. The resolution says, "And to provide further that the period during which payments on arrears or instalments," and so on. There are the words, "or instalments." The words used by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni in his amendment are: "Any arrears or on any instalments." The words "or on any instalments" have been left out of the bill, and I submit that the bill is therefore not in accordance with the resolution. It is quite easy to see that the resolution refers to "arrears or instalments."

Mr. CRERAR: Let my hon. friend read the words immediately following, "at present subject to bonus privilege." They are the governing words.

Mr. PELLETIER: But these privileges are subject to the law expiring on the 31st of March, and that is simply a qualifying phrase. The purpose is to extend the time until 1941. The minister cannot deny that the word "instalments" appears in the resolution, and certainly it does not appear in the bill. The instalment becomes due on the 31st March, 1938. After that it would become arrears if not paid, but the bill makes no provision for that. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment is entirely in order because the words appearing in the resolution do not appear in the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: What does the word "instalments" mean? It means something or nothing.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister please dwell on that point about "instalments" appearing in the resolution and not in the bill?

Mr. BENNETT: That is the crux of this matter. The resolution says: We propose to leave things as they were; only we are going to change 1938 to 1941. It covers both cases. It was intended to cover instalments, but now instalments are left out. In a court of law—I do not want to say that a man should express too strong an opinion about anything—it would mean this, that if we substitute 1941 for 1938 the statute stands just as it was. Now we have taken out of the bill the word "instalments" although it occurs in the resolution, and it is to remedy that, that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni makes his amendment.

Mr. PELLETIER: How can the minister explain the word "instalments" being left out?

Mr. CRERAR: Because at the end of March they would all be arrears, I assume. In any case the governing words are the arrears or instalments that are at present subject to bonus privilege. Now they are not subject to bonus privilege after the 31st of March because the legislation expires on the 31st of March.

Mr. BENNETT: We are going to keep it from expiring by making it 1941. Then it will mean 1941.

Mr. CRERAR: We propose in the bill to make it apply only to the arrears and instalments that were due on the 31st of March, and not to instalments that come due after the 31st of March.

Mr. PELLETIER: Then it is unfortunate that the minister did not word his resolution to convey that meaning, and if now an amendment is brought in which is strictly in line with the bill, I do not see how it can be ruled out of order.

Mr. CRERAR: So far as the observation of the hon. member for Peace River is concerned, that point was explained at least three times when the legislation was before us on a previous occasion. It is possible that the resolution might have been more clearly drafted; but I repeat that in the opinion of the law officers of parliament whose business it is to prepare this legislation, the resolution was ample for the purpose with which the bill was intended to deal.

Mr. NEILL: I do not want to influence your decision, Mr. Chairman, but I would call your attention to the fact that the only member advocating this thing on the government side is the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), who is not a lawyer. There is a galaxy of lawyers behind him, and not one of them wishes to risk his legal reputation by supporting the minister; and not one of them has risen in his place to challenge the arguments put forward from this side. The minister has been left holding the bag.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: If no other hon. member desires to speak to the point of order, I will give my ruling. We are considering Bill No. 33, section 2. An amendment has been moved to that section of the bill, not to the resolution, which was adopted by the house some days ago. The amendment proposes that after the word "arrears" on page two, line one, there be inserted the words "or of any instalments", and that the figures "1938" in line two, page two, be struck out and the figures "1941" be substituted therefor.

In my opinion the amendment exceeds the power conferred by the governor general's recommendation. The resolution passed in the house prior to the introduction of the bill proposed to extend to March 31, 1941, the period during which payment shall be made of arrears or instalments due and payable between March 31, 1933 and March 31, 1938. The amendment proposes to add three years beyond 1938 to the period during which these arrears and instalments have become payable. The amendment, therefore, imposes a new charge upon the treasury.

When the resolution is framed in general terms there is no limitation on the amount authorized by the crown's recommendation; but in this case the resolution limits the period during which arrears and instalments have become payable, namely, from April, 1933, to April, 1938. This limitation cannot be extended by this committee. The hon. member who moved the amendment quoted from May. If he will turn to May's Parliamentary Practice, page 510, he will find that the application of the provisions of a bill may be extended——so long as the power conferred by the royal recommendation is not exceeded.

The amendment proposes to exceed this power, and, if it should carry, the liability of the government would be increased, which would mean a charge upon the people. For these reasons the amendment is out of order.

Mr. NEILL: I have the very highest respect, Mr. Chairman, for your office and for yourself, and while I have no regrets so far as I am personally concerned, I do regret to see that all the authorities have been ignored. Bourinot, May, and even the leader of the opposition have turned your decision down. Owing to my respect for yourself and your office I shall not delay the committee by challenging your decision, but I am sorry to say that truth compels me to state that I think you are wrong. That point being disposed of, I shall now get back to the original principle of the bill with regard to which I wish to present some argument that may yet, I fondly hope, influence the minister to take a different attitude.

I wish to quote from a resolution passed by the Soldier Settlers' Union. There is a provincial executive in Saskatchewan, one in Alberta and a headquarters executive, and this organization passed the following resolution dated March 6, 1938. It is not addressed to anyone in particular. It reads:

Dear Sir:

I have been instructed to protest vigorously by the executive of the Soldier Settlers' Union on behalf of its more than 2,000 members, the bill placed before the House of Commons by the Hon. T. A. Crerar to continue the dollar for dollar legislation based on the recommendations of the Legion dominion convention held recently at Fort William.

This convention was certainly not representative of the soldier settlers of the western provinces. The examination of the many resolutions passed by locals of the Legion in the west will prove that no consideration could have been given to the voice of the soldier settler of the west.

Further evidence of this is provided by the fact that at the 1936 dominion convention of the Legion held at Vancouver at which soldier settlers were able to send representation, the convention unanimously passed a far different resolution calling for:—Revaluation at present day values and the cancellation of interest charges retroactive to the commencement of the loan.

We contend that this complete about face was due to the fact that soldier settlers were able to be represented at the western convention but because of financial difficulties were unable to be represented at the recent convention of the Legion held in eastern Canada.

Furthermore, why should the recommendations of the Soldier Settlers' Union which was recognized as an organization officially by the government by our inclusion in the conference of 1933, be excluded and the recommendations of a convention which was not by any means representative of the majority of settlers be accepted and acted upon in such feverish haste. This action in the face of the minister's statement to our organization contained in his letter dated February 25, 1937, promising full consideration to the representations of soldier organizations is very difficult to understand.

That was an unsolicited letter which came to me. I have also a statement, unsolicited—I was in ignorance of it—drawn up by a man calling himself a zone representative, Mr. A. S. Coburn of Nanaimo, a man of standing and reputation in his town. He lives about one hundred miles from where the settlers I represent live—I am not referring to the settlers to whom the resolution I have just quoted refers. This gentleman went there of his own accord last November and on his return submitted a report to the soldiers' legion. I have a letter from a Mr. Payne acknowledging receipt of it; therefore I assume he handed it to the head of the legion, and it did or should have formed a part of the representations he made to the minister. And we find the minister stating that he had a lengthy conversation with the president, satisfying himself that his present legislation was in accordance with the wishes of the convention. Let me read what this zone official says: It is rather a long communication; but it is very important to the people I represent, and if it is the last thing I do in this parliament I shall put it on the record:

On the 3rd November, I visited the Comox valley to investigate the various reports on the plight and hardships of the soldier settlers. It is my intent to present facts pertaining to these men and some of the reasons why their payments of principal, interest and taxes could not be met.

For some time past their position has been steadily growing worse, and the time has now arrived when some immediate and remedial action must be taken. The statements and figures following cannot be challenged. During the period 1919-1921, when returned men settled in this area, a number of them were advised to enter the poultry business. It may have been considered good advice, but events have proved otherwise.

In 1919, the winter price of eggs was over $1 per dozen, and in March, 1920, the low price was 50 cents per dozen. In May, 1932, the low price was 6 cents per dozen, and the average price for the spring and summer months was 7 cents. On November 28 of that year the high price was 22 cents and by November 5, it had dropped to 15 cents per dozen. Men carrying flocks from 1,500 to 2,000 birds, were either forced out of business or were obliged to reduce their flocks to 150 or 200 birds. Many feed bills have been owing from that time until the present. The names of these men can be supplied at any time.

I can personally endorse that because I was in the feed business in those years, and in the place where I lived I had to write off many a poultry bill.

The decline in egg prices was fairly steady from 1919 to 1932, but the cost of production was seldom under 18 cents per dozen, and for a considerable period well in excess of that figure.

During 1919-20 others were advised to enter the dairy business. At that time cows cost around $175 to $200 each. A condensery was started at Courtenay and it was pointed out that European countries would purchase an unlimited supply of this product. It was found, however, that condensed milk was produced to such an extent in foreign countries that there was a considerable surplus, with the result that the condensery closed down in 1920, and in 1921 the price of cows dropped to $35 and $40, thereby entailing a serious loss to those entering this business. Since 1930 a considerable number of sales have taken place in the Comox valley and a large number of dairy cows have sold as low as $10 and $15 each. Some have sold this fall as low as $15.

[Mr. Neill.]

In 1920 in the month of February the condensery paid 85 cents per pound for butter fat, and the lowest price for that year was 60 cents per pound. In 1932 the highest price was 28 cents and the lowest was 17 cents per pound. For 1937 it has ranged from 28 to 32 cents. Arguments have been put forward that the cost of production is lower. It may be quoted here that the price of bran in February, 1920, was $2.35 per hundred pounds, and in April, 1937, it was $2.25, a difference of only 10 cents, but a difference in butter fat of 53 cents per pound.

In 1920 pork was 23 cents per pound, live weight. In 1933 it dropped to 4 cents per pound. Six weeks old pigs were $10 each in December, 1920. In November 8, 1933, they were purchased for $2 each. In February, 1920, veal was worth 23 cents per pound, and in 1933 the best price obtainable was 9 cents.

I questioned one settler regarding the growing of potatoes. He stated that in the spring of 1920 he had purchased seed from a neighbour, paying for 900 pounds at the rate of $180 per ton. In 1920 he grew thirty-five acres at a cost of $3,500. A portion of the crop was sold at from $10 to $14 per ton below the cost of production, and over a hundred tons were dumped as it was impossible to market them at any price. The loss sustained was in the neighbourhood of $2,500.

Market gardening has been followed by some of the settlers, but the cost of production is in excess of the selling price, mainly owing to oriental competition and the scarcity of reliable help.

Fruit growing has not been carried on, mainly owing to soil and climatic conditions, and the lack of satisfactory markets, which are very limited.

The prices quoted above have been taken from settlers' accounts, and are not quoted from memory. They can be verified.

Summing up the situation in this district, it would appear that a number of problems face these men. It must be remembered that at the time of purchase, from the figures quoted they had reason to believe they had a fair chance to make payments, and undoubtedly would have done so but that conditions (which it must be admitted were world wide) were against them. Prices dropped in the case of many farm products to one-fifth of the prices obtainable at the time of purchase.

Prices of land in 1919 and 1920 were considerably in excess of its productive value. It is conceded that certain reductions have been made by the government, but this is not enough. Some of the loans, through no fault of the settlers, are now up to where they were before the thirty per cent reduction was made. This is owing to the continual piling up of interest. The value of farm land is extremely low at the present time. Some of the best land in the Comox valley, namely, part of the old Lewis estate, sold recently for $50 per acre. This is rich cleared land, and preferably to any land in the valley. Compare this with land purchased for the settlers at $100 to $150 per acre. It might be mentioned here also that a large percentage of this land had been cropped out before the men bought it.

Local conditions militate against these men. The Comox valley is the centre of an extensive logging industry, and the minimum wage in these camps is $4.20 per day. All fit young men are working in the bush, and it is natural that they prefer that to working (at wages far below those quoted) on the farm.

Considerable difficulty has been experienced in marketing potatoes in Victoria. In spite of the fact that the quality of potatoes grown in the valley is equal to that of any part of the province, the wholesalers are not giving Comox an even break. This is probably due to the request made at the time of the Stevens price spreads commission to have these firms investigated. As an instance of this attitude, recently the agent of the control board ordered two cars from the valley at a price of $24 per ton f.o.b. Victoria. The local agent of the board canvassed the growers and arranged for the quantity ordered. One car was loaded and word was received from the agent at Victoria cancelling the other car and stating that the price of the first car had dropped to $21 . . . unfair treatment has been handed out to these men for a number of years and many instances can be quoted.

In the early days of settlement large quantities of pork were purchased by the orientals working in the Cumberland mines. Since that time the company has eliminated Chinamen and for some time it has been extremely hard to market this product.

Having set forth in the foregoing paragraphs some of the reasons for losses entailed and non-payment of the amounts due, and after having given very careful consideration to this matter, I feel that if these men are to stay on the land some action must be taken by the government immediately. It must be remembered that these men who fought for Canada in the dark days of 1914-18 are aging fast, trying to make a home, which they feel will never belong to them and which, when they pass on, their widow and childrent must evacuate to make room for aliens, who should certainly not be given preference to the dependents of returned men.

The dollar for dollar arrangement has not proved of much benefit to the original settler, as he has not had the money to take advantage with. It has benefited those in receipt of pensions, high wages, or private means. The men who are honestly trying to make a living from the land have been unable to take advantage of it. If the government had offered $5 instead of $1 it is doubtful if a cent more would have been paid.

The board has advised a number of these men to take their cases before the farmers' creditors arrangement board. It does not seem right that they should be treated as bankrupts. The board argues this is not the case, but the settlers do not agree with this argument. Their credit is gone when this action is taken.

It would appear to me that all interest must be cancelled on loans, and this should be retroactive to the date of the thirty per cent reduction. This is not asking the government to create a precedent, as they loaned the Canadian Pacific Railway many millions of dollars, free of interest. Surely the returned men are entitled to equal consideration.

Some of the settlers would like to dispose of a portion of their holdings, and I suggest the government take over such portions at a valuation agreeable to the settler, or arrived at by arbitration. This would materially reduce many of the loans.

It is important that action must be taken immediately. Many of these men have sacrificed themselves and their families enough. They have gone short of food and clothes trying to carry on. Their morale is low, and the worry is becoming too much for them.

It is distinctly understood that any remedial legislation should apply only to original settlers.

Now the man who makes that report is this Mr. A. S. Coburn, who does not live in the district, who has no personal or business interest there; his business is not one which would lead him to deal with these settlers in any way; he is an utterly unbiased man coming into the district because he felt it his duty as the zone representative of the Canadian legion. This is not my language, but his, although I can endorse every word from personal experience and knowledge. That is his plea, in order to allow me to ask that this amelioration which the minister proposes should be widened to the extent at least that we thought was intended in the resolution. I shall not go into that again; we shall accept the situation as the minister states it. But on the bare merits of the thing, can he not see his way to extend it as I indicated in the amendment which was turned down? The cost would not be a great deal, because, as the leader of the opposition pointed out the other day, you would probably get more money in if you grant this; for otherwise the men will be in despair; they will say, "Take your land; I cannot make anything of it; I would rather go out, and we might as well go now as five years hence." But if you made this reduction it would encourage them to go on, and would be a very different matter.

There was placed in our hands the other day the report of the soldier settlement board. I take some facts out of it. Only 7·1 per cent of the instalments due or in arrears on October 1 last in British Columbia were paid. At that rate, how many years will it take the settlers to catch up on the arrears, plus the amount falling due each year for instalments and compound interest? Take the total collections for the year, including the British families scheme; the cost of collection works out at fifty per cent of the total collected. In other words, the government is going to collect this money, if they can get it, and it is going to cost them fifty cents on the dollar to collect it. Why not let the settlers keep it and stay on the land? I think that is a very strong point. You are not going to get this money anyway; so why not make a gesture and let the settlers stay on the land? If you throw them off, you will resell the land at an enormous reduction and somebody else, possibly an alien, will reap the benefit.

I recall a farm quite close to where I live. I have worked on it, and am quite familiar with it. Some years ago the board turned out the settler and offered the farm for sale. I suggested that they sell it to a man whom I would produce, for $1,200 or $1,300, but they said no; they wanted $3,000. I said, "Yes, possibly you will sell it for that, but you will not get the $3,000. You will only have the land back again in a year or two." They said they were going to sell it for $3,000, but I said, "If you will sell it for $1,300 you will get that amount in cash, and that will end it." What happened? They did get a man to buy it for $3,000 on time. He went broke, and they took the land away from him. They sold it to another man for something like $2,000, but he went broke and they took it back again. Now they are hawking it around at the price I suggested six or eight years ago. What has that system of management profited them? I am not pleading altogether for the settlers, though their situation is bad enough; I am speaking in the interests of economy and getting rid of this system of paying out fifty cents in expenses to get a dollar. We should make some settlement. It is not as though this were confined to the government alone; I am told that a large number of mortgage companies in the west are making the same offer to people indebted to them. They know it is better to get something than to get nothing, and that is the point I want to impress upon the minister.

I shall not delay the committee longer. I have put the case to the best of my poor ability, and I only wish I were more eloquent. If I could only get the minister out there so that he could see these things for himself, I am convinced that he would make a change in this legislation.

Mr. REID: I rise to protest once more against these amendments passing, and I must say that I am disappointed at the lack of any proper excuse given by the government for the introduction of this measure I listened carefully to the remarks of the minister both at the time he introduced the bill and during this debate, and one statement which he made stands out in my memory. I am going to endeavour to correct it as far as British Columbia is concerned. I refer to his statement with regard to agricultural prices.

It would appear that there are two motives for these amendments. One must be an endeavour to have those pay up who so far have not done so. The second probably is to save the government money. With regard to the first motive, when I look at the statement given me by the officials of the department I am at a loss to understand just how the settlers who have not paid possibly can make a rush now to make payment, in view of the fact that this legislation has been in existence for some three years, and many of them have been unable to make any payments at all. It is not that they are unwilling to make their payments. They would be only too willing to do so if they had the funds; but, as I pointed out, with eggs at seventeen cents a dozen, with potatoes they cannot sell, with hay they gave away and with the clearing of land as difficult as it is in the Fraser valley, it is impossible for these soldier settlers to make any payments whatever.

If the minister thinks that by this amendment he is going to save money, I should like to point out to him that out of a total of 1,668 settlers who should have made payments last year, only some 475 paid in full. There are thirteen districts in British Columbia, each with a supervisor. It will cost at least $50,000 to pay those supervisors, in addition to the cost of keeping up that office in which, as can be readily seen if anyone cares to visit it, many people are given employment. But if they collected only $100,294 in all last year, when the bonus for bonus system was in effect, with 475 settlers making full payment and 529 making partial payments, it would seem to me that under this plan the government are going to lose money. They are going to keep thirteen supervisors at work, together with the head office staff, with no returns whatever. So this cannot be defended on the score that they are going to save money. If the idea is to induce those who have not paid during the last few years to pay up, I say it will not make them do any such thing, because under the extremely difficult economic conditions prevailing in British Columbia they simply cannot do so.

I mentioned that before, but I took note that the minister made no reply. When he spoke of the increased agricultural prices he may have been referring to the prairie provinces, probably to Saskatchewan, but I am speaking particularly of the lower Fraser valley. I say to him that if he puts through this amendment there will be very little money taken in; yet it will cost almost $100,000 to maintain the office and the thirteen supervisors in British Columbia. I say it is impossible for the settlers to pay. Many of them, if not all, are excellent settlers, but they have not had a chance to make any payments. They have this grievance. While it is true that many reductions have been made by way of bonus, revaluation of land and so on, the fact still remains that to-day there are on the land civilian settlers who obtained that land under the soldier settlement board for a quarter of the valuation which is assessed against the soldier settlers.

Mr. BENNETT: Not the present value?

Mr. REID: Yes, the present value; not the previous value. I have a case in point, concerning two pieces of property near my own home. The soldier settler there is paying at the rate of $50 an acre to-day, after the revaluation and all the other reductions. Close to him there was another soldier settler who sold out some three years ago. That land was sold for $10 an acre, so that a civilian paying $10 an acre is living alongside an original soldier settler who is assessed $50 an acre. That soldier settler has been unable to take advantage of this plan, and in that he is only one of many hundreds throughout the Fraser valley.

A voice says, "Why didn't he come under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act?" That has been exploded time and again in this house. Only certain farmers, not all, can come under that act. But why should one department of government say, "Go to another department and get redress; we are not going to do anything for you." I say the principle is not sound, and it should not be tolerated. When the minister rises, I want him to tell us just what that office in British Columbia will cost to maintain. I have given the total collections of last year, and without knowing the exact figures I maintain that it will cost close to $100,000 to maintain the thirteen supervisors plus the staff in that office. If this amendment goes through, as I see the minister intends it to, it will mean that very little if any money will be collected. Let me repeat, that out of 1,668 settlers under the board only 475 paid up in full. I maintain that those figures speak for themselves and show a serious condition prevailing in the Fraser valley among the soldier settlers.

I make one last urgent plea to the minister to reconsider this question very carefully and seriously before these amendments are passed. They may be all right for Saskatchewan or Alberta or Manitoba, but for British Columbia the result is going to be tragic indeed.

Mr. PELLETIER: I wish to associate myself as strongly as I can with what has been said by the two hon. members who have preceded me. I believe there is one further point I might contribute to this debate; that is the question of discrimination. The minister must realize that when this act was passed conditions were very bad, and one of the reasons it was passed was to help soldier settlers at that time. Fortunately, in some parts of the country conditions have become a little bit better. The price of wheat has increased, and there are now some soldier settlers who could avail themselves of the opportunity offered under this legislation, if it were allowed to be extended until 1941, to operate in exactly the same way as it has been operating up to the present time.

Furthermore, I say discrimination has been shown because those who might have been able to avail themselves of this legislation in the past might have been living in the dried-out areas. Possibly they have not had any crops. If conditions should change, as the fond hope of the Minister of Agriculture as expressed from time to time would lead us to believe, these people would be in a position to avail themselves of this legislation. Furthermore, it would be to the advantage of all concerned in Canada if the government were to set an example by effecting rearrangements along this line.

May I point out to the minister that a problem very similar to this one, respecting school lands, existed in certain provinces. School lands had been sold at a time when land was very high, and it was found during the years of the depression that due to the drop in the prices of farm products it was impossible for the purchaser to meet the payments due upon those lands. The matter was taken up by the various provincial governments. I know in one particular case a board was appointed to investigate the question, and as a result drastic reductions were made.

I believe the example the government is setting in this legislation is not a good one, and I suggest that the minister consider seriously before he presses passage of the bill. So far as I am concerned, I can only oppose it. I believe the minister has heard enough argument, not to make him change his mind but possibly to provide him with more information than he had when the legislation was first introduced. I believe he might very well reconsider the passage of the bill.

Mr. FAIR: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has read a letter from the Soldiers Settlers' Union with headquarters at Lloydminster. I have a copy of that letter and, living within thirty miles of that particular headquarters I feel I should be remiss in my duty were I not to uphold the request contained therein. I have known the conditions there for a number of years. Speaking some time ago to the committee, I gave figures showing that during the years 1931 to 1937 inclusive, soldier settlers reduced their indebtedness to the extent of $40 or at the rate of $6 a year.

May I point out that those settlers were not able to provide a living for their families such as is enjoyed by hon. members now sitting in this committee. If hon. members who have had the opportunity to stay at the large hotels at Winnipeg, Saskatoon, Edmonton and Vancouver believe that the soldier settlers enjoy the kind of living obtained at those hotels, I would ask them to go out among the farmer settlers, have a meal there and sleep a night or two in their homes. After doing that, those members might have a little more information about the conditions under which the settlers are living.

So far as saving money is concerned, I do not think the minister and the government have been fair to the settlers. The figures show that every year this oppression has continued; that the settlers are suffering more and more, and that the country is losing more and more money. I believe the government is in possession of all the facts and figures, and further debate would be a waste of time. I suggest, however, that the government would be well advised to take drastic steps to give the soldier settlers a chance to get possession of their homes, and that no more time should be wasted.

Mr. O'NEILL: Mr. Chairman, I have received numerous letters and communications from farmers in my district, with reference to this bill, requesting me to use my influence—if I have any—with the government to have the bonus privilege extended another three years, or until 1941. I have on my file one letter from a farmer who wrote expressing his appreciation of the bonus period having been extended. Apparently he took it for granted, from the Hansard report, that the bonus privilege was to be extended to 1941. A number of members have taken that meaning from the resolution, and a number of farmers throughout Canada took the same meaning from it. I have only one letter expressing appreciation of the action being taken by the government, but have numerous letters asking that we take that attitude. I do not know what the minister intends to do, but I should like to add my voice to those of the hon. members for New Westminster, Comox-Alberni and other constituencies who have spoken in favour of the amendment to the bill, and have asked that it be extended to everybody until 1941, the same as it has been since 1933.

[Mr. Fair.]

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to trespass upon the time of the committee, having urged as strongly as I can the desirability of continuing the present scheme for another two or three years. I indicated to the minister the reasons which had induced my government to take the position it did take. A number of those concerned were brought to Ottawa and conferences were held. As a result of careful consideration it was concluded that this method would be the best one to clear up the situation.

From time to time we have written off large sums of money. The mere writing of that off means that we have lost that much money without doing the settler any very great good, except to lessen the amount which he has to pay. And it is agreed that he cannot possibly be in a position, at any time within the vision of the ordinary mortal, to pay off the obligations as originally created. That being so, there were two methods only by which the matter could be dealt with: One was writing off the obligations, which we did, and the other was to create some condition which would be an incentive to the settler to want to get title to his property. And it was believed—I am bound to say the result justified the belief—that if we gave him credit for two dollars for every one dollar he paid he would be most anxious to pay up the balance due and secure title to his property.

We now have evidence from the hon. member for New Westminster that conditions have been so hard in that locality that payments have been very few. Then, we have heard evidence from the hon. member for Comox-Alberni as to what conditions have been out there. The hon. member for Kamloops has given his views, and hon. members from the prairies have spoken. Yesterday I received a telegram from central Alberta repeating the considered opinion of a large number of settlers that the effect of this inducement which is offered by statute to those who are on the lands, had been excellent, and hoping that the inducement would be continued.

I quite understand the position taken by the minister, but I cannot understand how he expects to get more money by pursuing the method suggested in the bill. If money is to be obtained, then in some way you will have to change the old saying: You cannot get blood from a stone. From no part of the house has a member risen and stated that there was ability to pay on the part of the settler; there is no suggestion anywhere that he has had the ability to pay but would not pay. There is no indication that in any manner whatsoever he has endeavoured to disregard his obligations. On the contrary, according to the evidence given by the minister a few evenings ago, four million dollars have come into the exchequer under the operations of this scheme. Putting it on the lowest possible level, that of the exchequer itself, I cannot think that we could receive as much money by any method different from that which we have adopted here, namely, to create such inducement on the part of the settler to want to pay that when he pays one dollar he gets credit for two. I do not suggest that that be continued forever, but we should try it for at least two or three more years.

Have conditions improved so greatly in this country? Why do I make that suggestion? We are just beginning to realize the true conditions. We are just beginning to realize that what we spoke of as a great movement forward was in fact no such thing. We are now beginning to feel the effects of the great recession that has taken place in the United States. According to the figures brought down the other day, our exports last month to the United States were not one-half of what they were a year ago. They are $17,000,000 as against $36,000,000. Under such conditions, is it fair to do what is proposed? Is it quite just? Is it quite in keeping with what we have done? Is it not an utter and entire disregard of the record of the past, of what we have done in writing down and providing inducements with regard to payments? How can people pay anything under the economic conditions that have been mentioned in the debate of to-day and a few evenings ago? These people are just keeping body and soul together.

I do not want to speak of my own personal experiences, but I have guaranteed the obligations of many of these men. I suppose there is no harm in my saying that the other day I sent a cheque for $4,000 to a bank in connection with a guarantee I had given for one of these soldier settlers. He was there with his little family and he could not get about very well as the children were quite young. What are we going to say in the face of this recession that is reflected so terribly in our exports? Are we going to say: Well, this is a good time to stop being friendly and kindly; the time has now arrived when we want our dollar. I know the Minister of Mines and Resources is a kindly man, and I should like him to tell the committee what has induced the government to take this position. There has been no indication to this chamber of what has happened. There is nothing a single hon. member can say in explanation of what has been done except that we want our money. It is a bad time to want it. I do not mind telling you that it is always a bad time to want money when you cannot get it. That is the position; we are not going to get it.

I do not want to prophesy, for the role of a prophet has never been one that conduces to longevity. If I remember rightly the teachings of holy writ, some prophets fell into rather evil days. I shall not endeavour to prophesy, but I venture to think that those hon. members who return next year and ask the minister how much money he has received under his new act will find themselves greatly disappointed. Why not let us be just, not generous? Why should we depart from tradition? I shall not put it as high as tradition; why should we depart from the past record, the record not of one government alone? Mark you, if this were political I would not be talking of it in this way; it is something more than that. Essentially it gets down to this: Do we value keeping a man on the land where he can try to work out a livelihood for himself and his wife and his children? Do we say that we do not? This bill says we are to say to him, "Pay or get out."

The hon. member for New Westminster says that it means the spending of thousands of dollars in British Columbia because we are going to maintain the machinery of large numbers of inspectors and others for the purpose of inspecting the inspectors and other work of that kind. I plead with the minister. I asked him to think it over the other evening, and that is all I could do. I am sure he has done that. Are we going to go back to our several peoples, get them together and say: "Well, boys the government has concluded that you are so well to do, so happy and contented, that you will want to pay up, plus interest at five per cent; they have changed the order of things and provided that this is to be dealt with in a new way, namely, one hundred cents on the dollar and credit for just one hundred cents when you pay it. Look at what we have done." I am to tell my friends that we have reduced the interest rate from seven to five per cent. I am to tell them that we have cancelled the arrangement whereby they received credit for two dollars for every one that was paid. I must tell them that we are now going to ask them to pay one hundred cents on their obligation.

It cannot be done and it will not be done. Why not let us take the matter courageously in hand and say that we shall continue with the old plan; that we shall give them another couple of years of it? If it works out, all right; if it does not work out, so much the worse, we shall have to do something more. That is all I suggest to the minister. I apologize for trespassing again upon the time of the committee. If it were not that I felt so strongly about this matter, I would not urge it with such pertinacity and persistence. But I feel strongly about it, and I believe beyond peradventure in the suggestions which we make. These are not political suggestions; they are suggestions that come from observation, from experience and from some little knowledge of under just what conditions these men are living and of the effort they are making to be honest, decent citizens with an earnest desire to meet their obligations. But this they cannot do under existing economic conditions.

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Chairman, I disagree somewhat with the right hon. leader of the opposition. The only soldier settler who will not get any benefit under this legislation is the settler who has completed all his payments up to March 31 of this year and who has consequently taken full advantage of the bonus. Let that be clearly understood. I almost thought that the leader of the opposition was under a misapprehension. When this legislation was passed in 1933 establishing the principle of a dollar for dollar bonus, it was given a life of only three years. At that time the price of practically everything produced on a soldier settler farm was at the lowest point in the history of this country. If the situation is so desperate now when prices have doubled, according to the price index, why did the government of the day not make this applicable for five or ten years? They evidently contemplated at that time that there should be a limit, and in the law they passed they imposed a limit of three years. Later, in 1936, it was thought advisable to extend the privilege for another period. As I have stated before, legislation was introduced in this house extending it for a period of three years, but in another place that period was reduced to two years.

The criticism I would make of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni—and the same thing applies to the hon. member for New Westminster—is that they take a few cases, perhaps a number of cases, in British Columbia where conditions are bad, and then reason from that that this proposal should apply right across Canada. There are returned soldiers who have taken advantage of the dollar for dollar privilege, and who are in a position to complete their payments on their land; yet in order to confer an advantage on a returned soldier settler in Comox-Alberni my hon. friend proposes to extend this privilege right across the board to people who would no doubt be very glad to take advantage of it, but who on a basis of equity really do not need it. I am sometimes surprised in this house at the easy way in which we deal with obligations owing to the government.

As I said before, I am not now going to criticize the inauguration of this scheme about twenty years ago; but I venture to say that before the country is through with the soldier settlement experiment, it will have cost the country anywhere from $75,000,000 to $100,000,000, and probably nearer the latter figure.

Mr. BENNETT: I put it at $80,000,000.

Mr. CRERAR: I think my right hon. friend is low at that figure. It means that the taxpayers of this dominion have to shoulder that burden—make no mistake about that. There is no one in this chamber who is more desirous of dealing fairly with the returned soldiers than I am. I know the sacrifices these men made for their country. Some have, perhaps in a moment of misguided zeal, gone on farms, many of them not equipped with the necessary experience and knowledge to succeed in that vocation.

I repeat what I said before, that this legislation is, I think, fair. There is a way of dealing with the extreme cases to which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has referred, and I say this, that the soldier settlement board administration will facilitate in every way the cases of those who are in the plight referred to by him and by the hon. member for New Westminster before a tribunal where all the facts can be made known and an adjustment be arrived at. The soldier settlement board administration will not put anything in the way of that adjustment; we will facilitate it in every way.

Mr. NEILL: And that tribunal may be struck out of existence inside a fortnight.

Mr. CRERAR: No; my hon. friend is, I am afraid, again overstating the case.

What are the advantages of that method? The advantages it seems to me are these, that the individual soldier settler can go before what is in effect a court where he can be certain of the fairest kind of treatment, and the soldier settlement board administration is not going to put any obstacle in his way. Individual cases can be dealt with in that fashion. The man who is not entitled to consideration will not get it from the board, but the man who is entitled to consideration will get it. It seems to me that this is a much more equitable and fair way of dealing with this problem than for us in a great burst of generosity in this house simply to say: We are going to extend this privilege right across Canada, from Halifax to Vancouver, to everyone whether he needs it or not.

There are many who have taken advantage of this privilege. One would almost imagine, listening to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, that no one in British Columbia had been able to take advantage of this legislation. As a matter of fact, in the Vancouver district—and that includes, I think, all of British Columbia—there were still 1,312 soldier settlers on land at the 31st of December, 1937; of that number 1,165 had been able in some degree to take advantage of the dollar for dollar privilege which has been in effect for the past five years. I cannot at the moment give the precise extent to which they have been able to take advantage of it, but I submit that the picture is not nearly so black as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni pictures it, or as bad even as my good Scotch friend from New Westminster pictures it, when 1,165 soldier settlers out of 1,312 in British Columbia have been able in some degree to take advantage of the bonus.

I repeat, there is the machinery to adjust individual cases. It is not necessary, in order to deal with a few hundred or perhaps even a larger number of cases in British Columbia, to pass legislation that will be effective right across Canada and give advantages to those who, so far as I am aware, are not asking for it and probably do not need it. I think at times we should give some consideration to the position of the taxpayers of this country. I believe the great majority of the returned soldiers do not want to be unfair or unreasonable. They do not wish to get at the expense of the taxpayer something to which they are not entitled.

I admit that this question is a difficult one to deal with. I know I shall probably be misrepresented from one end of the country to the other in bringing down this legislation, but nevertheless I submit it is fair and reasonable. If economic conditions change within the next year or two and the situation comes that the right hon. leader of the opposition came near prophesying, it will always be open to parliament to reconsider its decision. It is not a closed book, if conditions change to warrant reconsideration by parliament.

Mr. FAIR: There is no time like the present for reconsidering.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. CRERAR: With my hon. friend there is no time like the present for soaking the taxpayer in every possible way he can soak them, but so far as I am concerned I do not march in that column. I submit again to the committee that this is fair legislation, and I think the committee will make no mistake in accepting it. If within a year or two from now the economic situation has changed and prices come down, it is always open to parliament to reconsider the legislation. I think it is quite clear that when the legislation was first introduced and made effective for only three years, it was brought down to meet an extraordinary economic situation in this country. Notwithstanding the predictions of my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition, the situation to-day is vastly better than it was then, and I think we can well afford to accept this legislation, and if necessary review the situation a year or two years from now.

Mr. PELLETIER: The minister has made it quite clear that in his opinion there are certain parts of Canada where the settlers are not or have not been in a position to take advantage of this legislation. The minister will realize as well as we do that the discussion this evening has unearthed a lot of information, and I believe it would obviate a great deal of discussion if he would be good enough to tell us what particular part of Canada he had in mind that could pay the dollar for dollar. I am interested to know that because it would clear up the situation immediately if we knew where the money was to come from.

Mr. CRERAR: Let us take the province from which my hon. friend comes. In the Edmonton district there are 1,663 soldier settlers on the land, practically all of whom have taken advantage to some extent, in some form or another, of the dollar for dollar bonus. In Calgary, the southern district, there are 1,362 soldier settlers on the land, and of these 1,156 to some degree have taken advantage of the bonus.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What is the total amount paid?

Mr. CRERAR: In Calgary the amount of the bonus credited was $622,000 and in Edmonton, $875,000. Now we come to Saskatoon, the district that covers the whole of Saskatchewan. In Saskatoon there were 2,831 settlers at December 31, 1937, and of that number 2,178 to some extent have taken advantage of the bonus. The amount of the bonus credited was $1,040,000 in Saskatchewan.

Mr. BENNETT: That means that one million dollars was paid.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; that is for the period during which the bonus has been operative.

Mr. COLDWELL: How many took advantage of it last year?

Mr. CRERAR: I have not that information; I have simply the total.

Mr. BENNETT: That is for the five years.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. I submit that even under those conditions this is a creditable showing, and I think it means that the overwhelming majority of the soldier settlers now on the land want to meet their obligations. They do not wish to sponge on the taxpayers if they can fairly and honestly meet those obligations, and this will give all of them an opportunity to catch up for the next three years on those payments they have been unable to make during the period in which the bonus was in effect. As I have said before, the legislation is reasonable. It was certainly not brought before the house until after it had been considered by the government and explored by those who have to do with the administration of the act.

Mr. COLDWELL: Speaking in round figures, as the minister has been doing, one is apt to give an entirely exaggerated picture of what has happened. If the minister had told the committee as well what number of cancellations had been made and the number of quit claims that have been given over the same period, I think it would show that the soldier settlers have not been able to do very much. With regard to the Saskatoon district, in the five years there has been collected approximately $1,000,000; that is $200,000 a year; and I believe the minister said there were some 2,000 settlers. That means they have been able to take advantage to the extent of $100 apiece, which is not a great deal when we average it over the five years and take into consideration the number of parcels of land involved. I agree with what has been said in this discussion. The letter just read by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and referred to by the hon. member for Battle River has also reached me and I would draw the minister's attention to the last paragraph. I believe that much of the difficulty could be cleared up if the minister would agree to the first part of the last paragraph of the letter from the Soldier Settlers' Union. Let me quote it:

> We strongly urge that a conference be arranged to bring about a permanent solution to the settlement problem.

[Mr. Crerar.]

I believe that one of the causes of dissatisfaction among the soldier settlers is the feeling that in recent years they have not been able to have a conference with the minister to discuss the matter. I shall not enter into the controversy that has been raised regarding the legion resolution. I believe the legion passed that resolution in good faith on information which it had. But it was pointed out that certain representatives of the settlers were not able to be present. If this matter were held in abeyance for a few weeks and the minister could confer with some of the soldier settlers, many of the misunderstandings could be removed and probably the minister could present a bill which would meet with the approval of more members of this house than approve it at the present time.

Mr. BARBER: I am very sorry indeed that the government has not seen fit to extend the bonus. I was puzzled until a few minutes ago, when I heard the minister's statement, as to why they would not continue the bonus. It appears from the statement of the minister that his sole reason is the protection of the taxpayers of the country. He has referred to large sums that have been paid, though I am not sure whether he mentioned British Columbia. At any rate, large sums have been paid into the treasury. Has he any idea how much of that would not have been paid if we did not have the bonus? There would have been very little as far as British Columbia is concerned, and I believe the minister will find at the end of the year that cutting out the bonus will result in lower collections. His collections will drop considerably and in some parts of Canada they will drop out of sight. I do not suppose there is any use in continuing this debate and pointing out objections. I have received a number of letters of protest from British Columbia. I have also a telegram from the Canadian Legion from Haney, British Columbia, dated March 14, addressed to myself:

> Strongly urge you support amendment bonus scheme. Failure secure this extension will dishearten many struggling to make good this district.

That is signed by the president of the Canadian Legion, branch 88. From the figures the minister has given, it appears that there were 147 in the province who did not take advantage of this legislation. Therefore, if this amendment goes through to-night, it means that the only men for whom provision will be made will be these 147.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is wrong. It will apply to all those who have been able to take advantage of the legislation only in part; it will apply to them and extend the opportunity to them to take advantage of it fully.

Mr. BARBER: I may be wrong, but I thought the minister said that there were 1,165 who had taken full advantage of it. At any rate there is a large number of those who have been unable to pay during the last few years, and they will certainly not be able to pay in the next three years. I know that a large number of those who have been paying will become discouraged and make no payments at all. It is all right to say that they can go to the farmers' creditors arrangement board, but these men are not bankrupt. An odd one may be, but a man who has been struggling along and making his payments in order to get that extra amount credited cannot go to that board the next year or the year following. He will not be bankrupt.

Back in 1933 when this legislation was first introduced, we know the condition. It was supposed to be temporary. At that time we thought that we should be back in prosperous times within three years. At any rate it was going to be easy to extend the term. It was extended; but according to the prices of farm products quoted here to-night, conditions are not very bright in many parts of this country to-day, and there is little opportunity for these returned soldiers on the land to make even fifty per cent of their payments. The minister infers that the soldier settlers in eastern Canada are in fairly good condition. I do not know about that, but I know how they are in British Columbia. In 1933, when this legislation was first introduced, we found some soldier settlers owing on their land perhaps $5,000. One in particular pointed out to me that he could go across the road and buy an identical piece, with the same acreage, for $3,000. I said, "For goodness sake buy it, and throw up your place." He said, "Well, there is this bonus; if I can keep on paying, with that bonus I shall be able to clear this place for a total payment of $2,500, with of course, interest added." Many of them viewed the matter in that light, that with the bonus it gave them a revaluation of their land, and they were encouraged to stay on and try to complete the payment.

Another suggestion was made the other evening by my leader in regard to the rate of interest, which I understood the minister was going to take into further consideration. They reduced the rate to five per cent; I thought it might be reduced to at least four per cent. Speaking of interest, I took up with the Minister of Finance the other day a little question of interest. There is in British Columbia a firm of which a number of the employees are returned soldiers. They decided to enter into a scheme by which their savings might be set aside and saved for their old age or for some future date. The question arose how to invest those savings. They said to me that in the post office savings bank they could get only two per cent. I took the matter up with the Minister of Finance, and this is what he said:

> I might say, however, that if the operations of the fund are such as to require that they should be available for withdrawal in cash form at any time, then in view of the current situation with respect to interest allowable on notice deposits or on short-term loans it would appear that two per cent is not an unreasonably low rate of return. I might mention, for example, that the dominion government is currently obtaining short-term funds for just over one-half of one per cent.

These returned men can obtain two per cent on their money; according to the Minister of Finance that is about the limit; but soldier settlers are called upon to pay five per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is scarcely fair in quoting the letter in the manner he does. I gave the best advice that I thought I could give under the circumstances with respect to money subject to withdrawal on demand. To compare that with interest rates on long term obligations is scarcely fair.

Mr. BARBER: I am not comparing it; we are talking about an interest rate. We know what it was some years ago and what it is to-day. The government is borrowing money at one-half of one per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Money payable in three months.

Mr. BARBER: I say the minister should have taken seriously into consideration giving the soldier settlers the benefit of a reduction to four per cent at least.

Mr. BENNETT: Was the minister a member of the government at the time these proposals were initiated?

Mr. CRERAR: No. I have not that sin on my head.

Mr. O'NEILL: What will happen to soldier settlers who have bought land and now owe probably as much as the land is worth on the open market? If this goes through and they are not able to take advantage of it, will they be permitted to stay on the land?

Mr. CRERAR: It is difficult to answer a hypothetical question of that kind. In the first place, as I have already said several times, a soldier settler in the position my hon. friend refers to can go before a board of review under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and get a readjustment of his obligation. That is being done constantly. I have not any doubt that the board will take into full consideration all the facts of each case. The settler will then have a period of three years in which the payments that are due up to the end of this month carry the dollar for dollar bonus privilege. I cannot think of any better way of putting him in a position where he can swim once more if he wants to swim.

Mr. NEILL: I wonder if the minister would amplify the statement he made a few minutes ago that I had misstated or overstated something. Let me give him the picture. He was telling some hon. member that after all things were not so bad; that these settlers could come before the farmers' creditors arrangement board and get relief. The minister may not appreciate it, but there are still people in this country who for sentimental reasons do not like to be put in the position of bankruptcy. They would put up with a good deal of hardship to avoid that, and that is what it means if you go to that court. There is also an economic side to the situation; his credit is utterly spoiled. I know men who have let their grocery bill run behind a little, because their credit was good, in order to make their payment and get the dollar for dollar advantage. But if a man goes before the board his credit is gone, because the usual proposal put up to this board is to cut the unsecured creditors' claims in half, and the moment that is done it means his credit is gone, not only with that particular grocer but with all the grocers in town, because they have a credit bureau which circulates that information.

The point I was making, when the minister said I was overstating, is: I said, or meant to say, that there was no use in holding out this golden vision of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, or the court as the minister called it, because the court might not be in existence a fortnight from now. And here is my justification. It is true that the bill may not be passed in a fortnight at the rate we are now passing legislation, but here is Bill No. 25, section 5 of which reads:

5. The said act is amended by inserting therein immediately after section nineteen thereof the following section:

"20. On and after a date to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council, no new proposal shall be made or filed by any farmer or accepted by any official receiver in any province in respect of which the said proclamation is issued."

[Mr. Crerar.]

I do not know what the activating motive will be to lead the government to take action, but this bill gives them power to proclaim at any date after the bill is passed that in any particular province that act ceases to be in effect. So it is a rotten deal indeed to hold out to these settlers that they may be able to go before this board which, as I say, may not be in existence then. Will the minister explain wherein I overstated anything when I made that allusion? I am not in the habit of being told that.

Mr. CRERAR: My observation was of a general nature. Not only this evening but when this bill was before the committee recently the hon. member for Comox-Alberni certainly gave me the impression that the situation of the soldier settlers in British Columbia was desperate. My remark that I thought he had overdrawn the picture a little was prompted by the fact that of 1,312 soldier settlers in British Columbia under the district of Vancouver, 1,165 to some degree had taken advantage of this opportunity in the past five years, to the extent of $650,000.

Mr. NEILL: In British Columbia?

Mr. CRERAR: In British Columbia. That was the bonus credited to them in five years. So I submit that the picture cannot be so gloomy as my hon. friend painted it.

Mr. NEILL: I do not wish to quarrel about the matter; it is not worth while delaying the committee, but that is not the occasion to which I alluded. The minister was definitely saying that the settler could go to the farmers' creditors arrangement board, and I said that in less than a fortnight that court might not be in existence.

Mr. DUNNING: That is an exaggeration.

Mr. NEILL: The Minister of Mines and Resources then said that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni was overstating the case, and that is what I wish to have amplified. Was I overstating the case when I said that at any moment the court, to which he suggests the settlers can go, may be done away with? Was there any overstatement in that remark?

Mr. DUNNING: As the minister responsible for the legislation to which the hon. gentleman refers, I can certainly say that he overstates the case when he says that in a fortnight that court may be out of existence. In the first place the legislation concerning it can scarcely be put through parliament and assented to in a fortnight, and beyond that I shall give him the assurance that a most careful inquiry will be made as to the need, from the standpoint of the farmer, for continuing the act.

Mr. NEILL: Is that inquiry provided for in the amending bill?

Mr. DUNNING: No. Power is given, and I stated very plainly—

Mr. BARBER: I was wondering if the minister could tell us how many of these 1,165 settlers took full advantage of this opportunity.

Mr. CRERAR: As I told the committee before, I am sorry I cannot give my hon. friend those details for Vancouver. I imagine they can be made available, and I should be glad to supply them to my hon. friend. In any case those who have not been able to take full advantage of the legislation will have an opportunity to do so for the next three years.

Mr. BARBER: I was just wondering how many would be in a position to come under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, because certainly they would have to be far behind to be bankrupt. Therefore we should know what percentage of those settlers have taken advantage of it, and what is the outstanding indebtedness of those 1,165 settlers at the present time.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. NEILL: No. It has not been put to a vote yet.

Mr. BARBER: Is the minister able to advise us as to the indebtedness of those 1,165 settlers in British Columbia, or of the total of 1,312 settlers?

Mr. CRERAR: No; I am afraid I have not that information in my notes.

The total present investment in British Columbia is slightly over $5,600,000. This includes all under the act.

Mr. BENNETT: Does that include interest?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; that includes interest.

Mr. BENNETT: How much is principal and how much is interest?

Mr. PELLETIER: A moment ago the minister mentioned certain figures referring to Edmonton, Calgary and Saskatoon. He said that in the Edmonton district the figure was $875,000; in the Calgary district, or the southern part of Alberta, it was $622,000, and in the Saskatoon district it was $1,040,000. Do those figures represent the actual amount of money collected or do they represent the bonus that was given? That is to say, Was there really $875,000 collected and something over a million and a half credited to the account of these settlers?

Mr. CRERAR: Already this evening I have answered that question twice. The figures I gave were the amount of bonus.

Mr. BENNETT: The amount paid as well?

Mr. CRERAR: The amount of bonus credited.

Mr. BENNETT: And an equal sum was paid?

Mr. CRERAR: Of course.

Mr. NEILL: The minister was talking about collections. I have in my hand the report of the soldier settlement board brought down this year, dated June 15, 1937. At page 329 I find the following collections: Vancouver, which I understand takes in the whole of British Columbia, instalments due in 1936; $273,364.96; total due, including arrears, $939,221.84; due payments, $66,871.35; percentage of current instalments paid, 24·5; percentage of total due, 7·1. So that in British Columbia, where we have been told they have paid so zealously, in 1936 they paid only 7·1 per cent of the total indebtedness. At that rate how many years will it take them to overcome that debt?

Mr. DUNNING: That is seven per cent of the total indebtedness in one year. I think that is pretty good.

Mr. NEILL: If they owed $100 they have paid $7, which would be scarcely house rent. Does the minister suggest that 7·1 per cent is a good record of payment? It certainly does not look that way, as compared with the other provinces.

TRANSPORT COMMISSION

AUTHORITY TO CONTROL TRANSPORT OF PASSENGERS AND GOODS BY RAILWAYS, SHIPS AND AIRCRAFT

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 31, to establish a board of transport commissioners for Canada, with authority in respect of transport by railways, ships and aircraft.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is to promote the stabilization of the transport industry in Canada, in the public interest as well as in the interests of all those engaged in transportation. The bill extends regulation of rates to inland shipping and to commercial air transport.

No one questions the benefit of the government regulation as applied to the railways, least of all the railways themselves. The government believes that the extension of rate regulation to our inland waterways and to our commercial airways will carry with it similar benefits. It should be made clear from the first that there is no intention to limit development on sound economic lines of any form of transportation in favour of any other form of transportation. It is inevitable that the development of newer forms of transport will be accompanied by some loss of business from older forms of transport, and it is not the purpose of this bill to interfere with that process, so long as the same rules of competition apply to all.

The purpose of the government is to bring about a situation where competition may make for the benefit of the public and health within the industry. We all recognize that Canada must have an adequate railway service, since without it and for climatic and geographic reasons it would be impossible to conduct the business of the nation. We also recognize that our great inland waterway must be served by transportation agencies conducted on a sound economic basis, so that these waterways may continue to provide those low-cost transportation facilities that make it possible for our western farmers to compete in the markets of the world.

Transportation by air is still in its infancy, and it is logical that the development of this industry should be conducted along sound lines, under government regulation. It is a matter of public interest that transportation rates be reasonably stable, and applied without discrimination. Experience has shown that publicity is essential to prevent discrimination. Therefore the publicity of rates is a fundamental requirement in this bill.

We also appreciate that our transportation rate structure may break down completely unless some relation is maintained between transportation charges and the abilities of various commodities to stand those charges. There is also the problem of conditions of employment in transportation industries. It will not be a question that it is the duty and interest of all employers to endeavour to maintain reasonable standards of conditions and rewards of employment. The absence of regulation and the resulting uneconomical competition must inevitably bear heavily on the workers, since labour costs comprise such a large proportion of operating expenses. The wide difference in working conditions, as between regulated transportation and unregulated transportation, must be apparent to all. Apart from the effect on labour, the interest of public safety is also involved.

Objections to this bill have taken the form, not that regulation is undesirable, but rather that the means provided by the bill may work hardship in certain specific instances. Many have objected on the ground that the bill will have the effect of increasing rates. I see nothing in the bill which can reasonably lead to that conclusion. The fact is that Canadian railway rates, as established under regulation, are among the lowest in the world, and this has been accomplished notwithstanding the fact that Canada is a sparsely populated country. Regulation should have the effect of lowering rather than raising rates, by tending to eliminate wasteful and destructive competition among the various forms of transportation.

It has been assumed that under this bill the transport commission will fix rates. That is not the purpose of the bill. It provides, rather, for policing the methods of rate fixing used by the transportation companies themselves, in order to substitute order for chaos, and to ensure the elimination of unjust discrimination between one shipper or passenger and another shipper or passenger.

Mr. BENNETT: But the transport board will fix the rates, will it not?

Mr. HOWE: They will approve rates. They will pass on the rates submitted, and amend them as the evidence in the case indicates.

Mr. BENNETT: Am I right in understanding that no rate, other than one approved by the board, will be valid?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Mr. STIRLING: That is what the railway commission does.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. HOWE: On the other hand, individual carriers who fear that rate regulation will result in the establishment of unreasonably low rates, as a result of the board of transport forcing carriers to adopt the lowest rate published by an improvident competitor, can be assured that the bill provides ample remedies against such a condition. There is nothing in this bill which can be used to force carriers to furnish services at rates that cannot be economically justified.

There was a time when transportation in Canada was largely a railway monopoly, without state regulation of rates. The need for regulation at that time was apparent to all. In 1888 the railway committee of the privy council was given certain powers of rate regulation. This seemed to satisfy the public until about 1898, when there was an insistent demand for adequate regulation. After extended government investigation, the Railway Act was amended, in 1903, to provide for the organization of a railway commission. The board was established in 1904 with very wide powers over railways constructed under federal authority, as well as over railways constructed by provincial authority, when such railways are declared by the parliament of Canada to be a work for the general advantage of Canada. The first membership of the board was restricted to three commissioners; but four years later, 1908, when our railway mileage was approximately 25,000 miles, three more commissioners were added, and the usefulness of the board increased by an arrangement permitting the board to be divided into two sections, each of which could sit independently, the decision of either section being, under the act, the decision of the board.

When the board of railway commissioners was first established, the railway exercised a virtual monopoly in the field of transport. The competition from inland waterways was negligible; the automobile was a novelty, and the aeroplane was a thing of the future.

Mr. BENNETT: There was always water competition on the great lakes. was there not?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, but at that time it was not a serious competitor with the railways, because it was confined almost entirely to bulk cargoes. The railways no longer enjoy a monopoly in the field of transportation. The rapid development of the internal combustion engine and its application to trucks, buses and automobiles, and the constant demand for paved highways, have brought highway transportation very prominently into the transportation picture. It is unnecessary for me to remind hon. gentlemen of the effect of highway competition upon railway revenues.

The construction of the Welland ship canal has also had a marked effect upon transportation problems, in that it has created a surplus of boats of the type that formerly confined their operations between Port Colborne and Montreal. These boats have now extended their operations to the head of lake Superior, and to obtain cargoes have made serious inroads into the package freight business formerly carried by the railways. The fact that the railways are subject to regulation while the motor vehicles and water carriers are not, has placed a severe handicap on the ability of our railways to meet this new competition. On the other hand, lack of regulation has not brought prosperity to the unregulated carriers. Competition has been of the destructive type, not only to the railway earnings but to the earnings of its new competitors.

Both the railways and the public have no doubt that regulation has been beneficial to railway transportation. There is every reason to believe that the extension of regulation to other forms of transportation would have been demanded by the public before this, were it not for the fact that the railways themselves are now in effect the regulators for competing forms of transportation. Railway rates are published, and generally represent the maximum that competing agencies can demand, while unregulated transportation can underbid the railway to such an extent as may be necessary to divert business from the railway. The public have the railway to fall back on when other forms of transportation disappear, and so have not become alarmed at the destructive effect of the competition from transportation that is often of the "fly by night" variety. In short, the railway tariffs form a protective blanket over the rates of competitors to the railways. A reduction in railway rates to hold railway business can have no permanent effect, other than to drive some of its competitors to more profitable fields.

Canada is practically the last country to apply state regulation to transportation other than railways. The United States have extended the authority of the interstate commerce commission to all railway operations, pipe lines and motor vehicles operating across state boundaries. Its Motor Carrier Act of 1935 has done much to regulate commercial vehicles on the highways and to coordinate highway rates with railway rates. Similarly, United States coastwise ocean traffic is regulated, as well as coastal carriers operating between ports on the Atlantic and ports on the Pacific through the Panama canal. Regulation has not as yet been applied to inland waterways, such as the great lakes and the Mississippi river; but there has been introduced in the senate by the chairman of the senate committee on interstate commerce, a bill which will provide, through the interstate commerce commission, the same or even more extensive regulation of shipping on the great lakes than we propose under this bill.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that the same bill which was up last year?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; it was not reached. In Great Britain, state regulation is exercised over the railway carrier, the highway carrier and the water carrier. The same situation exists in northern Ireland.

In the Union of South Africa, the state owns all railways and exercises complete control over highway vehicles for hire for passengers and goods. A scale of charges must be filed with the regulating body, and the reasonableness of those charges is decided by the board. In New Zealand and Australia, the regulating bodies have control over all forms of transportation, and a certificate of convenience and necessity is necessary before any new carrier can operate. It will thus be observed that Canada has been slow to accept a situation that most other countries have dealt with.

This bill applies regulation to shipping other than for bulk cargoes, such as wheat, iron ore and raw materials, that are handled in bulk without packaging. The reason for excluding bulk cargoes is that these are not competitive, being carried at rates so low as not to be attractive to rail carriers. In my opinion, both the public and the carriers would benefit by the extension of regulation to bulk carriers; but as a number of protests were received when this bill was considered previously, the government has decided to exclude bulk carriers from the bill. Regulation of shipping applies only to rates, as safety features are now regulated by the shipping act.

Transportation by air is a comparatively new industry and, therefore, regulation can be applied without any serious dislocation. It is believed that regulation is generally acceptable, both to the operators and to the public. Regulation under this bill applies only to aircraft operating on regular schedules, over regular routes. It does not apply to carriers engaged in pioneer work or on casual services.

Mr. BENNETT: Or a private undertaking.

Mr. HOWE: No; this applies only to public carriers. Provision for agreed charges extends to the railways a privilege that is now enjoyed by highway carriers, water carriers and aircraft, that of contracting with a shipper to handle his shipments exclusively at a rate which may be lower than the tariff rate. Agreed charges are now a well established feature of British transportation and have proved beneficial both to the carriers and to the shipper. The principle has also been generally adopted in France. In short, the principle of agreed charges permits a carrier to give to a shipper who gives all his business to the carrier a lower rate than must be given to another shipper who prefers to pick and choose between various types of carriers.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there any such thing on any other part of this continent?

Mr. HOWE: It has not been applied on this continent; but it has been applied in England for about three years, and I have been told it has proven to be quite beneficial.

The bill provides for full publicity of rates granted under agreed charges, and provides against discrimination as between shippers who wish to obtain the benefit of agreed charges. There can be no discrimination as between the large shipper and the small shipper. In fact, the principle of the agreed charges works to the benefit of the small shipper, who cannot always obtain as low a rate for highway transportation as can his larger competitor.

The fairness of a low rate for all year round shippers is obvious. In many sections of Canada, where the highways cannot be kept open the year round, everyone must use the railway for winter shipments. The agreed charge simply provides that in such cases, those shippers who agree to ship all year by railway will get an all year round rate, but those who elect to use the railway in winter and trucks in summer will not get the same treatment. It is a realistic treatment of a new development. There can be no harmful discrimination when it is provided that any shipper, big or small, who is willing to conform to the same terms, shall get the same treatment.

In my opinion the agreed charge presents a greater chance of preserving the low rate on long distance and bulk commodities, so essential to our national economy, and of putting a stop to the gradual withering of our rail service on many branch lines, the loss of which is an economic loss to the country, than any other measure of which I have knowledge. It is well worth a trial. It will tend to curb the uneconomic expansion of highway traffic and, by doing so, will afford an opportunity for the sound coordination of the two types of transportation, each within its own economic sphere.

Much is being said currently in favour of drastic measures to be applied for the purpose of reducing the operating expenses of our railways. The discussion extends to abandonment of five thousand miles of light traffic line, merging of locomotive and repair shops, consolidation of terminals and similar measures which would leave a trail of destruction across Canada that would, in my opinion, far outweigh any consequent real reduction in operating expenses. I regret to say that when this bill was last considered, those parliamentarians who are now most vocal in advocating such extreme methods, were strongest in opposition to the provisions of this bill. It must be apparent to all that the provisions of this bill will benefit our transportation industry, without in any way curtailing the extent or efficiency of transportation service in any part of Canada.

I sincerely hope that, in considering this bill, parliament will be disposed to place less dependence upon destructive and drastic solutions for our railroad problem, and will give serious and favourable consideration to this constructive step toward improving the economy of Canadian transportation. We all desire to avoid an increase in railway rates in Canada similar to that recently adopted in the United States. The public concern over the plight of the carriers in that country, where about forty per cent of railway mileage is in receivership, may be judged by newspaper comment on recent rate increases, amounting to five per cent on raw materials and ten per cent on finished products. Most newspapers commented that the increase should have been greater.

Transportation in Canada has done much toward the building of our national economy. Through this bill we can give it a measure of protection and assistance without imposing any burden on the Canadian people. When this bill is examined in committee, I trust that trivial objections and unjustified fears and alarms will not be permitted to cloud the real merit of the measures contained in the bill.

In order that the bill may have the fullest possible consideration, after the second reading I shall move that the bill be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the second reading of a measure involves the acceptance of its principle, and the principle of this measure is regimentation. How far my hon. friends opposite believe in regimentation is not a matter now to be discussed; how little they used to believe in it is a matter of record. I have a very clear memory of the many occasions on which some of my genial friends opposite, in language at once forceful and elegant, opposed anything like the semblance of regimentation. The frank smile on the face of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) does not in any way indicate that he was the only person to engage in those criticisms. But if we accept the principle of regimentation as a part of our everyday economic life, there would seem to be few fields in which it could be more usefully employed than in the field of transportation.

I cannot say that I wholly agree with the observations which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) has made touching the vocal characteristics of gentlemen in another place, because their vocal expressions were in no sense referring to this measure; they were dealing with an entirely different matter. When the minister suggests that in this measure we shall find a solution of our transportation difficulties, I think he does not mean by that, that we shall find a complete solution, but he believes it will offer some redress to the railway companies for the difficulties under which they now labour. I think that is quite true.

There are, however, in connection with regimentation, two or three matters that I think should be considered as matters of principle before the committee discusses this measure. Last year the measure proposed to deal with public highway transportation. I cannot but think that the minister is well advised in not endeavouring to deal with highway transportation, having regard to the difficulties he would encounter because of the fact that it might impinge at so many points upon provincial jurisdiction. However, that matter we now can say is entirely eliminated because it is not proposed in this measure to deal with highway transportation.

In respect to water transportation, some difficulties, of course, arise from the fact that in inland waters as well as on the sea coast we lie in close proximity to the United States, and obviously we cannot license their vessels. Perhaps it will be within the memory of the minister, as it must be of other members in this chamber, that we did on one occasion endeavour—I was not a member of the house at the time the effort was made—to regiment, if I might use that word, transportation on the great lakes by ships of all nations, including those of our neighbouring republic. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) finds it a little difficult not to smile, but he is doing his very best and I hope he succeeds. That effort at licensing or controlling transportation by United States ships on the great lakes is one of the amusing episodes in our long legislative history—I can not use any stronger term than that.

I foresee some little difficulty in dealing with the question of transportation on the great lakes between Canadian ports and United States ports, where rates may be set up that will of course have a great deal to do with governing rates between Canadian ports. That has always been so. That is, the rate from the head of the lakes to Buffalo has a distinct bearing on the rates from the head of the lakes to a Canadian port, whether Prescott or Port Colborne or wherever it may be.

Mr. HOWE: May I interrupt my right hon. friend to say that there is very little package freight between Canadian and United States ports.

Mr. BENNETT: Practically none, and the bill as it is now brought down departs from what was originally intended. It no longer applies to bulk freight, so I think there is probably very little difficulty from that angle.

There is one little anomaly I saw in the bill as I was going through it. Liquids are described as bulk freight, but casks and barrels are not. It would seem somewhat difficult to have a ship carry liquids except it be a tanker.

Mr. DUNNING: That is it.

Mr. BENNETT: There are many ships that are not tankers, just as there are many drinkers that are not tanks. At any rate, Mr. Speaker, the general principle of the bill is one which I think we should give our approval to, even though my hon. friends opposite have slowly come to accept the principle of regimentation.

There is only one real difficulty I see in the measure, and that is in part V, which does not come into operation until proclaimed, with respect to agreed charges. I thank the minister for the very full and frank explanation he gave of part V, and I doubt not that when the committee has to consider the measure it will encounter some difficulties. I fancy that many members of the house have received communications from their constituents and from boards of trade dealing with the question of agreed charges. Many people are opposed to agreed charges which contemplate an arrangement being made between the shipper and the transportation agency, whether it be a railway company or a shipping company, by which all the traffic of the shipper, be he a small or large shipper, is to be handled by the facilities of the one transportation company. That is, if he agrees that the Canadian National or the Canadian Pacific, as the case may be, shall do all his shipping for him in and out for one year, then he has an agreed charge at a rate which is much less than he would secure if he used one transportation company occasionally and another occasionally.

There are grave difficulties to be dealt with there. It is not just as simple in a country the size of Canada as it is in a country such as Great Britain. In France it has been in vogue for some years. It will be recalled that the French republic owns a large number of its railways just as we do here, but fortunately for them their government-owned railways are not competitive, in the main, with their privately owned lines. In other words, they occupy one territory, and the private lines occupy another territory. For instance, the lines running south in France, not all the lines, but in the main the large lines, are the property of private enterprise, and those that run to the northern seaboard are largely the property of the state.

Now we are going to enter upon an experiment in that regard so far as the American continent is concerned. I asked the minister a moment ago if he had a record of the experiment being tried in any other part of America and he said no. I could not find any instance in which it had been tried, although I had not access to the latest books on transportation. But it is an experiment. It contemplates a given transportation agency securing a monopoly on a shipper's traffic for a year—we will say for a period; that is the better way to put it.

Mr. HOWE: Every agency in Canada except the railways has that to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not for a moment saying that the general principle is new; but it is new as applied to railways, and has given rise in other instances to much difficulty. In England where they applied it we find a different set of considerations. In England they consolidated their railways into what one might roughly describe as four systems: the L.M. & S., the Northeastern, and then two smaller systems, making four in all, that represent the consolidated railway systems of Great Britain. Then there was a private and state enterprise in France. We are going to secure a monopoly to a given transportation agency, with the sanction of the law, if the shipper will agree to give all his traffic for a given period to that particular transport agency. And for so doing he will receive a lower rate than if he only used it occasionally. I think that is a fair way of putting it.

Mr. HOWE: The provisions permit the business to be divided between two types of the same carrier. It is not the intention to take the business from one railway carrier and give it exclusively to another.

Mr. BENNETT: It contemplates that one carrier shall have a monopoly.

Mr. HOWE: One type of carrier.

Mr. BENNETT: The railway.

Mr. DUNNING: It might be both railways.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. It is to prevent the possibility of competition between rail and water or highway or air becoming effective to the detriment of the carrier with whom the contract is made. That is the short way of stating it. Many of the boards of trade in the west are a little concerned about it, although it does not come into force until after proclamation. I think it would be well for the committee to give particular attention to part V, which covers these matters.

With respect to the substitution of the title "Transport Board" for the old "Board of Railway Commissioners," I suppose there is very little difficulty. In Great Britain, it will be remembered, it is not called the board of transport; it is the railway and canal commissioners that deal with matters there. I forget the name used in France. In the United States it is the interstate commerce commission, whose powers and jurisdiction have been extended during the years until they are practically all-embracing with respect to transportation. The difficulties we have in Canada in transportation matters it is not my purpose to deal with, except to say that we have a low freight rate structure. Whether we admit it or not, the real truth is—

Mr. REID: In some parts.

Mr. BENNETT: We have a low structure; I said, a low freight rate structure. There has always been a differentiation between the export and the local rate. If the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) has studied the history of the city of Spokane, he will know of its effort to secure transportation rates on a ratable basis of the through rate to Seattle and Portland and he will understand what I mean. For a long time transportation rates in the United States were based on the competition of water carriage to the Pacific coast, and it worked some very strange results, as indicated by judgments of the interstate commerce commission, which, as a matter of fact, were in some instances approved by the Supreme Court of the United States. I happened to be in Spokane at the time they carried on successfully their last great struggle with the Union Pacific and other roads and secured a reduction of rates that gave them a great improvement in their general commercial position. But ours is a low freight rate structure so far as present rates on the American continent are concerned. I have, as every hon. member has at times, compared the rates for the same distances in the United States and in Canada, and while there is good reason for complaint about some of the rates in this country, it arises because of our small population and our vast distances as well as the great physical difficulties which we have to overcome in transport. These are facts that have to be considered in dealing with problems of this kind. But I do not think it would be possible under present economic conditions to increase freight rates in Canada.

Mr. THORSON: They might have to come down.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite. I agree with what the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) has said. It may be necessary, in view of present conditions with respect to competition, from the standpoint of highways and otherwise, that for self-preservation the railways should make a reduction in rates.

Mr. THORSON: We might have to do that to meet continuing competition.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, quite; that is what I say. We may have to do that. But so far as direction by the transport board or the board of railway commissioners is concerned, personally I believe it is unthinkable that any order would be made to increase freight rates in this country. That is my conviction, for what it may be worth.

In some respects we in Canada are a very fortunate people. We are the only country in the world in which there has been a railway commissioner who prepared the legislation. He prepared the legislation and has sat continuously for a period of thirty years on the board. Doctor McLean prepared the original act under instructions from the late Hon. A. G. Blair, and his report is a matter of record; it will be found in the library. When the statute was passed, or shortly after, he was appointed to the board and he has been there ever since, so that we have had a sort of continuity that has really been of very great value to Canada. At any rate, that is my judgment, and I am speaking only from my own observation; for I used to appear before the board frequently. I believe that the continuance of Doctor McLean there did much to establish with respect to our board of railway commissioners a certain type of jurisprudence which has been of great value to the Canadian people. Just how the change will affect us I cannot see; for there is no very great change in principle between the freight rate structure that is to be set up under this statute and the one set up under the board. In either case, as I read it, it is essential that approval be given, either by the transport board or by the board of railway commissioners, as it is now, before the rate can become effective.

I recall having once been engaged in interesting litigation in respect of the necessity for publication and for making available to every shipper the freight rates charged by the carrier. In a particular case they quoted a figure that was less than the statutory rate. It was indicated that we should bring action to recover the balance, because we were occupying a statutory position. I am bound to say that the court found the means to render it a little hard to recover, although not without some difficulty, because a freight rate was regarded as much in the nature of a customs impost. When a rate had been approved by the board it occupied a position somewhat analogous to that of an ordinary customs tariff rate, and I cannot make a compromise about a tariff rate with the Minister of National Revenue. If by mistake I pay too little, there is a limit of time within which he can take action and recover the rest from me, notwithstanding that in good faith I paid what the agent or customs officer at the point of entry demanded.

Now I am being led into many by-paths; I apologize. I desire only to say that the general principle of regimentation as applied to transport by sea and air and rail is one that I am sure will commend itself to the people and should commend itself to parliament if the result is anything like what the minister hopes for. We all trust that his expectations may be met and his hopes realized. I think it will require a major surgical operation rather than an anaesthetic to bring about this result. While this may be a suitable anaesthetic, I am afraid it will not serve as the major operation which is essential for the purpose of bringing about, shall I say, health to the subject of the operation. I think the minister is well advised to refer the matter to the committee, and I trust that the public may have an opportunity to make such representations as it may desire, and that it will be made widely known, through Hansard and through the press, that public bodies may have an opportunity to make such representations as they desire with respect to the legislation. I think probably the only phase of the bill that will meet with much discussion is part V which deals with agreed charges on the one hand, and possibly—I say possibly—difficulties that may arise in connection with trade between Canadian and United States ports, either coastwise or other.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I should like to congratulate the minister on his achievement. I have only a vague knowledge, but it is sufficient to appreciate the enormous work this bill has cost him and those associated with him.

I am sorry to have to take exception to one item. I suppose if it is legitimate to talk about what is in the bill, it is also legitimate to talk about what is not in the bill. I refer to part II, which deals with transport by water. Subsection 4 of section 10 provides that the minister may license ships and may state in the licence the ports between which they may carry goods and passengers, and the schedule of services which shall be maintained. I would have liked to see that amplified in regard to the schedule of services, because that is the only allusion in the whole bill to that feature, and it is a very important feature.

Then the bill goes on to deal with tolls, charges, special rates, etc., at considerable length. Then, having built up what we will hope will be a desirable condition, it somewhat reduces its usefulness by section 12, subsection 4:

> The provisions of this part shall not apply in the case of the transport of goods in bulk.

That has been dealt with by both the minister and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). That will seriously detract from its usefulness, I think, but the part that I have more interest in is the next:

> 5. The provisions of this part shall not apply in the case of ships engaged in the transport of goods or passengers
> (a) between ports or places in British Columbia.

As far as we in British Columbia are concerned, that of course entirely annihilates the whole purpose of the bill. And I gather that the next section does away with any application to the whole coastal trade on the Atlantic. So apparently this section is left applicable only to shipping on the great lakes. Perhaps one should not call it discrimination, or class legislation; but certainly it is special legislation, leaving out the two coasts, where, as far as British Columbia, at any rate, is concerned, we badly need it.

Mr. BENNETT: It is regional legislation.

Mr. NEILL: Yes; I suppose that is the word which should be used. It is badly needed in British Columbia, so much so that in 1935 I introduced a bill to amend the Railway Act, which followed substantially the same lines as the minister's bill, except that mine applied to the coastal waters of British Columbia, and dealt at a little further length with tolls and routes and ports of call. There is ample precedent for this, because ships which obtain a subsidy from the dominion government have to comply strictly with such regulations. Each contract with the Department of Trade and Commerce sets forth a schedule of the ports of call and frequency of service covered by such contract, as well as rates and tolls. So we find that the port of call, the itinerary and rates and tolls are fully under the control of the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he grants a subsidy, however small, to that particular line of ships.

Moreover, it is fully competent under the Railway Act, because section 358 of that act extends its provisions to traffic carried by water by a railway company. Curiously enough it is confined to traffic carried by a railway company and does not apply to traffic carried by a shipping company which is only a shipping company. But if the shipping company is owned by or subsidiary to a railway company, it applies. That provision has been in our law for some twenty-nine years. When my bill was introduced a howl went up, of course, from British Columbia. Always a howl goes up if you propose any remedial legislation of this kind. The same thing occurred when the railway board act was introduced, only much more so; the heavens were to fall; business was to be ruined. But the railway legislation went through and no one would think of repealing it to-day. I think the same thing would have happened if my bill had been allowed to go through. People who would have been controlled howled about it, and many who would not have been controlled lent their assistance merely out of friendship or were afraid of something happening that was not going to happen.

Exactly the same reasons exist now as existed then for regulation of coastwise shipping. Even in 1907, when section 358 of the Railway Act was passed, the need was at least partly admitted, because they said—and the terms are very wide—"We will fully regulate the terms of water traffic when the traffic is carried by the ships of a railway company." It seems to me that was unjust. Why discriminate against the railway company? Why put a railway company that owns a line of ships operating in British Columbia waters under a handicap in competition with another line of ships not owned by a railway company? All my bill proposed was to put them all on an even footing. And there was reason for it. I had bitter complaints of discrimination by some companies there. I do not mind going as far as to say that one company practically threatened me with what would happen if I went on with this legislation. There was more or less of a monopoly out there. Of course it was not called a monopoly; that would be illegal, but called a gentleman's agreement.

Mr. STEWART: A friendly understanding.

Mr. NEILL: Yes; I would rather use that term, because the other stinks in my nostrils in connection with orientals. But I shall not go into that; it is one thing which, when you try to put your finger on it you find it is not there. It is there nevertheless. This company keeps out of this particular place and the other company keeps out of that place. I am not so sure that even the Canadian National does not have a look in at some of these friendly understandings. Then these people who opposed my bill two years ago put a great many obstacles in its path. It was going to apply, they said, to tugboats and every little launch that went to tow a boom of logs. That was all nonsense. It was not intended to do any such thing. I had made a mistake in the bill I drew, however; apparently it would have applied to ships going from the Pacific side to the Atlantic side; so in introducing the bill I explained that point and said I would be willing to accept an amendment providing that it would be applicable only to coastwise shipping as regards the Atlantic and Pacific; that it would not affect the traffic going from one coast to the other.

I know of cases of discrimination, some of which I have under my hand and could read, but I shall not detain the house. I am sure the minister has a copy of one letter, in which the writer said:

> We have been following with interest in the newspapers whatever comment they printed on the new ministry of transport, and note that certain interests in Vancouver are objecting to certain coastal routes coming under the jurisdiction of the new ministry. It seems to us here that it would be a very good thing for us . . . rates both for passengers and freight on this route, where they have no competition, are outrageous. We pay 65 cents minimum for 100 pounds of freight—the rate to Rivers Inlet is only 55 cents. We are roughly 130 miles from Vancouver, and our passenger rate is $6.50—five cents a mile.

I may mention that Rivers Inlet is 280 miles from Vancouver, while the place from which this man writes is only 120 miles. That is why I contend that some supervision is really required. It would not hurt the steamship companies eventually, because where political or other pull was brought to bear to force them to call at places where they were not justified in calling, they could appeal to the board and get relief, as the railways do now when they propose to close up a railway station or branch line on the ground that it is not profitable or necessary, and of course the people concerned raise an objection.

There is in British Columbia a place known as Howe Sound, no doubt called after some famous ancestor of the minister. Surely he will do the right thing by a place that has been named after his family. I think it was called after one of the captains or admirals on Vancouver's ships when they came to the Pacific coast. It is no longer in the district I represent, but at one time I did represent it. It is a place where there is a number of seaside resorts. A shipping company owned one of those resorts, and if you travelled on that line it is wonderful how easy and convenient it was to get off at that particular resort and how much more difficult it was to get off at a resort which was not owned by that company. I have even known a situation where the captain of the boat had an interest in a seaside resort. Again it was wonderful how much easier it was to get off at the right time and so on, at that place in which he had the interest, as compared with any other places.

I do not know what the situation is now, because that was a number of years ago, but I contend that there is ample reason for some provision of the kind I suggest. If the bill is not needed, as these people allege, no harm will be done, but it seems to be a case of the wicked fleeing when no man pursueth. If the thing is all right and needs no adjustment, no one will be any the worse off; but I say there is need for it and I do not know why the minister left that provision out of this bill. I am fairly certain that it was in the bill which was introduced in another place last year. Possibly, because of the difficulty of getting it through under adverse conditions, the minister has abandoned it. I will not say he has sold us down the river, but he seems to have abandoned that phase of his bill. I hope he will consider that point, because without it the bill is worth nothing to us. It is badly needed. It will not do any harm, and if we have a clause, as we have to-day in section 358 of the Railway Act, which makes it apply on the Pacific coast to the Canadian Pacific railway because they own a railway, is it not fair that it shall apply to other competing companies which do not happen to own railways? It seems to me the logic is unanswerable. I wish the minister would consider that point before the bill goes to committee, to see if he could not do something along the lines I have indicated.

Mr. R. E. FINN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, before this bill proceeds further, I should like to point out with all due deference to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) that it would have been far better to repeal the Railway Act of 1919 and draw up a new act, because there is going to be a conflict between that act and this bill if it passes this house and the senate and receives the assent of His Excellency the Governor General.

The cardinal principle laid down in the Railway Act is that there shall be no discrimination. Under this act there may be discrimination, because the railway commission is empowered to permit shippers and those who transport goods either by rail or water to enter into agreements as to charges for a period of one year, or for a greater period. Therefore that rate may be different from the rates ordinarily laid down, and there would be an undue preference or discrimination which is not permitted under the Railway Act. That is the first objection I have to this bill. I believe there is going to be a conflict, because this legislation is to be administered by the railway commission, and is subject to the Railway Act. When you merge the two measures and the Railway Act is the one which controls, then any provisions of this measure which are in conflict with the Railway Act go by the board. That is quite clear.

One of the first provisions of this bill is that a licence shall be granted. Under the Railway Act there is no such thing as a licence. A transportation company has a right to transport goods. If it is an incorporated railway company it has a right to transport goods by rail. But the railway board fixes the rates, and if they are discriminatory or unfair or undue they go by the board. Under this bill, however, there is a licence granted by the transport commission. For instance, some of the things to be dealt with here are pulpwood, poles and logs, liquids, coal and coke, sandstone and gravel, ores and minerals, crude, screened, sized, refined or concentrated but not otherwise processed—

Mr. BENNETT: The act does not apply to those.

Mr. FINN: Which act?

Mr. BENNETT: This one.

Mr. FINN: With all deference to the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) I must say that I am reading now from the interpretation clause, which sets out first what a carrier is and what agreed charges are. Under the Railway Act of Canada, because there cannot be agreed charges they may be discriminatory. Under the Railway Act of 1919 they cannot be. The next thing is the definition of a "carrier" and a "shipper". Then there is the definition of "aircraft". Then follows a definition of "board", "carrier" and "goods in bulk". We find that "goods in bulk" is interpreted in this way:

"Goods in bulk" means the following goods laden or freighted in ships and not bundled or enclosed in bags, bales, boxes, cases, casks, crates or any other container:
Grain,
Ores and minerals (crude, screened, sized, refined or concentrated, but not otherwise processed),
Sand, stone and gravel,
Coal and coke,
Liquids,
Pulpwood, poles and logs.

And that is all. Those are the definitions of the articles to which this bill applies. When the minister says the bill does not deal with these matters, then why does the interpretation clause deal with them?

Mr. HOWE: Goods in bulk are excluded from the provisions of the bill. It does not apply to goods in bulk, which are the commodities in the list he has read.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the definition.

Mr. FINN: That may be so, but the point I am attempting to make—I hope I will make it clear—is that under the Railway Act of 1919 there cannot be unjust discrimination in freight rates or tolls.

Under this measure the railway commission must accept agreements entered into by a shipper with a transportation company. Those agreements may be for a year or for two years or, as the song goes, "It may be forever." If that is so, and if it is in conflict with the provisions of the Railway Act; if it is discriminatory and unjust, and gives undue preference, then I ask, Which is to prevail—this measure or the Railway Act of 1919? Probably the Minister of Transport would clear that up, so that the premise on which I am basing my observations may be clear. If he does that I shall proceed to another section. First, however, I should like an explanation from the minister.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. member that the house is not in committee. We are discussing the principle of a bill on the motion for second reading, and he should limit his observations to a discussion of the principle.

Mr. FINN: Mr. Speaker, that is the first time I have heard the ruling that on the second reading of a bill the widest possible scope is not given to discuss every phase of it. I am simply asking the minister a question, and his answer will be helpful in order to enable me more intelligently to deal with the bill. That answer I should like him to give, and I shall sit down while he gives it.

Mr. HOWE: If I explain that, then I must make a speech; if I make a speech, I close the debate.

Mr. FINN: Then, all I would say, if that is the answer of the minister, is that this bill ought to be closed for good and ever. It should not be further continued unless the Minister of Transport is prepared to answer a fair question, or to have his deputies here, who may be more fully acquainted with the measure. He cannot possibly know very much about it, because he has so many departments he cannot be proficient in all of them.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think the hon. member might ask his questions in committee of the whole. All he is saying could be said in committee.

Mr. FINN: Mr. Speaker, I prefer to make my statements here, and under the rules of the house on second reading I have a perfect right to discuss a bill clause by clause, and to ask the minister who has presented the bill to give an explanation. If he is not prepared to do so, then I think he should move the adjournment of the debate on second reading.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: You move it.

Mr. FINN: On the advice of the right hon. the Prime Minister, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

SEED GRAIN

GUARANTEE OF LOANS FOR PURCHASE OF SEED AND OTHER ASSISTANCE IN SEEDING OPERATIONS IN WESTERN PROVINCES

On the order:

Consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the guarantee by the government of Canada of principal and interest of loans made by chartered banks and guaranteed by the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, respectively, for the purchase of seed grain and for providing other assistance to farmers in connection with seeding operations during the spring of 1938; the liability of the government of Canada in respect of such guarantees not to exceed in the aggregate the sum of $1,900,000 in respect of Alberta and $13,500,000 in respect of Saskatchewan.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have asked that this item be called in order that I may ask that it be discharged. There is an error in the resolution, and I desire therefore to have it discharged in order that I may bring in a notice in the proper form with a resolution properly drawn, and indicating the proper sums of money, preceded of course by another message.

Order discharged.

ELECTRIC POWER

SUPPLEMENTARY CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN CANADIAN AND UNITED STATES GOVERNMENTS CONCERNING WATER DIVERSION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): On January 27, 1938, the Canadian government, through the agency of the Canadian minister to the United States, addressed a note to the United States government regarding the project of the Ontario government and the Hydro-Electric Power Commission to divert water from the Kenogami river into lake Superior, this note being included in the white paper tabled on February 28, 1938. The reply of the United States government has now been received in the form of a note dated March 17, 1938, from their Secretary of State to the Canadian minister in Washington.

At the same time there has been received a memorandum also dated March 17, 1938, from the United States Department of State, stating the views of the United States government on the importation of hydro-electric power from Canada, and allied questions. Both notes, and the memorandum, were delivered to the Canadian minister on March 18.

I beg leave to table copies of the communications from the United States government, as well as a copy of a letter of March 21 from the Prime Minister of Canada, to the premier of Ontario in this connection. The correspondence being tabled is being printed in a supplement to the white paper tabled in the House of Commons on February 28. It is expected that copies of this supplement to the white paper will be available for distribution to members of parliament by noon to-morrow. The correspondence is being translated at the present time, and it is expected that the French text of the supplement will be available on Wednesday.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

Tuesday, March 22, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

SHOP CARDS REGISTRATION

QUESTION OF VALIDITY OF BILL NO. 22, PROVIDING FOR REGISTRATION OF DISTINCTIVE CARDS OF LABOUR UNIONS AND PREVENTING UNAUTHORIZED USE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): May I ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) whether he has yet obtained the opinion of the officers of his department with regard to Bill No. 22, an act respecting the registration of shop cards by labour unions, as to whether the proposed act is intra vires of the parliament of Canada?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Yes, I have, and I am going to hand the document over to my hon. friend the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret).

Mr. CAHAN: Has the minister any objection to telling us the purport of it?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The opinion is that the act is valid.

DUTCH ONIONS

REQUEST FOR IMPOSITION OF DUMPING DUTY ON IMPORTATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. C. BETTS (London): I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) a question of which I gave him notice a few minutes ago by telephone, not having had an opportunity to advise him earlier.

The American market is flooded at the present time with Dutch sets of onions which are being offered in this country at a cent and a half a pound. The cost in Canada is six cents a pound. I would ask the minister whether, having regard to the fact that this particular crop has a value in western Ontario alone of some $200,000, the government is prepared to impose the dumping duty, as was done in 1931, by adding four and a half cents a pound to the invoice cost?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): An application somewhat similar to my hon. friend's request was made by the Canadian Seed Trade Association very recently and I can only say to my hon. friend, what was said to them, that the department has asked the Department of Agriculture for a report as to surplus stocks now in Canada. When that information is received the application will be given consideration.

Mr. BETTS: May I ask another question turning upon the last one. Does the minister appreciate that this is a matter in which very speedy action will have to be taken if any result is to be achieved?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

POWELL AND UNWIN CASES

RELEASE OF J. H. UNWIN—QUESTION AS TO CONSIDERATION OF CASE OF G. F. POWELL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Many hon. members of this house and hundreds of thousands of Canadians outside rejoiced last evening when it was announced that at six o'clock Mr. J. H. Unwin was released from the penitentiary. The department's delicacy in choosing a time after the polls were closed and before the results could be known was noted and appreciated. I beg the minister's permission to bring to his notice the name of G. F. Powell, who was a fellow sufferer with Mr. Unwin, and to point out that Mr. Powell is a British subject, a citizen of Great Britain, our motherland; that he is here upon the invitation of the people of the British province called Alberta; that his record prior to his coming to Canada was without blemish, and that his freedom is much desired by millions both here and overseas. I respectfully ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) if he could give us some encouragement touching the case of Mr. Powell.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the case of Mr. Powell will of course be dealt with on its merits, and independently of the case of Mr. Unwin. As my hon. friend knows, his sentence was for a longer period, six months, while the sentence on Mr. Unwin, by the same judge, was for three months. I may assure my hon. friend, however, that all his representations are being fully considered. I should like if possible to meet his views, but of course any action taken must in the first place serve the ends of justice.

MARIEVAL, SASK., HALFBREEDS

DISTRESS OF PEOPLE IN DISTRICT NORTH OF BROADVIEW AND TRIBUTARY TO CROOKED LAKE INDIAN RESERVE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar). It is based on a report that I have received setting out the unfortunate situation facing the halfbreeds of the Marieval district north of Broadview and tributary to the Crooked Lake reserve. The report states that these people have no land and no prospect of employment. Such relief as they have been receiving will be cut off at the end of March, and they claim that they are now facing starvation. Has the minister been made acquainted with this situation, and will he have an investigation made and action taken?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): I have no information on the question which the hon. member has raised. I might remind him that the halfbreeds are not a responsibility of the federal government. They are wholly separate from and outside the federal government's obligation to Indians, and are in the same category as any other class of citizens who may be in need.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION

QUESTION AS TO PERSONNEL OF INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Might I ask a question of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King)? I am sorry I have not under my hand the appropriate Hansard, but no doubt the matter is within his knowledge. Some weeks ago, in answer to a question from, I think, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) he announced the setting up of two bodies, one a board of review and the other a committee, in connection with the oriental situation in British Columbia. We have had an announcement of the personnel of the British Columbia body. I should like to ask now whether the Prime Minister can give us the names of what I think he called the interdepartmental committee that was to be appointed here, and whether he can tell us when they will be appointed.

mittee was appointed some time ago, in fact before the board of review, as it is termed, was appointed. It is composed of officials of different departments of the government. I may happen to miss one or two in enumerating them, but as I recall at the moment there is on the board a member of each of the following departments: External Affairs, Mines and Resources, National Revenue, National Defence, Justice, Labour, Trade and Commerce. The gentlemen who represent these different departments are officers of the departments who are most familiar with the questions which the interdepartmental committee has to consider.

Mr. NEILL: The Prime Minister is not prepared to give their names?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend had told me he was going to ask this question I should have been very pleased to give the names. I shall do so to-morrow, if that is his wish.

ELECTRIC POWER

TRANSFER TO PARLIAMENT OF CONTROL OF EXPORT EXCEPT IN INTERNATIONAL EMERGENCY

The house resumed from Thursday, March 17, consideration in committee of Bill No. 21, to amend the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act—Mr. Mackenzie King—Sir Eugène Fiset in the chair.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—On export of power.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East) moved:

That section 4 be amended by adding the following subsection:

(4) Every such private act shall, unless it is otherwise expressly provided therein, be read and construed as including provisions that,

(a) the quantity of power to be exported thereunder shall, notwithstanding any provision therein fixing the quantity of power to be exported, be always limited to the surplus power in excess of that required for distribution for use in Canada;

(b) the power exported shall not be sold outside of Canada at a price less than the price of power produced and sold under substantially similar conditions for use in Canada;

(c) the said private act may be repealed by proclamation of the governor in council, at any time, upon such notice as the governor in council shall prescribe, or, if the governor in council is satisfied that the conditions imposed by paragraph (a) or (b) of this subsection are not being complied with, without notice.

Mr. BENNETT: All licences for the export of power granted prior to the passing of this bill will expire each year on March 31, whereas power which might be disposed of under a private act would be for a term fixed by the private act. I should think that in all conscience this bill should provide that every private bill shall be subject to the control which we now exercise, namely, that the licence shall expire on the thirty-first day of March. The private bill should be based upon the same principle as that which has governed us heretofore in granting such permission to export power. The other evening the Prime Minister brought forward the Canadian Power Company case as indicating a licence to export power. I confess that at that moment I was not aware of the fact that this was the present Ontario Power Company, but that private act did not contain in any part of it a provision for the export of power. It merely provided that they could carry the wires across the bridge and connect them up; in no place in that act did it say that any power was to be exported. So far as I have been able to find out, nowhere in the Canadian statutes is there any private act that authorizes the export of power.

In support of that position all you have to do is look at the white book, where you will see that this very company has had to take out its annual licence, and the footnote indicates that the rights of the old Canadian Power Company under chapter 120 of the statutes of 1887 were acquired by the Ontario Power Company, the rights of that company in turn being acquired by the hydro-electric commission. As I say, the provisions of that statute did not contain a single reference to the export of power, but they did contemplate the connecting up of the Canadian company with the American company, and it provided that they might make an arrangement to work the said electric light or other power jointly. But they were very careful not to say anything about the export of power.

Should we not maintain a measure of uniformity in connection with this matter? Here are the licences for the export of power, at pages 97 and 98 of the white book. Those licences, as I say, are allowed to run for only a year and expire, I repeat, on March 31, as I understand it. But they are renewable in the terms of the licences, in the absence of any understanding or event that might make it undesirable so to do. I put this point to the Minister of Justice. Yesterday the United States declared that they do not desire to import power from Canada. That relieves this situation very greatly. So far as this bill is concerned it can have no bearing in relation to the United States, and I do not know of any other country to which we would export power. Under the circumstances is it desirable to have one statute under which licences expire on the 31st day of March in each year and, assuming that conditions changed, another set of exports or sales in connection with which the term is fixed by private acts? I think not. I strenuously object to the export of a part of Canada being provided for in a private act brought in by a private member. The very theory itself is contrary to our system of government; that is, that a private member should introduce a private act by petition under which a part of this dominion may be exported out of this country, fixing in the terms of his bill—not the general act—the provision as to how long this is to be done.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is parliament that does that.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course parliament passes every private act.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is not a private member who will decide on that.

Mr. BENNETT: But the private member introduces the measure and indicates to the house his idea as to what should be done; and that bill, as it is presented to the house, necessarily will contain a statement as to the period of time during which that power can be exported. If it is important that we should have these other provisions in what you might call a regulated plan, then is it not more important still that we should have a period of time fixed within which these exports can be carried on, especially having regard to the observations made by the utilities board of New York, and the order in council passed in 1914 against the acquisition of vested rights in connection with any such exports? It may be purely academic now in view of the dispatch from the United States, but obviously should not the standard be set in the enabling statute and not in the private act?

I mention that because, I repeat, in the act as it will leave this house we shall have provided that the sales now authorized shall be renewed only from year to year, unless, in view of the dispatch from the United States indicating that they do not desire to import power from Canada, these licences will not be renewed. In any case it is distinctly provided that there is no acquisition of a right by reason of the licences now in existence. I say this in no contentious or controversial sense, but I do think that in order to prevent the possibility of a vested right being acquired under any private act fixing a period of time during which power may be exported, it would be desirable in the enabling statute, if I might call this such, not only to provide what we have provided with respect to surplus power, the price at which it can be sold, and the punishment or penalty or sanction, if I may use the word, for disregard of the terms of the private act—loss of the right to export; we should do also what we do in the Bank Act or the Railway Act or the Trust Companies Act or any of the other acts which deal with the essential point of the period of time, and indicate in the standard enabling act, which this will now become, the period during which the export could take place. For, as I say, on the one hand we will have a licence and on the other a private act, both authorizing the export of power. One will be for the term fixed by the private act and the other will be for the term fixed by the enabling statute, which makes it clear beyond peradventure that no vested rights are being acquired and that on the 31st day of March in each year there must be a termination of the right to export; and that a new right arises only as it is confirmed by the renewal of the licence, or, in the case of a private act, as might be thought desirable by reason of there being no controversy as to surplus power or price or as to the performance by the selling company of all the obligations placed upon it by the statute.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Of course the suggestions made by my right hon. friend relate rather to a question of policy. I may say that the three alternatives have been considered in the preparation of the bill, namely the one which is now before the house, leaving it to parliament to fix the number of years during which this permission to export will be granted, but with subsection (c) of section 4, which allows the governor in council to repeal it at any time.

Mr. BENNETT: Upon giving notice.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Upon giving notice, because of course private interests may be affected, and it is only fair that notice should be given.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no objection to that.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But if a repeal is being made because of the failure of the grantees to act according to the provisions of the bill, then it will be without notice—namely, if it exports power which is not surplus power, or if it charges a lower price in a foreign country than is charged to a Canadian consumer.

Perhaps I should read subsection (c) again:

> The said private act may be repealed by proclamation of the governor in council at any time upon such notice as the governor in council shall prescribe, or, if the governor in council is satisfied that the conditions imposed by paragraph (a) or (b)—

That is, the surplus of power and the price to be charged—

—of this subsection are not being complied with, without notice.

As it is, we leave to parliament the discretion as to the number of years during which the bill will be in force.

Then we considered another alternative, which would have been adding another paragraph, namely paragraph (d), in these words:

Subject to the provisions of paragraph (c) in this subsection—

The one I have just read—

—the said private act shall remain in force for a period of five years from the date of the commencement thereof.

This would have fixed the time limit. After five years the law would have disappeared altogether. Then we considered another alternative, the one which my right hon. friend opposite seems to favour—if I may have his attention.

Mr. BENNETT: I am listening carefully.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It would be paragraph (d) and in these words:

Subject to the provisions of paragraph (c) of this subsection the said private act shall remain in force for a period of one year from the date of the commencement thereof, but may be extended from year to year by proclamation of the governor in council for four yearly periods of one year each, but not so that the said act shall in any case remain in force for more than five years from the date of the commencement thereof.

There again it would be limited to five years, renewable by proclamation every year. But as I have said, this is rather a question of policy. I must say—and I think I am right in saying this—that the government is not linked with any one of those methods, and if the committee favours the suggestion of my right hon. friend opposite I think we would be quite willing to require the new proclamation every year to keep the act in force for a certain number of years.

Mr. BENNETT: The white book indicates that in 1907 licences were issued to the Canadian Niagara Power Company of Niagara Falls, Ontario. It is stated that the transmission line crosses the boundary at or near Fort Erie and Niagara Falls, Ontario, the licence for firm power starting in 1908 with 39,165 kilowatts and rising to 45,000 kilowatts in 1938. Then there is a note which says:

These companies were under the control of the electric power controller for these years, and licences were not issued by this department. The amounts shown are those recommended by the power controller.

Then for the same company, and with the same statement as to transmission line, dealing with surplus returnable on demand, the licence was issued in 1925, eighteen years later, and began to operate in 1926 with 20,000 kilowatts.

Then we turn to page 98, and we find mention of the Ontario Power Company of Niagara Falls, Ontario. It is stated that the transmission line crossed the boundary at or near Niagara Falls, Ontario. The date of the original licence was November 9, 1907. That was for firm power, beginning with 45,000 kilowatts, and is still for that amount, although at one time it rose to 60,000 kilowatts, and then fell to 37,300 kilowatts in two years. Note (a) is as follows:

This company was under the control of the electric power controller for these years and licence was not issued by this department.

That was during the period of the war, in the years 1918 and 1919. Then, note (b) states:

The Electrical Development Company and The Ontario Power Company were purchased by the Hydro-Electric Power Commission, and a licence equal to the sum of the licences of these two companies was obtained by the Hydro-Electric Power Commission.

That is one for 80,000 kilowatts, the first licence having been issued in 1925. It has now, in 1938, fallen to 45,000 kilowatts, and the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, at another spot near Queenston, has the right this year to export 80,000 kilowatts.

These are the two relevant licences in the province of Ontario. Of course, there is a licence in New Brunswick for 2,500 kilowatts; there is another one for 2,500 kilowatts, and there is one in Ontario, at Fort Frances, for 5,500 kilowatts. The point I should like to make is that under the terms of licences the hydro commission now has, it can export its power only for one year, the licence expiring on the 31st day of March in each year. There is no right of renewal, qua right, but it is renewed if the power is not required, and the company has conformed to all the requirements of the department.

Now comes the next point: If you grant a licence for five years, not stating how to divide it up, you have created a vested right, unless you add another paragraph, such as I suggested the other day, that no renewal of licence or any other act shall create a vested interest under this act. That, I believe, is important in view of what was said—and even in the dispatch which we had yesterday, there was the same thing. What are the grounds upon which the Secretary of State of the United States has placed his refusal? He says: "We do not desire to import power into the United States". First of all he refers to the protection of his power market. That is number one. Then, as number two, he refers to the undesirability of importing power from a foreign country, and thirdly, he casually mentioned the question of defence. On those three grounds the matter is put, and the opinion of Attorney General McReynolds is used as a basis, since the repeal of the Burton Act.

Now we are going to have the same hydro-electric commission apply for a private act in this parliament?—for they are the only applicants at the present time for the export of power. That private act may contain a provision for a term of years. But the licences they will have at Queenston and Niagara Falls will expire on the 31st day of March in each year, so that no vested right can arise, we have made it so clear as to be beyond the possibility of doubt. If, however, we pursue the course suggested in connection with a private act, what we have done—whatever language we may use, if we use a term of years at all, unless we negative it by express language—is to create a vested right.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): In favour of whom?

Mr. BENNETT: In favour of the hydro-electric commission.

Mr. EULER: We reserve the right to cancel at the end of another year.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) grasps at once the point I am desiring to make, that is, that the licence has to be uniform. The private act, which is a licence, should conform, so far as uniformity is concerned, to the licence which is being maintained by this statute. Remember, this statute maintains the licence feature. There must be no misunderstanding about that. The language of the section was redrawn the other evening to make it clearer. At Queenston there is the question of 80,000 kilowatts and at Niagara Falls, 45,000 kilowatts; in both cases the licences expire on March 31 of each year. But you have another licence in the form of a private act, so called, which authorizes the export, we will say for the sake of argument, of 50,000 kilowatts over a period of years. That is a creation of a vested right. In order that there may be uniformity we should see that the right to export power under this private act shall expire on March 31 in each year, but may be renewed, by the governor in council if you like, from year to year, just as the main act now says with respect to Queenston and Niagara Falls power.

We would thus have uniformity at Fort Frances, in Maine, at Niagara Falls and at Kingston. All would be in the same position. We now have the anomaly of having a private act authorizing for a period the export of power from this country without having the safeguards that are established by the general statute. I am not saying this in any captious sense, because so far as I am concerned the matter is of complete indifference. I am putting it forward in the public interest. There should be uniformity, and the Minister of Justice has indicated that two or three alternatives were considered. All I suggest is that you combine the three of them. First, you would provide for no period at all. The private act should make it clear that no period is being contemplated, the same as is now the case with Niagara Falls power. Remember we are dealing with exactly the same people. The only applicants we have before us are those who have the licence for the power at Queenston and Niagara Falls. Let us give them their licences in the same terms. They have not complained; they have been satisfied.

Then there are the two provisions that have been added, namely, one with respect to surplus power and price, which I think is admirable, and one with respect to the right to repeal the statute by proclamation. That is such a vast extension of the power of the governor in council that I could hardly see my learned and right hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, make the statement without choking, having regard to his attitude in times past with respect to the abuse of power by the governor in council.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We have it already.

Mr. BENNETT: It was against that that the Prime Minister the other day quoted the authority of Sir Robert Borden and others to the effect that it was a terrible thing to contemplate the possibility of the governor in council doing it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We have too much power now.

Mr. BENNETT: We are suggesting that it might be dealt with in this way. In any system of responsible government some power must be given to the executive to deal with certain phases of the matter. I think you could meet the situation with a combination of the three. First, provide that any authority to export power under any private act shall expire on March 31 in each year. Second, such right may be renewed from year to year, just as we have it in the principal statute. Third, nothing in this contained shall confer any right. All these the minister has in his mind in the provisions he has added. There is not one suggestion not contained in the combination of his three. If you combine the three of them, everything is there. Possibly I am a little stronger on the question of the acquisition of a vested right and the exact language, but if you combine the three I submit you have everything. It is in the public interest to maintain uniformity in all grants to export, whether they be for the company at Queenston, which is the same company, or the one at Niagara Falls or here.

That is the point I desired to make. I do not know whether I have made it plain, but I wanted to clear up beyond any peradventure the statement to which reference was made the other evening, that the Canadian Power Company statute does confer any right to export. On the contrary, it does not. What is more, they had to take out a licence and they have taken out a licence. The statute changing the name to the Ontario Power Company was chapter 105 of 1899, and that company was acquired by the hydro electric commission. The commission has taken out a licence from year to year. That is all I desire to say. Perhaps I could crystallize it into a really clear statement, but I think the point is quite apparent to the Minister of Justice.

Mr. STEWART: The record shows clearly that notwithstanding the fact that licences have been issued annually, and that they contain restrictions and provisions for cancellation, after having been in force for years, there has grown up in the United States the contention, notwithstanding all this, that vested rights may be acquired. If we pass an act of parliament and say that power may be exported for five years instead of one, surely we will be giving that contention just five times the weight which it has under the existing statute. That is the serious matter in this whole proposition. We should guard in every way against the possibility of the contention arising that there is a vested right. This should be done to prevent any international difficulty. It does seem to me that uniformity should exist in connection with these licences, and the course outlined by my leader provides for this. It would not require much change in the drafting of the amendment to secure this result, and I think it is most desirable.

Mr. SLAGHT: Mr. Chairman, I should like to discuss the provisions of this section very shortly before it is passed and call to the attention of the committee some matters which I think will be helpful in determining in just what way we should leave section 4, when viewed in the light of the amendments and the original draft.

Hon. members will recall that the section provides, first, that in future power exportation can be had only by an applicant coming to parliament with a private bill instead of as heretofore; second, that there must accompany the application an order in council from the exporting province—in the case of the hydro commission it would be Ontario—and where the power is generated wholly or in part in another province, there shall be also an order in council from the generating province. It is the intention of this amendment, I think quite properly, to see to it that both such provinces shall first express their approval of authorization to any private person, corporation or public utility to export power. I desire to align myself with the idea put forward by the leader of the opposition, (Mr. Bennett) namely, that we should provide if possible that, once by private act parliament has authorized a new and further export of power, thereafter there should be power by annual licence to continue and renew the export which parliament has once approved. It would be folly to ask any proposed exporter to come back year by year to parliament for a private bill to continue exportation. The proposed amendment sees fit to preserve by order in council the right to renew all existing licences. I venture to suggest that the existing licences when originally issued were not examined as to their possibilities for good or evil with anything like the pains that any application for a right to export power, coming forward by way of private bill, would now receive. As I understood the suggestion of the leader of the opposition, it was that after parliament had warranted an exportation, and only for one year, thereafter such exportation shall be in the same plight as the licences at present existing.

Mr. BENNETT: That is my suggestion.

Mr. SLAGHT: Personally I am fully in accord with that.

In view of the communications received yesterday and the great bearing they have on the matter before the house it is necessary to look a little more closely into the provisions of section 4. The views of the president of the United States on a subject of international importance such as the export of power should receive from us in this parliament the utmost consideration and respect. To my mind we should so treat the position that he takes—knowing, as he says, that in the form of the bill now before us the matter was under consideration by this parliament, which means that he has undoubtedly studied or had reported to him the purport of our bill and the debate which has taken place in the last two weeks, with the observations of the learned gentleman opposite, as to which I shall have a word to say in a moment. Having confided to us his reasons of state for indicating that he would not permit the importation of power regardless of whether we in this country authorized its export, I say that those observations and those reasons must receive the utmost consideration from this parliament.

May I be permitted a personal word which, I believe, has a bearing and will assist in the solution of the problem as to what we should do with section 4 and the appropriate other sections that follow? It is this. The president of the United States, and the secretary of state, Mr. Cordell Hull, who join in the communications received and tabled last night, are in my humble opinion the best friends that Canada has in the United States of America. I believe the history of the last six months has shown to anyone who has followed it that their policy of the good neighbour and of good-will towards this country—and I will not pause here to review the various incidents, such as the visit of Lord Tweedsmuir to Washington, the visit of Mr. Cordell Hull to Ottawa and Toronto, the Chicago speech of the president, and all the history of the last six months, in which the Prime Minister of Canada has played no unimportant part—these things have done more to cement in this critical time the friendly relationships between Great Britain and the commonwealth of nations in the British Empire and the Unites States of America than any series of incidents since confederation. That perhaps is an added reason why we should deal most carefully with legislation for the export of power.

Since the first application early in January by the hydro commission of Ontario, backed as it was by the premier of Ontario, for leave to export power, there has been a deliberate and organized effort by the Conservative party of Ontario and the Conservative federal party to kill the application. Why do I make that observation? An hon. member suggests that he is of easy mind now; the matter has no significance, and so on. But the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), who I am very sorry to observe is not here to-day, and who is the remote-control and absentee-leader of the Ontario Conservative party, opened the attack upon the hydro application for the export of power in a speech which he made to the Parkdale Women's Conservative Association in Toronto on the evening of January 19 last, some two months ago. He vigorously denounced the hydro application which had been lately made for the export of power, and gave reasons for his opposition; and he has been consistent in his denunciation ever since. Whether the ladies of the Parkdale Women's Conservative Association fully appreciated the effect of his denunciation it is not for me to suggest.

Then we have the leader of the opposition making, in his speech several weeks ago on the address in reply, another bitter and perhaps back-handed attack upon the export of surplus power by the hydro commission. The absentee leader of the Ontario party, the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, followed it up in a speech in Lambton during the present by-election, on March 7. If he is correctly reported, he again condemned hydro in their application for the export of power and made certain very choice and delicate observations with regard to the premier of Ontario and his entire cabinet because they favoured the export of power. Hon. members had the opportunity of listening the other day to a very refined and eloquent speech by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe. It was something like the Lambton speech but not quite so loose-tongued as his platform utterances, because, if correctly reported, in his Petrolia speech of March 7 he said of the Ontario general election last October 6:

> I have lost too many heats in horse races to make apologies. We did not have speed enough to keep up with that caravan of racketeers, but there is another day coming.

In other words, the premier of Ontario, who dared to export 110,000 horsepower of surplus power, power that would otherwise run over the dam, is the leader and head of a caravan of racketeers. I am afraid the hon. gentleman forgets that very recently the people of the province had an opportunity to choose between his distinguished self and him whom he indicts as the head of a caravan of racketeers—and they chose the latter by an overwhelming majority. However, I must not get away from my subject.

Miss MACPHAIL: Electors sometimes make mistakes.

Mr. SLAGHT: The hon. member is quite right; I believe the electors made a great mistake in 1930, for instance, if the hon. member will cast her mind back to that year.

But let me continue. After we had this, as I term it, deliberate cabal between the party in Ontario or the remnants of it and the gallant little band of thirty-eight comprising the federal Conservative party, what further evidence is there that they made up their minds to kill the application of the hydro from Ontario?

Mr. HEAPS: Were there any Liberals who opposed the deal?

Mr. SLAGHT: I have not yet heard of any Liberals who would be opposed to the deal, but there may be. Perhaps the hon. member has information that I am not possessed of.

Miss MACPHAIL: Are there any Liberals having anything to do with the export of power?

Mr. SLAGHT: Yes, madam.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. SLAGHT: The hon. member will pardon me; I did not say that in any light vein. But answering the hon. member, if the question has any application, and I do not see that it has, I understand her to invite me to state whether any Liberals had anything to do with the export of power.

Miss MACPHAIL: But don't go back to Sir Wilfrid.

Mr. SLAGHT: Perhaps she does not like an illustrious illustration, such as Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who had to do for a long period of years with the export of power under seventeen different licences year after year. The Prime Minister of Canada, in his former governments, also had to do with the export of power year after year; and, if I may complete the idea the hon. member perhaps has in her mind, the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden in his day, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen in his regime, and the present leader of the opposition in his five years, all endorsed the principle of the export of surplus power to the United States. The leader of the opposition, the hon. member for Leeds, the former Minister of Trade and Commerce, to whom I have to say a word—I am sorry he is not here to-day—all sat for five years, in which time they issued seventy-five licences for the export of power to the United States. Yet, if you believed what you hear on the hustings, and some of the indictments delivered in the debate on this subject, you would think that the principle of the export of power was something new for this parliament to consider. I wonder what the leader of the opposition was thinking when he voted in council, along with the gentlemen I have named, to license seven different corporations year after year for the export of power. In those five years they exported at least 300,000 horsepower annually, or 1,500,000 horsepower in that period. That is what they exported to the United States. Were they concerned at that time? Did their investigation of those applications lead them to believe that there would be a revolution in the United States if they exported power under these annual licences? Certainly not. We find whipped up for the first time in the last two months, both in the country and in this house, an absolute attack by a cabal, as I put it, against the export of power because, in my humble view, the applicant for the export of power was the young premier of the province of Ontario, who, in the election of 1935, travelled from ocean to ocean and took a prominent part in turning these gentlemen out of office and walking them across the floor to the opposition where they now sit. And for no other reason that I can find in examining their speeches. There was no difference between the proposed hydro application, not a jot of difference, and the seventy-five applications for the export of power which by order in council they approved of.

Mr. BENNETT: One must correct a misstatement. There were no applications granted; there was nothing but the renewal of existing licences.

Mr. SLAGHT: Quite so.

Mr. BENNETT: Let us get it straight.

Mr. SLAGHT: If my right hon. friend believed that the renewal was wrong or evil, that it had all the evils that might attach to his condemnation of this present hydro application, is he the type of man to have renewed the licences? I give him credit for being otherwise. If he believed that they were wrong and ought to be stopped, he would have stopped them. But he did not stop them because he believed that they were proper renewals, that the United States should have the right to buy that power, and that the various provinces of Canada that desired to export surplus power should have the right to exchange it for American dollars.

There has been a good deal of misapprehension about the facts connected with the export of power for thirty years. May I correct one or two of them. We have exported power under twenty-eight different licences for thirty years, consistently and continuously, and increasing up to some ten or twelve years ago when it remained practically stationary. During that thirty years we discontinued the export of power that had been previously going on under eleven different licences. There was no revolution in the United States when we discontinued that export. There were none of the terrible consequences that hon. members on the other side have portrayed with regard to the hydro applications. No; because it was recognized and has been down to the present time that the export of power from this country should proceed.

In connection with the hydro application, after investigating the matter, I undertook to sponsor the proposal to the extent of having the bill introduced as a private measure when the legislation so required. I looked into it and believed on the facts presented to me that it was proper so to do. Orders in council have been passed by the provinces of Quebec and Ontario reciting solemnly that the power which it is proposed to export is purely surplus power not needed in either of those provinces. The hydro commission of Ontario is a quasi-public body; let me remind hon. gentlemen opposite of that. This is not a case of a private corporation coming forward for gain to fatten the pockets of its shareholders, and seeking to export this power for the purpose. The hydro commission, if you will examine the statute that created it, is the trustee for the municipalities and the people of Ontario, and the commission has no right to make a dollar's worth of profit out of any power that it generates and exports. Its duty is to generate power for the industrial needs of our people.

Miss MACPHAIL: And the agricultural too.

Mr. SLAGHT: I was coming to that. My hon. friend and I are in accord in these matters. Its duty is also to generate power for the agricultural interests of the provinces, interests whom I have the honour to represent in my district of Parry Sound. I am sure my hon. friend will not think that I am forgetting them. We must ask ourselves this question: Who was the applicant? As far as I am concerned, having undertaken, on the facts and the position as it then was, to sponsor and present to parliament for their consideration the application of hydro to export power, after analysing the reasons given by the president of the United States in the white paper given to us this morning, and in view of the definite statement that he does not desire more power imported into the United States, I cannot see that hydro could present in this house at this session in the present state of affairs a private bill applying for the export of power. I think all hon. members will agree with me on that. It would be an act of international discourtesy now for the parliament of Canada to authorize the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission to export 110,000 horsepower to the United States, immediately after reading a most dignified and courteous communication from the president of the United States that in the interests of his country he feels regretfully compelled to say to us that he could not now tolerate any increase in the export of power from Canada to that country. So let that point be made clear.

But I want to deal for a moment with some very vigorous denunciations, intended no doubt for me as the likely sponsor of a private bill, which fell from the lips of hon. members on the other side. It was said to be preposterous that by a private bill any member of parliament should have the right to decide the terms—the hon. member almost said "decide"—under which a private applicant should have the right to export power. Hon. members may not all know that the present head of the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission is Doctor Thomas Hogg, who, I regret to say, is very ill just now. When he was appointed to the chairmanship of that great commission, which has assets of $500,000,000, the press of this country and the right thinking people by almost unanimous acclaim said that Doctor Hogg was a worthy chairman for the Ontario Hydro. He was appointed to office as an engineer for the commission under Sir James Whitney, the leader and colleague of my friend the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe of those days. All the higher engineers in the hydro organization—Mr. Jeffries, Mr. Dibblee, and three or four others who have had great engineering problems to deal with for hydro—were appointed by Conservative regimes. Doctor Hogg was elevated to the position of chairman by the Hepburn administration, and the premier of Ontario was commended by practically all members of both political parties for having made a non-political appointment.

Mr. HEAPS: He is a private ownership man, is he not?

Mr. SLAGHT: My hon. friend says so; I would not have thought it. My hon. friend's voice is a voice in the wilderness, the first in or out of the house. Let me point out that the first white paper published makes it clear that that non-political chairman—my friend may call him what he likes as to public ownership or otherwise, although I think it is quite unfair to Doctor Hogg—

Mr. HEAPS: Not in the least.

Mr. SLAGHT: That non-political chairman, in his report to the premier of Ontario, said that there was an undoubted surplus of power which Ontario could not possibly use and that it was in the interest of the commission and of the two million people in Ontario to obtain permission to export. What should we have thought of a premier or cabinet in Ontario which, their skilled engineers having made that report, did nothing to secure the right to export that surplus power and bring 1,500,000 United States dollars into Canada for power which otherwise would be running over the dam and absolutely wasted?

I have reviewed briefly the vicious attack that was made in an attempt to kill the bill, and I was about to deal with the criticism that a private act is all wrong because there would be a great lobby; and that there was a great lobby behind this bill. The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) was shocked at the idea of the lobby. As he put it, it was going to be almost irresistible to him; he would hardly be able to hold back. Let me say that since I undertook to sponsor this bill I have not asked a single hon. member amongst my friends on the other side or on this side, not a single member of the House of Commons, either to support or to vote for the hydro bill. One did not need to, because until the receipt of these documents last night the case for the export of power under the private bill which I intended to present was so strong, so impregnable, that in my view no hon. member who had the interest of his country at heart would have dared to refuse his consent.

Mr. THORSON: Will the hon. member speak for himself in that respect?

Mr. SLAGHT: Very well; I accept my hon. friend's suggestion. I am only indicating my view as to the strength of the case for the export of power. I hope the committee did not understand that I had any view as to how my friend might or might not vote when he heard the facts.

Two or three hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house said they were utterly opposed to this export of power by hydro. They did not want to hear the facts, they could prejudge the case. They were "agin it." I should have thought they might have waited to hear the facts presented.

Miss MACPHAIL: Mr. Roosevelt did not wait, did he?

Mr. SLAGHT: Will the hon. member consider what her question implies? Mr. Roosevelt had a very different problem to consider on behalf of his country from that which we have to consider on behalf of Canada in the present application. Surely if the hon. member has read his statement she will realize that he made that very clear. He said he was entirely sympathetic with the desire of the province of Ontario and the Dominion of Canada to seek a market in the United States for surplus power. That is the attitude Mr. Roosevelt took, after learning of the conditions here to such an extent as he did learn them. He made it amply clear that his attitude was based on an entirely different point of view, namely, consideration of the best interests of the United States.

Mr. HEAPS: If the facts regarding the export of power were so irresistible, why did not the government grant the right to export?

Mr. SLAGHT: There is a perfect answer to that, if the committee will permit me to state it. The matter was given some consideration when the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) brought forward a bill. It was then determined, not that Canada should never export more power; but the bill passed this house unanimously, and only by accident, I am told, did not pass the senate. I do not know whether my friend was here then; I think that he was not—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. SLAGHT: Was his voice raised then in regard to the principle of having parliament deal with the export of power in future rather than continue the principle of having it dealt with by order in council? If he sat silent, as he does now, he gave tacit consent then. If I understand his psychology, had this government accepted either the Montreal Light, Heat & Power application or the subsequent ones from the Cedar Rapids Company or the hydro commission, and dealt with them by order in council, my hon. friend could not have got on his feet quickly enough to indict them for going back on the principle that this house had the sole right of control.

With regard to this bugaboo of a lobby, I think I owe it to the Ontario Hydro to call attention to the fact that they are a quasi-public corporation with no right to spend any money on any lobby. Their accounts are regularly audited. There has been no lobby that I know of for this bill. My friend the leader of the opposition dealt with that matter. I must confess—you may believe it or not—that I do not know the details of lobbies, but I venture to think that the right hon. gentleman does.

Mr. SPENCE: You look innocent.

Mr. SLAGHT: I hope I am not unfair if I suggest that for the many years he sat as a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—

Mr. BENNETT: Entirely mistaken; he was never on the board.

Mr. SLAGHT: Then I withdraw.

Mr. BENNETT: Wrong again.

Mr. SLAGHT: Then as a gentleman who was zealous about the interests of that great corporation in the halls of parliament—

Mr. BENNETT: Then that statement should be withdrawn.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: It is all very well to laugh.

Mr. CAHAN: That statement was entirely untrue.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not hold, nor have I held since 1926 or 1927, any interest, direct or indirect, in any Canadian Pacific security; and I never have, in this house or elsewhere, promoted the interests of that corporation beyond my public duty.

Mr. SLAGHT: Let me accept entirely the statement made by the right hon. gentleman and express regret that I was misinformed as to the facts.

Mr. CAHAN: I rise to a point of order. We have had an address now for a long time, exceeding the forty minutes I think, directed to a hypothetical private bill which the hon. gentleman announces, for the first time as far as I am aware, that he had intended to introduce, and which he states now he will not introduce. That the hon. gentleman intended to introduce a private bill was not known, I fancy, to a very great number on this side of the house. Why, I suggest, should the hon. gentleman be allowed to discuss a private bill which is not in existence, which is not now before the house and which seems to exist only in the imagination of the hon. gentleman?

Mr. SLAGHT: May I direct the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that in committee I am speaking to section 4 of this bill. That section contains various amendments which have been regarded by nearly every hon. member who has spoken as possibly applicable to an expected private bill from hydro, and I am using the illustration with regard to that expected private bill to be introduced later by hydro only, as a guide to hon. members of this committee in connection with circumstances which may arise next year or the year after. It will provide some light, I hope, which will enable them to bring in now a general bill properly amended.

Before I leave the lobbying matter, Mr. Chairman, I think I have made it clear that this was a bugaboo raised as part of the scheme to kill the hydro bill. The leader of the opposition is very sensitive as to the possibility of some members of the house being affected by a lobby. I do not know whether anybody in bad grace—and certainly if it was done it was behind my back—has offered him a chocolate bar or a glass of ovaltine as an inducement to vote for the bill; or has offered the hon. gentleman who represents Kootenay East a rosy-cheeked Okanagan valley apple or a street car ticket to induce him to vote for the bill. Surely these hon. gentlemen have done a disservice to the whole house and the hon. members of the house by having it go out across Canada that there is a vigorous, vicious, evil lobby. Surely the sergeant at arms should be invoked to throw the lobbyists out of the corridors, if they are there. I submit that the whole thing was a red herring, nothing more and nothing less.

There is one point in regard to which I do not think information has been brought forward by anyone, and which is, and I think will be in the future, an important factor in determining whether or not it is safe to export power. It is in connection with the interruptions of power that have occurred in the past; and I am going to give an example going back only to last year. The power which we have been exporting under these licences, which hon. gentlemen opposite renewed for five years, has been interrupted time and again by mere telephone calls across the river from Niagara Falls, stating that they will have to turn off the power for given periods and for certain quantities. No revolution occurred. I have secured extracts from the log books, and without going into great detail let me tell the committee what they disclose. Seven days were chosen at random, from December 2 to December 9, 1937. I believe that power goes over on Sundays as well as week days. In the fifteenth hour, the thirty-second minute, Queenston No. 4 unit—I am quoting exactly from the log book—at the request of hydro reduced the export of surplus power from 75,000 kilowatts to 31,000 kilowatts for a period of time. On the very same day at another point the Toronto Power Company No. 1 unit, at request, reduced the export from 31,000 kilowatts to 23,000 kilowatts at another point. On the same day the Ontario Power Company No. 1 unit, at the request of the Canadian company, reduced their export from 23,000 kilowatts to 15,000 kilowatts. The Canadian Niagara company's units Nos. 9 and 10 reduced their export of 15,000 kilowatts to zero. So the record goes. I am not going to read any more of these extracts, but that is what was done when peak loads came along and power was desired both in Canada and the United States. I am credibly informed that the procedure was simply this: the operator on the Canadian side simply called up the purchasers' operator on the United States side and said, "We are sorry; we have to cut off these quantities of power," and they acquiesced. There was no revolution; no army marched across the bridge to turn the power on again.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is hardly a cancellation. It is simply an interruption.

Mr. SLAGHT: I quite appreciate that, and there is a vast difference, I grant my hon. friend, between a cancellation for all time and an interruption. That would take us into a discussion of the five different types of power, and I am sure the committee would not have patience with me if I attempted to go into that. My hon. friend is quite right, however, in calling attention to that point.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the hon. member give us the selling price per horsepower of the interruptable power that was cut off?

Mr. SLAGHT: I am sorry; I cannot. I could secure that information for my hon. friend in a few hours, I think, if it were pertinent and he desired it. That, however, is the history with regard to that bugaboo that you dare not sell any power across the line because if you had to take it back, either for good or by means of interruptions for a while, relations would be created which should not be brought about.

I had intended to make other observations, Mr. Chairman, but I fancy that I have made clear the view I hold as to the campaign that was put on against this Hydro exportation of power, and the reason for it. With regard to some of the old guard sitting across the house from me I would have expected that, because they bound themselves to that banner of their party of which they were so proud, but of which I hope they are now so ashamed, "No truck or trade with the Yankees." They are running true to form when they desire to prevent the sale of Canadian commodities to what in those days they styled the Yankees. I would not expect anything else from a gentleman whose idea of trading between nations was based not upon a policy of good will, if I am not unfair in putting it that way; not upon a policy of sititng down together and negotiating agreements and contracts, but whose slogan so far as trading with your neighbour was concerned was wrapped up in that celebrated phrase, "Blast Canada's way into the markets of the world."

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Sir Eugene Fiset): Order. The hon. gentleman's time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are in committee.

Mr. BENNETT: The time in committee is also forty minutes.

Mr. SLAGHT: I shall be glad to bow to the chairman's ruling.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Sir Eugene Fiset): I have allowed forty minutes, even with interruptions.

Mr. RINFRET: There is a rule in committee that every time a question is put to an hon. member, his time commences anew.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. RINFRET: There has been an exchange of questions.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. SLAGHT: I will conclude in a couple of minutes.

Mr. RINFRET: He can speak.

Mr. SLAGHT: I do not wish to go on too long.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no doubt about it: The rule is that a member may speak for forty minutes in committee, but he may resume his speech after someone has spoken in between.

Mr. HEAPS: So long as someone has spoken.

Mr. SLAGHT: I did not catch the observation of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. gentleman is now free to continue; he has the floor.

Mr. BENNETT: The rules in committee are made light of; the Prime Minister must not say that. The rule in committee is that forty minutes is all the time the hon. member may have. I raised a question of order, and the Prime Minister suggests that since I have spoken therefore he could go on and have another forty minutes. That is absurd.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The hon. member for Winnipeg North interjected a few words.

Mr. BENNETT: He asked a question.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): And the chairman had to sit down and rise again.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I may say a few words, and so have the rules complied with.

Mr. BENNETT: No, he will lose the floor then. He loses the floor, and then I might take it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member may conclude by coming on later.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I said that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And I purpose giving him that opportunity.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I did. A question of order arises. Let us realize—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not a question of order.

Mr. BENNETT: The rules are made not for one or two but for the whole house. The question of order is that he must not exceed forty minutes. If he exceeds forty minutes he must sit down, and someone else may make a speech. Then he may go on for another forty minutes. The chairman has to catch his eye before that of someone else—probably half a dozen may speak in between. The right hon. gentleman has the same right as anybody else to raise a point of order, but he has not a right to make an address on the other man's speech.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not a question of order.

Mr. STIRLING: He is still on his feet.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think he is sitting down.

Mr. STIRLING: He tried to be.

Mr. BENNETT: He cannot go on now, necessarily.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my right hon. friend say he cannot go on?

Mr. BENNETT: I say he cannot go on, after the chairman has called his attention to the fact that his forty minutes are up.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; I am going on, at the present time.

Mr. BENNETT: And the hon. gentleman has to take his seat, which he has just done.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I wish to say—and had intended to say before the hon. member for Parry Sound started to speak—was that hon. members opposite, led by my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition, devoted most of the time, in their discussion of the present section, to indicating what provisions should be contained, in order to deal with any later application for a private bill by the Ontario hydro-electric commission. I should like to repeat that this bill was not drafted in relation to an application by the Ontario hydro-electric commission, but owes its origin to the two applications which had come from the province of Quebec. I thought I had made that point clear, when I spoke on the second reading of the bill. The application with which the government was confronted, at the time it had to reach a decision as to whether or not it would grant a licence by order in council or require approval of parliament, was that of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company made in the spring of last year, and renewed in the summer, for the right to export power to the United States.

In replying to that application, the administration directed the attention of the applicants to the fact that on previous occasions parliament had expressed its view to the effect that future applications should be reviewed by parliament, and indicated that the government would not consider any application until the whole question had been discussed in parliament. After that application was made, another was submitted by Aluminium Limited. The same reply was made by the administration, with respect to the second application.

In both instances attention was drawn to previous discussions which had taken place in parliament. Then later the government received an application on behalf of the Ontario hydro-electric commission, and in answer to that application attention was drawn to the replies which had been made to the two previous applications, which replies were to the effect that the matter would not be considered until parliament reviewed the whole question of the export of power.

Mr. BENNETT: They withdrew their applications.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They withdrew them, yes. But that was the genesis of this particular bill—a bill framed along the lines of the one introduced some years ago by the hon. member for Leeds, which received favourable consideration in this house in 1928, and passed unanimously in 1929. I believe it is a mistake to discuss in connection with this general bill, a possible application which may be considered later on in the form of a private bill.

Mr. CAHAN: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEWART: You have been doing it for half an hour.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says "Hear, hear"; that is the line his leader took this afternoon.

Mr. CAHAN: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes—I beg the hon. member's pardon. However, the point I wish to make is that the bill before us is a general one which relates to applications for the right to export power which may be made at any time from any part of Canada. It is not a bill relating only to an application which may come from Ontario, respecting the hydro-electric commission. It is a bill which will pertain equally to applications which may come from Manitoba, British Columbia, New Brunswick or any other province, and which may be made at any time in the future.

What we are therefore immediately concerned with is the framing of a measure which will serve as a guide to those who may apply in the future for the right to export power, and to set out certain provisions a private bill should contain if its sponsors expect it to be approved by the parliament of Canada. The reason why the restrictive conditions were not included in the general bill is not that the government hoped to have more freedom in granting an applicant but, on the contrary, it was because the government desired to give to parliament the freedom to insert in a private bill any provision it might wish. It did seem to the administration a little inconsistent to say, on the one hand, "We will leave to parliament the whole question of granting an application, in the form of a private bill," and at the same time not leave parliament free to insert in the private bill any provision it might wish to insert.

It would be assumed, I believe, that a private bill would designate the number of years for which the right to export would be granted. That would be one of the first provisions which would be considered. In some cases it might be a bill to permit the export of power for one or two years. To name five years definitely as a period beyond which no private bill should continue in force might, on the face of it, appear to be an invitation to applicants to make applications for bills which in all cases would have a duration of five years. Similarly, the necessity of the government renewing a licence from year to year was a provision which, it was assumed by the administration, parliament itself would insert in a private bill, if it was thought that such provision were necessary and desirable.

That is the reason why these provisions, in detail, were not set forth in the bill, as originally presented. Where parliament gives certain power to the governor in council and leaves the final word with that body, there is a special reason for restricting and limiting the governor in council with respect to time and with respect to other provisions of which account should be taken. If it will help to effect unanimity with respect to the present measure, I see no reason why the committee should not accept the provision mentioned by the right hon. Minister of Justice. It is one which the government has considered and which it was prepared to bring before the committee for its consideration if there appeared to be a desire to have it presented. I shall ask the minister later on to move the amendment he has proposed. We now have three subsections, (a), (b) and (c), and the following is proposed by the hon. Minister of Justice as a new subsection (d):

> Subject to the provisions of paragraph (c) of this subsection, the said private act shall remain in force for a period of one year from the date of the commencement thereof, but may be extended from year to year by proclamation of the governor in council for four further periods of one year each, but not so that the said act shall in any case remain in force for more than five years from the date of the commencement thereof.

Mr. SLAGHT: It seems to me that the proposed additional amendment solves the difficulty that existed before and should meet with the unanimous approval of the committee. Some gentlemen questioned whether the Ontario hydro application would have passed. That is in the realm of speculation and nobody can say. However, in order to afford a guide in the future, should there be a change of policy on the part of the executive of the United States—a thing quite possible and thinkable in these days when changes occur so fast—may I suggest that practically every province of Canada is to-day enjoying a revenue from the United States dollars which come into Canada to pay for the export of surplus power. I refuse to believe that hon. gentlemen from British Columbia, New Brunswick, Manitoba and Quebec, each of which provinces is enjoying revenue from the export of surplus power, will join in the cabal of the other side to prohibit Ontario from having the right to export power which the engineers state is undoubtedly surplus.

The executive of the United States has observed that we in Canada have great undeveloped natural power resources, while in the eastern states particularly the power resources are practically all exhausted, inasmuch as they have all been brought into development at the present time. Let us keep that in mind, in endeavouring to get an enactment of section 4 which looks towards the future in a broad way. I should like to give in that respect some figures which I obtained from page 387 of the Canada Year Book for 1936. These figures indicate the available and developed water power in Canada by provinces, as of January, 1936. The two most important provinces in this respect are, first, Quebec, and next, Ontario, I shall not give the figures for the other provinces as those who are interested further may go to the Canada Year Book for them. The figures for Quebec show that the available 24-hour power at 80 per cent efficiency is 8,459,000 horse power at the ordinary minimum flow, and 13,064,000 at the ordinary six months' flow. The total turbine installation as of that date was 3,853,320 horse power. In the case of Ontario, the available power at 80 per cent efficiency, at ordinary minimum flow, was 5,330,000 horse power; at ordinary six months' flow, 6,940,000 horse power, while the turbine installation totalled 2,560,155 horse power.

We may look forward to an influx of United States, British and other capital to help to develop the undeveloped water power across Canada. Therefore we must be careful not to declare for future generations and not to put upon the records of parliament any false notions of economy as to the desirability, if at any time it be found desirable, of inviting capital to develop further these great natural resources. These times of stress, which have been noted before in the house, are peculiarly the time when we should fall in with the views of the president of the United States. I believe in him sufficiently to assume that if conditions change and if it is thought desirable to indicate to Canada a different policy, he will do so; for I am sure it is his desire, as it is and always has been the Liberal policy, to promote good will, the attitude of the good neighbour, and friendly and kindly relations between the two countries.

Mr. CAHAN: I commend the Prime Minister for bringing this discussion back to a consideration of the merits of the bill now before the committee. The hon. member for Parry Sound certainly has made one of the most provocative speeches I have ever heard in this chamber since I became a member. If I had not too much respect for myself, for the Prime Minister, for the leader of the opposition and for other hon. members, I would retaliate in phrases which would be quite as sharp and poignant as those which he has attempted to toss across the floor of the chamber this afternoon. It was not commendable for the hon. gentleman; it reflected no credit upon him that he should assume to fling across the chamber the epithets which he did this afternoon. If he persists in that course he will not hereafter find his membership in this house as pleasant and agreeable as it has been during the present and the two previous sessions. So far as I am concerned, I have heard of no cabal on either side of the house against the Ontario government or the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission. If such a cabal exists, either on the government side or on this side, it certainly has not been mentioned in any of the private discussions which I have had with colleagues on both sides with regard to the merits of this bill.

When the Prime Minister introduced the bill I accepted it as an effort on the part of the government, after due and careful consideration, to amend the statute of 1907, the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, and to provide that parliament might give an unbiased consideration to any future application for the export of power. The fact that the hon. member for Parry Sound intended to introduce some special measure in this case was not mentioned to me and was not known by me, and I did not take any observations on the possibility of a private bill being brought before the house to be a reflection upon the premier of Ontario, or upon the commission which my hon. friend represents, or to refer to the prospective introduction of a bill by the hon. member. I have tried to consider this matter not solely from the point of view of Ontario, because Ontario's interests are not so well known to me; I was also considering it from the point of view of other provinces, such as Quebec, which now have and will have in future large quantities of hydro-electric power for exportation, if the hydro-electric diversions which now exist and others which are in contemplation in those provinces are brought to completion.

In all his discussions with myself and my colleagues the leader of the opposition has always sought to ascertain what, in our opinion, would be fair and proper provisions to suggest by way of amendment to the bill now before the committee, not with a view to precluding hydro-electric development in Ontario, not with the view of placing obstacles in the way of the premier of Ontario and his government, or in the way of the hydro-electric commission of Ontario, but with a view to ascertaining and, if possible, enacting provisions which would apply to all possible applications for the export of power in the immediate future.

To suggest that this law which we now place on the statute books will be like the laws of the Medes and Persians, never to be amended or modified, is nonsense. That there is any such intention in the mind of the Prime Minister, it would be, I think, nonsensical to assert. We are dealing to the best of our intelligence with conditions at present existing in order to frame a general law under which the export of power in future may be carried on with the full approval not only of this house but of both houses of parliament. In that purpose I concur. Therefore, when the bill came before the house and amendments were suggested, we on this side suggested certain amendments which, in conversation among ourselves, had occurred to us, and from a desire solely to assist in drafting a bill which would commend itself to the great majority of this house. In discussing this bill I think we might just as well leave Ontario, as Ontario, and the interests of the hydro-electric of Ontario, out of consideration.

The suggestions which were made as to possible caballing for private ends remain, because whenever private acts are applied for, which grant or propose to grant special rights or privileges to certain sections of the country or to certain groups of individuals, there is always a tendency to caballing and lobbying. Such remarks as were made on this side of the house apply, I am sure, to that prospective condition of affairs and had no application to the hon. member for Parry Sound or to the interests which he represents in this particular debate. Therefore I suggest to the committee that we should accept the declaration of the Prime Minister as to his intentions in introducing this bill and his reasons for proposing certain amendments to the bill, and then, without further consideration of the provocative statements made by the hon. member for Parry Sound, we should give our full attention and apply the best of our intelligence and experience to the modification of this bill so that it may meet with the full approval of the great majority of members on both sides. That is the only aim which I have in view.

Mr. HEAPS: I wish to say just a word or two in reply to the extraordinary speech to which we listened this afternoon. I do not mind any hon. member making a speech, and I realize that perhaps one of the hardest things any prospective speaker has to endure is to have a speech which has been kept, so to speak, in cold storage for many months. Some day he wants to deliver it, and probably this afternoon we have had an example of the speech that has to be delivered, this being the only opportunity to present it. But probably it would have been better had it never been delivered. It is not pleasant to have statements made in this chamber which have a sinister reference to other hon. members, and such statements should not be made unless they can be backed up by absolute proof. When the hon. member for Parry Sound used the word "cabal," I thought I would send to the parliamentary library for the Encyclopedia Britannica and see what the word really meant. This is what I find:

> Cabal: A private organization or party engaged in secret intrigues and applied also to the intrigues themselves.

I have been in this chamber during the whole time that this measure has been before the house, and I know of no secret intrigues that have been carried on. Now and again I have spoken to hon. members with reference to this bill. I know some Liberal members who are very much opposed to the measure, and probably, if a private bill carrying out the intents and purposes of the legislation now under consideration came before us, they would vote against it. But as to any member who had it in his mind to vote against such a bill being accused of doing something that is against all rhyme and reason, I cannot understand language of that kind being used in connection with such a matter.

The hon. member wanted to know what Liberals were opposed to this measure. He does not need to go outside Ontario to discover that. In the provincial house there is the hon. member for Bellwoods, the former attorney general, who probably knows as much as any man in Ontario about hydro affairs. I do not think it can be said that Mr. Roebuck, M.L.A. for Bellwoods, is in favour of the proposals that were enunciated here this afternoon by the hon. member for Parry Sound. I believe we have all heard within the last few days the statements in which Mr. Arthur Roebuck has scathingly denounced the whole of these proposals, and there is in those proposals a good deal which deserves, probably, close consideration by hon. members. If members are not prepared to scrutinize very closely the matters contained in a proposed law, they are not carrying out the duties they were sent here to perform. As a member of the house, who has not as yet given any expression of opinion which way I shall vote, I resent the implication that if I were to vote against the proposal to export power I should be part of a "cabal" in this chamber opposed to the Ontario government. I am not taking my orders from Ontario. I am not prepared, as the expression goes, to be a Charlie McCarthy for anyone. If I have opinions to express I am going to express them according to the light in which I see them, and I am not to be intimidated by statements made in this chamber by any other hon. member.

The hon. member who spoke so vehemently this afternoon was extremely anxious to throw innuendoes against other hon. members. Will he tell us that he was not within recent times closely associated with some of these private power interests in the province of Quebec. We know it; and yet he is so free with his own statements thrown across the floor of the house. I am not holding this against him in the least, but when he makes such statements he should be careful to have behind him the necessary accuracy.

I am prompted to say a word or two in this debate not because I want to discuss the merits or demerits of the bill with respect to the export of power; but when I made a statement in reference to the appointment of Doctor Hogg to the position of chairman of the hydro commission, I did so because I know something about Doctor Hogg's actions and his associations. It is common knowledge, and if I had time, if I had known that the hon. member was going to raise the question, I could have brought forward facts to prove that Doctor Hogg has been closely associated with private power interests in Canada. He has been their consulting engineer on many occasions, having made reports to private corporations on the question of private or public ownership, when the one or the other had to be brought into question.

I do not think this discussion is in order. The Chairman has shown a great deal of latitude in allowing this question to be discussed in committee, and I do not know where the debate will end. I would have been more content to discuss the clause introduced this afternoon and to keep strictly within the terms of section 4, and the amendment introduced by the Prime Minister, with which I am in agreement. Perhaps it offers more control to the governor in council and to parliament than we formerly had, because under the provisions as they stand it might be difficult to get a clear-cut interpretation. There might be a question of conflicting jurisdiction. My main purpose now, however, is to protest vigorously against the sort of speech that we have been compelled to listen to this afternoon.

Mr. HAMILTON: It is not my desire to speak provocatively or with acrimony, and, indeed, I did not intend to speak at all at this time. However, I wish to discuss some of the safeguards that are contemplated in section 4 of this bill and in the amendment. But before I do so, I should like to make one or two observations. After listening to the hon. member for Winnipeg North I recall that not so very long ago he made certain remarks as to how members on this side of the house were kept in line on government measures. If I remember rightly—and I am speaking from recollection—the hon. gentleman suggested that they were to be kept in line by having a judgeship, or a senatorship, or something of that kind held dangling before them. I recall also the remarks made the other night with regard to the lobby that had been carried on in connection with, strange to say, a private bill which was not before the house. At the time I resented those remarks and I felt grateful to the Minister of Justice for stating that, in his opinion, those on this side could be trusted to use their good judgment and their common sense in connection with a matter of this kind. I thank him for that statement.

I think I am entitled to say here that throughout this whole discussion of the bill before us, and of any contemplated private bill which may be brought in, no living soul except members of the house—not the hon. member who spoke a short while ago, the member for Parry Sound—has ever asked me, or suggested directly or indirectly anything about what I would do in connection with the export of power from Ontario. Perhaps I have not the ability to carry out my determination; I gather from the remarks of my hon. friend opposite that nobody over here has. The only one who has that ability is the hon. member for Winnipeg North. I did wish, however, to see what the safeguards were that were being put around the private bill which was to be brought in.

Coming now to section 4, as I understand it, the safeguards which are being provided are to take care of the vital interests of this nation. Safeguards, I agree, are essential. My home town is one that has grown up by, and has been associated with, hydro-electric energy, where the water from lake Superior falls to the lake Huron level; and our whole history has been closely linked with water power development. I mention this to illustrate some particulars in which I believe there should be safeguards in a bill such as the one we have before us. Every few years increased power has been required, and I have seen personally the effect of the development of industry on the surplus power available, pressing upon those owning the power to use their influence and make contacts so as to bring in industries which would make use of that power.

There are two essentials in regard to which there should be safeguards. In the first place there should be a definite determination and incentive to use all power and to find uses for it in the dominion and particularly in the locality where the power is developed. Different standards have to be considered, depending upon the question whether the control is by private interests seeking profit or by public or quasi-public ownership bodies whose duty and trust are to the people at large. There is a distinct difference there.

In Sault Ste. Marie we have a public utilities commission which has been operating for years. The chairman has the absolute confidence of the people of Sault Ste. Marie, and the other members of the commission are similarly trusted. I mention this because it touches closely some considerations that have been brought forward in the house in connection with the bill now before us, although referable to the anticipated private bill in connection with the export of power from Ontario. There we have this situation. They are under obligation to take from a private power company an extra block of power; but it is optional; they do not have to pay for it until they take it. That power company have to carry that extra power and it is a dead loss to them unless they can make use of it. They have off-peak power, surplus power, a portion of which they have to supply to the city on demand, and having no use for it now they supply it for use under the boilers of the paper industry in Sault Ste. Marie. They supply at least a portion of that power. If the public utility commission had to take that power and pay for it, they would be in a similar position to the hydro-electric commission, in that they would have to pay for power for which they had no use. In view of the desire expressed by some hon. members to see that surplus power is kept for Canadian use, I would have every confidence that the chairman of that commission would do everything possible to develop uses for that power in and around that community first, and I would be content to allow them to export any remaining surplus across the line at Sault Ste. Marie, under the safeguards contemplated by this bill.

Another point on which I wish to touch for a moment is the danger of setting up vested interests in the United States with a right to look to a continuation of the supply of power. In the supplementary white paper the memorandum attached to the letter of the Secretary of State refers to the danger of United States industries becoming dependent upon imported power, and indicating what it would mean if the supply were cancelled. They would have to revert hastily to additional steam plant construction for base load power. I confess that to my mind this has been a serious danger. But in no provocative or acrimonious sense I want to read a statement which goes back to 1911. I was not very old then, but I carry forward even now some recollection of what was then said to be a very serious threat if we dealt with the United States of America. I want to follow that thought for a moment, because I think safeguards on that point are important. I quote from page 173 of the Canadian Annual Review, 1911, some remarks of the then Mr. R. L. Borden with reference to the 1911 election and the contemplated reciprocity agreement:

> If we attempt the experiment of linking arms with our gigantic neighbour he will have something to say about the unlinking. Already we hear the astonishing suggestion that as congress has ratified this agreement Canada dare not refuse to do it. Against the vested interests of hundreds of millions, against the tremendous power and influence of gigantic trusts, in the face of the delicate and difficult international conditions created by the treaty, and confronted with a threatened dislocation of business infinitely greater than that which brought our government to its knees last year, Canada would be as capable of withdrawing, without consent, from this agreement as the fly from the spider's web.

That was in 1911, and I have heard here in the last two weeks some arguments that concerned me as those did then. But since 1911 we have changed our viewpoint as to the danger of trade entanglements or alliances or treaties with the United States, and the successors of the party which then took that extreme view, were in 1934 and 1935 seeking to bring about a trade agreement with the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: Having first made the empire trade agreements.

Mr. HAMILTON: The point at issue in 1911 was the danger of trade moving in volume north and south, the danger that once we had entered into an agreement we would not be able to break it without creating international difficulty, the same argument that is advanced now. And I understand the reason why the right hon. leader of the opposition in 1934 did not make an agreement with the United States was that he could not make those channels deeper than they were and more binding than the United States was willing to make them, in other words, increasing the very danger which in 1911 we were warned against.

I wish to give as an illustration a situation which is of vital importance not only to my constituency but to Canada, in which the identical argument would apply. This is an iron and steel age. Practically our whole civilized life is based on iron and steel. Yet not one pound of iron ore, upon which that great industry is dependent, is mined in Canada. The ore which comes into central Canada comes from the United States of America, from resources which are not inexhaustible, which are being depleted rather speedily. The hon. member for Davenport a year or two ago pointed out in this house that very danger. It is a very real one. To-day we in this country are utterly dependent for raw material for that great basic industry upon our neighbours across the line, whose resources of iron ore are being depleted with some speed. I confess I cannot see a great difference between the menace that confronts us if the United States should suddenly terminate those supplies and that which would arise if we were exporting hydro-electric energy to the United States and suddenly terminated that supply. As the memorandum to which I have referred suggests, what they would have to do would be to resort to steam plants for their power. Similarly we would have to import ore from other countries, and probably pay more for it, as they would possibly have to pay more for power produced by coal burnt under boilers if that were necessary. I do not wish to detract at all from the seriousness of this question, but I do not think it applies with any greater seriousness to the export of hydro-electric energy than to other commodities which are exported.

The other day the hon. member for Davenport dealt with the diversion of water from the great lakes. To my mind that is on a different basis from hydro-electric energy, as in that case the United States have the physical control of that diversion, which they have not in connection with hydro-electric energy going into their country.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I correct my hon. friend? At Niagara Falls the diversion of water is for the generation of electricity for export to the United States.

Mr. HAMILTON: My understanding is that the hon. member referred to the Chicago drainage canal—

Mr. MacNICOL: Exactly.

Mr. HAMILTON: —and referred to others, and as I followed him his contention was that the United States were actually taking water for purposes for which they were not entitled to take it.

Mr. MacNICOL: Exactly.

Mr. HAMILTON: Well, in Chicago at any rate the taking of that water is controlled by physical means situated in the United States, and the only way we could stop them would be in some way to control their physical conduct, or that which they do in a material sense.

Mr. MacNICOL: I tried to point out that at Chicago, where for many years they have diverted 10,000 cubic feet per second, half of that water belonged to Canada, and that if we could use that additional 5,000 cubic feet per second at Niagara Falls we would develop an additional 150,000 horse power of electricity at Queenston.

Mr. HAMILTON: I fully appreciate that, but we cannot stop the water going into the Chicago drainage canal because we have no physical control over it. I am not an electrician and do not profess to have much technical knowledge of electricity; but in connection with electricity I assume we could cut the wires or in other ways stop the exportation, which we cannot do in reference to the water being diverted at Chicago. So I do not think the illustration is altogether valid as an argument against allowing the exportation of hydro-electric energy.

In connection with section 4 we have the parliament of Canada or the governor in council acting for the people and having the say as to whether or not exports shall continue. Then we have other public utility bodies equally responsible to the people they represent. In my town they are responsible, among others, to the men and women out of work, to the people of that city, which is seeking for additional industries which would relieve the unemployment now prevailing. We should so surround our exportations that we do not make any misrepresentations or misleading statements. When dealing with a great nation at present on such friendly terms with Canada, in the words of the president can we not deal with them as neighbours; can we not make with that country an agreement such as an individual would make with his neighbour? It seems to me that at this time, when there is so much suspicion and distrust, we should have faith and confidence in the relations that exist between nations. I may be talking foolishly and childishly, not as a man of the world; yet I am prepared to make these statements in any event. It is important that we should live up to the high standard of national and international conduct which is nowhere better exemplified than on the North American continent, where it has been an example to the world. So I think if we take care of these very real conditions that must be considered, with all the provisions that are embodied in this measure we shall be safeguarding the national interests of this dominion.

Mr. LAWSON: Mr. Chairman, while I appreciate the wisdom of the suggestion of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, I simply cannot allow to go unchallenged the statement of the hon. member for Parry Sound to the effect that the Conservative party in this house was predisposed or had agreed to oppose the exportation of power from Canada. Coming from Ontario, and the particular district which I represent, I cannot allow such a statement to be made without a reply. So far as I am concerned—and I am sure I express the views of all my colleagues in the house—we have had a sincere desire to see this general bill dealing with the exportation of electric power so drafted that the interests of all parties in this country would be safeguarded, irrespective of whether the applicant for permission to export electric power should be the hydro-electric commission, or any quasi-public ownership enterprise, or a private concern.

I am willing to give a good deal more weight to the views and opinion of the hon. member for Parry Sound on the subject of remote control leadership than I am to his attitude towards the federal Conservative party. No member in this house is in a better position to have a knowledge of remote control leadership than the hon. member for Parry Sound. If we could believe the press of Ontario, for two years prior to 1934 the hon. gentleman was the constant companion of a remote control Liberal leader in Ontario, the present premier of that province.

The hon. member for Parry Sound says that one would think the export of power was something new. Oh, no, it is not. It is because of the experience we have had with the resultant effects of the export of power that individual members of this party and the Conservative party in this house have been endeavouring to see that amendments were included in the bill now before us. It is because we have learned that renewals are not precedents, as the hon. gentleman would seem to think, for the granting of new applications. It is because we have learned from experience that once an application is granted, unless it is surrounded with the strictest terms, a vested right is created, and you must have an excellent reason for refusing the renewal because of the international complications which arise therefrom. It is because of our experiences at Massena and in regard to the Chicago drainage canal and the export of power at Niagara Falls, which were detailed by the hon. member for Davenport, that we have learned that care must be exercised in granting new licences for the export of power from Canada.

May I say to the hon. member for Parry Sound that as far as I am concerned, and as far as most of the members of the Conservative party in this house to my knowledge are concerned, if the hon. gentleman or any other hon. member introduces a private bill now or in the future providing for the export of power from this country he will find that we will consider that problem not from the point of view of whether it is the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, not from the point of view of whether it is a private corporation, but from the point of view of what is in the national interests of the people of Canada as a whole. That and none other will be the governing factor.

Mr. BENNETT: We have had the pleasure—and such apparently it was to many hon. members opposite—of listening to a high class speech by the hon. member for Parry Sound. He spoke in such slighting terms of the language used by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe that one would have expected that at least he would use what might be called language consistent with the amenities of civilized society. But it was ovaltine, a chocolate bar, and street-car tickets; this from a member of the legal profession, who gave a learned opinion in connection with the MacLaren bond issue, and who rises in his place in this house as an exemplar of all that is fit and proper in the conduct of public business. That is his language. That is the language of one who asserts himself as a leader of the bar in his province. I believe he is now—well, I am reminded that he was—a bencher of the law society of Ontario. The language he used here to-day is as I have indicated—and he holds himself up now to this house as an example. One would expect at least that the language used would not be of the kind he condemns. But he has seen fit to condemn in one breath and to approve in the other, using himself the language to which I have referred. I am accustomed to abuse; that is nothing new. There is, of course, an old saying that when you have a bad case you should abuse the attorney on the opposite side. I make no complaint about that; but I do make this complaint—not on behalf of myself, for I have not complained personally—that those who set themselves up as examples and condemn in such vigorous terms the language said to have been used by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe should not themselves sink to what they describe as an improper level, by using the language we have heard.

Something has been said about a lobby. I spoke about the dangers of lobbies with respect to private legislation. I in no sense indicated that any member of this house was lobbying. I spoke of what I said in parliament—I believe it was during the second session in which I enjoyed a place in it—at a time when the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, Mr. W. F. Nickle and I on the last day of the session joined in as vigorous a denouncement as we were capable of making of the lobby that was carried on in respect to the Bank Act. We were not in any sense denouncing the lobby of members of the house by members of the house—far from it. We were pointing out that systematic lobbies were being maintained by members of the legal profession on behalf of great interests concerned; that they were buttonholing members in the corridors and suggesting that they give support to this measure, to that clause or that paragraph of a bill.

What is more, we did something to end it. Every private bill is a conflict of interest against usage. Everyone knows that a private bill is an effort to have a majority of the members of parliament make an exception in favour of an interest. Whether it be a divorce bill or any other measure, it matters not; it is the interest that is the controlling factor. I pointed that out the other day, as I did twenty-five years ago in this chamber, when we denounced the practice of interests concerned employing a high type of lawyers who were buttonholing and lobbying members of parliament to support their views.

I read in the paper the other day that the Ontario government had engaged the services of two Ottawa lawyers for the purpose of lobbying their interests here. The presence of one of them in the debate in this house during the progress of the bill has always been apparent. There is no questioning the fact that lobbying has been discussed in every democratic parliament of the world, and the danger of it is apparent to every man who believes that democracy could be set aside lightly by efforts such as that. If hon. members refer to Hansard they will find what was said with respect to lobbying on the occasion I have mentioned. No one suggested that any member was lobbying any other member. It was for the first time indicated to the house that the hon. member for Parry Sound was to have charge of the private bill, and he suggests that some fellow member was endeavouring to lobby me with a glass of ovaltine or a chocolate bar, and the hon. member for Kootenay East with a street-car ticket. To that level has debate descended this afternoon.

Whatever else may be said with respect to the note received yesterday, and laid before the house, at least it vindicates the position taken by some of us with respect to this legislation. At page 13 of the white paper laid on the table to-day, the Secretary of State for the United States uses these words:

It is well known that successive governments in Canada have been traditionally reluctant to permit the long term exportation of power to the United States. The principal reasons underlying this policy were concisely stated in a letter, recently made public, from the premier of Ontario to the Minister of Trade and Commerce at Ottawa. The objections, as therein stated, were as follows:

1. That the exportation of power results in the establishment in the United States of dependent communities or industries.

2. That irrespective of the terms of the agreement under which export delivery is made, the commitments become irrevocable; that is, the deliveries cannot be suspended or terminated at any later date without giving rise to international complications and being regarded as an unfriendly act.

3. That the export of power enables industries, which otherwise would establish themselves or branches thereof in Canada, to handle their Canadian business from factories located in the United States.

It must be clear to all who have given thought to the problem that those reasons which have in the past made the exportation of power undesirable from the point of view of Canada have made the importation of power undesirable from the point of view of the United States. In the case of the latter, a broad policy of national defence is also involved. On this aspect of the question, it is perhaps sufficient merely to say that many of the industries most necessary to the life of a nation in times of national emergency require very large and uninterrupted supplies of power. The fact that the government of the United States anticipates no such emergency does not relieve it of the responsibility of taking the possibility into account.

And then follows this:

While sympathizing with the desires of Ontario and Quebec, the government of the United States considers that its primary obligation is to view the problem in terms of protection for the general power market in the United States and for those American industries which might become dependent upon imported supplies of power. In this connection, it may be pointed out that if the Northeastern power market in the United States were to become dependent for any considerable portion of its power supply upon withdrawable imports, it would be faced with the constant danger of having to revert hastily to additional steam plant construction for base load power.

In the circumstances, the government of the United States believes that it would be failing to discharge its proper obligations if it were to give its consent to the importation of hydro-electric power, even on a temporary basis, without simultaneously providing for the development of an alternative and equally economical domestic supply to be available when the imported power was withdrawn.

There is a concise statement of the considered policy of the United States of America, not only with respect to electric power, but also with respect to every matter that affects its national well-being, namely the protection of United States interests and industries.

When I heard the hon. member for Parry Sound speak of the tremendous friendliness of the United States for Canada, I could not but remember that only a few months ago, in 1935, this dominion signed a trade agreement with the United States, and that within a few months thereafter a revenue tax of three cents a pound was placed upon animal fats, thereby destroying the lard industry in this country, so far as price was concerned. Why? Because they were carrying out the policies that Mr. Secretary Hull has now enunciated in this note to the Dominion of Canada. During the past few weeks there passed the House of Representatives a bill that places against Canadian pork products a duty of six cents a pound. This is a prohibitive duty, and if it goes into effect it will prevent the sending of a single pound of pork products into the United States. That bill is now pending before the United States senate. Mr. Secretary Hull believes it to be the first duty of every government to care for its own people and its own country. He has indicated in no fulsome flattery and in no platitudinous discussion that that is so. He is a realist and his government is realistic. It considers the first duty of government is to care for the material, spiritual, and, shall I say the social well-being of its people.

I should like to remind the committee that the first comprehensive proposals made to the United States of America for a trading agreement came, not from a Liberal government but from a Conservative government. I say this now so that there may be no misunderstanding about it. The Conservative party never was the author of the statement, "No more trade or truck with the Yankees." Who was it said that? I ask the hon. member for Parry Sound who was the author of that?

Mr. SLAGHT: The bill-boards of this country were plastered with it.

Mr. BENNETT: Whose bill-boards?

An hon. MEMBER: Your bill-boards.

Mr. BENNETT: The question is answered; the bill-boards were the authors.

Mr. SLAGHT: Somebody paid for the bill-boards.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say that information founded on bill-boards would be a little difficult to follow, having regard to the ones we saw in 1935 and the relations between the federal administration and the provinces. But this we do know; it is a matter of distinct record that Sir Wilfrid Laurier said, "No more journeyings to Washington." It was after the great gathering presided over by Lord Herschell had ceased its duties at Washington without results that Sir Wilfrid Laurier said, "No more journeyings to Washington." The hon. member for Algoma West has asked a question. Let me tell him that no proposal was made by the Conservative government for trading with the United States until we had concluded trade agreements within the empire. Why? Because we knew that in Great Britain there existed a stable market for our agricultural products. We knew that there we would not have the fluctuations in policy brought about by the changing tariff views of the one party as compared with the other. We know now that to-day we have republican tariff in the United States of America. We know that it is the highest tariff in the history of the United States. We know that the president can negotiate trade agreements only if goods now dutiable are not made free and the tariff is not reduced by more than fifty per cent. To-day the average ad valorem tariff of the United States is nearer fifty per cent than forty per cent. If you include the specific duties, the average is sixty per cent. Half of sixty per cent is thirty per cent, so that the only tariff we can secure from our great neighbours is one of thirty per cent, and that is called a low tariff.

An hon. MEMBER: Clause 4.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, clause 4. I thought you would call clause 4 as it would deny me the right to answer the allegations made this afternoon by the last speaker and by the hon. member for Parry Sound.

I want to go a step further. The long tirade, partly abuse and partly argument, made this afternoon by the hon. member for Parry Sound, was to the effect that a man who would even think that the export of power should be opposed must have an unsettled mind. His contention was practically that no sane man would think of opposing it. His argument was so complete that even the hon. member for Selkirk must fall in and support those views. All you had to do was merely listen and the matter was complete. I wonder if the hon. gentleman knows anything of the policy of the Liberal party in that regard. Does he know what their policy was as declared in this house in 1928? Does he know that when a measure was introduced by the hon. member for Leeds providing that parliament should have control over this matter, the government accepted the measure and it was passed unanimously? As was pointed out very properly by the Prime Minister, the premier of Ontario sat there.

Mr. DUNNING: Over here.

Mr. BENNETT: He sat on both sides of the house, with the government at one time, and with the opposition at the other. He was not a member of the opposition in 1928; he sat on the government side. So far as the record shows, he gave his approval to the measure introduced by the hon. member for Leeds. Listen to the language of the hon. member who was put up to speak for the government of Canada, the Hon. Charles Stewart, then Minister of the Interior. These are his words:

Mr. Speaker, the government is taking no exception to this bill. It does not make any drastic change, but I think the sponsor has in mind that in cases where new developments spring up, and there is a possibility of a certain portion of the power being exported, the company or individual promoting the measure shall come to parliament and obtain a private bill for that purpose. With that suggestion, the government has no quarrel; indeed I think I may say on behalf of the government that we will go even a step further. It is in our opinion desirable that the exportation of electricity be absolutely prohibited; it is too valuable an asset for us to permit it to leave our country. Although we may be at some disadvantage from a climatic point of view we have this very valuable asset which to some extent offsets that condition, and it is important that we should retain it within the boundaries of our own country.

Those were not the words of the Conservative party; they are the words of the spokesman of the right hon. gentleman who now leads the government. That hon. gentleman spoke for the government when he said they would go even a step further than the hon. member for Leeds. He said:

It is in our opinion desirable that the exportation of electricity be absolutely prohibited,

That is to be found on page 453 of Hansard of February 14, 1928. I wonder if the hon. member for Parry Sound knows what was the declared policy of his party. If he did, then he has been indicating by his speech this afternoon that all those who hold the opposite view are ill-informed, ill-advised and have an improper appreciation of the situation. As Mr. Secretary Hull points out, all governments have been opposed to long term contracts for power. It may well be that over the dam goes water which might be converted into electricity that might be sold, but the reasons which actuated the government in 1928 to make the statement that was made on its behalf are just as cogent and powerful to-day as they ever have been in the history of this confederation.

As to the other point which was made, namely, that we renewed the licences which had been granted, of course we renewed them. It is true that the leader of the government found some of those licences in operation when he came into office. The record of them will be found on pages 97, 98 and 99 of the white book. It is true that those licences have been renewed. It is true that during the five years we were in office we renewed them, always on the representations made by the province of Ontario that they should not be destroyed.

Let us look for a moment at what I conceive still to be necessary to insert into clause 4, that is the provisions of the licence itself. Let us see under what conditions power is now exported. I believe the Minister of Justice will agree with me that it is highly desirable that there should be at least some uniformity. I quite appreciate the point made by the Prime Minister that this bill does not refer to the hydro-electric alone; it is to deal with all companies that at any time in the future may make applications.

The licence will be found at page 95 of the white book. Let us look at the application for it. I submit that the language of the licence should be the language of the general conditions of the enabling act so that the experience we have derived from the past we should be able to utilize in the future. This is the language set out at page 95, No. 52:

Licence Number is hereby granted to the doing business at in the county of and province of to export or to sell for export from Canada during the fiscal year ending 31st March, 19 , electrical energy at a rate not to exceed at any time during continuance of the licence, kilowatts, provided:

(a) That momentary indications in excess of the authorized quantity, due to short circuits, grounds, etc., will not be considered as violations of this licence, and

(b) That the maximum demand or peak of load curves, will not be considered as a violation of the licence when such peak does not exceed twenty-five per centum of the quantity herein stated, and does not continue above the licensed rate for a longer period than one hour at any time, and for not more than two hours altogether in any twenty-four hours.

This licence being only for one year, licensees must not enter into any contract which they will not be able to carry out if this licence is not renewed, or if the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act or the regulations made thereunder are changed.

This licence is subject to the statutes of Canada, now in force, or hereafter to be enacted and also to the provisions of the regulations regarding electrical power, &c., approved by the governor general in council on the 4th day of November, 1907, and to any regulations which may hereafter be made, which statutes and regulations are made conditions hereof.

Every contract made under this licence shall contain a clause or clauses expressly setting forth that it is made by virtue of this licence, which is subject to the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act and any amendments that may be made to it, and also is subject to the regulations made or which may be made by the governor general in council regarding the same; and every contract made under this licence shall have attached thereto a copy of this licence and of the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, and of the regulations approved by the governor general in council on the 4th day of November, 1907.

This licence, if renewed, shall be subject to the terms and conditions of such regulations as may be made from time to time, either by statute or the governor general in council.

That is signed by the deputy minister and countersigned by the director, and dated.

I suggest to the Minister of Justice and to the Prime Minister as well that this legislation would conform to what I conceive to be the general principles that underlie such legislation if the general terms of the existing licence were incorporated in the language of the general conditions to be observed; for, having swept out the licence by statute and having substituted for it a private act, it is highly desirable, I think, that we should see that any private act which may hereafter be enacted shall be subject to the provisions, among others, which I have just read.

I congratulate the government upon two of the conditions which they impose. I think the condition which deals with price is an admirable one. I think the condition which deals with surplus is also most admirable. I would only suggest that when the Minister of Justice is considering the terms of the amendment which he has read, it might be well to make it clear that the conditions imposed by the licence shall be the conditions which will apply to any private act.

The Prime Minister very properly used the argument, why not depend upon the private act? But the reason we should not depend upon the private act is that the terms of the licence which will be obtained by those companies whose licences are to be renewed from time to time contain these provisions, and they are part of the general conditions that govern the whole situation. Therefore the general bill, namely the enabling act, should contain like conditions. I suggest that because I regard one or two of them as being tremendously important. There is, for instance, the one that deals with the question of making no contract for the sale of power except the copy of the private act be attached to the contract. That brings home to anyone who acquires power the situation, so that a vested right may not be obtained.

I mention this, Mr. Chairman, without going further into the matter, because I should like to make it abundantly clear that, in opposing the general position in respect to power export there was nothing in it that had to do in any way, shape or form with immediate conditions; there was no effort to arouse animosity against the government of Ontario. To suggest that thirty-eight or thirty-nine persons were so powerful as to be able to effect this purpose does violence to my understanding of the weight of the thirty-eight persons. To suggest that it can be done involves, in my judgment, the negation of the very theory upon which government by majority rests. But we have followed the traditional policy of this party; we have followed the traditional policy of the Liberal party as declared in this house, the unanimous view, as the Prime Minister was at pains to point out the other day, as expressed on more than one occasion; and it was for that reason that we are opposed to the export of power. I submit that beyond all peradventure, if the amendments which have been suggested, amplified by the one that was just read, being, as I submit with deference, broadened so as to cover the conditions to which I refer, were passed, we would then in the enabling act have indicated to all the general conditions which will govern hereafter the granting of a private act; and, more, we would have maintained that position which the Prime Minister took in 1928, the position which was taken by the late administration, and the position which has been taken by the government of to-day; for there has been no departure that I know of or that any other hon. member has heard of that changes the general attitude of mind of successive governments towards the question of long term export of power. This was the Liberal principle declared time after time in Ontario and elsewhere in Canada.

But it is not necessary to go that far. All one needs to do is to take the statement made on behalf of the government of the day in February, 1928. By that we have stood. If in doing so we have created a cabal; if by doing so we have trodden upon the toes of a new Liberal policy of which we were not advised; if there is a new one in the offing of which we have no knowledge, yet indeed we can say with the greatest consistency that we have maintained the unanimous expression of the people of this country through their representatives in parliament assembled, that we were all opposed to the export of power except in emergency conditions which are provided for in this bill, and that long term sales of power were objectionable to the Canadian people for the reasons given by Mr. Hull as regards its importation to his country.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 41, for the relief of Alice Cecile Pinder Hartt.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 42, for the relief of Ruby May Foster Ryder.—Mr. Emmerson.

Bill No. 43, for the relief of Ethel Sadie Davidson Case.—Mr. White.

Bill No. 44, for the relief of Ray Simon Stern.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 45, for the relief of Norma Adelaide MacKenzie Hird.—Mr. Walsh.

Bill No. 46, for the relief of Mabel Marjorie Thompson Maynes.—Mr. Emmerson.

Bill No. 47, for the relief of Walter Edward Gorham.—Mr. White.

Bill No. 48, for the relief of Margaret Anne Eddie Bender.—Mr. Walsh.

Bill No. 49, for the relief of Kathryn Chronis Briggs.—Mr. Walsh.

Bill No. 50, for the relief of Vera May Levis Holloway.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 51, for the relief of Robert Andrew Young.—Mr. Walsh.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION

APPLICATION OF PROVISIONS OF CHINESE IMMIGRATION ACT, REVISED STATUTES, 1927, CHAPTER 95

The house resumed from Friday, March 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Neill for the second reading of Bill No. 11, respecting Japanese immigration.

Mr. J. G. TURGEON (Cariboo): It is with a sense of deep responsibility that I rise to-night to take part in this debate. I am quite aware that British parliamentary custom has decided that the whips of the two parties should take very little part in debate. While I am simply deputy whip and act only on occasion, nevertheless I do from time to time take the place of the chief government whip, and therefore I recognize that responsibility in rising to discuss this bill to-night. Were it not for the circumstances surrounding the particular measure now before the house I would not be on my feet. It is my intention to make as sure as I can that no word of mine shall hurt the feelings of any member of this house, and I trust also that nothing will be said which will be even provocative.

There are several matters deeply related to the question under discussion in connection with the two bills that have been introduced purporting to amend the Immigration Act and the Chinese Immigration Act, but I do not intend to deal with these related questions. Rather I shall confine myself to questions embedded in the measures themselves.

The question brought before us by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) is one of deep significance to the province of British Columbia. It is one which, if left unaltered in its present status, will soon be of vital concern to the dominion as a whole. I know the people of western Canada fairly well, and there is one thing that the people of British Columbia require of their public men more perhaps than any other attribute. It is that when any deep and embarrassing question arises, the people of that province shall know where their representatives stand, and out of deference to and in appreciation of that feeling on the part of the people of British Columbia, I state at this point that if these two bills before the house are forced to the conclusion of a vote, I shall vote against the second reading of both. Having so declared myself, I shall later on take the extreme liberty, with whatever force is at my command, of recommending to the proposer of these bills, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, that in the interests of British Columbia, in the interests of the very object which he has in mind and for which he has been working in and out of parliament for fifteen years or more, he withdraw them so that in the circumstances in which parliament finds itself at the present time it will not be necessary to vote the bills down.

Mr. NEILL: I rise to a point of order. Is the hon. member in order in discussing a bill which is not before the house? He should confine himself to Bill No. 11, and not discuss a bill which is not at the moment up for second reading.

Mr. TURGEON: I do not wish to get into any altercation with the hon. gentleman over a question of order, but the only difference between the two bills is that one purports to amend the Chinese Immigration Act and the other purports to amend the Immigration Act.

It is not possible properly to discuss, from the standpoint of British Columbians, the question of the exclusion of Japanese, through any instrument whatever, without discussing everything that arises from immigration and, therefore, from the policies adopted by this parliament to conduct and to regulate immigration.

As I was saying, I intend to suggest to the hon. member that in the very interests of the object he has in mind these bills should not be pressed to a vote during this session. Later on, I shall give my reasons for that suggestion. It is my intention also to show to the best of my ability why I think it is absolutely necessary for me, coming from British Columbia and having a sense of the responsibility that rests upon a member of this house, to vote against the bill on this occasion. Further I intend as well as I can, and even at the expense of repeating some of the arguments that have been made, to put forward some of the reasons why I believe that sooner or later action must be taken to bring about that which these bills purport to accomplish. That action must of necessity be taken.

Two results have followed from the discussion that has taken place upon the hon. member's motion. One is that this government has already set up machinery which we sincerely hope will bring to light in what degree, if any, illegal entries have been made from Asiatic countries, with particular reference perhaps to the race mentioned in Bill No. 11. There has been set up—or rather enlarged, for I understand it was set up previously—another investigating committee which will act more or less in conjunction with the board of review that is dealing entirely with illegal entrance and the steps necessary to be taken immediately to stop it, but the interdepartmental committee acting in conjunction with that board will inquire, I take it, into the whole question of Asiatic immigration.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the hon. member a question? Has there been any change since the announcement made by the Prime Minister on March 7? He was asked by the leader of the opposition about these boards of inquiry, and his answer was, as reported at page 1066 of Hansard:

> Mr. Mackenzie King: The board has been appointed to deal with the subject of illegal entries—
> Mr. Bennett: Only?
> Mr. Mackenzie King: Only, yes.

Then he goes on to say:

> However, I would assume that in any inquiry directed to illegal entries much information that was incidental thereto would be ascertained.

[Mr. Turgeon.]

Is the hon. member suggesting that there is to be another board, or that this board is to go further than the statement of the Prime Minister indicated?

Mr. TURGEON: I do not want to be unkind to the hon. member, for whom I have great personal regard; but if he paid more attention to the answers given by ministers of the crown he would not have had to ask me that question, because he will find on Hansard an answer to his own question, where the Prime Minister said that this interdepartmental committee was set up and is separate entirely from the board of review, whose function is confined to the question of illegal entry. This interdepartmental committee I take it has upon it representatives not only of the Department of Immigration but of the Department of Labour and the Department of National Defence. Perhaps one should not say that too loudly, but these two departments are represented on that committee, which is inquiring into every question relating to oriental immigration into Canada, which, of course, means largely into British Columbia.

A second benefit has resulted from the introduction of this bill by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. Oftentimes the position of British Columbia in the general scheme of things Canadian is misunderstood. For long years the position of that far western province with respect to all questions relating to immigration has been misunderstood. But I take it from this debate, and especially from the words used by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and other ministers, as well as by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), that now our position is better understood than it has been at any previous time in the history of this question.

What is the situation? I have before me two orders in council passed under authority of the Immigration Act. One is P.C. 2115 dated September 16, 1930, which puts a prohibition upon the entry into Canada, except of course with certain exceptions, of immigrants from Asiatic countries, though it clearly sets out that it is not concerned and does not deal with any Asiatic nation with which Canada has a treaty or convention. Then there is another order in council, which was referred to the other night, P.C. 695, dated March 21, 1931, and amended April 23, 1937. This order in council deals with steps taken to prohibit immigration of any kind into Canada, again with certain exceptions. The exceptions are: Those who come from Great Britain with sufficient funds to maintain themselves until they have opportunity to secure employment; those who come from the United States with sufficient funds, and agriculturists with sufficient funds to go into the business of farming. In this order in council there is also a proviso as regards immigrants as defined in paragraph 2, that is, those entering from the United States, and immigrants as defined in paragraph 4, that is, agriculturists who have sufficient means to farm in Canada: "Provided that these are destined for settlement in a province which has not signified its disapproval of such immigration." There is a clear recognition of the principle that, largely because of conditions in Canada to-day, persons to be admitted to this country must be destined for a province which has not signified objection to their entry.

I do not need to point out that immigrants from Asiatic countries who come to Canada come only to British Columbia. The general principle underlying these prohibitions is this, that because of the situation in which labour finds itself, because of the competition with which those who are farming may be faced, because of general competition in labour or in other means of gaining a livelihood in Canada, it is not right to permit immigrants to enter the country. Yet we find that immigration from Asiatic countries is concentrated in British Columbia and is of such a kind that it utterly displaces all other labour with which it comes in contact. That is a situation which cannot be denied and to which I call attention on behalf of British Columbia.

Ordinarily immigration is stopped because of its effect on labour and those engaged in production. In British Columbia we find two results from the immigration policies of Canada. One is that in those parts of the province in which Asiatic settlement is concentrated labour is ousted, farm values lowered very materially, and rural credit lessened and in some places destroyed. What else do we find as a result of the general immigration policies of Canada? My eyes are turned now to that great area of country running from Vancouver north clear through the centre of British Columbia for practically a thousand miles, a country containing the richest mineral section imaginable, from which untold millions of dollars have been taken, but which as yet in many places has been hardly touched and is still open for exploration. In that country we find seven or eight settlements, many of them isolated, several of them finding it impossible to maintain contact with each other because of lack of transportation. In that country there is everything to support a larger population—diversified farming, cattle, hogs, wheat and everything one can think of. It extends both east and west of the mountains. It is traversed by the great valley of the Fraser river and all its tributaries, and from east to west it is crossed by the Peace river waterway, with all its tributaries. Yet we find that because of lack of population that country is not in a position to support itself. It has over seven hundred miles of Canadian National railway lines, owned by the government of Canada. In another direction it is crossed by 450 miles of the Pacific Great Eastern railway, which is owned by the province of British Columbia. Every mile of railway line within that area is owned by the taxpayers; yet because it is without immigrants who should be going in there, the railways are unable to operate except at a terrific loss, though they are running through one of the richest parts of Canada.

The situation is this: British Columbia, surfeited on the one hand with Asiatic immigration, is crying and demanding that steps be taken at the earliest possible moment to see what can be done with the government of Great Britain in order to bring to this portion of the province immigrants properly directed, properly financed, properly organized and carefully selected. The province wants them. Only yesterday at Victoria the city of Prince George presented to the Rowell commission a submission in connection with immigration from the British Isles, and that plea for British immigration is not divorced from the question of oriental immigration. During the last few months a new and, if you wish, strange doctrine in international relations has been proclaimed by some great states. The doctrine is that parent states are responsible for the welfare and entitled to direct the destiny of strong minorities of their people who live in foreign states. It is true that up to the present time this refers only to states contiguous to what are called the parent states; but in the western part of Canada we have an Asiatic people migrating to British Columbia, with nothing between Canada and the country from which these people come except the Pacific ocean. With the transportation facilities of to-day the Pacific ocean is hardly a greater barrier than an ordinary boundary line between nations.

I do not point out these things simply that the government should take cognizance of them because, as I said in the beginning, I realize that already cognizance has been taken of the situation in British Columbia. Having said so much, however, may I just take a few minutes more to state why I cannot vote for this bill. I realize the importance of the measure brought into the house by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, and I should like to read some remarks made during the course of this debate by the leader of the opposition, for whom it goes without saying I have the highest respect. Mind you, these words were spoken by the right hon. gentleman, who was quite aware of the responsibility that attached to him through his past experience as Prime Minister and Minister of External Affairs, and who knows the delicate touch with which questions of this kind must be handled even in times of peace. The right hon. gentleman said:

> On the other hand, not for a moment would I pass the bill in its present form. Without placing a time limit as to when it should come into force, or providing that it should become effective by proclamation, I think we would be courting a very serious situation indeed, and one which we could not contemplate at this particular moment, having regard to our earnest desire to keep our own country out of the conflict in Asia.

These are not idle words; they are the words of the leader of the opposition who, as I said, was speaking from the depths of experience. Later on he said:

> Therefore, while I should like to commend the hon. member who introduced the measure to the house, and hope that the government are prepared to accept the principle of it, I am one of those who, accepting that measure and believing strongly in it, would not for a moment urge its passing in its present form, as I believe it would be a very dangerous thing for us to do at this time.

I know there are men around me who feel that it is perhaps an exaggeration to point out the difficulties and embarrassments which might arise by reason of any action taken in connection with the exclusion of an Asiatic race from our country, but here are the words of the right hon. gentleman, who says not only that such action is dangerous but that it should not be taken if we are really earnest in our desire to keep this country out of the conflict which is now raging in the orient.

In the last twelve or fifteen years we have gone very far in our relations with the British Empire. We have taken such steps and have declared ourselves from time to time in such manner that the Statute of Westminster of a few years ago was, after all, only a manifestation of that great development which has taken place in Canada. But this I ask the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and those newspapers in British Columbia which have been commenting rather bitterly upon the hesitancy shown by parliament in passing this measure: While it is right that we should become masters in our own home; while it is right that in matters relating to defence we should cut ourselves off from external influence; while undoubtedly it is right that we should decide that our destiny along the pathway of the world should be cleaved only by ourselves, have we reached the time when we can forget what has been the relationship in the past between this country and the British Empire? Have we reached the time when we can pay no attention to the call of kinship? The Prime Minister pointed out, in words that must be heeded by anyone who heard or read them, that in Japan there is a deliberate effort designed to break down the friendly relations which in the past have existed between Japan and the British Empire. If there were in Canada, or in any part of the world, some fiendish mind which wished to make certain that if anything were to happen by way of a world conflagration Canada should be in it, is there anything that such a fiendish mind could conceive which would be more likely to attain its objective than so to arrange matters that the one final spark which brought about a world crisis should be an overt act on the part of Canada, committed by this parliament?

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni, having been satisfied, as he must be, with the discussion which has taken place, and filled, as I know he is, with the desire to relieve British Columbia of its Asiatic problem; realizing that if the suggestions of the leader of the opposition were taken—and the hon. member agreed to accept them the other night—that nothing could be done in any event within a year and a half or two years; that in that time Canada will have gone ahead with a reconsideration of its whole immigration problem, and that she may be making extra relations with the British Isles concerning immigration under which, without offence being given, there might be an exclusion of Asiatics; and once more stating that I must vote against this measure if it comes to a vote, thereby showing the hon. member that I am not trying to save myself from embarrassment, with all the sincerity of which I am capable and with all the powers at my command, I ask him in the interests of British Columbia, in the interests of Canada and of all which he has at heart—a better, safer and wiser settlement of the Asiatic problem of British Columbia—seriously to consider the withdrawal of his bills.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated a few weeks ago, when the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) first brought his bill before the house, that it was one of the most important measures parliament would have to consider—particularly at this juncture in world affairs—he stated a fact which I believe appeals to the reason and judgment of every hon. member.

There is no doubt that the question on the Pacific coast is one of deep and vital concern. We have evidence of that in the restrained but definite speeches made by members from that province, and we see it also in the concern exhibited in Vancouver and on the Pacific coast generally in relation to this whole problem. I think, however, if we are to reach a sound decision on the merits of the bill we are now considering, it is necessary to take stock of all that would be implied in the house passing the measure.

The Japanese immigration question first became one of concern a great many years ago. Hon. members will recall that in 1894 the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland entered into a treaty, known as the United Kingdom-Japanese treaty, with the Kingdom of Japan. Canada gave adherence to that treaty. One of its provisions stated that the subjects of each party to the agreement should have full liberty to enter, travel or reside in any part of the dominions and possessions of the other. It was the freedom given in that provision which in the first instance led to the heavy Japanese immigration to the Pacific coast. To such an extent had that immigration increased that in the three years from 1905 to 1907 upwards of 12,000 Japanese came to Canada. Even then the matter was one of considerable concern to the Canadian people. The treaty I mentioned a moment ago, to which Canada had given adherence, was still in effect. It was that situation which led to the mission of the late Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux to Japan in 1907 to discuss with the Japanese government the question of limiting Japanese immigration to this country.

I should like to repeat that which was pointed out by the Prime Minister, namely that the Japanese government acted in a wholly reasonable manner at that time. An arrangement was reached by which Japanese immigration to Canada was limited to about 500 persons a year, and that arrangement, as was stated by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, remained in effect until after the termination of the treaty, which took place, as I now recall, in 1921.

The so-called gentleman's agreement negotiated by Hon. Mr. Lemieux continued in effect. It is quite true the matter was discussed in parliament in 1922 or 1923. In 1928 further representations were made to the Japanese government and further reductions in the migration to Canada were effected, bringing the number to 150 a year. I think it is only fair to say that the Japanese government have lived up to the gentleman's agreement of 1907 and the later understanding of 1928.

Mr. NEILL: No.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not think that can be effectively combated.

Mr. NEILL: Certainly it can.

Mr. CRERAR: In no year since 1928 has the immigration from Japan, under the terms of that arrangement, reached 150. The Prime Minister stated on a former occasion that in the last five years under that arrangement the average has been eighty-one persons admitted to Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the registered number. The illicit number was larger than that.

Mr. CRERAR: Under the agreement it was true that additional numbers of Japanese came to Canada, but they were entitled to come as Canadian citizens. I do not think even the hon. member for Comox-Alberni would deny a Canadian citizen, even if he were of Japanese nationality, the right of entrance to Canada.

Mr. NEILL: I would when they were especially exempted under the agreement.

Mr. CRERAR: The total number of Japanese who came to Canada from September 1, 1928, when the later understanding became effective, to December 31, 1937, all categories, was 1,330. Of those who were entitled to come under the agreement the number was 995. Of those outside the agreement there were 335. As I have said, those in the latter category were persons who, under our law, were Canadian citizens and had the right to come to this country. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni shakes his head, but I am stating the facts.

Mr. NEILL: No.

Mr. CRERAR: I have before me a tabulation taken from departmental figures, giving the numbers by males, females, and children under the agreement and outside the agreement who came to Canada during the period I have just mentioned. I think this information will prove useful to hon. members, and with the consent of the house I shall place it on Hansard. It is as follows:

A feeling exists on the Pacific coast that a considerable number of Japanese have entered Canada illegally. The illegal entry of immigrants is not a new thing. We are dealing with it every day in the immigration branch, particularly at the present time with the disturbed condition in Europe. No doubt some Japanese have entered Canada illegally, but I am quite sure that the number is not so great as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni thinks it to be. It must be remembered that if anyone has entered illegally, he is subject to deportation.

When speaking to his bill the hon. member said that he did not intend it to deal with any except those who would come in under the gentleman's agreement. While no doubt a problem is created in British Columbia because of the Japanese population, I understood my hon. friend to say that he did not intend his legislation to touch those Japanese already in the country; that it would apply simply to the Japanese the present exclusion which is applied to Chinese. The problem of illegal entry was recognized by the government before the hon. member brought in his bill. An interdepartmental committee was set up, as alluded to by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) which studied this question. Certain conclusions were arrived at among which was the one that we should deal only with those Japanese who might be in Canada illegally. When I was on the Pacific coast last summer, I was told that there were hundreds of Japanese who had entered the country illegally, and my hon. friend seems to harbour the same thought. As a result of the work of this interdepartmental committee, a board of review was established this week in Vancouver. This board is made up of Doctor Keenleyside of the Department of External Affairs, Mr. Taylor, Superintendent of Immigration on the Pacific coast, and Inspector Fish of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Every one on the Pacific coast who has a suspicion, or any knowledge, that a Japanese is in the country illegally, has been invited to present his information to the board, either personally or in writing. Any statement made to the board will be fully examined, and any Japanese found to be in Canada illegally will be deported. At the same time, it is only right to say that the Japanese who are legally in Canada will not be disturbed by the work of this board of review.

Mr. NEILL: The minister said that the interdepartmental committee had been established before I brought down my bill; but in replying to some hon. member on this side, I believe it was the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said that it was his intention to have an interdepartmental committee and a board of review set up. As that statement was made after the bill was brought down, how can the minister reconcile it with the one he makes now?

Mr. CRERAR: This was a matter of discussion between the Department of External Affairs and the immigration branch and one or two other departments. However, that point is not so important. The fact is that the committee was set up and the board of review is now sitting to discharge the duties I mentioned a moment ago.

The bill advocated by my hon. friend provides for straight exclusion. It applies to the Japanese the legislation now applying to the Chinese. In this respect I should like to quote again the statement made the other evening by the Prime Minister. It must be remembered that the Chinese and Japanese have a long civilization behind them. The other evening the hon. member for Comox-Alberni said that the reason the Chinese were dissatisfied with the action taken by Canada was because they felt they were discriminated against as compared with the Japanese. The inference to be drawn from the hon. member's remarks was that if the Japanese were put in the same position as the Chinese, this objection on the part of the Chinese would largely disappear. But that is not the case. The Prime Minister cited some evidence the other evening. A few years ago I had an opportunity of having a long discussion with an eminent Chinese gentleman, a man who, in his knowledge of languages, of history and of philosophy, stands in the front ranks in China. He was a man of great ability, and we discussed this particular question. He did not raise objection to the fact that we did not wish to have Chinese in Canada, but he did object to the manner in which we had gone about effecting this.

My hon. friend proposes to apply the same method to the Japanese. You cannot affront a proud people in this way. The hon. member smiles, but let me read to him what the Prime Minister stated the other night. In 1924 the United States did just about what the hon. member now proposes to do, and this action was a matter of representation by the Japanese government to the United States government. Let me quote from a communication addressed by the Japanese ambassador in Washington to Mr. Hughes, who was then Secretary of State. I quote:

> To Japan the question is not one of expediency but of principle. To her the mere fact that a few hundreds or thousands of her nationals will or will not be admitted to the dominions of other countries is immaterial, so long as no question of national susceptibilities is involved. The important question is whether Japan as a nation is or is not entitled to the proper respect and consideration of other nations. In other words, the Japanese government asks of the United States government simply that proper consideration ordinarily given by one nation to the self-respect of another, which after all forms the basis of amicable international intercourse throughout the civilized world.

Mr. NEILL: And what happened?

Mr. CRERAR: It does not matter what happened.

Mr. NEILL: Nothing.

Mr. CRERAR: With the present state of the world, with suspicion running so high, with the tension among nations which now exists, the hon. member comes and asks this parliament to administer that sort of rebuke to the Japanese government. What for? In order that we may be able to deal with an average of eighty Japanese annually in the last five years. I submit that is not a reasonable request to make of this house.

I know the hon. member feels strongly upon this subject; but may I say this, and in doing so I am merely repeating what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) said the other night: The government of Canada to-day is probably, if I may say so, a better judge of whether this is a proper time to take action of this kind or not than is any private person. The judgment of the government is that this is not the proper time; that such action would but add another flame to what is going on in the world at the present time. In view of that fact alone, I believe the hon. member would do a service to this country if he withdrew his bill.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I shall take only a moment in order not to delay action by the house, as I wish to see a vote on this question to-night. There is a great deal of sympathy in Ontario for the people of British Columbia regarding oriental immigration. This is not only a domestic problem; it is also imperial and it is international. On this question the people of Canada, I believe, think the same as those of New Zealand and Australia, that the time has come when this country should be a white man's country and further oriental immigration should be prohibited. We talk about gentlemen's agreements. Why in the world, when nobody pays any attention to treaties or pacts, should we expect that they are going to pay any attention to a gentleman's agreement? The people of the two industrial provinces are three thousand miles away from British Columbia; but I was out there in 1927 and I saw the way in which the oriental people are permeating every branch of business—lumbering, mining, and retail stores; these activities have been almost taken away from white men in that province, with the result that business men and the younger people who are coming from the schools and universities are finding it hard to make a living.

I would not say one word to offend Japan; far from it. I think the greatest mistake ever made was when, at Washington, to please the people of the United States we parted from the Japanese alliance. The British Empire never made a greater mistake. The mother country kept good order in the far east, and she arranged immigration policies so that New Zealand and Australia have remained white men's countries; there are no Japanese there. The same is largely true of the United States. Yet to please the people of the United States we parted from the Anglo-Japanese alliance. I think the government would be taking a step in the right direction if it adopted this measure. We want to see Canada as a whole, like the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, maintained as a white man's country.

I congratulate the members from British Columbia upon their attitude. I believe their views on this question are those of the people of Canada. I am sorry that the old alliance was broken, and I can only hope that the government will not mistake any longer the babble of the pacifists for the voice of the Canadian people in either national or international affairs, and particularly in regard to this great domestic problem. Something must be done. Gentlemen's agreements are mere scraps of paper. Last year 101 Japanese came in and nearly all have stayed in British Columbia. In the case of the Chinese, sixty per cent remained in British Columbia and the rest have moved across Canada. The time has come when we shall not be violating any agreement if we take the action that has been proposed. What Great Britain has done with Japan for Australia and New Zealand can be done for the people of Canada. Japan has obtained room for expansion; she now has Manchuria and part of China; no longer does she need Canada for her surplus population.

I congratulate the mover of the bill. I hope it will be supported by every hon. member, because I believe the unanimous wish of the Canadian people is that in future Canada, like New Zealand and Australia, shall be a white man's country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Taylor) has the floor, but if he is not going to speak—

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I merely wished to ask a question, but it is almost nine o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: I draw to the attention of the hon. member that if he speaks now he closes the debate.

Mr. BENNETT: I think this bill should pass. I believe this country should not—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The right hon. gentleman has spoken already.

Mr. BENNETT: No; I have not spoken on this.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. NEILL: When I get order, Mr. Speaker, I shall address myself to the subject. There is only a minute and a half left, and while it would not take long to answer the arguments advanced this evening, I do not think I can do so in a minute and a half. I would be obliged if you would call it nine o'clock.

[Mr. Church.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. NEILL: All right. I shall deal in the minute and a half that is left with the remarks of the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Turgeon). He said that some of the British Columbia papers had been commenting bitterly on this bill. There he was wrong. What the British Columbia papers were commenting bitterly upon was the failure of the government to pass the bill—a totally different matter.

An hon. MEMBER: Let us vote on the bill now.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member talks about machinery being set up, and the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) gave a flat contradiction to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on that point.

Mr. CRERAR: Nonsense.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member for Cariboo talks about machinery being set up. There have been three men—a policeman, an immigration agent, and a man from Ottawa. Does any hon. member suppose that the policeman and the immigration agent will condemn themselves by saying that they have let men in illegally? Of course not; they will smooth the matter over. Does anyone think I would condemn myself and say, "I am sorry; I am an immigration agent, but I have allowed people to come in illegally." It is a farce from the beginning. Of course I would let them look at the books and go down and show them the wharves, and they would be quite happy. The policeman would convince them that nothing had been done illegally in his department, and the immigration agent would do the same. It would not be human nature to do otherwise. Is that the kind of committee that we are going to trust to decide whether people have been coming in illegally or not? Mr. Speaker, it is nine o'clock.

ELECTRIC POWER

TRANSFER TO PARLIAMENT OF CONTROL OF EXPORT EXCEPT IN INTERNATIONAL EMERGENCY

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 21, to amend the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act—Mr. Mackenzie King—Sir Eugène Fiset in the chair.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I move to add to section 4, subsection (4) paragraph (d) which I believe meets the suggestions which have been advanced, as far as can be done in a legal clause.

(d) Subject to the provisions of paragraph (c) of this subsection, the said private act shall remain in force for a period of one year from the date of the commencement thereof but may be extended from year to year by proclamation of the governor in council for four further periods of one year each but not so that the said act shall in any case remain in force for more than five years from the date of the commencement thereof, nor shall the said private act operate to vest in any person any right to export power after the expiration or repeal of the said private act.

The hon. member for Leeds said that in fixing a period of five years we seemed to intimate that the power extended for five years, but I believe if we read the subsection carefully we shall see that, instead of extending, it limits the power of the governor in council to extend the private bill. The power is from year to year but not beyond five years. It is rather a limitation than an extension. The other part has the effect of declaring to the world that the act shall not operate to vest in any person any right to export power after the expiration or repeal of the private act.

While I am on my feet I should like to submit another amendment which comes at the beginning of the section. It reads:

That section four be amended by inserting at the beginning of the section, before the word "section," the following words:
"Subject as hereinafter in this act provided."

Mr. BENNETT: I think the amendment proposed is as reasonable as might be expected under the circumstances, except that it might be well to expand the last two lines, because the vested right might be a right with respect to something other than the mere export of power. For instance, he might claim damages; and as I suggested the other day, he should not acquire a vested right either to export power or for any other purpose; that is to say, he should have no right of action by reason of his allegation of vested right. That is the only suggestion I have to make.

Mr. HEAPS: With regard to paragraph (b) of subsection 4, which deals with the question of the price at which power should be exported, if power under any proposed bill is exported from Ontario, such power being owned by the provincial government, how is the price going to be fixed, and who will be the authority to determine whether the price at which the power is exported is a proper one in the circumstances? I can understand how easy it would be for two experts to be at cross-purposes on the question of a reasonable price and I am wondering who will determine that question.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Under the amendment as drafted it will be the governor in council, and in my opinion the governor in council should be the authority to decide on the matter. Of course, the governor in council will have the advice of any expert or engineers whom they see fit to employ.

Mr. HEAPS: I quite appreciate the fact that in the case of power being exported the government would obtain the advice of experts; but suppose there were a difference between the experts appointed by the provincial authorities and the experts advising the governor in council. Who is going to be the final authority?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We are the deciding authority.

Mr. HEAPS: That is definite?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Might it not be well to say "renewed" instead of "extended"?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, except that it is not exactly like a licence. It is an act of parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: "Extended" is good, but I thought that possibly in view of the language used in connection with the others, "renewed" might be better.

Mr. CAHAN: Is this a proposed amendment to section 3?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No, section 4.

Mr. CAHAN: What becomes then of the amendment which the Prime Minister proposed?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Sir Eugene Fiset): They are all being considered together.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This adds another subsection.

Amendment agreed to.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Sir Eugene Fiset): The Minister of Justice further moves that section 4 be amended by inserting at the beginning of the section, before the word "section," the words "Subject as hereinafter in this act provided." Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 5—Temporary licences.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I wish to offer the same amendment here, that immediately after the number "5" at the beginning of the section, and before the word "section," the following words be added: "Subject as hereinafter in this act provided."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 6—Licence to construct or place wires or pipes.

Mr. CAHAN: In the prior debate I suggested an amendment to this section, and I now beg leave to move that section 6 be struck out and that the following be inserted in lieu thereof:

6. Section 8 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

8. (1) All transmission lines or lines of wire or other conductors for the exportation of power and all pipe lines and other like contrivances for the exportation of fluid, from any place in Canada to any place outside of Canada, are hereby declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada.

(2) Subject to any regulation of the governor in council in that behalf, the governor in council may grant licences for the construction, placing or laying of any transmission line or line of wire or other conductor for the exportation of power, or of any pipe line or other like contrivance for the exportation of fluid.

(3) No person shall, without a licence, construct or place in position any transmission line or line of wire or other conductor or contrivance for the exportation of power or any pipe line or other like contrivance for the exportation of fluid.

I do not know whether the government have any objection to this proposed amendment?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I think we have.

Mr. CAHAN: They have had time for full consideration of it. My personal opinion was that without a declaration that transmission lines or lines of wire or other conductors for the exportation of power, and all pipe lines and other like contrivances for the exportation of fluid from any place in Canada to any place outside of Canada are works for the general advantage of Canada, this parliament would be deprived of jurisdiction over such lines, and any regulation made with respect to such lines, as was provided in subsection 2 of section 6 of the bill, would be invalid. I quite understand that this is declaring works to be constructed in future to be works for the general advantage of Canada, but I think it advisable for parliament to make that declaration. And with all respect I think such a declaration is within the competence of parliament. There are a number of cases to which one might refer, but I do not intend to refer to them to-night. We have made a similar declaration in the Railway Act. Parliament has declared that lines of railway which come in contact with lines which are already lines for the general advantage of Canada thereby become lines for the general advantage of Canada. That is a declaration relating to works to be constructed in the future, and I think that if the one is valid, the proposed declaration is also valid.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The Department of Justice advises against the amendment proposed by my hon. friend. Of course, as he knows, this section 6 merely proposes to change the place where what was already in the old act will be found in the future. There is no change at all except to place the section in another part of the bill. Since 1907 this has been the law of Canada, and it has never been challenged.

That is only to initiate what I have to say. Section 92 of the British North America Act, item 10, which gives jurisdiction to provincial legislatures, reads as follows:

10. Local works and undertakings other than such as are of the following classes:

These are the exceptions:

a. Lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs, and other works and undertakings connecting the province with any other or others of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of the province:

This is the item on which we base our contention that it is within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada. In the case of Hewson v. Ontario Power Company, 36 Supreme Court Reports, page 596, the question was as to the validity of a dominion incorporating act which gave power to the company to connect its wires with the wires of an electricity company in the United States. It was held that the subject matter of the charter was obviously not a local one, and that therefore it was valid by reason of this item 10a of section 92. This has always been the view of the Department of Justice. I find that on November 14, 1933, the deputy minister of justice, with the concurrence of the minister, the Hon. Mr. Guthrie, advised the deputy minister of the interior that the power works and appurtenant transmission lines constructed by the Calgary Power Company constituted, by reason of the manner in which they are interconnected and operated for the distribution of power, works and undertakings connecting the province of Alberta with other provinces and therefore are subject to the exclusive legislative authority of the dominion parliament in virtue of the combined operation of section 91, item 29, and section 92, item 10a of the British North America Act.

Mr. BENNETT: That is, that they extended their lines into Saskatchewan.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes. Of course to accept the amendment offered by my hon. friend would imply a doubt as to the validity not only of what has been in the law with regard to the export of power since 1907, but in many other enactments which are the law of the country at the present time. This we are not willing to do. In addition to that, if the amendment of my hon. friend is needed; if it would remove any doubt as to the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada in the matter, we submit that it should be done in the private bills when they come, and not in this public bill.

My hon. friend has referred to the section in the Railway Act which purports to give jurisdiction by saying that certain railways are for the general advantage of Canada. But that very section has been submitted to the courts, and in the case of Luscar Collieries Limited v. McDonald et al, reported in 1925 Supreme Court Reports, page 460, the majority of the court found that this section is invalid.

Mr. CAHAN: Which section?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That section in the Railway Act to which my. hon. friend has referred. This declaration that works for the general advantage of Canada would come under paragraph c. of item 10 of section 92, which reads:

(c) Such works as, although wholly situate within the province, are before or after their execution declared by the parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces.

The majority of the supreme court found that this paragraph could not be used in a general way to cover general works in the future which are not specified. It applies to works already executed or to be executed, and which are especially defined and described. Here is what Mr. Justice Duff said, at page 476:

The grounds on which it can be argued that section 6 (c) of the Railway Act does not constitute a valid declaration within section 92, 10(c) of the British North America Act, can be very concisely stated. The object of this provision, it is said, was not to enable the dominion to take away jurisdiction from the provinces in respect of a given class of potential works; works, that is to say, which are not in existence, which may never come into existence, and the execution of which is not in contemplation; the purpose of the provision is rather to enable the dominion to assume control over specific existing works, or works the execution of which is in contemplation. The control intended to be vested in the dominion is the control over the execution of the work and over the executed work. If a declaration in respect of all works comprised within a generic description be competent, the necessary consequence would appear to be that, with regard to the class of works designated by the description, provincial jurisdiction would be excluded, although dominion jurisdiction might never be exercised, and although no work answering the description should ever come into existence. In support of this view it may be said that the purport of the declaration authorized appears to be that the work which is the subject of it either is an existing work, beneficial to the country as a whole, or is such a work as ought to be executed, or, at all events, is to be executed, in the interests of the country as a whole. An affirmation in general terms, for example, an affirmation that all railways owned or operated hereafter by dominion company are works which ought to be or will be executed, as beneficial to the country as a whole, would be almost, if not quite, meaningless, and could hardly have been contemplated as the basis of jurisdiction.

This was the finding of the majority of the supreme court. I think the declaration suggested by my hon. friend would be quite in place in a private bill authorizing the export of power, say by the hydro-electric commission of Ontario, at a certain place. But the work has to be either executed or contemplated, and while this amendment is really generic in its scope, I submit that we would do better not to enact it in connection with this bill.

Mr. CAHAN: In reply to the right hon. gentleman, in the first place I submit that the opinion of Mr. Justice Duff in the case cited is rather in support of the contention I now make instead of being against it. In the act as it stands at present there is section 8, that is, in the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, chapter 54 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927. It is there. Although it is there, and has been there since 1907, the government of Canada has not attempted to test its validity. Its enforcement has been generally disregarded. I have in mind one licence which I obtained myself, and the extension into the United States was made under such a licence.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Is my hon. friend sure of his ground in making that assertion? My information is that this has been granted by licence many times.

Mr. CAHAN: I think it has never been enforced. It is true that there has been regulation as to the place at which the line crosses the boundary, and, in some instances, some regulation as to the crossing of the boundary, but that is not the full purport of the new subsection 2 of section 6 of this bill. Let me read this new subsection:

No person shall, without a licence, construct or place in position any line of wire or other conductor or contrivance for the exportation of power or any pipe line or other like contrivance for the exportation of fluid.

That is a line for the exportation of power. That means the line from the generating station or the power station or the transformer station through the province to the boundary and crossing the boundary, and it is that line, mentioned in the new subsection 2 of the bill, over which the government should have supervision and power of regulation. That provision is not within the power of parliament unless that line is previously declared to be a line for the general advantage of Canada.

My next point is in connection with section 8 of the existing act, which is subsection 3 as it now stands in my amendment, which states:

Subject to any regulations of the governor in council in that behalf, the governor in council may grant licences for the construction, placing or laying of any line of wire or other conductor for the exportation of power, or of any pipe line or other like contrivance for the exportation of fluid.

That section is also in the act at present; subsection 3 of my amendment is taken from the present act. The section in the present act states that without a licence no person shall construct or place in position any transmission line, and so on, and that implies that by granting a licence this parliament acquires legislative jurisdiction over the construction or placing in position of any such line. I suggest that parliament has no such legislative jurisdiction, except a declaration be made such as that proposed in the first subsection of this amendment.

The right hon. gentleman, in reading the opinion of Mr. Justice Duff, stated correctly that Mr. Justice Duff held that the construction of the line under section 92 (10) of the British North America Act applied only where the construction of a line was in contemplation. I submit that with regard to these transmission lines for the export of electrical energy, each and every one of them is in contemplation when this general act is passed, and that therefore the very fact that such lines are in contemplation, the very fact that the government assumes that it has the power of regulation with respect to those lines, shows that it is contemplated by this bill that such line or lines is or are about to be constructed. If the right hon. gentleman will assure us that, as long as he is Minister of Justice, in every private bill which is brought before the house a clause will be inserted to the effect that such line or lines as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of that private bill, for the exportation of electrical energy, shall be declared to be for the general advantage of Canada, the same purpose I have in mind undoubtedly will be served. But undoubtedly ministers of government change; others may hereafter sit in their seats. I trust that it will be a long time before there is any change concerning my right hon. friend, unless someone from this side of the house moves over there and holds the portfolio of the right hon. gentleman; but I think it would be advisable, even as a reminder, and it would have no ill effect, to insert a subsection such as the one I now propose in this amendment. If inserted in this bill, for greater caution, it will not serve to invalidate any other act on the statute books of Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It could imply throwing doubts on other statutes.

Mr. CAHAN: Sometimes it would be well, even if it were to throw a doubt upon the validity of prior legislation, that parliament, as in many cases similar, should make such legislation clear beyond all reasonable doubt, even though in some cases the change might be used as an argument by expert counsel. But I cannot conceive that, in dealing with a new matter such as this, in new legislation with regard to the export of power, and in placing such export within the jurisdiction of parliament, any reasonable precautions which we may now take would throw any doubt upon prior legislation.

Furthermore subsection 1 of section 8, as I have proposed it, will apply to all lines established for the exportation of power. It will not raise any doubt with regard to the application of the prior enactment, because the prior enactment will no longer be applicable even to lines already established. When once subsection 1 is enacted by parliament, it will apply to all lines in existence or in contemplation for the exportation of power. So that it is not a sufficient objection, I submit, to say that, simply because we are making section 8 clear now, it might be used by expert counsel as suggesting that prior legislation was invalid or defective. However, I do not intend to press the matter further. I have moved the amendment, and I was hoping the government would feel free to accept it.

Mr. BENNETT: There is in one of our statutes a clause dealing with a matter similar to this in which the language, if I remember correctly, is something like the following: "For greater certainty, but without derogating from the right of parliament to enact this legislation, it is hereby declared," and so on. I am not quite sure, but I believe those are the words.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am informed it is in the grain act.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that where it is? I recalled the words, but I could not place my hand upon them.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes. Of course the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George says that if he were sure his amendment would be inserted in every private bill which passes parliament, his purpose would be achieved.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so; it would be.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes. We are of the opinion that this is the only way in which the enactment would be valid and legal. Surely it would make it doubly sure when parliament has the authority. Any promoter or corporation—hydro-electric, or any other one—which would apply to parliament for a law granting them power, for its own security would insert such a clause in the bill. Even if I were to cease to be Minister of Justice, I would see to it that this clause was inserted.

Mr. CAHAN: Would the minister permit me to reply to that?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: Simply this, that instead of inserting this proposed amendment, the promoters of a private bill might assume that subsection 2 of section 6 of the bill has no force or effect, unless the work is declared to be for the general advantage of Canada. And having no force or effect they would simply disregard it, and certainly would not seek to impose upon themselves further regulation by the governor in council.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Sir Eugène Fiset): Mr. Cahan moves—

Mr. CAHAN: In view of the attitude taken by the Minister of Justice and in view of the fact that he has given assurance that he would regard the insertion of this special clause, subsection 1 which I propose, as a proper clause to be inserted in respect of any special line specially authorized by private bill, and having brought the matter to the notice of parliament, I respectfully ask leave to withdraw my proposed amendment.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. STEWART: May I trouble you, Mr. Chairman, to read the provisions of the section as to the price to be charged for power. I find at page 89 of the white paper, among the regulations respecting the export of electrical energy, on January 29, 1929, based on the authority of the order in council of November 4, 1907, the following:

8. Where a supply of electrical energy, gas or fluid is provided in any part of Canada by the contractor for export and home consumption, then the price charged to any person or company in Canada by the contractor shall not exceed the prices at which electrical energy, gas or fluid is sold by the contractor for export in like quantities under similar circumstances.

I take it that the provisions of the bill are almost identical with that. Mr. Chairman, will you read the subsection so that we may be sure?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Is my hon. friend coming back to section 4?

Mr. STEWART: I do not want to reopen the matter, but I just wanted to be sure. It concerns the price to be charged.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebce East): It is paragraph (b) of subsection 4 of section 4.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Sir Eugène Fiset): This paragraph reads:

The power exported shall not be sold outside of Canada at a price less than the price of power produced and sold under substantially similar conditions for use in Canada.

Mr. STEWART: It is the same, but put the other way around.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a little difference between them. It is the same contractor in the regulation, and it does not necessarily mean the same contract here. That is the only point.

Section agreed to.

Sections 7 and 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Existing licences.

Mr. FINN: Mr. Chairman, if I am in order I should like to make a few general observations with reference to the bill as a whole and to the objections that have been raised by hon. gentlemen opposite. I can well remember last year or 1935 when the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation was talking in reference to Beauharnois. He suggested that that undertaking be made a public utility and operated under government control. The right hon. leader of the opposition stated at the time—I hope I am quoting him correctly—that the parliament of Canada had no jurisdiction over the rivers and streams in the various provinces except those that were navigable waters, but it did have power to grant or to refuse licences for the export of power. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has said that the frailties and faults of previous legislation should be avoided, but the question is whether the frailties and faults were in the amendment which he has withdrawn and not in this legislation.

I went to Toronto and had a conference with Premier Hepburn, but I did not go until I had spoken to the Prime Minister. I felt it was my duty to do that as a follower and supporter of his. He told me that he had absolutely no objection to my doing this. I pointed out to him that in Nova Scotia we had had considerable difficulty in connection with the hydro-electric development and with the Nova Scotia Tramways and Power Company in contradistinction to the Halifax Tramways Company. The latter corporation has a net capitalization of $2,000,000 as compared with the capitalization of $13,500,000 of the Nova Scotia Tramways and Power Company. Sufficient power has been developed at St. Margaret bay to run the trams, to light the city of Halifax and for domestic and industrial purposes at no cost to the city.

I felt that personal contact was the best means of ascertaining the position that one should take on a grave issue such as is involved in a private bill to enable Ontario to export its excess power to the United States. I may say that the premier of Ontario was open and above board, and he stated that the contract which he desired to make was a yearly one for a period not exceeding five years. He expected that by means of this contract some $14,000,000 could be made for the province, and he felt it to be his duty as premier to seek to export this surplus power. I felt then as I feel to-night, that if any industry, whether it be manufacturing or otherwise, produces more than the people of Canada can consume, there should be no law to prevent them from exporting their surplus to any country under the sun. I cannot understand why a fine distinction should be drawn between these two types of industry. My personal view is that Ontario should be permitted to export its surplus power to the United States or to any other country.

Last evening the Prime Minister tabled some correspondence in connection with something that is not yet in being. The only forgiving part of the documents tabled is the last letter written by Secretary of State, Mr. Cordell Hull, at the instance of President Roosevelt. That letter is dated March 17, a day on which everyone is convivial and more ready to forgive and forget. The government of the United States took that particular day on which to write to our representative at Washington, Sir Herbert Marler, the document which has been placed on the desk of every hon. member of this house. There is in that document something which seems to be foreign to the relationship that has existed between that great country and Canada. It speaks of the importation of electrical energy from all foreign countries and Canada, a next door neighbour, part of the Anglo-Saxon race, and not foreign in the finer and the more noble sense of what we conceive to be the relationship which has existed in the past. Second, the president of the United States, through his Secretary of State, Mr. Cordell Hull, anticipated legislation being passed by this parliament, and plainly tells us, in cold, calm, black type, "You can pass any legislation you like, but you cannot put that power into my country," the United States, "unless you agree on the development of the deep waterway and making Fort William and Port Arthur the point of departure, passing the great city of Montreal and the city of Quebec as great shipping centres." Thank heaven, there is not a question that the maritimes are interested in that particular phase, although, speaking for myself and repeating the opinion of representative bodies, I believe the people of Nova Scotia are of the opinion that that development would be harmful to the Canadian ports.

I have a great respect for the president of the United States as well as for his Secretary of State, who is an outstanding statesman and a gentleman. Nevertheless, although they are 125 millions of people and we are only 11 millions, we have as much right in this parliament to express our opinion as to what we should do as they have to tell us what we should not do because if we do it we cannot "get by." It is like a sentry-go. The sentry stands at the gate and unless you have the pass word you cannot get in. Unless you have the password from the United States, electrical energy from Canada cannot go into that country, except under one condition, namely the development of the waterway, the development of the St. Lawrence to thirty feet, the deepening of the Welland canal—which has been done—and utilization by mutual understanding and by a distribution of the cost between the United States and Canada.

But let us not forget it is in contemplation —and I have this from those who know— that eventually through lake Erie a canal shall be built to the Hudson river and the shipping shall go down to the city of New York. Thereby our Canadian trade, which should go through Canadian ports, will be diverted through United States channels to United States ports, to the loss of our people who work on the waterfront, and our stevedores, and those whom they support, their wives and their children. Therefore I say that the legislation should stand or fall on its own merits, and without reference to these absolutely dogmatic statements, spoken ex cathedra, that, "you shall not pass unless you do what we desire you to do, namely, carry out what we hope to get through congress, making a great waterway down the St. Lawrence river for the purpose of having ocean-going ships come up to Port Arthur and Fort William, to the neglect of the ports that are intervening on the great St. Lawrence river."

These, as I see them, are the facts. If I am wrong, hon. members can draw my attention either now or later to any mistake. I am always open to conviction, even to that which was said to me to-day that perhaps, instead of coming in at the door behind me, one of these days I might be coming in at the door opposite, and I said, "Well, if conditions changed I might be coming in at that door when I should have been coming in at this door." But that is just by the way I see no reason why I should change the door, and I see no great reason why the people of Canada should change the door either.

Under these conditions I would, if a private bill were introduced, vote to give Ontario the right to export its surplus power. I see in the press to-day a statement by the hon. member who resigned his seat in this house to become the leader of the Conservative party in Ontario, who "Rowe-d" himself from here to the capital of that province, there to sit as the leader of the Conservative party, with the design of later becoming premier. He rowed himself there; he rowed himself back, and he rowed himself into this house through the graciousness of the Prime Minister, the members of the government and others supporting the government, who gave him a seat in this house by acclamation. He goes back to Ontario and tells the people there that Mr. Hepburn does not represent anything, that he is a hydro-electric acrobat. If there is any greater acrobat than the hon. member, who is up there performing some acrobatic feats, and who is going to meet defeat, I should like to know what his recipe is, because some time, a hundred years from now, it might be that the Liberal party would need to use it, when we who are here have all gone and with us, our senses and knowledge of things on earth; we shall be in the—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Kingdom of heaven.

Mr. FINN: No, I would not say, Mr. Chairman, in the kingdom of heaven, but I was going to say, up in the world of Marie Corelli.

An hon. MEMBER: Where is she?

An hon. MEMBER: Put it in French.

Mr. FINN: Some hon. gentleman says, "Put that in French." If he desires it put in French and he will write it down, I shall try to pronounce it, and if I am wrong in my pronunciation I shall take my seat.

The final point is this, that if we hope to keep the provinces of Canada together in their great confederacy, we must of necessity preserve local autonomy as well as the stronger legislative right of the parliament of Canada over matters of general concern. Matters that are set out in section 92 belong to the provinces, and the powers set out in section 91 are specifically within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada; in the words of the leader of the opposition, "for greater certainty" it is in the British North America Act, in section 91, that all powers which are not within the purview of and set out in section 92 shall remain and be in the parliament of Canada. There we find the residuum of power in the federal government and in the government of the country—the government of to-day and of the future, which I believe will be the present government.

I desired to say what I have said only because I had an opportunity of discussing the matter with the premier of Ontario and I felt that, having done so if I sat in my seat and said nothing he would think I was like the young man of sixteen about to die. He ascended the scaffold; they put the black cap on his head and the noose around his neck, and the sheriff said to him, "Have you anything to say before we spring the trap?" He said, "Yes, I have. I am sixteen years old and about to die. So soon I am done for, I wonder what I was begun for." So let Mr. Rowe row himself back.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I move:

That section 9 be struck out and that the following be substituted therefor:

9. That the said act is further amended by inserting, after section 10 thereof, the following:

11. Nothing in this act contained shall affect any licence existing at the date of the commencement of the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act Amendment Act, 1938, and every such licence may, notwithstanding the repeal of any of the provisions of this act by the said Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act Amendment Act, 1938, be renewed from time to time or revoked by the governor in council in the like manner and circumstances and with the like result and subject to the like terms and conditions as if such provisions had not been repealed but remained in force.

SUPPLY

USE OF CANADA'S FINANCIAL RESOURCES FOR ELIMINATION OF POVERTY—AMENDMENT OF MR. BLACKMORE

The house resumed from Monday, March 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Dunning for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Blackmore.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): When the house adjourned on March 14, I was directing attention to certain matters in the absence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), and as I understand that some doubt has arisen as to the correctness of the observations which I made, I desire to point out just what the facts are, reading from the weekly report of the Bank of Canada.

On the 30th day of April, 1936, the weekly report was in form C of the statute creating the bank, and under the title, "Advances to provincial governments," there appears the sum of $2,000,000 total of such advances. The same continues in the issue of May 6, May 13, May 20, May 27; and on May 30 the amount is increased to $3,000,000 under item 4, subclause (b), provincial governments, $3,000,000, total, $3,000,000. That is on May 30. It continued to be $3,000,000 for the weeks ending Wednesday, June 3, June 10, June 17, with an advance of $300,000 on the last date also to chartered banks. It continued at $3,000,000, on June 24, June 30, July 8, July 15, July 22, July 29, July 31, August 5, August 12, August 19, August 26, August 31, being for the month. On September 2, being for the week ending on that Wednesday, it was still $3,000,000; on September 9, $3,000,000; on September 16, $3,000,000; on September 23, $3,000,000; on September 30, $3,000,000; on October 7, $3,000,000; on October 14, $3,000,000; on October 21, $3,000,000; and on October 28, $3,000,000. On October 31, being the monthly statement, the amount under item 4, provincial governments, is reduced to $1,000,000, and for the first time, for the week ending Wednesday, the 28th, it appears in an amended form. The reserves in sterling and United States dollars are combined into one amount, and the investments of dominion and provincial governments' short term securities are combined, and likewise with respect to dominion and provincial securities under (b). These are combined for the first time in the report of October 28, 1936. On October 31 the advances to provincial governments are reduced to $1,000,000. On November 4 the amount is still $1,000,000, and on November 10 and November 18 and November 25 it is still $1,000,000. In the monthly statement of the end of November, 1936, that $1,000,000 disappears, since which time the form of C is, as I have indicated, amended by combining the reserves in sterling and United States dollars under one heading, and the investments in dominion and provincial short term and long term securities under one heading. The increase in dominion and provincial securities does not indicate whether or not it was brought about by the payment off of the $3,000,000 advances to provinces, but it does indicate an increase of that $1,000,000.

I desire to protest against the change of form in the Bank of Canada statement, the weekly statement and the monthly statement. We all know why the form was made as it was. It will be recalled that when the commission investigated the necessity for a central bank in Canada, one of our leading gentlemen of wide financial experience pointed out that there were grave dangers in permitting the purchase of sterling and United States exchange without some limitation being imposed upon the exercise of that right. Everyone in this country, be he banker or otherwise, looking at the form of statement which we appended to the Bank Act, could ascertain exactly at the end of each week how much was held in United States funds. He could know also the exact amount held in sterling. To-day the two are combined, and it is no longer possible for either banker or other individual to ascertain how the sum total of these two exchanges is made up.

Mr. ILSLEY: Why should it be?

Mr. BENNETT: Just for the reason that it was provided in schedule C in order that anyone looking at it could know how much was in sterling and how much in United States funds.

Mr. DUNNING: What public interest would be served by that?

Mr. BENNETT: The public interest of knowing exactly how the funds of this bank are being utilized.

Mr. DUNNING: That is not a public interest.

Mr. BENNETT: As was pointed out by Sir Thomas White when he made his dissenting report, the reason is that the public, which now owns the majority of this bank's shares, that I as an individual might know, to what extent sterling exchange was being acquired and to what extent United States exchange was being acquired by this bank for its reserves. I have a right to know that. Any man in this country has a right to know it, because we have put our guarantee behind the deposits of the banks. The banks protested against leaving to the discretion of one or two men the acquisition of reserves either in sterling or in United States dollars for the purpose of creating the reserves which have the purpose indicated the other evening by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) Now we are told that these two must be combined. I should like to know the reason why they are combined.

Mr. ILSLEY: I can tell my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, I suppose, in due season we shall learn, because the government for some reason made the change.

We come now to the next point. The government still left the form as to advances to the dominion government and provincial governments and chartered and savings banks as it was in schedule C of the original act. But when we come to deal with investments, the very difficulty which I pointed out has arisen, namely, including in investments dominion and provincial securities, short term and long term, a combination of the two without making it possible for any man to know what became of that $3,000,000 of advances to the provinces. Has not every citizen of this country, every person in every province of this dominion, the right to know why $3,000,000 is advanced to one province or two provinces, and other provinces are refused advances? How otherwise will he know it? Is that not the very purpose for which schedule C was provided, namely, that there should be a clear, distinct severance of the advances made under the item of investments for dominion government short term securities? They stood by themselves as item (a). Then we had (b), provincial government short term securities; (c), other dominion government securities; (d), other provincial government securities; (e), United Kingdom, other British dominions or United States securities of maturities exceeding three months.

That has now been modified by order in council, and the form no longer enables me or any other member of this house or any member of the public to ascertain what sum has been invested by the bank in the different classes of these securities, namely, short term dominion, short term provincial, long term dominion and long term provincial. That, I submit, is at variance with the very principles which underlie the maintenance of this bank. I want to make it clear that it is just such things as that which brought about the criticism of central banks. We are now just starting with a central bank; it is desirable that we should not get into a position where criticism of a kind that has been waged against some banks should be made against us. One of the important matters in connection with this legislation was that schedule C attached to the act made clear exactly what investments were made in the securities of provinces and the dominion, either short or long term.

I come now to another matter which should be considered. The other evening I pointed out that in dealing with the question of this bank there was a phase of it of which I wished to speak when the Minister of Finance was present. On July 5, 1935, we provided for the establishment of an exchange fund. Great criticism was waged against the government of the day because we provided that, when the gold in the hands of the banks or the dominion was realized, any profit should accrue to the dominion, after making provision for the foreign obligations of the banks at their branches in various parts of the world. The Minister of Finance finally arranged with the banks that forty per cent of their gold reserves should be kept by the banks for the purpose of providing for their foreign obligations; but sixty per cent of the gold held by the banks, as well as all the gold held by the Minister of Finance, passed into the hands of the Bank of Canada. Under the Exchange Fund Act, passed July 5, 1935, we provided that this gold should be converted at the then market price, and that the Minister of Finance should derive the benfit from the revaluation of that gold at the higher price. That, in fact, was done. In order that there may be no difficulty with respect to that, I direct attention to the language used by the governor of the bank at its annual meeting, so that we may have a clear appreciation of the fact that by legislation which we enacted in 1935, this country made a profit of $63,000,000 on its gold. At page 6 of the report of the governor of the bank to the first annual meeting, on February 25, 1936, we find these words:

> The largest item on the asset side of our balance sheet is gold, valued at $180,509,342. When we commenced operations we acquired gold to the value of $106,584,355, of which $69,455,439 came from the dominion government and $37,128,916 from the chartered banks. Settlement for this gold was effected on the basis of the statutory value of $20.67 an ounce. Subsequently, the Exchange Fund Act required us to value the gold at the current market price. The resultant profit of about $73,500,000 did not accrue to the Bank of Canada. Section 30 of the Bank of Canada Act had provided that any profits on gold transferred to the bank would pertain to the dominion government, but it gave the governor in council power to allow the chartered banks to receive the profit on gold transferred by them, to the extent that such gold was deemed to have been held against liabilities elsewhere than in Canada. The governor in council determined that 40 per cent of the banks' gold had been so held, and as a result the chartered banks received $10,475,114. The balance of the profit, namely, $63,006,382, was credited to the exchange fund of the dominion government, and future profits or losses on gold held by us will be credited or debited to that account.

It should be noted that the valuation at which gold is entered on our balance sheet represents the amount which should be obtained in Canada if the gold were to be shipped to London or New York on the date of the statement. In other words, we apply the realizable value instead of an arbitrary one, and are not restricted to the price prevailing in any one particular market.

The point is that the report of the governor indicates that we made a profit of $63,000,000, and that future profits or losses on gold held by us will be credited or debited to that account. But last year I asked the government whether an order in council had been passed bringing section 6 of the Exchange Fund Act into force, and the answer was no. Section 6 of that act reads as follows:

6. (1) For the purpose of endeavouring to control the external value of the Canadian monetary unit or of checking undue fluctuations in its exchange value the minister may directly or through such agencies as he may designate cause any balances in the special account to be invested in

(a) gold;

(b) foreign exchange as defined in section twenty-six, subsection two (b) of the Bank of Canada Act; and

(c) balances with any bank in London or New York designated by the Minister of Finance.

(2) Gold or other investments purchased under the provisions of the preceding subsection may be resold on instructions from the minister.

(3) This section shall not come into force until a date to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council published in the Canada Gazette.

Then section 7 provides:

7. The minister may from time to time cause any portion of the balances in the special account to be employed by the Bank of Canada in the purchase of securities of or guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada. In the exercise of the powers conferred by this section the minister is authorized to make such arrangements as in his opinion will conduce to the immediate availability of the funds employed as aforesaid. The proceeds of all sales of investments made under the authority of this act, and all earnings and interest accruing thereon, shall be paid into the special account and shall be available for the purposes of the account.

Then there is provision for winding up the account. What I should like the minister to make clear is what if anything has been done with respect to that account. An order in council had not been passed last session, and so far as I know there is nothing in the Gazette which would indicate that it had been passed since.

Mr. DUNNING: It has not been passed.

Mr. BENNETT: It has not been passed. Therefore the account, with the credit of $63,000,000 to the receiver general or the Minister of Finance, still stands. It occurs to me, having regard to the language that is used in the statute, that we have a right to some explanation as to the availability of the $63,000,000 which accrued to our credit with respect to the transactions in gold.

Mr. DUNNING: It is available.

Mr. BENNETT: I assumed that it would be available, naturally. It should be, at any rate.

Mr. DUNNING: You asked the question.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely, but I think it should have been available without the question having been asked.

Mr. DUNNING: Then why ask it?

Mr. BENNETT: Because it has not been available; that is the reason. The real fact is that so far as we are concerned, a profit of $63,000,000 accrued by reason of the late administration taking what some of our friends thought was an unfair proceeding, namely, taking over the gold from the chartered banks. The reason for doing so was obvious and did not require any discussion. The banks never were authorized to be dealers in gold. They were authorized to hold gold as reserves against their note issue, and when we took over the responsibility the reserves that they held for their notes passed into our hands. We made a profit of $73,000,000, of which $10,000,000 went to the banks on their external business, leaving a net profit of about $63,000,000 on what we took over from the banks and what was in the Department of Finance.

All I suggest to the Minister of Finance is that we should have a clear indication of what has been done under that Exchange Fund Act, with respect to which I remember that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), who was then the leading authority upon monetary matters, made some pertinent observations. It has a very direct bearing upon what was said by the hon. member for Rosthern and others in this house during the current session; for it meant that we had $63,000,000 available for the purposes of this country, any purpose that might be thought desirable in view of the fact that the government at no time thought it necessary to utilize the money for the exchange stabilization fund. Of course I am not unmindful of the fact that a former Minister of Finance, Sir Thomas White, indicated that in his opinion stabilization operations should not be undertaken, and the Minister of Finance tells me that they never have been undertaken.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not agreeing with Sir Thomas White.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not suggest that.

Mr. DUNNING: As yet there has been no occasion to use the fund for the purpose.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall make it perfectly fair and say that no proclamation has been issued by the governor in council putting the act into force, and that in the opinion of the minister no occasion has arisen for the utilization of any stabilization exchange fund.

I desire now to direct attention to what I conceive to be a statement which may be very harmful, and I cannot think that the minister really meant it in the terms he used the other evening. I want to quote his exact words, in order that there may be no misunderstanding as to my correctly stating his position. I am now looking at page 1151 of Hansard. Dealing with the question of the $350,000,000, the minister said:

An increase of say $350,000,000 in chartered bank holdings of Bank of Canada notes would increase their cash reserves from the present figure of about $250,000,000 to $600,000,000, and their cash ratio from about ten per cent to roughly twenty-one per cent.

The sponsor of the suggestion contends that no inflation is intended or would result by thus increasing bank cash, so long as the gold cover of the Bank of Canada did not fall below the twenty-five per cent minimum. This factor, however, is not a test of inflation. If the banks use their increased cash in the normal way, as a basis for the extension of roughly ten times as much in loans to the public, or for the acquisition of ten times as much in investments, bank deposits would expand by approximately an equal amount until the cash ratio was brought down again to approximately ten per cent. This would mean an increase in bank deposits from the present level of about $2,387,000,000 to something like $6,000,000,000, or more than 2·6 times the level of December 31, 1929. Am I merely old fashioned or orthodox when I say that this would mean a colossal measure of inflation?

I doubt if any observation more serious than that has been made by any responsible minister for a very long time. The other evening the Minister of Finance suggested seriously to the house that an increase in deposits of $350,000,000 would increase the loans by ten times that amount, namely three and a half billion dollars, and he adds the three and a half billion to the $2,800,000,000 and makes a total of over $6,000,000,000. It is just such talk as this, Mr. Speaker, that causes difficulty in this country. It is just because the uninformed in this country have believed that which is not so, that we have the condition we now have.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I ask a question? Has my right hon. friend not confused reserves with deposits? I listened attentively to him and what he said now was that the minister had said that an increase in deposits of $350,000,000 would lead to the result stated. It was not deposits at all; it was cash reserves.

Mr BENNETT: I am reading the exact language used by the minister the other evening.

Mr. DUNNING: Cash reserves.

Mr. BENNETT: Just a minute. He says:

If the banks use their increased cash in the normal way, as a basis for the extension of roughly ten times as much in loans to the public—

Mr. DUNNING: "Their increased cash."

Mr. BENNETT: Hold on; that is $350,000,000 deposit.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no.

Mr. BENNETT:

—or for the acquisition of ten times as much in investments, bank deposits—

Note "bank deposits."

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT:

—would expand by approximately an equal amount until the cash ratio was brought down again to approximately ten per cent.

And now follow the words:

This would mean an increase in bank deposits from the present level of about $2,387,000,000 to something like $6,000,000,000.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is all right.

Mr. BENNETT: "All right?" It is the most monstrous nonsense ever put upon a record. What is more, if the Minister of National Revenue knows anything about it, he would admit it at once The idea of saying that the increase of deposits of $350,000,000—

Mr. DUNNING: I did not say that.

Mr. BENNETT: I am reading exactly what was said.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend is repeatedly missing the initial sentence which he himself read. That sentence spoke of—

Mr. BENNETT: I have no right to be interrupted when I am reading the language used by the minister.

Mr. DUNNING: I object to being deliberately misquoted.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman will have to withdraw that. There is no deliberate misrepresentation. I have read from this record.

Mr. DUNNING: I am asking my right hon. friend to read the words.

Mr. BENNETT: And I have done so

Mr. DUNNING: And he has conveniently omitted the important words.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not do any such thing. What is more, I will read them again; let there be no misunderstanding:

If the banks use their increased cash—

That is the deposit of $350,000,000—

Mr. ILSLEY: No, the reserves.

Mr. DUNNING: What about the previous words my right hon. friend read? He read them once; now he is omitting to read them.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, surely I might be permitted to rely upon the language of the Minister of Finance in his delightful essay. I shall read it.

An increase of, say, $350,000,000 in chartered bank holdings of Bank of Canada notes—

Mr. DUNNING: Exactly.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is, reserves.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not reserves, for that purpose.

An increase of, say, $350,000,000 in chartered bank holdings of Bank of Canada notes—

I shall finish, if I am given the opportunity.

—would increase their cash reserves from the present figure of about $250,000,000 to $600,000,000, and their cash ratio from about ten per cent to roughly twenty-one per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is it, exactly.

Mr. BENNETT: But that is not what I am dealing with. I now come to the next paragraph.

The sponsor of the suggestion contends that no inflation is intended or would result by thus increasing bank cash—

"By thus increasing bank cash"—note that.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT:

—so long as the gold cover of the Bank of Canada did not fall below the twenty-five per cent minimum—

That is $150,000,000, being twenty-five per cent of $600,000,000.

This factor, however—

[Mr. Bennett.]

And here are the words:

—is not a test of inflation. If the banks use their increased cash in the normal way, as a basis for the extension of roughly ten times as much in loans—

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Mark you, ten times as much in loans. That is, $3,500,000,000, as the minister himself points out on the succeeding page.

—to the public, or for the acquisition of ten times as much in investments, bank deposits would expand by approximately an equal amount—

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that not absurd?

Mr. ILSLEY: Equal to the loans. The deposits will increase—

Mr. BENNETT: But the loans, he says, will be ten times $350,000,000, or $3,500,000,000. Listen:

This would mean an increase in bank deposits from the present level of about $2,387,000,000 to something like $6,000,000,000, or more than 2·6 times the level of December 31, 1929. Am I merely old fashioned or orthodox when I say that this would mean a colossal measure of inflation?

There is the language of the minister.

Mr. DUNNING: And that is right. I still stand by every word of it.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman might be compelled to, I should think.

Mr. DUNNING: If I made a mistake I would admit it. I am willing to have it pointed out.

Mr. BENNETT: And I am going to point it out. The language used by the minister is:

Bank deposits will expand by approximately an equal amount—

That is, $350,000,000, and that there would be a credit expansion of $3,500,000,000. Now, everywhere in this country men have been going to and fro telling the people: "All you have to do is to have deposits, and the banks can lend ten times that much money."

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what has been going on all over Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: Reserves.

Mr. BENNETT: Ten times the amount—that is what the minister said.

Mr. DUNNING: He did not; no, he did not.

Mr. BENNETT: Let us read it; let us have no misunderstanding. He will not deny what is written here.

Mr. DUNNING: Exactly.

Mr. BENNETT:

This would mean an increase in bank deposits from the present level of about $2,387,000,000 to something like $6,000,000,000. If the banks used their increased cash in the normal way, as a basis for the extension of roughly ten times as much in loans to the public, or for the acquisition of ten times as much in investments, bank deposits would expand by approximately an equal amount—

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT:

—until the cash ratio was brought down—

That is, the deposits, enabling ten times that loan to be made.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no, no.

Mr. BENNETT: Here are the words.

Mr. DUNNING: The cash made it possible, not the deposits.

Mr. BENNETT: The language of the Minister of National Revenue was that loans create deposits. That is exactly what he said. Of course I do not know what he meant.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not say that, but it is true.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: I am quite accustomed to hon. members laughing. That does not answer the question at all. There is the statement respecting "ten times," and what is more, the statement that bank deposits would expand by approximately an equal amount.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: That is, following the next figure, $3,500,000,000 which added to $2,387,000,000 would make something like $6,000,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: And now there follows the observation of the Minister of National Revenue that every loan creates a deposit. Mr. McKenna, in one of his annual statements, said that every loan creates a deposit. That is true only to the extent to which the deposit may not either in whole or in part be withdrawn from the bank. That is, to the extent to which cash may be carried about or withdrawn and placed in a safety deposit box or elsewhere, that statement is not true. I may go to a bank today and ask for a loan of a thousand dollars, and the bank may grant the loan. It places to my credit $1,000. Therefore a loan has created a deposit. But if I put $500 of it in my pocket, it has not created a loan for other than $500 because until such time as it again reaches a deposit in some institution, it is not a loan creating a deposit. That is so simple, it seems to me, as not to require any argument.

But let us see how far we may carry that statement. In days gone by I have heard it a great many times in this chamber from one of my friends who sat to my left, but who is not now in the house. I refer to Mr. Spencer. I wonder how many members of this house recall the story of the Merchants Bank of Canada, which negatives the whole statement that has thus been made. I wonder if they remember that the Merchants Bank of Canada was apparently one of the strong institutions of this country. It had a paid up capital of $10,500,000, with a rest fund of $9,450,000. It had a dividend rate of twelve per cent and the notes in circulation totalled $13,239,700. Deposits payable on demand totalled $38,345,152; those payable after notice, $88,087,635, and deposits elsewhere than in Canada, $3,204,602. The total liabilities of the institution were $161,507,349. On the asset side there was over $4,000,000 in gold, dominion notes amounting to $5,500,000 and $530,000 as security of its notes. There was $3,500,000 deposited in the central gold reserve, while dominion government and provincial government securities amounted to $14,000,000. Canadian municipal securities and British, foreign and colonial securities were valued at over $8,700,000, while railway and other bonds and debentures amounted to over $5,000,000. Call and short loans in Canada, not exceeding thirty days, amounted to over $7,000,000, while call and short loans outside Canada totalled over $4,700,000. Current loans and discounts in Canada amounted to $102,857,000, while those outside Canada totalled $1,110,000. Loans to provincial governments amounted to $205,000, and to cities, towns, municipalities and school districts, $3,800,000. The total assets were $182,004,625.

That was the condition of the bank as reported for November 30, in the Gazette of that year. On December 31 it was apparent that the deposits of the bank were falling away, and at that time we had to accept a very great responsibility. The Merchants Bank of Canada was failing. I use this illustration to bring home to my hon. friend this fact notwithstanding all that has been said and may be said, one fact remains as a grim reality about this business of banking. Here was this institution with its deposits, time and demand; with its loans; with its gold and with its securities, and there is the report as it stood at the end of November. At the end of December there had begun a shrinkage of deposits, and before the end of that month it is known to hon. gentlemen that the government of the day had to take the responsibility of either seeing the bank fail or permitting the Bank of Montreal to save it. I wonder if the efforts made by the Bank of Montreal to save the Ontario bank are known to hon. members of this house? I wonder if they appreciate the circumstances under which that was done? If the statement as indicated in the speech of the minister may be relied upon, this bank never should have failed.

Mr. DUNNING: My statement had nothing to do with an individual bank; it referred to the whole chartered banking system in relation to the central bank. My right hon. friend knows that.

Mr. BENNETT: I am dealing with exactly what the minister said applied to the banks about which he knows something. I refer to the Ontario bank; I refer to the Merchants Bank of Canada; I refer to the Northern Crown bank; I refer to the Union bank. Why did these banks fail? Why were they taken over by other institutions? That is the grim reality which we are now placing before the people of this country and which has not been placed before them in the statement. It is not sufficient to talk about every loan creating a deposit; for if every loan created a deposit, the Merchants Bank of Canada would have had deposits to meet anything.

Mr. DUNNING: If my right hon. friend will permit me?

Mr. BENNETT: Permit me to finish what I am doing.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not say that with reference to any single bank.

Mr. BENNETT: I am talking about the realities of this situation. Unfortunately or fortunately I have been through many of these experiences in my time. I have been a director of a bank, and I know something of the reasons why many of our chartered banks have been absorbed. People talk about amalgamation; but I can tell the house that the government of that day had to take the responsibility of permitting the Merchants bank to be acquired by the Bank of Montreal or we would have had one of the most amazing spectacles that could have been witnessed in this country. We would have had a situation that would have beggared description. Here was a bank with assets amounting to nearly $200,000,000, and there was this vast accumulation of cheques on Saturday which would be presented on Monday and which the bank could not pay.

Mr. DUNNING: Had not enough quick assets to meet them.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite. What happened to the Union bank? Does anyone suggest that the Royal bank wanted to take over the Union bank? They were asked to do that by the government of the country.

Mr. DUNNING: And the Weyburn Security bank.

Mr. BENNETT: That was taken over by the Imperial bank for the same reason. There was also the Northern Crown bank. We had this situation developing which I think every hon. member should understand clearly. When you go about and make the observation that every loan creates a deposit when there are not sufficient deposits to pay every cheque that comes in, you are inducing the people to have an entirely erroneous understanding of the whole situation. I use this illustration to indicate that when unfortunately loans have been frozen beyond the ability of the bank to produce the money to pay, then my deposit has passed from it. That is what I want to make clear. I want to make it clear that this statement so often made by so many people is misleading. Sometimes they think they are well informed, but they forget that the grim realities of the situation are these: Unless a bank is in a position to meet the cheque which is presented by its depositor, the bank is insolvent. It does not make any difference how much it has in loans, it must be able to pay your cheque. That is what it must be able to do because your cheque is payable on demand, unless you have a time deposit.

Mr. ILSLEY: The right hon. gentleman is talking as though deposits were an asset of a bank when they are in fact a liability.

Mr. BENNETT: I have not suggested that they are anything else.

Mr. ILSLEY: You are basing your whole argument on that fallacy.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not doing any such thing. If the hon. gentleman cannot follow me, it is not my fault. The statement is made that every loan creates a deposit, and a loan is an asset.

Mr. DUNNING: With regard to the banking system that statement is broadly true, but it may not be true with regard to an individual bank.

Mr. BENNETT: If it is not true with regard to an individual bank, it is not true with regard to the banking system. In other words, the Minister of Finance puts forth this strange doctrine, that this is true with respect to the system but it cannot be applied to the elements which go to make up the system.

Mr. DUNNING: That is quite true.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not true.

Mr. DUNNING: Where did the money go that was withdrawn from the Merchants bank by the depositors?

Mr. BENNETT: It was in loans that created deposits, and the loans were frozen. They were unable to pay the claims made against them and there was a decrease in deposits.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend has misunderstood my question.

Mr. BENNETT: The deposits in the bank decreased only a reasonable amount. I have them beside me. The loans on December 31—

Mr. DUNNING: It is the deposits you want.

Mr. BENNETT: I am taking the loans now. Please permit me to do one thing. The loans in Canada on December 31, 1921, were $91,000,000, while in the month before they were as I read, $102,857,000. Call and short loans outside Canada were $4,700,000, and they had fallen to $3,900,000; call and short loans in Canada, that is loans on demand, were practically $5,596,000 as against the $7,000,000 that existed at the end of the preceding month. In so far as the deposits are concerned, this was the story. Deposits payable on demand at the end of November amounted to $38,000,000. Demand deposits had fallen to $35,800,000—not a very large amount.

Mr. DUNNING: At what date?

Mr. BENNETT: The next month. And deposits payable after notice at the end of November, amounted to $88,000,000; they had fallen to $76,000,000 in December. The result was that, with just that small variation of $15,000,000, because of the nature of the loans the bank was unable to carry on.

I could multiply these instances if it were thought desirable, but I mention this for the purpose of trying in my own poor way to remove from the minds of some of our friends the thought that money is made merely by lending it. Every hon. member knows that in western Canada people go about and make the statement that all you have to do is to make loans enough and your deposits will be large enough to do anything with them.

An hon. MEMBER: You cannot do it personally, in your own business

Mr. BENNETT: Of course not. That is the position to which I desire to direct attention. I do not do this for the purpose of finding fault; I am trying to induce the minister to remedy what I conceive to be a misapprehension on the part of many people with respect to that matter. Unconsciously, and not with any intention at all, the statement made at the pages to which I have referred was calculated to and did leave an erroneous impression on the minds of those who read it. I do not mean—

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Speaker, I object to the word "calculated." It is not calculated to leave an erroneous impression.

Mr. BENNETT: How about "deliberate"?

Mr. DUNNING: I withdrew it.

Mr. BENNETT: No; the hon. gentleman did not.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, I do now. I think I did.

Mr. BENNETT: Once more, how evil it is to think of things that are not done. I say, "had the effect." When I use the word "calculated," do not think for a minute I suggest that the minister calculated it. I used the word in its proper sense—was calculated to and did leave an erroneous impression on the minds of those who read it. That, I think, is the proper and correct use and intention of the word.

Mr. DUNNING: I object to it.

Mr. BENNETT: If there is any doubt about it, I shall put it in this way—had the effect of leaving that impression on the minds of those who read it.

Mr. NEILL: Was likely to.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), with that fine and nice distinction with which he uses words, suggests that I should say "likely to," and I am quite content to do so.

I should particularly like, before I turn to another matter, to leave on the minds of my friends to the left this clear impression, that banks do not make money in that sense, nor do they make credit, unless they have real deposits with which to make it. That is the fact.

Mr. DUNNING: That is what I said. Cash. It started with cash, Bank of Canada cash.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman may change his words as much as he pleases. I have read them.

Mr. DUNNING: No; I am quoting them. Cash.

Mr. BENNETT: I quote them also. So they must have a kaleidoscopic way of appearing; they appear one way to me and another way to him.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps that is a fair way to put it.

Mr. BENNETT: Let us turn to another point, the question of the negotiation of $35,000,000, to which the minister referred. At page 1145 of Hansard he said:

> However, no action was taken until about the close of this deflationary period, in November, 1932.
> Mr. Bennett: And the exchange situation was the cause.
> Mr. Dunning: Yes. I shall give my right hon. friend credit, if he will have patience.
>
> Mr. Bennett: I am not concerned with that.
> Mr. Dunning: —when my right hon. friend persuaded the chartered banks to issue $35,000,000 under the Finance Act in order to relieve the cash shortage which had developed and which threatened to become more acute. I am not inclined to criticize my right hon. friend for the action he then took, certainly not for his general objectives. My real criticism would be directed rather against the tardiness of and perhaps also the lack of vigour in his measures. I realize, of course, that the machinery which was available to his hand was inadequate and cumbersome, and that any bold and aggressive measures would have been bound to meet the strongest possible resistance from the orthodox financial world.

I am going to direct attention to the language in that regard of the governor of the Bank of Canada. I mentioned a matter which I think the house should always keep in mind when dealing with this problem, that is, that we are different from Australia, for instance, whose only creditors were Great Britain and themselves. We found ourselves owing vast sums of money to the United States of America, they being in fact our principal creditor, if you take into account loans to corporations, private and public, to our state, and to the provinces and municipalities. We also owed large sums in England. On the one hand you had the exchange with respect to the pound sterling, and on the other hand the difficulties in connection with exchange with the United States of America. The Minister of Finance suggests that there was a certain measure of tardiness with respect to the action that was taken. May I remind the house that in 1932, when the empire agreements were being considered, the Liberal party voted to tie the dollar to the pound. They voted as a body to that effect. We resisted that; for to tie the dollar to the pound at that time would have done incalculable harm to this country, in view of what happened afterwards. We had on the one hand to pursue a course which would not raise exchange to any higher point than it had risen with the United States, where we had payments to make at that time in gold or its equivalent; and we had on the other hand to maintain our exchange position with Great Britain, Great Britain herself being in a most difficult position with respect to exchange. What did we do? We pursued the middle course, and we maintained so far as possible for our dollar a value that lay in between the pound on the one hand and the United States dollar on the other. Hon. members must know of the attention given to that matter by the Bank of Canada, which had to consider it on more than one occasion. I shall content myself with reading these words from page 13 of the first report of the Bank of Canada:

> The Canadian dollar has exhibited a remarkable tendency, when not at parity with the pound or United States dollar, to take up an intermediate position. Obviously, in the long run, the purchasing power of our dollar must approximate that of the United States dollar and the pound sterling, or there would be a marked divergence in exchange rates. From the point of view of short term movements, it is probable that the large volume of United States and United Kingdom investments in Canada, and the existence of so many Canadian bonds payable in two or three currencies—a feature of our financial economy which is not found to an important degree in any other country—have had a tendency to restrict fluctuations in our exchange rate. A discount on the Canadian dollar in the United States encourages purchases of Canadian securities; a premium encourages selling; and the situation vis a vis the United Kingdom is the same.
> One must add to this statement by pointing out that relative price levels in the security markets of the three countries, and the degree of confidence in our position, are important factors in security transactions.

So that we have the authority of the Bank of Canada for the position which we took. But I think it well in this particular to point out that exchange rates in the United States rose to the very high figure of 25 per cent, and at one time higher still. In other words the Canadian dollar was worth only seventy-five cents, and at one time a little less. Confronted with that position, we dared not anticipate and take the action which we took in 1934; for to do so would have been ruinous to the confidence which we must restore in the United States to save our credit in that market. Gradually, what did we have to do? We had to restrict imports so as to build up in that market a currency balance which would enable us to push our dollar up to as near parity as possible and restore public confidence in our securities. That we did, and it was a difficult process. That we did also in the United Kingdom, and that, too, was a difficult process. I should like to point out, lest there be misunderstanding on that score, just what did happen with respect to that matter, because it must be within the knowledge of hon. members that we had not only a difficult task, but a task which was a legacy from the former administration. The Minister of Finance must know exactly what the trend of the trade was when he left office. He knew that an adverse debt balance had been created in this country. He knew that we had this terrific responsibility with respect to interest charges on our obligations, private and public, as well as municipal in the markets of New York, and he knew also our position in Great Britain.

I have here a report issued by the statisticians of this country giving the story during all those years of what you might call the estimated British and foreign capital invested in capital investments abroad as at December 31, 1937, and preceding years, showing the slow progress that we made in being able to restore our credit position both in London and in New York.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, March 23, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

RAILWAYS AND CANALS

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Outremont) presented the second report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

GEOLOGICAL RESEARCH

Mr. LAPOINTE (Matapedia-Matane):

What amount has the government allotted for geological researches in each province of the dominion during the last ten years?

Mr. CRERAR: Return tabled.

CANADIAN INDUSTRIES—STATISTICS

Mr. ROBICHAUD:

1. What was the total amount of capital invested in Canadian industries (both primary and secondary) on December 31, 1937?

2. What was: (a) the gross value; (b) the net value of industrial production during the year 1937?

3. What percentage and money value thereof was: (a) exported; (b) sold in the home market?

4. What percentage of the portion sold in the home market would have been dutiable if imported?

5. What estimated average rate of duty would have been charged on such portion if imported, having regard to the rates of duty now prevailing against the countries of origin of actually imported goods of similar nature?

6. What were: (1) The total amount of dividends and interest paid to: (a) common stockholders; (b) preferred stockholders; (c) debenture stockholders; (d) mortgagees; (e) all other capital creditors? (2) The total amount of reserve set aside for: (a) depreciation or capital replacement; (b) possible future losses;

(c) any and all other purposes? (3) The total amount set aside for: (a) sinking or amortizing fund; (b) any and all other debt reducing purposes?

7. What were: (1) The total number of: (a) wage earners; (b) salaried employees? (2) The total amount paid: (a) in wages; (b) in salaries; (c) in gratuities or any other form of remuneration?

(If figures for 1937 not available, please give latest figures available.)

Mr. ROBICHAUD:

1. What was the total amount of capital invested in the Canadian manufacturing industry on December 31, 1937?

2. What was: (a) the gross value; (b) the net value, of its production during the year 1937?

3. What percentage and money value thereof was: (a) exported; (b) sold in the home market?

4. What percentage of the portion sold in the home market would have been dutiable if imported?

5. What estimated average rate of duty would have been charged on such portion if imported, having regard to the rates of duty now prevailing against the countries of origin of actually imported goods of similar nature?

LOANS TO PROVINCES

Mr. BENNETT:

1. Has the government assigned, sold, disposed of or pledged any treasury bills or other securities received from any province as security for loans or advances made to such province?

2. Has the government by guarantee, agreement, or any other means whatsoever, undertaken or agreed, directly or indirectly, to pay or cause to be paid the whole or any part of the indebtedness of any province to a Canadian chartered bank?

3. If so: (a) when were such undertakings or agreements made or given; (b) for what amounts; (c) what sums, if any, have actually been paid by the government?

SILVER PURCHASES AND EXPORTS

Mr. REID:

1. What is the total amount of silver purchased and held under the London agreement of 1933 up to the end of 1937, and (a) what was the purchase price paid in each of the years 1935, 1936, 1937?

2. Of the amounts purchased, what amounts were obtained or purchased as newly-mined silver in Canada, and (a) from what provinces were these amounts of silver procured?

3. What amounts of silver were exported to the United States during the years 1935, 1936, and 1937, and what price was paid for these amounts during the same years?

4. Have any representations been made by the government of the United States in connection with the continuance by Canada of the purchases of silver along the lines outlined in the London agreement of 1933, or on matters in connection with the future policy of the United States government in regard to silver?

SEED GRAIN

GUARANTEE OF LOANS FOR PURCHASE OF SEED AND OTHER ASSISTANCE IN SEEDING OPERATIONS IN WESTERN PROVINCES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the guarantee by the government of Canada of principal and interest of loans made by chartered banks and guaranteed by the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, respectively, for the purchase of seed grain and for providing other assistance to farmers in connection with seeding operations during the spring of 1938; the liability of the government of Canada in respect of such guarantees not to exceed in the aggregate the sum of $1,900,000 in respect of Alberta and $14,500,000 in respect of Saskatchewan.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

CAMP HILL HOSPITAL

CASES OF SMALLPOX AND MEASURES TO PREVENT SPREAD OF DISEASE—PROPOSED DEPARTMENTAL INQUIRY.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. FINN (Halifax): I desire to call the attention of the government, particularly of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) to a serious situation which has arisen in Halifax in connection with the Camp Hill hospital. I regret to say that a warning I gave a year ago was disregarded—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is in order in putting a question to any minister, but I do not think he is in order in making a speech, giving special reasons for the question he intends to put.

Mr. FINN: I am not making a speech.

Mr. SPENCE: Make your speech short.

Mr. FINN: I will dispense with it. The question I should like to ask is why an East Indian seaman stricken with smallpox was admitted to Camp Hill hospital, which is supposed to be devoted to returned men and women, so that an orderly who was in attendance on this patient also has been stricken with smallpox, and according to a letter just received it is feared that there may be an epidemic. The hospital is quarantined so that no person may enter or leave.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FINN: I may not be quite within the rules of this house in making this explanation, but I think the matter is sufficiently serious to permit some little latitude being given.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Mr. Speaker, the other hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) was kind enough to give me notice of a question along similar lines.

Mr. FINN: He did not give me notice.

Mr. POWER: I have prepared a reply. The question put to me by the other hon. member for Halifax was this:

It has been brought to my attention that a sick mariner was recently taken off a ship arriving from the far east which entered the port of Halifax and sent to Camp Hill hospital. Later it was learned that the patient was suffering from smallpox and died. Since then, others in the hospital have contracted this dread disease and, I understand, two orderlies are reported seriously ill.

In view of the danger of the spreading of this disease throughout the city of Halifax, I would like to ask the hon. minister:

(1) If he has been made aware of this matter.

(2) What steps have been taken to prevent a spread of this disease.

(3) If it is the intention of the minister, in future, to allow quarantine cases, particularly of sick mariners, to enter Camp Hill hospital.

To this I have had the following reply prepared by the officers of the department:

[Mr. Finn.]

The ss. City of Auckland arrived at Halifax on Monday, March 7. She was boarded by the quarantine officer, and the captain reported to him that there was no illness on board. Nevertheless, while the boat was being deratized at the request of the captain the immigration medical officer was advised that one of the members of the crew was ill.

The sick person was removed to Camp Hill hospital where the case was diagnosed as one of smallpox. The patient was then removed to the quarantine station at Lawlor's Island where he died on March 9. On March 18 I was advised that the orderly who attended the smallpox case at Camp Hill hospital had contracted smallpox and that instructions had been issued to remove him to Lawlor's Island together with a nurse and orderly and all those who had been in contact with the patient unless they had been successfully vaccinated. On March 19 I was notified that a second orderly, who apparently had had a successful vaccination, had developed smallpox and that he was removed to Lawlor's Island together with two nurses and an orderly.

With respect to what steps have been taken to prevent a spread of this disease I would say this: As soon as it was ascertained that the patient was suffering from smallpox, the medical officer in charge of Camp Hill hospital issued instructions to vaccinate everyone in the hospital; to prevent anyone leaving the hospital and to prevent all visitors entering therein. All members of the crew of the ss. City of Auckland were vaccinated as well as all employees of the immigration building. Buses used in the transportation of the crew of the ss. City of Auckland to and from the immigration building and ship were fumigated and the bus drivers vaccinated. In addition, the crew of the quarantine boat, Salucan II, and members of their families were vaccinated. The city health officer and provincial health officer were notified and both gave every assistance that they could in preventing the spread of infection to the people of the city. Both expressed themselves as being satisfied with the measures taken by the quarantine officers and medical officers of Camp Hill hospital.

When advice was received that the orderly who had attended the patient at Camp Hill hospital had become ill with smallpox, all inmates of the hospital who had not shown a successful vaccination were revaccinated and complete quarantine imposed on the hospital, no one being permitted to enter or to leave. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police were requested to place an officer on the hospital grounds to prevent entry or exit by anyone. Any new ex-soldier cases are being hospitalized in civilian hospitals and a clinic has been opened in the city for the treatment of outdoor cases. The chief of the division of quarantine and immigration of the Department of Pensions and National Health was directed to proceed to Halifax to take charge of the situation. A departmental inquiry is under way and as soon as possible a board will be set up for the purpose of inquiring into all the circumstances and for ascertaining what steps if any should be taken to avoid a recurrence.

The third question asks if it is the intention of the minister to allow quarantined cases, particularly of sick mariners, in future to enter Camp Hill hospital.

No. It has never been the practice to permit patients suffering from known infectious or contagious diseases to enter Camp Hill hospital. All sailors suffering from a quarantinable disease are sent to the quarantine stations, of which there are four, namely, Lawlor's Island, N.S., Partridge Island, N.B., Quebec, and William Head, B.C. All those suffering from other infectious diseases are sent to civic contagious disease hospitals with which the department has contracts at the various ports.

SHOP CARDS REGISTRATION

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF OPINION OF JUSTICE DEPARTMENT AS TO VALIDITY OF BILL NO. 22

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I should like to ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) if he will make available to hon. members on this side, or perhaps lay upon the table of the house, the opinion which has been given him by the Department of Justice as to the competence of parliament to enact Bill No. 22. I think if we were permitted to peruse that document it might shorten the discussion when the bill is again before the house.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I have not yet received the opinion of the Department of Justice, beyond the mention made by the minister himself yesterday, but I will undertake to table it in ample time before we resume consideration of the bill.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

APPLICATION OF FEDERATION OF MAYORS RESPECTING ALLOCATION OF GRANT IN AID FOR ENSUING YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). Has he been able to come to any determination yet on the application made by the mayors last week to place relief on the basis of 40-40-20? This is an urgent matter to the municipalities now preparing the tax rate.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): The application of the mayors relates to the allocation of the grant in aid for the coming fiscal year. The estimates for this year have not as yet been brought before the house. Before they are submitted to the house of course there will be a very careful review of the situation in all the provinces of Canada.

BATTLEFIELDS COMMISSION

AUTHORIZATION OF PAYMENT TO COMMISSION OF $75,000 A YEAR FOR PERIOD NOT EXCEEDING TEN YEARS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Minister of Finance to pay to the National Battlefields Commission the sum of $75,000 a year for a period not exceeding ten years from the first day of April, 1938, to be expended by the commission for the purposes and subject to the provisions of the act respecting the national battlefields at Quebec.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Sir Eugène Fiset in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: This resolution precedes the introduction of a bill to continue for a further period of ten years the present statutory provision under which a grant of $75,000 a year is paid to the national battlefields commission. I could give details as to the operation of the commission, if it should be desired at this stage, or I could do so on the bill itself. I think most hon. members of the house are familiar with the work of the commission. I thought I would advance the measure a step to-day, thus enabling any members not here this afternoon but who may be here later to say anything they wish at a later stage.

Mr. CHURCH: This is a most commendable vote, Mr. Chairman, but the last time it was before the house I put an inquiry to the government which I should like to repeat to-day. I have no objection to this vote, which began a little after the tercentenary in 1910. Quebec is a great gateway into Canada, and a great attraction to the tourist trade. Will the government consider marking out other battlefields? A bill was before the railway committee this morning, for instance, in connection with a new Niagara Falls bridge. The main battlefields in the Niagara district, a most important historic spot, should be improved. The battlefields are located at the gateway into the Niagara district, a district which enjoys the greatest tourist trade entering Canada. There are many battlefields in that district. One is at Point Mississauga, right at the mouth of the Niagara river where the steamer Cayuga, sometimes carrying as many as three thousand passengers, passes by. At Niagara on the Lake there was a large camp during the great war.

Some of the battlefields are in ruins. True, some of them are under the control of the Niagara Falls parks commission, but something should be done to preserve these historic sites in the Niagara district. Then, we go on to Fort Erie, and at Ridgeway we are reminded of the Fenian raid. The provincial government is doing something at Fort Erie.

Next we come to the historic points in connection with the northwest rebellion. There should be equality among the provinces in connection with this matter. After all is said and done, the government might well take a leaf out of the book of the United States administration. Fort Oglethorpe, in the Cumberland valley in the United States, marks one of the points of battle in the great war between the northern and southern states. Every state in the union has erected its own monument to soldiers who contributed in that great civil war. Many miles of historic sites are preserved.

Since this expenditure was limited, the amount spent has been about the same. I do not think the commission is going far enough. In my opinion something should be done as well in the other provinces. Mr. Chairman, you take a great interest in this work, and I believe you would agree that something should be done to extend the principle of the measure to the Niagara district, and also to other provinces where the historic sites, although not as important to us, are of vast importance to the provinces in which they are located, both in the present and to posterity.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. STEWART: Has the act authorizing an expenditure similar to this one expired, and if not when will it expire? Is it believed that this expenditure will complete the work the commission has in mind at Quebec, or is it just another instalment on something, the completion of which is still far in the future?

Mr. DUNNING: The act itself does not expire, but the section being amended does expire. The $75,000 annually provided in 1928 for a period of ten years, renewal of which is now asked for a further period, is the maintenance vote for that great area comprising the national battlefields at Quebec. To the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) I would say that so far as I am aware most of the other battlefields are now and for many decades have been private property. Any move to attempt to revive their historic features would involve the acquisition of a considerable amount of property. On the other hand, the national battlefields at Quebec are public property, and were committed to the care of the commission. The vote is to cover the costs connected with maintenance of the battlefields area on the cliffs above Quebec.

Mr. FINN: While favourable consideration should be given to the preservation of battlefields in Quebec, I must point out that the citadel at Halifax is perhaps the most historic spot in Canada. It is at that point that guns were first fired in Canada in connection with warfare, whether of a rebellious nature or connected with riots. I would ask the minister to give his careful consideration to a letter I shall send him in reference to citadel hill, in which I shall set out all the facts.

Mr. CHURCH: With all due respect to the minister's statement that Stoney Creek and Lundy's Lane are private property, may I say that they have no business to be private property. Historic sites should be public property. In Ontario we have none of these memorials. Fort Mississauga at the mouth of the Niagara river is a heap of ruin. Some other memorials in the Niagara district are under the control of the Department of National Defence. It seems to me that all the memorials the province of Ontario has are two from the ox-cart days, namely the Trent canal and the Newmarket canal. They are the ones marked out by the government.

The old fort at Toronto was a mass of ruins for years until the city government improved it. At the present time there is some agreement between the government and the city respecting that historic spot. The city, I think, has the deed. Many memorials were created as a result of the great war. Those are places at which regiments from all points of Canada were trained and, to the people of the municipalities, they are historic spots. For instance, I know that one battalion was raised in Edmonton; in fact it spent about a week in Toronto. Then, there are memorials in connection with the northwest rebellion which mark the spot where soldiers from Ontario and Quebec fought for the unity of this country.

This is the only opportunity there will be to speak on the matter, and there is no reason why the subject should not be studied by some department. Several hundreds of millions of dollars are spent each year on maintenance charges, and surely, in view of the deficit there will be anyway, along some lines, you can afford a few dollars to mark these great war memorials. We have one, the memorial chamber, right in this building. There are many places all over Canada where young men who took part in the great war were trained and, in the eyes of the local communities, they are historic. Something should be done in cooperation with the provinces and municipalities to save these historic places for future generations.

Mr. DUFFUS: I do not know much about the Newmarket canal, but—

Mr. CHURCH: I would ask the Minister of National Defence what he has to say about it.

Mr. DUFFUS: I do not know much about the Newmarket canal, but I can assure the committee that the Trent canal is no memorial; it is a very live national entity.

Mr. DUNNING: I think we should distinguish between two different things. This expenditure has to do with the national battlefields commission. Then, as many hon. members are aware, there is another body known as the historic sites and monuments board. I believe they report to my colleague the Minister of Mines and Resources. On the recommendation of the board historic sites of various kinds have been and are being marked in various parts of Canada. However, that work does not involve the provision of large sums of money for the maintenance of what amounts to a national park such as the one existing at the great battlefield on the heights of Abraham. I am not at all without sympathy for the views expressed by the hon. member for Broadview, but I do suggest to him that there is an opportunity to discuss the matter on the vote for historic sites and monuments, under the Department of Mines and Resources.

Mr. HEAPS: Who administers the present fund and looks after the administration of the national battlefields?

Mr. DUNNING: The present commissioners are Sir George Garneau, LL.D., chairman who has been on the board since 1908; Hon A. Turgeon, C.V.O., C.M.G., of Quebec.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He is dead.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not know that.

Mr. HEAPS: But he is still on the commission.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. Senator T. Chapais, senator, and a member of the legislative council of Quebec; Mr. N. A. Dussault, of Quebec; and there are at present three vacancies. Then, also appointed by the provinces there are the Hon. W. H. Price of Toronto and the Hon. L. A. Taschereau, K.C. of Quebec.

Mr. HEAPS: Has this commission complete control over the administration of the act?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Is nothing put on these memorials but references to historical events?

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot answer that.

Mr. LANDERYOU: What is the cost of the personnel of this commission?

Mr. DUNNING: The commissioners receive no salary.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Is a salary paid to any one who may assist the commissioners?

Mr. DUNNING: The secretary, Mr. Pacaud, receives a salary.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is this appropriation to provide for additional work, or is it a regular maintenance appropriation?

Mr. DUNNING: As I explained previously, it is a continuation of an arrangement which has been in force for the last ten years and which is covered by a statute. The sum of $75,000 is paid each year for maintenance.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is it proposed to erect any further monuments or memorials on this battlefield?

Mr. DUNNING: I know of no such proposal.

Mr. ISNOR: I desire to join with my colleague, the other hon. member for Halifax, in his representations in connection with the citadel at Halifax. I have brought this matter to the attention of both the Department of National Defence and the Department of Mines and Resources on more than one occasion, and only last week I again presented it. I trust that the representations advanced to-day by my colleague will receive the favourable consideration of the various departments.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 53, respecting the national battlefields at Quebec.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRANSPORT COMMISSION

AUTHORITY TO CONTROL TRANSPORT OF PASSENGERS AND GOODS BY RAILWAYS, SHIPS AND AIRCRAFT

The house resumed from Monday, March 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Howe for the second reading of Bill No. 31, to establish a board of transport commissioners for Canada, with authority in respect of transport by railways, ships and aircraft.

Mr. R. E. FINN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I moved the adjournment of this debate the other evening at ten minutes to eleven o'clock at the suggestion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and I now propose to continue with my remarks. I do not intend these to be in the nature of criticism; they are more in an effort to ascertain whether the provisions of this bill and the provisions of the Railway Act of 1919 will be in conflict. As I said the other night, the underlying principle of the Railway Act in connection with tariffs, tolls and rates is that no discrimination or preference shall be shown.

This bill provides that before a transportation company can operate—I assume this would apply to water transportation—a licence must be obtained. The bill provides also that the carrier and shipper may enter into a contract for a year or more for a specific rate for the transportation of goods. It is stipulated that the bill shall be subject to the provisions of the Railway Act and amendments thereto. Let us take the hypothetical case of a manufacturer in Ontario whose business is of such a kind and of such dimensions that he considers it profitable to enter into a contract with a transportation company for a year or more for the transportation of goods at a specific figure. However, there may be a smaller manufacturer whose business is not of sufficient magnitude to warrant his entering into such a contract. This manufacturer must pay the regular freight rate, which would be higher than the contract rate in the other instance. The result is discrimination as between the two manufacturers. Therefore, if this bill should pass, there would be conflict between its provisions and those of the Railway Act. I should like to quote one section of the Railway Act as follows:

> All tolls shall always under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, in respect of all traffic of the same description, and carried in or upon the like kind of cars or conveyances, passing over the same line or route, be charged equally to all persons and at the same rate, whether by weight, mileage or otherwise.
> 3. The tolls for carload quantities or longer distances, may be proportionately less than the tolls for less than carload quantities, or shorter distances, if such tolls are, under substantially similar circumstances, charged equally to all persons.
> 4. No tolls shall be charged which unjustly discriminates between different localities.

As I said the other evening, the duties of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) are varied. He has many branches to look after, and it is humanly impossible for any minister to deal directly with and pass final judgment upon all legislation having to do with the various branches. He must depend upon the advice of the technical officers in the branches. I suggested the other night that when this bill was up again the technical officers responsible for its drafting should be present to give any explanations required to clarify the situations, and to show conclusively to members of the house whether such a conflict will come into being when this measure is placed upon the statute book. The statute of 1919 is perfectly clear, and I would not have presumed to deal with this matter in the manner I have except for the fact that from 1916 to 1925 I appeared before the railway commission in reference to various questions of rates and differentials affecting the maritime provinces, and argued before the Supreme Court of Canada questions of law involved in the Crowsnest Pass Act of 1897 and reserved by the railway commission, and also because of the opinions expressed by the late chairman of the commission, Hon. Mr. Carvell, by the present vice-chairman, Doctor McLean, perhaps one of the ablest men who ever sat on the board of railway commissioners, and by various chairmen and members of the board, including the hon. gentleman who sits to my left, who has an honoured seat in this house and an honoured place in the hearts of everyone, the member for Outremont (Mr. Vien). So it is in no critical spirit that I am bringing this question up, nor was it the other evening, and I would like the Minister of Transport to feel that it is in no contentious way that I bring the matter to his attention and that of the house, but rather for the purposes of clarification and placing upon the statute books a law which will be effective, and which will not have to be referred to the supreme court, and then the privy council, to find out whether the jurisdiction of the commission is extended. There cannot be undue preferences given; there cannot be discrimination. Therefore there must be equality of rates; every manufacturer and corporation as well as the transportation companies must be treated alike, and it will be noted that the jurisdiction of the commission has been extended to cover water transportation.

It is for these reasons, Mr. Speaker, that I bring this matter to the attention of the house, in order that the legislation which we pass in this chamber may not be dealt with in the other chamber in such a manner as to suggest that we did not know what we were doing down here. I do not want this legislation to meet the same fate as Bill B, of last year, when it was in the other house for consideration. These are the reasons that have impelled me to make the remarks I have this afternoon and the other evening, when I asked the minister to give the matter his consideration and suggested that we might have the advice of his technical officers. I trust that in closing the debate he will be able to inform the house whether further amendments will be necessary in order to provide for contingencies which may arise through a conflict between the Railway Act of Canada of 1919 and the legislation now before us, as introduced by the minister, namely Bill No. 31, to establish a Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada, with authority in respect of transport by railways, ships and aircraft.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the house is for the second reading of this bill, and on the second reading the house considers the principle of the measure. The principle is considered to be the most important part of the bill, and on the second reading it is the principle only that can be discussed; the various sections of the bill cannot be considered until the bill gets into committee.

The first principle of this bill is that it extends the jurisdiction of the present board of railway commissioners and substitutes for the present board a new board to be known as the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada, with authority in respect of transport by railways, ships and aircraft. Why coastal transport on the gulf and the ocean and the general traffic on the Pacific coast and in Nova Scotia on the Atlantic are excluded is beyond me.

In England they have solved their railway problem. In this country we have a railway bungle—forty thousand miles of single track in a country of ten millions of people, a mileage almost equal to that of France, with forty-seven million people, and to that of the United Kingdom, with forty-six million, and almost equal to that of Germany, with sixty-seven million people. We have useless duplication, log-rolling politics everywhere in connection with the railways, and a waste of the people's money. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Finn) referred the other day to political appointments to the Canadian National board. No wonder that many people in this country want some dictator to arise to solve some of our domestic problems. The people are sick and tired of this parliament, which is a parliament of talk—that is all it is. That is all parliament has done so far—talk; nothing has been accomplished, and last week we were prevented even from talking and discussing a most important problem, that of our defence and foreign policy.

Last year a bill similar to this was considered by the other house and was sent to a committee which went over it clause by clause and made pages of amendments, but the bill now before us is entirely different from the one which was introduced in that other place. From this bill there has been deleted the regulation of motor buses and motor trucks on the highways, which was one of the most important clauses of all, because motor transport is taking the cream of the business away from the railways.

When this matter came up in the house in 1923, and afterwards when the late head of the Canadian National Railways was here, I complained to him and the committee on railways and shipping that the railways were too slow; that they ought to have grappled with this problem of motor buses and motor trucks years ago, and then they would have had the business to themselves. In 1922 and 1923 they could have had all the truck and motor bus business in Canada, then in its infancy as a transportation factor, before any regular bus and truck lines were running over the good roads of this country, and the railways have only themselves to blame if they were asleep and did not seize that business. That business is here to stay. There may be legal questions of jurisdiction. This parliament may have jurisdiction over interprovincial and international traffic, acting under the clause for the general advantage of Canada. But then there is the Chevrier transportation commission in Ontario.

At all events, we must make up our minds that motor buses and motor trucks are here to stay. A person nowadays can take his own car or go by motor bus almost from door to door to his destination; he can go through many cities and towns and back again home. Some of the buses from Toronto go right through the United States to Mexico. They operate throughout the United States a system of motor buses which carry some freight as well. That form of transportation is here to stay; and the railways should do something to get control of some of the business, either by purchase or amalgamation or otherwise; they should make some arrangement in some of the provinces where possible. It is going to cost a lot of money to do this, and it would have been much better had the railways done something of the kind years ago instead of building some of these branch lines all over the country and making the system and country pretty nearly bankrupt.

The present bill is not one which will regulate buses and trucks operating on the highways. I regret this because, after all is said and done, it seems that the government of Canada is being conducted from the provincial capitals. The federal government appears to be surrendering this motor bus and motor truck competition control without a contest and without even a recourse to the law courts, except to a lesser court for a decision on the question of jurisdiction. They have had no cases before the privy council to decide this problem of jurisdiction over bus and motor truck traffic by the parliament of Canada under section 91 regarding railway adjustments. It seems that no regulation and no bill can be passed by this honourable house without getting the opinion of a second parliament known as the attorneys-general, as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) calls it. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) has raised the same question in connection with the regulation of railways by setting up a similar claim of the provinces. The Chevrier royal commission in Ontario is now dealing with the matter, the result of which is very much in doubt. I fail to see anything of a constructive nature in the present bill, because it fails to provide for the proper control of transportation by this parliament. Parliament, not some outside commission, is the body which should have control. We in this country are "commissioned" to death. Almost every week another commission is appointed; that is all we have been doing.

In my opinion Canada is suffering not from overregulation of the railways but from underregulation of them. If we had had proper regulation we should never have had the state of affairs which motor buses and trucks have created to-day. If the present bill is passed, the railways and rate structures will be in politics more than they have ever been before. I shall not discuss the bill clause by clause, but take for example part V, agreed charges. Charges can now be made by agreement between the parties. All you have to do is to file the agreement with the new body, the transport board. That in my opinion is a retrograde step. The Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada may be criticized, but on the whole they have done very good work. As the minister is going to abolish them and substitute this new transport board, I should like to read two or three sentences from the 1936 issue of the Canada Year Book, indicating what good work that commission has done by way of regulation. It was established in 1903, its jurisdiction then being over freight and passenger rates only. A few years later, in 1909, the jurisdiction of the board was extended over express and telephone companies, and they did very good work in protecting the consumer and the public from excessive charges by those particular types of companies. At page 651 of the Canada Year Book, 1936, there are these two short paragraphs regarding regulation by the board of railway commissioners:

> The Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, as provided for by the amended Railway Act of 1903, was organized on February 1, 1904. In the beginning, its membership consisted of a chief commissioner, a deputy chief and one commissioner. In 1908 the membership was increased by the inclusion of an assistant chief commissioner and two other commissioners. According to the act, the board may be divided into two sections of three members.
> The powers of the commission, in brief, are in matters relating to the location, construction and operation of railways.

In reading this, hon. members must now substitute the transport board.

> Passenger rates are divided into standard and special freight rates into standard, special and competitive. Standard rates are maximum rates and the only ones which must be approved by the board before they are applied. Special and competitive rates, being less than maximum rates, may be applied by railways without the board's approval, provided that a change of rates has been advertised. But important rate adjustments usually come to the notice of the commission, for the changed rate alters the extent of the territory in which a shipper can compete and on this account he is apt to appeal the case to the commission. It is a knotty problem to mark the boundaries of competitive areas—to decide whether Nova Scotian manufacturers should be given rates which would allow them to compete west of Montreal, or again, whether high construction and operation costs in British Columbia should enforce a rate which prevents her goods from moving far into the prairies. By an amendment to the Railway Act, the regulation of telephone, telegraph and express rates was given to the commission, but with narrower powers than were given to it in dealing with railways.

The procedure of the board is informal, as suits the nature of its work, for experience has shown that hearings in strict legal form give the parties to the argument uncompromising attitudes. If possible, matters are settled by recommendations to the railway company or the shipper.

The railway committee of the privy council, the board's predecessor, was responsible to parliament.

On the whole, the board of railway commissioners have given very good service. As recently as last October I was present when they were holding a week's sessions in the city hall of Toronto. Farmers, truck people and representatives of municipalities from all over the Toronto district were before them in connection with grade crossings, and the present able and courteous chairman gave a careful hearing to the applications.

What are the government going to do by means of the present bill? They are going to substitute for that railway board a body to be known as the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada. They are going to restrict the powers possessed by the present railway commission to deal with these problems in the manner I have indicated. Last year the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) spoke, as a representative on behalf of the smaller business man, of what chance he had with the railway companies. The clause of the bill which deals with this matter is one of those which in my view are not in the public interest. We shall be going back to where we were years ago and having a political rate structure in this country instead of a fair and equitable rate after a proper hearing before a properly constituted rate control body. Under the present bill public control, in my opinion, will be non-existent. The bill further reduces the limited powers which shippers now have in respect of contracts and such matters between themselves and the railways.

In this connection it should be remembered that there are a great many small shippers in this country. I received a letter to-day from one of them, who is a fairly large shipper, in the constituency I represent, and who is complaining about this particular matter. He believes that the small man will not have much chance to bargain with the railways under the provisions of part IV of this bill, where the licensee can make a bargain regarding rates over the heads of the railway commission and of parliament, along any lines he likes. I will hand a copy of the letter to the minister. I do not wish to make public the name of the writer. He is a shipper to a considerable extent, located on Matilda street, Toronto, in ward one, which is in my constituency. He says that he has just got notice from the newspapers of this bill, and he wants to know why it has been brought up. He says:

> Under present conditions, when we figure our costs we know what freight we have to figure in to lay the goods down.

Under the present bill, he states, this will not be possible.

> The proposed bill would seem to offer an advantage to big business.

The writer wants to find out from me what firm or group of firms, large or small, are asking for the legislation. He continues:

> If any firm, or firms were permitted to arrange with a carrier for special rates on their goods, their competitors, or at least some of them, would be put to a disadvantage, either temporarily, or over a period of time.
> Our freight tonnage is considerable. We do business from coast to coast, and while we might be able to arrange ourselves for some special freight rates, we feel we would have to be continuously checking up to see that some of our competitors were not getting a freight rate that we were not receiving.
> We don't feel that we should be put in the position of having to do this, or having to be continuously protesting to the traffic board.

The late Sir Henry Thornton did not approve a policy like this. When my national coal policy was before the house and the committee on shipping, and it was proposed to give bonuses, subventions and subsidies to bring coal from Nova Scotia to the head of the lakes, Sir Henry Thornton told me that under my bill I was proposing a lunch-counter system of freight rates. Well that lunch-counter system I proposed was much better than sending some $56,000,000 to Pennsylvania coal barons a year. As a result of that policy a withering industry in the maritimes, the coal and steel industry, has been converted into one of the most prosperous industries in Canada, and to-day under that policy Nova Scotia is sending to the head of the lakes by water and rail and all water 3,000,000 tons of coal a year economically, thanks to our leader's policy. If that is a sample of the results of the lunch-counter system of freight rates, let us have more of it.

I am sorry to see the regulation of traffic on the highways omitted from the bill. I have here a letter from the former Minister of Transport in Great Britain, the Right Hon. Leslie Hore-Belisha, now Minister of War. He was Minister of Transport in England for three or four years and gave fine service in that office. In this letter he gives me an account of what has been done in England regarding the regulation of railways and improving the efficiency of transport, benefiting the consumer and bringing harmony into the railway situation. No one lost his job as a result of that unification, except a small number who were too old and who were given liberal pensions. The rest have been transferred to other duties. The same thing, I believe, could have been done here.

The Canadian National Railways started wrong. The head office of the railway should never have been taken to Montreal; it should have remained in Toronto, in Ontario, a public ownership province. The Canadian Pacific railway have transferred their eastern lines division office, which used to be in Montreal. to Toronto, under Mr. H. J. Humphrey, a vice-president. The direction and control of the lines in the whole territory between Winnipeg and the maritimes is under him. Why? Because they realize that Toronto as a rail centre outclasses Montreal in freight, passenger and hotel business, and a live corporation like the Canadian Pacific Railway Company goes where the cream of the business is, resulting from the great mining development in new Ontario. But what is the Canadian National doing? Political control and operation still exist, with headquarters in Montreal, although it is in Ontario they make most of their money. Who are its directors? Presidents of Liberal associations, the very thing condemned in the Drayton-Acworth report. The head office should be returned to Toronto where it was when Mr. Hanna was head of the first part of the system. I am not going to give my vote as a public ownership man to throw the Canadian National to the wolves to please some bankers and big business men who are responsible for the present railway bungle, and were to blame for launching a second and third transcontinental railway in the days of the "big I's". As a result of the railway deficits we have no money for social services; the municipalities are being raided of their revenues and taxes on real estate have reached an intolerable height.

It is the duty of the government to let us have a proper railway balance sheet. One thing about the finance minister's annual budget is that it is understandable to the ordinary layman. Barring the Bank of Canada item I think the budget can be fairly well understood. But it would take a Philadelphia lawyer to understand the present Canadian National Railways budget and debt and deficit statement. It is referred by the house to a "me too" committee known as the committee on railways and shipping, and after being there a few weeks it comes back and is passed by parliament without knowing anything about it. I doubt if many hon. members know much about railways. My observation in the committee was that they would call Sir Henry Thornton and other officers, ask about a few items, and then pass the thing pretty nearly as presented. There should be some more intelligible statement, but we shall not get it under this bill. A statement was made the other day by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) that there would be no saving. I need not read the speech; but the minister is well informed about railways, and he was challenging some statement made about the Canadian National Railways.

Colonel Drew also at Chatham the other night said the deficit was over $100,000,000. Something should be done to give a proper statement, one that the public who pay the bills can understand, and stop the damage done which is taking business from the Canadian National Railways. They are even using the radio to broadcast ridiculous statements. Why should a member of parliament, representing a political party, be selected by some outside body to make a speech over the radio at the expense of the Canadian people, even if he is defending the public road? According to Colonel Drew no one knows what the deficit is under the present fancy system of book-keeping.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member is wandering rather far away from the discussion of this bill, which deals with the institution of a board of transport.

Mr. CHURCH: My point is that this bill proposes to set up a board of transport commissioners with power to go over the head of parliament and regulate the Canadian National Railways, and it will not work. I am complaining that the people have no intelligible report, nor will they be able to get any more intelligible report or to stop damage being done to our railway. Under section 5 of this bill the board may regulate transportation by water, which will include the merchant marine. I contend that under the new board we shall not have any clearer statement of the position of the railway than in the past; that the issue will be more beclouded because shippers can make with the railways private arrangements outside the Railway Act, which they could not do before. I ask the minister whether under this new bill he will be able to give to the taxpayers and the shippers any clearer statement regarding this railway.

Then we come to a part of the bill which has been discussed on many occasions in and out of the house. Bill No. 31 ignores completely the report of the Drayton-Acworth commission recommending that the authority of the railway commission be extended in many ways, as set out on page 46 of that report. The bill further ignores the main recommendations of the Duff report, which referred to the contributing causes of the railway problem, criticizing the pass system and many other features.

As regards part III of the bill which deals with transport by air, the present board is a political board; that is all it is, and so will the new board be. The directors of the railway are all selected according to politics, and one of the great tasks facing the country is to solve this problem, but it will not be solved in the manner indicated.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I object to the principle of this bill. I believe it is going to lead to more politics and political rate structures than ever in connection with the railway system. In Montreal it has been promised in a by-election that the new terminal will be completed, and other statements along that line have been made. Part III of the bill deals with the Canadian merchant marine and the control of shipping by water, which does not include the coastal trade, but includes the great lakes. Under this bill there is going to be a lack of coastal control which should be in the bill. As a parliament, what control have we over the merchant marine? We have none. Not long ago we sold for a few thousand dollars ships that cost a million and a half, just at a time when those ships could have been put to good use, since Great Britain needs ships in order to carry the food that is required. This bill conflicts with the report of the special committee regarding coastal shipping by water. Then there was the Petersen inquiry about fifteen years ago, as to what should be done to regulate rates, but that report has been ignored also. There are now 2,000 fewer merchant ships to carry food to England than there were before the war. We should not have parted with our merchant marine.

The railway problem is one of Canada's great difficulties. In England they are providing a proper solution for their problem. In the United States they are doing the same thing, but we as a people sit down from day to day and do nothing. I am for a real public ownership system, not for what is proposed under this bill, which is not public ownership at all. It is merely private ownership in the guise of public ownership. We have never had public ownership since this thing has been started. This railway is a collection of the mistakes made by private ownership; the Intercolonial, the old Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific. They were all bankrupt lines; they were placed together and it was called public ownership. Certainly it is not public ownership as they have it in Ontario, and under the present bill it will be much further removed from public ownership.

Before this bill is given second reading, I should like the Minister of Transport to tell the country what is going to be done with regard to the railway problem. During the last election campaign the government promised that if returned to power they would bring down a solution. This morning I attended a committee meeting in regard to a bridge in connection with Niagara Falls. This parliament has jurisdiction over bridges that are international or interprovincial or that affect navigation. Those bridges come under the Railway Act; but if this measure passes, they will come under the transport bill. But what do you see when you attend such a committee meeting? Talk about lobbying down at Washington; it is nothing to what we have in Ottawa such as was seen this morning.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this bill should not be read a second time until the government are prepared to say what they are going to do in response to this clamour on the part of people all over Canada to reduce these deficits and give the Canadian National Railways a chance to carry on properly, unfettered and unhindered by politics.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, in no country in the world is transportation of such vital importance as it is in Canada. Hence this bill, which I term an experiment on the North American continent if not in the world itself, is of particular importance to the people of Canada and especially to the people of British Columbia. I realize that under the rules one is not allowed to discuss the various clauses of a bill on second reading, but since the bill is divided into five parts it is difficult indeed not to touch lightly on some of its provisions. I shall endeavour to keep to the principle of the bill, but in discussing it I must touch on one or two very important points.

If one looks at the bill it will be noticed that under Part I an appeal can be made from the rulings of the board which is to be set up, which will consist of the present board of railway commissioners and perhaps some others. That is similar to the provision already in the Railway Act. I should like to direct the attention of the minister to the fact that although the Railway Act has such a provision and such an appeal can be made, that provision has been of little value since its incorporation in the act. There are two methods of appeal. If one goes before the railway commission and questions arise regarding judicial authority or matters of law, an appeal can be taken to the supreme court. But if it is a question of fact the appeal must be taken to the privy council, which in effect is the cabinet. This is what has been done for many long years. The privy council or the cabinet have been loath to reverse any decision given by the board of railway commissioners. It is not a fact-finding body, and in deciding against the railway board, or giving any judgment, a precedent would, they maintain, become established. Hence those of us who have had occasion to go before the privy council after having received an adverse decision from the board have found that no matter how just our cause may be the privy council has refused to reverse the opinion or judgment of that board. I would suggest to the minister that if in the present bill appeals against rulings made by the new board are restricted to questions of fact, there never will be any redress given because, as I have pointed out, the privy council have always taken the stand that they would establish a precedent if they gave any opinion or judgment contrary to the findings of the board.

Further on in the bill the board is directed to determine whether such future conveyances are necessary. In the province of British Columbia there has been a law on the statute books for some time concerning motor trucks for hire, and in operation this has gradually been getting down to a virtual monopoly on the part of certain companies. Those endeavouring to put a motor truck into operation in that province now find themselves up against a board, who say, "In our opinion there are far too many trucks operating on the roads now, and we are not going to give you a licence to go into that business." It is practically bringing about a monopoly, as I have said, on the part of certain transportation companies to the exclusion of others.

Further in the bill the public interest is mentioned, and I take it that here the bill is following the lines of the Railway Act. I submit that this language is not wide enough. I should like to refer the minister to the report of the Duncan commission of some years ago, in regard to these words "public interest." At page 25 of the report they say:

> Section 320 of the Railway Act seems to give the wider powers that we have in mind to the railway commission, so far as the question of undue preference or unjust discrimination may be involved.

Then they quote section 320, which reads:

> 320. In deciding whether a lower toll, or difference in treatment, does or does not amount to an undue preference or an unjust discrimination, the board may consider whether such lower toll, or difference in treatment is necessary for the purpose of securing, in the interests of the public, the traffic in respect of which it is made, and whether such object cannot be attained without unduly reducing the higher toll.

They have this to say regarding that section of the railway act which, I take it, is part of the new bill:

> Even there we feel that, if the intention was to have larger national interests in mind, the section should be made clearer, and instead of the words "in the interests of the public" (which might be interpreted as in the interests of the "consuming" public), the words should clearly state that it is national interests (both "producing" and "consuming") that are in mind. If this was not the original intention of the section, we suggest it is the intention which should now be imported into it. We feel further that a similar extension of authority should be imparted to the railway board in regard to the question of reasonable compensation. It would then be competent for the railway board to make a survey of just the very character that the President of the Canadian National Railways testified as being part of his function (as the business head of a railway); and if from public policy they felt that an experimental rate should be conceded, they should be free to constitute the rate, even although it might not, at the time, or of itself, give reasonable compensation to the railway company.

Mr. MARTIN: Where do you see "national interest"?

Mr. REID: On page 3, at the foot of the page, and particularly in paragraph (c), section 5. Then, farther along in the bill we find that one must prove permanence of the service being offered by an applicant, and also must prove financial responsibility. Again one must be in business for one year. The section reads:

> (a) That during the period of twelve months next preceding the coming into force of the relevant part of this act—

New companies will have great difficulty entering the transport business if they have to prove that they were in the business for one year prior to the act coming into force, and must also prove their permanence.

How will the board of railway commissioners be able to decide what is advisable? Suppose the word "truck" were incorporated in the measure—which of course it is not, differing thereby from the bill of last year—how would the board be able to compare costs of hauling by truck, by boat or by air with railway haul costs, when no one can tell the cost of carrying goods by rail?

In evidence before the board of railway commissioners Mr. Flintoft said there was no expert in this or any other country who could tell what it actually costs to haul goods by rail. I ask the house to take note of that statement. How will it be possible for the board of transport commissioners to decide correctly when hauling costs by rail have not been gone into? They were instructed in 1925 to go into the matter, but have not yet carried out that instruction.

Ships between ports in Canada carrying goods to other ports in other provinces are to be licensed. I want to point out just how to my mind this will affect British Columbia. Shipping rates vary; they are lower or higher according to the demand for shipping. One shipping line has been taking lumber from New Westminster and Vancouver to Montreal at $5 per thousand feet under what the same lumber would have cost if carried by rail. What will that shipping company be up against when they make application for a licence? They will be asked: "How long have you been in business? Is this transport going to be permanent? Are you going to haul lumber twelve months of the year, or are you going to jump out and jump in?" and so forth. Bear this in mind: British Columbia, unlike the interior and eastern provinces, has practically only two means of transport, either by water through the Panama canal, and thence to eastern ports, or by rail.

An hon. MEMBER: And by air.

Mr. REID: They will not transport much lumber by air. I am afraid this shipping company and the lumber interests are going to find themselves in difficulties if they have to come to a board sitting in Ottawa and ask that this shipping line be allowed to transport lumber to Montreal or Quebec. Probably they will be asked by the board: "Why do you want to go into this business now? There are two railways serving the Pacific coast; we urge you to go back and use them." If this business of transport is to be carried out according to the proposed legislation, and British Columbia is to be faced with conditions such as those outlined in the bill, it will be to her disadvantage. We have no competitive lines such as are found in the eastern provinces.

On the last page of the bill these words are used:

> Nothing in this part contained shall affect any right or obligation, granted or imposed by the Maritime Freight Rates Act.

I wonder why they left out the Crowsnest Pass rates?—because they are specifically mentioned in the present Railway Act, with the Maritime Freight Rates Act. The reason for this omission will perhaps be stated in committee; at the moment I simply draw the minister's attention to the fact.

I should like to deal now with some of the arguments put before the house by the minister on the introduction of the bill. I realize the minister's anxiety to obtain revenue, but I suggest that he is going about it in the wrong way. My own view is, using an expression which may not be strictly parliamentary, that he is going to hog-tie all present and future transportation systems, and is going to bolster up a railway system which, in my view, refuses to be modernized.

I shall take one or two minutes to point out to the minister where the great losses occur on our railways, and the danger in the fact that freight traffic is being called upon to bear a heavy burden. I know the statement has been made that Canada has the lowest freight rate structure in the world. Well, that is a wide statement. Perhaps if one had time to go into it he could show that there are certain goods carried in Canada which are charged a very excessive rate indeed.

In connection with losses may I say, first of all, that in 1922 there were 165,655 employees who received salaries of $233,290,040, or an average of $1,408. That amount has been decreasing, until in 1936 we find there were only 132,781 employees receiving a total salary of $182,638,365, or an average of $1,375 per employee. I mention those figures because I am going to endeavour to show to the House of Commons that there is something more seriously wrong with our railways than is usually pointed out by many speakers both in and out of this chamber. In 1922 more than 44,000,000 passengers were carried, with an average receipt per passenger of 2·82 cents per mile. The average receipts in the year per passenger amounted to $1.79.

That figure has steadily decreased until we find that last year only 20,497,000 passengers were carried, with the average passenger receipt decreasing to $1.58. The freight traffic has not dropped to the same extent. In 1922 over 87,000,000 tons of freight were hauled. The receipts per ton averaged $2.01 and the receipts per ton mile averaged, $1.039. In 1935—I have not the figures for 1936—the freight hauled had decreased to 69,141,100 tons whereas the receipts per ton had increased to $3.06 and the receipts per ton mile had decreased only to $0.972. I am endeavouring to show that whereas there has been a considerable decrease in the case of the number of passengers carried and the revenue derived therefrom, the decrease in revenue from freight has not been nearly as great. While the freight tonnnage has decreased, at the present time it is paying more per ton than it did in 1922 or in the other years I have mentioned.

The total operating expenses of both railways in 1920 was $478,000,000, whereas in 1935 they had dropped to $261,000,000. In the meantime a number of economies had been brought about in operation. For instance three trains in 1928 equalled four in 1920. The total car capacity has been increased although the number of freight cars had dropped from something like 224,000 in 1920 to 217,000 in 1935. Fuel and upkeep costs are less and there has been a decrease in general expenses. The number of freight cars per freight train is greater and the number of employees and the compensation paid is less. Yet we have before us a bill which to my mind will load a little more on that part of the business which is already overburdened, the freight end. In spite of the fact that passenger traffic has dropped in Canada from 51,000,000 in 1919 to just over 20,000,000 last year, freight traffic has increased, as well as the receipts per ton mile.

In my opinion the minister is going about this matter in the wrong way if he expects to increase the receipts of our railways. I should like to refer briefly to what has taken place in the old country; both the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and the minister referred to that when they were speaking on the bill. We must bear in mind that this bill is not patterned after anything that now exists in the old country. As was pointed out by the leader of the opposition, it is an experiment; therefore we should be very careful about the provisions of the bill. In the old country there has been inaugurated a new system of goods rates and passenger fares which abolishes preferential and exceptional charges. It has been stipulated that wherever possible the scales of rates and tariffs shall be applied impartially over the whole system. According to this record, the passenger receipts last year in Great Britain per ton mile averaged $3.88 as compared with $1.58 for Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: They increased the first class rates.

Mr. REID: There are three rates in certain parts of the old country, but if you go into that you will find that the third class is the one that pays.

Mr. BENNETT: That is right.

Mr. REID: The railways in the old country have not just been sitting down or trying to put the motor trucks and passenger cars out of business; they have gone out and made an effort to meet modern competition. Let me give one instance of how they take care of the farmer in Great Britain. The other day a north country farmer wanted to move into the south. He just put on his hat and coat and caught a train and the railway company did the rest. They went on to his farm and crated up his pigs, poultry, implements and other possessions and installed them all on the new farm. Such policies have resulted in greater economies and more profits to the railway companies. We must bear in mind that wages in the old country are 150 per cent higher to-day than they were during the war years.

I should like to deal now as briefly as possible with some of the arguments advanced by the minister. He stated that this bill will not increase rates. That may be so, but at the same time it will not permit a decrease in rates which I claim is all-important to the development of traffic and trade. The minister stated that this bill will keep down wasteful competition, but I should like to ask him, where is the wasteful competition so far as British Columbia is concerned? There are only two railways operating from the coast and every time we have come to the board of railway commissioners for redress we have been told that we could expect no relief because they did not feel like reversing judgments which had been handed down twenty or twenty-five years ago.

The minister stated that the railways are placed under a burden because of the fact that the motor trucks are not under the same regulations. I am glad to see that for the time being motor transport is not to be covered by this bill. The minister referred a number of times to motor transport, and it may be that he proposes to take two bites of the cherry, so to speak. He may come back another time and ask that the motor transport provisions in the bill of last year be included in this one.

The minister referred to the regulations under which the railroads had to operate. I should like to point out that the board of railway commissioners was set up to protect the public, not the railroads. When this board was set up it was felt that the railroads held a monopoly and this action was taken to prevent the further exploitation of the public. But a new principle is being introduced by this bill. This legislation is being introduced not to protect the public but to protect the railroads alone. I maintain that that principle can be found through the entire bill. It is new to this country and is something that should be watched very carefully. Because of this I felt it incumbent uopn me to speak before the bill reached the committee stage.

When this legislation was discussed last year in the senate it was argued that the agreed charges provision was to take care of unprotected competition. I ask hon. members to read this clause carefully. My reading of it leads me to the conclusion that it is intended to control protected, unprotected and every other kind of competition, with the exception for the time being of motor trucks. However, that may come along a little later. One of the most startling statements by the minister is to be found on page 1554 of Hansard, where he is reported as saying:

> On the other hand, individual carriers who fear that rate regulation will result in the establishment of unreasonably low rates, as a result of the board of transport forcing carriers to adopt the lowest rate published by an improvident competitor, can be assured that the bill provides ample remedies against such a condition.

That to me is telling the country that the rate structure is not going to be lowered much but that an endeavour is to be made to maintain it in the face of falling revenues and because of the fact that what this country needs more than anything else is increased traffic and trade.

I am going to give the house one pertinent illustration bearing on the competition of motor trucks with railways. There is a fish contract for the hauling of five tons of fish each week from Vancouver to Calgary. The rates quoted, I believe, by the railway to the people shipping the fish is six cents a pound by express and three and a quarter cents by freight, although, mark you, it costs no more to haul the fish by express, because it goes over the same track and perhaps by the same train as the freight. Two men who have a splendid line of motor trucks got in touch with the shipper. They took a trip into Alberta through the United States, and found out what taxes they would have to pay. It was ascertained that the taxes would amount to $600 per truck per year; and I mention that because it has been too glibly said in this house that the motor trucks are getting off too light. If they put this truck line into operation between Vancouver and Calgary it would cost them in taxes, about $600 per truck per annum. After going into the matter very carefully they came to the firm and said, "We will haul that fish for you at two and a quarter cents per pound and land it in Calgary two hours ahead of the train. That line would have been in operation right now, but when the men went to the customs department they were told: We cannot allow you to put the railroads out of business, and we are not going to allow you to take fish out of Vancouver, over United States highways and bring it into Calgary in bond. So that project was stopped. I mention it, Mr. Speaker, because the people of this country want lower freight rates, not higher freight rates, and the great loss on railway passenger traffic is being loaded on to the freight traffic. Instead of the railways modernizing their equipment and meeting this competition, they are saying to the minister: give us a bill that will regulate and keep out the motor truck or any other form of transport which is likely to compete with us.

It is all very well for the minister to give the house his opinion, as all ministers before him have done, or would do if placed in a similar position. But before closing I want to read from an order in council, and I ask any hon. member, if he were faced with interpreting it, whether he would not interpret it differently from what the board of railway commissioners has done.

There was an order in council passed by the government in 1925 directing the board of railway commissioners to investigate fully the freight rate structure of this country. I am going to read one clause of that order in council, which gives the board very wide, almost unlimited, powers. Here it is:

> The committee therefore advise that the board be directed to make a thorough investigation of the rate structure of railways and railway companies subject to the jurisdiction of parliament, with a view to the establishment of a fair and reasonable rate structure, which will, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, be equal in its application to all persons and localities, so as to permit of the freest possible interchange of commodities between the various provinces and territories of the dominion and the expansion of its trade, both foreign and domestic, having due regard to the needs of its agricultural and other basic industries.

Then it goes on to particularize. What could be wider in language than that? What could give the board greater scope? But was that ever done? Did the board ever interpret that order in the wide sense that parliament thought they would, or at least as the ordinary layman would expect? I mention it to warn the members of this house to be very careful in their consideration of this bill, which touches for the first time a new phase of transportation, and see to it that every clause is carefully scanned and that the widest powers are given to protect not only shippers but the great consuming public. Believing, Mr. Speaker, that this bill touches the province of British Columbia to a very considerable extent in that it will interfere with the shipment of lumber and other goods through the Panama canal, I felt it incumbent upon me to assure the minister and the house that I am going to watch it very carefully, and I trust that many of the matters I have touched upon will be investigated before the bill is passed.

Mr. F. C. BETTS (London): Mr. Speaker, I should like to criticize the sections of the bill contained in part V which deal with agreed charges. I take exception to them on the ground that, reading this bill and the English legislation along similar lines, it seems to me that in drafting this bill the English legislation has been followed too closely, perhaps almost slavishly, and due regard has not been had to the very marked differences, geographical and economic, between the transportation problems of this country and those of the old land.

I would submit, further, that we would be far better advised to defer the introduction of this agreed charge principle until we have had more of an opportunity of seeing how it works out in Great Britain. I would therefore urge the minister, and the committee to which this bill will be referred, to delete the agreed charge sections of the bill.

Mr. O. B. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, may I say first, in reply to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) regarding freight rates, that I am informed the railways now have experts at work endeavouring to ascertain the exact cost of the movement of goods by freight and express.

I am in accord with the principle of this bill, but I am disappointed that it does not embrace other forms of transportation, such as highway traffic and the like. I am aware, of course, that highway traffic, with the exception of interprovincial traffic, is under the jurisdiction of the province, and at this time perhaps no good purpose would be served by including it. Such pressure, however, is being exerted from various sources at this time for the amalgamation of the railway systems of this country into a monopoly that it seems to me the time is ripe to place all our systems of transportation on an equitable basis, taking into consideration their national significance, all subsidies granted by governments in various ways and by various methods, and the different costs of maintenance.

One important provision which I think it might be well to include in this bill would be that the drivers of all vehicles engaged in the transportation of freight and passengers should be required to pass a medical examination. On the railway systems there is a provision that any employee who has to do with the handling of train service and is governed by signals must undergo at least every two years a physical examination for sight and hearing. Drivers of vehicles whose sight and hearing are defective are one of the greatest hazards we have to contend with on the highways.

One other item, recommended by the dominion joint legislative committee of the railroad transportation brotherhoods, might be brought to the attention of the minister at this time. It reads in part:

> That the Minister of Transport arrange to collect information regarding rates prescribed or charged by public carriers of freight and passengers in the various provinces and rates charged by railway companies and communicate the information to the provinces to the end that a fair and equitable basis may be arrived at for the establishing of uniform rates for highway transportation of passengers and freight.

The bill provides for the changing of the board of railway commissioners to the board of transport commissioners, which is necessary owing to the added duties of governing transport by air and water. I was interested to find out exactly what have been the duties of the board of railway commissioners and where their work leads them in dealing with the various matters that come to their attention. The report with regard to schedules handled by the traffic division shows that an average of 170 schedules was filed for each working day of the year, and is distributed among various items such as: Freight, 38,733; passengers, 7,894; express, 2,282; telephone, 1,493; telegraph, 13; sleeping and parlour car, 40, and bridge tolls, 7, a total of 50,462 schedules handled. It was necessary to hold 44 sittings of the board, covering 111 formal hearings from the total of 2,204 applications and complaints received, of which 94·96 per cent were disposed of without the necessity of formal hearings. The commission travelled 531,490 miles handling these formal hearings, which required 35 out of 100 working days. They are also required to report to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) the amount of difference between the tolls and the normal tolls under the Maritime Freight Rates Act of 1927; and between July, 1936, and June, 1937, inclusive, there were filed 18,968 abstracts, which involved checking 1,403,632 rates, 701,816 extensions, the additions of 18,968 columns of figures and the issuance of 3,494 corrections in rates.

There is also an engineering department which handles all matters of the allocation of funds by this parliament for the purpose of distribution by the board. Their department investigate and regulate all methods of safety, grade crossing accidents, farm crossing accidents, inductive interference, drainage and many other complaints that come to their attention; the inspection of locomotive boilers, safety appliances on rolling stock, train and station services, removal and appointment of agents, fire protection, and the storage of equipment to handle liquefied petroleum gases. From this description it will be seen that their activities are very extensive, and with the duties now added or to be added by this bill I presume they will require a large increase of staff.

The minister should be commended also for the inclusion under section 30 of regulations governing concessions for transport by air and water. I assume this, however, does not prohibit the transport of commodities under permit for relief purposes at reduced rates, or free, such as was handled by the railways in recent years. I was interested to know what has been the cost to the railways of handling freight of this kind during the last eight years. I therefore wrote to them, and have received the following replies.

The Canadian Pacific Railway Company advise that between 1930 and 1937 the loss of tolls to them in this respect was $3,561,245.04. The Canadian National Railways report theirs under two heads, namely, reduced arrangements and free arrangements. Under reduced arrangements their loss of revenue was $2,138,379.41, and under free arrangements, $466,889.37. The reduced arrangements are for the handling of hay and straw, grain, feed, live stock, settlers' effects, haying outfits, cattle for slaughtering, fruit and vegetables not donated but purchased by the dominion and provincial governments, live stock handled to the government reserve at Brandon for grazing, and fuel-wood. Under free arrangements the traffic handled comprises clothing, books, produce, fruit and vegetables which were donated by the various church organizations for free distribution among the drought relief sufferers in the provinces involved. The total loss was $6,166,513.82. I believe that this will prove conclusively how indispensable railway services are to Canada.

It is my opinion that the transportation facilities of this country are not being operated to the best advantage of the country as a whole. Sources of supply of many of our important commodities are segregated in specific areas, and in order to distribute them, which at present is being done on distance tariffs, a point farthest removed from the commodity necessarily is assessed the highest freight rate. In a country like Canada, with extensive geographical proportions, severe temperatures, and a demand for supplies in great quantities for the comfort and welfare both of industry and of individuals, we should give careful consideration to the proper function of transportation facilities throughout the dominion and how they should be provided. Should they be provided at cost, or below cost, and for what reason? At present the provinces and the dominion are contributing large sums of money annually for maintenance of highways for motor traffic. In addition the cities are providing paved streets, mostly at the expense of realty property, for the same purpose.

I wished to make a comparison of the expense of highway motor traffic and upkeep and operation of canals with the annual deficit of the Canadian National Railways. The provincial government highway funded debt and annual charges thereon to December, 1935, amounted to $492,290,334, with annual charges for interest and sinking fund of $25,587,461. The grand total expended on highways in 1935 amounted to $92,490,449, made up as follows:

Capital expenditures	$42,438,560
Interest	22,801,669
Payment on principal	2,785,792
Maintenance	21,716,770
Plant and general expenditures	2,747,658

It is estimated that $37,866,826 was expended on highways over revenues received.

We have invested in canals and harbours and aids to navigation up to March 31, 1936 a capital sum of $789,971,672. Maintenance and operation for the year amounted to $33,223,548, with a revenue of $1,166,530, showing an excess of expenditure over revenue of $32,057,018. The total deficit on highways and canals therefore approximates $70,000,000, which is slightly more than the deficit of the Canadian National Railways.

Taking it from another angle, Mr. S. W. Fairweather, Canadian National Railways economic expert, speaking at Toronto on December 6, 1937, stated that in percentages of national income Canada's total land transportation bill is approximately as follows:

	Per cent
Steam railways	9
Motor vehicles and highways	20
Street and electric railways	1
Airlines	1

He goes on to say that if an attempt were made to perform with the motor vehicle the services now rendered by the railways we would spend forty per cent of our national income.

We are subsidizing export shipments of wheat by low freight rates, while at the same time wheat for consumption in British Columbia is charged almost double the export rate. Competitive rates by freight and express to meet motor competition as well as passenger rates, are much below the published rates of the railways, which would indicate that by an increase in passenger and freight traffic a general revision of tariffs could be accomplished. I know from personal experience that in a certain city in the west the railways attempted to reduce their rates in order to meet highway traffic competition, but on every occasion the motor trucks reduced their rates below those of the railways, which in turn compelled them to carry freight and express at much below cost. If the principle is right that highway traffic, canals and ocean shipping can be subsidized effectively, it appears to me that a proper system of railway freight tariffs applying on bulk shipments of heavy commodities having to be transported great distances would have a beneficial effect on Canadian business and industry generally.

We all recognize that transportation is essential to our national life in peace, and perhaps particularly in war, and it is essential that the problem be solved to the advantage of all the communities in the dominion. It is my belief that a system of transportation rates under which the delivered cost of all necessaries of life would be uniform at every point in Canada reached by the transportation system is desirable. I venture to say that, as a result, in the course of a few years Canadian business and municipalities, as well as the railways, would be the most prosperous in the world. For example, putting the Canadian National Railways to work hauling coal to tidewater, to western Ontario, Saskatchewan and Manitoba points, at a rate not exceeding $2 a ton, so that shippers could deliver a good quality of coal at perhaps $5 a ton from our Alberta and Saskatchewan fields, would go far to solve the railway problem at the present time. It would put many thousands of men into permanent employment and do away with the necessity of a debate such as we had here on Monday regarding large numbers of men being laid off by the railways.

In cities like Winnipeg, Regina, Moose Jaw, Vancouver, or Prince Rupert, if fuel costs were cut in half it would immediately offset the burden of taxation. Take for instance an industry requiring four tons of coal a day. At $10 a ton, which they have to pay at the present time, the industry is unable to operate, but at $5 a ton it could flourish, keeping men in employment, giving the community the satisfaction of added business, and the railways perhaps sufficient profit. This I think would warrant the railways adopting such a policy and earning dividends, instead of bemoaning their troubles and unloading their deficit on the government.

Lumber, coal, grain, fruit, etc., are geared to give the railways real money on an equalized rate basis. At the present time, when the prairie people are so urgently in need of building material, transportation costs on lumber from British Columbia to the prairie provinces are equivalent to if not greater than the price of the lumber. Houses are most urgently needed throughout the prairies, and elsewhere in the dominion so far as that is concerned. Owing to the curtailment of their earning power, people have not been able to make good the depletion of their resources. I understand that Winnipeg during the last two years has had about 5,300 marriages, with no increase in housing accommodation.

The purpose of the bill, as I see it, is to assist transportation agencies in meeting their financial obligations, as well as to prevent discrimination between different types of transportation. I foresee the possibility in the near future of amendments to this bill to make it include the whole of our transportation system. I hope this will be possible, but I see no reason for delaying action at this time towards the solution of our railway problem until we can coordinate all kinds of transportation. I suggest a policy of bringing the necessities of life and of industry to every community in Canada reached by rail or water, on a uniform cost basis fairly approximating world values. With such a policy I am convinced that Canada would soon be the richest country per capita in the world. By making Canada prosperous we would soon overcome the handicap of our small per capita population in regard to railway mileage. I was interested in checking up the population per mile. I find that in 1901 we had a population of 5,337,000 with 18,100 miles of railway, or 300 people per mile. In 1916, with 7,500,000 people, the railway mileage had increased to 40,584, or 185 people per mile. In 1932 with 41,024 miles of railway we had 224 people per mile, and in 1937, with 42,000 miles of railway, that had increased to 261 people per mile.

It might be interesting also to note how the population is distributed according to provinces, as follows:

	Population	Railroad mileage	Per Capita
P.E.I.	92,000	286·05	322
Nova Scotia	537,000	1,397·21	384
New Brunswick	435,000	1,871·22	232
Quebec	3,096,000	4,777·45	648
Ontario	3,690,000	10,746·06	343
Manitoba	711,000	4,859·57	146
Saskatchewan	931,000	8,623·52	108
Alberta	772,000	5,686·44	136
British Columbia	750,000	3,907·37	192
Yukon Territory	4,000	57·72	693
Total	11,028,000	42,212·61	261

Saskatchewan, as will be noted, has the smallest population per mile of railway, but much of this mileage was constructed to connect with the sources of raw material, such as coal in Alberta and fish and lumber in British Columbia, and latterly great quantities of oil and salt in Alberta, in addition to agricultural products. For years the railways struggled against high tariff walls in the United States, but even worse than those high tariffs was the policy of keeping in effect a destructive system of freight rates which neutralized the existence of favourable grades for freight handling on the Canadian National. One instance is that portion of the Canadian National which reaches the Pacific ocean at Prince Rupert, which is three days less steaming distance to oriental ports than any other north Pacific point. The million dollars tied up in the Prince Rupert branch of the Canadian National is kept dormant because the rate on coal from the mountain coal fields, for example has been fixed and kept at an amount higher than the value of the coal at tidewater.

We have other coal resources which are not being exploited. I refer to the Groundhog anthracite coal fields, which of course would require a connection with the Peace river district and an outlet on the western coast. The Groundhog coal fields contain the largest compact body of anthracite so far discovered in the world, sufficiently close to Pacific ports to permit the coal to be delivered to any port on the coast at a very low freight rate. It is estimated that it can be delivered to any trading port in the world at less than $8 per ton. This in my estimation is a national prize that is worth taking, but after reviewing the coal situation in various parts of the world I believe it should be handled as a public utility, which eventually would develop into a great national asset.

In conclusion I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) with regard to tolls on our canal system. I should like to know if in any way this bill will inaugurate a system of canal tolls.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, the question how we in this national parliament can help to improve the transportation industry in Canada is most difficult and involved; perhaps even more involved and more difficult is the question of freight rates. I realize that this bill is to be sent to the railway committee, where there will be an opportunity to have it considered in detail; but before it reaches that stage I should like to point out one or two things to the minister and, if he sees fit, I would ask him to clear them up in his remarks when he closes the debate.

The other night the minister said that the object of this bill was the stabilization of the transport industry in Canada, which we all agree is a very worthy object indeed. I think the first four parts of the bill undoubtedly will help to accomplish that end. They are provisions dealing with the appointment of the board, with transportation by water, with transportation by air, and with traffic tolls and rates. The key to these four parts, however, is contained in section 24 of the bill, which I will read to the house:

24. (1) All tolls shall always under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, in respect of all traffic of the same description, and carried in like manner over the same route, be charged equally to all persons and at the same rate, whether by weight, mileage or otherwise.

(2) No reduction or advance in any such tolls shall be made either directly or indirectly, in favour of or against any particular passenger or shipper.

(3) No toll shall be charged which unjustly discriminates between different localities.

The minister will agree that this section is almost word for word with section 314 of the Railway Act. It appears to have been copied from the Railway Act.

Mr. HOWE: Yes; it is the same.

Mr. GREEN: So far the principle of the bill seems to me to be correct; but in part V we have a new principle, a second principle, which I doubt very much will help to stabilize the transport industry. It overrides the section I have just read. I would refer the minister to the first few lines of section 35, which is the first section dealing with agreed charges. It says:

Notwithstanding anything in the Railway Act, or in this act—

That, of course, would cover section 24.

—or in any other statute, a carrier may make such charge or charges for the transport of the goods of any shipper or for the transport of any part of his goods as may be agreed between the carrier and that shipper—

That is an entirely new principle.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, I think it is hardly fair to read that clause without reading the whole section. My hon. friend stopped just where the limitation comes in with regard to what he read. I think he should read the rest of it.

Mr. GREEN: I have no intention whatever of being unfair, and if the minister wishes I shall be glad to read the balance of the subsection:

Provided that any such agreed charge shall require the approval of the board, and the board shall not approve such charge if, in its opinion, the object to be secured by the making of the agreement can, having regard to all the circumstances, adequately be secured by means of a special or competitive tariff of tolls under the railway act or this act.

I submit this proviso does not help very much.

It may be wise to have a provision for agreed charges in order to meet traffic which is competing with the railways, but which is uncontrolled—in other words, traffic which does not come under the act such as competition provided by motor trucks which, we all admit, is serious. I will not deal with the question as to whether or not provision should be made to enable the railways to deal harshly with motor truck competition; arguments have been brought forward in favour of a provision for that purpose. But I do suggest to the minister that a way of meeting uncontrolled traffic was all the railways were asking last year when they appeared before the standing committee of the senate on railways, telegraphs and harbours with respect to Bill B of the senate. I would refer to page 332 of the proceedings before that committee and particularly to an answer given by Mr. E. P. Flintoft, K.C., who was representing the Railway Association of Canada. He said this:

There is this situation which is not covered by the act. There is all this local traffic, intraprovincial traffic that is being carried by the trucks, which this bill will not affect, and in respect of which they can make all the agreements they like. We say all the carriers should be in the same position, and that we should have the opportunity of making agreed charges if we find it necessary to do so in order to meet that traffic which is uncontrolled by this act.

The present measure seeks to go farther than that. It enables the railways to challenge and perhaps to wipe out competing traffic, traffic which is competing fairly and which, like the railways, is actually controlled by this measure.

An example is transport by water. It is with that one point that the people on the Pacific coast are so very much concerned. As the minister is well aware, there is water transport from eastern Canada through the Panama canal to British Columbia. Of course, there is transhipment in certain cases; but we know that goods are moved by water from Ontario, Montreal and Quebec, and in the winter from Halifax or St. John, through the Panama canal to British Columbia.

That canal was completed during the great war, but it took several years for the people of Canada and even for our business men to realize what great advantages had accrued to them by reason of its completion. However, because of that canal we now have established in Canada a great many comparatively short rail hauls from each coast to the interior. For example, goods brought by water to Vancouver are carried by rail to Calgary, Edmonton and other points in Alberta, being shipped cheaper by water through the canal to Vancouver and thence to points in Alberta than they can be shipped from eastern Canadian points to Alberta by rail. There is the possibility that under this bill that advantage might be destroyed.

As all hon. members are aware, water transport is cheaper than rail transport and, as I have said, we can get some goods from eastern Canada cheaper by water than by rail. While we cannot get all goods cheaper, the very fact that there is water transportation means that there is competition for the railways, and that railway rates to the coast have been cut to meet these water rates. I believe that in some cases goods can be shipped cheaper to the Pacific coast from eastern Canada than they can be shipped to Calgary and Edmonton, and the reason is that there is water competition through the Panama canal. That is of great benefit not only to the people in my province but to manufacturers and shippers in Ontario, Quebec and the maritime provinces and it is of great benefit to the people in Alberta because they can obtain goods cheaper in that way than by having them hauled all rail across Canada.

Yet under part V of the bill, by making agreed charges with the companies at present shipping goods by water, the railways can cut into this water transport business, and perhaps will be able to wipe it out altogether. If the water competition is wiped out, the result will almost certainly be an increase in freight rates to the coast which, I submit, is absolutely unfair, particularly in view of the fact that this same water transport is actually regulated by the bill. The bill gives the new board of transport commissioners the power to regulate water transport. It was believed, incidentally, that coast to coast water transport would not come under control; but not only traffic from British Columbia to Ontario and Quebec is covered by this bill but also traffic from Halifax and Saint John and other maritime points to Quebec and Ontario. I submit that it is not fair that the railways should, under the bill, be in a position to attack and perhaps to destroy fair competition by water, which is also regulated under the bill.

Mention has been made of the effect the measure would have on small dealers. The argument is that the large dealers, such as departmental and chain stores, will be able to make special arrangements with the railways, whereby they will have their goods transported more cheaply than will the small dealers. That will affect British Columbia more than any other province in Canada, because the cost of hauling goods to the coast is a greater item in prices than it is in any other part of Canada. I do not see how the measure can help being detrimental to the small dealer. It is true that there are protective clauses. I have no doubt those clauses have been carefully drawn, because I know the minister is most conscientious in all things, but I suggest that those protective clauses may sound better than they will work. A small dealer is not in a position to come from British Columbia to Ottawa, or from Calgary or Edmonton to Ottawa to appear before the transport board. He is not in a position to hire expensive counsel to represent him. The net result will be that the big man will receive the benefits and the little man will be just out of luck. That is not fair. The protective clauses are too cumbersome. I believe the result will be discrimination, and just the reverse of the stabilization of the industry which the minister is so anxious to achieve.

Then, I should like him to explain to us why such commodities as iron bars, rails, flour and grain products, newsprint, wood pulp, lumber and lumber products, naphtha, fuel oil in drums, sugar in bags and articles of that type, are not defined as "goods in bulk" and thereby taken out from regulation under the—

Mr. HOWE: What do you leave in? Name two or three articles you leave in.

Mr. GREEN: I should like to know why some of these are not included. This bill has the appearance of forcing the carriage of package freight by rail rather than by water on the great lakes.

In conclusion, there is one other point I should like to mention. For years we have been pressing for the completion of the trans-Canada highway, but the remarks of the minister when introducing this bill the other day would lead me to fear that there is not much possibility of the present government completing the road. I do not know whether my conclusion is just, but that is the way it looks to me. I suggest to the minister that the completion of this highway would not hurt the railways. It would provide a means for Canadians to travel through their own country; at the present time thousands and perhaps hundreds of thousands of Canadians are forced to travel through the United States; in addition it would mean a greatly increased revenue from the tourist industry, and I believe it would actually be one way of helping to solve our transportation problems.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think it can fairly be said that there is general agreement as to the principle of this bill, although this is tinged with some scepticism. However, that is not surprising as this is a difficult bill. None the less I consider it an extremely important piece of legislation; Ever since I accepted my present office, a substantial number of citizens has been asking me why I did not do something courageous about the railway problem. I have heard the word "courage" almost every day. I believe the introduction of this bill requires a little courage as it introduces a new principle, particularly part V. I urge that we all take a courageous view of this matter.

The provisions of this bill will be applied by the board of railway commissioners, about which we know something and in which we have great confidence. It is true the name of the board will be changed, but that will be the only change. It will be still a board set up by the people of Canada for the protection of the people of Canada.

There is no doubt that the provisions of this bill will have to be applied with a great deal of caution, but I think we can trust the board to proceed cautiously in its work. After a great deal of study I am convinced that this is the procedure which will give the most help to our transportation system and cause the least disturbance to business generally. I think it is the only practical thing we can do at this particular time. I regret that a year has been lost since this legislation was first introduced, as some progress might have been made in that time in working out the principles of the bill.

As I followed the discussion it appeared to me that there is not much question as to the desirability of regulating the rates of inland shipping and the aviation industry. I know our aviation industry in particular has felt the need of regulation. I think I can say that both these industries are acquiescing in the move now being made. They realize that it will be in their interests to have a board set up before which they can appear to justify the rates they are charging. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has objected to our not including rate regulation for the Pacific coast, but I say to him frankly that the reason that is not included is a desire to keep this bill down to the bare essentials.

I had a rather gruelling experience last year in piloting a similar bill through a committee, and I have introduced this bill on the assumption that it should be kept within strict limits if it is to complete its passage through parliament. I admit at once that the contentions of the hon. member are fairly well justified, particularly in their application to the Pacific coast where the steamships of our two railway companies carry a large proportion of the freight and are subject to the regulations of the railway board. I think I have assumed my full share of responsibility in bringing down the bill in its present form, and if the hon. member will take the responsibility for the suggestions he has made and can convince the committee, when the bill is before it, that they should be added to the bill, I shall give him my best support in having an amendment adopted.

Let me deal now with the matter of agreed charges, which will be the difficult part of this legislation. I am convinced that the fears and alarms in connection with agreed charges can be largely dispelled by a full discussion. The first study of these agreed charges creates a worse impression than the facts warrant. We have in this country at the present time an intolerable situation, in that our railway tariffs are the barometer for what other forms of transportation may charge. We have built up over the years a rate structure which I think we all believe is absolutely essential to the well-being of Canada. The basis of that rate structure is that low priced commodities shall be carried at a low rate, and that the natural products of our country, particularly those of our prairies, shall be carried the great distances to our seaboard at export rates which are undoubtedly the lowest on this continent. I believe Canada has the lowest ton mile rates of any country in the world.

To permit our railways to carry these commodities long distances at exceedingly low rates, it was necessary that the structure provide that the rates on commodities of a greater value and moving shorter distances should be proportionately higher. The rate structure having been built on that basis, the result is that the railroads have been exceedingly vulnerable to competition from motor trucks. These motor trucks are interested only in high-grade commodities, and serious inroads have been made in the tonnage of these commodities carried by the railroads. The railroads have attempted to meet that competition by a general reduction in commodity rates, that is, by applying competitive tariffs.

Mr. BENNETT: And reducing express charges.

Mr. HOWE: And by reducing express charges and speeding up trains. The speeding up of trains is a proper competitive move, in that it provides perhaps a better service than can be given by the trucks. But in the matter of rates the railway is, in the long run, helpless. For instance, a large manufacturer or dealer in an important railway commodity can go to the railway and say: "I have been offered a certain rate for moving my business by truck; I prefer to move by railway, but you must meet that truck rate." The traffic officers give the matter some study and find that it is in the interest of the railway to retain that business, and so say to the shipper: "We will meet the rate; we will cut our tariff to hold your business." That means that they cut their tariff from coast to coast. But that does not hold the business at all. It may hold it for a while; but after a few months the trucker may come back and say: "I have worked out my schedules so that I can now cut that rate again, and I will take your business." The railway having gone as far at it could go, cannot cut its rate again and so must say to the shipper: "Very well; we throw up our hands; move your business by truck."

I claim, Mr. Speaker, and we all know, that the railways are capable of moving a ton-mile of freight at a cheaper rate than any other mode of transportation except the bulk carriers, and it seems to me that having that fundamental advantage the railways should be placed in a competitive position where they can reap the benefit of that fundamental advantage. It seems to me hardly fair to make the railways forever the regulator of rates on highway traffic. We have a good many cases before the railway board for tearing up branch lines on which all the traffic has been lost to the trucks. Of course, when we attempt to take up such a branch line, we have serious objections from shippers all along the line, even though they are not users of the railway. The basis of their objection is not that they need the railway themselves for moving their goods; but they say: "We need that railway to regulate truck rates; do not leave us at the mercy of the truckers." Surely it is not reasonable to ask that the railways be maintained merely to set a rate under which trucks must operate to take competitive business.

Great Britain had this trouble perhaps to a greater extent than Canada, because their distances are shorter and a larger proportion of railway business there is vulnerable to truck competition than would be the case in Canada. In the old country the principle of agreed charges has been adopted and applied, and I am told that after a thorough trial the British people are well satisfied with agreed charges as a means of straightening out their transportation difficulties. My deputy minister spent some months in England within the last year studying this question. He made a thorough report on the subject, and I was convinced by his report that our earlier information was correct and that agreed charges are working out to the benefit of the public as well as of the transportation industry itself. I urge that every member give some study to the question of agreed charges and not form his opinion from one or two cases only, which may be brought before him.

It must be borne in mind that the essence of an agreed charge is a lack of discrimination. It must be obvious that it is not detrimental to the small shipper as against the large shipper, because if an agreed charge is given to a large shipper the railways must be prepared to grant the same agreed charge to any shipper, large or small, who is willing to comply with the same terms as the shipper for whom the agreed charge is made. That is the essence of the agreement, and the first duty of the board of transport commissioners will be to see, before an agreed charge is decided upon, that there is no discrimination.

Mr. LAWSON: If there was an agreed charge for the movement of an average of, say one hundred thousand tons a year by a large shipper, do I understand the minister's statement to mean that the same agreed charge would be applicable to some smaller firm that was moving only one thousand tons in the same year?

Mr. HOWE: Exactly. The charge must be the same to all persons who are willing to abide by the same conditions. In other words, the agreement is a public document, and anyone who is willing to write the same agreement must get the same treatment.

Mr. LAWSON: The same except as to quantity.

Mr. HOWE: The same except as to quantity. The conditions of the movement must be the same; the bill provides for that.

The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) mentioned shipments by the Panama canal. The United States for many years has found it necessary to regulate all coastwise shipments via the Panama canal. That comes in direct competition with the railways, and when regulation was applied to shipping, the coastwise shipping through the Panama canal was the first item to which regulation was applied.

Mr. GREEN: But had they these agreed charges?

Mr. HOWE: I do not know what that has to do with the question, but as a matter of fact they have not agreed charges in the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: That is his point, that the agreed charges have to do with Panama shipments.

Mr. HOWE: Quite. In the first place I would say that we have protection in the bill against the very thing that my hon. friend fears.

My hon. friend also said that this bill was a slavish copy of the British act.

Mr. GREEN: I did not say that.

Mr. BENNETT: It was the hon. member for London (Mr. Betts).

Mr. HOWE: I am sorry. The British act provides that any shipper or body of shippers can produce an agreed charge. We go further than that. We also provide that any carrier can protest against the agreed charge; that is, any carrier under this act, which means any regulated carrier.

Mr. BENNETT: Would that mean that one carrier could protest against another carrier making an agreed charge?

Mr. HOWE: Quite. Any carrier may protest that the agreed charge is unduly injurious to his business. We have a further provision, that even after the agreed charge is made, if representation is made to the minister that in the public interest this charge is working unfairly, the minister can send the case back to the transport board for rehearing. That clause was introduced in the English act, and we have it in our bill exactly for the reason my hon. friend suggests, to make sure that an agreed charge, even after it is agreed to, is not working to put a competitor out of business. So I think further study will indicate that we have ample safeguards.

What is the situation to-day with regard to that one ship? I think we have only one ship plying between Vancouver and Montreal. That one ship has agreements with the railways that "We will take only a certain proportion of this thing and only a certain proportion of that thing." They carry it at the railway rates; they fill the boat at the expense of the railways. Why is it unfair to bring that boat under regulation? If a spread in prices is required, let the board determine what the spread will be; but why have this month to month rule that "We will only have fifty per cent of the salmon or thirty per cent of the iron rods," or "We will take ten per cent of the automobiles"? Why not come out in the open, lay the agreement before the board of transport commissioners and get it approved in the ordinary way? I cannot see anything in the position of that one boat that is different from that of any other boat which is being brought under regulation in the coastal trade of Canada.

Mr. GREEN: Is it the intention in this bill to prevent competition by that line of ships? I believe it is not one ship only, but different ships that are used; ships under charter are brought in and put on this work.

Mr. HOWE: No. But we want competition in the open. We want all competitive factors applying the same rules. A ship at Vancouver can file with the board of transport commissioners any rate that it likes, and I have reason to believe that if it is the only ship plying there, the board will approve that rate. But the railways have a right to know what the ship is charging, just as the ship will have a right to know what the railway is charging. There will be the same publicity in both cases, and we shall not have the situation we have to-day, of a ship being able to shop around anywhere it likes with undisclosed rates, as against the railway which has full publication of its rates.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: Can we do that in the case of a ship which is registered in another country,—a British ship registered in London, for instance?

Mr. HOWE: A British ship entering the coastal trade must abide by the laws of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: I know that.

Mr. HOWE: A foreign ship cannot engage in the coastal trade.

Mr. BENNETT: I am referring to one which would run from Vancouver to Montreal.

Mr. HOWE: It is engaged in coastal trade if it runs between two Canadian ports, and it must abide by the laws of Canada. We have gone fully into that, and we find that such a ship is subject to regulation.

It is nearly six o'clock, and I believe I have said all that needs to be said at the present time. After the bill receives second reading, I shall ask that it be sent to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, where it will have a most searching examination.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 24, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

RAILWAYS AND CANALS

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SASKATCHEWAN RELIEF ADMINISTRATION

Mr. PERLEY:

1. What salary was paid by the federal government to Dr. Stapleford for his services in distributing relief in the province of Saskatchewan?

2. What salary is paid to Dr. Stapleford for his services in connection with the survey he is conducting with respect to relief in the province of Saskatchewan?

Mr. GARDINER: Dr. Stapleford has been paid at the rate of $500 per month from October 7, 1937, to date, for his services in distributing relief in and making a survey with respect to relief in the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. PERLEY:

1. What are the names of the forty-five federal government inspectors in the province of Saskatchewan in connection with relief administration?

2. What were their respective former occupations?

3. What are their respective salaries, including expense allowances?

Mr. GARDINER:

List of inspectors in Saskatchewan as at February 1, 1938:

1. and 2. S. Banks, farmer; B. J. Brockmann, farmer; R. V. Cameron, farmer; J. A. Davis, provincial agricultural representative; A. W. Daurie, grain buyer; B. S. Dermody, real estate agent; S. Forsyth, farmer; T. P. Hagerman, grain buyer; C. Henderson, farmer; E. Hogan, farmer; A. P. Humphrey, insurance agent; J. L. Laurie, grain buyer; S. McBain, farmer; W. Mitchell, farmer; B. A. Newton, farmer; H. L. Roberge, farmer; D. M. Robertson, farmer; J. F. Symington, garage man; H. S. Thompson, farmer; F. W. Widdifield, farmer; A. S. Agnew, agent; W. Hagarty, farmer; O. Parker, farmer; G. Andrew, farmer; I. S. Bricker, farmer; J. W. Rose, farmer; J. W. Pennington, insurance agent; R. E. Gleiser, merchant.

3. $125 per month and actual expenses.

CANADIAN WHEAT SHIPMENTS

Mr. ISNOR:

1. What was the total shipment, in bushels, of Canadian wheat for overseas destinations during the months of January, 1936, 1937, 1938, and February, 1936, 1937, 1938?

2. What quantities, for each period, were shipped from Canadian Pacific seaboard ports, Canadian Atlantic seaboard ports and United States Atlantic seaboard ports?

3. What quantities, for each period, were shipped via port of Halifax, Nova Scotia, and port of Saint John, New Brunswick?

4. What quantity, for each period, was shipped over Canadian National Railways to port of Halifax, Nova Scotia?

5. What quantity, for each period, was shipped over Canadian National Railways to port of Saint John, New Brunswick?

*J. M. EDDY

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Is one J. M. Eddy, of Bethune, Saskatchewan, in the employ of the farm loan board or the prairie farm rehabilitation?

2. If so, for what period has he been employed? What was his salary? What were his expenses?

Mr. GARDINER: This question presumably refers to work done under my department in connection with prairie farm rehabilitation. We have examined fully into the matter and find that there is no such person employed.

Mr. SPEAKER: Answered.

DEMURRAGE ON RELIEF CARS, SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. PERLEY:

1. What amount has been paid since the 1st of August, 1937, to date, to the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways on account of demurrage on relief cars in the province of Saskatchewan?

2. What amount, if any, is still outstanding and to be paid to the said railway companies for demurrage on relief cars in the said province?

[Mr. Euler.]

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Canadian Pacific Railway, $477; Canadian National Railways, $246.

2. Nil.

CHILLIWACK, B.C., POST OFFICE

Mr. BARBER:

1. What was the total cost of repairs, painting, alterations, etc., to the post office building at Chilliwack, British Columbia, during each of the years 1936-37 and 1937-38?

2. Who were invited to tender for such work?

3. Who were the successful tenderers and what amount was paid to each?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. 1936-37, $27.65; 1937-38, $263.70.

2 and 3. As works were of a minor nature competitive tenders were not asked. The following works were done:—

1936-37

Plumbing repairs—Farqueharson & Eckel Ltd.	$24 15
Glazing—Davies & Logan Hardware	3 50
	$27.65

1937-38

Installing railing—J. F. Semple	$ 30 00
Repairs & painting—W. Bowman	140 00
Grates for furnace—Farqueharson & Eckel Ltd.	51 41
New toilet and tank—Farqueharson & Eckel Ltd.	35 94
Glazing—C. H. Semple	6 35
	$263 70

CANADA AND GULF TERMINAL RAILWAY

Mr. LAPOINTE (Matapedia-Matane):

1. Has the federal government had any negotiations during the last fifteen years with the Canada and Gulf Terminal Railway with a view to the purchase of such railway?

2. If so, what were the results?

3. If purchase was not made, what reasons are given?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Acquisition by Canadian National Railways, was proposed in 1927 and again more recently.

2. Negative.

3. Because of heavy losses which would be involved.

*VISIT OF CABINET MINISTERS TO ALBERTA

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River):

1. What has been the cost to the dominion government for the visit of each of the following cabinet ministers: Mr. Gardiner, Mr. Howe, Mr. Mackenzie, during the months of February and March, 1938, to the province of Alberta?

2. What business was each man there for?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): With the consent of the house, so far as I am concerned I should like to answer this question orally.

I visited the province of Alberta while on the way to my constituency in British Columbia and on my return therefrom partly on personal and partly on departmental business. My stay in Alberta was for two days, and did not entail any expense whatsoever to the dominion government.

In answer to the second question: "What business was each man there for?" I will say, For the cause of good government, and in the public interest.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, I was invited to go to Alberta by an old friend of mine who was Liberal candidate in Edmonton East. I am sure he is sorry he asked me. However, I went at his request, and at my own expense.

Mr. GARDINER: I was in Alberta on two occasions during the period mentioned, but on neither occasion was any expense charged up to the government of Canada because of my visit to Alberta. I may say we have 3,000 more Liberal votes in Edmonton East than we had before.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—ALBERTA

Mr. MARSHALL:

1. In what year did the province of Alberta enter into agreement with the government of the Dominion of Canada for the policing of that province by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

2. (a) What sums of money were paid yearly by the province to the dominion government for this service; (b) what sums of money were collected yearly by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in that province and paid directly to the dominion government?

3. What has been the total yearly strength of all ranks from the beginning of contract in the province?

4. (a) How many of the personnel of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police presently stationed in Alberta were members of the old Alberta provincial police force; (b) what are their names, ranks and present salaries?

5. When was the present contract between the Alberta government and the dominion signed?

6. How long has that contract still to run?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Return tabled.

CAMROSE, ALTA., SUB-COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS

Mr. MARSHALL:

1. How many applications were received by the civil service commission for the position of sub-collector of customs and excise at Camrose, Alberta, recently?

2. What were the names, ages, addresses and qualifications of the applicants?

3. What was the name of the successful applicant, and what previous experience did he have in this work?

4. Is he a returned man?

5. How many of the applicants were returned men?

PERMITS FOR EXPORT OF WAR MATERIAL

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River):

1. How many permits were issued from 1934 to date for the exportation of arms, ammunition, aircraft or other types of manufactured war materials?

2. To what countries were these shipments sent?

3. What was the value of each shipment?

Mr. ROGERS: Return tabled.

DIVORCES GRANTED BY PARLIAMENT

Mr. FOURNIER (Maisonneuve-Rosemount):

1. How many divorces were granted by the parliament of Canada since 1928 inclusive?

2. What was the average age of men?

3. What was the average age of women?

4. What was the average number of children issued from parents so divorced?

5. What was the total number of children issued from such marriages?

6. How many years, in the average, had such persons been married before they were divorced?

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. What is the present indebtedness of the Canadian National Railways, and how is it made up?

2. How much is still owing the Grand Trunk shareholders?

3. What amount would it be necessary for the Canadian National Railways to earn each year in order to pay its way?

4. What percentage of the total mail in Canada does the Canadian National Railways handle, and what is the percentage of mail carried by the Canadian National Railways between competitive points?

5. How much of the equipment in use by the Canadian National Railways is rented, and what was the total rental paid in the years 1933, 1934, 1935, 1936, and 1937, and on what class of equipment was this rental paid?

6. Which company operates the radio carrier system in the east and west? If any change was made in this operation lately, why was it made? What was the amount of revenue derived from this service by the Canadian National Railways last year, and what is the expected revenue for this year?

7. What are the salaries of the board of directors, and what were their expenses for the year 1937?

8. What is the present capitalization of the Canadian National Railways? By how much has it been reduced, and when?

9. Has the pooling of passenger train services in the east been successful, and what has been the increase or decrease in revenues (between pooling points) to the Canadian National Railways since its inception?

WHEAT POLICY

REPORT OF GRAIN COMMISSION— EXPIRY OF PRESENT MINIMUM PRICE PER BUSHEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM HAYHURST (Vegreville): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) a question. In view of the fact that the Turgeon commission report has not yet been presented to parliament, and that the present minimum price of wheat is 87½ cents a bushel for the year which expires on July 31, 1938, could the government give the house any information as to its policy, or the intention of continuing its present policy for the crop year 1938-39?

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I had a word this morning with Commissioner Turgeon and it is expected the report on wheat will be ready very soon—long before expiration of the present fixed price for wheat.

With regard to the policy of the government may I say that it will be decided upon and, in due course, declared.

EMPLOYMENT COMMISSION

INQUIRY AS TO PRINTING AND AVAILABILITY OF REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) a question. Has the final report of the national employment commission been printed, and if not will it be printed soon?

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, my latest advice is that the report will be available early next week. It contains a rather voluminous appendix, the printing and translation of which have caused delay in making the report available to the house.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION

PERSONNEL OF INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE AND BOARD OF REVIEW

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) asked for the names of the personnel of the interdepartmental committee studying the question of orientals in British Columbia.

The immigration branch is represented by Mr. F. C. Blair, chairman of the committee, and Mr. A. L. Jolliffe. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police are represented by Inspector Armitage; the statistics branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce by Doctor R. H. Coats; the Department of National Defence by Major W. H. S. Macklin; the customs branch, Department of National Revenue, by Mr. P. L. Young; the Department of Fisheries by Mr. A. J. Whitmore; the Department of Labour by Mr. R. A. Rigg and the Department of External Affairs by Doctor O. D. Skelton and Mr. H. L. Keenleyside. Mr. Keenleyside and Mr. Whitmore are the secretaries of the committee.

The members of the board of review are, from the immigration branch, Mr. Fred W. Taylor, District Superintendent of Immigration at Vancouver, British Columbia; from the Department of Justice, Inspector G. W. Fish, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Vancouver, British Columbia, and from the Department of External Affairs, Mr. H. L. Keenleyside, Ottawa, chairman.

The Pacific coast representatives of the Departments of National Defence and National Revenue are cooperating closely with the board of review.

Mr. NEILL: Has the minister the date of those appointments?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, not here, but I can obtain them.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Departmental administration, $425,720.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, some days ago the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) made a request that, when the estimates for the Department of National Defence were presented for consideration by the committee of supply, there might be a statement made by the responsible minister, in the first place with reference to the general principles of the defence policy, and in the second place with reference to the question of general administration.

I would therefore ask the indulgence of the committee if in response to that request I might be permitted, as briefly as possible, in the first place to review the general fundamental principles underlying the present defence policy of the Dominion of Canada; in the second place to review the purposes for which the votes given last year were expended, and in the third place to make an analysis of the estimates for 1938-39. May I say at once that I regret that the hon. gentleman who made the request is prevented through an indisposition from being here this afternoon. He will, however, be granted every facility in the way of general discussion on a future occasion.

In reviewing the evolution of the defence policy of Canada it might be important to examine, not for any authoritative purposes but purely from the historical point of view, some of the declarations made at former imperial conferences. We might review also the declarations of policy which were made in this House of Commons in 1936 and 1937 and refer briefly to some of the findings of the imperial conference of 1937 in connection with national defence.

It might be worth recalling that a resolution was passed in 1923, reaffirmed by the conference of 1926, which ended with this important declaration:

> The primary responsibility of each portion of the empire is for its own local defence.

The conference of 1926 was responsible for the famous Balfour formula with reference to Canadian status. In connection with the matter of foreign relations, which is closely connected with the question of national defence, may I quote the resolution passed in 1926:

> It was frankly recognized that in this sphere, as in the sphere of defence, the major share of responsibility rests now and must for some time rest with His Majesty's government in Great Britain. Nevertheless all the dominions engaged to some extent, and some to considerable extent, in the conduct of foreign relations, particularly those with foreign countries on their borders. . . . The governing consideration underlying all discussions of this problem must be that neither Great Britain nor the dominions could be committed to the acceptance of active obligations except with the definite assent of their own governments.

In historical retrospect I think I can safely deduce that the following principles emerged from these imperial conferences:

First, that each self-governing portion of the empire is primarily responsible for its own local defence. Second, that the security of the empire is a matter of concern to all its governments. Third, that military action taken at any time, in peace or war, is a matter for individual decision on the part of each empire government.

It might be interesting to recall the resolution passed by the chiefs of staff of the subcommittee on imperial defence in 1923. I quote:

> His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom is mainly responsible for the security of the communications between the several parts of the commonwealth.

And also:

> Each of the several dominions is responsible for protecting its territory and coastal trade against aggression until support comes from the outside.

Between 1926 and 1936 there was no pronouncement of major importance with reference to the question of national defence. May I just emphasize the fact that the pronouncements made by the imperial conferences of 1923 and 1926, after the promulgation of the Balfour formula in 1926, are practically synonymous with the pronouncements made under the new Canadian status acquired since 1926; in other words, the aspects of national defence and the defence of Canada have been emphasized. Speaking in this house on February 12, 1936, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had this to say:

> While declarations on behalf of Canada on the subject of the defence of Canada have been made at various imperial conferences, as may be seen from the results thereof published from time to time, I am not aware of any commitments made on behalf of Canada with regard to imperial defence. At such conferences it has been expressly recognized that it is for the parliament of the several parts of the British commonwealth of nations, upon the recommendation of their respective governments, to decide upon their course.

Then on March 10, 1936, the Prime Minister had this to say:

> I should add that we have made clear at various conferences that any action in the nature of military obligations of any sort would be entered into by the government of the day only after such had been recommended to parliament by the government and approved by parliament itself.

May I be permitted to refer again to the debate that took place in this house on February 19, 1937, when the general principles with reference to our defence policies were laid down very carefully by the Prime Minister. I do not intend to refer in detail to the remarks he made at that time, but I should like to put the following on the record:

> When some of us to protect ourselves and our country against the forces of blood and of death ask parliament to vote money for purposes of defence, that we may continue to further the law of peace and work and health we are told that we are preparing for and promoting war. We are doing nothing of the kind. We are trying to make the national position secure to enable the law of peace, work and health to prevail and progress. This we believe is only possible as we keep at bay those forces that are making for death and destruction.

And again:

By all means, let us make the most of our friendship with the United States. By all means, let us make the most of our friendship and kinship with Great Britain and with every other part of the British empire. By all means let us continue to be friends with every other nation, because in that direction, more perhaps than in any other, security lies. But let us realize that unless we do something to help ourselves these countries cannot be expected to help at a time of world crisis, or great peril. It is not contended that that danger is great for us. There is a danger but so far as Canada is concerned, it is, as I have already pointed out, an incidental contingency. Relatively our danger is small. Another great war, however, might lead to exposure to dangers, which might be great indeed.

May I be permitted to quote shortly from what I said on February 15, 1937:

National security, national defence, the direct defence of Canada, of our coastal areas, our ports, our shipping terminals, our territorial waters, the focal areas of our trade routes adjacent to our harbour mouths—these are the matters dealt with in these estimates. May I tell my hon. friend there is no new defence policy embodied in these estimates. There is no new policy here at all. These estimates represent only an honest attempt by those who for the time being are charged with responsibility for the national wellbeing, to see to it that we have something effective and efficient for the purposes of direct defence of Canada or for defending our neutrality should it be assailed by anyone outside.

During the course of that discussion there was in progress throughout Canada a comprehensive review from various angles of thought of the necessities of the defence policy. May I be permitted to submit to the committee this afternoon, without either comment or criticism, the various expressions of opinion that were in evidence throughout Canada during the debate in the house last year. I think it is safe to say that there were five schools of thought at that time in the dominion.

In the first place, there was what might be called the imperialistic school, which regarded Canada as an integral part of the British commonwealth, bound to support every other member of the commonwealth with military action and bound to accept the foreign policy of the United Kingdom government, whether that policy was arrived at independently or through consultation. The slogan of that school probably was: When Britain is at war Canada is at war and is bound to throw her whole weight into the conflict.

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

The second school of thought was the isolationist or nationalist or North American, which held that Canada's geographical position and economic interest required that she dissociate herself from responsibility for troubles in other parts of the world, especially Great Britain's European complications and her imperial commitments in Africa, the far east, et cetera. In wars arising from such situations, according to this school, Canada would not participate.

The third group, in my judgment, at that time consisted of league collectivists, who would have Canada participate in international obligations for peace. Some of these would go so far as to have Canada participate in military sanctions. Others would not, especially if the hostilities were remote from Canada.

The fourth group, a very minor group, were the North American collectivists, who would have Canada join the Pan-American Union as a league of nations for the western hemisphere and unite with all other American nations in taking only so much interest in European and Asiatic affairs as might be consistent with purely American interests.

The fifth and I think largest group might be termed the moderate or the middle group, believing in no automatic commitments either for military action or for neutrality. These would join with Great Britain or with the league in war for a principle or for the safety of the liberty of the world if convinced that that liberty was seriously threatened. But they refuse to imperil Canadian unity by accepting in advance either one of the two following propositions: first, that when Great Britain is at war Canada must automatically go to her support with all her resources; or secondly, that when the league orders sanctions, Canada is bound to take action.

This I think is by far the largest group of Canadian public opinion; it was last year and I believe is this year, and the formula is that parliament, representing the public opinion and the public sentiments of the Dominion of Canada, must decide on every occasion as these issues arise. With reference to that sentiment the following declaration was made:

In practice this will not mean a rigid policy expressing itself in automatic action or inaction as trouble arises, but a policy in keeping with conditions and circumstances. In so far as we come to parliament with an expression of our opinion we will give it to parliament from the point of view that a certain course should be taken because, having regard to all the circumstances existing at the time, we believe it to be in Canada's interests it should be taken.

Mr. STIRLING: Whose statement is that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is the Prime Minister of Canada speaking.

Having had the benefit of what was a very evident clarification of the issues surrounding public sentiment regarding the defence policy for Canada both in this house and in journals outside, ministers representing the government of Canada, the Prime Minister and four of his colleagues, were privileged to take part in that great imperial conference of 1937. To conclude the continuity of quotation with reference to the evolution of the present defence policy of Canada, based not upon any historic conference but upon the realization by those responsible for government in this country of the necessities of Canada at the present time, may I put on the record one or two short quotations from the findings of the imperial conference of 1937. But may I be permitted, first of all, to make this declaration, that every single minister who represented Canada at that imperial conference in 1937 was bound regarding declarations made there with reference to national defence or foreign policy, by the declarations made to this parliament during the debates last year, and no pronouncement of any kind was made during those discussions of the imperial conference except along lines similar to the pronouncements made in this house a year ago.

Referring to defence, the official findings of the imperial conference have these words:

The conference gave close attention to the subject of defence, and considered ways in which it would be possible for the governments concerned to cooperate in measures for their own security. The occasion was taken for a detailed review of the state of defence in each of the countries represented at the conference and this opportunity was generally welcomed. . . .

The members of the conference noted with deep concern that since the session of 1930, international tension had increased in a marked degree, and that there had been a large and rapid increase in the armaments of all the principal powers. They were impressed by the world-wide effect of these increased armaments on the international situation and on the financial and economic position of the nations concerned, and while their respective parliaments had already recognized the necessity for taking measures to put their defences in order, they thought it of the highest importance that negotiations for the limitation of armaments should be reopened whenever there was a reasonable prospect of success. They recognized with regret that . . . international conditions were not at the moment favourable to further progress in the direction of disarmament.

And this final quotation from the findings of the imperial conference:

In the course of the discussions, the conference found general agreement among its members that the security of each of their countries can be increased by cooperation in such matters as the free interchange of information concerning the state of their naval, military and air forces, the continuance of the arrangements already initiated by some of them for concerting the scale of the defences of ports, and measures for cooperation in the defence of communications and other common interests.

Then this vitally important paragraph:

At the same time the conference recognized that it is the sole responsibility of the several parliaments of the British commonwealth to decide the nature and scope of their own defence policy.

This is very important—the conference recognized that it is the sole responsibility of each parliament of the commonwealth to decide the nature and scope of its own defence policy. That is all I intend to say, Mr. Chairman, with reference to the historical continuity of the evolution of what is to-day the defence policy of Canada.

Now I come very briefly to review the activities consequent upon the expenditures authorized by parliament in 1937. The main estimates voted last year were, roughly speaking, $36,000,000. The purposes for which these were asked were described in parliament in great detail in the debate to which I have alluded. May I say immediately that substantial progress has been achieved through the year in carrying out the program which was then described. Additional equipment, supplies, structures and premises have been acquired, and part of the increased vote went for pay and allowances and maintenance of an increased personnel in the naval and air services. Increased training for the militia was also provided.

Speaking directly of the naval service, there was last year for pay and allowances an increase of $358,000, partly accounted for by the pay and allowances of an increased complement of 13 officers and 360 ratings, as the new destroyers that were purchased last year from Great Britain required a greater complement than the old destroyers, which were demilitarized. The personnel also of the new mine-sweeeprs now under construction had to be trained. The net increase in the complement of the naval services was 345, including ten officers. The complement of the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve was increased from 875 ratings to 1,017 ratings.

In regard to stores and allowances, amongst the items acquired were naval guns and mountings; torpedoes; ammunition for guns, including service and practice outfits; anti-submarine defences for Esquimalt and Halifax; mine-sweeping outfits, and anti-submarine equipment of various kinds for ships.

Four new mine-sweepers are now under construction, and they can be discussed in detail when we come to the items that concern them.

With reference to the militia services item, there was an increase of $3,372,000. The chief purposes of these increases were as follows: to provide better training for the non-permanent militia; to provide for preliminary work on new coast defence fortifications, chiefly on the Pacific coast; to add to the supply of ammunition and technical equipment, and for the construction of new buildings and works required for the activities of the several services.

Coming to the non-permanent active militia, there was an increase there of $220,000, nine-tenths of which was applied to improving the training efficiency of the non-permanent forces. To give details: Fortress and anti-aircraft troops were given nine days' extra training; infantry troops were given two days' extra training, and the minimum of five days in camp for all cavalry and infantry units was reintroduced after some years. This meant an increased cost of $132,000. Other increases were occasioned by the tactical training of officers, the numbers attending the militia staff courses, and qualifying courses for personnel of units converted by reorganization.

Coming to the permanent force increase of $168,000, an increase of about three per cent, this is accounted for in part by increase in personnel of 22 officers and 173 other ranks. This was somewhat offset because 9 officers and 80 other ranks who were on the strength of the Royal Canadian Corps of Signals were previously included in the estimates for civil aviation and are now transferred to the Department of National Defence. There was an increase in the ration allowance from 26·17 cents to 29·90 cents, accounting for a total sum of $40,000. For concentrated training the units of the Royal Canadian Dragoons, the Royal Canadian Horse Artillery and two companies of the Royal Canadian Regiment were brought together for the first time in years for training in larger formations.

With reference to construction, there was an increase last year of $188,000. This was devoted to normal maintenance, to coast defence works, to new constuction of $1,000,000, and revotes on the year previous. Four new projects on the Pacific coast were undertaken with the amount of $895,000 allocated for coast defence works. The four important projects were: Albert Head, estimated to cost about $557,000; Fort Macaulay reconstruction, about $30,000; York Island Battery, about $125,000; and Stanley Park Battery, about $182,000. Construction works were also carried out at Barriefield (Kingston), Esquimalt, Ottawa, Halifax and Dartmouth, St. Johns, Kamloops, Valcartier, Trenton, Montreal, Hamilton, Quebec, and on the various camps of Petawawa, Shilo, and Currie Barracks, Calgary; at Winnipeg and at London, Ontario.

In regard to general stores, there was an increase of nearly $3,000,000. This was for the increase of the stores of ammunition and to obtain new and modern equipment necessary for the mechanization of the militia as decided upon in last year's reorganization.

Under direction of the Master General of the Ordnance with the cooperation of the navy, army and air force supply committee, a survey has been made of certain industrial undertakings in Canada with reference to their capacity for manufacturing requirements of the department. They have surveyed now over 700 firms in the dominion, and very soon, I believe, that work will be practically finished and a complete classification will be made in the department.

In regard to general stores, orders for ammunition for coast and mobile artillery were placed and a beginning was made in the establishment of a small domestic shell making industry; the productive capacity of the dominion arsenal at Quebec was increased; and orders have been placed for a limited amount of modern technical equipment, chiefly for instructional purposes at central schools and for mechanical transport for the permanent force.

The increase of approximately $3,000,000 was largely utilized in connection with the following major items: To complete payment on equipment ordered in 1936-37 and not delivered until 1937-38; for the acquisition of trucks and adapters to convert gun carriages for use with mechanized transport and otherwise in connection with the development of mechanized artillery and other equipment; for two light tanks and other training equipment for the training of newly established tank battalions; for four anti-tank guns and seven anti-tank rifles with ammunition; for coast defence armament; for coast defence ammunition; for field gun ammunition; for an inspection building at Quebec arsenal, and signal equipment; for operations of the navy, army and air supply committee and its functions in the matter of inspecting stores, arms and ammunition; for the operation of the dominion arsenal at Quebec for the production of small arm ammunition, due to the greater production, which is greater than last year by $198,000; and finally, for anti-gas respirators and other camp and barrack equipment.

With reference to the air services, there was an increase last year, as hon. members will recall, of $6,706,000. The authorized strength of the Royal Canadian Air Force was increased from 1,080 to 1,730, an increase of 650. The expansion during the last year was mainly concentrated on the completing of existing units rather than on the increasing of the number of units. Three new training schools were established—a wireless school, an equipment training school, and a technical training school. Individual training was given to 643 persons, including 40 militia officers and 11 members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

As regards flying time, individual training occupied 5,435 hours, unit training 5,200 hours, operations 4,285 hours, and civil government air operations 1,731 hours.

In regard to stores and equipment, as hon. members will recall, last year's estimates made provision for the acquisition of 102 aircraft, including the 5 Stranraer flying boats ordered in 1936-37. In addition 137 engines were ordered, 38 with the aircraft and 99 ordered separately. A substantial increase has been made in the reserve of bombs and ammunition; and parachute equipment acquired in addition to replacements constitutes mobilization equipment for eight squadrons.

With reference to construction, there was an increase over the previous year of $1,742,000. These moneys were spent largely at Trenton and Vancouver. At Vancouver the year's expenditure was approximately $625,000 for the barrack block, the completion of two hangars, and a bombing range. A site for an advanced air base on Queen Charlotte islands has been acquired at Aliford Bay at a cost of $13,840, and magazines for stores have been established on the Pacific coast at Esquimalt and Kamloops. In Nova Scotia an expenditure of $335,000 was undertaken last year. The development of the Yarmouth aerodrome absorbed $245,000 for the purchase, of land, clearing and grading. At Dartmouth $86,000 has been spent on the purchase of land and clearance. At Dartmouth seaplane station $55,000 has been spent, chiefly on the completion of a workshop and boiler house, but including paving and grading work. By the end of the fiscal year, it is expected, sites will have been acquired at Sydney and Truro and a floating dock at Dartmouth seaplane station contracted for. These three items will aggregate approximately $46,000. Developments have also taken place at Rockcliffe, near Ottawa.

With regard to non-permanent Royal Canadian Air Force personnel, units have been formed at various centres throughout Canada, namely at Toronto, Vancouver, Winnipeg, Montreal (two squadrons), Hamilton and Regina, and formation of squadrons at Calgary and Quebec is under way. In certain places the program has been somewhat delayed by the lack of proper training accommodation. The authorized expansion for the non-permanent Royal Canadian Air Force was from 97 officers and 666 other ranks to 118 officers and 946 other ranks.

As regards the training of the Royal Canadian Air Force non-permanent section: Seven squadrons carried out unit training, four units attended fourteen days annual summer training camp, seven non-permanent officers attended the initial armament course at Trenton, and the Winnipeg squadron carried out a small amount of army cooperation with the militia. The flying time for the non-permanent units was 5,360 hours. As regards stores and equipment, orders were placed last year for eleven new aircraft for the non-permanent air force. Small sums for construction were expended at Toronto, Winnipeg, Vancouver and Regina.

This brings me to the last division of air operations in Canada, namely civil government air operations. The decrease last year in the vote was $153,987. Four aircraft were delivered in 1937 and four additional planes have been ordered out of the funds of the current year. The program of operations is supervised by the interdepartmental committee on air surveys and base maps. Last year eight aircraft were used on photography, with additional planes transporting supplies between bases in the Northwest Territories and northern Ontario. Two were operated in northern Ontario and Quebec, two in British Columbia, and four in the Northwest Territories, the total flying hours being 1,731; and all these were equipped with wireless, at a cost of $16,000, the total cost of photographic service being $100,000.

That brings me up to the estimates now before the committee, the estimates for 1938-39. Let me say at once that the purpose of these estimates is to continue work that was commenced last year, and within the same definite limitations announced to this house a year ago: in the first place, for the preservation of Canadian neutrality; in the second place for the defence of our Canadian coast line, the defence of our ports and terminals, and the defence of the focal areas of our trade routes in case of necessity. A certain amount of priority has been established after deliberation: first for the air services; secondly, for naval defence; and thirdly, in regard to the repairing of deficiencies in equipment of militia services, permanent and non-permanent. During the coming year it is proposed to acquire two new destroyers; seventy-five new aircraft, fifty-five for the permanent force and twenty for the non-permanent; additional weapons and munitions and other equipment for all three services. It is proposed to increase the training of the militia forces and to construct the second stage of the fortification works on the Pacific coast, for the first stage of which, authority was received from parliament over a year ago.

There is a total reduction in the vote from last year of $2,000,007. The number of aircraft has been reduced from 102 to 75, accounting for part of the reduction. The building construction program of last year is fairly well advanced to completion, accounting for another part of the reduction. Difficulty has been experienced with reference to obtaining deliveries, and that has accounted for another part of the reduction. There is an increase in the naval service of $1,938,311. This is to provide for the purchase of two destroyers from England, exactly of the same type, the same class as the two we obtained last year. Of the total, four will be stationed on the Pacific coast and two on the Atlantic. This is in pursuance of a definite statement made to the house last year, that the government was disposed to give priority to considerations affecting our problems on the Pacific.

The increase in the Royal Canadian Navy personnel will be as follows: As a result of these two new vessels the establishment will be increased by two officers and 240 ratings. The new establishment will then consist of 119 officers and 1,462 ratings; and the establishment of the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve is to be increased from 77 officers and 1,015 ratings to 123 officers and 1,344 ratings. The total increase in all ranks is 375.

May I refer in passing to the resolution put upon the order paper by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) with reference to the establishment of a fishermen's reserve as part of the Royal Canadian Naval reserve. In my opinion the resolution was a very timely one indeed, and had it been reached on the order paper the government would have been pleased to accept it. As a matter of fact, two months before this session convened instructions were given to one of our most distinguished naval officers in Canada, who received the Victoria Cross at Zeebrugge, to undertake an investigation of the possibility of establishing a fishermen's reserve on the Pacific coast; and once that is done it will be followed by the establishment of a similar reserve on the Atlantic. I am glad to say, therefore, to my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni that his resolution has already been acted upon and will be followed by the department in connection with the naval services.

The reduction in air services this year in the estimates before the committee is $1,017,000, but that is occasioned by a reduction in the number of planes to be obtained. This will be accompanied, of course, in the air services, by an increase in personnel from 1,590 to 2,070. This new establishment of the air forces will now comprise 247 officers and 1,823 other ranks. The establishment of the air force will be increased from 103 to 144 permanent force and instructional staff and from 1,064 to 1,312 non-permanent personnel. So that you may envision the exact situation with reference to our air forces in Canada, I may say that after the purpose of these estimates is carried out it will provide for the partial organization and development of two additional squadrons, making ten in all. The non-permanent air force has at present nine squadrons in various stages of development, and this year's estimates authorize the initial organization of three more, making twelve in all. Thus, by the end of the year Canada will have in being, ten permanent force squadrons, and twelve non-permanent force squadrons, or a total of twenty-two air squadrons, although these will not by that time be fully equipped and manned. It will be seen, therefore, that we are approaching very closely to the objective indicated in the debate a year ago of twenty-three squadrons, eleven permanent and twelve non-permanent. With the completion of this year's orders the department will have 102 modern service aircraft, partial equipment for ten squadrons of the permanent air force; 62 training aircraft for the new personnel of the permanent air force; and 60 training craft of various types to meet the requirements of ab initio, advanced and service training for the twelve non-permanent squadrons. Work will be carried out this year on the development of aerodromes and air bases as follows: On the Pacific coast—Aliford bay, Queen Charlotte islands; Patricia bay near Victoria; and Prince Rupert. On the Atlantic coast—Dartmouth, Yarmouth, Truro, and Sydney.

Substantial additions will also be made to the reserves of service ammunition for the air force during the year. The new magazine in the interior of British Columbia will be completed and a magazine near the Atlantic coast will be provided.

Let me now say just one word with reference to the functions of the air force in connection with the government's program. A well equipped and efficient air force is, in my opinion, of primary importance for the protection of Canadian territory and waters, and in view of the rapidly increasing performance of modern aircraft the possibility of attack by such means is to-day a probability. Apart from its value as a highly mobile striking force capable of rapid concentration at any point in Canada, it is alsq required to assist the other services in their particular role of defence: in the first place, independent air action against enemy aircraft and bases, and air action in conjunction with ground anti-aircraft defences of important localities; in the second place cooperation with naval forces in the protection of trade routes and focal points of shipping; and thirdly, cooperation with the militia by observation of coast artillery fire and assistance in the suppression of enemy landings and raids.

With reference to the militia services, in the present estimates there is a reduction of $2,733,216, accounted for by the fact that deliveries cannot be made and the amount is regarded as fairly reasonable. In regard to the non-permanent militia, provision is made for an additional day's training and for more camp training instead of training at headquarters. In regard to the permanent militia, provision has been made for increased training and allowances, has also been made for the increased costs of rations and fuel. In regard to fortifications, $1,000,000 has been allotted for the fortifications on the Pacific coast. Last year the amount was $895,000. In regard to general stores, provision is being made for the acquisition of coast defence guns and mountings, fire control equipment and communications; anti-aircraft guns and mountings; machine guns, mortars and anti-tank weapons and field battery headquarters equipment; searchlights, both mobile and fixed; mechanical transports, includings tanks, and ammunition. It is anticipated that delivery cannot be obtained during the coming year of all the equipment which is to be ordered, and the funds provided in these estimates will cover the extent to which deliveries are anticipated during the year.

With reference to militia services there has been carried out by the department what is known as an interim plan of armaments for both coasts. This is a result of the fact that heavy ordnance cannot be acquired from British concerns for a period of about three years. But interim plans have been carefully prepared, in collaboration with an expert adviser, and these estimates are to provide in part for the completion of these interim plans. As I have said, these plans have priority on the Pacific coast, but eventually they will apply to the Atlantic coast as well. In regard to the survey that was made last year, that has been concluded on both coasts, and a complete plan is available in the department with reference to the defence of both coasts of the Dominion of Canada.

The next consideration, therefore, is this: Having analysed the general principle of defence policy; having explained what was done with the money voted last year; having made a brief review of the estimates for this year, what are the actual problems before a general staff with reference to the defence of Canada? In the first place, what are the possible dangers, and in the second place what are the objectives of the department in preparing plans to meet them? Some of our critics might say that these estimates are inadequate. Others might say that possibly they will involve commitments. Others might say that any policy of military preparedness is a contribution to the international armaments race. With reference to commitments may I say that none exist. With reference to the adequacy of the estimates may I say that they are carefully prepared to meet the situations supposed to be those with which we might be confronted. In regard to the militaristic point of view, I think every member of this government and every member of this house would be very glad indeed if these moneys did not have to be spent on national defence at this time. But we must meet the conditions in which we live. These are most disturbing times, with the international situation full of tremendous possibilities of danger and disaster, and we owe it to our people, we owe it to our duty towards the security of Canada, to do something reasonable and rational to protect our people and our country.

The purpose of the armed forces of any country I think may be threefold: In the first place, to support peace time diplomacy; in the second place to provide a deterrent to aggressive nations; and in the third place in case of hostilities to be used after the methods of diplomacy have failed. The interests to be defended by arms, if that regrettable necessity should arise in Canada, are first of all the protection of our Canadian territory, and in these estimates, Mr. Chairman, there is not the slightest suggestion of aggression or of menace against any person or any country in the whole world. They are all based upon what is reasonably assumed to be necessary for the defence of our Canadian territory, and

I feel sure that everyone, not only in this House of Commons but throughout Canada, if the need should ever arise is prepared in the ultimate issue to defend the homes and institutions of our people in this dominion. I feel that is a reasonable assumption. Then we have the defence of those institutions of learning, the cultural institutions and the great bequests of justice and freedom which are ours, despite economic strife in this country. As someone has said in regard to the essential requirements of the defence of Canada, patriotism and pacifism are combined in a positive form and a positive faith. The second necessity would be in regard to our foreign trade. We are an exporting and importing nation. We produce tremendous quantities of food supplies, and in case of an emergency between two belligerents that would bring its own economic consequences. Therefore Canada must be ready to preserve her neutrality and to defend herself against raids from any quarter.

In regard to the exact position of Canada it is only fair to say that to-day the main deterrent against a major attack upon this country by a European power is the existence of the British fleet in north Atlantic waters. An attack on Canada's overseas trade at the most congested points on our coasts in the opinion of those most competent to observe and advise would be limited to minor raiding forces. Just as the British navy on the Atlantic is our greatest security in that quarter so I think it might be reasonable to assume that in a major conflagration we should have friendly fleets upon the Pacific ocean, and the severity of raids upon our western seaboard would be limited by the strength and the position of these friendly fleets. Our major defensive buffer on the Pacific coast is not the Pacific ocean alone but the existence there of friendly fleets. There is no commitment or understanding in regard to these matters, but at this time I think reasonable assumptions are justifiable.

Now, sir, in regard to the scale of attacks upon Canadian territory or Canadian ports or terminals, these are considered by the experts who are supposed to be qualified to offer advice to be, in the first place, minor attacks by combined sea, land and air forces, to destroy something of strategic or commercial value, or to secure an advanced base of operations, and this applies to coasts, to focal sea areas and to the preservation of Canadian neutrality; in the second place, sporadic hit and run raids by light cruisers or submarines to destroy our main ports and focal sea areas. If that be the situation; if that is a correct description of potential dangers, then what are the defensive requirements needed in Canada to meet them? In the first place, for the defence of our focal sea areas we require sea and air forces capable of finding and destroying hostile service craft, submarine or aircraft raiders, and this requires aircraft and naval strength. That is why the small naval force of Canada is being increased by two destroyers at the present time. A slight increase in our naval forces is vital and essential, in cooperation with air and militia services, for the preservation of our neutrality, and the defence of our focal areas, our trade routes, our terminals and our ports. Secondly, for the defence of our main ports we have the anti-aircraft defences, army cooperation aircraft, fighting aircraft and ground troops. For the preservation of our neutrality it is considered that the requirements are a constant patrol of the coastal areas by auxiliary services, aircraft and bombing craft, and troops.

May I, therefore, summarize the situation in regard to defence policy. The task of a defence policy in Canada to-day is, first, to decide on the broad defensive requirements necessary to give effective protection to national interests which if necessary should be protected by force of arms; second, to define the individual and collective functions of each part of the broad defensive organization; third, to decide on the organization, strength, composition, equipment and distribution of the sea, land and air forces as demanded by their individual and collective tasks; fourth, to permit of effective organization, to control, coordinate and provide for not only the activities of the three fighting services in peace and war but of the whole national effort in war, and fifth, to provide the funds necessary to give effect to the requirements, I have just stated.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, may I say this: I have endeavoured to review Canada's defence policy up to the conclusion of the imperial conference of 1937. I have analysed the estimates of 1937-38 and the purposes behind the estimates of 1938-39. I have endeavoured to deal with the actual necessities confronting Canada, and the requirements of defence to meet these potential perils.

When, sir, as we do now, we contemplate the broad principles of Canadian defence, and endeavour to define with some particularity the responsibilities that rest with governments; when, as now, we are confronted with very grave international problems which at any moment may explode against the ordered progress of our national life in the Dominion of Canada; when we realize that the greatest necessity in Canada in regard to defence and other policies is the unity of our Canadian people; when we realize that no policy having regard either to national defence or to foreign affairs which does violence to Canadian unity is of very great value either to us in Canada or to others outside; when we witness the apparently inevitable divisions of modern nations into the friends of freedom and the friends of force; when the nations of democracy seem to be driven to the defence of their ideals against the nations of the dictators—if the clash is inevitable, and if the clash must come; if the cherished liberties of our civilization are imperilled, then it is that perhaps Canada, seeking to preserve national unity, must look back to the beginnings of her history, must assess the great treasure of culture that came from old France and the institution of ordered government that came from Great Britain; must realize how much the union of the great national legacies meant to the early days of settlement and of government, and also looking to the newer land to the south, consolidated through a valiant insistence upon the tradition of freedom; must be prepared, for the preservation of the best there is in these three nations and the best there is within her own boundaries—the best there is in democracy itself—to take her stand, if need be, against brute force and might and ruthlessness, and, if need be, for high purposes to endure sore travail.

We are a free people. We are very free, but we are still subject in this Canadian land to old kinships, old sentiments and very old loyalties. We, all of us in this country, love peace. We hate and despise war. Governments with great sincerity proclaim policies and pronounce dogmas, but no matter what the dictates of government may be, the people and the opinion of the people always decide the ultimate issues.

In my judgment, Canada is definitely opposed to extraneous commitments of any kind and to any type of extraneous entanglements. But public opinion in Canada to-day is in favour of a rational policy composed of reasonable measures for the defence of Canada. And public opinion in Canada, the opinion of the people, regardless of the action or inaction of any government, in the final analysis will decide the issues which may arise in the future.

All we can do, then, in this house at the present time, in the consideration of these estimates, is, in the spirit of that old Greek sailor mentioned by Seneca, in the spirit of real unity, to do the best we can:

> O Lord; you may sink me, if you will; you may save me, if you will; but at least I will keep my rudder true.

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie) (Translation): The armament estimates provide the members of the house this year as last, with an opportunity to state their views on the question of national defence. I intend to deal with the subject, as I did on a former occasion, without regard to sentimental or ideological considerations, but in the light of facts and from the sole standpoint of Canada's best interests.

May I begin by briefly recalling the circumstances which attended the voting of the defence appropriations for the last fiscal year?

The consideration of last year's estimates was preceded by an educational campaign which assumed various forms; for weeks and months we were the object of a sustained effort designed to develop in this country an imperialistic sentiment. The London Times went so far as to hint that the dominions would assume part of the cost of British rearmament. The combination of war preparations in Europe and increased military appropriations in Canada afforded some reason for doubt, to say the least, particularly on the eve of an imperial conference.

In view of our geographical position and the international situation, existing at that time, all causes of conflict having apparently disappeared—the conquest of Ethiopia having become an accomplished and accepted fact; Germany having, by scrapping the Treaty of Versailles and reoccupying the Rhine demilitarized zone, satisfied its pride; Japan giving no cause for uneasiness; and the gentleman's agreement concluded between Great Britain and Italy on January 2, 1937, having apparently settled the difficulties which had arisen in connection with Spain and the Mediterranean—I could not see at that time any danger of attack justifying an increase which seemed to me disproportionate to our needs and our means.

I asked for particulars and guarantees, but those I received did not seem to me to be sufficient.

Nevertheless, though refusing my support, I stated my readiness to vote any amount required to ensure the defence of Canada, but in Canada only. I asserted my opposition to any participation in a foreign war and to any preparations for such a purpose.

We were told that the appropriation was solely for the defence of Canada. But when I asked the Minister of National Defence where our first line of defence was, I obtained no definite reply carrying any reassurance, but rather an evasive answer tending to inspire if not fear, at least serious doubt, for the dispelling of which not a single statement issued from the government before the vote was taken.

Such were the circumstances of my refusal to vote for the increased appropriation. My opposition, mark you well, was based not so much on the expenditure involved as on the fear that it was intended for war outside of Canada.

Has there occurred any change in the situation since then, either in Canada or elsewhere?

In the months of May and June last, there was held in London an imperial conference at which defence was the chief subject of discussion. Despite the appeals of those who wished to involve Canada in a policy of imperial defence, our delegates showed a most commendable attitude.

The Summary of Proceedings states that the Conference recognized that:

it is the sole responsibility of the several parliaments of the British commonwealth to decide the nature and scope of their own defence policy.

and that:

the increased programs of armaments were no more than sufficient for the defence of their (that is, the countries represented) territories and trade and the fulfilment of such obligations as each might have assumed.

Then the Prime Minister, in a speech he delivered on his return from the Conference, spoke as follows:

Canada made no agreement to participate in any military campaign undertaken by the empire or the League of Nations.

These definite statements show the truly Canadian attitude adopted by our ministers. They serve, Mr. Chairman, to dispel the apprehensions raised by the increased appropriations of last year.

Here is another important fact. Last October a highly-placed man made the following remark:

Canada is a sovereign nation and a Canadian's first duty is not to the British commonwealth but to Canada.

Then came the Lotbinière and St. Henry elections.

The hon. member for Lotbinière reminded the House of the statements made throughout the campaign, in which the Minister of Justice and the Minister of National Health took part. He said:

My friends and I stated at every public meeting that we were in favour of defending our country, that we believed that our first line of defence was now in Canada, but that we were against spending one cent to arm or equip an expeditionary force—in short that we did not intend to take part in any foreign war.

[Mr. Raymond.]

The same language was used in St. Henry where the Minister of Public Works and the Secretary of State asserted their opposition to joining in any foreign war and stated that not one cent of the 1937 appropriation had gone into preparations for war outside of Canada.

The Minister of National Defence, called upon for a statement, affirmed that—the estimates contained no appropriation for an expeditionary force, but provided only for the defence of Canada against those who might attack us or violated our neutrality.

And on January 21st last the Minister of Justice said to the delegates of the Federation of National Catholic Unions:

I notice that your brief contains this sentence: The Federation of National Catholic Unions is against Canada's participating in any foreign war. Such is also my view of the matter.

Finally, the estimates for the coming fiscal year show a reduction of $4,551,401 in the contested items.

All these facts, Mr. Chairman, tend to set our minds at rest regarding the aims of the government's defence policy.

I now come to the international field. The situation abroad, dominated by the armaments race, is far from reassuring. Fortunately Canada does not appear to be taking part in the race with any hope of winning, as she has diminished her appropriations while other countries have considerably increased theirs.

Let us examine the sequence of events.

Italy which, since the Ethiopian conquest, one would be inclined to class among the satisfied nations, is becoming more and more threatening; she asks her people for guns instead of bread.

Germany wants colonies and wants to obtain them by force rather than by compromise. "Less and less butter and more and more guns," was the statement recently made by a minister of the Reich. Germany seeks to extend her influence wherever there are Germans.

Japan, which we thought happy since her conquest of Manchuria, has developed a still greater desire to expand. One wonders where she will stop.

Nations no longer consider themselves bound by treaties. They adhere to them only so long as it serves their interest to do so.

These three great nations do not hesitate to say that they place their reliance on force and antagonism. They have made an agreement known as the Berlin-Rome-Tokyo axis. Though threatened by no one, all three consent to the greatest sacrifices in order madly to arm themselves by day and by night. For what purpose? Not to defend themselves, for no one thinks of attacking them.

So we see small, peace-minded countries of Europe, like Sweden, Holland, Belgium, Switzerland and others increase their armaments in order to defend their territory, to defend their neutrality.

Let us look further into the matter. What is Italy's present policy? Though no one is disputing her colonial empire, she is increasing her fighting capacity, despite her poverty.

Notwithstanding the gentleman's agreement which she signed with England on January 2, 1937, she continued her intervention in Spain not for the purpose of obtaining foodstuffs to improve the condition of her people, but in order to obtain raw materials needed for war. She has designs on all sides—in Spain, in Africa, in Egypt and elsewhere.

She is maintaining three armies outside of her home territory: one in Ethiopia, one in Lybia and a third in Spain, which are exhausting her resources. With an army, a navy and an air force whose needs are constantly increasing, she is practically devoid of coal and oil.

While claiming that her conquest of Ethiopia was dictated by vital necessity, her actions show that her policy is a policy of aggression and that she cherishes designs of conquest and domination.

The statements uttered by Mussolini at the beginning of the year regarding the laying down of further units do not indicate any slackening in that respect.

Germany's policy is still more alarming. Having torn up the Treaty of Versailles, of which only the territorial clauses and the dispossession of her colonies are left, having freed herself from all the restrictions imposed upon her national sovereignty, having provided herself with a formidable army equipped with modernized artillery, and an air force daily becoming more powerful, she intends reconquering her colonial empire, with the aid of Mussolini, whose visit to Berlin in September last has consolidated the alliance of the Italian and German peoples.

On November 20, 1937, Hitler said:

> Within six years, Germany shall have reconquered her colonies.

On December 10, Mr. Goebbels declared:

> Naturally, the four-year plan is also intended for war.

On December 12 when Mussolini announced Italy's resignation from the League of Nations he said, with a flourish of his sword:

> On land, on sea and in the air, our arms are numerous and sharp.

And Hitler, in his speech of February 20, spoke as follows:

> Year after year Germany will insist more and more on the return of its former colonies of which she was deprived by nations who have no use for them, while for us they are indispensable.

The return of the colonies remains one of the articles of the program which Hitler and Mussolini are together seeking to carry out.

Encouraged by the success of her foreign policy, strengthened by her military revival, Germany has been demanding with ever-increasing insistence the return of her former colonies ever since Mussolini gave Italy's official approval to her claims at a great Fascist demonstration held in Rome last November. And she seeks to justify her colonial claims by economic reasons.

Let us see whether these claims are based on real economic need or simply on considerations of prestige.

In the course of a speech which he delivered in March, 1937, at the International Academy of Diplomacy in Geneva, Mr. Amery, a former Secretary of State for the Colonies and Dominions in the British government, showed with the aid of statistics that > —before the war the German colonies played a negligible part in the Reich economy; all together they accounted for only six-tenths of one per cent (0·6%) of Germany's exports and five-tenths of one per cent (0·5%) of her imports.

The loss of her colonies has obviously not prevented Germany from obtaining the supplies she needed and their restoration would not suffice to alleviate her scarcity of raw materials. In any case, Germany has since the war traded with her former colonies now under mandate on a footing of absolute equality with all the other powers, and she sells to them more than she buys from them.

As for essential raw materials, statistics show that 90 per cent of the world production comes from independent countries and only 10 per cent from colonies properly so called.

Are the colonies necessary for the settlement of a surplus German population?

The answer is no, for in 1914 there were only 24,000 Germans in all the German colonies, of which only 18,000 were on the African continent. Moreover, if Germany needs space for her surplus population, how is it that she has just concluded with Italy an agreement under which she is to admit 30,000 labourers for farm work in the spring?

In order to satisfy Germany, it would be necessary to redraw the boundaries of the entire world. And there is reason to believe that Germany's desire to recover her colonies is based on considerations of strategy or of prestige and pride.

How far will she go in the direction of territorial claims to satisfy her hunger for domination? Hitler's recent speech and the Austrian developments are rather disquieting. The Chancellor, speaking to the whole world, made known his intention to take under his protection the German minorities living in the neighbouring states. We might well ask ourselves, what next? There are now in Germany four to five million men employed in armament plants. And press dispatches report that the conscription has been decreed of all youths leaving school in order to enroll them in production.

Military conscription, economic conscription, everything tends towards war. Every budget contains national defence appropriations. The new improved motor roads were built with strategical uses in mind. From May, 1935, to November, 1937, Germany is said to have expended 8 billions of dollars in armaments and she has not finished. Where will all this lead to? Lucien Romier stated the question as follows in its relation to the Japanese aggression:

> Seeing Japan make such profitable use of her armaments, how much longer will Germany, strained to the utmost, and Italy, exhausted by her efforts, restrain themselves from attempting to obtain some benefit from their own armaments?

The attitude shown by Japan since last summer has injected into the international situation a new element of uneasiness and is most ominous for Canada. This new Japanese invasion of China has once more upset the friends of peace.

A proletarian nation, Japan, according to a French economist, has managed, without having in its islands a single raw material, to attain third place among the industrial empires of the world. Her population is overflowing. Had she not in Manchuria, which she conquered, and in her other possessions a sufficient outlet and source of supply? Nevertheless, without a declaration of war, she launches her forces once more upon China in quest of additional territory. It seems obvious that Japan, either to obtain raw materials for its industries and space for its surplus population or to enhance her imperial prestige, seeks to dominate the Pacific. In any case, at the end of December or the beginning of January a Japanese minister, Admiral Suyetsugu, launched an appeal to the yellow race to free itself from the domination of the white race.

Ever since last summer the Japanese have been bombarding civilian populations and attacking neutral ships. In August last the British ambassador was machine-gunned while travelling from Nanking to Shanghai. Later on the American ship "Panay" was sunk and the British ship "Lady Bird" bombarded.

Whether it is a matter of economics or prestige, it is certain that Japan is pursuing a great war of conquest which not only affects China, but threatens the interests and even the possessions of other nations. The question is how far her ambition extends. Is she aiming at the conquest of the whole world?

In the face of the alarming attitude of these three great warlike nations which have joined forces in the Rome-Berlin-Tokyo axis, the other nations which do not desire war have deemed it wise to undertake themselves rearmament programs of inconceivable proportions. Great Britain's program for this year involves an expenditure of 1,700 millions of dollars. That of France, 1,000 millions of dollars. That of the United States, 1,200 millions. And smaller nations such as Holland, Sweden, Belgium, Switzerland, to name only a few of them, fearing the worst, have increased their armament appropriations to an extent that compels them to practise the most rigid economy in other matters.

The uneasiness felt by every country in Europe has crossed the seas and affected our neighbour the United States. In the early part of the year President Roosevelt proposed an expenditure of more than one billion dollars to strengthen his navy and aviation, specifying that it was not for purposes of aggression but solely for national defence. To Chairman Taylor, of the House of Representatives Appropriations Committee, he said:

> Recent international developments have caused me a great deal of uneasiness. . . . It is my duty to maintain a jealous watch over national defence. When I say uneasiness, I have no particular nation in mind. It cannot be denied that many nations of the world are constantly increasing their armaments. I have made every possible effort to stop this disastrous race, but I have not succeeded. Facts cannot be denied. The United States, like all other nations, must recognize them.

Mr. Cordell Hull, Secretary of State of the United States, reaffirmed the ends sought by his country in its defence program. In a letter of February 12 last to Democratic Representative Ludlow, after stating that while guarding from extreme isolation the government wishes to avoid all alliances and entanglements, he said:

> If every peaceful nation were to insist on remaining entirely aloof from every other peaceful nation and on pursuing a policy of armament limitation without reference to relative armaments, the inevitable consequence would be that other nations inclined to play lawless roles would thereby be given great encouragement and even assistance towards so doing.

And in connection with the naval rearmament program, he said:

All of the ships and auxiliary services provided for in the proposed program are needed for the national defence of the United States and its possessions. It is the desire of the people and the government of the United States that this country be not drawn into or forced into war. . . . It is the belief of those of us who, with full sense of responsibility, advocate these increases in our naval strength that the making of these increases will contribute to the attainment of that end. . . . Even with these increases, our navy would not be able to embark upon offensive or aggressive operations.

This new orientation of American policy constitutes in the international field an event of decisive importance for Canada; it determines our own policy.

Glancing at the map and contemplating the immense body of water that separates the American continent from Asia, the possibility of a successful attack appears very remote indeed. But on the other hand, if we take into account the improvement and rapidity of means of attack, if we think of the defence preparations effected in the course of the last few months by the American people, the most peaceful on earth, for the protection of their Pacific coast, which adjoins Canada—an air base at Sitka Harbour, Alaska; another one at Dutch Harbour in the heart of the Aleutian Islands, 1,380 miles from the Japanese air base on the Kuril Islands; improvements to the Hawaii Islands naval base; an aerial station at Tacoma to protect the country against a possible threat from Japan by way of the Aleutian Islands, Alaska and British Columbia—is there not cause for uneasiness on our part?

Such is the history of the past ten months. An armament race accompanied by the pursuit of raw materials. An insatiable hunger for domination. World peace threatened from all sides by the dictatorships. The minds of these people instead of being directed towards peace are more and more directed towards war. The whole world is arming.

According to recent documents from Geneva, the expenditure on armaments in 1937 amounted to 33 million dollars a day, and it will be still greater in 1938.

In the face of such an international situation, where do we stand? Are we exposed to attack or to a violation of our neutrality? Wherein lies the guarantee of our security?

The League of Nations had for a time given hopes of security to peaceful nations. Unfortunately, following a series of successive failures, she has lost the means of preventing conflicts. I will remind the committee of only a few of these failures, in connection with the great powers whose actions are the cause of the greatest worry for peaceful nations.

In 1931 Japanese aggression against China in Manchuria, in defiance of three basic treaties: the Covenant of the League of Nations, the Washington treaty (also known as the nine power treaty), and the Briand-Kellogg pact.

In 1935 Italian aggression against Ethiopia, violating four treaties: the League Covenant, the three-power convention of 1906, the Briand-Kellogg pact, the Italo-Abyssinian treaty of friendship of 1928.

In 1936 Germany reenters the demilitarized zone of the Rhine, in spite of the Versailles treaty and the Locarno pact.

In each of these three cases the League of Nations bowed before the fait accompli.

As a writer has said: "The fundamental principle on which the league is based, that of collective security, crumbled down when the disheartening fatality that, even to oppose the use of force one must be in a position to use force, was made known to the world."

Is our geographical position a protection in itself? Assuredly, on account of the distance between us and the three bellicose powers, the danger of aggression is rather remote, but not entirely abolished. With modern means of transport, which are constantly being improved, and with the greater speed of aeroplanes and ships, oceans grow narrower, distances grow shorter.

Are not the United States as far away from them as we are? They entertained no apprehension last year. But, see what they are doing now. If they feel the need of protecting themselves on the Pacific, does not the same need exist for us also? In the case of a conflict between Japan and the United States, what would become of our neutrality?

Last year, Mr. Bourassa said, in connection with the military appropriations: "Against whom are we rearming? Against Japan? There might be something in the idea."

Would England or the United States protect us? As far as England is concerned, we cannot expect from her anything that goes beyond her own interest. If we want to be free from any obligation towards her that would involve us in a world war, we cannot demand anything of her. But, even if her interest compels her to defend our country, would it be possible for her to do so in a scattered war? Recent statements in the British House of Commons settle the question.

As for protection from the United States, it cannot relieve us of the duty of contributing something. And let us bear in mind that protection inspired only by interest is not to be fully relied upon. Italy conquered Ethiopia to the detriment of English interests. Japanese have taken possession of part of China to the prejudice of English and American interests. However, neither England nor the United States have intervened in defence of the countries attacked.

What country could attack or invade Canada?

We cannot think of any possible enemy. But we see countries arming themselves to the teeth, not for defence purposes, because nobody is attacking or threatening them, but with a view to conquer new territories, to strengthen their economic independence and satisfy their appetite for expansion and domination. Their attitude is becoming more and more threatening.

We cannot think of any possible enemy. But our country is endowed with unrivalled and varied resources which arouse the cupidity of those countries hankering after raw materials. The visit of German engineers to Anticosti island, last December, was prompted by the desire either to secure raw materials or to establish a military base, and one is as alarming as the other.

Ethiopia had no enemies, but she had natural resources. China had no enemies, but she was a source of supply and an outlet for the surplus population of Japan.

To-day, countries always find a way of justifying any attack.

Belgium had no enemies in 1914, her neutrality was guaranteed by a treaty. She was nevertheless invaded. Sweden, Holland, Switzerland have no enemies, but they are arming for their own defence. Our neighbours, the United States, have no enemies, but they also are arming, and how!

If we have no enemies, there are at least those who disturb our peace and who give us cause for reflection.

What is Canada's duty?

In this early part of the year 1938, we are faced with three great powers: Germany, Italy and Japan, whose armaments, ambitions and plans are the more alarming as the international situation grows more strained. Events seem to have conspired against the friends of peace and unarmed security. The moral appeasement that could be expected in the early days of 1937 has not materialized. Facts speak for themselves.

It is impossible for us to maintain an ideological policy; we have to face realities. Our state of sovereignty involves the duty of providing for our own defence and safeguarding our neutrality. The best way to develop a Canadian sentiment is to be prepared to rely on ourselves rather than on others.

It goes without saying that we must avoid being entangled in any external conflict.

When we see what is going on in Europe, Africa and Asia, where Great Britain has interests to safeguard, we realize how our association with members of the commonwealth might have serious consequences if it involved for us any obligation of taking part in a war in which one member might be engaged.

As an aftermath to the Ethiopian conflict, we are faced with the Egyptian crisis, in which we can see the clash between English and Italian influences.—In Europe, we have a dispute for the control over the Mediterranean, as a consequence of the Spanish war. In the Far East, it is the Japanese thrust in China with all its effects in the economic field.

Assuredly, Great Britain appears to know how to take blows when necessary. Nevertheless, she has interests on the five continents and the cause of conflicts are numerous.

The Statute of Westminster has made Canada a sovereign nation with all the liberties implied by that word; most precious of all being the liberty to avoid getting killed for the protection of the interests of others. At the present time Germany is asking for the return of her former African colonies, which have been divided among all the members of the commonwealth with the exception of Canada. Well, can you imagine Canada fighting in order to keep those colonies under their control?

Our interests are in America, because Canada is an American country, and our attitude in military matters must not be determined by the attitude of Great Britain, whose interests are so numerous and varied in all parts of the world, but by the attitude of our neighbour, the United States of America, who entertain no warlike views.

Let me read to you a resolution passed some time ago by the Canadian Students' National Congress, as reported by Le Droit of February 11:

> Canada owes it to herself to formulate a program of moderate rearmament in order to strengthen her coastal defences. Canada must not be a party to a plan of collective defence for the countries of the empire, but must rather aim at a system of tacit cooperation with the United States in that respect.

And the newspaper commented on these resolutions as follows:

> The two resolutions taken together are acceptable.

Canada enjoys the great advantage of being in America. Defensive armaments, unimportant in themselves, become powerful in our country against a distant enemy who could attack us only under disadvantageous circumstances due to the great distance, and only at the risk of provoking a friendly nation or a nation interested in our defence.

Like all other peaceful countries, we are compelled by necessity. The defence of our country cannot mean preparing for war; on the contrary, it means striving to avoid it by discouraging in advance those who might have in mind to attack us for any reason whatever.

As Lyautey said:

Showing one's strength is the best way to avoid the necessity of using it.

We cannot advertise to the whole world or let everybody believe that Canada would be an easy and defenceless prey for anybody who would like to attack it or simply invade it. Therefore I am in favour of a defence policy, based on our autonomous condition, on our desire for peace, on our geographical situation, on our financial means, and having for its sole purpose the safeguarding of our neutrality and the protection of Canada, in Canada.

What estimates are we asked to vote for National Defence purposes?

According to the blue book, they amount to $34,034,364. As a matter of fact, military appropriations are not over $32,766,594.

There has been included this year in the estimates for National Defence, under item 180 and items 194 to 198, a total of $911,770, that had never before been included in those appropriations, but were in the estimates for Civil Government, Northwest Territories and Miscellaneous. Item No 193—Civil Aviation, an amount of $356,000, covers expenses in connection with topographical air surveys for the Mines and Resources Department, and is also a non-miltary item. All the above-mentioned items, forming a total of $1,267,770, though administered by the National Defence Department, are not actually military appropriations and must be deducted from the amount of $34,034,364.

I should have liked to make a few observations on the four items about which I and some members differed last year, but time will not allow. It will be sufficient to say that they have been reduced by $4,551,401, compared with the amounts voted last year and that I have satisfied myself, with the aid of the particulars printed in the blue book and the information I have received, that the four items cover, for the greater part, maintenance and renewal expenses. As for the votes in connection with the new undertakings, they will be used to erect buildings that cannot be moved from one place to another, to purchase two destroyers and a number of planes necessary for our Pacific coast defences.

I took the trouble to make a careful study of the defence appropriations. And, if I have decided to support them, it is for the reason that, having made a serious review of the international situation in the light of the developments of the last ten months, I believe them necessary for the defence of our country and the safe-guarding of our neutrality; it is because, following a careful study of the various items, I am satisfied that they will serve exclusively for the defence of Canada, in Canada only.

As I do not believe in systematic distrust any more than in blind confidence, and having regard to the attitude adopted by the right hon. the prime minister in a number of cases, particularly in 1922 on the occasion of the Chanak incident when he refused to embark Canada in a war at the request of Lloyd George—then on the occasion of the Locarno treaty,—at Geneva, in September 1936, and above all at the Imperial conference held in London during the months of May and June last, I have reason to believe that, always animated with truly Canadian sentiments, he never will entangle Canada in a foreign conflict in which she would have no interest to defend; and by so doing he will contribute greatly to maintain unity in our country.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): There is a reduction in these estimates of $2,000,000 from last year's total of $36,000,000 odd. This is a large sum of money compared with past votes, but it is necessary, and I am glad that the government has given to the house an opportunity to discuss the great question which at the moment means so much to the people of Canada, as it does to the people throughout the British empire. The defence of the empire is a matter of life and death, because if Britain fails the world will go out into outer darkness and we in common with the rest of the world will lose our liberties and the civilization we enjoy. The Canadian people are very much concerned about the whole question; it is one of the questions uppermost in their hearts and minds to-day—"Whither Canada"? That question is on everyone's lips.

So far as defence is concerned we are back where we were in 1812—complete dependence on the motherland for protection. We have never had any adequate defence policy nor have we had adequate defence forces to protect our shores. We have been depending upon the mother country for the preservation of our liberties and our civilization. We can talk about this estimate of $34,000,000, but it is a mere drop in the bucket compared to what the people of the motherland have to pay for the defence of the empire. I have a great deal of respect for the Prime Minister; he is a gentleman whom I have known for a great many years, and I am sure that everyone sympathizes with him, for his burden at the present time is a heavy one. Under our constitutional practice, however, as the Prime Minister is aware, seeing that he has had a great deal of experience in diplomatic affairs, it is the duty of parliament to inquire into estimates such as those we have before us to-day and to see how the trust reposed in the Prime Minister and the government has been discharged.

I do not agree with the policy of silence in matters of this sort. I remember that before the great war, in 1914, Field Marshal the late Lord Roberts was laughed at in England and his speeches called pernicious and dangerous because, even up to three days before the outbreak of war, he predicted it. A number of public men in England—Asquith, Haldane, Runciman, and some of the most prominent men in public life there—were of the opinion that there would be no war; they had found a way of preventing it. There had been silence about foreign affairs and the defences of the country. That should be a lesson to us to-day in Canada in considering the question now before us. In my opinion silence is a mistake; it is far better for the government to take parliament and the country into its confidence and to indicate the exact state of affairs.

I am glad to see that the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Raymond), coming as he does from the province of Quebec, realizes the importance of national defence. The people of that province have always been loyal to the mother country and I am glad to see that its representatives are taking the stand that adequate defences and armaments are necessary. During the St. Henry by-election the Minister of Public Works and the Secretary of State, with other younger speakers, took the stand that adequate defences were necessary for this country. But adequate defences of themselves without adequate man power, as has been said very well by a great public man, are inadequate, and I believe the support of adequate defences for Canada is a sound position for the people of Quebec to take because, with British Columbia, it is among the most exposed provinces of Canada, so it is necessary there for us to have adequate defence.

The second point I wish to advance in regard to these estimates is that every gun and every soldier to man a gun brings us nearer not war but peace, as was said by the minister for war in England the other day. I am glad that stand has been taken. Nobody in Canada wants war. The Minister of Pensions and National Health and the Minister of National Defence know what war means, but even those of us who could not or did not go during the last war have seen the awful suffering that resulted on the part of men, women and children throughout the country then and since. Everyone in England and Canada hates war and the very mention of war. The very idea of war is hated and detested by everyone; nevertheless preparation is necessary. You will not hear one word in favour of war either in England or in Canada. It is right to hate war, but we have to face the facts. There is the question of the defence of liberty and civilization. In England they have been slow to get started, but they have recognized the mistake they made in this army, and now they are a unit in rearming. At Norwich the labour unions voted in favour of rearmament by two and a half million to less than two hundred thousand. It has been forced upon England, and these expenditures have been forced upon the government and people of Canada by the situation existing outside this country. The government does not want it; the opposition does not want it. No one wants to spend all this money unless it is necessary, but it is necessary with the conditions that exist in the world to-day, and armaments for Canada are a necessity.

Canada has tried conscientiously to carry out all its various treaties, peace agreements and pacts. They have been carried out to the letter. The Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition, the former prime minister, as heads of the government of this country, did their best to carry out our obligations in regard to the League of Nations and peace. They did everything they could in the public interest, but what happened? The League of Nations has had no greater support than has been given by England and Canada. To-day England stands before God as the trustee of the peace of the world. It finds the league in ruins, and is brought to the very verge of war for disarming.

We have been slow to see this coming upon us, and I say to the government of the day that something should be done to take the people of the country into their confidence and let them know what are the real facts.

No longer can officials of our external affairs and defence departments consider these matters as their sole responsibility. That was the situation in England up to 1914, but afterwards they were sorry for it. We should not make a similar mistake now. I only wish to offer constructive suggestions, and I believe the government should now trust the people completely in regard to Canada's foreign policy and Canada's defence policy. We should have all the information now, so that we can tell our constituents in order that the country may know what it is all about. This is not the private affair of our Department of External Affairs or the officials of that department. They should not keep these things secret. Let the government tell parliament plainly the extent of our obligations to Great Britain and the other dominions. We should have a statement of the facts. We should know who are our friends in world politics to-day, and who are not. We should know the differences of opinion that may exist between the motherland and the south of Ireland and South Africa or between the other dominions and Canada on defence and foreign matters, if there are any differences, as I know there are. We should know the facts with regard to our obligations to these dominions, the British Empire and our friends in Europe.

I say we should not only consult and advise with Great Britain. We will have no time for that if the enemy sail up the St. Lawrence and blow up the citadel, or attack the Pacific coast. Then it will be too late, as it was in 1914. We should know what nations are threatening us, who are our friends, who are our foes; the extent of our own defences and arms on land, sea and in the air; what deficiencies there are in our armed forces, and what is required. This vote is only a drop in the bucket compared to what will be necessary in the future if this policy continues the world over. We should know what is necessary if we are to maintain adequate defences and adequate reinforcements, not only in regard to guns but in regard to munition plants in Canada. All the munitions used in Canada should be manufactured here, so far as possible by those out of employment. In the St. Henry by-election the Minister of Public Works referred to the venerable cannon and the horse drawn artillery. We should know what guns, munitions, transports, equipment, clothing and rations will be needed, and what merchant marine we have to carry food to England. Our memory is very short, but we saw what happened to Belguim in 1914, when she was unprepared, and there was secrecy and silence respecting her defences until it was too late. Do we want it to happen again?

I am glad to see some advance in the policy with regard to the air force. Since we have been a country we have never had any policy of defence. To-day, as in the war of 1812, we are depending on the mother country. There is a vote of $10,000,000 for the air force, but you know as well as I do that with aeroplanes capable of travelling 250 miles an hour an enemy can leave their base, do damage to municipal institutions, public utilities, government buildings, schools and hospitals, and return very rapidly. So I think we should have a proper air force. During the last great war Canadians led the world as air men. They were the best at the front, and what we did then we can do again.

Then there is the question of national service. I have not heard any reference to this, although I believe the minister has done something about it. There should be some form of voluntary national service here, on educational, social and practical lines, and business men should help. We have a large number of young people out of work, walking the streets and taking the dole. If there were some system of training similar to that proposed by the minister of war in England they could enlist for a five year period, during which they could learn a trade, and get some pay and lodging, clothing and equipment, etc. They would receive physical as well as military training, and many of them could be employed as air mechanics, pilots and workmen. It would be a form of preparedness in regard to man power, which as I have said is just as necessary as adequate defences and adequate armaments. I think it would do a great deal to solve the unemployment problem.

I want to congratulate the Chamberlain family. The great Joseph Chamberlain gave us this dream of imperial preference and imperial federation out here, with a trade policy wrapped up in defence and migration. Great services were performed by his late lamented eldest son, Right Hon. Sir Austen Chamberlain, and the present Prime Minister of England, Right Hon. Neville Chamberlain, whose wise judgment and uncanny way of accomplishing things and steadying affairs in times of stress is a great asset in times like these. The Chamberlain family have always been well disposed towards Canada. Their trade preference policies have done much for this country. I am glad to see that in Great Britain at the present time a man who has kept a steady head is heading the government. If ever England needed a George Canning, she needs him now. We have to-day the same condition of affairs which existed in 1823 after the great Napoleonic war. At that time

England had a prime minister named George Canning, one of the greatest prime ministers, so far as his dealings in connection with foreign affairs were concerned, that the mother country ever had. He brought peace to Great Britain. For over a hundred years there has not been a civil war in that country.

I congratulate the present Prime Minister of Great Britain upon saving the dominions and the motherland from war. I believe he will go down into history for what he did in the past month. In addition to that, he is a modern George Canning. I believe that if the present government in Great Britain carries out the commitments it has now in the way of promises and pledges and makes no more, the policy of the motherland will be based upon that of George Canning, of keeping out of European affairs as far as possible and preserving peace—at any rate until Britain is armed.

What is Canada's defence policy? Whither is Canada going in foreign affairs? Those are two questions which might be discussed under this vote. It has been said that we are not to have all the facts in this matter, but I believe the government would be well advised to have our defence policy wrapped up with that of the mother country on land, on sea and in the air. The defence policy of a dominion such as Canada should be fashioned after and coordinated with that of Great Britain. The government has announced that it was not consulted but advised by the British government in connection with foreign policy, a distinction without a difference. The reason may have been that it did not want to be consulted; some have said that. The government says it has simply been advised. The distinction between "advised" and "consulted" may be a play on words.

We have no defence force. Would we wait to advise and consult the mother country if an enemy were to come here? No; we would be glad to advise or consult then, because we would not want this country to be overrun by an enemy dictator. Never in the history of Canada has it been more necessary than it is now to tell the Canadian people the exact state of affairs. There is no use in depending upon pan-Americanism and the Monroe doctrine. We have depended upon them in the past, and they have been found wanting. We owe all the freedom and liberty we have to the motherland, and are entirely dependent upon her for defence and freedom.

Our policy of defence, in all its detail, is wrapped up with that of the mother country. As I understand the defence policy of Canada, it must be wrapped up with that of Great Britain. Our defence policy is wrapped up in Locarno, and in the League of Nations. Our policy is one of isolation. If Canada's reliance is on the League of Nations, then it is leaning on a broken reed, because the league is bankrupt. The policy of Woodrow Wilson, that of open diplomacy, is a sham and has gone forever. This is the tenth league of nations that civilization has witnessed. They have all proposed through a formula to prevent war. They would have stopped war two thousand years ago, if a formula was all that was needed, but never in the history of the world have they been able to do so. There have been leagues of nations before, throughout the civilized world, and they have been complete failures. If a league of nations was sufficient to prevent war, then former leagues would have stopped wars two thousand years ago.

Is Canada still a member of the league? If the league is in existence, for what purpose is it? Our expenditures in connection with the league are very great.

In regard to the vote we are now considering for national defence I would call attention to the law of Canada to-day as it appears in section 63 of the Militia Act, chapter 132 of the revised statutes, which states:

> The militia or any part thereof, or any officer or man thereof, may be called out for any military purpose other than drill or training, at such times and in such manner as is prescribed.

Then section 64:

> The governor in council may place the militia, or any part thereof, on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

Then section 66 gives the governor in council these further powers:

> Whenever the governor in council places the militia, or any part thereof, on active service, if parliament is then separated by such adjournment or prorogation as will not expire within ten days, a proclamation shall be issued for the meeting of parliament within fifteen days, and parliament shall accordingly meet and sit upon the day appointed by such proclamation, and shall continue to sit and act in like manner as if it had stood adjourned or prorogued to the same day.

The is the law of Canada to-day. In the belief that armies, navies and air forces were unnecessary, the politicians led Great Britain to disarm. That disarmament came about through the agitation of pacifists, the League of Nations and other agents of separatism. Great Britain was led to disarm in 1922. She had the finest army, the finest air force and the finest navy the world had ever seen, all of which she scrapped. The great peace mother of the world disarmed. She had relied on that force to protect her shores, and we, too, had relied on it. A force equal to that cannot be got together in a day, a month or in a generation. As a result of her disarmament she to-day faces insult, invasion, and eventually extinction unless armed. Since 1933 the Japanese have captured Manchuria; Italy has taken Ethiopia, and Germany has invaded the Rhine and Austria. Despots and dictators with armed forces that were illegal, the world over have been looking at Canada with covetous eyes. This great, rich country, with its magnificent natural resources and wide open spaces has been coveted the world over. To-day within the empire we are at the parting of the ways. An unarmed Great Britain or an unarmed empire invites invasion, insult and finally extinction. There is no better or more certain way to war than to have an unarmed British Empire, an unarmed Great Britain.

There is an old Italian proverb which says, "The world will always stand aside to let anyone pass who knows where he is going." These dictators know where they are going. We might have had them here in Canada. Do we know where Canada is going? The world let Hitler go where he is going to claim world hegemony and dictatorship. Some hon. members to the left, in and out of the house, a year ago were willing to depend upon the Monroe doctrine and pan-Americanism for our defence. If they followed that for a few more days they would soon know whither Hitler and other dictators were going. Canada faces in time not only the possibility but a strong probability of invasion.

We do not know where Canada and the dominions are going. We are just where we were a hundred years ago. We have no adequate defence force to protect our borders. We have been outdistanced by Italy and Germany. Another mistake was this: We spent $3,500,000 on the League of Nations; in order to please the league and to please the United States we quarrelled with Italy. I say it was not worth the loss of a boy scout to send a defence force to Ethiopia, or to quarrel with Italy, once one of our most devoted allies. It is a great stroke of good fortune that Great Britain's Prime Minister has now seen fit to bring these two old allies closer together.

As I said the other night, in connection with the bill sponsored by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, the dissolution of the Japanese alliance brought great danger to the Pacific coast. I have no quarrel with Japan. I shall not say a word against a country which has been our devoted ally. If we had stuck to our policy in the far east we would be much better off in the Pacific to-day and have retained the Japanese alliance. We would have been much better off if we had given our money, through the mother country, towards the maintenance of the great Singapore base, a naval base established for the protection of Canadian, New Zealand and Australian interests in the Pacific. Australia and New Zealand have given about $5,000,000 towards the construction of that base. It was a project which would have protected us in the Pacific.

It is too bad that in order to please the United States we lost an opportunity to keep our alliance with Japan, and to please a section of the people in South Africa and Ireland we consented to that lamentable act, the Statute of Westminster. We have seen the results of such a policy in what has happened in the far east. We are depending upon the United States to keep order in the far east when we should be ready to cooperate with the motherland in her alliance with Japan there.

We are now realizing some of the mistakes that have been made. We have sided with the south of Ireland and South Africa in certain matters, and India has been given over to Gandhi through this policy of lack of preparation and pacifism. Because of the disarmed condition of Great Britain and the dominions, the British Empire was on the verge of war only a month ago.

In my opinion the league of nations' society is doing a great deal of harm in Canada. The British Broadcasting Corporation in Great Britain has stopped pacifist harangues over the air. They have been stopped in the United States and they should be stopped here. These people are hoping for the millennium described by Tennyson, but we cannot hope to escape the horrors of war on our own soil unless we have some force behind us. Great Britain was the only large country that stood by the League of Nations and promoted peace; the others all got out while the going was good. Great Britain disarmed and France disarmed, and as soon as there was complete disarmament by Britain and France, Germany, when fully armed crossed the Rhine and occupied the Rhineland. If the league had been any good at all it would have stopped that invasion. That was one great mistake which was made. But France was disunited and disarmed, without a proper government and with communism rampant, and Germany stole a march on her and is still marching in Europe.

What we need to-day is another George Canning, and I think we have one in the present Prime Minister of Great Britain to keep us out of European wars. The league has done more to provoke war than to avert it. It has been a source of mischief ever since its creation. The United States would not even join it. We see the result of all this in a vote of $34,000,000 to be paid by the taxpayers of Canada for all this folly. One of our great Anglican bishops in England said the other day that the civilization of Europe is not worth preserving; that it is worse now than it was a thousand years ago.

A few years ago Mr. John Buchan was then a member of the British House of Commons. He had an almost uncanny knack of interpreting public opinion, and he certainly expressed the view of the vast majority of his fellow countrymen when he said "that the League of Nations and the league of nations' society were largely in the hands of the crank, the sentimentalist and that appalling creature, the publicist." I hope the government of the day will stop considering the voices of the pacifists in this country as the voices of all the people of Canada. They are not. They have had their day and generation and we have seen the results. The government should not mistake the babble of the pacifists for the voice of the people of Canada on foreign affairs and on the question of adequate defence nor the voice of the Isolationists.

I hope the minister will not think I am criticizing his estimates as I am not. First, I should like to refer to Camp Borden. During the war a large air camp was established at this point. There are four landing fields, and I think the camp is unsurpassed in Canada for natural drainage and the facilities offered for landing and taking off. This camp has now been to some extent abandoned for Trenton, where under the best of conditions it is not considered safe to train young pilots. I know some changes have been made during the past year at Camp Borden, but I would direct attention to the fact that a large number of young men were killed at Deseronto during the war because of the winds prevailing in that part of the country. I consider Camp Borden as being a more satisfactory place for large air force training of pilots. I have talked over this matter with men who have been there and they agree with me.

The signal corps has been transferred from Borden to Kingston where the training conditions are rather inadequate. When Sir Frederick Borden was minister of militia there was a great artillery camp at Petawawa. This was considered one of the finest artillery camps in the empire, and many generals have commented upon it. I think we should have something like that at Camp Borden, Niagara and in all the provinces. Niagara should be used to a greater extent. Thousands of dollars should be spent on the Stanley barracks at Toronto, on old quarters and better quarters. These barracks have a historical interest and they should be retained.

I am sorry the government has not brought down a more definite policy with regard to the Pacific. We might have had a Locarno in the Pacific with Japan, England, Russia and the United States, but owing to the breaking of the Japanese alliance that was not brought about. I believe we would have better protection in a naval way on the Pacific if we were more closely allied with the motherland. We should take a greater interest in the Singapore base instead of leaving the matter of Pacific defence to the mother country and Australia and New Zealand.

There has been a definite change in our defence policy since the Statute of Westminster was passed. That statute was passed to please southern Ireland and South Africa, and the result is that New Zealand, Australia, Canada and all the other dominions are considered as separate countries which can make war or negotiate treaties. That folly called separatism divides us in war and separates us in peace. These countries have a separate defence policy from that of the motherland, and on the whole I believe the statute was a great mistake on the part of the dominions.

More consideration should be given to air defences. There is not only the possibility but a great probability that air raids will occur in the next war in which Canada is involved. The defence of our population from air raids should be considered. These raids will be the chief source of danger in all future wars, and we shall be living in a false paradise if we do not adopt measures to protect ourselves. Abyssinia was recently a theatre of war, and we all know the destruction of civilian population that occurred through this means of attack. Abyssinia is an open country with only a small density of population as compared with what there is on the island of Montreal and in other parts of Canada, and yet great damage resulted.

Air raids can work great havoc in time of war, and the menace will be a very real one in Canada, especially to the people of Quebec, the maritimes and British Columbia. I am glad that some preparation, although it may be only a beginning, has already been made by the minister to meet this danger. I know he has been out looking over the camps. A fleet of aircraft could pass up the Ottawa river without a moment's notice and blow up these buildings, the Chateau Laurier, the railway station and other large buildings. We should have very little warning of the approaching attack. Consultation and advice are words that are much used by the government nowadays, but we would not be consulted about any air raids that were contemplated against Canada. The enemy's aircraft would be upon us before you could say "O Canada," or sing God Save the King. An aerial bombardment is one of the dangers most to be apprehended in time of war, particularly in large cities with their dense populations; the protection of cities from aerial bombardment should be one of the chief objectives of the national defence department, and proper equipment for defence against this menace should be provided. Probably the minister will have something to say about that later on.

Large quantities of poisonous gas could easily be spread over a large area as was done in Abyssinia, and incendiary bombs dropped on our large cities, with great destruction and slaughter, and the enemy aircraft could get back to their base in practically no time. These attacks would not only bring ruin to our cities and towns but break the morale of our people and prevent us from developing a proper defence and mobilizing our man power and armaments.

In regard to foreign and defence affairs Canada should wake up out of its slumber before it is too late. We were just as near war a month ago as we were in July, 1914. We were told last August at lake Simcoe, Ontario, that war was gone forever; but here in the month of March this association with a high-sounding name, the Canadian Institute of Economics and Politics, received a very rude awakening. Pacifists and economists have had their day in Canada and the United States, and have failed. Real science, rightly understood, was the admiration of the world, but the way in which science has been applied with its inventions to making war more terrible has made science a curse to civilization.

In conclusion, I want to say a word or two about the schools and the way in which false and injurious information has been disseminated throughout Canada by many agencies in regard particularly to the League of Nations, defence, foreign affairs and the cadet movement. The cadet movement is not a military movement; it is more for physical training. I understand that the minister has been taking some steps along the line of having a national policy, a volunteer one in Canada for home service and home defence of all kinds. That is not a luxury but a necessity. I notice that the British Field Marshal Lord Milne, on January 7 last, was talking about this problem as it relates to the schools. He was addressing the secondary school teachers in England, and I am glad that the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) is going to address next Saturday the high schools of the city of Toronto. Lord Milne said:

> Sometimes too much was made of learning when reference was made to education. Character, patriotism and discipline were equally important.

An article in the January, 1938, issue of the National Review at page 48 quotes the head master of a public school as saying:

> A man may obtain a double-first and yet be uneducated.

The writer of the article makes this comment:

> Conversely, one has known educated men who could neither read nor write. Until the Board of Education insists that formation of character, the obligations of duty, patriotism and self-sacrifice are the mainsprings of education, young men will be found wanting, when put to a practical test, in the responsibilities of citizenship. . . .
> I have already commented on the lack of state teaching on the duties of citizenship, including service for one's country; but what is to be said of authorities in state-aided universities and schools who openly inculcate the principle of peace at any price?

Are we doing our duty and teaching the principles which Lord Milne advocated?

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I followed with great interest the speech which has just been made by the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond). He has his opinion, and I have mine. My only regret is that they do not harmonize any more. For instance, I could not help noticing these words in the latter part of his speech which I quote from memory: "I am not prompted by blind confidence nor by systematic distrust."

I hope my hon. friend will not be offended when I tell him that neither are these the feelings which prompted hon. members to oppose an increase in military expenditures. They did it on principle just like the hon. member last session, and as they do it now, as a matter of conviction. I may add that I have never questioned for a moment the fine purposes of my colleagues who did not share my views on this important question of policy.

It is not because they were impregnated with blind confidence that the majority of my colleagues in this house voted for the defence estimates. Neither was it on account of a systematic distrust that we took a different view. Did not the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who is liberal and wide-minded, state on several occasions, and particularly at the recent demonstration tendered the hon. member for Ottawa-East (Mr. Pinard) that the Liberal party hated coercion which is necessarily derived from narrow-mindedness.

Mr. Chairman, the events which took place throughout the world since the last session of this parliament and the threats of war which are hanging over central Europe at the present time would not justify my change of attitude as regards military expenditures. Last year, while we were discussing the defence estimates in committee, I asked the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) on several occasions if he would require a larger sum every year. As a matter of fact, I foresaw the expenditures which we are now discussing. Although they were reduced by $2,000,000, these estimates for the present fiscal year still amount to $34,034,364.42. Therefore I am quite determined once again to oppose this increase in the expenditure for militia and defence, in order to revert to the figure set for that purpose in the 1936-37 estimates. Why? Because the present estimates are still $18,155,953 higher than those for 1936-37.

In the compiling of those figures I have taken into account the amount of $2,201,000 for the purchase of two destroyers by the Canadian government, which appeared in the supplementary estimates for 1937. There is another reason why I should continue my fight. Canada, although far removed from the horrors of the Far East, the Iberian Peninsula and Central Europe, must realize what a suicide she would keep in store for herself for the day when, going beyond her own borders, she would take part in a foreign war. Our country will grow peacefully and harmoniously only in so far as it keeps its eyes on its own people, on its immense natural resources, on its youth whose strength must be preserved for the furthering of the progress of Canada and of Canada only, of its industries, its trade, its agriculture which has saved it from bankruptcy, which has fed the children, the women and the men of Canada. Our country must have peace to prosper on this American continent which witnessed its birth, its growth and its attainment of nationhood. Let us be guided by our traditions of strength and courage. Let these traditions bind us forever and more exclusively to this Canadian land of ours, the sole object of our love, hope and admiration.

In conclusion, I would like to state that, in the account I have just made of a situation which I find alarming, I had no other idea in mind, I was animated with no other motive than an ardent desire to serve my country while being of service to my constituents. I know their views, I know that they are inspired by a truly Canadian spirit. Therefore I would consider myself false to my trust if I took an opposite attitude.

Mr. Chairman, it is very painful for me again to differ on this vital matter with statesmen whom I respect, whose talent, ability and courage I admire. But I cannot sacrifice to the noble sentiments of friendship and admiration firm beliefs, or an ideal and a mentality which the horrors of war have irrevocably anchored in my mind and my heart. Others will perhaps criticize me. Nevertheless I will stand indomitably, with my eyes fixed on the firm, clear and limpid manifestation of principles dear to my heart, while respecting the convictions of my fellow members.

Let me add just one word. There is not a single Canadian citizen worthy of the name who would want the ruin of Canada. Well, any new military adventure on our part outside our own territory would involve tremendous expenses from which we would never recover. What I want to avoid is the bankruptcy and the downfall of my country. That is what I will oppose with all my strength. That is what I will condemn to my last breath.

Far removed from the maddened old world, and from a civilization bordering on barbarism, let us live in peace at home. Let us concentrate all our energies upon the attainment of the destinies of a great nation where tomorrow will blossom forth the virile beauty of a great people.

The hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie stated at the beginning of his remarks, if I remember rightly, that he had not received from the Minister of National Defence in the course of the last session a satisfactory answer regarding the limits of Canada. Mr. Chairman, in my humble opinion, Canada's limits are clearly determined by the Canadian Militia Act. I had no intention of speaking on this subject; I have been impelled to do so by the turn taken by the debate. I wish to tell the truth, the whole truth, as I see it, and to be corrected if I am wrong. The Militia Act of Canada, chapter 132 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, volume III, section 64, page 2789 contains the following provision respecting active service.

> The governor in council may place the militia, or any part thereof, on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

Now let us see what section 69 of the same act says, on page 2790:

The Army Act for the time being in force in Great Britain, the king's regulations, and all other laws applicable to His Majesty's troops in Canada and not inconsistent with this act or the regulations made hereunder, shall have force and effect as if they had been enacted by the parliament of Canada for the government of the militia.

I find nothing in the amendments brought to the Militia Act since 1927, that purports to repeal the sections that I have just quoted. True, there is chapter 21 of the Statutes of Canada for 1932-33, 23-24 George V, page 97, which was sanctioned on April 12, 1933. But this act refers only to forces of His Majesty from other parts of the British commonwealth or from a colony when visiting the Dominion of Canada. On the other hand, section 6 of the same act leaves wide discretion to the governor in council, particularly subsection 2, page 102, which reads as follows:

The governor in council

(i) may attach temporarily to a home force any member of another force to which this section applies who is placed at his disposal for the purpose by the service authorities of that part of the commonwealth to which the other force belongs;

(ii) subject to anything to the contrary in the conditions applicable to his service, may place any member of a home force at the disposal of the service authorities of another part of the commonwealth for the purpose of being attached temporarily by those authorities to a force to which this section applies belonging to that part of the commonwealth.

Then, section 8, page 103, provides as follows:

So far as regards any naval force and the members of any such force, the provisions of this act shall be deemed to be in addition to and not in derogation of such of the provisions of any act of the parliament of the United Kingdom or of the parliament of any other part of the commonwealth as are for the time being applicable to that force and the members thereof.

I shall close, Mr. Speaker, with another quotation from the Militia Act of Canada:

All the male inhabitants of Canada, of the age of eighteen years and upwards, and under sixty, not exempt or disqualified by law, and being British subjects, shall be liable to service in the militia: provided that the governor general may require all the male inhabitants of Canada, capable of bearing arms, to serve in the case of a levée en masse.

Be it understood, Mr. Chairman, that in making these quotations I am not moved by bitterness towards any one. I feel that, in speaking as I did, I am fulfilling the trust placed in me by my constituents on October 14, 1935. On nomination day, that is October 7, 1935, at a great meeting attended by more than 12,000 voters of both sexes, I was asked this question: "What will be your attitude in the matter of military appropriations?" I replied: "I will speak against them in the House of Commons and vote against them." Indeed, I stated this fact in the course of the observations that I made in this house last year. The profound convictions I hold in this matter, Mr. Chairman, make it impossible for me to change my attitude. This is my final word.

Mr. JOSEPH A. BRADETTE (Cochrane) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, before proceeding with what I have to say on this very important question, I wish to congratulate the hon. the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) for the splendid speech which he delivered a moment ago, when he set forth the whole situation before the House of Commons and the country so far as national defence is concerned. Of course, it required a great deal of courage on the part of the dominion government, last year, when he decided to carry on with the system of national defence which we had in this country, and which, on account of financial stress, during years of depression, had to be left more or less impaired. We very well remember the commotion brought about throughout the country by the announcement that the dominion government would spend for national defence purposes a sum of $36,034,371.42 during the fiscal year of 1937-38. Every member of this house remembers the discussions that took place about it. They also remember the controversy which was waged by newspapers of every political shade throughout the country. These press comments showed that the people realized that the government had displayed great courage under the circumstances, and appreciated the necessity of such a policy.

Once again the government is asking us to vote a considerable sum to carry out this national defence plan which was inaugurated last year.

Of course, there is not one citizen worthy of being called a Canadian, whether he come from the east, the west or the central part of Canada, who would dare say that he is not in favour of peace. However, Mr. Chairman, our people must, of necessity, be practical.

No doubt, Canada built great hopes on the League of Nations, which I am sure, has not yet completed the great task which it had mapped out, namely that of maintaining international peace in every part of the civilized world. We realize however the great difficulties which the League of Nations has to face. Again I say that I do not believe there is one man in Canada, whatever may be his race, religion, or political faith, who does not seek peace not only in Canada but in the whole world. But we must realize how serious present conditions are. There is no doubt that Canada is ideally situated as regards national defence. If we look at the map, it is easy to see that in the north we have not to fear any unforeseen danger, even with the tremendous development of aviation during the last years. However, in the present troubled state of the world who could say that we would not have to fear a possible attack on our Pacific or Atlantic coasts?

We need only to look around us to see that the nations in which we placed all our hopes for peace have failed. That is why we must realize the seriousness of the situation. Just as the man who, leaving his home or retiring for the night, bolts the door, so we must prepare for anything that may happen. He does not anticipate anything, nor does he know anyone likely to seek revenge on him, but he takes precautions. The same might be said of towns and governments which have a police force, and also of a nation which wants to uphold as much as possible its system of national defence. I further believe that the great majority of our people who live in the various constituencies which we are representing are in favour of a plan of national defence, in order that the government may maintain peace.

Mr. Chairman, there are in my own constituency, just as there are likely in all parts of Canada, thousands of returned soldiers who took part in the great war of 1914-18. They risked their lives for what they consider to be the cause of humanity and peace. After the war, they returned to their activities, and they now have sons old enough to serve in the army. I know that they are just as anxious as anybody else not to see their sons enduring the sacrifices which they went through or witnessing the same horrors which were their lot for four years. Every veteran, whether of the South African war or the great war of 1914-18, is body and soul in favour of peace. There lies his ideal, as well as all that it implies.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BRADETTE: Mr. Chairman, I have listened attentively to the masterly speech delivered this afternoon by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). He stated that public opinion, in connection with defence, could be divided into five groups. We are sure of one thing at least, and it is that nobody in particular, no political party can boast of being alone against war. We all agree as to that, in Canada. That is why, recently and in certain circumstances, some members of parliament or certain parts of the population seem to assume the whole responsibility in avoiding war.

The Minister of National Defence briefly referred to the signification of nationalism and its possible results. The Larousse dictionary defines the word as follows:

> Marked preference for anything pertaining to one's nation.

Undoubtedly all persons forming a country must belong to it, not in a sectional or provincial sense, but in a strictly national sense with all that the word implies. That is one reason why there should be no opposition to the appropriations for national defence, because, after all, when establishing a home or a business, one must accept all the responsibilities of that new situation. When young and living under our father's roof we do not realize our responsibilities. By the Statute of Westminster, Canada became an individual nation in the British commonwealth of nations, which means new responsibilities, national as well as international. To be fair in the circumstances, the least we can do is to be prepared to defend ourselves.

Before six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I briefly referred to our geographical and national position on the north American continent. Fortunately for us, our neighbour to the south is a friendly nation, on whose cooperation we may rely for a great number of years. We are separated by a 3,000 mile boundary line along which there is not a single fortress, and where peace prevails.

This afternoon, the Pan-American Federation was mentioned several times. That reminded us of the famous Monroe doctrine so often quoted by those who are opposed to any increase in our national defence appropriations. What is the meaning of these words: the Monroe doctrine? They mean that the United States told the nations of the world that any attempt to conquer countries in North or South America or to interfere with their administration, would be considered as unfriendly acts. Let us suppose that Canada should decide to abandon its national defence—as was suggested on a number of occasions in certain parts of Canada—the responsibility would then fall on the shoulders of the American nation. Would it be fair? Let us go a step further. Let us imagine Canada being invaded by a foreign power without possessing any means of defence. Then, the American people, according to the Monroe doctrine, would be forced to protect us, because they would not want a foreign nation to secure a footing in Canada. Would not the Americans, who are a practical people, after defending us with success I suppose and after spending vast sums of money and sacrificing a great number of human lives, ask us to pay the cost if we had the desire of maintaining our national existence? It being so, we must realize that those who mention the Monroe doctrine are not on solid grounds when they say that we have no need to defend ourselves but that the responsibility belongs to the great nation to the south. We have to study this matter from all angles, Mr. Chairman. As I have already said, we are proud of our new status as part of the British commonwealth of nations. But that status does not go without responsibilities and one of them is surely to take the means of protecting our own borders and our coast line in case of attack.

Many people ask us: "Against whom are we arming?" We all know that Great Britain wants peace and is not looking for further conquests. Great Britain wants to maintain peace, not only in Europe but throughout the civilized world. Is France actually getting ready for a war of conquest? No, Mr. Chairman, France only wants to defend her frontiers and protect her homes, because she still remembers the two invasions she was subjected to during the last sixty years. The same may be said of the United States, where a billion dollars was voted for the navy only a few days ago. Against whom are the United States arming? Are they arming against Canada or against the nations of South America or Asia? No, Mr. Chairman, they are not arming for attack, they are arming for defence in case of attack. That is how I understand the situation and how it should be understood generally in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, I am not in a position to say, and I would not go so far as to claim that I am thoroughly familiar with the feelings of the people in Quebec. However, may I be allowed to quote a short article by Mr. Eugene L'Heureux, published in L'Action Catholique a year ago, when the estimates for national defence were under consideration in the house?

I think that this article sets forth quite correctly the general feeling of the majority of the people in the province of Quebec.

It is as follows:

For Canada Only

Actual conditions, however, must be taken into account. Lack of knowledge in matters of national defence organization deters us from passing judgment on the appropriations sought by the government for the organization of the country's defence. We think it possible to place confidence in the government on that score, all the more so as the Prime Minister has emphasized the purely Canadian destination of this military expenditure.

In such times as these, when danger threatens from all sides, even the most peace-loving nations feel the need of protection against the possible tragic outcome of domestic trouble as well as against colonial ambitions of the great powers. Under present conditions, Canada's armament budget may appear reasonable event in the eyes of the anti-militarists.

Approaching the question from the point of view of French Canadians, we think that instead of bemoaning these military expenditures (under present conditions), they should rather endeavour to occupy a prominent place in the country's armed forces, so as to partake fully of the nation's activities and to claim their full share even in the military domain, and also to find in military life the benefit of a certain discipline in which they are lacking, much to our general and oft expressed regret.

I consider this article quite logical and I know whereof I speak for the following reasons. I had the honour last spring to take part, in the province of Quebec, my native province, in a by-election campaign, during which I made it my duty to discuss in the Gaspé peninsula the national defence appropriations. I must say that the explanations I gave on that occasion were very closely followed by the electors who fully realized the soundness of voting these appropriations for the defence of their own country.

What are the other nations of the British commonwealth doing? This afternoon's newspapers tell us that Australia is to spend in the space of three years nearly 145 million dollars for its own defence. Has Australia any thought of aggression, either in India, in Japan or elsewhere? No, Australia wishes only to defend her own coasts, her own boundaries. The same principle applies to South America and New Zealand, and that is the principle which should be applied to the appropriations we are now asked to vote.

These appropriations include a fairly large expenditure for aviation. Necessity compels us to develop financially and commercially, in respect of machinery, of modern invention, and so forth.

I surely believe that a military air force if put to proper use, would aid the development of the natural resources in the northern section of the dominion. When, in Canada, one looks at a map of the country, one is astonished to see a narrow strip of settled land, stretching from east to west. It seems that there is a certain desire to live as close as possible to the American border. If we want Canada to become a great nation, our expansion must necessarily be caried out in the northern part of the country, where a bountiful Providence endowed us with immense and untold resources still undeveloped. I am also of the opinion that a military aviation would provide an excellent agency for the development of the northern part of Canada in its entirety.

No one in these dark days is unmindful of the enormous burden meant by the conditions which we are now called upon to face. There is no one who, in his daily prayers does not ask for the maintenance of peace throughout the civilized world. In Europe, in Canada, in the United States and in the whole world, youth realizes the problem with which it is confronted at the present time. How one longs to see such noble dreams of peace come true, just as one wishes the establishment of the United States of Europe, such as was advocated by Aristide Briand, eminent French statesman. How I long, for my part, to see the people of South America, United States, Great Britain, Germany, Russia, Japan, in short, all the civilized nations of the world, formed into one great federation, constituting a solid group, a single nation, so that the world may never again know such tremendous sacrifice of human lives as was witnessed between 1914 and 1918, during the war which was supposed to end all wars. But twenty short years have elapsed since that awful conflagration, and yet the diplomats of Europe are once more wondering what the following day has in store, and are apprehensive as to the future.

Before concluding, I wish to thank the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for the noble and national attitude he has taken. During that critical situation, he was successful in not embroiling matters, and brought home the seriousness of the problem, not only to parliament, but to the people of Canada. I feel also, that I should express my opinion concerning the position taken by the Prime Minister of Great Britain, Mr. Chamberlain, who showed us that one must keep a steady head in these momentous hours and whose desire is that the problem which the European nations are facing at the present time may find their solution in peace. I also wish to extend my congratulations to the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). Indeed, it would mean a loss of faith in our civilization if the solution of these problems were to be secured only through the destruction of millions of young lives and by delaying the march of civilization. I pray to God that all men may work in cooperation towards the solution of these problems, so that the tremendous sacrifices of 1914-1918 may be spared, not only to our country, but to the whole world, and it is my sincere wish that they may not be witnessed again by the present generation, otherwise it would be, unquestionably, the dawn of a new era of decadence.

[Mr. Bradette.]

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to attempt to compete with hon. members who have spoken respecting matters of national policy, in an attempt to evaluate the foreign policies of this country or of Great Britain, or of the circumstances obtaining in the world to-day. I have listened with great interest and, indeed, a marked measure of enthusiasm to the speech delivered this afternoon in this chamber by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), when he set forth a report of the situation with respect to the technical and mechanical developments of the problem of defence in Canada.

For the little time I propose to take tonight it is my desire to speak about another phase of our problem. I should like to direct attention to the situation which obtains in Canada to-day with respect to the man whom I may call the man behind the gun—the man who is a member of the permanent force. It is not my intention, nor have I the ability, to launch into an oratorical description of the position in which these all too few men find themselves, nor shall I deal with the question in a manner calculated to arouse either the enthusiasm or the passion of this house on behalf of these men. Within the constituency which I have the honour to represent is located one of the larger military districts. During my short tenure of office I have taken it upon myself to study, in some measure at least, the conditions under which these men serve their country. These men have behind them the same traditions as are behind you and me, and many of them took up army life as a career at a time when it was more of a career than it is at present. I am ready to confess that many of our young men would have been glad of the opportunity during the last few unfortunate years to enter the service of this country and find even the kind of security obtainable under such circumstances.

In the brief time which I shall allow myself I intend to refer to four or five phases of the conditions under which these gentlemen serve their country, my country and your country. I shall make some representations to the minister, and through the minister to the government, for an improvement of the conditions under which these men serve.

Under date of March 10 of this year I read the following headline emanating from Great Britain:

Hore-Belisha's army estimates promise more attractive life for British soldier.
Less posture, polish, higher pay for Tommy.

I shall not deal to-night with either the posture or the polish as it concerns the enlisted man in Canada, but I want to point out that in the conditions obtaining in the world to-day the imperial government has seen fit to make a considerable effort to improve the lot of the enlisted man in the permanent forces of Great Britain. I think it is time that we should look at the picture that obtains in Canada and consider whether we cannot do something to attract to this service the type of young man who has a real contribution to make. I do not conceive it likely that in the immediate or near future we shall be maintaining in this country a military establishment on a large scale—I do not know that is even desirable—but in my opinion we should have a highly efficient military service. If we are to have that, then we must look to the condition of the enlisted man.

For my own convenience and the convenience of hon. members I propose to deal with some possible amendments to the Militia Act, without being technical in any way. I think in the minds of the men who serve us so loyally these amendments are considered to be advantageous, first of all for their own concern, second, for the government that employs them and, third, for all the Canadian citizens who support this establishment. For some period of time there has been considerable dissatisfaction with the exorbitant duty placed upon the importation of military kit from Great Britain. I appreciate the fact that this is not a matter which can be decided by the Minister of National Defence, but I have raised the question previously with other members of the administration. In putting forth this suggestion I am thinking more particularly of the men in the non-permanent force. My description of the non-permanent force is a force in which a man puts up his own money for the privilege of serving his country. Under these circumstances it seems to me that any representations by the Minister of National Defence to the council generally might well be listened to.

There is another condition obtaining in the permanent force to which I should like to direct attention. For the past forty years there has been a practice in the British army, upon which our Canadian permanent force is modelled, of making an allowance to a married man for his children. It is pretty well established, even in military life, that two cannot live as cheaply as one, since an allowance, I believe of fifty cents per day, is made to the married man who has no children. No ration allowance is made for the minor children of a soldier in the permanent forces, and I suggest to the minister that he consider the possibility of making some allowance in this connection. Allowances are made in Great Britain for children under the age of sixteen, and a suggestion has been made that in this country an allowance should be made for boys under the age of sixteen and girls under the age of eighteen years. In order to get this thing started I would be quite happy to have these allowances made under the same conditions as prevail in Great Britain.

There is another matter which I think the minister, and through him the government, might very well take into consideration. I believe that a portion of a pension due to a man who has served his time in the permanent militia should accrue to his widow when he predeceases her. At the present time a man serves a minimum of sixteen years, I believe, at the end of which time he may retire on pension. If he predeceases his wife, she receives no pension and in many instances becomes a charge upon the state. It seems to me that in trying to make the service attractive, we should consider doing something in this regard. When the spirit is upon us and we are prepared to do something about defence, we should enlarge this matter of pensions. The estate of the average enlisted man consists of his pay while in service and his pension after his service is completed, and I know of case after case where hardship has resulted. I shall not at this juncture recite individual cases as I believe that most hon. members who have had any connection with the permanent force will have personal knowledge of many cases of men who have retired on pension and then shortly after have passed away, and we have had the spectacle of the wife who has been the sustaining partner of her husband through a long period of service having to go on relief or being left to the charity of friends.

I had intended to develop that; but I pass on to another consideration, and this is one which particularly affects single men in the service. It is well known to hon. members that the enlisted man in the permanent force, whether he comes from Halifax or Vancouver or Winnipeg or Montreal, must serve in the military district to which he is sent; he has no choice in the matter. From time to time these men earn a certain furlough, and a peculiar situation obtains in that regard. If a man who is to-day a member of or who has retired on pension from the permanent force of Canada goes to Great Britain, he is afforded the courtesy of half fare on the railways of the motherland, just as that half fare is accorded to members of the permanent force of Great Britain itself. But the only men enlisted in the service of Canada who, I am informed, enjoy a similar privilege on Canadian railways, are the ratings in the naval service, and for a long time this has been a sore point with enlisted men in this country. I have in mind a couple of chaps who enlisted in the permanent force of Canada in the city of Halifax and were subsequently transferred to the city of Winnipeg. After an honourable and somewhat extended service they earned a furlough, and their natural desire was to return to their homes in the city of Halifax. What do we find? We find that there is at the present time no provision in the Militia Act to accord these chaps the consideration they would be accorded if they were members of the British force or if they were naval ratings or for any reason wished to take their furlough in the British Isles. I would commend to the consideration of the minister and the government the placing of our own Canadian enlisted men in at least as advantageous a position in Canada in this respect as when they go overseas as guests of the mother country.

Turning to the subject of living and working conditions, I was gratified to hear the minister speak to-day of the advancement in technical and mechanical devices in the defence forces of this country. I have had the experience of seeing service in a theatre of war, and I came away from that with a definite impression that the most important military detail in any army is the man who is described, as I said a few moments ago, as the man behind the gun. It may be the man behind the gun or in an aeroplane or in a unit of the military forces that serve at the front. It is the hope of this government and of all governments that our permanent force shall be the nucleus of whatever forces, defensive or otherwise, it may be necessary in the future to raise; that it shall be an inspiration and educative force for whatever forces it may be necessary to mobilize.

Certain conditions obtaining to-day in Canada with respect to the living and service conditions of these men do not commend themselves to me and will not, I think, commend themselves to hon. members who have knowledge of what is taking place. About three years ago I had occasion to look into the circumstances surrounding the living conditions of married men on the strength but not on the married men's establishment; that is to say, men who had married without official permission. Those with any military experience know the vast difference between official permission and just plain ordinary permission. In the one case you have the support of the law in all its majesty; but in the other the law forgets its majesty, and says: If you get married, we will look the other way. To the enlisted man there is not anything like the same difference as there is to the official mind. Consequent upon representations being made, a serious attempt was made by the minister, and, I am bound to say, by the deputy minister, as well as, I hope, by certain officials of the department, to remedy the situation, which is far from satisfactory. I found and others have found that men who had served six, nine or twelve years satisfactorily but who had married without permission were not being reenlisted, but on the contrary were being thrown on the unemployed market without any consideration. I made certain representations to the minister, as did others, and some definite steps were taken to remedy the situation, but I am sorry to say they have not worked out as advantageously as we had hoped. I am of the opinion that further investigation of this matter might result in advantage both to the department and to the men who are most interested.

There are certain other considerations. Dealing with these men who have married without official permission and reverting to Winnipeg, part of which I represent, and in which constituency the headquarters of military district No. 10 is situated, I found on investigation that with respect to every building under the Department of National Defence in that city occupied by soldiers or by officials or officers of the department, a special additional allowance of twenty per cent was made for heating because of the building being located in the city of Winnipeg. This fuel allowance, I am told, does not apply to members of the forces who for any reason whatsoever maintain their residence outside the official barracks, and I would suggest to the minister that he seriously canvass the possibility of relieving the plight of these men. In some instances the men are entitled to be on the married strength but are unable to get suitable quarters, and they are forced to buy their own furniture and to go to considerable extra expense by living outside the barracks.

Finally, I should like to say a word or two about the question of married men not on the married strength, and by that I mean those who married without the official sanction of the department. I have investigated not merely one or two or three, but many of these cases. I have gone to the trouble to request from the department—and in every instance my request has been courteously granted—the military record, length of service, and kind of qualifications which these men possess. I have also gone not once but many times to the barracks and inspected the quarters in some detail, and I know the situation which obtains there. I wonder if, in view of the stress which we are now inclined to place upon the question of defence, and in view of the clearly established importance of the men who constitute the first line of our defence, the minister might not consider now, at this session, the possibility of making some allowance and recognizing to some extent these marriages without official consent. I wonder if the minister has considered making an allowance of, say sixty per cent of the marriage allowance to these married men outside barracks until such time as they can come properly on the married strength, because on this question I feel that the department is or has been to no small degree responsible for a condition which obtains very largely in my own constituency.

For a number of years we have followed the practice of enlisting men in the permanent force and putting them in barracks in the very districts from which they come; and I suggest that it has been the tendency in the last seven or eight lean years to consider enlistment in the permanent force of Canada not so much in the light of a career as in the light of a job. When you take a young man of eighteen or nineteen, enlist him in the service and keep him in the district in which he was born, raised and educated, and so make no effort to change his environment, are you astonished that many of these young men come to regard the service as a job and their pay as wages just as much as though they were working for a private company, or that they begin to think before long of the possibility of maintaining a home of their own on that income, take a chance with a good-natured officer or one who conveniently looks the other way—as they all do—and so begin on that basis to build up something which they can ill afford to maintain? Perhaps, if we had used a little more foresight—and this consideration goes back further than three or four years—if we had trained at Halifax those who enlisted at Winnipeg, and at Vancouver those who enlisted at Halifax, and thereby completely broken the whole tenor and trend of their associations and their existence and brought them to think of the service as a career, this situation would not have arisen.

It was on these points particularly that I wished to present views which are not only my own but are shared by a great many who have interested themselves in the welfare of these men. On their behalf, and in the interests of the kind of service in Canada for which I hope, I recommend to the minister and to the government consideration of these particular points.

M. J. A. CRETE (St. Maurice-Laflèche) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, when the question of Canadian rearmament came up last year, involving perhaps the most important change in policy of these last few years, I objected with some of my colleagues on this side of the house to increased military estimates. I did at the time give a few reasons why I could not support that new departure which, in my opinion, was ill-timed and dangerous.

This year, the military estimates which have been brought down are practically as large as those of last year. Having regard to various opinions expressed in the course of the debate which took place last year, having regard also to subsequent international as well as national events, I intend to deal briefly with this policy of increased expenditure for the purpose of military reorganization.

I do not think I need state again that, in dealing with that question, I intend to dismiss every personal consideration, and to be guided only by an eager desire to deal with this question on its merits. In order to clear up any misapprehension in the matter I must state that I have no grievance against the government; on the contrary, I am on the most friendly terms with my leaders. Although I approve of Liberal policies and although I have a high regard, as I think I should, for views and opinions held by the administration, I shall take the liberty, on this matter of rearmament, of discussing frankly and honestly two basic features of Canadian defence; the military estimates and the delimitation of our boundaries.

I maintained in 1937 that neither our geographical position, our political situation, nor our financial circumstances warranted the increased estimates of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). After this period of one year, let us ascertain whether anything has occurred which might in any way alter the problem.

I am aware of no changes in our geographical position which offers us an exceptional degree of protection on all sides. On the east, we are separated from Europe by the Atlantic ocean; on the west there is, by virtue of the Pacific ocean, such a tremendous distance between our coast and the Far East that no aggressor would attempt to invade British Columbia without giving it a second thought. On the south, we have the United States against whom we could not even think of defending ourselves, in case of war. Having them as friends and associates, any invasion of Canada is rendered impossible because one can hardly imagine that they would allow any European or Asiatic power to establish themselves close to their northern border where they have so many vital interests.

In that respect, some people think that the guarantee of security presented by the Monroe doctrine would not be as effective as in former days. Yet the foreign policy of the United States has undergone no fundamental change, as is well evidenced by their absence from the League of Nations, by the Pan-American conference at Buenos Aires and their non-participation in the Sino-Japanese conflict. And moreover our relations with our neighbours during the last year have been characterized by a friendliness which is more and more apparent. Representatives of both countries have paid goodwill visits to one another and an increasingly cordial atmosphere surrounds the official relations of the two nations. I am pleased to call the attention of the House to that fact.

In support of what I have just said, let me quote as follows from a speech delivered by Lord Marley of England, the Speaker of the House of Lords, at Plymouth, January 30 last:

> The United States, should the need arise, would protect Canada against a Japanese invasion by way of the Pacific coast.
> There is little danger of a Japanese invasion of Canada, he added. The United States are so anxious to prevent the Japanese from establishing themselves in Canada that their naval base at Seattle would defend the Canadian coast.

When those facts are admitted, Mr. Chairman, we meet with the answer that there is no question of sentiment in the matter and that, without a defence system of our own, an American intervention might have serious results for Canada. I quite agree that there is no question of sentiment in the matter, but is it not a question of personal interest for the United States? Therefore I cannot very well see how we should have any obligation to Uncle Sam for having defended his own interests, his own business, while defending us.

Has the political situation changed in Canada, during the last year? Our relations with all the nations of the world are still on an excellent footing. We have no difficulties of an international character. We do not know of a single country which might have reasons to hate us or to seek revenge against us. The question has already been asked: "Against whom are we arming?" Let us look at the world and see who might be our possible enemies. Could we fear an attack from the United States? I have explained a moment ago that that possibility does not exist. Could we fear an attack from Europe? It could only come from a great power: Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy or Russia. What of Great Britain? Everyone knows, and our imperialists most of all, that she does not have to reconquer us. France will not try to get colonies from us, and, anyway, she cannot leave her borders in face of Germany which she still considers threatening. Germany herself is determined to concentrate on Europe. Has not her dictator stated in "Mein Kampf" that "the expansion of European nations will progress normally within the limits of Europe and not beyond the seas"? As for Italy, the development of Ethiopia will be a sufficient task for many decades. And Russia, hemmed in as we know between Germany and Japan, has on the ancient continent a sufficient field for her military operations.

As to the clash of the fascist and communist ideas which have brought foreign intervention into Spain and China, is it really possible to believe in the existence of a danger so great as to make us imagine that aeroplanes and cruisers should take the place of a well organized police force?

What about the Far East? Simple common sense tells us that there is nothing to fear militarily from General Chiang Kai-Chek. As for Japan, the evolution of her foreign policy assures us that the limit of her expansion can be only China and not Canada. Many causes explain her present invasion of China: her economic needs, her fear of communism, the Russian air base at Vladivostok which, threatening her from the north, allowed her to expand only towards the south. In addition, all the rights and preferences which the Treaty of Versailles had given to her in the Chinese market, the nine-power conference deprived her of, thus relegating her to the rank of a secondary power. In the meantime Japan remained faithful to the League of Nations and tried hard to improve her commerce, but China's domestic disorders inevitably brought about the military adventures of 1932 and 1937. These conflicts between rival oriental countries have nothing to do with a friendly Canada situated on the other side of the Pacific ocean and not on the shores of the narrow Yellow sea.

There is no doubt that our financial position has somewhat improved. Last year's deficit amounted to exactly $35,000,000. This year's will be lower, but in spite of commendable efforts our budget will hardly be balanced. It could be, were it not for our military expenditure. The dual program of unemployment and public relief remains to be solved. The precarious prosperity of which we have hardly begun to reap the benefit is threatened from many sources. A new economic depression is feared in the United States; should it occur, its reactions would certainly be felt in Canada. Can Canada therefore afford so heavy an expenditure for so problematic a military defence?

There is this improvement over last year, Mr. Chairman, it is intended to reinforce a little more the defence of our Pacific coast where, by a remote chance, the attack might fall. I do not contest the principle of national defence, but the manner of ensuring it. If to protect our home we should surround it with fences, place locks on the doors and take measures to keep it from being broken into, does it follow that we should provide ourselves with arms capable of tracking down the aggressor as far as the next village?

Following the political considerations I have dwelt upon and because of the fact that the question has been emphasized in the press and in public speeches, should we not ask ourselves, before speaking of Canadian territory, what is to be understood by "Canadian territory" and our lines of defence. So long as this question is not settled and determined by official acts, can Canadians be blamed for not accepting immediately a plan of national defence which, in the absence of this information, may have the appearance of a political adventure? Since we have been told and are being told again that this military appropriation is intended solely for the defence of the Canadian territory, is it not highly important to have an exact definition of Canadian territory?

We all learned at college that the Canadian territory is that vast country of the North American continent bounded on the south by the 45th degree of latitude, on the west by the Pacific, on the east by the Atlantic and on the north by the polar regions and Alaska. Anyone can understand my meaning by following on the map the indications that I have just given. Therefore, when I speak of Canada's first line of defence, it is within or in the vicinity of these limits that I place it. Contrary to these data of elementary geography, some have held that the matter is one of higher policy. It amounts to saying that Canada, instead of being situated in Canada, may be situated elsewhere, according to certain political necessities. Even the Militia Act, R.S. 1927, does not specify the limits of the area to be defended. The hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) quoted, this afternoon, section 64, and to complete my own argument I shall read it:

> The governor in council may place the militia or any part thereof on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

So it behooves the governor in council to locate our first line of defence, and if certain people were in power, we do not know whether they would not locate it thousands of miles away from Canada. They did it during the great war, and was not the same view aired in the senate last year? Therefore, the question is not without interest. Before voting millions for the defence of Canada, is not the house entitled to know where this defence problem leads to and what it involves? The hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) put this very question last year, but it will be remembered that the answer was far from being precise. Last spring, 14,000 students from all over Canada asked the government to incorporate some more definite provisions in the Militia Act. Failing these provisions we are still faced with this serious dilemma: Are we arming for the defence of the empire or for the defence of Canada? Not that I wish to stress that point, but, as a Canadian, I do not want Canada to renew the error it made in 1914. I readily believe, as the right hon. prime minister said, that Canada did not make any commitment at the last imperial conference as regards a plan of imperial defence. But even if no commitment were made, nevertheless there is a growing pressure to that end and its persistence is food for thought.

The minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) stated himself in Toronto, last December, that Canada ought not to leave Great Britain all alone to arm in defence of peace. Defending peace by building and equipping warships? Defending peace by building offensive aircraft, and providing them with bombs and grenades? Defending peace by training men in the handling of guns and tanks? Then "to help England to defend peace" would mean to "help England to win the war," would it not?

They have also stressed our duty toward democracy.

It will be remembered that twenty years ago we were asked to defend civilization rather than democracy and parliamentary institutions. What will it be to-morrow?

Imperialistic propaganda is active. We even hear Canadians like Mr. John Bassett, president of the Gazette Publishing Company, ask us to place the Empire before Canada. That shows the need of a clear, permanent and reassuring definition of our defence obligations if we are to embark in an armament program for the defence of Canada.

Mr. Chairman, looking at the armament question from the Canadian point of view must not be construed as disloyalty to the United Kingdom or to the Empire. We are justified in so doing because we have at heart the true interests of Canada, which are to be found here and nowhere else.

The question of autonomy is also involved. Canada has gained her autonomy, or what we call by that name, after lengthy struggles on the part of Canadian statesmen of both parties. In these difficult times, it is more important than ever that we should not retrograde, we must not lose ground. Opinions are divided on this subject and some people are so blind to Canadian autonomy that they would not speak otherwise if they still had colonial status. While repeating that Canada is a free and sovereign country, they want us to place our sovereignty and our liberty at the service of the Empire, in other words to enslave our liberty.

Prior to last year, Canada had maintained a prudent peaceful policy. Not content with vague humanitarian principles, she had shown the way in the betterment of international relations. I proudly support that policy. If I opposed an increase in military expenditures last year, it is because I was sorry to see our country join in the armament race. Are we not committing ourselves further in 1938? Could not that armament policy be interpreted as the forsaking by Canada of the wish for peace that we have been proclaiming for so many years? Would that not lead nervous, restless and suspicious nations to believe that we are following in the wake of some large powers towards a policy of armed peace? Who can fail to see where that might lead us?

I am all the more frightened by the fact that our military boundaries are not yet defined. So long as they are not defined and so long as the other inconsistencies I have mentioned are not cleared up, I think I express the wish of the majority of my electors, in reserving my approval for such items of the military estimates which I think reasonable.

[Mr. Crête.]

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to speak at any length, but I feel there are one or two things I should like to say to-night. I think it would have been easier for most if the statement by the minister had been made on one day and the debate proceeded with on some subsequent day. It was a lengthy address, and it did not seem to me clear. At one time the minister said we were preparing for the defence of Canada, and the defence of Canada only. At another moment we were hearing about the protection of Canada by the British fleet in the North sea. At another time we heard of the need which might arise for all democracies banding together once again to save democracy. It may be that in reading the speech it will be easier to understand the position of the minister than it was in listening to him. At any rate, after hearing it, and then listening to most of the speeches which followed, in a language which I am very sorry I do not understand, I find myself left entirely on my own resources, which possibly is the best place of all to be left. If we must fight another war to save democracy, we can be pretty sure that it will be the end of democracy. The one we fought to save democracy about half finished it, and another would be the end.

What we all feel, of course—and I do not feel it any more than other hon. members—is that it seems uncivilized to be able to find $36,000,000 or whatever it is we spend for defence, when, according to an authority on the schools in Saskatchewan, in that province we have thirty-five rural schools closed because money cannot be found with which to keep them open. Yet we can find money to protect us from an enemy who was not named, although when the minister finished his speech I felt that the enemy would be here about next week. We can find money for defence; but we cannot find it to keep open the thirty-five schools in Saskatchewan, or for providing some sort of reasonable standard of living for almost, if not quite, a million people in Canada who are still on relief. When the minister waxed eloquent—and he was very eloquent, particularly at the end of his speech, about defending our homes—I was wondering just how eager the people who have been on relief for so long would be about defending their homes. I can understand that they would be eager to get into the army, but whether it would be in order to defend their homes or in order to obtain the assurance of something to eat and something for their families is another matter.

One cannot help being extremely sad that we seem, not in Canada so much as throughout the world, to be turning backward instead of progressing and going forward to a civilization in which things of the mind and the spirit count, and that in the very day when we are being freed from the necessity of arduous labour, when we could use the leisure thus created for the development of the art of living. The whole world apparently is providing itself with instruments of destruction, and again all in the name of peace. We are all arming in order that we may have peace. Never again shall I be fooled by that one. It may be true that we must arm; it may be true that we are all arming, but not to bring peace, because the more we arm the more likely it is that the days of peace are numbered and that before too long we shall have an opportunity of using the instruments of destruction which now so many nations are furiously building and gathering together.

Too, I cannot help feeling—and I am now thinking in the terms of democracies, from a Canadian point of view—that if we were as anxious for peace as the eloquent speeches on defence would have us think, we would have stopped sending to those countries that we believe would turn them into munitions, the material for the making of munitions. That is true of Canada, and true in a larger way of the British Commonwealth of Nations and the other great powers. I cannot understand a nation attempting to protect itself against the onslaught of another nation, and at the same time supplying it with the instruments of destruction which will be used against it. It simply does not make sense. When a few years ago these various nations seemed about to crack up, from a financial and economic point of view, the great powers came to their assistance and put them on their feet again, thus strengthening their enemies. We should have started sooner in the cause of peace and in a different way. It is important, at any rate to me, to see that none of the bullets which might come back in the bodies of the nationals of any country are made out of materials from our own land. Surely that is only a reasonable request, that we do nothing to arm an enemy, either by munitions or by loans. I cannot help thinking that if the great powers had been serious in this matter of peace, starting even twenty years ago or ten years ago, we could have avoided much of the difficulty which now threatens the whole world.

There is one other approach to peace which some time all nations will have to take. That is the approach which they will make in their own countries, by financial or economic changes in each country which will remedy the difficulties within the nation and do something to lessen the suffering from poverty, in this day when we all know poverty should not exist.

I notice that the minister outlined the many schools of thought there are in this country, and, I think, very well, indeed. Personally I have changed from one to the other. I once thought that collectively we could act together, and in time could prevent the difficulty which now seems to threaten the world. I still think it could have been done. Now I feel—I am speaking more from instinct than anything else—more and more North American in my point of view, because less and less I trust the great powers in their diplomacy, in their understandings and in their secret undertakings. I fear Canada being drawn into a world conflict which is none of our doing.

In my opinion our British connection is our gravest danger. It is our gravest danger because we all—I am not an exception—worry about what would happen in London, what would happen in Glasgow or what would happen in all the other cities or counties which, because of our families, have come to mean a great deal to us. Yet I wonder whether, if we all—and there are only eleven millions of us, if there are that many; we could not say that there are twelve millions and not be exaggerating—went over and died for Europe, it would make the slightest difference.

There is a possibility, in spite of any assurance the minister may have made in the house, that when trouble breaks out in Europe, membership in a commonwealth, the heart of which although not exactly on the continent of Europe is uncomfortably near to it, will, because of public sentiment, carry us into a conflict which, after all, has very little to do with North America—and I hope I can say the Americas.

So from that point of view I am becoming more and more north American in my outlook. It may be an escapist idea; that may be the reason I have worked it out, I do not know. I just know that increasingly I am thinking in terms of north America, and am determined that from my point of view we shall do what we can to save North America, because I am not sure that, with such a small population, we can do anything to save Europe. If she is determined to bring about her own destruction, that is not our business. Our business is to do what we can on the North American continent. If, then, we are going to stress that fact, and if our national policy is going to be directed toward keeping out of European difficulties, and toward the protection of North America, I feel that more and more there should be understanding between the United States and Canada, because we share the Atlantic and Pacific coastlines. We are on the same continent; we think in the same continental terms, and, much as imperialists may deny it, Canada is becoming increasingly North American in her point of view. The young people growing up to-day are more and more aware that they are North Americans, and that the destiny of the Americas, or North America, is the thing which affects them most.

I do not say it will be impossible, but it will be more difficult than it was last time to inflame the youth of Canada to go again to fight in Europe. I think it can be done. With the radio, the press, an eloquent minister, and all the agencies which can be used when required, I think it can be done—and particularly when young men and women have little in life to interest them, when they have no economic security and when they have little chance of developing their capabilities. Here is a chance for adventure, even though it may mean death at the end. I think they can again be induced to leave our shores. I do not—and I am not speaking disrespectfully to the minister—believe that we can build up an efficient, mobile unit in Canada, and keep it in Canada, in the event of an outbreak of war in Europe. I am positive there is enough exchanging of staffs between Great Britain and Canada; I am positive there is enough imperialist sentiment in Canada to send our mobile force, or that part of it which can leave our shores, overseas; and that again, if war breaks out, it will be fought by us not here, but there.

I do not know that one can say more. I do not know whether one ought to strive to have the estimate cut down. I do not think we can defend our shores if this enemy which may come from either the west or the east is in dead earnest about it and has made up his mind to come in here. I cannot imagine a country the extent of Canada, with the small population we have, being defended by an expenditure of the estimate before the committee to-night. So that from the point of view of defence of the North American continent I think a great deal of it is wasted money. Frankly, I say to the minister I would rather open the schools in Saskatchewan. If we are going to do a lot towards killing everybody off, then let us do the best we can for them up to the last minute.

[Miss Macphail.]

There may be something to be said for coastal defence. But I say just the same thing again—I cannot think of any other way to say it: If there were a great onslaught on either the west or the east coast, any defence we have would not count at all. In such a case we would have to depend upon someone else.

I do not think we are going to have an enemy invade Canada; I may be wrong, but I do not think so. I do not think they are even going to try to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I hope not.

Miss MACPHAIL: I do not think there is any grave danger. But if they do, we would simply have to rely upon someone else. It might be the British fleet upon which we would have to rely—but I have a very peculiar idea about that. I do not think the British fleet would be in our waters in such an event. They would be in other places where need for the fleet existed. I do not think they would be coming here. So do not depend upon that. I believe if there was an attack on Canada, the United States—and I dare say that is what the minister was referring to when he talked about "friendly fleets"—is the one place we could look to for assistance which would be given rapidly, not so much for our sake as for their own, because we happen to be their northern boundary. And so they would come, if they thought there was any grave danger to us.

I believe the discussion on the estimates will continue for another day or so; at least they will not be concluded to-night. After I have read what the minister said—and after all, he read some of it—and have had an opportunity to read the translations of other speeches, I shall have a better idea of what people are thinking. But I have not changed my mind on what war is; it is just the same as before. There is no difference. The total disregard for human life, which we have suffered in Canada and which has been suffered all over the world since the last war, is the price we are still paying for the war we fought. If we have to face a further disregard for human life, it will be just that much worse. We shall not be any more successful after the next war. The concluding treaty will be no better than the treaty of Versailles. Like breeds like, and if we go on using the same methods of preparing for peace by getting ready for war, we shall get ready for war and get war—but not peace.

Mr. L. D. TREMBLAY (Dorchester) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, before I submit the few remarks which I feel compelled to make to the house, may I be allowed to extend my sincere congratulations to the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie)? I have listened very carefully to his splendid speech this afternoon,—as I always like to hear all his speeches in this house—and I was glad to hear the minister on the question of defence for Canada.

Last year, we took in the house the very position which the minister himself stated this afternoon. We were willing to vote for the estimates of the department of National Defence, but we also stated definitely our position which I would summarize in these few words taken from my own speech of February 18th of last year:

> It is true that I am not an imperialist or a jingo, and I will say bluntly that I am entirely opposed to Canada's participation in extra-territorial wars. But I want my country to be protected from any invasion, no matter where it comes from—

And I voted against the motion then before the house. This afternoon, I was glad to hear the very interesting speech of my hon. friend from Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond), and I congratulate him. Everyone admits that the hon. member is serious-minded, everyone knows that he is anxious to vote not only according to his conscience, but also wisely, and since I am in this house I have always seen him live up to this. Events of the year show that the position we took last year was sound, and this year the hon. member endorses the policy of the present government. As we were not experts in matters of war or national defence, we had to rely on those who deserve our confidence, and personally, I deemed it was my duty to do so. Events of the past year show that we were justified in approving the government and that we had correctly interpreted the intentions of the present government. The hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie said this afternoon that several statements were made since last year by members of the government. May I be allowed to quote one made by the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), in Lotbinière, as published in a Moncton paper? This is what the minister said:

> Recent events in the Sino-Japanese war, such as the bombing and sinking of the United States gunboat Panay, bring home to us the daily danger of an international conflict and emphasize the necessity of adequate protection for our shores.
> With the present development of aerial combat, the Pacific and Atlantic coasts of Canada are in danger of attack in the event of either England or the United States becoming involved in war. It is all very well to say that England and the United States will protect us, but we must have something with which to protect ourselves until they arrive.

The article is entitled "Lapointe's sane words."

For the sake of comparison, the Minister of Justice also took the city of Westmount, which, although it has a fire brigade of its own, nevertheless relies upon the whole Montreal fire brigade in the event of a conflagration. The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), and other hon. ministers during by-elections, have had occasion to set forth quite clearly the present government's position as regards rearmament. Personally, only a few weeks after the estimates of National Defence were passed last year, I took part in the Bonaventure by-election. Later, for three weeks, it was my good fortune to join in the campaign carried on by the present member for Lotbinière (Mr. Francœur), then government candidate in that constituency. Irrespective of any statements made in this regard, the question of national defence and armaments was discussed in Lotbinière and in Bonaventure counties, as well as in the other counties—the question of armaments was for ever dinned into our ears wherever by-elections were held. During those campaigns, an attempt was made to have the electors of the province of Quebec believe that the government was prepared to enlist citizens of Canada to carry on hazardous enterprises abroad, which is positively untrue.

The people of Quebec province, especially those who urged us last year by their representations to oppose armaments, gave the reasons which, in their estimation, should justify us in voting against them. The main reason offered was this: Canada's participation in another war would increase the burden of taxation, overwhelming as it is already, and would lead the country into financial disaster, if not into absolute bankruptcy.

Another resolution was practically to the same effect. All of these representations did not so much oppose any increase of particular estimates as the possibility of the government joining perhaps in a race for armaments in preparation for a war outside of our territory.

We have heard these objections voiced by some of our friends here this afternoon, much to my regret. As far I am concerned, I stated last year that I felt the government could be trusted and I say it again. People outside politics, without any party affiliation, particularly with the Liberal party—and I will quote testimony to substantiate this—state in this connection that the government is perfectly justified in asking for increased estimates for national defence.

With your kind permission, I will quote from an article in L'Action Catholique, by Mr. Eugène L'Heureux, which appeared in February, 1937, and which reads as follows:

For Canada Only

Actual conditions, however, must be taken into account.

Our lack of knowledge in matters of national defence organization deters us from passing judgment on the amount of the appropriations sought by the government for the organization of the country's defence. We think it possible to place confidence in the government on that score, all the more so as the Prime Minister has emphasized the purely Canadian destination of this military expenditure.

These people, who are in no way bound to the Liberal party, find it possible to place confidence in the government on that score and add:

The Prime Minister has himself emphasized the purely Canadian destination of this military expenditure.

This afternoon the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) mentioned on several occasions the circumstances in which the right hon. the Prime Minister had publicly testified to his Canadianism for the greatest happiness of the country.

When people like that, in whom we have confidence and whose whole past is a guarantee that they will always place our country's interests before anything else, tell us that we should organize Canada's defence and that they have no other end in view, we should have confidence in them and support them as they were supported at the by-elections which have clearly expressed approval of the policy of the government on national defence.

Not being a great strategist and not wishing to give myself out as one before the house, I cannot say whether our defence will cost 20, 40 or 50 million dollars. Neither am I ready to state, with all the equanimity shown by some of our friends, that Canada is in no danger of invasion and does not need to be protected. I am not disposed to take this attitude and, this year again, I intend to support the government and the ministers who have repeated, one after the other, that the appropriation asked for is solely for the protection of our homes against all possible danger from outside the country or against internal trouble.

Last year there was some discussion of dangers from inside the country. On March 30, 1937, speaking on the question of industrial disputes, repressive laws and communism, the right hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) said:

[Mr. Tremblay.]

This session we have taken means to increase another force we have available to maintain internal order in case of emergency, as well as to defend our coasts. I do not know whether it will astonish the house and the hon. member who has just spoken if I tell them that these increases in the estimates have been bitterly criticized by communists and those associated with communism in this country. I hold in my hand a circular which has been sent throughout Canada. One side is in English, the other side in French. It is the work of the association controlled by the communist party in Toronto, and is directed against those estimates.

It is strange—said the minister of justice:

—that these people should be so strongly opposed to the provision I have mentioned.

Is it not your opinion? Here is an organization which is considered as extremely dangerous and undesirable, especially in the province of Quebec, an organization which we have the duty to fight and to annihilate in our country. When the government expresses the desire to provide the means of maintaining order in Canada, those who are opposed to communism are in league with the communists, unknowingly of course. But they cannot prevent a situation where the communists are associated with them when fighting against the organization for national defence and the maintenance of order in our country, a fact of great significance.

I will leave it at that. I just wanted to tell the government that, for my part, I am convinced that, in the circumstances, it is the duty of the government of the day to maintain in Canada, not a disproportionate army, but an adequate army for our needs. Such is the sentiment in my constituency and, I believe, in the province of Quebec.

I would have liked to quote the figures communicated to me last year by the deputy Minister of National Defence concerning our permanent force, but I do not have them here. However, it is a fact that the Canadian army, and more particularly the permanent force, is in need of reorganization and modernization. The government does not ask for anything beyond that. We have the assurance that the government of the day is not in favour of our participation in foreign wars. It is our duty to support them, to assure them that we appreciate their policy, and to tell them that, while voting increased appropriations for national defence we are irrevocably opposed to Canadian participation in any foreign conflict.

Mr. ARTHUR G. SLAGHT (Parry Sound): Mr. Chairman, in addressing the committee on this important subject I desire first to ally myself with the observations of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) in the tribute that he paid to our Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). Whether or not hon. members agree with the precise estimates which have been brought down, I think there can be but one opinion as to the fact that we in Canada to-day are singularly fortunate in having as our Minister of National Defence a man of the calibre of the gentleman who at present holds that important portfolio. He came to us from a race outstanding in British history, outstanding in the sacrifices that Scotland has made on the battlefields of the world; and those who believe in strict economy in measures of defence will have the added satisfaction that Scotchmen as a rule are not profligate with their dollars or the dollars entrusted to them to expend. So from the standpoint of the record of a race noted for its courage and its loyalty to the empire, and noted also for its economy where economy is desirable, we are indeed fortunate at this time in our nation's history in having at the helm of the national defence department the gentleman who occupies that position.

I support fully the estimates which he has submitted, and I propose to go a little farther than any hon. members who have so far addressed the committee, by making this rather humble suggestion that, in supplementary estimates perhaps, or in some other appropriate form, if not at this session then certainly at the next, a much more liberal expenditure be made by Canada in one of the branches of our defence services, namely in the service that comes under the heading of air force. Last year we expended some $10,000,000, and this year the estimates contemplate an expenditure of some $11,000,000 on this service. We have been given the details of the machines, the man power and the equipment of our present air service in Canada.

I was greatly impressed by some of the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) in the thoughtful contribution she made to this debate; they were sentiments which, in the main, inspire practically every hon. member. But may I suggest that, exercising the privilege which her sex have enjoyed for the last hundred years, she has changed her mind, in one respect; may I also suggest that, noble as those sentiments are, they failed to touch the exact point which is involved in the discussion of these estimates, and this I say with the greatest respect.

I desire to remind the committee, by citing a few figures, of what is the present armed state of the world. I believe that these figures are authentic, so far as it is possible to be accurate in matters of this kind; they include not only standing armies ready for battle but reserves in the various countries referred to. Russia, with an enormous population, has an army of the type I have indicated of 15,000,000 men; France, an army of 6,000,000 men; Germany, with a population of 74,000,00, 2,900,000 men; Italy, with a population of 42,000,000, 2,450,000; Czechoslovakia, of which we have heard so much in recent days, approximately 1,250,000 men; Great Britain, 450,000 men. If I am correct, as I believe I am, our force in Canada consists of a permanent force of 4,000 men, and a paper force—and when I say that I shall be understood as meaning battalions which go to camp for perhaps two weeks in the year—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Not every year.

Mr. SLAGHT: And not every year, as my right hon. friend was kind enough to remind me—a force, I say, including reserves, of 75,000 men, and with a training force of 45,000. It is in support of what may properly be termed relatively a very meagre force that these estimates are presented, and they are absolutely necessary. Would any hon. member, bearing in mind the figures I have just quoted, suggest that in this day and age they should be reduced? Surely to put the question answers it.

I proceed to the particular branch of the estimates which attracts my special attention and as to which I have some remarks to make. I have already given the figures of expenditures on our air service in the past year and the expenditures proposed for the coming year. The minister told us that a year ago there were 1,080 men in our air force and that there is an estimated increase to 1,730, or an increase of 650 men. I have a suggestion to make which conforms, I understand, with a sentiment expressed this evening by the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond), in a speech which, owing to my own lack of education, I regret I was unable to follow in the hon. member's native tongue. He referred to the viewpoint that the air force is a branch of the defence service which has an economic value in peace time, and it is in my view the only branch of our defence service which has an economic and constructive peace value. Soldiers on horseback, our infantry, and the branches of our service other than the air force have no economic peace time value. We are aware of the value of the air service because we are a party to the expenditures that are being made for the great transcontinental service which will come into effect next July. Those of us who follow air progress know that in the last year Canada carried by air five times as much freight as any other nation. That is a remarkable record.

Mr. MacDONALD (Brantford): Is that per capita?

Mr. SLAGHT: Not per capita—gross. If I am correctly informed—and I believe I am—Canada carried five times as much freight in the air as any other nation, regardless of population. Therefore we should appreciate the strides which our country is making in this particular economic and military field, and the people of Canada and the members of this committee will be impressed by a viewpoint which has as its objective an increased expenditure on air service.

Let me remind the committee of one or two significent facts. I believe I am correct in saying that most of the machines in the military and perhaps also in the commercial branches of our air service are of low speed, and that the highest speed military machines we have, even including those under order, have no greater speed than 250 miles per hour.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Two hundred and eighty.

Mr. SLAGHT: Two hundred and eighty; the minister corrects me. In the British Empire to-day there are flying machines with speeds of 350 to 400 miles per hour, and those machines are effectively using machine guns from the air at that rate of speed. Picture a machine of that terrific speed, equipped with a gunner who is capable of shooting at that rate of speed, because the ability to do so requires, I am informed, a man in a class all by himself. I am not addressing the committee on this subject without having had the benefit of a conference in the past fortnight with two of the most distinguished air force men in Canada, one of them outstanding by reason both of his record in the late war and his follow-up of this great subject of air efficiency. I understand from those who know best that it is extremely difficult to find pilots who can undertake the control as pilots of these high powered machines and also to find gunners who can shoot at speeds of 350 to 400 miles an hour; but I am happy to say, on the information I have, that the British Empire has successfully solved that problem and is putting into its active defence service to-day all the pilots and gunners of this calibre that are needed for this speedy program and enormous expenditure which Great Britain has undertaken.

[M. Slaght.]

Why do I trouble the committee with these details? It is to suggest that the figure of $11,000,000 should be increased if possible at this very session. I take it that it would be appropriate to do so later by supplementary estimates. I do not propose to move any amendment here, because I have the greatest confidence in the Minister of National Defence. But I ask him to consider very carefully whether he should not bring down later an increased estimate for expenditure upon the air service.

Let me suggest to the committee how I think it should be spent. It would be possible to enlist in the air service of Canada 4,500 young men and train them for a year, and the following year to double that, or at any rate to increase it to eight thousand, so that at the end of two years, if we were spared a war in the interval, we would have in this country, if my dream came true, 1,000 trained pilots who would be efficient in operating the highest speed machines that can be turned out; and we would have upon the ground, to service these 1,000 pilots, 7,000 mechanics. I am informed that one pilot in the air requires seven men on the ground to service him efficiently in all the details of that service: First, the garage mechanic; then the higher-powered engineer, then the men who operate the beam service in the various airports. All that would have to be taken into consideration. Those who are familiar with the subject will not dispute the figures I have given.

Might we not in the two years to come build up such a service? Ten or eleven million dollars more would give us 4,500 men, who in twelve months' time would have this training. Might we not encourage young high school graduates, men of practical experience in our garages, young university men in their first years, or graduates from the schools of science across the continent, to enlist in the air service of the country either as mechanics or as pilots? Might we not establish training camps and schools at once in ten centres—Halifax, Quebec, Montreal, the Royal Military College at Kingston, Toronto, Winnipeg, Calgary, Regina, Vancouver and Victoria? My suggestion—and it is not a considered one—is that it might be found practicable to pay these men at least $70 a month, as wages if you like, and $30 a month more for board, or $100 a month per man. I would suggest that they be boarded in barracks and insured at the expense of the country for fifteen or twenty thousand dollars each—because we would expect the best type of young men in the country. If this suggestion were adopted we would have 8,000 men who, in my humble judgment, would be of as great value in war time as 200,000 young Canadians would be, enlisted in the infantry, the cavalry and other branches of the service.

I am attempting to look at this question purely from the point of view of the minister, that is, from the point of view of the defence of Canada. Suppose the war clouds should break into storm and disaster and Europe ignites, or possibly war breaks out in the far east. I, for one, am heartily in accord with the sentiment expressed by the minister and by practically every other hon. member, that we should be very slow to become involved in any war until we are entirely satisfied of the absolute necessity of our participating in it. But, realizing world conditions as indicated by the figures I have given with regard to the armed forces in Europe to-day, and in view of the expressed intention of some of the men who control the destinies of those European countries, does any hon. member think it is beyond all possibility that Canada might be at war in six or twelve months' time? Let us contemplate that as a possibility. For instance, who would have said, three days before the fourth of August, 1914, that in a few short weeks thereafter Canada would be transporting troops to the battlefields of Europe? No one in this country would have said so, except perhaps a very few rabid imperialists. And on the 24th of March, 1938, who will say that, if war does break out in Europe and progresses for a short time, when the things that we hold dear are endangered and our very national existence here is threatened, we might not have to become involved in war? The hon. member for Grey-Bruce properly pointed out that there might be an attack either on the west coast or on the east coast, but I do not quite share her view that we should fold our arms and say that we could not resist. If I understood her correctly, that was the impression I gathered from her remarks.

Miss MACPHAIL: You had better not interpret them.

Mr. SLAGHT: The hon. member was absent when I endeavoured to pay her a compliment for her contribution to the debate.

Miss MACPHAIL: Thank you.

Mr. SLAGHT: Who will say that it is impossible for this country to become involved in war? If we had a trained force of the type I have indicated, and if we were obliged to turn our minds at all to the problem of actual defence, how could we make a greater contribution to empire war service and empire defence—including our own selfish defence—than to have a force of 1,000 trained airmen equipped with a large number of machines of high-powered type, together with other machines of lower velocity and a mechanical force of 7,000 men to service that fleet of planes? Could we hope by any other means to make so great a contribution to ultimate world peace, which I assume is the desire of every hon. member.

I commend this suggestion to the minister. It must not be forgotten that such a force would have a definite economic peace time value. I believe that the development of air traffic, both passenger and freight, is in its infancy; and just as twenty-five years ago the first hard-tired small automobiles came upon the scene, so for the next generation progress in transportation will be in the air—transportation for economic and, I regret to say, destructive purposes. With a population of eleven million we cannot compete with the armies I have outlined; we could not begin to compete with them; it would be stupidity on our part to attempt to do so. But here is a branch of service that would be eminently useful—and I speak from the records of the last great war. By common consent, even on the part of Britain's enemies in that war, Canadian pilots and mechanics outshone the pilots and mechanics of every other nation. That is a well established fact.

I desire, with some diffidence, to present for the earnest consideration of the committee the observations I have just made as to a field in which we may engage. Do not let us wait until the nations of the world are at war before we prepare.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), who has just taken his seat, had continued a little further with his discussion of the air service, perhaps I should not have arisen. As he proceeded with his remarks I thought, in connection with the aeroplanes to which he was referring, for bombing and so on, he would have coupled with that subject some remarks in reference to rescue work as a result of gas bombs being dropped from the air, and if that had been done perhaps I should not have said anything at this time.

Mr. SLAGHT: I thank my hon. friend for that reminder. It is a real factor, and I overlooked it.

Mr. MacNICOL: I remember sitting in the Friedrichstrasse station in Berlin, Germany, for a matter of three hours last June, after I had finished my investigation into various matters in that city. I became attracted by the large number of aviators who were entering and leaving that station. First, I was interested in the bands on their arms, which all seemed to be different; then I commenced counting the number who got on and off each train. According to my memory a train entered or left the station about every four minutes; there were many tracks. I was putting in my time and commenced figuring an average of how many got on and off. Finally, I computed that the average number of aviators per train getting on or off was twenty. At the rate of fifteen trains an hour that meant three hundred aviators an hour, and for the three hours I sat there it meant nine hundred aviators.

I must confess that I left Berlin that night feeling greatly depressed, thinking that if the British Empire should become involved in any trouble with Germany, that country would have a very large number of trained aviators. I inquired how many they had, and was told that they numbered something between eight and ten thousand aviators ready to take the air at any time. Throughout the city itself I found preparations being carried on to protect its inhabitants, who number some four or five million, by means of shelters where the people could go in the event of the city being gassed.

The point I am making is that whether or not we like trouble, it comes to us, and to every nation, and at this moment I might add that I certainly approve the minister doing the best he can. I have no comment to make at the moment on the estimates except the omission, as I see it, of a vote to provide some defence against attack by gas in this country. However, a moment ago I started to say that throughout the city of Berlin they were preparing or planning places of refuge. When I returned to England I found similar plans there, and on going to the Home Office I learned that adequate preparation is being carried on in that country. I do not know of any preparations along this line being carried on in Canada. The minister may have in mind some protection against the effects of air raids on the civilian population in regard to gas, but I do not see anything in the estimates for it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is being very carefully considered at the present moment.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to learn that. I should like to take just a few moments to tell the committee the preparations that are being carried on in the old country. As I said, I went to the Home Office and found that they had divided England into eleven districts; I do not know about Scotland and Ireland. These districts were as follows: London, Salisbury, Cardiff, Birmingham, Shrewsbury, Liverpool, Newcastle, Leeds, York, Nottingham and Cambridge. All these districts were again subdivided to take care of the counties and municipalities adjacent thereto. Hearing that a great demonstration was to take place in the city of Leeds, I went there to learn what I could. Perhaps the minister was there also. The evening I was there I attended a school held for the purpose of educating the people in how to protect themselves against gas. There is no use in fooling ourselves or, to use a common expression, in kidding ourselves that we are safe in Canada. To-day no country is safe, and it is only fit and proper that every country should make preparations to protect its civilians.

What did I find in Leeds, at that school? I found a gentleman, I suppose an officer from the Home Office, and I might add that the school was held in a large auditorium in the city hall, which was packed with people who were in deadly earnest, listening to what the officer from London told them. He said that an air raid might take place without anyone being notified about it; that the Home Office, through the air marshal, would try to advise the sub-air marshals in the various districts that an air raid was impending, and this officer did his best to tell the people there assembled how they might protect themselves. I believe this can be done here, outside any possibility of Canada taking part in a war. I do not believe any hon. member wants to see Canada engaged in a war; I think every hon. member wants Canada to keep out of war, but whether we like it or not, it may come our way, and we might come right up against what this officer told the people that night in Leeds. I attended a school in another city as well, but I shall confine my remarks to what I learned that night at Leeds.

What did the officer ask them? He asked the people there assembled to volunteer—to do what? To divide themselves into various classes; to make preparation for what might come like a thief in the night, namely, a gas attack, without warning. The first class was the first aid and medical service class. He invited doctors, nurses, people belonging to the St. John's Ambulance Corps and other similar associations to join that class and volunteer to give assistance in Leeds in the event of an air raid. They were to be ready to go to the aid of casualties; to give them conveyance by ambulance to hospitals, and to keep the citizens instructed as to how to put on their gas masks. Just in passing I might say that before I left Berlin I made inquiry as to how many gas masks the German government had available, and I was told about forty-five million. In England I learned that they had about thirty-five million gas masks. When the minister speaks on this matter again, I should like him to tell us something of the preparations which are being made in Canada in connection with the provision for gas masks.

When the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) was speaking this afternoon, I wondered what would happen if one of these great aeroplane carriers sailed into Hudson bay. The planes would have to go only a few hundred miles to reach Cochrane, and I doubt if there is a gas mask in that town. If Cochrane were showered with gas they would all be in danger; there would be no possibility of saving their lives. It would be the same thing in Toronto; I do not know that there are any gas masks in that city. Would the minister tell us what preparation is being made in Canada, so far as gas masks are concerned, and particularly for the protection of our coastal cities, both east and west, such as Halifax, St. John and Vancouver? If there is no expenditure indicated in the estimates to cover that point, I am one who believes that there should be some provision for gas masks to save the people who might live in cities or towns bombed from the air by gas.

The second division they were instructed to prepare for was in connection with rescue parties and the demolition of buildings. We see pictures in illustrated papers of buildings which have been bombed, showing what is taking place in Spain. Squads must be in readiness to tear down damaged buildings, because a wall leaning over as a result of a bomb presents a danger. Volunteers are called to do that kind of work. There must also be men to clear the roads, or to repair steam pipes which have been opened by an explosion. I do not know whether we are doing anything along this line in Canada.

We may be on the verge of attack—I hope we are not; I hope we are never attacked. But it would not do us any harm to be ready to take care of ourselves if we were attacked from the air or otherwise. The officer next called for volunteers to attend to the decontamination of buildings and roadways, as a result of a town or city being gassed from the air. This particular service calls for the cleaning up of roads and the sprinkling of lime on them, or some other decontaminator, which would destroy the effects of gas.

The officer next asked for air raid wardens. These are volunteers who would be ready to fly at a moment's notice to warn people by means of sirens that the city was about to be gassed. He also asked that volunteers, to wear the necessary protective appliances, be enrolled to go here and there throughout the city, to various sections and places, to detect places filled with gas. He gave long instructions with respect to the preparation of rooms.

I wonder if we have anything like that in Canada. I brought back the literature which was handed to me—all sorts of it. Pamphlet No 1, is entitled, Organization of Air Raid Casualty Services. Have we anything of that kind sent out in Canada? If we have not, then we should have. No. 2 is entitled, Rescue Parties and Clearance of Debris. We should have some organization ready, in the event of a city like Halifax being bombed from an aircraft carrier. Who can tell that Halifax could be saved by any surface craft if an aircraft carrier, coming within range of the city, sent out bombing planes and showered it with gas? How would the people know what to do? Has the department sent out literature? If the department has not literature along the lines of that published in England, it should have.

Pamphlet No 3, is entitled, Organization of Decontamination Services, and No 4, is Air Raid Wardens. I had not intended saying anything, but I was moved to do so by the observations of the hon. member for Parry Sound. All I can say to the minister is that if there is no service available at the present time, or no money provided through an estimate for the protection of Canadians against air raids, against bombing and gas attacks from the air, then any vote along that line should be supported by the Canadian people.

Mr. ERNEST BERTRAND (Laurier) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to take part in this debate, but certain statements were made which prompt me to make a few observations. Last year, when we discussed the question of armaments, I stood by the government. We were somewhat criticized in our constituencies, but I was glad to notice, this year, a change of opinion among the public, and even among some members of this house. I am sure that many of those who criticized us last year will have to admit now that we were right then as we are to-day in supporting the government.

War is a terrible thing. We are all agreed on that, and nobody wants war, neither those who are in favour of armaments nor the others, but, as the hon. member who just spoke said, war will break out when we least expect it, and without notice.

There is in the province of Quebec a most vulnerable spot, in case of war. I mean the St. Maurice valley. I want the people who inhabit this valley to hear what might happen if a war broke out. With the powerful aircraft that are in use to-day, we know that our enemies would attempt to attack mainly the spots where our war industries are situated. For instance, in the St. Maurice valley there are cities like Three Rivers, Shawinigan and Grand'Mere where many industries are apt to manufacture war materials. At the head of the St. Maurice valley there is the Gouin dam which was built, I believe, some twenty-five years ago, and which forms a reservoir containing so much water that, if it were bombed, it would flood the whole St. Maurice valley. It could possibly drown the whole population and completely destroy our war industries.

I do not wish to censure any of my colleagues, but I just want to ask those who are residing in the St. Maurice valley to ponder over this contingency. Supposing an airplane would get to that dam at a speed of 400 miles an hour, and destroy it with bombs, would it not be a terrible disaster? The hon. members from that district have every good reason to see Canada well armed.

Nobody likes war, either on this side or on the other side of this house, and we have finally agreed on the question of armaments. I notice also that hon. members of the opposition who, last year, remained silent during the discussion of these estimates, now come forward and are more ready than ever to support the government.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest this afternoon to the speech of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). I say I listened with interest, because one does become interested when expressions are given by ministers of the crown on such matters as national defence, and matters touching upon problems of the day and their relation to other nations. I do not think the minister could have said anything but what he did. If any of us were in the same position we could not have said anything more. I am not now speaking for the group to which I belong. My personal observation is that if we were to find ourselves on the treasury benches we would not know just what to do in connection with foreign policy. We have often been asked just what we would do in connection with finance, and although the answer has not always been to the satisfaction of hon. members opposite, I think we would know just what should be done. But when it comes to the problems being debated to-night, I doubt if we would know just how to act. In saying that, I do not think I admit any weakness on our part; it simply illustrates that the problems which confront the government of this and other countries are so exacting that it would be difficult indeed to determine the proper and exact course to follow.

I am in accord with some of the things said by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail). I cannot see any sense in spending money on armaments and then permitting war materials to go from this country to potential enemies. I imagine all hon. members will agree with that. However, there are other matters to be considered. We all like to be idealistic to a certain extent; we all know in our own minds what we would like to see done; but we cannot very well deal with things as we would like them to be; we must deal with them as they are. Things being as they are in the world to-day, who can say just what should be done?

I experience a little difficulty in knowing just where the work of the Minister of National Defence ends and the work of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs, begins. I have never been able to determine the exact line of demarcation. When we are debating or discussing matters pertaining to estimates on national defence, we are so likely to slide off into matters of foreign policy. In some instances we feel that we have to do this. However, I think we should appreciate the position in which the Prime Minister finds himself these days. Sometimes I have felt that he has not given an adequate and full answer to some questions concerning foreign policy; yet at the same time I do not think we should try to embarrass the government.

I do not believe there is a man living who can predict what will happen in the next few months or even in the next few weeks. I do not think it is wise for us to ask the Prime Minister for a specific and definite answer with regard to foreign policy because he may have to change that answer in a few months. I am reminded of a book written by Sir Norman Angell. I shall not quote from that book as some hon. members do not appreciate quotations. Prior to the great war he wrote a book entitled The Great Illusion, in which he dealt with the money aspect of a possible war. It has since been proven that when that war did break out, every one of his contentions were erroneous. His predictions did not come true. Sir Norman Angell is nobody's fool; he is a smart man in many ways; but he could not make accurate predictions at that time, and conditions to-day are tremendously more problematical than they were then. I am not saying that we are nearer to war, but it seems to me that the world's stage as it appears to-day is more intricate than it was then. If such men as he were unable to say with any degree of certainty what would happen in the future, who can do so to-day? I would be reluctant to embarrass the government in this connection.

There are one or two observations I should like to make with regard to the closing part of the minister's speech. These observations may seem trivial, but I should like to place them before the committee. The minister said that we were a free people, but I do not think we are. We may be free to vote and elect a government, but I doubt very much if that government is free once it is in office. We are not free, even as a nation, to do as we would like to do. Our contention is that the present system of finance will not permit it.

If I understood the minister correctly, he said that to a large extent governments were guided by popular opinion. He had better think over that statement a little more as I doubt whether it is so in fact. If he will reflect a little more, he must realize that certain factors go toward moulding public opinion and those factors are often brought into play by the action of governments. There are many illustrations of this in history. For instance, take the case of the abdication of Edward. In that instance the popular cry was that he should remain, come what may. But Mr. Stanley Baldwin thought otherwise and paid little heed to the cry of public opinion.

We all recognize, I think, that statesmen must be very far-seeing. Sometimes public opinion is not right, and again, public opinion changes very, very rapidly. I would not advise our government to be swayed by public opinion, because public opinion to-day may be one thing and to-morrow it may be entirely different, and sometimes it does not take very much to change it. I suppose that public opinion with regard to conscription, for the sake of illustration, would be opposed to it; but if an incident such as that of the sinking of the Lusitania occurred, or if the newspapers were to print war atrocities and display cartoons showing babies stuck on the end of bayonets, public opinion would change very, very rapidly.

I have made these observations, Mr. Chairman, as my small contribution to this debate, and it may not be worth very much. I feel, of course, that money policy plays a big part in all these things, and this group goes a step farther in saying that until the money system is so adjusted as to bring about a conformity between money and the distribution of goods and services, there will in the end be no peace. Money knows no international boundaries, and until this adjustment is brought about, there will be no peace.

Mr. F. C. BETTS (London): I should like to say a few words, Mr. Chairman, before this item carries. First, I should like to quote a remark made by the right hon. leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he was dealing with defence estimates in 1937, as reported at page 1040 of Hansard of that year. He said:

> I should be inclined to believe that the security of one's country would rank as the first among all social securities.

That, of course, is a statement with which no one can quarrel, and it is as true to-day as it was then. Dealing with the principle which has been laid down by imperial conferences since time immemorial, and which was referred to by the minister in his remarks to-day, he said:

> The primary responsibility of each portion of the empire is for its own local defence.

In dealing with the local defence of a country such as Canada, I would point out that the vital areas extend for some very considerable distance beyond our harbours on the east coast and on the west as well. Local defence, using the term in its narrowest sense, if it is to be adequate must include such sea-going craft as can cope effectively with enemy warships, and in particular with enemy craft of the type known as the cruiser raider, such as the Emden, which wrought so much havoc during the past war.

Dealing with the phrase "local defence" and with our naval situation in particular, I would submit that as we are now equipped on the sea, or as we shall be even after the present estimates have been appropriated and spent, we shall have nothing that could be described as adequate for the defence of Halifax, Saint John, Vancouver and Victoria. The failure to make provision for purchasing a cruiser is, I contend, a glaring gap in the estimates as they stand, and our destroyer fleet would be entirely ineffective in coping with the type of raid that the Emden carried on during the last war, and with the type of raid that we may expect with full confidence will be suffered by our ports, not some weeks after war breaks out, but within a very few hours after the declaration of war. I would also remind the minister that declarations of war have gone out of fashion. What I am trying to emphasize is the extreme urgency of adequate protection on the sea, which is lacking at the present time.

We should also have, in my opinion, submarines in order that the focal waters around Saint John, Halifax, Vancouver and Victoria may be protected. Before I leave the eastern ports I should like to touch on their tremendous importance in any scheme of empire defence. Military experts agree that within the United Kingdom at the present time there is enough food to last approximately six weeks and no more. In the event of a war which included the United Kingdom there are two possibilities: The United States might participate in the early stages of the war, and the United States might not. In this house in our deliberations we should prepare for either eventuality.

Let us take the second one, a war in which the United States takes no part. The situation then would be that the United States, by their neutrality legislation, would be prohibited from shipping anything to the belligerents. No food, no munitions, no nickel, no copper could leave the United States for the British Isles if the United States were not involved in the war. That would place a tremendous burden on the ports of Saint John and Halifax. It would make those ports of primary importance in any scheme of imperial defence, and as they are now protected, my submission is that these ports would be put out of action within the first week of the war. They are absolutely vulnerable to attack by the cruiser-raider type of vessel. Furthermore, there is an entire lack, so far as I know, and so far as these estimates or the minister's statements have revealed, of any adequate, modern anti-aircraft equipment. The ports are at the mercy of attacks not only from the sea but from such planes as would inevitably slip through any North sea blockade that might be established, some carried by aircraft carriers and some in the holds of merchantmen, which would establish themselves somewhere within 250 miles of Saint John and Halifax, up north, Labrador way, where it would be practically impossible to locate them until great damage had been done. Using their ships as their base, they would run a shuttle bombing service which in a very short time would put the ports of Saint John and Halifax entirely out of action. The result of that would be that not only food, for which Great Britain would be looking to this country, but the all important supplies of nickel, copper and other sinews of war, which would have to come from the North American continent, would be entirely lacking.

The minister in his statement said that the use of modern aircraft had turned the probability of attacks from the air into a possibility.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The very opposite—the possibility into a probability.

Mr. BETTS: I stand corrected—yes. I would go one step further, and say that it has become an absolute certainty in the event of war. I point out another probability, if not a certainty, namely, that cities such as Quebec —certainly—and Montreal—possibly—would be subject to bombing attacks by dirigibles which would come in by way of Labrador, which would be seen by nobody except a few Indians, and which would be in a position to unload, without any warning whatever, two tons of explosives on the city of Quebec.

The same possibility, probability, or certainty exists in so far as the cities of Vancouver and Victoria are concerned. It is true that at the present time we have the British navy; we have had it for years, and we rely with a sense of security upon what that navy can do for us. But the fact of the matter is that if a war of world dimensions broke out—and personally I fail to see how any modern war can be other than one of world dimensions—the British navy would have all it could possibly do to protect the focal waters around the British Isles. There would be no possibility of the navy sending detachments to protect this part of the empire. Furthermore, we have no right to expect that that would be done, because, as imperial conference after imperial conference has affirmed, as the Prime Minister himself stated in his speech of February a year ago, and as the minister reiterated to-night, the primary responsibility of each portion of the empire is for its own local defence.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I protest against the entire lack of adequate provision in these estimates for the protection of those very parts of the country which the Prime Minister over a year ago referred to as vulnerable points, points which must be protected. I quote further from the remarks of the Prime Minister. At page 1041 of Hansard he said:

> With warfare what it is likely to be in the future, with possible air and submarine raids and all else that is to be feared, the protection of our great municipalities against the dropping of bombs or the sowing of mines which might disrupt the whole life of a municipality, becomes one of the most serious obligations under the heading of present day defence.

I ask the minister, and I hope he will tell us later on in his remarks, how many planes we have in this country capable of developing a speed of 250 miles per hour—

Mr. BENNETT: Or any speed.

Mr. BETTS: —and how many thoroughly modern effective anti-aircraft guns we have at Halifax, Saint John and on the eastern coast that are capable of coping with modern aerial attack.

Dealing further with the remarks of the Prime Minister, I find he makes these very appropriate and pertinent observations at page 1045 of Hansard:

> Any criticism of the government in respect to the defence estimates must be made on the score of what we are spending for defence in the light of the world situation as we know it in reference to dangers that may arise.

Later on at the same page he says that the government—> —has regard to conditions as they exist, and must consider what is necessary, and what it believes the people of the country believe to be necessary properly to meet those conditions. If there were no dangers in the world at the present time, if there were no threat of international war, if there were no impending calamity on a scale such as everyone, who is reflecting on the world situation, realizes that there is, certainly it would be an extraordinary thing for the government to bring in increases in defence estimates. But when countries are facing an altogether new situation, a government which has responsibility for defence must assume that responsibility in the light of existing conditions.

Then later on, dealing with the break-down of the League of Nations and the resultant acute condition of world affairs, he says:

> What is the position to-day with regard to treaties and contracts between nations? We have seen how far the treaty of Versailles has been respected. We have seen how Locarno has been violated. We have but to look at the pronouncements made from day to day by certain nations to discover that they put no faith at all in contracts and will not if it suits their purpose regard themselves as bound by any agreement or obligation. Some nations avowedly are placing their confidence in might not in right; in force not in reason. That is a very different situation from that with which the world was faced a little while ago. These circumstances have changed the whole position of security so far as the nations of the world are concerned.

And again, at page 1048:

> If the conflict spreads, if a conflict of that character becomes international, is it likely that any part of the world is going to escape its terrors? Facing such a possibility, not to speak of others scarcely less evident, can a government which has the responsibility of looking after the defence of its own country, ignore altogether what is necessary for the protection of its coasts, its harbours, its great cities, its people wherever they are, in contingencies that may arise.

I quote those passages in order to emphasize the point made by the Prime Minister, with which I am in entire agreement, that any defence policy must be moulded on conditions as they exist. Any defence measures that we adopt must vary according to the exigencies of the situation, according to the gravity of our position as an integral part of the British Empire, and I ask the minister to consider how much water, how much turbulent water, has flowed under the bridge since those pronouncements of the Prime Minister were made one year ago.

Japan has invaded China. Germany has annexed Austria. Poland has bludgeoned Lithuania into submission by an overwhelming show of force. Italy and Germany have been pouring men and aeroplanes, guns and materials of war into Spain in defiance of the protest of the British Empire and of every civilized country. The German, Italian, Japanese axis has been announced. Now, surely, to be consistent, a government which made the point that defensive measures must be framed on the world situation as we find it, would have increased the defences of Canada in the intervening years. Let us see what has been done. In the United Kingdom the defence vote for 1937 was £283,500,000, and for 1938, recently announced, the vote was £353,750,000. In Australia, the 1937 defence vote was £8,766,000. In to-day's paper there is an announcement that a three year program has been entered upon by Australia, which with the ordinary defence expenditures will involve a total outlay of £43,000,000, or an annual outlay of approximately £14,000,000. In Canada, we have reduced our defence estimates by $2,000,000, and we have reduced the amount which we shall spend on aircraft by $1,017,000, this despite the fact that on the 1935-36 basis Canada was spending per capita $1.41 for defence; Australia, $4.37; and Great Britain, $14.14.

I should like to conclude by reading the closing remarks of the Prime Minister's speech delivered in February, 1937, in which he says:

> Is it likely that we shall be able to maintain friendly relations with the United States if we do nothing to defend our own coasts but simply take the attitude that we shall look to them for our defence? Similarly with regard to England. Are members of this government who are to represent Canada at the imperial conference to be asked to assert Canada's equality of status with all the nations of the British commonwealth and at the same time to tell the British government that we are relying upon Great Britain to protect our coasts, and will do nothing to help ourselves because we have their protection? In a word, so far as looking to either the United States or Great Britain for the defence of our coasts or of any part of the dominion, while naturally we are glad to know that we can count on that additional safeguard in any great emergency, to suggest that we should depend upon it entirely and do absolutely nothing for ourselves is simply to be lacking in self-respect as a nation; it is simply sponging.

We have been sitting in this chamber now for two months, and have devoted much time to the discussion of all sorts of resolutions, many of them of very little moment. We have talked at endless length about the advisability of designing and adopting a new Canadian flag which will signify our status as an "equality partner in the empire." But my submission is that far from doing anything to carry our load, far from pulling our weight in the imperial boat, we are doing absolutely nothing. I submit that the present defence estimates, coupled with the statement of the minister, show an entire lack of appreciation of the seriousness of the situation in which we find ourselves, and so far as anything we are doing to maintain our own local defences is concerned, we are still sponging.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, March 25, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING COMMITTEES

RADIO BROADCASTING—CIVIL SERVICE ACT—AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION—CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. Heon be substituted for that of Mr. Wermenlinger on the standing committee on radio broadcasting.

That the name of Mr. Spence be substituted for that of Mr. Lawson on the special committee to inquire into the operation of the Civil Service Act.

That the name of Mr. Tustin be substituted for that of Mr. Barber on the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

Motion agreed to.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION

INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE AND BOARD OF REVIEW—INFORMATION AS TO APPOINTMENT AND MEETINGS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In further reply to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) as to the date on which the interdepartmental committee studying the question of oriental immigration was appointed, I may say that for the past year officials of the immigration branch, the Department of External Affairs and the mounted police, have been holding conferences concerning orientals in British Columbia, with occasional consultations with officials of other departments. This interdepartmental committee on February 28 was enlarged by the definite addition of national revenue, national defence, fisheries, statistics and labour. Members of the board of review were appointed on March 11. The board held its first meeting in Vancouver on March 21.

[Mr. Betts.]

ELECTRIC POWER

TRANSFER TO PARLIAMENT OF CONTROL OF EXPORT EXCEPT IN INTERNATIONAL EMERGENCY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved the third reading of Bill No. 21, to amend the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, few measures better illustrate the value of parliamentary discussion than the one now before us for third reading. We have, I believe in a not unfriendly spirit, discussed the proposals submitted by the government, and I think the adoption of suggestions by the government in the form of amendments has improved greatly the legislation. Yet I feel it would be most unfair, not only to myself but to many others who are associated with me, if I did not indicate that it is a little difficult even yet to understand how a private act of parliament should determine an issue so fully national and so very important in the largest and truest sense as that concerning the exportation of power.

I have only this further observation to make. While the executive may or may not be the best body to determine whether licences for the export of power should be issued, there can be no doubt about one thing, that they are as competent to determine that matter as they are to determine whether a statute of this parliament should be repealed. Inasmuch as the executive is now being vested with the power to repeal a statute, which repeal would from necessity arise from knowledge possessed by the executive as to the wisdom or unwisdom of the continuance of the statute, it should follow that the same executive is quite capable of fulfilling the obligation placed upon it by the original statute, namely, of determining whether or not licences should issue. If the power to repeal the statute is not as great as the power to determine whether licences should issue, it is hard to understand what is the true measure of responsibility.

That is all I have to say. I do not intend either to discuss anew the merits or demerits of the measure, or to move an amendment to refer it back to the committee. I content myself with saying that for the reasons indicated I shall have to say "nay" to the motion for third reading.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, speaking in the same spirit as that which has inspired my right hon. friend, I desire to thank him and the hon. members on his side for their suggestions, some of which have been embodied in the bill. I think this serves to show that this government is open minded when it comes to dealing with public business. I can assure my right hon. friend that when any private bill is introduced under the provisions of this measure, it will be dealt with with the same broad mindedness and spirit of justice.

With regard to the closing remarks of my right hon. friend, may I say that possibly if this matter had been dealt with and settled under the provisions of the existing law, when the application was made the governor in council would not have had as guidance the recent events which have occurred in and the statements which have come from the United States with regard to this question. On the whole I think all is well that ends well, and the house will do well to vote for the third reading of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed on division.

INSPECTION AND SALE

PROPOSED REGULATIONS RESPECTING BINDER TWINE, SALT AND OTHER COMMODITIES

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved the third reading of Bill No. 30, to regulate the inspection and sale of binder twine and salt, and to establish weight of bushel for certain commodities commonly sold by the bushel.

He said: It will be recalled that when this bill was in committee part II was deleted and third reading was delayed in order that it might be reprinted with that part omitted and any consequential amendments made on the motion for third reading.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence) moved:

In section two, for the words and figures "Parts I, II, and III" substitute "Parts 1 and II," and strike out the word "salt" in the second line.

In section three, strike out paragraph (e), being the definition of "packer."

In the title of the bill, strike out the words "and salt."

Mr. BENNETT: The bill should be referred back to the committee of the whole house.

Mr. STIRLING: Has it been reprinted?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. I have before me a ruling which dates back to 1920 to the effect that where an amendment is consequential it is not necessary to refer the bill back to the committee of the whole.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought they were more than that.

Mr. GARDINER: The amendments are made necessary by part II having been struck out. I am informed that the third reading would be moved in these terms:

That the bill with the amendments do pass and the title be, "An Act to Regulate the Inspection and Sale of Binder Twine, and to Establish Weight of Bushel for Certain Commodities Commonly Sold by the Bushel."

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SEED GRAIN

GUARANTEE OF LOANS FOR PURCHASE OF SEED AND OTHER ASSISTANCE IN SEEDING OPERATIONS IN WESTERN PROVINCES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the guarantee by the government of Canada of principal and interest of loans made by chartered banks and guaranteed by the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, respectively, for the purchase of seed grain and for providing other assistance to farmers in connection with seeding operations during the spring of 1938; the liability of the government of Canada in respect of such guarantees not to exceed in the aggregate the sum of $1,900,000 in respect of Alberta and $14,500,000 in respect of Saskatchewan.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, the bill to be based on this resolution represents the national aspect of an effort to ensure that those portions of the prairie provinces which were ravaged by drought in 1937 will once more be sown. The principle of the measure is identical with that of the one passed at the last session of parliament under which guarantees were given for the seeding operations of 1937.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister would give the results of that.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, I will a little later. The amounts involved differ because of the different area affected as compared with the area in 1936. In 1937 severe drought conditions affected Manitoba less than previously, with the result that Manitoba is not this year included within the bill to be based upon this resolution. In Saskatchewan the intensity and area affected was greater than ever before, and the problem consequently in that province is much more serious. The government of Alberta asks for a somewhat larger provision than a year ago, but not materially so. Last year the limit of our guarantee in the case of Alberta was $1,600,000. By the resolution now under consideration for this year the amount is $1,900,000. In the case of Saskatchewan last year the limit of our guarantee was $6,600,000, and this year the amount asked for in that province is $14,500,000.

I have spoken of the much wider area affected this year. Another factor which affects the figures is the higher prices which must be paid for seed grain, feed grain and fodder for use during the seeding period. In asking us to guarantee loans up to $1,900,000, the province of Alberta states that the number of farmers applying for assistance in this respect will be about 15,000. The amount required in this area in Alberta will be about $1,800,000, while the further sum of $100,000 will be required in that province to provide similar assistance in what may be called marginal districts.

The actual loans made in Alberta last year totalled $1,339,328; that is to say, the amount authorized by this parliament in respect of that province was not fully required. As at December 31, 1937, reflecting the somewhat better crop conditions in some parts of Alberta and as a result of repayments made out of last year's crop, the amount outstanding under the Alberta guarantee for last year has been reduced to $919,000.

In the case of Saskatchewan the number of farmer applicants has greatly increased because of the condition I mentioned a few moments ago. The government of that province estimates that the number of farmers who will need some kind of seeding assistance because of the lack of production last year will exceed 81,000, as compared with 25,000 who received assistance last year. These are just round figures.

The amounts required for the various forms of assistance in each province have been carefully considered by the federal Department of Agriculture together with representatives of the department of agriculture in each of the provinces concerned, and my colleague the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will be able to answer all questions with respect to the provincial method of determining how seed shall be supplied in detail and the terms upon which it is made available to the individual farmer.

Subject to further questions—of course the members of the committee are free to ask questions, and I have here all the information with respect to the whole history of seed grain advances during the last seven or eight unfortunate years—I would say that this represents what appears to this government and to the governments of the two provinces concerned as the most effective means of ensuring that this great area shall be sown this coming spring.

I said a year ago in discussing this matter that all Canada had recognized and appreciated the fact that the drought problem had assumed the proportions of a national emergency, and it is in that spirit that all those concerned approach the problem we have before us this afternoon. This measure represents cooperation, starting with the individual farmer, his municipality, his province, the federal government, and the chartered banks. The amounts here represented by the guarantee figures do not represent all of the advances which will be made by the chartered banks. For instance, in the case of Saskatchewan it is estimated that the advances by the banks will run to over $18,000,000 for these purposes. The mortgage companies, having the interest of a mortgagee in lands, are by provincial legislation enabled to advance seed grain to their mortgagors, and it is anticipated that they will do so to the extent of between $1,000,000 and $1,250,000. I think therefore it can be said that this measure does represent definite cooperation between all those interested to give another chance, and a chance I think under better moisture conditions than have been apparent at this time of year in that area for a number of years past, to the people in this great area to produce a crop once more. I am positive in stating that without a measure of this kind it would be quite impossible for millions of acres of our most fertile land to be sown to wheat this spring.

Mr. GLEN: I should like to know what, if any, application has been made by the province of Manitoba for like assistance, and why it is not sharing in this vote.

Mr. DUNNING: No application has been made by the province of Manitoba for the guarantee this year, and it is quite evident that the province believes that it can itself handle its own problem. I trust the hon. member understands that this loan is to the farmer from his municipality. The municipality in turn is guaranteed by the province, and the province by the dominion. I should have said in that connection that the bill will contain the same provision as the bill of a year ago, namely, that the guarantee of the dominion will not be enforceable until three succeeding crops have been grown following the distribution of the seed this year.

Mr. BENNETT: You might want to pay the losses in advance, as in the case of the wheat board.

Mr. DUNNING: I sincerely trust the country may be in such a position as to be able to pay ascertained losses in advance, and I sincerely hope that my judgment in that regard may be as much at fault on a future occasion as it proved to be on the occasion to which my right hon. friend referred. I have no quarrel as Minister of Finance with the kind of mistake that involves over-estimation in taking care of a liability. That is the kind of mistake which is excusable.

Mr. BENNETT: Not for the reasons it was made.

Mr. DUNNING: The kind of mistake which is inexcusable is the unwillingness to make adequate provision in such a case. "All's well that ends well," the Minister of Justice suggests.

Mr. LANDERYOU: As regards the $1,900,000 for expenditure in Alberta, is the money actually paid to the provincial government, or is it merely guaranteed?

Mr. DUNNING: This whole measure involves not the payment of money to any other government but the guaranteeing by this government of the credit of the Alberta government, which in turn guarantees the credit of its own municipalities.

Mr. DUPUIS: Upon the request of Alberta?

Mr. LANDERYOU: Will the government not have to meet any losses for three years?

Mr. DUNNING: The provision in that regard, which of course it will be more convenient to discuss on the bill, is the same as that of a year ago, that the claim against the crown shall not be called upon before the expiration of three years. In effect the intention is, as was the case last year, that there should be three years during which the municipalities and the banks and the provincial government should endeavour to collect from the proceeds of three succeeding crops, before any liability is on this government.

Mr. LANDERYOU: An article appeared in the Alberta papers on March 15 from which I quote:

> Expenditure of $1,900,000 by the federal government on seed and seeding operations in Alberta this year was announced Monday by Hon. J. G. Gardiner, federal minister of agriculture, after a conference with Hon. D. B. Mullen, Alberta minister of agriculture.

According to the press report the minister was going to have the federal government spend $1,900,000 in the province of Alberta—before the election, an hon. member suggests.

> Mr. Gardiner said the resolution on which the legislation will be based providing for the $1,900,000 for seed and seeding operations in Alberta was now before parliament.

After reading such reports in the press, I am not surprised that the cabinet of a Liberal government should disallow legislation designed to give the citizens of Alberta accurate news and information.

Mr. PERLEY: As the minister has stated, this is a very important measure, the purpose of which is to provide seed for a very large area in the province of Saskatchewan; and it will affect very much the returns that the farmers of that province will have next fall. That means also that it will affect the whole business of this dominion. It is important because, as has been stated, it provides for the distribution of seed, of feed for horses, and of power, by means of gasoline and repairs, for seeding the crop.

I regret however that the minister did not see fit to bring in this measure earlier. When one considers the importance of it, the present date, March 25, is quite late to introduce it. It is only right to expect that the minister will find it necessary to give details with respect to the whole question of conditions in western Canada. He has already mentioned the number of farmers that are affected this year, namely 81,000, but we shall also require details with respect to the area involved and the accumulation and distribution of the seed. However the proper time to obtain such details will be when the bill is in committee.

May I remind the committee that on a former occasion, in 1933, when Saskatchewan and other western provinces needed seed for their spring requirements—the area not quite so large as the present one, but being very considerable—a measure for the distribution of seed was introduced as early as February 1. I might add that it was held up for nearly two months; in fact on April 1 the government of the day had to employ the closure to get the measure through. Under all the circumstances I believe members of the government and all other hon. members will agree that we shall be acting in a kindly spirit if we facilitate the passing of this measure in good time, without regard to the delay caused five years ago by the details that were demanded and the questions that were asked. I do not think our present course will be calculated to delay this measure in any particular, although it is quite evident that we might do so if we so desired.

I am informed on pretty good authority that a request was made about January 29 by the government of Saskatchewan to the federal government for about $27,000,000 to provide seed and fodder for spring requirements. I will not go into details as to how this amount was made up, but the minister might let us know whether such a requisition was made by the provincial government on or about that time. If it was, it should not have taken the government all this time to decide what they would do about it; they should have known long before this. The minister might also inform us if the Minister of Agriculture held a meeting with the loan companies and the banks early in February, either here or in Toronto, when the whole question was discussed, including the provincial government's requisition.

I shall not argue the point as to whether $14,500,000 is sufficient. I believe it is. Of course price must be considered, but if proper distribution is made and the situation is efficiently handled this sum may be sufficient. The one point about which I am distressed is this. In the four years prior to 1935 relief and seed distribution was handled in Saskatchewan by a commission. It did a good job, and there was no criticism, at least not to be compared with what we hear to-day on all sides with respect to the quantity of seed to be provided and the number of acres to be seeded. The commission had its inspectors in the different municipalities; requisition was made to them and considered by the inspector concerned, and the farmer got his seed on reasonable conditions. But the regulations that have been issued by the provincial government which is now in power are such as easily lend themselves to some degree of discrimination and political favouritism. I referred a minute ago to the fact that we have not criticized this government very much. I believe we have been kind to them as regards the distribution of relief in Saskatchewan, not merely with regard to seed, but other matters as well. We have received plenty of information which leads us to believe that the handling of relief in Saskatchewan since 1934 has been a scandal and a disgrace, and I believe that if a committee were set up to investigate, we could prove it. There has been a lack of control of prices, and many other things could be brought up. However, this perhaps is not the time to enter into a discussion of that matter.

Will the minister also inform us whether any requests have been made by the provincial government that they be permitted to finance or assist municipalities in providing tractor power for seeding this spring, owing to the fact that there has been very great mortality among the horses of the province and there is a deplorable situation from the standpoint of horse power this spring? Reports have been coming forward regarding the loss of horses and in many municipalities it is over fifty per cent—that is, horses that died in the municipality during the winter, and the loss of horses shipped to the feeding ground in Manitoba, many of which have not returned. Many of the horses that are being returned to the province from the feeding ground in Manitoba are in a weakened condition and I was wondering whether any requisition had been made to the government for assistance to the farmers in the form of tractors for their seeding. When we get into committee on the bill I shall ask for more details with respect to many of these matters, particularly the purchasing of seed and the question of the premiums that were paid. I think we shall have to ascertain how they arrived at the price of $1.45 to the farmers.

At the present time the soil and moisture condition in the province is very favourable and the prospects for a crop are fairly good. In the last seven or eight years we have not had such favourable soil and moisture conditions for the reception of seed. The Minister of Agriculture has just returned from the province and he may be able to enlighten us in that regard. That being the situation, it is important that every possible acre that is suitable should be seeded this year. Many districts have not had a crop in five or six years and it would be serious and most regrettable if every possible acre were not seeded this year so as to give the farmers a break. I have received hundreds of letters protesting and expressing dissatisfaction with the regulations that have been issued by the provincial government with respect to the amount of seed which will be provided for the individual farmer. A report in the Regina Daily Star of March 22 is to the effect that the Liberal members of the provincial legislature are themselves concerned. The report is headed:

> Hear Liberals Trying for More Seed Wheat. Possibly it is just a hitch in banking arrangements, a ripple in administration that will shortly be ironed out, but some private members of the legislature insist there is now being carried on extensive negotiations with Ottawa in an effort to secure more seed and easier terms. It is further rumoured that important news is expected shortly from men who have something to do with the federal treasury.

The report goes on to state that a special session may be called. This is from Liberal members of the Saskatchewan legislature.

> If Ottawa "fails to come through" in the next few hours, the members may be called back to Regina within a week for a short and special session to deal with one matter only—more seed grain and particularly more seed wheat.

Mr. DUNNING: What newspaper is that?

Mr. PERLEY: The Regina Daily Star of March 22.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the hon. member be good enough to tell us who is the owner of that paper?

Mr. PERLEY: That question is beside the point, but I may tell my hon. friends opposite that if they will review the columns of the Regina Leader-Post they will find many a report in the last month criticizing both the government here and the government in Saskatchewan, and criticizing them far more bitterly than anything we have seen in this newspaper with respect to the distribution of seed and handling of relief.

I should like to know whether this government have had any request from the provincial authorities for an increase in the quantity of seed that will be given to the individual farmer. A very serious condition prevails out there. There are many farmers, with more than 250 acres, who should be provided with seed, but the present regulations will not permit of this.

I do not think we should hold up this measure at this stage, but when the bill gets into committee we shall have to ask for certain details. There is a shortage of horse power out there; there is no question about it. Another report in the newspaper from which I have already quoted, of the same date, March 22, intimates that horses brought in from pasture are dying.

Mr. DUNNING: The same paper?

Mr. PERLEY: Yes, and my hon. friends will find the same report in the Regina Leader-Post if they will look it up. I would advise hon. members to read also the Free Press and the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix; if they do they will get some interesting information. This report states that a whole trainload of horses had to be unloaded at Arcola before they got to their various destinations. Some had to be taken out and a veterinary called; then they were reloaded and taken to various places, such as Creelman and Fillmore. Some had to be taken to farms on stone-boats. That is a serious matter and it explains why there is a shortage of horse power in the province. In my opinion the farmers in certain parts of that province would be justified in asking the government to give them some compensation for the loss they have suffered in horses, particularly those shipped to the feeding ground in Manitoba. They were encouraged to ship the horses, in fact they were forced to do so because feed was not provided in Saskatchewan, and when the horses were shipped out they should have been properly cared for. As I have said, however, many of the horses are returning in a terribly weakened condition and they will not be able to cope with the spring work. That is why I suggest that the government should assist the farmers in providing tractors to put in the crop, because fifty per cent of the horses will not be able to go into spring work at all. However, we shall have more details when the bill is in committee. In the meantime I think it is necessary to get this resolution through as quickly as possible in order to facilitate the seeding operations in the province. The matter is of vital importance.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I have some comments to make upon this resolution but first I would ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), who gave us the actual amount guaranteed in Alberta last year, to give us similar figures for Saskatchewan. At the same time he might be good enough to give us the comparative acreage last year and this year.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): While the minister is looking up that information I should like to make a few observations. It is not very often hon. members hear the voice of the maritimes on a subject of this kind. But, as I said in the house the other day, we have a real shortage of seed grain in the province and in the county which I represent. It is true that this matter has been taken up with the Minister of Agriculture and he has given it as his opinion that the shortage was not of sufficient magnitude to warrant the federal government coming to the assistance of the farmers down there. We notice now that the provincial department of agriculture have taken the question up and are endeavouring to bring in the seed grain and distribute it on the same system as is provided here, by guaranteeing the amount to the banks. I have here a letter, which has at this moment come to me in the mail, from the Robinson Milling Company, in which they state that there never was such a shortage of seed wheat in Prince Edward Island, that the seed which is there is positively useless to sow, and seed wheat will have to be brought in largely from western Canada. The local government have come to the assistance of the farmers; they are giving them credit for seed and are going to pay part of the freight on the hay and seed oats. But there is this big question of seed wheat for the farmers of that county. What is asked in this letter is whether this government would not at least consider paying half the freight or giving a reduced freight rate from western Canada on seed wheat.

The people of the maritimes have not been shouting about their disabilities in this respect. When our friends in western Canada were short of food I think no part of the dominion came to the assistance of our friends in western Canada with a better spirit than the people of the maritimes. In the little province of Prince Edward Island we loaded car after car with help to relieve the situation in western Canada. Now the people of my province are in a really desperate situation, such as they were never placed in before. I appeal to the minister and to the government to give this matter consideration. When parliament can vote or guarantee $16,400,000 for three years for the farmers of western Canada, surely a small request such as ours, which would not run to more than a few thousand dollars, and which would relieve our situation and enable our people to put in a crop, is worthy of consideration.

I do not think I need elaborate on the matter. It is a request which I am forced to make on behalf of the people I represent. I hope the government will come to our assistance and at least give us a little of the help they are so willingly giving to other parts of the dominion.

Mr. DUNNING: The matter raised by the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) is of course not one of financing. As he pointed out, the credit of Prince Edward Island is good; it has not been impaired by successive years of such conditions as have obtained in western Canada, and consequently the guarantee by the provincial government of loans for seed grain sufficient to ensure the financing. As to the question of freight charges, that will no doubt be dealt with by my colleague the Minister of Agriculture.

In reply to the question of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), with respect to both provinces the guarantee provided for last year has not yet been formally given by the dominion, because exact information as to the precise number of dollars to be guaranteed is not yet complete in regard to all the municipalities. In the case of Alberta I spoke of the amount which was outstanding at the end of the year, but that does not mean that our guarantee has yet been made effective. It will be of course the amount they are ultimately shown to be entitled to.

In the case of Saskatchewan the amount authorized to be guaranteed by the statute was $6,600,000. The amount actually advanced in the form of seed and other items included in the vote was $6,524,000, and the amount outstanding in Saskatchewan as at December 31 last, which is the latest figure I have, was $6,498,000; that is, there had been a measure of repayment even in that province.

Mr. BENNETT: Amounting to $26,000.

Mr. DUNNING: Only a small amount, out of the proceeds of the first crop, which as hon. members know was non-existent over most of the area in which the seed was advanced. We expect to receive the necessary information from both provinces to enable us to give our guarantee shortly, and while I will not state positively that the amounts will be those I have just given, I am reasonably certain that if there is any variation the amounts will be less than those I have stated.

As to acreage affected, I am sorry I cannot give that information. That is of course provincial information. We may have it somewhere in our records, but I have not it before me.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Like the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) I deplore the lateness of the date on which this legislation is being brought down, in view of the fact that in some parts of the west farmers will be on the land within the next week or ten days. To discuss this legislation thoroughly might take some time, but anyone seeking information will be accused of holding up seed grain for the prairies. Surely we have known since last fall, and ever since this house met in January, that seed grain was going to be required, and this legislation could just as easily have been on the order paper a month ago.

Mr. DUNNING: We had not the information from either province a month ago.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am not blaming the Minister of Finance entirely. The provinces knew they would need this seed.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will forgive me, it is a most laborious task to ascertain accurately what is required for such large areas. I can assure him that exact information has been received only within a week; in fact I had to withdraw the resolution and reintroduce it because of an error. I can assure my hon. friend that the matter has been followed up with both provinces as diligently as possible. As Minister of Finance I am not inclined to jump at a broad statement by any province that it needs X dollars. Frankly it is my duty to know the basis of the request and have it demonstrated in some detail. There has to be discussion back and forth. My right hon. friend has gone through it before—

Mr. BENNETT: And he also remembers what he endured from the opposition of that day.

Mr. DUNNING: I have no doubt he endured a great deal from all quarters. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle mentioned the same matter. I can assure him that in the process of getting the information upon which this very important legislation is based every effort was made to see that no interest suffered, and it is too early yet to say that anybody is going to suffer from any delay. So far as the finance department is concerned we have moved along in the normal way and as expeditiously as the sources supplying information would permit.

Mr. PERLEY: Does the minister state that there was no requisition made, say by February 1, by the provincial government giving details in respect of the number of bushels?

Mr. DUNNING: There has never been a requisition made at any time. The matter has been under discussion for, I should think, six months. With that aspect the Minister of Agriculture of course has been more concerned than I, but the moment the matter takes the form of a guarantee of so many dollars it becomes the concern of the Minister of Finance. It is with respect to that matter that I am speaking; but there never was any requisition at any time. The amounts here provided for are contained in letters from the provincial governments. In the case of Alberta the letter was dated March 5—

Mr. PERLEY: Did not the Minister of Agriculture meet the loan companies and the banks early in February in Toronto or Ottawa and discuss this matter in detail, and was not the requisition then discussed?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, Mr. Chairman. As the Minister of Finance has just said, this matter has been under discussion for the last six months. In the first place it is necessary to secure sufficient quantities of the different types of grain to be used for seeding purposes. That is the first job to be done. In the second place it is necessary to invite everyone who has a real interest in the matter to see that seed is provided. As has been suggested by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, some weeks ago I did interview the loan company representatives in Toronto, and discussed with them the extent to which they would be able to assist in putting sufficient capital at the disposal of someone so that seed would be put in on the land in which they have an interest. I must say that we have always found the loan companies, whether in eastern or western Canada, quite ready to do everything they possibly can to cooperate with governments in putting seed in any of the lands on which they have made loans, and this year has been no exception. As the Minister of Finance has said, as the result of those discussions the loan companies are providing somewhere between a million and a million and a quarter dollars for the purpose of putting seed upon lands in certain sections of the west in which they have an interest.

There were discussions also with the banks as to the extent to which they could assist in providing finances for the purpose of furnishing seed to farmers. There were also discussions with the municipal authorities—not the municipalities as such, but officials who have to do with the central organizations of municipal bodies—and there were discussions with the provincial governments. On a number of occasions I have interviewed members of the governments of both Alberta and Saskatchewan and we discussed the question very fully with them. It is always true that when you begin to talk in the first instance you start out with a much larger sum of money in mind than the amount finally arrived at as actually necessary to provide what is needed. But I must say that in both Saskatchewan and Alberta agreement was reached between this government and the two provincial governments as to the amount of guarantee required in each province.

The Minister of Finance has already explained that the amount of $14,500,000 for Saskatchewan is not the total that will be provided by the banks in order to finance seeding operations in that province. My understanding is that the $1,900,000 provided for Alberta will be the total, and this amount will be guaranteed in connection with that province. For the benefit of the hon. member from Alberta who spoke a few moments ago, while I am not in the habit of saying that newspaper reports are wrong, still the statement I gave in Alberta, which probably was misunderstood by some, was exactly the statement that has just been made by the Minister of Finance—that this was a guarantee; that the money required would be supplied by the banks to the municipalities, which in turn would supply seed to farmers whose applications were passed upon by the municipal organizations.

The other question raised, with regard to provision for live stock or for power in order to put in the crop, is not an immediate concern of this government. It is the concern of the provincial governments. The $14,500,000 guarantee for Saskatchewan, to be furnished the municipalities by the banks, is presumed to make available sufficient money to take care of all the activities the provincial government think it wise to pursue in order to assist in putting in the crop. As to the method that will be followed; as to whether it will be the encouragement of the old habit among the farmers—I think it is the habit in Saskatchewan as well as elsewhere—to cooperate as far as possible in making use of any power available in the community, whether it be tractor power or horse power, in order to put in the crop in that community; or whether it be by the method of providing fuel to some for tractor power and feed and fodder to others for horse power, I feel quite satisfied that the government in each province, in cooperation with the municipalities, will make what arrangements are necessary in order to see that the crop is put in. I believe, too, that the greater part of that cooperation will be among the farmers in different communities. The general practice has been that where a man has no horses, as a result of his horses having died, the government does give some assistance through this guarantee. That is, the man may be enabled to hire a tractor, perhaps, that is owned by some neighbour, and that is not in use. The tractor may be even in a village. The tractor is hired and the fuel is provided in order that the crop may be put into the ground. But all these activities are carried on by the provincial government in cooperation with the municipal councils, and I think that is the proper place to leave them.

The question whether or not horses have come back in poor shape is not one with which I can deal, other than to say that in all the checks I have been able to make—and I have been over quite a part of the area during the last few weeks—I have not found that great numbers of horses have died; I have not found that they are any poorer than they usually are after going through a year of this kind, in any part of the dominion. It is perfectly true that if you put a number of horses, cattle, or any other live stock into a box car and carry them three or four hundred miles probably you will have to take one of them home on a stone-boat, as the result of what they do to one another during the journey. You may even have to take one out that is not worth hauling home, but these stories are very much enlarged upon, and the checks we have been able to make indicate that the death rate among live stock this year is not materially greater than in any average year in western Canada.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister mentioned the difficulty of getting seed together. After all this is not a measure to provide seed; it is merely to guarantee amounts of money. The question of the seed hardly impinges upon the computing of the amount of money the government would have to guarantee. However, there is no use labouring the point. I do not say that any harm has been done anyone, but I do say that the lateness of the date makes necessary haste in passing this resolution, which makes it impossible, perhaps, to secure information one would like to have if one had more time in which to ask questions and to deliberate as one ought upon this legislation. I do not feel satisfied as yet in regard to the statement the minister has made, but I have no doubt he will want to enlarge upon it when the bill itself comes down. I should like to know what acreage will be affected and whether the Minister of Finance thinks this amount will be sufficient to meet the situation. For instance, I notice that the number of farmers in Saskatchewan who applied last year was 25,000, while this year the number is 81,000. Assuming that they will need the same amount of seed, that means that more than three times what was supplied last year will have to be supplied this year, whereas the bill provides for only a little over twice as much. On the suggested basis of 250 acres for 81,000 farmers, the total would be 20,125,000 acres. At the price suggested, this would mean a figure between $28,000,000 and $30,000,000. I should like the minister to give us some idea as to whether the amounts we are guaranteeing will be sufficient to enable the farmers to put in a reasonable crop.

I think we are all agreed that moisture conditions in western Canada are better to-day than they have been for the past seven or eight years. Prices have improved, and with conditions in Europe what they are, they may be even better in the near future. It would be a tragedy if at this time the crops in Saskatchewan and Alberta were seriously curtailed because sufficient seed was not available to the farmers. I think we should have some information in connection with the suggestion of the minister of agriculture of Saskatchewan as to the maximum acreage for each farmer being 250. We ought to know whether that suggestion is acceptable to the federal government. Personally I think some other basis should be used. In and around the Regina plains, down through Yellow Grass, Riceton and Rouleau, you will find many farmers farming anywhere from one to five sections of land. If such a farmer has no seed available it may mean that he can put in only 250 acres. The result would be that a large part of his farm would be left to go into weeds. The farmer might not have the necessary fuel to operate his tractors—these farmers are all tractor farmers—in order to keep the weeds down and a serious situation might develop.

I suggest some other basis be used. I do not mean that these people should be given all the seed they want, but it could be worked out on a pro rata basis. A man with 200 acres would receive a certain amount, a man with from 200 to 500 acres would receive a certain percentage, and a man having over 500 acres would receive a percentage. Before the bill is brought down we ought to have some information as to the price to be charged. It has been suggested in Saskatchewan that the farmer will be charged between $1.40 and $1.45 per bushel. That is an exorbitant price and we ought to know just what will be charged. In view of the fact that this government is being asked to guarantee the money, we should have a clear statement as to how a man should go about applying for this seed and upon what basis his application will be accepted or rejected. We should know whether exceptions are to be made to the general regulations. When a man has been given a certain amount of seed by the municipal council we should know whether he can go to the inspector or to someone else and get that amount increased.

We should have particulars of the machinery that is being set up for the distribution of this seed. I think it would be well if the Minister of Agriculture had a copy of the regulations before him when the bill is brought down. Anyone reading the Regina and Saskatoon papers cannot help but be confused by the various suggestions and reports in connection with the regulations to govern the distribution of seed. A clear statement along these lines would help to clarify the whole situation, and I hope the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture will see fit to give us this information when the bill is in committee.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, it does appear to me that if this government is to give a guarantee we should know under what conditions we are giving that guarantee. The amounts indicated are $1,900,000 in respect of Alberta, and $14,500,000 in respect of Saskatchewan. Since we are providing the credit by which this money is being obtained from the banks, is it not desirable that full information be given? If it were not for the conditions to which the minister has alluded, it would not be necessary for us to pledge our credit. As the minister has properly remarked to the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) this is a matter between the provincial governments and the people of the provinces. If the credit of the provincial governments were good, we would not come into the picture at all. It is only because we in the west are unable to deal with the situation that we have to rely upon the credit of the federal government.

Has the seed grain already been provided? Was it secured last fall through the operations of the wheat board? Under what authority does the wheat board function? Was it permitted to buy only from producers? How has this wheat been held? At what price was it acquired? All these are relevant questions that should be dealt with. It seems to me that the government when in opposition would never have permitted a measure such as this to pass unless such information was forthcoming. I do not think the request is an unreasonable one. I have inspected the papers downstairs and I know what provision has been made to acquire this seed. I want to know what price has been paid for the seed grain and what price is to be paid by the farmer. There will be no great freight charges to pay on this grain, because it has been taken over in the interior elevators, according to the returns made a week or so ago by the auditors of the wheat board. I think all this information should be in our possession.

Then you come to the far more difficult question, a question that in days gone by used to be dealt with in a very, shall I say, detailed manner. Some of those who have participated in this debate will perhaps recall their anxiety to know, first, how many acres a man was to be permitted to seed; whether he should have a percentage of his available acreage seeded to wheat, to oats, to rye and barley; or should it be fixed definitely that no man could seed more than a blank number of acres? To act on such a suggestion would be utterly unfair. A man with a thousand acres would be in a position to have cultivated only the same number of acres as the man with only the minimum number. Attention has been directed to this by the hon. member for Weyburn.

Then you come to the next question, the distribution of the seed grain. There you have a question which unfortunately gets into the realm of politics. When the legislation is before us in committee I propose to suggest that there shall be no departure from the regulations, which I would like to see as a schedule to the bill. I know, as other members know, human nature being what it is, to quote the language of the Prime Minister that you have to consider the pressure that will be brought to bear upon those who are responsible for administration. That pressure takes many forms. You have the municipality and you have the provincial government. The regulations are initiated by the provincial government and are supposed to be made effective by the municipality.

Then there are the inspectors. You have one man with 1,200 acres urging that owing to the splendid moisture content of the soil and the apparent certainty of a crop, an exception should be made in his case and a larger quantity of land made available for cropping than in the case of someone who in his opinion is less fortunately situated. Surely we should try to deal with that so as not to make it possible in this democracy that men may think that their ability to secure a crop depends upon their attitude towards public questions—in other words, depends upon their political faith. It seems to me we must do everything in our power to see that that is not the case. I know something of the difficulties. I did not listen to all the criticisms urged in days gone by without realizing that this is not a condition applicable only to one individual or set of individuals, but is the common attribute of poor, weak humanity, and that if an election is in sight and the pressure is strong the result is fairly certain. We must do something to prevent that condition arising.

These are the questions upon which we should have information. We start with what has been done with respect to seed and what is involved with respect to cost. Then we come down to our acceptance, mark you, Mr. Chairman, of the regulations promulgated by the province; for the minute we give our guarantee we tacitly admit that the conditions are acceptable to us. We have, therefore a responsibility which I hope we shall exercise not in any narrow spirit but with an earnest desire, as the Minister of Finance has said, to make some little contribution to the national welfare by the creation in this year of grace of a substantial quantity of new wealth—for that is what it means. One of the reasons why a wheat crop is regarded as so valuable is that you sow it in the spring and have new wealth in the fall. It is not like cattle, where the new wealth does not become available for years, or like many other enterprises, in the mining field, for example, where the losses are colossal and now and then you have a great success. But with wheat, if we have a crop at all, we know it will result in a very great expansion of new wealth, and that wealth becomes available in the autumn of the very year in which the crop has been sown. That is why I suggest that the minister should place the information on Hansard, in order that the people may realize the magnitude of the efforts that are being made and the reason why the public credit is being pledged, that of the dominion in addition to the provinces; because according to the terms of the resolution the provinces are giving their undertaking and the municipalities are giving theirs, and the banks are protecting their depositors —on a ten to one basis, I take it?—by the guarantee of the federal government.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no cash basis.

Mr. BENNETT: I see. Then it is probably a dollar for dollar basis instead of a ten to one basis.

I hope the minister will give us as detailed a statement as possible on the points to which I have alluded so that we may have the information before us when we come to consider the bill. The opportunity for discussion on the bill itself will not be great, because, after all, on the resolution the minister gives a broad presentation of the case. It will be recalled that on one occasion this house sat for months dealing with a resolution, and it is very important that everything should be known when the resolution is before the house.

Mr. DUPUIS: As a member from the province of Quebec I think it is my duty, following the trend of thought in this discussion, to make public by putting on the records of this house the conditions and methods under which this government enters into the picture of giving guarantees to the provinces.

The Minister of Agriculture knows that we interviewed him about some cases in our province similar to those mentioned by the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean). I just want to put on the record the methods followed as I understand them, and if I am wrong, perhaps the Minister of Finance will be good enough to correct me at the same time that he answers other members.

As I understand it, it is the duty of the municipality to come to the rescue of any group of farmers in the municipality, and when the municipality is unable to guarantee seed grain to the whole community in the municipality, the municipal council must ask help from the province.

Mr. DUNNING: Right.

Mr. DUPUIS: If the province in turn is unable to guarantee seed grain for such a large area as we have in the western provinces, and when the conditions run on for a certain period of years, the provincial government may ask the aid of the federal government.

Mr. DUNNING: Correct.

Mr. DUPUIS: And these are the actual conditions which have prevailed this year so far as Saskatchewan and Alberta are concerned.

Mr. DUNNING: Absolutely.

Mr. DUPUIS: I understand, and perhaps the minister will be good enough to make it very clear to the committee, that these two provinces did present a formal demand to the dominion government this year.

Mr. DUNNING: "Demand" is perhaps too strong. They made a request.

Mr. DUPUIS: Yes, a request. Has the minister received requests from other provinces, and especially has he received from the government of the province of Quebec, a request to provide seed grain?

While I am on my feet I am glad to say that I concur in the remark made by the leader of the opposition, that the providing of seed grain should not be conditioned upon a man's political allegiance or anything of that kind, but that so long as a farmer proves he is unable to buy his seed grain he should have it. I am pleased that the right hon. gentleman said that, and I should like to be sure that this expression of opinion by the right hon. leader of the Conservative party will be conveyed to the administration in the province of Quebec; because I recall that in the last by-election in Bagot the premier of the province of Quebec said to the electors of the county: "If you want seed grain, vote for the Conservative candidate; if you do not, then vote against him." He also said: "If you want old age pensions"—and remember, Mr. Chairman, that seventy-five per cent of the cost of old age pensions is paid by the federal government—"then vote for the Conservative candidate." And he continued to speak in that way. I am sure that the leader of the opposition would not endorse such statements. I wish to be fair to Mr. Duplessis: he did not say "Conservative party"; he said, "National party." Of course this is a camouflage characteristic of the policy followed by our opponents, but it means the same thing. I am interested to see that these conditions and methods are well known to the people of our province; for I would not consent that a large area of that province should be deprived of seed grain by the provincial government upon the excuse that this government refused to grant it.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member has correctly stated the conditions.

Mr. DUPUIS: I should like also that the premier of Quebec should put in his own mind the right conditions under which seed grain should be provided in Quebec by the provincial government.

Mr. DUNNING: I think I need not add anything to the remarks of the hon. member. I have previously stated the conditions under which the federal guarantee is available, and I am quite sure that the great province of Quebec would never admit that its credit is not good enough to enable it to supply anything which in its judgment should be supplied to its farmers. If and when the time comes that Quebec is in a condition similar to that of the two western provinces I have named because of conditions that are all similar, I am quite sure this parliament would give the same consideration to Quebec, and indeed to any other province, as it is now giving to these two western provinces.

I shall endeavour to reply to one of the questions of the leader of the opposition (Mr.

Bennett) with respect to the supply of seed. Others relate more particularly to my colleague the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) who will deal with them.

The leader of the opposition very properly wants to know what steps were taken to ensure that seed will be available. Well, last year it became apparent during the summer that another very serious drought was actually in existence in western Canada, particularly in Saskatchewan, and it speedily became apparent that unless steps were taken very likely there would not be available in that part of Canada in the possession of anyone a sufficiency of wheat to enable a crop to be sown during the 1938 crop season. Under these circumstances the government early last fall—I cannot give the exact date, but I believe it was in September—took stock of the situation and found that the wheat board at that date still owned wheat features to the extent of just short of seven million bushels.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that the old 1935 wheat? So it is stated downstairs.

Mr. DUNNING: As at the end of July, I should have said, was the date as to the seven million bushels.

Mr. HAYHURST: Futures contracts, were they not?

Mr. DUNNING: They were in the form of futures at that time, as was reported to the house a year ago in discussing this matter. The wheat committee of the cabinet, in conference with the wheat board, suggested that under the circumstances it would be desirable not to dispose of this amount of wheat futures, but that it would be desirable in the national interest, because of the very clear need that we could foresee for this spring, gradually to turn those futures into cash wheat of a kind suitable for sowing in the west this year and to hold it available for that purpose instead of continuing to sell it. That was done, and therefore the two governments of Saskatchewan and Alberta will be able to secure from the wheat board the wheat supplies necessary for the purpose and covered by the guarantee which we now have under consideration.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Does the minister mean that they will buy it from the wheat board?

Mr. DUNNING: They will buy it from the wheat board, yes. It will be paid for by means of financing here arranged for as the result of the passing of the legislation we now have under discussion.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. BENNETT: They are converting the futures into cash wheat, and the wheat is being held against purchase for seed?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the story, as I understand it. Is that right?

Mr. DUNNING: Practically so, yes. The question of price remains, and obviously that is a matter of some concern. It was very difficult to say, back in July and August and September last, what price should be charged by the wheat board to the provinces, and in turn to the farmers requiring it, for the wheat then held by the wheat board. Obviously one could pick out a particular day when the price was high and say that they ought to pay that much, or pick out a day when the price was low and say they ought to pay this much.

Mr. BENNETT: There was a heavy premium on cash wheat, though.

Mr. DUNNING: I know. I am inclined to take the view, and I was at that time inclined to take the view, that a fair adjustment of the price basis would be the average of the price from the 31st day of July last until the date on which delivery was taken by the provinces of the wheat. While that has not yet been definitely determined, it still seems to me to be the most fair and reasonable basis upon which the transaction could be based. There are of course other costs in connection with it. The wheat was not, when acquired by the board in exchange for its futures, in the position in which it will be required to be placed for the use of the farmers.

Mr. BENNETT: It was in the elevators.

Mr. DUNNING: There will be a distribution cost. In a great many cases it was not in the country elevators.

Mr. BENNETT: A good deal of it was.

Mr. DUNNING: It was in the interior terminals in certain cases.

Mr. BENNETT: I said "elevators." That meant both country elevators and terminals.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, I see. I am sorry. In any event the country elevators in which it was contained were in most cases quite a distance from the area to which it must ultimately be distributed. The figure that has been referred to by the minister of agriculture of Saskatchewan is $1.45 a bushel. It will not exceed that figure, but it may be between $1.40 and $1.45, calculated on the basis which I have indicated, plus the averaging of the costs of movement, which of course must be covered as part of the costs of the wheat.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Before the minister goes on, could he say what the provinces paid the wheat board for that wheat?

Mr. DUNNING: It is not paid for.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): No, but on what basis will it be taken from the wheat board to the provinces? What will the provinces pay for that wheat?

Mr. DUNNING: They will pay whatever the price is—the average price. The price I am referring to in the whole of this discussion is the price at which the wheat board will turn the wheat over to the provinces. The wheat board is arranging already with the provinces for the distribution of it. So that, as I understand, the price to the provinces will be a delivered price. That is the arrangement that is being made—a delivered price at the point where it is required, covering all the costs of getting it there, and this will provide the basis for the price to the farmer.

Mr. ANDERSON: Is that wheat already deliverable to the provinces?

Mr. DUNNING: Is it "deliverable"? What does my hon. friend mean?

Mr. ANDERSON: Is it actually delivered to them at the present time?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. ANDERSON: Is it waiting until this legislation goes through?

Mr. DUNNING: There is no waiting, in this sense. Arrangements for the distribution of the wheat are proceeding. The title to the wheat cannot pass to the provinces and final distribution to the farmers be made until this legislation is passed, but the physical movement is going on, because everyone was quite sure, judging by the experience of a year ago, that parliament would approve of the distribution of that wheat for the purposes indicated. So that so far as the physical movement is concerned, it is now under way, though actual delivery to the farmer cannot well take place until this legislation passes, enabling the financing to be done, enabling the municipality to borrow the money to pay for the wheat; because while the province acquires the wheat the municipality is the borrower from the banks of the money wherewith to purchase it. So that these transactions are all now in course of mechanical preparation. The physical distribution of the wheat is proceeding, but, I repeat, the actual delivery to the farmer cannot take place until the necessary provision is made for the security.

Mr. PERLEY: This matter of price is a very important one. The minister said that it would be the average price; that is, the average price from the first of August until the wheat is distributed to the farmer, or when the province finally takes over the wheat from the board.

Mr. DUNNING: I should not like to be definite on that point.

Mr. PERLEY: Well, the minister mentioned the average price.

Mr. DUNNING: The difference will be slight between the two dates. I said that I believed a fair basis would be the average of the price from July 31 last until the date when the province takes delivery from the board.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): That is, on the seven million?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, on the whole of the seven million. But what difference will be created over such a long period of averaging, the difference of a few days, will not, I think, be pertinent to the issue.

Mr. PERLEY: Perhaps the minister did not understand me. I want to know whether the average price is based on the price in the interior elevator or in the terminal elevator. Is it based on cash wheat at Fort William or on what the option cost the board? At the end of July, 1937, they held 6,900,000 odd.

Mr. BENNETT: It was 6,964,000.

Mr. PERLEY: What option did they hold it on? If it was in December they had to convert it before the end of December; if they held it in May, they would have until May 31. There was a great difference in the spread between the cash wheat and the option from the first day of August, 1937, to the middle of March this year. I have the daily prices here, option and cash wheat, and it is important to know just where they take delivery of the wheat. Surely it will be agreed that there should be a difference between taking delivery at Fort William and taking delivery on a contract in the interior elevator. That is quite plain, because if the grain had never been moved from the interior elevators but had remained there from the time the grain man bought it, there would be no freight charges. There might be some carrying charges, but they would not be more than the carrying charges at Fort William, so that there should be some difference between street wheat in interior elevators and the Fort William price. The price on August 31 of cash wheat Fort William was $1.27, and May future was $1.21. A month later cash wheat at Fort William was $1.42—I will not give the fraction of a cent—and May future was $1.26, or a spread of 16 cents. At the end of August the spread was 6 cents. So that it had widened out 10 cents. At the end of October cash wheat was $1.38 and the option was $1.15, or a spread of 23 cents. On November 6 the figures were respectively $1.34 and $1.04, or a spread of 27 cents. In other words the spread between August and November widened from 6 cents to 27 cents, a difference of 21 cents. The spread has remained in the twenties pretty well up to the present time, and on March 15 it was around 24 cents.

The committee would like to know the reason for the spread between the option and the cash price, the reason for the widening out as soon as the board undertook the operation of converting their option into cash wheat. As I understand it, the 6,900,000 odd that they converted was all in the interior parts of Saskatchewan and Alberta. Can the minister give us the date when the provincial government first took over the wheat from the board?

Mr. DUNNING: We have not taken over wheat from the board.

Mr. PERLEY: Will the minister give us then the date on which the board first converted their option?

Mr. BENNETT: At the request of the government.

Mr. PERLEY: Yes, at the request of the government. We might be told also how many bushels the board held on March 15. How much wheat did the board hold in Saskatchewan which they converted? I have here an order in council dated December 15, authorizing the board to sell wheat to the provincial government. That was the first order, so that prior to that time they had no guarantee that the provincial government would purchase, and they were acting on arrangements made by the wheat committee of the government, the board taking a chance that the provincial government would eventually buy the wheat.

Mr. DUNNING: As regards the request for detailed information of the operations of the wheat board in this matter, I was careful to say when speaking of the average price that that was my view as to how a fair price basis could be arrived at. I did not say that it had been definitely determined, and I made no such statement because of considerations that are present in the mind of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley). Between now and the time when the bill is down for second reading and in committee, every endeavour will be made to arrive definitely at a conclusion. The matter is a very difficult and complex one. My hon. friend in his last few sentences asks how much wheat the wheat board was holding on this account in Saskatchewan as of March 15. He knows they were able to acquire mighty little of this wheat in Saskatchewan. If they had any in that province at that time it would be because, having been acquired, this wheat in the process of physical movement had been moved that much nearer to its ultimate destination. But the fact that it was in Saskatchewan on a particular date would not have any real meaning in relation to the transaction. However, we will endeavour by the time the bill reaches the committee stage, to have available the details the hon. gentleman is asking for. I see no reason why they should not be given.

Mr. BENNETT: They are given in part in these reports.

Mr. DUNNING: In part they can be deduced from the reports already tabled. When I say "deduced," I mean that the nature of the figures makes apparent the movement to some extent, but we have not the detail before us just now. It will be made available, together with such further information as can be given as to the method of averaging prices, when the bill is in committee.

Mr. PERLEY: I do not want to be misunderstood. The minister stated that possibly there was not 6,900,000 bushels of wheat in Saskatchewan. Is that when the board started their conversion operation?

Mr. DUNNING: I am sure it would be more difficult to turn the futures into cash with respect to wheat already in Saskatchewan of the quality required and in the geographical position required during that period. Part of it, yes.

Mr. HAYHURST: One of the great difficulties in Alberta, and the cause of much of the distress there, is the fact that the freight rates between there and Winnipeg are so high. We live in a marginal or in some cases submarginal area. Regarding the price of seed wheat, if the price were averaged with the Saskatchewan price, the Alberta price should be lower, because we have shipped the wheat east and then probably it comes west again. If there was sufficient wheat in Alberta the price to the farmer in Alberta should be less the freight rate to these other points.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall bear that query in mind when we come to committee. My understanding is that a definite arrangement exists between the board and the government of Alberta in respect to it. At the moment I cannot answer as to the nature of it. It may result in a slightly lower price, but I do not think the difference will be material.

Mr. FINN: The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has just said he will bear the matter in mind. I have been waiting for some time to say something, and every other hon. member has had an opportunity before me. But that is neither here nor there. I was struck by the remarks of the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) this afternoon. I was also struck by the reply of the Minister of Finance, which could have been no other, that because certain provinces are in a stronger financial position than others they are to keep on borrowing until their own credit is exhausted, and the credit of the dominion should be extended to the provinces which have exhausted their credit and therefore have no financial standing with the banks and loan companies. It reminds me that it was once said that before you were, I am. Before the two new provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta were formed, when they were territories, the maritime provinces were the eastern background and the eastern gateway of Canada to those territories, which at that time were a part of the general domain of Canada in which each province of Canada had its equity. Saskatchewan and Alberta were carved out of the territories, and we in the east had no objection whatever to its being done. Again we stood by and saw a strip of territory up to Churchill given to Manitoba. We saw the hinterland given to Ontario. We saw Ungava given to Quebec. We saw nothing given to Prince Edward Island, nothing to Nova Scotia and nothing to New Brunswick. The reason was that we were not adjacent to any such territory, therefore we could not grow and develop; and because we could not grow and develop we must remain as we are, stand on our own feet and maintain our position in this great dominion by our own financial credit.

It seems to me that this has been a rather black Friday. I have no reference to the hon. member on the opposite side, but I think it will be a black Friday if, as suggested in British Columbia, the territory of the hon. member for Yukon (Mrs. Black) is to be taken from her and added to the province of British Columbia, enlarging British Columbia to the detriment of the Yukon. I hope this will not take place as long as she has the ability and the physical strength to occupy a seat in this house.

Mr. HAYHURST: What has that to do with this matter?

Mr. FINN: My hon. friend asks, what has that to do with this matter? I wonder why he did not put that question to some hon. gentlemen a little while ago when they were talking about elections in Quebec and what Mr. Duplessis said. He was silent then; but when one is speaking intelligently and leaving the political aspect entirely out of the picture he is taken to task by some hon. gentlemen opposite. Hon. gentlemen opposite have only themselves to take to task for having taken me to task because it does not matter to me whether they take me to task or not. All I say is that we in the east are told, as was pointed out by the leader of the opposition the other day, that the greatest lobbies are going on in this parliament that have taken place for some time. The reason I referred to its being black Friday was that they are lobbying to-day on the air and by telegraph. There are two matters in which the maritime provinces are interested, and while there may be an inherent right in the ministers to act, they shall not act before there is an opportunity for every interest to be heard. I refer to the question of the beam trawler and to the removal of the dumping duty on sugar from Cuba.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. FINN: I have said all I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, and I shall sit down.

Mr. GARDINER: In answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Weyburn and enlarged upon by the leader of the opposition, I may say that in Saskatchewan they have a Seed Grain Loans Guarantee Act of 1938, which was put through in the recent session. The procedure under that act is this. First the municipality passes a by-law which will enable it to borrow money for seed grain purposes. A copy of the by-law is submitted to the minister of municipal affairs for approval. After approval has been given the municipality approaches the bank and arranges for a loan, giving as security for repayment its demand promissory note bearing interest at the rate of four per cent. Second, the municipality takes from the recipient his demand promissory note as well as a written agreement for a lien upon all crops to be grown during the year in which the note is given and the succeeding year on the land named in his application. Third, the rate of interest to be charged farmers by the municipalities is not stipulated in the Saskatchewan Seed Grain and Supply Act. My understanding is that if there is any increase added it will be just sufficient to pay the cost of administration, and that the final rate when payment is made will be four per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: They make no profit.

Mr. GARDINER: They make no profit. Fourth, the secretary-treasurer of each municipality is obliged to register each lien agreement and on or before October 1 of each year must prepare and forward to the minister of municipal affairs a return showing the names of all persons to whom advances have been made, and the amounts thereof. Fifth, provision is made in Saskatchewan legislation to give similar assistance to farmers in the local improvement districts which are administered by the minister of municipal affairs. Sixth, (a) the committee of the cabinet and the inspector for the district determine the amount of seed grain and supplies that a municipality may advance; that is, the cabinet in Regina decides the amount that each municipality can advance within the municipality. (b) Saskatchewan legislation provides that the municipality shall not advance in any year seed grain and supplies of a greater value than $200 in respect of any one quarter section. (c) On farms of 320 acres or less of cultivated land not more than sixty per cent of such acreage is to be sown.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that a statute?

Mr. GARDINER: That is provided by law. Then (d), on farms over 320 acres of cultivated land, fifty per cent thereof may be sown up to a maximum of 250 acres; that is, no one can sow more than 250 acres as a result of having obtained seed from the government.

Alberta has a slightly different arrangement, though the same in principle. In Alberta under the Seed Grain Loans Guarantee Act of 1938 the procedure is as follows. First, the Agricultural Relief Advances Act of Alberta provides that each municipality shall make provision to the satisfaction of the minister of municipal affairs for furnishing to necessitous farmers seed grain, fodder, feed grain, fuel oil and lubricating oil. A provincial order in council is passed authorizing the municipality to make a loan for such purpose. Then the municipality gives a demand note to the bank bearing interest at a rate not greater than four per cent for any such loans so authorized, and the municipality takes from the recipient his promissory note bearing interest at the same rate. A lien is taken from the farmer by the municipality upon all crops grown in the year in which the advance is made and in the next ensuing three years. Provision is made in the Alberta legislation to grant similar assistance to necessitous farmers in municipal districts, by the minister of municipal affairs.

The amount of seed grain that may be supplied to any applicant, together with any seed grain which he is able to provide for himself, is set out as follows: If the applicant has arable land in condition for seeding amounting to 50 acres, he gets seed for 50 acres. If he has 100 acres he gets seed for 75 acres. If he has 200 acres he gets seed for 120 acres. If he has seed for 300 acres he gets seed for 165 acres, and of course that includes any seed he has of his own. If he has 400 acres he gets seed for 210 acres; if he has 500 acres he gets seed for 255 acres, and if he has 600 acres he gets seed for 300 acres. If the acreage of arable land in condition for seeding is other than an amount mentioned above, the acreage for which seed may be advanced is to be calculated upon the basis of the foregoing figures; provided further that no seed shall be supplied to any applicant in excess of the amount necessary for seeding 300 acres of land. Those are the provisions of the Alberta act, and they compare closely with those in the Saskatchewan act.

Mr. HAYHURST: If a farmer has his own seed for one hundred acres would that be deducted from the amount he could sow, or would it apply as something extra?

Mr. GARDINER: So far as the guarantee is concerned in Alberta, since it covers one hundred per cent I presume the provincial government will not go any further in relation to that matter; or will the banks with regard to any obligation that we have. In Saskatchewan in view of the fact that the guarantee covers less than eighty per cent of the total amount—I think it is about seventy-seven per cent—these figures may not cover the total amount that may be supplied by the banks for feed and seed. In other words, while the maximum figures are 250 acres in Saskatchewan and 300 acres in Alberta, the maximum will be fairly close if the banks advance more than the amount which is guaranteed.

Mr. BENNETT: He gets seed for only 300 acres if he has 600 acres of arable land?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, not more than 300 acres in Alberta, even if he has more than 600 acres of arable land.

Mr. DUNNING: But the amount in Alberta includes any seed the farmer may have.

Mr. HAYHURST: I do not know whether I got the answer correctly or whether the minister misunderstood me. Suppose a farmer can get seed for 300 acres under this guarantee and he has 400 acres that he wants to seed. He has enough of his own seed for 100 acres. Can he still get seed for 300 acres?

Mr. GARDINER: As I read the Alberta act and as it has been outlined to me in this memorandum, which is really a summary of it, if a man has seed in his bin for say 100 acres he could get enough to seed an additional acreage up to 300 acres.

Mr. BENNETT: But he could only get seed for another 200 acres?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, for another 200 acres. The total amount of seed, both what he has in his bin and what he gets under this guarantee, would be only sufficient to seed 300 acres.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Then under this scheme any seed the farmer had would be deducted from anything he would be allowed?

Mr. GARDINER: There is no provision for that in the Saskatchewan act. That is purely a matter of administration, and I should not like to say what would happen. I have a fair idea of what I would say if I were administering it, but it is being administered in Regina.

In regard to the other question, as to whether sufficient has been supplied, which I think was raised by the hon. member for Weyburn, I do not think I can go further than to say this: Last year we had a great deal of discussion with regard to that same question, as to whether a guarantee of $6,600,000 was sufficient to cover the needs of the province of Saskatchewan, and as to whether $1,600,000 was sufficient to cover the needs of Alberta. After considering it from every point of view, and with all the information we were able to place before the house, I think hon. members finally were satisfied that this was as near as we could come to a sufficient figure. We have followed exactly the same procedure this year in trying to arrive at a proper figure, and I think we can say that there is sufficient provided under the guarantee to make it possible for farmers to seed their land this year, to the extent that governments can be expected to assist in providing seed. I heard very little complaint last year after the seeding was all over, and I may say that in Saskatchewan hardly all the guarantee was used, while in Alberta considerably less than the guarantee was used. So with that experience behind us I think this year it will be found that we will have pretty much the same experience.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But they did not restrict it to 250 acres last year. The farmers on the large tractor farms on the Regina plains, and down through my constituency, seeded more than 250 acres.

Mr. GARDINER: Speaking from memory I think it was the same last year; there was a restriction, and I think it was 250 acres. The schedule is slightly different this year, but not greatly.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Was any attempt made to have some standardization as between the Alberta and Saskatchewan regulations?

Mr. GARDINER: No, nothing more than that the two legislatures put through their legislation at about the same time, and naturally they compared notes and tried to make legislation conform as nearly as possible.

Mr. BENNETT: Did not the federal government give them any suggestions about it?

Mr. GARDINER: In discussing the matter we suggested from time to time that we preferred to have the regulations and legislation as nearly alike as possible. Different conditions, of course, require different treatment.

Mr. BENNETT: Did the federal government make any suggestion as to that?

Mr. GARDINER: Nothing more than in the discussions we had. The one matter called attention to the other.

Mr. QUELCH: Are these regulations which are imposed by the provincial governments imposed in order to comply with certain federal limitations?

Mr. GARDINER: There is nothing in any of these regulations or in any of these agreements that will prevent a province from going as far as they wish in providing assistance to farmers. The representatives of the provinces came to Ottawa and made their requests. The requirements were discussed and we tried to arrive at an agreement as to the proper action to take. As has been stated already, so far as Alberta is concerned the amount guaranteed is the amount asked for in the letter to the government suggesting that assistance was required. We checked up and found that that conformed very closely with the information we had. In so far as Saskatchewan is concerned, we had discussions about the matter and finally arrived at the figure placed in the guarantee. Of course, there was an understanding with the loan companies and with the banks that considerably more than the guaranteed amount would be supplied in Saskatchewan.

Mr. PERLEY: Did the municipal organizations not take the matter up and suggest that the amount be increased? Have representations not been made as to increasing the 250 acre stipulation?

Mr. GARDINER: I have no information with regard to that. I have heard rumours and have seen statements in the press to the effect that some people were not satisfied, but that has not been communicated to me officially. In further answer to the question, I might say that the municipalities did make representations that we make provision for all that was necessary.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It seems to me unfortunate that the same basis could not be applied in both provinces. In Alberta there is a sliding scale, whereas in Saskatchewan the maximum is fixed at 250 acres. In view of the fact that this government must approve these regulations, would it not be possible to arrange that there be a similar sliding scale in Saskatchewan to permit farmers with large farms to obtain a greater amount? It might be arranged that fuel would be provided in order that they could keep down the weeds. Otherwise we shall have a serious condition where a man with a farm of 1,000 or 1,500 acres has only 250 acres in crop and the rest going into weeds on account of his having neither horse power nor tractor power to keep the land in shape.

Mr. GARDINER: In connection with the point first raised, I would suggest that in the case of Alberta the amount assumed to be required is estimated on a bushel to an acre basis, whereas in the case of Saskatchewan it is estimated on the basis of a bushel and a quarter to an acre. This means that the amount allowed to the different acreages will work out about the same aggregate amount of wheat for the maximum acreage.

Mr. FAIR: Where grain can be purchased locally, will those coming in under this guarantee be allowed to purchase in that way, or must they accept the seed from the wheat board at the higher price?

Mr. DUNNING: There is nothing to prevent the province from working the matter out in that way.

Mr. BENNETT: I note by the last report that there was in the country and interior elevators a total of 4,625,840 bushels already delivered and converted, and 2,338,166 $^{55}/_{100}$ths bushels still out on open purchase contracts. That seems strange in view of the necessity of having the grain converted, but probably it is in a position where it can be converted very quickly.

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot answer as to that.

Mr. BENNETT: I was referring to what was said a moment ago as to the availability of the crop. It would seem obvious that they probably have it in a place where it can be easily converted.

Mr. DUNNING: I can suggest an explanation which my right hon. friend will appreciate from his knowledge of the grain business. If I were handling this transaction, my chief concern would be lest we put the cash premium entirely out of sight. It must have been a very difficult operation and we shall have to answer for it.

Mr. PERLEY: The weekly reports to the grain commission would show what there is in the country elevators. I think there is more than that according to the last report.

Mr. DUNNING: We shall check up on that. A great deal of the stuff in the country elevators is not fit for seed.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 78, to assist the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan in financing the cost of seed and seeding operations for the crop year 1938.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Departmental administration, $425,720.

Mr. DENTON MASSEY (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I am sure that those of us who listened yesterday to the minister would wish to congratulate him upon the clear statement he made concerning the general matters under discussion. All of us who take part in this debate must realize that we are dealing with what is one of the most important questions and at the same time the most contentious problem before the country to-day. We cannot be insensible to the implications and the far-reaching nature of the questions under consideration at the moment. We should keep definitely in mind the fact that there is a strange unreality in ignoring the present unsettled state of the world. We cannot be blind to facts which are apparent, facts which tend to unsettle the minds of men as well as the stability of nations.

There is no hon. gentleman sitting in this chamber who does not thoroughly abhor war and all that it embodies and suggests. We have had an experience, still too fresh in mind, which indicates to us that victory is hollow and is a name applied to a state of affairs for lack of a better term. As the Prime Minister of Great Britain stated yesterday in the British House of Commons, in war there is no winner. No matter what one's personal feelings may be, there is nothing to be gained by burying our heads in the sands of whatever doctrine we wish to subscribe to; there is no use in burying our heads in the sands of north America and blinding ourselves to stark realities. We may detest the idea of armaments as such, and we may be loath to enter into any extended program to reestablish the defensive arms of Canada. It may shock our sensitivities and it may do violence to our sense of the fitness of things, but the fact remains that we are compelled in this chamber to face cold-blooded facts. In the words of Woodrow Wilson: "We are not here to argue what we want to do but what we may have to do."

No one could possibly accuse Great Britain of having been responsible for the rearmament race that is going on in Europe and the rest of the world at the present time. No one can possibly say that she, of all nations, has not lived up to the responsibilities that were hers as a member of the League of Nations. No one can possibly accuse her of having departed from her commitments until other nations forced her so to depart. Certainly no one can accuse us in Canada of having been irrational in the volume and extent of our expenditures on armaments. But, Mr. Chairman, we are compelled in 1938 to face the cold-blooded facts of the situation.

The matter under discussion on these estimates cuts cleanly across party lines, and in such remarks as I have to make I am speaking not in any political sense, but as a Canadian to my fellow Canadians. I shall address my remarks particularly to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) in the earnest hope that, coming, as they do, subsequently to his most able speech of yesterday, he will give them every consideration for what they may be worth.

First, may I quote his words as reported in Hansard at page 1650, and with his permission digest one of his paragraphs and make it more definite. He said:

> When, sir, as we do now, we contemplate the broad principles of Canadian defence, and endeavour to define with some particularity the responsibilities that rest with governments, Canada must be prepared for the preservation of the best there is in these three nations—

That is Canada, Old France and Great Britain.

> —and the best there is within her own boundaries—the best there is in democracy itself—to take her stand, if need be, against brute force and might and ruthlessness, and, if need be, for high purposes to endure sore travail.

There is a statement which, taken by itself, means that the minister who made it at least has a sense of the needs of the situation. On the other hand, when we put into juxtaposition with that statement the estimates which are now before the committee, there seems to be a strange inconsistency. Let me put it bluntly to him: Are we prepared to defend Canada or are we not? If we are going to try to defend Canada with a defence that is adequate, the estimates before us for 1938-39 are sadly inadequate. If we plan to temporize with defence, perhaps these estimates are adequate. If we are not going to defend Canada at all, then clearly these estimates are vastly in excess of what they should be.

The hon. member for London (Mr. Betts) last night gave a most able presentation of his particular point of view in this matter, and I hesitate not at all to congratulate him sincerely upon his speech. He brought to the attention of the committee the necessity for us to defend particularly our harbours. The line of argument which he pursued was a telling argument. He suggested to us with great clarity that after all we were peculiarly vulnerable in such ports as Halifax, Saint John and Vancouver, and he insinuated though he did not directly state it, that these harbours could be attacked, and that we are at the moment absolutely defenceless and without protection for them and all that they represent. We know full well the vital necessity of those ports in time of war. We know full well how any Atlantic fleet would depend upon its ability to secure supplies, fuel and the like in such harbours as Halifax and Saint John, and how any Pacific fleet would lean heavily upon the harbour of Vancouver.

If we examine our own geographical position, we realize that an attack upon Canada could be made successfully only by air or by sea. We may, I think, safely assume that any attack by land from the country to the south of us is an absurd possibility even to contemplate, and accordingly the defence of Canada is at once confined to our harbours on the Atlantic coast in the east and to our harbours on the Pacific coast in the west; and the two coastlines. But no longer can we think of an attack as coming only from the sea. We must think of the air, and if we think of the air, then we find at once that the whole width of our boundaries should be defended. We have not 3,500 miles of border to defend with forts and batteries; but we do have our two coastlines as I have mentioned, and these two coastlines, it seems to me, can be defended at a relatively low cost.

I noticed from the minister's remarks as reported at page 1647 of Hansard that he gives us a word picture of our existing air defences. When one reads his statement, one is at once impressed with the fact that the locations of our training air fields have been well chosen, and if one did not know the actual facts as divorced from the picture he gave us, one would say that much has been done in Canada in the way of aerial defence. When we consider that we have training fields at Trenton, Vancouver, Esquimalt, Kamloops, Yarmouth, Sydney, Rockcliffe and other places, it would seem that the whole of the dominion has been fairly well covered with airfields. On the other hand, when one realizes the amount that has been spent on these airfields, the number of men with which they are staffed, the number of hours flown, and the number of persons who are being trained, one realizes how pitifully small is the Royal Canadian Air Force.

One does not criticize the air force for what they have done under the handicaps under which they have worked. One is, on the contrary, happy to think of what they have contributed so far, but naturally they have been grossly handicapped by lack of adequate equipment and by the small amount of money which they have had to spend. We must realize that all these things cost money and that naturally any government, which had to face such conditions as have existed and are existing in Canada, is loath to spend money on anything so contentious in Canada as armaments are, or as an air force is at the present time. On the other hand, we must realize the facts of the matter. When we realize that we have only a few aeroplanes—six, eight or ten at the most; I do not know what the exact number is—that will fly over 280 miles an hour; that we have absolutely no bombers—I think I am correct in saying that—and that we are not prepared not only to defend an attack on our borders but also to repel the attacker by means of a counter attack, then we must realize that what we have done is hopelessly inadequate to meet the present situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I correct a misapprehension? We have no aeroplanes of that speed at the present time, but eighteen are under order.

Mr. MASSEY: Well, then, we have yet to fly 280 miles an hour in Canada; the situation is even worse than I thought. We have some training ships that are incapable of a speed of more than 110 miles an hour, ships which would merely clutter up the air in case of any complication, and which would certainly be useless in any active engagement. I do not think the minister heard a remark I made a moment ago. We have no bombers in our air force, have we?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not yet completed, no.

Mr. MASSEY: We are at the moment in the process of purchasing ships for the Trans-Canada airways. They are certainly not wartime ships. Yet, if anyone goes to any country in Europe to-day he will find that all the passenger ships are bombers in fact as well as in name.

Mr. BENNETT: Convertible.

Mr. MASSEY: When one steps into one of the Imperial Airways liners, he is not on board a passenger ship, he is on board a military plane which has been adapted for peacetime flying. We are about to embark upon a large expenditure for Trans-Canada airways.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Are not these Lockheed-Electras fitted for bombing?

Mr. MASSEY: They are very small as compared with the modern bomber. Their lifting load is very small and their speed very slow compared with the bombers flying on passenger air routes in Europe to-day; also, as the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) remarks, they are obsolete for that particular purpose.

It seems to me that we are challenged not only to build up an air force for the defence of this country but to build up that air force ourselves. The Canadian pilot has demonstrated that he is the finest in the world. That was said by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) last evening; it has been said over and over again in this chamber, and it is an established fact. We are the finest pilots in the world, and we should know more about flying than anyone else in the world. We should be able not only to fly ships but to build them as well. Only the other day I noticed that a factory is to be erected at, I believe, Malton—the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) is thumping his desk—for the manufacture of planes. Why cannot we in this country develop an aeroplane industry of our own? Why cannot we build those ships which we are to fly in our own air force? Why should we have to buy them outside? Why should we be in the position to-day that we go to the United States to purchase from them the ships for the Trans-Canada airways?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In the defence services we are building practically all our own airships.

Mr. MASSEY: What is the capacity of the plant?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is more or less in the experimental stage. I think six different firms are contracting.

Mr. BENNETT: All the engines are imported.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The engines are all imported, yes.

Mr. MASSEY: It is not a complete plant of itself?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. MASSEY: It is in part an assembly plant?

Mr. McIVOR: May I be allowed to give just a little information?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MASSEY: I am perfectly willing that the hon. member should do so, but he can make his speech later.

Mr. McIVOR: We have in Fort William an aeroplane factory which is at present employing 334 men, most of them experts.

Mr. MASSEY: I am glad to hear from the hon. member for Fort William that in that part of the world they are as air-minded as he says. On the other hand, with all due respect for what is being done at Fort William, I am speaking not of smaller efforts but of the large effort. If we are to have an air force in this dominion and to make the ships that we require, we shall not do so with 340 men in this factory or 120 men in a factory somewhere else. In other words, what plans, if any, has the government in mind toward building our own ships in this dominion? What has the government in mind as regards the building of anti-aircraft guns? What has the government in mind toward either the purchase or building of the new pump gun? What has the government in mind toward the expansion of our ordnance facilities? We must realize, facing the facts as we are compelled to do, that in the event of war we must be able not only to put a fighting force into the air but to maintain it in the air. The whole question, then, is one not only of creation but of maintenance as well.

So I repeat that we must face the facts of the situation, a situation which we have had no part in creating. We are, if I may say so, innocent victims in a world of turmoil and strife, a world in which the existence not only of some nations of the world but of the empire itself is threatened, and of that empire we are definitely a part, and not only, let it be remembered, a traditional part but an economic part. Does any hon. member believe that our association within the empire is purely a traditional one? Where should we be were we a little country on our own in the northern half of the north American continent? What would happen to us in our present standing if we were to be attacked? We cannot be blind to the fact that the land-hungry nations of the world regard this dominion of ours as a juicy morsel on which to seize, and land-grabbing is not altogether unknown in these days. Japan has seized Manchuria, now Manchukuo; Italy has seized Ethiopia; Germany has seized Austria; Czechoslovakia hangs in the balance, and to-day Japan engages in another life and death struggle with China.

What is to happen next? Would any hon. member venture to rise in his place and say that there is to be no more of this; that this is the last; that we are through? Are we to be like the grasshopper in the fable who danced and sang, taking no thought of the winter to come; or are we to face, as I have said several times already, the facts of the situation? By no possible manner of means can we legitimately close our eyes to the situation which exists in Europe and which increases in seriousness, which hereafter may become less serious or may become more so. I think I understand the point of view of those living in various parts of the dominion who shun war and say that we should have no part in it because it does not concern us. But it does directly concern us if Victoria and Vancouver are laid in ruins, if Halifax and Saint John and even Quebec city are destroyed from both the sea and the air.

The government, I fully admit, faces a difficult situation. But it seems to me that the minister in his estimates has endeavoured rather to save the face of the government than the body of the people. In other words, is this a policy of how little can we spend and get by, rather than how much do we have to spend in order to have security? I take second place to no man in deploring expenditure for defence; but when that expenditure has been definitely shown by the trend of the times to be necessary, perforce we must face the situation as it is and lay aside our individual feelings for the sake of the nation, looking at the broader panorama in its full width and implication.

Let us look for a moment to our sister dominion, Australia. We were told in the press of yesterday that $215,000,000 are to be spent in the next three years by a country whose British-born population is not more than half our total population. Two hundred and fifteen million dollars will be spent in three years by one of our sister dominions. As the hon. member for London pointed out last night, Australia is spending for defence $4.30 per capita as against our $1.41.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We in Canada are up to $3.11 now.

Mr. MASSEY: As against Great Britain's $14.14.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. MASSEY: We cannot maintain our position as a nation and depend upon any sister nation, no matter how friendly that sister nation may be. We cannot possibly retain our status as a nation if we are going to lean upon one that is not part of us.

Mr. MARTIN: Why not?

Mr. MASSEY: The reason is perfectly obvious. A mother will look after her daughter without any expectation of reward, but cousins do not look after cousins on the same basis. That is the answer in a nutshell, as the hon. member for Essex East well knows.

Mr. MARTIN: No, I do not.

Mr. MASSEY: We cannot rely on the fleet of another nation to defend us. Does the hon. member suppose for a solitary moment that the fleet of the nation to the south of us, no matter how friendly that nation may be, is going to rush up the Atlantic seaboard for the protection of Halifax? Does any hon. member think for a moment that its fleet on the Pacific is going to engage the fleet of Japan or some other nation that chose to attack Vancouver?

Mr. MARTIN: No question about it.

Mr. MASSEY: Do hon. members realize the strength of the Japanese navy and to what that might lead as far as the United States is concerned?

How exceedingly anxious we were a short time ago to develop our status as a nation. As the minister pointed out yesterday, what he called "the Balfour formula" was acclaimed by many Canadians as establishing this dominion as a nation. Some of us have rejoiced in that fact; some of us have acclaimed from the housetops the fact that we are a nation. Are we then prepared to stand on our own feet or are we not? That is the question. Can we hope to preserve our entity as such and not be prepared to defend ourselves? There is no longer a north Atlantic fleet of the British navy. Let us not forget that fact, and let us not forget either that aeroplanes fly faster than ships plough the sea, and that a warring aeroplane is not like an aeroplane carrying passengers. A warring aeroplane does not have to get back; its job is to go to its appointed destination and drop its bombs; and after it has done its work, as one of the horrors of war, does it really matter whether it gets home? It sounds ghastly, but that policy was demonstrated over and over again by the enemy in the last war. Airships now fly the Atlantic one way, and it may not be long before the range of these ships will be such as to enable them to return to the field from which they took off or to an aeroplane carrier far at sea.

In the last war we did not experience hostilities within our own borders; in the next war there is no guarantee against that. Whereas there were some who said that the cry of the defence of one's home was a futile argument in 1914, that argument at least holds good to-day. The danger in which we live in this dominion is not the danger of being compelled to send an expeditionary force across the sea, but the danger of having our own homes destroyed by attack from the air. Let it not be considered as idle talk to-day to refer to the defence of our own homes, particularly the homes of those who live in our seaports. Air attacks are not unlike accidents; you do not know that you are going to have them until they happen. It was only a few years ago, as hon. members will recall that we looked up into the sky one day and saw some twenty planes, bearing the insignia of Italy upon them, flying through the air on their way to Chicago. True, that was a peaceful mission, but some of us wondered that day how long it would be before bombing planes of some enemy of the British commonwealth might be flying through Canadian air on other than a peaceful mission.

I urge the minister, with all the earnestness of which I am capable, that in his estimates he give consideration not only to the point of view of how little we can spend to save our face but to the point of view of how much we must spend in order to save the body of this nation.

Mr. THORSON: Will the hon. member indicate how much we should spend?

Mr. MASSEY: I am not a military expert any more than the hon. member for Selkirk, but I am discussing preparation in the face of the possibility of war. I am not here to state how much we should spend. The hon. member, however, knows quite well, living safely ensconced in the heart of the dominion, that he has nothing to be afraid of from the air. But how about those who live in Vancouver, Victoria, Halifax and Saint John? Their situation is entirely different. I can readily understand why the hon. member for Selkirk should have the point of view he has, but he does not face the situation which those who live on the seaboard must perforce face.

I implore the minister to look upon these estimates in the broadest possible way. In the light of his own statement of yesterday afternoon, with which he concluded his remarks, the possibility of war is not so remote that we can afford to ignore it and leave our policy to be decided after the guns have begun to thunder. We must face the possibility, as horrible and all as it is, that Great Britain may become engaged in another life and death struggle. We must try to visualize what it means to each one of us as Canadians, if Great Britain were to be defeated in such a struggle; yes, and to visualize as Canadians what would happen to us were we to be directly attacked. Every hon. member of this committee must face these decisions as an individual, and we have a right to require that our government should face them as a government.

Flights on the wings of oratory, arguments dressed up in all the detail of which every language is capable, and the subtlety of words, do not remove the fact that we are living in a wicked world wherein man is prepared to use force against his fellow man. All the sincere piety in the world is valueless when hostilities break out, and the arm of the invader is stronger than the arm of him who is merely pious. Again I urge the minister that, in the name of this dominion which we love; in the name of all the liberty and privileges that are ours as members of the British commonwealth; in the name, not merely of traditional loyalty or of effervescent patriotism, but of common sense, we face facts fearlessly and plan our course, not under the urge that inspires military aggression but under our desire to be a nation, in fact as well as in name, ready and prepared to defend our shores and our homes against the ravages of a ruthless invader. Let us give thought, then, not to any hectic higgledy-piggledy expenditure of large sums for a navy, for an army and for an air force, but to adequate and reasoned protection against the only possible attack to which we are subject, namely, from the air or the sea, and let us have a permanent land force trained and equipped to meet any emergency which may arise.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): I wish to express appreciation of the decision of the minister yesterday to precede his estimates with a statement as to general policy and to permit the discussion to cover a wide range. I feel that the statement he made yesterday will do much to allay unnecessary criticism and to give a better perspective of the intentions of the government. I am bound to say, however, that his statement does not answer all the questions, the anxious questions that are being asked by the Canadian people at this time. In this group we have withheld criticism until after the delivery of the minister's statement. We have given that statement some consideration. We appreciate the difficulties of the government in dealing with these questions. We are not unmindful of our responsibilities, and for that reason I do not intend to use any reckless language; for I fully appreciate the gravity of the situation confronting the Canadian nation at the present time.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has reminded us not once but several times of our responsibilities. But I would point out that the responsibilities of the minister at this moment are even greater. He is aware of facts in regard to international affairs; he is aware of the decisions as to British government policy which have not yet been disclosed to the Canadian House of Commons. I would be the last one to suggest that he should take a meddlesome attitude toward international affairs, or toward British policy, but I think it most important that he should deal definitely with some doubts and uncertainties which are in the minds of the Canadian people. Let us be under no misapprehension. In spite of all that the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) has said the Canadian people most earnestly desire peace and they intend to work for peace.

In my opinion it is the minister's responsibility to define more clearly Canadian policies, to give Canadian opinion courageous leadership and to provide a satisfactory basis upon which to unify Canadian opinion. May I suggest to him that this desirable result cannot be attained by any attempt to pacify the imperialists on the one hand or conciliate the isolationists on the other. As I view the question, unless some attempt is made to establish a plan of collective action by the great powers, there is little hope of averting a major world war in which Canada may be involved. We have been told by the Prime Minister that one of the most important guiding principles of policy at this time is the maintenance of Canadian unity. I submit that there can be very little unity; that he cannot satisfactorily answer the questions of anxious Canadian mothers at this time, unless he tells us more clearly how and under what circumstances or conditions Canada will employ the armed forces which he now asks this committee to provide. That is the important question, which I regret to say the minister did not adequately answer in his statement of yesterday.

If I criticize the defence policy outlined by the minister, it is not because I am opposed to defence as such. I regret very much that insinuations have been made from time to time misrepresenting my position or the position of anyone in this group in that respect, I say clearly I am not opposed to defence as such. The minister has strongly emphasized the idea that it is our duty to do something reasonable to protect our people and our country. I think he will not find any hon. member of this committee in disagreement with him on that score. What I have said and say now is prompted by a knowledge that defence involves much more than a haphazard expenditure of public funds on armaments.

He has not heard this group counsel inertia in the face of world trends of to-day. No one suggests that we should neglect our national interest and thereby to some extent court national extinction. I do not propose that we should leave our national defences in such a state of disrepair as to invite any lawless aggressor to come over and do with us what he pleases. I believe it to be the responsibility of any government to defend the country from external attack. I hope I make my position clear. We are quite as much concerned as the minister with regard to national security. We are quite as much concerned as the minister that our shores should not be ravaged or our homes laid waste. So I think we may eliminate from this discussion any insinuation that any of us would remain supine should any attempt be made to ravage our homes or violate the territorial integrity of our country. But I submit that it is quite compatible with that desire for national security and national unity to question the purpose and the degree of armament proposed in these estimates.

These matters have been discussed in the British House of Commons. Only yesterday the broad lines of policy were laid down by the British Prime Minister. As was done in Westminster, so I submit broad lines of policy, may be laid down here, with more definite reference to the existing international situation and Canada's position with reference to that situation. These estimates mean that we are preparing to fight. True, the minister emphasizes preparation for defence; nevertheless he did suggest the possibility of armed action in support of peace-time diplomacy, or of obligations to defend democracy. We should know now more clearly what the government's intentions are in this respect. The minister has not assured us that these estimates are solely for purposes of direct defence.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They certainly are, every cent of them.

Mr. MacNEIL: I have gathered otherwise from the statements of the minister as reported in Hansard. When he speaks of armed support of peace-time diplomacy and the defence of democracy, he is referring to external considerations. However, I hope that at a later time we may have his assurances in more definite terms. He cannot safely be indefinite in this respect.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

NIAGARA FALLS OBSERVATION BRIDGE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 15, to incorporate the Niagara Falls Observation Bridge Company—Mr. Damude—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1.—Incorporation.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee that considered this bill, I wish to say something about it before we proceed any further. I must say that I enjoy very much speaking of that historic district in which it is proposed to erect this bridge, and if there were more time I would enjoy it even more. The Niagara river frontier is one of the most historic districts in Canada, made famous first by those early French explorers whose bravery and ability to navigate the unknown wilds have never been surpassed. In the course of time it was found necessary to erect bridges over that great river. The first one to be erected, on the site occupied by the recent Falls View bridge that fell down, was erected in 1867. I do not know the date of the construction of the second bridge; but the third, the one that fell down on January 27 of this year, I believe was erected some forty years ago, in 1898.

As far as I can see, there is no reason for any hurry in considering this bill, in the first place because the state of New York has killed the bill as far as the United States side is concerned; and in the second place, to which I shall refer later, because of the proposed bridge above the falls that, I hope, will be erected some time later by Canada and the United States. While it is imperative that the cities of Niagara Falls, New York, and Niagara Falls, Ontario, should have at the earliest possible moment, a bridge erected at or about the site of the bridge which collapsed, we cannot hurry matters because, as I said a moment ago, the bill has been killed in the legislative assembly of the state of New York. So we are given ample time to consider thoroughly what is the best thing to do for that district.

There are several bridges left. First, there is the bridge below the escarpment at Queenston, called the suspension bridge. Second, there is the double-deck, steel arch bridge at the north end of Niagara Falls, the upper deck of which, I believe, is used by the Canadian National and perhaps other railways, while the lower deck is used by pedestrians and vehicles of one kind and another. Third, there is the cantilever bridge, perhaps better known as the Michigan Central bridge, immediately south of the lower steel arch bridge. Fourth, there is the Peace bridge itself, from the city of Buffalo across to Fort Erie on the Canadian side. So, if a bridge is not constructed on the site of the former bridge for another year, while the inconvenience may be great it is not a matter of extreme urgency.

The committee had before it two proposals, or rather one proposal and one objection. The objection was raised by the owners of the bridge that collapsed, the International Railway Company. They opposed the application of the Niagara Falls Observation Bridge Company, and it was interesting indeed to listen to the proponents of the new bridge and to the statements of the representatives of the International Railway Company. Certainly their representations were not similar, and figures were presented to the committee that made me, for one, wonder on what we could base our judgment. The representatives of the International Railway Company gave figures as to the earnings of the bridge that collapsed, and as these were greatly at variance with the figures given by the proponents of the Niagara Falls observation bridge I believe we should have both sets of figures placed on Hansard. The revenue of the collapsed International Railway Company bridge was given as follows:

1929	352,434
1930	322,376
1931	282,126
1932	204,591
1933	192,585
1934	221,025
1935	235,896
1936	275,297
1937	321,039

That gives an average over the ten years of $273,251. They stated—and their statement was not challenged—that those figures were audited by reputable auditors, and I do not believe any company, either the proponents or the opponents, would use any figures other than those which were audited. The figures submitted by the proponents of the Niagara Falls observation bridge were suppositious. I neglected to write them down, and there was no Hansard of the proceedings, but I did take the figures from one of the Niagara Falls newspapers, quoting what Mr. Suitor said in the New York state assembly. The figures quoted were higher than those submitted by the International Railway Company. As I remember, the income was estimated at between $500,000 and $600,000. On the one hand, we had an audited statement by the company and, on the other, we had figures submitted by the proponents of the bill at Albany, New York. The proponents of the bill who appeared before the committee submitted the very same estimated cost as is in Bill No. 15. It will be noted that the first action provided for in that bill is the issuing of $500,000 worth of bonds. Then section 12 provides for the issuing of securities not exceeding $7,000,000. In other words, the cost of the bridge was estimated as $7,500,000. Upon members of the committee questioning these figures and upon the proponents of the bill being told that the supporters of a similar bill before the New York state assembly had stated that the bridge would cost $3,000,000, the estimated cost was brought down to $4,000,000. That figure was still considerably above the figure submitted by the International Railway Company as the cost of their bridge.

The International Railway Company were represented by one of the ablest engineers on the north American continent, Colonel Monsarrat of Montreal, whose reputation could not be added to by anything I might say in his favour. Colonel Monsarrat stated that he could build a bridge sufficiently large to take care of the traffic for between $1,125,000 and $1,500,000. Upon further questioning we finally got the Minister of Highways of Ontario to admit that $2,000,000 was to be used to purchase lands. Who knows how much the bridge will cost if the land has not been purchased already! If it was a private company the land could have been bought before anyone knew a bridge was to be built, but I am sure that this land will now cost a great deal.

The International Railway Company would not have to buy any land for their bridge, and they claim they can erect a new bridge and provide ample exit and approach. The people of Niagara Falls want a new bridge as quickly as possible, and the International Railway Company claim that they could have their proposed bridge in operation within a year. They claim also that they have a right to permission to build a new bridge. I do not want anyone to get the idea that I am against public ownership. I think my record in the early days of the organization of the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission will stamp me as a public ownership supporter. But I am opposed to ownership that states a bridge will cost $7,500,000, and then reduces it to $4,000,000, when it is stated in the United States that the same bridge will cost only $3,000,000. We have too many bridges that cost far more than they are worth.

Figures were submitted to show that if this Niagara Falls observation bridge is built, even at a cost of $4,000,000, it will never be a free bridge. The proponents of the public ownership bridge say that their main purpose is to provide a toll-free bridge. Figures were submitted and were not disputed that the revenue from such a bridge would not be more than $325,000. Operating expense was put at $95,000, which leaves an operating income of $230,000. Allowing two per cent for depreciation, this leaves a net income of $150,000, and, less 5 per cent on investment, makes a deficit of $50,000. If a public ownership bridge is built, the city of Niagara Falls will derive no taxes from it. Many members of the Niagara Falls council have protested against the erection of such a bridge and against the expropriation of lands from which the city already receives taxes. I should like someone to figure out for me how a bridge can be paid for when the net deficit is $50,000 per year. The figures submitted by the International Railway Company showed that it has been difficult for them to pay any dividend on a bridge that cost between $1,125,000 and $1,500,000.

The proponents of the bill stated that the bridge which was wrecked was not able to take care of the traffic. I was over the old bridge a great number of times, and while one might have had to wait a little while on a Saturday or a holiday, there was no difficulty whatever in crossing the river on weekdays. The old bridge had four traffic lanes, the number to be provided by the suggested bridge. If four traffic lanes were not sufficient on the old bridge, they certainly will not be sufficient on the new one. It was pointed out that the old bridge could permit handling 2,520 an hour in both directions. I assume it was vehicles that were meant, as we were talking about vehicular traffic, at the time. There would be no time when anything like 2,520 vehicles would cross in an hour. The evidence was that the peak was 900 an hour. Traffic figures were submitted which showed that the record day was the Sunday before Labour day in 1928, when 15,767 vehicles crossed the bridge. The second heaviest traffic day was the Sunday before Labour day in 1931, when 12,581 vehicles crossed. On the Saturday before the record Sunday in 1928 there were 4,323 vehicles, and on the Monday following, 6,653.

I shall take Colonel Monsarrat's word for it that the four-lane bridge did have ample capacity, and as the new bridge would have only four lanes its capacity would be no greater. It was clearly pointed out that if there were more customs officials and immigration officers stationed at each end of the bridge, then traffic would move much more rapidly; but on the other hand it was pointed out that neither the government of Canada nor the government of the United States would appoint more officers to have them standing at the end of the bridge twiddling their thumbs for nine days out of ten, or perhaps more than that, just so that they would be able to take care of the heavy traffic on the first and fourth of July, Labour day, Decoration day and some other holidays.

I went to the committee meetings with an open mind; in fact I have not yet stated whether I shall vote for or against the bridge; but what I did not like from the very commencement was the attitude of the promoters of the bridge before they appeared before the committee at all. What did the Minister of Highways in the Ontario government say? I should like western members to listen to this. I quote from the Border Cities Star of March 15 as to what happened on the day the committee opened:

> Members who had taken ready exception to certain remarks made by Mr. McQuesten in the Ontario legislature last Friday tended to fling them back at him at the first opportunity. Among other things, Mr. McQuesten advised Ottawa to "look after its own business" and asked what right have the "Eskimos in the north," the "Ruthenians in Saskatchewan" or the maritime fishermen to meddle in Ontario's problems.

That was said in reference to members representing the maritimes and the west. I believe the hon. member for Mackenize (Mr. MacMillan) did take exception to being characterized as representing Eskimos. All that kind of talk may go in the Ontario legislature, and such methods may be able to get legislation through committees at Toronto, but they cannot get measures through committees at Ottawa—not if the opposite side can stop them from going through.

Nor did I like the language that characterized the old bridge as a twopenny-ha'penny outfit. Colonel Monsarrat characterized the old bridge as a splendid bridge, well constructed, and amply able to take care of the work it was called upon to do. The kind of talk and the methods to which I have referred do not get anybody anywhere. They may fall in line with writing letters over the head of the Prime Minister to a congressman at Washington in connection with waterways and writing letters to representatives in the house at Albany, but they are not the methods for Ottawa. Business at Ottawa is conducted on a higher plane than that.

Again, Mr. McQuesten said—I am not giving his exact words but this was the implication—You can do what you like here at Ottawa, but I am going to introduce a bill in the Ontario legislature giving the province of Ontario control over the beds of streams. He meant international streams. Now I would like to know this: Has this government control over the beds of international rivers? Do I hear hon. members saying yes?

An hon. MEMBER: Nobody said a word.

Mr. MacNICOL: Well, then, everybody should have said a word. If the Dominion of Canada has control over the beds of international streams, that is one half, what right has the Ontario legislature to pass a bill, entitled the Bridges Act of 1938, providing that such bridges cannot be built except upon approval by the lieutenant-governor in council. I wondered, when I heard that, why this bridge proposal came before the committee at all. If the Ontario government have the right to say whether or not a bridge shall be built over the Niagara river, there was not much use in their coming here to find out whether they could get authority from the federal government.

It was said on the last day of our committee meeting that the Niagara Falls council had passed a resolution endorsing the bridge proposal, but in the Niagara Gazette of the 24th of this month there was a report of an interview with the mayor of Niagara Falls, in which he stated that that was not so.

Mr. DAMUDE: I have it here.

Mr. MacNICOL: Just read what he says. The mayor's name is, I think, Mr. Hanniwell. I thought I had the report of the interview here; but if my hon. friend has it, it will save me the trouble of reading it, and if my hon. friend does not read it, I shall go to the reading room and bring it into the chamber and read it before the bill passes, because I was reading it only a few moments ago. Alderman McAninch said:

> This city and Niagara Falls, N.Y., is suffering materially, and will continue to lose business until we get a new bridge.

The article is headed "Wire-pulling."

An hon. MEMBER: Where?

Mr. MacNICOL: It is perhaps better for me not to say. Alderman McAninch went on to say:

> I would move that we hold a joint meeting with the city council over the river and the chambers of commerce of both sides to get some speed in the thing. There is a lot of talk about the personnel of the Niagara Falls Observation Bridge Company which has made application for a charter to build a bridge, and if our local member has a brother on the board, the Parks Commission manager has his brother on it, and Hon. T. B. McQuesten's former business partner is in the company too; there is sure to be delay.

I might say that the manager of the Niagara Falls parks commission or the solicitor characterized these men as straw men. I do not call them that, but that is how he designated them. I am not even sure that one member of the commission is the brother of the local member of parliament. I believe that one of the members is his son-in-law. But the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Damude) will know. Alderman McAninch continued:

> If the way the present directors are going about building the bridge will mean a big delay, then we should back up those who are ready to build a bridge.

The International Railway company are ready to start now; they have their plans drawn; they do not have to go out and sell their bonds; they can build the bridge, they say, for a million and a quarter to a million and a half dollars. Next, alderman Twidale of Niagara Falls is quoted as saying:

"There is a feeling of resentment in some circles that the old bridge company has not been allowed to go on with its plans," Alderman Twidale stated. "They served us well for forty years and have expressed a willingness to go ahead and have a new bridge ready for 1939."

What I asked in the railway committee and what I am going to find out before this bill passes is this, Have the International Railway Company the right to rebuild their bridge? If they have, it would be mere folly for us to pass this bill, because it will mean building two bridges close together, and certainly two of them are not required.

I think it would be well to make a comparison with what has happened in connection with the Peace bridge across from Buffalo to Fort Erie. That bridge cost $4,500,000, and it was stated that it would be paid for within a short time. We were told the other day before the railway committee that if we passed this bill and the proposed Niagara Falls observation bridge were erected, it would pay for itself, one gentleman said, in twelve years, another said in seventeen years; but they were quite different before the committee in New York, where it was stated that it would take maybe fifty years. On the basis of what the Peace bridge has done, it will take a very long time to pay for it, because last year the Peace bridge had a net surplus of some $66,000. For years it has not paid anything in reduction of its debt. It did pay, I believe, up to a million dollars a few years after it was erected, but it has now been erected for some eleven years.

Another reason why, in my opinion, the bill should not pass—I have just about enough time to talk on this point, and if I do not finish now perhaps I shall be able to complete my remarks after someone else has spoken on the subject—is what is said on page 14 of the white paper submitted to the house the other day in reference to a proposed bridge south of the falls. It was first recommended in 1900 by the deep waterways commission; then in 1910 by the international waterways commission; in 1913 again by the international waterways commission; in 1919 by Mr. F. C. Shenahon, one of the engineers of the Chicago drainage canal, and in 1921 by one of the United States government war department engineers, Mr. Warren. The recommendation was that a bridge should be built south of the falls. The white paper reads in this wise:

In addition to the completion of a waterway, the Canadian share of which has already been so largely accomplished, the settlement would provide a rational plan for the future utilization of the Niagara river with full protection for the scenic spectacle. Technical advisers suggest that a planned program will not only afford greater protection for the scenic spectacle than hitherto envisaged, but will also assure far larger recoveries of power from the available waters than has hitherto been contemplated.

Such a settlement would further assure the maintenance of lake levels and the navigable depths of the Montreal harbour and ship channel.

What was proposed by these various commissions? They proposed first in 1900 and again in 1910 to erect a bridge across at Buffalo which would also act as a barrage to the outflow from lake Erie and to raise the water level of lake Erie to 573·5 feet and maintain it there. During January last the water level of lake Erie was 570·63 feet, and that was 1·38 feet lower than the average stage of January for the last seventy-eight years. The time has come when something should be done to maintain the water levels of lake Erie, and here is a golden opportunity to do so and at the same time to have a bridge. They now propose to erect a bridge about one mile and nine hundred feet south of the falls. That water barrage or bridge would have sixty large drop gates with a rise and fall to enable them to regulate the flow. Each gate would be seventy-four feet wide. They propose to raise the height of the basin at Chippawa, which is the last part of the river in which the water level now is nearly constant, with no rapids, and which is at normal 561·3 feet, by 10 feet to 571·4 feet, and in doing that they will be able to raise the water level of lake Erie to 573·5 feet.

They would do three things. First, they would regulate the flow and raise the water level of lake Erie. Second, they would provide a bridge. Third, they would stop the erosion that is now taking place at the falls. When that barrage is erected, it will first dry one side of the river and then the other; works or weirs will be erected south of the Horseshoe falls and thereby prevent their further erosion. The Horseshoe falls have been shrinking on an average six or seven feet a year for the last one hundred and sixty years. The United States falls have receded an average of only one foot a year. But something should be done, and if we let the International Railway Company go ahead and build their bridge, it is immaterial to us what it costs, while if the governments build the proposed barrage bridge we shall have two bridges instead of one, but one north of the falls and the other south of the falls.

I notice that my forty minutes have expired, and I thank the committee for its patience.

Mr. McIVOR: I voted for this bill in committee, and I do not see any reason why I should change my mind. I congratulate the hon. member for Davenport upon having clothed his subject in a very fine address, but when the dress is stripped off it does not look very good. However, he did it cheerfully and because his conscience would tell him he was doing what was right. I occupy the same position.

The first thing that caused me grave doubt was that although I asked three times and the hon. member for Winnipeg North asked once to my knowledge what was the original cost of the old bridge, we could not get that information. My reason for asking was that if that corporation were not well paid for the bridge, they should be compensated; but the learned lawyer from Toronto and those supporting him, as the hon. member for Davenport knows very well, said they did not know, and we have to believe them.

Another reason why I think this bill should be supported is that some day, whether twelve, fifteen or fifty years hence, the proposed bridge will be publicly owned, and I do not think a beauty spot of international repute like Niagara falls should be exploited or virtually owned by any private interest. You may call me a socialist, a communist, or whatever you choose, but I do not believe that any corporation should have the right to make money at the public expense from a beauty spot like Niagara falls. We have in my district a little falls which comes in as second to Niagara, namely the Kakabeka falls; it is privately owned, but some day we hope it will be public property. In fifteen years this projected bridge may be publicly owned; if it is not, no private interest will be making money out of it.

The plan of the new bridge was under consideration before the old bridge was washed away, for the simple reason that the old structure was inadequate. I am not speaking from the Niagara Falls Gazette, or the Daily Star of Toronto, or the Montreal Gazette, or the Fort William Times-Journal. I am speaking from what I know, because I was caught on that bridge once. One hon. member says it was a twopenny-ha'penny bridge, and in the language of another member, I would not give thruppence for it. It did not fill the bill. I understood that it was not even insured. Why should it not have been insured if it was of great value? But it was valuable because it was a paying concern. Because the new bridge will be publicly owned I am going to vote for this bill, and I congratulate the hon. member who has sponsored it upon having common sense enough to bring it forward.

Mr. HEAPS: I apologize for the hon. member for Davenport. Since he has been sitting in this part of the house he has changed so much from the member we knew when he sat opposite that I hardly recognize him. He has improved to such an extent that I hardly thought he would make the speech which he has made to-night. If he says that he is in favour of public ownership, he ought to be in favour of a bridge which is to be publicly owned and controlled. I was under the impression that we were all in favour of the principle that there should be as few toll bridges in Canada as possible, whether they be international bridges or bridges within the dominion. I do not advance my Canadianism as far as the hon. member for Davenport does his; I do not carry the Canada-first principle to the length that some hon. gentlemen do. I do say, however, that the people of Ontario should own the bridge so far as the Canadian side is concerned; that part of it should not be owned by a United States concern. If this charter were not granted, it is claimed, the Mitten interests of the United States would have the right to build a new bridge where the old one fell down, and if they were given the right to erect a new structure there, this would mean a franchise in perpetuity. That goes without saying; in fact, it was so stated in the committee by those who controlled the bridge which fell down. It was said that their rights were perpetual on both the United States and the Canadian side. So that if the International Falls Company built a new bridge, we would be giving them a perpetual franchise, and they would have the right to operate it as a toll bridge for all time. The hon. member for Davenport said that the bill was killed in the New York legislative assembly, and that is partly true. It passed the state legislature but failed to pass the senate, and we were given the assurance that the reason it did not pass the upper house there was not that the bridge was to be privately owned but that it did not afford sufficient protection to the public, the reason being altogether different from that which we have been given to understand here.

Mr. MacNICOL: Not by me.

Mr. HEAPS: No. but in the committee. The hon. member for Davenport gave the same figures that we had before us in the committee during the week. We could not get from counsel for the private company what the bridge cost forty years ago; but he told us that during the past ten years there had been an average annual income of $273,000, while the total expenditures in the same ten year period averaged $65,000 a year. The question was asked Mr. Robertson what the profits amounted to each year, and he said he did not know. When he was asked whether there was anyone who could give any information in regard to the profits during those ten years, he was unable to answer the question. He did not know whether anyone knew what the profits had been, and an examination of the balance sheet would not disclose the profits of the bridge, because they were all lumped together with other utilities which the corporation owned on the United States side. I submit that when you find a bridge with an operating income of $273,000 a year, and annual expenditures of only $65,000, there must be a fairly large profit for those who own the bridge, especially when it has been in operation for forty years. I am not an engineer, but in my opinion the bridge must have been paid for over and over again by the profits derived from its operation. In view of these facts I do not think that they have very much of a claim against either the province of Ontario or the people of the dominion.

It has been stated that if the proposed bridge is operated on the basis of a cost of $4,000,000, it will never show operating profits. I do not know whether that is right or not, but I do not believe that a private corporation would be so anxious to erect a new structure unless they felt that there would be a profit from it. I do not think they would be at all willing or anxious to lose money on such a venture. The fact that they are anxious to erect a bridge would indicate that they expect to obtain a good deal of profit from it. But suppose the bridge did cost approximately $4,000,000; I still think they could show a profit. At any rate, we are faced with a choice in this matter. We are to choose between ownership of the bridge by the province of Ontario, in respect of that portion of the bridge which lies in Canada, and private ownership and control, and I am bound to say that as a member of this committee I favour the public body owning that portion of the bridge.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

On section 4—Capital stock.

Mr. BENNETT: What does the expression, "shares of $100 each," mean?

Mr. VIEN: It has been explained that it was not necessary to have any capital stock, and merely for the purpose of incorporation five shares are sufficient to qualify the five directors who are appointed.

Mr. BENNETT: Should not the word "five" be inserted between the word "into" and the word "shares" in the second line?

Mr. VIEN: The reprint reads:

> The capital stock of the company shall be five hundred dollars of common stock, divided into shares of one hundred dollars each.

There is no objection to inserting the word "five."

The CHAIRMAN: I must have the amendment.

Mr. VIEN: I move:

> That the word "five" be inserted in line 8 on page 2 of the bill, section 4, so as to make it read "divided into five shares of $100 each."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CAHAN: We have not the amended bill reported by the committee; I assume it no longer reads as it did in the bill which passed second reading.

Mr. VIEN: Yes; that has been reprinted. I thought every hon. member had a copy of the reprint. In the votes and proceedings in reporting the bill we mentioned that the bill had been reprinted.

Mr. CAHAN: I understand it is now a capital of $500 divided into five share of $100 each.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 5, 6 and 7 agreed to.

On section 8—Power to construct bridge.

Mr. BENNETT: Does this not cover a location which has already been granted to another enterprise?

Mr. VIEN: It is some 800 to 900 feet north of the present site.

Mr. BENNETT: But it would prevent the other bridge from being built by the predecessors in title?

Mr. VIEN: This bill does not affect the rights of the company to rebuild.

Mr. BENNETT: But that is not what I said. I said it would prevent it.

Mr. VIEN: It is probable that there is not room for two bridges on that site.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it the proper thing to take away these rights without having them determined?

Mr. VIEN: I was a little concerned about that point. There is no right in the company. I asked Mr. Robertson, who appeared on behalf of the company, whether the company had any exclusive right within a certain territory surrounding the site of the old bridge. They have no exclusive right; therefore there is no right taken away from them by this bill. I agree with the leader of the opposition that there will probably not be room for two bridges at that point.

Mr. MacNICOL: But the company does own the land at the end of the bridge on our side of the river, and owns a street running some distance on the Canadian side west of the exit of the bridge.

Mr. VIEN: The company owns the approaches on both sides.

Mr. MacNICOL: And the street as well.

Mr. VIEN: I am not sure as to that.

Mr. CAHAN: Did I understand the hon. member to say that the company owns the site of the bridge which fell down?

Mr. VIEN: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: And it is admitted that it has the right under its present charter to rebuild its bridge on that site. Those would be questions of law. But if this new bridge is to be built so near that site as to prevent the old bridge from being rebuilt, that is an engineering question, which I understand my hon. friend admits.

Mr. VIEN: Perhaps I did not express myself clearly. There is no engineering reason to prevent the company from rebuilding its bridge at the site of the old bridge. Even if the proposed bridge be built, the other bridge may be rebuilt, and it has been stated to the committee, and not contradicted, that prior to the fall of the former bridge the question of building a second bridge was mooted. But it is probable that it would not be possible economically to operate two bridges with the present traffic.

Mr. CAHAN: I beg the hon. member's pardon; I understood him to be dealing with a physical impossibility, not an economic probability.

Mr. ISNOR: I am not a lawyer, but I wonder whether the phraseology is as clear as it should be. I have in mind particularly the words, "in the province of Ontario to a point in the city of Niagara Falls, in the state of New York. . . . north of the present upper steel arch bridge." I understand the bridge has been destroyed, and the present phraseology could not have a legal interpretation unless the word "site" is used instead of "bridge."

Mr. VIEN: I think the hon. member's suggestion is a good one, that in line 24, after the words "upper steel arch bridge" the word "site" be inserted.

Mr. MacNICOL: You would have to strike out the word "present" too.

Mr. BENNETT: This bill undertakes to prescribe the site in a foreign country. We have no power to say where a bridge shall start in New York state. I recall that we had an animated discussion regarding that matter here with respect to one of these international bridges, and the law officers were of the opinion that the power of this parliament expired when we reached the middle of the stream. Perhaps the hon. member in charge of the bill will be able to make some representation as to whether that is changed. The Minister of Justice may recall that it was a bill something of this sort, and my memory is that the Department of Justice was of the opinion that we could start it here in Canada and send it to the middle of the stream, but we could not undertake to provide for its landing in the state of New York.

Mr. POULIOT: Unless we take possession of the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: There are not lacking signs of the opposite state of affairs. I think the language went further and said "towards the state of New York."

Mr. VIEN: The question was not raised in committee.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Departmental administration, $425,720.

Mr. MacNEIL: Mr. Chairman, before the dinner recess I was endeavouring to point out that in some important respects the minister's outline of defence policy was indefinite, and in my opinion it is extremely dangerous to be indefinite in these matters. I suggest to him that now is the time to take the people of Canada fully into his confidence. We have spoken of the necessity of maintaining Canadian unity. Nothing could be more destructive of Canadian unity than to be indefinite or ambiguous with regard to some of these matters, permitting this country to be manoeuvred into a position that is not clearly understood in advance and, may I say, that is not consistent with Canadian sentiment. I know it would mean a great deal of debate, perhaps acrimonious debate, at this time more precisely to define our position, but I think it would be far better to have that debate now than to leave it until we are compelled to mobilize our man power to meet a defence emergency. In my opinion any unwillingness to discuss frankly all aspects of the matter at this time forecasts a suppression of free debate when we succumb to war time hysteria.

So I repeat the question which I said the minister did not definitely answer: How and under what circumstances will Canada employ the armed force which he now asks this committee to provide? Unless our purposes are all fully disclosed, we are entering an armament race simply because other nations are arming, and in a vital issue of this nature that is not good enough. To plunge blindly into the provision of armaments is dangerous, and I suggest we are plunging blindly because we are not yet sure of all the implications of the defence program. If we arm simply because, as the hon. member for Greenwood has suggested, we are aware of grave external dangers, we must very soon ask ourselves this question: Against whom are we arming? It becomes increasingly difficult to define the boundary between defence and attack. Very soon we shall be attempting to answer the question: If we must defend ourselves, shall we not defend ourselves better if we engage in external war as a means of defence? So I say that apart from questions of direct defence, the minister has hinted at steps which may be necessary in regard to indirect defence. I intend to refer to his remarks in that regard, which I think are open to question; and, as he corrected me before the recess, I hope he will take occasion during this discussion to make his position clear. As reported at page 1649 of Hansard he said:

> The purpose of the armed forces of any country I think may be threefold: In the first place, to support peace time diplomacy; in the second place to provide a deterrent to aggressive nations; and in the third place in case of hostilities to be used after the methods of diplomacy have failed.

What does he mean by peace time diplomacy? What is this diplomacy, and what does it mean in the maintenance of the peace of the world? I think these questions should be answered. The minister speaks of efforts to restrain aggressor nations. In what respect definitely will Canada share in these efforts? Can we share in the efforts which are under consideration, and lend support to the policies which are sometimes suggested, and in which we have no voice? I submit that the intentions of the government on these issues now should be known. What is still more important, the purposes as declared should be strictly adhered to in practice. It seems obvious to me that the purposes already declared by the minister do not square in all respects with the program which is now being carried out. Surely it is obvious that we are planning for much more than merely the defence of Canadian shores. I say that the minister cannot safely dispose of these questions with imposing and glittering generalities. We have the right to ask him more adequately to define all the purposes and all the implications of his defence program as outlined to the committee yesterday.

In a similar manner we may question the basis upon which he has determined the scale of Canadian defence. This is also of primary importance. Defence measures mean sacrifice on the part of the Canadian people. If we are to be placed on a war time footing, we must forego measures of social security. That was brought to the attention of the committee last evening by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail); a "bullets and no bread" program has no appeal to the Canadian people at this time, unless we are actually ringed about with nations seeking to destroy us; and not even the greatest alarmist would suggest that that is the situation to-day. In this regard we should seek to strike a proper balance, or else we shall be working out the defence of the few and not the defence of the Canadian people as a whole.

I believe, that without a sound foreign policy it is impossible to determine correctly the scale of defence measures. Surely it is obvious that defence must be conditioned, first of all, by our resources, second, by our available man power and our geographical position, and, still more importantly, on the possibility and strength of potential aggression. Defence policy is naturally the outcome of foreign policy or lack of policy, and, as matters stand, we are shaping our foreign policy upon the basis of a developing defence plan, reversing the procedure that actually should be followed. Or if that is not true, we are shaping our defence policy without facing up to all the commitments which are actually involved in our existing external relations.

The minister, unfortunately I think, has not outlined very clearly our defence problem. He has shown that through succeeding imperial conferences we have reached the understanding that this dominion, as well as all others, must provide its own defence. We can no longer rely upon the protection of the British navy or the Monroe doctrine. These, as the minister suggested, will act simply as deterrents against the violation of our territorial integrity. If we face the matter frankly, such protection as we may enjoy in a world war will be extended by those other powers only as may seem advisable in protection of their own interests. It is well to remember this as we consider our external responsibilities. I think this has been made very plain in a recent statement by the British Prime Minister.

Again, may I point out that our neutrality, which the minister says we must defend, is not likely to be violated unless the United States becomes involved in a war on the Pacific. I think it is apparent from the minister's statement that if we can rule out definitely and clearly all external commitments, our defence problem is comparatively simple. Canada, without any extraordinary war effort, can defend her own shores against all threats within any measurable period of time. Our geographical position is favourable, and the topographical features of our country make defence comparatively easy against any invading force likely to endanger our territory within the next decade. We lie in what has often been called the strategic lee of the United States. We must recognize the fact that potential aggressors are likely to be kept occupied for some time in advancing their warlike ambitions in other directions on other continents. Canada will have ample warning of any definite threat to her territory. I think all agree that the invasion of Canadian territory is a remote contingency. The minister suggested this in his statement of yesterday.

The protection of our shipping beyond certain focal points or nodal areas adjacent to our ports is not of such vital concern as to warrant any participation in an ambitious naval program. Canadian trade is generally carried in other bottoms, and in any event our resources do not permit our attempting to protect our sea-borne trade on the high seas. If warring nations are given reason to attack Canada, they cannot as yet safely consider doing anything more than establishing fuelling stations at points on our coast to harass shipping and hit-and-run raids on our ports. The most pessimistic calculation I have yet heard did not envisage anything worse than this during any period for which we might reasonably make calculation. Therefore, it is obvious that we require only reasonable coastal defence, with small supporting land and air forces. We require only a military establishment capable of expansion to meet any defence emergency such as I have suggested.

Our defence program is complicated and our natural advantages are undermined by the uncertainty and ambiguity with respect to our external relations. That is why I have suggested that it is important that we should first have our foreign policy determined more clearly. As far as I can discover, we may or may not enter into some collective enterprise for the restraint of aggression; therefore we must arm. We have made no decision in this regard; so we do not know to what extent we should arm. We may or may not share in imperial responsibilities; therefore we must arm though we may be involved in a conflict in which we shall have no direct or vital concern. The minister has hinted more than once at the moral obligation of mutual support within the commonwealth, and many presumptions are entertained on this score. Because of this, action may be taken of more dangerous consequence than merely the defence of our own shores.

War intentions and war machines are gathering momentum in the world around us. Sooner or later some attempt will be made to check that momentum by an attempt to restrain aggression by force. If we intend to share in this enterprise, why should we not make sure now that we do not do so in the name of ideals long ago discarded and for purposes which are not now disclosed. In Canada we are benefiting by world-wide preparations for war; in various ways we are supporting the dangerous war credit inflation which to-day blocks peace moves. It has been said that to-day the threat of war yields greater profits than the promise of peace. In other countries it is becoming rapidly apparent that the sudden cessation of war-time industry would mean economic disaster. Even in Canada a reading of our financial journals and our stock exchange reports will give evidence of our growing investment in the profitable business of making war. As we are concerned at the present time about defence, let us remember that the greater the investment of that type, the greater the desire will be to protect the investment by resort to armed conflict beyond our national frontiers.

The minister has made an attempt to gauge Canadian sentiment on this matter. Sentiment will unquestionably play its part in determining the outcome of these issues, but I submit that before we succumb to any war hysteria, we should remember that sentiment is an unsound basis upon which to determine defence or foreign policy.

In the final analysis these matters must be determined on the basis of national interest. The price of Canadian participation in an external war may easily prove to be national self-destruction. I cannot conceive of any external interest or any sentimental crusade which would warrant such national suicide. I submit that all these considerations should be kept in mind when we discuss a defence program. As matters stand now, all these features serve to undermine the natural advantages we enjoy. I consider that our first line of defence is our external relations, the foreign policy which keeps us out of war and enables us to settle international conflict and live on terms of peace with other nations. Our second line of defence is a properly strengthened civilian morale, a fit and technically trained youth, and a proper mobilization of our industry to meet any defence emergency. The third and perhaps the least important line of defence is that which was discussed yesterday by the minister, the provision of armaments. I regret that he has placed such emphasis on the third line of defence. I consider we should give greater attention to strengthening what might be termed our diplomatic defences.

There is necessity for greater frankness on this subject. The hon. member for Greenwood said this afternoon that this is an issue which transcends all party considerations, at least considerations of party aggrandizement. It does not transcend those considerations to such an extent as to warrant absolute silence, but there are fundamental differences that should be threshed out now. It is extremely dangerous to leave the settlement of these matters until a period when there may be considerable war time hysteria. I speak of these matters from some experience. I think all of us remember the period preceding the last war when we did almost unbelievably foolish things and inflicted almost unspeakable cruelty on those who were designated as enemy aliens. I mention these matters because sound judgment is so distorted at times such as that.

It is suggested that we have been led into certain tacit commitments. I am not suggesting that the minister deliberately misled the committee, but I hope to be able to show that there are tacit commitments which he has not discussed. I have been personally dismayed by inconsistencies discovered when discussing these issues with men who should have some knowledge of the public affairs of this country, and my dismay was somewhat strengthened by an article I read in Maclean's magazine, by Professor Underhill of Toronto. The article reads:

> I have yet to hear of a single journalist or military man in Ottawa who doesn't (in private) laugh at the government's pretense that its present defence expenditures are meant for defence here in Canada.

That has been my own experience, and it has been confirmed to some extent by the remarks of Professor Underhill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My hon. friend must take the government's word for that.

Mr. MacNEIL: I am stating that that is my experience, and I hope that during the course of the debate the minister will set my mind at rest. I hope during the course of the discussion the minister will set our minds at rest with regard to all these matters, which give us some uneasiness.

Professor Underhill goes on to make this significant statement:

> But this is something quite different—

He was referring to the estimates for last year.

> But this is something quite different from what our government is starting out to do this year; namely, to construct the skeleton framework of a great national armed force, a framework which can be filled in and expanded by mass enlistment or conscription on the outbreak of war, and which is primarily designed not for local defence at all but for a series of expeditionary contingents overseas.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is entirely incorrect from start to finish.

Mr. MacNEIL: I am glad to hear the minister's correction. I am, however, going to proceed to place before him other points which have been brought to my attention and which tend to confirm that judgment. I am saying there is ground for something more than mere suspicion that there is preparation for participation in an external war. I am not at the moment arguing whether it is right or wrong, but I am contending that we should know definitely what are our commitments, whether implied or stated, on this score.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is none, either expressed or implied.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear; that is correct.

Mr. MacNEIL: I am trying to explain exactly what I mean, and I shall do so by referring to the statement made to this house in 1923 by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), who now sits on the treasury benches. On March 26, 1923, at page 1529 of Hansard, the hon. member for Quebec South introduced this resolution:

That, in the opinion of this house, it is expedient to declare that save in the case of actual invasion the Dominion of Canada shall not be committed to participation in any war without the consent of the parliament of Canada.

I know the Prime Minister has given us frequent assurances that parliament will decide in the event of war issues arising; but may I point out to the Minister of National Defence that his colleague in the government, the hon. member for Quebec South, makes a striking and convincing argument as to how commitments may be undertaken and how the country may be involved in war without the consent of parliament. I shall not attempt to quote his speech at length, but he makes this important point in a convincing manner, that on two previous occasions within our memory in which Canada was engaged in war, Canada was actually involved without the consent of parliament. When parliament met, it was presented with the actual fact of war. These are the historical precedents we have before us.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is exactly what we have decided to avoid now.

Mr. MacNEIL: Well, I hope so. But may I quote from the argument used by the Minister of Pensions and National Health. Referring to our experience in the last war and to how the British parliament was led into the position of declaring war because of commitments made of which they had no knowledge, the hon. member for Quebec South, speaking to this house on March 26, 1923, said at page 1534 of Hansard:

The Marquis of Lansdowne, speaking on the same day, August 6, 1914, states:

"I do not think anyone can have failed to be deeply shocked by what I can now describe as the cynical attempt made to bribe this country, and not this country alone, into a disregard both of its treaty obligations and of those other obligations which are not less sacred because they are not embodied in a signed and sealed document. . . . To the other category belong our obligations to France—obligations of honour, which have grown up in consequence of the close intimacy by which the two nations have been united during the last few fateful years."

Bonar Law is of the same opinion in a letter which he wrote to Mr. Asquith, Prime Minister of England, on August 3, 1914. Lloyd George, in defending his policy in August, 1918, four years afterwards, stated that there could be no question of doubt but that an obligation of honour was imposed upon the British Empire to intervene in any war in which Germany should be the aggressor. I have said before that it is possible for obligations of this nature to be entered into without consultation with parliament and without the knowledge and consent of parliament. I have had in my hand a book entitled, How the War Came, by Earl Loreburn, who was from 1905 to 1912 Lord Chancellor, and consequently a member of the British cabinet. I may say that Sir Edward Grey, in the course of his speech, after stating that he had informed Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman and others, states:

"The fact that conversations between military and naval experts took place was later on—I think much later on because that crisis passed and the thing ceased to be of importance—but later on it was brought to the knowledge of the cabinet."

This is what Lord Loreburn says:

"He does not say when . . . but one of Sir Edward Grey's then colleagues may be permitted, in view of his statement about withholding the information from the cabinet, to offer certain criticisms. Sir Edward Grey's phraseology rather conveys that his selection of confidants was casual, but Mr. Asquith and Lord Haldane were with himself vice-presidents of the Liberal League, a continuation of the Liberal imperialistic movement which had supported the South African war and opposed Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman on that subject."

He says further:

"There was no difficulty whatever in summoning the cabinet during the election to consider so grave a matter. A good many members of the cabinet were in London or within an hour of it, while those whom he consulted were at a distance. And there are railways and post offices in Great Britain. The cabinet met in January, 1906."

And then he goes on further to say that all during 1906 and later he, as a member of the cabinet, was not made acquainted with these conversations which had taken place with the French and Belgian officers. Further, he asked the question—When did the war come, and how did they bring us into it? Speaking with regard to the action of the ministers of the crown, he says:

"The answer to this question, in a single sentence, is that we were brought into the war because Mr. Asquith and Sir Edward Grey and their confidants by steps some of which are known while others may be unknown, had placed us in such a position toward France, and therefore also toward Russia, that they found they could not refuse to take up arms on her behalf when it came to the issue, though till the end they denied it to parliament, and probably even to themselves."

Mr. McBride: Does the hon. gentleman suggest that England was in honour bound to go and support France when she went to war, and that Canada, is not in honour bound to go and support England if she got into difficulties.

Mr. Power: I suggest that owing to this series of conversations and arrangements that took place between England and France prior to the last war, without there being any written treaties or conventions with the consent of parliament thereto, and without the knowledge of the whole cabinet, Britain found herself so involved that, without loss of honour, she could not stay out of the war. As I proceed further with my argument, my hon. friend will see that it is to avoid any such contingency arising in Canadian politics, that this resolution is being brought down this evening.

He goes on to say:

Mr. Power: I am under the impression that owing to some more of those conversations—

He was referring to the Chanak incident of 1922:

I am under the impression that owing to some more of those conversations, for instance the interchange of officers between the British general staff and our exchange of officers, and also owing to a certain resolution passed unanimously in this House of Commons in 1909, we were practically pledged to go to war in case the British Empire was forced into war through aggression on the part of Germany. It is to prevent any such contingency in future without the knowledge and full consent of parliament, that this resolution is being introduced.

Hon. members will be interested to hear these further remarks made at that time by the hon. member for Quebec South. He said:

I am Canadian, purely and simply, and I place the interests of this country before those of any other country no matter how closely we may be related thereto.

And again:

But on this question the time is fast approaching when every citizen of Canada will have to decide whether he is a Canadian first or a Britisher first. And when that question is placed before the people of Canada, without any extraneous circumstances to dim their vision or prejudice their judgment, then I think every member of this house will have to make his choice one way or the other.

Then he says in conclusion:

I say our people should devote their attention to their own national affairs, in an endeavour to make this country more prosperous and better to live in, and indeed a country better than any other in all the world.

I hope he is still of the same opinion and that his influence has some weight in the cabinet. The minister's statement of yesterday suggests the closest possible cooperation with the British War Office on defence matters. I think it is most significant, reading the report of the last imperial conference, that whereas in the reports of the two previous conferences the conclusions dealing with defence gave first place as to the independence of the dominions, in the report of the last conference that appears at the very end, and apparently is an afterthought.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The most important part of the finding.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says, "an afterthought." It was the climax.

Mr. MacNEIL: I have read that rather carefully, and that is the impression which it left with me. It is not given the same importance or emphasis as on former occasions.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The evil mind!

Mr. MacNEIL: I think we should know all the ramifications of this close cooperation. We learn in the book, Consultation and Cooperation of the British Commonwealth, published by the Royal and Canadian Institutes of International Affairs, of the purposes of the imperial defence college courses, London, where our staff is trained to deal with Canadian defence and trained, as we discover, in the broadest aspects of what is termed "higher imperial strategy"—"the higher imperial strategy." May I make it clear that I am not suggesting that the minister deliberately misled the committee; but I think we must recognize the fact that all the important men on the Canadian defence staff—they are listed here: the judge advocate general, the chief of the naval staff, the director of naval operations training, the director of military operations and intelligence, the director of military training, the director of staff duties, the air commodore, the air staff officer, the president of the national research council and former chief of the general staff—all these men have received their training or their final training at the imperial defence college, formed as I said for training in higher imperial strategy.

I have here a volume of the Canadian Defence Quarterly. I am not suggesting that this is an official expression of departmental opinion; but after all it is edited by a man who is in an important position on the Canadian staff, a position where he definitely influences the training of the gentlemen cadets of the Royal Military College. I have been tremendously interested in perusing the back numbers of this quarterly in order to get some indication of the opinions of our staff officers. It is quite clear to me that while this is not an official expression of departmental opinion, the importance of this publication among the defence forces cannot be denied. The fact that it is in every officers' mess in the dominion makes it certain that if there appeared therein any statement which was contrary to the policies of the department, the officer responsible for that statement would quickly be disciplined. It has been brought to my attention recently that any officer even criticizing departmental policy has been severely disciplined. In some able articles appearing in this magazine—and I am not suggesting that these officers are disloyal; I have a great respect for their capabilities as revealed in their contributions to this publication—it is clear that, whatever may be said in parliament by way of interpretation of the agreements reached at the imperial conferences, these officers are placing their own interpretation on the policies reached at the conference or enunciated in parliament. Some important conclusions will be found in some of these articles, conclusions to which no objection has been taken officially, and expressed by men who occupy a very high place and who are close to the council upon which the government must rely in making decisions upon the issues of war.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They have nothing whatsoever to do with policy.

Mr. MacNEIL: I made that clear. But I said that, in my opinion, the editorial staff of this publication echo, and dare not do otherwise, the opinions of their senior officers.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not necessarily.

Mr. MacNEIL: Otherwise this defence quarterly would not be accepted in officers' messes throughout the dominion. One man makes this significant statement, characteristic of several that appear in this publication.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Time.

Mr. MacNEIL: It does influence opinion among the officers and men of the Canadian forces. That being so, the minister must take cognizance of that which appears in this quarterly. The writer says:

It can be seen, therefore, that because of the remoteness of the possibility of Canada being invaded—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the date, please?

Mr. MacNEIL: This is October, 1935.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is when we started.

Mr. MacNEIL: I shall go on down the list. I have the last issue here, and the same opinions are expressed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Read the last issue, then.

Mr. MacNEIL:

—that the raison d'être of our land forces is not so much for the direct as for the indirect defence of Canada, which role is provided for by statute in the Militia Act of Canada.

The criticism is often made that Canada's land forces are for the express purpose of defending her coasts and frontier against invasion and that no legislation exists for their employment beyond Canada. We have attempted to refute that criticism and to show that Canada, being sensible of the possibility of her people demanding intervention in an empire war, is not entirely unprepared for that eventuality. Thus one may say that the principle under discussion is both recognized and applied in Canada.

In a subsequent issue, January, 1936, this appears in an article which was awarded first prize in an essay competition in which the higher officers competed. It is a summary of Canada's obligations towards imperial defence:

To summarize briefly Canada's defence problems, the following are the principal roles which her defence forces must be designed to meet.

(i) The local defence of her own territory;
(ii) The defence of her neutrality;
(iii) The despatch of an overseas contingent as a contribution towards the defence of the British Commonwealth of Nations;
(iv) The support of the League of Nations in the application of sanctions in so far as the interests of Canada appear.

In addition to the above defence requirements, there is the age-old problem of the preservation of law and order—otherwise known as aid to the civil power.

Then I find another interpretation; this is towards the final issue of 1936:

The purpose of Canada's defensive organization.

Conclusions of imperial conferences.

In 1923 the following principles were adopted, and were reaffirmed in 1926, while in 1930, defence matters were hardly touched upon.

(a) Each part of the empire is primarily responsible for its own local defence.
(b) The maritime communications of the empire must be adequately safeguarded.
(c) Naval bases and repair and refueling facilities must be provided.
(d) Naval strength as provided for in the Treaty of Washington should be maintained.
(e) Air forces should be developed on such lines as to facilitate cooperation between the several parts of the empire in emergency.

These principles are very general indeed, and nothing is said of the question upon which we should most desire to be enlightened, viz., our responsibilities for the collective security of the Commonwealth, which in the past has meant sending expeditionary forces. But, even though no commitment in this vital matter was made, and though no principle concerning it was laid down, we may be sure that it could never have been absent from the thoughts of those conferring, and that all remembered that forces from all the empire stood together on the battlefields of the great war, and felt that should another such danger arise, they would stand together again. I submit, therefore, that we in Canada should plan our defensive organization so that if another part of the empire needs our armed help, we can send a proper force, just as we confidently expect armed aid from other parts of the empire if we ever need it.

This unwritten principle, and the five affirmed in the 1923 imperial conference will have to guide us in deciding what defence forces we should have.

The CHAIRMAN: I regret to interrupt the hon. member for Vancouver North, but he has exceeded his time.

Mr. HEAPS: If I say a few words, the hon. member, will, I suppose, be allowed to proceed?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Having said a few words, I yield to the hon. member.

Mr. MacNEIL: I suggest to the minister that, whatever he may say in this chamber, from all that appears in the published statements of senior officers, from their articles in this and other publications, and from their statements to the public, they are proceeding on the assumption that Canadian opinion will demand the dispatch of an expeditionary force overseas. Time and again they have referred to the historical precedents. The late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, although opposed to our participation in overseas wars, and stating time and again that we should keep ourselves from the vortex of European militarism, found his opinion overruled by an upsurge of public sentiment. Again, in 1914, these issues were determined by public sentiment. That sentiment demanded the dispatch of an expeditionary force overseas; and these officers proceed on the assumption that in the developing struggle the same will be demanded of the Canadian government.

I am not basing my argument solely on the statements of senior officers. May I say, though, that these military experts say that Canada could very easily send over not only the 500,000 men recruited during the last war but probably double that number, and that the framework of the military establishment should be reconstructed for an expeditionary force of that size. Hitherto the ratio of distribution as between land, naval and air forces has been 2:1:1, and now the minister gives priority of arrangement to the air force, as appears in his statement of yesterday. At page 1647 of Hansard he says:

> A certain amount of priority has been established after deliberation: first, for the air services; secondly, for naval defence; and, thirdly, in regard to the repairing of deficiencies in equipment of militia services, permanent and non-permanent.

That does not suggest any concentration on coastal defence. Concentration on the defence problem which I have suggested is strictly concentration on a coastal defence problem. Furthermore, I hope the minister will explain the reduction in certain items and the increases in others in the main estimates that he has brought down. In the estimate for the non-permanent active militia there is an increase of $318,336, and in the estimate for the permanent force, an increase of $217,110. But in the estimate for engineering services and works there is a decrease of $1,170,000, and in the estimate for general stores a decrease of $2,106,252. There you have an accentuation of the ratio, which suggests preparations for an expeditionary force. If we are dealing with coastal defence, surely it is important to provide that equipment which is necessary for such defence. Those items in which decreases are made are those from which we might reasonably expect—if I am wrong the minister will correct me—the purchase of guns for fixed batteries and the equipping of the coast with anti-aircraft guns.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The whole trouble is the question of delivery, as I explained yesterday.

Mr. MacNEIL: Yes, I noted the statement the minister made. Surely coastal defence requires reasonable provision along these lines —mines and mine sweepers, fixed batteries at strategic points supported by a small mobile land force, and anti-aircraft guns, with precision range-finding devices. If we are thinking of the defence of our coasts and our ports, certainly we should make every effort to keep abreast of technological progess in this respect. But the question that I should like the minister to answer is: Why priority to the establishment of an air force? The observations of every prominent officer with regard to recent war manoeuvres and operations have shown that aircraft, even in squadrons, no longer provide effective defence against air raids. No longer are they a defensive weapon. I am not giving my own opinion; officer after officer, observing events in Spain, where a full-dress rehearsal for the next war is being held, has declared that no longer can pursuit or bombing planes offer effective resistance against raiding squadrons, their chief value being in the work of reprisals. They damage the effectiveness of opposing forces in so far as they are able to raid the aerodromes and destroy enemy aeroplanes while on the ground. And the reasons are obvious, as any military man knows. The increased speed of raiding squadrons with modern planes is such that interception by defending planes is almost impossible. The chances of successful interception are practically negligible. There is very seldom an opportunity for the defence planes to take to the air and attain a sufficient altitude in time for effective defence. In short, the air forces do not offer that defence in those raids, against which the minister says we must have protection. Their chief value is in cooperation with the land and naval forces in reconnaissance work, and even there their effectiveness is limited. It is difficult, therefore, to understand why priority is given to the air force in the defence program, when we know that in Canada we shall have no opportunity for making reprisals on enemy nations; it would be impossible.

Mr. FRASER: What about attacking warships?

Mr. MacNEIL: Even there, if I might quote the experts who have recently published opinions on the question, aircraft are of little value. For reconnaissance purposes they are excellent, but the minister is suggesting the absolute priority of the air service. I say, therefore, that he should have no ground for complaint if in many quarters in Canada he is told, "You are building up those forces which can most readily be shipped at the shortest possible notice to other parts of the world if required."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is not the reason for it, I can assure my hon. friend.

Mr. MacNEIL: I am glad to hear the minister say so, but he should have no ground for complaint if suspicion is aroused. I had hoped he would give priority to coastal defence in the strict sense.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Both the expansion of the air force and the small expansion of the naval services and also the militia services are designed for coastal defence, the three in cooperation.

Mr. MacNEIL: In the main estimates there is an increased expenditure for the army. Again I say it is difficult to understand why there is a definite emphasis on priority for the air force. Considering the fact that we are developing a trans-Canada service and training pilots, using planes which might be readily converted into war machines, there is still less reason for priority for the air force in the defence estimates. Certainly the provision for the skeleton of a large and highly mechanized army is not necessary in coastal defence work until we are confronted with the danger of an invading force strong enough to penetrate some distance inland.

I would ask the minister again how far he has proceeded with reorganization of the military defence department. I hope he will give some statement in that regard. In the first session he outlined his plans for reorganization; but apparently, for some mysterious reason, they have been brought to a halt. If he is thinking solely of the defence of the Canadian shores, it is difficult to understand why he maintains thirteen military district headquarters in Canada in addition to military headquarters at Ottawa. For purposes of coastal defence there could be eastern and western headquarters in addition to Ottawa, and suitable training centres at various points across the dominion. But here we have an amazing duplication of services at enormous cost right across the dominion.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There are not thirteen; one is numbered thirteen, but there are not thirteen.

Mr. MacNEIL: How many are there?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Speaking from memory I think there are eleven.

Mr. MacNEIL: I accept the correction.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Eleven, with military headquarters in Ottawa.

Mr. MacNEIL: I fail to see the necessity for expensive and elaborate armouries for coastal defence. I think the time has gone by when they serve any useful purpose in training our men to meet the defence emergencies which we shall probably have to meet. Training centres of another kind are necessary, as I think the minister knows very well. The maintenance of these large numbers of units is a tremendous duplication. This is a cause of complaint, not from me or from outsiders but from officers of the force who are interested in efficiency and are endeavouring to follow the principles of modern mechanized warfare and defence. I cannot see how these expenditures can be any longer justified. I found the answer to that in some statements published by senior officers, pointing to the fact that originally our militia establishment was organized to meet the threat of invasion from across the United States boundary. That guided the founding of our military establishment, and we have religiously followed that routine ever since, when there is no longer need even to consider defence against our good neighbour to the south. Surely that establishment is obsolete. We see here and in many other respects what they themselves call the "dead hand" of tradition, from which we suffered at the outbreak of the war. I am reminded that at the outbreak of the last war some staff officers took the ground that it was improper for a British officer and gentleman to use a trench periscope to discover what was before the trench. They said it was improper for an officer to use a mechanical device from a position of security to obtain information. There is much of that "dead hand" of tradition in the department, much that is obsolete with relation to defence, and much that could be justified only as preparation to participate in an external war.

Another matter which gives me grave concern, particularly with regard to the assumptions of the officers, is our present status in regard to self-government in these matters. The minister referred to the Balfour declaration, that we are "equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of domestic or foreign policy, united in common allegiance to the crown." I would ask the government to give reality to that declaration as far as it is possible at this time, and to the provisions of the Statute of Westminster, and, what is still more important, to give reality to the assurances given to this parliament last session that there are no commitments; that parliament will decide in all these matters and in all respects the issues of war.

Apart from the constitutional requirement, if we are to be frank and honest with ourselves this evening, we must admit that if Great Britain were involved in war to-morrow, we are at war; we would have very little to say about the matter.

Mr. MARTIN: By no means.

Mr. MacNEIL: I shall give my reasons. We are bound by the decisions of Downing street. One man has said, and quite properly, that this is an offence to any conception of our democratic rights.

Mr. MARTIN: We are bound, not constitutionally but by international law.

Mr. MacNEIL: There is grave doubt on that. There is a fundamental difference of opinion. I could bring quotations from Berriedale Keith, Professor Corbett, and other constitutional authorities to prove my statement that there is doubt as to the constitutional position, as to our freedom to claim a separate right of neutrality. The fact that that doubt exists is all the more reason why we should now clear up any uncertainty. I am not arguing the constitutional aspect now, but I say we should face it as a practical issue that when Great Britain is at war, we are at war. If to-morrow morning Great Britain is at war, Canada is at war.

Mr. MARTIN: Surely the hon. gentleman will admit that that must be qualified.

Mr. MacNEIL: I shall endeavour to show my reasons for that statement. In spite of the constitutional provision which has been made for us to claim full autonomy, I point out that a full measure of autonomy has not yet been claimed with respect to the right of neutrality. As one writer has said, one cabinet responsible to one party in one parliament out of seven commits all the members of the commonwealth to war. That, I say, is contrary to our conception of democracy. We should claim, as far as it is possible to claim for ourselves the right of neutrality, the right to give reality to the assurances made to this parliament by the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. FRASER: The hon. member will not accept the assurances when they are made.

Mr. MacNEIL: There is another important consideration which has not been cleared up, under constitutional law. If to-morrow his majesty is declared in a state of war with another nation, we are forbidden under constitutional law to trade with enemy subjects. It will become a criminal matter.

Mr. MARTIN: That is not true—not under constitutional law.

Mr. MacNEIL: That is under constitutional law. This is in effect the automatic application of economic sanctions against the nations at war with his majesty. That point has not yet been cleared up. May I indicate the position in regard to our consular services, which places us in a difficult situation. In only three countries have we ministers of our own. In the other countries, possibly the capitals of potential enemy nations, when the British ambassador is withdrawn, there is no one to represent Canada's interests, and as far as that country is concerned Canada quite properly would be considered at war. I point out to my hon. friend that last session a return was brought down showing that Canada has contractual obligations to maintain naval bases for his majesty's ships at Esquimalt and Halifax.

Mr. MARTIN: There is a difference between contractual and constitutional obligations.

Mr. MacNEIL: I am dismissing for the moment the consideration of constitutional aspects. At another time I may attempt to deal with the constitutional difficulties involved. I say that as a matter of reality, these are considerations which destroy any hope of claiming for ourselves the right of neutrality. I am not suggesting that we should attempt to make a prior declaration of neutrality and bind parliament; but I am suggesting that it is in line with the constitutional developments of recent years, with our status of self-government, with the Balfour declaration and the provisions of the Statute of Westminster, that we should be able to claim for ourselves the right of neutrality. I know there are some difficult problems to work out in that regard; but let us be under no illusion; as matters stand now, we are bound by the decisions of Downing street, and that position is repugnant to the average Canadian.

That is all strengthened by the close working relationship between our general staff and the imperial War Office. Our men are trained in the "higher imperial strategy," trained for cooperation in a common empire emergency. A permanent force officer in Canada is required to-day to pass the same examination, set and corrected by the same authorities, as an officer of corresponding rating in the British army. So that an officer of definite rank in the forces of one part of the commonwealth could be employed, either in time of peace or in war, in any appointment of similar rank in the forces of any other portion of the commonwealth. There is a Canadian air liaison officer in London with offices at the air ministry. And we have the common use of organization, equipment, establishments and training manuals issued by the Admiralty, the War Office and the Air Ministry of the United Kingdom. There is direct correspondence between our staff and the staff of the United Kingdom and the staffs of the defence ministries of the other dominions. There is a periodic exchange of liaison letters between the chiefs of staff of the British and dominions services. There is the attachment of Canadian officers to units in Great Britain. Last session the minister brought down a return in that regard, but I know that number has been increased. In addition to those on exchange, who number perhaps eight or ten or twelve at a time, last year there were seventy odd officers in training in Great Britain, and in January of this year there were approximately ninety of our officers and men receiving training under the imperial authorities.

Mr. FRASER: Do I understand that the hon. member does not agree that we should maintain naval bases in Canada available to British naval ships? Does my hon. friend object to the exchange of officers between Canada and Great Britain?

Mr. MacNEIL: Perhaps I did not make my point clear to my hon. friend. I was not expressing disagreement with the maintenance of naval bases. I say that when the minister states to the committee that we have no commitments, I have a right to say that the contractual obligation to which I have referred is a commitment which destroys any hope of neutrality in the event of Great Britain being engaged in a war. May I point out further that when the Union of South Africa, by the passage of several acts, attempted to claim the separate right of neutrality, the very thing which hindered that attempt was the maintenance of the naval base at Simon's Town. That is an illustration in point. I am not attempting to suggest what is right or what is wrong. I am arguing that this is a time for complete frankness with regard to these commitments.

Mr. FRASER: It is a good thing the hon. member has not the dictation of the policies of this country.

Mr. MacNEIL: Perhaps it is, but my hon. friend knows that I have a perfect right to rise in my place and state my opinion; and, as my hon. friend also knows, my opinion is shared by many others, who feel that we want complete frankness in regard to this matter.

Mr. FRASER: The hon. member is getting it, but he does not believe it when it is given him.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Let the hon. gentleman make his speech later on, if he knows how.

Mr. MacNEIL: I am not suggesting or advancing an anti-British argument.

Mr. FRASER: It sounds like it.

Mr. MacNEIL: May I point out to my hon. friend that I was born in Canada. I am a British subject, and I am not ashamed of my opinions in this regard. I did my stint of service in the war, together with my comrades in this house. If the hon. gentleman cares to bring my loyalty into question, he may do so, but I shall let my record speak for itself. I have endeavoured to make it clear—and I have not uttered an offensive word while doing so—that I am not advancing an anti-British policy. As was said by the Minister of Pensions and National Health, whom I quoted a moment ago, I am a Canadian and view these matters as a Canadian. But I realize that, in the final analysis, these matters affect Canada vitally and must be worked out not on the basis of false sentiment or any mawkish patriotism, but on the basis of national interest. The day has long gone by when people in this country say, "Britain is my country; Canada is my home." I say that due to the constitutional developments in which we take such pride in this house, Canada is our country, and we are responsible for the development of Canadian policies in this regard. So I am pointing out, as well as I am capable of doing, the grounds giving rise to suspicion and uneasiness in this country at this time.

These relationships exist. Of that there is abundant evidence, and they constitute tacit commitments. The greatest commitment of all lies in the fact that we have not relinquished that constitutional relationship, the constitutional law, which willy-nilly compels us automatically to apply economic sanctions against the subjects of those nations which may be at war with his majesty. That is a matter of constitutional law. All these things I say constitute commitments, and I feel that it is our responsibility to face the issues frankly and discover, in line with democratic traditions in Canada, just where we stand. We should know where we stand. As I said before, it is not good enough to leave these matters for settlement until we succumb to war hysteria. Then, in the event of war, of course to discuss any such matter as this would be secession, and I am not for one moment arguing for separation from the empire. I say this at this time, with all due sense of responsibility, that throughout Canada there is a growing and profound distrust of the policy of the present British government, and that does not mean disloyalty to British traditions or to the sentiments of the British people. Sometimes there is a vast difference between the policies of a British government and the wishes of the British people. Perhaps I may not with propriety attack the British government in this house to-night; but this fact is I think, clear, that the policies which they are following to-day are not in strict accordance with the mandate which they secured from the British people in 1935.

There are some reasons for this distrust. This is one: The British government has not given us any clear assurance of its intention to support a plan of collective security to stop aggression or to lay the basis for a collective peace. That assurance has not been given, and that is an important reason for the growing distrust. Many say quite freely that the recent statements of the British Prime Minister—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Speaking of collective security, may I say to my hon. friend that for a long time I have been a great supporter of this principle. But how can he get collective security, and can he hope for collective security as a protection, when some of the largest powers in the world refuse to join in any scheme of collective security?

Mr. MacNEIL: For the moment I am not arguing for collective security, and I realize as well as does the Minister of Justice, that there is not much hope of effective action under the present collective security plan. But I think he will agree that we should not abandon the ideal of a collective peace policy for the world, and that while the league perhaps has failed—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Meanwhile we cannot rely on it.

[Mr. MacNeil.]

Mr. MacNEIL: Even if the league has failed, we should not abandon it entirely; for it may provide a rallying point for world opinion. But let us be under no illusion as to the mistakes which have been made by the league, and for those mistakes the great powers must accept responsibility; for the league could not function without the consent of the great powers, principally Great Britain. However, I shall not attempt to elaborate these reasons to-night. I have my own opinion as to that; but it is clear, I think, from the experiences of Ethiopia, Spain and China, that when the great powers might have stood by some form of collective action in restraint of aggression, no effort was made to do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say this to my hon. friend: Is he quite sure that other nations which assumed an obligation in regard to collective security were equally prepared to play the part Great Britain was prepared to play in enforcing it? The hon. gentleman is putting it all on the shoulders of Great Britain. I am inclined to think that Great Britain was quite prepared to do all she could to further the doctrine of collective security, but she was not equally sure as to the support she would receive from some others.

Mr. MacNEIL: I think the Prime Minister is right in some respects, but not entirely so. There were other powers who shared the responsibility for the failure of the league, it is true; but British statesmen at Stresa, as the record now shows, were well aware of Mussolini's intentions with regard to Ethiopia, and at that time they gave no indication that they disapproved. It was not until the peace ballot was held in Great Britain in 1935 that the British government attempted to restrain Mussolini. The Prime Minister well remembers the statements made in the British House of Commons at the time Japan first contemplated its raid into Manchuria, when prominent supporters of the British government attempted to defend the action of Japan, and so on.

I cannot see how anyone can defend the actions of the British government with regard to Spain. The non-intervention pact has proved to be a farce. It has not limited the area of conflict or protected democracy. I know there is a difference of opinion on this matter, but many people feel that to-day the British government is not truly representative of the opinion of the British people. Of course, the truth of this will be determined at the polls, but this is one of the reasons for the growing distrust. There is no likelihood that the next war will come as a result of any attempt to maintain collective action in restraint of aggression. The next war will come when the great powers determine that they must defend their imperialist interests.

I shall not take up the time of the committee any longer, but I should like to deal for a moment with the constitutional difficulties of our relationships within the commonwealth. It would be difficult to justify Canadian participation in any external war on any basis or for any cause, even in defence of the commonwealth. We must consider that, in the event of trouble, the British navy will be engaged, not on one but on three or four fronts. To dispatch troops overseas from this dominion might be a magnificent gesture of empire solidarity, but in my opinion and in the opinion of many military experts it would be nothing less than sheer nonsense. Great Britain could not divert sufficient naval strength successfully to convoy troops across the oceans.

Furthermore, as has been pointed out forcibly in The Economist recently, the protection of our resources are of vital consequence to the commonwealth. To dispatch an expeditionary force of five, six or seven hundred thousand men, three or four divisions, would certainly definitely wreck our defences in Canada and at the same time invite reprisals from abroad. These are matters that must be taken into consideration when we consider any preparation for participation in an external war. In spite of this, there is the presumption that we must prepare for overseas war. What will be the position of Canada should we engage in an external war in which the United States is not definitely concerned? Canada's position would be a most unhappy one, particularly in view of the recent neutrality legislation of the United States. There would be considerable difficulty in attempting to finance a war in which Great Britain was engaged without access to Wall Street credit. We would jeopardize our economic life if all the commodities purchased in the United States were placed on a cash and carry basis, because at the same time our sea-borne trade across the Atlantic and the Pacific would be handicapped and interfered with. Consider the results upon our relations with the United States of attempting to force the rights of belligerency against neutral shipping. We cannot afford to have anything in the semblance of a rupture with the United States, and that would certainly occur if we engaged in a war which would not be considered by that country as one of self-defence.

I think this was recognized by Great Britain when she accepted naval parity with the United States and when, in effect, she agreed to share with that country the responsibility of defending the sea lanes across the northern Atlantic and Pacific. What is still more important, this means that Great Britain is depending upon the permanence of friendly relations with the United States. From the practical standpoint we cannot safely engage in a war such as would jeopardize these relationships. Sentiment is all very fine; but, as one writer has said, geography is always with us. It would be the greatest tragedy, not only for Canada but for the British commonwealth, to have these relationships jeopardized in any way. I suggest that, as a matter of defence and to prevent this undermining of our natural advantages, we should give first consideration to the first line of defence, that is, our external relations.

In my opinion we have not done all that might be done in this connection. The reason I brought up the question of our relationship within the empire is that it is essential that Canada should gain freedom of action if we are to make an effective contribution to world peace. There must be freedom of action within the commonwealth. As far as I can interpret the report of the imperial conference of last summer, that issue was to the fore. Australia certainly suggested a non-aggression pact. It was clearly understood that South Africa probably might not be interested in a non-aggression pact on the Pacific. There was a definite suggestion that there should be a regional regrouping within the empire as determined by geographical requirements. I think it is clear from the statement made last year by the Prime Minister that Canada did not accept any definite commitments, because our policy must be determined in a large measure by our relationship with and proximity to the United States. I think the time has come when we should be given greater freedom of action.

Freedom of action does not mean separation from the commonwealth. It would mean an escape from what appears now to be an attempt to enforce artificial unity within the empire. One scheme of empire defence is something that is not consistent with the practical requirements of the situation. Freedom of action such as I have suggested would open the way for natural development of policy, for cooperation and association in those matters in which we are mutually interested, and for the entry into a definite international enterprise leading to a collective peace policy. I am not suggesting that we have any strength as a military nation or that we should do other than the Prime Minister has suggested, that is, take a back seat in measures of coercion. As a trading nation we have economic importance, and I think on that basis we can make a definite contribution to economic appeasement and international cooperation. I hope that during this discussion the minister will make it quite clear that nothing exists in the way of tacit commitments—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I can make it clear now; there is none.

Mr. MacNEIL: —that there are no tacit commitments which will put us in a position where we could not withdraw from participation in an external war.

Mrs. MARTHA LOUISE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Chairman, what we have heard from every side during the past few weeks reminds me of what we heard just over a quarter of a century ago. I remember being in the Yukon at that time of rumours of war and saying to my husband, "Do you believe what Borden is saying, that there is a danger of war?" My husband replied, "Personally I do not believe it, but the Prime Minister says there is danger of war, and if I follow him I must believe what he says." So, when I hear the government say that we must prepare for eventualities, I am led to believe that the government in power must know that we have to prepare for eventualities which may not happen, which we hope will not happen, but at the same time we must be ready.

This is the third session that I have been in the house. I have refrained in the two previous sessions from taking any part in the debate on the militia estimates. I had to. My youngest son was in the regular army; my oldest son was a naval reservist in the United States forces, and I felt that under no circumstances could I say anything which would lead anybody to believe that I was inclined to a military mind, because I was not. I consider that I am an average woman and an average mother. I brought up my children to obey discipline and orders when the discipline and orders were necessary. I did not bring them up to be cannon fodder; I brought them up with the idea that if a country is good enough to live in, it is not only good enough to live in but good enough to die for if we have to die for it. None of us wants to. We all want to live. We all want to enjoy the sunshine and God's free air; but at the same time I believe every thinking man and woman want to feel, if the call comes, that they are ready. The call might come for one of us to fight; the call might come for another to remain on the farm; the call might come for another to cook, to do all sorts of menial labour; but as men and women, when that call comes, we must be ready. I do not doubt this for one moment.

In preparing for war, for the horrible eventuality as it is nowadays, we are doing as we do when we take out a life insurance policy, or fire or burglary insurance. For years and years I have kept on paying insurance, not that I expected my house to burn, not that I expected to die immediately, not that I expected burglars to enter; but at the same time I was going to be ready, and I think the minister in his speech has made it quite clear that he wants to be ready in case of a horrible eventuality.

We in the north have felt until the last few years that we were free from fear; but now when I go to my door in the summer and look overhead and see perhaps twelve or fourteen aeroplanes in the air at one time; when I hear over the radio five minutes after a crime has happened in China, that it has happened, I think, What may this all mean to me? What may this all mean to those of us on the outposts of the empire if we are not prepared, if we are not careful? Heaven knows I do not want war. I do not want to go through what I went through in London for three and a half years, when I listened to the shrieking sirens and saw the aeroplanes and those horrible zeppelins on fire and falling in flames, with many men jumping from them. I do not want to see that again. I do not want to visit those hospitals again and see men and boys near and dear to me, as I saw so many. But with the dictators to-day doing as they are, can we do anything but prepare and be ready for what may come to us? We have a country to the south of us which in self-defence will help us; but if she helps us she expects us to help her, and we have all been taught that the Lord helps those who help themselves.

I perhaps may not always agree with everything the minister may say, but at the same time I know him to be a cautions, canny Scot. I know he is not going to rush us into an expenditure of life or money unless it is absolutely necessary, and so with all my heart and soul, while praying that there may be no further trouble in this country, I shall support him.

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I sincerely trust that the hon. member for the Yukon (Mrs. Black), who is not only an hon. member but, I trust she will allow me to say, also a lovable one, will permit me to extend to her my very sincere congratulations upon her excellent speech. If I do not spend any time in discussing her important statement, it will not be because I do not regard it as having a proper place in this discussion.

I feel, in taking part in this debate, that there is the difficulty of making sure not only that one's words and phrases are well chosen but that one's temper as well is held in proper restraint. I think the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), who spoke preceding the hon. member for the Yukon, is likewise deserving of congratulations upon a speech which revealed a great deal of research and, if I may suggest, a speech which can be differentiated from the one he made last year in discussing this matter by a display of good temper, which I shall endeavour to follow. He presented a point of view almost the direct opposite of that presented by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey), and I think my contribution can best be made by an analysis of these two points of view.

First of all, the hon. member for Greenwood made a speech that should occasion sincere congratulations for the manner in which it was delivered, and if I do not agree with its content it will not be because I have not a high regard for the hon. member. I suspect that he was dominated essentially this afternoon, not by a lack of appreciation of the seriousness of the problem, but by the difficulty that while, on the one hand, he wanted to agree with the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), he did not find it a wise expedient in all the circumstances to do so. When he said the present estimates are inadequate, he gave us one indication that those who say they are wholly adequate will find themselves with at least one opponent. But if these defence estimates are inadequate, surely there is a responsibility on the part of the hon. member to indicate in what respect.

Mr. MASSEY: I did.

Mr. MARTIN: Well, he did? The hon. member made generalizations. He referred to the fact that the Statute of Westminster had imposed upon us as a nation responsibilities which were not being lived up to in the level of the present estimates. The Minister of National Defence is guided by experts; it is to be assumed that he is carrying out their recommendations, and I do not believe it is in the interests of a solution of this problem to take an extreme view in respect of either higher estimates or lower estimates.

Again, may I suggest this, that when the hon. member for Vancouver North was speaking, and again when the minister was speaking—and I say this as one who has no pretensions at being a soldier—I felt like making an interjection as to the wisdom of discussing in this chamber details of our military operations or of our armed strength. Surely there is another place for that, and there should not be in this chamber a discussion of details of this kind. Parliament is the place to discuss policy. Parliament is the place to discuss the foreign policy upon which the present estimates, inadequate or adequate, should be based.

Regarding the charge of inadequacy made by the hon. member for Greenwood, we might as well face the realization that this country could not adequately defend itself in a major conflict. I do not know whether the Minister of National Defence would agree with this statement, but I believe there is no question that in the event of a serious war on any front this dominion could not hope adequately by itself to defend itself, and the level of defence which we now have must largely be dictated by that circumstance. I certainly disagree with the hon. member for Greenwood when he says now that we are a nation; now that we are a member of the family of states, the stamp of our nationhood should be determined by our military, naval or air strength.

Mr. MASSEY: I made no such statement.

Mr. MARTIN: If the hon. member says he did not, I suggest that he should reread his speech.

Mr. MASSEY: I have.

Mr. MARTIN: I have before me his actual words. If I misunderstood the hon. member, I certainly withdraw what I have said. Assuming that he is correct in his correction of me, and speaking generally, I repeat surely that is not the test of nationhood. It may have been at one time part of the concept of sovereignty, but to-day we are not to be characterized as a nation in proportion to our armed strength.

With regard to what the hon. member for Vancouver North has had to say, I could not help noting that there was a great change in his attitude this year as compared with last, not only as regards temper but with respect to what I may call a tacit acceptance of these defence estimates. He spoke of tacit commitments, and he gave me the impression that he had tacitly although reluctantly declared himself in support of these estimates, although perhaps he would have preferred to see them distributed in a different manner. I do not think the hon. member is doing justice to the committee, to the problem or to our people, in saying, what has been inferred on several occasions during the present session, that there is a suppression of debate in respect of foreign policy. Before I resume my seat, I propose to make some statements with which, I am sure, the government will not altogether agree. There is no restraint upon me in making these observations, any more than there is a restraint on the hon. gentleman opposite. What the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has indicated in the leadership that he has given in this matter is simply that which characterizes all public assemblies throughout the world at the present time, that whatever we say should be stated not without some serious consideration of what is to be said, not without some serious appreciation likewise of the intensity of the present situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend might add—and how what is said here will be construed elsewhere.

Mr. MARTIN: And how what is said here may be construed elsewhere. I think that addition is proper. I share in no less a manner what the hon. member has said by way of characterization of the deplorable situation in which the world now finds itself. There is no question that this view is shared by every hon. member. The fact that the heads of certain states, particularly the totalitarian states, are able, by the employment of force, not only to violate covenants and treaty obligations but to violate the whole tradition of the post-war world, should not prevent a clear recognition of a fait accompli, or preclude an attempt to deal with foreign policy in the light of those facts.

What we in this chamber should not fail to do is to make a differentiation of function. In this house the hon. member for Vancouver North is not speaking as a professor or as a mere student of the problem; he is speaking as a member of parliament. What he states here should be from a different point of view from what he would say if he were in the lecture hall of a university or making a public lecture apart from his responsibility as a member of parliament. I mention this in order to set out what I think is the position of the Prime Minister in this respect. The Secretary of State for External Affairs in this country, like the minister of foreign affairs in any other country, is charged at this time, not with what ought to be, not with what has been, but with what is. The conduct of foreign affairs, then, is definitely related to questions of expediency, of commitments in the interests of peace. By that I do not mean that "peace at any price" should always be the excuse of those charged with the conduct of foreign affairs. I agree that one has some justification in such an instance to ask if peace at any price, does mean peace.

[Mr. Martin.]

The hon. member for Vancouver North this year, as last, has spoken of commitments. It will be remembered that when he made that charge last year, I asked him: Against which countries are we committed to prosecute a war of aggression? And on the basis of his speech to-night he can speak only of a war of aggression. Against what countries are we preparing to fight? Against the United States? Against Japan? Against France? Are we preparing to fight Germany? The hon. member has a responsibility as a member of parliament, and in his sincere approach to the problem I think he should be in a position to give an answer to a question of this kind. The fact that we have defences to the extent we have is in itself no implication, open or covert, that we have commitments. Further than that, it seems to me that unless public life in this country has been reduced to a negligible quantity, we should assume that, when the Prime Minister speaks, and when his ministers speak and give us repeated assurances of the sort that the Minister of Defence has given to-night, we should accept them.

I propose to recall to the committee the statement of the Prime Minister at Geneva a year and a half ago. As far as I can recall, it has never been placed on Hansard. I myself heard him speak from the tribune of the League of Nations. The British delegation, made up, as I believe it then was, of Lord Halifax, Mr. Eden, Mr. Malcolm Macdonald and Mr. Morrison, Viscount Cranborne and Mr. Shakespeare being present as alternate delegates, were seated in the assembly of the league along with representatives of the greater powers and other countries. What was the statement the Prime Minister made? It was not made in this parliament in the absence of the British ministers. It was not made simply to foreign ministers with the British ministers absent. It was made in the presence of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs and the then leader of the government in the House of Lords now the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Our Prime Minister stated to them and to the world that Canada had no commitments with any unit or with any body, and in respect of a conflict she reserved for herself through her parliament what she would do in the case of war. Surely a serious declaration of that sort, pitted against the statement of the hon. member for Vancouver North, clearly indicates that if it is a question of accepting words, there is no question as to what this house or this country will do.

Mr. COLDWELL: Can the hon. member tell us what the Prime Minister said in Paris?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall tell the hon. gentleman that myself, in due time. May I say that the meeting at Geneva to which my hon. friend is referring was the year before last.

Mr. MARTIN: The Prime Minister is able to speak for himself; I do not want to assume the role of Prime Minister.

An hon. MEMBER: Not yet.

Mr. MARTIN: Well, one can never tell. Not only at Geneva, but in a speech delivered in Canada again after his return, and during last session, time and time again the Prime Minister has stated the traditional policy in this respect of successive Canadian governments. One thing we may be satisfied about at the present time in Canada is that all political parties who have yet assumed office have agreed on one fundamental. The hon. member for Vancouver North has said that we must at least have a foreign policy upon which we can base our estimates, and he is quite right. It is in the examination of our foreign policy that I propose to make my reply to him to-night.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier, speaking in this chamber in 1900, said:

> Whilst I cannot admit that Canada should take part in all the wars of Great Britain, neither am I prepared to say that she should not take part in any war at all. I am prepared to look upon each case upon its merits as it arises. . . . I claim for Canada this, that in the future Canada shall be at liberty to act or not to act, to interfere or not to interfere, to do just as she pleases, and that she shall reserve to herself the right to judge whether or not there is cause for her to act.

That was in 1900, and that was the first declaration in this chamber by a prime minister of Canada on this problem. Sir John A. Macdonald had declared himself in equal terms if not more violently outside this chamber, though I am confining myself to statements made by prime ministers in this house. Compare that statement with that of the present prime minister delivered at the League of Nations session in Geneva, the ninth plenary meeting on September 29, 1936:

> The Canadian House of Commons, by unanimous resolution, has made the adoption of undertakings to apply either military or economic sanctions subject to the approval of parliament.
> What I have said and quoted does not mean that in no circumstances would the Canadian people be prepared to share in action against an aggressor; there have been no absolute commitments either for or against participation in war or other forms of force. It does mean that any decision on the part of Canada to participate in war will have to be taken by the parliament or people of Canada in the light of all existing circumstances; circumstances of the day as they exist in Canada, as well as in the areas involved.

I have taken some time and some pains to reiterate this aspect of the problem. But in the face of these pronouncements, how can any hon. member in this house or anyone outside say that we have commitments, tacit or explicit, with any country? One examines the argument of the hon. member for Vancouver North and it is this: Since we are members of the British Empire—and he might as well have applied it to the League of Nations; he might as well have said, "Since we are members of the League of Nations," or "Since we are a North American country"—these very affiliations constitute in themselves commitments tacit or explicit. That is what his argument amounts to. But the mere fact that we are members of the British Empire, members of the League of Nations; the mere fact that we are a north American country, neighbour to a great republic, one of the great powers of the world—do these facts, and these facts alone, constitute commitments?

Mr. MacNEIL: I was referring simply to commitments for military action abroad.

Mr. MARTIN: That is what I am referring to; we are discussing military estimates. If that is the only reply which the hon. member has to give, I take it that my interpretation of what he has said is correct.

The view of Professor Underhill in this matter is as valuable as the view of the Minister of Pensions. In this case, neither view is worth anything. They are the views of individual men. I sat in conference last May with Professor Underhill for a week discussing the problem, and there were present not only Professor Underhill but other distinguished academic people, most of whom I suspect are supporters of the group to which my hon. friend belongs. While we took no vote—as he well knows from this document which I cannot quote; I can only refer to it; I cannot discuss it because of the auspices by which it is distributed the majority took issue with Professor Underhill because they were unwilling then, in the face of the world uncertainty, to pass dogmatically upon the question in the manner in which Professor Underhill so often does; and I say that without being unkind to a man for whom I have the highest regard personally and intellectually

There is a great tendency in Canada to say that we have no foreign policy and that, consequently, since Canada has no foreign policy, there is a responsibility upon the administration of the day to declare its policy in respect of the situation in Europe, the situation in Spain—and I mention Spain with emphasis—the situation in China, Japan, and elsewhere. Well, I suggest that in approaching this problem we should divide it into two. With respect to the period following the war until two years ago, I would share almost entirely the criticism levelled by the hon. member for Vancouver North; but as regards the period since then, looking at the realities of the situation, as one must in parliament, I submit that one must take these later developments into consideration. At the Canadian-American Conference held at Queen's University last summer I sought to make this distinction in replying to the very excellent presentation of Doctor Dafoe, one of the most profound students of International Affairs in Canada.

As to the first period let me say I am not going to deny that the present disturbance, the present uncertainty, in Europe, might have been avoided by courageous statesmanship, by a belief in the League of Nations, actively, as well as in form and theory. I do not deny that. I shall never forget when I attended for the first time an assembly of the League of Nations in 1929. It was the last appearance of the then Chancellor of Germany, Doctor Gustav Stresemann, one of the greatest of modern Germans and one of the most peace loving men of modern Europe. Standing before the Assembly of the League of Nations, with tears running down his cheeks, the victim of a fatal disease, a dead man soon afterwards, and turning and addressing himself particularly to Aristide Briand, then Minister of Foreign Affairs, he said in substance:

Unless the world will recognize the injustices of the peace treaties; unless it will recognize that you cannot in this day of economic and political interdependence strangle one country in the hope that other countries will benefit, someone will come in my place; someone will come in as head of the German people and will be able to play upon these injustices in these peace treaties, will be able to refer to the guilt clause, to the unwise occupation of the Ruhr, and all that meant in making the middle classes of Germany a fertile soil for the totalitarian ideas now current in Germany. Unless these things are done, someone will come in and will be able, by refusal to recognize his intellectual responsibility in the matter, to rouse the German people to the use of force to get these things which are denied them by a Carthaginian peace.

I do not deny all that. But that is not the picture to-day. The fact to-day is that the League of Nations, the collective security system to which the hon. member for Vancouver North has referred without defining what he meant by collective security, in respect of political action is at the moment absolutely impotent to deal with disturbances in Europe or any other part of the world. Not only that; but if one goes back to the origins of the covenant; if one reads, for instance, the life of General Smuts by Sarah Gertrude Millin, one will find that when sanctions, economic, and military as well, were provided for, it was never intended that they should apply outside the regions involved. In other words, it was never intended that military sanctions in respect of a European conflict should be enforced by countries outside Europe. That was confirmed by the Sino-Japanese dispute and the Bolivia-Paraguay affair. Sanctions in none of these instances were contemplated or even attempted on the part of any country. I merely mention that to indicate that in our talking about collective security, collective action, we must not assume that our wishes are actually embodied in the covenant of the league. Speaking as one who came out of college full of the traditions of the late war, fully convinced that if civilization were to be preserved the agencies of conference and of law had to supplant force as an instrument of national policy, and as one who to-night may perhaps be said to represent thousands of young men and women throughout this country, I say that no greater disillusionment could come to one of my generation. One must recognize the occasion for the disillusionment. That is the important point which we cannot overstress in discussing this matter.

The Minister of National Defence specified to this committee five groups that he finds in this country in respect of foreign affairs. I think those five groups are, mathematically speaking, as accurate perhaps as a mere description could be. However, I suggest to him that perhaps he will not find a majority of people entirely subscribing to his fifth group, but the majority of people doubtless come within any number of these five categories of public opinion. In respect to the last two I can find points of agreement, and I know that many thinking people in this country share the same view. If one analyses these groups and what they mean in terms of public opinion in Canada, the irresistible conclusion is that if the Prime Minister to-morrow told the house that in a given event we were going to take up arms for this or that party, he would doubtless find support in some sections of this dominion, but he would find other sections diametrically opposed. What would be the result? In an attempt to bring peace to the world, he would be causing unrest and the antithesis of peace in his own country. One could cite example after example to illustrate that. I found it so myself. Making a tour of Canada last year I went into many sections of this great dominion, and speaking frankly of these problems I found such a variety of opinion as, in some instances, to compel me to disguise my views. If that is so in the case of a private member, surely hon. members will not fail to see it as applying still more to those who form the ministry of this country.

The hon. member for Vancouver North will find me agreeing with him on at least one point, if not with his reasoning, at least with his conclusion. We should not hesitate to obtain for this country the right of neutrality. I am not saying that I agree that we should declare now what we shall do in a given instance in respect of being neutral or not being neutral. But we should have that right. Let me point out, however, that this will not remove the difficulty which the hon. member has in mind. South Africa has that legal right; yet in international law, in spite of the constitutional and legal precautions she has taken, in the event of war involving any part of the empire she would find herself likely to be considered by any belligerent as being involved in that war. Therefore, the mere right of neutrality within the present constitutional arrangement will not meet the problem.

Again I take serious issue with the hon. member for Vancouver North. Constitutionally there is no question that we have the right to be neutral in any given event. That has been gone over in this house time and time again. If the hon. member will refer to the statement of the Prime Minister, I think in 1926, on this very point, he will find there quoted the speeches of Berriedale Keith, Corbett and others whose opinions he has discussed to-night. The conclusion is that constitutionally we have the right, in case of one part of the empire being involved, to declare our neutrality. International law, however, may present a different situation. As a practical matter I suggest this, that if war took place in which Canada sought to assert the right of neutrality, if a belligerent, having in mind our empire relations or our North American affiliations, found it convenient to attack Canada, that belligerent would not hesitate to do so because of certain legal or constitutional refinements. That cannot be too clearly emphasized.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, March 28, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADA-HAYTI TRADE

APPROVAL OF AGREEMENT SIGNED ON APRIL 23, 1937

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 79, respecting a certain trade agreement between Canada and Hayti.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADA-GUATEMALA TRADE

APPROVAL OF AGREEMENT SIGNED ON SEPTEMBER 28, 1937

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 80, respecting a certain trade agreement between Canada and Guatemala.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INSURANCE COMPANIES

AMENDMENT OF CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT, 1932, AS TO INVESTMENT OF FUNDS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 81, to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

Mr. STIRLING: Explain.

Mr. DUNNING: The object of this bill is to enable Canadian insurance companies to invest in equipment trust securities of Canadian railways, and also to include among the permitted investments certain securities of public authorities of the United Kingdom and of the dominions which are not now permitted under the Insurance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NEW WESTMINSTER HARBOUR

EXTENSION TO INCLUDE SMALL AREA BETWEEN NEW WESTMINSTER AND NORTH FRASER HARBOURS

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No 82, to amend the New Westminster Harbour Commissioners Act.

He said: This bill provides for the inclusion in the New Westminster harbour of a small area of land situated between the present jurisdiction of the New Westminster harbour commissioners and the jurisdiction of the North Fraser commissioners, the land having reverted to the Department of Transport. This matter arises through a revision of the act concerning the North Fraser harbour commissioners made a few years ago. It is felt desirable that this particular area should be administered by the New Westminster harbour commissioners.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER DREDGING

Mr. BRUNELLE:

1. What was the total amount expended for dredging the St. Lawrence river, from its inception to date, as far west as Montreal?

2. Of the total amount expended what proportion was for: (a) ship channel fleet, by purchase or construction; (b) maintenance and operation; (c) repairs?

3. What amounts of money have been expended by the government at the Sorel shipyard for the fiscal years 1933-34, 1934-35, 1935-36?

4. What maximum number of men could be employed at the Sorel shipyard under government operation to give the greatest degree of efficiency?

5. What was the average number of men employed at the Sorel shipyard in the fiscal years 1933-34, 1934-35, 1935-36?

6. In what physical condition was the ship channel fleet when it was sold?

Mr. HOWE:

1. $71,352,903.14 (from 1851 to date).

2. (a) $9,247,599.00 (records only cover 1900 to date).

(b) Ship channel fleet—$51,314,402.27 (incl. cost of dredging, plant, shops, etc.); contract dredging, $20,038,500.87; total—$71,352,903.14 (since 1851).

(c) $7,039,274.38 (government fleet only, records covering from 1905 to date only).

This figure included in Ship channel fleet, Answer 2 (b).

3. 1933-34—$526,697.99; 1934-35—$575,931.46; 1935-36—$530,893.80.

4. 250.

5. 1933-34—415; 1934-35—365; 1935-36—434.

6. The St. Lawrence ship channel dredging fleet was only twenty-five per cent efficient or serviceable, the balance being obsolete. Even the twenty-five per cent considered efficient or serviceable was reaching the limit of its usefulness in the class of work to be done.

MAPLE PRODUCTS

Mr. BLANCHETTE:

1. Which year has been the record year for production of maple products, and what was the amount of pounds and gallons produced?

2. Which year has been the record year for the exportation of these products, and what was the quantity exported?

Mr. EULER:

1. The year 1929 has been the record year for production of maple products when 11,699,000 pounds of maple sugar and 2,174,000 gallons of maple syrup were produced.

2. The fiscal year ended March 31, 1930 was the record year for the exportation of maple sugar when 12,501,047 pounds were exported with a value of $2,395,863. The fiscal year ended March 31, 1936 was the record year for the exportation of maple syrup when 208,646 gallons were exported with a value of $219,363.

BRAMPTON, ONT., ARMOURIES

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. What alterations, improvements and additions, if any, will be made this year with respect to the armouries at Brampton, Ontario?

2. What is the total estimated cost of said work, and when will it commence?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1 and 2. The Department of National Defence have provided $250 to cover normal incidental repairs. An addition is under consideration.

RURAL MAIL DELIVERY

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. When was the system of rural mail delivery inaugurated in Canada?

2. What changes, if any, have been made in letting rural mail contracts since said inauguration?

3. How many rural mail routes are there now in the dominion?

4. What is the total annual contract price of said routes?

5. What percentage of the present contracts were renewed on the last expiry date? What percentage were put up for tender?

Mr. EULER (for Mr. Elliott):

1. 1908 (10th October).

2. During early development of rural mail delivery the service was confined to established mail stage routes, the contractors being paid 50 cents, 75 cents or $1.00 per box per annum in addition to the contract rate according to the frequency of the service.

When contracts for such services expired, new arrangements were made following the invitation of public tenders for service of all boxes erected on any rural mail route. This practice still maintains.

3. 4,540 on 31st December, 1937.

4. $2,722,050.57 as on 31st December, 1937.

5. (a) approximately 63.6%.

(b) approximately 36.4%.

[Mr. Blanchette.]

YOUTH TRAINING—DOMINION-ONTARIO AGREEMENT

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. Upon what date did the dominion-Ontario (youth training) agreement go into effect?

2. How many unemployed young women have entered training for household work and specialized services under schedule "C" of said agreement since the said agreement went into effect?

3. How many have finished their course of training?

4. How many are still training?

5. How many schools or training centres have been established for the above mentioned purposes, and where are they located?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. The agreement entered into with the province of Ontario with respect to youth training is effective from August 1st, 1937 to March 31st, 1938.

2. Up to February 28th, 425 young women had entered training for household work.

3. Up to February 28th, 144 had finished training and been placed in employment.

4. 188 were in training as at February 28th.

5. Seven training centres have been established one at each of the following points:—Ottawa, Toronto, Hamilton, Preston, St. Thomas, Windsor, Sarnia.

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. Since the date of dominion-Ontario (youth training) agreement, how many unemployed young men have taken advantage of the courses of training in practical farming, as provided in schedule "D" of the said agreement?

2. How many are at present with farmers under the provisions of the said agreement?

3. How many of the said trainees have completed their course of training under the supervision of farmers in the county of Peel?

4. How many of such trainees are still in training with Peel county farmers?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Up to February 28th, 115 young men have entered training in practical farming.

2. 93 were still with farmers in February.

3. and 4. The reports received from the province do not give the information by counties.

FARM LOANS—MANITOBA

Mr. WINKLER:

1. In connection with the Canadian Farm Loan Act in Manitoba, what is approximately: (a) the amount of the average first mortgage loan; (b) of second mortgage loans; (c) of legal fees per loan?

2. How do legal fees per farm loan in Manitoba compare with those of other provinces?

Mr. DUNNING: The following return is furnished by the Canadian farm loan board:

1. Based on the number and amount of loans granted down to March 31, 1937, the average amount of first mortgage loans is between $1,900 and $2,000 and the average amount of second mortgage loans is between $600 and $700.

Legal fees paid on each loan depend on the amount of the loan involved and also on the state of title and the difficulties involved in clearing title and perfecting the security for loan, these fees being payable in accordance with a scale of fees fixed by the board.

2. The tariff of legal fees payable in Manitoba also applies in the other prairie provinces. The tariff of legal fees payable under Torrens land titles registration systems, such as are operative in the prairie provinces, is lower than the tariff of fees payable under other systems of land registration where title searches present greater difficulties.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—FIGHTING PLANES AND ANTI-AIRCRAFT EQUIPMENT AND DEFENCES

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

1. What is the number of modern fighting planes equipped with the latest fighting equipment and with a cruising speed of 250 miles per hour or more in Canada?
2. What anti-aircraft equipment of the latest type have we in Canada?
3. What anti-aircraft equipment of the latest device is on order, if any?
4. What steps are proposed to be taken, if any, to equip strategic points in Canada with anti-aircraft defences?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the third question asked, it is not in the public interest to answer it, but I shall be very glad to give the hon. gentleman the information privately.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—NEW STATIONS

Mr. FERLAND:

1. Were any new stations built by the Canadian National Railways since 1930?
2. If so: (a) in what localities; and (b) what is the population of each of such localities?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

2. Total amount of such loans applied for during each of the above years;
3. Total number of loans granted in Alberta during each of the above years;
4. Total amount of such loans granted during each of the above years.

PURCHASE OF FEED AND FODDER FOR SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. PERLEY:

For a return showing, the names and addresses of persons or firms in Saskatchewan who were employed during 1937 in connection with the purchasing of feed and fodder for the province of Saskatchewan, in the province of Manitoba, or the state of Minnesota.

NATIONAL PARK IN ONTARIO

Mr. PERLEY (for Mr. Church):

For a copy of all letters, resolutions, telegrams, orders in council and other documents, dated during the years 1937 and 1938, exchanged between the government of Canada and any officer thereof, and the government of Ontario, or any officer thereof, or any other person or persons relating to the establishment of a national park in Ontario for the Muskoka, Georgian bay, lake Simcoe, and Trent canal district.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

NEUDORF, SASK., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. PERLEY:

Millar, postmaster at Neudorf, Saskatchewan, and the appointment of his successor.

CANADA AND GULF TERMINAL RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. LAPOINTE (Matapedia-Matane):

For a copy of all telegrams, letters, resolutions and other documents exchanged since 1927 inclusive between the dominion government or any officer thereof and the Canada and Gulf Terminal Railway Company or any other interested person in connection with the purchase of such railway by the government.

DROUGHT AREA IN ALBERTA AND SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. FAIR:

For a return showing—
1. The acreage of the drought area in: (a) Alberta; (b) Saskatchewan;
2. The population of the drought area in: (a) Alberta; (b) Saskatchewan;
3. Number of acres under cultivation in the drought area of: (a) Alberta; (b) Saskatchewan;
4. The amount of the federal grant, per month since January 1, 1935, to the drought area in: (a) Alberta; (b) Saskatchewan;
5. Total grant paid since January 1, 1935, to the drought area in: (a) Alberta; (b) Saskatchewan.

Mr. GARDINER: Before this motion is adopted I should just like to explain that, in so far as No. 4 is concerned, there is no "federal grant per month since January 1, 1935 to the drought area in (a) Alberta; (b) Saskatchewan." I assume what is referred to there is the grant in aid which applies to the whole province. The other information can be given.

NATURAL RESOURCES

CONFIRMATION OF CERTAIN AGREEMENTS BETWEEN DOMINION GOVERNMENT AND PROVINCES OF MANITOBA, SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to confirm certain agreements between the government of the dominion and the governments of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, respectively, concerning the transfer to the said provinces of the interest of the crown, in the right of the dominion, in and to certain natural resources.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

MEASURE FOR ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide assistance towards the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress, and for such payments out of moneys, appropriated by parliament as may be necessary for all or any of the purposes of the proposed legislation.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

POLITICAL EXPENDITURES

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting political expenditures, and to make provision for the appointment and the salaries or remuneration of certain officers and employees and the payment of certain expenses in connection with the administration of the said measure.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EASTER ADJOURNMENT FROM FRIDAY, APRIL 8, UNTIL MONDAY, APRIL 25

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That when this house adjourns on Wednesday, 13th of April, it stand adjourned until Monday, 25th April, 1938 (daylight saving time).

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I desire to suggest to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that he change the motion to read "8th of April" instead of "13th of April." As a westerner, and I believe many other western members will agree, I think it would be advisable to have a few more days. The additional Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, Wednesday being the short day of the week, might facilitate the closing of business at an earlier date after Easter. I hope the Prime Minister will consider this proposed change.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): I concur in what has been said by the previous speaker (Mr. Perley). If the house were to adjourn on the Friday previous to April 13 I do not believe it would prolong the session, and, by giving them practically an additional five days, it would give hon. members who live at a distance from Ottawa, whether east or west, an opportunity of visiting their homes or their constituents. If the present motion is adhered to and we adjourn on Wednesday, April 13, quite a number of members will be absent during those three days. Under these circumstances, and in view of the probability of the session being shorter than was at first expected, I support the change suggested by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle.

Mr. WILLIAM HAYHURST (Vegreville): I concur in what has been said by the two previous speakers. Many western members will not be able to return on time if the motion is adopted in its present form, and they do not wish to miss any part of the session. If we adjourn, as has been suggested, on April 13, we shall be compelled to travel at a time when traffic will be very heavy, because the railroads are then at the peak of their passenger business. It would be much more convenient to travel immediately after the eighth.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As I understand the suggestion of hon. gentlemen opposite, it is that the government so amend the motion as really to permit five extra days' absence from the capital but with a loss of only two and a half days of the time of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite, and one a short day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This would permit hon. members to have the benefit of a full fortnight's vacation. If that is the general wish of the house I shall be only too pleased to amend the motion to read:

That when this house adjourns on Friday, 8th of April, it stand adjourned until Monday, 25th April, 1938 (daylight saving time).

Motion agreed to.

VANCOUVER RELIEF

REQUEST OF CITY FOR DIRECT ASSISTANCE FROM DOMINION GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Before the orders of the day are proceeded with I wish to put a question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) with reference to the relief situation in the city of Vancouver. Over the week-end I received a number of official letters from Vancouver drawing attention to this very serious situation, which has of course existed for a number of years and is aggravated now, I am told, by the new provincial-federal agreement which goes into effect on the first of May. I should like to have the permission of the house to read one or two short telegrams.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. MacINNIS: From the acting mayor I received the following wire—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to limit himself to putting his question.

Mr. MacINNIS: Your honour, it has been, I believe, a practice in this house to read telegrams even when they were not necessary to a question. I do not see why I should be denied a privilege that has been given to others. The relief problem—

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend has referred to the practice as he describes it, but the rules are pretty definite on the subject of reading telegrams instead of asking direct questions. If we are getting away from the rules and adopting a practice that is unnecessarily taking up time, I believe that such a practice should be discontinued and the rules adhered to. Mr. Speaker has expressed the view that the question should be asked direct. I hope the hon. member will follow the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. MacINNIS: The Prime Minister, I understand, is the custodian of the rules of this house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MacINNIS: He should enforce them when members of the government and hon. members on his own side of the house and prominent members of the Conservative group are concerned as well as when we in this corner are concerned.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MacINNIS: Will the Minister of Labour inform us what action, if any, the government is going to take in this matter?

An hon. MEMBER: What matter?

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) was good enough to give me notice of his intention to ask this question this afternoon. I did receive a telegram from the acting mayor of Vancouver directing attention to the relief situation in that city and suggesting it was desirable that the government should come to its financial assistance. In reply to that telegram I advised the acting mayor of Vancouver that the dominion government pays a grant in aid direct to the province of British Columbia; it does not control and has never controlled the financial arrangements between the provincial government and its municipalities. I also advised the acting mayor that at the moment the dominion is carrying out to the letter its commitments, as contained in several formal agreements under the present relief legislation, entered into with the province after very careful study of the various problems confronting the province of British Columbia.

My hon. friend has asked me what we are prepared to do to meet the situation in that province. May I inform him of what we are doing at the present time in that connection. During the present fiscal year, which will end on March 31, the dominion government will have contributed to the province of British Columbia as a grant in respect to material aid, that is, for the provision of the necessities of life—food, fuel, clothing and shelter—to those in need, the sum of $1,500,000. In addition to this the dominion government has, under the agreement of June 11, 1937, agreed to contribute fifty per cent of the cost of a program of provincial and municipal works to relieve unemployment, the dominion contribution amounting to approximately $522,000.

In addition, under the youth training agreement, the dominion government has agreed to contribute $100,000 to match a like sum to be expended by the province in carrying out training projects for unemployed young people, and under this plan, at the end of February, 8,580 youths were receiving assistance.

The farm improvement and employment plan in effect in the western provinces is not so well suited to the conditions in British Columbia as it is to other western provinces, and under this plan only 270 placements have been made. However, a supplementary plan of forest development and improvement works for transients has provided for a contribution from the federal government which will amount to an expenditure of approximately $500,000.

All these plans are covered by agreement between the federal government and the province, including the grant in respect to material aid; but it will be understood that the material aid agreement, while providing for a monthly payment to the province, does not and cannot provide as to the amount which the province shall transfer or allot to any particular municipality or district. This is, and must be, a matter to be decided by the provincial authorities, and it is for this reason that the mayor of Vancouver has been advised that the dominion government makes the grant directly to the province, but does not control financial arrangements between the provincial governments and the municipalities.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO INTENTION TO PROCEED WITH LEGISLATION AT THE PRESENT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): May I ask the Prime Minister whether it is the intention of the government to proceed at this session with legislation dealing with the question of unemployment insurance?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend gave me an intimation of his intention to ask the question he has just asked. I believe I can best answer it by outlining what thus far has been done in the present situation.

The proposal to the provinces that they agree to an amendment to the British North America Act to enable parliament to enact unemployment insurance legislation, was made on November 5 last. As the house is already aware, six of the provinces, British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, accepted the proposal at that time. The premiers of Alberta and New Brunswick, after some exchange of correspondence, indicated their intention to submit the proposed amendment to the provincial legislatures for their consideration. The premier of Quebec agreed as to the desirability of unemployment insurance, but suggested that it might be instituted by concurrent legislation.

On January 20, the draft of the proposed amendment was submitted to the provinces. Five of them, British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, expressed approval of its terms. This communication has not been acknowledged by the premier of Ontario. Approval by the government of Ontario of the proposal to amend the British North America Act was, however, set forth in Mr. Hepburn's letter of November 25, in the following terms:

> Following a cabinet council meeting of yesterday's date, I am pleased to inform you that the government of the province of Ontario is prepared to waive any constitutional objections and to give the fullest measure of co-operation and support to the proposed amendments to the British North America Act, empowering the federal government to enact unemployment insurance legislation.

The premier of Quebec has not, thus far, acknowledged the draft amendment. The premier of Alberta, in a letter dated March 15, stated that it was his intention to have the matter taken up before the Alberta legislature in the immediate future. The premier of New Brunswick has not yet acknowledged the communication of January 20, but the proposal was referred to in the speech from the throne delivered at the opening of the New Brunswick legislature on February 24, in the following terms:

> Consistent with their conception of the constitution and the principles of responsible government, my ministers, without discussing the merits of the proposal, took the position that the question should be determined by the legislature and the federal government was so advised.

The speech from the throne at the opening of the present session of parliament contained the following statement:

The cooperation of the provinces has been sought with a view to an amendment of the British North America Act, which would empower the parliament of Canada to enact forthwith a national scheme of unemployment insurance. My ministers hope the proposal may meet with early approval, in order that unemployment insurance legislation may be enacted during the present session of parliament.

In the circumstances, to which I have referred, the government do not feel it would be desirable to make a further statement before the remaining provinces have had an opportunity of indicating their views.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps the Prime Minister would not object to a supplementary question: Does he conceive it necessary or desirable that all the provinces should agree before action is taken?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think this is the moment to answer that question. We had better wait and see what replies we get in the first instance.

SEED GRAIN

GUARANTEE OF LOANS FOR PURCHASE OF SEED AND OTHER ASSISTANCE IN SEEDING OPERATIONS IN WESTERN PROVINCES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 78, to assist the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan in financing the cost of seed and seeding operations for the crop year 1938.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): We have now before us the bill in printed form, and while it deals in a general way with the dominion's guarantee and the terms of that guarantee to the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, I do not think that there is sufficient information in detail in the bill itself. I desire now, therefore, to ask for some more information, and I propose to discuss the bill from three important angles.

In the first place I should like to be assured by the minister that provision will be made, either in the bill itself or in the regulations governing the distribution of seed, to see that every farmer has a reasonable amount of seed in order that he may seed a fair average number of acres under cultivation; in other words, that each farmer who has a summer fallow in a sufficiently good state of cultivation to be seeded be provided with that seed. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) the other evening in discussing this matter, said that possibly some arrangement would be made with the banks or the mortgage companies with a view to assisting the farmer, but I should like to have some definite provision made to make sure of that.

The second angle from which I propose to discuss the bill is the price to the farmer. I think we should make sure that the price will not be unjust, that it will not be too high. This is necessary for the protection not only of the farmer but of the taxpayer if the guarantee ever has to be met.

In the third place, I think provision should be made to provide power to seed the crop in proper season.

With respect to the first point, judging by the regulations that have been issued to the municipalities by the Minister of Agriculture in Saskatchewan, I suggest that there will not be sufficient seed supplied to many of the farmers who have a section or two of land, and I trust that something will be done in that respect. I want to know how the minister arrives at the price of $1.40 to $1.45. In the regulation issued by the Department of Agriculture in Regina it is stated that the price to the farmer will be $1.45 or thereabouts. The Minister of Finance said on Friday that the price should be an average price.

While I am on my feet, I propose to ask a few questions. It is very unsatisfactory in asking questions to have other hon. members intervene before the minister has replied to them all, so that one does not get a consecutive series of questions and answers. I shall endeavour to put my questions so that the minister will know what information I am seeking.

I think we should know in what future the 6,964,000 bushels was held as at August 1, 1937, and the price of that option. We have here to-day at least three members of the cabinet who are members of an advisory committee to the wheat board representing the government. I hold in my hand a report issued by the Canadian Wheat Board, dated January 6, 1938. On page 1 of that report I find two paragraphs which I am going to read:

> Our unsold wheat at 31st July, 1937, amounted to 6,964,000 bushels, represented by futures contracts, which in the ordinary course of business would have been disposed of prior to that date.
> Towards the latter part of the crop season it was apparent that western Canada was again faced with a very small crop; in the province of Saskatchewan, particularly, conditions were disastrous and it was obvious that seed wheat would be required over a very large area. After consultation with the wheat committee of the cabinet it was considered expedient to retain the futures contracts referred to in order to exchange them for cash wheat suitable for seed requirements in that province. By arrangement with the government of the province of Saskatchewan the wheat thus accumulated has been sold to them.

I might also mention that I have here order in council P.C. 3113, passed on December 15, which relates to this matter, and I desire to put it on the record. It is as follows:

The committee of the privy council have had before them a report, dated 13th December, 1937, from the Minister of Trade and Commerce, stating that the Canadian wheat board advise with regard to the question of converting wheat futures into actual wheat to be used for seed and feed relief in the province of Saskatchewan, that arrangements have been made by the Saskatchewan government for the purpose of this wheat, and that all charges in connection with the handling, such as premiums, storage, transportation and any additional charges will be paid by the Saskatchewan government.

The minister, therefore, recommends that the Canadian Wheat Board be authorized to exchange the long futures contracts that they have on hand as at July 31, 1937, namely 6,964,000 bushels, for actual wheat to be used for seed and feed purposes in the province of Saskatchewan in connection with the sowing of the 1938 crop.

The committee concur in the foregoing recommendation and submit the same for approval.

That order in council is the first authority that was issued to the board to convert the options. The spread or premium on the cash wheat between the option and the cash, from August 31 to December 15 when that order in council was passed, widened from 6 to 27 cents. I think we should know why this premium widened on wheat in the interior elevators. Possibly the grain trade had some idea of the conversion that was likely to take place in December and prepared to make another little rake-off from the board. There was no special export demand to warrant a premium at that time, as I shall show from figures I have from the bureau of statistics. And wheat in the interior elevators was not in a position to command a premium. The Minister of Finance is an expert grain man. Before he entered political life he had very wide experience in managing one of the most successful grain organizations in western Canada, and he made a success of it. He knows that wheat in the interior of the western provinces does not command a premium as it might if it were at the terminals, where it would be available for immediate shipment in case an exporter were short on a cargo. If an exporter has chartered a vessel to ship grain and is a little short of a certain grade, wheat of that grade in another elevator would be at a premium to enable him to finish the cargo. But I ask the minister to explain why wheat in the elevators in the interior commanded the premium that it did over the option.

[Mr. Perley.]

In dealing with the price the minister said he thought the average price from July 31 until the operations were concluded, or the day the provincial government took over the wheat, should prevail. I do not agree to that. I admit that you have to have some basis on which to start figuring your price, but I cannot agree that the price should be the cash price averaged between those dates.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not say the cash price.

Mr. PERLEY: Well, the minister said the average price from July 31 to the time the government of Saskatchewan takes it over.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will permit, there were two questions discussed. One was the average base price, and the other the premium.

Mr. PERLEY: Does the minister agree that there should not be a premium?

Mr. DUNNING: I am not qualified to say that. I do not know how you would get the wheat without it.

Mr. PERLEY: I want to try to figure what I think the price of this wheat should be to the farmer. First, to the price of the option taken from the board as of December, 1935, when the new board took over, add the storage charged from the date the wheat was taken over by the province of Saskatchewan, or even by the board from the date of their conversion. That would be the storage on the grain as it was taken over following that conversion. Add to that the transportation, that is the cost of moving it from point to point within the province, and the cost of distribution. I consider that the most we could allow for storage would be say five cents. The storage rate at the terminals is one cent a month. For five months that would be five cents, which should be sufficient. While I am trying to figure out how I arrive at what the price should be, I should like to have the attention of the two ministers. I am allowing five cents for storage and ten cents for transportation from one point to another within the province. Then I am allowing three cents for the distribution costs, which I think should be ample. That is a total of eighteen cents. Then I consider that the price of the option as taken over by the new board would not be more than 90 cents, at the very most; I think it would be a little under that. That would give a figure of $1.08, or at the most $1.10, at which the wheat should be charged to the farmer.

The minister may be able to give some other explanation, but I am going to suggest to the house what I think would be the procedure in converting that wheat. The board would notify the clearing house that they were long in options, nearly 7,000,000 bushels of wheat, and that they desired to convert those options into cash wheat within the provinces. In other words they would notify the clearing house that they desired to take delivery of that wheat. Then it would be up to the clearing house to get that wheat, not necessarily within the provinces, but the clearing house certainly would have to get it at the point of delivery, which is at the terminal.

Mr. DUNNING: Fort William.

Mr. PERLEY: Yes, Fort William. Then the wheat board, having taken over the wheat on the option at Fort William, could sell it there and buy wheat in the interior, or they could make an exchange. The minister smiles a little; perhaps he will be able to explain this away. I know he is an expert in the grain business, but the board will have wheat at the terminals, because that is the only place where the board can call the options. I think the minister will agree with that. Having it there the board could either sell the wheat and buy cash wheat in the interior or make exchange arrangements with the elevator people. Therefore I claim that the wheat would cost the board exactly what the option cost. Of course the extra storage and transportation charges would have to be added, but I am dealing with the original cost.

The minister may say there were switching operations, and things of that sort. I have before me the report of the wheat board dated January 6, 1938, and I want to refer to page 3 in connection with the switching operations. This is what I find:

> The expenses of the board during the year, covering all administration and operating expense together with storage on wheat carried, amounted to $330,567.69. This was, however, more than offset by revenue accruing from the switching of nearby future contracts into contracts for deferred months. This revenue, together with interest earned on funds on hand, amounted to $424,487.42, thus leaving a credit balance of $93,919.73 after meeting all the board's operating expenses in Canada.

According to this statement the board made money in their switching operations, and in that connection I take it that this dates back to December of 1935. They say they earned also some interest on funds which they deposited, no doubt with the banks.

Mr. BENNETT: Two million dollars was deposited with the dominion government.

Mr. PERLEY: I may point out also that they had no charge for margins; that is, no interest could be charged in connection with money on deposit with the clearing house, since I have it on authority from the directors that the government was not asked to carry any margins on its account.

I wish to quote further from the evidence taken by the special committee, in order to show that the position of the wheat board was not affected by their switching operations, in order to indicate that the price at which we should figure this wheat is the original price of the option. I have before me the printed copy of the evidence taken before the special committee on the marketing of wheat and other grains, in 1936. At page 60 of this evidence we have a statement by Mr. Murray, in reply to questions put to him by myself, with respect to these switching operations:

> By Mr. Perley:
> Q. Do you not think it weakens your position when you go into the October?

That is, switching from the July to the October.

> That is, the new crop month. Switches are made into July and then July into October.—A. No.
> Q. They would have the new crop to deliver on those old contracts?—A. It does not weaken our position.

Further down I find this:

> Q. But it is cleaning up your May and cleaning up your July, to get it into the October?—A. It does not weaken our position in any way. The only thing that would weaken our position, being placed as we are with the responsibility of selling wheat, would be to exchange one option for an option that was not so readily saleable.

So there is a statement by Mr. Murray that their position was not weakened, and I could read further from the next page, where he states what a corner he could have manipulated had he so desired, and then he would have been able to call the shorts and make them dance a nice tune. The point I desire to make is that in changing the options from one month to another right through from 1935 the position of the board has not been changed, and the price that should be attached to that wheat is whatever the option stood them when they took over in 1935, which is a little less than 90 cents.

I should like the minister to tell us who is making the difference in this spread, which widened from 6 to 27 cents between August 31 and December 15. I should like also to know the number of bushels converted each month. I think this would be important, because then we could arrive at the storage fees that should be charged. If it was all converted during December or January it would make a considerable difference in the storage charges. Also I think we should know the position the wheat was in when the provincial government took it over; that is, the position in the interior of these provinces. Then we could figure what the transportation costs might be. I think we should know also when the provincial governments assumed the whole responsibility. The wheat is going out now. If we should happen to hold up this measure for a day or two I do not think it would make any particular difference, because the wheat is going out. I have here a report in a newspaper which came to hand to-day, which says:

Seed wheat is being shipped. Movement of seed wheat and supplies is already under way to the first of 1,120 points in Saskatchewan, according to Hon. J. G. Taggart, provincial minister of agriculture. Of this number between 900 and 1,000 will receive wheat deliveries. The Canada grain board has already authorized the movement of 6,500,000 bushels of grain. All the wheat is 1937 wheat from prairie points.

So the wheat was grown in 1937 in the three prairie provinces. I say the wheat is going forward now, so if this measure is held up for a day or two it will not make very much difference, and I think the public are entitled to some of the information for which we are asking. At page 1695 of Hansard the Minister of Agriculture stated:

Yes, Mr. Chairman. As the Minister of Finance has just said, this matter has been under discussion for the last six months. In the first place it is necessary to secure sufficient quantities of the different types of grain to be used for seeding purposes. That is the first job to be done.

He said further:

But I must say that in both Saskatchewan and Alberta agreement was reached between this government and the two provincial governments as to the amount of guarantee required in each province.

That shows that it had been under consideration for a number of months. I think we should have the figures with respect to the acreage to be seeded and the amount of seed required. I should like to know how the amount of the guarantee was arrived at. How was the price per bushel arrived at? How did the government arrive at these figures without knowing the number of acres in each province to be seeded? There was a question on the order paper to-day with reference to the acreage under cultivation in the area requiring seeding. I think we should have this information, as well as the requirements for the purposes of sowing oats, wheat, barley, rye and flax.

I do not think the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Agriculture can expect the house to approve this bill in a short space of time without it having this information before it. In connection with the amount of wheat in Saskatchewan, the minister made this statement, to be found on page 1702 of Hansard, in reply to a question by myself:

Between now and the time when the bill is down for second reading and in committee, every endeavour will be made to arrive definitely at a conclusion. The matter is a very difficult and complex one. My hon. friend in his last few sentences asks how much wheat the wheat board was holding on this account in Saskatchewan as of March 15. He knows they were able to acquire mighty little of this wheat in Saskatchewan. If they had any in that province at that time it would be because, having been acquired, this wheat in the process of physical movement had been moved that much nearer to its ultimate destination.

I have before me figures taken from the weekly reports of the grain commission in Winnipeg showing the amount of wheat on hand in the interior elevators, in the private elevators, in the mills and in the terminal elevators of the three provinces. For the week ending August 6, 1937, the total wheat in store was 7,284,211 bushels.

Mr. DUNNING: Is that in the whole area?

Mr. PERLEY: Yes, in the whole area. I have the reports from that date up to the present time, but I shall give figures here and there to show the gradual accumulation. On August 27 the wheat in store had increased to 13,130,424 bushels; on September 10 it had increased to 20,129,994 bushels; on September 24, 27,769,112 bushels; on October 29, 25,699,035 bushels; November 12, 25,362,606 bushels; December 31, 21,269,598 bushels and January 21, 21,947,559 bushels. From that date up to the last for which I have the figures, March 18, the wheat in store is in the neighbourhood of 21,000,000 bushels.

Mr. DUNNING: That is in country and interior public terminals?

Mr. PERLEY: That is in country elevators and private interior elevators.

Mr. DUNNING: And mill terminals.

Mr. PERLEY: And interior government terminals. I can give this information by provinces if the minister so desires. Not quite half of that is in Saskatchewan; most of it is in Alberta, and a little in Manitoba.

Mr. DUNNING: Have you the grades?

Mr. PERLEY: No, I have not. I have the amount of durum and the remainder is just northern wheats. There is a considerable amount of durum. It is interesting to note that since August 1 there has been a considerable amount of grain in store in these provinces, that is wheat grown in 1937. The minister asked if I had the grades, but I think he will agree with me when I say that a dry season such as we had last year, when there was no frost in the fall, tends to create high grades of wheat, generally speaking. If you follow these reports you will see that in the months of September, October and November there was considerable wheat shipped out of Saskatchewan, but then the elevators seem to have got up again to the previous average.

The Minister of Finance knows from his own experience that as soon as the heaviest runs of wheat are delivered to the interior elevators the elevator companies try to fill their elevators to carry the wheat over for the winter months. They like to store the wheat up to about May in order to get the carrying charges. This practice may account for some wheat being in that position. There is plenty of wheat in Saskatchewan to satisfy the requirements. I am concerned in the government seeing to it that the government of Saskatchewan guarantees or assists the municipalities in the providing of power to get the crops in at the proper time. The Minister of Agriculture is reported on page 1696 of Hansard as follows:

> The other question raised, with regard to provision for live stock or for power in order to put in the crop, is not an immediate concern of this government.

That statement should not have been forthcoming from the minister. I think it should be the immediate concern of this government to see that there is sufficient power with which to put in a crop. A further statement by the minister, to be found on the same page of Hansard, is as follows:

> The question whether or not horses have come back in poor shape is not one with which I can deal, other than to say that in all the checks I have been able to make—and I have been over quite a part of the area during the last few weeks—I have not found that great numbers of horses have died; I have not found that they are any poorer than they usually are after going through a year of this kind, in any part of the dominion. It is perfectly true that if you put a number of horses, cattle, or any other live stock into a boxcar and carry them three or four hundred miles probably you will have to take one of them home on a stone-boat, as the result of what they do to one another during the journey. You may even have to take one out that is not worth hauling home, but these stories are very much enlarged upon, and the checks we have been able to make indicate that the death rate among live stock this year is not materially greater than in any average year in western Canada.

I take exception to that statement, because I think the mortality among the horses has been considerably greater. While the minister may have had experts checking it, as he states, I think the authorities which I have are just as reliable as some of his checkers. I have received numerous letters from councillors of different municipalities and from reeves and reliable farmers. I know my own district pretty thoroughly; within a radius of forty or fifty miles of my own district we have lost at least thirty per cent of the horses this winter, and I think that is the average for the southern part of the province. Certainly fifty per cent of the horses that were there last fall are not ready to go to work. In any paper you pick up you will find some report to that effect. Here, for instance, is a snapshot of some horses that are described as typical examples of horses returning to Saskatchewan farms from the winter pasturage at Carberry. The minister can see the paper in the reading room. These horses are part of a carload that was brought back, and certainly they are in no condition to work within the next six weeks or two months. It would take a good many bushels of oats to put them to work, and the story in this paper is not very complimentary to the government.

I also read in to-day's papers coming forward from Saskatchewan that the Royal Humane Society in Moose Jaw and Regina are both of the opinion that some action should be taken to enforce the act with respect to cruelty to animals. Here is one dispatch:

> Regina members of the Royal Humane Society and the Saskatchewan society for the prevention of cruelty to animals will approach the government to determine the exact condition of horses returned to southern Saskatchewan from government-sponsored pasturage.

It goes on to say that the Moose Jaw branch of the society is taking similar action.

Mr. GARDINER: I wonder if the hon. member would mind telling me who shipped those horses, to what point they were shipped, and where they came from?

Mr. PERLEY: I happen to know of four carloads that were shipped from Wolseley, under government instructions. The farmers were told by the inspectors that they could not keep them at home because feed would be supplied for only so many horses and four cows to each farmer, and the farmers not having the feed the inspectors told them they could ship them to the feeding ground. Two carloads have returned, and I have a letter here from my neighbour, the reeve of the municipality, stating that some of the horses had to be lifted out of the car and were taken to a nearby barn and had to remain there several days before they could be taken home. I know the facts in the matter. These men shipped out their horses last fall because they could not feed them. The inspector,

Mr. Biden, told them they had to get rid of their horses and ship them, under the regulations, to the pasturage.

Mr. GARDINER: Were these particular horses at the Carberry pasturage or at some other pasturage?

Mr. PERLEY: Yes, they were at the Carberry pasturage.

Mr. GARDINER: All of them?

Mr. PERLEY: It distinctly says in the report that they were at the Carberry pasturage. I could cite other cases, but what I want to say is this, that the minister should be concerned about this matter and should see to it that the municipalities and the provincial government have sufficient assistance provided so that farmers will have power of some kind to put in the crop. I was concerned about this even before I left home, and I brought the matter to the attention of both the provincial and the federal governments. Speaking here in the debate on the address I made it very plain that the situation was serious. During that debate the minister replied that he was not so much concerned about having the feed in the province during the early winter months of December and January as he was about having it there in March at the proper time before seeding operations began. But I think he will agree that if the horses are arriving home from Manitoba from the pasturage in the condition this article indicates, it will certainly need more than government regulations as now provided to get these horses into condition for seeding operations.

As I stated a while ago, the distribution of the grain is going on, and it is done with the approval of the cabinet and of the inspector. I think that a little too much power is given to the inspector; the municipality is the one body that in my opinion should be given more say than the government inspector with respect to the amount of seed that the farmers will require. Who is a better judge of the calibre of the farmer and of the condition of his farm than the reeve and the councillors of the municipality? I think they should have a greater say in the matter than they have at present. I know cases where the inspector has refused applications that have been approved by the municipality.

This bill is brought down at a late date, and while I appreciate that we should not hold it up too long, it is important that we should have the information we require. As I have said, the wheat is being distributed, and I am anxious with respect to the supply, and the price and the power. The farmers have suffered a very severe loss due to the condition in which their horses are returning from the pasturage, and I say they have a right to be compensated in some way or other. It is the duty of this government to see that the provincial authorities who insisted last fall on the horses being shipped out under the regulations, should give some compensation to the farmers whose horses have been returned in such poor condition. Certainly the farmers should have tractor power to put their crop in, if it is at all possible. I trust that the minister will answer my questions and give us this information, which is due not only to the house but to the public generally.

Mr. G. T. PURDY (Colchester-Hants): Mr. Speaker, it is a rather long way from Nova Scotia to the west, but I should like to say a few words on this bill.

This bill is for the direct benefit of a portion only of this great country, and while on general principles I am opposed to federal legislation that is not applicable to Canada as a whole, I agree that in view of the situation facing us in the west some such legislation as this is necessary. On general principles I am also opposed to federal guarantees, on the ground that if a condition is of sufficient importance or seriousness to warrant financial assistance, the government should advance the money at once instead of adopting the more expensive method now proposed to the house. It is only too well known that for some reason securities carrying a government guarantee are usually quoted at a lower rate than similar direct obligations of the government, thus making the money more expensive. In the present instance, however, realizing that the chartered banks have the necessary machinery for handling the business which is lacking by the government, I wish to congratulate the government on this provision of the bill, particularly when it seems to be almost a foregone conclusion that when the federal government makes an advance in the district with which we are now dealing the money is lost to the federal treasury.

I do, however, question the rate of interest and would suggest to the government that they consider increasing it to something nearer the rate which private business has to pay, say 5 to 5½ per cent, with the provision that on any advance which the federal treasury has to make good the rate will be reduced to 2½ or 3 per cent. This would be a greater incentive to the banks to collect and would lighten the drain on the treasury.

Having discussed a few features of the bill from the federal standpoint, may I be permitted to discuss it for a few moments from a maritime province view? In this connection I cannot too strongly urge on the government favourable consideration of the very reasonable request of the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean), made in this house on Friday last, with regard to seed grain for maritime farmers. I do not propose to approach this subject from the angle of the beam trawlers, nor yet from the angle of the dumping duty on sugar, but I do propose to discuss it from the viewpoint of 25,000 to 30,000 people in my constituency, who are, in whole or part, dependent on agriculture for their livelihood, and from the viewpoint of the half million people of the maritime provinces who are in the same category. A hard-working and industrious body of people, loyal to the British Empire, loyal to Canada and loyal to the little provinces down by the sea, they believe in thrift and do not make a practice of parading their ills before successive governments at Ottawa. To my mind they are the backbone not only of the maritime provinces but also of the dominion. I do not need to point out to this house the number of leaders in all walks of life in Canada and in the United States whose background is a farm in one of the maritime provinces.

These people are generous to a fault; a very large proportion of the contributions to the west last fall, already referred to by the hon. member for Prince, came from them. They are proud of being a part of Canada; for this reason they approach problems from a national standpoint, with, I think, the result that they have not in the past received the same consideration as their more vocal and, in my opinion, less deserving cousins in other parts of Canada. They do claim, however, that legislation should apply equally to them as to other parts of Canada, and for that reason they fail to see the justice of such imposts as the duty on corn, of which they buy a considerable quantity in their mixed farming operations. This duty is apparently only for the benefit of a small section of our country, already highly subsidized by tariffs on manufactured goods. The result of this duty has a direct bearing on the price of all feed, thus causing our maritime people to pay a further toll to the grain producers of the west, already heavily assisted by the government. I trust that the government will see to it that this and similar duties are removed or else duties imposed on such items as vegetable oils; because it is most unfair that they should be required to pay heavy duties on goods that enter into their production and be subject to open competition on the goods they produce. Here I should like to say it is to the undying credit of the present government that their trade policies have been quite beneficial to the farmers of the maritime provinces.

The west is not the only part of Canada where droughts occur. In 1934 the hay crop in Nova Scotia was almost a complete failure. There was no suggestion that the federal government pay for the hay and feed. That year hay cost our farmers $11 to $12 a ton in Quebec and Ontario, f.o.b. cars. The local government made arrangements for the farmers to obtain a reduction of two-thirds of the freight, leaving a net cost to our people of $14 to $15 per ton. If, however, our farmers did not have the money or could not get credit to buy the hay, they had to shoot their stock or dispose of it in some other way at a very low price. The result was disastrous to many of our people. Again, in 1937, our farmers in many sections had a complete failure in grain and root crops. We did have, however, an abundant hay crop and this, added to a heavy carry-over from the previous year, gave us a large surplus for which there is no market. In fact there was a good deal of hay not harvested last year, and if we get a reasonable crop this year much of it will be left standing. We therefore now have this situation: in the maritimes a surplus of hay and a lack of seed grain and other mill feeds; in the west a lack of hay with seed grain and other mill feeds available for the maritimes if they pay for them. The government were aware of this situation last summer and also aware of the fact that the maritimes purchase large quantities of feed from the west at all times, and they should have, in the interests of the farmers of the maritime provinces, arranged for a sufficient reduction in the freight rates to enable the governments of the western provinces to purchase at least a portion of their hay requirements from the maritime provinces.

Since we are not allowed to load coal in grain cars, most of these must go back empty, and I submit that the railways, or at least the Canadian National, could have reduced rates on hay by two-thirds and still have done better financially than hauling back empty cars. Further, from the viewpoint and in the interest of the Canadian taxpayer it would have been far better business to handle the hay situation in this way and make work for Canadian railways, mines and farmers than to buy in Minnesota and send the Canadian taxpayers' money to the United States. I feel that in the interests of a united Canada this should have been done even at the cost of an increased outlay on the part of the government.

I suppose that the hay requirements for the year are nearly filled, but I would strongly urge on the government the advisability of helping the maritime situation as far as possible, if only to the extent of having seed and feed grain cars for the next month loaded with hay for the return trip. I trust that it is not too late for some adjustment, but prompt action will be necessary, for it is now towards the end of March.

The sap is flowing from the maple trees on the Nova Scotia hills, and whether they obtain assistance or not, the maritime provinces will still carry on. If our farmers have not been able to obtain work during the winter to pay for their feed and seed grain they will sell some of their stock and the feed and seed from the west will continue to be paid for in hard cash. However, we are proud that the credit of our provinces continues to stand high and that a dollar is still a dollar and something that must be worked for and not obtained for the asking; that a debt is something to be paid.

Heading further west: when it is spring time in the Rockies and the cattle are on the ranges, as the federal treasury is standing the strain, all will be well on the western plain.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Before the bill goes to the committee I wish to make one or two remarks. The other day, when this bill was in the resolution stage, I asked both the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) some questions. I should like to see the answers to those questions a little more fully developed as we go into committee on the bill. I asked first of all if the government considered that the amount of $14,500,000 was sufficient to guarantee seed to the farmers in the drought area. The Minister of Agriculture answered to the effect that we had had the same discussion last year; that everybody seemed satisfied with the amount that had been voted, and that there had been no complaints. I think that is true, but it is also true that there was no crop, and that by the third week of June it was quite apparent we were not going to have any crop.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Oh, no.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): At least in my part of the country it was apparent, and for that reason there were no complaints. Had there been a crop, and had farmers seen wheat going to the elevators for a good price at a time when they were not able to harvest very much, there would have been a great many complaints. Merely to say that there were no complaints last year hardly answers the question whether we are providing enough money to supply sufficient seed to enable these people to sow at least an average crop this year.

As I said the other day, the basis on which we are distributing the seed is not fair to the man who is farming on a large scale. Last year the provincial government had what I regard as an excellent arrangement, and I wish that at this late date the government would consider following something of that sort rather than the plan outlined by the minister the other day. According to the forms sent out by the provincial government on January 28, 1937, if a man had a total of 160 acres ready for cultivation he received seed for three-quarters, or 120 acres; from 160 to 300 acres it was two-thirds, or 200 acres; from 300 to 400 it was three-fifths, or 240 acres; and over 400 acres there was a maximum of 300 acres. On seeding rates the basis was as follows: wheat, one to one and a quarter bushels per acre; oats, one and three-quarter bushels; barley, one and a half bushels; flax, half a bushel. The estimated amount of fuel was to be one and a half gallons of distillate per acre; six gallons of gasoline per hundred gallons of distillate; lubricating oil, four gallons per hundred gallons of distillate, and so on.

That was a much fairer basis on which to work out the distribution. According to the plan now proposed, the man who anticipates putting in 200 or 250 acres will get seed for 100 per cent of the land he has prepared, and the man with a large farm, let us say 1,000 acres, and there are many such, will get 250.

An hon. MEMBER: One of the big shots.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): They are not such big shots; some of them have come down in the depression. We have never asked for discrimination against any class, big or small, but under the plan now proposed the man who has prepared 1,000 acres will get only enough for twenty-five per cent of his land.

Mr. DUNNING: From this source.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): From this source, yes. And the man in the drought areas has no other source. But I would point out that even out of this amount, it is possible, if the reports from Saskatchewan be true, that fuel repairs and probably feed to put in the crop will have to be taken. All this may be deducted from the 250 acre allotment, and if that is true that will reduce the amount by fifty acres more. Last year, on the basis worked out by the provincial government and submitted to the municipalities, fuel, repairs and feed were provided for over and above the seed grain that was to be allotted. I suggest that we should have a more satisfactory statement as to what the government considers would ensure a sufficiently large amount to meet the situation, and as to whether they consider the proposed plan the best basis of distribution. Here you have farmers who have gone on year after year facing what is little better than bankruptcy, and now in certain areas they have the first chance in many years to enjoy the unusual-combination of a good crop and a good price; yet no steps are being taken to profit by that situation and enable the farmers to recoup their past losses.

I have heard some hon. gentlemen opposite speak with great vehemence against compulsory reduction of crop acreage. Well, if we insist upon a maximum of 250 acres, irrespective of the extent of land prepared for seed, we shall have compulsory crop reduction and no mistake about it.

I submit that we ought to have some more information with reference to price. I was surprised the other day when the Minister of Finance said that the price would be between $1.40 and $1.45 a bushel. In my opinion, that is exorbitant to say the least. Much of that wheat was shipped out of the very districts into which it is going to be shipped this spring. I saw grain being shipped late in June and early in July last year from Creelman, Fillmore and other centres, and into these same districts wheat will have to be brought back for seed and the farmer will be asked to pay the freight both ways. It is a very unsatisfactory arrangement in view of the fact that we have known for a long time that seed would be required. Seeing that we have a wheat board it seems to me not inconceivable that we might have entered into an arrangement whereby the government would have been willing to work on a bushel for bushel basis, so that the farmer would sign, not for any specific amount of money but for the delivery of a number of bushels. He would have been able to deliver a bushel back for every bushel he had received and if there were handling charges in addition they could have been paid in cash. That would be a fairer basis, in my opinion. As it is, the farmer sold his wheat at a low price and now he gets it at a high price; and when he is ready to sell again the price will probably be low once more. I do not think it would be unfair to put the distribution on a bushel for bushel basis.

Mr. GOLDING: Have these farmers sold wheat without keeping any seed?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am referring to the farming community as a whole and not to individuals. Wheat will be coming back, not necessarily to the same farmer who sold it, though the wheat that is now being brought back to farmers in the district is wheat that was sold by other farmers there.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Was it the Creelman farmers who shipped wheat in June last year?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): They did not ship in June last. The wheat was ordered to be held at the elevator.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): It must have been bought from the farmers there.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes, two years ago. Most of that wheat was bought there in 1935-36.

Mr. EVANS: Did those farmers get seed in 1937 when they grew a crop in 1936?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Quite a bit of that wheat was sold in 1935 and some of it was rusted.

With reference to distribution there are still some unsatisfactory aspects that should be looked into. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), describing the method of distribution, made this statement on Friday last as reported at page 1704 of Hansard:

> . . . (a) the committee of the cabinet and the inspector for the district determine the amount of seed grain and supplies that a municipality may advance; that is, the cabinet in Regina decides the amount that each municipality can advance within the municipality.

Mr. GARDINER: That is the total.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes, the total amount that will be distributed; but what each farmer will get will depend upon the total. That seems to me a lot of power to put into the hands of an inspector and the committee of the cabinet. We might as well be realistic; within the next three months we are going to face a provincial election in Saskatchewan. We are now giving to such a cabinet the dispensing of $14,500,000 worth of seed with a federal guarantee behind it. I for one have no wish to see the distribution of that seed become a political football in Saskatchewan.

Mr. GARDINER: Is the hon. member suggesting that the Liberal party, which happens to form the government of Saskatchewan at the present time, would give too little seed, or too much seed? Which is he suggesting?

Mr. BENNETT: Too little to some; too much to others.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am suggesting that in view of an election being near at hand the distribution ought to be on a uniform and equal basis.

Mr. DUNNING: But the distribution is done by the councils.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It is also done to municipalities by the cabinet.

Mr. DUNNING: No, you said the total. Don't switch it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am not switching, if the minister will wait a moment. He has been in the cabinet so long that he keeps looking for things that are not there. The cabinet and the inspector will have the power to decide what the lump sum shall be to each municipality. There are bound to be municipalities which are persona grata to a government and others that are not. There are districts which are favourably inclined politically and districts which are unfavourably inclined politically. I am not suggesting—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): —knowing the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) as I do, that they are going to refuse to a certain municipality enough seed or give another too much. But I point out that we as a federal parliament, divorced as of course we are from these party considerations—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Which party? I wonder if the same thing would be true about some municipal councils?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I leave it to the hon. member to figure out the municipal councils. As a federal parliament, guaranteeing a large sum of money, there ought to be reasonable assurance that in the distribution of this seed and of feed and supplies there will be no discrimination. And giving the distribution to a committee in company with an inspector, with no clearly defined statement of how much money is to be spent in any one place, provides no such assurance. We have the statement of the minister himself (Mr. Gardiner) on Friday last, as reported on page 1704 of Hansard:

> On farms of 320 acres or less of cultivated land not more than sixty per cent.
> On farms over 320 acres of cultivated land, fifty per cent thereof may be sown up to a maximum of 250 acres.

There is no statement of how much per acre, no statement of how much repairs on the basis of acreage, no statement of the amount of fuel on the basis of acreage, or of feed. You give to a small group of men the distribution of $14,500,000 worth of seed without sufficient safeguard that such distribution shall not be influenced by partisan considerations.

[Mr. Douglas.]

Mr. DUNNING: What safeguard does my hon. friend suggest? Let us have something practical.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I gave it. A short time ago I outlined a sliding scale of percentages of a man's cultivated land.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Regardless of the condition it is in?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I said cultivated land, land ready to crop.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): That is not cultivated land as spoken of here.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I read just now the schedule suggested by the Saskatchewan government itself last year, which was not finally accepted, indicating the percentage of a man's land, ready for crop, that should be seeded, the amount he should get per acre.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): But that is not cultivated land.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The amount of oil he should get, the amount of money he should get for repairs, setting it down very clearly. All the municipality would have to do in that case would be to know how much land a man has ready for crop. On that basis they could figure out how much seed he had a right to, how much wheat, oats, barley, flax, how much repairs, and how much fuel and feed.

Mr. DUNNING: I point out that it is not the intention of this legislation to supply seed or assistance to everyone merely because he wants it or has the acreage. We do not intend that this shall be supplied to people who have other means of getting it. My hon. friend's suggestion as to safeguards assumes an automatic distribution to everyone.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I want to make sure that someone is not going to get it because he happens to be politically favourable to an inspector.

Mr. DUNNING: Or to the council.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Or to the council, or to the provincial government.

Mr. DUNNING: Can my hon. friend suggest a way to overcome the difficulty I have just mentioned, by his automatic scheme?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I point out that you are safe in assuming at the present time that in the drought area ninety-eight per cent of the population will require seed.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not safe to assume anything of the sort. Twenty-two per cent of them did not go on relief last year.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Of the farm population in the drought area?

Mr. DUNNING: In the worst part of it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That does not meet the situation at all. The minister says they did not require relief, but that does not mean that they do not require seed. The only way a man would have seed would be to have had a crop last year.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): How did they keep off relief if they did not have something?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): They may have had some cattle or a dairy farm. The fact that a man has been able to keep off relief does not mean that he has sufficient seed to put in his crop. In fact the very opposite is true; many men who have been able to keep going have done so by virtue of having stock, and they are the very men who have no seed.

Mr. DUNNING: I know men who have hung on to their one or two bushels per acre for seed.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Very few of them.

Mr. DUNNING: Lots of them.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I want to impress upon the house very seriously that we as a parliament are being asked to guarantee a sum of money and that the disbursement of the seed which that money will buy is being handed over to a few individuals without sufficient safeguards to assure its being distributed in an unbiased way.

Mr. GOLDING: The hon. member wants more? That is not enough, in his opinion?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I do not think it is enough—at least I think a different scale of distribution ought to be followed.

Mr. GOLDING: You still want more?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I do not think it is sufficient. Last year the Saskatchewan government, which is a Liberal government and would not be expected to be asking for more than it had a right to, on January 21, 1937, sent out a statement in which it said that the province would require about $8,700,000. That was subsequently cut to $6,600,000 in this parliament. That was with 25,000 farmers making application. This year 81,000 farmers have applied, more than three times as many. But we have not trebled the $8,700,000 that the government of Saskatchewan thought necessary last year. We have not even doubled it.

Mr. GARDINER: It is almost exactly three times. It is $20,000,000.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Three times $8,700,000 is a great deal more than eighteen or twenty millions.

Mr. GARDINER: Three times $6,600,000 is about $20,000,000, and that is what is provided this year.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The amount guaranteed by this parliament last year was $6,600,000, but that was not the amount the Saskatchewan government thought necessary to meet the situation. The amount they thought necessary was $8,700,000 to supply 25,000 farmers. Here we are suggesting that $14,500,000 will meet the needs of 81,000 farmers.

Mr. GARDINER: Allow me to correct the hon. member. The statement made by the Minister of Finance the other day was that under this legislation we have been able to make provision, in concurrence with the loan companies and the banks, to supply approximately $20,000,000 to the farmers of Saskatchewan for seed and seeding operations this year.

Mr. BENNETT: In addition to this?

Mr. GARDINER: No, $20,000,000 all told this year. Last year provision was made for only $6,600,000.

Mr. PERLEY: How much through the banks and loan companies last year?

Mr. GARDINER: I shall deal with that in a moment.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That still does not meet the question, Mr. Speaker. I am quite well aware of what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) said the other day, that between $18,000,000 and $20,000,000 is the total amount that will be available for seed. But of that $18,000,000 or $20,000,000 only $14,500,000 is guaranteed by this government, and it is doubtful if that is enough, when you compare it with the amount of $8,700,000 asked for in order to provide for one-third the number of farmers who will require to be looked after this year.

There is one further point I should like to mention. It is of little or no value to give farmers seed unless some provision is to be made to give them sufficient fuel or sufficient horse power to put in that crop. I cannot speak for other parts of Saskatchewan, but the part which I represent has been sorely depleted in horse power during the past year. This morning I received a local paper from my constituency which mentioned one farmer who had lost sixteen out of twenty-two horses this winter. That is an exception, of course; I am not suggesting that this condition is general, but I do know numbers of farmers who started the winter with twelve horses and now find themselves with four. It will mean that these farmers will have to get either machine power and fuel or horse power somewhere or other, and if either the feed or the fuel is to come out of this provision that is going to be allowed for seed for 250 acres, of course it will be hopeless.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course it would not come out of that.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am glad to hear that. The intimation in Saskatchewan was that it was to be taken out of the seed allotment. If the feed, fuel, repairs and so on are to be over and above the allotment—

Mr. GARDINER: It is to cover everything for the seeding of the 250 acres; everything necessary is supplied for that.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): On the basis of a bushel and a quarter per acre.

Mr. GARDINER: The same basis as last year.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Last year it was only one bushel per acre?

Mr. GARDINER: One to one and a quarter.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister definitely said it was going to be a bushel, if I remember the debate last year.

Mr. GARDINER: That was not stated last year. It was said that on some land it should be a bushel and on other land it should be more.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I merely point out what actually was said. At page 2769 of Hansard for last year the minister said:

> For 1936-37 the figures are: seed wheat, 2,739,000 bushels, 2,739,000 acres; the acreage is exactly the same, it being estimated that a bushel to the acre will be seeded—

Mr. GARDINER: That was the estimate, but in putting it out they put one bushel on some land and a bushel and a quarter on other lands. On some it was really less than one bushel.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Does that depend upon the type of land and the condition of the land?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, the type and condition of the land.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Because that is going to give rise to considerable dissatisfaction. We are going to have some farmers quite determined that their land will require a bushel and a quarter. Very few will agree that one bushel per acre is sufficient for their land. They will be quite willing to agree that it is sufficient for some other fellow's land.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): No, no.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) says "no, no." The farmer will figure that if he can get a bushel and a quarter and put in only one bushel, he will be able to seed twenty-five per cent more of his land than he anticipated.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The farmer is not dishonest.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am not suggesting that the farmer is dishonest, but I suggest that we are working out a very excellent system to make him dishonest. If we are to leave it to some person unknown, some Mr. X, to decide whether he will get one bushel or a bushel and a quarter; to decide how much feed, how much of this and how much of something else the farmer is going to get, we will make it very difficult to satisfy our people. That is why I have asked all along that we should stipulate clearly in the regulations issued by the provincial government and approved by the federal government just how much the farmer will get; how much fuel, how much he will be allowed for repairs, and so on, in order that there may be no controversy or dissatisfaction, and above all no feeling on the part of our people that partisan considerations have entered into the distribution of this seed.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I wish to deal with one or two of the questions raised by previous speakers, and first I should like to deal with the point raised by the hon. member for Colchester-Hants (Mr. Purdy), who spoke a few moments ago, because he brought up a matter which I think is very pertinent to the discussion that has been taking place.

As has been pointed out, the financing of seed grain in western Canada is assisted under arrangements made by legislation passed by this house. There have been requests from other parts of Canada for similar assistance. We have had very insistent requests from those representing the provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, and some representations have been received from the province of Ontario with regard to the necessity for assistance in furnishing seed supplies. The government has taken the same position with regard to all these applications, and it is the position that was outlined the other evening when we were discussing this matter. The government has taken the position that where a municipality is able, because of its financial circumstances, to provide for the needs of those living in the municipality, then it is a local responsibility. Where the requirements are too great to be taken care of by the municipal organization the matter is referred to the provincial government; and where the provincial government intimates to the federal government that the problem is so great that it cannot be taken care of due to the financial condition of the province, then the federal government has always been prepared to examine into the conditions existing and arrive at a conclusion as to whether those representations were based upon the actual facts and whether under the circumstances we should take any part in assisting in providing seed.

I speak now only of ordinary seed requirements. In all the provinces of Canada we do give help in securing and providing registered seed to people who are using such seed in different parts of the country. We also give assistance to the governments of the various provinces in selecting seed in other parts of Canada, in order that it may be shipped to the provinces requiring it. But with regard to actual assistance in financing the purchase of seed itself, and other seeding activities within the province, we have never undertaken that as a federal government in any province, from anything I can find in the records, unless conditions were as I have outlined. That is, the municipality first declares itself unable to take care of the situation; the province then declares its inability to meet the need, so that the problem becomes a national one. Under these circumstances we have entered into the task of trying to assist in providing seed and seeding necessities. With that in mind we have always felt that so far as the federal government is concerned we could not undertake within any province, where drought had become so acute that the problem became a national one, to do anything that would necessitate our undertaking similar responsibilities in other provinces. We do not feel that it is the federal duty to undertake to assist in providing seed for those who are in a position to provide it for themselves.

Some of the suggestions made this afternoon, if we were to accept them, might involve the government going so far as to assume responsibilities—both within the provinces where the drought is, and outside those provinces—that never have been anticipated in anything that has been done by this house, either under the present or under any previous government. As to whether or not the guarantee is sufficient, I can only repeat what was stated the other evening. The present decision has been based upon the experiences of the past few years and we believe that the amount provided will be sufficient for what is assumed to be the federal government's responsibility in this matter, that is to assist the provincial government in providing the necessary financial assistance to put seed into the ground where it could not otherwise be obtained. Having decided that, we asked the governments of Saskatchewan and Alberta to provide us with information upon which to base our decision as to what the amount should be. As was indicated a moment ago by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), the amount provided last year in Saskatchewan was $6,600,000. My memory is that the financial organizations did not undertake to go any further than the amount guaranteed by this government. They may have gone further, but in so far as this or the provincial governments were concerned, they did not undertake to go any further than the amount of the guarantee.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Does the minister mean the lending institutions or the mortgage companies?

Mr. GARDINER: I am referring to all lending institutions.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Did not the mortgage companies advance a million dollars to their tenants? The minister does not refer to them.

Mr. GARDINER: No, to the banking institutions. The mortgage companies advanced money to their tenants or to those who were on lands for which they took responsibility.

Mr. BENNETT: Foreclosed lands.

Mr. GARDINER: Lands in connection with which the mortgage companies had a financial interest and for which they considered they were responsible. They are doing the same thing this year quite outside of what we are referring to.

The legislation last year provided for a guarantee of $6,600,000. Some time in the month of July the government of Saskatchewan started to make representations with regard to seed grain. The first correspondence that we have on the files I believe is dated August 5. This correspondence had to do with the necessity for making an arrangement to have grain available for seeding when seeding was commenced in the following spring. As a result of these representations and of other discussions that had taken place before they were made, arrangements were entered into with the wheat board to secure whatever wheat was available.

In reply to the questions asked by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) having to do with this particular matter, I can only say that the figure used in arriving at an estimate of the amount that would have to be guaranteed has been $1.45 per bushel. To have reduced that figure at this stage would have meant that the total amount of the guarantee would have been reduced. There have been discussions as to what price ought to be finally charged and the discussions this afternoon might prove helpful in arriving at a final conclusion. The figure of $1.45 per bushel has appeared in all the estimates as the outside figure that would probably have to be charged to a farmer for seed wheat. The prices for other grains have been based on that price for wheat. I am sure that neither of the hon. members from Saskatchewan who have been speaking in regard to this matter would suggest that we should take a smaller figure than that maximum figure.

Mr. PERLEY: If the $1.45 per bushel was arrived at on the basis of $14,500,000 and it was then found that the price was too high and it was reduced, what difference would it make in the amount of the guarantee? You would be supplying a farmer with seed for the same number of acres.

Mr. GARDINER: The provincial government used the figure of $1.45. That figure was submitted to us as the outside cost and it was used in making our estimates of what the guarantee should be. The total amount is approximately $20,000,000. After negotiations with the banks and the loan companies it was decided that if the federal government gave a guarantee of $14,500,000, the banks would agree to supply the difference between that and $18,000,000 and the loan companies would supply the amount that they are satisfied they will have to supply. The total will be approaching $20,000,000 on the basis of $1.45 per bushel for wheat and corresponding prices for other grains with an allowance for petroleum products.

Mr. PERLEY: How many acres will that seed?

Mr. GARDINER: We are not responsible for that because it is a provincial matter. However, it is based upon a bushelage similar to what was used last year. The seeding rates are a bushel to a bushel and a quarter per acre for wheat, depending on the kind of soil. For oats it is a bushel and a half to a bushel and three-quarters, depending on the kind of soil and for barley, a bushel and a quarter to a bushel and a half. Then there is a five per cent allowance for clean-out. Minimum rates of seeding will apply except on heavy clay soils and in park belt area outside P.F.R.A. territory. While I have not the acreages before me, I have the amounts that were contained in the estimates which would give a fairly close indication of the acreages requiring to be seeded. I would say that the total acreage in Saskatchewan for which some form of assistance will have to be given will be in the neighbourhood of 12,000,000 acres. This is acreage to be seeded in all kinds of grain.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): When a farmer signs a promissory note, which I understand will be necessary under the guarantee seed loan bill of Saskatchewan, will he have to sign on the basis of $1.45 per bushel, or will that be left blank?

Mr. GARDINER: I assume that by the time the grain is delivered and the arrangements made, the definite amount will be known. My understanding is that it is the intention of the provincial government to charge the same rate for seed grain throughout the whole province. In previous years the tendency has been to charge different rates depending on the freight rates. The rate this year will be the same for the whole province, depending on the actual cost.

With regard to the size of the farms I can only say this: That is closely related to the matter I discussed first, namely, just how far a government should be expected to go in financing considerable acreage. That matter has been fully discussed by provincial governments, municipal bodies, individuals concerned, and representatives of the federal government for a great many years, and the conclusion arrived at is nearly always identical, or almost so, with the conclusion arrived at this year. The acreage provided for this year is not materially different from the acreage provided for last year. The statement read when the resolution was under discussion will show that the acreage to be sown on farms of 320 acres or less of cultivated land was not more than a maximum of 60 per cent of the total acreage, and I think the hon. member for Weyburn will agree that that is very close to the suggestion he made himself. On all farms of not more than 320 acres, it is advisable, under conditions existing, and with the supplies being obtained from someone else, to sow not more than 60 per cent of the acreage.

Then on farms of over 320 acres of cultivated land they sow 50 per cent up to a maximum of 250 acres. The only difference that might be taken to exist between these conditions and those of a year ago is that a year ago I think the figure was set at 300 acres. As I recall it, a little larger initial acreage was provided for at that time in agreeing to the 300 acres. But in view of the statement which the hon. member for Weyburn has read to the house indicating that the whole estimate of seed last year was based upon one bushel to the acre for the total acreage to be sown to wheat, and the fact that this year they are estimating it at from one to one and a quarter bushels to the acre, the individual who decides of his own choice that one bushel is sufficient to seed per acre, can seed even more than 250 acres if he has one and a quarter bushels an acre with which to seed his land.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The circular I read provided for one to one and a quarter bushels. It did not specify one bushel.

Mr. GARDINER: The statement the hon. member finally read and placed before the house when the estimates were going through was that the estimate of 2,739,000 bushels was based on 2,739,000 acres, or one bushel to the acre. This year the government started out by saying that on a considerable part of this acreage it might be necessary to sow one and one quarter bushels, and in arriving at their decision they are providing more wheat in some cases. Much of that large acreage spoken of is in the heavy soil area, and if a farmer has provided to him one and a quarter bushels an acre for 250 acres, and he himself decides to seed only one bushel to the acre instead of one and a quarter, he will come very close again to the 300 acres provided for last year.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Except that he is not guaranteed that he will get one and a quarter bushels.

Mr. GARDINER: We have nothing to do with that. That is dealt with by the provincial government.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But the minister based an argument on his supposition.

Mr. GARDINER: Just as my hon. friend did. I am basing my argument on a supposition, and my supposition at present is the supposition my hon. friend created.

Having said that with regard to acreage, let me refer to the one further matter that has been called to the attention of the house, namely, the matter of distribution. The other evening, when this matter was mentioned on two occasions, I purposely refrained from making any reference to it because, after all, as every hon. member now knows, the distribution of seed grain in western Canada, ever since seed grain was first distributed in the west, or at least ever since we have had municipalities in western Canada, has been handled largely through the municipal bodies. I am certain that that is true in Saskatchewan. No matter what government we have had in Saskatchewan, seed grain has been distributed through the municipal bodies.

Mr. HAYHURST: That applies in Alberta too.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, and I am quite sure that members from western Canada will agree that there is no more non-partisan way in which seed grain could be distributed than through the municipal bodies, because, after all, in spite of what has been said in this house by members from time to time, every member from western Canada knows that our municipal elections out there, whether they be city, town or municipal, are seldom contested on any partisan political basis. Someone behind me says never, and I think that is probably a true statement of conditions existing there. Partisan politics do not enter into the election of councils in western Canada, and I say that on behalf of all parties so far as Saskatchewan is concerned. It is not the practice to allow either provincial or federal partisan considerations to enter into the election of councils.

I could bring into this house many communications that I have had, since this question became a matter of discussion, from municipal officials, some of whom have been strong supporters of members sitting on the opposite side of the house, indicating that at no time has the administration of relief or the distribution of feed and fodder or seed been made a matter of political consideration in Saskatchewan or in Alberta. I state that only to indicate that all of the political discussions I have ever heard with respect to this matter have taken place either in this house or in the legislatures of the provinces concerned. Political discussions in relation to the problem confronting us are taking place both in this house and in the legislatures of the provinces, and it is probably only natural that should be the case because there is no doubt whatever that elections, federal and provincial, do take place on a political basis. In so far as we on this side of the house, more particularly the ministers who are intimately concerned with the administration of matters of this kind, are concerned, we do not object in any way to any political discussions in the house with regard to this question or to any political accusations in regard to it, but we would like our friends who make political accusations to give us just a little more detail with regard to them in order that we might be able to answer them. With one exception I have yet to receive from a single municipality anywhere in Saskatchewan a statement to the effect that political considerations have been brought into the decisions in connection with these matters. That one municipality was in one of those districts which have been mentioned in some of the discussion to-day. When the matter was looked into, it was clearly shown that even in that case there had been no political considerations.

Dealing with the question of horses being brought back not in the best of condition, I can only say this: Again, it is not a matter of immediate federal consideration. But we have placed at the disposal of the provincial government of Saskatchewan the Carberry pasturage, which was referred to a few moments ago, composed of 130,000 acres of land which we fenced in last year in order to assist in handling the cattle that were being brought out of the drought area. We have also agreed with the Alberta government to make it possible for them to send horses to a ranch in the southern part of Alberta, and to pay the costs for the horses for both the pasturage in Alberta and the Carberry pasturage on a somewhat similar basis to what we would have paid had the horses been left at home.

Mr. BENNETT: Which ranch is that?

Mr. GARDINER: It is a ranch in the vicinity of Manyberries. The lease was being dropped this year by one of the ranchers who had been on it, and the pasturage has been used by the government to take care of some of these horses.

I am informed that the age of the horses in western Canada, more particularly in the drought area, is very much higher than it was when the drought period had its beginning, and that is only natural. People had been getting along with their old horses at a time when they had no funds with which to resupply themselves with younger horses, and according to our check, there were among the horses which went down to the Carberry pasture, at a time when some 1,500 had reached the pasture, about fifty that I would agree should never have been sent there. The check was not sufficiently careful to prevent old horses from being sent which could only die when they got there. It is just possible, too, that among those which were shipped back, some were too old to be able to rustle on the grass lands of that particular pasture and come through to the spring period in a proper condition to be placed upon the land in order to put in the crop. But what I wish to impress on the house is that that is a matter which is being taken care of by the provincial governments. They have estimated all these things in coming to a conclusion as to how much money would be required, and I feel quite satisfied that, with the financial arrangement which is being made in both Saskatchewan and Alberta, the governments will be able to take care of the essential needs of those who require, first, seed, and, second, some form of assistance in connection with obtaining power to put the seed in the ground, and even to provide extra feed and fodder with which to put the work stock in shape to take care of seeding operations when they come.

It is now about a month away from the usual time of seeding a very considerable part of that area. The work stock is being returned to the area; the work stock in the area will be fed during the next two weeks or, in some instances, three weeks, out of feed and fodder that was provided through the winter months down to the end of March, and provision is made, under the legislation which is now going through, whereby that feed can be replenished out of the supplies of money that are being provided under this legislation to carry the stock through from the time when the winter supplies run out, to the end of the seeding period. Hon. members can rest assured that every consideration possible is being given to these matters, and also, I believe, that the municipalities in both provinces will take the same care this year as they have in past years to see that political motives do not enter into the consideration of this question. So far as I am concerned I have not heard that that was the case, either since this government has been in power or during the time the previous government was in office. There have been criticisms both when the previous government was in power and during the present government's term of office that too much consideration was given to political friends in the engaging of those who were employed from time to time to assist. But I believe that everyone, no matter to what political party he belongs, agrees that individuals once employed to take care of the situation existing in western Canada, whether they were municipal authorities or were directly engaged by governments, have not allowed party considerations to enter into the making of their decisions as to whether the man should, in the first place, have assistance, and in the second, how much he should get, and I am quite sure that that will not happen this year any more than it has happened in other years.

Mr. PERLEY: With respect to the minister's statement that the cabinet and the inspector have the say as to the amount which shall be granted to a municipality, does he mean that the inspector will not examine each individual application which is made to the municipality and then report to the cabinet whether he approves it or not? Or does the inspector just take the question of the maximum amount granted to a municipality, and review that?

Mr. GARDINER: No; the provincial government does not do anything at all about the matter until the municipality makes application for seed assistance. If the municipality does not make application, the provincial government will not deal with the matter. When the municipal authorities make application, they include particulars of the acreage for which they desire assistance, the amount of seed they think should be provided for that acreage, the repairs they require, the amount of assistance for providing power; everything of that nature must be in the application. All that the government says is: "When we receive that application, we will not place it before one minister; we will appoint a committee of the council so that it will receive full consideration, and that committee will sit along with the inspector who has inspected the municipality and arrive at a conclusion as to whether their representations are justified by the actual facts." If they consider they are, that will be the amount allowed; if they think it should be cut down, they will go back and discuss the matter with the municipality. That is the practice which has always been followed, and that practice, I am sure, will be followed this year.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I do not propose at the moment to trespass upon the time of the house at any great length, but I should like to suggest that we treat this as an ordinary business transaction. We are asked on behalf of the Dominion of Canada to give our guarantee to the banks of this country to ensure them against loss for advances made to municipalities, which, in turn, have been guaranteed by two of the western provinces. Ordinarily, if that were a business transaction submitted to any one of us, we should impose certain conditions upon the granting of our guarantee; if those conditions were absent, it would be regarded as bad business; if those conditions were present, it would be regarded as good business.

One of the matters which we have to consider is the price which the farmer has to pay for what he gets. This perhaps is the most important of all the conditions with which we have to deal. By the use of some authority about which I shall speak when the house is in committee, this government utilized the wheat board for certain purposes. The statute says that the wheat board shall buy only from producers. The time when the wheat board extended its option to October is a matter of exact date. It had on hand a certain quantity of wheat. It was known that wheat would be required for seed in this country. Notwithstanding that fact the October option was extended. Then we proceeded to buy back that option.

That raises a question of first-rate importance in this country. It is one of the most important questions that will engage the attention of the house, because it is a large issue of principle which will have to be settled. The farmer is now called upon to pay on the basis of that option having been bought back and converted into cash wheat, and the price is mentioned as $1.45. Had the cash wheat been held before the option was extended to October, that difficulty would not have arisen. If any of us, dealing with this matter purely as a business transaction, had dealt with it in that way, we certainly should have had some difficulty with our shareholders. This is a matter in regard to which we require a good deal of explanation.

According to the papers which have been tabled, the wheat board remitted to the federal government eight million dollars, and deposited with this government two million dollars more, making a total of ten million dollars. That eight million dollars has gone into the revenues of the country. It represented profits which accrued in the manner indicated in the auditors' reports. The other two million dollars have been paid back to the wheat board for the purpose of enabling it to acquire the wheat on conversion of those options into cash wheat. In fact, the last report indicates that, in addition, the wheat board borrowed substantial sums from the banks of the country. Substantial loans have been made from banks. Under what authority? I can remember when authority was the all-important question on this side of the house, and when hours and days were taken up in discussing that question. But where is the authority to use the wheat board in the manner in which it has been used? An order in council has been read by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley); but the wheat board act provides only one thing, namely, that wheat shall be bought from the producer and no one else; and the price to be paid for it was 87½ cents, and that only when the price of wheat reached 90 cents.

There are the facts; and yet the government has utilized the machinery of this statute without permitting the farmer to exercise his right to sell to the board, depriving him by the terms of an order in council which is illegal, without any question, because no condition which nullifies the operation of a statute can be imposed by order in council. That does not require argument even in this parliament; even the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) will not question that. No condition can be imposed upon a grant when it nullifies the statute under which it is granted. That is so simple that I should not even state it here. Those are the facts, and I submit that we must have adequate information with respect to that matter because it is the fundamental consideration in connection with this transaction.

In the second place, there is a good deal of force in the arguments that have been advanced this afternoon with respect to the acreage which is to be placed under crop. Not for a moment do I fail to recognize the difficulty of this government or of any government similarly situated. It has a right to impose conditions, because it is on our credit that this seed is being obtained. The conditions that it proposes to accept and not to impose are those found in an act of the Saskatchewan legislature. They have seen fit to provide that every person, rich or poor, high or low, who is so situated as to require assistance—not that they once did not require it, but they are now so situated as to stand in need of it—shall receive assistance only to the extent of 250 acres for seeding purposes. Well, I have lived in the west for forty years, and I have seen a quarter section, 160 acres, develop and expand and grow, until I have known a great many farms of a section, where it would not be unusual to expect 400 acres to be available, ready for seeding. I think I am stating the case fairly to those who know more about the matter than I do. There have been farms of a section and a half, of two sections, and of several sections. These people were once very well-to-do; all you have to do is to look at their places and see their houses, outbuildings, fences, and machinery. But by reason of the drought that we have now had upon us for more years than the evil days which fell upon Egypt, these people are practically penniless. It is a terrible thing to say, but I know men on relief in the west who were once very rich—well, not very rich, but more than comfortably off, quite well-to-do.

Mr. DUNNING: And who still own quite a bit of land.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, men who still own land in the condition I have mentioned, land that has not produced any crop now for, in some instances, eight long years. One gentleman told me the other day that last year was the eighth year in which his crop had been destroyed by drought.

Are we doing right in limiting these people to 250 acres? I am not speaking in any partisan sense; I am merely stating my own observations and my own experience in dealing with these problems, and, mark you, I am not forgetting for a moment the fierce tirade of abuse levelled at us after the last world wheat congress when it was suggested that there might be a limitation in production. That suggestion was met with very fierce denunciation; yet that limitation is now to take place, and it is to be brought about when, if we may judge from the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) —and he has experience as a western farmer— the moisture situation is favourable. The day before yesterday I was talking to a gentleman from the west and he went as far as to say this: "I have been over the western country these last few weeks, and I would regard the significant signs as being favourable to a crop in 1938." Of course, I am not unmindful of the fact that so many hon. gentlemen opposite, when parliament prorogued last year, were quite hopeful and, in fact, almost convinced that there would be a crop; yet we all know what the result has been.

Well, are we quite fair in giving this guarantee and accepting the limitation to 250 acres? I fully appreciate the argument of the Minister of Agriculture a moment ago that there are corporations and mortgage and loan companies which will make loans. I say to the minister, however, that last year they did not make loans for seed grain. They advanced money and had the farmer buy seed, because he was working for them on a crop payment plan, so that if he got anything they got something, and if he got nothing they got nothing. In the drought area a great many farmers got nothing, with the result that the advance had to be written off against profit and loss. What the minister says is quite clear. Some of these organizations will advance money to those who now occupy the position of tenant with them by reason of (a) foreclosure, under which they continue as tenants, or (b) pending final order of foreclosure, where they undertake to stay on, the understanding being that if they get a crop they will have something which will enable them to make the place their home again.

Mr. DUNNING: It has a much wider application than that.

Mr. BENNETT: I am coming to the third class, wider than the other two together, namely, those who are holding on to their homes, taking advantage of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, having projected their obligations into the future. They have been given a chance by the board of review to continue, and, in words that I have already used, try to work out their own salvation.

Mr. GARDINER: It includes another class.

Mr. BENNETT: Which class?

Mr. GARDINER: The class on whose land the loan company has a lien, but has not taken action.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the biggest class.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; but that is the ordinary case of mortgaged property, in which no proceedings have been taken because neither the insurance companies, nor the loan companies, nor individuals desire to have the property on their hands under existing conditions.

Mr. GARDINER: It covers a much larger class.

Mr. DUNNING: In relation to this problem it is a much larger class.

Mr. BENNETT: I had thought that class was now merged with the class which had taken advantage to a considerable extent of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. My own observation, in those communities with which I have made myself familiar leads me to say with great frankness that the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act has been used by a very large number of those who found themselves with a mortgage bearing such a relation to present value that it was idle to think of being able to pay the mortgage off. But that is a matter of detail which need not enter into a discussion of the broad principle which I assert should be considered. I should like the government to consider whether it is not desirable to state as we have a right to do, as one of our conditions in giving this guarantee, that it might be made available for the acquisition of seed for a larger area than 250 acres. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) asked the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Dougles) a very pertinent question. He asked him, "What would you suggest?" He suggested a sliding scale. The minister then said, "Yes, but there are cases in which they will get assistance from other sources; how would that be dealt with?" It could easily be said, "In necessitous cases," and we could define that in such manner as to make clear the class to which it refers. It seems to me a sliding scale might be most desirable. For instance, I hesitate to say that we should place a limitation of 250 acres in the case of a man who has 1,000 acres of land which looks extremely favourable for the production of a crop, and where it would not be unreasonable to say that 500 acres would be ready for crop. I think it is not unusual that half the land is available for crop.

Mr. GARDINER: Might I interrupt to point out that I said in addition, in reply to the hon. member for Weyburn, that there is at present a sliding scale in the provincial estimate. It says that on farms with 320 acres or less of cultivated land not more than sixty per cent of such acreage is to be sown, and on farms of over 320 acres of cultivated land fifty per cent may be sown up to a maximum of 250 acres. Then it goes on to state in the estimate that the nature of the land and all that shall be taken into consideration.

Mr. BENNETT: But there can never be more than 250 acres. I followed the minister in that regard the other day with great care. There is a sliding scale until the quantity reaches 250 acres, but there is no scale beyond that.

Mr. DUNNING: Except in bushels, the variation in bushels per acre.

Mr. BENNETT: The determination of that issue depends upon whether the land may be inferior or superior.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): It depends upon the amount the farmer himself would want to sow.

Mr. BENNETT: And it depends upon the quality of the land.

Mr. DONNELLY: In the drought area it is estimated at less.

Mr. BENNETT: I used the term "quality of the land" to cover all these factors. The other day the minister read from the statute and I asked, "Is that by statute?" He replied, "Yes; it is a statute of Saskatchewan and the regulations made under it." But it will be noted that there is no expansion of the 250 acres except such as might automatically arise from the sowing of a bushel and a quarter instead of a bushel to the acre.

Mr. DUNNING: The Alberta act has the same provision, with the difference that it stops at 300 acres.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite. One appreciates the attitude of the provinces. I think there is much in what has been said by both ministers, that the provinces should be better able than we are to determine the extent to which they will permit their people to incur obligations. On the other hand, the creation of new wealth is a matter of vital importance to Canada. It does not concern Saskatchewan and Alberta alone; it touches Ontario and British Columbia and every other part of this country. My only doubt has been as to whether we are shutting our eyes to the fact that there are very large farms in the west. I doubt not that the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) is cultivating now close to 1,000 acres of land.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): More.

Mr. BENNETT: He is in the fortunate position of not requiring assistance to obtain seed. But let us suppose his neighbour has also 1,000 acres of land, is not so fortunate and has to depend entirely upon the government for seed. Are we acting rightly when we say that this poor unfortunate, who for causes over which he had no control finds himself unable to provide seed for himself, shall not have seed for more than 250 acres of land, whereas his more fortunate neighbour is able to get seed for 500 acres? That is a matter which gives me some concern. I mention it because I am not a practical farmer, which, I fancy, is quite apparent to those who are listening.

Mr. DUNNING: The right hon. member is doing very well, better than I should do as a lawyer.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Moose Jaw was finding a little fault because one hon. member used the word "cultivated." That is the language of the statute of Saskatchewan. When it was read, I was amazed at its being put in just those terms by that legislature which contains so many farmers; for I raised the same objection in my mind as the hon. member, which shows I must have some slight knowledge of farming. At one time we had a distinguished member of this house who was a member of the legal profession; and his lawyer friends said that he was an excellent farmer, and his farmer friends said that he was a fair lawyer. But that does not arise in this case. I think if the Minister of Agriculture had been framing the legislation, he would probably have extended it to make it clear that it has a larger meaning than the mere word "cultivated." The hon. member for Moose Jaw pointed out that what he had in his mind was that the land was fitted to receive seed.

Mr. GARDINER: If I may be permitted to interrupt again, I think it will be found that is taken care of in the matter of acreage. That is the very reason they said it should not be more than sixty per cent. In the system of farming prevailing in that region, that is a proper limitation. Where dry farming and summer fallowing are the custom, they summer fallow at least one-third.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the reason why I used the figures I did, of 500 acres out of 1,000 being available for seeding.

Then you come to the problem of distribution. The Minister of Agriculture is not wholly right in what he said as to distribution of seed grain in western Canada, because it will be remembered that the distribution of seed grain in western Canada commenced in the time when the present provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta were territories. It was then felt to be an obligation of the federal government, for they were administered under dominion control, and no question such as that raised this afternoon was raised.

Mr. DUNNING: There was a different question.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course it was. In one case it was a territory and, in the other, a province.

Mr. DUNNING: No; a different question as to the status of individuals.

Mr. BENNETT: But I am pointing out the circumstances under which the first distributions took place. It was in the territories. I can recall how strange it seemed to me, coming from the east, to hear them talking about Ottawa distributing seed grain to the farmers of the country. Then I learned that the dominion government had taken the attitude that the people there were wards, using the word in a broad sense, provincial institutions not having been created. Notwithstanding the setting up of the provinces, it still became essential to advance money for seed grain, but this was done by the provinces making application to the dominion for assistance. Ever since the provinces were created in 1905, the method of distribution has not always been uniform. There have been times when one method was followed and other times when other methods were followed. But broadly and generally in Saskatchewan the matter has been left to the councils. Alberta was slower in developing municipal government, except through what were called large improvement districts, and in those cases distribution was sometimes made through someone connected with the Department of Agriculture, who was permanently on the ground, or by a combination of several methods.

I suppose every hon. member knows what our unfortunate history about seed grain has been. In every case we took a lien. It was a lien that attached by reason of a statute passed here. And from the day I first came into this house until I was endeavouring to administer the affairs of the country, the question was: How are you going to write off the seed liens?

Mr. DUNNING: That is on homesteads.

Mr. BENNETT: Some of them were not on homesteads.

Mr. DUNNING: The dominion liens?

Mr. BENNETT: No; there were dominion liens in the territories before any provincial institutions were set up, and in many instances those liens were, I am sorry to say, not paid.

Mr. DUNNING: On other than homesteads?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I think on other than homesteads.

Mr. DUNNING: For years the dominion government contended with me that they were responsible only for homesteads.

Mr. BENNETT: A former Minister of the Interior, Hon. Charles Stewart, was responsible, I think, for the last legislation in that regard. We had a sort of tribunal set up that dealt with these matters, and we used to pass orders in council on representations from this board, wiping out liabilities, or accepting smaller sums for larger, and thus getting rid of the liens. The hon. member for Colchester-Hants (Mr. Purdy) suggested that the dominion was going to lose this money. I do not share that view. If we get a crop, the province will be paid and we shall be paid. If we do not get a crop, we are just going to be out that much money, and we might as well make up our minds as to that right now. What we are doing, therefore, is underwriting providence to the extent of this much money.

Mr. DUNNING: And in various ways we have been doing so for seven years.

Mr. BENNETT: In some instances we are now entering upon that for the eighth year. That is why the matter strikes me as being so tremendously serious, and I fully share a sense of the responsibility that both ministers have put to the house regarding the attitude taken by both Alberta and Saskatchewan in the limitation of acreage. Yet I feel that there is something to be said about the desirability of a scale which goes beyond 250 acres, having regard to the large farms.

I have trespassed longer upon the time of the house than I had intended when I rose in my place. I desired only to direct attention to those three matters, because as underwriters, without whom the money cannot be secured, we have the right to impose conditions in the statute notwithstanding any legislation that may have been passed by any of the provinces. That is clear and obvious. Then they take it or leave it as to them may seem desirable. The legislation contemplates recognition of, shall I say, the superior knowledge of the local authorities on the one hand, and the right to receive the money without further conditions on the other; whereas I suggest that it may be desirable to consider the legislation from the other standpoint as well, namely, whether or not we are doing exactly what is fair when we have that limitation.

In connection with the operations of the wheat board it does not seem that any opportunity will arise for receiving an explanation as to how the seed grain was acquired and the conditions under which that was done, unless a judicial commission is set up to inquire into the whole matter. There were very heavy sales of wheat, for instance on one occasion in July, which have called for a great deal of criticism. I do not think the whole matter should be canvassed at the present moment; rather we should limit ourselves to the discussion and consideration of the operations that have taken place since the government first gave instructions—which I assume will be placed before us in writing—to the board to take the action that was taken, and an adequate explanation will no doubt be offered as to why wheat which might have been available was carried forward into an October option and why, so soon after, the option was brought back. The net result has been that a premium was created. We cannot get away from this, whether we like it or not. That brought about the premium, and I am afraid it was not unknown. It will be remembered that Paul once said, "I am convinced this thing was not done in a corner." Those are not the exact words; they will be remembered by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). It was known to everybody within, shall I say, a week or ten days. It was bound to be known, because the conversion of an October option into cash wheat involved operations which, in the very nature of things, means disclosing what was being done.

Mr. DUNNING: It could not be only October.

Mr. BENNETT: No; I was mentioning just the larger one. That involved the premium to which I referred.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Not only that.

Mr. BENNETT: No, not only that; many things brought about the premium, but that was one of the great factors. It was a fluctuating premium, which is now being reflected in added cost to the farmer, and, I think I can say with some safety, with some measure of profit to somebody.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. WILLIAM HAYHURST (Vegreville): When the house rose at six o'clock we were discussing the seed and grain relief question. The members from the maritime provinces, Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia who have spoken on this subject should consider themselves fortunate in not having a condition such as this to face in their home districts. We are certainly sorry that we must ask for a government guarantee in Alberta for seed relief purposes. I have had it said to me on different occasions that the western members inadvertently give the western provinces a bad name by advertising them in the wrong way. The people in the east and other parts of Canada think that western Canada is impoverished and in a bad condition financially, socially and otherwise. I should like to disabuse the minds of hon. members of that notion by quoting the production figures for last year. Alberta produced 74,000,000 bushels of wheat, almost half the total production of Canada and more than half the total production of the western provinces. We produced 77,000,000 bushels of oats, and we produced practically half of the total barley produced in western Canada.

These figures show that all of Alberta has not been dried out. It is estimated that the 1938 wheat acreage in Alberta will be approximately 8,000,000 acres, while the acreage in Saskatchewan will be 13,000,000 acres. The wheat acreage in Saskatchewan is practically all in the dried-out belt, while a large portion of the Alberta acreage is in a more humid region. At least 5,000,000 acres of the finest wheat land in Canada are in Alberta in sections that have sufficient moisture and rainfall almost to guarantee a crop. Any effort made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to diversify farming in Alberta and other parts of Canada will be appreciated by all of us. We would be more than happy to be able to produce large quantities of wheat even though we know that when that wheat is placed on the markets of the world, prices will naturally fall.

If we are to have a strong dominion, no part or province of that dominion must be discriminated against unduly. If business is to be good in one province, it must be good in all. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) said, I think last year, it is no use to take from some of us to give to all of us. I want the people of eastern Canada to understand that this is merely a loan to the municipalities so that this part of Canada may be able to produce wealth more abundantly This is the first opportunity I have had of tendering my personal thanks to the people in the east for the vegetables, fruit and other materials sent to the impoverished farmers in my province.

Last year the government purchased a certain number of wheat options, and it would seem that they should have made some money on the transaction. On July 31, 1937, unsold wheat amounted to 6,964,000 bushels represented by futures contracts which, in the ordinary course of business, would have been disposed of prior to that date. I take these figures from the report of the Canadian wheat board. If any criticism is to come from me, it is that we should deplore this buying of options by the government. The farmers of western Canada have suffered greatly in the past because of attempts they have made to go into this business of buying options. Thousands of farmers have lost their all on the grain exchange at Winnipeg through buying and selling options. The options bought and sold on that exchange represent millions of bushels more than the actual crop raised.

I should like to illustrate my point by detailing what happened last summer on the grain exchange. The farmers of western Canada sold rye options for July delivery all the way from $1 to $1.40 a bushel. On July 31, 1937, rye was taken off the board at around $1.63 a bushel, while at the same time July wheat was $1.43. Many farmers thought it would prove profitable to sell rye and buy wheat, but in doing this they were playing into the hands of those who deal in this type of transaction. The result was that they were trimmed and certainly needed the apples which were sent out from the east.

Many of these men sold rye in the belief that if wheat went down, rye would also go down. But, lo and behold, when wheat went down rye went up! When the rye option was finally taken off the Winnipeg board, it was $1.63; wheat was $1.45 while cash rye was around 93 cents. The cash price was 70 cents a bushel below the paper price which was just a pen-and-ink quotation which could be wiped off the books at a single stroke. This is what was done, and thousands of farmers who had sold rye were deprived of their margin. I went into one office and asked them if they would take rye for these options. They told me that cash rye was 95 cents at that time. That meant that if we threshed our rye we would get only 90 cents a bushel, while the paper price was $1.63. I asked them what would happen if we imported rye from the United States. There was plenty of rye available in that country at 78 cents a bushel, but they told me that the United States rye was not as good as the Canadian. They always have some way of getting out of a thing like this. They wanted to take that rye off the books so that they could tell the men who held options that they had lost their money when July 31 came around. It was upon this subject that I had intended to say a few words before six o'clock.

In travelling through western Canada I find many farmers who have been stung at some time or another by the grain exchange. We are anxiously waiting for the report of the Turgeon commission and would like to know why it has not been brought down. We realize that something must be done to prevent manipulation in grain futures on the Winnipeg grain exchange and we deplore the government's participation in transactions of this kind. We believe that the government should have made money as a brokerage at one-thirty-second of a cent should be enough. If they were buying wheat in 1935 at around 89 cents a bushel, they should be making plenty of money when they sell it to the farmer at $1.45 a bushel. As a matter of fact, we feel that the farmer is entitled to wheat at a lower price than $1.45 a bushel for his seed in the drought areas. I know that cuts both ways, because in my own constituency there is a considerable amount of seed wheat for sale and we naturally want to see a good price for those who have it for sale. At the same time I would bring to the attention of hon. members the disintegrating force that is exerted by such transactions as I have mentioned on the Winnipeg grain exchange, and which are dividing Canada instead of unifying it. Some hon. members wonder why the people of the west return men who are opposed to the present financial set-up, but it is really because we are being impoverished, more or less, by market manipulators not only in the west but also in the east.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Dominion guarantee of bank loans in respect to Alberta.

Mr. BENNETT: I suggest that it would be well to set out the Alberta statute as a schedule to this act. I think that would be useful and helpful in the future, having regard to the fact that the bill does not contemplate payments being made for three years. It must be remembered that the banks must agree to lend this money for a period of three years, which is an unusual transaction in connection with capital expenditure; indeed, it is unusual for such loans to run beyond a year. The municipalities are guaranteeing the money to the bank; the province then gives its guarantee, and we do not become responsible as joint guarantors but responsible only to pay any ultimate liability not discharged by the province or the municipalities at the end of three years.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend is not quite right. The municipality is the borrower. It is not a guarantor.

Mr. BENNETT: I should not have used the word guarantor. I knew, of course, they were the borrowers, and it is their responsibility to pay. That is the proper way to put it. They are the primary debtors; then the next debtor by way of guarantee is the province, and we are not going to be called upon to pay, as the legislation distinctly states, until it has been made clearly apparent that three years have passed and after an order in council has been passed by our own government itself defining the circumstances under which the province shall be conclusively deemed unable to fulfil its guarantee. I am only putting this suggestion to the committee; but it strikes me that it would serve a useful purpose if we attached the statute of the province as a schedule to the bill, because it recites what we are guaranteeing and makes clear what we are doing. It might properly, therefore, be a part of the bill, and the same with respect to Saskatchewan in view of the fact that the Minister of Agriculture has just intimated to me that he is going to make a statement presently that he has found that what he thought was a statute was in part a regulation.

Mr. GARDINER: In connection with the Saskatchewan act, Mr. Chairman, I should like to point out that in the discussion this afternoon we inadvertently—

Mr. BENNETT: It was the other day.

Mr. GARDINER: And this afternoon. I stated that all of these provisions were in the Saskatchewan act; but I find on a close check of the act itself that the memorandum does not make entirely plain the fact that only the first provision in the act, with respect to the $200 maximum per quarter section, is provided for in the act. The Saskatchewan act provides:

> The municipality shall not advance in any one year seed grain and supplies of any greater value than $200 in respect of any one quarter section.

The next provision is not in the act:

> On farms of 320 acres or less of cultivated land no more than sixty per cent of such acreage is to be sown.

Nor is the following provision in the act:

> (d) on farms of over 320 acres of cultivated land fifty per cent thereof may be sown up to a maximum of 250 acres.

That is not in the act. It is a matter of regulation, submitted in connection with the estimates.

Mr. DUNNING: In regard to the point made by the right hon. leader of the opposition, the only objection I can think of at the moment to printing the existing act as a schedule to the bill is the fact that provision is made in section 2 itself with respect to amendments to that act.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the very reason I suggest it should be printed as a schedule.

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid we cannot go ahead with the bill, then.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes. The point I was trying to make was that the conditions under which we are putting our name on the back of this paper are disclosed by an act, and it was because I saw those words in the section regarding amendments that I thought it desirable that we have in the statute as a schedule the conditions under which this parliament gives its approval to that guarantee. If we were drawing it up as a matter of business, we should have the conditions attached to the agreement.

Mr. DUNNING: There will have to be an agreement in addition to the statute.

Mr. BENNETT: That is an additional reason why I think the statute should be attached as a schedule to the bill, in that the statute would then always be available to members of the house hereafter to enable them to know the exact terms under which we incurred this liability. The amount asked for is $1,900,000. There can be no complaint that we did not give them all they asked for; that is obvious. But the conditions under which we are providing the seed are set forth in that statute.

Mr. DUNNING: The conditions under which they are providing it, subject to our guarantee.

Mr. BENNETT: We really are doing it by giving our guarantee, and the reason we become responsible for the payment of $1,900,000 is that we have presented to us a statute upon which we have relied. If someone desires to see what that statute is, he will look in vain in this bill to find it. It is usual in cases of this kind to attach the statute as a schedule to the bill, just as in the case of an agreement indicating certain conclusions arrived at by the parties. There are in the older statutes innumerable cases of attaching as a schedule to the statute the conditions which enable one to understand at a glance just what we have done, and why. I think that is desirable.

Mr. DUNNING: I am in a little difficulty in regard to that from the standpoint of time because the Alberta act has not yet been amended, I believe, to bring it up to this year. It is necessary for these legislatures to amend their own acts to make the necessary provision for an additional year. In the legislation which we enacted previously, in the last two sessions, we did not adopt the policy of attaching the provincial act as a schedule, and I am afraid that if we were going to do so now, we would have to wait until we received from the province their completed statute for this session.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the minister mean to say it is not passed yet?

Mr. DUNNING: It is not passed yet. I have no objection in principle to presenting a provincial act as a schedule to the bill; but might I suggest that possibly the same object would be served if we attached the provincial statute to the agreement pertaining to this legislation and then tabled the whole thing in the house?

Mr. BENNETT: That serves, in part, the purpose. I do not want the minister to conclude that I had any particular view about the matter.

Mr. DUNNING: No; I understand that.

Mr. BENNETT: But I should like to say this. I suppose it is because one has been trained as he has, that when I pick up a statute of the Dominion of Canada and look at it, if it refers to something else I like to have that "something else" on the record so that I shall have no difficulty in understanding it; and a layman should be in exactly the same position. That is purely a question of convenience. But where it involves what this does, it is more than a question of convenience. However, as the statute is not passed, we need not waste time talking about it; it cannot be printed.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course there would be involved the printing as a schedule of all the preceding acts referring to the same act which are dealt with here. There could not be a complete understanding of this act without the printing as a schedule of each of the annual amendments of the provincial statute.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no; you just print the statute as it was passed this year.

Mr. STEWART: Applicable to this guarantee.

Mr. DUNNING: Their statute of this year will bring up to date the previous ones. That, I think, is correct.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that all it is going to do?

Mr. DUNNING: That is all we know of. There are three acts in the case of Saskatchewan, one in the case of Alberta.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; I see that.

Mr. PERLEY: Hon. J. G. Taggart, Minister of Agriculture of Saskatchewan, has made the statement that 6,500,000 bushels of wheat have moved into districts where it is required; that the board has authorized that movement. Could the minister tell us what proportion of that 6,500,000 bushels was acquired in Saskatchewan and where the balance was acquired?

Mr. GARDINER: I can hardly understand the figures that have just been given by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. It is just possible that they cover the amounts of both feed and seed which are being shipped into the area to take care of both requirements. There would not be that much wheat shipped in to date under the undertaking in which this government is interested. There may be that much wheat required in order to take care of purchases which are going to be made by individuals, loan companies, and companies that are going to seed their own land. The government of Saskatchewan has assumed responsibility for attempting to ship into the area all the grain that will be required by individuals generally; grain that is supplied to loan companies and to corporations having land and to individuals who can pay for their seed will be sold outright and will not be affected by this guarantee. So I do not think we can show any real relationship between any figure for grain shipped up to the present and grain covered by this guarantee.

Mr. PERLEY: This report distinctly states that the grain board has authorized the distribution of that much wheat. I should like to know what wheat has been acquired anywhere in Saskatchewan.

Mr. DUNNING: In it, or for it?

Mr. PERLEY: Acquired within the province for the province?

Mr. DUNNING: We cannot answer that. I cannot tell precisely where the wheat was acquired—how much was acquired in Saskatchewan, how much in Manitoba, and how much in Alberta. I simply have not that information. With respect to the movement of wheat I am advised—this advice is now a day or two old—that there should be at this date about three and a half to four million bushels either now in Saskatchewan or on wheels to destination points in Saskatchewan. That is the latest information I have with respect to the movement. But, as the Minister of Agriculture has explained, there is much more involved in that movement than is involved in what we are guaranteeing, because the province is undertaking to see that wheat is there for all purchasers, and not merely purchasers through the municipalities covered by this guarantee.

Mr. PERLEY: Can the minister inform us of the price? They surely must have arrived at a price if they are distributing the wheat, because the farmer must give a note in settlement.

Mr. DUNNING: No; the price is not definitely settled.

Mr. PERLEY: Then what kind of settlement are they taking from the farmers?

Mr. DUNNING: They cannot take any settlement from the farmers until this legislation is passed and until the necessary agreement consequent upon it is made. In the meantime the varying freights from points of origin to points of destination have all to be pooled because, as I understand the situation, the intention of the province is to charge one price over all the province. Therefore, all the charges have to be actually arrived at. They have had to make special arrangements with the railways regarding demurrage on cars in order to give the farmers an opportunity of unloading at eleven hundred points in Saskatchewan. All these charges must be arrived at before the last half-cent of price can possibly be determined. I cannot give any other answer than that to my hon. friend. I said the other day that, in the judgment of those handling the seed, it would be somewhere between $1.40 and $1.45 in total cost covering everything to the farmer. I am sorry I cannot come closer than that in a transaction of this complexity and magnitude; to say something definite would be merely to put oneself in the position of making a mistake, or being likely to do so.

Mr. PERLEY: Can the minister inform us whether they have made any arrangement with the railway company with respect to freight or will the usual domestic rates be charged within the province?

Mr. DUNNING: It is a special rate, but the province has arranged that. I cannot answer as to just what it is. In each case the province is the purchaser of the wheat, and the provinces are handling these arrangements themselves. The only question which arises in that connection is the amount which must be added to the individual transaction to cover the averaging of all transactions and of all movements, as I say, to 1,100 points in Saskatchewan.

Mr. PERLEY: Does the minister think the price he mentions, namely, from $1.40 to $1.45, would be a fair one?

Mr. DUNNING: I am not going to answer that question. I have said what, from the information supplied to me, it likely will be.

Mr. BENNETT: That raises the real question we have to face sooner or later; we may as well face it now. On December 15 last the governor in council dealt with and passed an order in council. The effective part of it is as follows:

> The committee of the privy council have had before them a report, dated 13th December, 1937, from the Minister of Trade and Commerce, stating that the Canadian Wheat Board advise with regard to the question of converting wheat futures into actual wheat to be used for seed and feed relief in the province of Saskatchewan, that arrangements have been made by the Saskatchewan government for the purchase of this wheat, and that all expenses in connection with the handling, such as premiums, storage, transportation and any additional charges will be paid by the Saskatchewan government.

Obviously this committee should have before it these papers to enable us intelligently to discuss this matter. How did this government come into it? They came into it, clearly, from this document, by the Saskatchewan government having dealt with the wheat board; the Minister of Trade and Commerce made a report, and that report indicated that they were considering the question of converting wheat futures into actual wheat to be used for seed and feed relief in Saskatchewan. Those facts, I think, we should have presented to us in some form or another, because they are involved in the report made by the minister upon which this order in council was passed.

> The minister, therefore, recommends that the Canadian Wheat Board be authorized to exchange the long futures contracts that they have on hand as at July 31st, 1937, namely 6,964,000 bushels, for actual wheat to be used for seed and feed purposes in the province of Saskatchewan in connection with the sowing of the 1938 crop.

I have under my hand the relative documents dealing with that transaction. Every week the auditors sent in their report, always in the same form, so far as form is concerned. Week after week they followed a stereotyped form after this transaction was put in the shape in which it was. I quote:

> Exhibit A.—Statement of transactions in regard to wheat holdings acquired from Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited.
> Exhibit B.—Statement of transactions in regard to seed and feed account.

All the wheat that Murray bought while he was chairman of that board in connection with the operations of the board after McFarland was dismissed has been disposed of and ended and the loss indicated by these documents. All the wheat that was left was part of the McFarland wheat, and in July it was 6,964,000 bushels. That was McFarland wheat, and on July 31, Murray converted that into options. These were options to acquire real wheat later in the year. The Minister of Finance said that perhaps they were not all October. They may have been October, November and December, later in the year, and possibly some may have gone into the next year. Now comes the Saskatchewan government, not without the approval of this government, but with the approval and the knowledge of this government, and says, "We will convert these options into cash"; and to do that the price of wheat has been raised how many cents? That is the question. What is the premium? The intelligent action to take would have been in July, when it was known what the crop was, not to have had it converted into options.

Mr. DUNNING: It was not.

Mr. BENNETT: It says so here.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, let me read from the auditors' report:

On August 19th, 1937, the board commenced the policy of converting long options held on Number 2 account into purchase contracts for certain grades of wheat so as to ensure the retention of rust-resistant and other varieties for seed purposes in 1938. The transactions on this account to March 19th, 1938, are reflected in Exhibit B attached hereto.

Mr. DUNNING: But that is not what my right hon. friend said.

Mr. BENNETT: I said that in July they converted their then holdings into options.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: But they did.

Mr. DUNNING: No, that is directly the opposite.

Mr. BENNETT: There were outstanding options for the whole six million bushels in August.

Mr. DUNNING: They did not convert them into options.

Mr. BENNETT: They started to convert them into cash.

Mr. DUNNING: Into cash, not options.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I have been saying right along. What I say is that the options which expired were renewed and this wheat has been carried since the day they took it over at 89¾ cents.

Mr. DUNNING: The futures.

Mr. BENNETT: Murray took it over at 89¾.

Mr. DUNNING: The futures.

Mr. BENNETT: And the futures were renewed from time to time, so that on July 31, 1937, there were outstanding options, that is futures wheat, for 6,964,000 bushels.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. BENNETT: Then the Saskatchewan government apparently saw the wheat board; that information is communicated to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and he makes a report to council which is recorded in December, mark you, long after this work was started. That is the reason why I asked as to the authority for that. I asked how it came about, by whose authority it had been done. I cannot go beyond the auditors' report, for I have not access to the papers; but the auditors say that it was on August 19, 1937, that they were on this job of converting options into cash. Let me read the words of their report:

On August 19th, 1937, the board commenced the policy of converting long options held on Number 2 account into purchase contracts for certain grades of wheat so as to ensure the retention of rust-resistant and other varieties for seed purposes in 1938. The transactions on this account to March 19th, 1938, are reflected in Exhibit B attached hereto.

Here is Exhibit B:

	Bushels
Wheat purchased and stored in interior terminals and in country elevators (screenings 147,000 lbs.)	4,684,946–40
Wheat commitments—open purchase contracts (net)	2,287,903–55

Mr. DUNNING: On what date?

Mr. BENNETT: That was March 19 of this year, nine days ago. It goes on:

Cash position
Liability on wheat delivered but not paid for	$1,159,035 93
Estimated liability on open purchase contracts	2,904,349 64
Due to No. 2 account	5,255,701 31
Total liability on seed and feed account	$9,319,086 88

Where did the board get this power? Under what authority are they acting? The Wheat Board Act gave them no such power, and I have known the house to be kept for days while hon. gentlemen opposite on former occasions thundered anathemas on the question of authority and power. Well, what is their power here? Their power is to convert options into cash but unless somebody is going to take a loss—

Mr. DUNNING: Does my right hon. friend acknowledge that they have power to turn options into cash?

Mr. BENNETT: I have no doubt that if it was for the purpose—

Mr. DUNNING: Thanks.

Mr. BENNETT: The act says distinctly that if they were dealing with their own transactions, they had the power, but the documents show that it had passed out of their hands.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not out of their hands now.

Mr. BENNETT: Excuse me. I do not know what ministers were present, but the government on December 19 passed an order in council from which it appears that they knew these very things.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course we knew them.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, how did you act between August and December? What was the authority?

Mr. EULER: I am speaking from memory now, and possibly there may be criticism in connection with this; but the Saskatchewan government, so far as I recollect, made the suggestion to the wheat board that the options should be converted into cash wheat for the purposes of seed. The committee of the cabinet, four members, decided that it was quite a proper thing to do and, after discussing it, gave verbal authority. It may have been by wire or letter—I do not have it before me—but authority was given to the chairman of the wheat board so to act, to convert the options into cash wheat and so supply the Saskatchewan government at a certain price fixed according to the price over an average period. It was not thought necessary—and this is why I say that possibly there may be some criticism, though we had legal opinion—to have an order in council passed with respect to the matter; but later it was deemed better—and I believe it was on the suggestion of the chairman of the wheat board himself—that an order in council should be passed, and the order was then passed, according to what my right hon. friend says, some time in December. That is the explanation as far as I remember.

Mr. BENNETT: That puts the matter in an even worse light. The government knew the order in council was necessary and did not pass it.

Mr. EULER; No; we did not think so.

Mr. BENNETT: And now in December they come along and do it.

Mr. EULER: Exactly.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, surely this committee is entitled to something fuller than that in the way of information.

Mr. EULER: That is all we have.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. BENNETT: Well, we have not seen that yet. The minister is speaking of his recollection of these matters; I think we should see the documents.

Mr. EULER: My right hon. friend is perfectly welcome to have any documents that are in existence.

Mr. BENNETT: It would seem to me strange that the consent was given on December 15, 1937, and the auditor's report says this business commenced in August, 1937.

Then I should go a step further, and point out that on the financial side we have a still stranger situation. I take exhibit A, of August 21, 1937—I am using August because that is the month in which conversion commenced.

Cash position:
Funds on deposit with banks..	$ 2,946,114 85
Funds transferred to dominion government..	8,000,000 00
Funds on deposit with dominion government..	2,000,000 00
Due from Winnipeg Grain and Produce Exchange Clearing Association Limited..	42,586 25
	$12,988,701 10
Due from No. 1 account.. ..	11,858,104 18

That is the loss made by Murray after he took possession of the wheat.

Due from No. 3 account..	$49,574 88

Then you have due on Saskatchewan government account $50,570, which was discussed before the royal commission as though Mr. Justice Turgeon were a court. That matter will come up for discussion later. The cash surplus on No. 2 account was $24,845,810.16. That is the auditor's report, not my words.

I turn now to the account which is nine days' old, and this is the story:

Cash position:
Liability on wheat delivered but not paid for..	$1,159,035 93
Estimated liability on open purchase contracts..	2,904,349 64
Due to No. 2 account..	5,255,701 31
Total liability on seed and feed account..	$9,319,086 88

Eight million dollars could not be parted with; that got into the consolidated fund; the Minister of Finance saw to that. The $2,000,000 deposited he had to hand back; that is gone. And all the cash they had, $5,000,000, has been spent in buying wheat, that is, in converting options into cash, paying for wheat. According to the auditor's report of nine days ago, you have a debt of $9,319,086.88 against the surplus cash on No. 2 account on August 21 last of $24,845,810.16.

These are not my figures; I am just reading them as they are. I think we are entitled to some explanation of that. By what authority was it done? How could it be done? Surely we have some right to know that, because the price of this wheat to the farmers of the west is of vital importance. If it were not for that, I admit that another place would be the place to discuss the matter. But there is the story, and I should like an explanation.

Mr. EULER: Is my right hon. friend's point as to the price that is to be paid by Saskatchewan for the seed wheat?

Mr. BENNETT: The minister was not in the chamber this afternoon. The Minister of Finance has said that he cannot indicate the price clearly because the transactions of conversion are not all completed; the wheat is in process of delivery to some 1,100 points in Saskatchewan and he cannot say now what the price is going to be, but suggests somewhere around $1.45. Now this we know, that Murray bought that wheat for 89¾ cents, or thereabouts, in December, 1935.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): How much?

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, a couple of hundred million bushels or thereabouts. And this is part of it. It was all gone but 6,964,000 bushels, and on July 31 that was in the shape of futures. The minister properly said this afternoon that I should not say they were all October options, because the evidence does not indicate that. But I can properly say they were futures. I think he meant to convey that possibly some may be December; I do not know. On August 28, it was determined that that wheat in the form of futures should be converted into real wheat. That costs money, and that money is indicated in these documents. I am asking, by what authority is this being done? I have had produced to me an order in council dated December 15, 1937, which I have read. That does nothing more than say that the minister recommends that the Canadian wheat board be authorized to exchange the long futures contracts that they have on hand as at July 31, 1937, namely, 6,964,000 bushels, for actual wheat to be used for seed and feed purposes. It was not all seed, mark you; part is feed.

Mr. DUNNING: Feed for seeding purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: It says for seed and feed purposes in Saskatchewan in connection with the sowing of the 1938 crop. The point I am making is that it was not all seed; part of it was feed. What I am asking is not unreasonable. We want to know by what authority this is being done, and why the farmers of Saskatchewan have to pay the price of converting these options into cash wheat, when on July 31 your board saw fit to take that option and extend it at any rate to the future, that is beyond July 31. To-day the farmers of Saskatchewan and Alberta are going to be called upon to pay for it. The minister mentioned $1.45 as somewhere around what the price will be.

Mr. DUNNING: That will be the outside limit.

Mr. BENNETT: Including freight?

Mr. DUNNING: All charges.

Mr. BENNETT: Carriage, insurance and everything. That is the wheat which Murray took from McFarland or the wheat board or the cooperative at eighty-nine and a fraction cents in December 1935. There is the story. What I ask is, Where are the relevant documents? If we were back in 1935 or 1934 with a story like this, just imagine what they would be saying! However, that is in the realm of conjecture and doubt; we shall leave that and deal with realities. Here are the realities, and I want some statement as to why and how and by what authority that is done.

I want to know more. We are giving the guarantee of the dominion government—I as a taxpayer am doing so—for this $14,000,000 in Saskatchewan and $1,900,000 in Alberta, and it is on the basis of wheat costing what has been indicated. The Minister of Agriculture made this clear this afternoon. Just imagine if we had done that, or anybody else with any business capacity! I find it incredible that this could have happened, knowing what conditions were in July, 1937. Was there anyone who had any doubt at that date about what crop conditions were in this country? I crossed the plains just before that; I know that in Manitoba there was evidence of a crop, but I know that in parts of Saskatchewan and Alberta it was completely burnt up. Mark you, that is July 31, and here is the auditor's report that on August 28—

Mr. DUNNING: The week ending August 21.

Mr. BENNETT: It is said here to be August 19; that is the reason I turned it up, and with great deference to the Minister of Finance I am bound to take what the auditor says. He says that on August 19, 1937, the board commenced a policy of converting. There is the story, and I am sure the whole committee will listen with great pleasure to the explanation.

Mr. EULER: As the committee knows, I was not present while the discussion was taking place, but it seems to me there are just two points raised by the right hon. gentleman to which I should reply. The one is with regard to the authority under which the wheat board was empowered to make these purchases of cash wheat; the other was with regard to the price per bushel which shall be paid by the Saskatchewan government for the wheat.

With regard to the authority, I have already given the explanation. The wheat committee of the cabinet met and decided that the chairman of the wheat board should be empowered to purchase this wheat, to turn the futures into cash wheat and supply the Saskatchewan government, and later the Alberta government as well. We did not think it was necessary to have an order in council. I am inclined to think we had the opinion of the solicitors of the Department of Justice; I am not quite sure about that, but I believe we were told that an order in council was not necessary to enable us to do this. I then wrote or telegraphed to the chairman of the wheat board that he could proceed in the direction indicated, namely the making of purchases of wheat and turning them over to the Saskatchewan government. Later on, as I said before—I think it was on the suggestion of Mr. McIvor—it was thought that it might be better to have an order in council, conveying the authority in that way rather than merely by instructions from myself, authorized by the committee of the cabinet which has to do with wheat board matters. The price at which the wheat was to be transferred to the Saskatchewan government was an average price as between two dates, which I do not recall at the moment but which can be easily ascertained.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that settled?

Mr. EULER: The final settlement?

Mr. BENNETT: Have the terms been settled as to what the price is to be?

Mr. EULER: As to what the price per bushel is to be?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. EULER: No, I think not. The right non. gentleman means the price the farmer is supposed to pay? I do not suppose that would be possible.

Mr. BENNETT: The price at which the conversion was to take place?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. EULER: I think not, but I am not certain as to that. I would say, however, that even if the price at which the Saskatchewan government bought from the wheat board were known, this would not necessarily empower the board to say what the price would be to the farmer, because other factors, transportation and matters of that kind, will enter into that price. I can give no further explanation than that. I take it that the government was at least acting in perfectly good faith in wanting to get that wheat over to the Saskatchewan government at as early a date as possible and at a fair price. I do not know whether my right hon. friend is trying to make the point that if that wheat was taken over at 89 cents, it should be transferred for seed wheat at that price. I would judge that the wheat should go to the governments of Saskatchewan and Alberta at what it was worth at that time, and that price was to be an average as between certain dates, which at the moment I cannot recall.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a difference of opinion between my hon. friend and the other minister in that respect, but that is all right; it is only a matter of memory in both instances.

Mr. EULER: I am speaking from memory now, and I think I am correct. I cannot give the exact dates, but they can be easily ascertained. I could supply my right hon. friend with those dates without trouble.

Mr. BENNETT: Having regard to the experience of some of us on this side with respect to this matter, I remember that it was always thought desirable to have some legal background for any action taken, and I find that the powers of the board, as defined by the statute, were:

(a) to fix a price to be paid to the producer for wheat delivered to the board as by this act provided, subject to the approval of the governor in council;

(b) to sell and dispose of from time to time all wheat which the board may acquire, for such price as it may consider reasonable, with the object of promoting the sale and use of Canadian wheat in world markets;—

Those were the days when the advertisements with respect to bread were running so prolifically in British papers. I am quoting from section 8 of chapter 53 of the statutes of 1935:

(c) to sell and dispose of stocks of wheat and contracts for the delivery of wheat acquired from Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited and the wheat represented by such contracts as may be reasonably possible, having regard to economic and other conditions.

That is dealing with cooperative wheat producers' wheat. This was a part of that wheat. There is, so far as I know, no other authority than possibly the prerogative right of the sovereign, that deals with this matter. I know of none at all, and I am asking for the authority for dealing with this wheat in this way.

Mr. EULER: I have explained that.

Mr. BENNETT: If might makes right, the minister has explained it. If the dictatorial powers of the government extend without statutory authority to anything it pleases, I understand the situation.

Mr. EULER: Would my right hon. friend think that the subsequent order in council which was passed would rectify what he thinks was an improper action?

Mr. BENNETT: What your right hon. friend thinks is not just now the issue, but I shall tell you what he thinks. He thinks exactly what he says, that no order in council passed in December can give validity to what was done in August. That is what he thinks.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Could it have been done under the other board, the former board?

Mr. BENNETT: No; it could not have been done under any board—

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): It was done.

Mr. BENNETT: —as it stands now. That was done before the board was created. I should like to tell the hon. member for Moose Jaw that the circumstance to which he alludes was an entirely different one and had nothing whatever to do with this wheat board, which came into being in 1935 under chapter 53 of the statutes for that year, the administration of which has been solely in the hands of the present administration, except in regard to the fixing of the price for that year. If the hon. gentleman wants information with respect to seed which was bought by the old co-operative, it can easily be given.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I am not talking about seed.

Mr. BENNETT: What the hon. member wants to say, and does not quite have the courage to rise in his place and say, is: Was McFarland buying some wheat?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): No; I say McFarland did buy wheat, and not from the producers.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not. He dealt with it as defined in this statute:

(i) in selling and disposing of wheat as by this act provided, to utilize and employ without discrimination such marketing agencies, including commission merchants, brokers, elevator men, exporters and other persons engaged in or operating facilities for the selling and handling of wheat, as the board in its discretion may determine;—

In other words, the existing machinery was to be used; options were given and taken, and everything else was provided for.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): But McFarland bought 14,000,000 bushels of futures.

Mr. BENNETT: Absolutely, under that section, and bought them for the board.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Without any authority whatever.

Mr. BENNETT: No; it was bought by the old cooperative before the board came into being, while it was still awaiting the authorization of the governor in council with respect to matters such as price and so on. But do not let us get away from the main issue, which is, by what authority this board, under the direction of the government, is now undertaking to give, in consequence of that arrangement, a guarantee which means that it will cost the settlers and farmers of Saskatchewan something in the vicinity of $1.45 a bushel for their wheat.

Mr. EULER: If they had bought it in any other way, would they have bought it for any less?

Mr. DONNELLY: The board were not buying wheat. They had their options and said they were going to take delivery of the wheat. That is not buying wheat. The other man had to go out and buy it and give it to the board.

Mr. BENNETT: One or two more observations like that and the hon. member for Waterloo North will cry for "Blucher or night." That more nearly proves what we are saying than any observations which have been made by the minister. It is quite true that the board had become sellers of wheat, and they became sellers to Saskatchewan. They must be sellers at a price because the statute says they cannot sell except at a price. We want to know at what price they sold and that is what we have asked for. In view of the fact that the government directed the board to do this, surely we have the right to know three and a half months afterwards at what price they sold.

Mr. EULER: I have told that to my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister with his generous disposition that he sometimes masks behind a frowning countenance be good enough to explain just what was the price?

Mr. EULER: I would be merely repeating what I have said already, and I am not going to burden the committee by doing that.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend with his usual great ability has succeeded in weaving apparent mystery around a perfectly simple transaction. Here we had a condition in western Canada; it became apparent in June and July that over that great area there would not be a sufficiency of good seed for the following year. At the same time there existed a government agency, the wheat board, which had in its possession just short of 7,000,000 bushels in wheat futures contracts. These were just the same contracts as they had taken over originally from what my right hon. friend describes as the McFarland board. These futures contracts for wheat entitled the holder to get delivery at Fort William.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): They could deliver No. 1, No. 2, No. 3 or No. 4 northern, or No. 1 or No. 2 garnet.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall come to that in a moment. What would have been said of this government if, with a government agency holding nearly 7,000,000 bushels in wheat contracts, wheat had nevertheless been allowed to go out of the country and the farmers had been consequently unable to sow their land? As I recall it, we looked at the situation in late July after we came back from the imperial conference. I am glad my right hon. friend admitted a few moments ago that the wheat board had a perfect right to turn these futures contracts into real wheat, because that is the point.

Mr. BENNETT: They have to sell wheat. The law says that is their job.

Mr. DUNNING: If the wheat board had the power under the statute to turn its futures contracts into cash wheat at any time, then there can be no question about the authority of the wheat board to go through with this transaction which we are discussing. Why is that? Once it has authority to turn futures contracts into real wheat, can there be any doubt as to its authority to keep that real wheat? Goodness knows, the wheat boards and the authorities which preceded them did keep wheat and wheat futures contracts for long enough periods, and they must have had authority to do so. At least, I am giving my right hon. friend credit for believing that he had authority to do what he did, just as we believe that we have authority to do what was done in this case.

What do we find? We find the wheat board as a matter of national interest instructed by a committee of the cabinet that, in view of the shortage of good seed, it would be better not to let wheat get out of the country so that we would be short of seed. Proceeding steadily from August on, the board proceeded to convert these futures contracts into actual wheat. It is apparent that it would have been useless and wasteful for them to have taken delivery of that wheat at Fort William, because Fort William is not the place where the wheat is required for seed. In addition, there would be heavy freight charges in shipping the wheat westward from Fort William to the places at which it was required. An even more important matter is that the deliverer of wheat under a futures contract would, as my right hon. friend well knows, have the power to tender to the board No. 1, No. 2, No. 3 or No. 4 northern. These futures contracts permit the deliverer to deliver these lower grades of wheat at an agreed upon discount.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): And No. 1 and No. 2 garnet.

Mr. DUNNING: All the garnet mixtures could have been delivered. I shall do my right hon. friend the justice of saying that he never suggested that they should take delivery at Fort William.

Mr. BENNETT: He certainly did not.

Mr. DUNNING: He knows perfectly well that if the holder of the futures contract does not elect to take delivery at Fort William under the terms of the contract, and requires delivery at some other place, he must negotiate the terms upon which that delivery is to be made, because it is a departure from the original contract which involves the possible delivery, as I have stated, of No. 1, No. 2, No. 3, or No. 4 northern at Fort William. I submit that not only had the wheat board a perfect right under this statute, as stated by my right hon. friend, to do everything which has been done thus far, but it had the undoubted power, as he says, to turn these futures contracts into cash wheat.

Mr. BENNETT: No; I did not say that.

Mr. DUNNING: It had the undoubted power to acquire that cash wheat, and it has the undoubted power to sell that cash wheat to the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta in order that the farmers may sow it during the spring of 1938. The transaction is a perfectly simple one. As my right hon. friend says, they are sellers of wheat; their business is to sell wheat. Therefore, it is not their business to sell below the market. I believe I am correct in saying that the adjustments will involve turning the wheat over to the provinces concerned, to Saskatchewan at any rate, at a price based upon the average of prices between July 31 and whatever date is arranged for as the delivery date after this legislation has passed and it is possible to put through the financial aspects. My right hon. friend may take the financial statement and say that the surplus which existed now becomes a debt to the bank, and so on. He knows how simple that really is.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly it is.

Mr. DUNNING: It does not cost all these amounts to carry wheat futures, but it does cost something to carry real wheat. Interest must be paid; storage charges must be paid, and freight charges must be paid when the wheat is moved from one place to another. The freight charges to each of the 1,100 individual destinations within the province of Saskatchewan will have to be paid. If, after that has been done, the prices involved are to be based upon the averages such as I have indicated, who can say that the transaction is an unfair one from the standpoint of the board, on the one hand, and from the standpoint of the farmers who are getting the seed, on the other?

The provincial governments appear to be perfectly satisfied. They are the primary debtors in the matter, and they have examined the whole transaction. They have dealt with the wheat board; they have not dealt with the government. The wheat board has perfect authority under this statute to sell wheat. In making arrangements to sell to these provinces, I submit that it is acting as much within its power as though it were selling to a miller, to an exporter or to any one else who might be buying wheat. There is the simplicity of this whole transaction. There is nothing mysterious about it at all.

Mr. BENNETT: If these orders in council are correct, there is a distinct limitation on the part of the wheat board with respect to this wheat. This is not the wheat that is covered by a special section in chapter 53 of the statutes of 1935. Paragraph (c) of section 8 reads as follows:

(c) to sell and dispose of stocks of wheat and contracts for delivery of wheat acquired from Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited and the wheat represented by such contracts—

Mr. DUNNING: Yes—"and the wheat represented by such contracts."

Mr. BENNETT: Surely. It goes on:

—as may be reasonably possible, having regard to economic and other conditions.

That is what they had to sell. Then there is another provision with regard to their getting the wheat. That wheat, we find by the government's own records, was purchased by Saskatchewan, and here is why I say that—and, mark you, before any conversion took place at all—Saskatchewan bought the wheat under the provisions of that subsection.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not bought yet.

Mr. BENNETT: All right; then I am going to ask this question: Why did you pass the order in council on the fifteenth of December?

The committee of the privy council had before them a report, dated 13th December, 1937, from the Minister of Trade and Commerce, stating that the Canadian wheat board advise with regard to the question of converting wheat futures into actual wheat to be used for seed and feed relief in the province of Saskatchewan, that arrangements have been made by the Saskatchewan government for the purchase of this wheat.

Mr. DUNNING: Exactly—"arrangements"; and they are not completed yet.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely the hon. gentleman knows that the arrangements are arrangements to purchase the wheat; but being the kind of lawyer that he showed himself this afternoon, perhaps he has not appreciated that fact.

Mr. DUNNING: Not a lawyer; but we have the wheat.

Mr. BENNETT: This order in council says that they arranged to purchase the wheat, and here is the amazing part of it:

—and that all charges in connection with the handling, such as premiums, storage, transportation and any additional charges will be paid by the Saskatchewan government.

So that on December 13 last the government knew that the wheat board had sold the wheat to Saskatchewan.

Mr. EULER: We knew it before that.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely. The Minister of Finance said he knew it when he came back from England, and I assume that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who does not seem to have graced that occasion with his presence, knew of it during the absence of the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Trade and Commerce had been wandering around Australia—

Mr. EULER: So had the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. BENNETT: —and he learned during the absence of the Minister of Finance what was the fact. Here are the transactions. First, the wheat board, as authorized by law, sold wheat futures to the government of Saskatchewan.

Mr. EULER: Not futures; they sold wheat.

Mr. BENNETT: But the law says they have the right to sell wheat:

—and the wheat represented by such contracts as may be reasonably possible, having regard to economic and other conditions.

They sold the wheat and they undertook to convert the futures into real wheat for the government of Saskatchewan. I want to know where their authority to do it came from.

Mr. DUNNING: The right hon. gentleman himself said they had authority.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman misunderstood that observation. That had reference to their duties with respect to sales. They had no right to do a job for the province of Saskatchewan and take the risk of this money being paid.

Mr. DUNNING: Take the risk of its being paid?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, by Saskatchewan, the premiums and all the handling charges.

Mr. EULER: There was the same risk if they sold it to anybody else.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): May I ask the right hon. gentleman what act he is quoting from?

Mr. BENNETT: The Canadian Wheat Board Act of 1935, section 8, paragraph (c), and I have been reading from the order in council passed on the fifteenth day of December, 1937, which undertook to authorize something to be done which, according to the auditor's report, had already been done on a large scale, and for which the wheat board made an arrangement with the province of Saskatchewan as a corporation. It may have had power to contract to do a job of work for the province of Saskatchewan, but it is not so indicated in the powers granted to it.

Mr. DUNNING: Read section 7.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 7 provides:

The board shall undertake the marketing of wheat in interprovincial and export trade and for such purposes shall have all the powers of a corporation and without limitation upon such powers the following—

Mr. DUNNING: "Without limitation," it says.

[Mr. Euler]

Mr. BENNETT: There is a special clause that dealt with the cooperative wheat, and then you find in paragraph (c) of section 8 that the general powers of this board were entirely different from its powers with respect to this particular wheat. That wheat formed the subject of special legislation. It was discussed in committee and there were varying views about it. Hon. members will remember the difficulties that came about with regard to the acquisition of this wheat. There is no question how that difficulty came about, is there? Paragraph (f) of section 7 says:

Notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained, to acquire from Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited, upon terms to be approved by the governor in council, all wheat or contracts to purchase or take delivery of wheat in respect of which the government of Canada has given a guarantee.

Mr. DUNNING: Does my right hon. friend interpret the words in section 8, "it shall be the duty of the board," to constitute a limitation on the general powers that he read a moment ago in section 7 giving the board the powers of a corporation?

Mr. BENNETT: The duty of the board legally imposed on them the obligation—

Mr. DUNNING: Does that limit the general powers given under section 7?

Mr. BENNETT: Paragraph (c) dealt specifically with the board's wheat. The cooperative wheat was dealt with. After we get it into their possession, there is a definite way in which it has to be treated. It stands separately. There were no participation certificates to be given with respect to that.

Mr. DUNNING: But the very language of paragraph (c) permits everything that one could desire.

Mr. BENNETT: Paragraph (c) puts a limitation on this wheat as distinguished from any other. I am not stickling over technicalities. The board undertook this work for Saskatchewan. What I am coming to is this: We knew what the situation was prior to the end of July. We had some clear appreciation of it apparently towards the beginning or middle of July at any rate. We did not do anything, but Saskatchewan did. We then permitted them to acquire the wheat; but we did not pass any order in council until they wanted to purchase some seven million bushels of wheat, and we passed an order in council in December authorizing them to do it in August, that is—after it had all been done.

Then comes the question what the price is to be. The statute is obligatory on the price. I do not know yet what the price was. I have been trying to find out all night. I am tremendously interested in the price, as every member is, because it affects two things. First, it affects the standing of the wheat board with respect to the McFarland wheat. Second, it affects the price the farmers of western Canada are going to pay for that same wheat. At what price was that wheat sold?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Before the minister answers, I understand that the right hon. gentleman says that he is quoting from sections of the 1935 Canadian Wheat Board Act, and he is endeavouring to find out what authority the government had under the act to purchase the wheat for the province of Saskatchewan. I happened to be on the wheat committee a year or so ago, and as I remember it, the board under Mr. McFarland purchased some ten million bushels of wheat, not for any provincial government, but by way of wheat options for the purpose of gambling on the wheat market at that time. These facts were brought out before the wheat committee; they have never been refuted by anyone; and surely, if Mr. McFarland had that power at that time under this act, the government should have the same power under this legislation to purchase wheat for the provincial government that needs to buy seed for the farmers in that province.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose it may be desirable to make it clear that that observation has no merit in fact. I, therefore, shall do so. It was the cooperative enterprise that bought the ten million bushels of wheat.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): With the same gentleman acting as chairman or manager of the cooperative.

Mr. BENNETT: It was not the wheat board that bought it. Supposing the hon. gentleman just retracts the false statement he made.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): What false statement?

Mr. BENNETT: That the wheat board bought ten million bushels.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Mr. McFarland bought it.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. McFarland did not. The cooperative enterprise bought the wheat. We had the evidence of that. It was before the Turgeon commission.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): What Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde do is the same thing.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, it may be that the hon. member feels that he has added to his reputation by making that observation. The wheat board had not yet been organized; it was in process of organization, and the cooperative turned that wheat over to Mr. Murray. It is true they sold some wheat during the next few days; but whatever parcel was mixed with it, the general body of wheat was turned over to Mr. Murray, on which a profit—

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): It does not make any difference.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member says it does not make any difference.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Not a bit.

Mr. BENNETT: The only difference I would suggest is that it would be the generous and kindly thing to say, "I made a mistake when I said that the wheat board bought the wheat. The cooperative bought it." It would sound better and look better in the future.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The facts came out before the wheat committee. Mr. McFarland was working at the same time for both the wheat board and the cooperative under a guarantee from the government of this country.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. The hon. member may have an account with a set of brokers as a wheat dealer. I do not suggest that as a member of parliament he has it.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): No; I have not.

Mr. BENNETT: He might do two things. He might as a member of parliament do one thing; he might as a citizen do something else. Mr. McFarland, as part of the cooperative enterprise, bought that wheat, and hon. members will find the evidence in the Turgeon commission report if they want the rest of it. It was not bought by the wheat board; for the wheat board was in process of organization, and it was not an easy thing to organize; it took some time. That is all.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I wonder whether the right hon. leader of the opposition would tell us with whose money Mr. McFarland bought this twelve to fourteen million bushels?

Mr. BENNETT: He bought it with the cooperative's and the banks' money. It was charged up, as the hon. member will remember, in the bank account of the cooperative enterprise—in three banks, I think.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): With a guarantee from the government of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly; and the reason the guarantee was given was a sound one. It was during that interregnum before the wheat board took charge, and it was for the purpose of stabilizing operations in the price of wheat. This was in 1935, remember. This is the transaction in 1935 that we are talking about. The hon. member probably forgot that.

The CHAIRMAN: Is clause 2 carried?

Mr. PERLEY: No, Mr. Chairman. I think there has never been before parliament legislation as important as this on which so little information has been given, or, in relation to which, as regards the details in respect of this operation the government have been less—well, I would not say, frank, but certainly they have not put the details before us. This evening we have had the admissions: First, that they do not know the acreage to be seeded; second, that they do not know what the price is going to be; third, they do not know the quantity of seed required; and, fourth, they do not know where they are getting the wheat, whether in Alberta, Saskatchewan or Manitoba—

Mr. DUNNING: We know we have it.

Mr. PERLEY: They do not know how much was converted from options into cash during any one month, and there is a great deal of information we cannot get. This is a very important measure, and we should have this information. I wish to refer to the statement made a minute ago by the hon. member for Moose Jaw. If I had had about another two minutes I could have cited the evidence; I have the record here. I was just about to find the question which he brought up, because he was the person who brought the matter before the committee at that time. I may say that a day or two afterwards his statement was corrected, as the right hon. leader of the opposition has just stated; it was made plain that that McFarland operation was on behalf of the cooperative wheat producers.

The Minister of Finance mentioned the procedure with respect to this conversion. He stated that the contract called for delivery at Fort William, and he is quite right. He stated that Fort William was not the place where the wheat would be required. That also is certainly correct. He followed this up by stating that it would be useless for the board to take delivery of wheat at Fort William. I wish briefly to explain how that conversion could take place. I have before me the daily prices of wheat and futures from August 1 to the present. On December 15, the date of the order in council authorizing the action of the board, cash wheat at Fort William was $1.39 for No. 1 northern, and the option which was being converted stood at practically 89 cents to the board. I think the minister will admit that.

Mr. DUNNING: Does the hon. member contend that the value of that wheat was the value as of a date back in 1935, or the value at which it could be disposed of at that moment?

Mr. PERLEY: I shall come to that. The option was for 89 cents. I gave the information this afternoon with respect to the switching and what it cost; and that was switched—true enough—from month to month, from 1935 down to December, 1937. I cited the evidence of the report of the wheat board this year that on those operations they made a profit on switching, and I quoted from the evidence given by Mr. Murray that their position was not weakened by switching from month to month. Therefore, the position as far as the board was concerned was that they had a contract at 89 cents which called for delivery of wheat at Fort William. Is that right? That is what the wheat would stand them there.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. PERLEY: The wheat was $1.39 cash wheat that day, so there would be 50 cents spread there. If they took delivery of the wheat, with discounts on Nos. 2, 3 and 4 northern, they could easily have had that cash wheat and sold it there and bought the wheat in the interior. I should like the minister to state what the spread would be between wheat at Fort William and wheat in the interior. Certainly wheat in the interior of Saskatchewan is not worth the same as wheat at Fort William, so they would have a little advantage there. I think they would have had no trouble in buying the wheat from the elevator interests in Saskatchewan even if they had taken delivery at Fort William. I have a report here showing the amount of wheat in the interior. There is no question in the world that there were twenty million bushels in the three provinces in December and January. I believe that the grain trade was advised not to ship any out, but to hold it there; that some arrangement would be made and that a certain amount of wheat would be required for seed. I am of opinion that there was not less than half the amount required, of No. 1 and No. 2 northern wheat, in Saskatchewan. If I am not right in assuming that they could have taken delivery at Fort William, sold their cash wheat there, bought the wheat back in the interior, and been able to supply wheat to the farmers at not more than $1.20, I should like to be corrected, or to have the minister explain the situation.

Mr. DUNNING: Shall we call clause 2 carried, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. BENNETT: I should like to know at what price the wheat board sold this wheat to Saskatchewan? I am using now the language of the statute. It has been made clearer this evening than it was this afternoon that the purchase by Saskatchewan was early in August, on the 19th of August or prior thereto. At what price was it sold? The statute says that the price shall be stated, and I want to know what it is.

Mr. DUNNING: The price was not stated when the arrangements were made to undertake this transaction. I have made that clear at least half a dozen times.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Trade and Commerce says otherwise.

Mr. DUNNING: The Minister of Trade and Commerce on no occasion said that the price was set.

Mr. BENNETT: No; he said it was agreed that the average price between certain dates should be the price.

Mr. DUNNING: The formula agreed to was that to be fair to every one it was quite evident that a system of averaging would have to be employed. On the first occasion when I spoke to the financial resolution preceding the bill I expressed it as my own view that the fairest way would be to take the average of prices from July 31, down to the date when the province actually took delivery of the wheat.

We reach this point in trying to satisfy my right hon. friend. We estimate that it will be between $1.40 and $1.45, taking into account all charges including distribution cost to 1,100 points in Saskatchewan. Closer than that we cannot come to-night. After all, what difference does it make to our getting along with this legislation whether it was $1.43½, or $1.43¾, or $1.44? We have endeavoured to come as close as possible, because the actual factors making up the transaction have not yet been determined, and cannot be determined until the transaction is completed.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): In his statement on Friday the minister said that no requisition had been made by the Saskatchewan government.

Mr. DUNNING: Shall we call clause 2 was not the correct word, yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If I remember rightly, the Saskatchewan government last year canvassed the different municipalities and asked them to give an estimate of how much seed would be needed and what the acreage would be, and on the basis of that survey the Saskatchewan government asked for a certain sum of money to be granted by the federal government. The amounts given by the Minister of Agriculture last year were: wheat, 2,739,000 acres; oats, 1,300,000 acres; barley, 39,000 acres; flax, 14,400 acres; rye, 10,400 acres, making a total of 4,102,800 acres for which seed was to be supplied. A survey had been made, and on the basis of that survey a definite amount was stipulated as required to satisfy the operations. Has anything like that been done this year? The minister said that he had no definite figures as to acreage; but both Alberta and Saskatchewan must have made some survey in order to find out what the requirements would be, and at least an approximate figure must have been arrived at of the number of acres to be seeded, so that we should have some idea of the total acreage as compared with the total acreage last year.

Mr. GARDINER: Those who have been associated with the making of estimates in connection with seed grain and seed grain requirements in Saskatchewan, and in Alberta as well, have been working at this job, most of them, during the whole seven or eight years that there has been necessity for supplying seed to the people of those provinces, and the same type of officials here at Ottawa have been engaged during all that period in checking all those estimates. Some of the ministers here at the present time have also had previous experience of the same kind in the provinces. With all that experience we know fairly well what the acreages are likely to be, but no one is prepared to make more than an estimate of the situation at the present time.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): No farmer can on his own farm.

Mr. GARDINER: No. There is the additional difficulty this year, coming into all the discussions which have taken place with regard to this matter, that for the first time in the whole history of Saskatchewan there was not enough wheat grown last year to seed the province.

Mr. BENNETT: Not on a full acreage crop.

Mr. GARDINER: There was slightly over two bushels to the acre grown altogether, and by the time you cleaned that and eliminated what was unfit for seed, there was not sufficient grown in the province last year to seed the province. Furthermore, what is generally spoken of in this house as the drought area is not the drought area at all. What has been spoken of as the drought area comprises 170 municipalities in Saskatchewan, for which the federal government pays the full cost, and fifty-two municipalities in Alberta for which the federal government also bears the full cost in connection with relief. But in Saskatchewan that is not half of the area in the whole province which is suffering from drought this year. The new sections are not in exactly the same position as the other sections of the province, because much of the land is suffering now its first year of drought. Some of it had a year of drought in 1931 and no drought since, and to begin to estimate the requirements of those sections as against the requirements of the other sections, would be, I think, futile. I have all the yields in the different municipalities, and I could read them to the committee, but they would not be of any value. Municipality after municipality has no yield whatever. When you get into the neighbourhood of Qu'Appelle river and Long lake, coming from the southwest, you get from two to two and a half bushels, and in areas still further removed to the north and east you get around four and five, while at the very best in some limited areas you get seven, eight or nine bushels. But those areas are extremely limited.

To speak of wheat in Saskatchewan last fall which might have been kept for seed purposes is to overlook the fact that it would have cost more to have kept it in Saskatchewan and to have shipped it from where it was to where it is needed than to have purchased it in Alberta or in Manitoba and shipped it in. All these matters enter into the estimate of acreage, and the nearest estimate that can be made by any one at the moment is the estimate I gave this afternoon, namely, that there will be in the neighbourhood—it may be above or it may be below this figure—of 12,000,000 acres upon which seed will have to be put through government assistance. This does not mean that the whole 12,000,000 acres will be seeded to wheat, or that the whole 12,000,000 acres will receive seed from the governments. There is, however, an acreage of 12,000,000 acres that we shall have to consider giving assistance to. If we take

Alberta, the regulations there permit of seeding up to 300 acres; but that includes all that the farmer has in his bin, and to estimate the acreage there for which seed will have to be supplied as compared with some other areas where the farmer cannot possibly have seed in his bin, is an impossibility and something that would not help the committee in arriving at a decision as to what should be done.

The whole acreage that requires assistance from the government will get assistance somewhat on the basis which has been outlined to the committee, a basis that, as I pointed out at the beginning of the discussion this evening, was not properly set out in the statement made the other day and this afternoon again, to the effect that the acreage was set in legislation. The acreage is provided for through the regulations provided for in the legislation, and that is subject to some change. But that is an acreage set for the purpose of making an estimate, and anything that can be given the committee can be nothing better than an estimate. We are relying on the provincial and municipal governments to do this year as they have always done in their own interests, to hold the amount down to actual requirements but at the same time to see to it that the province and the municipality are not placed in a difficult position next fall, if they have a crop, in consequence of no seed having been put in the ground this year. They are as anxious to collect tax rates as we are to do the right thing by these people, and we are just as anxious to do the right thing by them as anyone in this committee can be. All that we think it necessary for this committee to do is to keep a proper check to see that money advanced by the people of Canada is not squandered, and to rely on the elected representatives of the people in the province and the municipalities to take care of the needs of the people so far as these total amounts permit of that being done. I think that, having made that check, we have done all that this committee should expect in connection with a matter of this kind.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The bill says, "for purchasing seed grain and providing other assistance to the farmers." I assume the "other assistance" includes what the minister mentioned this afternoon. Could the minister give some statement as to the basis on which fuel would be given? Is it the same ratio as last year?

Mr. GARDINER: Approximately the same.

Mr. BENNETT: The question of price having been adjusted in the manner indicated, perhaps the Minister of Trade and Commerce will give that information before we finally finish with this bill.

The only other question I wish to ask the minister is, how was it arranged that the wheat board should advance its own surplus moneys and borrow moneys to do what under the order in council it is provided that Saskatchewan would do? The statute simply says that Saskatchewan will bear all the incidental costs. I find now that the auditors' reports show that the board have not only exhausted the money they had on deposit, the two millions, and also other moneys, but also borrowed from the banks. Has the government any knowledge of any arrangements by which Saskatchewan thus divested itself of a responsibility which was the basis upon which this government gave them power to go ahead? The order in council is quite explicit on that point. In the order in council of December 15 it is provided:

> . . . that all charges in connection with the handling, such as premiums, storage, transportation and any additional charges will be paid by the Saskatchewan government.

I merely ask for information, because it may become important in respect of the question of price. The report by the auditors of March 19, nine days ago, with respect to the financial side, reading from exhibit A, states that they owe the banks $325,270.53 and the seed and feed account owes them $5,255,701.31. Perhaps the minister can give some information on that point.

Mr. DUNNING: It all arises from the well known fact that Saskatchewan could not finance a transaction of this sort without the guarantee of the federal government.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not the guarantee I am talking about but this money.

Mr. DUNNING: Exactly; but it starts from the fact that the credit of Saskatchewan is not such that it could pay on its own account fourteen or fifteen million dollars to the wheat board. The method by which this parliament dealt with the financing of seed wheat in the last two years was by way of guarantee of the credit of the provinces. That guarantee is not available to the provinces until this parliament enacts it into law. Hence the wheat board, in making the arrangement to accumulate this wheat for those provinces, had to look forward to the possibility of this parliament again acting as it had done in each of the last two years, by providing the requisite credit to enable the provinces to carry out the obligation they were assuming. This government felt sure that this parliament would, by this method, once more give those western plains a chance to grow a crop. The wheat board took our assurances in this regard, and the bill implementing those assurances is now before this committee, to enable the provinces concerned to pay the wheat board for the wheat which it has acquired for them.

Mr. BENNETT: That answers that part of the question, but not the question why they had to borrow money to do things which the province promised to do by the order in council passed by this government, wholly outside the question of the purchase price.

Mr. DUNNING: The purchase price includes all charges; it cannot be separated.

Mr. BENNETT: It seems to read as though they were to treat them as being separate, that is, what was incurred by the board after the purchase was made would be dealt with by Saskatchewan paying these charges. If the minister says that this also is to be borrowed from the banks as part of the money, then I understand it will be included in the $14,000,000 of which the Minister of Agriculture has spoken, part of the purchase price.

Mr. DNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Then, assuming that they are going to treat it in that way, the minister pointed out what the price would be to the wheat board; that is, what they would receive. They will receive back the money spent for the purpose of conversion of the options into cash wheat, including any premium paid. They will receive a purchase price on the basis of the average between given dates, as mentioned by the minister. The next question is whether this distribution that is to take place at 1,100 points, involving different freight rates and matters of that sort, would have anything to do with the amount of money received by the wheat board. This committee is interested in what the wheat board receives; what the wheat board should receive should have no relation to these 1,100 points to which wheat is to be shipped.

Mr. DUNNING: The wheat board is disbursing the money necessary to take the wheat to the ultimate points, and must be reimbursed for that by the provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: But that would not have any relation to the purchase price of the wheat. Suppose they sold the wheat to Dreyfus instead of the government of Saskatchewan, they would get a fixed price, say $1.25 a bushel. What I am asking the minister is whether these subsequent dealings between the board and the province have anything to do with the price that will be received by the board for wheat qua wheat.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister said something a moment ago which would lead one to believe that it might have.

Mr. DUNNING: There will be merely reimbursement of the expenditures made by the board on behalf of the province, in keeping the wheat the necessary length of time and paying premiums for the purpose of converting cash into options.

Mr. BENNETT: And the purchase price qua wheat will be the average?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister has given us an idea what the price of the wheat may be. Has he an estimate of the price for oats, barley, rye and flax?

Mr. GARDINER: The estimated cost of the wheat is $1.45; seed oats, 70 cents; seed barley, 75 cents; seed rye, $1; seed flax, $1.50; feed oats, 60 cents; fodder, $17. Petroleum products are estimated at $1,250,000; repairs to machinery, about $372,000. That is just in the drought area of 186 municipalities.

Mr. PERLEY: That is an interesting statement. I have a copy of a telegram which was sent to me on February 7, which indicates that this question of the distribution of seed and feed was discussed on the grain exchange, because the telegram is from the grain exchange. The prices quoted at that date are exactly those quoted by the minister now. It seems rather a coincidence that these prices which were quoted on or about January 28 should be exactly the same as those given to-night by the minister, and this telegram also indicates the estimated number of bushels required.

Mr. GARDINER: There is really nothing peculiar about that. Any farmer in western Canada could have given my hon. friend the same prices. That is exactly what we are paying for feed at my own farm, 60 cents a bushel. I paid 58 cents last fall. That is the price all over Saskatchewan, as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. PERLEY: The Minister of Finance mentioned that the price was not yet fixed. Did he mean the price to the farmer, or did he mean that the price was not decided at which they should take this wheat over from the grain interests, the grain firms that have the wheat in the elevators out there? Does the minister mean to indicate that they are taking this wheat and distributing it and it is being seeded, and that there has been no price arrived at or set at which it is to be taken over from the grain companies?

Mr. GARDINER: The question, as I understand it, is as to whether the price spoken of during these discussions, $1.45, is an estimated price to the farmer, and only an estimated price. I have understood all through the discussions, as I think the hon. member for Qu'Appelle has also understood, that this price is to include all the costs of laying the grain down on the farm. It can be only an estimated cost, because as yet the grain has not been laid down. As I said at an earlier point in the discussion, the intention of the provincial government, as far as we know it, is to lay down the grain to all individual farmers at the same price. This, of course, necessitates that they know the actual cost of delivery to these 1,100 points throughout the province before the actual cost to the farmer can be determined. At the moment they have just made an estimate of it, and this government has checked that estimate and is satisfied with it.

Mr. PERLEY: Then there is no definite price arranged so far as the grain firms are concerned?

Mr. GARDINER: The wheat was actually taken over from grain firms. I imagine all, or practically all of it, has been taken over at a certain price, and that price will figure in the final price the farmer pays.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister could not give us that price on the basis of No. 1 northern?

Mr. GARDINER: I would have to get a check on all the wheat taken over since last July. Several million bushels were taken over before the middle of October, and you would have to get all the prices and average them for the term, together with the costs of storage and everything else.

Mr. PERLEY: Could the minister give the minimum or maximum price?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I wonder if the Minister of Agriculture could answer the question I asked a few moments ago, as to the basis of distribution of feed, fuel and repairs to each individual farmer?

Mr. GARDINER: As I understood the question, it was as to what is to be supplied. I think the best way to answer that is to read the section of the act. Subsection (4) of section 2 of the Municipalities Seed Grain and Supply Act, 1938, of Saskatchewan, reads as follows:

"Supplies" means petroleum products, feed grain, fodder, repairs to implements and parts, repairs to harness, formaldehyde and other smut control compounds and gopher poison, and includes such other commodities and such services as the lieutenant-governor in council may approve.

I think it will be agreed that this covers everything. Section 3 of the Agricultural Relief Advances Act of Alberta reads:

The lieutenant-governor in council may authorize the provincial treasurer, in order to provide for the payment of any expenditures incurred in respect of advances made in pursuance of this act during the year 1936 and during every year thereafter, for the purpose of furnishing to necessitous farmers, all or any of the following commodities, namely seed grain, fodder, feed grain, fuel oil and lubricating oil.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What I had in mind was this. On Friday the minister was good enough to tell us what seed the farmer would get on the basis of the land he had prepared for crop. I wondered if the minister could give us, as was given last year, how much fuel the farmer will get, how much feed he will get, and what amount he will be allowed for repairs on the basis of the amount of land he has available. I have before me what was given last year, and I wondered if the minister could give us any idea of what will be given this year to each farmer on the basis of the amount of land he has already for crop, and whether that will be given over and above the seed allotment already outlined by the minister.

Mr. BENNETT: Before the minister answers, I am going to make a suggestion, along the lines of the observations made by the hon. member for Weyburn. In view of the wide powers conferred upon the lieutenant-governors in council by the provincial statutes, I had thought it might be desirable to say that in no event would the amount advanced for seed purposes exceed a certain number of dollars an acre.

Mr. DUNNING: It is in their law now, $200 a quarter section.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that in the law or the regulations?

Mr. GARDINER: That is in the law.

Mr. BENNETT: That means $1.25 an acre. I asked that because I became a little uncertain about it after the minister told me that part of what he thought was in the statute was in the regulations. He is quite certain that is in the statute?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; I have it in the statute here.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): That works out to about $2 an acre for the crop land.

Mr. GARDINER: It is not $1.25 for each acre seeded. There is provision that in certain sized farms the acreage seeded is to be a certain amount, and that figures out closer to $2.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I should like that information from the minister when he can give it.

Mr. GARDINER: Some of this I hesitate to place on the records as definite information. This is a matter which is being dealt with by councils and by the provincial government, and much of what we say here just makes it that much more difficult in the line of administration. I think it unnecessary to say that this government is insisting that one of the other governing bodies should supply so much oil an acre or oil at such and such a cost an acre, thus just making it that much more difficult for the people who are checking up on all these expenditures to do what is just and proper without being involved in undertakings in which we probably should not involve them. I think the best I could do would be to give the estimated figures of what the costs will be, but I do not think we should say things in this chamber which will commit men to make expenditures that probably they think should not be made. If it will satisfy my hon. friend, I might say this, that the estimates with regard to oil and supplies generally will be on approximately the same basis as they were last year, taking the price feature into consideration. But to say that the government under all circumstances, if a man is using an engine, will supply so much oil or so much gasoline in terms of dollars, I think involves those administering the acts in undertakings in which I do not think they should be involved.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I think that is a most unsatisfactory way to meet the situation.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, oh.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The Minister of Finance may laugh, but last year the provincial government of Saskatchewan circularized the municipalities. They set out, as I read this afternoon, a table, so much wheat, so much barley and so on. Then they went on to estimate the amount of fuel a man would get, so many gallons of distillate an acre, so many gallons of gasoline to so many gallons of distillate, and so on. If it was a good policy last year to lay down a definite basis of distribution, I cannot see why it should be wise this year to leave the matter surrounded with a haze of mystery. In view of what I pointed out this afternoon in connection with the situation in Saskatchewan, I do not think anything would do more to remove discontent or wrangling within a council, within a municipality or between an individual farmer and an inspector, than for the regulations to state clearly that according to the size of a man's farm and the amount of land he has ready for crop, he will be entitled to a certain amount of seed per acre, to a certain amount of fuel if he is a tractor farmer, to a certain amount of feed and to a certain amount of money for repairs. Otherwise it is inevitable in the distribution that someone will get a few more dollars than someone else.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Rightly so.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Not necessarily.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Would my hon. friend say that everyone should get the same amount of money for repairs, irrespective of what the requirements may be?

Mr. BENNETT: Who is going to settle that?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): You cannot settle that until you get out there and find out.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): There ought to be some basis. If the settlement of this matter is to be left to some person or persons, there will be trouble.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That will be inevitable with some items.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It was not considered inevitable last year when the Saskatchewan government sent out a circular describing the basis of distribution. I think we should proceed with a basis such as that. I am not suggesting that that particular one be used, but certainly something should be agreed upon so that this committee will know that this money is being distributed on a certain basis. We should know that the distribution will be made according to the amount of land ready for cultivation and not according to what some person shall decide what another person ought to have. I think we are providing for discrimination of the very worst sort.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I have heard it said that a little knowledge is a dangerous thing, but I think it has been proven to-night that very little knowledge is a very dangerous thing.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. member ought to know.

[Mr. Douglas.]

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): There has been only one member on the opposite side who has spoken who really knows anything about agriculture. I refer to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. I have been farming in western Canada for some twenty-nine years, and I say right now that I do not yet know how much grain I am going to sow this spring. I cannot know that until I go out there to have a look at the land after the snow is gone in order to see its condition. How can one expect a municipality or an inspector to know definitely how much land will be prepared? The hon. member for Weyburn discusses this matter as though all land had to be cultivated this spring in the same way. It will cost twice as much to work some land as it will to work other land. Some land will take half a bushel more grain per acre than other land. Certainly no one in the provincial government can tell in the middle of the winter what will be the requirements per acre. We have the estimates before us, but they cannot tell nearly as well for a municipality or a provnice as I can for my own farm, and I have no idea at all right now. I do not know whether I shall sow 200 acres more or less of wheat this spring. I cannot know that until I see the condition of the soil and know what work must be done. It is foolish to expect any government to know these things. The government are providing an amount of money which they estimate will be needed for seed in these provinces, and that is the best they can do. The amount provided is a maximum amount, and that is all that can be done at this time.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. member for Moose Jaw makes a great deal out of the fact that only one member on this side who has spoken is a farmer.

Mr. DUPUIS: How much land has the hon. member?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am not a farmer, but I know a great deal more about an omelette than any hen that has laid an egg.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The hon. member can mix things up.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. member takes his own experience as a farmer as the basis for his argument. He forgets that when he returns home he will be able to use more or less seed as he decides, but the majority of people who will be getting seed under this plan will be sowing less land than they would like to sow.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Not necessarily.

Mr. DUPUIS: The minister said it was the minimum.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The fact of the matter is that most farmers will not be getting as much seed as they could use. That is apparent from the schedule the minister gave the other day.

Mr. DONNELLY: In other years they have been sowing a lot of land they should not have sown.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. member for Wood Mountain may know of instances like that, but I do not. The hon. member for Moose Jaw says that some pieces of land may take half a bushel more an acre than others, and that some farmers may require more for repairs. That may be true, but it is necessary to make a survey of the entire district to determine the number of bushels an acre required for this piece of land, the amount of distillate required for this farm and the amount of feed for that? That would be impossible. You will be doing far less harm by drawing up a schedule than by trying to adjust yourself to every contingency to be found in different parts of the province. You say it is nonsense to draw up a schedule, but Saskatchewan drew one up last year. All I am asking is that you return to the practice of last year.

Mr. DUNNING: They will this year.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If they will this year, why is the minister not able to state what it will be? He was able to tell me last year when I asked.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): A minimum has been set; does the hon. member want us to set a maximum?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I do not know what is the minimum.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): That information has been given half a dozen times.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What is the minimum amount of distillate a man will get?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): One tractor will use fifty per cent more distillate than another. How is one going to know how much is necessary?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is the government going to have its inspectors test out all the tractors by driving them?

Mr. GARDINER: Perhaps I could explain the way in which this is arrived at. It has been known in previous years, and particularly last year, about what the average cost would be for the whole acreage to be seeded in a municipality, or even in a whole province for that matter. The percentage of the land worked with horses and the percentage worked with tractors are fairly well known to the government authorities in both provinces. They estimate that a certain percentage of the crop will be seeded with tractors which will require a certain amount of fuel. A particular farmer will need so many gallons of gasoline and so much oil because he is farming so many acres with a tractor. But to put that into either a regulation or a law would be placing the provincial governments and the municipalities in a much more difficult position than they would be in otherwise. We know this from experience. I think it is much better to make estimates of what the average cost per acre will be; what is the average requirement for repairs; what will be the average amount of oil and gasoline required to operate a tractor; what will be the average amount of feed and fodder required; I think it is much better to arrive at one's conclusions and to set the limits in that way.

Then we can allow those who are closer for purposes of administration to arrive at decisions as to what ought to be done. I am sure that the hon. member for Weyburn will agree that if it is impossible for a municipal council to make the decision, and make it properly, or impossible for an inspector on the ground, no matter how he may be appointed, to make it, it is impossible for us to do it here. You may criticize the methods of appointment of the inspectors and all that; but if the inspector is capable of checking a quarter section of land, and he walks over it and sees its condition and the equipment that is on it, he is in a much better position to state what the amount ought to be than any hon. member, no matter how familiar he may be with agriculture. The best we can do in connection with these matters is to set the maximum amount which can be used for different purposes; to try to get that maximum as near as we can to the actual requirements, based on experience; then to set up the best checking organization we can get and see that the best inspection system is set up, not by ourselves but by others, for we only check that work; and then try to see that none of the money provided is wasted. When we have done that, I think we have done practically all we can do, and I would hesitate to put my opinion either in the form of a regulation or in legislation of this parliament as to how much gasoline should be used to farm a quarter section of land.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Did the minister find it unsatisfactory last year when they suggested one gallon and a half of distillate an acre?

Mr. GARDINER: We have nothing to do with the administration; but passing through Saskatchewan as I did from time to time last summer, I think it was found very difficult in practice, largely because certain individuals take those figures and go out and say, "You did not give this fellow what the law or somebody in the house says he ought to get." That only makes trouble in the administration of the distribution. I would much prefer to check any complaints made afterwards and see that the proper thing is done, if anything improper is done, than for us to do anything now which would make administration more difficult.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I submit that you will have a great deal more trouble in this way if an inspector decides that of two farmers living across the road from each other one shall have a certain amount of fuel or a certain amount for repairs, and the other man something different. You will have far more trouble in that way than in what I am suggesting. I am quite aware that you will have a differentiation in types of soil and in conditions, and hardships might be worked on that account; but there will be a great deal more dissatisfaction and a great deal more quibbling done when you leave the whole matter to the individual judgment of some man who, if he is human, is bound to make mistakes and to have his interests, his influences and his likes interfere with his judgment.

One more question. The minister said this afternoon that feed and fuel would not be deducted from the amount of seed the man could get under the schedule. Does that apply also to repairs?

Mr. GARDINER: Feed and fodder, and oil and gasoline and repairs have no necessary connection with the seed a man gets. A man gets so much seed because he needs it. If a man's implements are new and he needs no repairs, he will not get any repairs. If he has sufficient feed left over from the winter to carry him over, he will not get any feed. All these are matters that come into the inspection on the ground. That is why I say it is extremely difficult for us here to make these decisions. They can be better made by the elected representatives of the people living right out in the community, they being checked by other individuals who do not live in the community, and they, in turn, if any complaints are made, being checked by men sent out by our department.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I raise the point only because it has been rife in Saskatchewan that a man would be allowed a maximum of seed for 250 acres, and that if he required repairs, the cost of the repairs would be deducted from the amount of seed he could get.

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am glad to hear that.

Mr. COLDWELL: The definition of repairs is sufficiently wide this year, I take it, to allow of ordinary repairs being made at the local blacksmith's shop.

Mr. GARDINER: Oh, yes, in actual practice. I might say in reply to what the hon. member for Weyburn has just said, that there is a limit on repairs, but it is only a limit of five per cent of the total credit.

Mr. BENNETT: The total credit is $200?

Mr. GARDINER: No; $200 a quarter section.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I mean.

Mr. GARDINER: If a man is farming 320 acres, it is twice that.

Mr. BENNETT: Suppose he has 250 acres, scattered over six quarter sections; would he get $1,200? That is one of my difficulties.

Mr. GARDINER: That is limited by the 250 acre provision, if that is in the regulations this year. I assume it would not be higher than three hundred.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Did the minister say five per cent?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That would be $10 on a $200 credit?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That would not be a very large amount for repairs.

Mr. BENNETT: I must say I think this is terribly loose legislation. Just look at it for a moment, and think what we are doing. I, of course, realize the severity of the criticism of the hon. member for Moose Jaw, but it does not deter me from carrying out what I conceive to be my duty.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I was not speaking of the right hon. gentleman at that time.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a great thing to be able to farm on the stock exchange. I cannot recall any such loose legislation as this since I have been in the house.

Mr. DUNNING: It has passed the house in two successive sessions.

Mr. BENNETT: But the situation seems to be so much worse than it has ever been before. The language here I realize is not different from what it has been on other occasions, but what concerns me is where it leads to in the light of what has been said this evening. Is the federal government to have inspectors, and, if so, how many? How many inspectors is the provincial government going to have, and what is their relation pending a provincial election?

Mr. GARDINER: The federal government have had inspectors for the past three seasons to check the feed and fodder put out and to check the requirements for seed. The number employed this year as of the particular date on which the answer was given the other day in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, was, I think, in the neighbourhood of thirty.

Mr. PERLEY: Twenty odd.

Mr. GARDINER: I think it was twenty-nine. That is not the highest number we have had at any date, the highest number being thirty-five, but on the date on which the question was asked the number was twenty-nine. The numbers will not likely be increased beyond that.

Mr. BENNETT: I think everyone who has been following the discussion this evening will agree that our country is in a sad plight. No one could listen to what has been said here to-night without realizing how serious the situation must be. What we are doing is saying that we shall find, first of all, the seed for 250 acres in necessitous cases; second, that we shall find the feed and the fodder for the horses, if horses are used; third, that we shall find repairs for the engine, and fuel, distillate or gasoline, and that we shall find the lubricants. We are going to find everything that may be necessary for the purpose of enabling the crop to be put in. The maximum is $200 for each quarter section, but the area of 250 acres may be scattered over many quarter sections. When I put the case to the minister a moment ago of the possibility of a man getting $400, he said that might be; but as regards the man who has 80 acres fit to crop on the 160 acres, what is the sliding scale on a quarter section; what is the maximum if he has only a quarter, if he can sow 70 or 80 per cent?

Mr. DUNNING: Sixty per cent of the cultivated portion.

Mr. BENNETT: If he has a quarter section of land all of which in times past has been cultivated, 96 acres can be put down to wheat, and then he can get $200. But if 50 acres of that is on one quarter section and 46 acres on the other quarter section, he gets $400, on the basis of the statement made here to-night.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, but why not?

Mr. DUNNING: He is restricted still by the number of bushels per acre for the land he seeds. That is the other restriction.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; he is restricted as to the number, but I am talking about the repairs and the feed and fodder. The limit is $200 for each quarter section?

Mr. DUNNING: Including the seed.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, I asked if that included the seed.

Mr. GARDINER: It includes everything.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the outside limit of everything.

Mr. GARDINER: Perhaps I had better read section 10, which clears the matter up:

> A municipality which has borrowed money under this act shall from time to time expend it in the purchase and distribution of seed grain and supplies to be furnished to farmers who are unable to purchase the same without assistance and who have become unable to do so by reason of failure of crops or other adverse conditions; but the municipality shall not advance in any year seed grain and supplies of greater value than $200 in respect of any one quarter section.

That is the maximum limit for any one quarter section.

Mr. BENNETT: In the case of oats and rye the situation would be different from that in the case of wheat.

Mr. STIRLING: What is the total amount of money which the dominion government has guaranteed and which it has to meet?

Mr. DUNNING: I gave that the other day.

Mr. STIRLING: It is on Hansard?

Mr. DUNNING: I have it, but it is on Hansard. I gave it on the resolution.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not deterred from doing what I conceive to be my duty by the criticism that I am not a farmer; I am dealing with legislation only as such. Might it not be desirable to incorporate in the statute the regulations that at the moment are purely regulations? Shortly put, the only protection we have here with respect to either of these provinces is the maximum of the amount we may guarantee.

Mr. DUNNING: It must be used for certain purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: We are not going to have control of that. That is my whole point. You start with the municipality. The Minister of Agriculture has dwelt upon the desirability of including the municipality because of the knowledge they have of local conditions. But, while the Minister of Finance is the custodian of the country's money, the bald fact is that the amounts of $1,900,000 for Alberta and $14,500,000 for Saskatchewan constitute the only limitation imposed in connection with this whole matter. You can think it over as carefully as you may. I have been sitting here for the last fifteen minutes going over it as carefully as I can.

Mr. DUNNING: The terms of the statute are fairly explicit.

Mr. BENNETT: I know. But the provincial statute has been worked out by the people on the spot. What we thought of as a statute is purely regulation, and the government is introduced as one of the bodies that determine the matter, but as far as the Dominion of Canada and its taxpayers are concerned the only limitations imposed on our liability are those two amounts of $1,900,000 and $14,500,000. That is the reason why I started out with the idea that we should endeavour to impose some limitation in the way of conditions in the statute itself and make it a criminal offence to endeavour to violate it, because in communities there are rackets that arise which one little expects. I could give day and date with respect to some that have occurred in all parts of the country. We have them in every province; we all know that. All one has to do is to take the reports which come in sometimes from the mounted police, and one can find out without much difficulty what happens in some of these communities. No one for a moment questions the honesty of the great majority of the people. But when one is dealing with something which belongs to a government, the rule of conduct is not the same. I do not see sufficient safeguards in the legislation. However, I am not going to labour the matter further.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Governor in council to approve form and terms of guarantees.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister be good enough to repeat that figure—I have been looking through his statements of the other day and I do not find it—with respect to the total amount of guarantees over the seven or eight years during which the dominion government has made those guarantees.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DUNNING: Well, the guarantee method was applied only in 1936 and 1937. Prior to that time the government lent money to the province and the province bought the seed with the money lent to it by the federal government of that day. I assume my hon. friend does not wish me to go back that far.

Mr. STIRLING: What I wanted to arrive at, even though it was only in the form of a rough figure, is what has it cost Canada to assist the farmers of the drought area on to their feet again?

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member means for the whole period, regardless of the method?

Mr. STIRLING: Has the minister any idea of the total?

Mr. DUNNING: With respect to seed, or everything?

Mr. STIRLING: Seed.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall give a brief statement with reference to it. In 1932-33 Manitoba got $600,000 by way of loan from the dominion government. Saskatchewan in the same year got $6,000,000 and Alberta, $140,000. In 1933-34—these are still loans to the governments, remember—Manitoba got for relief in the drought area, including seed grain, $250,000. There was nothing for Saskatchewan or Alberta in that year. In 1934-35 Manitoba got $225,000 for relief in the drought area, including seed grain; Saskatchewan got $3,000,000 for seed grain, and by way of specific loans to pay relief, feed and seed accounts on hand July 31, 1934, to 31st August, 1935, $4,500,000. Alberta in the same year got $2,095,000 for assistance in seed grain and seeding operations. In 1935-36 Manitoba received $408,000 under similar conditions to those previously related; Saskatchewan, $6,000,000, and Alberta, $1,100,000. The totals up ot that date, because that was the last year in which the direct loan policy was followed, are: Manitoba, less repayments, $1,106,000; Saskatchewan, less repayments, $18,900,000; and Alberta less repayments, $3,195,000.

It will be noted that some of these are not wholly for seed grain; there were years in which seed grain and relief were more or less run together. These amounts that I have indicated were, of course, affected to some degree by the write-offs authorized a year ago over loans generally in that year. But with respect to our guarantees which have been given, no losses have been paid by the dominion up to now. That is because the dominion's responsibility does not become enforceable until there have been three crops, including the crop sown, and that has not occurred as yet. Therefore, under the guarantees it cannot be said yet what our ultimate loss will be. It will be remembered that when I first suggested this type of legislation to the house two years ago, I related the satisfactory experience which Saskatchewan had had with the guarantee method as compared with the direct loan method over the years in the past. Where you have the guarantee method with the machinery of the municipality and of the bank helping you to collect, the experience during the years in which the credit of that province was good, when the province did not have to come to the dominion at all for supplementary credit, was that the great bulk of such seed grain loans were repaid under the guarantee method. Of course, we have not the conditions to deal with that have prevailed in 1936 and 1937.

Mr. CHURCH: As I understand it, the seed will be given through the municipalities, the province guaranteeing the municipality and the dominion guaranteeing the province, in this case to the banks, in an amount of some $14,500,000. What I want to know is why, in the matter of seed, the same principle is not followed as in connection with relief. In the distribution of relief the Minister of Labour does not deal with the municipalities. Why utilize a quasi-political body like the governor in council? Why not use Mr. Purvis, former head of the employment commission, who was selected by the Minister of Labour and was the representative of the duPont dynasty in Canada. The Globe and Mail is evidently trying to unload him on our party as leader so as to make our party, as it were, merely an adjunct of the duPont dynasty of America, and we are not going to become any such thing. I submit that there should be a principle behind every vote. Why should we deal differently with Saskatchewan and Alberta and let the farmers deal directly with the municipalities? Why should the Ontario government not deal directly with the mayors in relief matters, as in this Bill No. 78, instead of having the municipalities deal with and through the province? There is a principle involved, and I submit the proposed method is unfair. The same principle should apply in all the provinces on all relief measures.

Mr. PERLEY: I should like the minister to look into the question of power. I think it would be advisable to discuss this matter with the provincial government, because there is no question about a shortage of power. I have heard the statement made by the superintendent of one of the experimental farms in the west, that 40,000 horses which had been shipped to eastern Canada in the winter would not come back. That will deplete the horse power in the province to a considerable extent. The question is a serious one, and I hope the ministers will take it up with the provincial authorities and that more assistance will be given than is provided for under the legislation as it stands.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Terms of guarantee.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): In outlining the regulations the Minister of Agriculture said that a committee of the cabinet and an inspector for the district would determine the amount of seed grain to be advanced. Who will have the final veto? The municipal council will receive applications from a number of farmers and those applications will be forwarded to the committee who will sit in with the inspector from that particular district. If it is decided that the amount is too much, will the reduction be made on a percentage basis or will the individual applications be reviewed and reductions made where deemed advisable? The minister said that six men in a municipal council were in a better position to know the farmer's needs than we were in this house. I have heard that before, but often the municipal council's decision is vetoed by someone else. I know, of course, that there must be some control; but I should like to know where the veto will lie, and whether the final decision will cover the total advanced to the municipalities or whether individual cases will be considered.

Mr. GARDINER: That is entirely a matter of provincial administration, and anything that I may say with regard to it cannot be at all conclusive. The practice is for farmers to apply to the secretary of the municipality, and when the council meets the applications are submitted and discussed by the committee who know the conditions. The applications are submitted either to the whole council or to a committee of the council and to the representative of the government, who will be this inspector spoken of here, and he reports back to Regina with regard to the matter. He makes his own check, and the decision is usually reached as a matter of agreement between the province and the municipality in exactly the same way as we reach an agreement with the provinces. They discuss the matter from all points of view and decide upon the total amount to take care of the municipality.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Will the inspector be the final authority on the question as to what a certain farmer shall have, or by what amount his allotment shall be cut down?

Mr. GARDINER: In 99 cases out of 100 they will agree that there is no final authority.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Some of the councils do not feel that way.

Mr. BENNETT: Why does the minister put paragraph (ii) in this form? We are dealing with our own guarantee, and I should have thought we would have said that we are not going to give a guarantee for any liability which accrues prior to three years from the date the guarantee is given to the province. The conditions under which our obligation attaches under the second sub-paragraph of section 5 make it referable entirely to the provinces. I should have thought the minister would have said that our guarantee should not become effective until three years after the date of the payment by the banks, because it is covered by the agreement. We introduce into this bill a provision that it does not prevent the province from making voluntary payments from time to time before the expiration of the three years. What have we to do with that? Obviously any money the provinces pay, so much the better for us. The whole fabric is based on a different appreciation of the transaction that I have. We, the federal power, are not concerned about their condition; all we should say would be that our guarantee would not attach until three years after the date in any event when the payments were made by the bank.

Mr. DUNNING: I speak with bated breath about the part of section 5 to which my right hon. friend refers, because nothing has had more microscopic attention on the part of eminent legal counsel than this section, in order to ensure that the liability of the province and that of the government of Canada shall be separate and successive, and not joint—

Mr. BENNETT: That is clear.

Mr. DUNNING: —and, second, that we shall not give a dominion guarantee except in cases where the province has arranged that it shall have three years before its liability is enforced.

Mr. BENNETT: That is where we differ.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. DUNNING: With all respect I can only say that that is as I am advised.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not want to question the law officers, but I have seen some fearful and wonderful products occasionally. This undoubtedly makes the province the determining factor. I refer particularly to that part which provides that the province shall not be prevented from making payments from time to time. What have we to do with that? All we have to say is the second condition, that no liability shall accrue under our guarantee until the expiration of three years from the date of the advance.

Mr. DUNNING: With deference I think my right hon. friend is missing one point, namely, that there is to be a provision forbidding me as Minister of Finance to sign a guarantee unless the guarantee given by the province has the three year leeway. My right hon. friend will see that if the government could be required by the banks to pay in advance of the expiry of the three year period, that would create an obligation which the dominion government, if not under the terms of this legislation, at least for the sake of the credit of the country, would have to meet. So we endeavour to take care of it by saying that the Minister of Finance must not give the guarantee of the dominion unless he is sure that the province which is being guaranteed will not be required by its creditor to pay until three years from the date of the advance. That is really the intention. Then, in order to provide for the possibility of the province paying sums voluntarily in advance of requirement, the exception is made. Of course we are very anxious to have them do that.

Mr. BENNETT: I merely say that the minister has much greater confidence in the provinces when he is dealing with the distribution of seed and oil and feed than when they are making a bargain with the banks. If the provinces have not intelligence enough to make the bargain that you say they have to make before you will give your guarantee, I have not that measure of confidence as to the other things which have been said here tonight with respect to the distribution of seed, oil, etc., because the provinces have to make that bargain, not we.

Mr. DUNNING: But we refuse to come in unless it is a particular kind of bargain.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, this may be the way to do it.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—When province deemed unable to fulfil its guarantee.

Mr. BENNETT: That is an extraordinary clause. Surely the Prime Minister was not present in council when this bill was passed. Look at what the governor in council is going to do. He is going to decide that Saskatchewan is unable to pay its debts.

Mr. DUNNING: The colleague of my right hon. friend, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, last year raised the point in connection with similar legislation to this in connection with the words in section 5, paragraph (i), "that the province is unable to fulfil its guarantee." He prophesied that such words would be completely unsatisfactory to the banks. He said there must be some means of defining when inability on the part of the province arises. We have tried to meet that point, because I may say the banks took the hint and did advance legal doubts as to the position. We have tried to meet the difficulty by section 7.

Mr. BENNETT: I should say it makes it possible to attach an entirely different meaning to the words "inability to pay." The way in which it has been expressed is that the governor in council may by order, not define what is inability to pay, but define the circumstances under which the province shall be conclusively deemed unable to pay.

Mr. DUNNING: There were a number of headaches over that.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Orders and regulations.

Mr. BENNETT: Should we not say, as was often pointed out here, "not inconsistent with this act"? Some question was raised when we were on that side of the house and you were on this side regarding that. "To carry out the purposes and intention," I think should be limited by the words, "not inconsistent with the provisions of this act."

Mr. DUNNING: It is just the same as it was before.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. DUNNING moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister undertake that the file dealing with the report made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is just now out of the chamber, will be made available for us to read? In all conscience what we should do is read that file before the bill has third reading; but in view of the urgency of the matter, I shall be content if I have an opportunity to look over these telegrams and correspondence.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be glad to call the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the necessity of bringing down all correspondence leading up to the order in council to which my right hon. friend refers.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.53 p.m.

Tuesday, March 29, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORTS AND RAILWAY ESTIMATES TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table the annual report of the Canadian National Railways for the year ended December 31, 1937; the annual report of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, for the year ended December 31, 1937; the report to parliament of George A. Touche and Company, auditors of the accounts of the Canadian National Railway system, for the year ended December 31, 1937, and the annual report of the Canadian National Securities Trust for the year ended December 31, 1937.

These annual reports, together with the railway estimates, will be referred to the standing committee on railways and shipping. With the unanimous consent of the house, Mr. Speaker, I now move:

That the resolution passed by the house on February 11, 1938, referring the following estimates to the committee of supply, be rescinded, and that the said estimates be now referred to the standing committee on railways and shipping:

Vote 427—Maritime Freight Rates Act, Canadian National Railways Eastern lines, 20 per cent reduction in tolls, $2,278,000.

Vote 428—Maritime Freight Rates Act, railways other than Canadian National Railways, 20 per cent reduction in tolls, $860,000.

Vote 437—Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals, capital construction and improvements, $35,000.

Vote 438—Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, capital advances, $24,000.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think on reflection the minister will be inclined to withdraw his motion in so far as it affects at least two of the votes he mentions. As to the first two, we have passed a statute by which a twenty per cent reduction in tolls is to be made in respect of the government road as well as other railways, and that obligation we cannot lessen or increase unless by statutory authority. It is merely a matter of computation. I should think therefore that votes 427 and 428 would not be referred to the special committee, because they represent a commitment that we cannot avoid. The item with respect to the car ferry is really a part of the accounts of the Canadian National and was so dealt with until the representatives of the island and all parties were insistent that there should be separate accounts of the island ferry. Inasmuch as the item of $35,000 which covers capital expenditures would be in the ordinary course money that has to be found by the country—perhaps more, perhaps less, depending on circumstances—I think that properly should be referred to the committee, and the same applies to vote 438. I am inclined to think the Department of Justice would advise the minister that the first two items are such that the committee cannot exercise any authority over them.

Mr. HOWE: With reference to the two statutory items, it has been the custom to refer them to the special committee. There has frequently been a good deal of interest on the part of the committee in how the accounts are made up. We have on occasion called Mr. Campbell, of the railway board, whose particular function it is to make up these accounts, to explain them to the committee, and I believe that under the circumstances the committee will be interested in examining those two items.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPORTED LAY-OFF OF 350 EMPLOYEES AT POINTE ST. CHARLES SHOPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. WERMENLINGER (Verdun): May I ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) a question? If, according to to-day's news. three hundred and fifty employees of the Canadian National Railways are to be laid off at Pointe St. Charles shops, St. Ann's constituency, on Thursday of this week, is this not a contradiction of the explanation given to the house last week?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: It was supposed that there was to be an agreement between the heads of the unions and the transport board. There is to be a general convention of railway employees—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: —in Vancouver.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must inform the hon. member that he cannot make a speech, but must confine himself to putting his question.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: I ask the Minister of Transport to give us an explanation why three hundred and fifty men of the Canadian National Railways shops are being laid off on Thursday of this week.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): The reason for the reduction in shop forces is, of course, the lack of work to keep the number of shop men now employed at work. The management of the railway and the heads of the unions are coming to my office tomorrow to discuss procedure. Pending that discussion, I can add nothing to what I have said before.

DUTCH ONIONS

INQUIRY AS TO IMPOSITION OF DUMPING DUTY ON IMPORTATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. C. BETTS (London): Will the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) state whether, in view of the very grave threat to the onion growers of Canada arising from the fact that the Canadian market is being flooded with a huge surplus of Dutch sets of onions that are being offered at as low a figure as one and a half cents per pound, and in view of the further fact that if any relief is to be afforded there must be immediate action by the government, the government has yet decided to impose the dumping duty, as was done in the spring of 1931?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): The responsibility is not that of the governor in council but of the Minister of National Revenue, and the matter has been fully considered. It was discovered upon investigation that seventy-five per cent of the stocks of onion sets now in Canada are not in the hands of farmers or growers of onion sets but in the hands of dealers; and, as the effect of a dumping duty would be to benefit the dealers rather than the growers, and as the persons who would be injured would be farmers who are purchasing onion sets, it is not deemed advisable to impose a fixed valuation for duty purposes.

SUPPLY

USE OF CANADA'S FINANCIAL RESOURCES FOR ELIMINATION OF POVERTY—AMENDMENT OF MR. BLACKMORE AND SUBAMENDMENT OF MR. BENNETT

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Dunning for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Blackmore.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I do not know whether this is the third or the fourth time on which I have had a few observations to make upon this motion. Apparently the time available at any one sitting was not very long.

In view of the observations made the other day by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) I should now like to direct attention to the problem of international payments and their effect upon our general monetary position. It will be recalled, perhaps, that in this country during the last few years we have had a good deal of difficulty with respect to exchange, and we have had discussions on more than one occasion with respect to favourable and unfavourable balances.

International balances consist, of course, of visible and invisible items. We refer to the visible items generally as commodity balances, and we now include in commodity balances gold, it being no longer part of our standard but merely a commodity. On the other hand the interest we pay abroad, the freights we pay, the insurance premiums, royalties on moving pictures, dividends, and all matters of the kind constitute the invisible outflow of money from this country.

In 1926 we had reached the point in the development of our trade where a substantial favourable balance was indicated. We had 275·6 millions in our favour at the end of the year, and we had an additional 31·5 millions with respect to gold. We had also an item which we cannot consider too carefully, namely the tourist trade, which consists of the amount of money left by tourists in this country; and had it not been for that item during the last ten years our position on more than one occasion would have been one of extreme difficulty. In 1926 the tourist trade amounted to 102·5 millions. The total of all these accounts during the year 1926 amounted to 409·6 millions. Against that we had an adverse balance with respect to freight, shipping, also insurance, royalties and dividends and matters of that kind, and we had to make net interest and dividend payments amounting to 201 millions. So that after we deducted that from our favourable balances we had left a favourable international balance of 189·1 millions, which we are told would be represented by the movement of that much capital out of this country for investment elsewhere.

In 1927 our commodity balance—that is, the goods we export and import—had fallen to 138·9 millions. Our gold had risen to 25·5 millions and tourist expenditures left in Canada amounted to 129·8 millions, a total of 294·2 millions. That year our interest and dividend payments amounted to almost as much as the previous year, but our favourable balance amounted only to 63·2 millions. Now that in itself, I submit, in view of what is happening in the country at the moment, indicates a condition to which any government should pay the closest attention having regard to the circumstance that England has recently been directing attention to a similar significant fact in her own economy. In 1928 our trade on commodities was favourable to the extent of 131 millions. Gold had risen to 89·2 millions, and the tourist expenditure stood at the very substantial sum of 167·7 millions making a total in our favour of 387·9 millions. But again, there were payments in respect of freights on shipping insurance and the like, and in addition, dividends and interest, and these stood at the very large sum of 221 millions, so that our favourable balance was 131·7 millions, nearly twice that of the preceding year.

In 1929, and I can recall the circumstance very vividly, as many hon. members no doubt will, during the discussions in parliament it seemed to some of us at least that the danger signals were waving. There are differing views in this regard; if there were not there would be no political parties. At any rate we believed that these matters were of serious moment, and we find that our commodity account showed an adverse balance of 131·3 millions; that is to say, our imports exceeded our exports that year—commodity exports—by 131·3 millions. And it will perhaps be within the memory of some hon. members from western Canada that that was the year the Winnipeg Free Press so strenuously advocated the farmers holding their wheat and not being misled by Argentine sales and prices. Further, also, it will no doubt be recalled that in the succeeding speech from the throne it was pointed out that we had in hand practically the last year's crop.

Now that is important because it contributed, of course, to the adverse commodity balance. Then, before taking care of all these matters, we had the following points to consider. First, we had a gold balance, favourable, of 74·5 millions; our tourist expenditures had risen to the very large sum of 187·8 millions; but we had to pay that year, as well as freight insurance and the like, interest and dividends, 260 millions odd; so that on all our accounts we had 195·8 millions of an adverse balance.

That is an important fact and one which I think cannot readily be overlooked in view of existing conditions; indeed, if it were not for that fact I perhaps would not feel that I was warranted in taking up the time of the house at the moment to direct attention to the matter.

Then we come to the year 1930. It might be said that our friends opposite were in power during the whole of that year, from the point of view of the figures, although they went out of office during the last half of the year. That year we had a total adverse commodity balance of 122·1 millions. Gold had fallen 2·7 millions and the tourist expenditure—I direct attention to this very significant factor —was still at the high figure of 178·8 millions. The payments that we had to make outside of this country rose to 288·6 millions and on balance we had an adverse showing of 286·5 millions.

Remember that long before the stock boom had collapsed international security was no longer what it once had been, and investors throughout the world became apprehensive of all their foreign holdings. That, therefore, is some explanation of the condition that then arose. Bear in mind also that in 1930, at the end of the year, this country had an international adverse balance of 286·5 millions. I said, and I believe my hon. friends opposite will agree, that that was a significant fact with respect to the depression that was upon us. But the danger signals had been flying in 1929. They continued to fly in 1930 and matters became so acute in that year that there developed the situation to which I have directed attention, wherein there was an adverse balance of 286·5 millions. Confronted with that situation, what did we face? Such a situation, unless it is arrested, means national bankruptcy; there can be no gainsaying that, and no one attempts to deny it. I suppose that most hon. members of this house realize the discussions that took place in England in that connection. She was having a continued adverse trade balance notwithstanding the vast interest payments that were coming to her from investments abroad; and that is why economists there were agreed on the question of raising tariffs.

We come now to the year 1931. Things were very bad but we had reduced our commodity trade balance to the small figure of 17·4 millions. Our gold item had gone up to 90·1 millions and our tourist expenditure still stood at the large figure of 174·4 millions. I point out that this tourist item has been the one thing that has been of such value to us during all these years in relation to our international trade balance. As I say, it amounted in that year to 174·4 millions and the gold item was only 90 millions. So that one gets some idea of what the tourist trade has meant to this country. After taking the gold and the tourist trade and allowing therefor, we find that we had to provide for payments abroad the large sum of 279·8 millions, and after the balance was taken between the two, visible and invisible, we found that we had reduced our balance, still adverse, to 78·3 millions, an improvement of over 200 millions over the previous year.

I am not going to discuss here at length the reasons why that was brought about, but it was brought about by the imposition of dumping duties for one thing, and, of course, the tariff that we passed as an emergency measure in the fall of that year. I point out these two factors because they are of tremendous importance in view of the international situation at the present moment. I also point out that in the fall of 1931 Great Britain went off the gold standard. England had gone on the gold standard in 1925 or 1926, too soon after the war, some people thought. In the fall of 1931 the gold in the Bank of England was exhausted and she went off the gold standard and passed a statute indemnifying the Bank of England for what had been done during the Friday and Saturday when they should not have carried on their operations owing to the depleted state of their gold.

Now we come to 1932. In that year we had a favourable commodity balance of 73·7 millions. We had gold that year of 73·1 millions, and our tourist income, although it was dropping, still retained its vigour to the extent of 155 millions. In other words, it was more than twice the value of the gold which we had available to correct our adverse position. Again we find that we had been able, by the financial action taken, to reduce somewhat the extent of the payments we had to make abroad. That year interest and dividends were against us to the extent of 261·8 millions. So that when the balance was finally struck we found that we had reduced the adverse balance to the trifing sum of 22·3 millions.

In that year the empire trade agreements were initiated and came into effect. We entered on the year 1933 with much more confidence than we had had in the preceding year. In that year our favourable commodity balance stood at 146·6 millions; gold had risen to 87·8 millions. The tourist income had dropped to 66·2 millions. Altogether these items made up 300 millions in our favour. Then we turn to the external payments for interest, freight, royalties, etc.; that year, by the operations carried on, interest and dividends were 224·3 millions. We then found ourselves not only out of the red but with a credit balance that amounted to 20 millions. That represented the culmination of efforts that commenced in 1930 and had been carried on—the Minister of Finance says not with much vigour, but our opponents of those days used to say with too much vigour—with all the vigour at our command at any rate, utilizing the machinery of tariffs and dumping duties and everything we could command by legislation and otherwise for the purpose of restoring our position in the international world.

In 1934 we increased our commodity balance, that is of exports over imports, to 148·1 millions. Gold now had risen to 109·6 millions. Tourist income was a little better than the year before, at 82·4 millions, making a total with respect to these items of 340·1 millions. By the operation of our reduction of interest rates, and of course, I am sorry to say, by the diminution of dividends that our enterprises were paying abroad, representing investments of nearly $7,000,000,000 of United States capital in this country, we found that our payments abroad had been reduced to 211·6 millions. So that we finished the year with a favourable balance on visible and invisible items of 74·8 millions. That was the year in which you might say we definitely began to show an upward movement in the curve of return to prosperity. The lowest level was in 1933, then it began slowly to go up, as pointed out by the banks in their returns.

In 1935 we had a total favourable commodity balance amounting to 192·7 millions; gold had risen to 116·7 millions, with tourist income once more improving, so that in that year we had 123·2 millions from tourist expenditures, making a grand total of those three items of 432·6 millions. Here again we find interest and dividend requirements lessening; in that year they amounted to only 208·6 millions. In 1935 therefore we had a favourable visible and invisible balance on international account of 180·9 millions.

Compare that with the situation that was left us as a legacy in 1930. If the student of affairs is concerned to look for analogies, look at the condition of this country to-day. What is the position? The figures show that last month our exports to the United States fell from 36 to 17 as compared with the preceding month. That is a significant fact, and it marks exactly what took place in 1929 and 1930. To-day our exports are diminishing, our imports increasing. We met the situation with our dumping duties and emergency tariff, and I suggest that with these danger signals flying it is the duty of the government to take some cognizance of the situation and prepare us against that day which is fast upon us. In making that observation I am merely recording views which find expression not here only, but in every part of the world. Everyone in the world realizes what these dangers and difficulties are.

Mr. ILSLEY: The right hon. gentleman does not suggest that we had prosperity when he had these high trade barriers, between 1930 and 1935, does he?

Mr. BENNETT: I suggest just what I said a moment ago, that by reason of the action which was taken, prosperity had begun in this country in the latter part of 1933; it continued upward in 1934, 1935 and 1936, and in 1937 it stopped sharply. I suggest that prosperity did not come in a single day or a single year. Depression did not come in a single day or a single year. I again point out to the minister that, cognizant of these conditions, realizing that these adverse balances were rolling up against us, we adopted the only methods to which we had recourse to meet them, and accomplished the purpose we had in mind. And more; we not only accomplished it, but we obtained from the manufacturers of this country their undertaking that they would not raise their prices except in respect of increased costs of raw materials. They kept their word, with but one single exception of which I know, and the consumer did not pay. To add the tariff to the cost of goods for the purpose of showing the incidents of the tariff between these years is entirely beside the question and wholly wrong.

Let us look at 1936. A new government came into office; and the Minister of Finance talks about the vigour with which it acted. Show me what was done in 1936 that was not merely maintaining what was done between 1930 and 1935. Did your excise tax remain at three per cent? Is it there yet? Did your tariff duties remain where they were before, except with respect to United States items? And with regard to the United States tariffs remember it was a Republican tariff, the highest tariff the United States ever had. It was not a Democratic tariff. Instead of reducing their tariff by legislation they provided that the president should have power to make treaty agreements, for what purpose? For the purpose of extending favoured nation treatment, to all the nations of the world if you will, but the amount of reduction could be only fifty per cent and no more. Fifty per cent of that ad valorem tariff was fifty per cent of an average of almost forty-five per cent; fifty per cent of the whole, adding the ad valorem to the specific, meant fifty per cent of sixty per cent, the highest tariff in the world. That was what it meant; that is what it means. And more; under that agreement he could not make a free item dutiable or a dutiable item free. Congress would not authorize him to do so, and congress placed a limitation on the period over which these agreements were to extend. That is why we have quotas. That is why I objected in this house, and our friends objected. That is why we will continue to object to an agreement that imposes a quota upon the exportation to a market of 125,000,000 from a market of 11,000,000, when they have free entry for all their products in the market of 11,000,000. Those are the reasons why we at least tried to make the position clear.

Then in 1936, with the government continuing the very policies against which they had railed, what was the trading balance? Look at the result of it, from the day we endeavoured to correct the position by the emergency tariff of 1930, with the undertakings to which I have referred. Let us look at it. We find that in 1936 the commodity trade balance had increased to 322·2 million dollars. That was not brought about by any action that was taken within twelve months, after the change of government. That was the maintenance of that principle upon which we had accomplished these results. That is known by all. We had gold increasing to $131,000,000; we had tourist expenditures once more increasing up to $156,000,000, making a total under those three items of 609·2 million dollars. Interest and dividend payments, freight payments and payments abroad amounted to 233·8 million dollars, because by this time some of our dividends had been increased, and the money pouring out of this country to service this seven billion dollars of investments here had increased, so there we had 233·8 million dollars. And we had a net total favourable balance of 323·6 million dollars, brought about by the maintenance of those provisions which had been made for the purpose of correcting what had commenced in 1929.

Perhaps it is not pertinent at this moment to enter into a discussion with regard to the export of capital from this country, and various other matters to which reference might be made. Sufficient for my purpose it is to say that the statistical department has furnished us with an indication that our trading balance at the end of December, 1937, was still favourable, but was falling as compared with the preceding year. Our commodity trade was favourable to the extent of $212,000,000. Gold had risen to $145,000,000. The tourist trade had increased to $170,000,000, and interest and other payments abroad amounted to $247,000,000. Other items totalled $63,000,000, still leaving us a credit balance of $217,000,000 at the end of the year. But look at what has happened since. It has been only three months, but they have been three months which, it seems to me, more nearly make the analogy between 1929 and 1930 very important to any government, and to the government of this country in particular. There you have the flags flying distress signals. They are apparent. There is no business man who has not seen them. Go and look in the factories. Go and look at the reduction in the number of workmen in the factories. Go and look at the business man's attitude towards the problems with which he has to deal. You find the signs everywhere. What are we doing about it? We have the significant railroad situation. Do you realize that during one of these three months our nationally owned railway did not earn its operating expenses? Is that not something to think about?

With these other signs to which I have directed attention, with respect to these matters, I shall close that phase of it, but I have in my hand a document issued by the United States government concerning trade between Canada and the United States. It is their version of their relations to us, not our version of our relations to them. I fancy most hon. members have received copies of this document. I commend to my fellow members of this house a consideration of these words:

> Canada is our largest single foreign market for finished manufactured products.

Just think of it; eleven million people—

Mr. CRERAR: What is wrong with that?

Mr. BENNETT: —is the largest single foreign market for United States finished manufactured products.

Mr. CRERAR: What is wrong with that? Is it dangerous?

Mr. BENNETT: Well, I would expect that question from some people but not from a minister of the crown whose sworn duty it is to protect the people of this country and who doubtless is endeavouring to do his best in that regard. He wants to know what that means. I shall tell him what it means. It means that to the extent to which those manufactured products have supplanted Canadian factory products we have dispossessed our people of employment and given it to people somewhere else.

Mr. CRERAR: Would my right hon. friend explain, then, how unemployment has dropped in Canada, if his statement is correct?

Mr. BENNETT: But surely the minister knows that unemployment is going up by leaps and bounds.

Mr. CRERAR: I know it has gone down.

Mr. BENNETT: It has gone up 25,000 during the last month. If instead of making radio speeches the minister would read the reports of the other departments of the government he would know these things. Does he not know that? Surely he should know it.

Mr. ROGERS: Not in secondary industries.

Mr. BENNETT: Did I say anything about secondary industries? I said "industries." That is what I thought; here you have the other mind at work. Here is the academic mind at work. There is the mind that does not bother reading about it, and here is the academic mind which says they are not out of employment because it is not secondary industry.

Mr. ROGERS: Is the right hon. leader of the opposition speaking about tariff-protected industries, or is he not?

Mr. BENNETT: He is speaking of this statement:

> Canada is our largest single foreign market for finished manufactured products.

My hon. friend asks if employment is less than it was a month ago.

Mr. ROGERS: My right hon. friend just now stated that he is not speaking of secondary industries. His figures must cover unemployment in all industries including seasonal occupations.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) at any rate can count on these troops when occasion demands, and I am sure the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) would be glad to bring them up to his support.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): There has been so little applause from the opposition side that it appears to be welcome.

Mr. BENNETT: Another county heard from! Dunvegan is now heard from!

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): It is not Dunvegan; it is just another illustration of the fact that the right hon. gentleman does not know everything he aspires to know.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, as a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, it is a great compliment to have the hon. gentleman make that observation, because it indicates that after all the standard by which the measurement is made is not very high.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That still leaves my observation correct, that the applause from the opposition in recent weeks has been so scarce that any applause is welcome.

Mr. BENNETT: The second paragraph to which I direct attention contains these words —and these are the words of the United States:

> Approximately 49 per cent of the total exports to Canada in 1937 consisted of finished manufactured articles. 42·5 per cent was crude material and semi-manufactured products, and about 8·4 per cent was foodstuffs.

I shall not do more than commend this document to the consideration of hon. members opposite, because it contains month by month the statement of imports into the United States from Canada of various kinds of commodities. And it will be noted that in 1937 our exports, which are their imports, fell to $24,876,000. It might be of interest to note that even in those sad, dark days of 1935, in May of that year the exports from this country to the United States were over $27,000,000. The returns which came the other day from the office of the Minister of National Revenue indicate that in the month of February they fell to $17,000,000. Those were our exports to the United States. But you do not notice a very great diminution in imports, do you, from there?

Mr. MOORE: Would the right hon. gentleman give the reference number of the document to which he has referred?

Mr. BENNETT: This document can be obtained from the office of the United States attaché in Ottawa, and is entitled, Trade of the United States and Canada, Division of Foreign Trade Statistics, Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, Department of Commerce, Washington, D.C.

I have not time to deal with that, further than to point out that it might be supplemented by a document which no doubt the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore) has seen, which was issued on January 27, 1938, by our bureau of statistics, and which deals with our trade balance. I direct attention to these things at this time only for one purpose: I conceive it to be my duty, as it was in 1928 and 1929, to point out to the house, in as moderate language as possible, what the figures show. The immoderation of my language might in other respects be criticized, but not with respect to figures. I have merely pointed out what the figures indicate. I did it then. I draw from them the one inference that I did then. I was told that my inference was wholly unwarranted but, unfortunately, I lived through three or four years of responsibilities and I knew too well that the inference was sound. I give this warning to-day which may or may not be listened to. I have done my duty by pointing out the analogy between those days and these. I have pointed out what the effect of the trade agreement with the United States has been upon the United States; on another occasion I will deal with what the effect has been from the standpoint of Canada. I am pointing out to-day that what we have done is to afford them the principal market in the world for their manufactured products.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it right to assume from my right hon. friend's remarks that at the present time the tariff against the United States should be increased?

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say anything about the United States. But I do say this, that if this country's integrity is to be maintained it may become necessary to take those steps of an emergency character which were taken in 1930 to safeguard the life of Canada.

What is more, I could—but I do not propose to do so—deal with questions having to do with the trade of this country, under the empire agreements. That matter may properly remain for another occasion. I have dealt with this primarily for the purpose not of discussing trade but of dealing with the monetary side of it. The stabilization of exchange must always be one of the foremost considerations in the mind of any one responsible for the exchequer.

When England went off the gold standard —it is idle for me to say to the house what hon. members know as well as or better than I do; I apologize for even making the observation at all to the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean)—the immediate effect was to have our dollar sensitive to the falling of sterling exchange. Our dollar in the United States financial mind is so closely connected with the pound sterling that we can maintain our dollar at par when you have the British pound at par or thereabouts. The pound is now about five dollars, and our dollar remains at par.

The question arose at one time whether as soon as England went off the gold standard we should not resort to some kind of inflation. It will be recalled that fluctuations of the pound were very marked—so marked, in fact, that the pound in New York did fall to $3.30, a very low quotation indeed. I suppose it must be within the minds of most hon. members that steps were taken here to endeavour to prevent our being made bankrupt, because we had so many obligations to meet in the United States. At this point may I quote briefly from a statement I made before the board of trade at Toronto at the beginning of 1933:

> Another difficulty, of considerable importance to us all, was the depreciation of currencies. When the pound sterling fell from $4.86 to $3.70 ($3.30 in New York) and the currencies of all other European countries and of Japan fell to the level now obtaining, it created additional difficulties for the Canadian people. I will not stop to speak of the methods by which we endeavoured to grapple with these difficulties, except that I would like to say a word with respect to the question that arises out of the depreciated currencies. Sometimes I find suggestions from those who have given little study to the problem to the effect that all that is necessary for us to do in Canada is to embark upon a policy of inflation. What does inflation mean? Nine out of ten that I ask have no answer, except they say, you will have two dollars where you had only one before.
> Gentlemen, may I point this out to you; geographically, we are part of the North American continent. Who by taking thought can add a cubit to his stature? Who by taking thought can change Canada from being a part of North America to being a part of Europe?

The Prime Minister made an observation somewhat like that the other day.

> Gentlemen, I invite you to remember that fundamental fact, that the Dominion of Canada geographically is part of the North American continent. And it gives me no joy to remind you also that financially it is in the same position. But frank recognition of a fact is absolutely essential if you are going to deal with the problem that it raises. In this year of grace, the Dominion of Canada must meet in the United States of America, Canada and Great Britain, for principal and interest on Dominion loans, direct and guaranteed, provincial loans, direct and guaranteed, loans of municipalities and a few public corporations, the enormous sum of $684,149,048. Of this $323,346,120 represents principal and $360,802,928 represents interest. You will note the interest alone is almost a million dollars per day, including Sundays and holidays. We have to provide this by renewals of our promissory notes or by payment. And of this vast sum there is due in the United States of America $266,124,100. Of this sum $109,392,776 represents principal due this year, and $156,731,324 interest. The obligations of the dominion due in the United States this year for principal and interest direct and guaranteed aggregate $108,244,576. Similar obligations of the provinces amount to $70,600,073; of the municipalities to $25,136,536 and of public corporations to $62,142,915.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, it becomes apparent even to the most thoughtless of us all that we had a situation to meet which required that we should do everything possible to stabilize the exchange situation, in other words, to give value to our dollar; and one of the reasons why balances, visible and invisible, become important, is that if we have a favourable trade balance with the United States it means that we at least have some dollars there with which to meet our obligations.

I want to refer to another statement I regard as somewhat important because it was made at the imperial economic conference held in Ottawa in 1932. The situation we were there dealing with was world trade, not exchange. These are the words used by me at the imperial economic conference of 1932, as reported at page 116:

> One of the most important effects of the fall in prices is the increased burden of the fixed charges payable on our governmental and private obligations held abroad, chiefly in the United States and the United Kingdom. Canada is an important debtor country; on January 1, 1932, total British and foreign investments in Canada were estimated at 6·4 billion dollars, against which is an offsetting Canadian investment abroad of 1·8 billion dollars.

It is a little less than that now.

> A careful compilation of the amounts we will have to pay abroad during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1933, indicates a total of $362,000,000, or over a million dollars a day (exclusive of Sundays). Of this total, $233,000,000 represents interest and $129,000,000 represents maturing principal. Moreover, declining commodity prices have greatly increased the drain of this interest and amortization bill upon our national production. As one dollar to-day will purchase at wholesale 48 per cent more than it did in 1929, the real burden of the service charges on these foreign obligations has increased from $362,000,000 to $535,750,000.
> It is true that there would be some offset because of the fact that these commitments include interest and principal payable to Canadian nationals who will exercise the privilege of cashing their coupons and bonds in New York when the terms of the security allow that alternative. Such payments will eventually come back to Canada. It is estimated that possibly from 25 to 50 million dollars will return to this dominion. (There is a wide range to this estimate because it is impossible to estimate with precision.) This leaves a net balance of service charges payable abroad amounting to from $310,000,000 to $340,000,000 which in terms of the 1929 dollar would be equivalent to from $460,000,000 to $500,000,000. The total value of our wheat and wheat flour exports in the record year 1929 was $494,000,000; in the fiscal year ended last March it had fallen to $135,000,000.
> From another angle these obligations abroad are of major significance in the consideration of Canada's monetary policies. Most of them are payable in New York or optionally in Canada and New York, or Canada, London and New York. Where such options exist the premium on New York funds makes it practically inevitable that payment should be demanded in New York funds. This means that during the year ended next March a maximum of over $279,000,000 will be payable in the United States. England's going off the gold standard was followed by a drastic decline in the price of our dollar on the New York market.

I should like to ask my friends opposite, especially the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), to listen to this:

> The effect which this action by England had on Canada is difficult to exaggerate. It has resulted in a struggle to maintain the national integrity.

Hon. members have perhaps heard me say that too often.

> It was necessary for us to increase customs duties not for the purpose of protection, but to maintain the balance of our national position. We had either to face bankruptcy or restrict imports. At one time, our dollar fell as low as 75 cents in the New York market. To-day the premium on New York funds is only 14 or 15 per cent, but even with this premium the increased burden to the individual corporation or government of servicing these foreign loans is obviously a heavy one.
> It is equally clear that the depreciation of the Canadian dollar and the fluctuations in New York exchange increase the difficulty of refunding old loans and floating new issues in the American market. This is particularly important in view of the fact that since the war the United States has been our chief source of capital imports. Of the 6·4 billions of foreign investments in Canada referred to above, over 3·9 billions or nearly 62 per cent are owned in the United States, and only 2·2 billions, or 34 per cent, in the United Kingdom.

The figures are somewhat changed now as shown by the bureau of statistics, but I shall not take time to correct them.

> From 1924 to 1931, the United States absorbed over 41 per cent of the public issues of Canadian bonds, whereas the United Kingdom's purchases averaged less than 2 per cent of the total as compared with approximately 75 per cent before the war. At the end of 1931 Canadian banks had 83 million dollars loaned on call in New York and over 100 million dollars in bank balances in that market. Under present conditions, therefore, the relationship of our dollar to the American dollar is bound to be of great significance to Canada.

Finally, the evils of fluctuating exchanges are especially injurious to Canada because of the importance of foreign trade in our national life. With only ten million people Canada ranks fifth among the nations in imports and sixth in exports, whereas on a per capita basis we rise to third place in exports and to third or fourth in total foreign trade (depending on the year selected). Normally, about 20 per cent of our productive activities, it is estimated, are directly involved in commodity exports. Nor, as was pointed out in other discussions this morning, is the major portion of this foreign trade with empire countries. In 1930, for instance, 46 per cent of our exports of Canadian produce went to the United States and 67·9 per cent of our total imports came from that country. With the whole British Empire, on the other hand, the proportions were only 33 per cent for exports and 20·3 per cent for imports. For Canada, therefore, stable exchanges with gold standard United States as well as with the empire countries are a vital necessity.

Mark you, the United States was then on a gold standard basis.

With our southern neighbours, also, tourist expenditures and other forms of commercial and social intercourse bulk large. Invisibles play an important part in our international balance of payments. Tourist expenditures in this country, for instance, have amounted to from $200,000,000 to $250,000,000 annually.

I think last year it was higher still.

Our new production of gold has also been a matter of great importance to us. Although we have not been on the gold standard since 1929 in the sense of maintaining a free market for gold, we have been obliged to meet in terms of gold the external payments referred to. Our production of gold last year was $55,000,000 and the present rate of production is about $5,000,000 a month. You can realize how important this has been to us.

That was the statement made by myself at the meeting of the imperial economic conference here. Bear in mind that the United States had not then gone off the gold standard, and we had to service our obligations in terms of our contracts or be defaulters—and we were not defaulters for a single dollar. That is worth keeping in mind. At the present time the Minister of Finance has no difficulty such as that. The United States has gone off the gold standard, and the situation is no longer that of our having to find yellow metal, in the language of my friend from Ontario, with which to meet the obligations that arise in respect of provincial or federal securities. That situation has passed away. But we had to do that. We had to do whatever could be done to reduce that discount on Canadian dollars from twenty-five to ten, to eight, to seven, to six per cent; in 1933 we got it down to 98½ cents on the dollar, and thought we had been exceedingly fortunate. That situation is no longer burdening the government of Canada; that situation has been relieved by the action taken in the United States of America. And I should like here to do something I have always longed to do, to say that when England went off the gold standard and our difficulties were very acute, the president of the United States, Mr. Hoover, sent me word saying anything he could do within the limits of his constitutional rights to assist us, he would do, because we had declared that we would meet our obligations in the terms of our contracts—and we did. That is the side to which I draw attention.

Under these circumstances we believed it essential, as we still do, that this country should have a central bank. We believed it for reasons that I will not analyse at the moment. I had in the back of my head the idea, which apparently was not sound because our population was too small, that we might be able to do something with respect to exchange between Great Britain and Canada and not do it through New York; that we might be able through our central banks to establish our own exchange system throughout the countries that constitute the empire, with the central banks of Australia, New Zealand, Great Britain and South Africa. But our population is too small and our volume of business too limited as compared with the tremendous business of New York for us to hope to be able yet to establish clearly—I say, clearly—our position with respect to exchange.

Mr. McGEER: Was that message from the president of the United States official? Was it a document?

Mr. BENNETT: No, it was not a document. It was by word of mouth.

Mr. McGEER: Could it be defined in the terms that the speaker has mentioned? Apparently there was a reason why the assistance of the United States was—

Mr. BENNETT: Not a bit.

Mr. McGEER: Apparently it was because we had taken a different course from that of England. If there was any such arrangement between the Prime Minister and the president of the United States I think we should know it.

Mr. BENNETT: I have said distinctly there was no such arrangement; it was never discussed. But I want to pay tribute to a man who is no longer in an official position, and who, through his minister here, came to me and said anything they could do to help us they would do. That was all, because the constitutional limitations made it impossible for him to do anything.

Mr. McGEER: That is a very different thing from what was said a moment ago.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the position. The idea that it had anything to do with the attitude of England was never thought of or hinted at or discussed. It seems to me passing strange that that observation should be made.

At any rate, that is the position we found in 1933. I was going on to point out that in dealing with this problem of exchange we had one of the most difficult of all the problems that confront any government. For here were these maturities of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, payable in New York in gold; here were the maturities of our country, for instance the renewal of deposits with the Chase National bank,—and I do not forget, either, their great consideration for us at that time of peril and danger. I met the directors and told them exactly what the position was, and what we were striving to do, and they said, "Certainly, if you are trying to do that to meet your obligations, we will renew your obligations", and they did so on what was regarded at that time as most favourable terms. One should at least pay a tribute to those who have endeavoured to help in times of great stress and strain and have done what they could within the limits of their powers, having regard to their constitutional limitations, for the purpose of giving us assistance.

Then we established our central bank; and that was a slow process. Some people think it is a very simple thing to pass a statute. I explained the other day what the difficulties were. The deputy governor said last night in an address he made in this city that the government did what apparently he thinks it is the duty of a government to do,—to appoint a governor and take his advice. At least that is his statement that is printed in the press this morning. That was done, and when this government came into office what did they find? They found a well-equipped, well-officered and manned central bank operating in every province in Canada. They found more. They found not only the original set-up but that the provisions that had been made with respect to treasury bills had been so expanded that from 105 millions they had gone up progressively to 150 millions, where they now stand.

Mr. DUNNING: No, not when we came into office.

Mr. BENNETT: Not the day that the present government came into office. But the governor points out that there was a rise from 105 millions to 150 millions. He says in his report:

During 1936—

That is what I am talking about, the year after the present government came into office.

During 1936 the amount of dominion government treasury bills outstanding was increased from 105 millions to 150 millions. The average tender rate during the year was ·85 per cent for 90-day bills. The rate ranged from 1·198 per cent on the offering of January 2, 1936, to a low of ·643 per cent on September 15, 1936, and the last offering of the year was sold at a rate of ·746 per cent.

He then points out the difficulty of having any wide market for treasury bills, because bills of that kind in this country are, or were until the offering was made during these five years, an unknown thing. The only dealing with bills had been through the operations of the Finance Act, which by no extension of meaning could be said to be a market for bills in the sense in which that term is used in England.

One word more about that phase of it. The effect of these efforts was to place machinery functioning in every part of this dominion at the disposal of the incoming government. The United States had gone off the gold standard. That trouble had disappeared. Our funds were substantially at par, and if we maintained our trade balances they could be kept there.

Mr. ILSLEY: They still are.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. ILSLEY: That shows we have kept our trade balances reasonably normal.

Mr. BENNETT: Reasonably normal. I am only pointing out what the tendency is, and I can only read the figures as they are; I have not any ability to do other than that.

The other morning a report appeared in the press that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) had said at Edmonton:

. . . If no other party interferes with present legislation passed by the Liberal government, such control will be in effect in 1945.

The control he referred to was:

Changes are being made, and I say the time cannot come too soon for me when the government has control over credit and currency in this country. I mean control entirely in the hands of the government of Canada.

Then follows the statement I have read.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, may I call the attention of the right hon. gentleman to the fact the statement was corrected in the press the following day.

Mr. BENNETT: It was?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, it was not published here, then, so far as I saw. What was the corrected statement?

Mr. GARDINER: I have seen it in a number of papers. It appeared correctly in the Edmonton Bulletin the morning after the meeting, and was quoted in every other paper in the same way.

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact this report is clipped from the Winnipeg Free Press of March 17, 1938. The hon. gentleman says it has been corrected, therefore I will say only this about it, that no legislation has been passed by this government so far as I know that gives the government control of credit. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) may say that there has been an appropriation of some of his views and an adoption of some of his opinions, but they have been so circumscribed and limited in their operation that I am afraid he would deny their paternity. That is the position with respect to the matter at the moment. The only construction that I can place upon it is that the minister meant that the banks would be practically out of business so far as note issue is concerned by 1945. Well, the Liberal government did not provide that. In the revision of the Bank Act it is provided that on the first day of January, beginning with 1936, the banks shall retire five per cent of their note issue, and after the next five years, on the first day of January retire ten per cent per annum. That leaves twenty-five per cent of bank notes in Canada and elsewhere in 1945; and I should like the house to keep in mind the "elsewhere." I suppose it is known to every member that there are a number of branches of Canadian banks abroad, and by statute we authorize the issue of paper money in the West Indies by some of our Canadian banks. It will be recalled that in the return which the banks make they indicate not only the circulation of their notes in Canada but in every other part of the world; and the whole set-up as indicated by the return from time to time in the Gazette, is of course predicated upon its being a return for the whole of their operations in every part of the world. And twenty-five per cent was left because there are circulating the notes of one or two banks, in particular in the West Indies, in a rather extensive way, The reduction in the note issue of five per cent on the first day of January has now been operative for three successive years, so that 15 per cent has been retired—five per cent on January 1, 1936, five per cent on January 1, 1937, and five per cent on January 1, 1938. The governor of the Bank of Canada refers to the matter but does not indicate the exact volume of notes that had been retired by the beginning of this year. I believe, however, that it now stands at $22,000,000 or more. Is that right?

Mr. DUNNING: That is about right.

Mr. BENNETT: Those notes have gone out of circulation and have been destroyed.

Mr. DUNNING: And replaced by Bank of Canada notes.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; and, as pointed out by the governor in his report, the necessity of increasing Bank of Canada circulation arises from the diminution of bank circulation. As their notes go out of issue Bank of Canada notes come into issue, and that is responsible for the marked increase in Bank of Canada notes at the first of the year, when the transaction for the past year has been completed.

There is one point to which I would like to direct attention, because the other day we seemed to be at cross purposes in language though not in reality. I indicated to the minister my fear that when people talk about being able to make loans or investments to the extent of ten per cent of their cash reserve they at once create in the minds of the public—

Mr. DUNNING: The right hon. gentleman is starting wrong again; I am sorry to interrupt him.

Mr. BENNETT: Ten times the amount of the cash reserve—what did I say?

Mr. DUNNING: You said ten per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: I meant ten times. When people talk that way they at once conjure up a very difficult situation. For instance, here is the Ottawa Citizen, published only last night, Monday, March 28, reporting what one minister said—

Mr. DUNNING: In his pulpit in a sermon.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. Let me read a line or two:

> He also commented on a statement by finance minister Dunning that banks could loan ten times their cash reserve. This was disquieting and perplexing to the ordinary man, he said. "I don't think a healthy life can be built in Canada on any proposition that any institution can go ahead on ten times more than it can back up."

It was for that reason that I was endeavouring to use another formula. The real truth about the matter is this. I have in my hand the bank statement for February. It would be a different matter if we said, "Banks can never make loans in excess of their deposits and be solvent."

Mr. LANDERYOU: What are deposits composed of?

Mr. BENNETT: I will tell you what deposits are.

Mr. LANDERYOU: What are they composed of?

Mr. BENNETT: Your account and mine and a few others of that kind. Demand deposits in Canada at the end of February amounted to $634,068,054 and notice deposits $1,614,569,798, or a total of $2,248,637,852. That is in Canada; those outside Canada I leave alone.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Is that cash?

Mr. BENNETT: That is deposits. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance says it is my turn to bat now, and I do so with alacrity. And I am not going to take a base on a strike.

Mr. DUNNING: A base on four balls.

Mr. BENNETT: A base on a strike, yes. The real truth is that we had demand loans at that time for $807,279,133 and investments for $1,440,435.948, a total of $2,247,715,081, or $1,000,000 less than deposits. The business of banking consists in the maintenance of equilibrium between time loans and time deposits, demand loans and demand deposits; and for the purpose of preserving that equilibrium beyond question a cash reserve is set up, which in this case consists of Bank of Canada notes in the hands of the banks and deposits in the Bank of Canada that can be converted into Bank of Canada notes. That may consist of eight, ten, seven per cent or whatever you will of the deposits, but in practice it has been found ample to meet the situation. Why? Because our bankers have thus far been careful enough to maintain that equilibrium between time loans and time deposits and demand loans and demand deposits, so that there has been no claim made upon the cash reserve which exists for the purpose of maintaining the solvency of the institution. The other day I referred to the Merchants' bank, the Union bank, the Northern Crown bank, the Traders' bank, and other institutions that had not maintained that equilibrium between the loans and time deposits. For instance, one of these banks in my own community had lent to a real estate agent several hundreds of thousands of dollars. The boom burst, and where was that money? The deposit—where was that? Unrealizable. Instead of talking about ten times or eight times, or any other number of times, people should keep in mind the fact that the management is what determines the value of the bank; the administration maintains that high principle of an adjustment between time loans and time deposits and demand loans and demand deposits.

Mr. LANDERYOU: How are the deposits, created, then?

Mr. BENNETT: The deposits are created usually by someone writing on a deposit slip and handing so much money into the bank or discounting a piece of paper; that is the reason that Mr. McKenna made the statement that every loan creates a deposit. It does only if the deposit is made in the bank; if it is put elsewhere, in a safety box, or somewhere else, it does not create a deposit.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Why should anyone draw a thousand dollars out of the bank and carry that money around in his pocket and pay interest on it?

Mr. BENNETT: It frequently happens that substantial sums are carried about. Loose money is put away in the cupboard or somewhere else in the home for various purposes. All moneys do not go on deposit in the bank.

Mr. LANDERYOU: But it has to go back to the bank in interest.

Mr. BENNETT: The question of interest does not arise here.

Mr. LANDERYOU: It does.

Mr. BENNETT: The question at the moment is the maintenance of that equilibrium that I have already referred to. There are two kinds of deposits. In the first place you have notice deposits, that is to say, deposits that cannot be withdrawn from the bank unless notice is given to the bank. Loans are made for three months, six months, nine months and so on. but they must be so adjusted that when a man draws a cheque against his account he will find that cheque honoured. And if there comes a time when such a cheque is dishonoured then the bank has failed.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Would the right hon. gentleman say that the banks of Canada are safer and stronger than the banks of England? In 1914 when there was a run on the banks of England they did not have the amount of the deposits in cash.

Mr. BENNETT: I have told in this chamber once before the story of the difficulties in England. It is difficult to induce some hon. gentlemen who have very strong views to listen to the facts. The truth is that England was then on the gold standard. The Bank of England did not fail because it had not paper money; it failed because it could not provide gold to exchange for paper money. That is the story.

Mr. McGEER: That is not true of 1914, the year to which the hon. member refers.

Mr. BENNETT: I am talking about the failure of the Bank of England. And what is more, I have never listened to a tale about an inanimate thing that was more moving than the tale of the failure of the Bank of England.

Mr. DUNNING: That was not 1914?

Mr. BENNETT: No, this is the failure of the Bank of England, when they had to close as described by the late Chancellor Snowden.

Mr. DUNNING: I think the question was as to 1914.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Yes, I was referring to 1914.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, the same sort of thing happened. The great acceptance house of Kleinwarts had £7,500,000 out on acceptances. In England they have these enormous acceptance houses which buy accepted bills drawn on cities all over the world and sell them to the joint stock banks, and the joint stock banks may deposit them with the Bank of England for the purpose of getting money. Just as a solution suddenly colours a glass of water into which it is thrown, so this great disturbance of war threw the whole system into chaos, out of gear, and it became necessary, in order to put it in gear again, to do what was done. It was a temporary expedient for the purpose of relieving the stress and strain of an immediate difficulty, and it worked. Some hon. members, I doubt not, were in England at that very time, and everyone knows what the effect was. Immediate action was taken. The people accepted the so-called Bradburys as the expression of national credit at a moment of crisis, knowing that there was not one penny less of gold in England than there was before, that the gold was there for the purpose of backing the currency.

Mr. McGEER: Would the right hon. gentleman say that there is any difference between the pound sterling of to-day and the Bradburys of 1914-15? Neither is backed by gold, and that is the only thing of which there could possibly be any difference.

Mr. BENNETT: I have no intention of engaging in a controversy that would lead nowhere. I say they were backed by gold, and I say that the Bank of England has more gold to-day than it ever had at any time in its history, and is carrying it at $20.67 an ounce and not $35. While the currency is not backed by legislation making it technically gold standard money, there was never a time in the history of England when its currency was more fully backed by gold than it is to-day. Anyone who reads the financial newspapers or the last return of the Bank of England will know that. Why try to delude people with a specious story which has no foundation in fact or logic? Why endeavour to cover an issue up by vain words that mean nothing, when as a matter of fact the very money about which the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard is speaking is covered by gold to an extent that it never was covered before in the history of England?

Mr. LANDERYOU: Can they cover the deposits with gold at the present time?

Mr. BENNETT: Was there ever a time when the deposits could be covered with gold in any country? Everyone knows what the position is. In the long experience of mankind, by sound judgment and intelligent discretion people have learned to ascertain the likelihood of a run, the likelihood of men demanding their money all at once. I remember during the five years to which I referred one of our banks was suddenly confronted with a run for $10,000,000 because of certain rumours, and they handed out their bills and met the demands promptly and proudly. Under our law as it stands there is no chance of any difficulty arising as long as that is done, because we are the only country in the world that has so favourable an arrangement by reason of the issue of these bills in the terms in which we issue them, as I pointed out the other day. Why endeavour to create a suspicion in the minds of the people that something rotten is being done with respect to these institutions that we ourselves have created? In nine cases out of ten you will find the difficulty arises because someone wants a credit he cannot get. Someone wants to borrow money and cannot; that is what is the matter. Hon. members of this house have said to me: Why cannot I borrow so and so from the bank? I shall never forget a gentleman from Claresholm complaining to me that one of our chartered banks would not lend him money. I said: "Yes, I have a few dollars in that bank; I have an account there. They will not lend that money to you? What have you got?" "Well," he said, "I did have a quarter-section, but I sold it, and I have not got much—well, I haven't anything to speak of at all." "Listen," I said; "I would not lend my money to you with any hope of getting it back, and now you are complaining because someone who has control of my money for the moment will not lend it to you. If he did lend it to you I should like to have him dismissed." Did it ever occur to hon. gentlemen that that is the whole story?

Mr. DUNNING: But the hon. gentlemen in the corner do not intend that money borrowed shall ever be paid back.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DUNNING: I listened with my own ears to Mr. Aberhart saying just that on the radio on Sunday night, and dozens of other hon. members doubtless heard it. I do not know whether the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) heard it.

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact I prefer to attend church. I prefer to take mine undiluted. But this is made a catchword amongst our friends in the country—"Oh, look at those banks! They can buy securities or lend ten times their cash reserves!" And someone thinks that means all the money they have on deposit.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the trouble. But surely my right hon. friend will acquit me of any intention of conveying that impression.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, quite. I would acquit my hon. friend of almost anything in connection with financial matters.

Mr. McGEER: While we are on that point, if what the right hon. gentleman is now saying is said in earnest, what is the meaning of section 59 of the Bank Act, passed in 1934, which fixes the cash reserve for the merchant bankers at not less than five per cent of the total amount of their deposits? And will he also tell us how much they now have on deposit to support the $2,200,000,000 plus another $600,000,000 on deposit in the banks outside of Canada?

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think there is any difficulty about that question, except that it is not quite accurately put. I cannot be both questioner and answerer at the same time, so I shall take the question as though it were accurate and answer it as it should be. The maintenance of the equilibrium between time loans and time deposits and demand loans and demand deposits depends upon two things. There is the discretion and judgment of the man who is making the loan, whether fifteen, thirty, sixty, ninety or one hundred and twenty days; he has to decide whether notice deposits that he has will be drawn upon within that period, and to what extent. If the notice deposits are not drawn upon—all this is highly technical; he knows it all, has it in front of him—

Mr. CAHAN: He has it every day.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I was about to say he had it twice a day, in the larger banks. Therefore he makes his arrangements accordingly. The amount of money is put there as security, in the Bank of Canada or in the gold reserve, and as far as that is concerned my information is that when that is drawn upon to any extent you can be sure that something has gone wrong with the business of the bank.

Mr. McGEER: What about section 59, which you wrote into the Bank of Canada Act?

Mr. BENNETT: I have not section 59 before me.

Mr. McGEER: Apparently not.

Mr. DUNNING: It provides for the statutory portion of cash reserves required.

Mr. BENNETT: That was what I assumed. That is covered at the present moment, Mr. Speaker, by the provisions of our Bank of Canada Act and the Bank Act. To-day our banks have a line of reserve which consists first of Bank of Canada bills and second of deposits in the Bank of Canada, convertible into Bank of Canada bills. Those are the reserves. Those reserves are merely an assurance to the people of the country that their deposits will be safe; that is all.

Mr. LANDERYOU: That a small percentage of them will be safe.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the assurance, because based upon experience we are able to know that the withdrawals will be so trifling, as against the payment obligations that are provided by loans, that we can rely upon the draft not being made upon them. We all know that. Take your life insurance companies; take your fire insurance companies; take any of your companies. Look at the largest insurance companies in the world; look at the largest in Canada, with outstanding risks amounting to two and a half billion dollars. Why is it perfectly solvent? Because it is based upon those obligations maturing years hence, on an actuarial basis, computing the interest sometimes at two and a half per cent and sometimes at three per cent, as the case may be; knowing positively as an actuarial matter that some day they will become perfectly complete, and more; more in every case. For instance, there is one company that has $700 of assets for every thousand dollars of insurance outstanding. That is a very old company, needless to say, but that is almost incredible. Of course none of the companies has assets that equals its obligations.

Mr. DUNNING: Its ultimate obligations.

Mr. BENNETT: The obligations on policies, because they are payable in future. The experience of the banks—and I know exactly what I am talking about—is this: every bank—and the older the bank the better—knows what is the likelihood of money being withdrawn. That is a factor of the first importance. For instance, in some parts of the maritime provinces there are savings accounts that have been there for long periods, one of them in particular for three generations. It was willed to somebody, transmitted to the next man and then transmitted to the next. It is one of those old things, a sort of standby; that is all. Those are the notice deposits referred to here. Supposing I go into a bank to-morrow and ask for $10,000. The bank will say, "No, Mr. Bennett, we cannot lend you $10,000." Why? "Because we have reached the end of our lending ability at this moment. In the light of our experience we will be called upon to pay deposits amounting to so much, and we must be in a position to do so."

Mr. DUNNING: That does not happen.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, it does. It happened in 1914 in this country, when banks were fearful that maturities would not be paid. It must be remembered that when a bank lends money—

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, yes; in a time of crisis.

Mr. BENNETT: That is it, exactly. Just let me put this to this house: A bank predicates its loans upon its knowledge—and I say its knowledge deliberately—gained from experience and otherwise of the likelihood of the obligations being paid in time to enable any claim for deposits to be liquidated. That is the story, shortly put; and when there is a great crisis that interferes with the payments at maturity of course the bank has to take immediate steps to see what can be done to meet the necessities. In England they did it with Bradburys. We did something else, as you will recall, under the war time act that dealt with that situation. As far as loans and deposits are concerned the situation must always be this, that banks do not lend more than they have on deposit.

Mr. HAYHURST: Every loan creates a deposit.

Mr. BENNETT: I am quite content that the hon. gentleman has said so, but the misunderstanding on the part of the less intelligent public who listen to a lot of words, such as I have been using, which perhaps they are unable to understand fully, leads to the result that they gather up just a catchword. They say, "By Jove, this bank business must be a terrible thing. There is that bank with its deposits, and it is lending $20,000 on deposits of $2,000." I will tell you that the banks have to deliver just what the deposits call for, and the banks will liquidate their obligations to their depositors in the terms of the deposits. Let there be no misunderstanding about that.

Mr. DUNNING: We could not have a banking system for five minutes if that were not true.

Mr. BENNETT: It must be true, and that is just why new banks are so difficult to start. In the beginning they have no deposits to deal with, so they start out and lend money to make good fellows of themselves. The next thing that happens is that when my cheque is drawn on that bank I am told that the amount of my deposit is out in a loan that has not been paid, and the bank closes its doors. That is the story. I am afraid I have gotten far away from what I intended to say—

Mr. McGEER: Just on that point the right hon. gentleman might give us a little information about the $35,000,000.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. McGEER: What I should like to point out to the right hon. gentleman is that I did not ask a facetious question. What I wanted to know was why, in the 1934 bank act, the government of that day decided that a five per cent cash reserve was sufficient security against all deposits issued. What has happened is this, that the banks have far more than five per cent of cash on deposit, but in 1934 the government apparently concluded that five per cent of cash was an adequate reserve against deposits in Canadian banks. If that is so the banks can create deposits, as far as the limitations of the law are concerned in Canada, to the extent of $20 for every dollar of cash that they can deposit with the Bank of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the question?

Mr. McGEER: My right hon. friend does not need to do that.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the question?

Mr. McGEER: The question is this—

Mr. BENNETT: Why did the government do so and so?

Mr. McGEER: "The bank act of 1934 sets up a specific quantitative reserve which the chartered banks are required to hold against their deposit liabilities. In form this reserve must consist of a deposit in and notes of the Bank of Canada. In amount it must be equal to five per cent of the deposit liabilities in Canada. As a result the chartered banks as a group can legally create deposits amounting to $20 on the basis of a $1 reserve. A much larger secondary expansion is made possible, however, for the Bank of Canada is required to hold only—"

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. gentleman that he must ask his question, and that he can interrupt only with the consent of the right hon. gentleman who has the floor.

Mr. McGEER: My question is: Why did the government decide in 1934 that five per cent was adequate reserve?

Mr. BENNETT: I think there were two reasons. One was that this was the amount required in a preceding bank act.

Mr. McGEER: There was no reserve at all.

Mr. BENNETT: There had been, by practice. There was no central bank, but they had to maintain a reserve in Dominion of Canada bills. That is what the law was. I take it that the hon. gentleman read from that very valuable handbook, McGeer on Progress and Poverty, was it?

Mr. McGEER: I am reading from The Canadian Banking System, by James Holladay, but I can tell my right hon. friend that if he will read that book of mine he will know more than he indicates knowing to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: I was mistaken. It was not McGeer on Progress and Poverty he was reading from. But I note with interest his observation that if I read his book I would know more. I always feel we should pay tribute where it is due. He presented me with one. If I were to follow his suggestion and read his book I would know more of what he knew, but I would not know more than I know to-day. It is a very fine distinction.

Let us proceed one step further. The reason why five per cent appeared was this: There was a provision that the banks had to hold Dominion of Canada bills to the extent of a certain sum indicated by statute. Knowing we were to create a central bank, we provided that the reserve should be five per cent. The reason why the five per cent provision was made was threefold. All our banks are not equally strong and, with respect to note issue, the strong have always been careful with respect to the smaller. We have a common fund which takes care of that. It was brought to the attention of the government of that day that a reserve of five per cent had, in the light of experience, been ample. The banks said it had always been and it would always be in excess of five per cent, but they thought that five per cent was sufficient, for statutory purposes, and that as conditions improved—we were then in the depression—it would be competent for them to change that.

As a matter of fact, I believe the banks have averaged since 1934—except at one time, when conditions were extremely bad—between eight per cent and ten per cent. Is that right?

Mr. DUNNING: I think the average would probably be more than ten per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: I know it has run over ten per cent, but I am allowing for those dark days when things were lowest. I think it would average something like between eight per cent and ten per cent. It is nearer nine than eight, and I believe the minister might easily give it accurately. But at any rate it has risen, to answer the hon. gentleman's question at once.

In the light of experience it was found that, having regard to maturities and payments by those who borrowed, and in the light of the long time deposits remaining, and the non-fluctuation of them, that reserve would be sufficient to meet any demands which might be made by depositors for their money. In the light of experience that has turned out to be accurate.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Not in every case.

Mr. BENNETT: Since the act of 1934 I know of no case in which a depositor has not got his money.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The depositors have not all called for their money at the same time.

Mr. BENNETT: One thing I really delight in is that when a question is answered they merely suggest there was no reason why the question should have been asked. I always think that is highly entertaining.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I know of a case.

Mr. BENNETT: I said that there was no case since 1934 when the depositor had not been paid; but they say, "No, they did not want their money," or in other words, the question should not have been asked.

Banks have very large investments. The minister the other day referred to that fact. It is not from choice, but from necessity, that our banks place their money in securities. Here, for instance, is the central bank's statement for February, in crystallized form, and I find that they have investments of $1,440,435,948. I regret to say that the amount is larger than it was a year ago, and that it is rather larger than it was in January. These are dominion securities, provincial securities, and some municipal, but the one point I want to make clear beyond peradventure is that it is a bad sign when banks are compelled to invest their depositors' money in securities. Why? Because it indicates a lack of confidence on the part of those who have placed their money in the banks on time deposits, and who are not content to risk it in our industrial and commercial life. I draw an inference there that hon. members opposite will question: That, to me, indicates a lack of confidence. Confidence in this country can be restored only when, with some degree of certainty, men can engage in commercial and industrial enterprises.

At this time we have a trade agreement here, and another trade agreement there. "Shall I expand my plant"? "No; I do not know what is going to happen." "Shall I build a new plant"? "I do not know what is going to happen." "Shall I establish an industry"? "No, I have not confidence that the present situation will continue." I draw an inference my hon. friends opposite will repudiate at once. I say that lack of confidence arises because of the policy of this government; others disagree with that, and that difference of opinion is the foundation of party government. I say that certain things would establish confidence. I say that lack of confidence, non-confidence, is expressed in the central bank's statement, and I think at another time and place I can give very good reasons for so saying.

I have now led up to what I conceive to be the correct conclusion, namely, that we have here a complete lack of confidence, as evidenced by monetary results of policies of the government. One result is an increase in the securities held by the chartered banks. They have been compelled to increase their holdings of securities, or to refuse to take deposits and pay interest on them, because there is the cost involved in maintaining an office, and in keeping books and records of the deposits themselves. Either one of two things must happen: They have to use that money by investing it, and the investment is of two kinds—loans to customers, or purchases of securities. Investment in a loan is based upon the assumption that the loan at maturity will be paid; that a call upon the reserves will not be made, and that cheques will always be honoured for the deposits of customers. Investment in securities is predicated upon the assumption that during the lifetime of the security nothing will offer for lending purposes, and that therefore it is desirable, yea necessary, that they lock that money up in securities, as is the case. In my judgment, that is an additional signal to this government to take note of the conditions to which I have alluded.

Mr. DUNNING: Surely my right hon. friend will be fair enough to say also that loans, as well as investments, have risen.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; here are the figures. I did not insinuate that they had not risen, and I shall give my figures. A year ago call loans in Canada amounted to $118,000,000. To-day they are $70,000,000. A month ago they were $72,000,000. Those are the figures with respect to call loans.

Ordinary loans, or current loans in Canada have risen $46,000,000 since last year. The amount was $731,456,128, and it has risen $6,000,000 in the last month. It should be observed that the figures are very nearly alike. There is an increase, however, in loans. I do not wish the minister to say that I deny that fact.

I shall not trouble the house further; there is much that could be said, but the diversion which has been offered by the interesting questions which have been asked make it unnecessary to proceed further. The motion to leave the chair was met by an amendment, and the amendment was declared to be a vote of lack of confidence in the government and, as was indicated by the minister at the opening of his speech, was of such a nature that those who were opposed to the government would be disposed to vote for it. But the hon. member's amendment was made a means of suggesting that the alternative proposals of our friends of the social credit group would solve the problem to which they directed attention. That was their position.

They talk about monetizing credit. I wonder, sir, how many members of the house have stopped for a moment to think of the extent to which credit has already been monetized in Alberta, and the result of it.

Mr. LANDERYOU: By past administrations.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; but the credit was monetized to the limit, to such an extent that the interest on that credit could not be met, and default was made in payment of it. In the neighbouring western provinces credit has also been monetized beyond the possibility, according to the premiers of those provinces, of their continuing to meet without assistance the obligations thus created. Therefore, when you talk of monetizing credit and of social credit, we know that we have had the monetization of credit in those three provinces and that it has brought about conditions of such a kind that it is unnecessary to do more than merely refer to them as being the answer to the question: Shall there be a further monetization of credit? Of credit, mark you!—of the tar sands and of the Turner valley, of everything connected with the natural resources. All these were pledged when money was borrowed in London. I remember the prospectus of the Alberta and Great Waterways issues, and reference will be found there to Alberta's resources. We were monetizing our credit. We did this also in Saskatchewan and in Manitoba. We monetized our credit in every province.

Mr. LANDERYOU: And now we cannot pay it back.

Mr. BENNETT: Precisely, and although we cannot pay it back you want to have more of it.

I shall refer to just one other observation that was made in connection with the amendment, and that had to do with the question of inflation. I am not going to deal this afternoon with the complex and difficult problem of inflation, but I shall just content myself with reading what I said before the board of trade of Toronto in 1933. I said this:

> Now I am leaving aside the question as to how you are going to accomplish inflation. I have asked many men for the mechanics of it, and none of them have it except to tell me to borrow perhaps fifty million of dollars, and buy sterling, and perhaps fifty million dollars and buy American exchange, and so manipulate the two as to maintain a stable value for the dollar in terms of the pound. I have had recipes of that kind given me, but they have not said who is going to lend the money or pay the interest.

Then I used these words:

> Gentlemen, when you hear people talk about tying the dollar to the pound, I say, from investigations which I made during the last month abroad, we are making ourselves absurd. I use that term deliberately. How are you going to do it? I talked to the foremost authorities in Great Britain, discussed with them the question of inflation in Canada, and do you know what they told me?

And then I said:

> This is what he said to me: "Mr. Bennett, in all the history of the world you will find no record of inflation or departure from sound money by any country of its own volition as a matter of deliberate choice. There are two reasons why countries go off sound money, two reasons only when they inflate their currency; one is because of necessity from lack of sound currency and the other insolvency."

These were the reasons given by men who know so much more about this than I shall ever hope to do, that I just give this statement to hon. members as I gave it to my friends in Toronto, for what it may be worth. Certain types of inflation have been going on in these countries all these years. Every thoughtful man knows that. But the type of inflation that has been mentioned in certain of the speeches here, the issue of paper money without regard to—

Mr. DUNNING: Debt free money.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. That sort of thing is quite impossible if we are to maintain our solvency. I think everyone realizes that. Professor Kammener wrote a little volume on money in which he makes this statement which always staggers me, that when German inflation had reached its maximum, a single penny of the United States was sufficient to buy enough marks to discharge the entire mortgage indebtedness of the German empire before the war.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will the right hon. gentleman permit a question? I know he would not like to have his statement misconstrued. I should like to point out to him that we did not suggest social credit as a solution. My right hon. friend, if he reads very carefully my remarks, will not find the words "social credit" anywhere. Furthermore, we did not mention setting the printing presses in operation. That statement or meaning was absolutely put into our mouths by other people.

Mr. BENNETT: My mind is quite clear that the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Blackmore) did not talk of using the printing presses; while he may not have used the words "social credit"—it may have been that it was not desirable to do so—I am bound to say that I could draw nothing else from his remarks, and certainly the theories propounded were what I considered to be an authoritative statement of the principles of social credit. Perhaps I did a wrong to the hon. gentleman in the wording of the subamendment I now propose. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment be amended by adding thereto the following words:

—but that adoption of the policies of social credit as enunciated by its supporters in this house would afford no adequate remedy for such neglect.

I see no form of amendment by which I can express the lack of confidence in the administration which I have indicated as strongly as I can. At the same time I want to make it quite clear that I have not yet reached that state of intellectual advancement which would enable me to accept the principles enunciated by my friends to the left, with the invaluable assistance of their friend from Vancouver and his work on Progress and Poverty.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, we have listened to a long and rather remarkable speech by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). The subamendment he has just moved is interesting, and if it could be accepted without joining it to the amendment that was moved by the leader of the social credit group (Mr. Blackmore), I have no doubt that we on this side of the house would be prepared to support it. However, support of the subamendment involves the prevention of the house from going into committee of supply, and the subamendment will therefore have to be rejected by the administration along with the amendment that was proposed by the hon. member for Lethbridge. That is the position which I think the government will have to take on this motion.

Coming to the speech of the leader of the opposition, it is a little difficult for me to remember all that the right hon. gentleman has said. He began his speech on the fourteenth day of March; he continued it at considerable length on the twenty-second day of March, and he resumed it to-day. Having in mind that I might possibly wish to follow him I formulated some thoughts two or three weeks ago, but they have become a little vague and hazy at this late date. I have, however, this general impression of his speech as a whole. There were two parts of it that were quite surprising to me. The first was the position taken by the right hon. gentleman the other night in reference to a passage he quoted from the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), and in order that there may be no dispute as to what the Minister of Finance said, and as to the position taken by the leader of the opposition in reference to it, I turn to page 1151 of Hansard of March 8, where the Minister of Finance said this:

An increase of, say $350,000,000 in chartered bank holdings of Bank of Canada notes would increase their cash reserves from the present figure of about $250,000,000 to $600,000,000, and their cash ratio from about ten per cent to roughly twenty-one per cent.

The sponsor of the suggestion contends that no inflation is intended or would result by thus increasing bank cash, so long as the gold cover of the Bank of Canada did not fall below the twenty-five per cent minimum. This factor, however, is not a test of inflation. If the banks use their increased cash in the normal way, as a basis for the extension of roughly ten times as much in loans to the public, or for the acquisition of ten times as much in investments, bank deposits would expand by approximately an equal amount until the cash ratio was brought down again to approximately ten per cent. This would mean an increase in bank deposits from the present level of about $2,387,000,000 to something like $6,000,000,000, or more than 2·6 times the level of December 31, 1929. Am I merely old fashioned or orthodox when I say that this would mean a colossal measure of inflation?

The right hon. gentleman challenged that statement very sharply; in fact he characterized part if not all of it as "monstrous nonsense"; and because of the position taken by him, I think I should make clear what I believe is the true position. I believe, and I think most hon. members have believed for some years, that generally speaking it is true that loans create deposits, that is to say, that loans made by banks find their way immediately either into accounts in the same bank or into accounts in other banks, and that therefore loans are responsible for, result in, lead to, create deposits. The right hon. gentleman challenged that statement, and challenged it sharply. He put forward the case of a borrower from a bank who puts the money in his pocket and neither puts it in the bank himself nor gives it to anybody who directly or indirectly puts it in a bank. The simple answer to that is the one given this afternoon by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Landeryou) in his question, that that is beyond the range of the normal experience of human beings. Human beings may hoard money; but they do not hoard money on which they are paying interest, and the amount of hoardings of borrowed moneys would be infinitesimal, so small a factor in the whole situation that it cannot seriously be advanced as a reason for challenging the broad general statement, now commonly accepted, that loans do create deposits.

As a matter of fact, there is the best of authority for this statement. I suppose that the highest authority in the English speaking world to-day is that of the committee on finance and industry, which was made up of some of the greatest monetary economists and practical bankers in the world. The chairman of this committee was the Right Hon. H. P. Macmillan, K.C. The right hon. gentleman would not challenge his authority; he himself selected Mr. Macmillan to head a commission in Canada which investigated the banking situation in this country. I desire to read at this time two or three sections of this report so that the matter may be clearly understood. A great many hon. members, in speaking to me about the speech of the right hon. gentleman the other evening, said that he was right; that his position was sound. But his position is unsound and incorrect, as is shown by the report of the Macmillan commission. I shall read two paragraphs only, although several others also bear out the position that I am taking at the moment. Paragraphs 74 and 75 put the position absolutely clearly.

74. It is not unnatural to think of the deposits of a bank as being created by the public through the deposit of cash representing either savings or amounts which are not for the time being required to meet expenditure.

That I take to be the position of the right hon. gentleman the other evening.

Mr. BENNETT: No. I made it perfectly clear that a loan created a deposit, and I quoted McKenna to-day to the same effect.

Mr. ILSLEY: The right hon. gentleman quoted McKenna only to criticize him.

Mr. BENNETT: No; I admit that a loan creates a deposit if it is deposited in a bank.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will admit, Mr. Speaker, that the passage which was quoted the other night was not represented as "monstrous nonsense" to-day. The right hon. gentleman took an entirely different position to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: No, he did not.

Mr. ILSLEY: And with nearly everything he said to-day I am in agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, then, we shall have a dumping duty shortly.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not want anyone reading Hansard of the other evening to conclude that there is something in the position he took on that occasion, and therefore—

Mr. DUNNING: The minister does not agree with the tariff utterances of the right hon. gentleman to-day, but agrees with his monetary references.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; as has been suggested, I want to make it clear that it is with his monetary references that I am in agreement, and not with his statements about adverse balances and favourable balances of trade, to which I shall refer.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister will get there, too.

Mr. ILSLEY: The Macmillan report continues:

But the bulk of the deposits arise out of the action of the banks themselves, for by granting loans, allowing money to be drawn on an overdraft or purchasing securities a bank creates a credit in its books, which is the equivalent of a deposit. A simple illustration, in which it will be convenient to assume that all banking is concentrated in one bank, will make this clear. Let us suppose that a customer has paid into the bank £1,000 in cash and that it is judged from experience that only the equivalent of ten per cent of the bank deposit need be held actually in cash to meet the demands of customers; then the £1,000 cash received will obviously support deposits amounting to £10,000. Suppose that the bank then grants a loan of £900; it will open a credit of £900 for its customer, and when the customer draws a cheque for £900 upon the credit so opened that cheque will, on our hypothesis, be paid into the account of another of the bank's customers. The bank now holds both the original deposit of £1,000 and the £900 paid in by the second customer. Deposits have thus increased to £1,900 and the bank holds against its liability to pay out this sum (a) the original £1,000 of cash deposited and (b) the obligation of a customer to repay the loan of £900. The same result follows if the bank, instead of lending £900 to a customer, purchases an investment of that amount. The cheque which it draws upon itself in payment for the investment is paid into the seller's bank account and creates a deposit of that amount in his name. The bank, in this latter case, holds against its total liability for £1,900 (a) the original £1,000 of cash and (b) the investment which it has purchased. The bank can carry on the process of lending, or purchasing investments, until such time as the credits created, or investments purchased, represent nine times the amount of the original deposit of £1,000 in cash.

The next paragraph, 75, simply extends the field of operations to other banks, that is to the banking system as a whole.

Mr. CAHAN: That assumes that all the deposits are made in one bank. It does not take into consideration that deposits are made in other banks or that deposits are made in other banks in other countries.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, then, I shall read paragraph 75:

75. The process is much the same when we remove the assumption that there is only one bank. The credit granted by one bank may reach the accounts of customers in another bank. There is thus established a claim by the second bank upon the first for cash, and the ability of the second bank to grant loans is improved in so far as that of the first bank is reduced. Over the banking system as a whole therefore, loans and investments made by the banks increase their deposits. There is, however, a limitation on this process. A bank which is actively creating deposits in this way will naturally find that a considerable part of the cheques drawn against them will be in favour of other banks. It will thus lose part of its cash reserve to those banks and must proceed to limit its loan operations if its normal cash ratio is to be maintained. In practice, therefore, no one bank can afford to pursue a policy of creating deposits by making loans or investments which is much out of line with the policies of other banks.

Mr. DUNNING: That is exactly what I said the other night.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is exactly in line with what the Minister of Finance said in his speech the other night.

I believe there is something in what the right hon. gentleman says to the effect that the statement that loans create deposits may mislead some people. There is something in that position, and I have no quarrel with the warning he gave to the house and to the country this afternoon. It is not true that a bank can lend wildly and indefinitely to any class of borrowers, thereby creating a huge amount of credit money which is put into circulation in the dominion. There are two very well understood limitations upon the power of banks to increase credit money: The first is the necessity of preserving an adequate cash ratio, and that has been fully explained this afternoon. The bank must follow the normal banking practice with regard to the preservation of the cash ratio, and if that ratio is too small, there is danger of the bank being called upon to make payment in cash which it cannot make, with the result that it will find itself in trouble. The second limitation is that the loans must be good loans. The loans and investments must be good. If they are not, then the bank will find that its deposits, which are good deposits created by loans, which are liabilities of the bank, will be in excess of the value of the loans and investments, which are assets of the bank, and the bank will be insolvent and will fail, as the Merchants bank failed. My right hon. friend explained that the other night. The right hon. gentleman did not say frankly that he was wrong the other night, as he might just as well have said this afternoon; but after the explanation he has given us today there is not much difference of opinion between the parties in the house with respect to the true nature of banking operations.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. KUHL: Is it true that the banks of Canada owe the people of Canada between one and two thousand million dollars cash? Have the people that amount on deposit with the banks? That is the first question I should like to ask the minister, and the second is this: If they have that amount, how can the banks pay their obligations to the people if there is less than $300,000,000 cash in the whole dominion?

Mr. ILSLEY: The answer to the first question is, yes. The banks do owe the people of the dominion something over two billion dollars. The answer to the second question is that so long as the banks maintain an adequate cash ratio, they can pay all that in the ordinary course of events they will ever be called upon to pay. That is the practical way of dealing with the situation, and anything else is merely academic and theoretical.

Mr. POOLE: Does that not prove that the banks do create credit; that a loan does create a deposit?

Mr. ILSLEY: Everyone admits that. Everyone says so.

Mr. KUHL: Does that not prove that the banks do create money?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall answer a reasonable number of questions, but not too many.

Let me now deal with the other statement of the right hon. gentleman, a statement that surprised me. It is not so much a statement, for I do not think I can actually quote it; it is rather the general position he took in reference to adverse and favourable trade balances. Ever since I have been in the house I have heard this matter of adverse and favourable trade balances discussed, and while I am not sufficiently versed in economics or in the theory of international trade to deal at all thoroughly with the position taken by the leader of the opposition this afternoon, I am satisfied that almost any economist would regard with great surprise the touching faith which the right hon. gentleman has in favourable trade balances as a means of enriching a country. The position he has taken seems to be that if we send out more goods and services than we bring in, we are getting rich, and if we bring in more goods and services that we send out, we are getting poor; and that at all costs we must preserve a substantial trade balance.

My understanding is that over a period of time the amount of goods and services exported balances with the amount of goods and services imported, and if there is a temporary trend in one direction or the other, the effect on the currency is very likely to operate powerfully to restore the balance. For instance, if we were to export very heavily in proportion to our imports, there would be a demand by the purchasers of our exports for our exchange, which would cause our exchange to appreciate in terms of the exchange of the countries in which the persons buying our goods live; and when that happens, an adverse influence is set up against our exports. The same is true if we import excessively in proportion to our exports. For the time being there is likely to be a depreciation in our currency, which in turn will encourage exports.

I am sure the leader of the opposition when he came into power in 1930 did not start out consciously to affect the value of our currency by his dumping duties and high tariffs. I followed closely the course of events in those years. I was in this house in opposition, and I think the records will bear me out when I say that his object in raising the tariffs and imposing dumping duties to the exorbitant degree that he did upon goods coming into Canada was to end unemployment—to give work to the people of the country. That is what he said at the time.

Mr. BENNETT: That was one object.

Mr. ILSLEY: We did not hear anything about currency for two or three years.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: The records are there. The predominant motive, the reason given for the imposition of the dumping duties, was to give work to Canadian citizens—an object which, by the way, did not succeed—and it was not until people became interested in currency matters in 1932 and 1933 that the right hon. gentleman, ex post facto, took credit for having previously looked into the matter and taken steps to maintain our currency. It is an open question whether the maintenance of our currency at the level at which it stood in those years was a good or a bad thing for the country. I always felt, despite the argument to which we have listened this afternoon, that our currency for two or three years during that period was maintained at too high a level, though I admit that there are two views in that regard. As the leader of the opposition said, we were caught between the pound sterling and the United States dollar. As regards certain of our interests, it seemed advantageous to maintain our Canadian dollar at a high level so as to permit those of our municipalities and industries which had payments to make in the United States to make them with greater facility than they could otherwise have done. But from the standpoint of our exporters, who are a very substantial part of the population, it would certainly have been advantageous if Canada's dollar had followed the pound sterling to a greater extent than it did.

Now, sir, I want to deal with two or three statements that have been made. One of them has reference to this $3,000,000 loaned to Saskatchewan. I deal with this because the statements made in the house by the right hon. leader of the opposition—or not so much the statements as the tone in which they were made—seemed to carry the implication of irregularity on the part of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Not the slightest suggestion of irregularity.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, they certainly were calculated to disturb public confidence in the Bank of Canada. I say that, having heard the right hon. gentleman on the floor of the house and read his speeches since. I want to refer to that $3,000,000 transaction.

It will be remembered that these loans were made by the Bank of Canada in the spring of 1936. There had been a dominion-provincial conference in December, 1935, which continued into January, 1936. The delegates and this government agreed upon the setting up of a system of loan councils, that is an individual loan council for each province.

Mr. DUNNING: Each of the provinces which desired it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The essential feature of the loan council scheme was that borrowing and financing generally by the provinces which came into the scheme would be under the control of the dominion government. It was contemplated that there would be a refunding of the obligations of the provinces which came into the scheme. The government undertook to submit to parliament legislation which would establish a loan council scheme. That legislation, or the preliminary resolution necessary for the legislation, was brought into parliament, and if I remember correctly, it was rejected by the senate. But before the legislation was so rejected, and while the Bank of Canada thought, and had reason to think, that a loan council scheme or system was coming into existence, the Bank of Canada made these loans to Saskatchewan, believing that they were making temporary loans. On May 1, 1936, a four and a half per cent bond issue of Saskatchewan, in the amount of $2,000,000, was to mature. As the old peace, order and good government legislation had expired on March 31, 1936, the dominion government had no power to make a loan to the province to meet this impending maturity. However, the premier of the province, without any prompting on the part of this government or any member of it, consulted the Bank of Canada, and the bank agreed to make a loan of $2,000,000 to the province to enable it to avoid default, on the assurance received from the province that it would introduce the necessary provincial legislation to enable it to enter the loan council scheme, and a further assurance from the Minister of Finance that the dominion government intended to proceed with the loan council scheme. At the same time the Bank of Canada agreed to advance a further $1,000,000 to enable the province to redeem a three and a half per cent issue maturing June 1, 1936. That was the inception of these loans.

The weekly statement of the Bank of Canada for April 30, 1936, shows, under the title Advances to Provincial Governments, a loan of $2,000,000, and the bank's weekly statement for May 30, 1936, shows that the other $1,000,000 loan had been made, as total advances to provincial governments were shown on that date to be $3,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: That is April 30. I thought the minister said the loan was not made until May 1.

Mr. ILSLEY: The bond issue matured on May 1; the loan was made in time to take care of it, and would therefore show on April 30.

In the monthly statement of October 31, 1936, advances to provincial governments were down by $2,000,000, and the bank's holdings of dominion and provincial short term securities increased by $2,000,000. The weekly statement for November 25 is the last one on which the $1,000,000 is shown as an advance to provincial governments, and in the statement for November 30, 1936, this item disappears and the bank's holdings of dominion and provincial government short term securities increased by $1,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Then the bank still held the securities. That is what I want to know.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is apparent, therefore, that the two loans were made as advances for six months under section 21 (1) (k) of the Bank of Canada Act, which section also provides that this type of loan must be repaid before the end of the first quarter after the end of the fiscal year of the provincial government concerned. It is obvious that what the bank had in mind was that within the six months' period the loan council legislation would have been passed and an arrangement completed for refunding the outstanding debt of Saskatchewan as contemplated by the loan council legislation. Had this happened, the bank's loan to the province would have been paid off at maturity as a result of the refunding operation. However, as hon. members know, the loan council legislation failed of passing in the senate, and consequently the province had no means of finding the cash with which to pay off the $3,000,000 owing to the Bank of Canada. The bank's weekly statements show, therefore, that at the maturity of the loans the bank took the province's treasury bills. Is that not the whole story?

Mr. BENNETT: It does not show that; that is the point.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes; the statement shows it.

Mr. BENNETT: I have the statement. It does not show anything about treasury bills.

Mr. ILSLEY: The right hon. gentleman is referring to another point, that the treasury bills of the dominion and of the provinces are not shown separately. I am advised that these treasury bills have a six months' maturity and consequently have been included under the only item under which they could be shown.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the bank still hold them?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; as the six months' bills mature, they are replaced by treasury bills running a similar period.

Mr. DUNNING: It was all tabled in the house. It is no mystery.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a little unfairness, though.

Mr. ILSLEY: I want to deal with the question of publicity, because if there was ever a transaction to which the fullest publicity was given it was this transaction. It was thoroughly publicized in this house and out of it.

In the budget speech of May 1, 1936, the Minister of Finance referred to this loan. He said:

The province of Saskatchewan, which has an issue maturing to-day, May 1, has expressed a willingness to participate in the loan council arrangement and with the understanding that the dominion will proceed with its legislation the province, I am advised, has made arrangements with the Bank of Canada to enable it to meet this maturity.

Then on June 18, 1936, a return was tabled in the house giving copies of the correspondence exchanged between this government and the government of Saskatchewan in regard to the loan to be obtained by the province from the Bank of Canada.

The third time that the matter was referred to in the house was the next year, on April 10, 1937. The minister had been moving the second reading of Bill No. 118, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1938, and after the leader of the opposition had made a statement in connection with this same loan to the province of Saskatchewan, the Minister of Finance made a statement in regard to the whole matter. I do not think it is so long that I should not read it. It may be found on page 2941 of Hansard for 1937.

So we said there would be no more advances to enable any province to meet maturing obligations.

Sir, we applied this policy absolutely and entirely without discrimination. We had applications from all the western provinces. Then, in an attempt to meet the situation, the dominion-provincial conference came to the unanimous decision to adopt a modified loan council idea, and they had our assurance that we would place the matter before parliament. While that process was going on maturities took place in British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan, and I think a small one in Manitoba. It seemed to us that anything that could be done to anticipate the coming into force of the then contemplated loan council legislation, in order to prevent any of these provinces from being the first among Canadian provinces to default, would be worth while. But of course in order that it might be effective the province concerned necessarily had to consent to take advantage of the loan council plan. British Columbia said, no; British Columbia got no advance to meet its maturity. Alberta said, no; Alberta got no advance to meet its maturity. Manitoba said, yes, conditionally; we were not in a position to accept conditions, and Manitoba got no assistance. Saskatchewan said, yes, we will go in. But by the time they said yes, this government had no authority from this parliament to loan money for that purpose. The old peace, order and good government legislation had expired and we had no authority. They went to the Bank of Canada, and the Bank of Canada, without being prompted by this government in the slightest degree—in fact I had no knowledge of the initial negotiations—expressed a willingness to advance the money to save default, provided it had satisfactory assurance from the government of Saskatchewan that it would introduce the necessary provincial legislation to enable that province to enter the loan council scheme, and provided that the bank had assurance from the government of Canada that it intended to proceed with the loan council scheme. Saskatchewan gave the necessary assurance. Naturally we also gave the assurance, and the funds were advanced to Saskatchewan by the Bank of Canada to meet that maturity. Were it not for that particular instance there would be no question of misunderstanding between the leader of the opposition and myself. To him the history of that transaction involves discrimination against the other western provinces. To me it does not, because I have been conscious of nothing throughout this whole difficulty more than a desire to treat each of those provinces absolutely equitably. When I say equitably, I do not mean equally. Equal treatment is impossible. Equitable treatment is possible, and I maintain has been extended by this government since we came into office. What do I mean by equitable treatment? I mean the establishment of a principle which is available to all, which applies equally to all, and which depends for its working upon acceptance by each.

The right hon. gentleman went further in his speech the other night and made an attack on the changes which were made in the form of the weekly statement of assets and liabilities of the Bank of Canada. He made a strong point of that and dealt with it at considerable length, and I want to reply to what he had to say.

Mr. BENNETT: That was done by the government, not by the bank.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; the governor in council did it under the authority of the Bank of Canada Act. The reason authority was given in that act was that we had not had any experience with a central bank in this country. The framers of the act realized—I assume the right hon. gentleman himself was the framer of the act—that it might not be possible to draft a form which should not be changed. It would have to be changed to meet changing conditions, in the light of the experience of the bank. That was why provision was made for change in the weekly statement of assets and liabilities. The old form will be found in the copy of Hansard which contains the speech of the right hon. gentleman, and I should like to place the new form on Hansard now without reading it.

Mr. BENNETT: I gave the new form, but go ahead.

Mr. ILSLEY: Only by parts. To get it all together I shall put one of these forms on Hansard:

Bank of Canada

Ratio of net reserve (Item 1 of assets less Item 5 of liabilities) to notes and deposit liabilities: 55·80 per centum.

I want to show what changes were made, and why they were made. There were about half a dozen changes in all, not only the two that the right hon. gentleman attacked; that is, the union of sterling and United States funds and the union of dominion and provincial treasury bills. Those were not the only changes that were made. In dealing with the reserve, which is the first item, not only was this word used as a heading, but it appeared against three of the five items under the heading. This was unnecessary, and it was therefore deleted. That was the first change made. The second was this: The headings for sterling and United States funds were amalgamated under the single heading "Sterling and U.S.A. dollars." The right hon. gentleman said that was a wrong thing to do, because the public ought to know how much the bank had invested in sterling and how much it had invested in United States dollars. But there is a good reason why the public should not know that. The reason is just this, that speculators in these exchanges, studying the operations of the Bank of Canada and seeing that they were going out of sterling into United States dollars or going out of United States dollars into sterling, as the case might be, were in a position to get knowledge of the opinion of the Bank of Canada as to the trend or probable trend of these currency markets. That was the reason. To leave those separated as they were would be to give the speculators something by which they could guide their operations and anticipate transactions. That was the reason, and the only one.

Mr. BENNETT: Likewise the business men of the country.

Mr. DUNNING: What right have they to get special information?

Mr. BENNETT: All the right in the world.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not the purpose of the Bank of Canada to give business men knowledge of what it has bought or sold in the way of sterling or United States funds.

Mr. BENNETT: The sole purpose of the act was to serve the business people of the country.

Mr. ILSLEY: The purpose is set out in the preamble of the act, and it is not an information bureau for speculators, whether they are business men or anybody else. That was what it tended to be, with the other heading.

Mr. BENNETT: Had there been any evidence of speculation?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know about that, but certainly that was the trend of the thing.

Mr. BENNETT: Sir Thomas White, in his dissenting judgment, was particular to point out just that difficulty. He said, "should our bank funds be left in the hands of men like ourselves, without our knowing anything about it?" The hon. gentleman will remember his dissenting judgment with respect to this very point.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think Sir Thomas White was dealing with a situation like this. The third change that was made was this: the wording of the last item was incorrect. It read, "Reserves in funds of other countries on a gold standard," which might have implied that sterling was a gold standard currency. It was therefore altered to "Other currencies, of countries on a gold standard." I do not think that was attacked. In the old return there were no less than four sub-headings to bills discounted: Commercial bills, agricultural bills, etc., dominion government treasury bills and provincial government treasury bills.

Mr. BENNETT: They followed the statute in that regard, as to the power of the bank.

Mr. ILSLEY: But the statute did not provide that they must show those four categories. As the bank had hitherto held no discounts, did not anticipate having any, and still has none, it was thought unnecessary to subdivide this item until need should arise. I do not know whether or not the right hon. gentleman attacked that, but that was the reason for the change.

The fifth change was this: It had been observed that should the Bank of Canada make an advance to one of the Quebec savings banks, which was possible under the act, there was no place under heading No. 4 where it could be entered. The heading was therefore altered from "Chartered banks" to "Chartered and savings banks." Under item No. 6, "Investments," one item was made of all dominion and provincial government short term securities.

Mr. BENNETT: So we are no longer able to know what advances are made to the provinces.

Mr. ILSLEY: Quite. That is the point the right hon. gentleman stressed the other night, perhaps I should say with a rather sinister accent.

Mr. BENNETT: This is the first time accents have been the subject matter of discussion in parliament.

Mr. ILSLEY: This change was considered advisable, as otherwise if only one province were borrowing from the bank at one time, as indeed would be the usual case, the affairs of that province might receive undesirable publicity. I want to point out that the right hon. gentleman was trying to leave the impression the other night, and I think he stated in so many words, that the change was made to cover up this transaction.

Mr. BENNETT: The statement just made indicates that to be so.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not at all, because this transaction was given the fullest publicity six months before, as well as later. I have given the three respects in which this parliament was given full information as to this particular transaction, so this change could not have been made to hide that transaction. I think that follows. I suppose if we had a large transaction in the future, an important transaction such as this, the same publicity would be given to it; but if the Bank of Canada reached the position where it was making small loans or frequent loans to the provinces, is it in the public interest that the other provinces which are dealing with the bank should know what the financial transactions are between the Bank of Canada and the provinces? They certainly do not have it now when they go to a commercial bank.

Mr. BENNETT: The Bank of Canada declined to do anything for Ontario, and the very point I make is just what the minister has said, that it enabled this to be covered up. Now it is no longer apparent to anyone that a loan has been made to a province; still there is $3,000,000 due to this bank from Saskatchewan, and it is the only province which owes the bank money.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was given the fullest publicity; therefore that could not be the motive or reason. The point is that the charge against the bank, that the bank did this to cover up something, certainly is not borne out by the record. The bank considers that in the matter of publicity, as in so many other things, moderation should be the objective. It considers that the present form of the bank return meets all reasonable requirements. Indeed, even in its present form the return probably discloses as much, if not more, information in regard to the bank's operations than is the case in any other central bank in the world.

I want now to refer briefly to another matter. The leader of the opposition challenged members of the government to show any respect in which control over the Bank of Canada is any greater under the present legislation than it was under his legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: Over the practice and operation of the bank.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the right hon. gentleman is talking about interference in the routine operations of the bank, I think he is right. I do not believe his government, or this one, has interfered. But in regard to control and the power to direct policy, the power to map out a policy for the Bank of Canada, there has been all the difference in the world.

I want to point out three respects in which our banking legislation differs from his. The first is that the government now owns 51 per cent of the stock, and thereby assumes voting control. The second is this: Under his administration the directors were selected by the shareholders. Now the majority of the directors is nominated by the government, and the arrangement is such that at all times the government directors have a complete majority over the other directors, and the governor and deputy governor of the bank. So that the bank is at all times under the control of the government appointed directors. That is the second respect—

Mr. BENNETT: That is the theory of it.

Mr. ILSLEY: —by which control has passed from privately selected directors to government selected directors. The third respect is most important, because the right hon. gentleman pointed out the other night that the decisions of directors and the executive committee have been and are subject to the veto of the governor. That is an important section of the act. I have it before me, and so that there may be no misunderstanding I shall read it. The section in the original act was in these words:

14. No action or decision of the board of directors, or of the executive committee, shall have any effect unless the same is concurred in by the governor, or in his absence or incapacity, by the deputy governor.

Mr. DUNNING: That was the wording in the original act.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. We changed that so as to subject the veto of the governor to revision and, if necessary, to reversal, by the governor in council. That is the most vital change to be considered, when one talks about control of the bank. Because of its importance I shall read the new section 14:

14. (1) The governor, or in the event of his absence or incapacity the deputy governor only, shall have power to veto any action or decision of the board of directors or of the executive committee, and if this veto power be exercised, the governor or deputy governor, as the case may be, shall within seven days inform the minister in writing of the circumstances and the minister shall submit the veto to the governor in council who may confirm or disallow the veto.

(2) Any director or member of the executive committee may inform the minister in writing of his view of the action or decision in question, which view shall also be transmitted to the governor in council.

So as a result of this, the institution is now, what it was not before, publicly controlled.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the power of veto ever been exercised?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; it has never been reversed, and I do not think it has ever been exercised.

Mr. DUNNING: The governor has not exercised the veto power, up to date.

Mr. ILSLEY: The right hon. gentleman dealt with the Exchange Fund Act the other night, and asked what had happened to the $63,000,000. The most curious thing is that when one comes to read the Exchange Fund Act, he will find that he cannot tell anybody what happened to that $63,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: That section has never been proclaimed. The administration of the stabilization fund comes into effect only by proclamation of the governor in council, and that proclamation has never been made. Certainly the minister can tell me where the $63,000,000 is.

Mr. ILSLEY: Under paragraph 2 of section 4 of the Exchange Fund Act it is definitely provided that the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act are not to apply to the exchange fund account. Among other things, this means that it is not to appear in the public accounts during the period of its operation. Section 9 of the act provides that an annual audit of the account shall be made by the auditor general in such manner as he thinks proper, with a view to ascertaining whether the transactions in connection with the account have been in accordance with the provisions of this act.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not wish to interrupt the minister, but may I point out that the exchange stabilization fund has never come into being. There is none. The government has never availed itself of the provision by making a proclamation that it is in force.

Mr. DUNNING: That is quite right, but the $63,000,000 is in existence.

Mr. BENNETT: We have a right to know about it. The audit act applied only to stabilization, and at the government's initiation, so that if an operation were carried on the auditor general would know. The minister has assumed that this provision is in force, but it is not.

Mr. ILSLEY: The right hon. gentleman was told the other night that the $63,000,000 is in existence.

Mr. BENNETT: I want to know where it is.

Mr. DUNNING: You did not want to know where it was.

Mr. BENNETT: I want to know what it has been used for.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is in the hands of the government.

Mr. BENNETT: Where?

Mr. ILSLEY: And it is intact.

Mr. BENNETT: I never questioned its intactness. I want to know if it is available for purposes of accounting, or if it is in the consolidated revenue fund, or where it is.

Mr. DUNNING: Under the law it must be in the bank.

Mr. BENNETT: The Bank of Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. The law has been followed in every particular.

Mr. BENNETT: We put that provision there, at any rate, and I remember the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) making an observation on that occasion.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

NIAGARA FALLS OBSERVATION BRIDGE COMPANY

The house resumed from Friday, March 25, consideration in committee of Bill No. 15, to incorporate The Niagara Falls Observation Bridge Company—Mr Damude—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 8—Power to construct bridge.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, while perhaps it would be better for me to make my observations on the third reading of this bill, I shall take only four or five minutes tonight. The principle of this bill has been before the house on nine different occasions, from 1923 to 1935 when other bridge bills were before us. I am not opposing the principle of this bill. I am in favour of the principle of public ownership of bridges of this kind between the state of New York and the province of Ontario. They should be publicly owned and publicly controlled. When the Sarnia bridge bill came before the house, Sir Henry Thornton was represented before the committee and proposed that the Canadian National Railways should have the ownership and control of all such international undertakings as feeders for this railway. The Niagara district is one of our great tourist districts, and that great park of the Niagara parks commission stretching from lake Erie to lake Ontario, with all the future bridges between the state of New York and the province of Ontario, should be publicly owned and controlled, and free of tolls as a gesture of good will and an aid toward friendly relations. It is a great credit to the government of Sir Oliver Mowat that started that great park; that he bought all that land and developed it as a park, and under the chairmanship of the late Mr. P. W. Ellis the parks commission went ahead and did a great development work for many years, now extended very well by the present government.

I should like to hear from the sponsor of this bill whether there will be any variation from the principle I have described of public ownership in connection with this bridge. I attended a meeting of the railway committee and there was considerable discussion over this bill. Notwithstanding what was said the day before in this house about a lobby, I saw the biggest lobby I have ever seen before the committee when this bill was being considered. I should like to know if the principle of public ownership is going to be preserved in connection with this bridge or will the bridge be handed over or leased later on to somebody else? Will the government have absolute control over the rates and tolls? For fifteen years I have contended for public ownership of all these bridges in connection with the nine similar bills that have been before this house. The tourist traffic in the Niagara district is becoming so great, with a continual flow of motor cars crossing, that I do not know how it is going to be handled. I admit that the present Ontario government deserve credit for the way in which they have developed that area, and the Conservative government before them did some good work under Mr. Ellis, as chairman of the parks commission, so there is enough credit to go all around.

I do not like the hide-and-go-seek features of this bill. We had several bills for bridges across the St. Lawrence at various places, and one at Sarnia, and another at Windsor, and in my opinion it would be far better if New York state and the Ontario government built this bridge, and owned, controlled and operated it. When one sees the cars lined up at the Peace bridge, waiting to pass the customs and immigration inspectors, would it not be better if this new bridge would be free of tolls? It is different with the tourist traffic at Lewiston and Queenston on the steamer Cayuga, because the passengers can pass through Lewiston or Queenston in a minute or two, but the congestion on the Peace bridge is intolerable from inspection of customs and immigration officers. Both governments should cooperate in building and owning and controlling this bridge, and free it of tolls. It affords the greatest opportunity that I know of for a demonstration of good will between the two countries. The government of Ontario have spent a lot of money well and some foolishly, but undoubtedly on the whole they have done very good work in the Niagara Falls district, and the Niagara parks commission deserves great credit. The promoter of this bill has no doubt given a great deal of study to the question, and I should like to know from him whether this property will be handed over for construction and operation to the Niagara parks commission and whether the rights of the city of Niagara will be preserved, so that there will be no abuse of this legislation.

On the other bills to which I made reference earlier in my remarks were Bill No. 42, to incorporate the Port Huron-Sarnia bridge in 1928; Bill No. 79, incorporating the Niagara Falls memorial bridge in 1927, and Bill No. 22 of the same year, I took the same stand, and by the way I might say that some of the other bridge franchises were peddled all over the north American continent, and in Wall street and among the banks, the franchises were for sale after they had been secured from parliament. All Ontario governments of both parties have done splendid work in connection with the development of the Niagara park area since it was created by the government of Sir Oliver Mowat in the late eighties. The tourist traffic is going to develop by leaps and bounds with the popularity of the motor car, and in my opinion there should be no tolls at all on the bridge. Tolls are just a relic of the ox-cart days. The bridge should be publicly owned and controlled in the interests of the people. This parliament has control of all bridges that are international, interprovincial, or that affect navigation. If we have all the necessary safeguards now in the bill, I shall not oppose it.

We cannot visualize the future traffic that will go over that bridge with the development of the motor bus. The steamboat business is not what it used to be; they have only one boat the Cayuga, on that river; at the other end of lake Erie conditions are a little better. I should like to hear from the sponsor of the bill and from the Minister of Railways what is the policy of the government. What is the policy of the Minister of Railways on behalf of the government with regard to this bill? He sat on the committee, at the head of the table; he may not have been asked for his opinion. But I asked the same question in the railway committee, of which I was a member when nine other bills were up. Will the result of this legislation be to interfere with the traffic of the national railways or its assembly of traffic there? Will it affect the future development of the national railways if they go into the motor bus and motor truck business? How does the minister's policy coordinate with the principle of public ownership and control of this bridge as proposed by the Ontario government? I think we should know, because the railways are interested in this matter and represent, with their main and branch lines, an important investment in the Niagara district. They have a railway and a steamboat running from Toronto right to the edge of the falls by Port Dalhousie within a few yards of the site of the bridge. What is the policy of the government? Will it interfere with the Niagara, St. Catharines and Toronto railway, virtually a bankrupt concern with a lot of old boats running across the lake? I should like to know what is going to be done if this bill is passed? Are we going to see this bridge sublet or leased to some outside body later? Shall we have real ownership, such as I proposed in connection with the nine bills twelve or thirteen years ago? If the Ontario government policy is along that line, I am in favour of it; if not, I am opposed to it. I should like to hear from the Minister of Railways.

Mr. HOWE: I have a letter from the minister of highways of Ontario advising me definitely that this is a bridge of the Ontario government. As far as interfering with any railroad plans, it does not affect them in the slightest. I am entirely in favour of the passage of the bill.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the minister if the parks commission itself could not apply for a permit to build the bridge?

Mr. HOWE: I am advised that the crown in the right of the dominion cannot issue a permit to the crown in the right of a province. I believe the Minister of Justice has ruled to that effect. I understand that the way in which projects of this kind, where governments are interested, are usually undertaken, is by a private bill to individuals under the fathership of the province.

Mr. MacNICOL: The incorporators or directors under the private bill have, then, to surrender their rights to either the Niagara parks commission or the local government, have they?

Mr. HOWE: I have the assurance of the minister of highways that that will be done; that these men have agreed with the Ontario government that they will surrender their rights to the province at the proper time.

Mr. MacNICOL: Well, then, the province would be in possession.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. DAMUDE: The minister has dealt with most of the points brought forward by the hon. member for Broadview, but there are one or two other matters that probably it would be well for me to mention at this time. With respect to the authority of the bridge committee, I understand it is provided that there will be a six member authority set up by the province of Ontario and likewise six members of a commission nominated by the state of New York to operate the bridge; and the men whose names appear have, as the minister has stated, assigned their interests to the Niagara parks commission.

Another question that was raised by the hon. member is covered in clause 20. If he will turn to that clause, he will find that provision is made there for the transfer of the bridge to the state of New York and the province of Ontario when the bonds and debentures are retired.

The other evening the leader of the opposition raised a point in connection with the terms of the bill which provide for the construction in the state of New York. In that regard I would refer to chapter 59 of 1933, an act to incorporate The Sarnia-Port Huron Vehicular Tunnel Company, the wording of which is similar to the wording of this bill; also to chapter 55 of 1930, an act incorporating The Cornwall Bridge Company; to chapter 58 of 1928, an act to incorporate The Detroit River Canadian Bridge Company; to chapter 64, an act to incorporate the St. Clair Transit Company; and to chapter 65, an act to incorporate the St. Lawrence River Bridge Company. The powers given by the Canadian act and the United States act are only complete when both have been passed by the parliament of Canada and the assembly of the state of New York. Probably this will clear up the matter raised by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the bridge to be tax free?

Mr. DAMUDE: I understand that as far as taxation is concerned, it is a provincial and municipal matter; that there is no provision in the bill whereby the government have any authority to designate any taxation. I am given to understand that if the bridge were built by the province of Ontario and the state of New York, it would probably be impossible to have it assessed; but under present circumstances the position is similar, indeed practically identical, with the authority issued to operate the bridge across the Niagara river between Buffalo and Fort Erie. In that case the assessment of Fort Erie has been on a sliding scale; as the bonds are retired the assessment is reduced. The Fort Erie bridge paid Fort Erie the sum of $50,000; during the last ten years it has been reduced to the amount of $35,000, and I understand it will be further reduced as the bonds are retired. So that so far as the city of Niagara Falls is concerned, the province of Ontario, I am assured, will have no objection and will see that that municipality receives an assessment on this property.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say that I believe the hon. gentleman will find that we are doing something for which we have no legal warrant. I am perfectly aware of what he has pointed out with respect to other companies and what has been done with them. One related to a tunnel, the other three to bridges. We had occasion to point out to some of the gentlemen who were interested that they would have some difficulty in dealing with this; and if the hon. gentleman will look at the preamble of the bill—it has not yet been passed, but I may be permitted to refer to it—they have prayed for the right to construct and maintain and operate a bridge across the Niagara river into the city of Niagara Falls in the state of New York. It is perfectly clear and does not require any argument from a lawyer to point out that this parliament cannot give anyone power to build a bridge in New York state. The second point is that section 8 in its terms purports to do that very thing. That is the section now under consideration.

8. The company may construct, maintain and operate a bridge across the Niagara river—

After it gets to the centre of the stream it is in the United States territory.

—for the passage of pedestrians, vehicles, carriages, electric cars, street cars and other like purposes with all necessary approaches, roads and works, from a point between a point north of the present Upper Steel arch bridge and the north limit of Bender street in the city of Niagara Falls, in the county of Welland, in the province of Ontario, to a point in the city of Niagara Falls in the state of New York, one of the United States of America, north of the present upper steel arch bridge, and may purchase, acquire and hold such real estate, including lands for sidings and bridge heads and other equipment required for the convenient working of traffic to, from and over the said bridge as the company thinks necessary for any of the said purposes; but the company shall not commence the actual construction of the said bridge nor exercise any of the powers hereunder, until an act of congress of the United States or other competent authority in the United States of America has been passed authorizing or approving such bridging of the said river, but the company may, in the meantime acquire the lands, submit their plans to the governor in council and do all things authorized by this act.

I submit to the Minister of Justice that it is quite clearly beyond our powers here; and all the others have been in exactly the same position. I can clearly recall the authorities, but I am not going to weary the committee with discussions of that sort. Surely, however, we must not endeavour to exceed our legislative jurisdiction with respect to an international matter. When, in 1935, the time for completion of the Sarnia bridge was being extended, the language used was quite clear:

The construction of the said subway or tunnel shall be commenced within one year after the governor in council and the executive of the United States of America have approved . . .

Under this measure the governor in council is to approve the plans, and that is all. But how can the governor in council approve plans for the state of New York? The matter should be faced frankly. There is no getting away from it that we are exceeding our legislative jurisdiction in what we are doing, and it will be only a nullity when it is encountered in reality.

Mr. McLARTY: Does my right hon. friend not think there might be properly drawn a distinction, which is apparently drawn by this bill, between the attempt, on the one hand, to create an extraterritorial right and, on the other, to clothe the corporation with capacity to take advantage of such extraterritorial right as the foreign country might allow it to avail itself of?

Mr. BENNETT: There would be no difficulty if that were the position, but that is not it. If the hon. member will turn to section 8, and to the preamble as well, he will find that the real difficulty lies in the fact that we are not incorporating a company to build within our jurisdiction; we are authorizing the building of a bridge outside Canada.

Mr. McLARTY: Are we not clothing a corporation with capacity to construct a bridge rather than to build extraterritorially?

Mr. BENNETT: The distinction that the hon. member has made is quite clear, and it is one that is well recognized, the distinction between capacity to do a thing and the authority to do it.

Mr. McLARTY: The right to do it.

Mr. BENNETT: I use the word "authority" as meaning right—the right to do it, yes. Unfortunately, however, section 8, with which we are now dealing, purports to authorize this company not only to have capacity to build but also to have the right to exercise that capacity.

Mr. McLARTY: I do not want to interrupt my right hon. friend, but does he not think that the whole section is qualified by the words in the last eight or nine lines which provide that the company shall not commence construction without the appropriate consent from the other side?

Mr. BENNETT: That is quite clear, but it is a grant the condition of which nullifies the power of the grant.

Mr. McLARTY: Except that the word "may" is used.

Mr. BENNETT: We undertake to give them the power to construct a bridge across a river, only a part of which is ours. We may confer upon them capacity to do something and that capacity can be exercised only if, as and when some other authority gives them power to exercise it. But that is not the case here, for this parliament cannot clothe any body that it creates with the power to do something in another country. It may give it capacity to acquire and hold, but cannot confer upon it capacity to do; and we are undertaking to clothe it with capacity to do.

Mr. McLARTY: I suggest it is more a right to do it, a capacity to do it subject to appropriate consent being given by the foreign jurisdiction that has power to give it. As regards the right to do it, we are not conferring that in this bill except to the extent that that right may be exercised in conjunction with the legislative authority of another country. In other words, we are merely clothing the corporation with capacity.

Mr. BENNETT: I merely point out that in this case, whether we intend to do it or not, we are saying that this parliament of Canada is going to exercise its powers conditionally upon someone else permitting it to do so; and that somebody else is outside the country.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): What does the right hon. gentleman suggest—that we build half the bridge?

Mr. BENNETT: I suggest to the hon. gentleman that it will serve no purpose for him to become facetious.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We want to know what the right hon. gentleman has in mind.

Mr. BENNETT: What I have in mind it would be difficult to explain to the hon. gentleman, but I may express it in this way. We can exercise to the full our jurisdiction, which is to create a company with power to construct a bridge to the full extent of our territorial jurisdiction; the state of New York will do the same with respect to its part of the bridge, and the two under the provisions of the act will amalgamate into a bridge company.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): That is probably what will happen, but there is nothing wrong in this parliament incorporating a company with the right to go to New York and ask for permission to build a bridge there. That is all the bill says.

Mr. BENNETT: If that were all it said, I would not be standing in my place. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will do me the justice to look at section 9. It is provided that the bridge "shall be constructed and located under, and be subject to, such regulations as the governor in council prescribes". In the case of the Sarnia bridge it was made clear that it was subject to the joint approval of the United States authorities on the one side and the Canadian authorities on the other. Does the hon. gentleman think the legislature of the state of New York would ever become a party to the governor in council authorizing or empowering any body to determine plans for erecting a bridge in that territory?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): In the state of New York there might be another corporation incorporated to act in conjunction with this one, but it is not necessary that the company in New York be authorized to build a bridge to the middle of the river and that our corporation should build the other half of it. These are only possible powers, and if the right hon. gentleman wants to insert the word "joint"—because that is what he means —for my part I would be agreeable. I only wanted to know what he had in mind.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not going to spend my time and effort in doing more than point out the situation as I see it. I am not concerned about the matter except to do my duty, and having done that, my responsibility as a member of parliament rests. I have no responsibility for nor interest in the bridge, but I have an interest in all legislation that goes through the house; and the legislation to which my hon. friend referred a moment ago is, I still say, not legislation that this parliament can validly pass. I do not know who is responsible for the legal side of this matter, but it should have been provided that there should be joint action on the part of the executive of the United States on the one hand, and of Canada on the other. This bill provides in terms the exact opposite, makes the plans subject to the approval of the governor in council, and provides that the bridge shall land in the state of New York. We would not tolerate the erection in our country of a bridge the plans of which were to be approved by the United States authorities. Equally they will not approve of something that is to be done here without reference to them. The language of the bill introduced by the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Gray) made provision that there should be a recognition at once of the limit upon our jurisdiction. I have never had any doubt about the question of our capacity. For instance, we have created companies time out of mind with power to own a Peru coal mine, if there be such a thing. The capacity to own something in a foreign country is, of course, subject to the laws of that country. We have recognized those laws. But this bill is for the incorporation of a company to build a bridge entirely across the river, and that power can be exercised only by some other body granting a similar power with respect to its part of the territory. All that is necessary with respect to these measures is to say that they may do so and so within the territorial boundaries of Canada.

Mr. VIEN: But we did. The very same words are used in three statutes that we have already passed.

Mr. BENNETT: That we passed years ago.

Mr. VIEN: In 1928. In the state of New York when a similar bill was being introduced they used the very same language, and no exception was taken either in this house or in the state of New York.

Mr. BENNETT: I assure my hon. friend I have not raised the question for the first time. I assure him further that the fact that the question has not been raised does not in any case indicate validity. For twenty-five years the Lemieux act stood undisturbed; then it was challenged in the courts, and fell. I am only pointing out that this parliament has no jurisdiction to confer upon a corporation which it creates a right to be exercised beyond the territorial boundaries of Canada. It has power to create a corporation with capacity to hold and to own subject to the laws of the country in which it exercises those powers, and this bill provides for that. But it does not recognize the fact that we have no power to create and construct beyond our territorial jurisdiction.

Mr. DUPUIS: Was there not an international bridge commenced or completed during the previous regime, between 1930 and 1935?

Mr. BENNETT: There was one authorized. It was not completed.

Mr. McCANN: Would this parliament be competent to pass this bill if the legislative body of the state of New York had already passed a bill giving its permission?

Mr. BENNETT: It would depend upon the terms of that act. Also, the form would not be what it now is.

Mr. McCANN: The reason I ask is that I think it was contemplated that before this private bill reached this parliament, the legislative assembly and the senate of New York state would already have passed a bill similar to this giving its permission.

Mr. LOCKHART: In trying to listen to the observations of some previous speakers, I found it sometimes difficult to follow them because of noise in the chamber. But I have a few observations to make regarding this bill. I asked some questions in the standing committee regarding clause 8—and I believe the leader of the opposition has dealt with that and the point has been fairly well covered —that is, the right to construct not only in the province of Ontario but also in the state of New York. That is one feature of the bill which I could not understand.

The bill deals with a bridge to cross the international boundary. We have been told both in the standing committee and here that the New York state assembly passed a bill similar to this, but the senate threw it out. We are also told that the New York state assembly will probably not convene again this year, although there were some witnesses before the standing committee who said that it might be possible to convene a session next fall.

Clause 8 gives almost unlimited powers to those seeking this charter. But turning to the evidence given in the standing committee, I want to refer to this remark that was made by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Damude):

> This bill appears in my name, and is situate in the constituency I represent. I am very much interested in the passing of the bill, because I feel it is very much in the public interest. We are now in the position where there is a difference between a public authority and the owners of the old structure; therefore I would move that the bill be recommended.

I do not want the hon. member for Welland to feel that these remarks of mine have any personal reference, because I have known the hon. member for a long time and I believe he is presenting this bill in the form in which it has been prepared for him. But there are some phases and some ramifications which I think have been overlooked. I recall that in the standing committee the Hon. Mr. McQuesten pointed out that a resolution had been passed by the council of Niagara Falls, Ontario, authorizing the erection of a publicly owned bridge. I hope that anything I have to say will not be misconstrued as indicating that I am either a friend or a foe of public ownership. I think anyone who lives in the Niagara peninsula will realize that public ownership if properly managed is one of the greatest assets that this country can possess, so long as political interference does not enter in. Let me read again the authority which was read by the Hon. Mr. McQuesten. It was printed in the newspapers of my constituency and in all the press of the Niagara peninsula, and it says:

On January 31 the city council passed the following motion, presented by Alderman George Inglis and Alderman Grant Donald:

"Be it therefore resolved that this council petition the government of the Dominion of Canada to grant a charter to the Niagara Falls Observation Bridge Company in accordance with the application which the Niagara Falls Observation Bridge Company now has before the parliament of Canada, as soon as same can properly be done, so that construction of a new bridge can be proceeded with and an extreme condition remedied as soon as possible."

That was passed on January 31 of this year. When this bill was presented to this house and the committee began to work on it, I commenced to receive inquiries, when I went home for the week end, asking what was developing in connection with this bill. In the same press report His Worship Mayor Hanniwell of Niagara Falls is quoted as questioning the advisability of endorsing any company's application for a bridge. The report states that the sponsors of the motion contended that it did not commit the city to support of any particular company. The motive behind the resolution, it states, was merely to facilitate the early erection of a bridge. The report goes on:

"I think Hon. McQuesten is reading into that resolution a meaning that was never intended," his worship said. Reiterating the statement he has made several times since the Falls View bridge collapsed, Mayor Hanniwell said he didn't care who builds the bridge, so long as it is erected as quickly as possible, and this city receives taxation from the span and its property.

That is the part to which I should like to direct the attention of this committee. I also find that one of the newspapers on the United States side, the Niagara Falls Gazette, in its issue of March 22 says:

The fate of the bridge bill at Albany is but another example of what happens when government essays to do business for the people.

I shall not read it all, but it concludes in this way:

The New York legislature adjourned without action. It is likely the Canadian provincial parliament will do likewise. Meanwhile business men on the Canadian and American sides of the river will anxiously await the reconstruction of the Falls View bridge and the resumption of international traffic which meant so much to them.

That is the part on which I want to place particular emphasis, and it is largely on this that I want to base my remarks. These reports, I think, represent the opinions of the people at large in the constituency which I represent and in the city of Niagara Falls. In another press report, with which I shall not burden the committee, the question was asked, "What about the meeting on March 26?" I raised that question also in the committee, and the only answer I received—I think it was from a member representing one of the York constituencies—was that it had no bearing on the matter. When I was home the last week end, I made it my business to inquire into the situation there, following the deliberations of the committee during that week. I found that these press reports represent the views of a great many citizens of Niagara Falls. This meeting on March 26 was to have been attended by the chamber of commerce, the mayor and aldermen of the city of Niagara Falls, Ontario, representatives of the International Bridge Company, representatives of the Niagara parks commission, Hon. Mr. Houck and the hon. member for Welland. I can quite understand that the citizens of Niagara Falls would desire some such meeting to be called, but for some mysterious reason the meeting was put off. I cannot understand this; perhaps the hon. member for Welland could throw more light on the matter, but according to the press of March 24, Hon. Mr. Houck telephoned the mayor stating that he had important business in Toronto and could not attend the meeting. The other interested parties were very much concerned as to why that meeting was not held.

I happen to reside in the adjoining municipality, and I recall that a few years ago the finance commissioner of the city of St. Catharines was called to Niagara Falls to act on a board to assist a municipality which was in financial difficulties. I have served as mayor of my own city, and I know something of the difficulties that confronted Niagara Falls. I also know that a great many home owners had lost their homes, and more were likely to do so. Some may ask what this has to do with the power to construct a bridge. If hon. gentlemen will bear with me for a moment, I should like to give one or two reasons why it has a great deal to do with it. As the mayor of Niagara Falls said, he was quite willing to deliberate, but he wanted the city to receive taxation from the span and the properties involved. As I have said, our finance commissioner was called to Niagara Falls, and he had a good deal to do with assisting the city manager and a number of others who were able to help the city out of its difficulties.

I have received one letter which states that because I object to this bill passing in its present form, I am an opponent of public ownership. I do not want that interpretation to be placed on anything I may say, and probably my views in that respect are fairly well known. I know many of these home owners who have been practically crucified by high taxation. I am informed that revenue of $10,000 or $12,000 was derived from the original International Railway Company by way of taxation, to the benefit of the property owners of Niagara Falls. We were told in committee that the amount of $7,500,000 in the original bill could be reduced to $4,000,000, possibly because the bill in New York state was something along that line. The amount was $7,500,000 in our original bill, but it has now gone down to $4,000,000. We are told by the Hon. Mr. McQuesten, in committee, that $2,000,000 is for the bridge and $2,000,000 for right of way and buildings.

I should like to speak for a moment or two respecting the section giving power to construct the bridge. In this connection I hope the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Gray) will correct me if I make any misstatement in connection with the Sarnia bridge. I am told that the buildings at the end of that bridge, in the state of Michigan, are costing approximately $85,000. I am also told, on good authority, that the buildings at the Canadian end of the bridge are costing about $125,000. I assume the hon. member will be able to confirm or to challenge this statement, but I must point out that this information has been given me on good authority.

[Mr. Lockhart.]

According to the statement of the Hon. Mr. McQuesten, $2,000,000 is to be spent on buildings and right of way, in the present instance.

Mr. YOUNG: Is the hon. member quite sure that that is what the minister of highways for Ontario did say? As a member of the committee I did not understand that statement to be made.

Mr. LOCKHART: He divided it into $2,000,000 each way—$2,000,000 for the bridge and $2,000,000 for the right of way and buildings. He pointed that out definitely.

Mr. YOUNG: I did not understand that.

Mr. LOCKHART: Let us double the amount for the buildings at Niagara Falls. We shall concede that Niagara Falls is probably a more important point than Sarnia.

Mr. GRAY: I shall not concede that.

Mr. LOCKHART: We shall double the amount of $125,000, and make it $250,000, and we are left with $1,750,000 for the purchase of right of way. That is the part which is disturbing the taxpayers of Niagara Falls. They want to know if that is an indication of the amount of assessment they may possibly lose. They realize that a great deal of valuable property is going to be taken in, and these are questions they are asking. It is quite reasonable that a meeting of the magnitude of the one which was to be held last Saturday should be held to discuss the whole question.

This is the situation one finds when he approaches the problem with an open mind. I look at the bill and try to find something which gives the taxpayers of Niagara Falls, Ontario, some assurance as to what they may expect by way of protection, in case large amounts of assessment are taken away from them, in addition to the $10,000 or $12,000 which has been paid annually by the International Railway Company. They asked me a question and I have sought the answer. This is the only answer I could find: I was provided with a letter dated March 16, sent by the hon. member for Welland to the corporation of Niagara Falls. Here again I believe the hon. member means every word he says. It is addressed to the mayor and, in part, reads as follows:

> In the meantime I wish to state, for your information, that I am looking after the interests of the city of Niagara Falls, with regard to assessment privileges on whatever bridge is erected in that area. "I will certainly not support any measure that will deprive your municipality from the assessment that you so urgently need."

I do not question the motives of the hon. member for Welland, because I have known him too well and too long to do that.

Mr. DAMUDE: Does the hon. member suggest that this bill deprives the municipality of taxation?

Mr. LOCKHART: I am just pointing out some of the possibilities. In the first place, it would not be logical to erect two bridges. I have pointed out that $1,750,000 is to be spent on right of way, and that there is a great possibility that a great deal of money will be taken away from the taxpayers of Niagara Falls. I cannot find anything in the bill indicating that the taxpayers are being protected, and that is why I rise in my place to-night and make my objection.

I have other letters from citizens of Niagara Falls, but I shall not read them at this time. I want to protest particularly against the passage of section 8, which empowers the company to do something which I do not think it can legally do. I protest that no further action be taken until all interested parties are brought together, as was proposed at the meeting which was postponed to March 26. That seems to be of paramount importance to the ratepayers of Niagara Falls. I do not want to see the bill pass until a clause is inserted which will give a guarantee to the taxpayers of Niagara Falls, and which will be something more than the word of the hon. member for Welland—although I am content to take his word. I do not wish to see the bill pass until the taxpayers are protected. I am firmly convinced that I represent the views of a large proportion of the home owners in the city of Niagara Falls, Ontario, who have watched the development of the bill, and who have seen it hurriedly forced through the committee.

Mr. HANSON: I do not think parliament in this connection, has anything to do with municipal taxation.

Mr. STEWART: Who said it had.

Mr. LOCKHART: The provincial government can take away large amounts of taxation. If the House of Commons would like me to enlarge upon the point, I could give definite information.

Mr. SPENCE: Give it to them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nine o'clock:

Mr. LOCKHART: I shall give it at some later date.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

USE OF CANADA'S FINANCIAL RESOURCES FOR ELIMINATION OF POVERTY—AMENDMENT OF MR. BLACKMORE AND SUBAMENDMENT OF MR. BENNETT

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Dunning for committee of supply, the amendment thereto of Mr. Blackmore, and the amendment to the amendment thereto of Mr. Bennett.

Hon. J. L ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I hope to be able to conclude my remarks in a very few moments. Before the dinner recess the Exchange Fund Act was mentioned, and a question arose as to whether or not the act is really in force at the present time. I have looked at it and find that it is in force, and that section 6 of the act alone requires to be proclaimed.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and that establishes the operation of the stabilization fund.

Mr. ILSLEY: For one purpose only:

> For the purpose of endeavouring to control the external value of the Canadian monetary unit or of checking undue fluctuations in its exchange value the minister may directly or through such agencies as he may designate cause any balances in the special account to be invested in—

Certain ways. Subsection (3) states:

> This section shall not come into force until a date to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council, published in the Canada Gazette.

That proclamation has not been made. But the point I bring to the attention of the house is this: The other sections of the act relate not wholly to the operations under section 6, but to the account itself which is in existence.

Mr. BENNETT: The creation of the account by the realization of the gold.

Mr. ILSLEY: The account is already created.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly.

Mr. ILSLEY: And the manner in which the account is administered and has been administered since the gold was taken over is subject to certain sections the clear intent and purpose of which is to prevent public discussion of the operation of the account. Subsection 2 of section 4 says:

> The provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, shall not apply to the said special account during the period of its operation.

Mr. BENNETT: During the period of its operation, and it has never been operated.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not what it means at all. The account is there. Let us take section 9:

An annual audit of the special account shall be made by the auditor general in such manner as he thinks proper, with a view to ascertaining whether the transactions in connection with the account have been in accordance with the provisions of this act, and he shall certify to the House of Commons that in his opinion, having regard to the examination, the transactions in connection with the account have or have not been in accordance with the provisions of this act, and that the records of the said account do or do not show truly and clearly the state of the said account.

And section 10 provides:

No person employed in the service of His Majesty or of the Bank of Canada shall communicate or allow to be communicated to any person not legally entitled thereto under the provisions of this act or by direction of the minister, any information with respect to the operation of the said special account, or allow any such person to inspect or have access to any written statement with respect to the said account.

And a penalty is provided for the violation of the provisions of that section.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 7 is also a relevant section.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it is quite proper for the right hon. gentleman to ask the government whether the money is there, whether it is available, and so on, and whether an order in council has been passed proclaiming it, but it is the clear intent and purpose of this act that anything else relating to the account is not to be made public.

Mr. BENNETT: Sections 7 and 8 deal with two phases, one with the investment of the account, and the other with the winding of it up.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think I shall enter into a discussion of the meaning of those sections, because the matter is not of sufficient importance, and I think the right hon. gentleman is satisfied with the information that has been given.

Mr. CAHAN: Would the minister explain about section 6? Until section 6 is brought into force, the section can have no force or effect whatsoever. I understand the minister to admit that a proclamation of the governor in council with respect to bringing into force section 6 has never been published in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. CAHAN: Therefore section 6 is not in force.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: That is true.

Mr. CAHAN: And therefore any other sections which deal directly with section 6 cannot be in force, because, unless section 6 is brought into force for all purposes, it can serve no purpose whatsoever.

Mr. ILSLEY: The answer to the hon. gentleman's suggestion is this, that there is a special account apart altogether from the method of operation of the account under section 6. Section 6 provides that the balance in the said account may be applied to certain uses. But the existence of the special account does not depend upon section 6. This special account is there; it has been there right along, and the sections I have read, section 4, subsection 2, and sections 9 and 10, apply to that special account whether it has been put to these special uses or not, because the account is there.

Mr. BENNETT: That was neither the intention nor the fact when the act was passed.

Mr. DUNNING: At all events the auditor general has so proceeded ever since the act was passed.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know what either of my hon. friends is saying, and so I shall pass on.

I wish to refer to two statements of the Minister of Finance that were challenged by the social credit group. I do not want to enter into the intricacies of the social credit controversy with the members of that group, because I am sure they would be able to involve me beyond my depth before I got very far; but I want to make some observations on the suggestion that the Minister of Finance in certain statements which he made in his speech was, as it were, merely setting up a man of straw and then knocking him down again.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I do not think he even knocked him down.

Mr. ILSLEY: The first statement I want to refer to has to do with our old friend the A plus B theorem. The Minister of Finance in his speech on March 8 said, at page 1155 of Hansard:

In other words, the whole theory is based on a false premise, and the whole program which derives from that theory is unsound and pernicious.

Then he proceeded to state what he said was the basis of the whole theory, and to state the premise he was referring to, and he stated the A plus B theorem I think very fairly and fully. I do not think anybody can have any objection to the manner in which he stated that theorem. He was followed by the member for Red Deer (Mr. Poole), who said this, referring to the Minister of Finance:

I want to ask him if he did not make a mistake when he said that our theory was that the system did not supply a sufficiency of purchasing power at any one time. That is not the premise of our argument at all. . . . Why raise a false premise?

I want now to quote from a celebrated authority on social credit, no less than Major Douglas himself, and I shall give the reference to his work. This is what he says in his book Social Credit, revised edition, chapter 2, page 94:

In the foregoing chapter we have endeavoured to establish two important propositions in generalized terms. The first of these is:

(1) That the collective prices of the goods available for sale at any moment in a given community, if they have been produced by ordinary commercial methods, cannot be met by the money available through the channels of wages, salaries, and dividends, at one and the same time.

That is what the Minister of Finance said, and that is the statement which was challenged by the hon. member for Red Deer.

Mr. POOLE: The Minister of Finance did not make that statement. I should like the hon. gentleman to quote just what the Minister of Finance did say.

Mr. ILSLEY: I refer the hon. member for Red Deer to his own statement. He said, referring to the Minister of Finance:

I want to ask him if he did not make a mistake when he said that our theory was that the system did not supply a sufficiency of purchasing power at any one time. That is not the premise of our argument at all. . . . Why raise a false premise?

I now quote from the Monopoly of Credit by Major Douglas, pages 106 and 107:

A factory or other productive organization has besides its economic function as a producer of goods, a financial aspect—it may be regarded on the one hand as a device for the distribution of purchasing power to individuals, through the media of wages, salaries, and dividends; and on the other hand as a manufactory of prices—financial values.

From this standpoint its payments may be divided into two groups:

Group A—All payments made to individuals (wages, salaries, and dividends).

Group B—All payments made to other organizations (raw materials, bank charges, and other external costs).

Now the rate of flow of purchasing power to individuals is represented by A, but since all payments go into prices, the rate of flow of prices cannot be less than A plus B. Since A will not purchase A plus B, a proportion of the product at least equivalent to B must be distributed by a form of purchasing power which is not comprised in the description grouped under A.

I am merely placing on record these extracts from the writings of Major Douglas. I shall leave it to any member of this house, if he will read the speech of the Minister of Finance, and then read this, as to whether the minister did not accurately, precisely, fairly and fully state Major Douglas' A plus B theorem. I shall go further, although I shall never convince some hon. members. It is all right if hon. gentlemen opposite are abandoning the A plus B theorem—and I believe there is a little tendency on their part to do so—but if they are, it would be interesting if they would rise in their places in the house and say so.

Mr. QUELCH: May I point out that in Major Douglas' book, The New and Old Economics—

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall permit a question, but I cannot consent to the hon. member making a speech.

Mr. QUELCH: The book has been referred to.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall try to answer questions, but not to permit these little speeches in the meantime. This is heavy enough sledding for me.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister asked if we had abandoned the A plus B theorem, and I was going to answer that question.

An hon. MEMBER: Read Douglas again.

Mr. ILSLEY: If hon. members are generally interested in the A plus B theorem and the basis of the social credit doctrine. I would recommend that they read the speech of the Minister of Finance and the way in which he completely demolished the A plus B theorem.

An hon. MEMBER: We did read it.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Can the minister tell us whether Douglas has stated that his whole doctrine rests on the soundness of the A plus B theorem?

Mr. ILSLEY: What does the hon. member say about it?

Mr. QUELCH: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister has asked whether we have abandoned the A plus B theorem. I pointed out that in his book, The New and Old Economics, Major Douglas, in reply to that, pointed out that by far the simplest way to deal with the matter was to divide it into five main heads.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. ILSLEY: The next statement of the Minister of Finance which was challenged by the hon. gentlemen—

Mr. LANDERYOU: Mr. Speaker, I ask that we be permitted to reply.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

An hon. MEMBER: Take your medicine.

Mr. ILSLEY: The next question I shall read from the speech of the Minister of Finance will be found on page 1157 of Hansard:

> But the main part of the program as expounded by Major Douglas does seek to avoid inflation by providing for a reduction of prices by a certain proportion by government decree.

And later on in the column:

> It is evident that the total amount of these credits or subsidies given to producers involves a huge total; for they are designed to make up for the shortage between the cost value of total consumption and the money value of total production of the country during a given period, say one year, and the estimates made by social crediters indicate that only from two-fifths to one-ninth of the total production of a given period is consumed. It is apparent, therefore, that the new purchasing power thrown into the monetary system would be of colossal proportions.

The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), the leader of the social credit group, seemed stirred by the use of those fractions, two-fifths and one-ninth. He wanted to know where the minister got his figures. The figures were taken from, and the immediate basis for the quotation is a statement by H. T. M. Gaitskell, an Oxford professor, in his chapter on social credit in G. D. H. Cole's book, What Everybody Wants to Know about Money. Gaitskell's statement was as follows:

> But the estimates of Major Douglas and his followers range from two-fifths to one-quarter and even to one-ninth.

That is to say, they believe that only two-fifths or one-ninth of the total production of a given period is consumed.

Mr. QUELCH: Mr. Speaker, I would challenge the hon. gentleman to show me where Douglas has made this admission.

Mr. ILSLEY: This Oxford professor—

Mr. QUELCH: He is not a social crediter.

Mr. ILSLEY: The Oxford professor who wrote this had been reading social credit works and was purporting to make a summary of what he had read; and this being merely hearsay, so to speak, and coming from second hand, was immediately challenged.

Mr. DUNNING: They quoted from the same book themselves.

Mr. ILSLEY: That proposition was immediately challenged by a member of the social credit group. The hon. member for Lethbridge repeatedly quoted Cole's book. What Everybody Wants to Know about Money—I myself heard him do so more than once—but I have here the references in the social credit works themselves which bear out the statement I have made.

Mr. QUELCH: Let us hear them.

Mr. ILSLEY: All right. I shall give the hon. member one now. There is an appendix to Major Douglas's book on Credit Power and Democracy, published by Major Douglas and, of course, put out with his sanction and authority. In this appendix is a draft of the social credit scheme for the mining industry of England prepared by Major Douglas, and a commentary on the scheme by A. A. Orage. Hon. members will recall that he is a prominent social crediter.

An hon. MEMBER: He is dead.

Mr. ILSLEY: If hon. members want the "hearsay" traced back to the original source, I am prepared to do so, not only with this quotation but with a number of others.

Mr. BENNETT: One of the writers is dead.

Mr. ILSLEY: As a matter of fact they vary from two-fifths to one-ninth. Orage, after assuming that the rate of production to consumption is 4 to 1, proceeds by application of the formula for determining just price to show that "price must be one-quarter of cost"—"The ratio of total production to total consumption being as 4 is to 1, cost and price are to each other as 4 is to 1; or again, price must be a quarter of cost." There is the quarter.

It would take some time to go into these others, but I shall give hon. gentlemen the references and they can look them up themselves.

Mr. QUELCH: I would point out that there is a big difference between one-quarter and one-ninth.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ILSLEY: The references are: Economic Democracy, by Major Douglas, pages 65 and 66; Major Douglas's The Monopoly of Credit, page 36; the appendix to Major Douglas's Social Credit, pages 208 and 209, which includes his draft social credit scheme for Scotland; page 36 of the pamphlet of H.M.M. entitled An Outline of Social Credit, published by the Credit Research Bureau, London, with an approving foreword by Major Douglas; and a pamphlet entitled The Nation's Credit, a precis of Major C. H. Douglas's proposals, by C.G.M., published for the credit study group of London, at page 13. That is all I have, and none of these will expressly say two-fifths to one-ninth, but they range between; the estimates range from two-fifths to one-ninth.

Mr. QUELCH: So far the minister has only quoted one-quarter.

Mr. ILSLEY: I gave the quotations of the Oxford professor, published in G. D. H. Cole's book, which is quoted freely in this house by hon. gentlemen in that corner. I do not think I shall go further. I merely wanted to dispel the impression that when the Minister of Finance attacked certain positions, those positions were never taken by hon. gentlemen.

May I conclude with one word which I consider important. The public, it seems to me, is interested not so much in the organization of the Bank of Canada as in its policy and its record. Once more let me emphasize, as the Minister of Finance did, the fact that the bank has not pursued a policy of deflation. On the contrary, the policy of the bank has been what one might call reflationary. All one needs to do is to take the cash reserves and Canadian deposits of the commercial banks of Canada at three dates and compare them. The Minister of Finance gave them, but in different parts of his speech. I wish to put them together. These are the cash reserves and Canadian deposits:

	Cash reserves	Canadian deposits
December 31, 1929..	$228,000,000	$2,270,000,000
March 31, 1935.. ..	200,600,000	2,033,600,000
December 31, 1937..	250,000,000	2,387,000,000

In other words, Canadian deposits on December 31, 1937, were $117,000,000 higher than they were at the end of December, 1929, and $350,000,000 higher than they were when the bank started operations in March, 1935. These figures speak for themselves and utterly destroy the charges against the government and the bank, that they have pursued a policy of deflation. On the contrary, there has been a notable increase of money and credit since the bank started operations—as great an expansion, in our opinion, as would be consistent with the best interests of the Canadian people.

Mr. JOSEPH NEEDHAM (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, we have had an interesting discussion on this motion since it first began. I do not know how instructive it has been, but certainly it has been quite interesting. It was particularly interesting, the last time the motion was under discussion and this afternoon as well, to see and hear the members of the government and the leader of the opposition as well expressing their views with regard to the functions of the central bank and the chartered banks. In this debate so far certain statements have been made—or rather, I should say acknowledgments—which a few years ago would have been laughed at by the general public and would have been regarded as unbelievable, coming from the ministers who have taken part in the debate. The admission that loans create deposits, the admission that banks can create money—these are indeed startling. To follow the intricacies of discussions on the banks' operations by the ministers would lead one to believe that the cat had been let out of the bag and that an effort was being made to catch it again.

Anyone coming into the house to-day and listening to the discussion that we have been hearing would wonder what was the question before the house, and therefore I think it would be just as well to read again the motion presented by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore):

> That all the words in the motion after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefore: "This house is of the opinion that for the effective removal of poverty from Canada this government has neglected and is now neglecting to use the resources of the dominion as adequately as the people of this country have a right to demand."

It is that motion which I want to discuss for a short while this evening. I am satisfied that the motion is timely and that it is for the government to prove that they are meeting the requirements of the Canadian people. This resolution no doubt springs out of the promises which were made by the present government prior to the election. I take it that every citizen of Canada has around him the evidence to satisfy himself whether those pledges have been carried out and whether this resolution is timely or not. I believe I am safe in saying that a large majority of the Canadian people believe there is something wrong with the present situation, which has produced the condition in which we find ourselves to-day. The evidence is manifest throughout the country. Some of us can go back a number of years and compare conditions, say thirty years ago, with conditions to-day. Thirty years ago there was a song of joy and gladness everywhere in the country; optimism characterized the people who went to build homes for themselves and their little ones, and to establish a future for the dominion. Compare that with the condition in which we are at the present time—and we have passed through some prosperous years in that period. Ask the unemployed, those on relief, or the youth of the country. Consider the debts that are owed in Canada to-day, municipally, provincially and federally as well as individually, and the picture is not a very encouraging one.

Over the radio two weeks ago on Sunday night the ex-president of the board of trade speaking from Montreal with regard to the funded debt of Canada said that it was around eight billion dollars. That means for each person a debt of $800. At confederation that per capita debt stood at $21.87. I ask you, sir, whether there is not something seriously wrong with a system which creates a condition like that in these few years. In the speech by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) in response to that of the hon. member for Lethbridge, he said that this government had control sufficient for the needs of the people. I quote his words, as found at page 1146 of Hansard:

> Canada's financial machinery is now adequate to enable the government to cause effective action to be taken in the field of monetary policy to the extent that monetary methods may be appropriate to solve our problems.

That is quite an acknowledgment to make. The government recognizes that it has at the present time the machinery to solve the country's problems. That is what this resolution calls upon the government to do. The question is, Is there evidence that they are doing it? The Minister of Finance said also:

> It should be noted also that Canadian deposits —and, mark you, these represent the credit which does ninety to ninety-five per cent of the money work of Canada—are now at a level nearly twenty-two per cent above the figure for October 31, 1932, and over $117,000,000 higher than at the end of the boom year 1929.

Again he said, as reported on page 1148:

> Finally, chartered bank deposits with the central bank and their holdings of Bank of Canada notes have risen by $41,000,000. This latter total is the increase in bank cash which has made possible an expansion of over $350,000,000 in Canadian bank deposits or Canadian credit during that period of two and three-quarter years.

What I am concerned about is, Where is this credit, and is it available for the use of the people of this dominion? Is there any manifestation of its being used? It is useless to create additional credit and leave it in the bank; it is doing no good there. It is a matter of policy if it is not being put to work. There is something wrong with the system that has created the position in which we find ourselves. Since confederation our debt has been enormously increased. If my recollection is correct, $273,000,000 was the federal debt at confederation. Now it has reached over $3,000,000,000. There has been either mismanagement or bad policy. I cannot think this situation is due to mismanagement by the ministers who have been in office since that time; I am inclined to think it is due to the policy that has been followed. There have been both Conservative and Liberal administrations, and in point of time it is about fifty-fifty between them. It could not have been any nearer had it been arranged, and perhaps it was. But it has made little or no difference which party was in power; the results have been the same, because they have both been following the same policy. Lord Salisbury said, "The commonest error in politics is sticking to the carcasses of dead policies."

Mr. BENNETT: That is good Conservative doctrine.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Analyse the situation as it is to-day, a bonded debt of around $8,000,000,000 with the policy that has been in vogue since confederation, and tell me if there is any hope for the future by following the same policy.

We heard a great deal this afternoon about debt, interest and the accumulation of debt. The statement has been made in the house that 63 cents out of every dollar paid in taxes goes to pay interest. What is going to happen when it takes the whole dollar? That will not be very long, at the rate the debt is increasing. Something will happen then; I do not know what. I am wondering why some people are so anxious to keep the same policy in vogue. If we ask ourselves who they are who are fighting so mightily at the present time to prevent any change in the policy of governments in this country, we shall find that they are those to whom the present system has been very kind.

We heard a good deal this afternoon about loans and bonds. I say with all seriousness that if the credit of this country is good for a dollar bond, it is just as good for a dollar bill. If the credit of the country is good to float a loan of $100,000,000 through financial institutions, it should be just as good to float that loan by the government itself. It seems to me that where we and other parties differ is in regard to the issue and control of the currency and credit of the dominion. I and thousands more in this dominion want to know why the credit of this country in the floating of loans or bond issues must go through financial institutions, so that the people have to be taxed not only for the loan but for the interest that goes with it.

Mr. BENNETT: All ours go through the Bank of Canada now, and we get the benefit.

Mr. NEEDHAM: The year book for 1936 tells me that the floating of loans in 1936 cost over $3,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but he will find that under this statute the Bank of Canada has become the fiscal agent of the Dominion of Canada. All our national loans are floated through that institution, and the moneys thus derived by the Bank of Canada are made available to this dominion. That is not so in discharging our fiscal obligations in London. Those are conducted by one of the chartered banks, because we have no Bank of Canada there.

Mr. NEEDHAM: I am just taking the figures from the year book.

Mr. BENNETT: That has nothing to do with floating the loans of the Dominion of Canada. That is probably the printing of the bonds, renewals, and matters of that kind, which run into a very large sum.

Mr. NEEDHAM: It is given here as the cost of flotations.

Mr. BENNETT: That would be advertising, possibly, and the printing of the bonds. It has nothing to do with the payment of fees to financial institutions. So far as I know, since the Bank of Canada began to do business on behalf of the dominion there has been no issue that has not been floated through the channel provided by the statute, namely the Bank of Canada.

Mr. NEEDHAM: There is the interest on the debt; it has made no difference there. There is the debt and the interest, just the same as before.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Then it does not matter. It is a financial institution which is costing the country some money just the same.

Mr. BENNETT: The banks are compelled by statute to cash the coupons at par. The interest is a charge paid by the Dominion of Canada, and the banks cash the coupons.

Mr. NEEDHAM: It is still debt and interest.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Just as it was before. There has been no change there, and that is where, as I see it, the whole difference lies. We claim that the floating of loans, the issuing of bonds, should not carry interest whereby the people are burdened with this debt and interest which are growing by leaps and bounds year after year. I have yet to meet one person who holds out any hope at all that our national debt will ever be paid. I should like anyone in the house to tell me if he has any hope that we shall ever pay our national debt, which is growing so rapidly.

Mr. BENNETT: If an annuity were provided, as was provided by statute at one time in Ontario, and if we had been able to escape the depression, an annuity established would have been sufficient to wipe out the debt in the course of about a hundred years; that is, if we had been able to give effect to it.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Why could it not be done?

Mr. BENNETT: Depression.

Mr. NEEDHAM: What caused the depression? War. What caused the war?

Mr. BENNETT: I think probably social credit.

Mr. NEEDHAM: And so it goes on, just one continual round, chasing in a circle. That is just what it amounts to. It is the same to-day; we have the same problems we have had right along. What were the problems facing Canada in 1930? They were unemployment, absence of purchasing power and heavy taxation. What are they in 1938? They are just the same, only we are worse off because our debt and interest have almost doubled in these last few years; not quite doubled, but at least grown very rapidly.

Mr. BENNETT: No; the conversions had the effect of lowering the interest charge very greatly. One transaction saved $14,000,000 in one year.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Yes; but that is only a fleabite, and the increase in the debt just about makes up for that. Then the government ask us to have confidence in their policies and to look forward to better times. I have jotted down this statement, referring to unemployment and so on: Idle men willing to work are a disgrace to any government. Idle machines are a serious reflection on our system, and idle money is the greatest curse of all, money which should be in circulation but which is tied up in bank vaults and so on. It should be the most serious concern of the government at this time to find the proper application of men, machines and money to the welfare of mankind in this country. If this government can find that proper application, it will solve the problem. There is a proper application, but I am satisfied that it is out of adjustment at the present time. None of the three are working in the right proportion for the prosperity and welfare of Canada. It is all a matter of adjustment, and at present this government has the responsibility of making that adjustment.

There is no greater tragedy than to see men and women who have lost heart, who feel that they have no place in the scheme of things, in the society in which they move at the present time. There are thousands who have lost heart and many others who are on the border line at the present time. Think of the youth, as compared with the youth of thirty or forty years ago. Think of the outlook we had as boys; compare it with the outlook before the youth of to-day. We planned and worked and studied in order that when we built our homes and raised our families, we might leave them a better heritage than we received. The fathers and mothers are seriously concerned at the present time and are looking to this government for some solution. That is what is dealt with in the resolution we are discussing to-night. It is still true, as in former years, that Lazarus waits for the crumbs that fall from the rich man's table.

There are two classes on relief in this dominion. One class has been drawing relief since confederation. When a government does not balance its budget, so that it must borrow more and more to meet deficits, it is certainly paying relief to the lenders in increasing volume. They are just as surely on relief as any other class, and we have been keeping them on relief ever since confederation. The other class are the recipients of direct relief in these days, the unemployed, and so on.

I have a sentence about which I should like hon. members to think seriously. I say that the consumer should be the measuring stick of all values. The day will come in this and every other country when the consumer will be the boss, because he has the franchise, and any government which neglects to look after the best interests of each and every consumer is not fulfilling its function as a government. The consumer, may I repeat, should be the measuring stick, and if we look to his welfare we are looking to the welfare of each and every one, and the prosperity of the country as a whole.

I ask myself: Why are the banks in such good financial condition, when most businesses are just tottering on the brink of bankruptcy and financial distress? There is a reason for that.

Mr. BENNETT: They have reduced their dividends by nearly fifty per cent.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Out of the consumer.

[Mr. Needham.]

Mr. BENNETT: They reduced their dividends by nearly fifty per cent, while the banks in England maintained theirs, during the crisis.

Mr. NEEDHAM: That is possible.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not only possible; it was done.

Mr. NEEDHAM: There were smiles on the faces of hon. members opposite when the hon. member for Lethbridge, when asked what he would do, said, "I would call in the bankers." I take it that when this government took office it did call in the bankers, and I believe it took their advice. I wonder if it called in the manufacturers, and asked them whether they would like more orders for their factories. I wonder whether it called in the retailers and asked them if they would like to sell more goods. I wonder if it called in labour, and asked them if they would like to go to work. I wonder if it called in the farmers and asked them if they would like a market for their produce. I wonder if it called in the unemployed and asked them what they thought of the situation. I wonder if it called in the housewives who, I see, are now organizing, and asked their opinions. Had the government got the advice of these parties, I think some different action would have been taken.

When the hon. member for Lethbridge was speaking, the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) asked: "Can you give us any evidence of where anything of this nature has been tried and proved a success?" I should like to refer to New Zealand. Some hon. members may say, "Yes, but New Zealand has not a social credit government." I am informed that social credit candidates did not take part in the campaign of 1935 in New Zealand, but that in most constituencies the candidate was pledged to social credit principles. After the election it was discovered that on the government side there was a majority of social credit pledged members. So, while it is called a labour government, it is government pledged to social credit principles, and one which has worked along that particular line.

Mr. DONNELLY: Are they giving $25 a month?

Mr. NEEDHAM: The same criticism was made in New Zealand that has been made in this chamber. In 1935, prior to the election in that country, the same game was played. Here are some choice pieces of invective which were thrown at the labour party there: "Savings would be wiped out; insurance policies would be worthless; wages would be worthless." "If given power, the labour party would wreck the banks and institutions to which you have entrusted your savings." "Their reckless experiment of creating credit would make all money worthless." "Why waste time talking about wages, pensions and spending power when wages would not be worth the paper they were printed on"? "Labour's talk about using public credit, to issue sufficient money to meet the needs of the nation, and the promise to mint and print it means only one thing—worthless money." "A hundred pounds would eventually be worth less than a hundred pence." "Savings, bank balances, and insurance policies would be wiped out."

But the people of New Zealand considered it was time to take a chance, and they got this result: Sixty-five thousand unemployed found work, and there are now $30,000,000 more in the savings banks than there were at the time these stupid words were spoken. Have not these same words been used in Canada? We are all familiar with the political mind which cannot rise above the traditions of the past, and which imagines the world would go to pieces if the people got a decent living.

The following is a newspaper article dealing with the situation in Australia:

Premier Savage, head of the first Labour government of New Zealand, had been tackled by the leader of the opposition on the subject of his declared intention to make use of the public credit. This term, his opponent, Adam Hamilton, professed to be unable to understand, which, by the way, is a failing that is also familiar to Canadians.

"My statements," replied Mr. Savage, "mean that we are going to use the public credit instead of going around by London or some other place. If we came in here to pursue the bad old ways, we would not be justifying the confidence the people placed in us at the last election. We are going to do the job the people asked us to do."

The method that had been adopted in the past, the premier said, had been to float loans on the London market. "We never got the money. Sometimes we got goods that we didn't particularly want. But we did get a huge national debt. To-day we are instituting a new method. We are going to use the public credit direct. We are going to carry our own obligations.

If the leader of the opposition cannot distinguish between a lending institution which the people own and one which is owned by somebody else I pity him. The difference is between pledging the public credit in order to produce upon it and pledging the public credit to raise debts upon it."

On the question of production Mr. Savage pointed out that New Zealand had had production before but it had seldom had prosperity. What good is production, he asked, if the benefit does not reach the producer?

"It is no use creating wealth unless the people have access to it. The money incomes of the people must equal the value of their production."

In the ten years preceding 1930 the farmers had doubled their production, yet their incomes remained the same. "But in the last twelve months during which the government has been guiding the industry, the national income has gone up by 20,000,000 pounds.

Mr. HANSELL: That sounds like social credit.

Mr. NEEDHAM: That is in New Zealand, in the first year of operation. Then, we have another statement from New Zealand, which is as follows:

The practicability of the New Zealand program is confirmed by the best of all tests and yardsticks—the immediate effect on consumer goods business volume, on which depend ultimately all capital goods activity, export trade, wage paying ability, dividend paying ability and tax paying ability.

In this connection it is interesting to note that in the new government's first twelve months of office, their national production was up 18 per cent, industrial production 13½ per cent, wages 13½ per cent; building 24 per cent, savings deposits 15 per cent, and unemployment was down 32 per cent, to mention only a few of the evidences of steady improvement. Practically no woman is unemployed, and large numbers have left factories, shops and offices to get married.

The only way to cure our problem is to tackle it according to the best democratic plan available and then correct our mistakes, if any, as we proceed. The greatest mistake is to do nothing.

I should like to give in concrete form a few of the things which the government of New Zealand have done in one year of office. They nationalized their central bank one hundred per cent. Compare that with what Canada has done. The elections in Canada and New Zealand were held in the same year, 1935. Our present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) during the compaign promised the people of this country that if he were returned to power he would nationalize the central bank and restore to government the control of currency and credit, to be issued in terms of public need. He said that before the election. Premier Savage said it after he was elected, and that makes quite a difference.

Here are a few other things that were done by the New Zealand government within its first year of office. All classes of pensions were increased; wages were restored to the 1931 level; a forty-hour working week was made universal with a few exceptions; wage scales are adjusted twice a year to the cost of living index; the price of dairy products is fixed by the government; the 1937 program includes a comprehensive plan of health insurance and national superannuation.

The other achievements of the New Zealand government are maximum education possibilities for all children; balanced imports and exports; the price of wheat, flour and bread has been stabilized; increased old age pensions, with women receiving the pension at sixty instead of sixty-five, and income, not property, is the deciding factor in determining the amount of pension paid; invalid pensions on a sliding scale; widows' pensions increased, and so on. I am sure that if any member wants to read a summary of the work of the first labour government, he will find it very interesting.

Mr. DUNNING: They are not a social credit government.

Mr. NEEDHAM: I said a labour government. If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) had been in a little while ago, he would have heard the explanation regarding the government's connection with social credit.

Mr. DUNNING: I know their Minister of Finance very well, and he is not a social crediter.

Mr. NEEDHAM: He is doing the work we are pleading for.

In conclusion, I think this debate has been interesting and instructive for the Canadian people. This government is on trial at the present time before the people, before the unemployed, before the youth, of Canada, and, above all, on trial before the court of human justice.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, although this debate has gone on for quite a few days, the only thing that seems to have been definitely settled so far is that every loan creates a deposit. However, I am doubtful of the efficacy of that conclusion to get us out of our difficulties. From my point of view I think it is about as useful a matter to discuss as which came first, the hen or the egg. At all events we have come to one conclusion.

I am glad that I am following the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Needham), particularly because of the subject with which he concluded his speech, as it is along that line I am going to speak to-night. I wish to show that a socialist government must inevitably follow a capitalist government if democracy is going to continue.

The government of New Zealand, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has pointed out, is not a social credit government. It is a labour or socialist government, carrying out within the limits of its power those things which socialists would do to rectify the faults of the present system.

When the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) moved his amendment, he took occasion to deliver a lecture on social credit. I am not finding fault with my hon. friend for so doing. He and those sitting around him were sent here to give voice in this house to very definite ideas which they hold in regard to economic and social problems and the way in which they can be solved. He was only doing his duty in bringing that matter to the attention of the house in the way in which he did. Whether or not we agree with the theory of social credit, the debate has served a useful purpose. It has drawn to the attention of the house once again through the speeches of several members the tremendous inequality in the distribution of income in this country.

In the few words I am going to say to-night I am not going to take the position that there is no merit in the claims made by my hon. friends to my left. I suppose there is a modicum of truth and some error in all philosophies and in all social and economic creeds. I noticed, during the course of the speech of the hon. member for Lethbridge, that when he was asked specifically what his party would do, he invariably replied that they would call in the experts. That is a good answer under ordinary or even extraordinary circumstances, but in this case it is not satisfactory. It is not satisfactory because in the matter of the operation of social credit there are no experts to be called in.

If the hon. member for Lethbridge wanted to construct a road or a bridge or a house and wanted it well built, he would send for a man who had built roads or bridges or houses, depending upon what he wanted done. In other words, he would call in an experienced builder. He would not call in to build a house a man who had just written about building houses but had never built one. This, of course, is not to say that social credit is not feasible or easy of operation. But it does say that there are no social credit experts, because social credit is nothing but a theory. Major C. H. Douglas is not and could not be an expert in social credit, because there is no social credit system in operation anywhere where Major Douglas or anyone else could acquire the necessary experience to become an expert. No one knows that better than Major Douglas. That is why he keeps at a safe distance from the fields of actual operation.

Mr. QUELCH: They might put him in gaol.

Mr. MacINNIS: Major Douglas formulated the theory of social credit, and it is still a theory, never having been put into actual operation. In other words, so far as social credit is concerned, Major Douglas is a theorist or a theoretician; his work has been in the field of theory and not in that of practical experience. An expert is defined as:

A skilful or practical person; a scientific or professional witness; a specialist; expert; taught by use, practice or experience; having a facility from practice; adroit; dexterous; ready; skilful.

A theory, on the other hand, is:

A doctrine, or a scheme of things, which terminates in speculation or contemplation without a view to practice.

These definitions are taken from The King's English dictionary, and I think they agree with common usage.

I do not agree with the theory of social credit, because I do not believe that our problems are either wholly or largely a matter of money. That is not to say that the control of finance and credit is not important. I may be altogether wrong, but in my opinion the problem is largely one of ownership and control. According to my reading of history, it seems to be satisfactorily established that all down through the ages the persons or classes who owned and controlled property owned and controlled everything else, including the very lives of the people who did not own. The people who owned have always lived well and in comfort, while the propertyless class was always in poverty and suffered varying degrees of misery. The owner of the chattel slave lived well on the toil of the slave, while the slave, no matter how prosperous his master was, lived in misery. When the chattel slave emerged into the feudal serf, the feudal lord who owned the land and the means of production with which the serf laboured, also lived well on the labour of the serf. In those days it was not a question of money; yet the control over the lives of the non-owning class, whether slave or serf, was absolute and complete.

With the coming of the machine age it was thought that, at long last, the worker would come into his own. With the coming of power production another change in the social relationship between master and worker took place. The industrial revolution released the feudal serf from the land of his feudal lord. The serf became a free labourer; but this did not help him very much, because his former owners still owned and controlled the means by which he lived. Indeed, history tells us that for a long time his condition was even worse in many respects than it had been when he was in his former position, attached to the land. The free labourer was now a wage earner, but still dependent for his living upon the owner of the means of production. His condition was not improved because, as I said before, his former masters still owned the means by which he had to live.

Another change occurred. With the industrial revolution the increase in wealth became very great. The wealth amassed by the owners of the means of production increased on a scale never experienced before; but in the main the wealth producers remained in misery and in want; and again I say it is not a question of money. The reason I cannot see a solution of our problem in social credit is because, as I see it, the property, the wealth of the owning class, this abundance that we refer to on occasions, in the present as in the past, results from the labour of the working class. I cannot see how, by any manipulation of money or credit or by any other hocus-pocus, the producers of wealth can consume that wealth and yet leave it in the possession of those who owned it in the first place to have for their full enjoyment. I cannot see how it can be done. It does not appeal to my reason.

In the main, I think, our capitalists and our bankers are fairly intelligent people. If it were possible to leave them in full enjoyment of the social and economic advantages which their present position gives them and yet give the producers of wealth, that is the wage worker and the farmer, full and complete access to the products of field, mine and factory, just by the printing of money either by the government or some other agency, I am quite satisfied that they are not so selfish or so foolish that they would not do this. They would gladly agree to it.

On the other hand it is quite easy to understand why money assumes such an important place in the mind of the average person. The wage of the wage earner is considered in terms of money. The salary of the professional man and of the office worker is computed in terms of money. The price the farmer receives for his products is stated in terms of money. The rent, interest and profit of those who live by that kind of income are reckoned in terms of money. When one considers that "banks make money and that the banks are full of money," one can easily understand that, when their money income is reduced or stopped, the first thing people think about is that something has gone wrong with money or the money machinery. When one couples with that the conviction that all that is necessary is to make money plentiful again and all will be well; that nothing will be changed except that the poor will be rich and the rich richer—well, there is nothing to it! Just print sufficient five, ten and twenty dollar bills and everything will be fine! The farmer will get more money for his product; the wage earner will get more money for his labour; the salaried man will receive a higher salary, and the owner of property who lives by rent, interest and profit will get more money from these various sources! Who could refuse such an easy solution of our problems? Why should not everyone be anxious to grasp it? Sometimes I almost feel like accepting it myself.

Money is not wealth. It is a means of exchanging wealth. It exchanges the goods or services of one individual for the goods or services of another. It exchanges property claims from one individual to another. But one must have some property claims to exchange before the exchange can take place. Every piece of paper money, be it cheque, note or bill, is just a promise to pay. Whoever accepts it in lieu of something he has given up does so on the understanding that the paper he holds is a charge against property. That is, the promise to pay, the credit he holds, is at the same time a debt and a claim on property. It seems to me that if the state is going to make and distribute money to all who need it, and if that money is not to become a future debt, the state will by that process be distributing the wealth of the country; it will take from those who have and give to those who have not. I have no objection to that being done, but if my social credit friends think that it will be done and still leave social relationships unchanged; that is to say, that it will leave the present owners in control and ownership of the means of production and distribution, then they are due for a rude awakening. It cannot and will not be done in that way. It seems quite clear to me that in a community of people owning their own land and other means of production, and operating them by their cooperative efforts, thus producing for their own needs, the necessity for purchasing power would never arise. It is only the intrusion of property rights between the goods and the consumer that makes purchasing power, as my friends see it, necessary. That is the one thing which we have to understand before we can understand the problems that confront us to-day.

As a socialist I am in agreement with my social credit friends when they say that every citizen, simply because of his human descent, is part owner of the national heritage; that is to say, in theory he is; and because of that part ownership in the national heritage he is entitled to a share in the national income. It is because I am a believer in that doctrine that I am a socialist. That is why I advocate the social ownership of the means of production. But I cannot understand how the social crediters can say in one breath that they believe that every one is a part owner of the national heritage, and in the next breath reject socialism, which is based on that very axiom, and support capitalism, which is based on the principle that he who has may hold, and he who can may take.

I am driven to the conclusion that so long as we are content to leave the national heritage; that is, the natural resources of the country and the other means of production, in the hands of private individuals, so long will the wealth produced go to the private owners, less the cost of production. And that it should do so is merely a natural sequence in the order of things. I am afraid we do not understand clearly enough, if we understand at all, that the purpose of the capitalist system is not to produce the greatest amount of goods and services for the good of the community at large, but rather to produce more capital to be reinvested so that in turn it can produce still more capital.

If any member of the house does not believe that statement, there is an easy way in which he can prove it to his own satisfaction. Let him try to raise capital to build a factory for the production of something useful. Let him tell those whom he expects to put capital into that factory that there will be no profit accruing; let him ask them to buy shares in the business and let him tell them that the purpose is to produce easy chairs for old age pensioners, or to make new clothing for the wives and mothers and children of those on relief. Let him tell them that, and I am quite satisfied that he would have great difficulty in raising capital for any such purpose. That is in itself a clear indication of what the purpose of capitalism is.

But suppose you want to produce something else, something that might be even harmful to the community, something that is not at all useful. What happens? We find to-day that governments have not the slightest difficulty in borrowing unlimited sums for the building of armaments. In that connection a revealing comment appeared in a recent issue of the New Statesman and Nation of December 18, 1937. Referring to the British government's rearmament program, which was announced as £1,500,000,000, that journal made the following comment:

> Accordingly, the government relies on expanding expenditure on this form of "public works" to offset any tendency towards general economic depression that may manifest itself for some time to come. Armaments are, indeed, from this particular standpoint the ideal form of public works.
> They do not compete in any way with private enterprise; they have the great advantage—from the capitalist point of view—of being entirely unproductive; they provide interest on money which might otherwise not be able to earn any; and they are just as good as any more useful works both in providing indirect employment and in distributing purchasing power. Digging holes and filling them up again would of course possess most of the same advantages—or paying the unemployed higher incomes out of borrowed money. But that would never do.

Does that not clearly indicate to any one who cares to read, what the purpose of the present capitalist system is? If you can get capital to work in a way that can carry out that purpose, you can find unlimited money.

A reference has been made to debt. If we keep in mind that we are dealing with material things; and if we consider them from the viewpoint of ownership, which is the only intelligent way in which we can consider them, we shall have no difficulty in understanding debt, and we shall know why we are going into debt every day. One effect of the capitalist system is that it continually transfers property rights; it centralizes wealth. Why do people borrow? They borrow because they want something they do not have. From whom do they borrow? They borrow from those who have something that the borrower needs. When the loans are repaid, those who had have more than they had before, and those who had not have less.

Mrs. BLACK: Not necessarily.

Mr. MacINNIS: Not necessarily? That is what usually happens. Let me add that these debts can never be repaid, because they cannot be paid except with the property of those to whom we owe the debts.

I do not think we can have a clear understanding of the reason for the economic difficulties in which the world finds itself to-day unless we realize, as I have said, the real nature of capitalism; unless we realize that the purpose of capitalism is to produce more and more capital and not to provide for human wants. It does provide for human needs incidentally; but that is not its purpose, which is to create more and more capital. In order to explain the point I quote from a speech made a year or two ago by the Right Hon. Walter Elliot, former Minister of Agriculture in the British government; I think he is now Secretary for Scotland. Referring to the difficulties that the world was getting into at the time, he made this statement:

> But these factors, the power of science to make anything anywhere, the determination of men to try everything everywhere, and a growing doubt as to whether foreign loans in many parts of the world are not simply free gifts which we should do as well to keep for ourselves, have produced and are producing a change so fundamental in our outlook that it might almost be described as the third stage of the industrial revolution. The first stage was, so to speak, the drilling of a borehole and the tapping of a great subterranean source of power by the people who made this venture. The second, which we have just lived through, was the piping of that power to undeveloped nations as capital development, financed by unrepaid loans. The third stage is the check and flood-back as the bore holes in other countries strike oil in their turn, and the pipes begin to fill up from the far end also.

I do not see how the situation could be put much clearer than that. Let me explain briefly those stages. The first stage was the industrial revolution, beginning in England less than two hundred years ago, with the advent of motive power and machine production. The first result was to build up the capital structure of Great Britain: home industries. The second stage was the development of new countries, countries like North and South America, Australia and New Zealand. The third stage is where Mr. Elliot says that they have struck oil in the new countries and that there is a flood-back as the bore-holes fill up from the other end. So that in those countries into which, when capitalism was young, the older countries were putting their surplus investments, they now have surplus capital themselves and are looking for a place to invest it. That is the world's condition at the present time, and it is a condition which the world is not going to get over under its present form of production and distribution.

I read what seemed to me a rather significant article in the January issue of Canadian Business, which I think is the official organ of the Canadian chamber of commerce. The author of this article is Courtland Elliott, described by the publishers as one of Canada's brilliant young economists. He says:

> The periods of greatest prosperity in Canada have coincided with an inward flow of foreign capital. Such capital has been invested directly in Canadian enterprises or in securities, the proceeds of which have been used largely for construction or expansion. In either case the funds have resulted in the manufacture of capital goods and the employment of labour at good wages.
> There are those who contend that Canada already has enough capital equipment for the volume of business that is being done and for the size of the population we have to sustain. In the light of present conditions and short-term realities that statement is probably true. Faced with restricted markets on the one hand and improved industrial technique on the other, it is evident that our existing capital equipment has not been unduly pressed in the recent period of recovery. Indeed the fact that new capital financing for industrial purposes in 1937 was lower than in many years, and Canada has not been a net borrower of outside capital for three years, might indicate either a lack of need or a lack of profitable employment for foreign and domestic capital in Canada.

If such a condition is permanent we would probably have to reconcile ourselves to a lower standard of living, a withering production organization, a rising tide of social dependency and financial instability.

I do not agree that it is necessary for us to do that. To me it seems amazing that at a time when the people of Canada along with the people of the rest of the world have in a way reached the position for which mankind has been striving all down through the ages, that is, economic security; when we have everything necessary to produce the things we need, we should say that because we cannot get markets; because we cannot use them for this and that, we must prepare for enduring misery and poverty. It is beyond my comprehension that intelligent people should agree to that. I claim it is not necessary, if we use the equipment for social ends; that is, building homes and in other ways improving the living conditions of our people.

Let me say that I am supporting the amendment. I am supporting it because in my opinion this government has not even tried to make the resources of the country and the machinery of production operate in the interests of the people.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is speaking on the subamendment?

Mr. MacINNIS: No; I am speaking on both.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend must be speaking on the subamendment of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), because that is the only thing before the house. He is supporting that?

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes; I am supporting both. I shall have to vote for both because both are still before the house.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member is a little mixed.

Mr. MacINNIS: No; I am quite clear in my point of view. About five years ago the present Prime Minister, speaking in this house, outlined a comprehensive program of social reform, which he pledged that the Liberal party would put into effect if returned to office. I maintain that that pledge has not been kept. On that occasion he said, as reported at page 2508 of Hansard of 1933:

It has been said by some hon. members of the Progressive group that there should be a new motive in industry. May I say that I entirely agree with that.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

That is the present Prime Minister speaking.

I believe that once the different groups in industry are represented in the control of industry we shall come to have a very different conception of industry generally. The conception that we have to-day is too largely that industry is primarily a source of revenue; the means whereby private gains may be reaped.

We had been pointing that out for years. At that time the Prime Minister accepted our point of view. But what has he done since he came into office to change the purpose of industry, or as he said himself, to give it a new purpose? I claim that he has done absolutely nothing.

In the same speech he went on to say, at page 2510:

The system of distribution of products needs overhauling. Distribution should be on a service at cost basis. The spread in price is too great, as any comparison of prices paid to producers with prices consumers have to pay will make self-evident.

Again I ask, What has the Liberal party done to reduce this spread? Again the answer is nothing. Then on the same page, 2510, he says:

Industry has been adversely affected by the control exercised over industry, not by industrial managers so much as by promoters and financiers. We believe the interlocking of directorates is one of the factors which, on the one hand, enables bankers to control industries—

I should like my hon. friends over here to listen to this:

—and on the other hand, enables industrialists to control the banks. It is our view that in this connection there is room for much in the way of reform.

There is still room for much in the way of reform, but I doubt very much that we shall see any reform in this direction on the part of this government. I think it was our view, before the Prime Minister took it as the view of the Liberal party. But what has this government done to break the control of the bankers and industrialists over the economic life of this country? Again the answer must be, Nothing. I quote now from the message given by the Prime Minister to the people of Canada on October 14, 1935, the evening of the last election day. Part of his message at that time was:

We take up at once as our supreme task the endeavour to end poverty in the midst of plenty, starvation and unnecessary suffering in a land of abundance, discontent and distress in a country more blessed by providence than any other on the face of the globe, and gain for individual lives, and for the nation as a whole that "health and peace, and sweet content" which is the rightful heritage of all.

We still have poverty in the midst of plenty. We still have starvation and unnecessary suffering in a land of abundance. We still have discontent and distress in a country more blessed by providence than any other on the face of the globe, and we are still waiting for that "health and peace, and sweet content," which the Liberal party promised us on the day of their victory in 1935. What is more to the point, there is no indication that the government has any plan by which these desirable things mentioned by the Prime Minister may be brought about.

As a final word may I say that until some government takes definite and decisive action to bring our industries under social control and make them function for the welfare of the people instead of being used for their exploitation, as they are to-day, the difficulties we are now experiencing are going to remain with us.

Mr. J. J. KINLEY (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) is very general in its terms, and is something that one might expect at any time from an opposition member, especially in that corner of the house. But, as the hon. member explained in the course of his remarks, he confined his attack upon the government to the monetary system, and suggested that his so-called monetary system, social credit, would bring to this country prosperity and relieve us from debt, and that unemployment would fade away. Otherwise he was most complimentary. I should like to quote from his remarks as they appear in Hansard:

> The government has tried everything but money reform. I am ready to say what I have said in a hundred places in this country, both on the platform and elsewhere, that as far as I can judge the government in power to-day has done everything it could possibly conceive of under the present system to improve the condition of our people. It is my judgment that the ministers are as energetic, as honourable and as earnest as men could possibly be. It is my belief that the members are ready to do their utmost. They disagree among themselves with regard to high and low tariffs and with regard to the advantages of trade with this and that country, but as far as they can see and come to agreement, they are doing the best they can. I do not hesitate one moment to say that.

Coming from a member of the opposition, this is a high tribute, and it does not seem to me that tributes of this kind come very frequently even from our own most ardent supporters. But we are told that the Liberal party is a marching force, always advancing, never arriving and never satisfied. So we think that perhaps when the budget comes down and the three-way trade agreement is completed, we shall have made another step forward and shall have again advanced a little further with our ideas of better trade relations. Hon. members will note that the hon, gentleman, who is the leader of his group and who comes from the prairie provinces, thinks the government has made a pretty good job of its tariff so far.

On the other hand the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) feels that at present the Liberal party is injuring this country by lowering tariffs. This is the first we have heard of this complaint from the right hon. gentleman for some time. I can remember him only a year ago stating that the Liberal party had not lowered the tariff to any extent.

The right hon. gentleman spoke of duties and dumping duties, and as it is nearly eleven o'clock I wish to refer for a moment or two to one of those dumping duties. I am glad that dumping duties are passing from our customs rulings and that the customs authorities do not invoke them as they were invoked in the days of the previous administration. I believe dumping duties are dangerous, because they affect the whole fabric of our export trade. Canadian manufacturers should be against dumping duties except as a last resort, because a manufacturer who takes advantage of the drawbacks in duty and ships abroad, may be said to be dumping. So, when someone in a foreign country says that products are sent to that country at less than the cost in the country of origin, the manufacturer can hardly complain. At present in my part of Canada we hear a great deal about the dumping duty on sugar. That is something which affects my people. We feel that we should do a better trade with the republic of Cuba, whose tariff laws are very fair in that they say that if a country buys fifty per cent of its requirements from them, they will give that country the minimum tariff. In view of the fact that this is a potential market for our primary products, and because of the primary products Cuba can ship to us, I think the continuance of the dumping duty to the island of Cuba under present conditions is promoting an economic injustice.

The other day the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) told us what was in the speech from the throne in Nova Scotia, and he pointed out that in that province those on relief had been reduced from 75,000 to a little more than 6,000, and that this was a record not equalled anywhere else in Canada. This is not because we have greater wealth in Nova Scotia; the fact is that the per capita wealth in that province is only $1,514, as against a per capita wealth in Ontario of $2,468. It is due, rather, to the independence and individualism of our people. They do not like to submit to the indignities of being supported by the state. The municipal councils in our towns and municipalities guard against giving relief, where it is possible to avoid doing so, and they see to it that an honest day's work is given for the money spent on any of the projects carried on in the province.

On motion of Mr. Kinley the debate was adjourned.

SUPPLY

USE OF CANADA'S FINANCIAL RESOURCES FOR ELIMINATION OF POVERTY—AMENDMENT OF MR. BLACKMORE AND SUBAMENDMENT OF MR. BENNETT

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Dunning for committee of supply, the amendment thereto of Mr. Blackmore, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Bennett.

Mr. J. J. KINLEY (Queens-Lunenburg): Last night when the house adjourned I was discussing unemployment and I referred to the tribute paid to the province of Nova Scotia by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). The minister said that in this regard Nova Scotia had the best record in Canada, unemployment having decreased more than in any other province. We are proud of that record, but at this moment I am confronted with a situation that is causing me considerable concern, because I have telegrams from fishermen and fish companies in western Nova Scotia advising me that their vessels have been laid off and that the men are unemployed. I wish to make a last appeal to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud), who is in his place, because on the first of April he must come to a decision as to whether he will continue the use of beam trawlers on the Atlantic coast.

I do not intend to argue this question at great length. Three commissions have given their decision. The Maclean commission was appointed by the federal government to go through Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and the Magdalen islands and investigate the whole subject, and that commission reported against the use of trawlers on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. ISNOR: Was the report of that commission unanimous?
