ROYAL COMMISSIONS

GRAIN, TEXTILES, PENITENTIARIES AND EMPLOYMENT—INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF REPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, as this is the twenty-seventh sitting day of the session, I should like to know if the government will be in a position on the first of the week to tell us when we may expect the report of the grain commission, the textile commission and the penitentiaries commission—and also the final report of the late lamented employment commission; do not forget that.

VALIDITY OF ALBERTA STATUTES

POWERS OF DISALLOWANCE AND RESERVATION—ANSWERS OF SUPREME COURT TO CERTAIN QUESTIONS REFERRED BY GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, at the request of some hon. members I desire to lay on the table of the house six copies of the answers of the Supreme Court of Canada to certain questions, by way of reference by the governor in council of certain Alberta matters, and the reasons for such answers. The questions and answers are as follows:

Question. Is power of disallowance a still subsisting power?

Answer: Yes.

Question. Is power, if subsisting, subject to any restriction, and, if so, what is nature of restriction?

Answer: No.

Question: Is Bill No. 1, entitled an Act Respecting the Taxation of Banks, intra vires?

Answer: No.

Question: Is Bill No. 8, entitled an Act to Amend and Consolidate the Credit of Alberta Regulation Act, intra vires?

Answer: No.

Question: Is Bill No. 9, entitled An Act to Ensure the Publication of Accurate News and Information, intra vires?

Answer: No.

Question: Is power of reservation a still subsisting power?

Answer: Yes.

Question: Is power, if subsisting, subject to any restrictions, and, if so, what is the nature of restrictions?

Answer: No.

The court stated that the only restrictions on disallowance or reservation were the statutory restrictions contained in the British North America Act, and the limitations on the power of the lieutenant-governor contained in his instructions.

The opinion on every one of the references is unanimous.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice, in view of the great interest taken throughout the country in the decisions handed down, if the text will be printed for distribution?

Mr. BENNETT: Print them in the votes and proceedings.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, that might be done. Of course it is a pretty bulky document, but if the house would agree it might be printed in the votes and proceedings, for the convenience of hon. members.

CORONATION OATH

PERSONAL EXPLANATION OF MR. CAHAN RESPECTING ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON FEBRUARY 28

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably absent from the house on Monday last when the Prime Minister replied formally to a question I had asked with regard to the coronation oath. His reply has been interpreted by some members of the house, and some people outside the house, as raising a question of personal veracity between the Prime Minister and myself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, no.

Mr. CAHAN: I did not think that any such issue was raised.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly not.

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

Mr. CAHAN: But, as a personal explanation, I should like to say that in asking the question I was quite familiar with the statutory changes in the coronation oath since first prescribed by the Coronation Oath Act. I was familiar with the fact that originally the kingdom was referred to as the Kingdom of England, that upon the union in 1706 of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland the name prescribed by the statute was the Kingdom of Great Britain, and that by the act of 1800, providing for the union of Great Britain and Ireland, the name prescribed was the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. Since then there has been another change in that designation of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, which, since the organization of the Irish Free State as a dominion, has been known as the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

But when referring to changes in the coronation oath, as administered on May 12, 1937, I was not referring to any such statutory changes, because former changes in the name to that of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland were not, I conceived, changes in the terms of the oath. Those were statutory changes in the name of what was originally known, when the oath was prescribed by enactment, as the Kingdom of England. I was referring to other terms. I do not wish to raise any further question at the present time which would lead to any discussion, but I wish simply to say that in asking my question I was not considering statutory changes. I had in mind certain alterations which I did not conceive to be statutory alterations, and with this statement I am quite content. I was sure from the beginning that no question of personal veracity had been raised by the Prime Minister's reply.

I also notice that newspapers from the Atlantic to the Pacific allege that I, in my capacity as a member of the house, was deemed by the Prime Minister to be guilty of gross impropriety in asking another question. I infer that his reply referred to the form of my question, and not to any real impropriety in the question which I asked.

I have nothing further to say except that in reading the reply I did not believe that the Prime Minister was making any imputation with respect to my personality as a member of the house.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure it is unnecessary for me to say to my hon. friend that no member of the house, and least of all myself, would make any reflection upon my hon. friend's veracity.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION

QUESTION TO BE EXAMINED BY INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE—INQUIRY IN BRITISH COLUMBIA BY BOARD OF REVIEW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to a Canadian press dispatch from Vancouver, dated yesterday, to the effect that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) had announced in that city that the government intended thoroughly to investigate the Japanese problem in British Columbia. I should like to ask whether or not such is the case, and if so in what manner and to what extent an investigation will be made.

Mr. CHURCH: They will appoint another commission.

Mr. SPENCE: Hear, hear—another commission.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to intimate to me that he would ask this question. As I indicated on February 17, the government has been investigating the question of surreptitious immigration into Canada, particularly on the Pacific coast. Officials of the interested departments have been considering the matter jointly and the government intends to intensify the investigation and do everything it possibly can to prevent anything in the way of illegal entry. In accordance with the statement made at that time the interdepartmental committee, consisting of representatives of the branches of the service chiefly concerned, namely, immigration, justice, national defence, labour, fisheries, statistics and external affairs, has been instructed to reexamine the whole situation and to report at an early date.

In addition it has been decided to appoint a board of review composed of representatives of immigration and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and external affairs to carry on an inquiry in British Columbia. The board will not necessarily hold public sittings but will be prepared to receive representations from any persons claiming to have information regarding illegal entry and anyone having such information will be invited to present it to the board. These representations will be immediately investigated. A special detail will be assigned by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to work in collaboration with the board to carry out a thorough check-up. The report of the board of review will be given immediate consideration by the government.

I might add that any persons found to have entered Canada illegally will be deported. On the other hand no person who has been legally admitted to Canada need have any apprehension.

An announcement will be made in due course of the personnel of the board of review.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask whether it has been ascertained, as a result of the investigations that have been made, how many Japanese have entered this country illegally? Perhaps the minister is unable to give an answer at this time, but the question arises out of what has been said.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I would prefer to give an answer to my right hon. friend's question on Monday.

VALIDITY OF QUEBEC STATUTE

QUESTION OF DISALLOWANCE OF "ACT RESPECTING COMMUNISTIC PROPAGANDA"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. PELLETIER (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, is it the intention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) or the government to refer the so-called Quebec padlock law to the supreme court to determine whether it is intra or ultra vires?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): The legislation my hon. friend is referring to is being considered by the Minister of Justice along with the petitions which have been received in relation to it. Whatever the recommendation of the minister may be, it will be submitted to the governor in council.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT THIS DAY AT SIX O'CLOCK

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): While no request has been made, I understand that it will be appreciated by a number of hon. members of the house if when we adjourn this evening at six o'clock the house shall stand adjourned until Monday afternoon. It is the intention of the government to ask at six o'clock for an adjournment until that time.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Speaking for those who are associated with me, as well as on my own behalf, I desire to express grateful appreciation of the courtesy the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has extended to us in dealing with the adjournment at six o'clock as indicated.

BONE CREEK, SASK., FARMERS

LACK OF FEED FOR LIVE STOCK AND NEED OF RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): On February 25 the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) brought to my attention on the orders of the day a matter to which he said he did not expect a reply at that time but at a later date. His representation was:

It is alleged that some seventy farmers of Bone Creek municipality have received only from fifty to sixty-five per cent of their winter hay. It is claimed that the last delivery was made on February 2, and that their live stock is starving. They have interviewed the council without result and have wired Mr. Taggart and Mr. Kember at Regina.

A few days ago I passed over to my right hon. friend a wire which I received and which I should like to place on the record. It reads:

Re municipality of Bone Creek. Municipality asked for forty-one hundred and thirteen tons. To date twenty-seven hundred and twenty-four tons have been shipped. Ten cars are in transit, thirty-two cars are on order and orders are being issued every day for more hay for this municipality. Our field man will make an inspection immediately.

The inspection has been made and I am informed that feed is now going forward in sufficient quantity to take care of the situation.

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

HARBOUR COMMISSIONS

EXTENSION OF JURISDICTION OF WINNIPEG AND ST. BONIFACE HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 32, to amend the Winnipeg and St. Boniface Harbour Commissioners Act.

He said: The purpose of this bill is to extend the jurisdiction of the Winnipeg and St. Boniface Harbour Commissioners to the waters of municipalities contiguous to the cities of Winnipeg and St. Boniface which desire to be brought under the act. The harbour limits now include the Red river within the boundaries of Winnipeg on the one side, and St. Boniface on the other. The municipality of East Kildonan has requested that the portion of the river fronting that municipality should be included. It is also probable that Kildonan West, Fort Garry and St. Vital will make similar applications. With the completion of the sewage system for Winnipeg it is expected that the Red river will be used more extensively by pleasure boats, and for that reason the city has asked the government to introduce this bill to extend the boundaries of the harbour commission.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

On section 1—Municipality.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the minister any real meaning to give to the word "contiguous"? It has no exact legal meaning so far as I know.

Mr. HOWE: My understanding is that it means touching the city of Winnipeg.

Mr. MUTCH: Am I right in understanding that this bill will not change the present jurisdiction of the municipal councils?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct. If these municipalities decide to come in, each council will have the privilege of appointing one member to the board.

Mr. MUTCH: It is just enabling legislation.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

INSPECTION AND SALE

PROPOSED REGULATIONS RESPECTING BINDER TWINE, SALT AND OTHER COMMODITIES

The house resumed from Thursday, March 3, consideration in committee of Bill No. 30, to regulate the inspection and sale of binder twine and salt, and to establish weight of bushel for certain commodities commonly sold by the bushel—Mr. Gardiner—Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: When this bill was before the committee yesterday certain sections were allowed to stand.

On section 7—Reconditioned or rewound binder twine.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, part II of this bill was under consideration yesterday, and I asked the committee to rise and report progress in order that we might check back further. I realized from the discussion that we were more or less at cross purposes because of statements which had been made with regard to what is contained in other acts. I have since had those acts checked. This bill as it is now before the committee is for the purpose of repealing all parts of the Inspection and Sale Act which have been covered by other legislation. I found on further investigation that these sections with regard to salt are fully covered in the Food and Drugs Act and the Feeding Stuffs Act, and that there was no necessity for these sections to be retained in the present act.

The proposal now is to remove sections 13, 14, 15, 16 and 17 from the present bill, and pass the bill without Part II in it. That will require some further amendments in Part III afterwards. But I suggest that part II be dropped from the bill.

Mr. DUNNING: I move that part II of the bill be struck out.

Mr. PELLETIER: In clause 13 of part II mention is made of every sort of container and package. Why could not salt blocks be included in that designation?

Mr. GARDINER: Section 13 is now out.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. GARDINER: It will be necessary to amend section 19 to read:

> Every person who violates any provision of Part II of this act shall, for the first offence, be liable, on summary conviction, to a penalty not exceeding twenty-five dollars, and for each subsequent offence to a penalty not exceeding fifty dollars.

And it will become new section 14.

Mr. DUNNING: I so move. There will have to be a renumbering of the sections.

Mr. GARDINER: We have struck out sections 13 to 17. Former section 18 now becomes No. 13, and former section 19 will now become No. 14.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 18—Manner of determining a bushel.

Mr. GARDINER: Regarding this section there was a question raised yesterday by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell). We changed the wording above the list of articles, and the question was raised whether any offence could be proven with the wording we put in yesterday. I had that checked up and I am informed that the point taken by the hon. member for Swift Current was well taken. I suggest that the new section 13 in place of section 18 shall read:

> In contracts for the sale and delivery of any of the undermentioned articles the legal weights per bushel shall be as follows:

Mr. DUNNING: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. STIRLING: Is the minister satisfied that there is no confusion between the penalty prescription in clause 12 and the penalty set out in new clause 14? The penalty in clause 12 refers to persons charged with the enforcement of this act, the whole act. The penalty in new clause 14 refers to the violation of a provision in part II, and the penalty clause in section 10 specifically speaks of part I.

Mr. GARDINER: I judge from the wording that it is clearly defined. Section 12 says:

> Every person who obstructs an inspector or other person charged with the enforcement of this act from entering any premises to examine binder twine as provided by this part . . .

The same inspector might be enforcing the whole act. but this relates to when he is working under this particular part. I am letting third reading stand over, in any case, to have it all checked.

Bill reported.

WAR VETERANS' ALLOWANCES

EXTENSION OF ALLOWANCES TO INCLUDE CERTAIN OTHER CLASSES—ENLARGEMENT OF MEMBERSHIP OF BOARD

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the War Veterans' Allowance Act so as to extend the allowance payable thereunder to a class of veterans of the great war not presently the recipients of such allowances who, because of tangible or intangible disabilities and handicaps, are incapable of maintaining themselves; to include certain veterans of the South African war; to include among the classes of moneys non-deductible from allowance, pensions or grants accompanying certain military decorations; to provide for the avoidance of over-lapping of benefits payable under the War Veterans' Allowance Act and those payable under the Old Age Pension Act, and to enlarge the membership of the war veterans' allowances board.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

Mr. POWER: It will be remembered that the War Veterans' Allowance Act was passed in 1930 to provide for the maintenance of veterans who are in necessity and because of age or incapacity were unable to provide for themselves. It was based on the assumption that the people of this country do not want to see its veterans in the bread-line or suffering hardship from lack of the necessities of life when they become too old or too disabled to work, even though their disabilities could not be proved to be a result of war service and consequently are not pensionable.

The act provided for a maximum allowance to a married veteran of $40 a month, provided he had reached the age of sixty or was so disabled as to be "permanently unemployable." In addition to this $40 per month, he could earn or receive from other sources $20 per month, giving him a total income of $60 a month. With the single veteran, the amounts were half the sums named. Since the act was based on the assumption that the terrific strain on those in battle during the last war would pre-age the veteran as compared with the civilian, the act provided that the veteran must have served in a theatre of actual war. It provided however that those who received small pensions, no matter where they served, would also be entitled to its benefits. It also provided that those who served in His Majesty's imperial forces and in the forces of His Majesty's allies should receive the same benefits provided they were domiciled in Canada when they enlisted.

The government at the time this act was enacted in 1930 knew that the cost of legislation would increase as years went by. As a matter of fact the cost in 1930 was $318,000, and during the last fiscal year it was $3,178,000. It will continue to increase for almost another twenty years. The expenditure at its peak in about the year 1957 is expected to reach twelve to thirteen million dollars and will look after approximately 35,000 to 40,000 veterans. At the present time 12,800 veterans are in receipt of the allowance and $4,500,000 will be required to make provision for the recipients under this act during the next fiscal year, although a supplementary vote will be asked for to cover those it is proposed to bring under this amendment.

It has been stated that the legislation was originally enacted to provide for the veteran of sixty and the veteran who was "permanently unemployable." "Permanently unemployable" has, broadly speaking, been interpreted to mean totally incapacitated. After the act had been functioning for six years it became apparent that there was another class of veteran for whom the act did not provide but who was incapable of maintaining himself. For the main part it was found that this veteran was in his late fifties; he had not quite reached the age of sixty, and he did not have sufficient disability to classify him "permanently unemployable." Yet he was physically older than his years, and because of his pre-aging found it difficult to secure employment. The act was therefore amended in 1936, bringing in a third and additional class. The amendment provided for the man who, "having served in a theatre of actual war, has attained the age of fifty-five years and is in the opinion of the board incapable of maintaining himself because of disability, pre-aging and general unfitness." Over 1,100 veterans have been granted the allowance as the result of this amendment of 1936.

It is now proposed by this legislation to broaden the act still further, so as to enable the board administering it to provide for any veteran, regardless of his age, who cannot maintain himself because of industrial as well as physical incapacity or inadequacy. I refer to the veteran who is only partially disabled but whose tangible or intangible disability, combined with certain economic or industrial handicaps, such as having been unemployed for a long time, render it extremely unlikely that he will be able to maintain himself again.

The amendment will empower the board to award the allowance to any veteran, having served in a theatre of actual war, who because of a combination of conditions and circumstances is not likely again to become self-supporting, and it will exclude only those veterans who are physically fit to maintain themselves as and when work is available to them.

The veterans' assistance commission, whose report was recently tabled, found there were approximately 15,000 veterans unemployed throughout the dominion who had service in a theatre of actual war and were unprovided for by pensions or allowances. They classified these veterans into three groups, "fit," "partially fit" and "unfit." Over 10,000 of these veterans were classified by the commission as being "fit" and 5,171 were classed as "partially fit" and "unfit." It is this group of just over 5,000 veterans that the amendment contemplates providing for, subject of course to investigation and approval by the board. The anticipated annual cost will be about $2,000,000.

Summarizing the situation, therefore, it may be said originally the act provided for the veteran of sixty and the totally incapacitated veteran. Later it was broadened enabling the board to give special consideration to the veteran over fifty-five. Now it is proposed to amend the act further to the end that the board administering this legislation is empowered to grant the allowance to any veteran, regardless of his years, who in its opinion, because of economic conditions and handicaps combined with disabilities, is unlikely again to become self-supporting.

It may be said that in passing this legislation we shall be fulfilling to the utmost the requests of the returned soldiers themselves as expressed through the dominion convention of the Canadian legion held in Fort William early in February when a resolution was passed on the subject of cash bonus to veterans of the Great war. The resolution reads in part:

> That this convention endorse the resolution passed by the dominion executive council to the effect that it is unalterably opposed to the principle of any bonus for service in the great war, conceiving it to be the responsibility of the government of Canada to adequately provide only for those disabled as a result of war service and dependents and dependents of the fallen and to ensure adequate assistance for those who saw service in a theatre of actual war and who are now by reason of economic conditions combined with their disability, tangible and intangible, resulting from war service, unable through no fault of their own to secure employment.

With respect to this resolution I submit that provision has already been made through pension legislation to "care for those disabled as a result of their service and dependents and the dependents of the fallen," and I further submit that this amendment is intended for and will take care of those who "by reason of economic conditions combined with their disabilities, tangible and intangible, are unable to secure employment."

> That the act be amended by removal of age fifty-five years where it refers to the granting of an allowance because of disability, pre-aging and general unfitness, and that it be amended further so as to permit a more liberal interpretation of legislation covering the granting of the allowance at any age to a veteran who saw service in a theatre of actual war and who because of his unfit condition or other handicaps is unable to maintain himself.

This recommendation is being fully implemented by this amendment, and moreover, certain classes of veterans with respect to whom recommendations were made by the commission involving lesser allowances will now, by this amendment, be provided for under the War Veterans' Allowance Act which provides a more generaus scale of assistance.

I have no hesitation in stating that with this amendment the War Veterans' Allowance Act of Canada will be broader in its scope and more generous in its terms than similair legislation in any other country.

It is also provided, in accordance with the undertaking given last year that if it was feasible to do so it would be done, that South African veterans shall be brought within the provisions of the War Veterans' Allowance Act. While it was very difficult to get at the exact figures, it is estimated that this will cost approximately $30,000 to $50,000 per annum.

It is also provided that, in view of the increased amount of work placed on the shoulders of the members of the board, the board be enlarged from three to five members.

Provision is also made for the exemption of the grants which accompany certain decorations such as the Victoria cross and the distinguished conduct medal. These grants, as hon. members know, amount in the case of the Victoria cross to approximately $50 per annum, and a somewhat lesser amount accompanies the distinguished conduct medal. There was no legislation providing for an exemption in respect of these amounts, and it is now provided that there shall be.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): I have no wish at this stage to start a debate on this resolution, particularly since the government, like St. Paul on the road to Damascus, has apparently now seen a great light and is adopting a suggestion that we have pressed earnestly upon it during the last two sessions. However, I should like to have a more complete report from the minister. He has referred to five thousand of the fifteen thousand unemployed veterans who served in a theatre of actual war, but he has said nothing about the other ten thousand who are fit and whose plight was very fully dealt with in the report of the veterans' assistance commission. The recommendation was made that they should be paid a provisional economic allowance. On February 15, I asked the minister a question—which appears at page 493 of Hansard and is as follows:

Mr. Green: If the minister is not prepared to make a statement to-night with regard to the recommendations of the veterans' assistance commission, how soon will he be ready to make that statement?

Mr. Power: As I have already stated, within a week or ten days.

That was the answer the minister made then, and he has had twice that length of time in which to make the statement. Can he now tell us what is to be done about the other recommendations of the veterans' assistance commission?

Mr. POWER: I do not know that I am under any obligation to make such a statement on this resolution leading to the introduction of a bill, because we are fully implementing and more than implementing one recommendation. I do not think there is any reason why we should be called upon to deal with fifteen or twenty recommendations, some of which have no relation to this bill.

Mr. GREEN: Perhaps the minister could deal with the recommendation with respect to the provisional economic allowance. That is the main recommendation in the report, and if he will deal with that alone I think that we shall be satisfied.

Mr. POWER: To some extent I am dealing with the provisional economic allowance. The commission recommended, in one part at least, that a great many of these men—five thousand of them who are going to be covered by the war veterans' allowance—should receive a provisional economic allowance amounting to $18.75 per month for single men and $30 for married men. This bill will give $20 to the single men and $40 to the married men, so that in that respect it is more generous than the recommendation made by the veterans' assistance commission. I have no objection to laying down principles in so far as this bill is concerned. This bill will not deal with the one hundred per cent fit man. Most hon. gentlemen will agree with me in considering that the one hundred per cent fit man is not the responsibility of the federal government. If he is out of work at the present time it is due to economic causes and not to war causes. If a man is absolutely fit to work it is extremely difficult to attribute his unemployability to his war service. But it is intended by this bill to cover everybody who can in any way attribute his present unemployability to the war, who is suffering from a disability which may be intangible, who, in other words, is possibly washed up, burnt out, who has not been able to obtain employment for the last few years. That man will come under the provisions of the bill. If, however, a man is absolutely fit and can take a job if one is offered him, he is not considered to be a responsibility of the government under the War Veterans' Allowance Act.

Mr. NEILL: Is there to be an age limit?

Mr. POWER: None whatever.

Mr. GREEN: Are we to take it from what the minister has said that the government is against the finding of the commission as set out at page 63 of the report in the following words:

. . . the commission has come to the conclusion that it can do no less than recommend that the dominion government accept responsibility for all indigent unemployed veterans who were domiciled in Canada at the date of enlistment and who saw service in a theatre of actual war.

Mr. POWER: The government is accepting responsibility for the fit man by endeavouring to find employment for him. As a matter of fact through the instrumentality of the veterans' assistance commission during the past year it has accomplished the following:

Employment—

Permanent placements	2,210
Temporary placements	4,784
Casual placements	4,329
Total	11,323

Probational Training—

Commencements		598
Discontinued	79
Employed as trained	263
Employed otherwise	10
Tourists' guides	45
Not retained by employer	40
Still on training	161
Total		598

Corps of Commissionaires—

The appointment of a board of governors in Montreal led to the appointment of boards of governors and divisions of the corps in leading centres throughout the dominion.

Actually since the corps was organized last year 48 commissionaires have been permanently placed and 67 have secured temporary employment. This is exclusive of the excellent divisions which have been functioning in Vancouver and Toronto for some years.

Projects and Schemes—

Montreal.

The workshop gives employment to 80 men at present and since it was started in February, 1937, 329 have been reconditioned in that workshop for permanent placement in other industries.

Toronto.

Fourteen veterans and their families were established on experimental small holdings last year and the venture gives the committee every encouragement of success.

A grant was made to "Poppy Fund Incorporated" to assist towards the purchase of new premises.

This factory at present employs 83 veterans.

Windsor.

Twenty veterans and their families are being settled on an experimental small holdings project and of these six are now settled on the property.

Winnipeg.

Twelve veterans and their families have been established on experimental individual small holdings.

Regina.

A workshop was started on the 1st September, 1937, and so far has operated very successfully.

Moose Jaw.

A small grant was made to the committee to assist towards the operation of a workshop which has been operated for a few years with a fair degree of success, but lacked the necessary funds.

Vancouver.

Grants have been made to assist towards schemes which have for their objective the principle of becoming self-supporting and to give employment to a number of veterans. These schemes are:

(1) Veterans' auto parking and protective corps.
(2) Residential night patrols.
(3) Veterans' industrial first aid.
(4) Parking spaces and auto service.

In connection with the amputations placement service, a small grant was made to a subcommittee for the purpose, and the honorary local committees, who have done a great deal of good work during the past year, are being continued in office. It is proposed that they be continued during the next year.

Mr. GREEN: I have no wish to reflect upon the work done by the honorary committees, but I take it from what the minister has said that the government has no intention of adopting the suggestion that there should be a provisional economic allowance.

Mr. POWER: Certainly not under this legislation.

Mr. GREEN: Is it proposed to act on the recommendation during this session, to bring in legislation to carry out the report of the commission?

Mr. POWER: That can be more fully discussed under the item in the estimates providing for unemployment assistance. At the present moment we are dealing with a certain class of veterans under the legislation which we now propose.

Mr. GREEN: The minister said clearly the other day that he would tell us the stand of the government with regard to this report of the veterans' assistance commission, and we ask to-day that he at least make a statement with respect to this one point, whether or not there will be a provisional economic allowance.

Mr. POWER: I said that I would introduce a bill and a bill is being introduced.

Mr. GREEN: Are there more bills coming up?

Mr. POWER: I wonder whether the hon. gentleman likes the resolution or not? Does he object to it? If he does not, perhaps he will let me get on with it so as to disclose fully the provisions of the bill. We shall have ample time to discuss any extraneous matter during the session.

Mr. GREEN: The minister will not say whether or not the government will bring in a bill to provide for a provisional economic allowance?

Mr. POWER: Under this legislation no man who is one hundred per cent fit will be looked after. I cannot make it any plainer than that. All those who are partially fit or unfit will be looked after under the provisions of this legislation, but if a man is one hundred per cent fit he will not be looked after.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I think if there is one resolution of all those introduced this session or in past sessions on which we could compliment the minister, it is the resolution now before us. To my mind this legislation proposes to deal with just that class of men who have been neglected and who could not be brought within the four corners of the Pension Act. This will give the war veterans' allowance board a chance to deal with hundreds of cases of men completely disabled, men who find it impossible to get assistance because they cannot prove to the satisfaction of the commission that their disabilities are due to war service. I know the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) will approve of this measure also. He has always been very fair in matters of this kind, and I do not believe the little thrust he made at this government, when he said that at last it had seen the light, was really worthy of him.

Mr. GREEN: It sees the light so seldom that I had to remark on the fact.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I think in all fairness it should be said that all governments regardless of which party has been in power, have endeavoured to do the very best they could for the returned men, having regard to the financial situation and their ability to deal with the question, and I believe this proposed legislation will measure up to all our expectations in this regard.

Mr. PELLETIER: I desire to congratulate the minister on bringing in this resolution, and I agree with the legislation as far as it goes. I understand that this is not the time to debate these questions at length, but since the bill will be based upon this resolution I think the minister might very well give us a little more explanation in order that we may be able to discuss the bill intelligently when it is brought in.

For example, it is stated that the new bill proposes to include certain veterans of the South African war. For one thing I should like the minister to explain what he means by "certain veterans." I should like an explanation of the word "certain." In the second place. I see that pretty well all those suffering from war disabilities are going to be looked after, but I see absolutely no mention of ex-prisoners of war. I thought perhaps the minister might make it clear whether it is the intention that veterans of that class shall be dealt with under this legislation.

Mr. MULOCK: We could discuss this bill more intelligently if we saw what it looked like. The minister has explained the purposes of the bill, and we can discuss its provisions when it is laid before us. We should give the minister an opportunity to introduce it, and in that way we might save time.

Mr. PELLETIER: I should like to have an answer to the question I asked. What does the minister mean by the word "certain?"

Mr. POWER: The moment this resolution passes I intend to ask for permission to introduce the bill, and it will be distributed. If my hon. friend will possess his soul in patience for another ten minutes we can get the bill introduced.

[Mr. A. E. McLean.]

Mr. TUSTIN: This resolution refers to the War Veterans' Allowance Act, and provides that veterans of the South African war may be looked after as well. But I do not see anything in the resolution with reference to nursing sisters. I should like to ask the minister whether nursing sisters are covered.

Mr. POWER: They will be included.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): There is a small class, not very numerous, that I think might be worthy of a little consideration. Men who did not serve in an actual theatre of war are not included under this measure, and I think that is quite correct. They did not suffer in the same way as the others did, but a number of nursing sisters who worked hard and perhaps had to bear a certain amount of risk are perhaps as deserving as those who actually served in a theatre of war. The only difference is that patients were brought to them; they did not go to the patients. Could the minister give a little consideration to this small class of very needy and very deserving veterans of the great war?

Mr. QUELCH: I am very much in favour of the general principle of this resolution, but I realize that from the point of view of the veterans the success of this measure is going to depend in large measure upon the sympathetic consideration that is given the applications by the war veterans' allowance board. I think we can safely say that in the past we have received fairly sympathetic consideration from that board, and if the same treatment is accorded in the future we can have every reason to believe that the bill will reach its objective. I wonder if the minister could tell me how many applications were made under the new class; that is, those over fifty-five years of age? How many applications were refused and how many were granted?

Mr. POWER: I have not that information at the moment, but I shall be glad to give it when the bill is in committee. Roughly speaking, however, I can say that about fifty per cent of the applications made for war veterans' allowances are granted, and I quite agree with my hon. friend that it throws a heavy burden on the discretion of the board.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Power thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 35, to amend the War Veterans' Allowance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Suppression of local electrical interferences, $205,478.

Mr. NEILL: I should like to ask the minister a question which I think I brought up last year, or when he had some bill before the house. There is a feeling that the inspectors do not have sufficient—in fact I do not think they have any—mandatory power in correcting local disturbances. A man has some kind of electrical machine which is a perfect curse to the whole community. The inspectors, who are very competent men, go around and find that out. They approach the man about whom the complaint has been made and suggest that a change be made, at perhaps small cost. If these changes are made—and in most cases they are, because people are fundamentally decent—it is all right; but there is the odd case of the man who will not do it. I suggested last year and again suggest that it would be advisable to clothe these inspectors with power to compel people in default to do as they are told, or to have them fined.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): When the act of 1936 was passed we took almost unlimited power. If we found there was interference with broadcasting in Ottawa, we could even go so far as to close down the Ottawa Electric Railway Company. I cannot say whether the mandatory powers are used as much as they should be. Of course we try to effect results without compulsion, but if compulsion is necessary we have ample power to shut down any machine which causes radio broadcasting difficulties.

Mr. NEILL: Has the minister any record of prosecutions, or action of that kind, during the last year?

Mr. HOWE: We have not taken action under that section of the act.

Mr. NEILL: But I suppose you can use it as a threat?

Mr. HOWE: We are doing that constantly.

Mr. PELLETIER: I notice there is an increase of $11,972, in the vote. I imagine that that increase is necessary because of the development of radio in Canada, and because more inspectors and administrators are required. On the other hand I believe a useful purpose would be served if the minister would tell the committee exactly to what individual one should go to request the suppression of local electrical interference. With whom must a person get in touch, and how is one to follow up his complaint in order to see that the suppression is carried out? I ask the question because a number of people in the smaller towns do not know what to do about the electrical interference affecting their towns. Many of them are not aware what steps should be taken, to whom they should address their correspondence, or how far they can go towards having improvements made.

Mr. HOWE: There are fifty-two officers engaged from coast to coast in Canada in that kind of work. A letter addressed to the radio branch of the Department of Transport in any of the principal cities, or one addressed to the radio branch of the Department of Transport at Ottawa, or to myself—many people write me about it—would have the desired results. When I receive a communication of the kind I forward it to the inspector, who traces down the complaint as rapidly as his work will permit. I have found out that our service is fairly prompt. Usually when a complaint is made the local interference branch can effect an immediate improvement.

Mr. PELLETIER: Is any cost involved in a request for assistance from the department?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. HEAPS: Will matters pertaining to radio broadcasting come under the review of the committee which has been appointed?

Mr. HOWE: I presume the matter under discussion could be included in the work of the committee, because interference is closely connected with broadcasting.

Mr. HEAPS: Members of the special committee would have a much better opportunity for discussion, if one is afforded, in the committee than they can have in committee of the whole. If the administration of the department is under examination, officials can appear and tell what is being done in practically every broadcasting activity.

Mr. HOWE: We shall be pleased to have officials present to discuss radio interference. Perhaps I should make a statement with respect to interference. It may be known to hon. members that there is a cycle of sun spots, an eleven-year cycle, and this year the cycle is in its worst phase so far as radio interference is concerned. Last year it was very bad, but this year it is at its worst. The consoling thought is that next year we shall advance towards an improvement, and as a result the interference will be less than it is at the present time. We are trying to keep man-made noise down to a certain level. Below that level there is always noise which is received on the radio receiver provided that the receiver is turned on sufficiently. With poor reception, due to the present condition of sun spots, it is often necessary to increase the volume considerably in order to get a distant station; when that is done a level of noise is broken into which we cannot and do not attempt to control, and the result is very poor reception. I mention these points because a great many people are saying, and with reason, that reception this year is worse than it has been. That is the position so far as the suppression of noise and interference is concerned. I believe we are carrying out our work to a proper degree, but the fact that reception is poor arises out of a condition which is somewhat worse than we have had in the past few years.

Mr. MacNEIL: What facilities exist in Vancouver to deal with interference resulting from electrical appliances? How many officials are appointed to do the work, and how far do their districts extend?

Mr. HOWE: Our Vancouver office covers the whole of British Columbia. At that point there are two interference cars, and a staff of four. The cars are equipped with the latest equipment for tracing interference, and are kept very busy in the area.

Mr. MITCHELL: Which of the fifty-two offices mentioned by the minister is located near Medicine Hat, Alberta?

Mr. HOWE: There are officers at Moose Jaw and two at Calgary.

Mr. MITCHELL: People in Medicine Hat are experiencing considerable difficulty through interference. At that point the radio corporation retains a man who, if my memory serves me correctly, receives something like $15 a month. He gives all his ordinary time to his own work, and trouble-finding is only an out-of-hours occupation for him. I believe he also sells licences. The results are very unsatisfactory. We rarely see a trouble car in the vicinity. There is no place to which we can phone to get assistance, and the people in the locality feel that adequate attention is not being given to the matter and that they are not getting proper value for the licence fees they pay. What can we expect in the future?

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HOWE: May I correct my former statement by stating that, as indicated by the hon. member, we do have a part-time man stationed at Medicine Hat. He does what he can to trace interference, and when the difficulty is beyond his capability he calls in a trouble car. This service has no connection with radio licence fees. It is paid for by a vote of parliament, whereas the licence fees go to pay for the broadcasts. I shall be glad to look into the situation at Medicine Hat and see if some improvement cannot be made.

Mr. MITCHELL: If the man was paid enough by the government to make it worth his while to spend all his time on that work, there is plenty there to keep him busy.

Mr. MacNEIL: I should like to urge upon the minister an extension of the service to the suburban areas around the city of Vancouver. I refer particularly to West Vancouver, North Vancouver and North Burnaby. I have received numerous complaints from people who say that there is serious radio interference from defective electrical appliances, so much so that at times it is impossible to get the local stations. They say that this matter has been reported to the local departmental officials. A car was sent into the district but it was not possible to have it remain a sufficient length of time to trace down the source of trouble. The officials informed those who are in correspondence with me that they are so under-staffed and their facilities so meagre that they are unable to deal effectively with the trouble. Many of these people live adjacent to industrial plants and other institutions, and they feel that a check-up should be made of possible defective electrical appliances. Will it be possible with the increase in this vote to extend the service into the suburban areas around the city of Vancouver?

Mr. HOWE: We appreciate that another radio car is needed in British Columbia and we shall endeavour to provide it before next summer.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What are the duties of the temporary assistants?

Mr. HOWE: A portion of those employed in the government service are temporaries. So far as radio cars are concerned, the civil service commission has ruled that the drivers shall be considered as temporary employees. They are all engaged in this work and there is really no difference between the temporary and the permanent employees.

Mr. MARSH: I should like to hark back to what the minister said a moment ago about the effect of sun spots upon radio reception. If research along these lines has been started, I would suggest that it be continued; if it has not been started, it should be instituted as soon as possible. If we are going to wait for the sun to stop having spots we may have to wait quite a little while. The cycle of maximum sun spots is eleven and one-third years, but the maximum is not reached in any one year. The years 1935, 1936 and 1937 saw increasing sun spot disturbances, and it is claimed that the peak will be reached during this year. The years that follow, 1939, 1940 and 1941, will show these spots on the down grade, but there will still be an appreciable number of sun spots visible, and therefore plenty of radio and magnetic disturbance. This will be so if the research work carried on for the last fifty years by astronomers is correct, and I think it is. Research work is being carried on in the United States and in Europe, but I think something should be done here in its relationship to radio reception. While Joshua commanded the sun to stand still, I do not know whether the Minister of Transport with all his fine ability can prevail upon it successfully to stop having sun spots. In any case, this is a problem that will have to be met.

Mr. HOWE: We have tackled the problem in another way. Sun spots interfere only with long distance reception and we are bringing in such excellent local programs over the CBC that all necessary entertainment can be obtained from the local station.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Last summer two petitions were presented to me in connection with radio interference, and I went into Calgary to see the radio man, I believe his name is Mr. Ainsley. He received me courteously and sent a trouble man to my district on three different occasions. This man, whose name was Mr. Stunden, was a very fine fellow. We went around and we found twenty-two electrical appliances that were faulty; they did not have the necessary filter condensers to overcome radio interference. The owners of these appliances were informed that they were causing radio interference and were asked to have them fixed. This man told me how in another town he had asked a man to fix up some electrical apparatus and he replied that he would not do it. That was all there was to it. He told me he would return to my town in a couple of weeks to see what had been done. When he returned we went around and we found that only one out of the twenty-two had decided to put in a condenser; the others had made no attempt whatever to get rid of the radio interference. He then told me that they had no power whatever to make anyone correct an apparatus or appliance which might be causing interference, and asked me to put before the department the conditions under which they were working. I do not think these men should have to make more than one trip. I was informed that at times they have to make as many as three trips in an effort to have interference eliminated. People who are causing interference should be informed and then if it is not eliminated, something should be done. These officials should be able to apply some sort of force.

Mr. HOWE: We are a very patient department, but sometimes our patience may be exhausted. We may drop in and fine these people. If we do I hope the hon. member will not come around to get the fines remitted.

Mr. TUSTIN: Would these fifteen inspectors include district inspectors?

Mr. HOWE: The men listed here are engaged in this particular service. There is a district service under the Radiotelegraph Act.

Mr. TUSTIN: Are the district inspectors qualified to clear up electrical interference?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. TUSTIN: I have always found the inspectors very courteous and more than anxious to do their work, but it seems to me that they have too much work to do. My constituents have advised me that it has taken from six weeks to three months to have an inspector come around to make an inspection. Once the inspector arrived on the job he was able to clear up a large amount of interference. It would seem that these inspectors have too much territory to cover or too much work to do when six weeks to three months elapse before a complaint can be attended to.

Mr. HOWE: All services in the department are practically the same. If we could double the vote we could get better results, but we have to balance a reasonable expenditure with the results obtainable. We know that our staff works quite hard, but we think we are achieving a measure of success.

Mr. TUSTIN: Then the minister will admit that the department is understaffed so far as inspectors are concerned.

Mr. HANSON: Do the inspectors stationed in Vancouver to look after British Columbia have to make special trips? I think the inspector comes to my constituency once a year, sometimes perhaps twice a year. Several complaints have been received, and resolutions have been adopted by boards of trade, and so on, asking that an inspector should visit the district four times a year. As in the case of the hon. member who preceded me, probably the territory is too big; it needs another inspector. In an outlying district inspection once a year is not sufficient. There is no checking up; probably no one but the inspector could check it, and as he comes only once a year radio reception is bound to be poor. If an inspector came four times a year throughout northern British Columbia, I think the people would be satisfied. I would ask the minister to look into the matter and advise me whether there is any set time that the inspector should be there.

Mr. HOWE: Whenever we can extract $6,000 more from the exchequer, we intend to put another inspector in British Columbia. We admit at once that our four men there cannot cover the territory as frequently as they should. When we get additional funds, that is where we intend to spend it first.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does this particular vote cover the work done by the inspectors in regard to blanketing by the new Canadian Broadcasting Corporation station at Hornby, Ontario, which has had considerable effect on reception sets in the county of Peel?

Mr. HOWE: The situation in the county of Peel is being taken care of by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It is a special situation that they have created. They have installed some five hundred wave traps which, I think, are making some improvement.

Mr. LAWSON: Rather than deal with this question from the point of view of some particular municipality, I should like to deal with it more in its national aspect. I observe on page 214 of the estimates the details of this item. Apparently for all Canada we have four radio electricians, twenty-three junior radio electricians; then I see we have eleven radio inspectors and three junior radio inspectors. Assuming that one who owns a radio receiving set makes complaint to the department's branch in his municipality as to interference or static or noise on his set, which one of these gentlemen whose classifications I have named responds to such a call and deals with the matter of obliterating that interference?

[Mr. Tustin.]

Mr. HOWE: It might be any one of them. They are highly trained men in that narrow groove. The junior radio electrician is a civil service classification that has to do with the man's salary rather than his ability to trace these noises. It is a fairly narrow specialty, and I think any one of those men would be fully competent to deal with such a matter.

Mr. LAWSON: Then I observe that there are twenty-three junior radio electricians, four radio electricians, eleven radio inspectors and three junior radio inspectors, making altogether forty-one. May I assume that there are forty-one men in the whole Dominion of Canada engaged in the business of trying to obliterate interference on private radio receiving sets?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct, yes.

Mr. LAWSON: Then I would suggest that that is by no means an adequate staff to deal with the trouble. Let me give one instance which is illustrative of many. We have in the city of Toronto a fairly good residential district known as Moore Park. A gentleman who resides in that district had a collector of radio licence fees come around to his house about three months ago wanting to collect a radio licence fee. The resident refused to pay on the ground that he had not used his set in six months and could not use it because of interference. The collector, being a rational man, said that seemed a reasonable ground why this gentleman should not pay, and he said, "I will report this at once to the department in Toronto; some one will come here and correct that for you in a few days, and afterwards I shall be back to collect the licence fee." Nothing having happened for two months and seven days, to be exact, the resident in question called up the department in Toronto to know what was being done about his complaint, or whether the complaint had been received. After they had kept him waiting on the telephone for five minutes while they looked it up, a gentleman came back on the telephone and said that the collector of licence fees had been very faithful; that he had put in the complaint; but, he said, "My dear man, we still have 3,546 complaints ahead of yours to look into."

Seriously I do not think such a situation should be allowed to prevail, particularly in view of the fact that although we may be going to increase the price of the radio licence, not one cent of that increase is going to be used to improve reception on people's receiving sets, but is going to a corporation which is not subject to the control of this parliament and about which we can obtain no information through this parliament. I suggest to the minister that he should seriously consider increasing the number of inspectors, even though the cost must come out of the public treasury of this country; or that if he is going to increase radio licence fees, at least he divert that increase towards seeing that people get better reception, instead of handing the money over to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Issue of radio receiving licences (Transport department only), $113,420.

Mr. LAWSON: Although the stoical attitude of the minister with respect to the difficulties of the public may be conducive to avoiding further discussion, I should like to ask the minister some questions respecting this item. In reply to a question which I asked in the house a few days ago I received the information that during the calendar year 1937 the total amount of money received by the department from the collection of radio licence fees, after the deduction of commissions to collectors or whatever they may be, amounted to $1,925,014.16 net. Then I find that including a part of that period, namely, from April 1, 1937, to March 2, 1938, the department paid over to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation $1,870,000, or $55,014.61 less than they had collected. I would ask whether any percentage of the net amount received from the collections is deducted from the payments to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, if so, what percentage, or is the corporation merely granted amounts from time to time without relation to the sum collected?

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend framed his question on the order paper in a way that did not give an exact indication of what he was trying to get at.

Mr. LAWSON: If the minister will permit, I deliberately framed my question so that I might be given either the calendar year or the fiscal year, because I did not know which way the department kept the statistics.

Mr. HOWE: Only in the third question.

Mr. LAWSON: But they answered by giving the fiscal year as against the calendar year.

Mr. HOWE: As I remember, the third question was framed to cover either the fiscal year or the calendar year.

Mr. LAWSON: Right. I left the choice to you.

Mr. HOWE: We have nothing to conceal in that particular. I should like to make the matter as clear as I can. The funds are collected on behalf of the broadcasting corporation by the Department of Transport. The corporation is a self-contained body, over which the Department of Transport has absolutely no control. As minister my only relation to the corporation is that if the government wishes to communicate with it, I am the channel through which that communication is made, and if the broadcasting corporation wishes to communicate with the government, it does so through myself. Parliament set up a body, in the form of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, independent of the government. I have, however, one check on the corporation; that is I can take my own time in paying over the money we collect, and I exercise that power to make sure that the corporation lives within its means. Each month the corporation submits to me a budget for its requirements, and on the basis of that budget, which we check, we pay over the funds as we collect them from the broadcasting receiving licences. We do not always pay over the whole amount immediately; in fact, last year we did not pay over all the fees we collected, for the reason, I believe, that the broadcasting corporation had certain outstanding accounts which were in dispute and which they were not prepared to release within the year. However, all the funds we collect are earmarked for the broadcasting corporation, and some time at or about the end of the fiscal year they have been paid all the expenses of that year.

Mr. LAWSON: In full?

Mr. HOWE: Less the cost of collection. That cost divides itself into two parts. In the first place we pay commissions to collectors, a maximum of twenty-five cents and a minimum of five cents per licence. Perhaps I can give my hon. friend some information—

Mr. LAWSON: No; I am interested only in what the department receives net, and as against that, in the calendar year, how much the department pays to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. HOWE: Commissions to collectors average about sixteen cents per licence. In addition to that there is the head office expense of the branch which does this collecting. Last year it was about $103,000; this year it will be $113,420. That also is deducted from the amount we pay over. In other words, we reimburse ourselves in full for the amount shown here as the cost of collection at head office. The result is that our total cost amounts to about sixteen cents plus ten cents per licence for administration; we pay over the full amount received for the licence less this twenty-six cents, which is a lower licence collection cost than that of any country of which we have a record, excepting Great Britain, where I believe the amount used to be twenty-eight cents, but has now been reduced to about twenty-five cents.

An hon. MEMBER: They use the postal carriers.

Mr. HOWE: Of course they have a much more compact population to collect from, and it is not surprising that they are able to collect licence fees for slightly less than we can.

Mr. LAWSON: I am not concerned about the amount of commission which is paid; all I wish to get clear is that, as I now understand the situation, the department arbitrarily apportions its total overhead so as to allocate a portion of it to the collection of radio licences and then it pays over to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation the net amount received less that arbitrary allocation of cost of collection.

Mr. HOWE: I doubt very much if it is an "arbitrary" allocation of the cost of collection. There is a separate branch which does nothing but attend to this work. It will be understood that the head office machinery for handling over a million licences is considerable. Two notices are sent out each year to each licencee. This branch does nothing but collect these licence fees, and the cost of the branch is charged against these fees.

Mr. LAWSON: I am not objecting to what happens; I am only trying to get it clear.

Mr. HOWE: If the hon. member substitutes the word "actually" for the word "arbitrarily," we shall be in agreement.

Mr. LAWSON: I cannot substitute the word "actually," and I shall explain why I cannot do so. Suppose I ask the minister to tell me, of the list of employees under this item on page 215 of the estimates, who are exclusively engaged on the work of collection, and I only occupy the time of this committee and the minister's time in order to secure all that information; I suggest very strongly that this would not result in an aggregate of $113,000, because there must be a certain overhead, where, for example, a man devotes part of his time to this job and part to something else. I am not complaining about the department arbitrarily apportioning its overhead; I am merely trying to get the fact.

Mr. HOWE: Every man in this list spends his entire time in collecting licence fees. It is a twelve months' job.

Mr. LAWSON: Then would the minister give me a list of employees with their respective salaries who make up the $113,420 under this item?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. Would the hon. member like me to read that list? I have it here.

Mr. LAWSON: Frankly, if it will save any time, I am quite content that the minister shall put it on Hansard. I want the record, but I do not want to take up the time of the committee.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman, page 215 of the estimates gives the distribution of the employees. I can read the names in addition if they are required.

Mr. LAWSON: Oh, I am not interested in names. Excuse me a moment while I glance at page 215. May I take it that this list of employees set out on page 215 of the estimates represents the employees who are exclusively devoting their time to the collection of radio licences?

Mr. HOWE: Exclusively, yes.

Mr. LAWSON: Then I assume that I may take it that the actual cost of the collection of radio licences in this country for the fiscal year to commence April 1, 1938, is estimated to be $113,420, and that such amount will be deducted from the fees received for radio licences and the balance paid over to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

Mr. HOWE: Less, of course, the commissions paid to collectors, to postmasters. This, one might say, is the office overhead.

Mr. LAWSON: Will the commissions paid in addition to these amounts be deducted from the amount collected before it is paid over to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

Mr. HOWE: Those commissions are deducted from the amount before we receive it.

Mr. LAWSON: All right.

Mr. HOWE: The book is sold less the commission.

Mr. MARTIN: Is it not a fact that since the present set-up the cost of collection has been reduced as compared with the previous set-up?

Mr. HOWE: The cost of collection is decreasing slightly each year, as we sell more licences. It is now, I think, a shade under twenty-six cents; it was twenty-eight cents a year or two ago.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): I notice that under printing and stationery there is an increase from $11,500 to $16,500. Could the minister explain that increase of $5,000?

Mr. HOWE: It is entirely due to the fact that there are more licences; there are more licences to print, that is more books of licences; there are more notices to be sent out. We send out notices twice a year to those who have not paid. Of course we are dealing in millions; a million pieces of paper are required each time we do any of these things.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Yes, but the amount is increased one hundred per cent. It was $11,500 the year before and now it is $16,500.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): A hundred per cent?

Mr. HOWE: Five thousand dollars is not a hundred per cent of $11,500; it is more like thirty-three and a third per cent.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Well, almost fifty per cent.

Mr. LAWSON: I should like to have a specific statement from the minister in respect of the following matter. The amount of the licence fee is fixed, as I understand the matter, by order in council, under the Radiotelegraph Act, so that the increase in fee which has been prescribed for the forthcoming year has been fixed by the government by order in council under that act. Will any portion of that increase be expended for the purpose of obliterating interference with private radio receiving sets, or will the whole amount, less cost of collection, be paid to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

Mr. HOWE: Under the broadcasting act we must pay to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation all licence fees collected less cost of collection. I do not know that they use any part of their funds for the removal of interference, but in any event we cannot do so under the present act.

Mr. LAWSON: Then I may take it that no portion of this increase will be spent for the purpose of obliterating interference. Does the minister agree with me that there will be paid, however, out of the consolidated revenue fund, which is raised by general taxation upon the Canadian people, the sum of $205,478, as shown by item No. 396, for the obliteration of interference?

Mr. HOWE: That is a correct statement. Under the act passed in 1936 that arrangement is compulsory.

Mr. HEAPS: We are spending more than $200,000 a year out of government revenue in connection with radio interference. What is the United States government spending for the same purpose?

Mr. HOWE: We have not the figures.

Mr. HEAPS: Would it be possible to get them and put them on the record? Conditions in the two countries may be similar so far as radio interference is concerned, but the conditions under which radio operates are entirely different. I believe the United States government is spending large sums for the purpose of obliterating radio interference. I wonder if the minister could get information in regard to the United States. It would be worth having.

Mr. HOWE: I shall try to get it.

Mr. PELLETIER: At the same time the minister might try to find out what percentage goes towards collecting radio licence fees in the United States.

Mr. HOWE: There are no licences there.

Mr. NEILL: I wish to suggest an improvement in the collection of licence fees. Under the present system licences are on sale at post offices—I am thinking more in terms of country post offices—and in the stores of those who deal in radios. The percentage which the postmaster gets is very small and, with his own duties to attend to, he does not bother to push the sale. The department became aware of that fact and they decided that, instead of putting on a large police force to prosecute those who did not procure their licences, they would put the collection on a percentage basis, getting people to go and hunt up radio owners who had not obtained licences. The idea was a good one. They paid a larger commission, and the system would have worked all right but for the fact that these collectors who are appointed by the government from time to time—political appointments, I suppose—do not find it worth while, so that you can hardly get anyone to take the job. The man who is doing it on commission is naturally keen to push sales and he goes around to radio owners. He goes to one man and tries to sell him a licence and is informed that it has already been got at the post office. The fact is that those who are willing to get their licences go to the post office of their own accord, and only those who have to be reminded, those who have to be dunned a few times by the collector, are left to these commission men.

I do not think the post offices would mind if the sale of licences were taken from them because there is very little in it for the postmaster. The man on commission goes to a radio owner who says he will see about the matter. The collector goes away, and in the meantime the radio owner, having been reminded, goes around to the post office and gets the licence, the result being that the post office gets the sale after the groundwork has been done by the man on commission. Obviously, under these circumstances, it is hardly possible to get anyone to take on this commission work. It is necessary that there should be such collections; otherwise people will simply not get their licences, and you could not put on a force large enough to prosecute them, the amounts being so small. I suggest that one man be put on the job on the first of April, or whatever time is thought best, and that he be allowed to push the thing right through for the year. But it should be given to him alone. I suggest that it be taken from the post offices and stores and given to one man who will understand that he will get all there is in it; that he will get the cream of the business as well as the business among those who are reluctant to buy licences. I know of one man who has called on a radio owner five times, the net result to him being twenty cents. That does not pay. If you want the work well done, you must give it to one man only.

Mr. HOWE: We have considered very carefully the method of collection. The fundamental fact that we must keep in mind is that not too large a proportion of the $2 shall go towards the cost of collection. The licence fee is a compulsory payment; we compel people to pay it, and if they do not, they are breaking the law. There is no particular day on which anyone must pay, and if payment is compulsory there must be some convenient place where people can go and get their licences. We did think seriously of eliminating the post offices and putting the business into the hands of collectors, but the same difficulty would apply there. The collector, in rural constituencies particularly, would have a large area to cover and would be required to call at least once upon every radio owner, and the housewife might not find it convenient to pay on the particular day on which he called. Whether she would mail the fee to the collector, we are not sure. I think it is fundamental that we should give people an opportunity to pay their licence fees reasonably at their convenience. As a matter of fact, we allow six months before exerting pressure.

I have great respect for my hon. friend's judgment, and if he believes that the scheme he suggests would work well in his own constituency, we are willing to try it there. I have made that offer to one or two members of constituencies where we know we are not collecting the proper portion of fees. If my hon. friend will call on the radio department, we shall be glad to work out a scheme for his riding.

Mr. MacINNIS: Has it been definitely decided to increase the licence from $2 to $2.50?

Mr. HOWE: An order in council has been issued to that effect.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have received, as no doubt most other hon. members have, a great many complaints against the increase. Can the minister tell us what the licence holder will get either in better programs or in reception for the additional fifty cents? I do not wish to waste my time or the time of others in replying to letters in this regard if there is some possible answer to justify the increase. If the minister can tell us—

Mr. HAMILTON: More will get reception, who do not get it now.

Mr. MacINNIS: —what value they are going to get for the increase of fifty cents, I have no doubt they will be satisfied to pay it.

Mr. HOWE: On each vote we are told that if we had more money to spend we could do a better job. It is the same here. If we had another hundred thousand dollars to pay for suppressing radio interference, we would be able to suppress more of it. The additional revenue is to be used in two directions. One is to increase broadcast coverage where at the moment coverage is very poor, and the other is to improve programs. As I said some days ago, in speaking during the debate on the address, tastes in programs differ. Whether my hon. friend will think we have improved the programs, I cannot say. Whether anyone else will think so, I cannot say, but we are going to spend more money on programs with the hope that we shall better satisfy listeners with Canadian built programs. As I say, this is an intangible matter, and my hon. friend and I could debate for a long time whether one program was better or worse than another, probably without settling the argument. But that is what the additional revenue will be spent for; part will go to increase coverage, particularly in the maritime provinces and on the prairies, and part of the money will be spent in building better programs.

Mr. HEAPS: How much extra revenue does the minister expect to receive from the increased fee?

Mr. HOWE: We estimate the additional revenue at $650,000.

Mr. TOMLINSON: I have had several complaints in the county of Bruce as to the method of collecting this tax or licence. Last fall I believe inspectors dropped in and laid about forty-two summonses. I am quite in favour of the act being enforced, but I believe the method is wrong in itself, especially in a rural community. I should like to make a very humble suggestion, which I think, if adopted, would work for the benefit of the department and of the people themselves. Although you instruct your collectors to make personal calls and notify the people that they must pay, that has not been done. I made particular inquiry to find that out. So, although they receive their notices, they allow the matter to slide from day to day.

I would suggest that the minister give consideration to appointing the assessor as the collector of radio licence fees. The assessor, who goes around in the spring of the year, must visit every home. That is his duty, though he has other duties as well. While he is obtaining his information as to the number in the family, and so on, he might also ascertain if they had one radio or two, and then make his personal demand for the licence fee, explaining at the same time that if they do not pay within a certain time he would notify the proper authorities and they would be liable to be summonsed.

Mr. HOWE: I appreciate the suggestion, and we are looking into the possibilities of doing something of that kind. It is quite possible that something may be done along those lines, but there again we find that an arrangement which would work out well in certain ridings would not work so well in others, depending upon the duties of the county assessors.

The suggestion of my hon. friend that the inspector drop around in the fall and then summons people out of a clear sky, will hardly bear analysis. I have had a good many people say that to me, and in each case I have been able to give them the record of the person concerned. In almost every case whoever complained to me about an individual instance has gone away well satisfied that the person deserved to be prosecuted.

Mr. TOMLINSON: I should like to explain further that probably the greatest complaint is that when these inspectors do come around, they have a list of four, five or six houses. They walk in and ask if a person has a radio licence, and if they have none a summons is issued, because the department claim they have been notified previously. But those people realize that their next door neighbour, who has probably never bought a licence and who never pays a fee, is not summonsed. If this inspector drops in on them, they think he should drop into every home where the licence fee has not been paid.

Mr. TUSTIN: How many licences were issued last year, and how many does the minister estimate will be issued during the coming fiscal year?

Mr. HOWE: In 1936-1937 there were 1,038,000 licences sold. This year, to the end of January, there were 1,075,000.

Mr. TUSTIN: How much commission was paid to post offices and agents for issuing these licences?

Mr. HOWE: Where a salary is paid, the postmaster gets five cents per licence. Postmasters who work on commission receive fifteen cents per licence. The collector who is sent around gets twenty-five cents per licence.

Mr. TUSTIN: Has the minister the total amount that was paid?

Mr. HOWE: Of the licences issued, forty-one per cent were through post offices; thirty-seven per cent through house to house canvass, and eighteen per cent through radio dealers. Then 3,148 licences were issued free of charge to the blind. Whoever sells licences has a special book out of which he issues licences to blind persons.

Mr. TUSTIN: All I wanted was the total amount of commissions paid to agents and post offices.

Mr. HOWE: For 1,075,000 licences, $179,542.55 was paid. That is for the year 1937-38 to January 31.

Mr. TUSTIN: Then I take it that $103,709 was paid by the department for the collection of licences, and $179,542.55 was paid in commissions?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Mr. EDWARDS: Would the minister outline the procedure when the owner of a radio is taken to court for not paying his fees? He is notified twice, I understand. Does the department take part in the prosecution? I understand a summons, or some sort of certificate, is endorsed by the head of the department, or his deputy.

Mr. HOWE: After it has been decided to prosecute, the case is reviewed at head office. If it seems to be a case which should be prosecuted, I sign the authority, and the Department of Transport attends to the prosecution.

Mr. EDWARDS: That was the point I wanted to have cleared up. I made inquiry at the police court of my home city, and that was the information I received. I had not known the situation prior to that time. I now understand that each case is reviewed.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. BETTS: I cannot applaud the suggestion that the assessor be given the job of collecting radio licence fees. They are already employed; in these hard times they have fairly good jobs. I believe this is a function which could be carried out admirably by returned soldiers. They are a particularly dependable class, and many of them are in great need. The Department of Pensions and National Health has set up a veterans' assistance commission, of which honorary committees have been set up in the larger centres to keep in touch with the returned men. They have lists of unemployed veterans, their qualifications and capabilities, and I would say that if the government really is desirous of ameliorating the situation of the returned man, as it contended it was during the last campaign, and since, this is a splendid opportunity for the Minister of Transport to cooperate with the Minister of Pensions and National Health, so that this work might be given to returned soldiers.

Mr. HOWE: I believe practically all collectors are returned soldiers. May I point out, however, that the work does not present a very encouraging outlook for a returned soldier, because there is not much pay connected with it. The fee is small, and no man could possibly make a living at the work. Collecting licence fees at twenty-five cents per licence is not a career. However, I believe that the veteran with a small pension is the man who is doing the work in Canada.

Mr. NEILL: I understood the minister to say that the order in council had gone through increasing the fee to $2.50. I am not going to kick at that, although it would no doubt be popular to do so. But we did get the new station at Vancouver, which has been of great benefit to us in British Columbia.

I should like to put in a strong plea on behalf of the people in the country districts—not the larger cities. It costs a great deal to run a radio with batteries. A thousand hour battery, which runs for only about eight hundred hours, costs about $25. It is quite different from the man in the town who connects his radio to an electrical plant, and scarcely notices the cost.

If a man can afford to pay for two radios, he should have two licences, just as he would if he had two automobiles. People who are remote from moving picture theatres and who do not live near a village or town, find that the radio is of great importance to them. One way to help them would be to give them consideration in the matter of the fee. If the minister increases the fee, and adds to it the already heavy tax imposed on the man who has to use batteries in his radio, he is making the cost prohibitive. If the minister cannot reduce the fee, I would ask that at least he would not raise it in respect of those who use batteries. This would be a sort of means test, because if a man has a battery set, it would mean either that he is a poor man in a town, and uses coal oil, or that he is in the country, where there is no electricity.

Mr. HOWE: The government is givng serious consideration to differentiating with respect to battery sets in areas where continuous current is not available. I believe there will be an announcement on that shortly.

Mr. HEAPS: I should like to refer to the increased revenue the department expects to receive from the additional fifty cents in licence fees. I believe the minister said he expected an increase of over $600,000 as a result of the added amount. May I suggest that he take a portion of that money, at least ten per cent of it, and use it in an attempt to do away with radio interference. As has been pointed out by the minister, the amount now spent in that connection is taken out of the consolidated revenue fund. I should think it would be only right and proper if the increased amount were used to improve radio reception.

Mr. MARTIN: No one who has followed the development of radio in Canada during the past year and a half can resist the conclusion that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has indeed done an excellent job. While the minister is not actually in charge of its operation, he is likewise deserving of sincere commendation.

But while this is so, I hope the minister will not think I am detracting from my views as to the usefulness of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or as to his own excellent administration, if I express strong disapproval of the increase in the radio licence fees. I believe I would not be adequately representing my constituency if I failed to do so.

I am hoping the minister's statement in answer to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, to the effect that the government is giving consideration to some aspects of the matter may bring about an extension in some particulars. My objection is raised not only because of the increased cost—although that will be burdensome to many, not merely to those with batteryless sets but to farmers in constituencies like my own, and other people in the cities—but because by passing the act of two years ago parliament has committed itself to belief in a publicly owned chain of radio facilities. I endorse that principle, and believe it is in the best interests of Canada.

If that is to be the accepted principle, then I think we should pay for it in a proper way so as not to depopularize the institution itself. I suggest, with the greatest respect, that not only the increase in licence fees, but the method of collecting these fees, will in the long run tend, not only to impose an additional burden on the people but, more particularly, to discredit an institution which has thus far so well justified itself. It is an institution which may be used as one of the most effective instruments in keeping together the various sectional interests of the country which, at the present time, present such a picture of disunity.

Mr. HAMILTON: In certain areas of Canada, including my own constituency, radio owners do not get any reception from C.B.C. stations. In the Sault Ste. Marie area we pay a substantial sum in radio licence fees, and I am quite sure we would pay it willingly if we were getting the reception I believe we should get. The fact is, however, that we are getting nothing whatever from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The local station is not connected with the network, and the powerful Toronto station, CBL, does not reach Sault Ste. Marie with any degree of dependability. As a result we are paying a substantial sum and getting nothing whatever in return from the broadcasting corporation.

If the radio fee is to be increased, then I think it is fair to ask that at least arrangements be made whereby all parts of Canada may get, as nearly as possible, equal coverage. In those areas where they are able to get the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the United States stations they will be getting something extra for the fifty cent increase; but as far as my constituency is concerned, the people will receive nothing extra for the extra fifty cents. The people there feel that they are being asked to pay $2.50 to give other sections of Canada good coverage, while they get nothing themselves. I agree with the suggestion that battery sets should receive special consideration.

Mr. HOWE: Both the department and the corporation are aware of the situation at Sault Ste. Marie, and the purpose of the application for additional revenue is to remedy the situation there as well as in other parts of the country.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I think the consensus of opinion throughout the country is that there should not be an increase in these licence fees. I understand that there was a surplus of $128,000 last year, although this figure may be subject to correction. We have a very good system set up under the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and I want to commend the minister for the improvement in the service. However, if I were to ask for the return of all correspondence against this increase, I am sure it would take a staff of stenographers two or three weeks to prepare it. If the administration wants to get more money, I see no objection to its obtaining increased revenue through charges against the United States stations, which desire to broadcast in Canada for advertising purposes, and I think that would be a more advantageous way to obtain additional revenue than to add an additional burden to people already hard pressed for money.

I am not speaking on behalf of those able to pay this fifty cent increase; I speak for those in the rural areas, particularly in the dried out areas, to whom fifty cents is a tremendous amount of money. The radio is the only means of entertainment that these people have, and I do not think the licence fee should be increased. It would seem that this increase is being passed on to Canadian people while publishers are going to have just that much more money to put in their pockets. I am against the principle of obtaining increased revenue from increased fees These revenues should come from the same source from which we are obtaining it now. If the radio corporation does as well next year as it did last year and still has $128,000 to work on, then there should be no kick.

I am of the opinion that considerable pressure has been brought to bear by the newspaper and magazine concerns. They feel they are losing a substantial amount of revenue because the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is permitting United States broadcasts over the Canadian system. I do not think this should be taken into consideration. The corporation was set up for the betterment of radio reception and to provide entertainment for the Canadian people, and I do not see where the publishers enter the picture at all. I am in favour of the licence fee being left at $2.

Mr. BETTS: What proportion of the collectors are returned men?

Mr. HOWE: We have no record at the moment, but I shall be glad to get it. I may say that we try to get returned men in every riding.

Mr. BETTS: When the minister states that these positions are held by returned men all over Canada, I believe he is stating something with which he is not familiar. I can tell him that in many places in western Ontario returned men are not doing the collecting, and they would be very glad to have this work. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. Tustin) informs me that in his riding the appointment was given not to a returned man but to a prominent Liberal ward heeler. I submit that in many cases these appointments are made for political reasons and no consideration at all is given to the returned men. The returned man is eminently suited for this work and he should have it. If the minister is willing to cooperate with the Minister of Pensions and National Health, I see no reason why all collecting should not be done by returned men.

Mr. LOCKHART: I quite agree with what has been said by the last speaker. A returned man in my constituency was discharged, but I do not desire to refer to that at the moment. I saw it stated in some magazine that there were from two and a half to two and three-quarter million radios in operation in Canada. I do not know whether the minister has knowledge of the approximate number that might be in operation, but I suggest to him that in some rural municipalities nearly seventy-five per cent of the people owning radios are not taking out licences. The number of radios in operation given by the minister is considerably lower than the estimate of the dealers.

Mr. HOWE: If the hon. member is interested in a particular constituency, I shall be glad to give him the figures. We have found the dealers' figures to be not altogether reliable. For instance, the publication Radio Trade Builder estimates that in 1937 there were 1,670,000 sets in Canada. I assume that estimate is based upon the number of sets manufactured and sold; but what formula was used to allow for discarded sets, I do not know. The only authentic figures available were those obtained in the census of 1931 which showed 770,436 sets in operation. In that year the Radio Trade Builder made an estimate of 967,800 sets, approximately 200,000 more than the estimate of the census enumerators. For the next fiscal year, 1932-33, the departmental figures showed 761,288 licences issued.

Hon. members and others make the statement that in certain localities fifty per cent of the radio owners are not buying licences, but the figures do not always check up. We believe we are getting about ninety per cent for all of Canada, the percentage being greater in the cities and smaller in the country districts. When hon. members come in and make such statements, I ask them what localities they are interested in. We look up the population of the particular locality and divide it by five to get the approximate number of houses. Then I ask my interviewer what he believes to be the number of licences issued based upon the number of houses in the locality and invariably I find that his guess is much below the actual number of licences issued. We know that in the country districts we do not get as high a proportion as in the cities, but the reason is obvious. With a maximum cost of twenty-five cents per licence, it is impossible to call on every house in the country and collect a fee at that house. If we spent a larger proportion of the fee for collecting, we could collect more, but we believe that the commission under no circumstances should go above twenty-five cents per licence.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Did the minister say that it was positively settled that the fee is to be increased by fifty cents? What about people who have several sets? The minister said that he had several sets in his own house. Does it mean that people have to pay $2.50 for each set they have, or pay fifty cents more for additional sets?

Mr. HOWE: The licence fee is $2.50 for each set.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): So if one has three sets, he would have to pay $7.50?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Does that apply also to a radio in a motor car?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. BETTS: Is it optional under present arrangements that postmasters have radio licences for sale, or is the postmaster obliged to have them?

Mr. HOWE: It is optional with the postmasters. They are paid for running the post office; we invite them to take on this other work, but they can refuse if they wish.

Mr. MULOCK: I fully realize the difficulty of the minister in administering this act, and I congratulate him upon the improvement that has been made in radio generally throughout the country. But I should not be expressing the feelings of the people of my riding if I did not say that the increase in the licence fee is, to say the least, not popular in the riding of North York. We realize also that there are many districts which have not received the same advantages from radio that Toronto and York and central Ontario have received. The people in our part of the country find it difficult to see what additional benefit they are going to receive by reason of the increase in this tax. Realizing as I do the difficulty that people in various parts of the country are having, as mentioned by the hon. member for Algoma West (Mr. Hamilton), and that they are not receiving any benefit at the present time from the broadcasting corporation, some consideration must certainly be given to those districts. Would it not be possible to do that without increasing the tax at the present time? Could this matter not be referred to the radio committee set up in the house, the personnel of which was announced to-day? People are having difficulty in paying their taxes, and if it is humanly possible I would ask the minister not to raise any tax at the present time.

Mr. HOWE: The matter can and no doubt will be discussed in the radio committee, and it does not take long to pass an order in council.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I was going to suggest, as a member of that radio committee, that a number of the matters being discussed to-day might be discussed there, and perhaps to better advantage, when we have the officials present who can answer questions directly. I hope the minister's statement that the fee is to be increased is not final. I think he has indicated that his decision might be changed. All along I have been very much in favour of nationalized radio, but I think this is a retrograde step. I would hope that the amount necessary to be raised could be raised in some other way than by increasing the licence fee, which means a heavy burden on a great many people in this country.

Mr. THORSON: May I ask the hon. member what other method he would suggest?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Several other methods might be suggested. One would be a tax on radio tubes. The price of tubes in this country is very high indeed, much higher than in the United States. I think it would be easily possible for the manufacturers of tubes to absorb the amount themselves. I should like to have that more fully discussed. If it is really necessary that the public generally should be taxed for this radio service, I would rather that it came out of general taxation as a subsidy than as an increased fee. The fee is a tax, and such a direct tax that the people know they are paying it.

Mr. DUNNING: A service charge.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: A service charge if you like, but all taxes are assumed to be for services rendered.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh no.

Mr. THORSON: Is it not better that the tax be direct than concealed?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, because the question of incidence of taxation arises. Generally speaking, I would agree that it was well to have taxes direct rather than indirect. In my judgment we are already taxing the poorer people of this country altogether too much. It is true the tax is usually concealed, usually indirect; the people do not realize it. The tariff is a tax, but concealed. We are taxing very heavily the common people of this country, and the wealthier people are escaping very lightly. If this public service is necessary to the welfare of Canada, as I think it is, and if we cannot carry it on with the charge that we have been making in the past, I suggest that it would be well for the dominion government to give a direct subsidy out of the general revenue.

Mr. DUNNING: In other words, that we abandon the principle for which my hon. friend has just been contending.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not see any abandonment of principle.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend has just been contending for the principle of direct taxation. He says we should not conceal taxes, because the poor are made to pay more. If we give a state subsidy for this purpose instead of making a service charge, obviously that is the very concealment which my hon. friend condemns.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No; I do not see any concealment about it. If you like, you can raise the income tax in order to do it, and that brings you back to direct taxation, but such a tax would be a direct tax on people with big incomes instead of an additional direct tax on people with small incomes. I would welcome any method of reducing indirect taxation that we have to pay through customs charges. Meanwhile I deplore that this very much appreciated service should have to be paid for by—

Mr. DUNNING: By the people who use it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Who in many cases are not able to pay it. Take the railways; people use railways, but we are subsidizing those railways to no small extent. Take the canals; people use canals, but they are not paid for exclusively by the people who use them. So on all along the line; all the government services are used by the people or some of the people, but are paid for out of taxation. I cannot see why this particular service should be singled out for the application of the principle that it must be paid for just as it may be used. I do not think the suggestion I have made departs from a practice which has been common in this country for a great many years.

Mr. HOWE: I suggest that my hon. friend is doing a real disservice to the cause of which he has been an advocate in all our committees, in that he would make radio broadcasting a public service administered outside and independent of the parliament of Canada. Radio broadcasting in this country is a corporation in which the listeners are the shareholders. It is compulsory upon those managing the corporation to satisfy their shareholders. Unless the corporation can justify its cost to the people who listen, it should go out of business. But the minute you depend upon grants from the public treasury for that sort of thing, you destroy that responsibility; you have officials administering broadcasting who need not justify their policies to any one. In advocating such a system I do not think the hon. member is doing any service to a cause in which he really believes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Much that the minister has said would be true also of the Canadian National railway. But what about my first alternative suggestion, the one that I really put forward, which has been overlooked—the tax on tubes? The minister has not answered the proposal. I gave the other as merely a secondary alternative.

Mr. HOWE: A tax on tubes means a tax on the manufacture of tubes. By the time it reaches the persons who are paying the cost to-day, that tax will be multiplied at least by three, due to the pyramiding of costs from the manufacturer to the retailers' shelves. Therefore, instead of putting a fifty cent tax on the listener—because it is he after all who is the consumer of tubes—you impose a very much higher tax upon him. The question has been explored, but there seems such a tremendous waste in the collection of a tax of that kind that we have had to discard it as entirely impracticable. I might add, however, that the cost of tubes as well as of batteries is now being reviewed by the tariff commission. We have reason to believe that the selling price of both tubes and batteries is higher than it should be, and I have considerable confidence that through the work of the tariff board we may expect a reduction in the cost of this material that will more than offset the fifty cents per set increase in licence fees.

Mr. FINN: I wish to compliment the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Woodsworth). He is becoming more adroit every day he is in the house. He prefaced his remarks by saying that he thought these matters could be better settled in committee, but he saw to it that he put himself on record in Hansard as to where he stood in reference to them all.

An hon. gentleman, who is a member of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition and whose name I cannot at the moment recall, stated that he believed the returned soldier should be the man and the only man to collect the radio licence fee. As far as my constituency is concerned, there are many men who to-day are much poorer and are suffering much more hardship than many returned soldiers who are doing this class of work. I appreciate the services of our returned soldiers. I am prepared to say that I believe those returned soldiers are best off whose bodies were left on the fields of France and Flanders, because they have nothing more in this world to worry about. It may be that the statement in regard to returned soldiers will not be popular with that body; but I am not concerned whether my views are popular with them or any other class of persons so long as I have a conscientious belief in the statements that I make. Where the returned soldier is in want, he should, of course, be given the opportunity; but where there are others who are in more or equal need and are perhaps suffering from circumstances which make their lives and the lives of their families even more unhappy, and who by this means could make a few dollars and bring a little comfort to their homes, they should be considered along with the returned men and no injustice should be done to either.

The third point I desire to make is that the broadcasting corporation, which is independent of parliament, is in a similar position to the Canadian National Railways, and I compliment the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) upon his acceptance of the view that the people are the shareholders in all our great public holdings, including the railways, broadcasting and other services.

I may be mistaken, and if so I am subject to correction, but it seems to me there is a dual system in reference to broadcasting. On the one hand it is controlled by the broadcasting corporation and is practically government operated. On the other hand there are broadcasting stations which are privately owned. The question is whether the broadcasting corporation will make up their minds to control all private stations, take them over at their real value and operate them, or whether we are to continue to have privately owned stations. If the government is likely to arrive at a decision, which no doubt would be made known to the broadcasting corporation, that all these stations should be publicly controlled, it would seem advisable that, until the question is settled, no more broadcasting licences should be granted to private corporations, with resulting embarrassment to the government itself and to members of this house. I mention this because the matter may possibly bring some embarrassment to my colleague from Halifax and myself; he can speak for himself; I am expressing merely my own view, and I have not any positively fixed ideas on the subject. However, it seems to me that this dual authority and this dual right are not likely to give the best services to all the people. As has been mentioned this afternoon, there are those in various parts of Canada who are not able to receive the same programs in their homes as are available to and provide happy evenings for those in other parts of the dominion.

With reference to the proposed increase in radio licence fees from $2 to $2.50, I am pleased to hear that the minister and the government are taking into consideration whether the additional fee is to be imposed. So far as I am advised by those whom I have the honour to represent, including a large number of poor people, they object to this extra fifty cents, and so do I. They feel that $2 is sufficient. They are the shareholders, and we know that at the annual meeting the shareholders control. I suggest that at least we should give serious consideration to the majority view of the people in regard to this matter. I am sure the minister will take into serious consideration the points brought forward by various hon. members of all political parties. In the government the wise counsel of the Minister of Transport will no doubt be listened to, and the result transmitted in due course, perhaps over the radio, to the broadcasting corporation.

There is one other point I wish to touch upon for a moment.

Mr. HOWE: Do not talk me out; it is five minutes to six.

Mr. FINN: I do not propose to talk the hon. minister out; I could not if I tried. I shall give way to the minister now, and on a future occasion I hope he will give way to me and that the chairman will not rule me out of order.

Mr. SPENCE: I regret very much that the government saw fit to increase the fee. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has many enemies in the country, and it is always irritating at any time for people to have to pay extra money for anything. My motto is, "Let sleeping dogs lie." In this instance it would be better to secure the extra revenue from some other source, because there is turmoil throughout the dominion. I do not blame the broadcasting corporation for what they are doing, and I do not think anyone should censure them very much, although many people are of the opinion that the corporation is not giving the best service it could.

There is one point I wish to clear up. One hon. member spoke of the great hardship on the people in the dried out area—I assume he comes from the prairies—who are compelled to pay this extra half dollar. I should like to know whether the unemployed who are on relief and people living in the dried out area are forced to pay the licence fee at all. In Toronto those who are on relief are not compelled to buy licences. Considerable discretion is left to the department. I suggest to the minister that if people in the dried out area are compelled to buy licences, not to mention anything about the extra half-dollar, they should not be.

Mr. HOWE: No pressure is brought to bear on anyone who is indigent or on relief.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): They do not know that and they are paying the licence fee.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am strongly opposed to the increase, for two reasons. One is the extent and the incidence of it, and the other is the apparent manner in which it was brought about. If the information that has come to my hand is correct, as to how it was brought about, then I think the matter is extremely serious. I do not wish to talk out the minister's item; on the contrary I wish to cooperate with him. But it has been brought to my attention, whether rightly or wrongly, that pressure was brought to bear upon the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation by the newspaper fraternity of this country. It is reported to me that in the January 15 number of a paper called "Marketing", published in Toronto, there appears the following reference to a certain meeting which was held:

A constructive suggestion was made that if the CBC would seek to secure its needed additional revenue by increasing the licence fee on radio sets, the press would stand back of it and help the public realize that such increase was just and necessary; otherwise the press would have to consider the advisability of revealing what the CBC is doing in flooding Canada with U.S. programs.

A statement like that is exceedingly serious. Sitting here, I have been wondering what authority parliament has over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. If pressure can be brought to bear upon it by such means in one connection, it looks to me as if it can be brought to bear in another. I am greatly alarmed about the matter.

Mr. HOWE: There was absolutely no pressure brought to bear. We knew, when we undertook the program of high-powered stations across Canada, that such a program could not be undertaken with the revenues then available, but the change was not made as a result of pressure.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I wish to bring to the attention of the minister a matter of importance in connection with the Radio Patent Act. There have been complaints from a number of people who have brought in radios from the United States—

Mr. SPENCE: Let them buy them here.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): But the point is that the government gave them the privilege of bringing radios provided they were valued under $100, and an employee of one concern in Calgary told me that there were three hundred convictions against people who had brought in radios. Would the minister inform us how this matter will be dealt with? What are we going to do about the matter?

Mr. HOWE: The whole question is in the hands of the tariff board. They are making a thorough investigation and we expect to have a report in due course.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): In regard to this act?

Mr. TUSTIN: It has been represented to me that there has been a great deal of discrimination in the matter of advertising charges. Is there any difference between the rates which are charged United States advertisers and those which are charged Canadians?

Mr. HOWE: Not so far as I am aware.

Item agreed to.

RIGHT HON. R. B. BENNETT

REPORTED RETIREMENT FROM PARTY LEADERSHIP —OBSERVATIONS OF THE PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before we begin the afternoon's proceedings may I be permitted to say to my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) how sorry I have been to learn that because of an impaired condition of his heart he has found it necessary to inform his party that he will not be able beyond a few months to continue to hold the position of its leader which position he has held during the past ten years. I know this expression of regret will be equally felt by all hon. members, and I hope that the right hon. gentleman will permit me to express this feeling toward him on behalf of the house.

I have often marvelled that my right hon. friend found it possible to assume the great amount of work he has undertaken, knowing something of the tremendous strain which, as leader of a political party, part of the time leader of the government and part of the time leader of the opposition, he has had to endure. Knowing how completely my right hon. friend's life has been devoted to public affairs, how conscientiously he has performed his duties as leader of his party and in the house, I can imagine how distressing it must be to him to feel that, because of the condition of his health, he is obliged to relinquish some part of those duties. In the decision which has become imperative he has my sincere sympathy.

I would express the hope that with release from extra strain, and some of the exacting burdens he has borne my right hon. friend's health may be speedily restored; that the greater freedom thereby assured, may serve to increase and prolong the enjoyment of his days as well as afford opportunities of useful public service in other ways which otherwise might be denied.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure it is not expected that I should do more than thank the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie King) and those associated with him for the very kind observations he has made touching my own relations with the party with which all my life I have been associated. I realize that the strain of five years of stress left an effect upon me, but my general health has been far better during the last few months than it has been for some time. Unfortunately that is no index as to the condition of one's heart, and I was told last year that I must abandon these duties that I have been endeavouring to perform. I was slow to believe that that might be necessary, for reasons which I dare say the right hon. gentleman can understand and every hon. member of this house will appreciate. Nevertheless, a general election being within reasonable sight, I was told that it would be quite impossible for me to carry the burden and strain of such a time. So I felt it was my duty to acquaint my political friends with that fact.

I am not delivering any valedictory; that will be left for another occasion. But I would be less than human if I did not express to my right hon. friend my very warm appreciation of his kind thoughts which, as a matter of fact, he expressed in a letter which he sent to me yesterday. I am deeply sensible of the kindness with which the house has received his words of sympathy, as well as his words of regret. I can only say, Mr. Speaker, that I would like to thank the house for this manifestation of good will, which, perhaps, if it had been expressed in more strenuous times, might not have been necessary at all.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, as one who never agreed with the policies of the right hon. gentleman who has just spoken, I heartily join the house in extending to him my very best wishes for happiness, good health and a full enjoyment. of life outside the house.

CIVIL SERVICE

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO OPERATION OF CIVIL SERVICE ACT—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata) moved concurrence in the first report of the special committee appointed to inquire into the operations of the Civil Service Act.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I intended to refer the other day to the provisions of this report, to which we are now asked to give concurrence, dealing with the printing of evidence to be taken before the special committee appointed to deal with civil service matters, but the chairman of the committee was not present at the time. I should like to call attention to the great expense which would be involved in producing what I am sure would be a second Hansard for a considerable number of days. I do not know how we should deal with it in the house, but surely some discrimination could be shown as between evidence of real value given before the committee and that great volume of other evidence and discussion which will not help to clarify the issue but which may even help still further to confuse it. In the interests of economy I do hope that the committee will endeavour to make some arrangement to make unnecessary the production of a voluminous and continuous Hansard.

Mr. POULIOT: I regret very much that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) did not mention this matter before, because I feel sure we could have come to an amicable understanding. First of all, let me say that the evidence given before all other civil service committees has been published for the information of hon. members. I am not in a position at the present time to state just what evidence will be given this year; that matter is to be discussed to-morrow morning by a subcommittee which is to draw up a kind of agenda of the witnesses to appear before the committee. We had voluminous reports of the proceedings of the committee to investigate the prices of farm implements, and the same is true of other committees. I submit respectfully that the printing of the evidence of this committee which is to deal with matters of interest to all members of the House of Commons is deserving of consideration. I realize that some members will never look at the reports that will be published, but even if only ten or twenty members read them, I submit it would be useful to have them printed. I do not want to have any restraint placed upon the relevant evidence that may be given, but I believe the members of the committee are in earnest in their intention to ask only pertinent questions of the witnesses; therefore, the evidence will be much shorter and less costly.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Might I suggest that this motion be allowed to stand until the chairman of the committee and the minister have had an opportunity of conferring.

Motion stands.

PENITENTIARY ACT AMENDMENT

COMPUTATION OF TIME SERVED BY CONVICTED PRISONERS PENDING APPEAL

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 36, to amend the Penitentiary Act.

He said: The purpose of this bill is to harmonize the provisions of the Penitentiary Act with those of the criminal code with regard to the computation of the time served by convicted prisoners who are detained in gaol pending the determination of appeal.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT

HUSBAND OR WIFE COMPETENT WITNESSES IN CERTAIN PROSECUTIONS—SUBMISSION OF CERTAIN PROOF BY AFFIDAVIT

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 37, to amend the Canada Evidence Act.

He said: This bill involves three changes in the act. The first amendment is to make a wife or husband competent and compellable witnesses for the prosecution in charges of theft by either the husband or the wife of the property of the other while living apart. This is a special offence under section 354 of the criminal code. The other two changes are for the purpose of avoiding cost in proceedings. The first is to permit proof by affidavit of the sending of a notice or an order by any branch of the public service instead of compelling witnesses to go from Ottawa to all parts of Canada to make that proof. The other amendment is for the same purpose but with regard to banks. It is to permit proof by affidavit that there is no account where a cheque has been issued, if such be the case. Under the law as it is, it is permissible to prove by affidavit that there is an entry on the books of a bank, but there is no permission to prove the negative. This is to make both the same.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

INCOME TAX EVASIONS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the attention of the government been called to the evasions of income tax in Canada by wealthy evaders who have left Canada?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

2. Is the government aware of several rich millionaires moving to the West Indies and other places outside Canada, with their wealth, to escape taxation, and, if so, what action has been taken?

3. What has been done to effect such a proposal and for a registration system to check evasions, and will any select committee be appointed to go into the matter?

4. Is the government aware that scores of wealthy Canadians are taking up residence in the Bahamas in order to escape tax levies?

5. Will any register be established of income tax?

6. Is any list of delinquents published in the blue book form, or has the auditor general asked leave to check up same?

7. Will correspondence, if any, between the auditor general and the Department of Justice on this subject, be tabled?

8. What action has been or will be taken in the matter?

9. What does Ontario pay federal government for collecting its income tax, or is it collected at cost?

10. What steps are being taken to amend either (a) the criminal code; (b) the Immigration Act, or other statute law, to prevent Canadians in Canada crediting all their assets to companies they own or control and then escape income tax by investing surplus abroad?

11. Have any representations been made by the government of Ontario to either jointly with federal power or separately take action herein, and will all correspondence, if any, be tabled?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. The words "evasion" and "evaders" are not precise. If they be taken as implying default under the Income War Tax Act, the answer to the question is in the negative. If they refer to persons who have left Canada, wholly abandoned their residence in Canada, and are permanently resident abroad, the answer is in the affirmative.

There are such persons. They are, however, not within the purview of the Income War Tax Act. They are required to pay only in respect of income which has its source in Canada, in the same manner as other non-residents of Canada who have the source of their income within Canada.

There are a number of persons, said to be well-to-do, who continue to maintain a residence in Canada but who also have a residence abroad in which they spend a considerable portion of their time. The government is not aware that any of these persons evade their Canadian income tax liability. They are all liable to income tax on the total income from whatever source derived throughout the world, whether directly or through the holding of shares of personal corporations incorporated abroad, because they have a residence in Canada, which brings them within the purview of the law whether they are personally in Canada or not.

Therefore there are two groups of persons,—

First, those who have a residence in Canada and also may have a residence abroad, and Second, those who have no residence at all in Canada and reside wholly abroad.

The government is not aware in either case of evasion of the Canadian income tax law. The former pay, as stated, on their total income from all over the world. The latter do not evade, they simply are not within the purview of the income tax law as residents of Canada. They only pay, as all non-residents of Canada throughout the world pay, namely on the income which has its source within Canada or on the profit, if any, from the carrying on of any business in Canada.

2. The government is aware that some persons give up their residence in Canada and take up residence outside of Canada, just as some persons give up their residence abroad and take up residence in Canada. Persons leaving Canada move into jurisdictions some of which have higher and some lower taxation laws than exist in Canada. The government is aware that some persons said to be well-to-do have left Canada and abandoned all residence therein.

3. A tax roll continually amended so as to keep it up to date is maintained in the income tax division showing all persons resident, ordinarily resident or carrying on business in Canada and as such liable to income tax.

4. The government is aware of a number of Canadians who have taken up residence in the Bahamas and other places and who at the same time maintain a residence in Canada. Such persons continue to pay tax in full as residents of Canada on their total income from sources throughout the world, even though they be personally absent from Canada for a substantial portion of each year.

The government is aware that some Canadians give up their residence in Canada and reside entirely abroad. Non-residents of Canada throughout the world are not liable to Canadian income tax except in respect of income that has its source in Canada.

5. See answer to Number 3.

6. If by "delinquents" is meant those who are delinquent in filing income tax returns, the tax roll section of the income tax division requires the filing of returns and if not filed the delinquents are prosecuted for failure so to do.

If by "delinquents" is meant those who do not pay their taxes in full, the collection section follows up the outstanding amount, demanding payment from the taxpayer and may enter upon such legal action as may be necessary to effect collection. All ledger accounts are open to the auditor general for checking purposes.

7. See Auditor General's Report—1937, Vol. 1, p. 253, et seq.

8. Answered by Number 7.

9. At the rate of $80,000 a year.

10. Steps were taken, to prevent personal companies incorporated abroad from being used to minimize taxation by requiring all persons resident or ordinarily resident in Canada who owned, directly or indirectly or through trusts, shares of companies incorporated in any part of the world outside of Canada, when the income of such company is derived from interest, rents, royalties, dividends or other similar income, to declare under the Canadian law in their individual income tax returns the income of such company or companies, whether the same is or is not in fact distributed, and as well all personal income from whatever source derived and to pay tax on the combined income. This was passed in 1926 applicable to 1925 and subsequent years. Any person who files a false return is subject to prosecution under Part 15 of the criminal code. No further steps are being taken to amend the acts referred to in the question.

11. No such representations have been made, therefore there is no correspondence to table.

GREAT BRITAIN AND ITS EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—BRITISH WHITE PAPER TABLED IN LONDON

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Will the government prepare another white paper similar to the one they issued regarding Italy and Ethiopia, giving all correspondence in relation to the government of Great Britain and its external affairs, as far as related to Canada since the last white paper was issued here?

2. Would it be possible for the government to secure copy of the British white paper said to have been laid on the table by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons, London, to-day, covering foreign affairs with references as they relate to the dominions in this matter?

3. If these two white papers are prepared or received by the government, will they be laid on the table of the house and a copy distributed to the members?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. It is not considered practicable to furnish a document of the scope suggested.

INCOME TAX LEVIES

Mr. CHURCH:

Will the government consider summoning another interprovincial-dominion conference on the whole subject of Income tax levies with a view of restoring this tax to the municipalities in whole or in part?

Mr. DUNNING: This question relates to a matter of policy and it is not usual for the government to make statements on matters of policy in giving replies to questions.

*INCOME TAX—REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT

Mr. CHURCH:

In view of the triplicate income tax in Canada by federal, provincial and municipal authorities on the same class of personal property, will the government consider submitting to the Supreme Court of Canada, under the Supreme Court Act, a reference to clear up the whole question of jurisdiction on this form of taxation?

RECOGNITION OF ITALIAN GOVERNMENT AS GOVERNMENT OF ETHIOPIA

Mr. CHURCH:

On January 27 and February 9, pursuant to an order of the house, a return was laid on the table in answer to my inquiry: "Has Canada approved, or been asked to approve, of the conquest of Ethiopia by Italy." In view of the statement yesterday by the Prime Minister of Great Britain that they have recognized this conquest de facto, has the government of Canada approved of the action taken since the return mentioned was tabled?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Canadian government is not aware of any statement made by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom on March 2nd that the United Kingdom has recognized de facto the conquest of Ethiopia by Italy. A statement of March 2nd respecting this question was, however, made by the foreign office in connection with litigation at present before the courts in London. This statement is reported in press dispatches as follows:

His Majesty's government recognize the Italian government as the government de facto of the part of Ethiopia which they control, and according to their information the Italian government now is in control of virtually the whole of Ethiopia. His Majesty's government therefore recognize the Italian government as the government de facto of virtually the whole of Ethiopia.

The foreign office statement does not purport to indicate that recognition of the Italian government as the de facto government of the part of Ethiopia which they control has only recently been accorded. The de facto recognition, to which reference is made, may be considered to have taken place during the latter part of 1936 or early in 1937, when the governments of the United Kingdom, France and certain other countries, after securing from the Italian authorities formal assurances of the grant of adequate facilities, decided to reduce their respective legations at Addis Ababa to consulates.

3. What are the rates of pay and allowances of any kind to counsel and assistant counsel of the commission, and the amount paid to date to each such official by name, under these or other heads?

4. What is the total cost to date for: (a) secretarial assistance; (b) clerical assistance; (c) preparation of stenographers' reports of proceedings of the said commission?

Mr. DUNNING: The information asked for in this question is given in an order for return tabled to-day, asked for by Mr. Edwards.

3. What were the number of applications for loans from March 1, 1937, to February 28, 1938, by provinces?

Mr. DUNNING:

2. If this question relates to the Home Improvement Loans Guarantee Act and not to the Dominion Housing Act, no information can be given. Many home improvement loans are for the purposes of converting single unit houses into multiple unit houses but the information regarding the total number of family units provided is not compiled.

3. Applications for home improvement loans are made in the first instance to chartered banks and other approved lending institutions and they do not report the number of applications received.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) inquired if it has been ascertained, as the result of the investigations that have been made, how many Japanese have entered this country illegally.

My right hon. friend proceeded to say that possibly the minister would be unable to give an answer at this stage. That is correct. The inquiries which have been proceeding have given a very considerable amount of information, but it would not be possible to give any definite or conclusive reply to the question at the present stage. One of the main purposes of establishing the board of review to which I referred on Friday is to procure this full information. I may add that as the result of inquiries by immigration officers and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, 145 Japanese have been deported for illegal entry in the period 1931 to date.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I was going to ask the Prime Minister, not knowing that he would answer my other inquiry to-day, whether or not the jurisdiction of the board of review will extend to the whole question of Japanese immigration and penetration into our country, or would it be limited, as a reading of his remarks might indicate? There is a good deal of interest in the matter, and I have been asked to ascertain, if possible, just what the jurisdiction would be in the premises.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The board has been appointed to deal with the subject of illegal entries—

Mr. BENNETT: Only?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Only, yes. However, I would assume that in any inquiry directed to illegal entries, much information that was incidental thereto would be ascertained.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION ACT

Mr. MITCHELL (for Mr. Hansell):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence, contracts, tenders and other documents in the possession of the government, dated during 1937, with respect to the proposed scheme under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, at Enchant, Alberta.

CHARGES AGAINST OFFICERS OF ROYAL 22ND REGIMENT

Mr. COLDWELL (for Mr. MacNeil):

For a copy of all orders, decisions, letters, telegrams, recommendations and recorded evidence relating to the court of enquiry held by the Department of National Defence in Quebec, August 24 to August 28, 1936, to deal with charges against officers of the Royal 22nd Regiment.

Mr. POWER: Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the proceedings of the board of inquiry are of a confidential character and that the documents and memoranda relating thereto come within the category of privileged communications. I would therefore suggest that this motion be not passed.

Motion dropped.

DISALLOWANCE AND RESERVATION OF ALBERTA LEGISLATION

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a copy of all petitions, correspondence, and other documents, relating to the disallowance of the three Alberta acts (August, 1937), the reservation of the three Alberta bills (October, 1937), and the reports of the Minister of Justice on these acts and bills.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, just before the motion is adopted, may I say to my hon. friend that, as he no doubt must surmise, there has been an immense amount of correspondence, much of which is communications from private individuals, and a good deal of it in the nature of what might be described as form letters, resolutions of social credit groups and communications from various bodies. It would take a long time to have it all copied, and I assume it would be of little value to my hon. friend if it were; but if what he is really anxious to obtain, as I believe it is, are the important documents and everything that would really be relevant for purposes of consideration and debate, I should be very glad to have the order passed in that way. I might add that if my hon. friend wishes at any time to see the files for himself I shall extend a welcome to him in the Prime Minister's office, and I am sure the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) will in his.

Mr. COLDWELL: I thank the right hon. gentleman for his suggestion. I am interested only in the important documents.

Motion as amended agreed to.

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a copy of any instructions sent to the Lieutenant-Governor of Alberta in regard to the reservation of the three Alberta bills in October, 1937.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, there were no instructions sent to the lieutenant-governor of Alberta.

Motion dropped.

PROPOSED DISALLOWANCE OF ONTARIO POWER COMMISSION ACT, 1935

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a copy of all correspondence, petitions, and other documents, relating to proposed disallowance of the Ontario Power Commission Act, 1935, and any reports of the Minister of Justice thereon.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, perhaps my hon. friend would allow what I said with reference to his previous notice of motion to apply also to this one.

Mr. COLDWELL: I understand that.

Motion as amended agreed to.

STATE MEDICINE

PROPOSED PROVISION BY THE GOVERNMENT FOR THE MEDICAL CARE OF THE SICK

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, it is most urgent that state medicine be established in the Dominion of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I must admit that in introducing this resolution I do not feel as comfortable around my stomach as I did before dinner, but the motion is to be seconded by one who is thoroughly worthy, the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden), my former family doctor.

I should like to say in opening that I am indebted for help on this big question from many sources. I of course have had first-hand information. We have also listened to many radio addresses; we have had information from health magazines, and from material disseminated by health boards throughout Canada. Many of our church leaders have also given us much help.

When one thinks of state medicine in any form, it certainly appears as a gigantic task, I can only say, in the words of the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), that we cannot expect to change our whole system at once, or even rapidly; we must do it gradually and be thankful for the success that we are getting.

A definition seems necessary at this stage. I would say that state medicine means this: a system of socialized medicine making available to all complete medical service at public expense.

This, Mr. Speaker, is a living question. It is a living question to those who see the need for it daily; it is a dying question to those who are afflicted and cannot get necessary medical care. State medicine is not a dominion question only, but is linked up closely with the provinces. Hon. Doctor C. M. Weir, provincial secretary for British Columbia, says it is necessary to have cooperation with the dominion government. We appreciate that, and I am sure the members from British Columbia and the other provinces are ready to say, in the words of Dickens, "Barkis is willin'."

There may be hon. members who think that because I am not a doctor I have no right to speak on this question. But I maintain I have every right to speak because of what I know, and because of the reality of the things I have seen, and because, too, of the number of times that I have seen the doctor do all he can, serve faithfully to the end, and then say to the minister: I have done my best, and I must now hand the patient over to you. I should like to give you an example of that. In the town of Souris two doctors were called in to attend one who was seriously ill. When they left I asked them if there was any hope, and they shook their heads. The finger nails of the patient were purple, his lips were purple, and his eyes were becoming glassy. His temperature was 105⅘ and his pulse was over 140; he had the death rattle in his throat. I said, "I suppose I can put on all the mustard I like;" they said, "It won't hurt." So I stood in the door of that room; I asked the Great Physician to take charge, and I was willing to cooperate to the limit. We continued to apply mustard every half hour from then on to six o'clock in the evening, which was about eleven hours. Then the patient called out that he was burning up; and we were thankful to see when we took off the mustard that there was much sweat. I was going out to get him a drink of water, when he called to his wife, "Make that sky pilot stand in the door and thank the Great Physician." Therefore, Mr. Speaker, having afterwards given that man seventy-six hypodermics of digitalis, strychnine and camphor oil, I know a little bit about medicine. I believe I have some right to speak on this question because of my association with doctors who have given outstanding services to patients which have been much appreciated. But I would interject here that, being of course inexperienced in this house, I have been surprised that so many members advocate cures for the diseases of the body politic and leave altogether out of consideration Him who one day took from a lad five loaves and two fishes and with them was able to feed a multitude.

This proposal implies, first, all essential medical service requisite to the recovery and maintenance of complete health; all that is necessary to the complete well-being of the sick, both physical and mental, including examination, diagnosis, services of doctors and nurses; the benefits that can be secured from hospitalization; health education, preventive service, and a check-up of all those who are ailing. Second, it implies the socialization of medicine, government responsibility for seeing that such service is freely available to all, and that existing services should be utilized as far as feasible. It does not imply compulsory use of this service, neither does it imply that private medicine shall be prevented.

I should like to give a few statistics; this matter is not in my field, but I find it necessary to do so.

More than half the deaths at childbirth which could have been avoided are caused by deficiencies in medical care; so says the New York academy of medical care. More than half the sick in certain crowded centres receive no medical care whatever; so says the United States public health service. Only three teeth in ten now receive dental care—the rest just keep on decaying; so says the committee on the cost of medical care. And that same committee adds that only one person out of ten receives a doctor's annual examination, which any doctor would say is the right way to prevent disease, by nipping it in the bud. The committee concludes, after five years of research, that our tragic failure to make full use of our hospitals, nurses, doctors and dentists causes a vast amount of preventable economic waste, physical pain and mental anguish, as well as millions of needless deaths. We need the benefits of prevention. The poet said that a fence at the top of the hill is better than an ambulance down in the valley. The remedy for this condition will not come through the individual doctor, who is often overworked and often underpaid, as will be shown a little later on; it will not come through the charity and the extra service of the medical man, or through committees. Let me quote from Mr. Greaves, who spoke lately over the radio:

> For one thing, it seems to me extremely contributive to the issue that the commercial or profit motive should be, if utilized at all, relegated to second or indirect place. . . .

The direct profit motive should be eliminated, for it detracts attention from the full, hearty serving in the cause.

If the medical men did not have to worry any more about their salaries, that is if they were like the ministers in that respect, they would give far better service. Mr. Greaves continues:

Secondly, prevention and remedy of disease cannot be genuinely effected unless the public has at its disposal, and at a reasonable cost, everything which it needs for each individual case and which science has discovered for our hygienic benefit.

That is, they should have at their disposal in the cause of health those things which are needed to deal with the average case that comes to them for attention. Hon. Doctor Weir, provincial secretary of British Columbia, says that in Canada in 1930 five out of eight people of average means sufficiently ill to require the services of a trained nurse were unable to pay for these services. This statement is based on the evidence of 1,189 doctors. Also he says that in Canada in 1930, illness from sixty to ninety days in hospital bankrupted fifty per cent of the people of moderate means for periods ranging from two years to five years and over. In British Columbia in 1935, out of 9,000 heads of families on relief, 1,600, or about eighteen per cent, were suffering from partial disabilities, while additional numbers were totally disabled or were suffering from temporary difficulties.

From the Health League of Canada I quote:

Every year thousands of Canadians die from preventable diseases.

This health league has done a great deal to aid in the cure of preventable disease. The writer tells us that the success of vaccination made medical science think along new lines; that they have been exploring other fields and are doing great work. They tell us that one out of three dies ahead of his time. Professor Winslow of Yale university states that twenty-nine per cent of the deaths in the United States registration area are postponable; and we have the authority of the Health League of Canada for the statement that thirty-four per cent of the deaths in Canada, also could be postponed. Half of our disease, they say, is preventable. One hundred and eighty thousand Canadians are always sick; of these ninety-one to ninety-six per cent are ill enough to be disabled. So that 1·82 per cent and 2·88 per cent, or more than two per cent of the whole population, is always too sick to work; that is, two per cent of Canada's population, or 180,000 persons, are always on the sick list. The bulletin states:

Of the population of Canada, thirty per cent are adult males; thirty per cent are adult females.

It is thus estimated that 54,000 adult males are continuously ill. This amount of illness would suggest that in the adult male population alone there are lost each year 16,200,000 working days.

Calculations show that, for every twenty males gainfully employed, there are approximately six females similarly employed. This would suggest that, in addition, the female population loses 4,800,000 working days per year.

Total loss per year—21,000,000 working days, at least fifty per cent preventable.

Superfluous loss per year—10,500,000 working days.

Converted into money, the annual cost of illness is estimated to be approximately $300,000,000. To this is to be added a much larger sum in the cost of postponable deaths. In the United States this is said to be six billions annually, and in Canada it is on a corresponding scale.

Let us consider mothers' allowances for a moment. These are paid for the most part to young widows with dependent children. One province alone spends over two and a quarter million dollars a year for the relief of the distress of widows and orphans whose husbands and fathers in a large number of cases have died as a result of preventable diseases.

Referring to British Columbia again, I understand that different countries have adopted the voluntary system, while in others the contributory system prevails. The following countries have the compulsory system: Austria, Bulgaria, Chile, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Esthonia, France, Germany, Great Britain, Greece, Hungary, Northern Ireland, Italy, Japan, Latvia, Lithuania, Luxemburg, The Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Portugal, Roumania, Russia, Switzerland, Jugoslavia. The voluntary system exists in the following countries: Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Finland, India, Italy, New Zealand, Palestine, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Union of South Africa, Uruguay.

May I read a note on one of the most progressive countries that have health insurance or state medicine: I refer to Northern Ireland, Northern Ireland came under the British scheme of health insurance in 1930, and in 1934 the various organizations there were unified by being absorbed in a single national health insurance society. The note reads:

Ireland came under the British scheme of health insurance in 1930. In 1934, the Irish societies were unified by all being absorbed into a single National Health Insurance Society. This unification is regarded as a preparatory measure with a view to the institution of a comprehensive insurance scheme which will adequately protect the worker and his family against all the social risks.

When any movement is led by such countries, especially by a progressive people like those of Northern Ireland, we can sit up and take notice.

There are two outstanding arguments for state medicine; first, there is the urgent need of those who are ill, and, second, the doctor. I will treat both these points in a general way. There is vital need for some socialization of medical services, in the first place because of the serious shortcomings that exist under the present system in spite of the great advance in the science of medicine, resulting in poverty and often in death; and, secondly, because the prevention and cure of disease have by no means kept pace with the advancement in medical science. There is a third factor to be considered, however, and that is the maladjustment of medical science to public need. The inadequacy of medical services to the needs of the public is shown very clearly in the lack of both personnel and funds contributed to various public health agencies. In private medicine there is an insufficiency of personnel, inaccessibility to equipment, and inability among the masses to pay the cost of medical care.

As most hon. members know, the wage of the average worker or head of a family is about $986 a year, there being five persons in the average family; in other words, the monthly salary of the average worker is about $80, and this has to maintain five persons. Obviously some essentials must be cut to the very bone. Doctors are not called till the very last moment; they are called only when it is absolutely necessary. Many ailments appear in later life as the result of malnutrition attributable to lack of proper care for mothers during the developmental period of child life. Captain MacPherson tells us that there is great loss of life because people are unable to call the doctor when necessary; they cannot pay the bill. There can be improvement only by the organization of medicine to serve the needs of society. Private medicine has failed to some extent. Medical equipment is insufficient and in some instances there is lack of confidence. As a result, those who are ill resort to other cures. Some have turned to Christian Science, and here I would say that if Christian Science would only use all the means at its disposal, all the things that have been found by medical science to be of benefit, and would then leave everything to the Great Physician, it would accomplish much good. There are others who apply to druggists for remedies. Perhaps some of us have been guilty of this. But the druggist cannot prescribe, because he cannot diagnose properly. Again, others use patent medicines.

The cost of medical service has assumed such alarming proportions that adequate medical care can be paid for only by those who are wealthy. The very poor can also be assisted, but the great middle class can get no help. The high cost of medicine is due largely to the cost of hospital and nursing services, though these in themselves are not exorbitant. The upkeep of hospitals and the cost of all the equipment used are not excessive, and everyone knows that nurses are not overpaid.

There has been great progress in medical science, especially in the field of obstetrics, and yet it is found that in Canada from twenty-five to thirty-five per cent of the mothers in childbirth are unattended. Again, the doctors are not fairly paid under the present system; only a few earn large incomes. The doctors with whom I have discussed this question are all in favour of state medicine, with the exception of those who have first-class practices—the $100 or $150 a day men. A great deal of free work is done for the poor in hospitals and clinics without remuneration, and the doctors do more of such work than any other professional man, except the clergyman. Let me give you an outstanding example. Doctor Riddell of St. Boniface told me once that in 1925 the hon. member for that constituency (Mr. Howden) had $75,000 coming to him from the community and that he would never get it. This is not fair to the profession. To ask a doctor to go out at all hours of the night on some of the most urgent cases and not to have him paid is most unfair. The efforts of the medical men to remedy the situation are insignificant. Voluntary clinics have been established but there are not enough of them to be of general service. The control of medicine by the state would offer a remedy. Medical service provided for the community should include provision for scientific diagnosis and treatment of all its members in need of medical care. It should provide for the adequate financial remuneration of doctors and should encourage health education and the control of disease. This can be provided by state medicine, whereby the work of all agencies in the community for public medicine and for preventive and curative medicine could be properly controlled. These agencies can be utilized to make the benefits of modern medicine available to all the people. By some system of health insurance the cost of medicine can be brought within the ability to pay of the family of moderate means.

State medicine would have other advantages. To the doctors it would reduce the cost of medical education and assure them of more adequate compensation. It would raise the standards of medical practice, and remove a certain type of competition. It would provide access to needed equipment, too expensive for the individual doctor to buy for himself, and time would be available to those specially qualified to engage in scientific and medical research. It would tend to remove what any doctor here knows about, the temptation, of a kind which comes to no other professional man, to slip into malpractice.

For the patient it would have the advantage of providing for one examination in one place instead of several, without interfering with the personal relation between doctor and patient. It would guide the patient promptly to the best treatment, and provide the hospital, nursing and convalescent care that are necessary, regardless of the patient's ability to pay. It would provide capital outside the medical profession to meet the cost of those unable to pay.

State medicine is logical. It is in keeping with the spirit of the times. We already have it to a considerable degree in such matters as the control of communicable diseases, sanitation, medical care for men in the army and navy and on the railroads and in many industries. They have their nursing staff and medical staff ready at their call. Furthermore this public care for health is constantly increasing. More and more provinces are taking over the field of preventive medicine in part or in whole. Medicine is a proper field for state control, being analogous to education, and applying even more universally than education. It has many things in common with fire and police protection, which are considered indispensable to public safety. There is a legal basis for the control of medicine by the state. The state has certain police powers aiming at the protection of national existence, the maintenance of right or justice, and the public welfare. Public health is an important factor in public safety.

From personal experience I know something about the need for state medicine. I worked on construction work in Calgary and I have seen men keeping themselves in shape with appliances but unable to do a decent day's work. I asked one of them: "Why do you not see a doctor and have that minor operation?" He replied: "My wife and children need the money more than I need the operation." I served as sky pilot in southern Saskatchewan and saw farmers denying themselves what they needed, and sometimes their wives also suffering, because they were not able to pay for a necessary operation. In Winnipeg and rural Manitoba this need was evident to me twenty years ago, and the need is great at the head of the lakes to-day. Only this morning I had a man in the office who had to take his wife out of the hospital when she should have remained there, because he was not able to pay the $1.50 a day. I know that condition prevails in many other places.

Down in Cape Breton I was told by an efficient investigator that they have group medicine for those working in the mines. The men pay forty cents a week for cooperative medical service; they carry this themselves without the aid of the city or the state. But there are many people who live and die without proper medical care; children are born without a doctor and die without a nurse; children are undernourished and liable to all kinds of diseases, especially tuberculosis. I would like to give one or two instances from my own knowledge. One is the case of a mother in the city of Fort William with a boy, maintaining herself by keeping house, getting board for herself and son, and earning $20 a month. The boy developed a sore ear. She did not call a doctor, thinking she would save the expense. The result was that mastoid trouble developed and after protracted treatment she had a medical and hospital bill for over $400—this woman earning $20 a month on which to feed and clothe herself and her boy.

I was in our local hospital one day two years ago and saw something that made me decide that I would support anyone who would bring up this matter in the house. This man had seen me thirty years before, but apparently I have kept my youth a little better than he has; for he knew me although I did not recognize him. He said: "I want you to take me home." I said I would if he had the permission of the doctor and the hospital. The next day I got him home, took him out thirty-two miles and found there a cosy little home with four small children. In the bed was the mother with another happy little bundle four days old. I did not wonder that the man wanted to go home; there was no doctor there, and no nurse—just a little slip of a girl. My better half taught them first aid. I felt like rolling up that little bundle of happy possibilities and taking it home and training it as we thought it should be trained. I have seen farmers in our district suffering under the need for medical care, but, as one said to me, he would rather die than go into debt and allow his farm to be sold and leave his wife without a dollar. The other day I learned the story of a maid who was earning $10 a month; she became ill and was taken to hospital for an operation which cost $150 plus the hospital bill. When can she pay it? That sort of thing is very effective in driving people to certain shades of thinking.

I am convinced that it is the duty of christian Canada to look after her sick. That is part of the program laid down by the Great Physician when he said: Feed the hungry; clothe the naked; visit the sick and go to those in gaol. We cannot pass by on the other side and disregard that program and call ourselves a christian nation.

I know there are many arguments against this proposal. You can get arguments against anything, as I have observed since I have been in this house. It is desirable that we should hear these arguments against state medicine or health insurance, both to show up any weaknesses as well as to demonstrate its strength. I know from reading the book of Job that the devil can justify his position, and from reading the book of Matthew that he can quote Scripture to serve his purpose. I am not particular whether it is state medicine or some other form of medical care for our people so long as our government takes up this task. I have paid my tribute in another way to the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) who has grown so much in my estimation as a man of ability and a fair-minded man; as one who shows great skill in finding the weak spots in legislation, as well as being willing to approve of what is good. I think of the government as having intelligence and ability and willingness to learn, and with great resources at their disposal, willing to treat their fellow men as brothers. I think of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power), with his courage and readiness to be in the front line trench. I think of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) having the ability to find the money for every worthy cause, as he did in the case of pensions for the blind. I am convinced that these two ministers are not going to stand back or allow their fellow ministers to clothe themselves in priestly robes and take on sacerdotal airs and pass by on the other side while those who are sick are left to fend for themselves.

Knowing that Canadian health is Canadian wealth, we cannot afford to trifle with the physical and mental well-being of our citizens. In other words, it costs more not to have state medicine than to have it.

[Mr. McIvor.]

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, if the motion requires a seconder, I should like to take that privilege. My first words must be those of congratulation to the mover (Mr. McIvor). For a number of years we have been close friends, having lived for some time only a door or two apart on the same street. We have played together, hunted together, visited the sick together and gone to church together. The hon. member may not have been at my convention, but it was my privilege to be at his and later to congratulate him when the votes were counted. He apologized, in a way, for having brought the motion before the house; no apology need have been made. There is no doubt that the hon. member's incentive in bringing the motion before the house was his ingrained interest in, and sympathy and love for, humanity. May I congratulate him upon having revived the subject on this occasion.

What is state medicine? A great deal has been said in the United States and in Canada in the last ten years about state medicine, but I believe I have never seen the term defined. In fact, a questionnaire directed to Doctor Routley, Grand Secretary of the Canadian Medical Association, brought this response:

> The Canadian Medical Association has not adopted any official definition of the term "state medicine" but it is my view that the council would likely be in agreement upon the following definition:
> "By state medicine is meant a system of medical administration by which the state provides medical services for the entire population, or a large group thereof, and under which all practitioners are employed, directed and paid by the state, on a salary basis."

I should say it would be sufficient to define state medicine as provision by the state or government for the medical care of the sick. This definition would be broad enough and elastic enough to fit any set of conditions, from the mere payment of medical fees to a medical man for services rendered to the state, to the complete medical service such as, so far, we see in only one part of the world—to me, the ideal condition—namely, state medicine as it is practised in Russia.

Is state medicine desirable? I ask the question, and seek to answer it in the affirmative, under three headings. I would say, yes, first because it would limit the spread of infection and the incidence of death, and, second, because it would eliminate the uneven distribution of the cost of medical services to the people. May I put it in another way: it would afford an adequate system of medicine to the wage earner and the low salaried man. The third reason is that it would take up the slack between outlying districts, where there are no doctors, and the idle doctors which are to be found in comparative abundance in any urban centre.

Let me enlarge upon the first of these reasons, and point out that, although I had no collusion or cooperation with the mover of the resolution, I find that his remarks in this connection are along lines similar to those I propose to make. Repetition may be tiresome, and I shall endeavour in this particular to detain the house for as short a time as possible. I have said that state medicine would limit the spread of disease and the incidence of death, and to bear out my contention I shall repeat some of the statements of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor).

Every year thousands of Canadians die of preventable disease. Can anyone gainsay that statement? Secondly, one person in three dies prematurely of such disease. Over half of all disabling disease could be prevented. Three per cent of Canadians are continually sick. All hon. members are pretty well aware by this time that sickness costs the people of Canada the estimated sum of $311,000,000 yearly.

To give more detailed information, may I say that diphtheria has killed as many as 1,200 persons in Canada in one year; typhoid fever has killed approximately the same number; tuberculosis destroys about 8,000 lives every year, and cancer destroys approximately the same number each year. Heart disease takes a yearly toll of about 11,700 lives. Maternal mortality in Canada runs up to 1,300 yearly. Prior to the activity of the various governments, in cooperation with the federal government, the incidence of venereal disease in Canada was appalling.

You say, "Well, what of it? There are too many people, anyway; why not let them die? To hundreds of thousands of people we are giving not only medical attention, but food, clothing and shelter. At a time like this would it not be just as well to refrain from a discussion of state medicine? Why not wait until we balance the budget, and until we settle our railway and unemployment questions?" There is good reason for many of those questions, because every time we reclaim an invalid from a serious illness we do so against the time he will take sick again. If the person happens to be an indigent, dependent upon the state, each time we cure his illness we place a further burden upon the state. You may ask: "If he was no good in the first place, why not let him die?" Unfortunately many of these people are suffering from infectious disease and we must control infectious and contagious disease as a matter of protection to others. Diphtheria, scarlet fever, typhoid fever and so on, not to mention the venereal diseases, which are the worst of all, are conditions that have to be controlled. If we must control them for our own safety we might as well make a job of it and control them for the sake of those who are suffering.

I have said that I believe state medicine is a good idea, because, among other things, it would eliminate the uneven distribution of medical costs. The cost of illness must be common knowledge to hon. members of this house. I think it is a fair statement that about four-fifths of the citizens of Canada enjoy incomes of less than $1,800 and that a large majority of the people would consider themselves very fortunate if they could be sure of an income of $1,200 per year. A man with an income of $1,200 or $1,800 per year and who has a family to support usually has very little reserve. As a general rule he uses up one hundred per cent of what he earns.

I hope the house will not mind my discussing these matters in detail, but this is how it strikes me as a doctor. Should an ordinary case of sickness come along, such as a mild attack of grippe, this man goes to bed and calls in a doctor. Before he is well he owes his doctor and his druggist from $10 to $20. To many people, that may not seem much, but it is a lot to a man who uses up the hundred dollars he receives every month. If he has the misfortune to require the removal of an appendix, if he suffers from a strangulated hernia or something else that necessitates his going to hospital, he finds himself put back to the extent of a couple of hundred dollars. As a doctor I am meeting these cases all the time. A man with a family of three or four children who is receiving only $100 per month finds it quite difficult to pay a bill of $100. In this connection I should like to refer to some remarks I made in this house during the session of 1936. I said:

> I believe it has been estimated that the cost of medical service to the Canadian people, largely a direct charge, is about $311,000,000 a year. On the other hand it has been estimated that the cost of medical service to the people of the United States is something over $3,500,000,000 a year, which figures out in both instances at around $30 a head. During the regime of President Hoover an inquiry was undertaken as to the cost of medical service to the people of the United States.

And again:

> Before this inquiry was entered upon it was realized that there was a great deficiency in medical service to the American people, and on the other hand it is well known that medical men are driving taxis and doing manual labour and institutional work for which they receive little or no remuneration. An inquiry was therefore set on foot; a survey was made of some 1,800 families in all economic grades, and some very interesting facts were ascertained.

And further down:

It was found that 52 per cent of the American people receive no services from a physician. I think these figures would largely correspond with conditions in this country. It was found that 79 per cent get no attention from a dentist, that 89 per cent receive no health examination or similar preventive service, and 62 per cent receive no medical, dental or eye care of any sort. These statistics are for the prosperous years of 1928-29. Conditions are indubitably much worse now.

On the other hand it was ascertained that although many doctors have good incomes, one-third of all the physicians in the United States had incomes of less than $2,500, even in 1929. More doctors were found in the $1,000 to $2,000 class than in any other. It was also found that 16 per cent of American families spent less than $10 a year for medical service; forty-six per cent spent less than $40 a year; four per cent spent more than $500, and one per cent spent more than $1,000.

A further argument I advanced at that time was:

It will be readily apparent that those who spent only $10 a year were not a matter of great importance, or even the $40 class, but for the four per cent whose expense for medical service was over $500, and that one family out of a hundred which was called upon to bear an expense of over $1,000, it was a very serious matter.

We must realize the impossibility of the ordinary family undertaking to cope with such a condition. I stated that there are means by which these matters could be easily taken care of. These services are costing the people of the United States approximately $30 per year, but it was found that for $36 per year the entire population could be given adequate medical service by bringing together those who lacked medical service and doctors who are idle. This is my second reason for supporting state medicine.

My third reason is consideration for the forgotten man, the doctor. We hear a lot about the forgotten man, but I submit that the doctor has been forgotten as much as anyone in the last thirty or forty years. In my previous remarks I stated that medical men were driving taxis and doing manual work in American cities, and I know for a fact that there are many medical men in Canada who have absolutely nothing to do. This is the case even though conditions have improved. Another matter that should be taken into consideration is the fact that the young men who graduate to-day in medicine are far superior to those who graduated thirty-five years ago. The training they are given to-day is far better. A young man entering medicine to-day must have a high standard of learning before he takes up the study of medicine; then he must put in four grilling years at college and one or two years in a hospital. I have no hesitation in saying that to-day the young interne in the hospital takes technical operations in his stride that would make the older practitioner in the country stop to take his breath before he would attempt them. These men are first class professional mechanics. They take on blood counts, spinal punctures, gastric irrigations and syphonage, things that many of us would not attempt without sending our patient to a hospital. Here you have these young men, turned out of the universities at the end of five or six years with a first class training, and with nothing to do. Why? Because in different communities, sparsely settled, the people cannot afford to support a doctor, and the consequence is, on the one hand, the people must go without medical attention, and, on the other, these young men with medical training must go without work.

I have referred to my own early experience —not outstanding at all; just the usual thing. After graduating I moved across from Winnipeg into a district that was starting as a workmen's suburb. There was no difficulty about getting work to do; I always had plenty of it. Morning, afternoon and night, and often all through the night, I was working; but like Old Mother Hubbard my cupboard was often quite bare, or pretty nearly so. I used to think in those days that if some authority, the state—I did not care who the state might be, whether the city council, the province or the government of Canada—would only come to the rescue in cases of that kind and give a man a decent living, he would go to his work with a better heart, and he would not have to go through such long gruelling hours of work without the burden of finance being settled. That is another thing that could be very readily cleared up if we had a form of state medicine.

Let us assume that state medicine is a good thing; let us assume that it is desirable in regard to all these things that we were talking about a little while ago, these deaths from diphtheria, typhoid fever and what not. Assume that state medicine is a good thing. Then what is the next thing to do? Is there a member in this house that does not understand the significance of modern day medicine? Is there a member in this house, be he medical man or otherwise, that does not know the history of diphtheria, of scarlet fever, of typhoid fever? Is there anyone who does not know that the incidence of death from diphtheria was reduced from eighty-six to six per cent with the discovery of antitoxin, and that with the discovery of the diphtheritic toxoid the death rate has been still further reduced? Is there anyone in this house who does not know that typhoid fever, which formerly in war time killed hundreds of thousands, more in fact than were destroyed by enemy attack, did not occur in the great war at all? Why? Because of inoculation. The same is true of smallpox. We never hear of smallpox to-day, or of cholera, although at one time the people dying in cholera epidemics were so numerous that they had to be carted away in wagon loads. But now it is unheard of in Canada. Why? Because from long years of vaccination and inoculation, from generation to generation, we are no longer susceptible. And the only common sense thing for us who are human creatures to do to-day, for human society as a whole to do, is to institute a regime that will insist upon inoculation and vaccination in every case.

Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that chickenpox, which is the mildest of the eruptive fevers, so mild that we do not even bother to quarantine for it in this country, if it were to occur among the aborigines in the South Seas or amongst the Indians in the north would cause them to die like flies? Why? Because they have not been vaccinated or exposed to the disease. So we need inoculation and vaccination. You say we are getting it? Yes, we are getting it for certain diseases. You cannot send your child to school without getting him vaccinated for smallpox, and there is inoculation for scarlet fever and typhoid and all that. That is fine, and we can look forward with confidence to the human race in all civilized countries being probably immune in the next ten or twenty years to the most infectious fevers. I believe we can do so.

But there are more subtle and more destructive and more dread diseases than can ever be found in school clinics. I refer to venereal diseases, the incidence of which is ever so much greater even than measles—and that is going a long way. If we want to reduce these present-day figures, if we want to improve our figures of maternal mortality and so forth, there is only one way to tackle the problem, and that is to make regulations under which human beings will be examined from time to time. At such time as they are examined, they can be vaccinated and inoculated. Incipient cases of heart disease will be discovered, and measures will be taken from month to month to ensure the health of expectant mothers until the advent of the new life. By these periodic health examinations the venereal terror—shall I call it that?—will not be able to hide behind a mantle of false modesty and shame. These things will be brought to light. These diseases will be attended to as sickness should always be attended to, regularly, definitely, and in the proper way.

It was mentioned a while ago that the children going to school are examined and inoculated. That is true, and conditions such as bad tonsils, bad teeth, bad eyesight, scrofulous glands and other conditions are recognized at the time of the examination. The child is prohibited from going to school until he is in proper condition; until, on the one hand, the case has been referred to a physician, and, on the other hand, the compulsory school regulations have been complied with by the parents. Then the absence of the child from the school leads to a nurse's visit to the home, and when she visits the home she ascertains the incidence of infectious fevers, scarlet fever, measles and what not. In that way a very fine work is being done by the school nurses. Then when patients enter general hospitals nowadays, they are usually subjected to a thorough examination by the staff doctor, rechecked by another physician; so nothing is left undone, and a great deal of disease is thus brought to light.

The government also has its health regulations governing appointments to the civil service, but I greatly fear, Mr. Speaker, that the health examinations for civil servants do not go quite far enough, and that the certificate is all too loosely prepared by the examining doctor, whereas if a thorough examination were made on these occasions a great deal of hidden disease would be brought to light.

What has been done in the way of state medicine in other countries? We have heard a good deal in this chamber about state medicine, and I think we all know that they have had it in Europe for fifty years, Germany being the first country to adopt it, if I remember well. The Scandinavian countries followed, and England went in for state medicine in 1911, when it adopted the panel system, under which invalids and sick people generally are given free medical attendance, free dental care, free medicine, and sick benefits in the form of state insurance during illness.

I have mentioned Russia, and I have here a little book entitled Red Medicine. It was written by two eminent men, Sir Arthur Newsholme, K.C.B., M.D., formerly principal medical officer of the local government board of England and Wales, and John Adams Kingsbury, secretary of the Millbank memorial fund, formerly commissioner of public charities of the city of New York. Sir Arthur Newsholme has edited a number of medical works. He personally undertook a survey covering all the European countries and edited a series of studies called International Studies on the Relation between the Private and Official practice of Medicine with special reference to the Prevention of Disease. In volume one he discusses medicine in the Netherlands, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Germany, Austria and Switzerland. In the second volume he deals with Belgium, France, Italy, Jugoslavia, Hungary, Poland and Czechoslovakia. In volume three he deals with England, Scotland, Wales and Ireland. He was entrusted with the special mission of making a survey of and an inquiry into the medical system as it operates in Russia. He and his associates travelled all over that country, visiting all the states and the large cities. His book is a very interesting one. He lays down a number of postulates as pertinent to the proper application of medicine. In general they coincide with those laid down by a group of medical men in the United States. I shall read these postulates and then state his observations.

1. The health and therefore the hygienic and medical care of every person in a community is a matter of concern and responsibility not only for himself, but also for every other person in the same community.

2. An organized community through its government is called on to concern itself with the practical application of all the known laws of health and of all remedial measures which will help in the restoration of health.

3. There is a lamentable amount of inadequacy—

Listen to that.

—and discontinuity in the medico-hygienic provision for the community—

Very true indeed.

—also that for a high proportion of the total sick, adequate medical care necessitates the organization of measures and of institutions beyond what the individual medical practitioner can provide.

To that I would say, "Hear, hear" without any hesitation.

4. For a large section of the population, in all countries, the cost of sickness is overwhelmingly great. . . .

"Hear, hear," again.

The cost of hospital treatment is beyond the means of a large proportion of the total population.

5. In order to supply adequate medical aid for all, either private charity, or provident insurance, or taxation . . . must be forthcoming in a continuous, even and adequate stream. No person should be allowed to die or suffer serious harm through the lack of shelter or food or medical aid.

6. Economy and wisdom alike demand that each illness shall be investigated and treated socially as well as medically. . . .

[Mr. Howden.]

7. Treatment should be available to the fullest extent necessitated by the patient's illness, irrespective of his financial circumstances.

8. Prevention is always more important than provision.

On those postulates concerning the application of medical science Sir Arthur Newsholme made a survey of all the countries of Europe. His findings are summed up in this final paragraph:

Measured against the postulates set out earlier in this chapter, it would seem fair to conclude that soviet Russia has, at least in many respects, come nearer to fulfilment of these postulates than any of the other countries studied by us or of which we have knowledge. Indeed, soviet medicine is largely based on the general propositions which are here enunciated as standards for adequate medical care of all people.

Now I am not advocating communism, and I am not a socialist particularly. But this is not the only book which contains reports along the same line; there are about a dozen such publications. I believe this writer to be beyond reproach; he is an English knight who has been intimately connected with the British government; he was sent to make a survey and an inquiry, and he made it. Russia is the only country of which we have knowledge where there is real, honest-to-goodness state medicine, one hundred per cent state medicine, the sort of state medicine which provides adequate coordinated care for all citizens of the country. The difference between state medicine and medicine as it is practised to-day can be explained in this way. Every one has heard of the Mayo clinic; we know there are clinics in New York, Montreal and other cities, possibly in the civic hospital of Ottawa. When you adopt a form of state medicine, there is a clinic at the disposal of every man in the land; he does not have to depend on this or that doctor, however capable or however inadequate he may happen to be; a systematized, coordinated service of medicine has, therefore, that distinct advantage.

One not infrequently hears insinuations and suggestions to the effect that when you have a body of publicly paid medical men, you do not get results. Well, if one cannot get results from paid medical men, one should not get results from a paid civil service, or from paid preachers, to whom the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) referred, or from any man who has a guaranteed, assured salary, because those people do not need to care. I should like to read an extract which seems to me very much to the point:

It is frequently argued that whole-time salaried appointments are destructive of personal initiative and inhibitory to continued effort. This incidentally is a grave and undeserved reflection on present whole-time officers in the medical and scholastic professions. The reflection is deserved in individual instances, and these instances in the aggregate may bulk somewhat largely, but in my judgment they form but a small proportion of the total. In these instances security of tenure of office reduces effort and short of this may and sometimes does stereotype and render static present methods of work.

But it cannot be said that the intellectual stagnation and moral lethargy, when they occur in officials, are their special possession. With these occasional accompaniments of a too sure livelihood may be compared the medical work of an occasional private medical practitioner in a poor district, his hurried interviews with his patients, his too frequent treatment of many patients without diagnosis, the pile of weekly medical journals which one can see unopened on his table, and the inability to attend the meetings of medical societies, still less to cultivate post-graduate work.

I believe that a regularly paid medical man, one who accepts a fee for regular service, is probably just about as dependable as the man who is driven to death with overwork and harassed by underpay, and I should be very much disposed to think that if such a man were given a living wage he would render very much better service to the state and to his fellow man.

I cannot possibly hope to conclude on this occasion; I shall have to wait until another time to say all that I have to say on the subject.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): There is no doubt whatever that the previous speakers have voiced the opinion of the vast majority of the people of Canada. I am sure we all appreciate the frank and forcible presentation of the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden). I may say in passing that though he may not know he is a socialist, I have rarely heard the socialist case presented with greater force than he has put it before us this afternoon. It is a strange thing that though the majority of the members of the house are in general agreement on the desirability of much greater health service for the people of the country, nothing very much is likely to happen as a result of this debate this afternoon. It is passing strange that that should be so. In matters of this kind we in this house are, after all, little more than an academic debating society.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We all recognize to-day that something in the nature of state medicine is desirable, first of all on humanitarian grounds, and, in the second place, on the grounds of economy and efficiency; yet there are certain obstacles that stand in the way, obstacles that are hardly understood by the general public outside, obstacles that make a great part of the work of the house quite futile.

I am very glad that this question has been introduced by a Liberal. The Liberals here have a majority of some one hundred members, and if they desired to do so they could give us action along this line to-morrow. There is no doubt about that, and yet nothing happens.

There are probably two difficulties that will be brought forward if we get to the point where the government must speak on this matter. One difficulty is the question of jurisdiction. The British North America Act will be brought out, as it always is, and we shall be told very clearly that this is a provincial matter and that the dominion government can do nothing about it. The British North America Act is for the government a very present help in time of trouble, that is, whenever action is required. And if, by any chance, the British North America Act is not sufficient, we have, of course, the financial difficulties, and it will be said to be inopportune at this particular time for the government to take action. Is that not really the situation in which we find ourselves?

Only this morning my attention was called to a passage in the Edmonton Bulletin in which the new Liberal candidate, Mr. R. C. Marshall, was said to have sounded the keynote of a progressive Liberal program. Among other things he advocates old age pensions for all requiring them at fifty-eight years of age or sixty years at most, and "adequate enough to assure a decent standard of living and not a mere pittance." He wants to make it possible for older men and women to get out of industry, knowing they will be comfortable in their declining years, and make room for the younger generation, and so on. I have no doubt that Mr. Marshall would like to get some votes, and this is something that is popular throughout the country. If a candidate can tell people that they are likely to get pensions at sixty, or better still at fifty-eight, he may get some votes. But I do not believe that this kind of statement is made merely for vote-getting; it is made because the people generally feel the need for social services of this kind.

What the hon. member for St. Boniface said of the ordinary man is quite true. Not only can he not get help in time of sickness, but a great many people as they approach the end of their lives, or at least the end of the working period of their lives, are in a state of great anxiety about the means of supporting themselves in their declining years. These and other considerations give great concern to the people of Canada, and anybody who will advocate such measures as the one we are now discussing may be sure to receive support.

The thing I object to is that any man who is intelligent, any man who knows the workings of this house, will venture to get up on a platform at election time and promise that if he is elected he will bring about these reforms.

Mr. Marshall is appealing on behalf of Liberalism. If the Liberal party were honest at this time, it would repudiate the statements of the candidate at Edmonton. In parliament to-day we find ourselves in this difficulty. We are allowed by the government to go ahead with this debate, which may last the whole day; a great many admirable reasons for the adoption of state medicine will be put on Hansard; and then the whole proposal will be left in cold storage for another year or another two or three years, possibly until another election, when some other honest and earnest people will get up in the house and advocate a measure of this kind.

Is this sort of thing to go on indefinitely? I do not like to be dragged into party politics; but I say that when the government has a majority quite capable of putting through a measure of this kind, the least it can do is to tell the people of the country as a whole where it stands on these matters, and that it is or is not going to do anything about the question. That is the least that can be done to maintain anything like political honesty in this chamber or in the country.

It is not my purpose this afternoon to give any lengthy presentation of this case. That perhaps can be better done by some of the medical men in the house. All I want to do is to assure the house that we in our group are heartily in sympathy with state medicine. It is just part of the program we should like to see adopted, by which the welfare of the community as a whole would be given first consideration.

I might place on the record a summary of the case for greater health provision for the sick by quoting a few brief passages from those who have given considerable attention to this matter. I have in my hand a pamphlet entitled Social Work and the People's Health, being the report of an address given by Miss Charlotte Whitton, executive director of the Canadian Welfare Council, before the Registered Nurses' Association of Ontario on February 5, 1936:

> Extent and nature of the problem: At any time about two per cent of the working population are sick from one cause or another; at the date of the 1931 census one out of every twenty-three workers had lost time in the year for illness, and the average lost time for this one worker in every twenty-three (that is over four per cent) was over twelve weeks. Altogether for the whole working population an average loss of about ten full days per annum due to illness was recorded. On June 1, 1931, one per cent of all workers were off work due to illness. One reliable estimate reports about seventy per cent of all school children as suffering from remedial defects; about thirty per cent of persons from eighteen to forty years of age as incapacitated for arduous labour from largely preventable causes, and sixty per cent of those from forty to sixty years as in need of care for controllable if not preventable conditions.

And again:

> Many of our people are not regularly employed, even in good times, because of the seasonal nature of employment. Sometimes as high as forty per cent of the working population will have some time off during the year, and this may run as high as twenty-four and twenty-five weeks for certain activities. It was estimated in the unemployment insurance calculations that 860,000 wage workers are seasonally or casually employed and that about 730,000 workers are occupied in agriculture.

It is manifest from these figures it is quite impossible that the ordinary insurance scheme would cover the needs of the great majority of the sick people of this country. Let me give another quotation:

> Millions of dollars, hundreds of units and thousands of personnel are already an integral part of public health services or services so substantially aided by public funds as to fall justifiably within the category of publicly provided services. Thousands of qualified persons are engaged in private practice in medical, nursing, dental and pharmaceutical pursuits. Hospitalization services indicate the extent of Canada's existing investment in health. In 860 hospitals, 11,416 doctors are now members of staff or caring for patients, with 726 medical staff and 733 internes in full-time employment; 5,210 graduate nurses and 9,472 student nurses are employed. Annual maintenance costs exceed $38,000,000 and 51,577 beds are available for hospital patients. Fully twenty per cent of this care is given to non-pay patients, while thirty per cent to thirty-five per cent of all patients are indigent.

That gives some idea of the extent of the interest we have in this problem.

One more brief quotation from another pamphlet by Miss Whitton, entitled Britain's Social Aid and Ours. In Great Britain, where the hon. member for St. Boniface has said there is a thoroughly worked out scheme of health insurance, there is also provision for medical assistance for the indigent.

> There is thus provided through the public assistance committees, which in Canada might be described as municipal social welfare committees or boards, a complete local service including institutional, and hospital, and outdoor relief and medical relief in their own homes for all persons who are in need thereof for causes other than unemployment, or who are not eligible for aid under unemployment insurance or assistance, health or pension plans.

In this country already medical men are beginning to work along the line of more systematic provision for the sick. I have before me a pamphlet containing a reprint of an article by J. A. Hannah, M.D., in The Canadian Doctor. It is entitled, The Development of a Voluntary Plan for Prepayment of Medical Services. This indicates that the medical men realize the necessity for a much more systematic way of dealing with the sick. There has been worked out a very interesting computation as to what it would cost if cooperative arrangements were made. I quote:

After extensive search and reading we were able to compile a table somewhat after the following:

Home calls—1 per person per year at $3	$ 3 00
Office calls—1·5 per person per year at $2	3 00
Surgical operations—0·08 per person per year at $50 each	4 00
Hospital care—1·3 days per person per year at $3.50 per day	4 55
Drugs	50
X-Ray	1 00
Administration	2 00
Total for medical care	$18 05
Dental	4 00
Nursing—0·5 per person per year at $5 per day	2 50
Total	$24 55

Now, Mr. Speaker, it would seem that if it were possible that some arrangement could be arrived at, either a voluntary or a state arrangement, by which we could ensure that people could be taken care of for $24.55 a year and the doctors receive adequate maintenance, this would be highly desirable in the interests of the public.

Mr. POWER: If I may interrupt, I suppose my hon. friend knows that there is some such scheme in force in Toronto at a fee of $24.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, I understand that. I think that fee was based on these calculations.

Mr. POWER: It is operating in Toronto to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: There is one at less than that in Calgary.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Undoubtedly if we had it under state control and on a very wide scale, that sum could be brought down considerably. I believe in some Scandinavian countries it is down to something like $16 per person.

I should like further to present to the house a few considerations which have been advanced in a memorandum of the health league of Canada and which seem to me to summarize the situation very well. I quote three isolated paragraphs:

If the dominion would finance a program of health promotion similar to that established in the United States, under the social security program, local health needs could more advantageously be served, the dominion could retain supervision over conditional grants for health purposes, could approve projects to be undertaken by the provinces, and could coordinate the public health program for all of Canada.

Again:

As long as the dominion continues to regard public health as a matter solely of provincial responsibility, and refuses to recognize the national health aspects of child and maternal health, and of such diseases as tuberculosis, cancer and venereal disease, the general improvement of public health of the nation will be retarded.

And still again:

The federal government should not only assume its responsibility in this field of public service, but also should plan, finance and supervise the administration of a comprehensive national health program. In carrying out such a program the cooperation of voluntary organizations will continue to be of prime importance.

Mr. POWER: What is the date?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am afraid this memorandum is not dated, but it is of recent date. It came to me along with several resolutions passed recently which, I believe, should be placed on record. The first, from the Canadian Medical Association, says:

Whereas venereal diseases constitute a problem of major importance; and

Whereas Canada, for eleven years, had a most effective plan for the control of venereal disease involving dominion and provincial cooperation and organized education; and

Whereas, in 1932, the division of venereal disease in the dominion government was dissolved and grants to the provinces for this purpose cancelled, also grants for educational purposes discontinued only to be restored in part; and

Whereas three regional conferences held in 1931, as well as the Dominion Council of Health, at a meeting held in December, 1931, all recommended that the scheme be extended and grants increased;

Therefore be it resolved that the dominion government be memorialized, and asked to reestablish the division of venereal diseases in the federal Department of Pensions and National Health; to reinstate the grants to the provinces; and to make adequate provision for educational purposes throughout Canada to the end that the Canadian scheme be once more put on an effective basis.

This resolution was passed at Ottawa in June, 1937.

It would seem to me that although we are not likely to have anything like a comprehensive scheme of state medicine, the least the government could do would be to comply with the terms of this resolution.

One other resolution along similar lines, which seemed to me a reasonable one, was passed at the annual meeting of the Canadian Public Health Association held at Ottawa on the same date. It states:

That whereas the venereal disease problem is a matter of national importance, previously dealt with most efficiently in Canada by a carefully coordinated scheme involving co-operation between the dominion and the provinces, financial and otherwise, and carried on by virtue of the existence of a venereal disease division in the dominion Department of Health, assistance to organized education and propaganda;

And whereas three conferences of clinicians called by the dominion government in Edmonton, Toronto and Montreal in 1931 made various recommendations, practically none of which have been carried out;

And whereas the Dominion Council of Health in December, 1931, endorsed these recommendations urging continuance of grants and extension of the scheme,

Therefore be it resolved that the dominion government be memorialized and asked to reinstate the grants to the provinces, to re-establish the division of venereal diseases in the dominion government, and to make adequate provision for educational purposes throughout Canada to the end that the Canadian scheme be once more put on an effective basis.

I commend these resolutions once more to the attention of the minister.

Sometimes we have been inclined to think that Canada is in the very forefront of development. As a matter of fact, in matters of public welfare Canada lags far behind. The hon. member for St. Boniface, who preceded me, told of some of the achievements in soviet Russia. I was reading only a few days ago a book entitled, Social Work and Legislation in Sweden, published by the Royal Social Board. This is a survey, published by order of the Swedish government. I wish I had time to place some of the facts contained in the book before the house; but in view of the long list of speakers, I shall refer only to the work itself. As I look over the paragraphs, I am delighted to think of what could be accomplished in Canada, and what actually is being accomplished in other countries.

The following headings and subheadings will indicate the variety of subjects discussed:

Social Insurance:
- Accident insurance.
- Sickness benefit funds.
- National pensions, children's allowances and compensation for blindness.
- Pension funds, endowment insurance societies, etc.
- Relief and pensions for seamen.

Hygiene and Care of the Sick:
- Organization of public hygiene and care of the sick.
- Private organizations:
  - The Red Cross.
  - Swedish Public Baths Association.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Hygiene and Care of the Sick—Concluded
- Combating national diseases:
  - Tuberculosis.
  - Venereal diseases
  - Diseases of the teeth.
  - Cancer
- Care of the abnormal:
  - Mental disease.
  - Care of the mentally deficient.
  - Care of epileptics.
  - Cripples.
  - The blind.
  - The deaf and the deaf-mutes.

It may be all very well to have instituted within the last few days a trans-Canada air service; it may be all very well to boast of our natural resources, and of the enormous sums being piled up by certain individuals and corporations in Canada, but I suggest it would be a great deal better for Canada if we could boast that no unemployed man or no sick person goes neglected. Canada might then be laying the foundations of true national greatness.

I hope that to-day, as has so often happened, the government will not close the debate by pointing out jurisdiction and financial difficulties which may lie in the way. I do not ask that the whole of medical aid should be brought under a centralized agency, but I cannot see that there is any reason why the dominion government could not have an active health department which would help to co-ordinate the work of the provinces and municipalities, which would undertake certain types of work common to all the provinces and, above all, which would give financial backing to the various schemes already under way.

Mr. H. R. FLEMING (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, in listening to the speech of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), I found it difficult to determine the intention behind the resolution appearing on the order paper. Does he mean complete socialization of state medicine, or does he mean the extension of state influence and control in the health field? It is difficult to find uniformity of opinion, even among medical men, on the question of state medicine. I take the term to mean a system under which the state would assume responsibility for all medical men, under which all those engaged in medical services would be employees of the state.

As state medicine has been widely discussed and as the subject is of vital importance, it is essential that we should keep in mind the distinction between socialization of medicine, which I have interpreted state medicine to mean, and other forms of cooperation in the health field, such as health insurance.

Therefore, when I say I am opposed to state medicine, it does not mean that I am opposed to government participation in the health field. It would be ridiculous for me to take that attitude. For many centuries governmental and public authorities have been forcibly removing from communities those who were suffering from contagious diseases. At the present time we have our municipal, provincial and federal health services. I believe that few doctors, if any, object to this in principle. The Canadian Medical Association at its last convention held in the city of Ottawa endorsed the principle of health insurance. Canada has lagged behind most of the countries of the civilized world in this respect. There is no country in the world to-day which disclaims all responsibility for the care of the sick. I understand that some forty countries have some form of state insurance or have assumed other responsibilities.

The only country that has state medicine according to my interpretation is Russia. The system in Russia may look good on paper, but if we consider the figures published by the League of Nations we find that that country is the focal point of typhus infection for all Europe. In 1883 Germany made it compulsory for all those earning less than a certain income to carry a form of state insurance, but the state contributed nothing to the insuring societies or organizations. In England the employer, the employee and the state all contribute. Austria adopted a system in 1888; Hungary adopted one in 1891, and it spread to other countries of the world until, as I said before, forty countries have some form of state insurance. In most of these countries no one concerned is satisfied with the way in which the system has worked. The main failure seems to be not so much bad organization, the inertia of the doctors or the failure to realize the importance of preventive medicine, as the inability of the countries to provide funds to ensure adequate medical services.

The cost of illness in Canada is $23 per capita yearly. For the state to assume this responsibility would mean the staggering sum of $253,000,000 added to the annual taxation, and there would be no assurance that these costs would not be greatly increased when the medical services were free. This estimation does not take into account the extension of preventive medicine or of medical research. I should like to quote Hon. Dr. J. M. Uhrich, Minister of Public Health for Saskatchewan. He says:

> But remember: Somebody will have to pay for it. Do not let anyone run away with the idea it is not going to cost anything. Money does not grow on gooseberry bushes, and the only way such services can be paid for is out of the pockets of the people themselves.

The consideration of a state scheme of insurance is ruled out by the British North America Act. Under that act the federal government was given jurisdiction over quarantine and the establishment of marine hospitals, and to the provinces was given jurisdiction over hospitals, asylums and charitable institutions. Public health was not a matter of concern to the framers of the British North America Act. The broader jurisdiction in the health fields was given to the provinces, and the provinces have accepted full responsibility from confederation down to our own days. In the matter of public health the dominion has been able to cooperate with the provinces. The privy council of Great Britain found that part IV of the Employment and Social Insurance Act, which was passed by this house some years ago, was unconstitutional, and at the present time the house is circumscribed on this particular subject.

However, I should like to make a few observations on the question of medical services in Canada. First of all, let me register my objection to a system or scheme of state medicine. It has never been established that any fundamental fault is to be found in the system under which we are working. There is no evidence of widespread neglect of those who need medical care. The medical system as such is not responsible for all conditions and it cannot cure all diseases. Sickness is due to many causes outside its province. A system of socialized medicine would bring many serious disadvantages. Medical services can best be advanced by other and less radical means. The financial aspects of medical care can be met acceptably in various ways without socialization. Wider and more effective use of medical resources could be effected without socialization, and a realization of better social and economic conditions would facilitate more adequate medical care. Socialization would not be practical from any point of view, particularly under the democratic system.

Some of the disadvantages of socialization are that the quality of medical service would tend to deteriorate. There would be a tendency to standardize treatment, and routine and perfunctory work would result. The incentive to do good work would be removed and personal responsibility would be lowered. The old relation between the doctor and the patient would be destroyed; competition would be removed and medical progress would be obstructed. There would be less interest in work, less professional interest, and research and recognition of new forms of treatment would be hindered. Greater frequency of periodic health examinations would not bring expected good because they would be superficial and careless. Socialized medicine would tend to increase the number of faddists and quacks; for dissatisfaction with established forms of treatment would drive many to seek other forms of relief. It would result in an enormous bureaucracy with all its disadvantages.

As far as the public is concerned, it would tend to break down self-respect, self-reliance and pride; it would discourage thrift and individual responsibility for one's well-being; it would encourage feigned illness and treatment of many trivial disorders.

My experience as a municipal doctor bears me out in this statement. Many times I have been called twenty miles out in the country for some trivial ailment. The patient could very easily come to the doctor's office. One other abuse was very common. In free hospitalization a patient would ask to be taken to hospital for a common cold. Why shouldn't he go to the hospital? It was free. They paid taxes. The onus of compelling the patient to stay at home was on the doctor. And what excuse could be given if the patient subsequently developed pneumonia?

There is yet another angle. Need I point out to the house the difficulty of Canada competing in world markets if saddled with the financial burden of medical care?

My main objection, of course, is to the doctor becoming the paid employee of the state; for I object whole-heartedly to regimentation and bureaucracy in the care of the sick.

Our medical service is not perfect. Doctors in Canada make no pretence that it is. We have fought persistently to make it better. We have made great strides in the control of communicable disease. In the past twenty-five years the profession has increased the expectancy of life on this continent by fourteen years. Medical service has vastly improved and been extended. I quote the Hon. Doctor Uhrich, Minister of Public Health for Saskatchewan:

> We have fought numerous battles with death on many fronts and have won signal victories. Eighty-five years ago, one out of every four Irish immigrants who came to Canada died of cholera; to-day we do not know it as a cause of death in Canada. We have so far eliminated smallpox as a cause of death that, whereas formerly whole villages fell victims to the scourge, we had in 1931 only three deaths in a population of ten million.
> We have defeated death on a dozen fronts; we have pushed him back from trench to trench.

I think, Mr. Speaker, it is safe to say that no one in Canada need suffer needlessly at the present time for want of medical attention.

Yet the system of medication has failings, and we as doctors would be foolish not to admit it. Perhaps it is the fault of the "system" or, more properly speaking, the conditions under which we have come to work. I can appreciate that the sponsor of this resolution (Mr. McIvor) has seen these failings, has seen that health conditions could be improved, and has jumped to the conclusion that state medicine is the solution. I say "jumped" to the conclusion, because I do not believe that if the intervening stages had been carefully thought out or if the idea were given the practical test, the idealism which has prompted this resolution would be realized.

I intend to vote against it because I believe it would benefit in the end neither the doctors, the patients nor the general public. No better reasons could be found. I will say this, that I feel confident if the members of my profession were convinced that the last two named parties would greatly benefit, they would be the first to advocate state medicine; for I must say for my fellow practitioners that they are, as a whole, the highest-minded group of men one could be privileged to meet.

We hear so often in the house of a distinguished member of the bar; that so-and-so was a brilliant jurist, an outstanding lawyer; or we read in the papers of counsel in the court room pleading some case. He has all the surroundings that people like to read about, a crowded court room, judge and officers of the court in their robes of office. But look at the picture of the medical doctor in a lowly cottage on the frozen plains of Saskatchewan—miles from civilization—his only light a coal-oil lamp, rendering the greatest service that mankind can offer, saving some poor creature from death, or alleviating pain and suffering—and the public know nothing of it; this house hears nothing of that.

The record of the profession will bear me out. We have realized to the full that our business is to deal in terms of human life. Is there any other profession which has a more consistent record of public service?

Anyone who knows the work of the Canadian Medical Association is fully aware that it is always seeking to improve as well as to maintain the ethics of the profession, while at the same time endeavouring to raise the standard of practice. We have crusaded for health; we have been in the vanguard in trying to improve social conditions; we have given in great measure of our time and energy that the sum total of human happiness might be increased.

For these reasons it could hardly be charged that the doctors are thinking only of self-interest if they disapprove state medicine. I cannot speak for all the members of my profession; but as a medical man knowing something of medical practice, I can truthfully say I am firmly convinced that state medicine—particularly under present conditions—is not the solution of our health problems. It just wouldn't work out.

There are certain things the state can do. There are certain things it has done in the past and could continue and extend in the future. There are other activities which could be properly assumed as a public responsibility. I am thinking of research and health insurance, for instance. But within certain limits it should be confined. The source from which medical practice flows, from which it derives its force, is individual effort, and the service is essentially one of personal relationship between doctor and patient.

I have admitted that community health service has failings, that it could be improved. One of my chief objections to state medicine would be that you cannot institutionalize personal relationships. Every doctor realizes it is of primary consideration, if a cure is to be effected, that the patient have full confidence in the doctor.

Under the state system, I am afraid, the tendency would be for too much of the work to become routine investigation, as doctors are only human. People would become human guinea-pigs, instead of patients who are paying for a service and have the right to demand it. The doctor, moreover, would depend for his livelihood no longer on his reputation for efficiency, ability and service, but on his ability to please his superiors, or perhaps the politicians. At the present time a doctor lives by his ability and is recompensed accordingly. Under a state system there is every reason to believe he might be able to subsist or become successful by his ability to "wangle." Nothing could be more disastrous to the medical men themselves, as well as to public health, than that the ability to play politics should determine their rate of promotion. Much as we dislike to admit it, that is the tendency in public service.

What disaster would we not be courting if we permitted our health service to be inoculated with the deadening drug of indifference? That is what we are risking if we take the service from personal initiative and rob proven ability of its just rewards.

There can be no question in the mind of anyone who knows human nature that a state system would kill a doctor's initiative. At the present time, if a government, federal, provincial or municipal, employs $2,000 a year men, it obtains $2,000 a year service.

I cannot see how any state system could make provision for the greatly varying abilities of doctors. It cannot be done on the basis of preparatory training, even as regards the initial salary; for of two men with identical training one may be a "washout" and the other a very capable doctor. Will it be possible to give the majority of work to the competent doctor under a state system? The energetic doctor, who would probably be the capable doctor, would probably do the majority of the work. But if he saw his fellow "washout" getting an equal salary, I fear for both morale and efficiency. Besides, I would wish to know pretty definitely "who" or what was to be the determining factor in a doctor's salary or rate of promotion before I would give any support to a state scheme.

Even for the competent physicians who were sincerely endeavouring to perform their duties, I am afraid cases would become routine assignments instead of a labour of love. The doctor would not have to stake his reputation on every case; he would have to perform only his "duty". He would be robbed of the incentive of doing his very best for the patients under his care. And may I stop to ask this question: Who is to assume responsibility for malpractice, let alone the unavoidable casualties? The responsibility for any person who dies while under state care, any case which does not prove satisfactory to the patient or relatives, would be laid at the door of the government.

Now governments have been blamed justly and unjustly for many things; but is any government prepared to assume responsibility for all the ills of mankind? That one fact alone is enough to make most hon. members vote against this resolution. Imagine a government being turned out of power because an influenza epidemic started during its regime; or one of the members of the house trembling for reelection because the Jones family's myriad members blame a government doctor because little Johnnie isn't getting well fast enough! At that, it might stimulate a campaign for eradication of disease. But until Canada became a disease-free area, I tremble for a parliamentarian's existence.

If hon. members are willing to assume all these responsibilities, to shoulder all the ills of mankind, I wonder if they would consider whether the sacrifice they are ready to make for the public would be really worth while.

I have pointed out that the service which could be expected from a personnel of state doctors would not be of as high a type as under individual competition, because initiative would be killed, incentive to do best work gone, while the dead wood of the personnel would remain. For these reasons alone the public would not be getting the best service, to which it is entitled, and which it is imperative it should receive.

As I suppose every hon. member knows, sickness is a convenient excuse for avoiding many things. Our medical knowledge is not and never will be sufficient for us to say definitely whether a man is sick or not. We can say that there is nothing organically wrong with him, but we cannot say that there is nothing wrong with him. The mere fact that he wishes to complain of sickness means that there is some maladjustment in his make-up; even laziness could be considered to be that. At any rate, it is a bad habit, and state medicine would assuredly be imposed upon.

The healthy, of course, for their own protection must always care for the sick. This is one of the reasons why it is easy for people outside the medical profession to stimulate interest in public health. But I am concerned now with the fact that in recent years the burden of payment for medical services has fallen upon the middle class. The rich can afford to pay for it and the poor get it free. That is one of the difficulties of our system. We might be in a better position if we had adopted the Chinese system of paying the doctor so much to keep us well. But the Canadian system has been that doctors are called in only in the case of sickness. As was pointed out this afternoon, doctors themselves have assumed the responsibility of keeping people well by wholesale vaccinations and inoculations against the various infectious and contagious diseases. For years we have fought to improve public health.

There is still another phase of the question. As mentioned before, the burden of medical costs falls upon the employee in the lower wage brackets. Because he cannot afford a proper diet or because of the general conditions under which he lives, he is more often ill than those who are living under better conditions. In his budget he does not make any provision for the event of sickness. He will not say, "This year I am going to break my leg," or "Next year I am going to have my little boy's appendix out." Customarily he works upon the assumption that he is going to be perfectly well. And sickness is a very expensive proposition.

Whether or not health insurance should be compulsory is a debatable point. Personally I would favour a compulsory plan because it would not be as expensive as the voluntary plan. I should, however, like to see federal responsibility for the unemployed and indigent, because there is little doubt that we are approaching the time when relief will have to be assumed as a national responsibility, also health insurance for at least those in the low-wage brackets. I should like also to see the government give extensive grants for preventive medicine and for medical research. In that manner we could safeguard and improve the health of our people without recourse to state medicine or the socialization of medicine.

I plead with all hon. members. Do not give ear to those who would take away from the medical profession their individuality and self-respect. With that assurance I am sure that the medical profession will re-pledge ourselves to the public service and well-being.

Mr. J. K. BLAIR (Wellington North): While I favour state medicine to some extent, I do not believe it is the duty of this government to deal with the problem in an expensive manner; it should remain with the provinces, just as in the case of relief. This government does not administer relief; it is controlled largely by the provinces and subsidized by the federal government. The provinces know better the conditions in their localities. I believe the same is true with regard to medicine. There are occasions, I believe, when the dominion government could properly subsidize the provincial governments for some purposes. For instance, many cases of confinement are not paid for. I am sure that every doctor in this chamber can find, on looking through his books, as many as six confinements in one home, for none of which he has been paid. I do not think that should be so. The difficulty is that one cannot tell whether a person is indigent. It is said that we should prove indigence and put in a bill; but this involves a great deal of trouble, and it seems to me that in the rural districts the doctors should be entitled to receive compensation in respect of confinements which after two years have not been paid for.

The second proposition brought forward was a payment of two dollars a month per capita. Hon. members must realize that this would involve an expenditure of $264,000,000, no small amount for the Dominion of Canada. Another movement that is on foot is to centralize maternity work in the larger hospitals. That is a sad mistake, because the maternity mortality in hospitals in such cities as Toronto has been very high. That point has been taken up; I have mentioned it for four or five years; now the city of Toronto will not furnish a report of its maternity mortality; at any rate I have tried for the last three years to get it, and because of my habit of announcing what it is they refuse to give it. The maternity death rate is much lower in the rural districts, in the towns and villages, than in the cities.

A service which I regard as extremely important is the provision by our provincial government of a travelling clinic for tuberculosis; it also has a free clinic in all our hospitals which diagnoses cases of tuberculosis and of venereal diseases. In my opinion people should be required to get a certificate of health before they are married. I know of many instances where a tubercular patient has gone away to get married; I know also of not a few instances where patients suffering from other contagious diseases, including venereal diseases, have got married. These things are disgusting; there should be some way to prevent them, by requiring a certificate from the superintendent of the hospital or some other doctor, after an X-ray has been taken, guaranteeing the patient's freedom from the disease. This would mean much to our civilization; it would keep many people out of our asylums and prevent other serious consequences.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (Middlesex East): I have been deeply interested in the debate that has taken place this afternoon. I followed carefully the remarks of the mover of the resolution (Mr. McIvor) and what was said by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden). One could sense the view that would be taken by the hon. member for Fort William, who moved the resolution, inasmuch as he is a fisher of men. He kept his argument on that plane and I do not think it did him any harm. I was greatly taken by the remarks of the hon. member for St. Boniface. There is no question about it, he has made a great study of this whole problem and he speaks from a wealth of experience as well as from his heart. He left a deep impression on me, and, I believe, on the house.

Like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), I lack the necessary equipment to speak from a medical point of view; but I wish to tell a story about one disease in Canada, a story that may encourage a good many people. I am going to discuss briefly a subject that has never, to any extent, occupied the attention of this house. It has received scant attention, not because it is not of vital importance but because, since it deals with a matter of public health, it is primarily a responsibility of the provinces. I refer to the prevention and treatment of tuberculosis. In Ottawa, the federal Department of Health and the Canadian Tuberculosis Association undertake the collection, correlation and publication of statistics bearing upon this subject, and upon these statistics I wish to base my few remarks.

I first became interested in tuberculosis while visiting the Queen Alexandra sanatorium situated on the outskirts of London, Ontario, and in my constituency of Middlesex East. This sanatorium, one of the largest in Canada, and probably one of the largest on the north American continent, houses 600 patients in all stages of the disease. Such a large concentration of his fellow citizens brings home forcibly to the visitor the seriousness and extent of this malady. His Excellency, Earl Grey, at one time Governor General of Canada, dedicated the Queen Alexandra sanatorium on April 5, 1910, but in studying the history of the institution we must go back a few years. In 1908 the late Sir Adam Beck and Lady Beck, realizing the urgent need of providing some means of caring for those suffering from tuberculosis, stressed the importance of a sanatorium as a centre from which to combat the disease in that district, and under Sir Adam's leadership some twenty prominent citizens of London were instrumental in organizing in 1909 the London Health Association. The board of directors as elected at the first meeting were: President, the Hon. Adam Beck; Vice-President, Mr. J. B. Smallman; and Honorary Secretary-Treasurer, Mr. H. E. Gates, with seventeen directors.

There followed the establishment of clinics and the examination of contact cases. Many children were found to have been exposed to the disease, and the question of caring for them presented a serious problem. It was not safe to put them with adult patients; for some were suffering from the disease in an advanced form. Certainly a preventorium for children was urgently needed. The London Health Association, discharging the heavy duty of the sanatorium, asked the members of the Women's Sanatorium Aid Society to assist them by raising the sum of $10,000 for the erection of a building. The society was given three years in which to raise the fund; but they worked so successfully that it was raised in fourteen months, and in June, 1914, the preventorium, with beds for thirty children, was officially opened by Sir John Gibson, lieutenant-governor of Ontario.

Then came the world war. The first soldier patient was admitted to the sanatorium in 1915. By the end of the following year the number of those being treated was fifty-one, and the buildings soon became crowded to their utmost capacity, necessitating emergency accommodation. In 1918 the Marion Beck nurses' residence was donated by Sir Adam and Lady Beck as a token of thanksgiving for the restoration to health of their daughter. In 1921 Lady Beck passed away. Sir Adam died on August 15, 1925. Much sorrow was felt when these deaths occurred; for these good people were the essence of self-sacrifice, charity and goodness towards their fellow men.

Mention should also be made at this time of the erection of the veterans' memorial building, which was a gift of the Byron sanatorium branch of the tuberculous veterans' section of the Canadian Legion, B.E.S.L., as a tribute to those men who during the period of their own illness had unselfishly given of their strength to help others. One-half of the building contains a rest room for the use of visitors to the sanatorium, and the other half is used by the officers of the Byron branch. On the occasion of the dedication and the opening ceremony, held on November 23, 1930, the Hon. Colonel Murray MacLaren, then Minister of Pensions and National Health, was present and officiated.

For some years the quarters provided for the members of the staff of the Queen Alexandra sanatorium who were engaged in active work in connection with the field of tuberculosis research had been most inadequate. Through the generosity of Mr. W. L. Mara the Mara laboratory was founded. This laboratory is most modern and up to date from the point of view of scientific equipment and X-ray apparatus, and it was erected as a memorial to the Mara family. Doctor J. G. FitzGerald, dean of the faculty of medicine of the university of Toronto, officially opened the building on October 28, 1932.

The area particularly served by the Queen Alexandra sanatorium comprises the counties of Middlesex, Elgin, Lambton, Kent, Huron, Perth and Oxford, although patients are admitted from any county in Ontario. Clinics for the free diagnosing and examination of contacts and suspected cases are conducted as follows: In London, at the Victoria hospital, twice weekly; at the Westminster hospital, three times weekly, ex-soldiers only; at St. Joseph's hospital, weekly; and monthly in Ingersoll, Goderich, Sarnia, Stratford, Chatham and Woodstock. These clinics, which require the services of two full-time senior staff physicians, and one half-time stenographer, are financed through the sale of Christmas seals in the counties mentioned. In addition to the diagnostic clinics there are four outpatient clinics a week, as the sanatorium to which patients previously treated in the sanatorium return for their pneumothorax treatments. An average of seventy-five patients a month receive these treatments. The sanatorium property consists of 543 acres of land, and it is necessary to rent an additional 150 acres. An accredited herd of 180 holstein and jersey cattle and a flock of some 3,000 white leghorn hens provide the milk and fresh eggs so essential in the diet of the tuberculosis patient. The sanatorium has its own pasteurizing plant; a large garden produces fresh fruit and vegetables in season. For some time now the sanatorium has been administered under the very able leadership of Doctor D. W. Crombie, medical superintendent.

[Mr. Ross (Middlesex).]

That is the statistical part. I have some personal touches which may be of interest to hon. members. As the sanatorium is situated in my riding, I have had opportunity time and time again to visit it, and have had many discussions with the staff physicians. These lead me to the comforting impression that much has been done and is being done to stem the ravages of the white plague. Among those interested in the disease there is an appreciable feeling of optimism as to what may be done in the future, both in the treatment of the individual patient and in prevention. This feeling of optimism appears to be growing. As a layman I am struck by one outstanding fact, so obvious that the mention of it seems like the utterance of a truism, that is that tuberculosis is preventable.

Tuberculosis is an infectious disease. It is caused by a known organism called the tubercle bacillus, which has been recognized for about fifty years. This germ is transmitted from the diseased to the healthy. Inasmuch as the disease is caused by a known organism, it differs from the so-called degenerative diseases. Being caused by a known agency, tuberculosis should theoretically be preventable. In spite of this, however, there were 6,591 deaths from this disease in the dominion in 1936. This is not said in criticism of the agencies which are engaged in anti-tuberculosis work. To them goes our warmest praise; for they have waged an unremitting battle against the plague and have used to the utmost all available weapons against it. There are many medical, social and economic factors which make the struggle for the prevention of tuberculosis much more difficult than the campaigns so successfully directed against other infectious diseases, such as diphtheria and typhoid fever, which used to take such great toll of human life but now are relatively rare. However, in spite of difficulties it is evident that real progress has been made towards conquest of the disease.

The 6,591 deaths from tuberculosis in 1936 represent a death rate of sixty-one per 100,000 of population. This is in marked contrast to the situation only five years ago. In 1931 there were 7,628 deaths from this disease, representing a death rate of seventy-four per 100,000. In 1926, five years before that, the death rate was eighty-six per 100,000. Comparative figures for the dominion are not available before 1926, but the fall in mortality in the last fifteen years has been remarkable. Prince Edward Island cut its death rate from 145 in 1921 to sixty-six in 1936; Nova Scotia from 134 to eighty-nine. In Ontario the death rate over this period fell from seventy-one to thirty-six. From these figures comes the comforting assurance that the struggle against tuberculosis is meeting with substantial success. Nevertheless one cannot view with equanimity the fact that even yet this disease, which on the face of things should be preventable, each year wipes out in the dominion enough people to populate a good sized town.

The question of treatment and that of prevention are closely interrelated. Discussion with sanatorium physicians reveals the fact that more patients than ever before are having their disease successfully arrested and being returned to useful and normal lives. Rest treatment, which time has established as the only successful cure, has of late years been increasingly aided by various forms of surgery which are employed to assist the diseased organs in their recovery. It is now possible to bring about lasting cures in many cases where previously all that could be looked for was a temporary prolongation of life. Indeed the evolution of the treatment of tuberculosis forms one of the most interesting and satisfying chapters in the history of modern medicine. Furthermore, adequate treatment means the isolation of those who are infectious, and the permanent and satisfactory arrest of the disease means that the patient is no longer a source of danger to his community. It is not claimed that the tuberculosis sanatoriums are the sole factor responsible for the fall in the death rate. They play a large part; but the cause of the decline in mortality probably rests on a broader basis, namely, the increase in public awareness of the disease, its causative factors and means of prevention. The community which is tuberculosis-minded is the one which will show decreasing incidence. That community will employ the greatest number of anti-tuberculosis weapons, among the most effective of which are the sanatoriums. It appears, therefore, that the community which employs these special hospitals to the utmost will also be found to be making full use of other measures, such as stationary or travelling clinics, milk pasteurization, observation of contacts, separation of children from infectious adults, and all modern methods of health education.

This conclusion is endorsed by a study of dominion statistics. Several natural factors influence the incidence of the disease. For example, the maritime provinces have always shown a higher incidence and death rate than the prairie provinces. This may be due to several causes, including the differences in density of population, standards of living, housing and climate. Thus the wide scattering of the prairie population and the known antiseptic value of intense sunshine on infectious material may do much to keep infection under control.

If we discount these natural factors which may cause variation in incidence, it is evident from our statistics that the number of sanatorium beds in a community can be used as a criterion by which to judge the extent of its anti-tuberculosis work.

In Ontario the movement for the establishment of tuberculosis sanatoriums was early in its inception and sturdy in its growth. Thirty-one years ago Sir William Gage built in the Muskoka district the first Canadian sanatorium, which still exists as the Muskoka Hospital for Consumptives. In 1936 Ontario had 3,205 beds for the treatment of the disease. Concurrent with the increase in the number of beds has been an increase in public interest, in the formation of private and governmental clinics, governmental and municipal examination of contacts, pasteurization of milk, and public education in matters of health. The total governmental, municipal and private cost of operating tuberculosis sanatoriums in Ontario last year was $2,250,551. When we consider that the death rate in Ontario last year touched its lowest point of 36 per 100,000, it is difficult to conceive of any better way in which two and a quarter million dollars could have been spent.

What can the dominion government do to further the struggle against tuberculosis? I hesitate to make any concrete proposal; I am aware that the matter as it affects the dominion is in goods hands in the ministry of health and the Canadian Tuberculosis Association. Would an increase of knowledge, interest and appreciation on the part of the house lead to material encouragement of their efforts? More public education as to the increasing curability of the disease and its prevention is essential. The power of publicity in these matters is enormous. Last spring the premier of Ontario made a speech on the subject which received wide publication, and I am informed by sanatorium physicians that in the two months following that speech these sanatoriums had great difficulty in admitting the number of patients who clamoured for treatment. Therefore it is evident, from a study of the course of the disease in the last quarter century, that the time is fast approaching when a full and concerted effort on the part of all concerned would reduce tuberculosis from the terrifying position given to it by Sir William Osler as one of the "captains of the men of death" to an insignificant place in the mortality tables of the dominion.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. JOSEPH NEEDHAM (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, may I first place on record the resolution under discussion:

That, in the opinion of this house, it is most urgent that state medicine be established in the Dominion of Canada.

The resolution is very broad. It does not indicate how state medicine should be established, or whose direct responsibility this duty would be. All hon. members are aware that the provinces have a large share in the control of the health of our people. We also recognize that there is a federal department of health. I take it the resolution contemplates cooperation between the provinces and the dominion in the establishment of a system of state medicine. Just how far the authority of these respective governments should extend is perhaps one of the points which will have to be settled. We know, however, that each is or should be directly concerned with the health of the people.

Perhaps the state should have the first concern, because the state must realize, perhaps more directly than do the provinces, the value of citizens. In a time of war the federal state has a claim on every citizen and should have the first responsibility of seeing that every citizen is kept in the best possible health. All hon. members realize that while a healthy person is an asset to a state, a sickly person is a liability.

Then we may analyze the question from another angle. The federal state is directly concerned with matters of war and armament. We might ask ourselves this question: What is the use of providing defence unless we have healthy citizens to use the defence equipment? I say it would be far better to spend less money on armaments and more on the health of the population, even though such health expenditures be considered from the standpoint of war preparation. It should be of at least equal, or possibly of greater concern to have healthy people than to have armaments.

From the evidence brought forward this afternoon it seems clear that those countries most progressive in the construction of armaments are the countries giving the greatest attention to the health of their people. This is not a political issue, nor is it a claim whereby one class may benefit more than another. The benefits derived would be for the good of the whole dominion. If such a scheme could be worked out, I feel we would go a long way towards creating a happy and contented people, because it is impossible to enjoy life while in a state of imperfect health.

May I make particular reference to some of the arguments adduced this afternoon by the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Fleming). I clearly recall that the same arguments were advanced when state medicine was proposed in Great Britain, and I believe they have been advanced in every country where the subject has been discussed. I believe his argument that everybody with a sore finger or a sore toe would run to a hospital, if medicine and hospitalization were free, is not well founded.

I recall that in 1917 and 1918 the municipality of Round Valley granted free hospital accommodation to its citizens. Two years after the system was inaugurated a new council rescinded the provision. I was secretary during the period, and I know that fewer patients from the municipality went to the hospital during the two years hospitalization was free than during the time the people had to foot their own bills. If necessary, I could produce proof of my statement.

I shall not take time to place statistics on record, because I believe sufficient were advanced this afternoon. We did hear, however, that each year $311,000,000 is spent in treatment of disease while only $7,000,000 is spent for preventive purposes. I find that in Ontario, $54,846,349 was spent on sickness in one year, and $834,502 was spent on public health. It would seem safe to say that there is room for investigation in connection with preventive medicine, and to ascertain whether or not sickness cannot be arrested in the early stages. On many occasions persons may have to pay $300, where $30 should have been sufficient to prevent the illness.

For these reasons I say we should have a health program for the whole dominion worked out cooperatively between the provinces and the dominion. We often hear it said that human life is the most valuable asset the dominion has. That value is enhanced if human life is in its full vigour of manhood or womanhood. The American Medical Association have stated that state medicine is any form of medical treatment provided, conducted, controlled or subsidized by the federal or state government. So, in a degree, at the present time, in quite a number of the provinces we have state medicine, and especially in connection with the operation of sanataria and the subsidizing of hospitals and doctors.

A royal commission was appointed in Saskatchewan in 1921, and its report showed that sixty-five per cent of the school children were infected with tuberculosis, and that seventy-five per cent of the students in the normal schools were in the same condition. In 1934 only fourteen per cent of the school children and seventeen per cent of the normal school students of Saskatoon were infected. Ninety thousand school children were examined in British Columbia and eighty-three were found to be medical defectives.

I should like to pay tribute to what has been done by the school nurses in some of the provinces and also to the efforts put forth by some municipalities to provide dental and medical care for school children. When a report is sent home that a pupil requires certain treatment, quite often there is the problem of financing to be solved. I know of one instance where a school nurse visited a school and recommended that two girls should have their tonsils removed. Neither set of parents considered the matter to be sufficiently urgent; it was thought that it could be left until holiday time. In both instances the girl was dead before the holidays. The fear of having to pay a doctor's and hospital bill is what keeps many back.

Reference was made this afternoon to what other countries are doing along this line. Sweden presents the nearest approach to state medicine. The system there is on a non-compulsory basis and most of the people take advantage of it. A room in a publicly owned hospital costs seventy-five cents a day as compared with $7.50 a day in a privately owned hospital. An appendix operation costs only $8. Sweden rightly boasts of the most inexpensive yet most efficient health service in the world. We can all make a comparison between those costs and what we have to pay in our own community.

The National Health Insurance Act was passed in England in 1911. This was a compulsory scheme for all workers receiving less than $1,250 a year. The average contribution by the worker is about eight cents a week, the employer paying a like amount and the state, the balance. That scheme has been in operation for many years, and it offers a guide as to what is beneficial for a country. A patient is permitted to have his own doctor, and the doctors have as much freedom under the scheme as they had formerly. I should like to quote Lloyd George in this connection. In July, 1933, he said:

> The scheme of national health insurance which I launched in 1911 has now been in operation for twenty-one years. It has firmly established itself as a permanent feature of our social life and has proved of incalculable benefit to the nation. While its main features have remained unaltered it has been added to and adapted by successive governments of every party colour and used to serve as a basis for further developments of social insurance which are steadily raising the standard of life of our people and increasing their security and happiness.

Doctor Routley, secretary of the Canadian Medical Association, visited Europe last year. Speaking on February 7, 1938, at the convention of the association held here in Ottawa, he stated that Lloyd George had told him that such social security measures as state medicine and health insurance had kept Great Britain from revolution in the past few years. State medicine has been in operation in England since 1911 and it has proved its worth. More than 18,000,000 people in the British Isles have benefited from the free health services.

I should like to touch briefly upon what has taken place in New Zealand. As a memorial to King George V, the government decided last year that a fund should be created for the establishment of permanent health camps. Public appeals and government subsidies produced approximately $850,000. Last year half a pint of milk daily was made available to all school children, both public and private. What a boon to agriculture such a scheme would be. Of course, we are glad for what has been done and for what is being done. Lord Bessborough and his lady appealed for a fund to be known as the King George V silver jubilee cancer fund. This fund has made it possible to do great work throughout the dominion.

I should like to turn now to my own province. I want to give all credit possible to the provincial government and the municipal authorities of Saskatchewan for what has been done in connection with state medicine, hospitalization and control of tuberculosis. That province is now seeking to lead the world in cancer treatment. The only thing that keeps it back is lack of funds to complete the program. I have read carefully the addresses of the present Minister of Public Health, Doctor Uhrich, as well as the reports of the state medical association. With the cooperation of the dominion government it will take only a short step forward to have state medicine in that province. There is a provincial statute which permits any municipality to engage a doctor. The last report I have is that of 1935, and it shows that there are fifty-four full-time and fifty part-time municipal doctors. Prior to that time I had never known of a municipality that had gone back on the scheme after once engaging a doctor. The scheme must have proven itself in that province. There are twenty union hospitals brought about by the cooperation of two or more municipalities. In this way a hospital is established, and in many cases the hospitalization is free or almost free.

I have often wondered why Ontario was so greatly concerned in the quints, those five little girls at Callander. But we see what medical care and attention has done for them. They are no more valuable than my child or yours; but because the state could commercialize them, it was worth while. I say that the state should commercialize every citizen of this dominion in order that they may render to the state the highest possible service; and it would really in the end be the best possible investment this country ever made, to produce the strongest, most virile race possible on this part of the north American continent. The state has all the means at its disposal; we have the equipment; we have the willingness of the people, and if anything stands in the way, this government should be able to remove any difficulty.

Mr. PIERRE GAUTHIER (Portneuf) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, will you allow an unfortunate victim of the poor acoustics of this chamber to make an effort to have his voice reach you and enunciate a few arguments against the resolution moved by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) —which all of us cannot approve—and in favour of personal and private initiative aided, financially at least, by the public authorities.

If the convictions of the hon. member for Fort William are as deep, as strong and as vibrant as his voice, the combined arguments of those who do not share his opinion will hardly suffice to make him change it. I am not accustomed to speaking English in this house, but in the hope of convincing the hon. member by speaking his language, I may be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to continue my remarks in English.

(Text) I know that the motion before the house is important; but I am one of those who do not share the opinion of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), and I know that if a law were enacted by this parliament establishing state medicine throughout Canada, it would not be as welcome in the country as he thinks it would. I admit that in some countries state medicine is in operation. I have read interesting books on the nationalization of the medical art. Perhaps I should use the word "socialization," for in some special regions it would be more correct. In reading those pages, one is inclined to look upon the results obtained there as very encouraging, almost perfect in fact. Clinics for children, mothers, and men, whatever may be the disease, endangering their lives, are under the surveillance of skilful trained nurses and eminent doctors; chemical and physiological researches are carefully carried out, and serums freely and widely applied. But we do not need state medicine to obtain all these good results. Read the history of medicine and you will find that the works of Pasteur, Harvey, Carrel, and the discovery of Doctor Banting, are not to be attributed to state medicine. Their discoveries were due to the personal initiative of these individuals. Their genius could not wait for the establishment of state medicine.

I agree that the government in many instances should be prepared to help private initiative, to render it more effective for the welfare of the people. Nothing can be too costly when the health of the nation is at stake. If there is a capital that should be jealously taken care of, it is the human capital, and in the past this protection was easily obtainable by private initiative, very often helped by the public purse. Nobody can convince me that the old system has failed or that the medical profession has not successfully served the needs of the people, that it has not met the demands of the populations in various countries of the world. Is there not any other means, sir, of helping the people than by nationalizing or socializing everything? Have we come to the pass in this world where the individual is looked upon as incapable of any personal effort, too weak-minded to produce by himself what society expects from him, so interested in the word money as to convert even his own talents, his self-sacrifice and devotion towards others, into nothing but money?

Let it be understood that I am not imputing to the mover of the motion thoughts and motives which are not his. To come to the point, I want to bring to the consideration of the house what is now the general tendency in many parts of the world, and, I am sorry to say, in different parts of our own country, and that is to impose on the state a general control of human activities in every domain. I shall not go further on that line except to say that if this opinion should prevail in the world, it should leave the medical art alone, and leave to the patient the freedom and satisfaction he enjoys in the choice of his own doctor.

I shall not quote any statistics; I do not need them, as they cannot express or even help to make clearer the argument which I wish to use against the establishment of state medicine. I intend to bring into this discussion, however, the results of my personal observations as a general practitioner. For seventeen years I have been in constant contact with the patients whom I have had the opportunity, and I must say the pleasure, of treating for various ailments and diseases. One cannot be directly associated with sick people for many years without learning what qualities they desire in their medical man. State medicine may have and probably has many appealing sides and many advantageous issues for some people. I do not believe, however, that it can replace the genuine satisfaction which is brought to anyone jealously keeping his freedom in the choice of his own doctor, his family doctor, whether he is a general practitioner or a specialist.

State medicine may appeal even to an important part of the medical profession, anticipating the day when every treatment, every pill, every look at a wound will surely bring a monetary compensation. But this same important part of the medical profession, practitioners or specialists, would, I am proud to believe, hesitate to favour a law enacted by parliament which would change this present noble and self-devoting profession into a part of the state mechanism. One may say that devotion does not always bring food to one's family. I agree that that is true. But every doctor can say this, that his first clients were not always rich people; poor people called upon him during the first days of his career; poor people were the ones confident enough to try his skill, his medical judgment even though it were from pure necessity. Anxious to do well and to do good, to bring the happiness that follows physical and moral relief, he answered the call. After a few weeks the young doctor already had a fragment of practice. The poor people who were his clients spread their satisfaction in the vicinity; rich people acquired confidence and began calling the new doctor. Indirectly the free treatments were bringing food and happiness—happiness through success and devotion—to himself and later to his family, when he acquired one.

But what if this young doctor is state-salaried? What sentiment develops in his mind? Absolutely different will be the link between the medical art and the people in general. He will regard himself merely as one obliged by law to give treatments. Will the moral obligation on his side, this consoling and disinterested devotion towards the human being in need of medical care, remain strong enough? Can anyone say that later on, in the course of time, all sensitiveness will not depart from his mind and be replaced by a series of numbers, all alike, to which he has to attend in series at certain times of the day or of the week, whether it be a specially urgent disease or one of those emergency cases so frequent in general or special practice? The medical man cannot be indifferent to his patients. He cannot look at them as he looks at things. If he does, it is no longer the medical art; it is crude materialism in its operations, expressions and results.

I know the danger of materialism for those who spend their time in fighting against matter, especially for those trying to put an impenetrable wall between their physiological and psychological knowledge. Why open a door to this sometimes disastrous danger? As I said, on the patients' side the result cannot be any better. They will be trained to see in their doctor the man in some way imposed by the state. Because if we appoint one, two or three doctors for a special district, the patient will have to take one of these on account of certain regulations that the administrating board will have to impose in order to have at least a seeming control.

Can the state act successfully without depriving the individual of the sacred right of freedom, even if he is poor, in the choice of his own doctor, his family doctor, the one he thinks is the best, in whom he is absolutely confident? I do not think so. And if you destroy between the doctor and his patient this certain amount of ease, sympathy and confidence absolutely necessary for the success in many many cases—so important sometimes to produce, in certain maladies, what you would look upon as a miracle—if you ignore the link between the medical art and the people whom you have accustomed to look upon it as part of a mechanism operated by the state, you lower the level which this art has obtained, and in doing so, you do not render a service to society.

My apprehensions are not futile and my words are not delivered in view of a political advantage. I am giving the house my point of view on the matter. To tell this chamber my admiration for the admirable part doctors have played since the opening up of this country, would be superfluous. The public in general, the women in particular know what doctors have done from the largest cities to the most remote lands.

Some doctors may find state medicine a gift of Providence. They may find practice too hard at times, the evenings too long, the profession in itself ungrateful, especially when the pay is small, in some instances nil. I have been through all that. It is sometimes hard, not only for the doctor, but for his family, and I might say, for his creditors also.

Though doctors have not been the only ones to suffer in this world, I think they have suffered more than any one in any other profession. But who in this world has never experienced want, in the different stages of physical or moral life? I do not wish to prove that necessities in life are to be absolutely forgotten. I only want to say that there is more in life than stingy personal interest, more than monetary or material considerations.

I said, sir, that private initiative could be greatly helped by public powers. This brings me to the last part of my remarks, to a suggestion I desire to be accepted in every part of this land. As a member of the Quebec legislative assembly I witnessed the birth of what are called the "health units." They represent in the highest degree the help that public authorities can obtain in promoting private medical initiative without the establishment of state medicine. They prove that state medicine is not needed to help us to perform wonders. Thirty-five units are under operation at the present time, and they certainly give satisfactory results. They are operating in rural districts, the cities having their clinics, dispensaries and so forth, subsidized by the provincial government. I know these organizations cannot be perfect; they are man-made. But they give the best results. I should say they are the most nearly perfect corps a province or a country could have.

They have met with strong criticism on the part of both the doctors and the public; but having proved themselves absolutely necessary they will, and as a matter of fact I believe they do, meet with general approval. The great utility of these units lies in the tracing and prevention of diseases and in the education of the general public by literature, clinics and lectures to mothers and children. The official doctors pay special attention to young mothers. Neither the doctors nor the nurses are allowed to practise. They have strict orders from the department to direct to his own family doctor anyone who needs care, and a sanitary inspector sees that the law is carried out in regard to public septic nuisances.

In the territory covered by the units between eighty-five and ninety per cent of the children from birth to the age of five are immunized against diphtheria. Since the establishment of these health units, infant mortality has fallen from 200 to ninety per thousand births. The doctors who head the units have special degrees from the university of Toronto or the university of Baltimore.

What I have outlined here represents the results which have been obtained without state medicine. The spirit that led to the establishment of these units was the desire to help both doctors and public. and the proper functioning of the units is sure to accomplish the end in view. The Rockefeller Foundation gave wonderful financial assistance to the provincial government, and the people of the province are grateful to that institution. I have read in the press that the thirty-sixth health unit will be in operation in Drummondville on the first of May, and others shortly in Wolfe and Richmond counties. I am glad to see that the Quebec provincial Minister of Health is giving his attention to the establishment of these health units. I congratulate the provincial government upon its continuation of what was begun by the former government of the Hon. Mr. Taschereau.

I do not yet know what view our federal Minister of Health has on this question of state medicine; but I have absolute confidence in his judgment, and I believe that he will deal with the question from the standpoint of the interests of the Canadian people as a whole. I ask this chamber to examine the question thoroughly before urging upon the government the establishment of state medicine. State medicine may have a brilliant side, but it cannot replace the absolutely necessary links between the people and the medical art. I have dealt with but one side of the question, and that imperfectly. Others, I am sure, will present special arguments against the proposal for state medicine.

(Translation) After the efforts I have just made in the language of Shakespeare in order that all members of the house might understand the sole point that I wished to emphasize to-night, that is the moral aspect militating against the establishment of state medicine. I hope hon. members will carefully consider the system in force in the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick. I remember quite well that at the birth of sanatory units in Quebec—and I see here a few of my former colleagues of the Legislative Assembly who can corroborate my statement—strong objections were heard from medical organizations and from the public.

As I stated a moment ago with great difficulty in a language not very familiar to me, sanatory units have proved themselves, to my mind, the only effective means of preventing the establishment of state medicine in Canada, in the event of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) favouring such a measure. There are doubtless doctors who would prefer state medicine, but it has a defect which slips too easily into the life of the doctor and which both the public and the doctor should combat by all possible means, that is the spirit of routine. To my mind, and I speak from an experience of seventeen years, state medicine is the surest means of developing this spirit in the practice of medicine. For this reason, for the public good and in order to maintain the medical art at the high level to which it should be maintained in this country, we should take every means to repel this danger and to prevent the introduction and development of this routinism which, I repeat, so easily creeps into the practice of the medical profession.

A doctor's life is not a bed of roses. It is not pleasant to leave a warm house at two o'clock in the morning in twenty-below-zero weather, in order to bring relief to a patient. It does not always appeal to everybody and to every doctor. But there must be somebody to do it, and it must not be forgotten that our country has developed and is still developing as a result of the devotion to duty shown by all classes of its population. Therefore the doctor is ever ready to do his duty. In remote districts where he cannot reach his patients easily and quickly and where the population is not large enough to support a doctor, the state should help the doctor to live and to provide the sick with the medical care essential to every human being.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health): The resolution which we have been debating all afternoon reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, it is most urgent that state medicine be established in the Dominion of Canada.

To a layman confronted with a resolution of that kind, the first difficulty is to get a real definition of the terms employed. I have listened carefully during the afternoon in order to understand exactly the definition of state medicine, at least in the minds of many of those discussing it. I took the trouble to read in the pages of Hansard debates that have taken place on this subject during recent years, in order to see if they contained a definition of state medicine. I found that on many occasions several hon. members had stated the purpose of state medicine. My predecessor the Hon. Doctor Sutherland on one occasion said:

> The ultimate purpose of any plan is to make available for every Canadian the full benefits of curative and preventive medicine, irrespective of individual ability to pay, and, at the same time, to assure the practitioners of medicine and others associated in the provision of medical care a reasonable remuneration for their services.

My good friend the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden), with the idealism which characterizes him, has on former occasions when bringing a similar resolution to the attention of the house, depicted state medicine as a modern utopia. Doctor Stanley, who was member for Calgary East in the parliament which sat here from 1930 to 1935, and who took a great interest in all these matters, stated that he was unable to define just what state medicine was. Under those circumstances I thought it advisable, as a layman, to seek counsel from those who might be best qualified to know, so I asked some of the officers of my department to telegraph to the secretary of the Canadian Medical Association to ask him what definition he would give of state medicine. This definition has already been quoted by the hon. member for St. Boniface this afternoon. It is as follows:

> Canadian Medical Association has not adopted any official definition of the term state medicine, but it is my view that council would likely be in agreement upon the following definition. By state medicine is meant a system of medical administration by which the state provides medical services for the entire population or a large group thereof and under which all practitioners are employed, directed and paid by the state on a salary basis.

That is to say, state medicine would be a system whereby medical service would be available to all citizens, and all the medical workers—if I may so express myself—doctors, nurses, dentists, orderlies, etc., would be paid and directed by the state.

On the other hand we have been talking this afternoon of a system described as health insurance, which is cognate to state medicine. But health insurance differs from state medicine, as I understand it, in that it implies a contribution of some kind by the beneficiary and does not necessarily mean that the doctor or medical worker will be in the employ of the state. So the definition I am told should be this, that state medicine means free treatment of all citizens, with payment of the doctors by the state, whereas health insurance means treatment of those who have contributed, by doctors paid, either by fees or on a capitation basis, to look after people who intend to be beneficiaries under the scheme.

We have also discussed during the afternoon what I might call public health. If this resolution refers to public health, then there is no great necessity for its being on the order paper, because public health work is carried on in all the provinces of this dominion and there is a department of public health in the federal field. Public health work I understand to mean the intervention of the state in such matters as preventing the importation of disease from foreign countries, for which we have set up our quarantine regulations, also the state looking after the sanitary arrangements of the people, for which we have our municipal laws and regulations. It includes further the intervention by the state, as in the case cited by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier), namely, the health units in Quebec and in other provinces, which with the assistance of philanthropists have developed a system whereby health services are furnished gratis to a very large proportion of the population, the portion which needs it most, as my hon. friend said. There are food regulations which also come under the heading of public health, and which we have had from time immemorial. It is a matter of some local pride for me to say that three hundred years before the United States of America were forced to pass regulations regarding food by the vitriolic pen of the well known novelist who wrote The Jungle, we in the city of Quebec had regulations governing the slaughtering of animals for food. Even in community effort to look after disease, at the beginning of the eighteenth century there was in Montreal a Doctor Bouchard who carried out a plan somewhat similar to that outlined by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), and on payment of a certain fee undertook to look after the health of certain of his fellow citizens.

I believe the idea now being generally studied throughout the world, and the one which possibly is the basis of this resolution, is that public health is not sufficient. We must go a good deal beyond that and look after the health of the individual, as differing from that of the community to which I just referred. We must even go beyond the sphere of action of dealing with the communicable diseases, and go into the very homes of the people and there deal with the individuals with respect to both preventive and curative medicine.

There is no doubt in my mind that there is growing throughout Canada and, in fact, every other country, a greater consciousness of the responsibility of the state towards its citizens in matters of public health. There is no doubt whatever that the economic, social and moral structure of the state to a large extent depends on the health of its citizens. It is coming also to be believed in Canada and elsewhere that one of the fundamental and most important functions of government is to care for and preserve the health of its citizens. There have been many schemes and many projects submitted to various legislatures in Canada. Some of them are perhaps impossible of present realization, on account of financial difficulties; some met with local difficulties, others with jurisdictional difficulties, and it would be apparent that even were we immediately to decide to embark on one or another of these schemes, we would at once be faced with the question of priority.

For instance, I do not think there is any doubt that the greatest need for medical care to-day in Canada would be in the rural areas. But there might be some discussion as to whether or not it is the extremely indigent people who need looking after, from the standpoint of physical well-being, or those whom we might call the lower middle class, the wage earner on the smaller salary. On the other hand, if health insurance were to be adopted, in all likelihood it would be the wage earner on the small salary rather than the indigent person or the person engaged in agricultural pursuits, who would be the first to benefit.

Possibly, without going into an elaborate discussion of the various schemes, I might best make my contribution to the debate by laying before the house such information as I have been able to obtain, through the officers of the department, with respect, first, to health insurance and, second, to state medicine, as it exists in certain other countries.

Health or sickness insurance, whichever term you wish to use, has been in existence for a very long time. At first the intervention of the state was not required. During mediaeval times, in the middle ages, the guilds, which were corporations made up of employers and employees had, as one of their principal functions, the looking after of the health of the persons composing those guilds. As time went on, we find that during the French revolution the guilds were abolished. Later on, the industrial revolution came along, and they no longer had their place in the social structure of the day which, as is well known, did away with the old friendly relations which existed between master and journeyman. That system made of the employee more of a machine than a working companion. If we can believe what we read of those days, the situation of the worker in industry at that time was most deplorable.

But in spite of the economic liberalism which had brought about the industrial revolution, it soon was brought to the attention of those interested in their country and in its citizens that something must be done to alleviate the lot of the toiler. As a result the factory laws began to make their appearance in England.

For many years these laws were merely palliatives. Children under twelve years of age were not permitted to work in the mines, and so on. But as time went on there developed in the minds of employers, and certainly in the minds of employees, a resolution to see to it that the people who worked in the factories and mines were better treated and had a better chance to enjoy the life around them. Employers undertook large schemes for the benefit of their workmen, such as Port Sunlight, by Lever Brothers, and Bournville, by Cadbury. Employees began to form trade unions and friendly societies. The state at last became interested, and recognized the trade unions and friendly societies. After that, not only in England but throughout the world recognition of the societies was made by way of subsidies to assist them in their work and, finally,—first in Germany, I believe, and followed by similar legislation in other countries in the world—by compulsory enrolment of the workers in these friendly societies under the jurisdiction of the state.

And so we have it that the first state health insurance scheme of which we have knowledge was started in Germany in 1883. When it began operations it dealt only with industrial workers. Soon it took in the workers employed in commerce, then the agricultural workers, finally the workers in the homes and, I believe, even the workers in transportation. The result is that to-day sixty per cent of the workers in Germany are under some form of health insurance scheme. They must, however, belong to some society; the scheme to which they must belong is indicated to them by the state. There is compulsory insurance and compulsory enrolment in a specific scheme. The contribution by the worker is two-thirds, and by the employer one-third, the state contributing nothing more than the cost of supervision and, in some instances, administration.

The latest figures which I have been able to find with respect to the cost show that it runs about $2.50 per person per annum. In Great Britain where, it has been stated, a system of state medicine obtains, there is no state medicine, but there is a widely developed scheme of health insurance which covers something like 19,000,000 workers. The legislation covering health insurance was introduced in 1911, and provided that the insured would benefit through medical care and sick benefits when laid up. There is also provision for maternity and disablement benefits. The weekly contribution by the male worker is nine pence and by the female worker, eight and a half pence. The employer contributes an equal amount and, after paying the cost of administration, the state contributes an amount equal to one-seventh, in the case of the man, and one-fifth, in the case of the woman. During 1936 the contribution of the state to the health insurance scheme was £7,000,000, while contributions by the workers and employers amounted to £27,000,000. The interest income was something like £6,000,000.

The scheme is administered, first, by the central administration or the government; second, by committees and, third, by friendly or approved societies. The insured may belong to an approved society and obtain extra benefits in quite a substantial way. The scheme is in sound financial condition, and over eighty per cent of the 6,000 approved societies are in a position to grant additional benefits to their members. In 1924 a royal commission presided over by Lord Lawrence of Kingsgate was appointed to inquire into the scheme and reported unanimously as follows:

> We are satisfied that the scheme of national health insurance has fully justified itself and has, on the whole, been successful in operation. The workers of this country have obtained under it substantial advantages, in particular by securing the title to free medical attention and medicine whenever and as soon as these are required. We are convinced that national health insurance has now become a permanent feature of the social system of this country and should be continued on its present compulsory and contributory basis.

It is only fair to say that in England to-day there is considerable criticism of the scheme. I have under my hand a pamphlet issued by Political and Economic Planning, a non-political organization. The insurance scheme is criticized in this pamphlet, not because of the principle involved, but with respect to the details. The pamphlet states that there is not sufficient coordination; that in one locality the treatment of tuberculosis may be very good, while maternal care would leave much to be desired. It states also that there are too many committees and authorities. I believe the example given of the county of London shows that to man all the committees would require something like 19,000 people.

There is also criticism of the faulty distribution of the panel patients. Some doctors have too many patients on the panel roll, while others have not enough. The greatest difficulty that they have to face is, in my opinion, the fact that no provision is made for the dependents of the insured. Emphasis is laid on curative rather than preventive methods. The report goes on to urge the extension of the use of existing services and states that as additional funds are available, these services should be supplied where needed. Certain priorities are suggested, and perhaps the house will hear with some surprise the statement that one of the first priorities is better nutrition. It is also suggested that there be a provision of general practitioner service for the dependents of insured persons and the encouragement of wider studies of the causes of ill health.

Criticism is also made that the smaller tradesmen and independent workers do not come under the scheme. It is suggested that those who earn something more than £250 per annum, the limit at the present time, should be allowed to come into the scheme. From information that I have been able to obtain, there would seem to be general agreement as to the principle of health insurance generally, but innumerable criticisms of the details. In some countries, as in France, physicians are paid on a fee basis, the beneficiary paying a portion. In other countries the system is worked on a panel system and each doctor is paid on a capitation basis. The minimum wages for those who come under the scheme range from $900 to $1,200. Most insurance schemes do not cover the dependents. The schemes mostly provide for common illnesses that may be cared for by the general practitioner and do not make provision for any preventive medicine, as is being most frequently urged.

Now I come to state medicine proper. Under any definition which I have been able to obtain, state medicine exists in only one country in the world, that is in Russia. I must apologize to the house for not being in a position to speak with any authority on what has happened or is happening in Russia. I am forced to consult the authorities which have been placed at my disposal in order to be able to give any information at all. Two books which have been written within comparatively recent times would seem to contain most of the information necessary for the purposes of this discussion. One was referred to this afternoon by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden), the title being Red Medicine. That book would appear to have been written from the capitalistic standpoint rather than from the standpoint of those who are at present in control of Russia. The title of the other book is Socialized Medicine in the Soviet Union, by Professor Sigerist of Johns Hopkins university. From a reading of that book I would conclude that the professor is rather sympathetic with the theories of those who are now governing soviet Russia. Without entering into any controversy on the matter, I think I have been able to obtain from these books, and from people who have visited Russia, certain information which may be of some interest to the house.

Looking at Russia and considering its medical background, I think we must admit that of all countries in the world, Russia provided the most ample room for experimentation. Strangely enough, it would appear that the first experiment in health insurance in Russia was carried on in 1866 through the municipal authorities or Zemstovo organizations. However, perhaps owing to the character of the government or the backward nature of the citizens of the country, very little progress was made. So much so, in 1890 there were only 26,000 hospital beds in all the Russian empire. In 1913 there were only 2,700 medical stations to serve a rural population of 80,000,000 people. In 1917 many districts with a population of more than forty thousand had no doctor at all. In 1914 it was reported in Russia that there were twelve million cases of infectious diseases reported, and an enormous number unreported. So there, if anywhere, was a fertile field for trying out some system or another of state medicine. I do not know that I can approve the method which was followed in putting state medicine into force, nor am I quite sure that I am willing to approve everything that has been done or the manner in which state medicine is being conducted in that country; but I think there is no doubt—and perhaps I say this with the threat of the padlock law hanging over me—that the health of the people must have been enormously improved by some of the measures which came into operation in Russia after the revolution.

Theoretically at least, and on paper, at the present time every citizen in Russia is entitled to free medical advice, treatment and hospitalization. He gets medical care and attention, sanitation, preventive medicine, sickness and accident insurance, and all cognate activities at the expense of the state. But I would imagine, from the information which I have had, that all of the districts of Russia are not as yet fully covered. Other information is to the effect that perhaps even in that country there is a feeling that to the political victors belong the spoils, and one would understand that there is a preference even in giving medical treatment to those who belong to the ruling party in the state; that if one does not happen to be a communist, the medical care and attention are perhaps not so good as those which he would receive had he belonged to the party in control.

Mr. MAYBANK: Do they not all belong to one party?

Mr. POWER: No; apparently they do not. Apparently even within that country only a small minority of the inhabitants belong to the party in power. But they have gone about their institution of state medicine in a manner that will perhaps appeal to a great many of us. They have more than any other country institutionalized treatment. Domiciliary visits and care are almost done away with. Patients of all kinds and all classes are brought to the state clinics and the state dispensaries. Maternal care is given almost entirely in hospitals. Infectious and communicable diseases must be reported and hospitalized under very heavy penalties. Every effort is being made to bring those whose health is not absolutely perfect under the control of some institution or another. Doctors are all in the pay of the state, with perhaps the exception of those who look after foreigners visiting the country, and perhaps a few who are allowed to give consultations and receive fees. Hospitals are all free, with the exception perhaps of the abortoria, which are considered to be luxuries.

When the revolution broke out and it was decided to organize state medicine on its present basis, they proceeded by way of intensive propaganda among all classes of the state. They impressed the citizens of Russia with the idea that it was a patriotic duty to bring about cleanliness, sanitation and good health. Typhus was a foe to be combatted almost as much as the armed foes on the borders of the state. By means of this propaganda I think it can be established that a great deal was accomplished along the lines of sanitation, cleanliness and health. Lenin himself is reported to have said, "Either socialism will defeat the louse or the louse will defeat socialism." Apparently the louse was conquered.

Doctors are all on state wages. They are obliged to go to the section of the country to which they are ordered. If they do their work well, they may get an increase in salary, and if they do it badly, the least that can happen to them is that they will get a decrease in salary.

In bringing about these reforms they were faced with the problem of having very few doctors. A great many of them, on account possibly of their circumstances and perhaps of their political affiliations or sympathies, were either sent into exile or liquidated, so that when the commissariat of health was established in 1918, it was necessary to proceed to the formation of a corps of doctors. This was done by taking from among the ranks of the working men or their children those whom they considered best qualified to become physicians. They were trained in the state training colleges and universities, paid a wage during the time of their training, and sent out to do the work which could be allotted to them.

I think there is this to be said in favour of the system, that if it works—and it does on paper—it will certainly correct a condition which we have in this country, and which certainly requires some improvement. There will be a better distribution of medical men throughout the country. There can be no question that one of our difficulties from the standpoint of health is the almost impossibility of getting a young medical graduate to go out and establish himself in the remoter districts where the chances of obtaining a livelihood are difficult, but where he is sure of one thing, hard work, and very little return for it. The soviet union is endeavouring to correct such maladjustments as that. It is endeavouring to provide also for convalescence, and for nurses. It is endeavouring to bring to its people the realization that health is one of the most important things for it to look after.

I have laboured this Russian experiment because I imagine that is the goal which is being sought by all or most of those who are asking us to institute state medicine in this country. After all, if what we read to-day is all true, it would be an ideal kind of state medicine.

I forgot to mention a moment ago that the costs of their system of state medicine are taken not out of what would be equivalent in Russia to our consolidated revenue or out of any central fund, but out of the costs of industry, all industries, of course, being managed and operated by the state. It is simply that much more money added to the payroll; it works out that in each locality or each industry a certain amount is added to the cost of the operation of the industry, and that amount goes to pay the cost of state medicine. It is almost impossible, I believe, to get any exact figures; but Sir Arthur Newsholme and John Adams Kingsbury, who wrote the book entitled Red Medicine, figure it out at something like eighteen per cent of the cost of the payroll. Professor Sigerist, who wrote from a different viewpoint, figures it out at about six per cent of the cost.

Perhaps we should also take into some consideration the basis on which all this is founded. The basis, I should say, was a purely materialistic one, and hardly humanitarian. The soviet state wants to look after its citizens for the same reason in all probability as the owner of slaves on a southern plantation wished to look after his slaves—because he needed them to work for him. I do not say that with any intention of disparaging those who might wish to urge on us the adoption of that system; but I believe, in the light of what we have been able to ascertain, that humanitarianism is the last thing of which the leaders of the soviet state would wish to be accused. As a matter of fact Walter Duranty, a writer whom I was reading recently and who is, I believe, fairly sympathetic to communism, expresses the view that he is surprised that mental cases were not shot out of hand because they were no longer of any use to the state. Whatever may be the motive —and I merely give my opinion when I say that I do not believe it is humanitarian so much as materialistic—the fact is that there is one country in the world where there is state medicine.

I suppose that what we must next consider is whether state medicine as they have it in Russia could be adopted in this country. I doubt very much whether the people of Canada would stand for it, and I do not think the Minister of Health has the authority under the British North America Act to shoot the doctors in this country. I fear it would be impossible to establish any absolute and complete system of state medicine without first taking some steps to liquidate a great many members of the medical profession. I doubt whether the medical profession as such is in favour of such a system. As a matter of fact the Canadian Medical Association has strongly disapproved state medicine although, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, I believe it approved health insurance.

Now with regard to our people. We have some kind of state medicine here. We had during the war. When we were in the army we were looked after—personally I think some of us were very well looked after—by doctors employed and directed by the state; but I would ask almost any hon. member who served during the last war if he was satisfied with the medical treatment which was handed out to him by the medical officers. We have state medicine in another respect; we have it in the department which I administer, that of pensions. Every pensioner theoretically and legally can be looked after by the state for his pensionable disability and also for other disabilities which are not pensionable. I would hate to ask for a show of hands of hon. members to let me know whether any pensioner they ever met was satisfied with the treatment given him by the state doctor. Time after time hon. members have risen in the house to say that the doctor looking after the pensioner was incompetent; that he had maltreated the pensioner; yet these men were chosen at the beginning from persons who also had experience overseas and would be likely to have consideration for their comrades, and in later years they were chosen by the civil service commission.

My experience—and I give it for what it is worth—is that the very moment a medical man, in so far as pensions is concerned, becomes an employee of the state and is appointed by the state on a salary to look after the pensioners his usefulness disappears. Again and again men with good reputations, men who are known to be at the height of their profession, have joined the Department of Soldiers' Civil Reestablishment and the Department of Pensions, only to be told, when they gave any decision whatever which was not to the liking of the pensioner, that they were no longer any good and were paid by the government to prevent the pensioner from obtaining his just rights. So that, in my humble opinion, the people of this country themselves would not be satisfied with medicine directed, controlled and paid by the state.

The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), dealing with a resolution which was not quite on all fours with this one but recommended that some form of state medicine be established in this country, said, in 1931:

> How many hon. members have considered the implications of that resolution? How many have considered its effect upon the existing provincial organizations, medical and otherwise? How many realize that it means the entire disbandment of the medical associations of the country of private practitioners, and the substitution therefor of the state as employer of all the medical men of Canada? How many have considered that? Yet that is what it means. . . . Are hon. gentlemen prepared to say yea to that? Do any of them desire to say yea?

On that occasion, after a somewhat prolonged discussion, the majority in the house voted against any form of state medicine. I have no difficulty in concluding that, if state medicine means what I think it does, if it comes within the definition which I have been told must be given to it, the house will not be ready to give support to the resolution. However, I desire to congratulate the mover of the resolution and to thank him for putting it before the house. We have had a full, frank and free discussion of a number of matters related to state medicine. We have discussed health insurance, and I believe the people of the country and hon. members themselves have come to know that there is much more that can be done along the lines of improving the health of the people.

With respect to health insurance, already in three provinces of Canada there are health insurance schemes on the statute books. There is a very complete scheme in Alberta. There is another one in British Columbia. Neither of them has yet been brought into effect. In the discussion on this health insurance scheme of British Columbia the question of jurisdiction naturally came up, and Mr. Weir, Minister of Health of British Columbia, at the meeting of the provincial premiers held in Ottawa in 1935, stated:

> My opinion is that it would be a grave error for the dominion government by amendment to the British North America Act to relieve the province of the major responsibility in health matters. The true role of the federal government in the health field, it seems to me, is to supply leadership, to assist in the promotion of significant health movements. . . . Under section 92 of the British North America Act public health and health insurance fall within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures and it is essential that they should remain so.

With respect to the other provinces, my friend and leader, the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), has dared to suggest to certain provinces that we might, with the assent of the provinces, add two words to the powers conferred upon the federal government by the British North America Act, and he has met with such a storm of revilement and abuse, in one province at any rate, that I fear that were I to ask that province to add two more words, "health insurance," I would be submitted to the tortures of the rack and the boot, and perhaps eventually boiled in oil. In any case, I personally have some respect for the political views which I acquired in early youth. My earliest impressions of politics were the campaigns of Laurier and Mercier, who were provincial right-ers. They believed in provincial rights, though it is only fair to state that a great many of those who are in favour of provincial rights to-day are not composed of those elements of the population that favoured Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1896.

I doubt very much whether at the present time it would be possible to get the assent of the provinces to the proposal that health insurance should be completely turned over to the federal government. As I have shown, British Columbia is opposed to it, having a health insurance scheme of its own. Alberta would be opposed to it, because it has a health insurance scheme of its own. But there is no doubt whatever that there is need for better medical facilities in Canada. We have boasted and we shall probably continue to boast of our advance in medical research and medical science; but it is all too true to state that only eighteen years ago, in 1918, 30,000 Canadians lost their lives in the influenza epidemic, and only last year between 5,000 and 6,000 people in one province alone were attacked by infantile paralysis.

Too many lives are lost in childbirth; too many children and mothers die; and irrespective of jurisdiction, provincial or federal, too many people are dying of the degenerative diseases of middle age. We have not as yet been able to find a cure for cancer, or even the cause of it; and tuberculosis, though it has been controlled to some extent, is still a menace within our borders. Mental diseases require a great deal of care and involve a tremendous expense to a large section of the population. Venereal disease, though something has been done in that direction, is far from being under control at the present time. The cost of sickness is altogether too great; the cost of prevention and cure under the present ill-adjusted system is altogether beyond reason.

In a country like ours, with a climate such as we have, the most equable climate in the world; with a people sprung from the sturdiest stocks in Europe; with scientists at least as learned as those in any other country; with universities producing young men who are capable of leaving Canada and holding high positions throughout the world—with all these advantages we can achieve a great deal. But I believe that we can achieve it less by regimentation as it exists in some other countries than by coordination of our people in the way of science and by coordination of the work of the universities and of government. I believe we can succeed less by coercion and more by cooperation among all those bodies, municipal, provincial and federal who wish to bend their energies towards the task of making this a better and a healthier nation. The federal Department of Health is ready and willing to do its share.

Mr. J. A. MARSHALL (Camrose): I find it rather difficult to follow immediately the Minister of Health (Mr. Power) because he has dealt effectively with this resolution from the standpoint of the government. I believe I am safe in saying that the policy of the government will not deviate very much from the path which it is following at the present time; nevertheless I want to emphasize the fact that hospitalization and medical services are problems which at the moment are pressing very heavily upon municipalities.

I congratulate the mover and seconder of the resolution on the splendid manner in which they have presented the case for state medicine. It seems to me that there are to-day some Liberals who are becoming more socialistic than the socialists, but I realize that the mover of the resolution (Mr. McIvor) has been actuated by the very highest motives, because he has come in contact with cases of suffering which require medical attention, and, very often, hospitalization.

There is one very good virtue about the resolution, and that is its brevity; it is short and to the point. There is no preamble which would perhaps confuse rather than clarify the motion itself. It states in the briefest of terms that state medicine be established in the Dominion of Canada. I hope the hon. member for Fort William will not feel disappointed when I say that I am not prepared at present to support this resolution. Not long ago the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) said we should all seek for the truth. I say in all sincerity that I am seeking for the truth in this matter. I have wrestled with this problem for many years, but I am not yet convinced that state medicine is the solution. If, however, the hon. member can convince me that we can bring hospitalization and medical services to the people of this country without increasing taxation, I am prepared to study the matter from that angle.

There are many questions which one might ask himself in connection with a problem such as this. Would state medicine tend towards greater benefits to the people of Canada? Could a form of state medicine be worked out that would be satisfactory to all the people of Canada? Should we have state medicine for all or for part only of our people; and, if only for part, where should the line be drawn? What is wrong with the present system that we should change it? Finally, would state medicine mean political control, with all the evil influences attached thereto?

Opinions enunciated here this afternoon and evening have not convinced me that state medicine is the solution of the problem. The study of the question of affording proper medical care to our people has occupied my attention for many years. They say that fools rush in where angels fear to tread; I am not a doctor, but I have had a great deal to do with matters of this sort as a municipal secretary in one of the rural sections of Alberta. For years it has been my pleasure and privilege to serve a council which is second to none in its earnestness and sincerity of purpose in grappling with this problem. I have seen good men give up on account of the strain involved, because the problem of hospitalization and medical care is becoming greater and more difficult as time goes by.

While my remarks deal entirely with a rural municipality, they can be applied with equal force as well to urban municipalities in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Ten or twelve years ago we were worried very little with hospital and doctors' bills. In those days the taxpayers had the money to take care of these social services. Then came the years when farmers had poor crops, and prices for what they produced were low. They found themselves able perhaps to pay the interest on their mortgages and hold back sufficient to keep their wives and families during the winter, but few if any kept enough back to provide for medical attention or hospital bills. So the demands on the municipalities became more frequent and persistent. On many occasions I have found myself in the unhappy position of having to decide whether hospitalization of a man or woman or child was of greater or less importance than a decrease in the mill rate. Time after time I have held out the hope that taxation could be reduced, only to find that hospital bills and doctors' bills came in faster than taxes. I have known municipal councils to grapple with this problem for days on end, only to be driven to the inevitable conclusion that if they were to meet these demands, an increase in taxation could not be avoided.

I wonder how many hon. members know what it means to have the responsibility of refusing or granting hospitalization to a suffering human being. If more of us had some of this practical experience, we would be more apt to find a solution of a problem which is bearing very heavily indeed upon the municipalities. I would suggest that hon. members take time this coming summer to visit the municipal offices not only in their own immediate vicinity but in distant parts of the dominion, drop in to the council meetings and listen as the councillors discuss these problems. I think we would come back to the house at its next session determined to deal effectively with this problem. We would tell this government to hasten on with their program.

But with all this experience behind me, I say that I am not yet sure that state medicine is the cure. It was my experience in grappling with these problems in a municipal office that caused me to renounce my allegiance to the Liberal party and join the ranks of those who believe that a solution can be found only through the new economics.

I am told state medicine was introduced into Germany around 1883, yet only forty or forty-five per cent of the people of that country are covered. I am informed, further, that state medicine was introduced into England in 1911; yet only thirty-five per cent of the people of that country are covered.

Many people are asking this question: Should we have state medicine on a contributory basis? I think we should ask ourselves the question as to how such a scheme would work. In a scheme of this kind I believe there would be three parties to the contract, namely the employer, the employee and the state. The employer would contribute his apportionment to a fund. Naturally, he would not take it out of his own pocket; it would come from the funds of the firm or corporation, and it would be reflected in an increase in the price of goods.

The employee would contribute his portion from the pay envelope he would receive either every week or every month. That would mean a reduction in the purchasing power of the consuming public, and there would be a further spread between prices and purchasing power. The state, as the third party to the contract, would contribute its share. No doubt the money of the state would be borrowed from a financial institution and the money thus borrowed would have to be repaid with interest. The state, in turn, would tax that back from the individuals, both employer and employee, and we would again have a further increase in prices and a further decrease in purchasing power.

If that is what a proposal of this nature means, then I must say I am emphatically opposed to it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Would not the money collected go out in wages and doctor bills?

Mr. MARSHALL: Part of it would. Finally, I think the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) hinted during his observations that this is more or less a matter for the consideration of the provinces. A week ago I would have agreed with him, but to-day I am not so sure of the matter, in view of the decisions handed down by the Supreme Court of Canada in connection with the legislation passed by the Alberta legislature. I am just wondering what powers a provincial government actually has. I thought for a time that a legislature elected by a majority of the people in a province was supreme; now I am not so sure that that is so.

As has been shown in the house this afternoon and this evening, the medical profession are not agreed as to whether or not socialized medicine is a cure. Not long ago in the senate of the United States the Hon. J. Parnell Thomas said this:

> Those advocating socialized medicine and similar reforms always soft-pedal the little matter of where the money is coming from. The people are led to believe in such catch phrases as "costs could be distributed according to the ability to pay" or the cruder version of the same idea, "soak the rich." Schemes for soaking the rich invariably end in soaking the poor. So if the American people want to accept socialized medicine, let them do so with their eyes open.

Then he continues:

> You ask: Can anything be done to make the purchase of medical care easier for the people? Yes, there is much that can be done of a fundamental and practical nature. As you have already seen, when the American people are bothered by their medical bills it is because they are bills and not because they are medical. In other words, the same people are bothered by meeting grocery bills, rent bills, and all other bills.

And I want particularly to draw the attention of the house to this last sentence:

> The real solution of the problem would be to help these people pay their own bills, not tax others to do it for them.

I do not believe anyone has any right to rise in his place in this chamber and condemn any proposal without suggesting a remedy. Do not misunderstand me; I am heartily in favour of bringing to our people the best medical care, attention and hospitalization we can possibly give them, but it is the method by which this objective is proposed to be attained with which I am not in accord.

Under present economic conditions there is no other way with which I am familiar to bring these services to the people, than by the method of taxation. Taxes being at their peak, as they are to-day, it would seem quite impossible and inadvisable to consider taxing for this purpose.

Under the proposals of the Social Credit party the problem assumes a different aspect. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has said, we should take control of our currency and credit, and use it in terms of public need. I understand this parliament now has control of currency and credit, and I therefore believe that we should use it in terms of public need. The public need in this instance is hospitalization and medical services. Issue national money, and distribute it to the people in the form of national dividends. I know some hon. members will smile at that suggestion; but if they will read the report of the commission set up to consider veterans' problems they will find that that board advocated a provisional economic allowance. What is the difference between a provisional economic allowance and a dividend? If we issued a national dividend or a provisional economic allowance to all the people of this country, I feel quite sure that we would not have to worry as to whether or not we should regiment the medical profession. It would seem to me the wrong way to tackle this problem would be to regiment the men and women engaged in one of the loftiest professions of the day. We should consider this matter very seriously and endeavour to find a solution at this session of parliament.

Mr. J. J. McCANN (Renfrew South): Mr. Speaker, as the debate has covered the subject of the resolution so thoroughly, it is not my intention to make any extended remarks, but I merely want to put on record my position with reference to the subject matter of the resolution and to attempt to convey to the house and to the public the attitude which organized medicine takes. The resolution reads:

That, in the opinion of this house, it is most urgent that state medicine be established in the Dominion of Canada.

The discussion to-day has covered the whole practice and history of medicine. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) who introduced the resolution gave as one of his arguments that he would like to have the medical profession relieved of the temptations which beset it in the practice of medicine. The solution he offered was state medicine. However, I feel that he could deal more effectively with temptations by following his own profession, rather than by working through the medical profession.

Some of the arguments advanced to-day have been to some extent convincing, but most of them have convinced me that state medicine is not a solution for our economic and medical problems. It is rather hard to understand the logic of some hon. gentlemen who have taken part in this debate. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) is quite prepared to have this country assume an obligation of $250,000,000 in order to introduce this system, and yet, if I remember correctly, he is not in favour of an increase of fifty cents in the cost of radio licences. I cannot understand that logic at all. We are living in an age of progress. Everyone is conversant with the advance that has been made in the last twenty-five years. Great progress has been made in transportation by air and by highway. Motor cars have been introduced, and things have been speeded up to the point where distance has been almost annihilated. We have also seen the introduction of the radio, one of the greatest mediums for the education of the public.

I wonder if people are as thoroughly conversant with the great progress which has been made in medical science? Despite the fact that we have had the greatest war of all time; despite the fact that we have gone through the greatest epidemic ever known; despite the fact that we have faced the greatest depression which has probably been known, in the last twenty-five years medical science has made greater progress than even industrial science.

During the past fifty years medical science made more progress than it had in the 500 years previous. Reference was made this afternoon to many of the lines along which this particular advance has been made. It would be interesting, if time permitted, to go back over the history of modern medicine, but it is not my intention to do so. I want to enumerate only a few of the particular lines along which this progress has been made. If we go back to the time of Jenner, the English physician who was responsible for the introduction of vaccination against smallpox, we must realize that by the application of that one method of treatment more lives have been saved than have been taken in all the wars from that time to this, or in those previously. The method of Jenner was to inoculate people in order to stimulate their own systems so that they would be protected against smallpox. His suggestion met with opposition; but finally his opinion and teachings prevailed and now smallpox, a scourge that cleaned out nations at one time, is practically an unknown quantity. Other physicians, following along the lines of reasoning initiated by Jenner, have been able practically to eliminate diphtheria, typhoid fever and other diseases by inoculation. During the South African war more soldiers on both sides died from typhoid fever than from bullet wounds, but in the great war the incidence of that disease was reduced to the absolute minimum.

I wonder if people realize that there are yet many diseases which have not been conquered, for instance, cancer, diabetes, nephritis and heart disease? Seventy-five years ago ninety per cent of all deaths were caused by acute infections, but to-day seventy-five per cent of all disease is due to chronic ailments. To my mind the advantages of modern medicine are not being extended to enough of the people. Our great task is to provide a system whereby these benefits will be made available to the great bulk of the people. The medical profession may well be said to be fifty years in advance of the people's willingness and ability to accept modern medicine. The barrier that exists in this regard is the economic one. What is the solution of the people's difficulties and disabilities? Is it by commandeering the medical profession and introducing state medicine? Surely not. Medicine is not a trade. Medicine is a science and an art. I wonder what would be the result in this or any other country outside Russia, where they have state medicine, if the state were to commandeer the services of lawyers, for instance, or of the members of any other profession. The answer is not hard to find. There would be a furore against any such action, and if that is the case, why start in on the doctors?

State medicine has been tried and is working in only one state in the world, namely Russia. We have nothing on record to show that it is any great success in that country. Great leaders in medicine do not come from the Russian empire. There is no name which comes out of Russia to the public of any member of their medical profession other than that of Metchnikoff.

I submit that the introduction of state medicine in this country would destroy the initiative of the men in the medical profession, and what has made for great success in other lines of initiative tends to do so also in the medical profession. It is the competitive factor which has brought about the advances which we have made in other fields. It is because of the competition that there is between men of science that we have the greatest advances in science, and the greatest progress is made in those countries in which the competitive factor works freely. Someone or another has said that if a man can make a better mouse-trap than his neighbour, the public will beat a well-trodden path to his door, and that is as true in medicine as it is in any other line. The medical man who is a good clinician, a good diagnostician, and who has a good lot of common sense which he wishes to use, founded upon a basic knowledge of the principles and practice of medicine, is the man who will make the successful practitioner.

I am unalterably opposed, from my own reading and from anything I have heard here to-day, to supporting or voting for state medicine. But the subject of health insurance has been discussed. Health insurance, within certain limits, might be applicable in Canada. It is not new even in this country. It has been enacted in British Columbia. It has been taken up in Alberta, and there is on the statute books of that province a Health Act which would bring about state health insurance, but it has not yet been put into effect because Mr. Aberhart feels that he has not the money to carry it on. I read in the Financial Post a week ago that he had made the statement that if social credit went into effect in that province, with the $25 that each individual would get, they would be able to pay for their own medical and hospital expenses, and it would not be necessary to put the health insurance measure into effect.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian people have already passed judgment on health insurance. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), when he was Prime Minister of this country, introduced in 1935 the Employment and Social Insurance Act. Part IV of that act made provisions under the heading of National Health. As I understand it, the proposal was to set up a commission, whose powers under Part IV were to be exercised:

> —so far as may be found practicable and expedient, in cooperation with any department or departments of the government of Canada, with the dominion council of health, with any province or any number of provinces collectively, or with any municipality or any number of municipalities collectively, or with associations or corporations.

It was to be the duty of the commission to collect information and data, and to analyse and make the information available to any province, municipality or corporation, and it was also to examine and report on any national health scheme proposed to be put into effect.

The people of Canada in the election of 1935, although perhaps this particular policy or plank of the Conservative platform at that time may not have been brought prominently to their attention, were at all events not sufficiently enamoured of it to return that party to power in order that they might put that scheme into effect. Since this and other legislation passed at that time were put upon the statute books, they have been referred to both the Supreme Court of Canada and the privy council, and have been declared ultra vires. The hon. Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) in his remarks this evening would lead me at least to believe that probably those judgments would bar public health and health services from coming under the jurisdiction of the federal department. I just want to point out to him what Mr. Justice Kerwin, of the Supreme Court of Canada, said in giving his opinion on Part IV of the Employment and Social Insurance Act, which dealt with national health:

The sections included in part IV enact that the duties and powers of the commission under that part shall be exercised so far as may be found practicable and expedient in cooperation with any department or departments of the government of Canada.

He goes on to say:

By themselves the provisions of part II—

Which had to do with unemployment service:

—and of certain portions of parts IV and V might be unobjectionable, but in my opinion they are so inextricably interwoven with the powers of the commission set up under part I and with the scheme of unemployment insurance referred to in part III that they must stand or fall according to the validity or otherwise of sections 15 to 38.

The whole thing was thrown out on that ground. The decision given by the privy council was somewhat along the same line. Their Lordships say:

In the present case their Lordships agree with the majority of the supreme court in holding that in pith and substance this act is an insurance act affecting the civil rights of employers and employed in each province, and as such is invalid. The other parts of the act—

That would include part IV, which had to do with national health:

—are so inextricably mixed up with the insurance provisions of part III that it is impossible to sever them. It seems obvious also that in its truncated form, apart from part III, the act would never have come into existence. It follows that the whole act must be pronounced ultra vires.

From that I would gather that national health or any act with reference to national health, which the federal parliament might put into effect, of itself and standing on its own feet, might be within federal jurisdiction. After all, Mr. Speaker, health is a national problem, and the problem of health in British Columbia does not differ one iota from the health problem of Nova Scotia, nor does the health problem of Quebec differ from that of Ontario. Tuberculosis is one and the same disease whether it is in Nova Scotia or British Columbia. Silicosis is the same disease whether it is in Quebec or Ontario. National health knows no boundaries. The same problems occur from one end of the country to the other. Organized medicine has not taken a stand definitely with reference to health insurance or to state medicine. A majority of doctors is opposed to state medicine under its strict definition. It would mean that doctors would be controlled and paid by the state. On the other hand health insurance would be a system whereby people in times of good health would budget for times when they were ill.

The Canadian Medical Association, which represents organized medicine in this country, made an illuminating submission before the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations. They gave a history of the medical profession from the time of confederation to date. They outlined the progress which has been made during that time. They pointed out, very fittingly, that when this country became a confederated state, what we know as public health was wholly unknown, was not so much as mentioned in the British North America Act; that we have at this time problems which were not then thought of and for which, consequently, no provision was made; and they submitted to the Rowell commission that due consideration should be given to meeting the problems of public health as they exist to-day. I shall not take up further time, as I understand some others wish to say something with reference to this matter. I merely want to put on record the opinion of the Canadian Medical Association with reference to health insurance. Very briefly it is this, that before any policy of health insurance is put into effect in Canada, the matter should be studied by a committee or a commission who would go into all the avenues of the subject, and that the medical profession would be very glad to cooperate and to give them the advantage of an intensive study which they have made.

Their stand with reference to health insurance may be summarized as this: that they have not authorized an expression either in favour of or opposed to the institution of health insurance in Canada. They are also of opinion that before health insurance is applied in any part of the dominion, a survey as recommended by the Minister of Pensions and National Health for Canada in 1935 and approved by a conference of ministers of health from the several provinces should be carried out. That represents the views of organized medicine in Canada, and I put on the record that I am opposed to state medicine, and would be in favour of health insurance only after a complete examination of that problem.

Mr. C. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): May I congratulate the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power), who is not a medical man, upon having made such an able presentation of the case for the department he so well represents; upon having clarified, for the benefit of the house, the difference between two distinct terms, state medicine and state health insurance; and upon the world-embracing review which he gave of legislation on the subjects of health insurance and state medicine.

I was happy also to note that, in the various addresses presented here to-day, no criticism was offered against the ability or the honesty or the devotion of the medical profession in giving medical services to this country. The demand for health insurance does not arise out of any conflict between the medical profession and the public. The public desires to secure highgrade medical service and is quite willing to pay for such service. On the other hand the medical profession is eager to supply such service, but in return it expects a reasonable remuneration and satisfactory conditions under which to work and to live. It is because the public as a whole have confidence in the ability of the profession and recognized the profession's devotion to human welfare, that the majority of the public will accept leadership from the organized medical profession in devising ways and means of remedying the present situation concerning medical services.

The discussion of a subject of such importance as health insurance calls for placing before the house certain facts and considerations which have a serious bearing on the question and thus providing a proper orientation to any legislation which aims at supplying complete medical service to all the people of Canada. The Canadian Medical Association undertook to formulate such a plan as early as 1930. May I say briefly what the Canadian Medical Association is and means to the country?

In round figures there are 10,000 registered medical practitioners in Canada. They are grouped into various provincial medical societies, and these societies in practically every province are recognized as branches or divisions of the association. The business of the C.M.A., to use the abbreviation term of the Canadian Medical Association, is conducted through a council of approximately 120 representatives sent as delegates from the various provincial medical societies. These delegates in turn elect seventeen members to form the executive committee of the Canadian Medical Association, which carries on the affairs of the association during the year. The Canadian Medical Association meets once a year, generally in June, in annual session. The association as a body therefore represents and speaks for the medical profession of Canada; it is authorized to do so. One article of its constitution and by-laws includes the following two items: first, the promotion of public health; second, the endeavour to assist in the advancement of medical legislation for the good of the public and the profession. Under these objects it would be fair to assume that the association is committed to engage itself actively in the consideration of plans whereby the state of the public health may be improved, also to consider ways and means of raising the standards and increasing the efficiency of medical practice in the common interest of the medical profession and of the public.

For this reason, namely, to improve the status of medical practice in Canada and to give better medical services, since 1930 the Canadian Medical Association has been making a thorough study of the question of health insurance. To that end, a committee was charged with the task of making a complete survey of health insurance in every country in the world as well as a complete study of all literature available on the subject. The committee on economics of the Canadian Medical Association was enlarged by a number of medical practitioners, the number being brought up to twenty-seven, with representation from every province in Canada. To implement and render more efficient the task which it imposed upon itself, it went as far as to send its general secretary to Europe to get first hand information on the question of health insurance as it is carried on in various countries which have adopted the system. The report of the secretary will be presented at the coming annual meeting of the Canadian Medical Association.

Prior to that, in 1934, this committee on economics, charged with the special study of health insurance, presented a voluminous report of about forty pages, and my task to-night will be to endeavour to give the house, as briefly as possible at this advanced hour, a synopsis of the basic principles adopted by the committee on health insurance and approved by the Canadian Medical Association. With this object in view I shall quote extracts from the report in order to cover the ground as rapidly as possible, and in doing so I speak with the knowledge acquired as one of the members of the study committee of the Canadian Medical Association, who have been investigating health insurance since 1930. After reviewing legislation and literature, the report makes the following general observations:

> In reviewing the causes which lead to a demand for health insurance, our committee recognized that there exists among the public considerable dissatisfaction with regard to the methods of medical practice. The expression of this dissatisfaction does not imply any criticism of medicine or of the medical profession. Indeed it is the very contrary, because the dissatisfaction grows out of an appreciation of medicine and a desire to profit more fully by what medicine has to offer for the benefit of mankind.

The real problem arises out of the inability to pay for such medical services as are required. . . .

It would appear that the problem grows out of the following conditions:

1. A change in our social organization under which the state has assumed increasing responsibility for the welfare of the citizens, as evidenced by legislation covering old age pensions, mothers' allowances, workmen's compensation, and so forth.

2. The present individualistic system of medical practice is of long standing. It has not adjusted itself to the present social organization in which the majority are wage-earners with no resources beyond their weekly earnings.

3. Medical facilities are not fairly distributed, and so some areas are deprived of essential medical services because the population of these areas is not sufficient to support the required medical services.

4. The wage-earning population are often unable to pay ordinary fees, and are certainly not in a position to meet the costs of a long or serious illness. The wage-earner usually loses his wages when he is ill, at the very time when expenses are increased and the necessity continues for providing maintenance for his family.

5. Medical care becomes a luxury rather than a necessity when the income provides only sufficient for food, shelter and clothing.

6. The medical profession is expected to furnish medical care for the indigent—a state responsibility—without remuneration.

7. Because of the cost of medical care, there is delay in securing care and a great deal of self-medication.

8. Modern medicine is inevitably more costly, as seen in the development of hospitalization and specialist services.

9. Modern medicine demands, in a percentage of cases, that consultant, hospital and other facilities be available if the patient is to receive the care required. This implies an actual correlation of existing services and making these services available to the patient through the family physician.

Our report is divided into three sections. The first reviews all health insurance legislation of other countries as well as all the literature that was available to us. Part II reviews the health legislation situation in Canada, and part III explains the Canadian Medical Association's plans for state health insurance in Canada. Here we are concerned chiefly with part II and part III. Part II reviews, first, the practise of medicine in Canada, its legal set-up and its development along individualistic lines; and, second, medical care as applied to the three groups of individuals who make up our population—the indigents, the middle class, and the well-to-do.

In supplying medical care to all three of these classes there are considerable deficiencies and shortcomings under the present system of medical practice. The medical care of the indigent is a distinct provincial or municipal responsibility as established by the British North America Act.

All provinces have made some provision for the medical care of this group of the population. Unfortunately, in general, the care of indigents in their own homes is left to the medical profession, although in some places a physician is paid out of public funds to give such care. When hospital care is required, a per capita per diem allowance is usually paid to the institution caring for the patient; but no fee is paid to the physician, it being argued by some that the physician receives his reward through his hospital appointment. The medical profession is proud of its record of gratuitous service to those who are in need. The members of the profession in general are willing to give a certain amount of free service. Nevertheless, there is a general feeling that the profession is being exploited, and that governments are meeting their responsibilities for the care of the indigent at the expense of the medical profession. Free service should be entirely voluntary; but to assume that the medical profession will contribute one of the necessities of life, for the provision of which the state is responsible, is unsound in every way. It is interesting to note that physicians are not allowed to deduct from their taxable incomes, under the heading of contributions to charity, a sum equal to their free service.

In this connection, on the question of the treatment of indigents, may I add the following remarks. In New Brunswick there are 265 registered practitioners, or, to use round figures, let us say 250. In normal times there is not one physician in the province who each year does not perform at least $1,000 worth of medical work for which no entries are ever made in his books. That means a quarter of a million dollars' worth of free services given each year in ordinary times. During the time of the depression there was not one physician in the province who did not contribute at least $3,000 worth of services to the people of New Brunswick, meaning a contribution of three quarters of a million dollars for New Brunswick alone, the smallest but one of the provinces. If we take the 10,000 registered practitioners in Canada, and allow that $2,000 was the minimum amount of free service which each contributed to the country every year during the depression period, it amounts to $20,000,000 each year, and in the seven years of the depression it attains the enormous sum of about $150,000,000 or approximately one-quarter of the entire amount spent by the federal, provincial and municipal governments to provide assistance to the unemployed.

Our committee has figures from the various provinces showing clearly that in ordinary times, outside contributions to hospitalization costs, provincial and municipal governments have not, in general, recognized their responsibility for the provision of medical care for the indigent. Furthermore it is regrettable to note that the federal government does not regard medical care as one of the necessities of life, otherwise medical care would have been provided for in the unemployment relief legislation, together with food, clothing and shelter.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that the hour of closing rapidly approaches, so I shall be obliged to pass over many of the considerations which I wished to present to the house. However, I should like to place on record a series of resolutions adopted by the Canadian Medical Association showing what it considers the fundamental principles necessary to be recognized in any scheme of health legislation which might be enacted in Canada. These are as follows:

1. That in the provinces where health insurance is established it be administered under an independent health insurance commission, and that there should be close cooperation between this commission and the provincial Department of Public Health with a view to making full use of preventive services.

2. That a central health insurance board and local insurance boards be appointed, representative of all interested, to advise the responsible administrative authority.

3. That the professional side of health insurance medical service be the responsibility of the organized medical profession through the appointment of a central medical services committee and local medical services committees to consider and advise on all questions affecting the administration of the medical benefit.

4. That the question of the establishment of local areas for health insurance administration be left to the decision of the individual provinces.

5. That the whole province be served by adequate departments of public health, organized on the basis of provision of individual health supervision by the health insurance general practitioner.

6. That there be a health insurance fund, and that regional officers to act as supervisors and referees be appointed, paid and controlled by the central board or commission.

7. That medical care for indigents be provided under the plan, the government to pay the premiums of the indigent, who then receive medical care under exactly the same conditions as the insured person.

8. That the plan be compulsory for persons having an annual income below a level which upon investigation by competent local authorities proves to be insufficient to meet the costs of adequate medical care.

9. That the dependents of insured persons be eligible for the medical benefits.

10. That there be offered, on a voluntary basis, to those with incomes above the health insurance level, hospital care insurance, and that this be administered as part of the health insurance plan, such hospital care not to include medical service other than hospitalization.

11. That the only benefit under the plan be the medical benefit.

12. That the medical benefits be organized as follows—

(a) Every qualified licensed medical practitioner to be eligible to practise under the plan.

(b) The insured person to have freedom of choice of medical practitioner and vice versa.

(c) The medical service to be based upon making available to all a general practitioner service for health supervision and the treatment of disease.

(d) Additional services to be secured ordinarily through the medical practitioner.

(1) (a) Specialist medical service.
(b) Consultant medical service.
(2) Visiting-nurse service (in the home).
(3) Hospital care.
(4) Auxiliary services—usually in hospital.
(5) Pharmaceutical service.

(e) Dental service, arranged direct with dentist or upon reference.

13. That the insurance fund should receive contributions from the insured, the employer of the insured and the government.

(a) Payment of the premium of the insured in certain proportions to be determined, should be made by the employee, employer and government.

(b) Where an insured person has not an employer or where it is not practical for the government to collect from the employer the government should pay in for that insured person what would be the employer's share as well as its own share of the premium.

(c) Where the insured is "indigent" or has been out of work long enough to come without the scope of the provisions of the act as relating to an insured employee the government should assume payment of the full premium.

14. That the medical practitioner of each province be remunerated according to the method or methods of payment which they select.

15. (a) That the schedule of fees in any health insurance scheme shall be the schedule of fees accepted by the organized profession in the province concerned.

(b) That all schedules of fees be under complete control of the organized medical profession in each province.

16. That the contract-salary service be limited to areas with a population insufficient to maintain a general practitioner in the area without additional support from the insurance fund.

17. That no economic barrier be imposed between doctor and patient.

18. That the volume of work demanded from and the remuneration to members of the various professions be such as to assure a standard of service equal to or better than present-day standards.

May I conclude with a summing-up as follows.

For the last ten years there has been a growing demand in certain sections of Canada for some form of health insurance.

Conscious of this trend of thought the Canadian Medical Association made a thorough, world-embracing investigation of health insurance.

With this study as a foundation it has formulated definite plans for health insurance, acceptable to both the general public and the medical profession.

The Canadian Medical Association does not at the present time voice an opinion either in favour of or adverse to health insurance.

The Canadian Medical Association is strenuously opposed to any form of state medicine which would tend to regiment or draft members of the medical profession into the ranks of state servants, controlled and salaried by the state, thus destroying the personal relation between doctor and patient.

The medical profession demands that it be relieved of the burden of gratuitously supplying medical services to the great majority of Canada's indigent and unemployed.

The Canadian Medical Association advocates the broadening of the federal health department's field of activities along the lines suggested at the 1935 meeting of the dominion health council.

The Canadian Medical Association recommends that before any form of health insurance is enacted by any legislative body, a royal commission be appointed to examine the whole question of health activities and medical services in Canada.

Mr. McIVOR: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: I draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that if he speaks now he closes the debate.

Mr. McIVOR: I wish to withdraw the resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the wish of the house that the hon. member have leave to withdraw the resolution?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. DUNNING: In view of the absence of unanimous consent there is only one alternative, that is to call it eleven o'clock.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Tuesday, March 8, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING COMMITTEES

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING—AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION—CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the name of Mr. Ross (Middlesex East) be substituted for that of Mr. Deachman on the standing committee on railways and shipping.

That the name of Mr. Rickard be substituted for that of Mr. Ross (Middlesex East) on the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

CIVIL SERVICE

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO OPERATION OF CIVIL SERVICE ACT—FIRST REPORT CONCURRED IN

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata) moved that the first report of the special committee appointed to inquire into the operations of the Civil Service Act be concurred in.

He said: It has been agreed that the evidence and not the discussion will be printed in connection with this committee, and therefore I move the adoption of the first report.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I concur entirely in the proposal of the chairman of the committee, but this affords an opportunity to say that there is a rule of the house with respect to the printing of evidence given in committees. On examination I find that this arrangement will not constitute a discrimination against this particular committee, because it is in fact a rule that only the evidence shall be taken and printed. I say this for the guidance of other committee chairmen who may have the same difficulty.

Mr. POULIOT: The last report of the committee on banking and commerce contained two pages of discussion.

Mr. DUNNING: They should not have been included. It is hard to keep the rule.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO TERMS AND OPERATION OF SUPERANNUATION ACT

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved:

That a select special committee of the house consisting of Messrs. Anderson, Baker, Blanchette, Bradette, Davidson, Dunning, Francœur, Hansell, Heaps, Hill, Lockhart, McCann, McLean (Melfort), Mallette, Mutch, Pottier and Wood be appointed to inquire into the terms and operation of the Civil Service Superannuation Act, and all matters pertaining thereto, with power to call for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath, and to report from time to time.

Motion agreed to.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

SERVICE IN PERMANENT MILITARY AND AIR FORCE TO BE INCLUDED FOR PENSION PURPOSES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance—for the Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act to provide that time served in the permanent naval, military and air forces of Canada may be included in the term of service of an officer or a constable for pension purposes; and to restrict the application of the act in respect to members of the reserve.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

BRITISH COLUMBIA AND YUKON

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER CORRESPONDENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar). The other day he brought down a return of correspondence asked for by the hon. member for the Yukon (Mrs. Black). That return consisted of correspondence from April 1, 1937, but the file shows that there are other letters which have not been brought down. Would the minister mind bringing down the correspondence, say, back to April 1, 1936? It will be necessary to make the thing clear.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): There is no objection to that; it can be brought down.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

INQUIRY WITH RESPECT TO INFORMATION FURNISHED TO MUNICIPALITIES BY BUREAU OF STATISTICS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Before the orders of the day are called I should like to direct a matter to the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler). In explanation of the question which I intend to ask, may I say that it has come to my attention that not only my own municipality but others are finding difficulty in getting statistical returns from the bureau of statistics in connection with applications for old age and blind pensions. I have in my hand requests for information that go back as far as January 13. I am advised that this delay is probably due to lack of temporary assistance to take care of the unusual amount of work pertaining to blind pensions and other matters. Would the minister be good enough to check up on this situation and consider the providing of temporary assistance in the department to ensure the sending forward of this statistical information to the several municipalities concerned.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I shall be very glad to inquire into the matter.

SUPPLY

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—STATEMENT OF MR. ROSS (ST. PAUL'S) ON MOTION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The house resumed, from Tuesday, March 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Dunning for committee of supply.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, before the adjournment of the house on Tuesday last I was speaking to the question raised by the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) regarding grants in aid payable to the province of Ontario under the agreement covering the last quarter of this fiscal year. That discussion was continued in substance on the following day during the debate on the resolution moved by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), and I concluded what I had to say upon this question at that time.

DISMISSAL OF EDWARD E. JAY AND OTHERS FROM STAFF OF DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct the attention of the government to an injustice which has been done to certain ex-service men. It has been protested through the usual channels but without securing redress, and I bring it to the attention of the house on this occasion because to some extent it touches upon the honour of the house, or at least upon the privileges and rights conferred upon the members of this house by established custom. I find it necessary to bring this matter before the house because after perusal of the correspondence in the case I find that it is only upon action by the house, upon a recommendation of the governor in council, that the wrong which I submit has been done may be righted in respect to the individuals in question.

I refer, Mr. Speaker, specifically to the dismissal of Edward E. Jay and certain other ex-service men from the staff of the Department of Agriculture in the province of Prince Edward Island during August 1936. The facts are contained in sessional paper 243A of last session, a return to an order of the house dated January 27, 1937. The essential facts as contained in that sessional paper and set forth by me appear in Hansard of April 7, 1937, at page 2691. I shall not repeat the facts which were then placed on the records of the house, except to say that these ex-service men, after being employed for periods ranging from five to thirteen years, were dismissed, without due notice and without inquiry, by reason of action begun by the hon. member for Kings (Mr. Grant). The hon. member made his complaint with reference to Mr. Jay in the following terms in a letter to the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner):

> To my personal knowledge, Mr. Edward E. Jay, seed potato inspector, Peake's Station, R.R. No. 1, Kings county, P.E.I., was guilty of political partisanship at the last federal election and I recommend that he be dismissed from the service.
> Yours respectfully,
> Thos. V. Grant,
> M.P. for Kings, P.E.I.

Mr. Jay was dismissed under authority of order in council P.C. 2156, dated August 26, 1936. Others were dismissed by order of the minister, some of them by telegram. I would ask the house to note that this was done without any further inquiry or any detailed statement of the alleged offences in any instance. In every instance considerable evidence was subsequently produced to show that these men had not been guilty of the alleged offences. This evidence submitted by the men on their own behalf was corroborated, as the sessional paper will indicate, by a number of responsible bodies of citizens, but as far as I am aware no action was taken to grant them the hearing requested. All of the men had enjoyed excellent records of service not only in the Canadian forces overseas but subsequently in the Department of Agriculture, and I submit that by reason of the action taken not only were they deprived of their livelihood but their employment opportunities for the future have been blighted. My point is that they were denied recourse to any procedure that would ensure observance of the elementary principles of British justice.

The justification for these dismissals was based on a custom that has been tolerated in this house for years. I consider that this custom should no longer be tolerated, because in application it is grossly unjust and open to vicious practice. It now becomes apparent upon further investigation that the custom as originally agreed upon has been violated and given an unwarranted application. The Minister of Agriculture referred to the custom in correspondence that was exchanged. I quote from page 2699 of Hansard of April 7, 1937, where the hon. Minister of Agriculture is reported as having said:

> I can only say that the action was taken under the practice which has prevailed for a number of years in connection with such matters. The practice followed is that where a member, on his own responsibility, states in writing that a man has been politically active, his word is taken on the ground that he is in a position to be called upon to answer for his action on the floor of the house. Where anyone else makes complaint, a full investigation is held.

As to whether the hon. member for Kings feels disposed to answer on the floor of the House of Commons for his action in accordance with this custom, I leave to his own conscience. I would, however, bespeak his cooperation to secure a full investigation into the matter, that any injustice done may be rectified.

I would ask hon. members to note that this special practice, authorized by an understanding between the political parties years ago, has not in this instance been carried out in accordance with the terms of the original agreement. I refer to the remarks made by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), speaking on a former occasion in this house. Sir Wilfrid Laurier is reported in Hansard of December 6, 1911, at page 894, as follows:

> I beg my hon. friend's pardon. We said in 1896 that no man should be dismissed unless he was first given the opportunity of being heard. But I said also that we would accept the written statement of a member of parliament, giving the facts and asking for the dismissal. This is the rule we laid down and we have lived up to it. I am told by hon. gentlemen opposite that we did not live up to that rule. I do not admit the charge. I think we did, but even if we were deficient I would expect that the hon. gentlemen who are on the treasury benches at present would at least act according to their own doctrines. Are they going to throw over their own doctrine and institute dismissals right and left without giving any man the opportunity of defending himself or without any member of parliament taking the responsibility of placing on record a charge against the man whose dismissal he seeks? I would insist on the leader of the government that he should enforce the rule that no man should be deprived of office without being given the opportunity of defending himself or at least unless the member of parliament who asks for his dismissal has the courage to put on record the reasons why he demands it.

Again, in Hansard of February 15, 1923, the present Prime Minister is reported as follows:

In some cases charges have been preferred against certain officials by hon. members of this house. Where an hon. member has been prepared to state to the house that of his own knowledge an offence contravening the provisions of the Civil Service Act respecting political partisanship has been committed, the government has acted under the provisions of the Civil Service Act, which provide that a civil servant guilty of political partisanship shall not be retained in the service. I think that list will cover any of the dismissals to which my right hon. friend has referred.

Mr. Meighen: I presume that that list would cover practically every case, because the statement from any member that a man has been guilty of political partisanship is not very hard to secure from a partisan supporter.

Mr. Mackenzie King: I did not say a statement from any member. I said a statement from an hon. member of this house that of his own knowledge a civil servant has been guilty of a certain offence which was in the opinion of the government sufficient to warrant his dismissal under the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

The clear intention was that before carrying out such dismissals under this custom, on the written word of a member of parliament, details of the alleged offence would be specifically set out. This contention is borne out by the terms of order in council P.C. 1467, dated October 16, 1922, which I quote:

The committee of the privy council have had before them a report from the right honourable the Prime Minister, representing that, in view of the large number of charges of political partisanship which have been made against government officials in different parts of the country, whose dismissal is asked for by the complainant, it is advisable in the public interest that a course of procedure should be defined for dealing with such charges, in a manner which, whilst giving effect to the intent of the existing legislation respecting political partisanship, will, at the same time, avoid the possibility of injustice being done any member of the public service.

The Prime Minister, therefore, recommends that the following procedure be adopted, viz.:

1. That only such charges of political partisanship as may be made specifically in writing against an official of the government shall be deemed deserving of consideration.

2. That without in any way superseding or suspending the power conferred by existing legislation, when a specific charge of political partisanship is made in writing against an official of the government, if the act complained of is, in the opinion of the minister, of a character to constitute "engaging in partisan work" within the meaning of section 32, chapter 12, George V, 1918, an Act respecting the Civil Service of Canada, such charge may be referred by the minister of the department in which such official is employed, to a commissioner for investigation and report.

3. That for the purpose of such investigation and report, should the number of complaints so warrant, one or more commissioners may be appointed in each of the several provinces under the provisions of part I of the Inquiries Act, chapter 104, revised statutes, 1906.

(Signed) H. W. Lothrop,
Assistant Clerk of the Privy Council.

It should be noted that this order in council does not distinguish between a member of parliament and any other person, and this is as it should be. It seems to me unthinkable that a member of this house should be privileged under the protection of his position to initiate action that would deprive the victim of that action of recourse to the elementary procedure of law and justice. If this practice is condoned, nothing would more seriously demoralize the efficiency of the public service or work greater hardship to civil servants affected. The house will note that in the cases mentioned and referred to in sessional paper 243A, the Minister of Agriculture did not adhere to the terms of the order in council. The order in council requires that the charges be specified in writing and in such terms as to enable the minister to form an opinion as to whether or not the act complained of is of a character to constitute engaging in partisan work within the meaning of the act. In these cases the details of the charges were not specified, and subsequently evidence in support of the affidavits furnished by the men in question was not given consideration. The minister was never in a position, in the light of the evidence on his file, to form the required opinion. In no instance were the charges made the subject of an inquiry or an investigation as required under the order in council. I submit that these men were wrongfully, perhaps mistakenly, dismissed. The procedure followed in the cases cited does not appear to coincide with the intent either of the order in council or of the House of Commons as expressed in the quotations I have laid before the house.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this mistake should not deprive the men affected of the right to appeal for justice and redress. I appeal to the government to institute an investigation with the object of reinstating men who have been dismissed upon insufficient evidence. That is the first point. I think the house owes it to the men in question because of the procedure followed. Secondly, I would urge the government to give this house an assurance that in future insistence will be made upon a procedure which works full justice to all men concerned, namely, that within the terms of the order in council, details of such charges made by members of this house shall be set forth specifically, and that, when deemed worthy of consideration, proper inquiry shall be made as authorized under the terms of the order in council.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): One year ago, when the house was in session, I was notified by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) that it was his intention to bring this matter up on the estimates of the Department of Agriculture; but at a later date, and I must say after the hon. member had informed me of his intention to change the procedure, the matter was brought up on the estimates of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power). I am not certain as to why the change was made. When my estimates were up I had all the information here with which to answer any questions with regard to the dismissal of these particular persons; the question however was not discussed on my estimates last session but upon the estimates of the minister of pensions.

When the matter came before the house I did not happen to be in my seat, as I had another appointment and was not able to be here. But on that occasion the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) addressed the house and stated what I assume would be taken to be the view of those who had previously served in governments in Canada on a matter of this kind. At page 2703 of Hansard the hon. member for Kootenay East used these words:

When I first came to parliament twenty-six years ago, a member of parliament had the right to say that of his own personal knowledge someone was guilty of partisanship, and that person would be dismissed; more than that, when I first came to the house, any employee of the government would be dismissed at the mere request of a member. That was the system then in vogue, the old patronage system. We have gone a long way from that, fortunately.

Further down the column on the same page the hon. member for Kootenay East used these words:

As regards these ten veterans—

In the first place, there were only four veterans; the ten who were dismissed in that particular constituency were not all veterans.

As regards these ten veterans, however, it appears that four of them were appointed under the regime of the present party prior to 1930, and they are dismissed at the request of a member, without a hearing, and without being apprised of the specific offences of which they are accused. The statement is simply made that the member knew that they were partisan and that they should be dismissed. That is a retrograde step; it is something that has not been sanctioned in this house in recent years. True it is that Sir Wilfrid Laurier laid down a dictum that has been frequently quoted, to the effect that if a member seriously stated on his own responsibility as a member that he had personal knowledge that the person complained of had been guilty of partisanship, that person should be dismissed.

What I wish to call attention to is the fact that apparently in the mind of at least one hon. member who had served in governments previously, this was considered a custom which had not been followed by governments in recent years. The hon. member for Vancouver North, in the speech he has just made, has taken exactly the same position, that this is something which was practised some years ago but has not been practised in recent years by governments in Canada; and he has quoted remarks made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in dealing with this situation following the election of 1911.

The question was discussed in 1911, again in 1923, and again in 1928 on the floor of the house, and so far as I have been able to follow those discussions it was admitted from all sides of the house on each of those occasions that it had been the general practice to act upon the word of a member who has a seat in this house and who can, because of that fact, answer for his recommendations upon the floor of the house. When, two years ago, I became a member of the government and recommendations of this kind were brought to my attention, I took the trouble to check back and find what the practice was, and determined to follow the practice exactly as it had been followed previously in the Department of Agriculture and other departments, at least until some change was announced in connection with the policy having to do with dismissals of this kind. And when representations were made to the department, by a member of the house, to the effect that to his own personal knowledge an employee of the department had been politically active, action was taken automatically by the departmental officials to dismiss him. I did not change the practice in any particular; I gave no instructions to them to make any change, but simply informed them they were to follow the practice that had been followed and that they should do so until such time as they received instructions to do otherwise. So far as these individual cases are concerned, they did not come to my personal attention as individual cases to be acted upon by the minister, but were acted upon in the ordinary course of events in the department as cases had been acted upon previously.

Lest there should be any question in that regard, I should like to read to the house two or three letters that went out following the election of 1930—in the years 1930 and 1931—because they bear out the contention I am putting forward at the moment. On November 3, 1930, a letter was addressed to Paul Caldwell, potato inspector in the province of New Brunswick, in these terms:

Dear Sir:

The Civil Service Act states that no government employee shall engage in partisan work in connection with any dominion or provincial election, and it provides that any person who is guilty of political partisanship shall be dismissed from the civil service.

Information has been received in the department to the effect that you engaged in partisan activities, and if this statement is correct, the department is giving you an opportunity to submit your resignation; otherwise, there will be no alternative but to proceed with your dismissal from the service.

Please be good enough to let me know at the earliest possible moment, as if no reply is received from you within a reasonable time the department conclude that the information which it received is correct, and that you were guilty of political partisanship and will proceed accordingly.

The following letter was addressed to the minister of the department on July 30, 1931:

This is to certify that charges have been made against Russell Nicholson, Hunter River, Prince Edward Island, who is engaged as fruit and vegetable inspector in Queens county, Prince Edward Island, that he was guilty of political partisanship in the recent dominion election. We personally accept the responsibility that these allegations are true and beg to ask for his immediate dismissal.

This is signed by the two members for that constituency, and action was taken upon their recommendation. There were sixteen letters signed by the members of the two constituencies dealing with eight different employees in the constituency of Queens, in Prince Edward Island, and eight also in a constituency in New Brunswick, after the same election. And they were acted upon. I did not go any further than to check these two constituencies, but I found sixteen on all fours with the four that are here brought before the house. They were in two constituencies, one in Prince Edward Island, and one in New Brunswick, and I think they justify me in saying that at least until the time of the last government, governments in Canada had followed the practice that had been pursued back in 1911, whether those governments were Liberal or Conservative.

I make this statement merely in order to make it clear to the house that any action which was taken in relation to the four men in question was in accordance with the practice that has been followed, and I think I can say without fear of contradiction that it has been followed in all the departments of government right down to the present time. I am not arguing that it is the proper practice; I am simply saying it is the practice that has been followed in dealing with matters of this kind. Where a member states in this house that, of his own personal knowledge, someone has been active politically, then automatically the department concerned has acted upon the recommendation of the member and has removed from office the particular person concerned.

With regard to any steps that have been taken following such action on the part of the department, I examined the records still further and found that without exception—if there were any exceptions they were very few—the person concerned, did by some method or other deny that he had taken political action after having secured the position he then occupied. On one occasion one of these individuals—one of the eight in New Brunswick to whom I referred—declared that he had never done anything of a political nature while he was in the employ of the government. That brings up another point which I shall discuss in a moment with reference to these particular persons.

On the declarations with reference to the four individuals whose names are now before the house, there are some of the same names as appeared on the declarations on behalf of the other officials in 1931, indicating that they had given good service and that they should be allowed to continue in office. The records show that some of the same concerns that made representations on behalf of these four men, also made representations on behalf of those who were removed in 1931. But I am not submitting these facts to use them as an argument that the practice is a proper one; I am simply showing that it has been the practice.

One investigation was held as a result of the protests made in 1931. It had reference to the dismissal of one returned soldier. Some of the others in the group that were dismissed, following 1930 as well as 1935, were returned soldiers, but there was one investigation that was held into the dismissal of a returned soldier. During the investigation, so far as I have been able to read the evidence, it appeared that the son, or, I believe, a nephew of the member who had made the statement that he, of his personal knowledge, knew that this man had been politically active, gave evidence to the effect that he had seen this particular employee go into a hall where a public political meeting was being held and had seen him come out again. To show the effectiveness of an investigation of that kind the individual's dismissal was confirmed on the word of the son of the member in the same way as he had been dismissed previously on the word of the member himself. That was in 1931, following the election of 1930.

The record right through indicates that this sort of thing has been the practice down to the present time, and that is the only reason that I make these statements. I make them because of the very definite assertion of the hon. member for Kootenay East and of the hon. member for Vancouver North, that while this was the practice back in 1911 it has not been carried on recently and should not be revived.

Mr. STEVENS: I think the minister is stretching the meaning of what I said regarding 1911. What I said regarding 1911 was that it was the common practice to remove employees of the government on the word of the member. I did not say that that was the practice that was defined by Sir Wilfrid Laurier or Sir Robert Borden, and others. I said it was the common practice, and I added that in recent years the custom had been a little more rigid—at any rate, that is what I intended to imply—in that it was required that there should be a written statement by the member. If the minister will do me the courtesy to read my remarks more carefully he will see that I did not wish to suggest for a moment that the practice had been abandoned. Everyone knows it has not.

Mr. GARDINER: I am pleased to have that explanation from the hon. member for Kootenay East, because it makes it unnecessary for me to proceed any further with an argument to convince the house that it has been the practice right down to the present time.

In dealing with the individuals in question I stated a moment ago that the hon. member for Kootenay East in referring to the matter mentioned ten returned soldiers, and I indicated that these persons who were dismissed in that constituency were not all returned soldiers. Only four of them were, I call attention to that only in order to point out that what the minister of pensions said a year ago regarding the matter is true, that this particular question does not concern returned soldiers as opposed to any other individuals in the employ of the government of Canada. If a man has been politically active and the proof which in the past has been accepted with regard to his activity is presented, action results from that, whether the man is a returned soldier or is not. In other words, being a returned soldier does not excuse a man for being politically active.

There is another point in connection with these four men that I would like to place on the record. Only one of the four had what might be called a permanent job. Mr. Jay, I think, had a job which entitled him to draw pay from the government throughout the entire year. The other men had only part time jobs. Mr. Edward Cairns, who came into the employ of the government in 1928, drew from the government the following amounts—omitting cents:

1930-31	514
1931-32	464
1932-33	312
1933-34	683
1934-35	461
1935-36	426

So it will be seen that these were all part time men working at so much a day or month.

Mr. MacNEIL: Were they not employed each season—seasonal men?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, they were seasonal men, employed each season while inspecting a crop of either vegetables or fruit. Then Mr. Edmund P. Donnelly received the following amounts:

1933-34	360
1934-35	310
1935-36	345
1936-37	125

Mr. Charles MacLeod drew the following amounts:

1931-32	$175
1932-33	322
1933-34	532
1934-35	370
1935-36	465

These men were all employed by the day and for so many days.

Mr. Edward Earl Jay was employed in 1924 and again in 1925. In 1926-27 he was employed from July 5 to January 5. In 1927-28 he was employed from July 11 to January 11. For 1928 to 1930 he was employed from February 15, 1928 to August 19, 1930. On August 20, 1930 he was made permanent, and from that time on drew pay for the entire year.

I state these facts in order to bring out the point that some of the men who declared that they were not politically active during the time they were in the employ of the government made a distinction between the time they were actually working for the government and the time they were not. This raises a question to which I think hon. members might give some consideration when dealing with a matter of this kind, as to whether or not the employment of a man by the government during two or three months of the year on some particular work deprives him of the right to take any part whatsoever in politics during the remainder of the year. Some of the men dismissed seem to think it should not deprive them of that right, and have made declarations to the effect that they have not been politically active while in the employ of the government. But so far as this one man was concerned, he was in the constant employ of the government, and he was dismissed on the word of the member to the effect that he had been politically active.

Mr. HEAPS: What was the nature of the charges against the persons dismissed?

Mr. GARDINER: There were no definite charges. These letters in 1931, and all the letters right back over the years, indicate that the member did not make any specific charge, but simply said that the individual to his personal knowledge had been politically active.

Mr. COLDWELL: May we have the declarations that these men made in refuting the charges?

Mr. GARDINER: They are all on the records of last session. There were three returns brought down in reply to an order of the house: one dealing with the constituency I have been speaking of in New Brunswick, one with the constituency of Queens, Prince Edward Island, and another with these four cases in the constituency of Kings. I think most of the records will be found in those returns.

Mr. MacNEIL: I direct the attention of the minister to the fact that declaration was made that they had never been politically active and never attended political meetings.

Mr. GARDINER: There were declarations of that same kind in other cases, all the way back, and still the word of the member was taken.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GARDINER: My friends question that. If I wished to take the time I could read them; some of them are in the records of the house already and hon. members can see them. But I think if they go to any department of the government and look up the records during the time almost any minister was there they will find that what I am stating is correct.

Mr. CAHAN: They will not find it in the Department of the Secretary of State for five years.

Mr. GARDINER: Having established the fact that this has been the practice, all I wish to say is that when the hon. member for Kings sent in a declaration over his signature to the effect that of his own personal knowledge these men had been politically active, his word was taken, as the word of other hon. members of the house has been taken, and acted upon. As far as the one individual is concerned, about whom most of the discussion has taken place, the one who was employed continuously during a period of some years, while it may be very difficult for an hon. member to go before a commission and prove his contention, judging from my own experience over twenty-five years in meeting with civil servants and examining files I would conclude without any further investigation that the member was quite justified in making the statement he did make, and for that reason as minister of the department I would not have required any further examination or investigation in that particular case.

But the general practice has been established, and so long as it continues to be the practice we shall act upon it in my department. When it is decided either by this house or by the government that a different practice is to be followed, then as a member of the government I am quite prepared to follow that practice.

Mr. MacNEIL: May I ask the minister before he takes his seat whether the order in council to which I have referred is still in effect?

Mr. GARDINER: The order in council referred to is still in effect, but it deals with a different class of cases.

USE OF CANADA'S FINANCIAL RESOURCES FOR ELIMINATION OF POVERTY—AMENDMENT OF MR. BLACKMORE

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I am not altogether satisfied with the progress which is being made in our dominion towards removing poverty from the midst of the potential abundance which exists in this country. It is the duty of every hon. member of this house to express his opinion and give the reasons for that opinion, and I merely undertake to discharge my duty in this respect.

As I see it, the government of the day has not only unsuccessfully grappled with the problem which confronts it; it has not even discovered the principles upon which a solution should be based. We still have a disastrous unemployment problem, as I think everyone will grant quite freely. We have a far greater unemployment problem than ought to exist in a country like ours, so munificently blessed with resources. Our standard of living, even among the vast majority of those who are employed, I think all will agree is shamefully low. Our primary producers are crucified because of the fact that they must sell their products on an unprotected market while they buy what they need in order to produce on a protected market. This is causing universal suffering, particularly throughout the west, and apparently nothing is to be done about it. We are suffering from insufficient markets, and in order to get markets we are obtruding our products into the world market, displacing the products of other countries and engendering unfriendliness, while our own people are suffering for want of the very things we are seeking to sell. We have a debt burden which I think anyone who thinks about it calmly must realize is utterly appalling. Let us ask ourselves, as plain, straightforward, common sense, ordinary people: Can we see any way in which this country can ever get rid of the debt which is now hanging over us, if we go on as we have gone for the past ten years? Let us be perfectly honest with ourselves; let us face right up to the question in an unflinching, manly way. I think everyone will agree that our chances of getting out of debt, even if we have no great calamity in future, such as a war, are almost entirely negligible. There ought to be some way by which we can get out of debt, considering the natural wealth of this country. Surely some means can be discovered.

We are uncertain as to whether we ought to have a high tariff or a low tariff. I think even hon. members of the government party will agree that one of the greatest causes of contention among them is whether we should have a high or a low tariff, and no one seems to know. All we do is simply contend about it, and as long as the present system continues that is going to be the case in regard to every hon. member of this house, no matter what party he belongs to, which indicates that there is clash of interest between east and west, between primary and secondary producer, which certainly ought not to exist at a time like this. Surely there is some way of getting over this difficulty. Some people say that economic nationalism is the solution of our problem. Others arise and declaim against economic nationalism as an abomination, as the cause of war, and so on. All these people have been nurtured in Canada; they are even members of the same parties in parliament. I say as long as such conditions exist hon. members will readily realize, I think, and frankly grant that we are far from any sort of solution or even any conception of what the solution might be.

I do not wish to declaim against things as they are without being prepared to offer a suggestion as to how they might be bettered. In Canada we have plenty; that is beyond any question. There may be one or two who will question that statement, but I think there will be very few. I believe almost anyone will readily grant that we can produce all the food, all the clothing, all the housing and all the fuel we need in Canada. An excerpt which to some extent bears upon this question can be found in the Chart of Plenty, published by the national survey of potential productive capacity of the United States. I am willing to grant that this does not apply strictly to Canada, but remembering how closely we resemble the United States in our natural resources and our industrial and railroad equipment we must concede that conditions here must be very similar to those in that country. Therefore when we read on page xiii of Loeb's Chart of Plenty that the United States, without adding to its existing plant or man power, could easily produce for the people of that country $4,400 per family in goods, even we must realize that some such principle must apply to Canada. In the same connection I am going to refer to another quotation which is to be found in The Condition of Britain, by G. D. H. Cole, which was published very recently. At pages 376 and 377 he refers to the findings of the Brookings Institution, again applying to the United States, and reaches the conclusion from their findings that in 1929 only four-fifths of their actual productive capacity was being bought.

Right here, I maintain, is the crux of the situation. They are producing the goods but the people cannot buy. Now the question is why can the people not buy, and how men can manage it so that the people will be enabled to buy. If the goods are there and the people are unable to buy, the problem is clear. The question is how to deal with it. We have the factories; we have the workers; we have the transportation; we have the distributive agencies in Canada, the wholesalers and retailers, and every other thing that is necessary except the means to make them operate. Mr. Henry Ford may not be an authority but nevertheless he is a very successful man; consequently his opinion ought to have a great deal more weight than mine. People who might object to my opinion because I am not successful ought to listen with respect to the opinion of Mr. Ford, who is successful. Recently Mr. Ford made this statement:

> Money is just part of society's transportation system for moving goods from man to man; it breaks down so often it is time our financial engineers developed a better model.

I am not saying that any great credence is to be placed in Henry Ford's opinion or that any great respect is to be given to it, but it is significant, as a point of departure, that this is what he says. I have also a quotation by Paul H. Douglas, which in the same way indicates that money is the cause of the trouble. I shall not trouble the house by reading it, but it is very emphatic.

We, as a group of social credit people, think the solution of Canada's difficulties lies in money, and we believe that the particular kind of money is state-created money, or king-created money. From past experience I feel sure that hon. members now will not jump to conclusions. May I commend the members of this house for their general tolerance of the opinions expressed, and I should like to thank them for that. Since my experience in the past has been so pleasant I think I am safe in assuming that to-day, when I speak of a warm, quiet, beneficial kitchen fire hon. members will not immediately begin to think of a vast conflagration consuming a city. I say that because in the past whenever we have spoken of government or state-created money, people immediately have talked about Germany. You do not have to have a great conflagration destroying a whole city or a world in order to have a fire. A controlled electrical current will light your home, will warm your toaster, heat your iron and perform many other services, but when you think of electricity you need not think of the lightning flash. If you did, you would back away from electricity at once. When you speak of a shower of rain coming down graciously and beneficently to moisten the ground and all that is growing therein, you need not think of a cloudburst which would destroy everything in its path. In the past the reaction to the question of money has been something of that kind. In advocating more purchasing power we are not commending the cloudburst or the conflagration or the lightning flash; we are commending rather the kitchen fire, the electric current under control, and the shower of rain.

The government have tried everything but money reform. I am ready to say what I have said in a hundred places in this country, both on the platform and elsewhere, that as far as I can judge the government in power to-day has done everything it could possibly conceive of under the present system to improve the condition of our people. It is my judgment that the ministers are as energetic, as honourable and as earnest as men could possibly be. It is my belief that the members are ready to do their utmost. They disagree among themselves with regard to high and low tariffs and with regard to the advantages of trade with this and that country, but as far as they can see and come to agreement, they are doing the best they can. I do not hesitate one moment to say that.

We have tried having our banks independent, we have tried keeping them under a very rigid central control, but neither one of these methods of handling our money has succeeded. On every hand we are faced with frustration and the threats of fascism and communism. There is stress and strain among the provinces. If you travel from one end to the other of the province from which I come you will find a very sad and disheartened people.

An hon. MEMBER: No wonder.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is all right to say "No wonder," but that is the fact. Alberta is one of the nine provinces. If you go to those places in Manitoba where people are thinking most you will find that that province is facing frustration and is absolutely at a loss to know what it is going to do. That is the condition existing in two of the western provinces; but I do not intend to go into this in detail. Hon. members are just as aware as I that there are stresses and strains. Surely there must be some way out. In a land such as ours, with people such as ours, with equipment such as ours and in an age such as ours, there surely is a way of escape.

We have a suggestion to offer. Inasmuch as I have been dissatisfied with the progress made by the present government, not so much in its application as in its indisposition to try new things, I move that the motion now before the house shall be treated thus:

> That all the words in the motion after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefore: "This house is of the opinion that for the effective removal of poverty from Canada this government has neglected and is now neglecting to use the resources of the dominion as adequately as the people of this country have a right to demand.

Although I am introducing this as a want of confidence motion, I hasten to say that we have no desire to make this a political question. We felt that we should discuss this matter fully and frankly and dispassionately. We have canvassed with a great deal of care the methods which could be used to bring up this problem on the floor of the house for consideration, and of all the various means which have been suggested, this one seemed the least objectionable and the most likely to bring about the kind of discussion that we wished. I hasten to urge upon the members that they do not consider this a political move.

We do not consider ourselves a political party at all; we consider ourselves everywhere as just an economic league. We have no desire to establish ourselves as a political party, as a group in the house or as a league outside. I want to present my case as modestly and yet with as much assurance as should be fitting. I have been told that sometimes in the past we have spoken with such confidence and, shall I say, such cocksureness, that we have in a measure offended some hon. members of the house. May I urge this in order that you may feel less harshly towards us: Anyone who does not believe sufficiently strongly in his opinion to get up and fight for it with all the energy and vigour of which he is capable, is probably not very sincere. We are very sincere. We believe with all the power of our beings that there lies along the lines which we indicate some chance of solving the problem.

It is my belief that R. F. Irvine, professor of economics at Sydney university, was saying a true thing when he used these words:

> I believe the principles put forward by C. H. Douglas are not only sound but that they provide the only practical way of escape from the tragic fate which otherwise awaits the whole western civilization.

We have never made any statement more positive or more assured than that since we came here. That is a statement by a professor of economics of a great university in one of our sister countries. He has had twenty-five years experience as an orthodox economist, and surely his word should be considered of some importance, whether we agree or disagree with what he says. I urge that you attribute my zeal or ardour, not to persuasion, not to enthusiasm, but to genuine conviction. In further extenuation of my attitude, may I say that hundreds of years ago Bishop Berkeley, who is looked upon as one of the greatest minds in English history, was in favour of exactly the principle which we are advocating—

Mr. MARTIN: That is not true.

Mr. BLACKMORE: My hon. friend is at liberty to come to me and satisfy himself to the full after I have completed my speech. Disraeli recognized the faults in our money system; he referred to it as the Dutch finance system and had a great many things to say about it which I do not think have been promulgated among the youth of this land for a long time. Gladstone realized the weaknesses of the system, and in 1932 the London chamber of commerce roundly condemned the system we are under and suggested the very one we now advocate. Irving Fisher, professor of economics at Yale, has the same attitude to money. G. D. H. Cole, an eminent professor of Oxford, while he does not exactly favour dividends or the just price, is in favour of national money. That is the thing which we are going to discuss here this afternoon.

Mr. DUNNING: Surely my hon. friend is not quoting those names as supporters of the Douglas theory of social credit.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Not by any means.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, thank you.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They are simply the names of men who support the first fundamental of Douglas, and that is that your money shall be state-created, king-created, and shall be debt free. There is no doubt about that point; if anyone questions it I could bring plenty of evidence to bear me out. But I think everyone accepts that because it is well recognized by everyone who understands the Douglas system.

In order to determine for ourselves whether or not the system advocated by Douglas has a chance of succeeding in Canada, there are a great many considerations which we must canvass with some care. I am going to say, first of all, that Canada has tremendous financial resources. When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) the other day, in all seriousness and earnestness, made the statement that there was no way in which you could get money except by taking it away from someone else, he was, according to our view, entirely wrong.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend must not qualify what I said by leaving out part of it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I shall be delighted to have the minister straighten it out if I have not quoted him correctly.

Mr. DUNNING: I used deliberately the two terms money and wealth, because I wanted it to be quite clear that I was not referring only to physical money, dollar bills and such, but to the actual transference of wealth which takes place when we take something from all of the community and give it to some of the community. We can call it money or wealth, but definitely a transference of wealth takes place.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would my hon. friend then say that there is a way of getting money in Canada other than by taxing or borrowing?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. I hope to follow my hon. friend, and I will tell him then.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Once he grants that, we are not far apart. One of the great causes of disagreement among people I think, is that they do not always know when they are talking necessarily about the same thing.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Is it not real wealth that my hon. friend wants to have transferred from those who have it to those who require it, rather than money?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think that when I have finished my hon. friend will fully understand all that I am talking about.

An hon. MEMBER: Never.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We hope so. I give him credit for a good deal, and myself some credit too.

The question is, how much money can Canada have? How much money ought Canada to have? Should the amount of money which Canada should have be governed by the will of banks? Just as soon as we ask ourselves that question in all earnestness and set about finding the answer to it we shall be on the way, at least, in my opinion, to find some path out of our difficulties. We as a group contend that the amount of money, genuine good money, which this government can have, does not depend on the will of any banker or on the amount of money which people have been able to make and save in the past. Then you ask: Well, what is money? So the first thing we will consider this afternoon is, what is money?

In order that we may get together on this, and that you may not feel I am giving any private definition of money I am going to read a quotation from a book which is just off the press. It was published in 1937 by John Donaldson, Professor of political economy—I am not sure just where. The name of his book is The Dollar, at page 1 of which he says:

> Although there are many meanings given to the term money, unless otherwise indicated the word will be used here to mean (1) currency in the sense of all regularly recognized circulating media of hand-to-hand exchange (such as coins, national bank notes, federal reserve notes, and federal reserve bank notes), plus (2) credit, in the form of bank deposits.

For the purposes of our discussion let us accept that as the definition of money. Roger W. Babson, in a book published in 1937, called If Inflation Comes, defines money at page 68. He is worried about the coming of inflation, just as the Minister of Finance expressed himself as being afraid of it; and he has good cause just now, I will grant. In setting forth his reasons for his fear of inflation Mr. Babson gives the following as money: "gold coins, silver coins, paper money, cheques, private credit, government credit." I think that is enough from that quotation. I may say that Mr. Babson goes into the question of money and inflation with a great deal of care. He is certainly not a social crediter, but I like to read men who disagree with me completely because I find in them large sources of information.

There are then two kinds of money; currency and credit. To illustrate what our conception is, so that the members can form their own opinion whether they agree with it or not. might I give this simple little illustration. It is almost childish but it helped me to get a conception of the confounding difficulties when I first commenced to study Douglas.

If you go back into the history of money, (according to one story), you will come to a time when there was a man living in a community and keeping cows. Another man not far off was raising grain, and the man raising grain came to the man with the cows and said, "Let me sell you some of my grain." "Well," said the man with the cows, "I would gladly take some grain but I have not got anything to give you for it. I could let you have a cow." "No," says the man with the grain, "I cannot handle a cow just now. She will get in my way, but I certainly would like to sell you this grain." "Very well, then," says the man with the cows, "I will make a little leather tag and on it put a cow's head and my private mark, and you take the tag, go your way, and when you want the cow, come back and give me the tag and I will give you the cow, because the cow stands behind the tag." "Right," says the man with the grain; and he hands over his grain, takes the tag and goes his way. A little while afterwards he goes to a man with shawls. "I would like to get one of those shawls," he says to the owner. "I will give you some grain for a shawl." "No, I cannot handle any grain," says the man with the shawls. "I will tell you what I will do," says the man with the grain. "I will give you a cow for the shawl." "Yes?" said the man with the shawls. Then the grain man takes out the leather tag and says: "Take this little leather tag and give it to Jim Jackson, and he will give you a cow, for a cow stands behind the tag."

The mere fact that the word "pecuniary," which is the word we use with respect to money, is traceable to the word pecus, meaning cattle, indicates that that story may not be altogether far from the truth.

Now the question arises, how many tags could Jim Jackson make and trade for grain or shawls, or milk or cream, or fruit or sheep or anything else he wants to trade them for? Immediately people will say: It will depend on the number of cows he has. Of course it will. Allowing a certain number of cows to absorb the shock, shall we say, so that he will not be completely cleared out of all his cows, if he has thirteen head of cows he can safely issue probably nine or ten tags, which may go circulating all around the community. Every time a tag returns there will be a cow to back it. Now, suppose this man has thirteen cows and he issues ten tags; let us suppose another man has thirteen cows worth of grain and issues ten tags, and another man with thirteen cows' worth of shawls issues ten tags, immediately we see that in this little community there can be thirty leather tags in circulation. What is the backing of them? Is it the banks? Is it gold? Is it silver? Is it copper? No, it is cows and grain and shawls. Originally the money of a community depended exactly on the community's ability to produce goods that people could use. That helped me to get the idea of the backing of the money of the new economics. I believe we have quite lost sight of that backing of money. As soon as you begin to apply that principle to Canada, with all her boundless ability to produce all manner of things, you see that there is the possibility of a great many leather tags. Let me say that that possibly explains the way in which currency could be backed. Those leather tags would be currency.

Now, as to the other kind of money that we use—the credit; let us employ a similar illustration to get the idea of what credit is. Credit in the last analysis is the ability to produce and deliver goods and services, as, when and where required. That is a glib definition which meant nothing to me the first six months or so I studied it, but I got the idea of what it meant by this means. Supposing that, to a community where there is plenty of timber and fish and good hunting, and coal in the ground, there come four men to settle. One is a good hunter, one a good fisherman, one a good woodman, one a good builder. The hunter goes out and has considerable success; he gets a good deer every day. He goes to the woodman and says, "If you will cut me twenty-five logs to-day I will get you a good deer." The woodman knowing that the hunter can be relied upon, goes off and cuts the twenty-five logs. The hunter goes out and gets the deer, delivers it and gets his logs. The confidence which the woodman had that the hunter could get the deer gave an establishment of credit. If this little community went on and gradually developed, one man coming in with the ability to saw lumber, another with the ability to tan hides and make coats, little by little the public credit of the community would grow because its ability to deliver goods and services as, when and where required, would increase. The man who is the woodman will give an I.O.U. to the hunter; the hunter may give the I.O.U. to the tanner. We will suppose that they begin to use for I.O.U.'s figures in a book just as we use them now, just as our bank credit is operated. A man comes in who makes it his specialty to write up these I.O.U.'s. He does not need gold; all he needs is the assurance that these people can deliver goods and services as, when and where required, and he can commence to write up credit.

Mr. CLEAVER: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Gladly. That is what I am here for.

Mr. CLEAVER: Before I forget about these cow tags, are you suggesting that they can be handed or given to anyone without being earned, without being paid for?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Not just yet. We will come to that after a while.

Mr. CLEAVER: I am sorry to have interrupted the hon. member. I just wanted that information.

Mr. BLACKMORE: As you have asked it, let me say that if a community gets into war and one person is wounded so that he is thereafter incapable of going out and raising cows or grain, and the men who can raise cows and grain and shawls can produce far more than they can possibly use, it is conceivable that some of the tags could be given to this wounded man without doing them any harm at all. But when one of the tags comes to the man with cows he can turn it over and buy grain with it, and the grain man can turn it over and buy shawls or coal or any other article the community produces.

Mr. CLEAVER: Are you suggesting that anyone may acquire one of these tags without having given value for it himself or through his friends or someone else?

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is a very fair question, but as we go along we shall get to the point that, as the community develops, it will be evident that the all-important thing for the man who produces cows is that he shall be able to sell them. That is the all-important question which obtrudes itself upon all western stock producers to-day. Their great anxiety is not whether they can raise cows but whether they can sell them. They are interested in any means which can be employed whereby they will be enabled to sell their stock. Even the people who do not produce would probably confer upon them a distinct advantage—

Mr. CLEAVER: I take it that—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I have the question? Very well. I am glad to answer questions; we might just as well take them up as they arise, because that is what I am here for. I delight greatly in questions.

First of all, then, we have decided on a definition of what is money; what is currency (tags); what is credit—figures-in-a-book. If hon. members do not agree with my definition—good. If they do, we are together thus far. The next question we shall take up is, where does money come from? Is the money which the bank, for example, lends to you if your credit is good, money which somebody put into that bank, or is it money which the banker creates at the moment and lends you? If the answer to the latter question is yes, a tremendous possibility opens up. Where does money come from? The contention of the whole social credit movement is that the banker creates that money as he lends it to you. There is a real clash there, some bankers maintaining it is not so, and increasingly many bankers and great authorities contending and declaring that it is so—and the latter are not all social crediters, by any means. We say that bankers lend credit and not currency. Some evidence that that is true is to be found in a quotation which I shall read. May I say that when I first heard this four or five years ago I considered it was the most idiotic thing I had ever heard of, and not until I was completely convinced that bankers do create the money they lend was I ready to listen to the social credit proposals.

Here is a quotation from a source which I think all hon. members must respect. It comes from the London Economist of August 15, 1936.

> The most obvious and significant fact which emerges is that no single major country has overcome the great depression without undertaking a policy of monetary expansion of one kind or another.

Which indicates that money is the root of the difficulty.

It is, of course, open to anyone to maintain that recovery would have come without positive expansionist policies if only the countries concerned had waited long enough. In fact, however, it never did. Holland and Switzerland are waiting still.

Hon. members can find this letter in volume 124, July to September, 1936, page 292. The article goes on to say that the monetary expansion is accomplished, not out of savings, but by the creation of fresh credit. That agrees exactly with our contention. There are many other quotations that could be cited. I am going to direct the attention of the house to the London Chamber of Commerce report of July, 1932. I quote:

> It is upon the base of currency (money without physical existence) that the structure of bank or credit money is built. This credit money is many times greater in quantity than the currency, and having no physical existence, it is conveyed from account to account by cheque. At the present time the banks are working to a ratio of ten per cent cash of their total deposits—i.e., they are lending ten credit pounds for every one pound cash holding.

That is, they are lending ten credit pounds for every one pound of cash held. I would submit that statement to any man in Canada and ask him to explain how on earth that is true unless the banks, holding one pound of money, can create and lend ten credit pounds out of nothing. As I say, there are plenty of quotations that I could give; I have them in great number. But these are enough.

Where does the money come from? If all the money that this government could borrow in Canada were obtained in Canada, if it had to come out of past savings of the Canadian people, out of life insurance and trust companies and the like, then, of course, we should be prepared to pay interest on that money and consider ourselves in debt for it. We should have to pay it back and have our descendants for generations pay interest on it. Ultimately, if they could liquidate it, they would. But if the money originally was created out of nothing why should we have to pay interest on it? Why should we be in debt and bleed the country white to pay it back? That is manifestly a revolting prospect.

The next question is, what gives money value? The Minister of Finance has said, very wisely and quite correctly, confidence. Surely it is confidence. And what makes confidence? Is it not first of all the certainty that the person to whom you present money will deliver to you goods and services as when and where required? Does anything else matter at all? Undoubtedly the conclusion must be drawn that if in a country you have plenty of goods and services so that people are able to deliver these goods and services as, when and where required, then to the extent to which you have goods and services you can have money. That is a social credit contention put in another way.

The thing that attaches confidence to money is government backing. This Dominion of Canada has created millions upon millions of dollar bills. Did they cause inflation? Surely not. Were they good money? Surely they were. Did they always have gold behind them? Surely not. Just consider for a few minutes Sir Thomas White's excellent pamphlet, How Canada Financed the War. Many of these principles are set out clearly. Consider the way in which Britain financed the war. Britain went into debt to the extent of seven billion pounds. One of these billions she borrowed from the United States and two of them she borrowed from her people, raising it by loans and taxation. But the other four billion pounds were not in England before she went into the war. Where did they come from? If they were created by banking institutions in England, why in the name of common sense should the English people and their children to the last generation be loaded with a burden of debt which they must pay back, paying interest to an extent that ruins the country, just as we are doing now? The money was created out of nothing by the banking institutions of Great Britain, and ten per cent of it was created by the British government itself in treasury bills. And after a pound of treasury bills was created and handed to the bank the banker could immediately make ten pounds of his own credit money and lend it back to the government. Such a situation must surely present itself to any thinking man as an incongruity, a monstrosity, an absurdity. The thing that gives money value is the power of the people behind the government that creates that money—the power of those people to deliver goods and services as, when and where required. It is not gold. This principle must be laid down; if the hon. members challenge it we must clear the matter up. If the people's productivity backs and makes possible the money, then the money certainly ought to be theirs.

There is in the minds of people generally throughout Canada and the British world, and in the United States as well, great confusion as to the backing of money. Practically everyone has the idea that there must be gold behind the money. Thirty or forty years ago it was generally thought that money was better if it was made of gold. We never see gold to-day; we never even ask for it, nor do we trouble ourselves about it. Is it gold that gives value to our money? Let me hasten to say, I fully grant that you must have gold to back your exchange. But that is another matter that must be considered in its place; if we go into it on this occasion we shall not cover the other aspect of the question. Apart from exchange, however, is there any reason at all why the question whether there is gold in Canada or not should affect the value of Canada's money?

Mr. ROGERS: Does the hon. member agree that the value of money has some relation to the price level?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, undoubtedly, and the price level has a relation to the amount of money. We readily grant all that. In order to make it clear that the value of money does not depend upon the substance from which it is made, or with which it is backed, I wish to quote an authority whom I think every man in this house will readily accept—I refer to Ricardo. I would also quote from Sir Norman Angell's booklet, Your Money. No one can question either of these men or accuse him of being a social crediter. From page 15 of the booklet, I quote:

> It is not necessary that paper should be payable in specie to secure its value; it is only necessary that its quantity should be regulated.

That is clear as can be. It shows that the value of money does not depend upon the gold behind it; it does not depend upon the gold in it, nor upon the silver behind or in it. The value does in some measure depend upon the quantity. The Minister of Finance pointed out last year, quite accurately, that velocity has a good deal to do with it. We did not doubt for a moment, but in the limited time at our disposal we could not present the whole case; it takes books to present a new economics. No one knows exactly to what extent velocity does affect money, but it is certain that the value of money depends upon quantity and velocity. These facts being granted, then unquestionably it follows that the value of your money depends, not upon the gold or silver behind or in it, but upon the goods and services producing and consuming power, of the country behind the government that creates the money. That is the social credit contention.

There is another question which bears definitely upon the matter we are discussing: How much money can Canada have? How much money can a community have? At one time during the war the government created $16,000,000 in new bills. Why did they stop at sixteen? Could they have created sixty? I am not going to try to answer that.

Mr. DUNNING: The answer to that question is very important.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Very true. But the big question is this: Did the amount of money they could have created depend upon the gold that they happened to have, or the goods and services they could produce and deliver?

Mr. DUNNING: It does not depend on either.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It depends in fact on the exchanges, on the use for the money. Is not that so? I wish that hon. gentleman had remained here; I have forgotten his name and constituency. Those questions will be answered before we get through. Now, the value of the money, or the amount of money which a community can have, depends upon the exchanges. Observe that the man did not have to have a tag until he wanted to exchange a cow for grain, but as soon as he wished to effect that exchange he had to have a tag. The more such exchanges he had to make the more tags he had to have. And that holds true with the country. This is an abstruse and intangible problem, difficult to predict and measure, I grant. Up to the present men simply do not know how to measure it; we grant that. But it is certain that there is a relation between the number of exchanges to be effected in the country and the amount of money the country can use. The question is: How many exchanges will the people of Canada make with each other if they are given a chance? Upon the answer to that question depends the amount of money Canada can have, and whether or not the government of Canada back in those war days could have created $160,000,000 instead of $16,000,000, and still have had sound money. Let me hasten to say that I do not wish to have any of the statements I make taken and interpreted in a broad way; it is impossible, as all hon. members know, and as the Minister of Finance knows very well, to make a statement without having plenty of time to qualify it.

Mr. DUNNING: That is frequently true of the hon. member's quotations.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Exactly so. I have exerted all the intelligence, ability and industry that I possess in reading these books with the most minute care to make sure that the interpretation I have put upon the quotations is correct according to the meaning of the author. And I tell hon. members where they are found in order that they may read for themselves. Read the books through and see whether you agree with the author. I can get no other meaning from what they say than that which I give here.

I have here two other quotations, one from Sir Norman Angell, and one from Sir Basil Blackett's book, Planned Money, pages 103 and 106, which bear out the statement that the amount of money that a country can have depends on its exchanges.

Having covered the question of what gives value to money, let us turn to another question which is fundamental to social credit. I am sure some hon. members will be surprised to hear that social credit stands for king-created money, money created by the sovereign, by the crown. That is just a ready way of expressing the thought. It is crown-created or government-created money. At the risk of boring the house I wish to review for a few minutes the history of English money. Let us go back into the past and see what they did in ancient times and whether when the king created money it caused inflation. Were the kings able to regulate the money, and did they do so? I found some very enlightening books on this question, from which I am drawing the information which I now give to the house.

Edward III was the first king who commenced to manage English money. In 1346 he reduced the penny from twenty-two grains troy of silver to twenty grains. Hon. members would say that he debased the coinage. But it did not work that way. In 1351 he issued a new penny containing eighteen grains. His reason was that he knew the country needed more money, and apparently the only silver they had was what was in their coins, so that new coins were made containing a smaller amount of silver.

Mr. REID: The hon. member is wrong; he did it to make a profit for himself.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am glad the hon. member is so free to challenge my statements.

Mr. REID: I can prove it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I refer my hon. friend to The Breakdown of Money, pages 41 and 43; he will find much enlightenment there. Henry IV in 1412 reduced the penny to fifteen grains. Thorold Rogers in his History of Agriculture and Prices says that there was no rise in prices. Now, that is significant. There is a case where the amount of money was increased and the actual value in the money decreased, but there was no fall in prices. Why? Because the productiveness of the country had increased meanwhile, and the country really needed more money. Edward IV in 1464 reduced the penny to twelve grains, and prices remained absolutely stable. Henry VIII debased the money in 1542—this is what the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) had in mind; he did it to make a profit.

Mr. REID: So did the others, every one of them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We shall ask the hon. member to give his proof in the speech which he can make after I conclude. Henry VIII debased the value of the coinage in 1542; he increased money faster than the increase in goods, with the result that there was a rise in prices from 100 in 1541 to 213·5 in 1556. The authority, again, is Thorold Rogers. This rise in prices was partly due to the debasement of the currency and partly due to a large influx of gold and silver treasure from America. In those days when a man had gold he could take it to the mint and have it coined. The result was that the king had very little control over the amount of money in the country, provided the people could get plenty of silver and gold. This element was entering into money from the time of Henry VIII forward and caused a great deal of trouble down to and through the time of Charles II. But the rise in prices apparently was not owing to an increase of money by the king.

In 1561 Queen Elizabeth called in £850,000 of debased silver and issued in place of it £730,000 of good money, and the result was deflation. She issued good money and instead of inflation she caused deflation. Prices in 1561 were 205 and in 1562 they were 192·9, which indicates just what I have said, that prices fell using 1399 as 100.

This is somewhat heavy material, but I find it intensely interesting and constructive. Later American gold and silver came along in very great quantities and caused great inflation, which wrecked both Charles I and Charles II. Charles II began to use notched tallies for his money, and after a while began to use paper. He found that the paper money was good, and the people began to use the paper, exchanging goods and services for it just as they had done with the metal money. Charles II had made an important discovery, and I should like to read what one of the greatest authorities in the world has to say about him. Doctor Shaw, whom the Minister of Finance will readily recognize as one of the greatest authorities on money in England, has this to say:

> . . . the orders would have performed all the functions that were in the next century to be performed by the privately issued bank notes.

Those are not the words of any guesser; they are the words of probably the greatest scholar in the world in regard to monetary matters, as quoted by Christopher Hollis in The Two Nations, page 18.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we are discussing the question of whether or not king-created money is good money. The idea has begun to go abroad, because of a faulty educational system and because of propaganda, that if a government creates money it is necessarily bad money, or weak money.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am glad the Minister of Finance is so confident that that is not so.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not think anyone in Canada contends that the money created by the government of this country is not good money, and I do not think our educational system in any part of the country teaches such a thing. I think that is incorrect.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Our educational system and our propaganda do contend, though, that if the government creates a dollar bill it is inflation.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am delighted to hear the minister say that, because when we have been contending for state money the answer has been that it will cause inflation.

Mr. DUNNING: We have state money. You have some in your pocket; I have some too. I wish I had more of it. Of course it is state money.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, we seem to be getting into a unity of faith. Once you grant that state money is good money, then there is no reason—

Mr. DUNNING: It depends upon the state, you know, as to whether or not it is good.

Mr. BLACKMORE: True, but no one will question the fact that Canada is good.

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear; I am glad to hear my hon. friend make that statement.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is exactly how I feel. Now, then, Mr. Speaker, once we grant that this dominion government can create money, and that it is good money, and that the amount of money which it can create depends not upon the gold it happens to have but on the exchanges which can be brought about in the country, then we begin to see that it is simply idle folly to suppose that all the money this country has must be borrowed from banks or collected in taxes.

Mr. THORSON: But it must be good outside the country as well.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Very true. I am much pleased with my hon. friend's interest, but he must remember that we can do only one thing at a time. Let us get this proposition laid down fully and recognize that state money is sound money in Canada. During the war the English treasury notes were complete evidence that state money is sound. Doctor William A. Shaw, in one of his recent great books which all hon. members would find interesting reading, the name of which for the moment I have forgotten, but it has to do with the principles and practices of central banking, tells us that when the British government discovered the use of the treasury bill they had discovered the perfect money, and he deplores the fact that they allowed themselves to be deceived into going back to the gold standard, which brought about this terrible wreck from which we are all suffering at the present time.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): But did they not retreat in the face of the requisitions of the United States?

Mr. BLACKMORE: That would be a matter that we would have to go into.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I think it is a factor.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We must remember that if we go into side issues we will not get through. I shall be very glad to take up all considerations in time, but we have plenty to deal with to-day, so let us go straight through Certain it is that Doctor William A. Shaw, notwithstanding anything that can be said, has stated definitely that they had discovered the perfect money. I intended to bring that quotation down to the house with me to-day, but I thought perhaps it was too long to read here. Then they abandoned it; they sold themselves for a mess of pottage, and apparently we followed them.

I was going to comment on Canada's covered issues of notes, Canada's backed issues of notes, but since the Minister of Finance has been so kind as to help me out I do not need to go into that. I think we are all satisfied that Canadian money is good money, and that there is a tremendous possibility for the creation of the same in Canada.

Mr. THORSON: Then it might not be good if it were created in excess.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We grant that, Mr. Speaker, surely, but the all-important thing is to know to what extent you can go before it becomes excess.

Mr. THORSON: Now will you tell us that?

Mr. BLACKMORE: All right, but the point, as far as I see it, is just as I indicated in the little illustrations I gave. Because a fire has been used to create a conflagration, we cannot be forbidden to have a kitchen fire.

Mr. MARTIN: To what extent would you go?

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is a matter of which I have said already even the wisest and best informed of men are only becoming dimly conscious, but they are certain that a great deal more than we now have can be created.

Mr. MARTIN: I have followed the hon. gentleman very carefully and sincerely, and I should like to ask him a question, because he has given this matter a great deal of study. To what extent would he advocate that we should go?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I would advocate going far enough, as G. D. H. Cole says, to put our resources, that are not now being used, into production. That is not clear, I know, but the point, as you know and I know—

Mr. DUNNING: That means exactly nothing. That is what we are waiting to hear. The other day my hon. friend said he wanted a chance to explain what social credit would do. That is precisely the question in point, but my hon. friend does not give the answer. Tell us about it. Tell us how you propose to proceed. I ask as an earnest inquirier. I do not agree with my hon. friend in all that I have read as to what he means, but I wish he would tell us what social credit will do and how it will work.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In the first place we must not enter into too many technicalities here.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is all right to laugh, but the details I have given here this afternoon are quite sufficient. At another time I shall go into those details along that very line, if I am required to do so. In the first place we can say this: No one would be afraid if the banks throughout this country were to take a notion to lend $300,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: I would.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the minister be afraid?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes; I am afraid of notions like that. I would want to know what was back of it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the minister be afraid that $300,000,000 loaned to farmers and various other producers throughout the country would cause inflation?

Mr. DUNNING: I would want to know precisely what was back of it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think that will be developed as we go forward. Back of it is the Canadian banking system. My hon. friend has raised a question which probably I could deal with right now, by means of a quotation which astonished me.

Mr. THORSON: Never mind quotations.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If I make a statement in this house without a quotation to back it up, people say I do not know what I am talking about, so I am going to give you the quotation and tell you where it can be found. At page 140 of The Canadian Banking System, a book published in 1938 by James Holladay, Ph.D., professor of economics at the university of Alabama, appear the words, in question:

> The Bank Act of 1934, however, sets up a specific quantitative reserve which the chartered banks are required to hold against their deposit liabilities. In form, this reserve must consist of a deposit in and notes of the Bank of Canada. In amount, it must be equal to five per cent of the deposit liabilities in Canada. As a result, the chartered banks as a group can legally create deposits amounting to $20 on the basis of a one dollar reserve. A much larger secondary expansion is made possible, however, for the Bank of Canada is required to hold only a 25 per cent reserve against its liabilities, which in turn constitute the reserves of the chartered banks. Consequently, the Bank of Canada can expand a dollar into $4 of liabilities which, if borrowed by the chartered banks, will enable them to lend an aggregate of $80 against a primary deposit of one dollar. This compares with a possible legal expansion of $28.50 under the federal reserve system in vogue in the United States.

If the Bank of Montreal lent $10 of credit money, unquestionably what would be behind it would be a one dollar bill of the Bank of Canada, and the one dollar bill of the Bank of Canada, if we interpret all these things aright, could just as well be expanded to $10 of federally created money if the government willed. Behind the one dollar which the Bank of Montreal would get from the Bank of Canada there would be only twenty-five cents in gold.

Mr. DUNNING: But you say that gold is unnecessary.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am not saying that it is necessary, but it is there if the people who want gold must have it. Manifestly if the banking system can lend $80 against $1 of gold, it would appear that the framers of the Bank of Canada Act were not greatly concerned about gold. I am sorry that this one aspect of the discussion this afternoon is not in sufficient detail to meet the points raised by the minister and several other hon. members. The next time we bring up this matter on the floor of the house we shall go into their questions in more detail.

The next great question is: What of inflation? We shall discuss inflation with considerable care. The reason why we have moved this motion of want of confidence is simply that we could show that the possibilities of financing the Dominion of Canada are tremendous, I almost said limitless. The other evening the minister said quite straightforwardly and sincerely, "I am not sure we are managing them right, but we have the complete power to manage them." I believe I quote him correctly.

Mr. DUNNING: The management of credit and currency in Canada is right here in this parliament.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am delighted beyond measure to hear that, for I feared that it was somewhere else. Once it is here in this parliament; once we realize that there is such a tremendous reservoir of potential money in this dominion, a reservoir which will permit $80 in credit being issued against every dollar in gold deposited in the Bank of Canada, then we must realize the powerful weapon we have to be used in fighting poverty in this country. This government persists in believing that it must borrow from the banks and pay back to the banks, money which the banks could not create except for this government. So long as the government holds to this notion, the situation in Canada cannot greatly improve.

Mr. DUNNING: We want to know what my hon. friend and his friends would do in managing the credit and currency of Canada if they sat here and had the responsibility. We want to be told how it is to be done.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I shall quote what Douglas says.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not hesitate to say that I am a follower of Douglas. Douglas says, "The first thing I would do would be to call in the bankers, and I would tell them that they were responsible for the economic condition."

Mr. DUNNING: To whom would you say that?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Call in the Bank of Canada, if you wish.

Mr. DUNNING: You would say that to the Bank of Canada?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Call in whoever has charge of the financial affairs of Canada. We would say to them, "We want you to manage matters so that poverty will be removed from the midst of plenty." The bankers will probably say, "Very well, we will go and do it." I do not propose to go into more detail at the moment, but I should like to give one illustration. In the town of Raymond in which I live and from which I was elected, there are hundreds of good men. Twelve or thirteen years ago many of those men could write their cheques for $500, $1,000, $3,000 or $10,000. Where are they to-day? They are ruined. Why? Before the depression those men could go into a bank in the spring and get a loan of $3,000, $4,000, $5,000 or $10,000 with which to put in a crop. When those men went into the bank after 1929, the banker said, "We cannot let you have the money." The result was that credit was restricted all through the country. The men, women, boys and girls who had been working for those people, no longer could get jobs. The result was that the purchasing power in that particular community was dried up. Because those men could not borrow money with which to raise a crop, with which to produce, production in that particular area fell off. The same thing was true throughout all Canada.

In limiting production the bankers limited consumption. If a man could not get money with which to produce, neither could he get money with which to pay wages to permit people to consume. People must be able to produce and other people must be able to consume.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would you pass a law to force the banks to lend people money?

Mr. BLACKMORE: We would have to leave that up to them. It may be that that could be looked upon as a special question, and I am not prepared this afternoon to go into the details of a discussion of that kind. I have seen ministers rather displeased at times when an hon. member asks a question without giving notice. Surely the same principle should apply to anyone who has come here prepared to deal with one aspect of a question when questions are asked in connection with another aspect. I would call in the bankers and tell them that they must bring about a change in conditions. Suppose they say, "We cannot do it, we do not know how." Then we would say, "Very well, we will bring in experts to teach you how."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. YOUNG: Is my hon. friend saying that he does not understand all this?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Not at all. I have heard ministers of the crown rise in their places and say, "I cannot give the details of this." They did not make that reply because they did not know; they made it because it was not the right time to answer.

Mr. YOUNG: My hon. friend is making a learned speech which he has carefully prepared; but when it comes down to the real point at issue, he says, "I am not going to answer that to-day." I am an honest inquirer. Would my hon. friend be good enough to answer the question asked by the Minister of Finance and tell us just what he would do if he were sitting here on the treasury benches? That is what we have been trying to find out.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have said what the first step would be.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is this the social credit policy about which we have heard so much, calling in the bankers?

Mr. BLACKMORE: That would be the first step.

Mr. ILSLEY: What is the next one?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Just what I have said. If the bankers said, "We do not know how to change all this—"

Mr. ILSLEY: Then you would call in the experts?

Mr. BLACKMORE: We would have to call in people who would know how. Suppose the Minister of Finance or the Minister of National Revenue would ask me what I would do if I were put in charge of his department. I would be confounded, naturally, until I had time enough to study it as he has done. The minister would call in the experts, and have them tell him, and if they could not do what he wanted them to do, he would dismiss them and get others.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Might I ask, for information: Who are the experts who have demonstrated—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No; go on.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I know my hon. friend the member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) will be glad to listen to my question and answer it if he can, and he needs no help from those behind him saying no. I would ask him who are the experts who have demonstrated their expertness by doing this thing somewhere at some time in the past, and in whom we have reason to have confidence that they can do it again, because they can show they have done it before?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Before men had successfully flown airships, you surely could not get an expert who knew how to fly a ship; but there were experts who knew a good deal about the matter, and by constantly applying themselves they did learn to fly ships. The big mistake is that we are not trying. We are content to "stay put," so to speak, and to continue within the confines of a system handed down to us from 1688. I would be glad to have evidence that that is not the case, but I have not been able to see any since coming to Ottawa.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The hon. member has not answered my question. I should like to know who are the experts who have demonstrated that they are experts by having done this simple operation at some time somewhere.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We shall have to let that be a state secret for some time, although I have some information which might interest my hon. friend.

Mr. THORSON: Why not send the master expert to go into this matter?

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is completely aside from the question before us. Let me say that I appreciate tremendously the courteous, kind and interested hearing which is being accorded me this afternoon, but I have not time to go into all these details. However, inasmuch as all hon. members are so much interested, we shall do so before we get through the session.

Mr. DUNNING: But these are principles, not details.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Now, what is inflation? I am going to give a definition which is quoted with approval by Roger W. Babson in his recent book, and which I think is sound:

> Someone has defined inflation as when purchasing power is made available to the people at a faster rate than goods are made and brought to market.

Mr. DUNNING: Does he confirm that definition?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, in the main.

Mr. DUNNING: He says someone has stated it in that way.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes; he approves it in the main. My hon. friend will find the book in the library. It is carefully written, but Mr. Babson does not pose as an authority on the subject. In a way he accepts that definition, and all the best writers on the new economics, and the best writers that I have found on all economics, are agreed on that definition.

Mr. ROGERS: The implication being that there would be a rise in prices in that situation?

Mr. BLACKMORE: No; there would not be so long as there were more goods than money, and I shall bring that out later on. I know the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) is interested because he raised the question last year, and as I go on with my speech I think hon. members will find that all their questions will be answered in due time.

Mr. ROGERS: The hon. member has been very good-natured.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Taking that as our definition, we shall go forward. If some hon. members disagree with it, all right; but think about it anyway. But if we agree on that definition, it means a tremendous amount to our thinking regarding the possibility of financial expansion in Canada, the possibility of dividends, for example; and just jumping forward for the moment, tied up with that is the possibility of distributing money in the compensated price. The ordinary objection to the social credit theory is that it will cause inflation. Very well. We must know what inflation is before we can be in a position critically to examine that possibility.

There are two main kinds of inflation, into both of which Babson goes with considerable care. I took pains to read someone who is not a supporter of the new economics just to make sure that I would not be entirely out of touch with my hearers this afternoon. Babson points out that there are two kinds of inflation. You can have inflation with respect to gold. If you say that the rule is that for every one dollar of gold you can have four dollars of bills and you must not go beyond that, then manifestly if you have five dollars of bills you have inflation with respect to gold. That is as clear as can be.

If you say that the rule is that you can have four dollars of bills and seventy-six additional dollars of bank credit, and then you expand your bank credit to eighty-six dollars, you have manifestly come to a condition of inflation in bank credit with respect to your gold. Whether your inflation is with respect to goods or services is another question.

There are two distinct ways in which you can have inflation in the country. One is inflation beyond the accepted gold backing, or whatever else you say is the backing; it may be bills, dominion notes or other cash. The other applies to your potential production of goods and services. You may have so many goods and services, and so little money, that you can expand your money even though your money intrinsically be almost worthless, as they did with playing cards once upon a time in Canada, and still have your money good, providing you have more goods than you have money.

Let me restate this. We can have a currency inflation; we can have more currency than there is gold; or we can have more currency than there are goods and services; or we can have so much currency that if the banks expand that currency in credit there will be inflation either with respect to gold or with respect to goods and services within the country. Having laid this down as a basis, we are now in a position to go forward with the discussion. I regard this as extremely important.

There is another matter which needs to be dealt with. You may have ten million dollars in the hands of a few people, say ten people. Those men may begin to buy on the stock market and run prices up until there is a collapse, or they may cause a local inflation which may ultimately bring disaster to the country. With a small amount of money, however, that would not be possible. Take the ten million dollars and distribute among a thousand people, and you will have no inflation whatsoever. A great deal therefore, depends not only upon the amount of money you have in the country but upon its distribution. While on that point might I say that the social credit idea of distributing money through dividends is one of the devices for preventing inflation, because the money is placed right out among the people who are going to use it, and immediately they get that money they will be exchanging some of it for clothes, food, fuel and various other things; whereas if the same amount of money were in the hands of a few wealthy men, they would not use it; or, if they did, they would use it for inflation.

So inflation involves a number of considerations: First of all, currency inflation; next, credit inflation, which is inflation with respect to your gold or other money or cash backing; then inflation with respect to your goods and services within the country. Let it be recognized fully that if you have more goods and services than you have money in the hands of the people to buy those goods and services, you will have a fall in prices, and therefore you will have deflation. But as soon as you have more money in people's hands than there are goods and services to buy, there will be a rise of prices, and you have inflation.

An hon. MEMBER: How are you going to get money into the people's hands?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Through the dividend and the compensated price. We shall consider that in due time; I am not going to discuss it to-day. I had not intended to discuss the dividend or the compensated price; but they are exceedingly important in the Douglas system, and without them the Douglas system of course would fail. The chief reason why many fail to understand the value of the Douglas system is that they fix upon the one idea of state money, forgetting the other two, the dividend and the compensated price, and say immediately there will be inflation; whereas the whole system is designed and perfected to prevent inflation and to create the greatest possible distribution of goods.

The next question we shall consider is: Is state money inflation? I think from what we have said that every hon. member would rightly answer no.

Mr. THORSON: It might be.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Of course it might be. Just as dropping a lighted match may cause a conflagration, but in the hands of common sense people that will not occur. The dictionary gives the idea that one dollar of national money is inflation. You can find that in some of the dictionaries; I have read it. But history and common sense show that that is not so. National money does not necessarily bring inflation. I am going to read a quotation from a book which I believe hon. members will find exceedingly instructive. One of the finest books I have read to date is Controlling Depressions, by Paul Douglas, Professor of Economics at Chicago university. It was published in 1935; it is fair, open-minded, thorough, scholarly, and restrained; it has many good points.

Mr. DUNNING: But he is not a social crediter.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Not at all. Far from it. If he were, he would lose his position. On page 148 of his book these words appear:

> Finally, if we turn to actual experience we find that it simply is not true that the use of paper money invariably leads to runaway inflation.

He has been discussing state paper money.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, nobody has said that it does.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I shall not go into that in greater detail, although I have here a number of quotations from such eminent authorities as Irving Fisher, G. D. H. Cole, Paul Douglas, and R. F. Irvine, all expressing the idea that state money is sound and testifying to its truth. I shall take the liberty of saying that we can pretty well decide that state money is not necessarily inflation.

The next question I wish to consider is: Is new money necessarily inflation? On this subject a wide diversity of opinion exists, many people imagining that the minute you have new money you have inflation. Such is not the case. Is new credit inflation? Is new currency inflation? The answer must be: No, not necessarily. Money has been called the blood stream of the economic system. I find that it helps me to appreciate the effect of money, to crystallize it, so to speak, if I think of money with respect to inflation in terms of that analogy of blood. If a boy weighs 130 pounds, according to most computations that I have read he should have ten pounds of blood, one-thirteenth of his body weight. He has that ten pounds of blood because he weighs 130 pounds and is healthy. Now the body weight of the state is its goods and services producing and consuming power.

Mr. DUNNING: How many pounds, though, in some exact terms that can be understood? The analogy is not correct unless it is stated in some terms of measurement.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is merely intended to convey an impression which, although it may be perfectly clear to the Minister of Finance, is not clear to tens of thousands of people throughout the country, namely that the amount of money which a country can have depends upon its productive powers and not upon its banks and its gold. Once that principle is laid down, we have something upon which to base our thinking.

Mr. MARTIN: What, for instance, is the productive power of Canada?

Mr. BLACKMORE: It can be found out. But the hon. member is not trying to find out, is he? Since this question has been raised, let me ask: Has this government set to work a body of men to find out the productive power of this country?

Mr. MARTIN: Is the hon. member seriously saying that there can be any adequate measure by which any government could determine the productive power of this or any other nation at a given moment?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Unquestionably, if what I have said thus far, regarding the amount of money a country can have without inflation, is true, the very first consideration to be gone into is the matter of productive and consumptive power. About that there can be no question. The United States has already done this, through its economic survey which resulted in the Chart of Plenty by Loeb, and through its Brookings Institution. We have not any Canadian Brookings Institution, or any survey, and apparently the government has no intention of providing any.

Mr. THORSON: Is the United States showing such a remarkable success?

Mr. MARTIN: I deny first that the Brookings Institution are seeking to determine the productive power of the United States. But apart from that, would the hon. member tell us how he would go about to determine the productive capacity and power of Canada or any other country? Will he tell us how he would do it?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am astonished that the hon. member, with all his knowledge, would ask a question like that in all sincerity.

Mr. MARTIN: I do not know. I come to the oracle for knowledge.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Starting with Alberta, I would say that I would want to know how much coal Alberta can deliver, how many mines it has, what is its productive capacity. Get the information together, and we would know exactly the number of tons—

Mr. DUNNING: That is not its productive capacity.

Mr. MARTIN: Certainly not. The hon. member cannot tell us how much coal there is in the mines.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am sorry if I have not taken care to specify it, but there is of course a difference between actual and potential capacity. No one can determine beforehand potential productive power, but we know it is greater than is now being used; of that there is not a question in the world. Vast numbers of cattle have been allowed to perish; many plants have been allowed to close.

Mr. ILSLEY: Should your money issue be based on actual or potential productive power?

Mr. BLACKMORE: At first it would have to be on the actual productive power. It would have to be well within the actual, because of the fact that you do not know what is the product available. But when you know that your immediate productive capacity is not now being used, it is evident that there is not enough money going into circulation.

Mr. ILSLEY: How much is the present issue of money below the actual?

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: These are very fine questions. It is delightful to me to have them asked as earnestly as this, and these hon. members are asking in all earnestness. I should say that the best guide we have is the one I referred to when I started. The Brookings Institution estimates are the nearest approach we have. They give quite definite information in the quotation to which I referred at the beginning of my remarks, and which I produced to be prepared for such questions as the hon. member has asked. The institution sets out this fact, that at no time during the past forty years have the people of the United States been able to buy more than eighty per cent of the actual productive capacity of the country. That indicates quite clearly that whatever amount of money, taken along with the velocity, would be necessary to enable the people to purchase that extra twenty per cent should be distributed among the people.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think they were using the words in a different meaning. I do not believe that is what the Brookings Institution meant by "productive capacity." They were talking about factory equipment and the like.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Perhaps my hon. friend would like me to read the quotation. These matters are of vital interest. It is with such material that I do my thinking and, no doubt, my hon. friend does his, so that if he will pardon me I shall read this passage. It is important to be thinking about a way of putting the people back to work, of remedying unemployment. It is an idea which is quite prevalent among thinkers to-day, that we should be able, in a country like this, either to give people all they need or to put them to work. The quotation to which I refer is from the Technical Possibilities of Increased Production, in a book entitled The Condition of Great Britain, by G. D. H. Cole; it is to be found on pages 266 and 267:

> The Brookings Institution estimates. . . at height of boom, American industry was working at only about four-fifths of the actual productive capacity of available factory plant and labour, and that without any improvements in technical efficiency, most industries could then have increased their output by as much as thirty per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: They are talking about industrial plant capacity which is a different matter from national capacity for production.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The very first thing you look to when you begin to wonder about the possibility of giving the people a decent standard of living is the capacity of your clothing factories, your ability to produce coal, your lumber resources, and so on, the means whereby you provide food, clothing and shelter, amusement, training, and all the things the people require. If you find you have within the country the resources, equipment, training, organization, and distributive power by means of which you can deliver to the people, as, when and where required, the goods which will give them a decent standard of living, then you know that this aspect of the problem has been solved. In other words, the problem of production need no longer trouble you. You now have the problem of distribution to deal with. And the means of distribution is money. You need then to turn to the monetary aspect of the problem, and that is our whole contention this afternoon. That is the reason for moving this motion, that the government has not availed itself of the possibilities of the country's financial resources, the means of distribution.

Let me come back to the blood illustration. If a boy weighing 130 pounds increases his weight by twenty-six pounds, then unquestionably he should have two pounds more of blood. The trouble with Canada is that we can grow an extra twenty-six pounds of productivity, but the banker decides whether we shall have the blood, the money, or not.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh no.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is no getting away from that. Not only is that so, but the borrowers in the country also decide. If I am correctly informed with respect to physical anatomy, if I were to lose four pounds of blood, by haemorrhage or some other mishap, there are cells within my body whose business it would be to set to work immediately to replenish the blood supply, and those cells do not wait until somebody comes and borrows blood and undertakes to pay it back with interest. There is a mechanism within my body—

Mr. YOUNG: Do not forget that you have to visit the restaurant three times a day as well.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am glad the hon. gentleman has made that remark. I would tell him in reply that, looking at the national body, we have the power to produce shoes and clothing, coal and other necessities, the thousand and one things which we require daily. There is no question that these things are there in abundance. They are the food. Speaking metaphorically, we have the body weight; the blood we need is money. We need more money, just as the body demands more blood.

Mr. DUNNING: And it gets more money.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Only if people borrow; there is no question about that. I am glad my hon. friend takes issue with me; we shall discuss the matter as we go along. Suffice it to say that when a country like Canada is growing, if it is to be healthy, strong and vigorous, there must be some sort of practical, automatic mechanism by which the money stream is increased. What would happen if a physical body grew larger without a commensurate increase in the blood supply? It would become sickly.

Mr. DUNNING: We have machinery to-day, and it is operating every day.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We shall look forward to what the minister has to say in that regard, because we have not yet found out what it is. All I know is what I can read in books.

Mr. DUNNING: You have only to read the statutes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Read Irving Fisher's book and you will see that in the matter of money the United States is at the mercy of 14,000 banks, if I remember rightly, and a few millions of borrowers. If the borrowers borrow, then the bloodstream in the economic system is increased; if the borrowers do not borrow, then there is no blood, no money. If the banks choose to lend, there is blood; if the banks decide not to lend, then the economic system will not get any blood, any money. And to-day our banks are not lending except to the government.

Mr. DUNNING: That is not true either.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am glad to hear that; we are finding out things that we should never have known unless we came to parliament. Certainly where I come from there is no sign of any lending. I know that men cannot borrow now as they used to.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Did they have crops or products of value?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes; 1932 was a glowing example.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): At twenty cents a bushel they could not borrow money.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We have an excellent example this year.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): In 1937 did they have a crop on which to borrow money?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes; we have a fine example of it to-day. I know the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will be interested in this discussion. In my constituency for example, with 55,000 lambs being fed this year, what is going to happen? They are going to be sold at a loss. Why? Because there is not sufficient consumptive power; the lambs cannot be bought at profitable prices. So it is with any number of things. Beef can be produced in my constituency; but it cannot be sold at a profit; it cannot be sold for what it costs to produce it, any more than butter or cream or cheese or dozens of other things can be sold at a profit.

An hon. MEMBER: Nonsense.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is no use saying, "nonsense" to me when I come right from there.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That does not answer the question whether these people had a crop of grain on which to borrow money.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Even if they had a good crop on which they could borrow money, by the time they had paid back all the money they had borrowed, and paid it back with interest, they would have less than when they started; they would be further in debt. The actual figures in the west will prove that. I have not the time to-night, however, to go into that question. We are getting away from the subject, and though I am glad to answer any questions that are asked, there is a limit beyond which one cannot go in a single speech.

I have made three attempts to complete this illustration of blood. We simply need more money in order to service our production. Without the money we cannot service production; production diminishes; the shelves are cluttered up, and there is depression. That is the story of every depression; everyone knows that. Let me illustrate in a general way; I shall not go into details but for the present shall confine myself to generalities. Let us say that actual production is 100 and money is 60—that is, purchasing power. Then we could increase that purchasing power by 10 and that would be not inflation, but reflation.

Mr. DUNNING: What is the difference?

Mr. BLACKMORE: The difference is this: If 100 is production and 100 is consumption, then you have equilibrium and you should be able to prevent either rising or falling prices. But the moment purchasing power falls below 100, then you fall into depression and you have deflation, with the result that people must sell at a loss. That is the story of depression. If you increased money from 60 to 70, many people would consider that inflation. As a matter of fact it is not inflation; it is merely reflation, because you have to go a great many points further before you can get to the point where you can equate consumption with production. Another extremely important point to consider is this—and it bears upon the question asked by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). If potential capacity is 150 and money is 60, you can increase that 60 to 120 and the only result will be an increase in production.

The idea prevails among many people that when you increase the quantity of money you immediately increase prices. I say you increase production. Go to a coal mining area where the mines operate only part time; you spend double the amount on coal. Enlarge the market for the coal; does it raise the price? No; you will simply increase the production of coal. The same thing would be true throughout the country, with every industry which can produce more than it is now able to produce and sell. If your potential capacity were 150 and your money at 60, you could move it up to 150 and the result would be only reflation or stimulation. You would stimulate additional production. I have not time to quote authorities, but I have plenty of eminent authorities to the effect that that would be the case. This is a feature which people overlook entirely in the application of the social credit idea. The other day one hon. member rose in his place and entertained himself freely at our expense by suggesting that we could raise the dividend from $25 to $50, to $60, to $75. If you take productive capacity or potential productive capacity at which you can give people $25 worth of goods, we all know that by increasing their purchasing power you increase the immediate productive capacity of industry; and as the resources of the country, both natural and human, are called upon and brought into activity, so will the standard of living of the people be raised, until that goal which the chart of plenty indicated is reached. That is the way it is done.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): But that was a positive promise to be fulfilled within eighteen months.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Exactly, and when the promise was given many things were assumed. It was assumed that there would be a great deal more willingness to cooperate on the part of many people than proved to be the case. Now let us not get off the present subject. We are willing to debate the Alberta question to the limit at any time the hon. member wishes, but let us deal now with the question of inflation.

The next question arises right out of what I said a minute ago; you must have new money. There is no question about that. Hon. members will be interested in this fact. It was tremendously interesting to me. Carl Snyder, quoted by Paul H. Douglas in Controlling Depressions at page 181, found that over a period of years, say during the last forty-five or fifty years, the productive power of industrial countries has increased three per cent per annum compounded. Now, if your productive capacity is 100, your consumptive capacity 100, and the money in circulation 100, and you do not increase the amount of money but your productive capacity increases to 103, then you would begin to have a fall in prices.

I wish the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) had stayed in his place. The trouble is that some hon. members do not stop to hear a thing through. He said a few minutes ago that those kings reduced the content of the money to make a profit. The fact is that they increased the amount of money, knowing that their people had to have more money because the productive power of the country had increased, and if there was not an increase in the amount of money there would be a fall in prices, just as there was in Great Britain in the last fifty years of the nineteenth century. Prices fell because they could not get enough gold to back up their ridiculous gold standard money, established under a Dutch system introduced in the days of William III, the same system we are trying to work now. There was a fall in prices with consequent suffering, notwithstanding that the productive power of the country was increasing tremendously. The same thing is true of Canada.

I quote a passage from Irving Fisher's One Hundred Per Cent Money, published in 1935. At page 85 he says:

> In fact, a fixed volume of money—if its velocity did not vary—would, as business volume increased, result in a slowly falling price level. Therefore there should in my view be a currency commission—

The Minister of Finance wanted to know how we would go about it; here is a suggestion. I am not an authority in this matter; if I were placed in a position where I had to be, I would soon take steps to become one, just as he did. He gathered authorities around him to instruct him on tariffs and other matters until he became one of the greatest authorities on tariffs on the American continent.

Mr. DUNNING: I had to know where I was going and what I was about before I started.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And we know where we are going. This bears it out, as clear as day:

> . . . there should, in my view, be a currency commission authorized to manage the currency, including the cheque book money.

A thing which no government so far has ever tried.

Mr. DUNNING: Surely they have; we are doing it every day.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am glad to hear that; still I cannot help judging by what I see.

Mr. DUNNING: The trouble is you read the wrong books!

Mr. BLACKMORE: I come from seeing realities; I see the poor suffering in every direction, I hear cries for relief coming from the cities—

Mr. MARTIN: We all do.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, is that not evidence that things are going wrong? What more evidence do you want? What is an economic system for if not to give people plenty?

Mr. MARTIN: The point of my observation was that I do not think the hon. member should assume he alone is in sympathy with those who are suffering.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, I think you could go through my remarks this afternoon with a fine-toothed comb and not find a single word indicating that I claim to be the only one in sympathy with those who are suffering. The hon. member is exceedingly unjust when he imputes such a thing to me.

Looking down through the course of English history we find there has been need of new money from time to time. The whole history of English finance indicates that. The disasters which followed the battle of Waterloo were entirely owing to mismanagement of money. An hon. member—I am not going to name him because we had a sort of understanding that we would not refer to each other personally—the other night said he never knew anyone to get something for nothing. Listen to this. This is from Controlling Depressions, by Paul H. Douglas, published in 1935. Before quoting the passage I may say that I know of only one class of people in the world to-day who get something for nothing. They are indicated clearly in this passage, found at page 181:

> Finally it may be asked why private interests should be allowed to obtain the wealth which comes from the creation of monetary purchasing power in the form of bank credit. As Carl Snyder has shown, production, if we take long periods of time, has increased at a rate of approximately three per cent a year compounded. Now if the private bankers only increase the quantity of credit in the same proportion they would gather to themselves a very large gain in wealth and power. This has most certainly been the case in the past.

Note it is not the member for Lethbridge who is saying that.

> The volume of bank credit which has been built up from very small beginnings is now the property of the banking fraternity. By creating credit they have acquired a title to wealth and a claim upon the national income as real as if they had themselves built gigantic factories, railroads, utility plants, etcetera. Some idea of how much these sums amount to can be gained from the fact that if we were to take a credit total of thirty-three billions as our base, an increase of three per cent in this figure to match the increase in production would mean that in the very first year the private bankers would create one billion dollars in new credit.

When you stop to think what that would mean, Mr. Speaker, it would be as though they had discovered in a gold mine or an old vault a billion dollars of money, all minted and ready for use, and they simply took that out and put it into their own vaults as new money. Then you realize how serious the situation is. The author is quite clear about it; there is no question about his meaning.

Mr. DUNNING: And he is not talking about Canada.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Very good, but the thing does apply to Canada; it would be interesting to see how my hon. friend could prove that it does not.

> They would own this and would in fact increase their wealth by that much. As the total volume of credit rose, the absolute yearly additions would of course rise also.

Where will all the money come from for the dividends? We have a hint there.

> Thus, three per cent of fifty billion would amount to 1·5 billion a year. A large part of the fruits of progress, therefore, tend to be transfererd to the private bankers because their ability to create the monetary counters enables them to claim title to the goods.

Our contention is that that sort of thing should no longer exist in any civilized country. The government should be gaining all that profit, not necessarily by having a government owned bank but by the creation of the monetary counters, just as fast as the productivity of the people calls for those counters.

My time is getting short. I greatly appreciate the interest and tolerance that have been shown by my hon. friends, but before leaving the banking system there is one thing more I should like to say. Let no one imagine that I am in any way opposed to the bankers, except in so far as they have been allowed to take over the creation of the life-blood of this country, which is of the most vital concern to Canada. That power must be taken back by the state, so that the state may provide the people with the money they need. To-day the banks lend money and get money out into circulation only through the men who will borrow. The mere fact that they have been transferring their deposits, from people all over the country, into government securities, is clear evidence of that. They cannot and will not trust the farmers, the manufacturers and others. They want their money where it is secure. So they create their money and lend it to the country, and fasten themselves as leeches upon the body economic of this dominion, to sap the very life-blood from the people; and we allow them to do it and apparently think it all right.

We must have a means of distributing purchasing power debt free, so that it will not depend upon the fortuitous circumstance of more or less borrowers in a given community. The present system, as it is conducted, checks production and consumption, rendering it impossible for the producers to sell their goods and therefore impossible for them to produce more, thereby lowering the standard of living in this wonderful country instead of raising it. The system creates only debt, stagnation, poverty and despair in a land of potential abundance. It is an abuse that screams to high heaven. Hon. members on the government side have talked of the need of preserving the old order, of the sacred trust and responsibility that rests upon them. I admire them for those sentiments, but let me urge upon them that they have an equally great responsibility and an equally sacred trust to bring in the new order before it forces itself upon them.

Mr. VIEN: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like, if I may, to be allowed to finish. Later I shall be very glad to answer any question my hon. friend cares to ask, but at the moment I should prefer to finish what I have to say.

At the present time all over the Anglo-Saxon world we are industriously trying to put new wine into old bottles, and it simply will not work now any more than it would in the days of the Saviour. The result is that we are changing altogether too slowly. Roosevelt expressed a thought which I believe applies very well to our situation, in his Constitution Day speech. I hope to have time to read it before six o'clock. I have culled some quotations from that speech, which I believe apply not only to the government but to me and the other members of this parliament. This is not solely your responsibility; it is mine as well, and I know you realize that.

Mr. DUNNING: Would my hon. friend permit me to interrupt for a moment? If he intends to conclude before six o'clock, we might have an understanding that I would ask the Speaker to call it six o'clock at the conclusion of my hon. friend's remarks, if he does not intend to go much beyond that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to finish before six o'clock.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is, of course, perfectly free to go on as long as he wishes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I understand that, and I appreciate it very greatly, but I think I have burdened the house quite sufficiently for this time. Among other things President Roosevelt said:

> In our generation a new idea has come to dominate thought about government—the idea that the resources of the nation can be made to produce a far higher standard of living for the masses if only government is intelligent and energetic in giving the right direction to economic life.
> That idea—or more properly that ideal—is wholly justified by the facts. It cannot be thrust aside by those who want to go back to the conditions of ten years ago or even preserve the conditions of to-day. It puts all forms of government to proof. . . .
> Modern history proves that reforms too long delayed or denied have jeopardized peace, undermined democracy and swept away civil and religious liberties.

May I pause here to make the observation that the mere development of strains and stresses throughout this dominion, the threats of fascism and communism, are glaring evidences that reform has been too long delayed already in this country.

> Yes, time more than ever before is vital in statesmanship and in government—in all three branches of it.
> We will no longer be permitted to sacrifice each generation in turn while the law catches up with life. We can no longer afford the luxury of twenty-year lags.
> You will find no justification in any of the language of the constitution for delay in the reforms which the mass of the American people now demand.
> Yet nearly every attempt to meet those demands for social and economic betterment has been jeopardized or actually forbidden by those who have sought to read into the constitution language which the framers refused to write into the constitution.

So, Mr. Speaker, those people who have been rejoicing over the disallowance of the Alberta acts, where Alberta has striven to solve this problem for itself, realizing that the central government has neglected its trust, must remember that the selfsame device of hiding behind the constitution has been applied across the line and in other countries when they have sought to bring about reforms. I continue reading:

But tolerance and fair play would disappear here as it has in some other lands if the great mass of people were denied confidence in their justice, their security and their self respect. Desperate people in other lands surrendered their liberties when freedom came merely to mean humiliation and starvation. The crisis of 1933 should make us understand that.

I believe this government should begin to issue currency and credit in terms of public need, just as the people of this dominion were led to believe it was going to, and as it has signally failed to attempt to do. It should commence to battle the money power, just as the Prime Minister said it would. Even yet the commencement of that conflict is being delayed and delayed until to-morrow.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, although it pains me in some ways to have to do so, I find myself obliged by the position and the responsibility which I hold to move a vote of want of confidence in the government on the ground that it has failed adequately to use the resources of this country to battle poverty.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

COMPANIES' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

Mr. ERNEST BERTRAND (Laurier) moved the second reading of Bill No. 26, to repeal the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1933.

He said: The purpose of this bill is to repeal the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act which was passed in 1933. The act was passed unanimously at that time as it was felt it was needed because of the state of business in the country. I have read the debates that took place, both in the house and before the committee. The discussion in the house takes up only a page and a half of Hansard. I think everyone on both sides of the house admitted at that time that this was a most important piece of legislation. The Bankruptcy Act was passed in 1919, and section 13 could have been applied to the condition sought to be corrected by the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act. Section 13 reads:

Where an insolvent debtor intends to make a proposal for,—

(a) a composition in satisfaction of his debts; or,

(b) an extension of time for payment thereof; or,

(c) a scheme of arrangement of his affairs;

he may, either before or after the making of a receiving order against him—

That section contained subsections which were designed to take care of all arrangements that might be made before a receiving order or an assignment had been made. The section was amended in 1923 when the words "either before or" were struck out. This amendment was made because at that time there was no superintendent of bankruptcy and it was considered too easy for anyone to be appointed a trustee. It was known that in large centres like Montreal and Toronto trustees would go around to interview a company or a man who was being sued and try to induce it or him to make an arrangement with the creditors under section 13 of the Bankruptcy Act. This condition became so bad that the act had to be amended. Later on Mr. Reilly was appointed superintendent of bankruptcy and he succeeded in clearing up the situation. A reading of the discussion that took place in 1933 when the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act was passed will show that no mention was made of section 13 of the Bankruptcy Act.

Mr. BENNETT: The difficulty was that it did not apply to farmers.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Section 13 of the Bankruptcy Act did not apply to farmers, but neither did the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act.

Mr. BENNETT: That was what it was for.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It applied only to companies.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes, quite.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We feel that this act should be repealed as it grants to companies a privilege not enjoyed by individuals. As I say, there was no mention in 1933 of the bankruptcy law as it stood in 1919. In my opinion, this legislation was very badly drafted. I would be bold to put forward just my own opinion, so I should like to read some other opinions I have received. The Saint John, New Brunswick, board of trade passed the following resolution on February 15, 1937:

Finally we would recommend that the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act be repealed. It was enacted during the recent business depression largely to assist debtors during those difficult times. As the business world is once again at normal levels, we submit that there is no longer any justification for the loose provisions of this statute.

The board of trade of Montreal also passed a resolution in 1937 dealing with the same matter. It reads:

This legislation was enacted at a time when the economic strain of the past several years was bearing heavily on trade and was designed to relieve the heavy expense incidental to bankruptcy.

To some extent it succeeded, but to-day there exists among creditors a manifest objection to the act.

Chief among the reasons for this opposition are absence of adequate control of debtors' affairs and the consequent use of this act in order to evade the more strict and exacting provisions of the Bankruptcy Act. In explanation it should be stated that arrangements or settlements are made at metings of creditors. No trustee or inspectors are appointed, no list of creditors is required to be issued, no examination of debtor is required, all permitting a condition not generally conducive to the protection of the creditors' interests.

It is unfortunate that in amending the Bankruptcy Act, parliament in 1923 removed a provision for settlements and arrangements without bankruptcy which existed in section 13 of the 1919 Bankruptcy Act.

The restoration of such a provision would enable all the benefits now possible under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act to be included in the Bankruptcy Act with the added advantage, the importance of which cannot be too strongly emphasized, of proper control by creditors and final supervision by the superintendent.

I know that complaints against this legislation have accumulated in the office of the superintendent of bankruptcy. This is quite easy to understand. As is mentioned in the resolution of the Montreal board of trade, this law has no machinery with which to protect the creditors. According to section 17, general rules were to be passed by order in council, but to date they have not been put into effect. Section 11 defines a debtor, and I should like to read subsection 2 of that section. I believe that most of the complaints are in connection with this particular section which deals with the admission of claims. If a company is in difficulty and the creditors want to come to its aid and are willing to compromise, there is always some kind of understanding between the company and the creditors asking for that compromise. It cannot be otherwise in practice, and the main question always is, Who is the bona fide creditor and who is not? Subsection 2 of section 11 reads as follows:

> Notwithstanding anything contained in subsection one the company may admit the amount of a claim for voting purposes under reserve of the right to contest liability on the claim for other purposes.

That is an open door to fraud, and it has been used in a flagrant way for fraud. It is easy to understand, when a company may admit any claim for purposes of voting, reserving its right to have the claim set aside when the time for the distribution of moneys comes, that officials of companies which want to get rid of creditors will have no difficulty in securing a sufficient number of claims for purposes of voting.

I should like to give the house figures on the number of companies that have petitioned to come under this act. In 1935 in Montreal, according to the registrar's office, fifty-five companies made application; in 1936, fifty-two; in 1937, thirty-one; and up to the third of March, 1938, there were eight. So the figures in those years respectively were fifty-five, fifty-two, thirty-one and eight, of companies making application. This, I think proves that business is getting better, and when the board of trade of Saint John, New Brunswick, says that this law was of a temporary nature, I think the facts prove that it is so.

Now let me give the figures of companies in Toronto making application to come under the act. In 1936 there were five companies in Toronto, as reported by Dun & Bradstreet, and fifty-two for the same year in Montreal; in 1937, five in Toronto, and thirty-one in Montreal; in 1938 up to the third of March, three in Toronto, and eight in Montreal. There were a few applications made in other cities, but very few as compared with Toronto and Montreal; and if the figures for Montreal are larger than those for Toronto, it is not that we want to boast about this large number of insolvent companies. I am quoting these figures just to show the great interest that business men have in this question.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Has the hon. member any figures for the other cities?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The figures have been given to me by the business men of Montreal, and they show that in Winnipeg, according to Dun & Bradstreet, there were no applications in 1936, and in British Columbia for the same year, according to Dun & Bradstreet, there was one application. I have no figures for other cities.

I should like to quote from a memorandum prepared by the board of trade of the city of Toronto. The Toronto board of trade seems to be concerned mostly with one side of the question, that with this act on the statute book, securities could be sold in different states where they would have been barred if the trust deed or the bonds had contained a proviso that the majority of the secured creditors could force an arrangement upon the minority secured creditors. That seems to be the principal reason why these gentlemen are opposing the repeal of the act. According to their own memorandum, the act requires so much reconstruction that I think it is far better to repeal it. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, we are in this situation to-day, that we have an act which the consensus of opinion of the business men of Toronto, Montreal, Saint John and everywhere else says is having very bad results, and we have either to supplement the act by adding general rules and many other sections, or to repeal the act and insert a few sections in the bankruptcy law that will cure all the above difficulties. I just want to read a paragraph or two of the memorandum prepared by the Toronto board of trade:

As unsecured creditors often have only very small claims and are widely scattered throughout the country—

That is not absolutely true, but I am reading it as it appears here:

—their difficulty has been that usually this type of creditor has not had sufficient interest at stake to warrant adequate representation and close contact with the various steps taken by debtors seeking compromises or extensions under the act. The result of inadequate unsecured creditor watchfulness has been that in all too many instances unscrupulous debtors have succeeded in effecting compromises quite unfair to unsecured creditors.

This was one of the reasons given for the passing of the act, that it would not require a trustee to supervise the arrangement. Even those who were in favour of the act realized that a trustee is needed. It is exceedingly bad to give to debtor companies or debtor persons the choice of three or four different acts under which they can make compromises or come into bankruptcy, because in practice it always works out against the creditor; for the debtor chooses the act where he will meet his creditors in the easiest way. Many company debtors to-day go under the Winding-up Act, because under that act there are no such offences as there are in the bankruptcy law. I quote again from the memorandum of the Toronto board of trade:

Although section 17 of this act contemplates that general rules of procedure thereunder would be made, none have been laid down yet.

And the act has been in force since 1934.

As proceedings under this act are more expeditious than proceedings under the Bankruptcy and Winding-up acts, it has been used extensively by financially embarrassed companies and owing to the lack of general rules of procedure thereunder, it has been applied by some debtor companies in a manner which was both unfair and detrimental to creditors.

I am continually quoting those who are supposed to be against the repeal, because if I should go to the files of those who complain and who are asking for repeal, I should find many other arguments that I could present here.

In a number of cases, companies have obtained court orders under this act summoning meetings of creditors to consider proposals for payment of liabilities in full and copies of such orders and proposals have been sent to creditors with a proxy form made out in favour of the debtor's nominee. In many cases, neither a statement of the debtor's affairs nor a list of its creditors were sent with the proposals. As it is frequently inconvenient for creditors, particularly distant creditors, to attend meetings to consider debtor's proposals, and as there is often insufficient time between the receipt of the notice and the date of the meeting to investigate a debtor's affairs, and as a creditor may lose his vote unless he acts promptly, many creditors who have but a slight knowledge of the existing condition of the debtor's affairs, have completed and returned proxies in favour of the debtor's nominee with the intention that such proxy would be voted in favour of the debtor's proposal for an extension. During the depression, many creditors were willing to consent to an extension rather than risk either a bankruptcy or being forced to accept a compromise.

Another objection to the present act is that between the date upon which the court makes an order staying proceedings against a debtor and the date of the creditors' meeting, any debtor in the manufacturing business which desires to take advantage of its creditors may cut up or convert its readily saleable raw or bulk supplies into goods in process and thereby place itself in a position where its creditors would have difficulty in realizing upon the debtor's assets if the debtor's proposal were to be refused. Creditors should be given some control over the conduct of the debtor's business during this period.

There is no control at all in the law as it is to-day.

Careful consideration of the terms of the act does not indicate any completely satisfactory means of controlling this possibility. It is felt, however, that the provisions for appointment of a trustee, as suggested in the proposed general rules, go some distance towards controlling the debtor's affairs pending consideration of the proposal by the creditors and constitute a strong moral check on undesirable conduct by the debtor.

The act does not provide for the appointment of an independent person to give all creditors or possible creditors reasonable and proper notice of the debtor's proposal and of the meeting to consider it, or for the appointment of an independent party to receive creditors' proxies and to record creditors' votes. The act does not require statements of the debtor's affairs to be verified by affidavit and filed with the court or for a summary of such statement and a list of creditors to be sent out with the original proposal or to be submitted to the meeting of creditors. A statement of affairs prepared by the debtor but unaccompanied by any declaration as to its accuracy is generally produced at the meeting of creditors but unless some licensed trustee has been consulted by the debtor, the statement submitted often fails to classify the creditors (secured, preferred and unsecured) or to disclose the true position of the debtor's affairs.

As I said a few moment ago, we are in this situation, that if we leave this act on the statute book, the complaints and the frauds that have been going on will continue until it is amended; and if we add to the act all the provisoes and rules that are wanted by some gentlemen in the business world, it will take probably another year before the amended law can come in force and we shall have to complain again of the act as it exists to-day and as it will remain in the meantime.

I know that some representation has been made to the government in connection with the amending of the Bankruptcy Act, but I have no authority to say whether it is to be amended or not. But a few words in section 13 as it was in 1919, the words "either before or after," and two or three sections that would replace section 13, subsections 3(c) 3(d) and 3(e) as they were from 1919 to 1923 would absolutely give the same security to any company willing to compromise with its creditors without going into bankruptcy.

Big corporations do not seem to like the word "bankruptcy." They might be bankrupt; they might owe more than all the assets combined; and yet they do not want to be termed "bankrupt." In 1919 section 13, subsection 3(e) of the bankruptcy law had a proviso stating that when proceedings are taken under the immediately preceding four subsections, that is when there was no receiving order or authorized assignment, all other applicable provisions of this act would apply, but no document in such proceeding would be headed "The Bankruptcy Act," nor would the term "bankrupt" or "bankruptcy" or "assignor" or "assignment" be applied to a person who before any receiving order or authorized assignment has been made makes a proposal for composition. This amendment would have the advantage of giving the same right to an individual as it gives to a corporation to-day under this act. For these reasons I move that the law be repealed.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I believe that the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Bertrand) has an entire misconception of the purpose of the act which he seeks to repeal and of the valued services which that act has given to the commercial community as a whole. As a matter of fact, for two years and a half, while I held the office of Secretary of State, only one complaint ever came to that office with regard to the administration of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, and that was from the province of Quebec, where it was alleged that proper notice had not been given. When I called the attention of the judge to it, the judge showed that there had been a misconception of his order; he made his order clear, and the result was that there was no dissatisfaction in that case.

This act is not a bankruptcy act. A bankruptcy act has been used, so far as I have had experience, too frequently for the perpetration of the worst kind of frauds. It has been used for the purpose of enabling a few creditors to drive a company, often a competitor, into bankruptcy, to compel the liquidation of its assets by forced sale, and to destroy altogether the goodwill of the business. Time after time it has been used by creditors to conjure up claims for the purposes of driving their rivals into bankruptcy without any hope of redemption.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): May I ask a question?

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. member can ask questions before we close the debate; he will have ample opportunity. As a matter of fact this act of which the repeal is sought, is, in simple terms, practically a reenactment of certain sections of the English Companies Act. In England, in that large business community where commercial and industrial affairs are carried on chiefly by companies, it was found necessary to insert certain clauses in the Companies Act to enable the creditors of the company to make friendly compromises with the company; and if three-quarters of the creditors of any particular class agreed, they could force a dissentient one-fourth into accepting a compromise which was approved by the court.

I have no time to-night within forty minutes to call attention to injustices I have seen perpetrated in my own experience by a minority of creditors, who, for their own personal ends, have precluded satisfactory, amicable arrangements being made between creditors and companies.

The hon. gentleman says that no rules have been formulated as provided in a certain section. The fact is that it never was intended that such rules should be formulated or put into force by the governor in council unless it should be found that the ordinary procedures of the court were inadequate for the purposes contemplated. In this case a thorough investigation was made of the procedure in each of the provincial courts, and we found that the proceedings for approval of a compromise, if made either by originating summons, as prevails in many of the English speaking provinces, or by petition, or by motion, as in other provinces and especially in Quebec, would be governed by the ordinary rules of procedure prevailing in the courts; and it seemed to me better—and I still think it was far better—that in entering into provincial jurisdiction the rules of procedure which prevail in each provincial court should prevail in this case. If there is any complaint whatsoever with regard to the administration of this act in the courts, it is not because of lack of rules, because the Judicature Act prevails in the provinces except Quebec, and under it, as every lawyer here knows, the rules are ample and adequate for the purpose. In the province of Quebec, under the code of civil procedure, the rules there enacted are adequate in respect of every petition and original motion made before the court. There, if a motion is made, the parties interested may examine upon oath all parties concerned, and a judge in chambers hears all parties who wish to be heard and gives a just decision accordingly as to whether a scheme or arrangement which is come to under the act is made in good faith and is a fair arrangement for all the parties concerned.

This is not only a proceeding between the creditors as a whole and the debtor; it is a proceeding which enables any class of creditors by a majority holding three-fourths of the credits to approve a compromise as between that class of creditors and the debtor company. That is made to obviate the possibility of a small minority of any class of creditors serving their own selfish interests by holding out against a fair and equitable compromise. And that is the rule in England, as it is the rule which is prescribed by this act. In arranging for a revision of the Companies Act I would certainly have followed the English act and placed these very provisions in it. But certain lawyers of Ontario and Quebec and some others thought that it would not be possible to accomplish the end in view by drafting an act which would be within the legislative competence of the parliament of Canada.

This legislation, before its enactment, was advertised as few acts are that pass this parliament. The bill was circulated from one end of the country to the other; it was placed before commercial and financial men in every part of the dominion. The act was not drawn clumsily. I am not seeking credit for myself; but I say: Place the act before any competent lawyer or judge, and I am sure he will say that the bill was drawn with the utmost care possible in order to keep it within the legislative jurisdiction of parliament. It was based on the presumption that the rules of court which prevail with respect to procedure would be applied to every motion or petition made under the act. But in order that there might be power in the governor in council, in case it was shown that the rules in any particular court were inadequate, right was reserved to the governor in council to make rules for that purpose.

[Mr. Cahan.]

During the two and a half years which elapsed after the passing of the act before I ceased to be Secretary of State, there was no complaint from any quarter, while the mere enactment of the measure gave necessary and sufficient relief throughout the country; for when it once became known that a creditor, one out of a hundred, or two or more out of a hundred, could no longer hold out and defeat an equitable compromise in order that any creditor might obtain his own pound of flesh, or in order that he might exercise his right of dissent so as to destroy a competing company which should never be destroyed, then all creditors began to make reasonable arrangements with their debtor companies. Many were made that did not come under the act at all. Competent business men met together, and after discussion agreed to a fair compromise between the debtor company and its creditors, as they do frequently as between an individual debtor and his creditors. In so far as it made fair play necessary, it conduced to amicable and satisfactory settlements between debtor companies and their creditors.

But to return to the English act. The English have their bankruptcy law; they have their winding-up acts. There is there but one jurisdiction with respect to companies; here there are several jurisdictions, generally divided between the provincial and the dominion. And the difficulty in drafting this legislation was to draft an act which would not only apply to dominion companies but give the same relief to all provincial companies, whether organized under provincial charters or by special statutes of the provincial legislatures. And that object was attained because after a most thorough discussion, at which all parties were represented before the court, the Supreme Court of Canada on a reference held this act intra vires of the parliament of Canada. Therefore I wish to call attention to the English act and to its provisions. Section 153 of the English act provides that:

(1) Where a compromise or arrangement is proposed between a company and its creditors or any class of them, or between the company and its members or any class of them, the court may, on the application in a summary way of the company or any creditor or member of the company, or, in the case of a company being wound up, of the liquidator, order a meeting of the creditors or class of creditors, or of the members of the company or class of members, as the case may be, to be summoned in such manner as the court directs.

There are no special rules in the English act for the summoning of the meeting; but the ordinary rules of practice under the Judicature Act apply. The same Judicature Act is in force, I think, in every province except Quebec, and those who are acquainted with the code of civil procedure in Quebec know that ample provision is there made for the summoning of all parties interested in order that they may be represented before the court which assumes jurisdiction.

Then subsection (2) of the same English act reads:

> If a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors or class of creditors, or members or class of members, as the case may be, present and voting either in person or by proxy at the meeting, agree to any compromise or arrangement, the compromise or arrangement shall, if sanctioned by the court, be binding on all the creditors or the class of creditors, or on the members or class of members, as the case may be, and also on the company or, in the case of a company in the course of being wound up, on the liquidator and contributories of the company.

That act was passed by the parliament of the United Kingdom which had jurisdiction over the incorporation of all companies, jurisdiction not only with respect to companies in financial difficulty, between creditors and the company, but in conflicts between shareholders inter se. Therefore, as this parliament has no jurisdiction in conflicts between the shareholders of a provincial company, it was provided in this statute—and the Supreme Court of Canada held it to be a competent statute—that the provision in the provincial acts relating to conflicts between classes of shareholders should be applied in the case of a provincial company. But in respect of any conflict between creditors and the debtor company, that is entirely within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, and the supreme court has so held.

Now that English act provides for compromises. They may be between a class of creditors and the company, or between the creditors as a whole if there are none of a particular class outstanding. It provides that the ordinary rules of procedure of the courts shall apply, and that is what we followed in this act, with a special provision that if it were found necessary to make new rules to overcome any fault or default in the proceedings, the governor in council was given the authority to make, alter, revoke or reenact such rules, or to delegate to the judges of the court in any district the right to make new rules. There is no deficiency in the act with respect to rules.

This act was not intended as a temporary one. It was deemed necessary for the amicable adjustment of all disputes arising between creditors and the debtor companies, amicable adjustments which would obviate the necessity of driving the debtor company into bankruptcy and having its assets sold in bulk, as they were being sold in bulk, for very low prices.

I wish to call attention to the fact that I have no knowledge of the memoranda from which the hon. gentleman has read. I do not know whence these memoranda were obtained, whether they were special petitions sent to the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Bertrand) or whether he obtained them from the superintendent of bankruptcy.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The memorandum which I read came from the board of trade of Montreal. It was passed in November, 1937.

Mr. CAHAN: But I was wondering where the long memorandum came from.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It was sent to the Minister of Justice, and seeing that I had this bill before parliament they sent me a copy of it.

Mr. CAHAN: I thank the hon. gentleman for this information, but it does not influence my judgment that a committee of the board of trade even in my own home city have passed a resolution of that kind. I have seen so much of the ruthlessness of creditors who happened for the time being to hold the controlling vote in dealing with debtors, when better motives and more lenient measures should apply, that I am not surprised that some of these hard-hearted men are disgruntled at the prospect of this act being retained upon the statute books.

I have not had time to examine the return brought down by the Secretary of State, but, as a matter of fact, I think it shows that less than ten companies incorporated under the dominion statutes have applied for and obtained relief under the act. That number of compromises having been filed in the returns to that department does not show a large misuse of this statute with regard to dominion companies. I do not know as to the accuracy of the figures quoted by the hon. member for Laurier; I am bound to accept them although I do not know where they came from; but in a time of great financial distress such as prevailed during the last two and a half years that I had charge of the Department of the Secretary of State I was really surprised that so few cases arose.

The reason so few cases came up was that when a minority of the creditors of any class, that is, representing less than twenty-five per cent in value, found that there was a way by which they could be compelled to give to the debtor company a reasonable compromise which would enable it to pay its debts and retain its property for future industrial or commercial business, such minority readily entered into that reasonable compromise. As has been discovered in England, as indicated in the English act, where a certain proportion of all the creditors, representing at least three-quarters of the value, are willing to accept a reasonable compromise or arrangement, which is placed before a judge who after a thorough investigation approves it as being fair and equitable, then it is not unreasonable that the small dissentient minority should be compelled to come in and accept the terms that are offered to all.

I would regret very much to see this act repealed. We had stress and strain in 1930, 1931 and 1932. The number of companies that were ruthlessly driven into bankruptcy, without a chance of retrieving their position, was considerable. Bankruptcy frauds were prevalent, too, in those days. I have no doubt that they have been somewhat remedied by a better administration of the Bankruptcy Act; but the sole protest that came to me with respect to this act, after the bill had been distributed from the Atlantic to the Pacific, came from trustees in bankruptcy, gentlemen who had been appointed by the government as qualified trustees, who thought this act, which permitted a reasonable and amicable compromise, might take away a considerable portion of the fees they were receiving out of bankruptcies. They made their protests accordingly, some of which I have no doubt will be found in the files of the bankruptcy branch of the Department of Finance. But that has been entirely obviated. The act is being administered fairly. There may be rare cases where some judge who administers the act is not thoroughly informed as to company law, and perhaps does not fully realize the responsibilities which he assumes as the judge in charge of such an arrangement as this. It is only in such a case that a fraud could arise, because so long as you have a competent judiciary administering the act no frauds are possible under it.

I would regret the repeal of this legislation, and I would regard it as a backward proceeding at this time. Some hon. gentlemen may think the worst of the depression is over. Perhaps it is; perhaps the country is so prosperous that there will be few companies getting into financial difficulties under the present regime. But this year is not the end of all things. There may be other financial recessions or retrogressions; and if you have an act like this upon the statute books of Canada, in practically the same terms as the English act, you will find that it will afford relief to many honest debtor companies which should be placed in a position to meet their creditors and, by amicable agreements and arrangements, arrived at in good faith, come to satisfactory terms with them. If you take that act off the statute books, you will find the same difficulties arising that arose during the recent depression, certainly during the last two or three years before this act was brought into force.

Mr. D. A. McNIVEN (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, if there is one type of legislation with which I have little or no sympathy it is bankruptcy legislation, and in particular the Bankruptcy Act. As it is applied in this country that act disposes of the assets of the bankrupt at whatever price they will bring. The organization is disrupted; the good will of the company is depreciated and ultimately lost. That, I think, is a fair summary of the operation of bankruptcy legislation. When I heard the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Bertrand) suggest that certain individuals did not like bankruptcy, I wondered if there were any who did like bankruptcy proceedings, not only because bankruptcy brings about the results I have just indicated but because, in the case of an individual, for all time or in any event for a great number of years he carries the stigma of bankruptcy and there is an order following his earnings during that period.

It was for these reasons that I regarded very favourably the legislation referred to as the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act. From what experience I have had of its operation, and from comments that have been made to me by creditors both large and small and by interested companies, I have found that it works out very fairly in its operation and that its provisions are very much appreciated.

SUPPLY

USE OF CANADA'S FINANCIAL RESOURCES FOR ELIMINATION OF POVERTY—AMENDMENT OF MR. BLACKMORE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Dunning for committee of supply, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Blackmore.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the motion of the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) is an amendment to the motion that you leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply. It is therefore, as the mover indicated, a vote of want of confidence.

I shall not deal with the language of the amendment, then, for the reason that while naturally it would command the support of most if not all of those opposed to the government, it is really intended by the mover as a vehicle for the discussion of the financial theories advocated by the social credit group, and a discussion of the control of currency and credit in Canada generally. It is in that sense that I shall attempt to-night to discuss currency and credit in Canada. I do so with a very keen appreciation of the responsibility attaching to words uttered in relation to this subject by anyone who occupies the position of Minister of Finance, but I shall hope to avoid any mistakes or any slips by sticking as closely as I can to the text which I have set out for myself to follow.

During this session there have been frequent references to monetary reform, not only by those who profess so-called social credit principles but also by many other members. The right hon. leader of the opposition, while not very specific, stated on one occasion that we should not be incapable of making progress in monetary reform. He made general references to what had been done in Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, but he was very careful to point out that while these dominions had acted with great courage, conditions differed in different parts of the empire. He said that what was true in one dominion could not always be said to be true in another. Other hon. gentlemen have also referred to monetary policies and some have suggested various experiments in monetary reform.

First let me say that in my opinion it is unnecessary and confusing to speak about the need of enacting new laws in the field of monetary policy. Parliament has set up an institution, now controlled by the government, charged with the specific duty of regulating the volume of currency and credit in the best interests of the economic life of the nation. Those words I quote from the statute itself. That is now the function of the Bank of Canada. The bank is already in operation, and I am convinced that its directors and officers are attempting to perform their high task to the best of their ability and with a singleness of purpose that excludes all considerations except the promotion of the permanent welfare of the general mass of people in this country. Many hon. gentlemen realize what they have been doing. Some may not agree that what they have been doing is best for our country; but in order to keep the issue clear, let us agree that when hon. members advocate some experiments in monetary policy, some vague monetary reform, what they are really doing is criticizing the policy of the Bank of Canada. Of course that is the right of any hon. member, but we will avoid confusion if we define the issue clearly.

I propose, therefore, to say something about the policy which the Bank of Canada has been following as shown, not by confidential information available to me in my official capacity, but by the bank's published statements. To make clearer the results already accomplished, I shall find it necessary to review briefly the Canadian monetary policy during the whole depression. Before doing so, however, it might be well to define our terms and to refer briefly to the methods by which the Bank of Canada can perform its primary purpose of controlling the volume of currency and credit in use.

By the term "currency" most of us refer to money in its narrower sense, that is to say, our bronze, nickel and silver coins, and our paper money. Our metallic coins are merely the small change of ordinary business transactions, the hand to hand money convenient for the purpose of making change. The volume of these coins in circulation is practically self-regulating. We issue them from the mint through the Bank of Canada in accordance with the public demand. If business activity and particularly retail trade are expanding, if prices are rising, the public will require more of them and the Bank of Canada will receive requests from the chartered banks to ship more five or ten cent pieces to the maritimes, more fifty cent pieces or more silver dollars to British Columbia, and so on. If we shipped more than the needs of business demanded, they would merely pile up on the bankers' shelves and become redundant. They constitute no real problem of monetary policy.

Paper money in Canada now consists of two types: first, chartered bank notes and, second, Bank of Canada notes. Chartered bank notes are subject to rigid limitation under the existing law as to maximum issue. That maximum will decrease year by year until 1945 when the banks will have the right to issue only up to twenty-five per cent of the amount of their paid-up capital. Bank of Canada notes may be issued by the bank subject only to the limitation that the bank must keep a reserve of at least twenty-five per cent in gold against its total note and deposit liabilities. The small denominations of Bank of Canada notes, chiefly the ones, twos and fives, constitute the large change of hand to hand circulation. In addition, Bank of Canada notes have another important function. Being legal tender they may constitue legal reserves for the chartered banks. In other words, our chartered banks keep Bank of Canada notes as well as deposits in or balances with the Bank of Canada as the cash reserves which they are required to maintain against their demand liabilities, comprising both notes and deposits within Canada.

I shall not introduce the qualifications I would be required to introduce if I were dealing with the regulation of currency and credit under gold standard conditions. Contrary to what I sometimes read in newspaper editorials, we are not on the gold standard and are not subject to its deflationary or other controlling influences. We have long since cut adrift from gold. For better or for worse, for the time being at least, we are on a managed paper standard, just as is the United Kingdom. It is true that the Bank of Canada is required to keep a minimum gold reserve of twenty-five per cent of its combined note and deposit liabilities, but the value of our currency is determined not by gold but by the principles which govern managed paper standards and which may be summarized as demand and supply. So much for currency.

Now let us turn to the regulation of credit. What do we mean by "credit" in this limited sense? For our present purpose "credit" means circulating credit or bank deposits. As everyone knows, the story of the last century or more, particularly in the Anglo-Saxon countries, is a story of the gradual rise of bank deposits to perform the monetary work of the business world. As a circulating medium bank deposits have been found to be infinitely more convenient than currency, and to-day in Canada, in the United States and in the United Kingdom, they are the vehicle by which ninety or ninety-five per cent of business transactions are effected. As they are in quantity the most important by far of all our circulating media, and moreover, since they are subject to wide swings of expansion and contraction, it is the control of their volume to which we mainly refer when we speak of the central bank's function of controlling the volume of currency and credit in use.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to the methods by which the central bank exercises this power of regulation and control. These methods will warrant careful study by all hon. members, but here I can do little more than refer to them.

Briefly stated, the Bank of Canada exercises its control over the chartered banks by operating on the cash reserves of the banking system, either by conducting so-called open market operations or by altering its rediscount rate, or by both. Our chartered banks, like all commercial banks, are accustomed to keep a certain proportion of cash as reserves against their note and deposit liabilities. In practice they have found it necessary to keep this cash reserve in order to be able to meet the demands for cash that may be made upon them at any time by their note holders or by their depositors. In Canada the cash reserves of our chartered banks consist of notes of the Bank of Canada and deposits by the chartered banks with the Bank of Canada. Speaking of the banks as a whole, the proportion or percentage of cash which the banks keep is in practice about ten per cent, and by law it must be at least five per cent. The Bank of Canada can expand or contract these collective chartered bank reserves at will, always providing that it can buy and sell securities or other suitable assets when it wants to. It is the buying and selling of securities for this purpose by the Bank of Canada that are commonly known as open market operations.

Suppose, for example, that the Bank of Canada buys ten million dollars' worth of securities. Then, no matter from whom it buys those securities, the reserves of the chartered banks as a whole will rise by the amount of ten million dollars. If it buys from other banks, their accounts at the central bank will be credited, and those accounts are part of the chartered banks' cash reserves. If it buys from an individual, then that individual pays the money into his account with his bank, and when that bank presents the cheque to the central bank to be paid by it, then that chartered bank's reserves at the central bank are raised by the same amount. Obviously, if each chartered bank has some percentage of cash reserves which it thinks it is necessary to maintain, the banks which eventually are credited with the additional cash and which thus find their cash reserve percentage increased, will wish to reduce it again. Otherwise they are losing the opportunity of increasing their earnings. Consequently such banks will take steps to increase their own assets and deposit liabilities by amounts sufficient to reduce their cash reserve percentages to near the customary level again.

As we have seen, the Canadian chartered banks as a group think it expedient to maintain an average reserve of ten per cent, and consequently if, as a result of the purchase of ten million dollars' worth of securities by the central bank, the reserve of the chartered banks has been increased by ten million dollars, the chartered banks will seek to expand their assets and deposits by approximately one hundred million dollars. Thus it is that security purchases by the Bank of Canada tend to expand bank deposits in the country by approximately ten times the amount of the transactions.

You may ask just how the chartered banks will expand their assets and deposits as a result of open market operations by the Bank of Canada. If the chartered banks can find good borrowers they will tend to increase their ordinary commercial loans, and by so doing increase their deposit liabilities by a similar amount. Otherwise they may buy investment securities which will usually earn them a considerably lower rate, or they may expand partly in one way and partly in the other. Either move will increase the aggregate of deposits of the banking system as a whole.

It is of interest to note that the chartered banks will all expand more or less in proportion to their relative size. Otherwise some will lose cash reserves to others and will find their individual cash reserve percentages dropping too low.

I have referred to the effect of the Bank of Canada purchasing securities. Precisely the opposite effect will ensue if the central bank sells securities. There will be a corresponding fall in the cash reserves of the chartered banks, a reduction of the average cash reserve of the banks as a group, and a consequent necessity for collective contraction of deposits on the part of the banking system.

The second well known mechanism by which the central bank exercises control is the deliberate raising or lowering of its rediscount rate. High rates, of course, tend to contract business enterprise, and low rates tend towards expansion.

Mr. BENNETT: But there are no rediscounts in Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: The rediscount rate is in effect; I shall come to that in a moment. I was saying that high rates tend to contract business enterprise, and low rates tend towards expansion. The control exercised by this method is indirect rather than direct, and it may not be very effective unless there is a well developed money market sensitive to changes in discount rates. These are the major weapons which the central bank may use in carrying out its primary function of controlling the volume of credit and currency in use in the country.

In order to obtain a proper perspective from which to consider how far the bank has carried out its duties, let us glance back over the course of monetary policy during the depression. It will only be necessary to call attention to a few salient points. We recall too keenly the vicious spiral of deflation which pursued its devastating course from the end of 1929 until the beginning of 1933. On December 31, 1929, Canadian deposits of the chartered banks totalled $2,270,000,000. This volume of deposits was based on a cash base of about $228,000,000, which had been expanded rapidly as a result of advances made under the old Finance Act. These advances had increased to $81,700,000 on December 31, 1929. By October 31, 1932, the cash in Canada had been reduced to $183,000,000, of which only $27,500,000 was based on Finance Act advances, and Canadian deposits had shrunk to $1,960,000,000. This represented a contraction of over fourteen per cent in circulating credit.

I shall not take time to debate the difficult theoretical problem as to whether this credit contraction was the cause or the result of the liquidation of business and the fall in prices. I shall merely state what I believe to be the prevailing view among competent economists, that while in the early stages of the depression the contraction of credit was probably largely the reflection of the decline in business and prices caused by fundamental economic maladjustments, yet after a time the monetary and credit factor became definitely an important cause.

From early in 1931 to the United States banking crisis in March, 1933, credit liquidation was certainly a factor operating with cumulative force to aggravate the decline in business and prices. Here was a time when, if ever, the use of monetary policy was justified as a weapon against the ravages of deflation. In my opinion, an opinion held at that time as well as now, conditions in this country were such as to warrant prompt and courageous experiments of the type which my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) apparently has now in mind. However, no action was taken until about the close of this deflationary period, in November, 1932—

Mr. BENNETT: And the exchange situation was the cause.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. I shall give my right hon. friend credit, if he will have patience.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not concerned with that.

Mr. DUNNING: —when my right hon. friend persuaded the chartered banks to issue $35,000,000 under the Finance Act in order to relieve the cash shortage which had developed and which threatened to become more acute. I am not inclined to criticize my right hon. friend for the action he then took, certainly not for his general objectives. My real criticism would be directed rather against the tardiness of and perhaps also the lack of vigour in his measures. I realize, of course, that the machinery which was available to his hand was inadequate and cumbersome, and that any bold and aggressive measures would have been bound to meet the strongest possible resistance from the orthodox financial world.

The expansion of bank cash, which began in November, 1932, was soon followed by a cessation of the declining trend in Canadian deposits; and when, following an amendment to the Dominion Notes Act of June, 1934, a further substantial expansion of bank cash occurred, Canadian deposits began a rapid rise which has continued until the present time. In March, 1935, the Bank of Canada commenced to operate as a central bank and assumed responsibility for the regulation of the cash reserves of the chartered banks and consequently of the volume of credit in circulation. Recognizing that the regulation of the country's credit and currency was so vital a sovereign function that it could not be left in the control of a private institution, this government in 1936 amended the Bank of Canada Act to give the dominion government effective control over the bank by majority ownership of the capital stock and majority control of the board of directors.

Mr. BENNETT: No wonder you laugh.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I cheer. I do not laugh.

Mr. DUNNING: I think it may now be fairly said that one of the difficulties which my right hon. friend was concerned with in 1931 and 1932 has been removed. Canada's financial machinery is now adequate to enable the government to cause effective action to be taken in the field of monetary policy to the extent that monetary methods may be appropriate to solve our problems.

To enable the house to follow my discussion of past and present conditions, I have had placed on the desks of all hon. members a chart showing clearly the trend of the cash reserves in Canada and Canadian deposits of the Canadian chartered banks. The chart shows the course of these two fundamental factors from the beginning of 1927 until the end of 1937. If hon. members follow these two curves, they will note the rapid expansion of credit in the boom years, the drastic deflation in the early years of the depression to which I have just referred, the effect of the action taken in November, 1932, and in the fall of 1934, and the expanding trend of bank cash and Canadian deposits from 1934 right up to the present time.

* Prior to March, 1935, these reserves are the sum of gold and coin held in Canada, holdings of Dominion notes, and deposits in the Central Gold Reserves not required as backing for excess chartered bank note circulation; in March, 1935, and after they consist of deposits with the Bank of Canada and holdings of Bank of Canada notes.

I think this chart may come as a revelation to some who have been inclined to criticize Canadian monetary policy of recent years as deflationary or insufficiently expanding.. Consider the figures. On October 31, 1932, as I have already stated, cash in Canada was $183,000,000, of which $27,500,000 was due to bank borrowing under the Finance Act. As of the same date Canadian deposits had fallen to the low level of $1,960,000,000. On March 31, 1935, the end of the first month in which the Bank of Canada was in operation, the cash reserve of the chartered banks was $200,600,000, and their Canadian deposits were $2,033,600,000. As at December 31, 1937, bank cash had increased to $250,000,000 and Canadian deposits had increased to $2,387,000,000. It should be noted that this expansion in bank cash has taken place despite the fact that the chartered banks have not been borrowers at the central bank. There are only one or two instances of such borrowing, and only for very short periods. It should be noted also that Canadian deposits—and, mark you, these represent the credit which does ninety to ninety-five per cent of the money work of Canada—are now at a level nearly twenty-two per cent above the figure for October 31, 1932, and over $117,000,000 higher than at the end of the boom year 1929. Is it any wonder that I find some difficulty in restraining myself when I read certain newspaper editorials and listen to certain speeches?

Let us approach these figures from a different angle. It is usually the case that an argument with regard to monetary policy can never be settled, because it is impossible to determine exactly what would have happened if some other policy had been followed. But in the case of Canada during the last five or six years we can get some idea of what the banking and monetary situation would have been if no action had been taken in the monetary field. I assume first of all that the chartered banks would have regarded the Finance Act as a temporary source of funds for seasonal purposes. They would not have been willing to remain indebted to the government for long periods of time. Such an attitude on their part is a perfectly proper and understandable one. Rediscount facilities are intended to fulfil temporary needs and not to supply permanent or semi-permanent requirements. On this assumption the cash reserves of the banks to-day would be about the same as they were in October, 1932, after making two deductions. The first deduction represents the amount they were then borrowing under the Finance Act, namely $27,500,000. The second deduction represents the subsequent increase in the active note circulation after making allowance for the notes which could have been supplied by an increase in the chartered banks' own issues. Making those two deductions, I assume that the amount of bank cash to-day would have been about $114,000,000 if no action had been taken to remedy the situation. As I do not believe that the banks would have found it wise to operate on a cash ratio of less than, say, 8½ per cent, which is a very low ratio indeed, their Canadian deposits would have been in the neighbourhood of $1,340,000,000 instead of the actual figure of $2,387,000,000, as they were at December 31, 1937. Naturally their assets in the form of loans and investments would have been lower by an approximately equal amount.

I realize fully that the situation which I have just outlined would have been found intolerable long before 1938, and that action to remedy it, first perhaps by temporary measures and later by the creation of a central bank, was inevitable in the best interests of this country. But let me contrast the situation as it threatened to be with the situation as it has actually been. First of all, by appropriate monetary action, the increase in note circulation required for use by the public because of better business, increased employment and higher payrolls, has been taken care of by the central bank with no drain on the cash reserves of the chartered banks and therefore no need for curtailment of credit or liquidation of investments. On the contrary, the cash reserves of the banks have actually been increased by an amount which has enabled them to expand their commercial loans and to add substantially to their investments. The keen desire of the banks to find remunerative employment for their funds has meant that no borrower to whom they thought it was reasonably safe to lend had difficulty in obtaining the accommodation he required. Governments which command the confidence of the investing public have been able to do a tremendous amount of new financing and refunding at very low rates of interest. Corporation refunding and repatriation of debt have been accomplished on a large scale, and an increasingly effective treasury bill market has been developed.

Lastly, we have to-day a monetary structure which is fully capable of meeting without strain the requirements of an increasing volume of business as and when developments in the non-monetary field create a demand for additional funds; and we have a central banking organization which provides the machinery for such adjustments as may seem desirable from time to time.

It is perhaps not unnatural that what has been done in the monetary field has not attracted the attention of the average man. But the very fact that our monetary machinery is thought by so many to have done nothing when, in fact, it has done so much, is to my mind a testimony to the quiet effectiveness of the policy followed. There has been no crying from the housetops, no spectacular announcements of policy followed by reversal of that policy. These things may attract newspaper attention, but they disturb the normal course of business and tend to defeat their own ends. On the other hand, let me assure you, sir, that there has been no concealment in these matters. The figures are available for those who care to study them.

Anyone who takes the trouble to do so can find the Bank of Canada's policy mirrored in its own weekly statements, and the effects of that policy in the monthly statements of the chartered banks. Contrast, for instance, the first weekly statement issued by the bank on March 13, 1935, with the statement for December 31, last, and you will find some illuminating changes. During that period of about two and three-quarter years the bank's note circulation has increased by $68,000,000. Its investments increased by $36,000,000, and gold is up $73,000,000 because of the revaluation which took place in July, 1935. Finally, chartered bank deposits with the central bank and their holdings of Bank of Canada notes have risen by $41,000,000. This latter total is the increase in bank cash which has made possible an expansion of over $350,000,000 in Canadian bank deposits or Canadian credit during that period of two and three-quarter years.

Mr. BENNETT: Invested in Canadian securities.

Mr. DUNNING: Some of it. I submit that this is a record of which we may well be proud. It is a story of the carrying out of an easy money policy demanded by the public good. It is a story of efficient administration characterized by a full mastery by the management of the bank of complicated monetary technique and by a thorough grasp of sound objectives for the Canadian people as a whole. Some apparently think that it has not been pushed fast and far enough; there are others who fear the reverse may be the case. These latter, in my opinion, are too much bound down by what they regard as orthodox tradition, and too little conscious of the pressure which had been crushing so many important parts of our economy. The super-expansionists, on the other hand, are too little aware of the complicated forces with which we are dealing, too inclined to oversimplify the problem, too blind to the probable repetition of the evils of such a hectic inflationary boom as has caused much of the misery from which we have been suffering since 1929. In this, as in so many other cases, wisdom is likely to be found in the middle course.

I am sure the house will desire to know on what basis the Bank of Canada has determined the policy which it has followed. In other words, what are the criteria which must guide the central bank in carrying out its important task? What economic factors does it watch? How does it interpret current trends? By what objective standards does it decide that it should go so far and no further, to quote the act, "in the best interests of the economic life of the nation"?

These are very difficult questions to answer. There is no simple mathematical formula which the bank can use to find an easy answer to its fundamental problem, no single test which it can use. If there were such a simple formula or a single test, we should probably not need a central bank with its highly specialized staff. There is little difficulty in defining the general objectives of the central bank and of the government which controls it. These objectives are the maximum possible sustained level of productivity and the minimum possible level of unemployment. Monetary policy in itself cannot enable us to reach these objectives. A bad monetary policy can impede us; a good monetary policy will assist progress towards the desired ends if other factors are favourable.

If the country is suffering from abnormal unemployment and if the volume of production is relatively low, then there is a prima facie case for an easy money policy. If production and employment in the country as a whole are at a high level, the objective is naturally to maintain the equilibrium. Gradual growth in the population of productivity per capita might in such case call for a moderate enlargement of the credit base, that is, the cash reserve of the banking system year by year. The third case which we may visualize is one in which boom conditions, sure to be accompanied by unwise use of credit and increased maladjustments, are seen to be developing. In such circumstances the central bank may try a direct attack on the source of trouble if it is limited in its character; but if it is widespread, general restrictive action may be necessary.

This description of monetary policies, which might be appropriate under varying conditions, is of course of a most general nature. I shall try to supplement it by indicating some of the things which a central bank must study in order to arrive at an appraisal of the existing state of affairs. The most important indications will be found in a study of all data relating to production, distribution, and employment; changes in the general price level of wholesale and retail goods, in the cost of living and in the relationship of these one to another; any available information regarding changes in the relationship between prices of consumers' and producers' goods, manufactured goods and primary commodities, especially foodstuffs; and changes in import and export prices, in other words, the "terms of trade." Lack of equilibrium between these separate sets of prices is liable to upset the balance of payments and the national income.

Even in a closed economy—by that I mean a self-sufficient economy, shut off from the rest of the world—the exchange of goods within the country will be impeded, and the national income therefore diminished, if the purchasing power of any one section of the country is altered at the expense of another section. And in an economy like ours, which is not closed, the relationship of these various groups of prices to similar groups in other countries must also be studied, because a change in prices internally as compared with prices externally may mean eventually a change in the balance of payments. Similarly, changes in the volume and nature of production must be studied; for if these depart from a reasonably balanced relationship, and goods are produced which there is no opportunity to sell at a profit, price relationships will be disturbed, unemployment will result, and the national income will be diminished. Failure to sell will be reflected in growing inventories. I do not suggest that monetary policy by itself can restore equilibrium in such cases; but developments of the kind just indicated are danger signals which must be observed by a central bank because of the effect which they may have on general business, and because of the possibility that action by the bank, or by the government in a non-monetary field, may contribute to the restoration of equilibrium.

Another factor which may create disturbances in the national economy is the action of governments, national, provincial and municipal. Hence the budgets and policies of these public bodies must be studied by the central bank.

Then there are financial factors which in the short run are largely dependent, and in the long run entirely dependent, on the economic factors already referred to. Capital movements, short term and long term, can be so disturbing that the central bank's short term policy may be directed entirely to counteracting them, or on the other hand so beneficial that its short term objective is secured for it without having to take definite action. Of the importance of speculation, either in the stock market or in commodities or in real estate, we have had so many illustrations in recent years that it is unnecessary for me to do more than mention this factor. In connection with its open market operations and its function as financial adviser to the government, a central bank must of course study continuously the bond market, and indeed, the capital market as a whole. This is a day to day matter.

Particularly necessary is it that the central bank should examine the country's balance of payments and its current and prospective development. Changes in imports and exports must be watched, and study of the effects of tariffs at home and abroad also comes into the picture.

Is the country a creditor or a debtor nation? If it is a creditor nation, is it employing its favourable balance in a manner to stimulate the international exchange of goods or services, or is it endeavouring to strengthen its reserves? Do these reserves need strengthening? If it is a debtor nation, how long can it or should it go on borrowing, and on what terms? If foreign debt is being repatriated, is the movement taking place on a scale likely to affect the domestic market or the exchange rate, or both? The general policy of the central bank will be dependent upon the answers to these questions.

But this policy will be only one factor in bringing about the state of affairs which it is desired to achieve. At all times the central bank must keep itself as well informed as possible in regard to the condition of and the outlook for business in the country's principal markets, so that it may as far as is humanly possible form some idea in regard to prospective developments, favourable or unfavourable.

Having taken all these factors into consideration, the bank decides what the volume of cash should be; that is the size of the combined cash resources of the commercial banks, upon which their credit structure will be based. But the appropriate amount of cash at any given moment cannot be determined without reference to the rate of turnover of the medium of payment, that is the rate of turn-over of deposits and money, sometimes called the velocity of circulation. This cannot be known with exactness, but such things as bank deposits and clearings and the course of prices give a good indication. Changes in the national income are more conclusive evidence, but may be available too late to be of use.

There have been many examples of the policy of a central bank being determined by the real or supposed short term needs of its government. Sometimes, as in the case of a war, these needs are so pressing that they get the right of way, even if the actions taken are not in the long term interest of the country as a whole. But it is obvious that in the ordinary course of events such considerations should be definitely subordinated to the long term requirements of the economy as a whole.

Let me emphasize again that I do not want to convey the idea that a central bank by studying all these factors can arrive at conclusions which can be stated in precise mathematical terms. All this information, however, must be the subject of continuous study and continuous intelligent interpretation. It must be mixed with experience, business sense and a sound sense of public psychology.

This discussion of objectives and criteria has been necessarily somewhat abstract. Perhaps I can make it more concrete if I consider one or two suggestions which have been made by some critics who advocate a much more rapid expansion of currency and credit than has taken place since the Bank of Canada started its operations.

I shall take first of all the suggestion made by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) on February 8 last, and if I criticize one of his suggestions I do not wish him to think that I am one of those to whom he referred as believing "that there can be no improvement in what they had conceived or what had been conceived prior to their day and generation." His contribution to the discussion of this matter was an admirable one, and if I disagree with his concluding suggestion in regard to monetary policy it is not because I question the sincerity of his convictions or depreciate the time and study which he has given to some of the difficult problems which concern us all. My disagreement is based on my own interpretation of current conditions, and the results which I believe would be sure to follow from his suggested program, which results in my opinion would be little short of disastrous to this country. He does, however, provide me with something which my social credit friends always fail to provide, that is something tangible by way of suggestion of what should be done by this parliament in the realm of monetary policy.

The suggestion of the hon. member for Rosthern is, in brief, that the Bank of Canada should issue, on the basis of the gold which it holds, an additional $560,000,000 of Bank of Canada notes in order to finance the construction of highways, irrigation projects and other public works. He justifies this additional issue on the ground that the bank, holding as it does $179,000,000 of gold, would have, to quote him, "the right to issue on a sound money basis $718,000,000 worth of currency fully secured on a twenty-five per cent basis."

Mr. BENNETT: He overlooks the reserves.

Mr. DUNNING: In the first place the details of my hon. friend's calculations are not correct. Under the law the bank must keep a reserve in gold of twenty-five per cent, not merely of its note liabilities, but of its combined note and deposit liabilities. It must keep twenty-five per cent not only of the volume of its own notes but of the volume also of the deposits made by the chartered banks in the central bank.

Mr. TUCKER: Pardon me, that can be suspended by order in council, can it not?

Mr. DUNNING: That is the law.

Mr. TUCKER: But by law it can be suspended by order in council.

Mr. DUNNING: No; I think not. Perhaps I shall clear up the point my hon. friend has in mind.

As the bank had over $209,000,000 of deposit liabilities on January 18, the maximum increase legally possible in its note circulation would be about $351,000,000 instead of $560,000,000 as stated by the hon. member for Rosthern.

Furthermore he states:

> It is regarded as sound financial practice to have a gold coverage of twenty-five per cent; that is so regarded, I believe, even by the Bank of England.

What the hon. member is referring to, I believe, is a resolution passed by the world economic and monetary conference, held in London in 1933.

Mr. BENNETT: It is in our statute.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. However, it must first be noted that the twenty-five per cent minimum coverage recommended by the London conference was, as my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition will remember, recommended as an absolute minimum legal cover, and not as a desirable working ratio.

Mr. BENNETT: And the hope was expressed that it would not be so used.

Mr. DUNNING: I am going to read that portion of the resolution of the London conference in order to demonstrate that point. The same resolution goes on to say that such legal provision—

> . . . must not be taken as an excuse for unduly building up a larger superstructure of notes and credits; in other words the effect of this resolution should be to increase the free reserve of central banks and thereby to strengthen their position.

In practice the central banks of the world keep a substantially higher percentage reserve in normal times. On January 26, for instance, the reserve of the Bank of England was 32·7 per cent. based on the old valuation of gold. On the basis of the new valuation, of course, the reserve would be very much higher. The effect of this higher percentage in normal times is that when business recovery reaches a more advanced stage or gold outflows occur, the central bank's reserve may be allowed to run down without violating statutory limitations or causing a restrictive policy to be put into effect, with a consequent contraction in business activity.

In the second place it should be noted that gold reserves have a dual purpose. Not only do they provide a cover for domestic note circulation, but they also constitute reserves with which to meet a deficit in the balance of payments. The latter purpose, particularly in the case of a debtor country like Canada, might well have, at times, a more deciding voice in determining the amount of gold to be held, than the former.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the reason we seek a favourable commodity balance.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. Obviously the amount of currency to be issued must be determined by the actual needs of business rather than by an arbitrary ratio to the amount of gold which is accumulated for diverse purposes.

We come back, then, to the question whether the present volume of currency and credit in circulation in Canada is adequate for the needs of business and whether a further increase would be beneficial. It must first be understood that an increase in Bank of Canada note issue does not mean more notes in the hands or pockets of the public. Whatever medium be used for issuing the new currency or credit, such as the proposed one of financing the construction of public works, the central bank's notes would be immediately deposited with the chartered banks. An increase of, say $350,000,000 in chartered bank holdings of Bank of Canada notes would increase their cash reserves from the present figure of about $250,000,000 to $600,000,000, and their cash ratio from about ten per cent to roughly twenty-four per cent.

The sponsor of the suggestion contends that no inflation is intended or would result by thus increasing bank cash, so long as the gold cover of the Bank of Canada did not fall below the twenty-five per cent minimum. This factor, however, is not a test of inflation. If the banks use their increased cash in the normal way, as a basis for the extension of roughly ten times as much in loans to the public, or for the acquisition of ten times as much in investments, bank deposits would expand by approximately an equal amount until the cash ratio was brought down again to approximately ten per cent. This would mean an increase in bank deposits from the present level of about $2,387,000,000 to something like $6,000,000,000, or more than 2.6 times the level of December 31, 1929. Am I merely old fashioned or orthodox when I say that this would mean a colossal measure of inflation?

Perhaps there are some who believe that such inflation would be desirable, and on the effects of inflation, therefore, I shall be compelled to say just a word or two. Inflation does not increase material wealth but, by increasing the volume and decreasing the value of money, it redistributes wealth. Everyone who by custom or by contract receives income by way of fixed or nearly fixed payments loses by inflation, and everyone who owns real property or an equity in real property gains, at least relatively. In Canadian society this means that the wage earning and salaried classes, the people on relief, the bank depositors, insurance policy holders, rent recipients and bondholders will lose. To give some idea of the order of magnitude of the classes involved, 2,600,000 Canadians are wage and salary earners, as against approximately 400,000 employers and 600,000 who work on their own account. There are approximately, I think, 900,000 persons on relief. There are 4,084,752 bank savings deposit accounts and roughly 6,500,000 life insurance policies in effect in Canada.

The generally deep-seated illusion that inflation will hit the wealthy classes has been exposed many times by experience. The wealthy classes have generally a much smaller proportion of their wealth in the form of bank deposits, bonds, life insurance policies, annuities and other contractually fixed values than the middle and lower classes, and a much smaller proportion of their total incomes in the form of contractually or traditionally fixed payments such as salaries, wages, interest, rents, pensions and relief payments than either the middle or the lower classes. The wealthy classes do not, of course, all benefit in like proportion, because property values are not all affected in the same manner, but the large owner of equities and the skilful speculator in equities have all the odds in their favour.

No more deliberate method, in my judgment, can be conceived of taking from those who have not and giving to those who have. The pitiful state of the great bulk of the population during the various inflation periods in European countries, and the long, painful struggle before the middle and lower classes ever recovered what had been lost in one stroke, are scarcely arguments for deliberately introducing a policy in Canada to benefit the lucky or astute gambler. No wonder the people of continental Europe, who have passed through a great world war and a great inflation during the last quarter century, are as much concerned to-day with the possibility of the recurrence of cumulative inflation as they are with the possibility of another great war.

Inflation may look like a scheme by which governments can get something out of nothing. It is not so. The mind of man has not yet solved that particular problem, and never will. Governments have only one source for the funds which they use, and that is the pockets of their people. No tax system may be wholly scientific or wholly equitable. Inflation, however, in my opinion is the most unjust and unwise system of taxation that has ever been devised.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would my hon. friend permit a question? Has he, to his own satisfaction, proved that this $6,000,000,000 would create an inflation?

Mr. DUNNING: Positively yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: On what grounds?

Mr. DUNNING: I shall deal with that a little later—but in this speech.

The hon. member for Rosthern has referred to the building of roads, and the construction of public buildings, land reclamation projects and armaments in Germany. If that country, "hemmed in by the problems which face her," can find the means for such a comprehensive program, he wonders why we in Canada cannot handle our small unemployment problem. Did it not impress the hon. member that Germany in carrying out her program has made the most strenuous efforts to avoid inflation and has not resorted to the direct currency increases, which he proposes for us, to finance her program? She is too close to the results of her experience in 1923 to try again to accomplish easy results by inflationary methods. Let me say here that in a material way she has great achievements to her credit, and I have every admiration for the financial wizardry shown by Doctor Schacht and his staff. But does my hon. friend really believe that Germany has gone further than we have in solving her problems or that her present economic structure rests on as sound a foundation? Does he look forward with confidence to the solution of her economic problems in the next two or three years? Does he realize what has been happening to the standard of living of the German people and the sacrifices which they have had to bear in quantity and quality of food, clothing and other consumers' goods? Does he realize that the tax revenues raised by the state have increased from about 6·6 billions of reichsmarks in 1931-32 to 14·2 billions in 1937-38, and to an estimated 18 billions in 1938-39? Furthermore, does he think that the Canadian public would be willing to accept the methods which have been followed in Germany? I dare say that if we as a people were willing to accept a dictatorship in economics as in other matters; if we were willing to allow a dictator to force us to forego certain things and accept cheap substitutes for others; if we were ready to sacrifice food and clothing and motor cars to good military roads and to rearmament, we could show results somewhat comparable with those which have been obtained in Germany in these respects. But if I understand the Canadian public correctly, I think they prefer freedom to regimentation, more consumers' goods to better military roads, more butter and better bread and better clothing and shoes to more cannon and more bombers.

I have spoken of only one aspect of the results of excessive expansion of currency and credit which we call inflation. I should say a word about another aspect of even a milder degree of inflation. I refer particularly to the maladjustments in the economy that invariably occur during a period of rapid expansion. As expansion proceeds, prices rise and this process tends to become cumulative, as the turn-over of deposits becomes more and more rapid. In this connection, I wish to stress the importance of this turn-over factor. The amount of money work performed or, to put it another way, the volume of business transactions effected in money terms, depends not only on the total volume of currency and credit but also on the velocity of circulation of notes and deposits—the number of times the dollar turns over in the course of a year. Too little stress is placed on this velocity factor in most monetary discussions.

Perhaps I can best illustrate its importance by referring to estimates recently published by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, According to these estimates, the velocity of circulation of money, (coins, bank notes and Dominion or Bank of Canada notes), declined from 26·85 in 1929 (this means that the Canadian dollar in the form of notes or coins turned over on the average 26·85 times during the year) to 17·42 in 1932 and then rose to 21·27 in 1936.

Bank deposits, on the other hand, turned over 23·04 times in 1929 and only 14·95 times in 1932, but by 1936 the rate of turn-over had increased to 18·26 times. It will be seen immediately how much more important this decline in velocity was in the deflation period, 1929-32, than was the decline in the volume of credit itself. I have already said that bank deposits fell off during this period by about fourteen per cent, but the figures just given show a decline in velocity of over thirty-five per cent. We need not be surprised, therefore, when we learn that the total volume of business transactions effected in Canada declined from an estimated total of over 52½ billion dollars in 1929 to slightly over 29 billions in 1932. I recommend a study of this velocity factor to all social crediters and all inflationists; it seems to be conspicuously absent in their thinking.

Mr. POOLE: The Liberals denied that in Alberta.

Mr. DUNNING: As I stated a moment ago, the velocity of circulation of both money and credit tends to rise very rapidly as confidence returns and business activity increases. If the public believes that inflation is under way and that the government or the central bank is going to continue to inject new currency or credit into the monetary system, as would necessarily be the case if the program suggested by my hon. friend were accepted by the government, then they would begin to lose faith in the integrity of the monetary unit and a race from the dollar would begin. In other words, the velocity of circulation would increase with enormous rapidity and prices would tend to soar with ever-increasing rapidity.

During a period when this process is under way it is perfectly obvious that there is fertile ground for the development of those maladjustments in the economy which I have already mentioned. Prices do not rise at the same rate in all industries. In those industries where prices tend to rise most rapidly, the prospect of increased future profits acts as a magnet to new capital, and business men increase their investment in fixed plant and equipment. Much of the new investment will prove to be unwise. Speculative activity will become excessive and may find an outlet in commodities or in securities or in real estate, producing the whole series of evils with which we are all too familiar.

Furthermore, there will be maladjustments between the various types of prices—retail prices, wholesale prices, security prices, wage rates, prices of raw materials, prices of finished commodities, etc. All these conditions are the familiar product of an inflationary boom which is bound to result in a serious depression. Essentially, a depression is a state of business in which maladjustments between various industries and between costs and prices make it impossible for a system of private enterprise to function normally, and a business recovery is the stage in which normal equilibrium is gradually being restored.

It may be asked why the central bank could not control such an inflationary boom as I have been describing and prevent these excesses from developing. My answer to that is that the central bank could probably perform that function, in large measure at least, if it began to exert its controls at a sufficiently early stage. But the point is that if there is a too rapid, and a too extensive, expansion of credit with a view to hastening recovery, the central bank's control is bound to be ineffective. Once the situation gets out of hand, the only thing which the central bank and the government can do is to introduce restrictive measures of such a drastic and comprehensive nature as to bring about the very depression which they had been trying to guard against.

The importance of this point will be recognized when it is remembered that the proposal being considered involves an immediate or rapid increase in bank cash of 240 per cent. I am aware, of course, that the hon. member for Rosthern has suggested that if inflation should threaten as a result of his program, the legal reserve requirement of the chartered banks might be raised to prevent any secondary expansion of bank deposits. Let us assume, first, for the sake of argument, that this could be worked out, although I believe my hon. friend would be the first to recognize the difficulties involved in timing and calculating the necessary adjustments in the reserve ratio to avoid inflationary expansion or deflationary restriction—as his construction program would necessarily extend over two or three years at least.

But if we assume it could be done, what would be the effect? I submit that one of the effects would be that we would be paying for the $350,000,000 program by an indirect tax on the shareholders, depositors and borrowing clients of chartered banks. The banks would have additional deposits of $350,000,000, on most of which they would be paying interest, but through the control of the legal reserve an equal amount would have to be carried by them as idle cash reserves bringing no return. The additional interest load would be met either by reducing the interest paid on all savings deposits or by raising the rate of interest on bank loans, or by reducing dividends to shareholders, or by all three methods.

Mr. BENNETT: Or by expanding business.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, I shall deal with that phase of it in a moment. Even if we are not concerned with any long run adverse effects upon our banking system, I ask if it is fair that the whole burden of such a program should be thrown on those classes in the community which use our chartered banking system. Alternatively, if this is the desire, why not impose a tax directly and be done with it, instead of assuming all the risks involved in tinkering with our currency and credit structure?

Apart from the initial effects of such a program, I shall mention only one other difficulty in the proposal to offset increases in bank cash by raising the legal reserve ratio. What is to happen when the $350,000,000 program has been completed? When the funds are all spent and the banks' cash reserve has been raised to twenty-one per cent, what will take the place of the artificial purchasing power injected into our monetary system? The program in itself will likely have done nothing to restore the normal functioning of the economic system. On the other hand, it may have done much to retard recovery by undermining confidence, by promoting undue expansion in one or more industries, by raising the prices of certain commodities, and by creating a more rigid and a more expensive banking system. If private enterprise is, as is probable, not ready to take up the slack, why not another $350,000,000 program of the same type? Moreover, if a $350,000,000 program is good, why not a $500,000,000 program? Why not, indeed, a billion dollar program? This is the inevitable record of such experiments with the currency.

Returning to the main proposal, I should mention the possibility that the increased bank cash might not immediately result in a tenfold or, indeed, in any expansion of circulating credit in use. If the business and financial world saw that the government and the central bank had committed themselves to a program of progressively expanding the volume of cash on a huge scale, precisely the opposite result might occur, at least for a time. Although ultimately the process of inflation would be almost certain to get under way, the first effects might be a general stagnation of business. Private business would be reluctant to make future commitments. Private individuals would hold a larger proportion of their funds in idle cash. The velocity of circulation of money and credit would decline, and this decline in the rate of turn-over would offset or possibly more than offset the increase in the volume of currency and credit. In other words, a contemplated program involving such vast inflationary possibilities might destroy the confidence of the business world in the soundness of conditions, and of the public generally in the future of their currency. In recent years we have seen more than one instance of such lack of confidence causing an almost insuperable obstacle to business recovery. The government would, of course, be creating purchasing power by its large public works program financed by inflation, but it would probably be found that the retarding of private business enterprise would much more than offset the stimulus which the government was trying to give.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that government spending cannot make up for the paralysis of private enterprise and of private spending which is created by fear and uncertainty. Under an absolute dictatorship, with complete regimentation of business and the private citizen conditions might be different; but under an economic and political system such as ours it is essential to maintain the confidence of the millions of individuals and organizations that make their own decisions as to whether they will or will not spend and invest.

The second suggested program for expanding currency and credit to which I wish to devote some attention is that series of proposals which goes under the general title of social credit. Hon. members will realize that most of what I have already said is a criticism of this doctrine, although I have not addressed myself to the precise terms in which social credit theories are couched. Also, hon. members who have sponsored social credit in the house will not expect me to deal with all their arguments or all their definitions of terms or all the variants of their theory, as presented by themselves or by the founder of their school. Even they, I think, must realize that the numerous volumes in which their high priest has expounded his doctrines are masterpieces either of confused thought or of studied ambiguity, and that every time he has been put up against prescribing a concrete program for a specific problem, he has again been a master of evasion. I am afraid that even my hon. friends have learned much from him in this respect. The debates of the house contain many social credit speeches, but it would take a magnifying glass to discover any concrete explanations made in those speeches as to how the program is to be carried out. The other evening when the leader of the social credit group (Mr. Blackmore) was advocating the creation of credit to supply all the needs of our people, he was asked by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) to explain just how it was to be done. He proceeded to explain in some detail what scarcely needed explanation, why the United States should have more money and credit than Newfoundland; but the explanation asked for was left for another time; and I know my hon. friend will forgive me if I say that this afternoon, after inviting questions, he always carefully deferred an answer to a specific question to some future occasion.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If my hon. friend will permit a question, has he now proved to his own satisfaction that six billion dollars in the banks would cause inflation?

Mr. DUNNING: I have no doubt of that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Has he proved that?

Mr. DUNNING: I think so.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not.

Mr. DUNNING: However, with the background which I have already given of monetary policy in this country, I propose to comment on a few of the special points in the social credit doctrines.

Let me say at once that, in my opinion, social credit rests upon an incorrect diagnosis of an existing malady and prescribes a cure which would be dangerous in the extreme. In other words, the whole theory is based upon a false premise, and the whole program which derives from that theory is unsound and pernicious.

The false premise to which I refer is that, as an inevitable result of the working of our present economic and financial system, there is a chronic shortage of purchasing power in the hands of consumers. This deficiency is supposed to arise from the fact that, of the costs incurred in the production of commodities for sale, only a part have involved the distribution of purchasing power to potential consumers. In other words, if the cost of a pair of shoes is ten dollars, only, say six dollars of that cost represent all the payments that have been made to individuals as wages, salaries or dividends—which are called "A" payments by Major Douglas—and the remaining four dollars represent payments made to other organizations for raw materials, bank charges, etc.—which are called "B" payments. Similar assumptions are made as to all other commodities sold in the community in the course of a year. Now, the theory alleges that, as individuals who are the potential consumers always receive for their work in production less than the total cost of the products of industry, they never have enough purchasing power, enough money and credit, with which to buy those products of industry. We have all heard that stated in the house time and time again. Because of this shortage of purchasing power, which according to the analysis is inevitable and also permanent, we are bound, it is alleged, to have gluts of commodities, surpluses of goods that cannot be used by the public because they have not enough money with which to buy them, "poverty in the midst of plenty," periodic depressions, wars and tariff struggles and all the other evils to which flesh is heir.

Mr. MITCHELL: May I ask a question?

An hon. MEMBER: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DUNNING: One at a time, now.

Mr. MITCHELL: I should like to ask the hon. gentleman, if the theory which he has just explained does not cause the difficulty that he has referred to, what does?

Mr. DUNNING: I understand the hon. member is speaking next. If I omit anything along the line of his question, I trust he will develop it.

This which I am quoting is an analysis, briefly stated, upon which Major Douglas has stated his whole program must stand or fall. In the language I have just used I have been paraphrasing as fairly as I can Major Douglas. Does it sound convincing to hon. members?

Mr. POOLE: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. gentleman permit a question? I want to ask him if he did not make a mistake when he said that our theory was that the system did not supply a sufficiency of purchasing power at any one time. That is not the premise of our argument at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POOLE: It should be this way, I think.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POOLE: Why raise a false premise?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is not asking a question; he is making a speech. I understand that he is on the speakers' list, and he will be able, of course, to make any explanation he wishes. I am endeavouring to state the Douglas theory without quoting at great length from all the Douglas books and to state what I think anyone will agree with, namely, that Major Douglas' theory on which, he states clearly, his whole program must stand or fall, is this "A" plus "B" theorem or analysis. There is at first sight an air of plausibility about it, and, particularly when it is stated in the mathematical terms of the so-called "A" plus "B" formula, a superficial mind like mine which has forgotten its algebra is likely to be awed into an acceptance of it as a mathematical truth. Particularly in times of severe depression it is likely to win unthinking acceptance, because in such periods, as we have already noted, there is likely to be monetary and credit deflation. This temporary deflation of money and credit demands an appropriate remedy in the type of monetary policy which I have previously discussed. But the error of Major Douglas is that, finding this type of temporary deflation in the immediate post-war depression when he began his investigations, he was led to erect a general theory which contends that there is always and inevitably a deficiency of purchasing power created by the working of our present system.

The falsity of his analysis has been exposed time and again by economists—not only the orthodox economists but even including such an unorthodox one as the communist John Strachey in his book on The Nature of Capitalist Crisis—and those who have time to go into it in more detail should read one of these exposures—for instance, Gaitskell's chapter in G. D. H. Cole's volume on What Everyone Wants to Know about Money. But let me indicate briefly a few of the major errors underlying the analysis. In the illustration I used of the pair of shoes costing ten dollars, payments amounting to four dollars were assumed not to go to individual consumers but to other firms and organizations. Most of this, say three dollars, would represent payments made for the purchase of raw materials such as leather, etc., and it does not take long to realize that the three dollars recovered by the shoe manufacturer as part of the sales price of ten dollars for his shoes goes to pay wages and salaries of the long line of people making the leather and other materials purchased by the manufacturer in order to make his shoes. But, says Major Douglas, this argument disregards the element of time. The money received by the farmer who raised the live stock and the tanner who produced the leather, etc., has been paid out in the past in an earlier stage of production, and so is not available in the present when the pair of shoes has to be purchased by someone. But obviously this attempted rebuttal entirely overlooks the fact that industry is a continuous process and that at all times producers and industries are operating side by side in all the various stages of production. It is evident, therefore, that industry as a whole is making available purchasing power equal to the total "A" payments made and these in turn will equal the cost of production of all consumer goods produced. Were it not so, our economic system would have broken down completely long years ago and we would now be operating on an entirely different type of system.

It is true, of course, that a deficiency of purchasing power may arise if there is a breakdown in the continuity of the productive process, and these break-downs do occur. But these periodic break-downs are what we mean by depressions and they call for their own appropriate remedies. They are not the phenomena which Major Douglas is attempting to analyze and prescribe for.

Another error which the social crediters make is to overlook entirely the fact that consumers do not buy the whole product of industry. A very substantial proportion of the total product of industry consists of producers' or capital goods—machinery, tools, equipment, etc.—which never come into the hands of consumers and which they never have to buy. The firms which are producing these capital goods pay wages, salaries and dividends which constitute purchasing power in the hands of consumers for the purchase of consumers' goods produced by other industries. It is, therefore, absurd to contend that sufficient money should be placed in the hands of consumers to enable them to purchase the entire produce of industry.

Finally, the social crediters overlook, in my opinion, the importance of the velocity factor to which I was referring a few minutes ago. They appear to forget that a dollar may turn over fifteen to twenty-five times in the course of a single year and thus do the money work of $15 to $25. Thus in 1929, when the total volume of business transactions in Canada amounted to fifty-two and a half billions of dollars, the total volume of money and credit in circulation was estimated at less than two and a half billion dollars. Would the sponsors of this theory contend that the volume of money and credit should have been increased to fifty-two and a half billion dollars, in order to provide purchasing power in the hands of consumers for all of the transactions which took place during the year 1929?

So much for the false foundation upon which, in my opinion, the social credit program rests. What about the program itself? It is impossible here to go into the myriad complexities and variants of the program; but as one would expect, it involves an attempt to provide a compensation for the supposed chronic shortage of purchasing power in the hands of consumers, which Major Douglas has been at such pains to demonstrate.

Most of the positive devices which are suggested will be recognized by all as frankly inflationist. This applies particularly to such suggestions as social credit dividends of $25 per month, payment of old age pensions by so-called monetizing of the national credit, and other devices of a similar nature. But the main part of the program as expounded by Major Douglas does seek to avoid inflation by providing for a reduction of prices by a certain proportion by government decree. How this proportion is to be arrived at is a technical problem and remains a mystery. Producers who sell at the lower prices once they have been established become entitled to credits supplied by the government equivalent to the difference between the old and the new prices in respect of each article sold. No interest is charged on these credits and no security is required therefor—they are really subsidies based on the national credit. The theory, of course, is that as a result of these credits or subsidies producers will find themselves as well off as they were before their prices were lowered, while consumers have obtained the benefits of the lower prices and are able with the same money incomes to buy more goods. It is evident that the total amount of these credits or subsidies given to producers involves a huge total; for they are designed to make up for the shortage between the cost value of total consumption and the money value of total production of the country during a given period, say one year, and the estimates made by social crediters indicate that only from two-fifths to one-ninth of the total production of a given period is consumed. It is apparent, therefore, that the new purchasing power thrown into the monetary system would be of colossal proportions.

It should be obvious, from what I have previously said, that this program would involve inflation on an enormous scale, with skyrocketing of prices and all the maladjustments of an artificial boom.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend was courteous this afternoon and I do not mind if it is a question, though I should like to get through to-night.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wonder if, while I ask the question, I may inquire whether the Liberals will show us the same courtesy we showed them. The question is this: Will the hon. gentleman tell us where he has got all this information in regard to the two-fifths and one-ninth? What authority is he quoting?

Mr. DUNNING: What authority?

Mr. BLACKMORE: What social credit authority is he quoting for all this?

Mr. DUNNING: Well, I have had the benefit of reading, as my hon. friend has had. I shall not say that I have read as widely as he; but one thing I do not do, and that is to pick out a quotation from a man's book in order to back up a point I am making, when I know that the trend of the whole book is directly against the theory I am advocating. I do study these matters; I have to do so in my capacity as Minister of Finance. I discuss them frequently with my technical officers, and endeavour to shape my own views and the views of the government, in so far as I can influence them, with respect to monetary matters, and I may tell my hon. friend that ever since this session opened I expected to have to face this question in parliament and have been very carefully preparing myself for it. Moreover, I have been very careful to-night to stick as closely as possible to the text because, as I said at the outset, I have a very deep sense of responsibility with respect to the influence, not on my hon. friends, but on the credit of Canada generally, of anything which a man occupying the position of Minister of Finance says with reference to such matters.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I ask another question?

Mr. DUNNING: Certainly.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am wondering why the Minister of Finance cannot tell us where he has got his information with regard to the figures he has quoted.

Mr. DUNNING: In quoting the Douglas theory I have attempted to condense within a narrow compass my conception of it from what Major Douglas has written in many books, and from what my hon. friends have been saying in the house during the last two or three years. It is my own opinion. If my hon. friends believe that I am wrong in any particular, it is their privilege to point out, after reading in Hansard what I have said, wherein I am wrong. That is the privilege of debate. It is by that method that we all endeavour to arrive at the truth. I am endeavouring to state what is my opinion, what is my conception of the thing I am talking about.

To continue, if the program were continued, this inflation would be progressive and cumulative, and before long the experience of post-war Germany would have little to teach us. Of course, Major Douglas says that at the first sign of rising prices no more new money would be created.

Mr. QUELCH: He never said that.

Mr. DUNNING: If this promise is to be taken literally, then the social credit program would be at an end, and presumably we would have to worry only about the effects of the first dose of inflation. I am afraid, however, that under a social credit regime the promise could not be taken literally, and at the best we would find continuing doses of inflation on an enormous scale with attempts by the regime to counteract the effects of inflation by the fixing of maximum prices. This would lead inevitably to the assumption of control over all industries, trades and economic activities and the complete regimentation characteristic of an authoritarian state. Moreover, as history has shown repeatedly, for instance in the fiat money period of revolutionary France and in the hyper-inflation period in post-war Germany, the attempts at fixing maximum prices, regulating wages, and so forth, would be futile and ineffective, even though the death penalty were imposed against offenders.

I have dealt all too briefly with the positive program of social credit, but I think the members of the house are sufficiently aware of the nature and implications of the program to make a more detailed appraisal unnecessary.

In conclusion, I have traced the history of our monetary policy in the last few years, and have tried to show, I fear at too great length, the reasons why I believe that this policy, in the recent past at least, has been well considered, and why some of the alternative policies which have been suggested should not be adopted. Our policy has been and is an easy money policy which has resulted in an expansion of our credit base and of the volume of credit in use at a rate which is believed to be in harmony with the best interest of the economic life of the nation. It is a policy which recognizes the part which monetary weapons can usefully play in stimulating and supporting business recovery, but not one based on the belief that monetary factors are the sole factors to be considered. It is a policy which has retained the confidence of the business man and the private citizen, not one which has created fear or uncertainty. It is one of the factors responsible for the fact that our economy has shown a consistent, and indeed rapid, recovery; not one characterized by fits and starts.

Of course much remains to be done. One of our important industries has been prostrated by the recurrent ravages of drought Unemployment has declined substantially, but we still have employable persons who are unemployed. These and other problems must be attacked on many fronts. Fundamentally our need is an actual increase in material wealth, not a different yardstick with which to measure it, or the deliberate ruination of one class for the imaginary benefit of another. Such an increase in material wealth can be best secured by facilitating the production of the many commodities which Canada is best adapted to produce, and by exchanging these products on as large a scale as possible for products which Canada cannot advantageously produce, receiving in return for our exports, as much rather than as little as possible. Monetary policy will continue to have its part to play, and I am confident that the administration of Canada's monetary policy by the Bank of Canada is in capable hands, and is directed to the single purpose of promoting the best good of all Canada in so far as monetary policy can be effective to this end.

Mr. A. H. MITCHELL (Medicine Hat): May I say to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) that I did enjoy his essay. It will be necessary to read and study it in order to deal effectively with it.

May I say also that when I came to this house I had some fixed ideas and some firm prejudices. One of those prejudices was political; another was perhaps against individuals. There have been times when I actually doubted the integrity of the Minister of Finance and the men who control finance in Canada. But I should like to say that as I have come to know them better, I came to understand my prejudice more, and I think what we have to say can be more useful according as we lose our prejudices.

In seconding the motion of the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), my leader in the house, may I say that I believe this government is actually in a negative position. It is in the strange position of having a leader who stated in the house, while in opposition, that usury once in control will wreck any nation. Now, Mr. Speaker, I agree completely with the right hon. gentleman in that statement. But I have not seen any evidence that he or his government has done anything to free this country from that condition.

Let me explain exactly what I mean. I was so impressed by that statement that usury, once in control, will wreck any nation, that I looked up the definition of the word "usury". The first definition I saw was, "the fact or practice of lending money at interest". I looked in six different dictionaries in the parliamentary library in order to see whether there was any disagreement, and I found they agreed in the definition that the fact or practice of lending at interest is usury, with the added meaning especially in later use, of "the charging or taking of excessive or illegal rates of interest."

In the light of what I have found since I discovered the meaning of that word "usury," and in view of the statement I have quoted as to its effect when in control of a country, the striking thing is that the effect of lending principal and recovering interest is the accumulation of a tremendous debt, which is growing rapidly. When principal only is borrowed by a borrower, and principal plus interest is repayable at maturity, the principal and the interest are of exactly the same material, namely dollars. If I borrow $940 and repay $1,000, that is, if I borrow at six per cent discount, I am returning $60 which I did not receive. If every person who borrows a sum of money, when he makes repayment repays the principal plus interest, then surely, since the material which he uses for repayment is the same as what he borrowed, he must be repaying with part of someone else's principal. Therefore it is not surprising to find that usury—or use the term interest if you like—the payment of interest for the money which we have to use to exchange our goods and services, is part and parcel of an idea which is in control of this nation. That fact I would say is the pons asinorum of the new economics.

Every time principal is lent money goes into circulation; every time loans are repaid money comes out of circulation. But since principal only is lent, and principal plus interest repaid, more money must come out of circulation than went in, which is nothing more or less than impossible. The result is debt. So I say that if the Minister of Finance has successfully disposed of the "A" plus "B" theorem, we have yet to hear how he is going to dispose of the debt problem, which confronts individuals, businesses and governments, whether provincial, municipal or federal.

It is like a gigantic poker game. I happen to know something about the game. I know that the man who runs the game is called a banker. That may be a coincidence. The banker "drags" each pot; it is only a small drag, hardly a percentage of the pot each time; but as the game goes on and the banker keeps dragging, if the same players stay in the game, eventually the banker must have all the money. Unless new players come in, eventually all the players, or at least some of them, are bound to be in debt to the banker. That is the way it operates.

Now, when money goes into circulation as debt, and like a comet returns bringing with it a tail of interest, the busier and more productive we are the more money is borrowed, the more principal is used up in paying interest, and necessarily the more debt must accrue. The fact has been borne out by the findings of the Bank of Canada in connection with provincial operations in the three western provinces, and because of it, if not because of the "A" plus "B" theorem, if your personal difficulty and that of all the people whom you know, or know of, is lack of money, is it not obvious that the central national difficulty is but the aggregate of the difficulty of all the citizens, and that the scarcity of money is our paramount national problem?

Those are not my words, Mr. Speaker. I have quoted from the foreword to Professor Irving Fisher's book One Hundred Per Cent Money, which was written by Robert H. Hemphill, formerly credit manager of the federal reserve bank of Atlanta. He goes on to say:

> We have ample producing and distributing facilities to supply everyone with an abundance of the essentials for a high standard of living, and we are desperately anxious to produce, but we haven't sufficient money to effect the exchange of our goods and services.

We are dependent for sufficient money upon the judgment of a few men, whose integrity I am not questioning for one moment, although, as I said to the Minister of Finance, there was a time when I was narrow enough to have done so. It is hardly possible to conceive of the effect of compound interest. It is impossible to pay simple interest. How are we going to pay it when you compound it?

So, Mr. Speaker, the technique which is suggested by Major Douglas deals with that phase of the difficulty. The growth of debt may be judged by the fact that in the seventeenth century world debt increased forty-seven per cent. At the end of the eighteenth century world debt had increased 466 per cent. At the end of the nineteenth century world debt, public and private, had increased 12,000 per cent. Professor Rautenstrauch, of Columbia university, taking 1800 A.D. as the year of origin and one hundred years as the unit of world debt, says that world debt is now increasing as the fourth power of time—of time, not squared—in spite of the bankruptcies, the various repudiations, writings down and so on. That is an appalling fact, and it requires some solution. The "A" plus "B" theorem has not been disproved to my satisfaction by the Minister of Finance, and there are many other points he made with which I am not going to take time to deal; but that does not by any manner of means dispose of the problem. It is a fact that history shows that when debts become unbearable, a means is always found of repudiating them. In France it was revolution; in Germany it was inflation, and in Russia it was both.

The position of this government is a negative one, because on the assertion of the minister himself, the government with parliament holds the means of correcting or finding a solution to that problem, which lies in the source of money and the means by which people obtain it; for now it comes only as a flow of principal through production. With the complications of mechanization and all the other complications such as unemployment and so on, it does not carry the burden it is expected to bear. I should like to quote the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who said in the house:

> Once a nation parts with the control of its currency and credit, it matters not who makes the nation's laws. Usury, once in control, will wreck any nation. Until the control of the issue of currency and credit is restored to the government and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of the sovereignty of parliament and democracy is futile.

Has this government shown evidence that it has accepted its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility? I am sure that at the moment the position of the government in that regard is negative. It has stopped Alberta from trying to exercise sovereignty; but nothing is done to apply the sovereignty of the dominion over money power for the benefit of the people of Canada, except in the opinion of those who control the Bank of Canada, the Department of Finance and so on. Certainly something more is needed than reliance on exporting to foreign markets. Alberta has been stopped from trying to find a way out along the path of social credit. All right; the responsibility then is upon the dominion government to achieve better results.

Money technique and an accurate accounting system are required, not a poker game complete with banker. The government may feel satisfied with the results that are to be seen in the trade statistics, where Canada is shown to be exporting more than ever to the markets abroad. This is not a proof of anything except that we in Canada deprived ourselves of $6,000,000 worth of our own produce. Did we do so because no one here was hungry, because all the people were warmly housed and well clothed? No, Mr. Speaker, we did not.

Mr. SPEAKER: Eleven o'clock.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Wednesday, March 9, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

THE LATE PETER SINCLAIR

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, since its last sitting, this house has suffered the loss of another of its members, the thirteenth since the present parliament assembled, fortunately the only one in the present session.

Hon. members will have learned, with deep regret, of the sudden passing of Mr. Peter Sinclair, one of the members for the constituency of Queens, Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Sinclair had been in regular attendance at the sittings of the house since we reassembled here in January. He was in his seat as recently as Friday last. It was only on Saturday last that he became indisposed, and it was thought advisable that he should go to the civic hospital for treatment. Neither in Mr. Sinclair's own mind nor in that of others, had there been, at the time, any anxiety concerning the possibility of his recovery. His death was wholly unexpected, and the word of it in this morning's press must have occasioned a shock to his many friends in this house, and will be particularly felt in his native province.

Mr. Sinclair had little more than completed his fiftieth year. He was returned to the House of Commons at the last general election. His political career, though short, had not been without promise. He was elected to the legislature of Prince Edward Island in 1927, and became a minister without portfolio in the government of Hon. A. C. Saunders in the following year. He continued as a member of the legislature till 1931. He suffered defeat in the provincial elections of that year and retired into private life for a while, giving his time to farming and to business activities. In the general elections of 1935 he became one of the Liberal candidates for Queens and as already mentioned was returned as a member of this parliament.

Mr. Sinclair came of a family in Prince Edward Island well known for its interest in public affairs and possessed of a fine tradition of public service. His father, Peter Sinclair, after whom he was named, had, in his day, been a member of the legislature of Prince Edward Island, and one of the representatives in this House of Commons of the constituency which his son subsequently represented. For many years the same constituency was represented in this house by his brother, the Hon. John Sinclair, who was a member of a former Liberal administration, and is at present, as hon. members are aware, a member of the senate. Like his brother, the senator, Peter Sinclair had been throughout his life a member of the Liberal party in Prince Edward Island, and active in his advocacy of its principles and policies. He took a special interest in all that pertained to the welfare of his native province. He was most loyal in the support which, at all times, he accorded my colleagues and myself, and we feel deeply a loss which will be shared by all members of the party in this house and by the people of Prince Edward Island.

In the short time he was a member of this house, Mr. Sinclair had not had opportunity to take much part in its proceedings. Being, however, of a kindly, generous and friendly disposition, he made many friends among its members.

The sadness of Mr. Sinclair's passing at so early an age is increased by the circumstance that he leaves behind a widow and seven children. You, Mr. Speaker, I am sure, will convey to Mrs. Sinclair and the members of the family, in their bereavement, the expression of the very sincere sympathy felt for them by all members of this house.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the sudden passing of the member for Queens is a striking illustration of the truth of that ancient saying, "In the midst of life we are in death." No one who saw Mr. Sinclair in his place in the house on Friday would have thought it at all probable that on Wednesday afternoon we should be mourning his passing. It is, I say, a most striking illustration of the uncertainty of human life.

I did not know Mr. Sinclair at all well personally, but I knew him in the way that one does know members of this chamber. He was a zealous supporter of his party, and deeply concerned in everything that had to do with the prosperity and welfare of the province whence he came. His devotion to the interests of Prince Edward Island might be said to be perhaps his outstanding characteristic.

I believe that when Disraeli passed away, Salisbury said, "Zeal for the greatness of England was the passion of his life"; and if our late confrere might be said to have had a passion, it was zeal for his native province of Prince Edward Island. It manifested itself on all occasions, and he took a very deep concern indeed in everything that had to do with the welfare and prosperity of that province.

I cannot do more than say that we should like to associate ourselves with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his party in sympathy for the loss of one who has been very early in life called from its activities, and who leaves behind him a wife and seven children, thus intensifying, as the Prime Minister has so aptly said, the sympathetic concern that every member must have in his passing. In associating ourselves with the government in the loss of the deceased member, we realize, Mr. Speaker, that you in your own way will convey to the bereaved widow and family an expression of the sympathy which we all feel, and our deep regret that one of our number should have been so suddenly called from our midst.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we in this group should like to associate ourselves with the expressions of esteem and sympathy uttered by the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, our group also would like to join with the Prime Minister and his party in extending sympathy to the family of the deceased member.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE FOR GOVERNMENT BUSINESS ON AND AFTER MONDAY, MARCH 14

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Monday, the fourteenth of March, to the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence on Mondays over all other business except introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION ACT

AMENDMENT OF PROVISION RESPECTING PROHIBITED CLASSES

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 38, to amend the Immigration Act.

Mr. DUNNING: Explain.

Mr. NEILL: This is a very simple bill, and framed in modest and very general terms. It does not discriminate against or specifically name any nation or any race. It proposes to make a small but, I think, a useful addition or amendment to section 3 of the Immigration Act. In order to facilitate, I trust, its passage through the house and to secure the support of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), I have followed the suggestion he made on a previous occasion in connection with another bill and have provided that it shall not come into force until the first day of July, 1939.

Mr. DUNNING: What is it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the bill about?

Mr. NEILL: It is to amend section 3. To put it in two words, it proposes to add the words "of Europe" to section 3, paragraph (t). If the house wishes me to read it out, I shall do so, but that is the only change.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the effect of the bill?

Mr. NEILL: Paragraph (t) of section 3 of the Immigration Act, chapter 93 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

(t) on and after the first day of July, 1939—

That is one change, instead of 1927.

—in addition to the foregoing "prohibited classes," the following persons shall also be prohibited from entering or landing in Canada: Persons over fifteen years of age, physically capable of reading who cannot read the English or the French language or some other language or dialect commonly spoken by and native to the people of any country, state, province or other political or territorial division of Europe—

And then follows the rest of the section, keeping to the old section.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

RADIO BROADCASTING

REQUEST FOR COPY OF ADDRESS BROADCAST BY G. V. FERGUSON OF WINNIPEG FREE PRESS ON SUNDAY, MARCH 6

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): By leave of the house I should like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a question of which I gave him notice on Monday last but which I deferred asking at the time the orders of the day were called yesterday, owing to his absence, which was due to the sad circumstances which we all know. I wonder if there will be any objection to my asking the question now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

[Mr. Euler.]

Mr. CAHAN: The question is: Would the Prime Minister procure and lay on the table of the house a copy of the address delivered over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's radio system last Sunday afternoon by Mr. G. V. Ferguson, managing editor of the Winnipeg Free Press? I ask the question for this reason. In view of existing international complications, when members of the government and of the parliament of Canada, in their sincere desire for the preservation of peace, are exercising commendable reticence in their public discussions, there are many who deplore that a radio system, which is under the control of the Canadian parliament, should be freely utilized for such provocative propaganda as that which was contained in this address.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The question which the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) has asked raises a very serious issue of policy. It raises the issue of how far the government would be justified in going in the way of exercising direct control over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. As my hon. friend is aware, the functions, powers and duties of the corporation are defined by statute, and they have been so defined as to remove the corporation from anything in the nature of possible political or other pressure on the part of the administration or any member of it. In the circumstances I rather feel that the government should not at this stage, at all events, seek on its own initiative to lay on the table of the house any papers that may have been read or speeches that may have been made over the radio. It should at least first obtain the consent of the chairman and members of the board of the corporation so to do. However, I shall have pleasure in asking my colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe), to bring my hon. friend's question to the attention of the board of directors of the corporation. Possibly this may be the means of procuring for my hon. friend the document which he desires the house to see. If not it will at least occasion, on the part of the board, some fuller consideration than has been given thus far to the matter he has in mind.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

PROPOSED CESSATION OF FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROJECTS WITHIN PROVINCIAL JURISDICTION

Mr. OSCAR L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, in order to conform with the constitution, to respect the provinces' desire for autonomy and to favour the betterment of the dominion finances, the federal government should cease making financial contributions towards the execution of projects which are entirely within the jurisdiction of said provinces.

He said: (Translation) Mr. Speaker, I apologize to you and to the house for bringing up a subject which has already been considered from various angles during the present session, but I think the discussion to which the motion I have the honour to propose will give rise will serve to recall to memory certain facts that are apt to be forgotten—facts the recollection of which will have the effect of improving the relations between the central government and the provincial administrations. I fear that some of my friends, hearing you read the motion which suggests that the federal government should respect the provinces' desire for autonomy to the extent of avoiding any financial interference in the execution of projects coming under their jurisdiction might think that I am being facetious. No, Mr. Speaker, I am not trying to be funny at the expense of the provinces; I have no intention of showing that their vehement claims to autonomy ill agree with their unceasing requests for federal grants.

Someone has said, "We have nothing to learn from Ottawa." I do not propose to suggest to the author of this statement that logic should compel him to complete it by adding: "Not only have we nothing to learn from Ottawa, but we have nothing to ask of Ottawa." Some of the provinces are so jealous of their autonomy that the federal government is running the risk of gravely insulting them by making financial contributions to the carrying out of obligations assigned to them by the constitution. Public relief and social services, for instance, come under their jurisdiction. Therefore, our Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), by forcing the provinces to accept every year from eighty to one hundred million dollars from the federal government for public relief and social purposes is not only inflicting a cruel injury to their pride but indefinitely postponing the realization of his dream of a balanced budget.

You may think, Mr. Speaker, that I am jesting. In order to prove that I am not, I am going to quote from a publication which has just come to me, L'Unité of Thursday, March 3rd, 1938. Under the heading "Old-Age Pensions," this paper says:

> The centralizing ogre of Ottawa is once more threatening the autonomy of the provinces.
> A few years ago, it will be recalled, the provinces sacrificed to the national government part of their rights in order to establish a system of old-age pensions. According to the understanding between the federal and provincial governments, the administration of these pensions was left to each province, which was to supply 25 per cent of the amount of the pensions, plus the costs of administration.
> It was a piece of stupidity on the part of the provinces to sacrifice this right. It amounted to selling their birthright for a mess of pottage.

This quotation shows that there is a school of opinion which claims that the federal government should refrain from insulting the provinces by making financial contributions to the carrying out of responsibilities which the constitution has assigned to the provinces. Therefore, in order to respect the provinces' desire for autonomy, to respect their pride, to avoid wounding their feelings, the Minister of Finance should cease contributing to the execution of such obligations and thus put himself in a position to realize much sooner his dream of a balanced budget.

My purpose in moving the resolution which you have just read is not to deliver a more or less impertinent lecture to the provinces, inasmuch as I have just proved to you that there exists in the provinces the feeling that each government should remain within its own field of jurisdiction, that each should, to use a rather vulgar expression, mind its own business and that, in the words of the proverb, the shoemaker should stick to his last. I simply wish to provide the house with an opportunity of considering calmly and seriously the relations between the dominion and the provinces with a view to seeking means of rendering them more frank and cordial. Let us all together, in the light of history and aided by common sense, endeavour to clear the air, to remove uncertainties, to dispel causes of misunderstanding, to extricate from the jumble of opinions and recriminations the essential principles which should guide our national life. I hope that some of my fellow-members will help me to recall the fundamental principles which should underlie the relations between the dominion and the provinces. As to the facts which I shall have the honour to lay before the house, I have taken them in part from the report of the special committee of inquiry on the British North America Act which sat during the session of 1935 and from the excellent brief presented to the Rowell commission by Professor Frank Scott, of the faculty of law of McGill university, Montreal.

I do hope, sir, that no sarcastic motive will be attributed to the motion you have just read. I must admit, however, that it is a little difficult to avoid being sarcastic when one sees, for instance, a government, that had been pushed into power for damning trusts, objecting to a national unemployment insurance scheme on the plea of autonomy—which of course cannot be to the liking of the trusts—or when one sees a provincial prime minister refusing all contribution to an unemployment insurance scheme, arguing that his province is an agricultural province, but asking in the same breath a national crop insurance scheme at the expense of the whole of the Canadian people including the industrial workers.

We must ask ourselves, sir, what was the idea of the fathers of confederation on the subject of our constitution; how that idea has changed since 1867 and what means are to be adopted in order better to understand the powers and responsibilities of the different legislative authorities in our country. Those are, I may say, the three points which should be considered in order to reach the end I had in mind when moving the resolution.

After I have dealt with those three points, I hope I will have contributed in a measure to the understanding and cooperation which must exist in Canada and its provinces, if the nation created in 1867 is to achieve its aims. It is quite possible that in doing so I will be merely voicing commonplaces and stock phrases. Consequently I will be brief. There are in this chamber learned, wise and experienced men better able than I am to deal with such a complicated matter and to give appropriate advice and directions.

A perusal of contemporary documents leaves no doubt but that the fathers of confederation, in 1867, had a great idea. They aimed not only at the bringing together of the British colonies of North America, but also at the creation of a new nation. As a matter of fact, the British North America Act is not, as many think, a pact, a compromise, a treaty of alliance; it is the constitution of a new nation and the charter of a new country. The raison d'être of confederation is set out clearly in the preamble to the British North America Act. There, it is declared that the provinces of Canada, of Nova Scotia and of New Brunswick have expressed a desire to contract a federal union with a view to form a single power under the British crown.

Section 4 states that the provisions of that act would commence and have effect on and after the Union, and that the name Canada would be taken to mean Canada as constituted under this act.

In the language of the speech from the throne, 1865, a new nationality and a new country were created for the purpose of weaving the local particularistic views of the small colonies into a larger entity. A united body replaced the various provincial entities. A new state of things replaced the previous one and Canada of 1867 absorbed the former colonies which became administrative districts thereof.

The Hon. John Rose was therefore right when he said:

> The feeling of nationality will soon become deeply rooted in our souls.

In creating that new nation, the fathers of confederation surely intended to create a national government fully empowered to deal with all questions of a national character and presenting a common interest for all the country's citizens. That was quite clear in their minds. They had before their eyes the example of the American civil war brought about by the unreasonable claims of the various states and they were determined to preserve from such a fate the new nation they were creating. In the opinion of everyone the jurisdiction of the new federal government was not to be limited to certain specific or enumerated powers as in the case of the United States Congress. Sir John Macdonald dealt with this matter quite clearly and frankly:

> Ever since the union was formed, the difficulty of what is called "state rights" has existed, and this as we know—

—he was referring to the constitution of the United States—> —has much to do in bringing on the present unhappy war in the United States. In fact they—

—the separate provinces which became the United States—

> —commenced at the wrong end. They declared by their constitution that each state was a sovereignty in itself, and that all the powers incident to a sovereignty belonged to each state, except those powers which, by the constitution, were conferred upon the general congress. Here, we have adopted a different system. We have strengthened the general government. We have given the general legislature all the great subjects of legislation. We have conferred on them not only specifically and in detail all the powers which are incident to sovereignty, but we have expressly declared that all subjects of general interest not distinctly and exclusively conferred upon the local legislatures, shall be conferred upon the general government and that local subjects shall be conferred upon local legislatures. We have thus strengthened the general government and legislature and avoided that great source of weakness which has been the cause of the disruption of the United States.

Those words of Sir John Macdonald may be found in the Debates on Confederation, session of 1865, page 33. In the course of the same speech, page 41, Sir John is quoted as follows:

This is precisely the provision which is wanting in the constitution of the United States. It is here that we find the weakness of the American system—the point where the American constitution breaks down.

Kindly take note of this:

It is in itself a wise and necessary provision. We thereby strengthen the central parliament, and make the confederation one people and one government, instead of five peoples and five governments, with merely a point of authority connecting us to a limited and insufficient extent.

During the same debates, Sir Georges Etienne Cartier, is reported as follows on page 60:

Under the federation system, granting to the control of the general government these large questions of general interest in which the differences of race or religion had no place, it could not be pretended that the rights of either race or religion could be invaded at all. We were to have a general parliament to deal with matters of defence, tariff, excise, public works, and these matters absorbed all individual interest.

Here is now the opinion expressed by Hon. George Brown:

For all dealings with the imperial government and foreign countries we have clothed the general government with the most ample powers. The measure, in fact, shuns the faults of the federal and legislative systems and adopts the best part of both, and I am well persuaded it will work efficiently and satisfactorily.

I could quote many more similar statements to show that in the early days of confederation there was no ambiguity and that everybody agreed perfectly well on the distribution of powers as between the central government and the provincial governments. There was no conflict on the question of autonomy, or rather each institution was autonomous in its own sphere. The federal government had all the powers which are necessary to a national government, and the provinces, all those belonging to a territorial administration. It is made clear in the very wording of section 91 of the British North America Act which says in the first place that generally speaking, it shall be lawful for the Federal Parliament to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada and that these general powers shall not be restricted by the enumeration following the first paragraph of the section, which is given just as an illustration.

On the contrary, when it is a question of laying down the powers of the provinces in section 92, particulars are given, and the section ends by saying that the provinces shall have jurisdiction in matters of local interest within their borders.

Mr. WALSH: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? I am sorry I am not asking it in French. Would he suggest that the opinions he has quoted in regard to confederation are in harmony with the opinions recently expressed in judgments of the privy council and the Supreme Court of Canada on issues between the various provinces and the dominion?

Mr. BOULANGER: No, I am afraid that the opinions of the fathers of confederation do not exactly coincide with some of the decisions rendered by the privy council, and if my hon. friend will wait I will touch on that point a little later on. One of my points is precisely that the judgments of the privy council have altered the first conception of confederation.

(Translation) Coming back to the motion which the fathers of confederation had formed of what Canada should be, I wish to point out that at that time the position was quite clear, that is to say, all matters of national import and affecting all citizens as a people were to be under the jurisdiction of the federal parliament, and all those of a local or territorial nature were to be left to the provinces. To sum up this point, I wish respectfully to submit:

1. That the provinces, as they existed before 1867, were not sovereign states, but mere British colonies whose powers were very limited.

2. That Canada, as organized in 1867, was not created by the provincial legislatures of that period, but by the future Canadian citizens who took part in the conferences at Charlottetown, Quebec and London. As a matter of fact, the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia did not exist then, or rather British Columbia existed, but did not take part in the setting up of confederation. Strictly speaking, the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, as they are known to-day, did not exist in 1867; they were created by the British North America Act of 1867, and the province which represented us at the time confederation was worked out was called the province of Canada, and included Lower and Upper Canada.

3. That Canada got her powers from the imperial parliament which gave effect to the constitution set up at the three above-mentioned conferences, and not from the provinces.

4. That the powers of Canada are those of a nation, and that they are liable to expand toward a greater sovereignty and a larger autonomy, such as has been actually shown.

5. That when Canada appeared on the map of the world the former British colonies in North America vanished as such and became administrative districts of Canada.

Such was the situation in 1867. It was plain, clear, well defined, and well determined. After a number of years, did it become obscure, ambiguous, unintelligible, and hopelessly confused, such as it is claimed? That claim is certainly exaggerated, but we must admit that the work of the fathers of confederation has been somewhat defaced and mutilated, so much so that its operation is more difficult, and its meaning more confused. That is hardly due to the legislative action of the Canadian or British Parliaments, but rather to the theoretical interpretation of the Canadian constitution by the courts, and more particularly by the Privy Council in England. Indeed, since 1867, there were only seven amendments to the constitution, and those amendments were not so very important. The American constitution, which is twice as old as ours, was amended at least three times as often as ours was.

Here are the amendments which were made to the Canadian constitution:

1. The British North America Act, 1871. The object of that amendment was to determine whether the dominion parliament had a right to carve new provinces out of the Northwestern Territories. While such power seemed to have been given under section 146 of the constitution, there was some doubt, and they wanted to make it clear under an amendment.

2. The Parliament of Canada Act, 1875. That amendment was to give a better definition of the powers, privileges and immunities enjoyed by parliament anent the rights of a parliamentary committee to take evidence under oath.

3. The British North America Act, 1886. The object of that amendment was to give Parliament the necessary powers to enable the Northwest Territories to be represented in the Senate and the House of Commons.

4. The British North America Act, 1907. The idea was to empower Parliament to increase the subsidies to the provinces and effect a final settlement with the latter. Experience has shown that it was not actually a final settlement. I shall later discuss that amendment which is the most important one.

5. The British North America Act, 1915. The object of said amendment being to increase the representation in the Senate, and to change the main senate constituencies.

6. The British North America Act, 1916, the object of which was to extend by one year the term of the existing parliament.

7. The British North America Act, 1930, which sought to authorize the dominion parliament to transfer to British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba, their natural resources.

It will be seen that the legislative amendments to the constitution were not sufficiently important to change the latter's character or nature.

However, the legal interpretation of the constitution has had much greater consequences. As a matter of fact, the courts and especially the Privy Council in England, instead of interpreting the constitution in the light of those historical and juridical facts which have resulted in the birth of Canada, have always endeavoured to give it a narrow interpretation and to consider it simply as an ordinary statute of the United Kingdom's parliament. It would appear that the Privy Council had two reasons for so doing; first, the fear that Canada might acquire full independence and autonomy and sever its connection with the British Empire; and, secondly, the desire to favour the provinces to the prejudice of the central government. In the minds of the noble lords, an increase in the provincial powers on the one hand, and a lessening of the federal powers on the other hand, were bound to help in postponing that imaginary danger of secession with which they have always seemed to be obsessed. To gain that end, the Privy Council mostly used two means. It has sought on the one hand to limit in a manner which has sometimes been absurd, the central government's power with regard to trade, and on the other hand, it has stretched to the utter limit the interpretation of the provision conferring jurisdiction upon the provinces in matters of property and civil rights. Throughout the contest between the dominion and the provinces it always seems as though the provinces were sorry to have abandoned what in their minds were sovereign rights in matters of national import, and were anxious to recover them through the medium of the courts.

The Privy Council, through Lord Haldane, was then able to boast, and rightly so, of having, in the course of years, changed the Canadian constitution, and of having distorted the work of the founders of Confederation. Indeed, while paying a tribute to the late Lord Watson, who died in 1899, and who had one of the longest terms of office in the Privy Council, Lord Haldane spoke as follows:

> He was an imperial judge of the very first order. The function of such a judge, sitting in the supreme tribunal of the empire, is to do more than decide what abstract and familiar legal conceptions should be applied to particular cases. His function is to be a statesman as well as a jurist, to fill in the gaps which parliament has deliberately left in the skeleton constitutions and laws that it has provided for the British colonies. . . . Lord Carnarvon's Confederation Act of 1867, which had given separate legislatures and executives to the provinces, had by no means completely defined the relations of these legislatures and their lieutenant-governors to the parliament and governor general of the dominion. Two views were being contended for. The one was that, excepting in such cases as were specially provided for, a general principle ought to be recognized which would tend to make the government at Ottawa paramount, and the governments of the provinces subordinate. The other was that of federalism through and through, in executive as well as legislative concerns, whenever the contrary has not been expressly said by the imperial parliament. The provincial governments naturally pressed this latter view very strongly. The Supreme Court of Canada, however, which had been established under the Confederation Act, and was originally intended by all parties to be the practically final court of appeal for Canada, took the other view. . . . Lord Watson made the business of laying down the new law that was necessary his own. He completely altered the tendency of the decisions of the supreme court. . . . In a series of masterly judgments he expounded and established the real constitution of Canada.

As a result of seventy years of legal interpretation, the dominion parliament is now deprived of its general powers under the first part of section 91 of the British North America Act, the greatest part of its power of control over traffic and trade, of a great part of its power to carry out treaties and of almost all power of legislating in social matters for the nation as a whole.

It is all very well to speak about the sacredness of the constitution and to say that it should be left alone, but it is edifying to recall that the greatest rent which has ever been made in the constitution of 1867 was made at the request of the provinces themselves. I am referring to the fourth amendment made to the constitution in 1907 in connection with subsidies paid by the central government to the provincial governments. Indeed, most quarrels occur about money matters, and the difficulties between the federal government and the provinces generally have a financial character. If there is anything in the constitution which they endeavoured to make permanent, unalterable and inviolable it is surely section 118 which determines the amount of the subsidy to be paid to the provinces by the Ottawa government. Yet, that is what has been changed most. We find in that section the following words:

> Such grants shall be in full settlement of all future demands on Canada.

It could not have been stated more clearly or definitely. Nevertheless, no sooner had the constitution been in force, than the provinces began to scheme and to insist upon getting what they called better terms. During the seventy years that have elapsed since 1867, there have been three general revisions which increased the grants to all the provinces and over twenty special revisions which were beneficial to each of them.

To sum up, the four original provinces now receive from the federal government more than three and a half times the amount that had been promised them in the British North America Act. All those revisions of subsidies were made without any amendment to the constitution, with the exception of the 1907 amendment, to which I referred a few moments ago. Through that amendment an endeavour was still made to state that the agreement just concluded would be "final and definite" but those words were deleted at the request, I think, of Winston Churchill who pointed out that a parliament could not bind a future parliament.

It may be noted that besides having succeeded in securing many increases in the federal subsidies, in spite of the definite terms of section 118 of the constitution, the provinces have succeeded and are still succeeding in obtaining from the federal government substantial amounts for the purpose of helping them to meet obligations which, from their very nature, are strictly provincial and territorial. Such financial help, which in fact is an increased subsidy, is disguised under the euphemism of grants in aid to the provinces. That is why the provinces receive from the federal government besides the subsidies provided by the constitution and increased in 1907 through an amendment, from $85,000,000 to $100,000,000 a year to help them to meet obligations which are their own concern, such as the care of the poor, direct relief, old age pensions, road-making and public works. May I mention a few instances: For old age pensions, from April 1, 1936 to September 30, 1937, $35,825,301.75. I should point out, by the way, that the writer of the article I already quoted, who said that old age pensions are a national scheme, is evidently mistaken, for on the contrary, the federal act only makes possible a contribution of seventy-five per cent by the dominion, in order to help the provinces to meet their obligations as regards their old people.

For direct relief to unemployed, and needy farmers and fishermen, from April 1, 1936 to December 31, 1937, $42,118,173.97. For direct relief in the western drought areas, from April 1, 1936 to January 31, 1938, $13,170,645.81. Relief projects, in Quebec alone, under the agreement of November 3, 1936, amount already paid, $2,420,944.59. Under the agreement of September 11, 1937, amount to be paid, $1,668,240.84. The latter payment has not yet been made, but it is the maximum amount of the federal contribution under the agreement of September 11, 1937. For the trans-Canada highway, to help the provinces in increasing their road work, from April 1, 1936 to December 31, 1937, $3,403,942.74.

There has been some criticism of the method whereby the federal government grants to the provinces money which they spend with practically no control. It is contended that, according to the best methods of administration, the government levying the taxes ought also to do the spending and that this sort of charity beginning abroad, so to speak, is putting a premium on extravagance and on the art of passing the buck. But what can be done to avoid that unless the federal government assumes responsibility for direct relief, relief works and other social services of a similar nature, and then the provinces would object strenuously to such a violation of their autonomy and invasion of their jurisdiction. That thing has happened, as I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks.

In 1887, the provinces did not seem to have the same idea as they now have respecting the inviolability of our constitution. Indeed, in that year, a conference between the provinces was convened in Quebec city by Hon. Honoré Mercier, and all the provinces sent representatives. The dominion was also invited, but declined. A number of resolutions were passed at that conference, all having the effect of asking for changes in the constitution, and they were sponsored by the provinces themselves. The provinces seeked to have those changes passed by the imperial parliament without consulting the dominion government, but the imperial government refused to submit the question to their parliament. It is interesting to see what important changes were being aimed at by these resolutions in 1887, of which there were eighteen. Here is a list of the main points that were covered by the resolutions:

1. Abolition of the power of disallowance of provincial statutes by the federal government.

2. Granting to the provinces the right to secure prompt judicial decisions on differences between federal and provincial legislation.

3. Interdiction to private individuals to question the validity of federal or provincial statutes after two years following the enactment of said statutes.

4. Limitation of the term of office for senators and the right of a provincial government to appoint half of the number of senators representing that province in the Canadian parliament.

5. Making provincial lieutenant-governors direct representatives of the king instead of federal officials.

6. Removing from the federal government the right to withdraw from provincial jurisdiction local public works under paragraph "c", sub-section 10, section 92, of the British North America Act.

7. Using for the purposes of federal elections, voters' lists made by the provinces.

8. Granting to the provinces the right to appoint stipendiary, police and other magistrates.

9. Giving away to the provinces all fees collected in connection with legal proceedings in provincial courts.

10. Giving to lieutenant-governors the right to issue commissions for holding sessions of the criminal courts, "nisi prius", etc.

11. The right of provincial legislatures to determine the privileges of the members of the legislative council and of the legislative assembly.

12. The right of provinces to do away with legislative councils—we still have it in the province of Quebec—because two provincial chambers are not a necessity.

13. Recognition of the right of provinces to the ownership of public lands;

14. Granting to provinces the right to legislate in matters of insolvency and bankruptcy;

15. Granting to provinces the right to pardon criminals, to commute or remit sentences or to stay the execution of a sentence;

16. Adjustment of provincial boundary lines;

17. Increase of dominion grants to provinces;

18. Recognition of the right of the provinces to go directly to the imperial parliament in order to secure constitutional amendments.

As will be seen by the list I have just given, the provinces, which are now so vehement in their claim for autonomy and the sacredness of the constitution, did not hesitate in the past to attack the federal autonomy,—because the dominion must also have autonomy,—nor to ask for changes in the constitution that would have been favorable to them.

Mr. PELLETIER: Would the hon. member permit me to ask a question?

Mr. BOULANGER: With pleasure.

Mr. PELLETIER: Would the hon. member be so kind as to tell us what happened to the requests made by the provinces on that occasion?

Mr. BOULANGER: The resolutions were forwarded to the imperial government with a request for an amendment to the constitution, but the British government refused to submit them to parliament.

The moral of the story is, Mr. Speaker, that there would be more peace, harmony and understanding in Canada if we were less inclined to forget how our country was established. In order to ensure general agreement and the proper functioning of our administrative machinery, it is necessary to return to the true conception of what our fathers wanted Canada to be. It is essential to recognize frankly and honestly that there is only one government that can speak in the name of the whole nation and exercise jurisdiction in matters of national importance and general interest and that there is on this northern half of America but one sovereign state, but one country in the legal sense, but one nation. This country, one of the fathers of confederation described as follows:

> I see in the distant future a great country bordering on the blue ocean, reflecting as of yore the shield of Achilles, the western mountain summits, the white-crested billows of the east, the meandering Assiniboine, the five great lakes, the St. Lawrence, the Saguenay, the St. John river, Minas Basin. On the shores of all these waters, in all the valleys to which they bring fertility, in all the cities and towns on their course, I see a generation of industrious, happy and moral men, free in theory as in practice—men capable of safeguarding, in peace as in war, a constitution worthy of such a country.

This country it is, in all its extent, in all its entirety, in all its essence, with its history, its institutions and its aspirations, that I want to love, that I want to serve. I am proud of being a citizen of this country, in all parts of which I feel at home. And why not? The discoverers, explorers, and missionaries of my race, the settlers, the merchants, the artisans of my race have contributed to the physical development of Canada, just as in 1867 my forefathers contributed to its legal creation as a new unit among the nations of the world, and, ever since, the members of my race have continued to contribute to its national life.

Right and proper though it is to insist on provincial autonomy, one must not lose sight of federal autonomy. In other words, while the provinces are autonomous in the sphere of the powers, jurisdiction and objects assigned to them by the constitution, the federal government is autonomous in national and general matters, as I endeavoured to show a moment ago. The secret of the proper functioning of our system of government should consist in the absolute and scrupulous respect of the border line between federal and provincial jurisdiction. I attempted to show that our system of government is very simple in theory and that the distribution of powers is quite clear. I also endeavoured to point out that if in practice difficulties and conflicts arose, it was due to the fact that the original conception of confederation had been departed from. To this conception we should return. On it depends the harmony of the relations between the central and provincial governments. Otherwise, in the words of an editorial writer, Canada runs the risk of being "balkanized," that is of becoming a group of jealous and quarrelling states. It is easy to see that such a situation would hardly be conducive to the advancement and happiness of the country. No, the Dominion of Canada was not established in accordance with the definition that Lord Balfour gave of the British Commonwealth of Nations. It is not composed of self-governing nations equal to each other and in no way subordinate one to another either in domestic matters or external relations. It is a homogeneous country with a central government possessing the full powers of a national government and having subordinate governments with jurisdiction over local matters in definite territorial divisions.

Such is the conception which our fathers had of Canada. Let us return to it, and all difficulties of interpretation and conflicts of jurisdiction will vanish. Let us return especially to the spirit of 1867, to the spirit of tolerance, of frankness, of unselfishness, of understanding, of good will, of broad-mindedness that made confederation possible.

Our fathers built solidly in 1867; they built for the future. They envisioned a country great, glorious and happy, a nation vigorous, united and determined to make its mark in world history. It is up to their descendants to transform this vision into reality. It is true that the world has evolved since 1867, that conditions have changed, but it should be easier for the Canadians of to-day to pursue and consolidate the undertaking of 1867 than it was at that time to create the Dominion of Canada. The ship of state may sail on unfamiliar seas, but those who are at the helm will bring it safely into port if they take their inspiration from those who built and launched it. The union and cooperation that made confederation possible will ensure its survival. Therefore, without ceasing to love the bit of land on which we were born and where we grew up, let us shun that narrow and destructive provincialism which is the greatest of national dangers and the most formidable obstacle to the realization of Canada's destiny. Let us think and act as Canadians for the good of our country, of all our country, and our country is more than a province. In the words of Honoré Mercier, let us put an end to fratricidal strife; let us be united.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): The question raised by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) deals with one of the most important problems this country has to face. There is no country in the world so overgoverned and overtaxed as is Canada.

You may lay the blame for this if you like on the fathers of confederation, because by the British North America Act provinces were created for political and not economic purposes. In my opinion the time has come for us to have a new bill of rights under confederation, for the two industrial provinces of Ontario and Quebec. We hear a great deal about maritime rights, prairie rights, social credit rights and Pacific rights, but hardly ever do we hear any hon. members from Ontario and Quebec demanding a new deal for the two central industrial provinces. Fifty-one per cent of the people of the country are engaged in industrial pursuits, and I do not know where those two provinces will wind up—especially the municipalities. If the hon. member's motion should be adopted the governments of the provinces might as well be abolished. They should never have been created in the first place.

Under section 92 of the British North America Act, we have two municipal systems, one within the other, a ring within a ring; we have provincial governments with powers under that section, and a duplicate municipal system of cities and towns and counties, and what is the result? Overgovernment and overtaxation. The provinces give the cities and towns and rural municipalities only such powers as they see fit to give them. For instance, from 1867 to 1918 the municipalities had exclusively the field of income tax. Then, in 1918, the dominion invaded it; now the provinces have come along and taken from the municipalities one of the main sources of their income, namely the income tax.

The hon. member's motion begins:

In order to conform with the constitution—

Well, the constitution of this country seems to be more honoured in the breach than it is in the observance. Literally it is a constitution for some provinces and not for others. It would have been a sorry day for the hon. member who moved this resolution if it had been in effect when return No. 107 to an order of the house was brought down by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) last session. What was in that order? It showed that Quebec got more relief works than any other province in the dominion, in the form of schools, court-houses, public buildings of all kinds, roads, pavements—municipal pavements—built in the city of Montreal, botanical gardens, and so on; all these things were paid for by the general body of the taxpayers of Canada. I do not object to Quebec getting everything it can. I am one of those who do not believe in a sectional feeling; I believe in the principle of confederation, each for all and all for each. But Ontario and Quebec, the industrial provinces, are paying eighty per cent of the cash taxes of the dominion, and Ontario should have had similar treatment so far as municipal institutions go. This return is a most interesting one and shows that, "to the victors belong the spoils". Talk about a constitution; the facts in the return of which I have spoken show how the system works in practice.

The motion goes on to say:

—to respect the provinces' desire for autonomy—

What do the working people and farmers care about autonomy? How much do those who are out of work care about it? What do the real estate holders upon whom these heavy burdens are placed care about autonomy? You cannot feed the hungry by talking about autonomy.

The resolution continues:

—and to favour the betterment of the dominion finances.

Well, the government and hon. gentlemen opposite who support them are facing a railway deficit of forty million dollars. Who were the authors of that railway policy? The Laurier administration and the Liberal administrations which succeeded it, by establishing another transcontinental railway when one railway with a double track would have done for many years to come, branch lines off it being built by the provinces or the dominion. The result is the government have to make up a forty million dollar annual deficit. The present government announced that if they were returned to office they would tackle this problem and settle it. They have not made a move even to appoint a committee or constitute any other body to settle it. They had the Duff report, which they ignored, also the Drayton-Acworth report of 1917, on railways, for a guide.

The resolution speaks about favouring "the betterment of the dominion finances." I will tell the house how they were bettered. The dominion finances were bettered by the dominion making a raid on the municipalities and taking away the source of over fifty per cent of their income. In my opinion the income tax should be restored to the municipalities.

I was astonished at the action of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) in respect to this matter of income tax. The social credit movement in Alberta got all they asked for, namely a reference under the Supreme Court Act to the supreme court to settle the problem; but the poor old province of Ontario and the industrial provinces generally are not treated in the same way. The case of the King v. Caron decided that income tax was a direct tax and that the federal power could impose it. That case decided that the parliament of Canada has powers of direct and indirect taxation; that it can impose a system of taxation for any purpose whatsoever from the sky to the centre of the earth; that it can impose a direct tax. That case is not without certain exceptions and provisoes; and certainly there cannot be three bodies constituted in this country—the dominion, the province and the municipality—all imposing a tax on the very same class of personal property. That is not done in the case of bills of exchange, chattel mortgages, wills, succession duties and such things; yet in respect of this class of personal property a triple income tax is imposed. The question as to the power to make a second levy might very well be referred to the supreme court. The dominion comes along to a municipality and makes a raid itself for income tax; then it comes along a second time and is accessory after the fact to help the raid of the provinces as well, so that, with the provinces imposing a tax, there is a triple tax upon these poor people. On behalf of one industrial province I protest against it. I believe that the people of the cities and towns are not going to stand for it much longer. They want a share of this income tax which has been taken from them. The government has heard what the mayors think of it. Why in the name of common justice should Alberta get what Ontario cannot get—a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada on such constitutional questions? The purpose of having the supreme court is to deal with these very constitutional questions. It is no use making the privy council the goat of our constitutional system on all these constitutional questions. In my opinion a stated case should have been granted under the Supreme Court Act.

Lost, stolen or strayed, Mr. Speaker, is the federal power. Where is the federal power? Where is federal autonomy and authority, and where is Canada drifting as a result of lack of autonomy and absence of direct federal control? The federal government is not being administered in Ottawa; it is, in my opinion, administered in the capitals of the provinces. Eight Liberal governments and one quasi-Liberal government in these provincial capitals are usurping the powers of the federal authority. That was never the intention of the authors of the British North America Act. In 1935, on a similar motion I coined two phrases, one that the nine provinces were like a lot of Balkan states all quarrelling among themselves, and a second epigram that the British North America Act had the toilers of Canada in a strait-jacket. So they have. These are two economic truths.

Take the question I discussed the other day with reference to motor cars. I understand, from a letter I have received to-day from the head of one organization in the country, that he has been asked by one of the attorneys general what he thinks about our motor car regulations in Canada. I submit that what is wanted at the present time is a strong federal power if we are to solve some of the economic problems with which we are faced to-day.

Federal power, in the present state of affairs, is at its lowest ebb since confederation. Federal authority has become a door-mat for the provinces. The capital has been described as "the Washington of the north"; but the federal authority has been embarrassed by provincial governments and has been deficient in political strategy, so that with respect to sickness, unemployment insurance and many other problems it has been unable to take any effective action. And Ontario has been shackled worse than any other province inasmuch as it has been refused a stated case on income tax.

The motion which we have before us to-day deals with the question of constitutional reform. The four greatest problems facing Canada to-day, as they have faced the people of England, are constitutional, parliamentary, cabinet and law reform; but so far as this dominion is concerned, we sit still and do nothing about it. If any motion is brought forward with a view to having something definite done with respect to any of these problems, someone is sure to move the adjournment of the debate, so the motion can never be pressed to a vote. The government's policy is not only one of laissez-faire, but also one of laissez-mourir.

I do not know where this country is heading for or what is to become of our parliamentary system, with all the commissions and committees that are being appointed, and also government by order in council. This federal parliament seems to have no power. Under the British North America Act, for example, the provinces are given a cash subsidy with which to maintain provincial institutions. Do they maintain these institutions? No. I submit that this money should be earmarked for the purpose for which it is intended. The money paid out to the provinces should be definitely earmarked and the auditor general put in control to audit every dollar. What is the cash subsidy for? It is handed over to party A, that is to say the province, to be passed on to B, the municipality. Does the province pass it on for the purpose for which it is intended? Not at all. Do the provinces maintain such provincial or municipal institutions as are contemplated in the granting of the subsidy, school-houses, court-houses, gaols, hospitals, and registry offices? No. In Ontario under Sir Oliver Mowat the money was devoted to other provincial purposes. Many of these institutions are maintained by some of the provinces, but so far as Toronto and York are concerned, that is not the case. The municipalities are made to pay for all these provincial institutions towards whose upkeep Canada contributes.

The relief problem is in the same position. Some provinces receive one per diem grant; other provinces receive another greater per diem, and the whole thing is made a political football, as return No. 107 to an order of the house relating to relief works in Quebec and other provinces demonstrates.

As I say, the federal power is at its lowest ebb since confederation. The power of the House of Commons is usurped. Our powers under the British North America Act have been taken from us and handed over to useless, roving commissions. These commissions are making Cook's tours not only in Canada but in other parts of the world as well. They go to England, they travel all over Europe, and some of them wind up in the Black Sea; others go to Australia and the United States. They are fact-finding bodies that do nothing, and by the time we get the report of the present economic commission that is making a study of the British North America Act we shall have had an election. These useless, roving, terrestrial bodies do nothing but gather clouds of facts and are purely advisory, appointed to kill time and save the government from facing the facts.

Take the coal commission. What did that commission investigate? We have not heard from it one word about a national coal supply; we have heard nothing of the suffering of the ordinary man, the consumer. All the reports of these commissions when tabled are nothing but a modern tower of Babel in advice; for there is nothing but confusion and nothing practical to be found in them. We have a Liberal government here in Ottawa and Liberal governments throughout the provinces; but what have we had or what are we likely to get in the way of constitutional reform? My right hon. leader (Mr. Bennett) is absolutely correct in what he has said, and the time will come when they will have to follow his advice. The fact is that he was so far in advance of public opinion on this question, so far in advance of it as to have been the standard bearer; and I do not hesitate to say that he is the truest, ablest, most faithful and most courageous public man I have ever served under—and I have served under a great many. In my humble opinion, notwithstanding the way in which he was attacked because of the statement he made about the Rowell commission, he was absolutely correct in what he said, not only in his facts but in his law, and his policy for a round-table conference. No practical results have flowed from that commission, and none will in the end.

And what does the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) do? Last session, referring to the social legislation of the previous administration, he described it at Pembroke as "counterfeit legislation." He said it was "counterfeit legislation." That may be his opinion, but what does the Canadian Liberal Monthly say? I quote:

> The Bennett social reform legislation has effectively tied the hands of the present government for well over a year, and has prevented the administration from exploring certain avenues of valid and constitutional social reform.

Will the present government tell us who has tied their hands? They have been in power nearly three years, and if the measures put through by the previous administration were, as charged, "ill-considered, hastily drafted and condemned with the stigma of unconstitutionality," hon. gentlemen opposite must have known that those measures were unconstitutional when they were being enacted. Why did they not have measures of their own to propose? Return No. 107 proves that the constitution has been violated by these 450 votes I have indicated.

The other day a question came up with reference to the exemption of certain properties in connection with an agreement to which the dominion government is a party in Ottawa. Fire protection, water, police protection and other matters of that sort entered into the discussion. The British North America Act, the Municipal and Assessment acts, provide that crown property shall be entitled to exemption, and yet the government pays over a large sum of money to one municipality for fire, water and police protection. Well, what goes for one municipality should go for others, and other places should be paid for services the very same given federal property elsewhere.

Take another act in respect of which we find an invasion of federal rights—the Combines Investigation Act. That has been the star piece of political vaudeville during the past session. I intimated to the Minister of Labour that I had received a number of letters from housewives in regard to the prices of certain commodities. But what does he care about prices of butter, tea, bread, coal, or anything else? He appointed the Tory commission to investigate the coal situation, and they forgot to mention the consumer. There was not one word about a national coal supply. The hon. gentleman refers to my leader's legislation as "counterfeit legislation," but what about the Combines Investigation Act? The government has removed from the control of the law courts and grand juries the regulation of trusts and combines in restraint of trade. These combines are flourishing in Canada like a green bay tree; they are unmolested by the government of the day; the control over them has been taken from the courts and handed over to a useless body under an official known as the registrar of combines. When I presented the twenty-six letters from housewives in Toronto, I was told that I would have to see some gentleman named Mr. McGregor, Registrar of Combines, and after seeing him I would have to get in touch with the housewives; in other words I would have to pass the buck. Then I would have to draw up twenty-six different affidavits and then present them to the head of the department, and he in turn would communicate with his lord high commissioner, the Lord McGregor, who presides over the combines investigation department, and direct him to take train to Toronto to find out whether a combine existed. It is taking the matter out of the control of the criminal code altogether, and giving it to a nobody commission. Yet they talk about breaking the constitution and autonomy.

There are certain features of this motion which would make it a sorry day for the municipalities if the motion were passed. These relate to federal taxation and revenue. Under our constitution the federal government has unlimited sources of taxation, both direct and indirect, for any purposes whatever. Under the first clause of section 91 of the British North America Act, "public debt and property," the federal government makes many grants to the provinces. For example, it was under that that old age pensions, sickness and unemployment insurance, technical education, health and other matters were handed over to the provinces. And under that section there has been discrimination; some places happen to build an airport; others do not. Ontario seems to be an unfortunate province; at one time it was said that not a five cent piece would be given to Ontario. The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) will remember that. We would not get one cent if the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) and his combines commission had anything to say. What we need in this country is a Pym, a Hampden, an Eliot, to rise up and say, "We will not pay any of these taxes"; we will let the law courts say what the law is.

Another matter is the question of provincial subsidies and relief grants. Why are these not earmarked and under the control of someone or some federal officer? Why should they spend this money like water any way they like, millions of dollars handed over to the provinces? Then in addition they come along and impose an indirect tax on the municipalities for the same purposes, or deduct sums for expenses. The provinces in order to maintain revenue impose direct taxation, and take away the income tax from the municipalities. The British North America Act has the workers and the toilers of this country in a strait-jacket. What is to become of the municipalities; what is to become of the holders of real estate? Real estate is being confiscated, homes taken away. Such a policy has killed the construction and building industry on which hundreds of thousands of workers depend for their livelihood, and has starved municipal revenues.

If property owners are to be saved something must be done, and done right away. Real estate should be relieved of many of these burdens.

We want a British North America Act for the living, not for the dead. The original framers of the act were no experts; they were only ordinary laymen; they did not intend that the act they drew should be like the laws of the Medes and Persians; it was intended that it should be adaptable to existing conditions. Confederation now is at the cross-roads, the parting of the ways. The very fate of confederation is involved. This relic of antiquity, the British North America Act, is responsible for the failure of Canada to settle the economic problems referred to in the motion of the hon. member. If the motion should pass, what would become of education in the province of Quebec? I have here a statistical summary of the Bank of Canada, dated May, 1937. It deals with one feature in which I think the hon. member will be interested, namely, public support of education. It shows by provinces the grants by the dominion and the contributions from local taxation and the provinces to publicly controlled schools. In 1915, for all the provinces the proportion from dominion government grants was 1·9 per cent. And that has since been withdrawn, being for technical education. In the same year the proportion from the provinces was 12·3 per cent and that raised by local taxation, 85·8 per cent. Figures are given for 1920, 1925, 1930 and 1935, the proportions raised by local taxation in those years being 87·8, 86·4, 85·6 and 86·5 per cent respectively. In 1935 the grants from the dominion represented only one-tenth of one per cent as shown in Bank of Canada statistical summary, "public finance: education—government support of publicly controlled schools." I had proposed a system of scholarships long before the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) came to the house, from 1923 to 1930, and as reported at page 329 of Hansard of 1935, pointing out that something should be done to provide university national scholarships not only in medicine but in physics and chemistry, mining, scientific research, transportation and economics.

This constitutional question is not going to be solved by majorities in parliament or by parliamentary repartee. It is a problem calling for broad national sacrifice. The remedy for this taxation problem must be far-reaching and uncompromising, as much so as the application of conscription during the war. We have a war in Canada in this constitutional question, with tens of thousands of our citizens on relief. Unemployment has its dangers. We are united when there is an enemy at the gate, but facing these internal problems we are divided. These economic problems are our internal foes. The policy of the present government seems to be a policy of laissez-faire; do nothing at all; laissez-mourir; let them die a natural death; let them starve. In my opinion the motion should have included a vote of the people, on constitutional reform to abolish provincial legislation. There should be a vote of the people, giving them opportunity to express what they think about this government and overtaxation; there should be a referendum taken at the next general election. It would be a guide to the mother of parliaments in dealing with amendments to the British North America Act.

The province of Quebec has my sympathy; Quebec and Ontario are the two old industrial provinces, and to-day they are suffering together; they pay eighty per cent of the cash taxes of all Canada. I express my deep regret to the people of the prairies for the difficulties they are undergoing; but the poor farmers and industrial workers in Ontario and Quebec, as you probably know better than I do, Mr. Speaker, are suffering just as severely and are under just as great a strain as the people of the prairies. This is the third or fourth motion this session relating to reform, but we should have a select committee of the house appointed as soon as possible next session, representative of all parties, to take up the problem of constitutional, parliamentary, cabinet and law reform.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, as I see it this resolution raises again the oft-recurring question of jurisdictional legislation. I believe the time is long past when this vexatious question should have been settled once and for all. Progress in the much needed social legislation, initiated either by the provincial legislatures or by the dominion parliament, is constantly blocked by this question. Are we going to permit the people of this great and wealthy country to perish while the courts are busy deciding questions of jurisdiction, or are we going to set ourselves to the task of so arranging matters that the cause of these disputes will be eliminated?

I wish to suggest what I think should be done to overcome the great obstacle, and I wish to do so in as unpartisan a manner as possible, since this is a matter which far transcends any political issue, a matter which confronts every citizen of Canada regardless of his political ideas or affiliations. With the one exception of money I doubt if there is any question in connection with which there is more confused thinking than as to the constitutional position which we occupy to-day. In my opinion the people of Canada are accepting a position which I do not think should be tolerated in a country calling itself civilized and democratic. We proudly proclaim that we are a sovereign nation, yet we admit that we must proceed to another country to have our constitution amended. We boast of ourselves as free Canadians, yet our census makes no provision for the enumeration of Canadians. We claim that we are a union of sovereign, self-governing peoples, yet we have no distinctive Canadian emblem to symbolize that position.

There is an explanation for these apparent anomalies, and I intend to avail myself of every opportunity to place before the house information which I believe casts light on this subject. I wish to discuss the statements contained in the preamble to the resolution we are at present considering, in order to indicate what I consider our constitutional position to be and what I think should be done to end once and for all this exceedingly vexatious question of jurisdictional legislation.

The mover of the resolution (Mr. Boulanger) in using the term "federal government" in connection with the constitution, no doubt implies that the British North America Act is a federal constitution; that Canada is a federal union and that this is a federal government. That is the hon. member's opinion, and I wish to take issue with him on all three points. On a previous occasion in this house I showed, I believe with sufficient evidence, that although it was the desire of John A. Macdonald and the other fathers of proposed confederation that the British North America Act should become a federal constitution, actually it did not. It became merely an imperial statute which joined the provinces into a united colony called a dominion, and not a federal union. It also made provision for a central government, but it did not become a federal government; it became a dominion government.

I feel that the use of the term "federal" in referring to this government is deplorable. We do not find the word "federal" in any of our statute books; it is always "dominion." I believe any one who carefully examines the history of this country will find absolutely no historical foundation for calling Canada a federal union or this government a federal government. I do not wish to repeat the arguments which I put forth on a previous occasion in this house. Hon. members who are sufficiently interested can refer to the address which I delivered on February 10, but at this juncture I might just repeat the nature of a proper federal union. As I see it a federal union is a union of sovereign states, mutually adopting a constitution. The status of sovereignty must precede confederation or federation. The confederation or federation can be consummated only by formulating an agreement in the nature of a constitution, which is and must be eventually ratified by the electors composing the union, and I do not think it requires very much investigation or examination of historical evidence to discover that no such thing has ever been done in this dominion.

I may be over-optimistic, Mr. Speaker, but I am hoping in the near future to see a new constitution created for Canada. I believe we should become prepared for it, and I believe the people of Canada should be made alive to the issue. I have become intensely interested in this subject, and have done a considerable amount of reading on it. I made quite a study of the history of the Australian constitution, and if the house will permit me to do so I should like to place on Hansard a brief summary of the manner in which the Australian people constructed their federal constitution. The information I have has been obtained from a book which I found very enlightening, dealing as it does with the whole history of the constitution in Australia. The book is entitled The Annotated Constitution of the Australian Commonwealth, by John Quick, LL.D. and Robert Randolph Garran, M.A., and I found it an illuminating and fascinating book, in which the whole question is dealt with in the most minute detail.

In placing this on Hansard I wish to show the extremely democratic method employed by the people of Australia in creating their constitution. Although for quite a number of years previously the colonies of Australia had been negotiating in an attempt to bring about a union, no really definite action was taken until January 29, 1895, when a premiers' conference was called at Hobart, at which conference certain resolutions were adopted. I wish to read this because I believe the first step in creating a new constitution for Canada would be similar action to that taken by the Australian colonies. The resolutions were as follows:

1. That this conference regards federation as the great and pressing question of Australasian politics.

2. That a convention consisting of ten representatives from each colony, directly chosen by the electors, be charged with the duty of framing a federal constitution.

3. That the constitution so framed be submitted to the electors for acceptance or rejection by a direct vote.

4. That such constitution, if accepted by the electors of three or more colonies, be transmitted to the queen by an address from the parliaments of those colonies praying for the necessary legislative enactment.

5. That a bill be submitted to the parliament of each colony for the purpose of giving effect to the foregoing resolutions.

6. That Messrs. Turner and Kingston be requested to prepare a draft bill for the consideration of this conference.

Those were the resolutions adopted by the premiers' conference, the first really definite step in the creation of a federal constitution for the Australian commonwealth. The authors make this comment:

The draft bill was considered, amended and agreed to as the draft of a type of bill suitable for giving effect to the resolutions of the conference.

The draft bill provided that the convention, after framing a draft constitution, should adjourn for a period of not less than thirty and not more than sixty days.

This made it possible for the various governments to register their objections.

The merits of this scheme were obvious and notable. It avoided all the great defects of the process of 1891. It secured popular interest, by providing that the members of the convention should be elected by the people themselves, and that the constitution should be submitted to the people themselves for acceptance. It conciliated the parliaments by giving them a voice in initiating the process, a voice in criticizing the constitution, before its completion, and a voice in requesting the enactment of the constitution after acceptance. In other words, whilst necessarily assigning to a single body, representative of all the colonies, the task of framing the constitution in the first instance, and finally revising it, it ensured that both the peoples and the parliaments of the several colonies should be consulted at every stage—in initiation, in deliberation and in adoption. And lastly by making statutory provision in advance for every step of the process, it ensured that the matter once begun should be brought to an issue. No fuller security could have been given that the constitution would be based upon the will of the people and of the people's representatives.

The next step in the creation of the constitution was the Bathurst convention of November, 1896. This was known as the Peoples' Federal Convention, and was a convention of two hundred representatives of the various colonies of Australia. The authors state:

Its chief benefit was that it dissipated the atmosphere of suspicion in the minds of a section of the people with regard to the commonwealth bill.

Following this were the convention elections. Elections were held, and the number of candidates which entered the field indicates the enthusiastic manner in which the people constructed their constitution. In the colony of Victoria there were twenty-nine candidates in the field, only ten of whom were to be elected. In South Australia there were thirty-three candidates, and only ten to be elected. In Tasmania there were thirty-two, of whom only ten were to be elected.

The next step was the Adelaide convention held on March 22, 1897. At this convention three committees were set up, the first of which was for the consideration of constitutional machinery and the distribution of functions and powers, and was to consist of four members from each delegation. The two remaining committees were set up to deal with other matters. Following this the legislatures of each of the colonies considered the draft constitution, and suggested amendments which they deemed wise.

The next step was the Sydney session of the convention, held on September 2, 1897. The authors make this comment:

This convention was called to reconsider the draft constitution together with amendments suggested by legislatures. On September 9 a resolution moved not to conclude work until Queensland was represented. Resolution was carried. 286 amendments were considered. Due to shortness of time four main resolutions were considered.

This conference adjourned on September 24 until the final session, which was held in Melbourne on January 20, 1898. It would appear, then, that the next step in the construction of their federal constitution was the Melbourne session of 1898. This was the last and most important, extending from January 20 to March 17. On the last day Mr. Barton made a motion inviting the premiers of all the colonies to supply copies of the draft constitution to the electors. Mr. Kingston, in putting this motion from the chair, made the following enlightening statement which I should like to place on Hansard:

It seems to me that this is not the time when one should stand trembling on the brink of a distinct declaration as to future policy in connection with this great movement. I can but speak for myself alone; but in regard to this constitution I say unhesitatingly that I accept it gladly. More, I welcome it as the most magnificent constitution into which the chosen representatives of a free and enlightened people have ever breathed the life of popular sentiment and national hope. Mine will be no Laodicean advocacy; but with such ability as I may possess, and with the fullest enthusiasm and warmth of which my nature may be capable, with my whole heart and strength I pledge myself to recommend the adoption of this constitution, daring any danger and delighting in any sacrifice which may be necessitated by unswerving devotion to the interests of the commonwealth of Australia.

I think those remarks indicate the highly democratic principles that were followed from beginning to end in the creation of the Australian federal constitution.

The next step we find is the referendum on the draft constitution, taken in 1898. The authors make this comment on the first referendum:

In accordance with the requirements of the enabling acts, the draft constitution was forwarded to the governors of the several colonies by the president of the convention and by the representatives. From the rising of the convention an interval of eleven weeks elapsed before the popular vote was taken in four colonies, an event which in New South Wales, Victoria and Tasmania, was fixed for Friday, June 3, and South Australia for June 4. Western Australia alone took no action, but awaited the result of the vote in the other colonies. In the colonies in which the vote was to be taken copies of the draft constitution were freely distributed to the electors. In New South Wales and Tasmania the constitution was accompanied by an official explanation prepared by R. R. Garran; in Victoria the Melbourne Argus published an unofficial statement by Doctor Quick; and in South Australia a summary of its provisions was circulated by the government.

The campaign for and against the constitution began promptly and was vigorously conducted by the newspaper press, the federal representatives of each colony and prominent politicians of all parties.

I have here the results of the first referendum. I shall not give the figures in detail but they indicate that the majority in favour of the constitution at its first draft was 111,349.

On January 29, 1899, all six premiers met in conference again and arrived at a unanimous agreement. A second referendum was held, so that the people of Australia had the opportunity of voting on their constitution on two occasions; and it is interesting to note the difference in the size of the majority in favour of the constitution. On the second referendum the majority in favour of the constitution more than doubled, being 236,602.

Mr. STIRLING: How many voted?

Mr. KUHL: Here are the totals: Total number of people voting yes, in favour of the constitution, 377,988; total voting no, 141,386. The authors make this interesting comment on the situation:

These figures are a striking proof of the extent and sincerity of the national sentiment throughout the whole of eastern Australia; and they are also a unique testimony to the high political capacity of the Australian people. Never before have a group of self-governing practically independent communities, without external pressure or foreign complications of any kind, deliberately chosen of their own free will to put aside their provincial jealousies and come together as one people, from a simple intellectual and sentimental conviction of the folly of disunion and the advantages of nationhood. The states of America, of Switzerland and of Germany were drawn together under the shadow of war. Even the Canadian provinces were forced to unite by the neighbourhood of a great foreign power. But the commonwealth of Australia, the fifth great federation of the world, came into voluntary being through a deep conviction of national unity. We may well be proud of the statesmen who constructed a constitution which, whatever may be its faults and its shortcomings, has proved acceptable to a large majority of the people of the five great communities scattered over a continent, and proud of a people who, without the compulsion of war or the fear of conquest, have succeeded in agreeing upon the terms of a binding and indissoluble social compact.

Again I wish to remark that such comments indicate the highly democratic nature of the method by which the people of Australia constructed their constitution.

The final act was the conference of the premiers in 1900, from January 24 to January 27. This conference arranged for a delegation from the states to be present at Westminster when the bill was passing through the imperial parliament. On July 9 the queen gave royal assent to the measure, and on September 17, 1900, the queen signed a proclamation declaring that on and after the first of January, 1901, the people of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Tasmania and Western Australia should be united into a federal commonwealth under the name of the Commonwealth of Australia.

There is one more paragraph I should like to place on Hansard. The authors of this book discuss the constitution clause by clause, and there is an interesting comment at the words "have agreed." This is what they say:

These words make distinct and emphatic reference to the consensus of the people, arrived at through the procedure, in its various successive stages, prescribed by the substantially similar enabling acts adopted by the legislatures of the concurring colonies. In four of the colonies acts were passed enabling the people to take part in the framing and acceptance or rejection of a federal constitution for Australia. Through those acts the people agreed, first, to send representatives to a federal convention charged with the duty of framing for Australia a federal constitution under the crown in the form of a bill for enactment by the imperial parliament; and, secondly, they agreed to pronounce their judgment upon the constitution at a referendum, which in each colony was arranged to follow the convention. In all the colonies the constitution was eventually referred to the people. At this referendum each voter was enabled to vote by ballot "Yes" or "No" on the question asked in the ballot paper, "Are you in favour of the proposed federal constitution?" In this manner there was in four colonies a popular initiative and finally in all the colonies a popular ratification of the constitution, which is thus legally the work, as it will be for all time the heritage, of the Australian people. This democratic method of establishing a new form of government may be contrasted with the circumstances and conditions under which other federal constitutions became law.

My suggestion, therefore, to settle once for all these jurisdictional disputes is that the provinces of Canada be called together in a constituent assembly for the purpose of drafting a new constitution, to be finally ratified by the Canadian people. The question as I have tried to put it to the house was very simply summed up by Doctor Beauchesne in the evidence he gave before the special committee on the British North America Act in 1935. I should like to quote Doctor Beauchesne because I think he sums up the whole situation exceedingly well. His evidence will be found at page 125 of the report of proceedings:

When the British North America Act was passed, the population of the four provinces which formed the Dominion of Canada aggregated 3,070,601, or less than the present population of Ontario or Quebec. The total revenue of the dominion in 1868 was $13,687,928, and the total expenditure $14,071,689. The net debt of the country was $75,757,135. Our railway mileage was 2,278. Motor vehicles were not known; aviation was a dream. The west was uninhabited except by Indians, half-breeds, fur dealers and roaming buffaloes. The population of British Columbia was very small since it was put down in 1871 to 45,000, of which number only about 9,000 were whites. Prince Edward Island had a population in 1861 of 80,857.

The act was passed mainly as a compromise because the legislature was so deadlocked that nobody could form a government. We were then a colony with a governor who still received elaborate instructions from the colonial office. There was no question of our representation in foreign countries; we were not even allowed to negotiate our own treaties; there were British garrisons in our country; social reform was looked upon as the last word of dangerous radicalism.

We have since progressed very materially; our industries have been multiplied; our urban population has exceeded our rural population; the war and its dire consequences have appeared; imperial conferences have taken place; the British commonwealth of nations has been formed; the statute of Westminster has altered our status. Most of the provinces have lived beyond their means, but they have let up on the autonomy principle in later years. Nobody will doubt that economic legislation in Canada is more difficult of introduction than in any other country in the world, on account of our dual system of government. The time has come, in my humble opinion, when the British North America Act, except as to minority rights, should be transformed and a new constitution more in conformity with present conditions should be adopted. Amendments here and there would be mere patchwork which could not last. The people of 1867 are different from those of 1867. What we want is a new constitution.

All let or hindrance to the creation of a federal union under the crown, as requested by Canada in the Quebec resolutions, has been removed. We can emulate Australia and follow the leadership of and bring to fruition the vision of the first prime minister of Canada, Sir John A. Macdonald, by constructing a constitution and creating a federal union. This I believe to be the only method of dealing with the questions raised by a resolution such as this. I see no other way out, and I believe sooner or later the people of this country must become reconciled to that fact.

So far as the resolution itself is concerned, in my opinion such action as would arise out of the adoption of the resolution would be entirely inadequate to begin to solve our present problem; consequently I am opposed to it from this point of view. So long as the provinces of Canada are compelled to accept the present constitutional position and division of powers, with the central government having complete jurisdiction over the question of money, I feel that the central government must accept the responsibility of seeing that there is sufficient money in the country to make financially possible what is physically possible.

On these grounds, Mr. Speaker, I must oppose the resolution.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): As the discussion has gone somewhat far afield, I think it might be useful if I reminded the house of the terms of the resolution actually before us. I do this with no disrespect to my hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. Kuhl), but simply in order that we may understand quite definitely the proposal under consideration.

The motion is expressed in the following terms:

That, in the opinion of this house, in order to conform with the constitution, to respect the provinces' desire for autonomy and to favour the betterment of the dominion finances, the federal government should cease making financial contributions towards the execution of projects which are entirely within the jurisdiction of said provinces.

I am sure the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) will forgive me if I do not take up in detail the several arguments he has advanced in support of the resolution. Perhaps I may plead my limited knowledge of French as a partial excuse for any failure on this account. I do know that he dealt in a very forceful and competent manner with certain references to autonomy which have been made in recent months in a number of our provinces.

Apart entirely from the merits of the specific proposal contained in the resolution,

I believe the hon. member for Bellechasse has done a real service in bringing before us at this time the wider implications of the policy of federal grants in aid to assist provincial governments in the discharge of their constitutional obligations. I propose to deal in a few moments with some of these wider implications of the resolution, because I believe it is of vital importance that we should understand some of the consequences of certain policies which have been followed by successive dominion governments during the past twenty-five years.

Perhaps I should say at once that the resolution in its present form is not one that can be accepted, and I hope that the hon. member for Bellechasse will see fit to withdraw it at the close of the debate, after a number of other members of this house have spoken to it.

It is proposed that the dominion government should cease making financial contributions toward the execution of projects which are entirely under the jurisdiction of the provinces. It will be agreed, I think, that there is no material distinction in principle between grants in aid for projects of the nature of public works—highways and bridges —and grants for projects of the nature of social services. In its strict interpretation the term "projects" might be confined to public works and undertakings, but in its broad interpretation it would certainly include social services within provincial jurisdiction, including old age pensions, pensions to the blind, certain public health services, and the provision of relief to those who are physically disabled and unemployable. So far as these services are concerned it is clear, I think, that the dominion government could not withdraw its financial assistance to the provinces at this time without a very serious dislocation of existing arrangement for social assistance. I have no doubt, however, that this whole question—and it is one of the most important questions of our time—will receive very careful study during the investigation which is now being conducted by the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations.

The mover of the resolution did not refer at great length to public works projects in the provinces which in recent years had been assisted by financial contributions from the federal treasury in order to afford relief from unemployment. At the same time it is within the knowledge of all members of the house that there has been some opposition to this policy as it has been followed by the dominion government since 1930. I am not going to attempt to deal in detail with the various features of the policy under which the dominion government is giving financial assistance to the provinces for public works. It began, as I have said, in 1930, and has continued without interruption up to the present time. Very large sums of money have been granted by the dominion government for this purpose. As a result, undoubtedly, there has been a decided gain in what might be termed the social capital of the nation. Highways have been built which without that assistance might not have been constructed. Assistance has been given to public works, playgrounds and recreational facilities in various provinces. Developmental roads have been constructed into mining areas, and unquestionably, through the assistance thus given by the dominion government, there has been a stimulus to the tourist trade of our country.

When all this has been acknowledged, I think it must also be admitted that as unemployment projects these public works have had a limited value. When this administration came into office we found that this policy of giving assistance for the construction of highways in particular had been followed in previous years and we felt that it should be continued at least for some time. In our agreements with the provinces, however, we did make a stipulation that those employed upon these public works projects should be taken as far as possible from relief rolls. We did not insist that all so employed should be taken from the relief rolls. We realized fully that there were many deserving people in necessitous circumstances who had kept off relief rolls and that full consideration ought to be given to this group of the unemployed. We required, therefore, that fifty per cent of those employed upon these public works projects should be taken from relief rolls. I am in a position to tell the house that on the whole that stipulation has been observed in the various provinces, and certainly municipalities adjoining such works have received a measure of benefit by reason of the fact that a considerable number of heads of families and individuals previously on relief have been given employment through these joint projects.

The necessity for works of this kind depends, of course, upon unemployment conditions. As these conditions have improved from year to year we have felt justified in reducing this form of assistance to the provinces. During our first year of office the sum set apart for this purpose, that is, for assisting the provinces in such works, was $14,895,574. I may say that the new amount voted was some $10,000,000. The remainder was a revote for works uncompleted in the program of the previous year. In the last fiscal year the sum was $7,331,000. Here the new amount voted was $5,500,000, the remainder being revoted from works uncompleted in the previous year. It will be seen that in this assistance which we have given the provinces we have followed very carefully the improvement in employment conditions, and while these works were designated as relief works we have gone as far as we felt we reasonably could in ensuring that those employed upon them should be taken from relief rolls.

I suggested at the beginning, however, that the resolution goes much beyond the question whether the dominion government should assist the provinces in the construction of highway projects and public works for the relief of unemployment. The resolution directs attention to the general policy of federal assistance to the provinces, which is of very great constitutional importance, and I know that the mover in what he has said this afternoon has realized full well that by the adoption of the policy of grants in aid to the provinces we have probably retarded the adoption of a suitable method of amending our constitution. Not only that, but almost unconsciously we have entered upon a broadening field of dual responsibility with the provinces in relation particularly to social services; and I would say to the house, out of the experience I have had in the past two years, that I know of no more difficult administrative system than that of dual responsibility in relation to social services. Hardly a day passes, when, through correspondence or delegations, this government is not asked to contribute to particular projects for the relief of unemployment. These projects present a most bewildering variety. The federal government is asked to contribute to municipal waterworks, sewage disposal plants, sidewalks, recreational centres, community halls, and many other projects of this kind. Indeed, if we consented to make expenditures for these various purposes it is not too much to say that responsibilities which ever since confederation have been regarded as belonging exclusively to the municipalities and provinces would be placed largely upon the federal government.

Mr. LAWSON: Would the minister care to make a statement from his experience as to the advisability of these social services being national in their aspect, assuming that funds were available to carry them on as a national effort?

Mr. ROGERS: I am not prepared to say that all these social services should be placed on a national basis. There are some that by reason of their character certainly ought to be on a national foundation. I refer particularly to unemployment insurance. As my hon. friend is aware, health insurance is regarded by some provinces as being properly the function of the provincial governments, and so with mothers' allowances and workmen's compensation. My thought would rather be this, that, whatever we do in connection with this great question of social services, we should try to define our responsibilities. We should try to escape from this blind alley of dual responsibility, because as long as dual responsibility continues you are going to have misunderstanding and friction between the dominion and the various provinces that are concerned in the discharge of that dual responsibility. I see no possible way of avoiding it. Not only that, but once our responsibilities are clearly defined, this federal government cannot be charged with seeking to evade its proper obligations. There have been many charges in recent years, possibly some of them justified, that this government and other governments have sought to evade their proper responsibilities by shifting them to other governmental agencies. That has not been a good thing for government in this country, because unquestionably it has created in the minds of many people the thought that governments were not taking their duties seriously, and were only too glad to find some excuse for avoiding them. That has not been the case generally speaking; in saying that I speak not only for this administration but for other administrations which have been charged with responsibility for national affairs.

I am sorry the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) is not in his seat—and I do not say this in criticism of him, because he is very constant in his attendance in this house. But the other day, speaking on a resolution which dealt with a very important social service, he said he assumed that in due course, after the discussion had gone on for a little while, some minister of the crown would rise in his place and plead that nothing could be done because of the question of jurisdiction. Mr. Speaker, it would be a sorry day for government in this country if it became a matter of reproach that a minister of the crown should seek to uphold the constitution. I do not suggest that there should be any evasion of responsibility, but equally I believe most strongly that we should be willing to observe the lines of demarcation which can properly be drawn between federal and provincial obligations.

May I say this, that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and those who from time to time charge this government with avoiding its responsibilities because of the question of jurisdiction are at the same time impressing us with the importance of adopting a suitable procedure for constitutional amendment. I should like to argue the point —I could do it with strong conviction—that nothing has done more in recent years to prevent the adoption of a suitable procedure of constitutional amendment than the submission of the federal government to the financial demands of the provinces. I am not wholly blaming the provinces in this matter, because they too have been faced with serious difficulties. But our progress in the direction of constitutional amendment has been retarded by our submission to pressure to assume added financial responsibilities without at the same time acquiring administrative power. Time and again that has happened. One need only glance at the order paper to-day to see several resolutions which propose a continuance of that policy, a policy under which, for example, this dominion parliament would make further grants in aid to provinces to assist them in the discharge of their proper constitutional obligations.

Sooner or later, and I trust after the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations has made its fact-finding report, this government and the country at large will have full information as to what might properly be the dividing line between federal and provincial jurisdiction with respect to these vital questions. I think it must be the wish of every hon. member of this house that this inquiry will succeed in its object, and that it will be possible upon the basis of the information thus obtained to secure the amendment of our constitution, and as far as possible escape from this practice of dealing with social services upon a basis of dual responsibility.

I should like to place briefly before the house the train of events which has led to the present situation. The hon. member for Bellechasse has dealt with the financial arrangements that were made at confederation. At that time, as he well knows, there was no assumption on the part of even the most enlightened statesmen that governments would be called upon to assume social responsibilities which then were supposed to attach to families or to individuals. There certainly was no thought that provinces would be faced with the necessity of laying out millions of dollars upon hard-surfaced highways. I suppose it was hardly within the mind of any at that time that people would have the means of travelling by motor car over such highways extending ultimately across the whole of Canada. Naturally the arrangements made at confederation were subject to the limitations of the thought and vision of those who lived in that day.

I find that the total expenditures of the Dominion of Canada in 1869 amounted to $14,000,000. Out of that total some $2,600,000 was paid in subsidies to the provinces. The provinces at that time felt that with the subsidies and with what they were raising by direct taxation they would be fully equipped to meet any demands that might be made upon them. Certainly there is nothing in the debates of the confederation period to suggest that in the opinion of the provincial governments there was likely to be any rapid and large increase in their own expenditure.

That financial settlement at confederation was designed to be permanent, yet it was altered only two years after the British North America Act came into operation. In 1869 the province of Nova Scotia made its first appeal for better terms. At that time there was strong agitation for repeal in Nova Scotia, and the government of the day felt that it was in the interests of the country that the appeal of Nova Scotia should be recognized and that the province should receive further financial assistance. But I should like to call the attention of the house to this fact, that the assistance given to Nova Scotia, which was the first alteration in the financial arrangements of confederation, was carried out simply by a statute of this parliament, not by an amendment of the British North America Act. Edward Blake in Ontario protested strongly against this course of action being followed. A resolution was passed by the Ontario legislature suggesting that in this important matter, which after all involved a disturbance of the financial arrangements of confederation, there should be a proceeding by way of constitutional amendment. That protest was referred to the law officers of the crown in Great Britain, and the federal government of that day, under Sir John A. Macdonald, was advised that this parliament had entire control over the disposition of its own revenues. Thereafter parliament and successive dominion governments have been in the position to make arrangements with any single province in this country to relieve grievances, in connection with dominion-provincial financial affairs, and to do so without at the same time attempting anything in the nature of a general settlement with other provinces. I think it is not too much to say that this decision, based as it was on the report of the law officers of the crown in 1869, was a fateful decision in Canadian history. Certainly it served to open the door to the kind of financial improvisations which have done more to disturb and aggravate dominion-provincial relations in this country than any other single cause. From that time to the present day there have been no less than twenty-six rearrangements of general subsidies in this country. There has been only one settlement which applied to all provinces. That was in 1907, and the settlement of that day was based very largely upon recommendations made twenty years before by the interprovincial conference held in the city of Quebec. That settlement of 1907 was assumed originally to be final and unalterable, an assumption based upon the fallacy that it is within the power of any group of men to predict with confidence what new burdens shall fall upon governments in future years. The words "final and unalterable" were omitted from the enacting sections of the constitutional amendment. The revision of 1907 was only in force five years before it was altered in favour of the province of Prince Edward Island.

Some few years ago I had occasion to make an extensive study of the structure of dominion-provincial finance, and I can say to this house that one who makes such a study of the development of the financial relations between the dominion and the provinces cannot escape the conclusion that the arrangement as it now subsists conforms to no logical and intelligible principle. The review of these financial relations now being undertaken by the Rowell commission, the first general review of such dimensions in the history of our country, ought to have been made many years ago. Certainly had that been done, in particular in the period immediately following the great war, I believe we could have avoided many practices which have tended to aggravate our difficulties in recent years.

So much for general subsidies as a feature of dominion-provincial finance. I turn now to another development which has taken place particularly in the post-war period, but which was begun in 1913. As I have said, it was impossible to predict at confederation what new burdens would be placed upon governments, whether those governments were national or provincial. As time went on there developed in the provinces demands for services of an educational nature which were far beyond the thought of anyone at the time of confederation. In 1913, because of the financial need of the provinces, and certainly upon the assumption that the provinces themselves could not finance this service, this parliament granted assistance for agricultural instruction. Following the war we had a whole series of statutes under which this parliament gave grants in aid to the provinces for the construction of highways, for technical education, for employment offices, for combating venereal disease, for better housing, for old age pensions; and more recently—and I do not question for a moment the necessity here—the dominion government came to the aid of the provinces in connection with the emergency which developed out of the serious depression which began in 1930. But in all these grants in aid to the provinces there was, so to speak, an attempt made to superimpose an extra-constitutional structure of social services and grants in aid, upon the financial arrangements and distribution of powers made at confederation. We have, not all at once, not even consciously, but step by step, departed from the original arrangements of confederation, and without constitutional amendment have built up a structure of social services very largely upon a system of grants in aid to the provinces.

That, Mr. Speaker, brings me to the point with which I was dealing at the outset. I fully agree with the hon. member for Bellechasse that this indirect means of meeting a constitutional difficulty is not the best method of meeting the situation. It has had several results, and I think we should keep these results in mind, particularly when we are thinking in terms of improving or renovating our constitution. First, it has broken down the fences which divided federal and provincial responsibility for public works and social services. I doubt if that point needs any elaboration in this house. Secondly, it has exposed the federal government to charges of evasion or parsimony whenever it has refused financial assistance to projects and services which the constitution has placed within the provincial jurisdiction. Here, too, our experience affords ample confirmation of the truth of the assertion. Time and again this and other federal administrations, which after all have their own definite and enlarging responsibilities under the constitution, have been asked to assume financial responsibilities which belong properly to the provinces. I had occasion a few days ago to state my own conviction, that in advance of a thoroughgoing revision of our constitution it would be folly on our part to assume complete responsibility in relation to disabled persons and unemployables now on municipal relief lists. Yet there are those who believe that here too the dominion, without any attempt at constitutional amendment, in advance of constitutional amendment, and in a way which will retard constitutional amendment, should assume financial responsibilities without obtaining administrative powers.

In the third place this policy of conditional grants in aid has tended to provoke almost incessant controversy on constitutional powers and obligations and has produced endless friction in the relations between dominion and provincial governments. This statement is beyond contradiction. Dual responsibility, while potentially a field of cooperation, human nature being as it is and sectional interests being as they are, becomes almost of necessity a field of conflict and of friction. Personally I do not despair that this field of potential cooperation can yet be fertilized and cultivated, but I can say that after my own experience of the last two years I speak less positively of the possibilities of cooperation in the field of dual responsibility than I was inclined to do some time ago. Certainly these controversies between governments at this time, when other systems and philosophies are competing for our allegiance, is a danger to the maintenance of our institutions, and it ought to be our purpose, as far as in us lies, to prevent a recurrence of that friction. I do not suggest that it can be done at once. Neither do I suggest that the wise way to avoid it is by surrender, either on the part of the federal government or on the part of the provincial governments. But I do believe that each of us in his own field of responsibility ought to recognize the danger of prolonging misunderstandings and friction, so that in due course we shall be able very largely to escape from dual responsibility and so divide our functions that a national government will have power and resources to do the things that a nation ought to do and that provincial governments likewise will have power and resources to discharge their proper functions under the constitution.

Finally, the system of giving indirect assistance to provinces, in advance of constitutional amendments, has delayed action in securing the cooperation of the provinces in the adoption of an accepted procedure for the amendment of the British North America Act.

The importance of this question cannot be over-emphasized. It is true that we now have a royal commission examining the whole field of dominion-provincial relations. When that commission has reported, as a people we shall still have before us the problem of devising an amendment procedure for our constitution. This is the only federal state in the world which does not possess the power of amending its own constitution. I would not suggest that in any amendment procedure which could be adopted there should be the slightest departure from the most ample protection which can be afforded minority rights. Those rights, after all, are grounded anciently in the Treaty of Paris, in the Proclamation of 1763 and in the Quebec Act. They are inviolable. They at least are the basis of partnership; they at least may be expressed in terms of a compact. But when we go beyond these minority rights attaching to race and religion, I believe that if we are to avoid futility and frustration as a national government we must devise some flexible procedure of amendment through which the people of this country, having confidence in its national destiny, will be afforded the means through which their national government can respond to national needs and ideals.

We are confronted year in and year out with necessities which we cannot meet wisely and efficiently because we have not the procedure of amending our constitution. Lacking that, as I have said, we have continued with the alternative method of grants in aid which in my opinion, is improvident and inefficient.

Mr. WALSH: Would the minister elaborate on his definition of the word "flexible"?

Mr. ROGERS: We have examples of flexible methods of amendment in other countries. I would go so far as to say that we should at least have an amendment procedure which would enable us to transfer jurisdiction either from the dominion to a province, or from a province to the dominion, without requiring the consent of all provincial legislatures.

I am not in this referring to minority and racial rights, because I have already made it clear that with respect to them I believe there is the strongest possible cause for requiring unanimous consent. But, apart from that there is no federal state in the world which has not some procedure of amendment which would enable its government to meet changing needs and advancing social ideas.

I have spoken longer than I had intended because of the wider implications of the resolution to which I have referred. The matter raised by the hon. member for Bellechasse is one of greater importance than would appear at first glance. In his closing sentence he spoke most eloquently of the possibility of this country achieving national unity. It is not too much to say that the essential task before us to-day is the restoration of that unity. It is a task of the utmost difficulty. It is not the mission of one party, although naturally the party in power has a special responsibility in relation to it. It presents a challenge to all of us, regardless of what our political allegiance may be.

We must recognize that dangerous devices and tendencies which have crept into our governmental system, particularly in the post-war period, are not beyond eradication. We must also have faith that sectional points of view, however strongly and forcibly they may be expressed at times, do not represent a desire on the part of those expressing them that the country should retreat from its national destiny. One must hope that in the immediate future there will be a mobilization of national opinion throughout our country, a mobilization having its origin in a realization of the gravity of the present situation, and having its stimulus in the faith that we still have the will and the capacity to accomplish difficult tasks. Let us trust that this mobilization of opinion will secure for us what we have long lacked—amendments to our constitution, and a procedure by which under that constitution we can deal effectively with new problems as they present themselves in future years.

Mr. BOULANGER: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the resolution be withdrawn.

Motion withdrawn.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

5. When was the present contract between the Alberta government and the dominion signed?

6. How long has that contract still to run?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There was an agreement in 1905, when the province of Alberta was created, for the policing of that province by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. This agreement was effective until 1918. In that year the province created its own police force and had it in operation until 1932, when a new agreement was entered into and is still in force. I suppose the hon. member has in mind the second agreement, and if that is so, I shall be pleased to answer; otherwise it will take a very long time and much work to answer as regards the past, between 1905 and 1917.

Mr. MARSHALL: What the minister suggests will be quite satisfactory.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

WHEAT IN STORAGE AT CHURCHILL

Mr. PERLEY:

1. What were the number of bushels of wheat in storage at Fort Churchill during the seasons 1935-36, 1936-37, 1937-38?

2. What was the amount of wheat in each of the above seasons held by the Canadian wheat board at Fort Churchill?

3. What were the amount of storage charged against same, the names of the parties to whom sold by the Canadian wheat board, and the quantities in each case, during the above years?

WENTWORTH COUNTY RIFLE RANGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): I wish to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). Will the rifle range that is to be constructed in Wentworth county be a 1,000 yard range?

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): This question has been referred to headquarters of Military District No. 2, and, with the concurrence of the non-permanent active militia, it has been recommended that the range be 800 yards. If necessary, however, it can be extended to 1,000 yards.

PRIVILEGE—MR. PERLEY

FREIGHT ASSISTANCE ON LIVE STOCK SHIPPED TO FEEDING GROUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): On February 10 the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), on a question of privilege, read three telegrams into Hansard, the third of them being found on page 317. It is a telegram from the Minister of Agriculture of the province of Saskatchewan and reads:

Hon. J. G. Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Both Laidlaw applications investigated and recommended by municipal secretary and our district representative. Schuster came to Regina to complete freight arrangements after his application had been approved by municipality. Laidlaw until recently tenant of Perley but declines to continue. Municipality advanced seed and supplies to value of four hundred eighty-two dollars fifty-four cents in 1937, being about half amount desired by tenant and landlord. Termination of tenancy by Laidlaw may partly explain criticism. Understand tenancy has been unprofitable throughout to Laidlaw which reduced him to circumstances necessitating aid in shipment of live stock out.

On hearing that telegram read I felt sure that the greater part of it was not a statement of fact, that it was incorrect, and I therefore wrote to the secretary of the municipality.

Mr. GARDINER: On a point of order, I understood according to the ruling given that it was not permissible to read telegrams with reference to this particular matter, and I do hope that if the hon. member is going to be allowed to read a telegram now I shall have an opportunity to get one and read it.

Mr. PERLEY: This is a question of privilege. The minister himself read several telegrams, and this is somewhat different from the point he is trying to make. I directed to the secretary of the municipality the following letter:

February 10, 1938.

Mr. Clifford Hunt, Sec.,
Rural Municipality,
Wolseley, Sask.

Mr. Gardiner and I have had some little altercation in the house and I would like a little information from you in order to verify a statement I made.

You will remember that last November when David Laidlaw was shipping out his cattle and horses to Manitoba, he made application for free freight and the question I want to know is, did he make application to the municipality to approve of his getting free freight and did the municipality recommend same and did George E. Biden approve of same. Also give me particulars with respect to the fourth car they shipped in the name of Wilfred Laidlaw. Did the municipality approve of his application for free freight and did Biden approve of it? As I understand it, the municipality did not approve or recommend the application of David Laidlaw for three cars and later the application of Wilfred Laidlaw for one car was turned down.

Please send me a night letter in reply to this giving me the particulars, sending collect to me at the House of Commons. Call Mr. Platt the reeve and get his approval of your statements in wire.

In reply to the foregoing communication I received the following letter rather than a telegram:

February 14, 1938.

E. E. Perley, Esq., M.P.,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir:

In reply to your letter of the 10th instant I would advise that Mr. Laidlaw first went to Regina to the Department of Agriculture and requested from them freight assistance to ship out three cars of stock to Manitoba for winter feed. The Department of Agriculture referred him back to this office and this application was not presented to the council for their approval. I signed the recommendation and it was later signed by Mr. Biden and he was granted free freight on three cars.

Later, Wilfred Laidlaw made application for free freight on one car and I pointed out that if this stock was owned by David Laidlaw then he would not be able to get the required assistance as the maximum assistance given by the department was on three cars and he had already had this assistance. I believe, however, that Wilfred Laidlaw was later given assistance in shipping out one carload. I cannot recall Wilfred Laidlaw's car ever having gone through this office. I do not believe I signed same and I gave the matter no more thought until I received your letter yesterday. Wilfred Laidlaw did suggest that he might possibly pay the freight out on this car himself.

Yours truly,

C. J. Hunt.

On February 11, as will be found at page 359 of Hansard, the matter was again brought to the attention of the house by the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), who took exception to a personal reference in the telegram. Altogether apart from the matter of feed and seed he took exception to it on the ground that it was a personal reference. In reply the Minister of Agriculture made the following statement, which will be found at page 360:

In reply to that statement the telegram merely says that the hon. member himself together with Mr. Laidlaw made application to the government for consideration in relation to seed in the spring of last year.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I could not understand that statement and I directed another letter to the secretary of the municipality as follows—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I rise to a point of order. I would refer Your Honour to the ruling given on page 382 of Hansard of the present session. That ruling applied distinctly to the hon. member who is now speaking and to the Minister of Agriculture as well, and it was held that such comments from outside cannot properly be made.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what is being dealt with. The Minister of Agriculture read into the record, improperly, I thought, a communication from the Minister of Agriculture of Saskatchewan, which communication directly attacked one of the members of this house. The hon. member is now merely clearing up that statement, and to preclude anyone from saying that he has not done it completely, he is reading a communication he sent in order that the answer may be understood. He is reading it so that it cannot be said that he has left out any part of the record. That is the position. Surely it is one of the privileges of a member of this house to take advantage of an opportunity such as this to put himself right when a statement has been made, reported in Hansard, by one not a member of this house, regarding himself. The hon. member has had no opportunity except this, and it is the highest privilege of a member of this house to place his position before the house when he is attacked by one not a member.

Mr. POULIOT: Please read between the lines now.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): On the point of order, I did not raise a question because I thought we would waste valuable time discussing it. On a question of privilege an hon. member is entitled to rise in his place and make his own position clear by denial, or something equivalent thereto, but not to make a speech, bringing into his remarks outside comments, letters, telegrams or anything of that kind. The hon. gentleman is making a full fledged speech on this question of privilege. This is the first time I have seen this done, and especially affirmed as a right.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member has a right, as the Minister of Justice and other hon. members have said, to state his point of order and make his position clear; but I do not think, in view of the decision I rendered some time ago, that it is his right to put into the record documents and letters and telegrams from persons outside the house.

Mr. BENNETT: What is taking place at the moment is merely an explanation to clear up a situation which never should have arisen, because the ruling of the Speaker is that the telegram from Mr. Taggart should not have been on the record. It is because it is improperly on the record that the effort is now made to clear it up, and on which the question of privilege arises.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is twice wrong, or perhaps three times.

Mr. BENNETT: Put yourself in his position.

Mr. PERLEY: On hearing the last statement I directed the following letter to Mr. Hunt:

Would you please let me have by return mail—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PERLEY: I asked the municipality for a statement as to whether they had supplied seed grain in 1935, 1936 and 1937 to Mr. Laidlaw. The reply was this—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PERLEY: Well, the reply was to the effect that they had not supplied Mr. Laidlaw with one bushel of seed during the years 1936 or 1937, nor one dollar's worth of feed. That is the reply signed by the secretary of the municipality.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think the statement I have made so far proves conclusively that the telegram with respect to providing free freight and seed to Mr. Laidlaw was incorrect and was not a statement of fact. The latter part of the wire was more or less a personal attack on me, or was injected into the wire for the purpose of doing me a personal injury. I do not for one moment think that the Minister of Agriculture would desire to do that knowingly; not at all, and I am not charging him with that. But I am saying that he was grossly misinformed.

Mr. GARDINER: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member, in view of your ruling, is putting me in an impossible position, because I cannot reply. I should like to suggest that there is a proper opportunity for him to discuss this matter. When my estimates are before the house he can put on the record everything he is now seeking to put on, and I shall be quite prepared to deal with it at that time.

Mr. PERLEY: I want to refer to the concluding paragraph of the wire, which relates to myself.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. If this is a question of privilege, I think the hon. member ought to be satisfied now, and if he desires to say anything further, when the estimates of the Department of Agriculture are before the house he can deal fully with the whole matter again. He has stated his point.

Mr. PERLEY: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has explained his point of privilege.

Mr. PERLEY: As a matter of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I ask you to delete the latter part of that wire from the records of this house. I do so because it was injected for the purpose of doing me an injury. I am drawing your attention to the ruling you made on February 14, recorded on page 382. In the concluding paragraph you said:

The house may be indulgent in these matters but it is a well known principle that a statement made in this house cannot be contradicted by a statement made by a person who is not a member of the house.

I therefore suggest that you delete the latter part of that wire, which has personal reference to me, from the records of the house.

RADIO BROADCASTING

LICENCE FEE FOR RADIO SETS—QUESTION AS TO INCREASE, APPLICATION AND ABOLITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to direct an inquiry to the government through the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe). In view of the fact that the current fiscal year terminates exactly three weeks from now, and licences for radio receiving sets ordinarily must be purchased before that time, I wish to ask two questions:

1. Does the government intend to rescind before March 31 of this year the recent order in council increasing the licence fee for radio sets and otherwise altering its application?

2. Has the government given consideration to the suggestion which I made in this house on February 1 last that the licence fee be entirely abolished?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): Both these questions involve matters of government policy. The policy of the government in regard to both matters will be made known in due course.

VALIDITY OF QUEBEC STATUTE

QUESTION OF REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF CANADA OF "ACT RESPECTING COMMUNISTIC PROPAGANDA"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): I should like to address to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), a question of which I have already given him notice. It is as follows:

In the light of the recent judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada stating that the Alberta act called Bill No. 9, which restricted publication of news, is ultra vires a provincial legislature, and particularly in view of the reasons for judgment of the various judges, as, for example, the words of the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Davis, that the "right of free public discussion of public affairs. . . . . is the breath of life for parliamentary institutions," can the Minister of Justice give assurance that the Quebec "padlock law" will shortly be either disallowed or referred to the Supreme Court of Canada for a decision as to its validity as a provincial enactment?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I can only make to my hon. friend the same answer as I made to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier), and I may say that it is a standard answer which will be given to all possible similar questions. Any recommendations which it will be the duty of the Minister of Justice to make with regard to this or any other provincial legislation and with regard to any petition concerning this legislation, will be made to the governor in council. My hon. friend will understand that I could not give to him or to any other member of the house any information or intimation as to what that recommendation will be.

ELECTRIC POWER

TRANSFER TO PARLIAMENT OF CONTROL OF EXPORT EXCEPT IN INTERNATIONAL EMERGENCY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 21, to amend the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill which is now before the house for second reading implements the undertaking which was given in the speech from the throne on January 27 to the effect that legislation would be introduced with a view to furthering the principle of parliamentary control of the export of electric power. On the first reading of the bill, on February 11, I outlined its scope and purposes, but it might be well at this time to repeat what was then said.

While the bill in form constitutes a general amendment and recasting of the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, which has not heretofore been amended since it was passed in 1907, in substance its object is to transfer to parliament itself the power at present legally vested in the governor in council to control all export of electric power from this country. The bill does not affect the licences to export power which have already been granted, nor does it take from the governor in council the right to renew or cancel the existing licences. It does provide that no further exports of power may be made unless they are specifically authorized by a private act of parliament. An exception to this rule is made only in the event of a temporary international emergency, and only for the duration of such an emergency.

The house will recall that in 1928 the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) introduced a bill in this house to amend the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act. The bill was given first and second reading at that session but did not get beyond the committee stage. In the following year, 1929, the hon. member for Leeds reintroduced the bill, which was given all three readings in this house with practically no discussion. The bill went to the senate, where it was given first and second readings. After the second reading, while the bill was in committee in the senate, some information was requested with respect to the number of licences that had been already issued, together with other data which hon. members of the senate desired to obtain. It was not possible to secure that information in time for consideration before the session prorogued. As a result the bill introduced by my hon. friend did not become law.

What I should like particularly to bring to the attention of the house is that in 1929 all members of this house, regardless of party, accepted the principle of parliamentary control of the export of electrical energy. That was the underlying, essential principle in my hon. friend's bill. The original act with respect to the exportation of power from Canada was enacted in 1907. From 1907 up to the present time that act has not been amended. The amendment which the hon. member for Leeds proposed in 1928 and 1929 would have taken away the power which at present resides in the governor in council to issue licences, and would have transferred that power to parliament. It was the approval of parliament that my hon. friend desired should be given in respect to all future licences for the exportation of power. The principle contained in the present bill is the same as that which appeared in the bill of the hon. member for Leeds in 1928 and 1929. It is the principle not of completely prohibiting, under all circumstances, the exportation of power from Canada, but rather of making a general prohibition, subject to exemptions by approval of parliament.

The present bill, however, is a little different from that introduced by my hon. friend. It is not different in principle: the principle is the same, as I have indicated, the direct control of parliament over further export of power from Canada. But inasmuch as the legislation has not been amended since it was originally introduced in 1907, the present measure seeks to recast the legislation by separating those provisions which have to do with the export of electrical energy from those which have to do with the export of fluids, such as gases, oil and water. The provisions with respect to fluids are in no way changed but are placed by themselves in the bill. The provisions with respect to the export of electrical energy are likewise placed by themselves. A change is made in the provisions with respect to the export of electrical energy, in the manner that I have indicated.

My hon. friend's bill merely provided for the approval of parliament. It did not indicate in what particular form that approval should be given. Approval might have been given, under my hon. friend's bill, by resolution of this house or by a private act. The government has thought it preferable at this time to make provision for the approval of parliament being given specifically in a private act. One reason for preferring a private act to a resolution is that a resolution is not law. It would leave the legal position just as it is to-day; the governor in council would still have the power to grant licences. On each occasion the governor in council would simply have to wait until a resolution of both houses had been passed. But a private act has this advantage over a resolution; it enables the parties desiring to secure a licence for the export of power to make formal application, to present their views to a committee of the house and to have the house view the matter in a judicial as well as a legislative manner.

Mr. BENNETT: Might I ask the right hon. gentleman a question? Does he realize that a resolution, if it is to mean approval by parliament, cannot be effective unless it is in the form of a bill—because then it is a resolution not of both houses of parliament but of parliament itself, which is all three estates.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend is giving an interpretation which I had not thought had been placed on my hon. friend's bill in the first instance. This house passes many resolutions without enacting legislation as a result. On the other hand, very frequently the house enacts legislation as the result of a resolution, and certainly I had assumed that my hon. friend's bill would have made it possible for the approval of parliament to be given by a resolution—I mean a resolution approved by both houses of parliament. As the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has just indicated, an act would require the assent of the crown as well as action on the part of both houses. However, a resolution on the part of both houses might have been a course for which the present administration could have provided in this measure, had they desired to do so. We preferred, as I have said, in order to ensure that parliament would exercise its judicial as well as its legislative functions and powers, to proceed with the granting of licences by means of private acts rather than in any other way.

There is a third reason why it is preferable that the approval of both houses should be given in the form of a private act rather than in the form of a resolution; it is very difficult to draft into a resolution the specific terms which it might be advisable to have inserted with respect to any licences that might be granted.

My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition raised a point at the time of the first reading of the bill to which perhaps I ought to direct attention at once; that is, that the government should proceed by means of a public bill rather than a private bill. May I say to my right hon. friend that I am unable to follow him in his suggestion in that regard. At the time he spoke, I thought he was correcting me on a matter of terminology, but I see that he had something more in mind. As he knows, a public bill sets forth a general policy and makes the general provision with respect to the subject with which it deals. A private bill is in the nature of an exemption from a general law, and that is what the government desires to effect with respect to future authorization for the exportation of power. The measure before the house is a public bill providing that, except by private act, no further export of power can take place from Canada, other than under the exceptions in the bill itself, which are restricted to licences which have already been granted from year to year.

In support of what I have just said I would direct the attention of my right hon. friend and members of the house to the citations in reference to private bills as indicated in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms. I quote first paragraph 840:

The object of a private bill is to alter the law relating to some particular locality or to confer rights on, or relieve from liability, some particular person or body of persons.

And paragraph 847:

The object of a private bill is, in fact, to obtain a privilegium—that is to say, an exception from the general law, or a provision for something which cannot be obtained by means of the general law, whether that general law is contained in a statute or is common law.

The present bill, if it passes both houses and is assented to by the crown, will be the general law. In order that hereafter any person or corporation or other body may obtain authorization to export electrical energy, he or it will have to come to parliament for a private bill granting that authority.

May I supplement what appears in Beauchesne by the following, which is taken from Ilbert's Legislative Methods and Forms, 1901, at page 28. Ilbert is a recognized authority in matters affecting legislative methods and forms.

Mr. BENNETT: He was clerk of the House of Commons in Great Britain.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. I quote:

A public bill is introduced as a measure of public policy in which the whole community is interested, and originates on the motion of some member of the house in which the bill is introduced.

The object of a private bill is, in fact, to obtain a privilegium—that is to say, an exception from the general law, or a provision for something which cannot be obtained by means of the general law, whether that general law is contained in a statute or is common law.

Private and public bills differ not merely in the mode of origination, but in the mode of procedure for passing them. In the case of a private bill the rules of the standing orders of the two houses as to the giving of certain notices and the deposit of bills before a certain date must be complied with, in order that all persons may have notice if their private interests are affected. Each bill is considered by a select committee of each house, who hear the promoters and opponents by counsel, consider their private interests, and determine, in a quasi-judicial capacity, whether the promoters of the bill have justified their request for a privilegium, and whether private interests are properly protected.

The officers of the house and the different government departments watch private bills from the point of view of the public interest, and call the attention of the select committee to matters affecting that interest. The House of Commons also appoint annually a special committee on police and sanitary regulation bills, for the purpose of guarding against the insertion of enactments inconsistent with the general law.

Subject to these provisions for the protection of public interests, the proceedings on a private bill resemble more closely private litigation between the parties interested than a discussion on questions of public policy, though, as each bill has to go through the same stages in the whole house as a public bill, there is an opportunity for members to raise at those stages questions of public policy in respect of the bill.

When my right hon. friend raised the point on February 11, with respect to the term "private bill," I thought it well to ask the Deputy Minister of Justice if he would give me a written opinion on the matter. As the right hon. gentleman had raised the point, I thought it would be of some importance. May I now supplement the authorities I have read by the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice. The communication is dated at Ottawa, February 12, 1938, and reads:

Dear Mr. King,

With reference to the observation of the right honourable the leader of the opposition that a bill to authorize the export of power could hardly be designated a private bill but would be a public bill of a private nature, I beg to advise you as follows:

The question whether a bill should be classified as private or public, of course, depends upon the object thereof. The object of a private bill is to alter the law relating to some particular locality or to confer rights on or relieve from liability some particular person or body of persons. The object of a private bill is to obtain an exception from the general law.

If it is contemplated that the export of power in future is to be permitted in the same manner and circumstances as in the case of licenses under the present law, I would think that any such privilege under or exception from the general law prohibiting export would be an object which would properly be dealt with by means of a private bill resulting in a private act. The boundary line between public and private bills is a narrow one and since no conclusive definition or test exists for determining doubtful cases, individual opinions may differ.

My understanding was that the private bills procedure was considered to be peculiarly appropriate for dealing with applications to export power. Being initiated by petition to parliament, the proceedings partake of both judicial and legislative character. The promoters appear as suiters while those who apprehend injury are admitted as adverse parties. Petitions in favour of or in opposition to such a bill may be received at any time while the bill is under consideration.

My view is that the granting of an exception to the general law prohibiting export is comparable for example to the case of a loan company being excepted from the operation of the Money Lenders' Act; such exceptions are created by a private act.

Yours truly,

W. Stuart Edwards,
Deputy Minister of Justice.

I would say, therefore, in connection with what is contemplated under the present measure, that, hereafter, parties proposing or desiring to obtain authorization for the export of power will have to proceed, for example, in exactly the same manner as persons interested in securing from parliament a charter to establish a bank or build a railway. They will have to follow the procedure for private bills, and thereby enable all parties interested to be heard, before any final decision is reached with respect to the measure in question.

There is a further consideration I should like to mention at this time. It is a reason why it would seem desirable to have the matter of the future export of electrical power removed from the control of the governor in council and placed under some other authority. The reason is not new; it was advanced in 1907, at the time the original bill was enacted, by Sir Robert Borden, who at the time, was leader of the opposition. The then Minister of Justice, Sir Allen Aylesworth, who had the legislation in hand, was not unfavourably impressed by the suggestion.

It was pointed out by Sir Robert Borden that the governor in council is necessarily concerned with matters largely of a political nature. He felt that the governer in council was not equipped to handle matters of administration as effectively as some other bodies, and necessarily the governor in council would have to be guided by the advice of individual officers in the public service. Apart from that, attention was drawn to the fact that, under our constitutional practice, council is composed of members of one political party, and, in dealing with a matter of this kind it might be assumed, although not necessarily so, that the action of the governor in council was being influenced by political reasons. That possibility would be removed altogether if the power were taken away hereafter from the governor in council. I may say, however, that there has been nothing in the thirty years since the act was passed to give reason to believe that there had been the slightest political motive or consideration behind the granting of any licences. Nevertheless, I think the point is one which deserves consideration and I must say that personally I rather favour the suggestion which was made at the time, that these matters of the export of electrical power and energy should be made the subject of review by a body such as the railway commission, or the transport commission as it is now known, which would deal with them as it does with other matters already under its jurisdiction.

When that proposal was made in 1907, it was urged that the railway commission had about all that it could attend to and that without reorganization it would not be advisable to add to its duties. No government from that time up to the present has thought it necessary to make the suggested change. However, something in the nature of a public utilities commission will, I believe, sooner or later become necessary. It might well be that we should have in mind the possible transfer to such a body of jurisdiction in the granting of future authorizations for the export of power. It may be of interest to the house to have before it the words used by Sir Robert Borden at the time with respect to this matter. They will be found at pages 4635 and 4636 of Hansard of March 13, 1907. Sir Robert said:

> The other objection is that the governor in council is about the worst body that could be found for the purpose of dealing with such a matter. I say that for two reasons; in the first place, because the governor in council is not composed of persons having any special knowledge of the conditions which should control the export. It is composed of men who are very much taken up and occupied with their political as distinguished from their administrative duties. For that reason one would not anticipate that any administration—I am not speaking especially of the present administration—would be a very competent or capable body to deal with a question of this kind. The answer may be that they would be governed by the report of some officer, but when we are confronted by that answer, then, there is another consideration.
> That is the consideration that the governor general in council under our system is and necessarily must be a partisan body. It represents presumably a majority of the people of this country and it certainly must always represent a majority of the members of parliament. It is a partisan body, it acts as a partisan body and you will have entrusted to the governor general in council under the provisions of section 5, very delicate questions indeed, questions which concern the material advantage of their political friends, questions which concern the material advantage of their political opponents; and it does not seem to me that it is wise to entrust so delicate a power as this must necessarily be to a body of that kind.

As I have already intimated, the then Minister of Justice Sir Allen Aylesworth rather agreed with Sir Robert Borden in the point of view he expressed, but no action was taken to change the method by which licences would be granted. I bring this suggestion before the house at the moment because I feel that in the existing situation it is important that hon. members should realize that the only desire of the government is to further the public interest and to ensure that there shall not be in reality or to appearances, directly or indirectly, the determination of the export of electrical energy from any partisan political motive.

It might help the house better to appreciate the stand which the government has taken with regard to some recent applications which have been made to the governor in council for the export of electrical energy if I were briefly to review the discussions which have taken place in this house on this all-important question. I shall try not to detain the house at too great length in this review, but to indicate in brief outline the essential features of the more important discussions, and in particular statements of policy as they have been put forth by different administrations in dealing with the question of the export of power. As already mentioned, the first debate of any importance on the subject was that which took place in 1907 when the existing legislation was enacted. I shall not go into the arguments which were put forward at that time, although I shall refer to one or two of them when I come to sum up the reasons which may be urged for and against the granting of licences for the export of power when there is a surplus of power available.

From 1907 on, for many years, there appears to have been very little in the way of discussion in parliament on this subject. In 1914 an important order in council was passed as a result of certain statements which had been made by the Public Service Commission of the state of New York to the effect that the termination of existing exports of power from Canada would paralyse the business and industry in the United States which had become dependent upon Canadian sources of power. I shall refer to that order in council later on as it sets forth reasons which are very important in considering the advisability of exporting power. The 1914 order in council will be found set forth at page 104 of the white paper recently tabled. It was not until 1925 that any extended discussion took place in this house on the question.

In 1925, the matter came before the house in connection with the placing of a duty on the export of power. In that year an effort was being made to develop the Carillon power site. Considerable discussion took place on the question of the export of the power which might be generated as a result of that project. Delegations made representations to the government with respect to the matter. In that year also a resolution was introduced into this house by Mr. LeSueur, the member for Lambton West. This resolution had an important bearing on the policies adopted at that time and thereafter, and I shall refer to it more particularly in a moment.

In the next year, 1926, a significant act was passed by the legislature of Quebec prohibiting the export of power from that province. That act was amended in 1933 to permit exports in certain cases. I shall have occasion to refer to both these measures when I come to set forth the reasons for and against the export of power. There was, however, no discussion in this house in 1926 on the export of power problem.

In 1927 the Beauharnois development was projected. There was some discussion on matters relating to waterways, but there was no discussion of importance on the subject of the export of power. In 1928, however, the Beauharnois company made an application to the government for the approval of plans in connection with the Beauharnois project. This served to bring to the fore the question of the possible export of power from Beauharnois once that development had been completed. As I have mentioned, it was in that year that the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart), who was then, as he is now, a member of the opposition, introduced the bill to which I have referred. At that session the measure received only two readings. In the following session the bill was re-introduced early in the year and passed by this house without debate. There was, however, in the year, considerable discussion on the St. Lawrence waterway development, and with respect to the approval of the plans of the Beauharnois company. From that time until 1933 there will not, I believe, be found in Hansard references to this question, other than some of a cursory character made by members during the debates on the address or the debates on the budget, expressing their views as to the general policy that should be followed with respect to the export of power. The present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) did make one or two references as to the views of his government. I shall bring those references to the attention of the house.

From sketching it thus in outline, it will be seen that the main discussions on the question on the export of power took place between 1925 and 1929. There had been little discussion in the years between 1907 and 1925 and very little discussion from 1929 until the present year. A Liberal administration, as hon. members will recall, was in office from 1921 until 1930, except for a short intervening period when the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen was in office. Such discussions as took place in that period occasioned declarations on the part of the government of the day as to its policy with respect to the export of power. I intend to give to the house these declarations and the circumstances which occasioned them.

While my right hon. friend was in office from 1930 to 1935, he did not introduce any legislation on this subject. He accepted, I think, the view which was generally held at the time the bill of the hon. member for Leeds passed this house, namely that all parties were agreed upon the policy that there should not be further export of power from Canada without some form of parliamentary approval.

Mr. BENNETT: No new licences were issued.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my right hon. friend says, no new licences were issued. The same was true of what has taken place since the present administration came again into office in 1935. From that year to the present time we have issued no new licences of any importance but have confined the action of the governor in council to renewing year by year the licences which had been previously granted.

In the early part of last year, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler), speaking in a discussion in this house on the export of power, set forth the view of the government as understood by him at the time, namely that further licences should not be granted without the consideration of each case on its merit; that there should be not a blanket prohibition, but a policy of prohibition admitting of exceptions where the circumstances of the case justified. That was the position when the present administration received, in the summer and autumn of last year, three applications for export of power, two from the province of Quebec and one from the province of Ontario.

Before I discuss the three applications, I should like to supplement what I have said by reference to declarations of policy and opinion as they were made in this house in regard to the various matters to which I have referred. First of all, in the debate which took place on the imposition of an export duty in 1925, a statement was made by the Hon. Charles Stewart, who was at that time Minister of the Interior, and as such had particularly to do with water power questions. Mr. Stewart, speaking in this house on March 30, 1925, stated the position of the government as follows:

> There is a law upon the statute book at the moment authorizing us to issue licences for only one year, and so far as I can ascertain that is all that the government intend to do in that direction. Whatever their intention may be, as a member of the government I have not heard of any change of policy. What I do say is that notwithstanding the fact that we have only developed to the extent of three million odd horsepower out of a possible development of forty-one million horsepower, I think it is good business to keep the cheap power in Canada for the development of Canadian industry, and I see no objection, and my hon. friend opposite sees no objection, to the imposition of an export duty.

That, as I have indicated, was the one important pronouncement made in that debate.

A little later in the year a delegation from the Ottawa valley on behalf of the National Hydro Electric Company waited on the government to advocate the export of 300,000 horse power from the development at Carillon. That delegation was received by the Right Hon. George P. Graham, the Hon. Charles Murphy and myself. We gave to the delegation the promise of consideration of their request, but no assurance was given that any additional licences would be granted. It may be of interest to the house to know the government's view as expressed to the delegation. I have to give it as it appeared in the local press, as the delegation was received at my office and the record of its proceedings does not, of course, appear on Hansard. The Ottawa Citizen of May 5, 1925, under the heading, "Places Interest of Canada First on Power Issue," reads as follows:—

> Premier King Says This Chief Consideration in Reaching Decision on Export Question.
> Deputation Urges Carillon Scheme.
> Prime Minister Says It's National Problem. Cabinet to Discuss It.
> That the future of Canada would be the first consideration in the question of permitting the export of electrical energy to United States was stated by the Prime Minister yesterday afternoon in replying to a large and representative delegation from the municipalities bordering on the Ottawa river. The delegates came to urge the administration to grant permission to export power from the proposed development at Carillon.
> The Prime Minister replied that the problem which the government had to consider was not local to the Ottawa valley, but had its national, international, and interprovincial viewpoints. The government had only one desire, namely, to further the public interest. When private interest could be helped without injuring the public interest, it was desirable to help it also.
> The main question for the government was to decide for the public interest, and in the export of power it was necessary to see that the future of the country was not prejudiced in any way. Immediate consideration was promised.

Speaking in this house that year, the Right Hon. George P. Graham made some significant statements with regard to the export of electrical power. In Hansard of May 14, 1925, at page 3222, he stated:

> I am strongly of the opinion—if it were my personal business, I might perhaps think otherwise, being after the profits—that any government in Canada ought to go very slow in approving of the export of power in any great quantity. There is no question about that in my mind; I agree heartily. There is an argument on the other side which has been presented to us very strongly time and again by people living along certain powers, who feel they are losing day by day in seeing the power flow by their doors without development. They take the ground that development cannot take place unless outside capital is got for that development, and that would imply the export of a part of the power. That is the situation. It is not changed at the present time from what it has been for months and years.

Again, speaking on May 19, at page 3348, Mr. Graham said:

I am stating the government's policy. I am pointing out that my hon. friend's supposed policy the other night is not practicable; is not followed by his own friends in any province; is not followed by any government. In the production of power business demands that under certain circumstances, such as those existing in connection with the hydro-electric projects, an export of power should be allowed.

Mr. Manion: Temporarily.

Mr. Graham: I will come to that. I want to nail it down fast and tight that the policy of any government looking to the welfare of the Dominion of Canada and to the development of power in Canada should not be a prohibition of the export of power under all circumstances to the United States; for the result would be at one fell swoop to bring about increased rates on the part of the hydro-electric power projects in Ontario as well as on the part of other companies.

Let me go a little further. My hon. friend (Mr. Manion) suggests that the export should be temporary; I am coming to that. The legislation of the parliament of Canada has been sane along these lines. The regulations adopted in 1907-08 by the Laurier administration were sane. They restricted by regulation under the statute the period of time for which licences might be granted, limiting it at twelve months. That was wise. The hon. gentleman may say that that might permit the establishing of vested rights. What vested right could be established in twelve months? None, and none has been so established. This regulation restricting the export of power to a period of twelve months is notice to the United States users that this supply of power to them is not permanent; that it can be taken away from them at the end of any twelve-months period. It is notice to every person concerned that this is only temporary. I want to put it again, as strongly as I can, that the policy of this government in power is the policy that has been adopted in Canada and successfully followed during the last eighteen years. It is the policy that has been practised by the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario and by the companies, and it is a policy under which every interest is safeguarded so far as the Canadian user is concerned.

That statement, I think, sets forth clearly the policy of the administration at that time. The question of export of power was also brought before the house that year in a debate on a resolution introduced by Mr. LeSueur, the then member for West Lambton. The resolution proposed that export be permitted only on a yearly licence, no licence to be issued "beyond those at present outstanding except for off-peak power."

The resolution as introduced practically meant the prohibition of export except with respect to off-peak power. When the resolution was presented to the house by Mr. LeSueur, who was then in opposition, I suggested on behalf of the government that it should be amended so as to permit the export of power only upon the consent of the government or governments of the province or provinces concerned, and the amendment was accepted by the opposition. The Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, who at the time was the leader of the opposition, said that he accepted the amendment because he believed that so far as the provinces were concerned they would not wish to give their consent to the export of power. He thought that prohibition of export would be obtained in that way. In addition to that reason, however, he thought it desirable to have, if possible, unanimous agreement in the house on so important a question, and accordingly was prepared to accept the amendment which the government proposed. The amendment struck out the words "except for off-peak power" and substituted the words "except with the concurrence of the province or provinces in which it is proposed to develop such power." I shall read in a moment the text of Mr. Meighen's remarks at the time. The resolution as introduced read:

That in the opinion of this house the export of hydro-electric power from Canada should be permitted only on yearly licence and no licences should be issued beyond those at present outstanding except for off-peak power.

My observations on the resolution appear in Hansard of June 15, 1925, at page 4276, as follows:

I am sure every hon. member would wish, with respect to the export of power, to see that under no condition was power exported which we would likely need in the immediate future, or which we would be unable to recover before the time at which the actual need might arise. With any policy that has that end in view, the government is wholeheartedly in accord.

And at page 4278:

I would suggest that the hon. member amend his resolution by deleting the words "and no licences should be issued," and so on, and substituting therefor the words:

—and that hereafter no licence for the export of power beyond that already granted should be issued except with the concurrence of the province or provinces in which it is proposed to develop such power.

I believe that if that provision were substituted it would give all the security that is needed. . . .

In a word, if this parliament declares that there should be no export of power except by yearly licence, it thereby serves notice on its neighbour—because it is only to the United States that any export can take place—that at any time, as the needs of this country demand, that power export may be terminated, without occasioning a grievance or without having established any vested rights of the other side meanwhile. If beyond this it couples with that declaration the provision that all future licences shall be granted only by concurrence of the province from which the power is to be exported, there should be every reason to feel that we have gone as far as we should in seeking to safeguard our resources. To go further would be possibly to work an injury in the opposite direction.

The motion as amended was agreed to, on June 15, 1925, and appears at page 4288 of Hansard:

That in the opinion of this house the export of hydro-electric power from Canada should be permitted only on yearly licence, and that hereafter no licence for export of power beyond that already granted should be issued except with the concurrence of the province or provinces in which it is proposed to develop such power and of any other provinces adjacent to such development and interested therein.

In the course of that debate, in addition to Mr. Meighen and myself, the Right Hon. George P. Graham also spoke, and his utterances in reference to the policy at the time I think should be quoted. Mr. Graham said, as reported at page 4258:

It is different in the case of a yearly licence. If a licence is given for twelve months, as has been the practice since 1907, the party who receives the power—unless something unforeseen happens or he gets notice to the contrary in advance—has a certain right to believe that year by year that licence will be renewed. That is really what has been done. That is what has to be done if the contract is for one hundred years. That has been done for years in the case of the Hydro-Electric, and that is being done also in the case of the Cedar Rapids power development. Giving a licence year by year leads to the conclusion that, unless something unforeseen happens, such yearly licence will be granted annually. . . . .

I just want to point out to my hon. friend and to the house that we must be careful how far we go with a resolution aimed at the export of power. The general principle may be all right but if we are going so far to say that it never shall be possible, that it cannot be possible under any circumstances, that any new power developed in this country should be exported, then we may tie up some very laudable enterprises, including the development under way in the province of New Brunswick, which is not in the hands of a private concern at all but is a provincial enterprise respecting which the province has been trying for a long time to get a proper status so that it could proceed with the necessary construction and development. I think we ought to be very careful as to how we proceed in tying up beyond peradventure the right of some province to export power. . . .

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Of course I can imagine the time might come when it might be the duty of any government then in power, no matter of what party, to consider the situation and to see that the power in Canada is retained to the people of the dominion to whom it belongs; but to tie ourselves up absolutely and to say that under no circumstances whatever shall power be exported would be an altogether different thing. I think my hon. friend will see himself that it might be a mistake to make this resolution so far-reaching. Personally I have no objection at all to the first part of the resolution, but I think it would be a great mistake to insist that we should never export one single horsepower hereafter except off-peak load.

The statements of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen will be found in Hansard of June 15, 1925, at page 4281:

Power is the rawest of all resources. Power is much more rudimentary, much more an instrument of further development and production than is any other raw resource whatsoever. Power bears the same relation to the ordinary raw resources of a country that those raw resources bear to the finished products of the country. It is the instrument by which the mineral is delved from the ground; it is the instrument by which the coal is heaved to the surface. It is the most fundamental and rudimentary of all things looking to the expansion of a nation; so that the arguments which apply in favour of directing trade currents and trade policy so as to keep raw resources for development by the people of a country apply with double force to the case of power. . . .

At page 4282:

Power is not something that is in the world market, that another country can substitute for if a first country withdraws. Power is something which once exported becomes the foundation of a great vested right and the withdrawal of it—however closely, however narrowly and carefully it may have been provided for—becomes a practical impossibility. We found ourselves in the position that when we needed the power badly we could not withdraw it, and we found, as well, that although we applied the system of yearly licences the company undertook to give contracts extending over a period of time and we were bound not only by the rights secured by the industry erected but were also bound, in a measure, by the contract although that contract had no warrant to be entered into.

I accept the amendment in order that we may be united and that the whole world may know how we are travelling in relation to this great question. But I would prefer that governmental responsibility should not be shirked, and I would have preferred that it be declared once and for all that we are against further exportation; but I accept it inasmuch as I believe this amendment in its practical result will reach the same end as the amendment that was moved before, because I do not believe that our provinces will agree to the export at all. That being my opinion, I accept the amendment as now agreed to by the Prime Minister himself.

The references I have given make it clear that in the year 1925 all parties in this house were united on a policy of permitting the export of electrical energy by yearly licence only, subject to the approval of the province or provinces concerned. They were united as well in agreeing that, with these precautions, individual applications might be considered upon their merits.

In 1926 there was, as I have already indicated, nothing further in the way of discussion in this house. But in that year—and I refer to this particularly because it bears on the position of the provinces—the province of Quebec passed an act prohibiting the exportation of hydro-electric power from that province to places outside Canada. The first clause of the act is as follows:

> Every sale, lease or grant whatsoever of water powers belonging to the province or in which it has rights of ownership or other rights, made on or after March 24, 1926, shall contain a clause prohibiting the exportation outside of Canada of the electric power which may be developed in this province.

The following year, 1927, there was no discussion in this house, although the then hon. member for Vancouver Centre, the present member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), in the course of the debate on the budget gave his views at some length with respect to the export of power.

I come now to the year 1928, the year in which my hon. friend the member for Leeds introduced his bill for the first time. On January 7, 1928 the Beauharnois company made application for the approval of its plans under the Navigable Waters Protection Act. I should like to make perfectly clear what was the duty of the administration of the day with respect to that application. Some hon. members who were not in the house at the time may not be familiar with the law with respect to the development of water power on navigable rivers. The law requires that, where any power development is contemplated on a navigable river, the plans must be submitted in the first instance to the Department of Public Works of the federal administration, and be approved with respect to their non-interference with navigation. In other words, under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, no development is permitted on a navigable stream, which is calculated or likely to impede navigation. The application of the Beauharnois company for the approval of its plans, was made pursuant to the provisions of this act. The Beauharnois company had obtained its charter, not from the federal government but from the government of Quebec. All the federal government had to consider was whether or not the plans as proposed interfered with navigation.

May I direct attention to this fact, that the province of Ontario had for many years been developing power at Niagara. The province of Quebec was equally anxious to develop power within its boundaries. Had the government of Canada at that time refused to approve the plans of the Beauharnois company, when as finally submitted they in no way interfered with navigation but as a matter of fact took into full account possible future developments with regard to navigation, this government would have been denying the province of Quebec a right which the province of Ontario had exercised for many years. I think that ought to be clearly understood, because many efforts have been made to misrepresent the action of the then federal government with respect to the Beauharnois development. All that was done was to approve the company's plans under the Navigable Waters Protection Act. I do not think it has ever been claimed that the approval was not properly given. It was given in the light of the reports of technical experts, who were agreed that the plans in reference to the development of power did not prejudice the federal interest in the matter of navigation.

At the same time there was before the country and before parliament the question of the development of the St. Lawrence waterway, involving a navigation project as distinguished from a power project. The St. Lawrence waterway occasioned a great deal in the way of discussion and consideration in parliament. Being discussed pretty much at the same time as the Beauharnois power development, the two questions came to be interlocked, as it were, and each was referred to in discussions on the other. When discussions took place with regard to the development of the St. Lawrence, the question of what attitude should be taken with regard to the power that might be developed on the St. Lawrence, as a result of the navigation development, naturally came up for consideration, and the government felt it imperative to express its views in reference thereto. What was said with respect to what related to navigation must be viewed in the light of the particular proposals to which it had reference..

In order to be fully advised with respect to the development of the St. Lawrence waterway, the dominion government appointed an advisory committee composed of a number of gentlemen who had special knowledge of the questions involved. This body, which was known as the Canadian national advisory committee on the St. Lawrence waterway, made its report to the government on January 11, 1928. The report will be found in the white paper which was tabled the other day. I shall make reference to one or two passages from the report. They bear on the question of the export of power and the policy that should be adopted in reference thereto.

Parliament met early in January, 1928, and on January 30 of that year the hon. member for Leeds introduced his amendment to the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, which provided that no person should export power without the approval of parliament. In introducing his bill my hon. friend said, as will be found in Hansard for that year, on page 12:

The effect of this bill is to provide that a licence shall only issue by the authority of parliament, and on such terms as may be determined by parliament. The necessary amendments to the existing act are included in this bill, and there is an express provision that nothing contained in this bill shall be deemed in any way to affect the rights of the provinces in connection with electric power.

The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) spoke on the second reading of the bill and made the following statement, which will be found on page 361 of Hansard for February 10, 1928:

There is, however, a general tendency towards believing that, with respect to the exportation of electric energy, parliament should be consulted because of unfortunate incidents that sometimes arise by reason of such licences being granted, and then when the power may be required for domestic purposes at home, it is found that there have been created abroad vested interests of such a character that the cancellation of the licence is regarded as an unfriendly act. Parliament, therefore, should consider these matters in every detail before a licence is granted.

Hon. Charles Stewart, taking part in the debate and speaking on behalf of the Liberal administration of the day, on February 14, as will be found at page 453 of Hansard for that year, declared:

The government is taking no exception to this bill. It does not make any drastic change, but I think the sponsor has in mind that in cases where new developments spring up, and there is a possibility of a certain portion of the power being exported, the company or individual promoting the measure shall come to parliament and obtain a private bill for that purpose. With that suggestion the government has no quarrel; indeed I think I may say on behalf of the government that we will go even a step further. It is in our opinion desirable that the exportation of electricity be absolutely prohibited; it is too valuable an asset for us to permit it to leave our country.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Speaking on behalf of the government during the budget debate of that year I gave to this house a very explicit statement of the views which the government held at that time. In doing so, I had in mind the existing controversy with respect to the development of the St. Lawrence, and the desirability of making the position clear in order that undue expectations might not be aroused in other countries with respect to the power which might be developed as a result of the project. The quotation is:

Then take our water powers; a few years ago we did not even regard them as an asset; to-day they are one of our greatest assets. This government has laid down the policy that the export of hydro-electric power shall be prohibited so that these great reserves of energy may be utilized in building up the dominion. We have available forty-one million horsepower, of which at present only four and three-quarter million has been developed.

That was the position in 1928. In 1929 my hon. friend re-introduced his bill and, as I have said, it was passed without discussion. It was given its three readings in this house with the unaminous approval of all members. The present Premier of Ontario, the Hon. M. F. Hepburn, was at the time a member of the house and, from the record of a division on that day, it will be seen that Mr. Hepburn was present in the house the day the bill received its three readings. As a matter of fact, so united were hon. members on the measure as proposed, which had as its essential principle the approval by parliament of the granting of all subsequent licences for the export of power, that it went through the house in one day.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did Mr. Hepburn vote for or against it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In effect everyone voted for it. There was no division.

Mr. BENNETT: It was just called "Carried".

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The bill was carried unanimously in this house. That was on February 21. On February 25, a debate took place on the St. Lawrence waterways development, and on that occasion I brought out clearly the government's view with respect to the exportation of power developed through that project from Canada to the United States.

I wish at this point to make clear to the house exactly what was in the mind of hon. members at the time that measure was discussed. One of the arguments strongly urged in favour of the St. Lawrence waterway project was that, under certain circumstances, it might be possible to have the whole cost of canalization of the St. Lawrence borne by the United States. Canada had already made expensive developments in connection with the Great Lakes-Niagara-St. Lawrence waterway system. We had constructed the Welland canal, and there are other important developments of which hon. members are aware. Our outlay had already been very considerable, so that if the project were to be proceeded with it remained then for our American friends to meet the major portion of the expense, and we would have the advantage of the development, without much by way of further cost to Canada.

The situation was that the eastern states were in need of power and Canada requested only a limited amount; she did not require anything like the amount of power which could be developed on the St. Lawrence. The proposal was made from different quarters that Canada might be prepared to allow export of power to the United States for a number of years, until the demand had increased sufficiently to enable the Canadian market to absorb all the surplus power. That point was raised concretely in connection with the Beauharnois project. It was stated that if it could be agreed between the two countries that a large part of the surplus power developed at Beauharnois should be exported to the United States for a period of years, the amount paid for the power would be sufficient to meet whatever expenditures might have to be made by Canada for the canalization of the St. Lawrence.

Mr. BENNETT: That was predicated on the St. Lawrence waterway.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes; as my right hon. friend has said, it was predicated on the St. Lawrence waterway development. It was in that connection the government found it necessary to make it clear to the United States that we would not for one moment consider the export of power to the extent that would be involved in a proposal of that kind. In other words, public opinion in Canada would not entertain the thought of large quantities of power being exported to the United States, to the extent that it would develop communities on the other side of the St. Lawrence river which would be dependent upon Canadian power. In its report, the committee appointed to advise the government made it very clear that they felt any export of power to that degree would not be in accord with the views of the Canadian people, and should not be contemplated. It was made clear, once and for all, in discussions in connection with the St. Lawrence waterway development, that we would not consider the possibility of large-scale exportation of power from Canada to the United States.

I shall not refer to the brief observations of the hon. member for Leeds in reintroducing his bill. I shall, however, read to the house what I said in the debate on the St. Lawrence waterway. My observations are to be found in Hansard of February 25, 1929, page 415:

Our government has repeatedly made clear its policy with respect to the exportation of power from Canada to the United States. We have given it as our opinion that power should not be exported. That opinion was endorsed by the national advisory committee with respect to the power which might be generated in connection with the development of the St. Lawrence. Accordingly, in writing the United States with respect to any possible basis of negotiation, our position in this regard was made very clear. The exact statement made by our government will be found in the correspondence which passed between the United States and Canada, all of which was tabled in this house on April 17, of last year. In that correspondence will be found a communication dated January 31, 1928, which contains these words:

"Reference was made in your note to the early development of hydro electric power as a factor which must have equal application to and influence upon the Dominion of Canada. The opportunity of developing great quantities of power incidental to navigation is, it is agreed, a special advantage possessed by the St. Lawrence project, and an important consideration in determining its advisability. In this aspect of the project, however, there are again special features in the Canadian situation which it is desirable to make clear. Public opinion in Canada is opposed to the export of hydro-electric power, and is insistent that such power as may be rendered available on the St. Lawrence, whether from the wholly Canadian section, or from the Canadian half of the international section, shall be utilized within the dominion to stimulate Canadian industry and develop the natural resources. With this view the national advisory committee expresses itself as in complete accord."

That finishes the quotation from the note: I now return to my observations:

When the United States government replied to our communication it was made perfectly clear that from the point of view of the United States, Canada was entirely within her rights in taking such a position, and that no question would be raised on the part of the United States with respect thereto.

And later on:

What I wish to make clear at the moment is that, with respect to any projected St. Lawrence development, this parliament may take it as definitely settled and understood between the United States and Canada that power generated on the St. Lawrence and belonging to Canada will not be exported to the United States but will be used for the development of our industries and our natural resources.

Hon. members will find, at page 112 of the white paper I tabled a few days ago, the report of the Canadian National Advisory Committee. The opinion of the committee is found in section 9 at page 116:

In consideration of the economic aspect, we have given some thought to the question of possible export of power. As to that we would say that we are in complete accord with the feeling throughout Canada that export of power should not be permitted.

Then, at page 119 is the expression of opinion of Mr. Beaudry Leman and Adelard Turgeon, two members of the committee who, while in agreement with the other members of the committee, made additional observations, a part of which reads as follows:

It would seem wholly desirable that power developed in the national sections and Canada's share of power developed in the international section be not exported, permanently or temporarily. The energy so produced should be retained permanently in Canada as being a very important factor in its development. Should large amounts of power be temporarily exported there would be strong possibilities of causes of friction developing with the United States when this power would be required for use in Canada.

In view of the large amounts of power which would ultimately become available for use in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, it would appear desirable that the governments of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario agree with the broad lines of the policy adopted by the government of Canada. It would seem important that the cooperation of the provincial governments concerned be obtained in respect of the features of this project wherein power development is the predominating object. The collaboration of the government of Canada and of the provincial governments concerned towards the realization of this project would be a potent factor in insuring its success.

Mr. CAHAN: What is the date of that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is dated Montreal, January 18, 1927. Based on that advice of the advisory board, a communication of some length was sent by the Canadian government, through its minister at Washington, to the Secretary of State of the United States. This communication was dated January 31, 1928, and made clear to the government of the United States how the government of Canada viewed the question of any possibility of large exports of power from the Canadian St. Lawrence waterway developments. In 1928 I tabled the correspondence relating to the St. Lawrence waterway project as a white paper. The report of the Canadian National Advisory Committee appears in that white paper as well as the correspondence between the governments of Canada and the United States. I intend to read a part of the dispatch of January 31, 1928, which will be found at page 9 of the white paper, of 1928:

Reference was made in your note to the early development of hydro-electric power as a factor which must have equal application to and influence upon the Dominion of Canada. The opportunity of developing great quantities of power incidental to navigation is, it is agreed, a special advantage possessed by the St. Lawrence project, and an important consideration in determining its advisability. In this aspect of the project, however, there are again special features in the Canadian situation which it is desirable to make clear. Public opinion in Canada is opposed to the export of hydro-electric power, and is insistent that such power as may be rendered available on the St. Lawrence, whether from the wholly Canadian section, or from the Canadian half of the international section, shall be utilized within the dominion to stimulate Canadian industry and develop the national resources. With this in view the national advisory committee expresses itself as in complete accord. The committee further indicates that, in view of the relatively limited capacity of the Canadian market to absorb the vast blocks of power contemplated by the St. Lawrence proposals, it follows that it is most important, in any arrangement which may be considered, that the development of power on the Canadian side should not exceed the capacity of the Canadian market to absorb it.

I wish to make clear again the circumstances in which these communications were sent to the United States government. They arose out of the development of the St. Lawrence waterway project and the proposal that, if the government of Canada would consent to the export of large quantities of power, it might be possible to have the canalization of the St. Lawrence made at the expense of the United States rather than at the expense of Canada. This brings the matter up to the end of 1929. The statements which I have given were made prior to the passing of the order in council which approved the plans of the Beauharnois Power Company. The statements were made in order to make the position of the government clear with respect to this larger proposal before any formal approval was given to the power development plans. As I indicated in the outline I gave a few moments ago, there has been no further major discussion in this house on this question since 1929.

In the years 1930 to 1935, my right hon. friend opposite was in office. During that period one significant measure was passed by the legislature of Quebec, which reversed the policy of that province of opposition to export of power from Quebec. I have already quoted the important sections of the statute of 1926. On April 4, 1933, that act was amended to permit the export of a limited amount of power under certain conditions. I shall refer to these conditions before I conclude, but at the moment I think the house will be interested to know the position taken in 1933 by the present premier of Quebec with respect to the proposal that the act should be amended to permit the export of power from Quebec to the United States. The Quebec legislature does not happen to have a Hansard in which discussions are recorded, as is the case in this house, and I have therefore to fall back on the press report. I imagine the following report is correct, at least no exception has been taken to it so far as I know. The Montreal Gazette of April 5, 1933, reports a speech made by Mr. M. L. Duplessis, the leader of the opposition in the Quebec legislative assembly, during the debate on the bill to permit the export of power, as follows:

Mr. Duplessis said that the premier (Mr Taschereau) had declared at the time of the export prohibition legislation that once the power went to the United States it would be impossible to recall it, and to seek to do so would be a cause of war, so it was apparent that the government would not have control of the power to be exported. It meant a permanent alienation of 250,000 horse-power developed in Quebec. Already there was export of power from Cedars Rapids, and the Southern Canada Power Company also exported power to the United States. Evidently, the law had already been breached.

The second excuse was that the provincial government needs more revenue. But, demanded Mr. Duplessis hotly, was this a sufficient reason for alienation of natural resources? The conduct of the government was most regrettable, most condemnable. It meant that the United States would be aided in building up its industries, and Canadian workmen suffer from lack of employment.

"I cannot understand how the government, speaking through the voice of the distinguished minister of lands and forests, can tell the province that because it needs money it is necessary to part with our precious capital," said the opposition leader. "These resources were handed over to us as trustees, so as to insure the survival of our people, to maintain our national life, and not because we could get some revenue. We need money, but that is paying very dear for the few dollars. The minister asks for legislation to enable the government to give part of the soul of Quebec to the Americans for an annual revenue which does not represent more than a small share of the actual value of the power. The government says that things have changed, but the conditions of to-day are those made by the government, which has permitted over-capitalization, forced pulp and paper manufacturers to build new mills, permitted Sunday labour in those mills, and thereby added to the causes of the trouble. The government in 1926, following the policies preached by the opposition, adopted a policy of leasing our natural resources, and now the government asks for a return to the disastrous policy of alienation."

As to argument that the province has almost unlimited resources, Mr. Duplessis suggested that this surplus of electricity be used to electrify the countryside, supply light at cheap rates. For while 1,000 rural municipalities get electricity, he was ready to engage that the whole 1,000 complained of the rates charged. The country could be made more attractive with electricity, farming could be made to pay, and thereby a great problem would be solved, and there was also the matter of heating by electricity to be considered. Charity commenced at home, said Mr. Duplessis, and when all the things he had mentioned had been done, it would be time to consider if we had a surplus which could not be disposed of in Canada, and then the attitude to be adopted could be decided. There was talk of the need of preserving the savings of the people, but the greatest saving for the people would be to safeguard the natural resources for their benefit. What should be done was to commence rectifying the errors the government had committed in the past as much as possible, for there must be respect for rights legitimately acquired.

The present legislation meant that the richest and most accessible water powers would go to the benefit of the United States. Mr. Duplessis said the legislation was of a permanent nature, and it was to deal with a temporary condition of depression, and had it not been the premier who this session had repeatedly declared against legislation of a permanent nature to deal with temporary difficulties. The opposition was against the legislation with all its powers, and would not support a policy that was ruinous, backward and disastrous. It was asked that the lieutenant-governor in council be given the powers needed, but there had been abuses in the past, and he for one had no confidence in the lieutenant-governor in council, nor in the ability to make terms for the sale of our natural resources to the Americans. "We are of the opinion that the legislation presented is inopportune and prejudicial to the public interested," concluded Mr. Duplessis.

That, I think, is all that I need quote for the period from 1930 to 1935, except the following, which I imagine my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition will wish to have placed on record. Speaking on May 17, 1933, the then Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) said, as reported in Hansard, at page 5131:

With respect to the export of power from Canada to the United States, those who are interested will find that in 1925 the legislature of Quebec passed a statute, the preamble of which is as concise and powerful an indictment of any policy that will permit the export of power as it is possible to conceive can be put into words. No stronger indictment as to the evil consequences that will flow from permitting the export of power to the United States can be found than will be found in that statute. But the province of Quebec has not the jurisdiction over the export of any commodity from this dominion. That rests within the jurisdiction of the dominion, and this parliament passed a statute which provides for licences being given before power or gas is exported from our country.

Elsewhere in the course of the discussion my right hon. friend mentioned, I believe, that no further licences had been granted by his administration and that they had no intention of permitting further exports.

In 1934, 1935 and 1936 there were no discussions in this house. I come now to the year 1937. Last year there was a short discussion; it took place on an item in the estimates, "Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, administration of, $750." At that time the late Right Hon. Sir George Perley questioned the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler), who was then submitting his estimates, with respect to the policy of the government on the export of power. The discussion is reported, at page 2932 of Hansard of April 7, 1937, as follows:

Sir George Perley: I understand it is the policy of the government not to issue any further licences for export. . . . .

Mr. Euler: We do not grant licences to export power, except with the consent of the province concerned. We have given only this one.

Sir George Perley: I understand that. This one seems quite all right, because it involves only an exchange of power; we get back what we export. But if at the present time an application is made to the government for a licence to export a large quantity of power, what would the procedure be? What is the government's policy in that respect?

Mr. Euler: I do not know that I am in a position to say, except that I suppose each case would be judged on its merits. As a general principle, and speaking for myself rather than for the government—in fact, that is the only way I can speak—I would say it is not the policy of the government to export to another country power which might be needed in this country. However, no applications have been received, and I believe there are none before the department. About all I can say to my right hon. friend would be that we will cross that bridge when we come to it.

Later, Sir George Perley having said, with reference to some other point, "The minister does not seem to have taken that view of it,"—

Mr. Euler: . . . I cannot definitely say at this time, if the right hon. gentleman wishes me to make a direct statement, that this government is taking the absolute position that in no case whatsoever will it issue a licence to export power. I cannot say that. But I will say, as I said before, that I do not anticipate any substantial exportation of power, and certainly none which in my opinion of the government would in any way prejudice Canada's position in the future with regard to power requirements. I can give my right hon. friend no further assurance than that. I do not know of any absolute assertion by any government that as a matter of definite and conclusive fact they will not at any time export any power.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Sir George Perley: I think the minister is right in that.

Mr. Euler: I think we should consider each case on its merits.

That concludes all I wish to say with regard to the discussions which have taken place in this parliament and what appears on the record as to the views of different administrations with regard to the export of power. I have made these quotations in extenso for the reason that they bear immediately upon the question which the government had to consider last year. From what I have pointed out, I think it is clear that, after the bill of the hon. member for Leeds had passed this house unanimously, the government—all governments from that time on—assumed that further licences were not to be granted without, at least, securing the approval of parliament. The fact that the bill referred to passed its first and second readings in 1928 and all three readings in 1929 without a division, settled, I believe, in the minds of the administrations that followed—that of my right hon. friend during his time, and the present administration since we have come into office—the view, which we believed the House of Commons would take with respect to any applications, namely that, while we should not close the door wholly to any export of power, we should provide that no further licences should be granted without the approval of parliament and that, in seeking to secure such approval, each application should be considered on its merits.

Much of the discussion that took place in previous years related to developments for purposes of navigation; but out of all the discussion we reached the point where this House of Commons was agreed upon a policy of permitting future export of power only with the approval of parliament. That was the position when, in April of last year, the government received an application from the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company for the right to export 40,000 horse power to the United States, to the Aluminum Company of America at Massena, New York. The application will be found at page 65 of the white paper I tabled the other day. It was made on April 17. Some of my colleagues and myself were preparing at that time to leave for the coronation and the imperial conference, and when the application was brought to the cabinet we felt that we could not possibly give it adequate consideration in the little time that remained before we left. Accordingly we advised the parties who made the application that it would have to stand over until after the return to this country of those members of the cabinet who were going abroad.

In the application, very strong arguments were presented as to why it should be granted immediately. For example, the application set forth that it would mean a reduction in the rates to consumers of electricity in the city of Montreal, whereas, not to grant the application at once was to deny consumers in that city a reduction in rates which they otherwise would have. That presented, of course, an important consideration. While the imperial conference was in session the company renewed its application to the cabinet, stressing that the matter was of such importance that it desired to have the licence granted before the return of the ministers who were abroad. It was pointed out that unless this application were immediately granted, the company might lose altogether the chance of making an important contract which it had under negotiation. However, the members of the government in Ottawa, in the absence of their colleagues abroad, declined to grant the application and took the view that the matter must be held over until the return of the absent members when there would be a full cabinet to consider the whole question.

When we returned, this question was one of the first taken up by my colleagues and myself. The president of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company wrote me a letter in regard to the application and asked for an immediate answer to the representations that had been made. The answer I made was to the effect that, in view of the importance of the subject, and the extent to which it had been discussed in parliament in the past, the government felt that the matter would have to be discussed in parliament in the first instance.

It was in August that the president of the company communicated with me. In November another application was received, this time from Mr. Powell, the president of Aluminium Limited of Montreal. Mr. Powell called upon me personally, accompanied by his counsel, Mr. Geoffrion, and presented the representations of his company with respect to the necessity for granting their application. It was pointed out that important contracts which had international significance were being held up because of a shortage of power experienced by a concern in the United States with which the Canadian company was allied, and that unless the application were granted forthwith these contracts might be prejudiced. It was claimed that all that was being requested was the right to export surplus power going to waste in Canada. It was urged that to deny to the company the right to export surplus power to help them to meet an important demand on the other side was to take an indefensible position. It was also advanced that the proceeds which the company would obtain from exportation of power would result in additional employment at a time when employment was needed, and that it would also have its effect on consumers' rates.

These were strong representations. The government took again the same position that I have described with reference to the previous application, namely, that, however willing we might be to grant the application, we did not feel that, in the light of previous discussions in this house and the view that it had unanimously taken with respect to the bill requiring the approval of parliament in the first instance before any export should be granted, we could do other than bring the matter here to parliament before consenting to such exportation.

I have brought the matter up to the second of November. Up to that time neither my colleagues nor myself had had any knowledge whatever that any other application was likely to be forthcoming. I am making this clear because I wish the house to understand exactly how it has come about that this bill has been brought in at the present time. It has not been brought in because the government of Ontario made an application. Representations in respect of the Ontario government's application were not made until late in the month of November.

Mr. BENNETT: It is significant that in the meantime the Cedars Rapids had withdrawn their application.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That point will come out later.

Mr. BENNETT: It is in the white paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But it does not bear upon what I have in mind at the moment. What I wish to bring out is that it was November 29 before representations were made by the premier of Ontario to my colleagues and myself with respect to granting a licence to the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission to export 120,000 horse power. The position of the government had been taken, not in reference to any application from the province of Ontario, but with respect to two applications from the province of Quebec. That, I wish hon. members to see clearly, and to understand. The decision of the administration to deal at this session with the export of hydro-electric power, in a manner which would lead to a discussion of the whole subject on the floor of parliament, grew out of the two applications made by Quebec companies, one in April and the other early in November, 1937. And the decision was reached and made of record in the replies that were sent to those companies before any member of the administration had any knowledge or thought of the possibility of any application coming from the province of Ontario. I notice that the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), speaking the other night in Petrolia, sought to present an entirely different view. I marvel very much at what he said in the light of the knowledge he must have possessed of the facts. Here is what he said, as reported in the Toronto Star of March 8, 1938:

Petrolia, March 8—"Premier Hepburn frightened King so badly over the export of power from this province that now the Prime Minister of this dominion has turned right-about-face and has submitted the matter of power export to parliament." Hon. Earl Rowe, Ontario Conservative leader, made this statement here last night.

And the statement is in quotation marks. Now may I say to my hon. friend that it was not Mr. King who was frightened by Mr. Hepburn, but it was my hon. friend himself who had the life frightened out of him. What is the present position? After he fought a provincial campaign with Mr. Hepburn and was badly defeated he took to cover very quickly, and is under cover at the present time in this house. He ought to be in the Ontario house fighting his battles with the premier of Ontario there. Evidently he is too frightened for anything like that; he has come back into the fold here and is carefully protecting himself in the shelter of this house while he makes attacks of this sort outside, which are wholly unwarranted and unjustifiable. I say to my hon. friend that as far as the application from Ontario is concerned, that application had nothing whatever to do with the decision of the government to refer the question of the export of power to parliament at this session. That decision was made, as I have indicated, before any word whatever had come to the government from the province of Ontario, nor was there the slightest thought in the mind of any of us that an application would be received from that source.

I have another reason for having placed on the record these statements this afternoon. It is to make perfectly clear to hon. members, and to the members of the Ontario legislature and to the people of Ontario, why the present administration could not possibly have given any other answer than the answer it gave to the premier of Ontario when he made the application to us to give to the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario the right to export 120,000 horsepower. We were already on record in writing to these two Quebec companies that they would have to wait until parliament met and the whole question was discussed here, before we could consider their request, and that we would only grant their request if we had reason to believe our doing so would be favourably viewed by this parliament. We expressly stated that we wished to be guided by the views of parliament, recognizing that in the course of years there may be reasons for modifying policies, but equally that, if those policies are to be modified, it must be in the light of reasons sufficient for that purpose.

I now refer the house to the application of Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated, which will be found at page 57 of the white paper tabled the other day. The reply sent to that application appears on page 65 of the white paper. I wish to read that reply because it is what governs the situation. This letter was sent by myself in reply to a communication from J. S. Norris, president of Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated. The president's letter is dated Montreal, August 10, 1937. I shall not read the entire letter but shall read two paragraphs:

The proposition is a matter of business in that it affords an excellent opportunity of disposing, temporarily, of some surplus power and bringing into the Dominion of Canada a substantial amount of money which would otherwise be lost.

The granting of the export licence requested will bring to the federal government approximately $75,000 per annum, by reason of the export tax, to the Quebec government a very substantial increase in revenue, and to the electricity customers in the Montreal area the amount indicated.

. . . we bespeak your good offices toward early and favourable consideration of the matter by your government; in other words we are fearful of losing the opportunity of this sale and consequently would appreciate an early decision.

The reply I made to that communication was as follows:

Ottawa, August 14, 1937.

J. S. Norris, Esq.,
President,
Montreal Light, Heat and Power
Consolidated,
Montreal, Que.

Dear Mr. Norris:

I wish to acknowledge your letter of August the 10th, just received, with reference to the application of the Cedars Rapids Manufacturing and Power Company, a subsidiary of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company, for a licence to export 40,000 horse power to the United States, for sole use by the Aluminum Company of America, at Massena, New York.

The representations of your letter have received the most careful consideration of my colleagues and myself. I regret, however, that the government is not in a position to grant the licence, at the present time. In view of the broad question of policy involved, and the fact that the export of power to the United States has been debated at length in parliament on several occasions, the government is of the opinion that an opportunity should be afforded at the approaching session for a discussion on the subject, before any final action is taken with respect to the application of the Cedars Rapids Manufacturing and Power Company.

Yours sincerely,

W. L. Mackenzie King.

The interview with Mr. Powell, president of Aluminium Limited of Montreal, was held in my office, on November 2. In the absence of the under Secretary of State for External Affairs, the acting under secretary, Mr. Read, was present. I later asked Mr. Read to communicate to the company the views of the government as they were given after we had an opportunity of considering this second application. The following is the communication which was sent by Mr. Read to the president of Aluminium, Limited, Montreal:

Ottawa, 12th November, 1937.

Dear Mr. Powell:

May I refer to your interview last week with regard to the question of the application of the Cedar Rapids Manufacturing and Power Company, a subsidiary of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company, for a licence to export 40,000 horsepower to the United States for the sole use of the Aluminum Company of America at Massena, New York. During that interview you and Mr. Geoffrion discussed the relationship between the question of granting the export licence and the position of your company, Aluminium Limited, and its subsidiaries, especially with regard to the use of waste power developed on the Saguenay and the problem of the export markets.

The representations with regard to this matter have received the most careful consideration by the Prime Minister and his colleagues. It is a matter of regret, however, that the government is not in a position to grant the licence at the present time. In view of the broad questions of policy involved and of the fact that export of power to the United States has been debated at length in parliament on several occasions, the government is of the opinion that an opportunity should be afforded at the approaching session for a discussion on this subject before any final action is taken with regard to the application for the export licence in question.

Accordingly I have been instructed to communicate this conclusion to you for your information.

Yours sincerely,

J. E. Read,
Acting Under Secretary of State for External Affairs

R. E. Powell, Esq.,
President,
Aluminium Limited,
Montreal, P.Q.

That communication, as I have said, is dated November 12. It was not until November 26 that the premier of Ontario asked to have an opportunity of meeting my colleagues and myself to discuss the question of granting to the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission a licence for the export of 120,000 horsepower. Perhaps I should pause for a moment to make clear how the matter was brought to our attention in the first instance. My colleague the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) was in Toronto over the week end of November 21. While he was there, he had an interview with the premier of Ontario, in the course of which the premier handed him a communication which had been sent to him by the chairman of the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission giving certain facts and making certain statements with respect to the power situation in Ontario. This communication was given by the premier to the Postmaster General to bring down to me to be considered by the government as an application, or at least as the basis for an application to the dominion government for an export licence. The communication appears in the white paper at page 67. It was not until January 21 of the present year that an application was made in due form. It appears at page 72 of the white paper.

When the first communication I have referred to was received by me, I sent it to my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who informed the premier of Ontario of the two previous applications which the government had received and of the action we had taken with respect to them. The minister indicated that it would not be possible to have the matter given consideration at that time. On November 26 I received a telephone communication from the premier of Ontario asking if he might be permitted to present the application to the cabinet in person. I arranged for a special meeting with my colleagues. I had planned to leave Ottawa during the previous week for an absence of a few days, but deferred my departure in order to make possible the meeting, and I asked my colleagues to have their plans so arranged as to permit them to be present also. On November 29 Mr. Hepburn met with my colleagues and myself in my office and made what I think might be considered as an application on behalf of the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission to export 120,000 horse power.

I need not go into what was said at the interview; that is beside the point. All I think it is important to communicate to this house is that the premier of Ontario pressed very hard for an assurance from the government that we would grant the application.

In the presence of my colleagues, I read to the premier of Ontario the reply which I had made to Mr. Norris and the reply which Mr. Read had made to Mr. Powell with respect to their applications. I quoted several of the declarations of policy, which I have placed on Hansard this afternoon. I directed the premier's attention to the fact that he himself was in the house on the day in 1929 that the bill of the hon. member for Leeds was unanimously put through all its stages, and the house had decided there should be no further export until parliament had been given an opportunity of approving it. I pointed out wherein this had been the policy of all administrations from 1929 on. I intimated that in the circumstances it was impossible for the government then and there to accede to the request that had been made and that consideration of the application would have to be held over until after the assembling of parliament.

We were told that the matter was extremely urgent; that the answer must be given that day; for the reason that if it were not given that day the speech from the throne, which was already prepared and was to be delivered on the following day, would have to be changed. I intimated, in speaking with the premier of Ontario, that being a responsible ministry we held the view that as the executive we were the servants, not the masters, of parliament, and that inasmuch as parliament had repeatedly shown a special interest in this matter, and as we had stated in writing our intention to bring the matter before parliament at this session, we could take and would take no action until after an opportunity had been afforded for a full discussion on the export of power in parliament. Naturally the premier of Ontario was much disappointed at that reply. I think I have indicated all that is essential in regard to what took place, and why at that time it was not possible to meet the wishes of the premier of Ontario.

Perhaps I should conclude what I have to say by briefly summing up the reasons pro and con with respect to the granting of an application for the export of power. I hope I have made it clear that so far as the administration is concerned, we have been actuated not by personal motives in any shape or form but solely by a desire to further the public interest and to be true to what we believe to be the relation of an executive to the parliament to which it is responsible. I would now say that in our opinion not only should members of this house feel free to express their views with respect to what is wisest in the matter of granting permission for the exportation of power, but they should consider the question most carefully and should not fail to express their views in the clearest manner possible. The views which have been already expressed in this house in previous years show there can be no doubt that the question is one of the most important that at any time is likely to present itself for the consideration of parliament. It is perfectly clear that policies have tended more and more in the direction of safeguarding our electrical energy in this country; it is, however, equally clear that as time has passed it has become apparent that there may be cases where it may be wholly justifiable to grant permission for the further export of power. I would go a step further and say that there may be cases where it would be an injustice not to grant such permission, provided that the case on its merits establishes the wisdom of so doing.

With respect to the particular applications I have mentioned, the only one which has come before us since the last session of parliament, that of the company at Cedars Rapids, as the right hon. the leader of the opposition has already remarked, has been withdrawn. I am not so sure as to the application of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company, but as one is a subsidiary of the other I believe the cancellation of one application would involve the cancellation of the other.

Mr. BENNETT: It is the same organization.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This means that at the present time the government has before it for consideration only one application, namely that which comes from the government of Ontario. I hope I need not say that the attitude the government will take towards the matter is precisely the same as if the application had come from any other province of the dominion. May I point out further that in considering this matter I believe we should seek to free ourselves of any feelings of prejudice which may have been aroused as a result of discussions which have taken place. In the present measure, we are not deciding what is to be done in connection with the Ontario application, more than to state that the application can be granted only after a private bill has been introduced, has passed this house and the senate, and been given assent. To-day we are deciding what steps should be taken in the event of applications from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta or British Columbia. If possible at this stage, I should like to divest this measure at all events of any special relationship to the province of Ontario. That question can be debated when, in the event of this measure passing, we have the private bill before us.

The house must now consider the broad question of whether or not some cases may arise or have not already arisen where parliament would be justified in granting licences for the export of power. What, then, are the arguments pro and con? Possibly I could sum them up briefly.

The argument most frequently urged against the export of power is that we are parting with our natural resources; that we should not deplete our natural resources. It is stated that the natural resources are the greatest assets of a country, and that in allowing the export of power we are losing the value of a great asset. I believe the answer to the assertion is that power differs from other natural resources in that unless it is used at the time it is created it wastes and is lost forever. Nothing but surplus power, it is said, is to be thought of in connection with exportation. Once power is created, unless it is used immediately it is gone for all time.

This consideration does not apply to other resources. Exportations from our mines and our forests are exportations of national assets which may be limited in quantity. Electrical power is not so limited; the supply is not lessened by permitting export of surplus quantity. When we export power we are not parting with national capital. We do not export the rivers or the falls which create the power. They remain, and continue to function. The same is not true of copper, gold or any other natural resource which may be exported. The true parallel is found in the annual crop. In the exportation of surplus power we have something similar to the exportation of a perishable crop, because if it is not exported it is wasted for all time. It would be as reasonable, it is contended, to prohibit the export of wheat, or cattle or paper to the United States or for the United States to prohibit the export of its coal or oil to Canada. I believe the difference must be apparent, and it is a fundamental one to keep in mind in connection with any application for the export of surplus power.

The next argument is that we ought to keep power in Canada for the purpose of building up our own industries. It is stated that we should keep it for our own industrial and commercial development and, particularly, that it should be kept in the country for use in shops, factories, and for domestic use in homes for purposes of lighting, heating and motive power. There is too the argument that electrical power should be used more extensively on our farms to relieve much of the work now being done by manual labour. Especially as other fuel becomes more scarce and expensive is there the greater need to keep electrical energy in our own country. The contention is that if at this time we export power to any great extent, as time runs on it would not be available, and it would be more difficult for domestic industry to secure, at the low cost which would otherwise prevail, the power which should be available. Also it is contended we should, by retaining our power, seek to attract industries and capital to Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the Prime Minister's idea with respect to the possibility of withdrawing the right to export power, after it has been exported?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall deal with that point later. I am now trying to present both sides of the case as fairly as possible, because undoubtedly there would be no justification for asking parliament to permit the export of power only by private act unless there were cases where such private acts of parliament would be wholly justified. For that reason I am presenting the argument in this form, to make clear to the house what is to be said for and against the export of power. I do this so that the entire situation may be clear to hon. members.

The opposite side of the same shield is that, with our own power, we should not through export, help to build up competitive industry on the other side of the boundary line. It is alleged that as we send power out of the country we are helping to create industries in another country. As the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) argued on one occasion, we were sending power to build up factories in the United States and to give employment to United States labour, while our own people were unemployed.

It must be remembered that in the development of power, capital is necessary for the erection of plants in which the power can be generated. Capital must be found for transmission and installation of electrical energy before its use can become general. From where is that capital to come? It has been argued—and I believe it can be argued successfully—that some of the enterprises which have already been established in Canada for the purpose of developing power have been established with the assistance of United States capital, and that the capital would not have come to Canada had it not been for the fact that some of the power was to be exported to the United States. In other words, those who favour export contend that to establish a power development requires extensive capital, and that capital can best be secured by permitting the export of a limited amount of the surplus power, until the necessary further capital is found in the country itself to provide for additional transmission, installation and the like. It is the demand for power that brings forth the capital needed for its development. If that demand is not effective it is of little avail. If capital cannot be found at home, it is contended that by exporting surplus power developed at home employment is thereby given our own labour and additional income secured wherewith to expand and extend facilities at home.

In connection with the building up of industries elsewhere, it is important to note that apart altogether from available power, there are many other factors which must be taken into account. Power is a decisive factor in deciding the location of industry in only relatively few cases. Most industries depend upon other available materials, the accessibility to markets and in some cases the geographical location. Power is vital to certain industries, but in others it is not the most important factor. It is probably more important in the paper and aluminium industries than in most others. It has further to be kept in mind that steam power can be produced from coal and that under present day developments it is possible to have it produced at a much lower cost than could have been done heretofore. It is alleged that what will happen in the event of surplus power not being exported is simply that coal will be used to develop power from steam as a substitute. It is claimed that exported power brings revenue to the country that exports. That is one of the answers given to the statement that the export of power means that our own people are going to suffer as a consequence.

The export of power, it is claimed, increases the cost to consumers at home by limiting the quantity available at any moment, and by deferring the time when the surplus power may be used for domestic purposes. The contrary argument is that the extra sale of power enables companies to reduce costs to consumers. It was asserted in all the applications that were before the government last fall that in the event of the export of surplus power being permitted, the companies would be in a position to reduce rates to consumers. What was promised in that connection will be found at pages 57, 65 and 75, 76 and 77 of the white paper. There will also be found the answer of the companies mentioned to the assertion that the export of power may mean that the day is being postponed when consumers in our own country will get lower rates.

Mr. CAHAN: Did they suggest to what time the reduction would continue?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Every grant of permission for export should be made subject to clearly defined terms and conditions; in the granting of permission parliament would fix a definite time limit and a definite amount of power related to the quantity that is available and required in Canada. It would doubtless require that there must be reasonable belief that the surplus power to be exported would not and could not be used at home at the time of the export.

Mr. BENNETT: Within a reasonable time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Within a reasonable time. I am simply outlining the argument; I am not saying that it is substantial or otherwise. I think it is right that we should see that there are two sides to this question.

The strongest argument against the export of power is between that referred to by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), namely, that once power is exported it is difficult to retrieve; that it creates vested interests in other lands, and that international complications are almost certain to result once an effort is made to stop the export of power that has been exported for a certain length of time. As I mentioned in the earlier part of my remarks, in 1914 the governor in council found it necessary to deal with that phase of the question. The Public Service Commission of the state of New York had made representations to the effect that power which was being imported from Canadian sources could not be cut off summarily. They had given it as their opinion that the government of Canada would not be justified in stopping this export once it had been permitted for a considerable period of time. The government of Sir Robert Borden felt it necessary to take official notice of that statement and reply to it. This was done by the enactment of an order in council in which it was made quite clear that the government of Canada could not be expected to refrain from stopping the export of power at any time that it might deem it necessary to do so, and that it must be understood in the United States that any power which was being exported from Canada was being exported only by yearly licence. This yearly licence, it was asserted, was being required that exports from Canada might be considered not as creating a permanent vested right which companies operating in the United States could hold and claim, but simply a right extending from year to year.

Mr. BENNETT: That the licence meant what it said.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has there been any instance where power has been cut off? What about the large company the Prime Minister has referred to, the Niagara Hudson Company?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot go into details at the moment; I am just trying to give broad aspects requiring consideration. What I want to make clear is that that question did come up in 1914. I am not sure, as I have no personal knowledge, that during the war the question was not considered by the government of the day.

Mr. BENNETT: That is right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe there was a desire on the part of some Canadian interests to take back some of the power which was being exported to the United States. The power, I have been given to understand, was being used by industries manufacturing essential war supplies, and as the United States was friendly to Great Britain at the time, and subsequently an ally, pressure, I understand was brought to bear on the Canadian government by the government of Great Britain as well as that of the United States to allow the export of power to be continued.

Mr. BENNETT: Certain changes were made in the Massena dam.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no personal knowledge of the matter, but I believe that is correct. A significant fact, however, is that thirty years have passed since 1907, and thus far we appear to have escaped anything in the nature of serious international complications. I think our American friends fully understand the terms upon which power is being exported and will understand whatever terms may be inserted in any permission to export power that may be granted.

At the present time a question arises as to what might happen in a critical situation were large quantities of power being exported to the United States. During the last few days we have seen references in the press to alleged representations made in Washington by the New York power authorities in conference with the president and to views said to be entertained by the president concerning the significance of any extensive export of power from Canada to the United States. While there is no possibility, I imagine, of war arising at any time between this country and the United States, none of us can say that there are not possibilities at some time in the future—I hope and pray they may never arise—that the United States may be drawn into a war into which Canada may not be drawn, or conceivably that Canada might be drawn into a war into which, as for awhile was the case during the great war, the United States may not be drawn. In either case the question might arise as to how far neutrality was being preserved by the country that was not at war if, on the one hand, it was supplying power to a nation that was at war, or on the other was receiving from a nation that was at war the power to develop some of its industries producing essential war supplies. I believe that question is important enough to mention as a consideration of which account should be taken in considering possible future complications, and of course it is something that will have to be considered in the event of further exports of power.

These are all important considerations. If the house will permit me, I should like, for a few minutes after we resume, to place on the record one or two statements which bear out the contentions I have been making with respect to the pros and cons of the export of power. I hope, however, that enough has already been said to convince hon. members not only that there is ample justification for the government bringing forward this legislation at the present time but also for giving it the particular form it has, namely requiring that power shall hereafter be exported from Canada only with the approval of parliament, and that in the light of all existing circumstances and the merits of the case, realizing that there is much to be said both for and against the export of power, and that the course it may be wisest to take can best be decided only after all sides have been heard and all relevant facts carefully considered.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I had in mind before adjournment as an addition to my remarks was largely in the nature of quotations from some of the documents which are recorded in the white paper I tabled some days ago. If the house will allow me to indicate in Hansard where the quotations appear it will save the trouble of putting them at length on the record. With this permission I conclude what for the present I have to say on the subject of export of power.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): The complete and extensive review made by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) of the history of parliament's attitude to this question and the attitude of those who have spoken from time to time on the export of hydro-electric power has lightened my task, because I had intended, though to a more limited extent, to place before the house the views expressed in the way in which the right hon. gentleman has quoted them. I had not intended, however, to go into as much detail as he has done. I think it fair to say that the only conclusion which can be drawn from these quotations is that public opinion has been moving over a period of years in the direction of the limitation and perhaps the prohibition of the export of electrical power from Canada. There are two other observations which I would make in connection with the Prime Minister's speech. A considerable portion of it, I submit, would be more applicable to a private bill which might be introduced in the house to permit the export of electrical power; and as far as that is true, I do not propose to follow in detail the course the Prime Minister has adopted but will reserve the right to take an opportunity to discuss the situation if and when such a bill is introduced.

Undoubtedly hydro-electric power is a great natural resource, and the Prime Minister has stated that it may be distinguished from our other natural resources in that if it is not used it will go to waste. I think we all agree that it is the duty of the government and of parliament to deal with the natural resources of Canada in the way best calculated to serve the interests of the Canadian people, and I cannot conceive that over the long period of years during which this subject has been discussed, this distinction between hydro-electric power and other natural resources has been overlooked by those who have discussed the matter. It is not at all a new statement to make, and I have just this to say, that if it be waste not to use hydro-electric power, it would be far worse than waste to allow it to be used by the competitors of Canadian producers and industry to the disadvantage of Canadian producers, thus enabling their competitors to add another advantage to those which they already possess.

I look upon this as perhaps the most important bill that has been introduced in the house this session or that will come before parliament. It affects our dealings with one of our great natural resources and for that reason it deserves careful and serious consideration. In days gone by we have boasted of our natural resources and then we have proceeded in many cases to waste, to dissipate and to destroy them; now we are turning our attention to the conservation of these natural resources.

I propose to discuss this bill from two angles: our interest and responsibility to the Canadian people, and our relations to our great neighbour the United States. I had hoped that the attitude of the government would be the same on this occasion as it was when I introduced Bill No. 15 in 1928, on which occasion the then Minister of the Interior, speaking for the government, supported the bill and said that they were all prepared to go further and prohibit the export of power.

As far as I know, the first steps taken to control the export of power or electricity or fluid was in 1907 under the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act. That act provided for a licence to be issued under order in council. This provision of the law continued without any amendment until 1928, and in fact no amendment has yet been made. An attempt was made in 1928 to make an amendment which would have practically the same effect as the bill now before the house. Clause 1 of Bill No. 15, which I introduced, reads:

> Section five of the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, chapter fifty-four of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, is hereby repealed, and the following is substituted therefor:
> "5. No person shall export any power without approval of parliament or on any terms or conditions other than those approved by parliament.
> Provided nothing herein contained shall be deemed to affect the right of the governor in council to renew or cancel wholly or in part any licence for the exportation of power issued before the first day of January, 1929.
> Provided also that the governor in council may grant licences, or may authorize an increase in the amount of surplus power to be exported under existing licences, in cases of temporary emergency."

That, I submit, is in effect quite similar to the bill now before parliament. My bill passed this house unanimously but failed to receive approval in another part of this building. The object of the amendment on that occasion was to place the responsibility upon parliament rather than upon the governor in council. Orders in council may perhaps in some cases be considered more of a routine matter, and certainly the growing appreciation of the importance and value of hydro-electric power makes it desirable that any disposition of it should be considered by parliament rather than by the governor in council.

I think we can all recall that in the early days of the history of this country industry established itself around a waterfall. Communities were built up, stores established, and it became a centre of influence and activity. Now that is all changed. Instead of industry finding it necessary to go to the waterfall for power, the power may be transmitted very long distances to wherever industry may desire to establish itself. Whether that is to the general public advantage may be a question; but the fact remains, and must be recognized in our consideration of this matter. The necessity for conserving our natural resources was recognized, as I recall it, in 1909, when a commission on conservation was appointed by chapter 27 of the statutes of 1909. Some of the provisions of that statute are as follows:

1. There shall be a body to be known as "The Commission of Conservation," hereinafter called "the commission."

2. In addition to ex officio members, the commission shall consist of twenty members appointed by the governor in council, and who shall hold office during pleasure.

3. The Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of the Interior, the Minister of Mines and the member of each provincial government in Canada who is charged with the administration of the natural resources of such province shall be ex officio members of the commission.

10. It shall be the duty of the commission to take into consideration all questions which may be brought to its notice relating to the conservation and better utilization of the natural resources of Canada, to make such inventories, collect and disseminate such information, conduct such investigations inside and outside of Canada, and frame such recommendations as seem conducive to the accomplishment of that end.

I submit that a commission set up in the way this one was for the single purpose which it had in view, constituted as it was, non-partisan in its political character, and equipped as it was, was well qualified to give advice and to deal with matters committed to its care. And the recommendations and reports of such a commission should carry great weight with this house. Therefore I propose to quote briefly from some of the reports of this commission on this subject of hydro-electric power.

First I quote from the second report of the commission, 1911, page 113. The title of the chapter is, Opinions Given, 1910. They were dealing with the question of a proposed dam in the St. Lawrence river. The St. Lawrence Power Company, which had passed under the control of the Long Sault Development Company, was incorporated by an act of the dominion parliament on May 23, 1901. Its object was to construct a dam in the St. Lawrence and to develop hydro-electric power. The observation of the commission with respect to the particular phase of the matter now before the house was as follows:

Canadian interests are given a minimum consideration in the company's plans. Of the total available development of 600,000 horsepower only a small portion, one-sixth, would be developed on the Canadian side of the river.

The Canadian market cannot at present absorb its half of the proposed development and should power be exported to the United States the vested interests it would create there would prevent its subsequent withdrawal to meet the future needs of Canadian industries.

Then again, dealing with a bill of the St. Lawrence Power Transmission Company, which came before this parliament, they say:

The House of Commons amended the bill so that the company could neither acquire water powers, generate electricity nor export it from the country.

Then I refer to the eighth report of that commission at page 183, Our Water Powers and Industrial Development, by Leo G. Denis, hydro-electric engineer, commission of conservation:

The war has awakened Canadians to a realization of the natural resources of their country. It has thrown us back upon ourselves in a way which perhaps no other one thing could possibly have done. It has shown us that we must be less wasteful in the use of our resources and must devote more attention to their more adequate development. If we are to retain our place industrially we must learn to do for ourselves what others have been doing for us. The time has surely arrived when we should work out our industrial independence and prepare for the industrial struggle that must follow the war, otherwise it is more than likely we will lapse into our old helpless dependence and never realize our destiny of becoming a really great industrial nation.

Again at page 189:

Canada is by no means backward in hydro-electric development. With but few exceptions all our principal cities and by far the greater number of our towns and villages are supplied with hydro-electric energy, while the electro-chemical industries centred at Niagara, Shawinigan and elsewhere evidence the development in that direction. Nevertheless with proper direction and encouragement this could be greatly increased. An example of this is given in the electro-chemical field where although exact figures are not available it is safe to say that more hydro-electric energy is exported for this industry than is used in Canada for the same purpose.

Industries in which the cost of power is but a small factor in the total cost of production do not benefit greatly from cheap power. While cheap power is an attraction to all industries, other things being equal those requiring the largest amount figured on a basis of the value of their product will naturally be more interested.

Again at page 227, The Water Power Situation in Canada, by Arthur V. White, consulting engineer of the commission, speaks along the same line and emphasizes the value of hydro-electric power.

All the recommendations in these reports that I have been able to find emphasize the value and importance of hydro-electric power, and are against the export of it from Canada. The reasons which they give were, I submit, sound then, and if they were sound then they are stronger now, because the use of hydro-electric power has expanded. We are finding new uses for it every day, and the extent to which it will be used and required is bound to increase as the years go by. All these recommendations are in favour of a restriction or prohibition of the export of hydro-electric power.

The other feature I wish to emphasize is the importance of the policy in relation to the United States. Our international relations are a matter of tremendous importance to Canada. The necessity of at all times being on good terms with our neighbours to the south needs only to be stated to be admitted and, on different occasions has been emphasized by the right hon. the Prime Minister. Much has been done to ensure the maintenance of these good relations by the appointment of joint commissions and international commissions for the purpose of solving amicably any questions which may arise.

The export of hydro-electric power has been the subject of a declaration and of an attitude taken by a responsible authority in the United States. The Prime Minister referred to it this afternoon, and I propose to make a further reference to it. The Prime Minister referred to P.C. 2203 of August 25, 1914, which states:

The committee of the privy council have had before them a report dated June 16, 1914, from the Right Hon. the Secretary of State for External Affairs, calling attention to a recent opinion of the Public Service Commission of the State of New York in the matter of the application of the Canadian-American Power Corporation for permission to import an additional 46,000 horsepower of electrical energy from Canada into the United States.

The minister observes that the opinion, in discussing the laws and regulations of the Dominion of Canada relating to the exportation of electrical energy and their effect on the question of granting the desired permit, uses the following language:

"Government Limitations Upon the Export of Electric Power from Canada

The Canadian government requires the taking out of a yearly licence permitting exportation of Niagara electric power. Upon the limitations existing as to the exportation of electric power from Canada into the United States, it appears that for many years, under the so-called Burton Act, and by action of the Canadian government a very large amount of Canadian-produced Niagara electric power has been and is now being imported into this country at and about the Niagara frontier, and is being distributed for light and industrial power and railroad purposes within the State of New York in many places, embracing Syracuse to the east, the southwestern part of the state, territory south of Lake Ontario and Buffalo, and Niagara Falls in the west. The companies distributing this imported power have issued stocks and bonds in very large amounts based upon their business of distributing Canadian power. This applicant is now seeking to enter the same field. Without going into details, it seems sufficient to say that the prohibition of exportation from Canada of this present electric power which now comes into this country would paralyze business and industry of many kinds and would deprive numerous localities of electricity for light. American-produced Niagara power is so far from supplying the vital needs of the section of the state above described that the immediate results of such prohibition would plainly amount to a great public calamity.

The form of securing a licence yearly from the dominion government is required by the dominion law, but such licence has been granted yearly to the other great producing electrical corporations of Canada, and no reason appears for apprehension that any discrimination would be made against the Electrical Development Company or the Toronto Power Company, lessee. We have nothing before us but the suggestion that the Dominion of Canada may at some future time forbid this exportation. This commission must assume that international relations affecting so important a subject as the means of continuing great industries which have grown up in reliance upon the use of this imported power, and as well the interests of the Canadian producing companies themselves, have become fixed and subject only to such changes as will fully protect the great commercial and industrial interests and rights now served by this power brought from Canada. The time has long since passed when governments proceed ruthlessly from pure national rashness or anger to destroy the settled accepted commercial relations and formally vested rights of persons and corporations."

That is the end of the quotation. The order in council then continues:

The minister further observes that from the foregoing it is conceivable that some misapprehension may exist as to the scope and effect of the action of the government of Canada with respect to the exportation of electrical energy and as to the object toward which such action has been and is directed.

That object is apparent from and indeed is embodied in the laws, regulations, and procedure under which this government has hitherto permitted such exportation and by virtue of which alone electrical energy is exported from Canada.

The Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act provides that no person shall export electrical energy without a licence, or otherwise than as permitted by such a licence; that subject to the regulations made by him in that behalf, the governor in council may grant licences; that licences shall be revocable upon such notice to the licencee as the governor in council deems reasonable in each case; that any licence may provide that the quantity of power to be exported shall be limited to the surplus after the licencee has first provided for Canadian consumers to the extent defined by the licence; that every such licence shall be revocable at will by the governor in council if the licencee neglects to comply with any of the conditions imposed with regard to the supply and distribution of power in Canada; that the governor in council may make regulations for giving effect to the objects and intention of the act.

By order in council of the 4th of November, 1907, regulations were established to give effect to the act. Under these regulations licences to export electrical energy must be applied for on or before the 1st day of April of each year, and are, therefore, valid only for one year. It is further ordered that any licence issued shall be revocable at will by the governor in council if the licencee neglects to comply with any of the conditions from time to time imposed by the governor in council with regard to the supply and distribution of electrical energy in Canada; and, moreover, that whenever such electrical energy is required for the use of purchasers in Canada any such licence shall be revocable upon such notice to the licencee as the governor in council deems reasonable in each case.

Under established procedure the licences granted have invariably directed attention to the fact that they were granted by virtue of The Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act and the regulations made thereunder, and for some years past have expressly pointed out that as they were granted for only one year licencees must not enter into any contract which they would be unable to fulfil if the licence should not be renewed, or if the act, or the regulations made thereunder, should be changed.

The effect of these laws and the procedure is clear, and it must be abundantly apparent what the object of this government has been and is. Power or energy generated from streams in Canada, has been as it must be, regarded primarily as a natural resource of the country to be developed and utilized to the utmost possible extent for the benefit of the country. And it was recognized that while it was consistent with that view to permit exportation so long as the demand in Canada for power should not be sufficient to absorb the whole production, yet it could be permitted only in such manner and on such terms as did not conflict with the ultimate necessity of securing and preserving this natural resource for the use of the people of Canada if and when needed by them.

In view of this object clearly embodied in the laws and regulations referred to, it seems hardly necessary to point out that the securing of a licence each year, so far from being a matter of mere "form," is one of substantial significance. Nor can it be admitted that, by reason of the existence of industries elsewhere which have used electrical energy exported from Canada, there has been created a condition or status which in any way involves an obligation on the part of this government to permit a permanent diversion of this natural resource from the country. For it is the fact that all electrical energy exported from Canada has been exported only by virtue of The Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act and the regulations made in pursuance of it; and not only are these, as laws of the Dominion of Canada, within the notice of those interested, but the minister is advised that it has been the invariable practice of the officers administering the act to inform licensees that they should notify all persons, with whom they might enter into contracts to supply electrical energy, of the terms and conditions imposed by the act and the regulations, and that in fact all such persons have been so notified. Their use of the electrical energy has, therefore, been subject to and in full recognition of the contingency contemplated by the act as above pointed out.

But though it is impossible to accept the suggestion, if indeed such a suggestion is intended, that anything in the nature of a vested right has been acquired, it is nevertheless recognized that many consumers who have been using Canadian exported electrical energy may have placed themselves and their business activities in such a relation to this supply of energy that any sudden, complete cessation of it would entail great inconvenience and possible hardship. This is, of course, a consideration which should receive every respect consistent with the duty of this government ultimately to secure for this country the best benefits of the natural resources appertaining to it. The regulations established to give effect to The Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act themselves provide that in the event that the exported electrical energy is required for the use of purchasers in Canada licences shall be revocable only upon reasonable notice. In accordance with the spirit of this provision, and it need scarcely be added, with every desire and intention to avoid anything that could be regarded elsewhere as an arbitrary exercise of power, the most careful consideration is being given to the question of the terms and notice on which the undoubted right of this government to terminate at any time the exportation of electrical energy may best be exercised so as to entail the least possible inconvenience to those concerned.

And while the effect and intention of the laws and regulations above referred to are apparent from their face and neither need nor will have gained anything from re-statement, yet Your Royal Highness's advisers are desirous that no injury or hardship should accrue through a misapprehension on the part of the consumers who have used or hereafter will use electrical energy exported from Canada, however unfounded that misapprehension may be.

The committee, therefore, advise, on the recommendation of the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that a copy of this minute, if approved, be forwarded to His Majesty's Ambassador at Washington with the request that he make representations to the United States government in the sense thereof in order that the matter may properly be brought to the attention of whatever persons or interests are concerned.

All of which is respectfully submitted for approval.

(Sgd.) Rodolphe Boudreau,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

I would draw particular attention to the paragraph which points out that it was considered necessary to send this to His Majesty's Ambassador at Washington, in order that representations might be made in the right direction in connection with this position. Here, I think, is a plain warning as to the attitude likely to be taken by the users of power in the United States, if exported from Canada, even under an annual licence and with the distinct provision in the licence that it may be cancelled at any time. I say that, because those were the very provisions which were in the licences referred to in this memorandum. With that warning before us, I say we should be very careful of the action we take in connection with the export of hydro electric power.

The sixth annual report of the commission of conservation to which I have referred, quotes this very memorandum at page 146, and refers to the Burton Act of the United States which dealt with the importation of hydro electric power from Canada. Again there is contained the warning against the export of hydro electric power. I quote from page 147 of this sixth report:

> The Burton Act empowered the issuance of revocable permits for the transmission of additional electric energy from Canada into the United States, and it may further be emphasized that the Canadian measure—the Fluid Exportation Act—provides that licences for the export of power from Canada are also revocable. What, then, is the real import of a statement such as is recorded by the Public Service Commission of the State of New York? It, in effect, proclaims that the people of New York need not be concerned about permits and licences, revocable or otherwise. It states plainly that, if they can only succeed in once getting this electric energy from Canada into the United States, and have it distributed so that their citizens and industries become dependent upon it, then Canada could not hope to alter these conditions. In the words of the commissioners, the conditions in the state would "have become fixed, and subject only to such changes as will protect the great commercial and industrial interests and rights now served by electric power brought from Canada," that is to say, as will protect "the great commercial and industrial interests and rights" in the United States.

That was the view taken by the commission at that time, upon this memorandum referred to in this order in council. Again I say that in this house, desiring to maintain at all times the most amicable relations and to avoid anything having the semblance of friction or misunderstanding, we should be very careful indeed in the matter of this export of hydro electric power, particularly in view of this warning that has been given both by the power commission of the state of New York and by our own commission of conservation.

It has been pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that there may be some temporary financial advantage in the export of hydro-electric power. Well, it is difficult to say just where that advantage is to be found, whether with the consumer or with some company desiring to export power. We ought, however, to weigh any temporary financial advantage against any possible future complication, and we should take the long view of the matter rather than the short view. Taking the long view, and considering also the tendency of industrial development and the added uses to which hydro-electric power may be put, I submit that it is not in the interests of the Canadian people to export hydro-electric power at this time. This matter is, I understand, receiving some attention in the United States. I have reason to believe, from something I read in the newspapers, that the president himself is giving the matter some attention, and that it is causing him some concern. I believe he sees in it possible complications and difficulties in the future.

If I wanted to give an example of the desirability of retaining Canadian resources and the difficulty of getting them back once they have gone from Canada, I think I might not inappropriately refer to the diversion of water at Chicago. There is an instance where there is not a licence or a permit; where there is no authority whatever, and where the supreme court of the United States has directed a reduction in the amount of the diversion. The question has been the cause of long, extended negotiations and discussions between the government here and the government at Washington; yet we have not succeeded in terminating that diversion, which is to the disadvantage of the Canadian people. I contend that if this condition prevails when there is no authority and no right, if a licence is granted and power is exported under that licence it would be very much more difficult to get that power back when it is required here than it has been to lessen the diversion of water at Chicago.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, in essence and principle this bill is the same as the one I introduced and which passed this house. I believe it should commend itself to the favourable judgment of the house, and I propose to support it on the second reading.

Hon. W. EARL ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, undoubtedly the bill which is now before the house deals with one of the most important national issues that have come before parliament this year, an issue which, in the words of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) may be more important than perhaps any other matter that may come forward this session. Before dealing with the bill, however, I feel that I should reply to the reference to myself made by the Prime Minister in his remarks this afternoon. With all due respect to the press, which seldom makes a mistake, I wish to make it clear to him, that what I said at Petrolia the other day was not quoted quite exactly, and before I conclude my address I shall repeat just what I said at that time. When the right hon. gentleman suggested that I ran for cover and came to this parliament, it occurred to me that no man should know more about running for cover than he does, because I well recall the days when he had to run to cover from his own county in order to get elected to this house. He ran from Waterloo to Prince Edward Island, from Prince Edward Island to North York, and from North York he went as far as he could, to Prince Albert, in order to get elected to this house.

Mr. GOLDING: He was not leading a party in another house.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): No; but I wish to say to my hon. friend that I sat in this house when the right hon. Prime Minister had no seat here, and was still leading his party. May I say also to my hon. friend that I have been elected more often for my riding than he has been elected for his. I might also say that had I run for cover I would probably be in the legislature at the present time. But I think those who know my record best know that I have run for cover very little, and since 1925 I have been elected in my own riding more often than any other hon. member in the house has been.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I deny that.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I am excluding such supreme characters as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), who has gone back to his electors time after time to be reelected as a minister. Why, he being Minister of Justice and with the great record he has, we would not even have defeated him in our own riding. However, I wish to say that I am not as easily frightened as the right hon. Prime Minister might suggest. I have not been in politics as long as the right hon. gentleman, but I am not at all frightened nor do I run for cover either from either the little premier of Ontario or the great Prime Minister of Canada himself.

The bill that is now before the house deals with an issue which we all recognize as being of great national concern to-day, and one which may be of great international concern to-morrow. Under this new state of affairs, this new parliamentary procedure that is going to be put into force, of course we shall have an opportunity to discuss in more detail the merits and demerits of power export as such when any of these private bills are presented to parliament. Therefore it is not my purpose, to deal with the merits of power export in itself, nor could I do so under the rules of this parliament. I realize that, by the rules of parliament, on the second reading of a bill I am constrained to discuss the merits of the bill itself, and, as the Prime Minister very properly said this afternoon, its broader principles. I hope, however, that before the bill is brought into the house for third reading, hon. members will be able to ascertain more clearly the desires and purposes of the government, so that they may know more definitely whether the bill is carelessly drafted or cleverly devised.

The Prime Minister reviewed the chief feature of the whole issue, namely the surplus power. It was said that this bill is the same as that introduced by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart). Why, Mr. Speaker, the word "surplus" is clearly and somewhat cleverly, carefully or carelessly dropped from the clause in relation to the export of power, except in the single instance where it is for temporary or emergency purposes.

I feel, however, that there is one thing more in the bill that is a little less conspicuous than that. That is the way in which the government have evaded their own responsibility in this great national issue. I repeat what the Prime Minister has said, that this is a great national issue, perhaps the most important matter to come before this parliament. As I sat and listened this afternoon to the right hon. gentleman, I could not help thinking that I have never before listened to anyone talk so long about an issue so great and say so little. I compliment the right hon. gentleman upon that art, for he has long since established a record in this regard, but not even his most ardent supporter sitting behind him—

Mr. BRADETTE: Is the hon. member trying to do the same thing?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Not even my hon. friend who has just spoken knows how his right hon. leader is going to vote on this great national issue. This issue is of tremendous national concern; this issue has been growing every year. It enters more and more into our domestic life and into our great industrial life. Surely an issue of such magnitude is worthy of some leadership by the Prime Minister of the day, a Prime Minister with a top-heavy government behind him of 170 members. When have we seen in this house a Prime Minister use a private bill to cover up government responsibility?

I realize that if I said that this was almost the same as using a private bill to deal with tariff matters, someone would immediately say, "Oh, no, that is a different matter." May I remind the house that it might just as well be suggested that the national policy of this country in connection with immigration or any other complicated international problem should be ushered into this house by means of a private bill in order to relieve the government of responsibility. I have never run for cover in that way, but I say to the Prime Minister that so far as this issue is concerned, he ran for cover in major style.

The procedure of parliament and the responsibility of government are involved in this matter. We heard the Prime Minister this afternoon quote from Doctor Beauchesne's book. I think he could have gone to any other set of rules; I think he could have quoted the experiences in the older parliament in Great Britain, and they would all have shown that a private bill, such as these private divorce bills that come before the house, must deal with a person, a corporation, a municipality or a district. Yet we have a matter of national concern, a matter which may in time become of international concern, brought before us in the form of a private bill. I said in Lambton that the Prime Minister perhaps was frightened and was taking refuge behind a private bill rather than saying where he stood. We heard what he said this afternoon to the effect that he had made up his mind in November to bring this issue before parliament; we knew that before this afternoon; but I venture to say that some of his supporters did not know until very recently that this matter was to be brought in dressed up as a private bill. This great government with 170 members behind it—

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): "Hear, hear," says the brave Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie).

Mr. CRERAR: He did not say that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I did not say a word.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The Minister of National Defence, the whip and the Prime Minister sit with 170 members behind them and bring up in parliament, hiding behind the petticoats of a private bill, one of the greatest issues to be brought up this year. It is true that some time ago a similar bill reached second reading in this house; but inasmuch as this bill gives to parliament an authority which has often been exercised by order in council, it also transfers government responsibility to a private bill. I submit that while this may be a gesture toward parliamentary freedom, it is not much of a compliment to responsible government.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

An hon. MEMBER: There is one supporter.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): My hon. friends think there should be more noise, but may I submit that those who make the most noise sometimes think the least. So far as the principles of this bill are concerned, I submit that the main point is the procedure of parliament. The Prime Minister cannot refer to any other instance where a matter of great national concern has been ushered into this house by a private bill. I believe he is justified in bringing the matter before parliament; but where is government responsibility in connection with this issue?

We have heard repeatedly that this is one of our most outstanding issues. We have heard repeatedly that it is growing in prominence every year. We know now that electricity is brightening the homes in the countryside just as it brightens the homes in the cities. We know it is turning the machines in the farm barns just as it turns the vast machines in our factories. It is a recognized fact on both sides of the border that where you have cheap power, there will population be found. In proof of this all you have to do is to look at the map. Great centres of population will be found in the Niagara district and along the St. Lawrence. This fact has been recognized by both countries. I can well remember being in this house when the so-called Sifton interests brought up a private bill in connection with the Georgian Bay canal. May I remind the house of such eminent citizens as Sir Clifford Sifton referring to the export of power and stating:

> The suggestion that power can be generated on the Canadian side, and exported to the United States, and that thereafter, when it is required in Canada, the company can be ordered to deprive United States customers of the power and deliver it in Canada, is entirely illusory.

There are other instances where outstanding citizens, both in this country and across the border, have expressed the same thought. Some years ago, when there was a surplus of power, the following statement appeared in the 1920 report of the Bankers' Trust Company:

> The water powers of Canada have been thoroughly investigated and are intelligently administered. The combination of cheap power, favourable living conditions for labour and good labour markets, is rapidly transforming Canada from a country which a few years ago was almost wholly agricultural to one in which the manufacturing interests are of great and growing importance.

Mr. Henry L. Stinson, secretary for war of the United States, stated:

Canada, if we do not take it—

That is, the power.

—will use the entire amount. . .It would result in giving to Canada very possibly a large number of industries, which otherwise would be established on this side of the Niagara falls.

I am not going to weary the house at the present time with statements which, perhaps, have already been placed on Hansard. But I wish to point out, Mr. Speaker, that there are those in your great province of Quebec who in the past have held similar opinions. The late popular Minister of Justice, Hon. Sir Lomer Gouin, said some years ago:

The export of power from Canadian sources to industrial districts in the north eastern section of the United States would place at the disposal of United States industrialists a Canadian raw material from the sale of which the profits to Canada would not be large, but which would be used as an element for cheap production to bring Canadian industries into still further disadvantage in competition with those across the border.

There are others in your province, sir, who have referred to the advantage of retaining power here for the development of our own resources, among them no less than the Hon. Maurice Duplessis himself, who stated in 1933:

Natural resources are a heritage to be preserved for the people of Quebec and not to be sold to the United States for the sake of putting a few cents in the government's pocket.

Once exportation of electricity to the United States is permitted, it will never be possible to halt. It is a complete alienation for the benefit of the stronger.

The Montreal Standard stated in 1930:

The export of power is followed by an exodus of population to the centres supplied by that power.

I do not intend to read all that was said by the greatest hydro-electric power authority Canada has ever known, the late Sir Adam Beck. I shall read merely a couple of short sentences from a long interview which he gave when he was feeling very strongly on this issue. He said:

To export power to the United States would foster and build up industries in the eastern United States at the expense of those in Canada.

Canadian cities and rural communities would be deprived of further low-cost power.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the date of that? Where was that interview given?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): It was given in 1925.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): May I inquire from where the hon. member took this quotation of a statement by the present premier of Quebec?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I took it from a press report of a speech delivered by Mr. Duplessis in the legislature of Quebec, when speaking on the Mercier bill, on April 5, 1933.

Mr. VIEN: Is he of the same opinion today?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I have not been talking to him lately.

Those in this country who have had experience of the export of power at different times will recall that the late Right Hon. Sir George Perley, who formerly sat in this place in the house, stated clearly his conclusions on the subject; and may I point out that there is not an hon. member who will say that the late Sir George Perley was not sound and unbiased on most questions. He stated that it was most difficult to recall grants of power and that he was utterly opposed to its export. I shall not read from his somewhat lengthy statement, excepting this passage:

As a matter of fact, we learned from sad experience that when we gave authority to export power we could not stop its exportation when we wanted to. It so happens that I was one who had a great deal to do with the granting almost the first application for the export of power to the United States. That happened many years ago. We went over the papers very carefully and it was therein stated, as definitely as words could make it, that the export of power could be stopped on proper notice whenever the government of Canada wished to do so, or whenever the power was required in this country. But when it came to the time when we wanted the power, during the war, the United States took the ground that industries in that country had been built up through the use of the power and that it would be an unfriendly act on our part to discontinue the export of it. I take it that from that time forward everybody was pretty well agreed that it was not in the interests of Canada to grant licences for the export of power, even if it was not required by us at that particular time.

There are many other declarations to which I might refer, but I wish only to point out that all through the years both parties in this house have had one fixed policy. Neither party has ever ushered in its policy behind a private bill. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) stated some time ago in a speech:

Export licences should not be granted, this being the settled view of the country.

That, Mr. Speaker, is definite policy; that is the responsibility of a party leader. There is more in that one sentence than we listened to this afternoon in three hours from the Prime Minister so far as policy is concerned. However, the Prime Minister himself a very short time ago, in February, 1929, said:

What I wish to make clear at the moment is that with respect to any projected St. Lawrence development, this parliament may take it as definitely settled and understood between the United States and Canada that power generated on the St. Lawrence and belonging to Canada will not be exported to the United States but will be used for the development of our industries and our natural resources.

Surely nothing can be plainer so far as the house is concerned than that both parties have had settled views and definite policies with reference to the export of power.

Let me cite one other authority, Sir Henry Drayton, who was power commissioner during the great war. What were his experiences? The difficulties experienced during those years made both parties more steadfast in their opposition. Sir Henry Drayton said:

The first question that was taken up—

In 1917.

—was the release of power exported by Canada into the United States. It was found that it was entirely impossible to have any of this power released owing to war conditions.

He stated in this house in 1923:

It is perfectly clear that not only the government can but should see to it that no further licences are granted for the export of electric power.

There is no doubt as to where our parties have stood in the past and as to where their policies have led. I realize that this government had a policy in the past. Three times it has declared its policy. The Prime Minister stated, this afternoon, once when parliament was sitting they refused to grant an export licence, twice when parliament was not sitting they did the same thing. Three times during the last year the present government has had courage enough to say no, to follow what had been the fixed policy of both parties. If I were as desirous of running for cover as the Prime Minister intimated this afternoon that I was, would I be as strong for this policy of preserving our own resources in our own country at this time? I know what will be said in Ontario about cheaper hydro rates; but I contend that we should have a strong policy on a large issue such as this, and I say definitely—I say this in advance to those who may think I would run to cover on this issue—that I am opposed to the export of power, because I know that power, if exported, will develop cities in a country not our own. It is the thin end of the wedge. But why this change of heart at this time? The Prime Minister will say that there is no change of heart, but at any rate there is a change of front. The present government refused three times during the past year, once when parliament was in session and twice in the recess, to do what it now seeks to do. If it was government policy to refuse then when parliament was not sitting, why is it government fear now? Why ask a private member to introduce a bill? Why did the right hon. gentleman speak for three hours this afternoon and as the man who is chiefly responsible refuse to tell the house where he stands? Will he tell us now whether he would vote for export or not?

Mr. GRAY: Is the hon. member opposed to this?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Perhaps I was unfair when I said that the Prime Minister was frightened; perhaps that was not the word I should have used. I have never seen him frightened.

An hon. MEMBER: What is there to prevent a national issue being brought into the house?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I grant at once that this is the right place in which to bring up national issues, but I say that the government should assume the responsibility for such issues.

Mr. GRAY: Is the hon. member opposed to the bill?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I am opposed to the evasion of governmental responsibility as evidenced by this bill. I quite agree that a matter of this sort should be brought before parliament.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I quite agree with that; but there is a vast difference between an issue such as we have before us being introduced by the government and it being brought forward in the form of a private bill. Such a procedure would not be allowed in the British House of Commons and it should not be allowed here.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): My hon. friends laugh.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): And Canada will laugh. The Prime Minister himself indicated this afternoon the reason why an issue of this sort should be sponsored by the government when he pointed out the difference between a private bill, which concerns the welfare of private persons or corporations, and an issue such as this, which is of great concern to the country at large. It affects not only the homes of private citizens but great national enterprises, not only one district or the economy of one province, but the development of a country. This is a national issue just as much as is the fiscal policy of the country; it is as much a national issue as is immigration. I wonder what is becoming of parliamentary procedure and the authority of parliament if a government with 170 members behind it cannot assume responsibility where a national issue is concerned but takes shelter behind a private bill.

An hon. MEMBER: One hundred and seventy-nine members.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I beg your pardon—one hundred and seventy-nine. I am sorry that the Prime Minister's feelings were hurt by my saying he was frightened. During the last thirteen or fourteen years I have seen him in difficult situations in the house and have never seen him unduly frightened, and I must compliment him on his level-headed approach. But I can tell him that I, too, have been in difficult places. I just wonder whether he had more reason to be frightened than he told the house this afternoon; for it will be recalled the premier of Ontario some time ago made reference to the attitude of the government at Ottawa and, according to the Windsor Daily Star of December 17, he was reported as follows:

> The federal government's opposition to export of power application is due wholly to pressure being brought to bear on Ottawa by Washington to force Ontario's and Quebec's hands on the development of the St. Lawrence deep waterways.

He stated further in the same interview:

> Mr. King, in referring the matter to parliament, is again taking the line of least resistance.

He then said that he would make public Ottawa's attitude in respect to hydro's back-to-Niagara policy.

Mr. FRASER: It put you back in this house.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Let me tell the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Fraser) that what Mr. Hepburn should have said was that he had his back to Niagara and his face to Montreal, and my hon. friend co-operated with him in the greatest betrayal of public confidence the province has ever known.

Mr. FRASER: It still helped to put you back into this house.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I do not need any help from my hon. friend. More than that, I stand here to-night with as much right as the hon. gentleman, and I have been endorsed by my own ridng as often as he has been in his—yes, and as someone says, with less expenditure. But if I had been artful in running for cover I could have found a seat in Ontario. I preferred, however, not to desert my own riding.

I would not refer to these matters but for the fact that the Prime Minister this afternoon seemed to suggest that his wild, reckless, ill-founded statements frightened me. An array of cabinet ministers went through Ontario to help the new premier—

An hon. MEMBER: The old premier; he is still premier.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The premier of that province is further reported as follows:

> Furthermore, when visiting President Roosevelt last spring, Mr. King stopped en route and spent an hour in my office in futile effort to persuade me to accede to the request of Mr. Roosevelt on the St. Lawrence waterways.
> He said that if I did not, Mr. Roosevelt might retaliate in the matter of trade barriers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend now read what I said in reply to that particular statement.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The Prime Minister took up three hours this afternoon and he should have put it on the record. He cannot expect me to finish his speech for him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says I took three hours. He forgets that half an hour was taken up by one of his own friends on a question of privilege. I did not begin speaking until half-past three.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Half an hour is not much to the Prime Minister, as I have heard the right hon. gentleman speak for four hours and not say any more than he said this afternoon. The premier of Ontario, on reading, in Mr. Lyon's summary of the matter, the sentence, "Mr. King expressed no opinion himself," stated that this was characteristic of the right hon. gentleman:

> That's why we couldn't go back to Niagara, he explained.

He did not say that was why he went to Montreal. He said:

> Mr. King is taking made-in-Washington policies and trying to force them on Ontario. Mr. King has never been friendly to Ontario, as I happen to know as member of the House of Commons. I was there when he made his "Never a five cent piece" speech. Mr. King is still licking his wounds suffered in personal defeats in ridings in this province. They have never healed, even though for the first time in his political career, this province sent him a majority in the last federal election.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What has that to do with this bill?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Just as much as it had to do with it when the Prime Minister told the house this afternoon that I ran for cover and had to come back to this house. This has to do with this bill—

An hon. MEMBER: That hurt!

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): No; it did not hurt as much as you think. But these are some of the statements that have caused this change of front; these are some of the statements that prompted the Prime Minister and the government of the day not to continue with their policy to submit the question to parliament but to devise a scheme to evade their responsibilities.

After the long speech we heard this afternoon, where do the government stand to-day? They are afraid to continue to say no, and they seem to be ashamed to say yes. Are they going to give their consent to the export of power or leave it to parliament, this government with 170 of a majority, groping in the dark for someone to lead them on a national issue? There is more fear and uncertainty demonstrated in the government's attitude on this issue than we have seen for a long time. It is all very well to tell the people of Canada that this is to be a democratic exercise of the rights of parliament, but may I point out in conclusion—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I take this as a compliment, Mr. Speaker, because some of the hardest boiled politicians across the way do not seem to like it. I shall not embarrass the Prime Minister—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, do not worry.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): —with any further statement, but I know that these challenges, threats, defiances and insults which have been thrown out by the premier of Ontario have left him somewhat worried. Mr. Hepburn says, "If they want a fight they are going to get a fight." To-day not only is this government embarrassed about what the premier of Ontario has said, but it is afraid of what he is going to say if it does not grant his request, and that is why it hides behind a private bill. He said further, "If the federal government turns down our request, we are going to challenge the validity of their legislation in the courts." And when the Prime Minister knows that the premier of Ontario does not care anything for the decisions of the court, then he is ashamed to say yes and afraid to say no. We have never seen a greater spectacle of irresponsibility in this parliament than we are seeing at the present time. Again I ask and pause for the Prime Minister to tell the house and the country where he stands on this great national issue. Is there anyone within sound of my voice who will say it is not a great national issue? Is it not of as much concern as any other of our great natural resources?

We have watched the pulpwood go down the streams; we have watched the premier of Ontario dig his canals illegally, flout the authority of parliament, ignore the Minister of External Affairs and the Prime Minister's prerogative. We have watched him negotiate with another country in his letter to congress; we have watched him defy this parliament. We see him worried about the St. Lawrence waterway for fear it will take some freight from the railways, but he digs a canal in northern Ontario illegally to float down the river logs that were formerly carried by the railways. That is the reason we see in this country 20,000 more men employed in primary industries than in 1929 but 80,000 less employed in industrial activities. Why? Because of that same laissez-faire attitude which will allow cattle to be sent out of this country on foot and allow to be imported 60,000 in cans manufactured in another country; just as they send out of this country raw pulpwood and bring back seven or eight hundred thousand or a million more magazines than were coming in when they came into power; magazines teaching our children a culture, patriotism and loyalty that are not our own, teaching them a pride that is not a Canadian pride. These magazines are printed on paper made from raw logs cut in this country, floated down the streams, robbing our railroads of revenue.

This is the thin end of the wedge, and I ask the Prime Minister to-night, now that he has reviewed the history and position of this important question, this great national issue, What is his position? Why does he not state it? Is it because he is afraid of the greatest lobby that has ever been seen in this parliament? Is it because he is afraid of the same private power interests, of Beauharnois, that threatened him when he made the statement here that he would never be in favour of power going out of this country? At that time we had more power than we knew what to do with, but when the private bill comes before parliament I shall endeavour to show that there is no surplus in Ontario for export and that there will be a shortage before 1941. I ask hon. members to read Doctor Hogg's speech and they will see that before 1942 we shall be short of power in Ontario. This is day to day politics. Why do the government hesitate on this great national issue? Is it because they are afraid of the private interests, of Beauharnois, or is it because they are afraid of what the premier of Ontario has said or of what he is going to say, afraid of his threats, afraid of his challenges, afraid of his defiances?

Mr. Speaker, I urge the Prime Minister to-day, before this bill goes through this chamber, to tell the house and tell the country where he stands on this issue. Where does he stand on an issue that concerns the development of a great country, an issue that may be not only of concern to this country to-day but of international concern to two great countries in the future? It affects your province, it affects my province; it affects your country and my country. All you need do is to look at the aluminum plant; I am not sure what riding Arvida is in, but there is not an hon. member from the province of Quebec but can see that this is the thin end of the wedge, the development of power to be sent across the line. True it will give some employment to our men here in building the plant, but it will give many times as much employment across the line. It has been estimated that power used will give eight times more employment than power developed. I believe in developing power to give eight times the employment here rather than in foreign countries.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Ever since I have been a member of this house I have taken a very great interest in the question of the export of hydro-electric power. This afternoon the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), in his exhaustive sketch of the history of this question of the export of power and legislation controlling it, referred to the Carillon incident. I recall it very well. In my recollection, however, we were confronted with a contract already entered into, followed by an order in council authorizing the export of that power. It covered 400,000 horsepower, although there was only 200,000 horsepower available in that particular place. Some of us brought the matter to the attention of parliament, with the result that there was an exhaustive discussion, portions of which were quoted this afternoon by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). At that time, some thirteen years ago, it was a startling illustration of how careful we ought to be in all matters pertaining to the export of power; and I think as a result of the discussion in parliament in that year, and in regard to that particular incident, parliament or this House of Commons ultimately took the stand to which the Prime Minister referred, which was crystallized in a bill in 1928, which bill was accepted by the House of Commons although it did not finally pass parliament.

While the right hon. Prime Minister was talking, I was puzzled to know what he was driving at. I listened to him with great care. I was waiting patiently for some explanation of the bill itself, because after all we are on the second reading of a bill, which means approval of the principle of the bill. The principle involved is not the export of power; it is the method of export, the regulations or legislation which will control that export. On that subject, unless I am very much mistaken, the Prime Minister was singularly silent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, no.

Mr. STEVENS: Just a moment. The right hon. gentleman spent over two hours in a historical review, excellent in form and no doubt very useful; but I was puzzled to know what the Prime Minister was driving at, and I must confess that to this very moment I am at a loss to know what it was all about. But I propose to bring to the attention of the house what I gather to be the principle of this bill, and I want to warn the house at this stage of my remarks that this parliament owes it to Canada to scrutinize carefully the principle involved in this bill before giving it second reading to-night.

From some remarks made by speakers who followed the Prime Minister I gathered that the supposition is that the principle is the bringing into parliament of something that hitherto has been dealt with by order in council, and it has been intimated by one of the speakers, not supporting the government, that he intends to support the bill. That of course is his privilege, but I cannot justify my conscience or my record in this house in connection with the export of power in supporting the principle which is involved in this bill, and I shall explain why.

Under the old legislation power was exportable under certain conditions. I am not going to read the act; it is here; but if I seem to misstate it I shall be glad to be corrected. These conditions may be briefly summarized as follows: First, it was exported under licence granted by the governor in council. Second, such licence was revocable. I ask hon. members to bear that very carefully in mind. Third, it was not obligatory but it could be limited to surplus power. That authority was granted in the act; in fact it was indicated in the act. Fourth, prices at which power could be exported were subject to control by regulation by the governor in council. Virtually all of these restrictions as they apply to power are abandoned in this legislation. If my hon. friends will follow me I shall indicate just how that is brought about in the legislation itself. I hold in my hand Bill No. 21. I have also the old act, which is cited on the opposite pages of the bill. It will be observed that there are two main sections dealt with. There are one or two other sections of less importance, but sections 3 and 4 of the bill are the two main ones. Those two sections replace sections 5 and 6 of the old act. We find that section 5 of the act in force at present provides:

> No person shall export any power or fluid without a licence, or any power or fluid in excess of the quantity permitted by his licence, or otherwise than as permitted by such licence.

The same provision applies to the construction of pipe lines and so on. That clause is repealed. The section which is to replace it deals solely with fluids, that is, gas, oil, or substances of that kind; it does not deal with power at all. I am not quarrelling with that clause, but I want to indicate this: The section which is put in this new bill, dealing with the export of fluids, contains this provision:

> Such licence shall be revocable upon such notice to the licencee as the governor in council deems reasonable in each case.

It also provides that no person shall export any fluid in excess of the quantity permitted by his licence or otherwise than in accordance with the terms of his licence. But if you turn to the next section, which separates power from fluid, then you find that the export of power is permitted, as far as the bill is concerned, without the restrictions that are applicable to fluids. I am quite aware that the Prime Minister or the government may answer that this will be covered in the private bill. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that introduces one of the main objections to this bill, because in section 4, which is to replace section 6 of the old act, there is no provision such as is contained in the old act with regard to the revocability of the licence, the control of prices, the limitation to the surplus or the other provisions to which I have referred. This new section provides:

> Except as otherwise provided in this act no person shall export any power unless expressly authorized to do so by a private act of parliament, or otherwise than in accordance with the terms and conditions contained in such private act.

This is not entirely new legislation; I grant that. For instance, we do permit private corporations to come to parliament with private bills for the incorporation of loan and insurance companies. There is the Bank Act, which provides for the incorporation of a bank, and there are some other general statutes. But there is this marked distinction between these standard acts and this bill. It is this: In each of those statutes the main principles under which such private corporation can operate are set forth. The private act must be a model bill in conformity with the statute. The only variation from that ever permitted under any of these general acts is something peculiar to the company making application, such as the amount of capital, the number of directors, or matters of that kind. But the principles affecting the public interest are set forth in the statute itself which governs the incorporation of the private company.

That is where this legislation is at distinct variance with all other public statutes of this type. The Prime Minister may say, or it may be said that we shall deal with that when we come to committee; but I submit to the house that this is a vital deviation from principles of legislation, not only well recognized in parliament, but accepted throughout the country at large. And so in this particular section we find that the export of power, as distinct, mark you, from the export of fluids such as gasoline and oil—these are linked together under the old statute—is here left entirely to the whimsies of a parliament which at some future time, or at any time, shall deal with some private bill.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, those of us who have been here for some years know—and I refer back to the Carillon incident, which is one of the most notorious of my experience in parliament—of the sort of lobbying which can be put up in support of a private bill. Who is there who, before the Railway Act of this country was brought to its present form, and we stopped what was known in the old days as free trade in railways, does not recall the lobbies that used to frequent this house and the railway committee every time a private bill was up? Who is there who does not recall private lobbies supporting private bills of the type we are entering upon here?

This is a retrograde step. We are going backward. We came past this sort of thing years ago. We have learned from bitter experience that it was infinitely better to establish in a public statute what the conditions shall be in a matter of public interest, such as the present one, rather than leave the matter to the haphazard decision of the moment, in connection with a private bill.

So for that reason I am absolutely opposed to this bill in its present form. In saying that, let me say this to the Prime Minister: When I say I am opposed to the bill in this form, it must not be said—I will not permit it to be said—that I am opposed to bringing before parliament an application for the export of power. Not at all; I am entirely in favour of that. But I am opposed to permitting any powerful corporation to come before parliament with a private bill, when we have no knowledge of what exists by way of contracts, and so on, and to lobby a private bill in connection with the export of power.

May I ask the Prime Minister this question: Is the government aware of applications pending the passing of this bill? Would the Prime Minister and government take the house fully into its confidence and tell us exactly why the government's policy, as outlined this afternoon by the Prime Minister at such great length, was changed in December or January to the form we have it in this bill? Because certainly if I followed the English language as he used it this afternoon, that policy did not appear in two hours and a quarter of his speech, and in the last quarter hour I found it difficult to understand just where he stood. My right hon. friend gave arguments this way and arguments that way; but he was extremely careful to say that he was simply putting forward what other people had said. I did not hear a single syllable from him which indicated exactly where he stood in the matter, and it was a little disconcerting to those of us who are in favour, just as much as he is, of parliamentary control, to find him in that position.

Now, I go farther than that. The measure before us, as the preceding speaker has said, removes from parliament the control of this type of business, namely the export of power, and places it partly in the hands of the private company which is able to get through parliament a bill which suits itself, and partly in the hands of provincial authorities.

Here again I speak from considerable experience. I call to witness any member who has been in the house for some years: How often have we found it that when the practice has grown up of referring something to the attorney general of a province, or to the provincial government, when such consent or approval is stated it becomes obligatory upon the federal government to carry through whatever that measure involves. Let us consider, for instance, the granting of licences to breweries. That is peculiarly a federal matter; but, as a matter of courtesy for several years it has been the custom to refer the matter to the attorney general of a province. If an attorney general of a province approves an application, it is a rare thing for the federal government to refuse it. I grant you that it may be done; it may be stated that in theory it can be done. But I am speaking about our experience in this sort of practice.

I submit again that in connection with such a vitally important matter as the export of power, we ought not to leave the matter in the form in which it appears in section 4 of the bill. That section effectively and actually removes from this parliament control over the export of power, and places it in the hands of a provincial government. My right hon. friend knows perfectly well that in any instance where there is a question of doubt as to the wisdom of granting such licence the responsibility will be handed to the attorney general, or whatever provincial authority may be in charge, whereas the decision ought to be made right here.

Let me say to the government that I am quite aware how difficult it is to deal with the export of power, because for some years I happened to be at the head of a department which had to do with the matter. A number of applications came before me from time to time while I held that position. It is a matter of grave concern to any minister in charge of the administration of the act to make these decisions.

For instance, I remember a reference to the question of emergency power, for which there is provision in this bill. A large paper mill in Minnesota, just south of the Canadian border at the lake of the Woods, was burned down, and an application was made for an emergency export of a certain number of horsepower. The application was granted. The term of exportation, according to the application, was to be for the period during which the old plant was being restored or reconstructed. But before we did anything we had to send a couple of experts to the point in question to study the whole situation carefully, for fear that we were being jockeyed into the position of granting an export licence which at a later time we might find it difficult to revoke.

The question of revocation is one of the most difficult confronting the country, whether it be in connection with power or any other commodity. You can argue the theory of the thing all you like; but the government and the Prime Minister above all know that once these licences are granted, once power is exported, once industries are established and, as in many cases, once the sanitary organizations of towns and cities have been built up to depend upon this electric power, it is impossible or close to impossible to revoke such licences. Every one who has had anything to do with these matters knows that perfectly well. We have no right to delude ourselves in this manner. It is no light question. As the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) said an hour or so ago, we are extremely anxious to keep on the best of relations with the United States. Of course we are. I never go abroad without reflecting with pride upon how long these two great countries have maintained a condition of absolute friendship. But if we want to jeopardize that friendship, then let us get careless with matters of this kind. It is not that we are so unfriendly to them that we would refuse them, not at all, but we must be careful.

If we are going to export power; if we are going to part with our power, then let us come out and say so. Let us say we are going to export 200,000, 300,000 or 500,000 horsepower. Let us determine that we are going to do it as a permanent policy, because that is what it amounts to. The aluminium company made application a few months ago for permission to export power to the state of New York for the establishment of an aluminium plant in that state. Does it not stand to reason that if that export licence is granted and an industry established, we could not attempt to revoke the licence in three, four or five years. This is one industry which perhaps more than any other is dependent upon electrical power. No wonder the jurist in advising that municipality in the United States, as referred to in the order in council quoted a moment ago, stated that while it was an annual licence, to put it in the vernacular of the street, it did not amount to anything. To talk about these licences being annual is sheer nonsense. These are just like the licences granted by a municipality. As long as the people who get the licence behave decently, the licence is as good for a dozen years as it is for one. Hotels and other institutions are financed on the strength of licences, and they know that within the ambit of good behaviour their licences are secure. It is a matter of practice and custom accepted in every civilized country in the world, and particularly in this country. If a licence for the export of power is granted and a great industry is built up in the United States as a result, there is virtually an assurance of perpetuity. If we think otherwise or do otherwise, we are deluding ourselves.

Furthermore, it has been pointed out in connection with the great lakes diversion at Chicago that there is nothing more difficult than to remedy or correct or reverse an action between two friendly countries like the United States and Canada. If it was the case of a great country with a little country alongside and we were ready to ignore that country ruthlessly, it would be different. But that is not our way of doing business; that is not the Prime Minister's way of doing business, and it is not the way any government that represents the people of this country would do business. They are bound to give every consideration to the requirements of those who have entered into such an arrangement as a result of our action.

My second objection is that we are surrendering our control of the situation. This private bill comes before parliament carrying with it a copy of an order of the lieutenant governor in council of the province from which the power is proposed to be exported declaring that the said power is not required for other use in that province. If we approve that clause we are saying virtually to any outfit that comes before us with a private bill containing the imprimatur of approval of the province upon it, that such private bill will be accepted. I know and other hon. members know that we shall not be able to resist it. We may think that we shall, but we shall not and we do not, as a matter of fact. I can recall in the past how just such arguments have been presented before various committees of this house, and the bill has carried virtually every time where the matters covered therein were of a consistent nature.

Section 5 refers to temporary licences and deals with the question of emergency. I should like to read part of that section as follows:

> . . . in the event of conditions arising which are deemed to constitute a temporary international emergency, may, upon such terms and conditions as he sees fit, grant temporary licences for the exportation of power . . .

The argument which I now propose to make may be drawn a little fine, but in my opinion it is important. In connection with emergency exports we say in the bill, "upon such terms and conditions as he sees fit, grant temporary licences for the exportation of power." We attach the question of temporary to emergency. This offers another argument in support of what I have said already, that where a licence is granted under ordinary circumstances it is not looked upon as being temporary. That may seem to be drawn a little fine, but I know how difficult it is to carry through the administration of these matters. I warn the Prime Minister that the very statute will be cited in support of the permanence of licences other than those granted under section 5.

These are some of the reasons why I am opposed to this bill in its present form, but I should like to make one or two further general observations. The Prime Minister cited the arguments pro and con excellently, and he covered the question of the encouragement of the establishing of industries elsewhere to the damage of industry in Canada. Let us explore that argument for a moment from this standpoint. In the first place hydro-electric energy is not a commodity. We speak about exporting it as if it were something we had in abundance that we could ship out of the country in order to make money. Electrical energy is an instrument of production, just like a machine; it is part of a machine. We in Canada are in the peculiarly happy position, almost unique among the countries of the world, of having tremendous undeveloped hydro-electric power. If we administer that great resource properly, our policy will be formulated to bring everything possible to the energy instead of sending the energy elsewhere to create industry in another place. That consideration is of immense significance.

Only a few weeks ago I was talking with a prominent Canadian industrialist who has a plant also in England and does business in that country, Australia, South Africa and elsewhere. As a successful and efficient industrialist he can speak with authority, and he told me that he did not think, having in mind modern inventions and the advances of science, there was a country in the world so advantageously situated as is Canada in connection with modern industrial development. I believe he is right. He said further, "I do not need to go to other countries to produce cheaply." In one or two instances he manufactures in other countries because of tariffs; but to-day he is shipping his goods from Canada, in spite of the higher payroll here than elsewhere, into a number of countries and paying as much as one hundred per cent duty to get into those markets, and is doing so successfully. Why? The answer is, hydro-electric power in Ontario. And that power is not limited to Ontario; one thinks at once of the great province of Quebec; but there is also the west, which we sometimes regard as merely a land for growing wheat, although, as hon. members know very well, in the great rivers of the west and in the northern sections we have some of the most magnificent water powers that can be found anywhere. What we should be doing, instead of wondering how we can get around the distasteful task of refusing to export power and hand it over to outside interests, is to bend our efforts to find ways of utilizing more and more this great natural resource which we possess from one end of the country to the other.

My hon. friend the Minister of Mines (Mr. Crerar) recently gave a number of addresses on the mining industry of Canada. They were excellent; I congratulate him. But let him; let us; let the government; let parliament study how we can develop the electrical production of this country to supply the lowest cost power possible to our great mining industry. Let us follow the suggestion of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) with regard to the farms of Ontario; I say this with absolute sincerity. In old Ontario and the older sections of Quebec there is not a farm which should not be in possession of electric power at the lowest possible cost to relieve the drudgery and give the families of the farmers there some taste of what modern science can do to lift the burdens peculiar to older farming conditions. There is no reason why this should not be done; it is done in Sweden and in other countries which possess no more power than we have, but which use it for the happiness of the people. There is ample scope for the development and marketing of power. The Prime Minister referred this afternoon to the statement of one of these companies which applied. I did not like the statement. They said, "If you do not grant this licence to export power, the people of Montreal cannot have a lower rate for their electrical energy."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They did not say just that.

Mr. STEVENS: They did not put it in just that crude way.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They said that if the application were granted, the users would get cheaper power.

Mr. STEVENS: That is true; but sometimes, if we put these statements in, let us say, the vernacular they are more clearly understood. Let that company lower its rate and see how rapidly the use of its power will increase; probably they will find that any surplus they have will be rapidly taken up, so that the people of Montreal will have the advantage of the lower rates, the company will have the revenue, and the country will retain the power within the province. That is the answer I would give them.

Let parliament study how we can increase the use of electrical energy. That is real business. Look at what has been done in Ontario by the Hydro-Electric commission. I am not concerned in the squabbles and quarrels about this, that and the other thing relating to the Hydro-Electric commission. I have driven through Ontario and seen what hydro-electric energy, administered by the commission, has done for Ontario within the scope of my own memory. I can remember very well, when I was a boy, the first street lights that were installed. The town I lived in was lit with gas, and I recall the time when electric lights were put in. From that day to this the history of hydro-electric development in Ontario is one story of continued progress and good administration, on the whole, with, no doubt, some mistakes. Let us see if we cannot do something for the back country of these great provinces—the villages of northern Ontario, where certainly they have hard enough times, and the villages of northern Quebec. Reflect also upon the difficulties that have to be faced on the prairies. Let us consider how we can get this hydro-electric energy to the people of this country; let parliament bend its energies and its brains to constructive effort rather than to the evasion of responsibility. The Prime Minister will, I hope, take it kindly from me when I say, with great earnestness, that in this section 4 he is evading responsibility, and he is failing to include in the bill the safeguards which from the very inception of legislation on this subject, from the time of the earliest act, a copy of which I hold in my hand, have been provided—safeguards as to prices, the question of surplus, of revocability, and so on. At the least, let these things be put in the bill; let it provide some protection.

I am opposed to the principle of this bill because in my opinion it does violence to the prerogatives of the federal house. It aggravates the differences of opinion at present existing between the provinces and the dominion. It will be recalled that much of the trouble in the last few years regarding trade and commerce is due to the fact that the federal authorities do not occupy the field of control of local trade, although they are empowered to do so. We have surrendered powers here and there to the provinces, and then we wonder why after a time they claim these powers as a right. This bill is just adding one more aggravation to the problems which already exist in that respect.

I therefore shall oppose the bill—not that I am opposed to bringing to parliament the matter of the control of the export of electrical energy, but because I believe this is a retrograde move and inimical to the best interests of the people of this country.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): I am sure the house will have been very much interested in the statements that have just been made by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens). However, I do not wish to pursue the line which both of the previous speakers have followed in discussing the question of whether it is wise or unwise to export power. I do not believe that, so far as this particular bill is concerned, that is the issue. When such a bill comes before the house, the position that my colleagues and I will take will be taken without hesitation.

If I understood the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) this afternoon, the purpose of the bill is to give to parliament the right to decide whether power shall be exported or not. From the statements made by the Prime Minister it appears that the government had three choices in mind. First of all, there was a question whether there should be appointed a public utility commission to decide upon matters of this sort. Personally I am much opposed to any such matter being decided by such a commission. Then they had under consideration the question whether the matter should be referred to the railway commission. I am also opposed to a matter of this kind being referred to the railway commission. The railway commission is a rate-fixing body, and in my opinion it could not give a more intelligent answer to questions of this kind than parliament can. I have a greater objection, however, to both of these suggestions. I have always objected to the delegation to others of powers that should be exercised by parliament. In a matter of this sort parliament is the body which should decide whether power should be exported or not.

If, as stated by the Prime Minister this afternoon, the main purpose of the present bill is to give the house an opportunity, under the auspices of a private bill, to state whether it is in favour of the export of power, then I am in favour of a bill of that kind. Far too long have I claimed that too much power has been vested in the cabinet or the governor in council or through the medium of administration by order in council, and I am pleased that the government, even at this late date, for the reasons stated by the Prime Minister and probably for other reasons, has seen fit to bring in a measure of this sort. Now that the government has extended, so to speak, the sphere of activity of this house and its right to determine certain matters which previously have been determined by order in council, I trust that this principle will be further applied to other matters which at the present time come almost exclusively under the jurisdiction of the governor in council.

For these reasons I am going to vote for the second reading of the bill. I shall do so, however, with the proviso that some of the matters raised here to-day will be gone into in greater detail when the bill is before the committee, because I believe, with the hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Stevens), that there are certain ambiguities in the bill itself. But I hope that they will be cleared up satisfactorily before the bill is given its third reading.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): The government is to be congratulated upon having accepted the principle which this house unanimously adopted some years ago. It is obvious that when the house unanimously accepted the measure which was proposed by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart), it had in mind that parliament rather than the governor in council should deal with this question, and in furtherance of that principle this measure is submitted to the house. I differ entirely, however, as to the method to be pursued for the purpose of giving effect to the principle which is being adopted.

The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) contended that the bill did not contain reference to the conditions. Of course, he is entirely in error in that, because it provides that the private bill shall contain the conditions and terms under which the licence shall be granted. That is exactly the provision which exists to-day; only to-day the terms and conditions are settled by the governor in council and not by a private bill. In one case the parliament of Canada will deal with it; in the other the executive deal with it under the full authority entrusted to them under delegation of powers from this parliament. To attain the end which the Prime Minister had in mind, it was only necessary to provide that there should be an amendment or addition to the existing statute. That is all. It was not necessary to go further than merely to continue the existing legislation and add to it an amending provision, that any licence granted under the provisions of this act should not become effective until approved by parliament. This would mean that a bill would be introduced into parliament ratifying and confirming the granted powers contained in the licence. It would then pass this house and the senate and be assented to by the crown.

That, I submit, would be the proper method of dealing with the matter. It would involve, of course, what was intended, that the question of policy should be settled by the government of the day; for there is no possible way of avoiding or evading what it does appear to me must be taken for granted, namely, that any question which affects export is a matter of policy on the part of the dominion government and of this parliament. This government has at all times to command the support of a majority of the members, and a question of policy must be always determined by the government and submitted to the house for its consideration. When you are dealing with a question of export you are dealing with a matter of policy over which this dominion alone has jurisdiction. It is not a question of what might be thought by the province; it is a question of the central power, the Dominion of Canada, the entity called Canada having control over export. And that central power having that control over export, that power must be exercised, not having regard to the peculiar interests of a little community or locality, but from the point of view of the national good, the broad general outlook of what most affects the Dominion of Canada, and of all that concerns its well-being and the prosperity of its people. That is the question which must be settled; it is not a matter of what may be thought by this or that interest.

I say that because it appears to me perfectly clear that, having approved the general principle, as this house has done, parliament should determine the question of the issuing of licences for the export of power from this country; and that power should be exercised by a very simple method, namely, by providing that any licence issued should become effective only when approved by parliament. That is not an unusual procedure. In the United States certain appointments are subject to ratification by the senate, and in various other countries there must be approval by parliament.

Now there arises another question, a question of a private act. It seems to me intolerable that it should be thought that in this free parliament a corporation, a group of individuals or a community should be able to lobby parliament into the granting of licences. It seems to me monstrous that such a suggestion should even be made. I wonder if hon. members have given due consideration and thought to the principle involved in that part of the bill. Any bill by means of which parliament is to be asked to deal with this important matter should be a government measure, introduced by the government of this country, reflecting the policy of that government on a great public issue, and showing to the constituencies and the people of Canada the view the government hold. But the government is now going to leave it to a private member to bring in a bill and call it a private bill.

Never before in all our history has such a public measure been submitted to parliament in this manner. The Prime Minister this afternoon said it may well be the most important measure submitted to this parliament during the present session. That is to emanate from the hands of a private member as a private bill. Did anyone ever hear of such a monstrous proposition as that the terms of a licence, the conditions under which we are to part with a part of the assets of this country, its very life-blood, are to be in the hands of a private member who introduces a private bill and inserts the terms and conditions and provisions under which we are to permit the export of a part of the Dominion of Canada to another country? Permit it! The terms and conditions are not being settled by the government of the day; they divest themselves of all responsibility. They entirely forget the public interest and say that a private member is to introduce a bill into this house and in that bill are to be fixed the terms and conditions under which that licence is to be granted. Has anyone ever heard of such a proposition in all the history of this parliament?

We have railways created by statute; we have banks created by statute; but does anyone for a single moment ever think that they are created unless the terms and provisions and restrictions are fixed in the general enabling statute? That is known by all. Did anyone ever hear to the contrary? Take a trust company; let an hon. member in this house seek to incorporate a trust company. He rises in his place as a private member; his petition is presented; the advertising takes place and then the bill is introduced. But what is the form of the bill? Does it contain terms and conditions and provisoes fixed by him? Not so; it is in conformity with the general principles which the enabling act of this parliament has settled. And it is the same with respect to railways. We have a Railway Act; is it silent with respect to the conditions, or does it prescribe the terms and conditions? What is the private act? The private act only gives life and vitality to a group of men under a corporate name, but the provisions of the Railway Act apply.

Suppose you desire to incorporate a bank; you come to this parliament. Do you think that a private member's bill which undertook to name the terms and conditions under which that bank could do business would be considered for a single moment? Not so. What would happen is known to every man. You have the individuals, the provision as to the capital; you give them a local habitation and a name, and then the provisions of the Bank Act apply, not the terms and conditions settled by the private act, but the provisions of the enabling statute, the Bank Act of Canada.

Because in days gone by we have given unanimous approval, and properly so, to the principle of this parliament retaining and exercising jurisdiction over the grant of licences, to-night we are told that the terms and conditions are to be settled by the private act. Each private act will, I suppose, from necessity have some changes, because it may be in one province or another. There is export of power, for instance, from British Columbia, or Quebec, or Ontario. It might well be that there would be some slight modification in respect to that. But who would think that in the private bill the terms and conditions would be fixed? Nevertheless that is what we are asked to do. The general principle of the bill being as it is, it follows that we should deal with that phase of it on the assumption that parliament is prepared to give a grant to vindicate its past performance in that regard, maintaining our right of control with respect to the matter. But surely when this bill reaches committee it never should leave it until there is added to it the terms and conditions under which a licence is to issue. Never should it be otherwise. That exhausts what I have to say about the broad and general principle.

But there are other matters that will have to be seriously considered and discussed when the private bill comes before parliament. I confess, Mr. Speaker, that I find it almost incredible that anyone, having regard for our institutions, would suggest that a matter so vital to the life of Canada as the export of power should be left to the caprice of an unguided and leaderless free House of Commons, lobbied as we have seen these lobbies in days gone by. Happily they have disappeared. But once more they are to be resumed; once more each case is to stand or fall upon the ability of the gentleman in charge of it to induce his friends to vote for it. Once more we have introduced into this Commons House of Parliament the old story that we thought we had ended. I can remember in my early days in this house protesting against the lobby that was taking place on behalf of the Bank Act. The Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, Mr. W. F. Nickle and I placed upon Hansard at that time our views. It stiffened the opinion of the government with respect to some matters, and you will recall how lobbying fortunately disappeared. We know the evils of lobbying; we have seen lobbies operate; we know what they have done in legislatures and in parliaments. We know what they had to do in England in respect to the matter, and we know what we tried to do here because of the scandals that arose.

Yet to-night in 1938 we are told that a private member can introduce in this house a bill which usurps the functions of government and provides for the export of the industrial life-blood of this country. Think of it! Why should a government not risk its life upon the question? Why should a government not say, "We are in favour of a licence," or, "We are against a licence?" What is the function of government? What is the duty of an executive? To lead or to be led? What are the Prime Minister's views? He spent this afternoon dealing, not with the principle of this bill but with the historic aspect. At the end of his speech he took the pros and cons of another bill which is to come as a private bill, and presented them to this chamber, neatly balancing, like an acrobat, the pros and cons; here a little and there a little, for it, against it; not what I say but what someone else says, not what I think but what they think. Did he disclose to the house to-day what his thoughts are? Did he make known to any hon. member or anyone in this country what his views are in respect to power export licences? Does he believe in it or not? Will he vote yea or nay? What leadership is to be given? What are the conquering hosts to do?

An hon. MEMBER: Do what they are told.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, thank you. Do what they are told, but by whom? That is the point, by whom? By the private interests or by the government of the country? By the lobbyists, by the private bill, by the introducer of the private bill, or by the government of Canada, which alone has power to deal with the export of power? Which is it to be? I am glad my hon. friend put it, "Do what we are told."

Mr. GRAY: One of your friends.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, I thought it was one of the hon. gentlemen opposite speaking the truth for once.

Now let us go a step further. Does the house realize the principle that is involved? Remember, the control of export is one of the highest functions of government. Does the house realize that it affects revenue? I doubt the constitutionality of a private bill that authorizes and licenses the export of power. I doubt the power of any private member, under the British North America Act, to introduce into this house a bill that provides for the export of anything. Why? Because it involves revenue. The very speech made this afternoon shows how it touches revenue, and not only the revenue of this government. Mark you, we get a fee under the statute. We get revenue under the statute. So do the provinces, but we do also. It is not the provinces alone; we have been getting revenue. Now for the first time, Mr. Speaker, I am told that a private member con introduce into this house a bill that deals with the revenues of Canada. At the appropriate time I propose to point that out and to ask whether or not it is within the constitutional power of a private member to do so.

Mr. EULER: He does not propose the expenditure of money.

Mr. BENNETT: He proposes the collection of it, and that involves expenditure as well; for there can be no licence issued that does not involve inspection. However small the expenditure may be, if it is a charge upon the taxpayers for fifty cents or fifty thousand dollars the principle is the same.

Mr. EULER: Very far-fetched.

Mr. BENNETT: Not far-fetched at all; it is a fact. No man knows that better than the minister who has just spoken, because in his department every year he asks us to vote the sum of $750, and sometimes more, with respect to that matter. In the estimates appears a provision for this very expenditure, and if expenditure is involved how can a private member, under our constitution deal with the matter? There is expenditure; there is collection of revenues, and you are going to have a private member deal with it, a private member whose legislation is not that of the government. Terms, conditions, provisoes, limitations—all these things are to be fixed and determined. Now what are you going to do about that?

Mr. MacLENNAN: That is a lot for a private member.

Mr. BENNETT: On reflection probably the hon. gentleman will realize that this touches the province of Nova Scotia and the island of Cape Breton. Anything that affects export, be it small or large; be it pulpwood or power; be it any of the products of this country; whatever it may be, cannot be dealt with under our constitution as thus far interpreted in our history except through governmental action. Did anyone ever before hear of anyone introducing a private bill to deal with the question of limitation upon exports; or to grant a power to break in upon a general act of prohibition and destroy its value for the purpose of making an exception to the general rule? Mr. Speaker, as old as some of the oldest statesmen in England you have this provision: Whenever duty and interest conflict there is bound to be loss to the body politic unless the greatest care is exercised. On the one hand there is our duty: Follow the constitutional practice and look to the government to enunciate a policy which we can vote for or against. On the other hand there is the interest of the private concern. I pointed out this afternoon the significant fact that those who had applied for the licence to which the Prime Minister referred had withdrawn their application in November, and that was the time when this device to circumvent the provisions of the refusal under the statute was first heard of. That in itself is a significant and serious fact. If you will look at the white paper you will find it. There it is.

I shall content myself, Mr. Speaker, merely with saying that I am in favour of what we unanimously resolved to do some years ago, namely, to permit this parliament to exercise its power with respect to the granting of licences for the export of power. Second, I submit that the proper method to exercise that power would be to provide that no licence should become effective until such time as it had been approved by parliament. Then you would have the government submit to the house a measure ratifying and approving the action taken, if a licence was issued, and of course declining to do so if no licence had in fact been issued. Third, I submit that this bill contravenes every established precedent in leaving in the hands of a private member the determination of the destiny of this country and its people.

Mr. EULER: Parliament has control over it.

Mr. BENNETT: Not parliament; a private member.

Mr. EULER: It does not follow that his bill is going to carry.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: Why, of course not. The hon. gentleman has just said what I was desirous that he would say. The initiative that makes it possible to determine any question arises from a private member, and when a private member exercises initiative upon a question which determines the destiny of a country you are violating the well established principles of our constitution.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. BRADETTE: Very childish.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) suggests that that is not so. Let us look at the matter just a little more narrowly. Power is to be exported from this country. One of our assets is to be carried out of Canada, just as much as though you took any asset we have and carried it over to a foreign country.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If parliament agrees.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so; I am coming to that. That asset is to be taken away, not if parliament agrees but if parliament gives assent to a private act which is governed by interest, as pointed out by Bacon; as long ago as that. Interest is the dominating factor in a private bill. Interest always has been. The very rule that was read this afternoon indicates that; and for the national good, the welfare of the state, we are now to substitute a private bill which is governed and controlled by private interest. Always remember that. Every private bill is based upon the assumption that for some reason private interest shall prevail over the fixed, universal rule.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Surely a member has the right to introduce even a public bill.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not say he has not the right to introduce a public bill, but this is said to be a member introducing a private bill. The Prime Minister dwelt upon that at length and cited authorities as to its being a private bill. If I were dealing with it as a public measure I would use entirely different arguments, but what the member is introducing is a private bill and the basis of all private bills is interest. That is as old as the parliament of Britain. The conflict between interest and duty is the conflict, not of to-day or of yesterday, but of the centuries. It is a conflict of duty on the one hand and interest on the other; interest, with all it means, with all its ramifications, with all that is involved of wealth, with all that is involved of privilege, with all that is involved in the benefits that accrue, as against duty which is measured by the general rule. And when you say that that general rule shall be invaded by a private member introducing a private bill, you have struck a blow at the institutions of this country from which it will not readily recover. These are the days in which we know democracy is being attacked on all fronts. The whole theory of parliamentary control is democratic, as the Prime Minister properly said this afternoon. That is democratic; but if in order to make it effective you substitute interest for duty, you substitute the interest that invades the general rule and take the operation of the private statute out of the general rule, then instead of helping democracy you have struck a blow at it.

There is no member of this chamber who does not realize that. That is the reason why the conflict as to whether one should vote for the second reading of this bill becomes acute. But it appears to me that while one can merely record his opposition to the principle of a private member with a private bill, actuated and governed by interests, taking a given undertaking out of the operation of a general rule—while one is opposed to that, one realizes that, as indicated this afternoon by the Prime Minister, the government's policy is to seek the opinion of parliament. And on the theory that the governing principle is to seek the approval of parliament, I shall be content by merely recording my dissent from the general principle involved in the bill, and give notice that when the bill is in committee I shall seek to modify those provisions to the extent of providing that any licence granted under the statute shall not become effective until approved by parliament.

That is all you need, all that is ever needed, and all that has ever been needed. It is true that it still leaves responsibility with the government. It still leaves the question of saying yea or nay with the government. It still involves that the governor in council shall make up its mind and arrive at a conclusion. It still means that with doubts and conflicting opinions the government has to decide yes or no. It has been entrusted with that power, and that is its duty.

And now to avoid it, the government says, "We have nothing to do with that at all; we merely pass a statute which says that this house and a private bill will determine what they want." That is to be the voice of parliament, touching an issue, Mr. Speaker, which is not private by any stretch of the imagination. It touches the lives and livelihood of thousands of Canadians born and unborn. It affects the industrial life of this country and the development of our resources. When the private bill is before the house I shall endeavour to indicate some of the reasons why we should vote against any export licence being given at all—not only on grounds of sound economy, but also on the great international issues to which the president of the United States referred in the short report made the other day. Perhaps the Prime Minister in his reply, closing the debate, will be able to indicate to what extent he may have further knowledge of what was in the mind of the president when he made those observations; for if those observations as reported in the press meant anything, they meant that we should not grant a licence for export. Why? "An once of prevention is worth a pound of cure."

To foresee; to look into the future; to see the possible complications; to realize what may happen—that is what the president was directing attention to just as in 1914 the government of Sir Robert Borden found it essential to pass the order in council they did to negative once and for all, so far as they could, the thought that a vested interest could be acquired under a yearly licence.

There is an acute distinction between granting an export licence to an existing industry, and granting an export licence to a utility for distribution; there is all the difference in the world. To grant an export licence to a company for its industry, and for a limited period of a year or two years, while it is building up its power plant, is one thing. To grant a licence for the export of power to a distributing company, or to a utility, means just what was pointed out by that New York commission, and what was pointed out in the Astor hotel at the banquet at which the then president of the United States was reported to have said that it would be regarded as an unfriendly act.

If you have regard to these circumstances, they afford ample reason why at the proper time we should vote against the granting of licences by private bills. But that is not the point now before us, and I shall have to content myself by simply saying that it is the principle of democratic control, of parliament having control. I still believe the unanimous opinion arrived at by this house some years ago was sound; that all that is essential to exercise that control is that we should merely amend the present statute by saying, "And no licence granted under this statute shall become effective until approved by the parliament of Canada." That would end the matter. There would never be any uncertainty or anything else then with respect to it.

Terms, conditions and provisoes would rest with the general act. The private act would no longer have existence.

Approval given by this parliament to the order in council passed by the executive under the grant of powers made in 1907, which is consonant with the general principles which govern under British institutions, the exercise by the executive of the power conferred upon it by parliament—because parliament is not always sitting—would have thus been maintained, and the approval given by parliament to an order in council granting a licence would ensure that democratic control over the granting of licences which is essential to our well-being.

Mr. Speaker, I apologize for having trespassed upon your time to the extent I have, because I desire not to confuse two issues—one the enabling act and the other the private act. The private act involves consideration of all these questions to which the Prime Minister referred this afternoon. The enabling act refers only to the general principle as to how the control of this parliament shall find expression in an enabling act.

When the opportunity arises, I shall submit to the committee of the whole house the amendments which I think are essential for the purpose of giving effect to the principle this house has heretofore unanimously adopted.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take part in the debate, and it is not my intention to make any extensive remarks. However, I am forced to say a word, in view of the observations of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), and especially his appeal in favour of democratic control.

He protests against the bill because of the removal of democratic control. Well, this is a bill under which it is asked that parliament exercise a power which, in its wisdom, years ago it had delegated to the governor in council. Instead of this power being exercised by delegates, this bill will bring about a new situation whereby parliament itself, the representatives of the people of Canada assembled here, will decide as to whether or not there should be an export of power, through a licence to any party who may be asking for it.

The other day the house spent the whole afternoon discussing a resolution moved by the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Gladstone), during the course of which discussion many hon. members complained that the government was arrogating to itself most of the powers of parliament and that private members had no more authority or power. They asked that this should be changed. To-night we have heard the other claim made, that the government is entrusting too much of its powers to the hands of private members. I heard my right hon. friend say that it is almost a constitutional crime that a private member should be allowed to introduce a bill dealing with questions of this kind.

Mr. BENNETT: No; to initiate this form of legislation.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): As I said when my right hon. friend was arguing this, a private member has the right to initiate a public bill. If my right hon. friend wants a public bill instead of a private bill, what will be the difference when the legislation is initiated? They will be exactly the same. There is just a slight difference in the procedure. A private bill must be preceded by a petition. The whole public will know that a petition has been made to this parliament asking for the passing of a bill. The people of Canada will know in advance of the application. When the bill reaches its second reading hon. members will have an opportunity to express their views; but instead of being discussed in committee of the whole, the private bill will be referred to a select committee of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: A standing committee.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It would be referred to a standing committee which has the power, under the rules of the house, to hear counsel and witnesses and all evidence necessary and essential for a proper decision to be arrived at before a report is made to the house. What is the crime being committed by the government in saying that it shall be a private bill instead of a public bill? I have not consulted my colleagues about the matter; but if that is the only objection I do not think we should fight over it. If a change from a private bill to a public bill will enlist the unanimous support of the house, then I think my right hon. leader will be quite willing to change it. There is practically no difference when it comes to discussion in the house.

I think the government should be commended for giving to parliament the full say in the matter. My right hon. friend has spoken of democratic control. The complaint in recent years, not only in Canada and the old country but everywhere else, has been that too much of the control of parliament has been removed. On different occasions in this house the right hon. gentleman has referred to that remarkable book, The New Despotism, by the Chief Justice of England, Lord Hewart, in which the complaint is made that instead of parliament being allowed to decide certain vital issues, this is done by governor in council. Have we not heard considerable both in and out of this house of government by order in council? This is exactly the opposite principle; it is restoring to parliament its control. If that is not democracy, I do not know what the term means.

I do not think I have any more to say on this matter. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) said that with this matter being dealt with by a private bill, with parliament having the control instead of the governor in council, there will be tremendous lobbying. Are members of parliament afraid to exercise their rights and powers as members of parliament? Have we come to the stage where a parliament in Canada will refuse to exercise its proper control over the affairs of the country because it is afraid it will not be able to do so honestly? As far as we on this side of the house are concerned, we trust ourselves. I have enough confidence in members on all sides of the house to be sure that they will do their duty, as we shall do ours. I repeat that this is restoring control to parliament in connection with a vital issue. I agree with my right hon. friend when he says that there are certain matters which are so important that the governor in council cannot deal with them. Parliament has reserved to itself control over the tariff and many things of that kind. This matter is so important that I think parliament might very well keep to itself the right to dispose of the matter.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): This afternoon when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was speaking, I asked a question as to the probability of the revocation of licences for power export. I have had some experience in companies that required considerable electrical horsepower with which to operate. When I asked my question I had in mind the Niagara-Hudson Company of New York state, which imports a large volume of power from Canada and has for many years. The right to export that power has not been revoked and I doubt very much if it could be. As has been said by several hon. members, the revocation of the right to import power that has been imported by an importer in the United States for any length of time would cause trouble between the two countries. That is the opinion I hold. I did not get any reply to the question I asked as to what course would be followed in revoking this right. I do not believe it could be done without causing trouble between the two countries.

There is another point to be considered. As the Prime Minister and other hon. members who have made an investigation of the matter know, there has been put into operation in Great Britain a plan whereby there will be a tremendous increase in the amount of power required in that country, and I believe the very same thing will happen here. As the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) predicted, before two or three years a large amount of additional horsepower will be required in Canada. That has been the result in the old land. As hon. members who were in Great Britain last summer know, all the great railroads adjacent to London are being rehabilitated for the use of electric power. The same thing may happen in this country. If it does, and we have exported large amounts of horsepower which cannot be revoked without causing trouble, where will this country be so far as the supply of power is concerned?

One thing about this whole proposal that I do not like is that in renewing the contracts for power with certain companies, the Ontario government, finding it has more power now than apparently it requires, is asking us to permit that government to export it. Once it is exported there will not be enough power left, and if the same consequences as regards increase in demand follow in this country as have occurred in the old land, we shall find ourselves in great difficulties.

What happened in the old country as a result of the vast increase there in the demand for power? I have in my hand a book which I got last summer from one of the government offices; it is a report on electricity distribution. The result of what they have been doing over there—and the same can be done here—shows that a very large increase in the amount of power consumed reduces the cost to the consumers. Sales of electricity to consumers for all purposes increased from 3,512 million units in 1920-21 to 11,467 million units in 1933-34. The same thing would happen here if efforts were made to carry out the policy outlined by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe and the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), to give the farming community of this country electrical power at reasonable cost, thereby reducing the drudgery. Why is it that throughout this country to-day men are leaving the farms? Why is it that the number of women on the farms has been so greatly reduced? In a part of the country with which I am quite familiar, on 1,400 acres there is just one woman. There are numbers of bachelors, but no women for them to marry, because the drudgery is so great on the farms that the women cannot be induced to stay there. The hon. members for Dufferin-Simcoe and Kootenay East suggested, what is quite true, that this country can use every horsepower that can be produced, if it is properly disposed of, without necessity for exportation. There is a lot behind this proposed exportation of power which I do not believe the Canadian people will favour.

To return to the figures of production in the old country, illustrating the increase in the consumption of power as a result of what they are doing over there: for lighting, heating and cooking the increase has been from 582 million units in 1920-21 to 3,916 million units in 1933-34; and for power supplies—that is one of the things which has been spoken of this evening—the increase has been from 2,499 million units in 1920-21 to 6,392 million units in 1933-34.

What has been the result of these large increases in the demand for power so far as costs are concerned? The charges for electricity in the old land, as measured by the average revenue received per unit of electricity sold, decreased in the case of lighting, heating, cooking and shop and office purposes, from 5·75d. in 1921-22 to 2·28d. in 1933-34, and in the case of power, from 1·69d. in 1921-22 to 0·73d. in 1933-34. These figures show very clearly that an increase in power consumption will give a large decrease in the selling price.

We have been told that if we do not permit the export of power from this country the Ontario consumer will pay more for his electricity. That has not been the result in the old land. There, through the great efforts made to increase power production and power distribution, the price to the consumer and the manufacturer has gone down. We can do the same thing here.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at three o'clock.

RADIO BROADCASTING

First report of the standing committee on radio broadcasting.—Mr. Beaubien.

FARM IMPLEMENTS COMMITTEE

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT PRESENTED APRIL 8, 1937

Mr. J. FRED JOHNSTON (Lake Centre) moved:

That the second report of the special committee of the house appointed on the first of February, 1937, to continue and complete an inquiry begun by the standing committee on agriculture and colonization, pursuant to a resolution of the house on March second, 1936, into the causes underlying the high prices of farm implements, with particular reference to the advance in prices in the year 1936, presented to this house on April 8, 1937, be concurred in.

He said: In rising to speak to the motion which is now before the house I think it might be well for me to review briefly the steps leading up to the presentation of this report on the eighth day of April last. Bearing in mind the contents of the resolution, the house will recall that in January, 1936, farm implement companies did increase their prices. The matter was brought to my attention shortly before I left home to come here to attend the first session of this parliament. One of the local agents representing one of these machine companies showed me a letter he had received from his firm instructing him to advance his price list, giving as their reason that material and labour costs had advanced to such a point that they were forced to increase their prices.

After coming to Ottawa I discussed the matter with some other hon. members who are directly concerned with agriculture. I gave it further consideration, because I was not unaware of the fact that inquiries such as this cost money, and I wanted to be sure that I would be justified in bringing the subject to the attention of parliament before going into it any further. I finally decided to bring it to the attention of the house, and I did this on the second day of March, 1936. The resolution which I submitted at that time was on the motion of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) amended, by referring the matter to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization rather than the body mentioned in the original motion. The committee on agriculture and colonization undertook the task, and during the session of 1936 did considerable spade work in connection with the inquiry. They heard evidence covering 476 pages, a number of witnesses, and received and filed thirty-nine exhibits. These, by order of the house of February 1 last were made part of the record of the committee now reporting.

Toward the end of the session of 1936 it was felt by the members of the committee on agriculture and colonization that a smaller committee could better deal with the matter. As hon. members know, the committee on agriculture and colonization consists of sixty members. Consequently, on February 1 last, again on the motion of the Minister of Agriculture, a special committee was set up consisting of twenty-five members. This committee did me the honour of making me chairman. The special committee last year held forty sittings, examining twenty-nine witnesses, heard 1,209 pages of evidence, and received and filed one hundred exhibits.

When the Minister of Agriculture made his motion the house will recall that the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) expressed doubt whether a committee of this house was the right body to handle this matter. The right hon. gentleman expressed the opinion that acrimonious discussions would arise in that committee. I am sure the right hon. gentleman will be glad to know that nothing of the kind occurred. The work of the committee was harmonious throughout, and thanks are due to the members of the committee for their cooperation. In that connection may I say that on the last day of our sittings the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), who is a member of long standing in this house, stated to the committee that in all his experience he had not served upon a more efficient committee. I took that as a tribute to the members of the committee and particularly to the counsel and the auditor whom we were fortunate in procuring, Mr. Graham, solicitor, of Swift Current, and Mr. Macdonald, chartered accountant from Winnipeg. I think anyone who has studied the evidence and gone through the report will agree with me that these two men did a tremendous amount of work in the short time at their disposal.

Coming to the report itself, there are thirty-six conclusions and recommendations. I have time only to touch very briefly upon a few of them.

The first conclusion points out that the prosperity of the farm implement industry depends on the prosperity of agriculture. As we study the evidence that is made very plain, that when agriculture is depressed the farm implement manufacturers of this country are not prosperous. The committee had the benefit of evidence tendered to it by Doctor Booth. Doctor Booth is an agricultural economist connected with the dominion Department of Agriculture. He told the committee that the annual requirements of farm implements in this country amounted to $51,700,000, and that during the period 1926-35, on account of the depression and farmers not being able to purchase their annual requirements, there had grown up in this country a backlog of requirements amounting to some $200,000,000. If this estimate is anything like correct and I think it well within the mark, and if this backlog is to be taken up in the next few years, it will be understood that farm implement manufacturers have in prospect a period of large sales, probably equal to the days when western Canada was being settled. When we consider the financial statements of the implement companies during that period we find that they experienced very prosperous times. With the annual requirement of $51,700,000 plus the backlog of $200,000,000, hon. members will understand how vital this matter of price is to the farmers of this country.

As I stated at the outset, in January, 1936 farm implement companies increased their prices. They stated before the committee that this increase amounted to three per cent over their line of production. The auditor of the committee claims that the increase was 4·4 per cent. If we take the implement company's own figure what do we find? That on that annual need of $51,700,000 you have to add another $1,550,000 and on the $200,000,000 back log that has to be taken up if the agriculturists of this country are to put themselves in a position to produce cheaply, there is another $6,000,000 added to the cost of farm implements by this increase.

We thought that was bad enough, but on November 1 last, despite the conclusion of the committee that this increase of 1936 was not justified and that any further increases would not be justified, the implement companies put into effect further material increases in the prices of these implements. I have here a list of twelve of the more important implements. I have not time to give all the details—

Mr. BENNETT: Is that part of the evidence before the committee?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): No, this is not part of the evidence; this is the increase that was made last November. I hope the right hon. gentleman will not raise a point of order, because I think this has a very direct bearing on the question.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not raising it as a point of order at all. I mention it only in view of the statement I made the other day that no Canadian evidence was received with respect to cream separators.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That is not correct.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, the evidence is there; it speaks for itself.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): I think the right hon. gentleman was misinformed.

Mr. BENNETT: I have read the evidence.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): All cream separator manufacturers in Canada had an opportunity to appear before the committee. They received a questionnaire from the committee; if they did not see their way to return the questionnaire or appear before the committee, they have little to complain of at this time.

However, in regard to this increase in prices of farm implements of November 1 last, applicable to purchases of this year, what do we find? This list consists of machinery in every-day use, which will be found upon every farm in the country:

The list:

8-foot binder with carrier and tongue truck.
20 d.d. drill.
10-foot dump rake.
14-foot single disc harrow 6H.
4-section steel drag harrow.
8½-foot stiff tooth cultivator 6H.
14-inch general purpose gang.
W30 tractor.
12-foot combine.
9-foot 12-24-inch one way disc.
500-pound cream separator.

The percentage of increase on these twelve implements was 7·8 per cent, one of the largest increases that has been made in the history of this country with regard to the prices of farm machinery. This has come since the report of the committee was tabled in this house on April 8 last year; and covers the full range of implements at varying percentages of increase.

Mr. McCANN: Has the hon. member the individual rates of increase?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): Yes, I have.

Mr. McCANN: What is the rate of increase on the last item?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): On the five hundred pound cream separator the percentage increase is 10·1.

Mr. BENNETT: Might I ask the hon. gentleman if he has the record of the increased prices of steel?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): No, I have not, though I have looked into it. No doubt there was an increase in the price of steel and other raw material, and there was some little increase in labour cost. I will admit that since the committee reported last April, there were increases, but I am going to try to indicate before I conclude that even with those increases in the prices of materials going into the construction of farm implements, the increased prices were not necessary or justified.

What does that mean? I have stated to the house that the annual requirement in farm implements in this country amounts to $51,700,000. This backlog that has grown up because the farmers have not been able to make their annual purchases amounts to $200,000,000. I have a table here which I think gives ample proof that the backlog does exist. We have the average increase on these twelve typical implements which, as I have said, amounted to 7·8 per cent, but in order to be on the safe side we will say that on the whole line of machinery manufactured by these companies the increase of November 1 amounted to five per cent. Take that together with the three per cent increase in 1936 and you have eight per cent in all. Hon. members will see that on the annual requirement this means an extra amount of over $4,000,000 that must be paid by the farmers, while on the backlog it amounts to some $16,000,000. That is a very serious matter, when we consider the condition of agriculture at the present time.

What do we find with regard to the operation of these companies over the period of years? Number 4 in our conclusions reads:

> That the companies engaged in the industry, over the period of their operations as a whole, have made substantial profits on the capital invested in each company.

The International Harvester Company, over the period 1926 to 1935, a low period of production and sale, was shown to have earned a minimum profit of 6·3 per cent on their business. That is not a bad return. With regard to the other great company doing business in this country, the Massey-Harris Company, a loss was shown during this period, but the evidence brought out before the committee would indicate that this loss was not altogether due to the depression, but that other considerations came into the picture.

Now I should like to say a word with regard to the finances of these companies and what they have done for themselves during the time they have been serving the Canadian farmer. Time will not permit me to go into all the companies, but what do we find when we turn to the Massey-Harris Company? First of all, Mr. Speaker, we are wrong when we look upon these companies as being purely Canadian. We find that the Massey-Harris Company does sixty per cent of its business outside of Canada. In 1891, when the Massey and Harris interests were merged, together with some other manufacturers, they had a capital of approximately $3,500,000, of which only $300,000 was put up in cash, the remainder being given in exchange for the assets of the constituent firms that were merged. In that period, 1891 to 1912, the capital remained at $3,500,000, leaving out of consideration for the moment another $1,000,000 that was put in in 1911. What do we find happening during that period? On a capitalization of $3,500,000 this company was able to pay cash dividends amounting to $11,212,349 and stock dividends of $8,500,000, or total dividends of $19,712,349; to create a rest account of $6,500,000; to set up a special contingency account of $1,680,000 and to retain unallocated in surplus account $1,061,000, or a total of $28,959,349. That is a very substantial return on a capital which amounted to $3,500,000 at the inception of the company and which remained at that figure until near the end of that period, when an additional $1,000,000 was put in. I am sure no one would say the prices this company charged its customers during that period were not sufficient to pay them a good rate of interest on the original investment, to give their stockholders sufficient in the way of dividends and still leave a very, very wide margin. Such is the situation with regard to that company, and broadly speaking it may be said to apply to many of the other companies, with perhaps a little less force.

Before our committee these companies indicated that they had suffered very severe losses in connection with time sales. That is so. I would desire that all purchasers of farm implements in this country should note the exact situation in regard to this matter. I have here a statement which was furnished to the committee by the auditors and which shows the approximate net sales in Canada of the four big companies, International Harvester, Massey-Harris, John Deere and Cockshutt Plow-Frost and Wood. During the period under review, 1926 to 1935, the sales of these four companies amounted to $246,740,000. Their bad debt loss in connection with these sales amounted to $12,726,000, or 5·2 per cent. That is too much for these companies to lose, and I think they have done the right thing in increasing the cash payment. The result of that loss, as in all cases, has been that the man who does pay must make up for the fellow who does not pay, and the sooner the farmers of this country come to realize the fact that it will pay them to buy their machinery for cash, the better it will be.

In connection with the increased cost of producing these machines, No. 14 of our conclusions reads:

> That the relative increase in the cost of labour has been one of the important elements in the increase of prices occurring between 1913 and 1936.

It was established before the committee that during that period labour costs had increased a full one hundred per cent. The farmer has no quarrel with the labour employed in those factories, but his contention is that if there were a greater number of men employed in the factories, performing more hours of labour, the farmer would be able to have his machinery at a lesser cost. There is no fight between the farmer and the man employed in the factories. During this period the federal and provincial governments have spent tens of millions of dollars in an endeavour to keep farmers on the land, and to rehabilitate those who are on the land, particularly in the drought areas of western Canada. I suggest there is no group in the dominion which benefits more by those expenditures than do the farm implement companies. They benefit in a direct way.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house, that the agriculturists are not looking for too much when they ask the farm implement people to make a contribution. But what contribution do we get? Another increase in prices. Having lived in the drought area during the last few years I know of the difficulties experienced by the people there. They have to take the loss; they cannot pass it on, and cannot get away from it. It is their loss. On the other hand the farm implement companies, having, as they claim, made a loss during the drought period, are now passing it on. Not only must the farmer consider his annual requirements, but the one who has not been able to purchase his requirements during that period will be penalized an extra eight or ten per cent to catch up on the backlog.

I have before me a quotation from a speech delivered by Sir Edward Beatty, touching on this point, at a joint meeting of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the Kiwanis Club of Toronto on February 5, 1936. I hope my farm implement friends will pay some heed to what Sir Edward had to say in the matter. Although his observations were not made directly to them, I believe they apply. He said:

> The business leaders of this country must face facts. Men attracted from farms to cities by high wages offered them by business institutions, and then abandoned to unemployment through no fault of their own, have a legitimate criticism to make of the skill with which private business has conducted its affairs. To deny this is to be smug. For a business man living in comfort—

And these are the words to which I direct the attention of farm implement companies—

> —even if his dividends and profits have shrunk to nothing, to tell men who do not know where to obtain their next meal, except from public or private charity, that this is all inevitable, is wrong.

I should like to point out to the farm implement companies that if they made no profits during the period of depression, neither did the farmer. He is not in a position in any degree to pass on his loss. On the other hand to-day the farm implement companies are not only increasing their prices on the farmer's annual requirements but are calling upon him to pay a penalty on the backlog he was not able to take up during the period of depression. In street parlance, I suggest to the house that it is not playing the game.

Conclusion No. 16 reads:

That it is the opinion of the committee that the cost of cream separators to the consumers should be reduced and with that end in view recommends that this item be placed on the free list.

I am not going to discuss this conclusion in detail, because I believe it will be dealt with by other hon. members representing dairying constituencies. It was proven, however, that with regard to one machine the mark-up over cost amounted to ninety per cent. The cream separator in my opinion may be looked upon as the hand maiden of thrift. Any farmer who has the ambition to augment his income by using one of these machines should have it at the lowest possible cost. For that reason the committee have recommended that cream separators again be placed on the free list, where they had been many years prior to 1930.

Conclusion No. 17 is:

That reduction in the tariff should and does in the long run tend to lower the price level to the farmer, depending on the extent of free price competition in the industry.

Let me give a case or two in point. In January, 1936, tractors valued over $1,400 were placed on the free list. The Caterpillar Tractor Company gave evidence before the committee. As a result of this tariff change on one model of tractor manufactured by this company there was a price reduction of $880, and every dollar of it was passed on to the purchaser. When it is said a reduction in tariff does not amount to anything I would suggest that we take notice of a reduction in price of this kind. There should be reductions such as I have indicated, unless there is within an organization, if not a monopoly, at least an understanding with respect to a way of getting together to defeat the action of parliament when tariffs are reduced.

We find further, that as a result of the tariff reductions in January, 1936, the International Harvester Company of Canada made reductions on 168 items, the Massey-Harris Company on 6 items and the John Deere Manufacturing Company on 103 items. The committee found that while there was competition with regard to sales, there was no competition with regard to prices.

I now direct the attention of the house to conclusions 19 to 22, which deal with the provisions of the Customs Act and Customs Traiff, affecting the importation of farm implements. The statement is that these measures should be clarified. I shall not read the four conclusions to which I have referred. It is sufficient to say that the inquiry clearly indicated that there were inequalities existing in the application of these regulations, that they were unfair to the importer of farm implements, and that in addition they deprived the dominion treasury of very considerable sums of money.

Let me give an example to illustrate my point. Since 1924 tractors have not been classified as of a class or kind made in Canada. As a result the American parent companies, under regulation of the Department of National Revenue, could have invoiced the tractors to their Canadian companies at the same price as to the American subsidiaries. What was done? They were not so invoiced. The auditor of the committee made a conservative estimate of the amount of income tax that had been lost to the Canadian treasury. His estimate was that at least $400,000 would have been paid into the Canadian treasury by means of income tax had the Department of National Revenue drawn this to the attention of these companies. As I stated at the outset, I hesitated to bring this matter to the attention of the house because of the cost. Let me say that from this one item, many times the cost of the inquiry will be returned to the dominion treasury. In connection with these matters I want to say that I have every confidence that the present Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) is doing all that he can and will see to it that his department is a department for the collection of revenue rather than one to curtail the importation of goods into this country.

I want to say something with regard to the matter of credit—I wanted to speak about a number of other things, but my time is slipping along. The cost of this credit ranged from 24·7 per cent to 50·2 per cent, depending on the time over which it extended and the class of implement purchased. It will need no argument on my part to indicate that no business could carry on under such a load and succeed. The implement companies stated that this was not to be looked upon as an interest charge, that it was put on to induce the farmer to pay cash. I have in my hand two tables, which the International Company worked out for the committee, giving the factory cost of an eight-foot binder. I desire to draw the attention of the farmers of this country to these tables. I believe that if they realize what it costs to purchase farm machinery on time, they will make a greater effort to buy only for cash.

What do we find with regard to the increase in the cost of these machines? Back in 1913 the factory cost of an eight-foot binder was $75.83. In 1930 this cost had increased to $138.39. That was the year in which the right hon. leader of the opposition came into power, and in 1931 there was a further increase to $153.11. In 1935 the factory cost of this binder had dropped to $123.32, a decrease of approximately $30. I remember when this matter was before the house on another occasion the right hon. gentleman said that the companies had given him a letter to the effect that they would not increase prices provided a duty of twenty-five per cent were placed on these machines. He indicated at that time that they had kept faith with him, that they had not increased prices but rather had decreased them.

Mr. BENNETT: And there was to be no increase in the cost of raw materials.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): They have kept faith; they did not increase the prices, they reduced them as the right hon. gentleman said. However, they did not reduce them far enough. It will be noticed that the factory cost of a binder in 1931 was $153.11. In 1935 this had dropped to $123.32, or just a few cents short of $30. In 1931 the cash price of a binder to the farmer at Regina was $278. In 1935 this had dropped to $263, or a decrease of $15. They came only half way in their reduction.

There is a matter of greater importance with which I should like to deal if time permits. I refer to the question of freight rates. Numbers 11, 12 and 13 of our recommendations deal with this matter. The people in the west know just how important this is. During the period 1926 to 1935 inclusive the International Harvester Company marketed 77·6 per cent of its total Canadian sales volume in western Canada, while the Massey-Harris Company marketed 66·69 per cent of its production in western Canada. The fathers of confederation realized that the matter of freight rates was of prime importance and they stated that the outlying portions of Canada would have to be given a cheap and efficient system of transportation. It has been stated in this house that the fathers of confederation went even further and said that this should be done even though it meant a tax upon the taxpayers generally.

Back in 1897 the government in office at that time made an agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company known as the Crowsnest Pass agreement. Under that agreement the government paid the Canadian Pacific Railway Company a subsidy for the building of a line from Lethbridge through the Crowsnest pass into British Columbia. I believe this subsidy amounted to $3,400,000. The railway company agreed to maximum rates on certain commodities, such as wheat and wheat products eastbound and farm implements and other commodities westbound. Western Canada enjoyed the benefit of those rates from 1897 until 1919, or, more properly speaking, until 1902. In that year an agreement was entered into between the government of Manitoba and the Mackenzie and Mann interests, under which the rates were to be a little lower than under the Crowsnest Pass agreement. From 1902 until 1919 western producers had the benefit of the rates provided by the Manitoba agreement, but the Crowsnest Pass agreement was still intact.

In 1919 the railway companies made representations to the government of the day to the effect that they were not able to carry on under the existing rates. They said that something would have to be done and, rightly or wrongly, the government agreed to suspend the operation of that agreement for a three-year period. Those three years expired on July 6, 1922, the year in which a new government under the present Prime Minister came into office. If nothing had been done at that session, on July 6 of that year the rates under the old Crowsnest Pass agreement would have automatically come into effect. But again the railway companies made representations to the effect that they would not be able to carry on.

The new government appointed a special committee to inquire into the matter and I was privileged to be a member of that committee. To make a long story short, a resolution was presented to the committee and adopted which recommended to parliament that the rates on wheat and wheat products eastbound should be restored. That resolution was accepted by the house. The reason the rates westbound were not restored was due to the fact that the western members of that committee could not get sufficient support in the committee to get them through. It was not because we did not believe they were necessary, nor was it because we did not believe the western farmers were entitled to them.

The record of the Liberal party in connection with the Crowsnest Pass agreement is good. Following up what had happened and the opinion expressed by the fathers of confederation that the outlying sections of Canada should be given an efficient transportation system, the Liberal party, in its second year in office in 1897, made this agreement guaranteeing to the people who had settled on the western prairies these maximum rates. The railway companies could take only a certain toll for carrying a bushel of wheat, and that agreement continued, as I have stated, until 1919.

Again, in 1922, the Liberal party restored those rates, and I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that in 1898 and in 1922 the circumstances of the people living in that western country were not to be compared with conditions to-day. I suggest that the government give very serious consideration to the question of restoring these rates at this time.

I had wanted, sir, to refer to the financial statements of the different implement companies for the present year, which all show a marked improvement in business over the previous year, but time will not permit. I want, however, to read and put on the record an excerpt from a letter that I received from the United Farmers of Manitoba. It comes from outside my own province, from the city of Winnipeg, and is addressed to myself:

> During the past year the report of the special committee of the House of Commons dealing with prices of farm implements, of which you were chairman, has been receiving widespread attention in this province and particularly among the leaders of the organized farmers. General satisfaction has been expressed at the outspoken nature of the comment on certain conditions which have prevailed in regard to implement prices and widespread expectation has been stimulated looking toward concrete action in the direction of relieving some of the injustices which have been imposed and which continue to the present time. It is felt that the House of Commons having had its attention so specifically directed to these unfair exactions should not stop with merely recognizing their existence but should further bestir themselves to bring to bear whatever pressure may be necessary to secure readjustment and relief.
> Our hope is that it will not be a matter of mere expression of opinion but that some concrete action will be devised by conference with the leaders of the implement manufacturing industry or otherwise to secure the relief which the report so fully recognizes as being overdue.
> Signed on behalf of
> The United Farmers of Manitoba,
> William R. Wood,
> Secretary.

If Canada is to continue to produce wheat in large quantities, undoubtedly changes will have to be made. In my opinion we shall have to produce wheat at a lower cost; and how are we going to do that? I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that one of the steps which this house should take is to reduce, if possible, the cost of farm implements to the farmer, because, after all, farm implements and the soil are the farmer's raw materials, and he cannot carry on his industry without them.

[Mr. J. F. Johnston.]

I have a statement here which I should like to place on Hansard, with the permission of hon. members. It is an extract from a report submitted to the Royal Grain Inquiry Commission by Charles F. Wilson, statistician, agricultural branch, Dominion Bureau of Statistics, December 5, 1936.

Mr. BENNETT: I doubt, Mr. Speaker, whether that should be placed upon the record. It is part of the proceedings of a commission which has not yet reported to this house, is not public property and is a document to which we have not access.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): It came into my hands, I might inform the house, in this way: I telephoned the bureau of statistics and asked them if they could give me some information with regard to the world situation with regard to wheat. What I wanted particularly to get at was how much less wheat the importing countries of the world had been taking in the last few years as compared with ten years ago, and Mr. Wilson sent me this information in reply.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a 1936 document of the royal commission on grain, and obviously none of us has access to it as yet, but I am not objecting to its going on the record.

Mr. CRERAR: It is public information, available from the bureau of statistics.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): Mr. Wilson's statement reads:

> The foregoing statement with respect to the individual European importing countries has drawn attention to the various devices used to stimulate domestic wheat production and to curtail wheat imports. These devices have included increased tariff protection, exchange control, import and milling quotas, licensing of imports and import prohibitions, price support and price fixing for domestic production, and control of the grain handling and flour milling industries. In consequence of the employment of these devices in varying degree in the European importing countries, wheat production in Europe, apart from the lower Danube and Russia, increased—

Here is the important part:

> —increased from an average of 936 million bushels in 1922/26 to an average of 1,265 million bushels in 1932/36. This means that during recent years the European importing countries have been producing around 330 million bushels more of their own annual requirements than they did ten to fifteen years ago. The wheat imports of these countries have correspondingly diminished by approximately 300 million bushels annually during the same period.

That is the condition to which I wanted to direct the attention of hon. members, that the countries to which Canada once sold millions of bushels of wheat have increased their own production during the last few years by approximately 300 million bushels annually. How does that affect Canada? It lessens available markets to that extent, and I suggest to the house in all seriousness that if Canada as a country is going to continue to produce wheat in large quantities we must in some way reduce our cost of producing wheat, or else we shall have to go out of the wheat picture.

I have a few suggestions to offer, Mr. Speaker, and then I am through. I suggest:

(1) Serious consideration should be given to the matter of removing all duties on the general line of farm implements.

This suggestion does not come from the committee, but I am persuaded to make it because of the action of the machinery companies in November last.

(2) Cream separators should be placed on the free list, as they were for many years.

(3) No dumping duties to apply on farm implements or cream separators.

(4) Raw materials going into the manufacture of farm implements should be made free.

(5) Restore the Crowsnest Pass rate on farm implements and see to it that the full reduction in freight charges is passed on to the farmer.

(6) Appoint an agricultural economist to check on material and labour costs going into the manufacture of farm implements, this official to furnish the Minister of Agriculture with an annual report.

I make that suggestion for this reason, that if such an official had been on the job during the period I referred to, from 1891 to 1912, I think the farmers might have looked for a material reduction in the price of farm implements.

(7) Appoint a commission to inquire into the feasibility of manufacturing farm implements in the prairie sections of Canada, where seventy per cent of the farm implements sold in Canada are purchased.

We have cheap power out there, Mr. Speaker. The city of Winnipeg is noted for its cheap power. We have almost unlimited deposits of cheap coal in the province of Saskatchewan. I think this suggestion is worth while and should be investigated thoroughly.

In conclusion, sir, I suggest that the rehabilitation of the agriculturists in this country is a pressing national problem. To this end I suggest that immediate study be given to the matter of setting up a system of insurance on a contributory basis that would enable the farmer to supply his own seed and feed requirements in times of drought or loss of crops from other causes. Had there been such a system in operation in the prairie sections of Canada during the period 1900 to 1930 the west could have taken care of her needs in this regard. Lastly I appeal to those of our people, who are more concerned with building for a united Canada than they are in making immediate profits for themselves, to assist in stabilizing this great basic industry. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that agriculture must be stabilized if we are to have in this country a well balanced national economy.

On motion of Mr. Bouchard the debate was adjourned.

SEED GRAIN

GUARANTEE OF LOANS FOR PURCHASE OF SEED AND OTHER ASSISTANCE IN SEEDING OPERATIONS IN WESTERN PROVINCES

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the guarantee by the government of Canada of principal and interest of loans made by chartered banks and guaranteed by the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, respectively, for the purchase of seed grain and for providing other assistance to farmers in connection with seeding operations during the spring of 1938; the liability of the government of Canada in respect of such guarantees not to exceed in the aggregate the sum of $1,900,000 in respect of Alberta and $13,500,000 in respect of Saskatchewan.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT

INTEREST RATE ON REPAYMENTS OF TAXES AND INSURANCE PREMIUMS—ARREARS OR INSTALMENTS SUBJECT TO BONUS PRIVILEGES

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 33, to amend the Soldier Settlement Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaubien in the chair.

On section 1—Payment of rates, taxes, insurance, et cetera, by board in case of default on part of settler.

Mr. MacNICOL: I wish to discuss the case of a returned soldier in Saskatchewan. Is this the right place to bring it up? I have already mentioned the position of Lieutenant Frank Murphy.

Mr. CRERAR: That could be discussed better under the soldier settlement estimates. I do not know whether the complaint relates to the subject matter of this bill.

Mr. MacNICOL: It has to do with a settlement that has already been made or suggested between the soldier settlement board and this soldier farmer. Perhaps if I tell the minister exactly what it is he will say whether it can be discussed under this item.

Mr. CRERAR: The chairman is the one to tell you that.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Beaubien): My information is that it is not relevant to the bill.

Mr. MacNICOL: How does the chairman know that when he does not know what the case is? It is a matter of settlement between the soldier settlement board and this farmer. He is not satisfied and I should like to present his reasons.

Mr. CRERAR: I rather think that touches upon the administration of the soldier settlement board and I suggest that it can be more properly discussed when the estimates are before us.

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to suggest the other evening, had the debate not been protracted, the question whether or not it is desirable to make the rate of interest four per cent. As a matter of fact the minister knows better than I do the great difficulty there has been about the payment of interest at all, and the inability of the settler to pay interest either on the purchase price or the balance remaining unpaid or on advances made by the crown for purposes of providing for payment of taxes or for insurance. It does seem to me that a rate of four per cent would be an ample charge so far as soldier settlers are concerned. If such a rate were charged there might a likelihood of part of it being paid. Five per cent is really a commercial rate. If we are borrowing money at less than four per cent the rate here might well be four per cent. I intended to bring the matter to the attention of the minister the other evening, but at the time he was pressed from other sources.

Mr. CRERAR: The purpose in reducing the rate to five per cent—and parenthetically I may say that it has always been five per cent except for a brief period at the beginning—is to bring it more into line with the rate charged in connection with federal farm loans. I may be wrong but my impression at the moment is that the rate there is five per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: That is so; that is the minimum. That is the prevailing rate.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. I think that under all the circumstances five per cent is a fair rate when you take into account the concessions that have been made in the past to this particular class of returned soldiers.

Mr. COLDWELL: I notice these words:

> . . . it shall be lawful for the board to pay such rates, taxes or assessments or to insure such property as aforesaid and all moneys so expended by the board either before or after the enactment hereof, shall be repaid. . . .

Has it been the practice of the board to pay such assessments up to the present time, and if so to what total sum? The soldier settlers are in many instances in quite a hopeless position, and what we should require is not the payment of taxes, and so on, which will increase their obligations to the board, but something more than this bill provides, something which will bring the debts down to a point where the settlers themselves can see some possibility of meeting their obligations.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not think I have the information which the hon. member has just asked for. The explanation of the purpose of the section was given the other day when the resolution was under discussion. It has been found that there were many returned soldiers, for instance, who either could not or neglected to keep up their fire insurance premiums on buildings, and the like. Then there were cases where taxes were not paid. The board was authorized under the legislation creating it to advance moneys to keep these properties in good standing, and it is with the rate of interest on those moneys that this section is concerned. There was one provision in the Soldier Settlement Act which gave warrant for charging seven per cent; there was another provision which could be stretched to the interpretation that five per cent should be charged. The purpose of this section is to make it clear beyond doubt that the five per cent rate obtains and that no question can be raised in the future concerning the charge of five per cent.

The amount that has been advanced in this way on the whole I should think would not be very great.

Mr. BENNETT: The payments to the municipalities for taxes are substantial.

Mr. CRERAR: Payments to municipalities for taxes probably are substantial, but, in relation to the whole obligation, relatively small.

Mr. QUELCH: Do the provisions of this bill apply only to soldier settlers, or to all settlers under this act—that is, British settlers, immigrants and others?

Mr. CRERAR: The provisions of the bill will apply to soldier settlers, civilian settlers and others who have been beneficiaries of it in the past.

Mr. QUELCH: Then these are not special concessions to returned soldiers?

Mr. CRERAR: No, I do not think they can be so described.

Mr. QUELCH: It has often been said that they are.

Mr. CRERAR: All classes coming under the Soldier Settlement Act administration, which includes soldier settlers, civilian settlers who purchased abandoned soldier settlement claims, those who came under the so-called 3,000 British families scheme, and I think there was also the New Brunswick 500 families scheme—these all share alike in the benefits which may be conferred by this legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: All lands under the administration of the soldier settlement board.

Mr. CRERAR: That is right.

Mr. PELLETIER: It concerns the payment of rates, taxes, insurance, et cetera, by the board in case of default on the part of the settler. Last year, if my memory is correct, the government brought in a measure by which through agreement with the government of Saskatchewan some $18,000,000 of taxes and various charges due by farmers on their lands was wiped out by the federal and provincial governments. Is the minister in a position to tell us exactly how much benefit was derived by the Soldier Settlement Act administration because of that measure? If there were old taxes accrued against these lands and they were wiped out, the board must have received some material advantage. I should like to know what advantage has been received.

Mr. CRERAR: The soldier settlers in Saskatchewan and Alberta did not come under that arrangement. My hon. friend will recall that that was a voluntary arrangement entered into between loan companies, municipalities and the government of Saskatchewan. The government of Saskatchewan was a creditor for very considerable amounts, of farmers all over Saskatchewan, as well as the loan companies and the municipalities. That arrangement was reached by an understanding come to voluntarily between these various interests. The soldier settlement board had no authority by the legislation under which it operates to come into that scheme. That has been recognized, and as I say, leniency has been shown to the greatest possible extent and the soldier settler was able to enjoy the advantages of that scheme in another fashion, by applying under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act for an adjustment of his obligations if he felt that he could not carry on.

Mr. BROOKS: In some districts the school authorities have a lot of difficulty, with taxes sometimes two, three and four years in arrears. Is any period specified during which the taxes shall be in arrears on these farms before the board will pay, or is it left until the farms are put up for tax sale by the school district or the municipality?

Mr. CRERAR: I think the latter is correct. I cannot speak with definite knowledge, but the soldier settlement board will protect the lands where they are worth protecting.

Mr. BENNETT: We went further than that. The minister will remember that during the last few years many municipalities and school districts found themselves in difficulty because they were without money, and we passed a statute—the exact year escapes my memory—by which we provided that the minister might take care of the situation. It is very important that it should be done promptly, for two reasons: one, to relieve the difficulty of the school districts and municipalities, and, second, because penalties accumulate and the amount payable becomes out of all proportion to what it would be if the taxes were paid promptly. I think the minister's deputies will be able to advise him that since the enactment of this legislation an effort has been made to pay within a reasonable time after it became apparent that the settler was unable to pay, and the crown became the collecting agency from the settler, not the municipality.

Mr. CRERAR: I know that applied to lands which had been abandoned by soldier settlers and have not yet been resold by the board. Coming back to the crown they were for a time in the position that taxes could not be collected from the crown in the right of the dominion. I was not so sure that it applied in the case of the settler still on his land who got in arrears with his taxes.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister is quite right. For reasons which will be well understood it was not put in those clear terms, because that would have been a direct incentive not to pay the taxes, and would make the crown the collecting agency, which is a task of great difficulty. But in practice the endeavour was to deal through the people on the ground, so that the school districts and the municipalities would not be ruined through being unable to collect the money. The minister realizes how difficult it has been to deal with some, especially in the west.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Has the minister considered the possibility of including under this section provision for the cancellation of interest payments in districts where there has been no crop? In the drought area mortgage and loan companies have cancelled interest; in some cases they have made very substantial reductions in principal as well, yet farmers under the soldier settlement scheme have not had the advantage of that. I have in mind now the case of a man in the Candiac district, under the soldier settlement plan, who also has a loan under the farm loan board. During the bad years he has been able to pay his taxes and make his living with a minimum amount of relief. As the result of these bad years, however, there has been an accumulation of interest, until now, having made his payments ever since the war, he actually owes more on the farm than he engaged to pay in the first place. It seems strange that men who are on farms under a government scheme should not at least be able to get the same type of reduction that other farmers are getting from private mortgage and loan companies. Last year, for instance, there was no crop, and the 1937 interest is being added to his debt, as well as the principal payment that was not made. If we are to pass legislation to guarantee the payment of taxes it might be worth while keeping in mind the possibility of cutting off the interest payments in the years when there is no crop. I wonder if the minister could give consideration to that point, either under this legislation or under some subsequent legislation that will be brought in.

Mr. CRERAR: Consideration has been given to the matter just referred to by the hon. member for Weyburn. The difficulty, of course, in a government scheme of this kind is to pick out particular districts or areas and confer upon them certain advantages or privileges, if you like, by way of interest remission. If we attempted that, for instance in the particular district represented by my hon. friend, I think I am safe in saying that immediately we would be faced with requests from other districts and other parts of Canada until it would come to the point where it would have to have general application. The dollar for dollar bonus—

Mr. NEILL: Are we discussing that?

Mr. CRERAR: No, we are not, but I want to point it out as an illustration, in reply to the hon. member for Weyburn. The privilege given under the dollar for dollar bonus was one that applied right across Canada. Everything that has been done in the way of easing the situation of the soldier settlers has required general application, and I think if my hon. friend from Weyburn will reflect for a moment he will see the reason for that. The soldier settlers in the dried out areas in Saskatchewan have suffered very severely, of course. They have not been able to take advantage of the provisions with respect to the dollar for dollar bonus privilege. This legislation will give them an opportunity to do that for the next three years at any rate.

There is one piece of machinery of general application that has been set up by the federal government. I refer to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. If a soldier settler in Saskatchewan wants to get an adjustment of his obligations or wants to have his situation eased he can apply under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and no objection will be raised by the soldier settler administration. Indeed I think I am safe in saying that the soldier settlers are encouraged, when their circumstances warrant it, to seek an adjustment under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, because, as I have said, that is an act which is general in its application. The same thing will apply to the soldier settler in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, British Columbia or any other part of the dominion. If we should depart from that principle and attempt to have legislation conferring benefits upon a part of Saskatchewan or a part of New Brunswick I am afraid we would be getting into a great deal of trouble. I can assure the committee that the whole object of the administration is to administer this legislation sympathetically. We believe there is still a very considerable asset here.

There is another fact that I might mention, if I could have the indulgence of the committee for a moment. Out of the total number of those who belonged to the expeditionary force only about two per cent come under the category of soldier settlers. We have many returned soldiers who are farming and who are not under this scheme at all. For one reason or another they did not care to come under this scheme but established themselves on farms. Again, we have a great many returned soldiers who have purchased homes for themselves or established themselves in small businesses, all without government aid. I do not think any effective criticism can be made of this or any previous government, from the time this soldier settlement scheme was inaugurated down to the present time, on the ground that the soldier settlers have been in any way harshly dealt with. I think the general consensus, not only in the public mind but also in the minds of a great many returned men themselves, is that the treatment they have received under this scheme since its inception on the whole has been quite fair.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I quite appreciate the minister's point with reference to the desire not to discriminate as between one part of the dominion and another, but it is a fact that in the drought area you have a part of Canada that has been subjected to unusual recurring conditions, and there has been discrimination in favour of all the people in that area by private lending institutions. In view of that fact it would seem that the government would not be exceeding its prerogative in bringing its policy into line to some extent. It might be done by having the interest payment cancelled or in any case reduced in years when the average crop per acre did not come above a certain amount, or under some general principle that would apply in any part of Canada, so that a soldier settler who had not produced a crop that would enable him to meet his obligations would not have the interest piling up.

Mr. CRERAR: May I ask my hon. friend who would be the judge as to whether he had produced a sufficient crop to meet his obligations?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is a matter of administration under the act. It would not be very difficult—

Mr CRERAR: I think it would be very difficult.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I do not think it would be difficult to find out how much a man was selling through an elevator. At present the municipalities are checking up very closely, and it would not be very difficult for the government to keep in touch in order to find out what crop a man was actually selling. I do see the minister's point, however, with reference to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. Although the minister may not have the exact figure, could he give approximately the amount of interest and principal that has been thrown off under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act in favour of soldiers who have come to or applied for protection under the boards of review of the different provinces.

Mr. CRERAR: I believe I gave that information the other day when the bill was in committee. However, I shall look it up.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): With respect to the suggestion of the hon. member for Weyburn, I would like to urge that particular consideration be given to the drought areas. I have in mind particularly the area in my own constituency. These people would appreciate it if some of the arrears in interest could be reduced. It is not a case of discrimination, as has been suggested. It is recognized throughout Canada that the people in the drought areas are up against a situation which never existed before. I do not see why other parts of Canada should believe that there has been discrimination. It is a case of necessity. Already the dominion government has offered assistance, and this is one way in which it can assist, without a direct expenditure. The machinery is already set up, and it would be great encouragement for the returned soldiers in the dried-out areas —I am not so much concerned about the outside areas—if something were done. I am referring to the area already set aside by the dominion as one in which the people are not in a position to take care of themselves. It would be in the interests of all concerned and to the advantage of Canada to take into consideration some sort of remission or reduction in arrears of interest.

Mr. CRERAR: I have the information sought by the hon. member for Weyburn. The advantage accruing up to date under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act is about $1,400,000. This is practically all in the western provinces.

Mr. COLDWELL: I asked the ministe the other day if, having taken advantage of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, the soldier would be debarred from obtaining any further remission from this parliament. The point I had in mind was this. The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act provides for a bankruptcy proceeding. Once having gone into bankruptcy and having been declared insolvent and a computation and settlement made with the creditors, is it possible that a soldier or other settler would be entitled to take advantage of subsequent legislation by this parliament? That was the point in which I was interested the other day.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not see why not. If a soldier settler applies under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act I should think he would come under the benefits of this legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: In the absence of any restriction he would, certainly.

Mr. CRERAR: And there is no restriction.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Mr. CRERAR: Consequently he would still be a beneficiary under this legislation.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): As to the figure the minister gave with reference to the reduction in principal and interest under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, can the minister give a rough idea what percentage that amount would be of soldier farmers' debts?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What percentage would the reduction represent?

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot give the hon. member that information at the present time.

Mr. REID: A few moments ago the minister said that only two per cent of the settlers were in the expeditionary force. In a return tabled last year it is shown that there are 10,668 soldier settlers, 5,783 civilian settlers, and 1,825 families under the British family scheme. Is the minister correct in the answer he gave?—because I take it that the segregation indicated in these figures shows that 10,668 were actual soldier settlers, and that is over fifty per cent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. REID: Well, the total figure is 18,276, and the soldier settlers number 10,668; that is certainly over fifty per cent. The minister's observation was that only two per cent of the settlers had belonged to the expeditionary force.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): No—of the total number.

Mr. CRERAR: Of the total number of the enlisted force in Canada for the great war, only about two per cent are at present soldier settlers.

Mr. REID: That is one way of putting it, but it would be fairer to say that there are still over 10,000 soldier settlers, or fifty per cent of the settlers under the act. It is not quite fair to segregate the number so as to show the percentage of those who enlisted. These soldier settlers are the ones who took advantage of the act at its inception.

I do not think hon. members are quite fair when they mention the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, because not long ago there was introduced in the house an amendment which will permit any province making application to come out from under the provisions of the act. A province such as Ontario, or in fact any other province, may say, "We do not wish to be under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act," and without any thought whatsoever of soldier settlers. Personally I am against the principle of one part of the government saying, "We are not going to give you further relief, but if you go somewhere else you will get relief there." That is not a good principle. As has been well said, one has to show he is bankrupt before he can come under the act. Many ex-service men have made every effort to pay up so that they can obtain the dollar for dollar benefit; but since their creditors are paid up, how can they say they are bankrupt. We are actually penalizing thrift.

Mr. PELLETIER: Even if the department, as the minister says, are administering the act as sympathetically as possible, it is still possible to overlook some kinds of relief of which they could avail themselves. I am referring to the old taxes which were wiped off, as the minister said, by mutual agreement between individuals and the government of Saskatchewan, to which those old taxes were due. The government of Saskatchewan had in turn borrowed this money from the federal government, which was finally called upon to pay out the sum of $18,000,000 to the government of Saskatchewan in order that these voluntary agreements might take place. The soldier settlement board could have made representations to the government of Saskatchewan on behalf of the soldiers, so that they might keep their land, with the old taxes cancelled. If that had been done it would not be necessary at this time to provide for payment of taxes. It might be possible to do that in the future. If the soldier settlement board had taken advantage of the provision which was made at that time on behalf of the individual farmers, they might also have obtained the relief which was given to all other farmers in Saskatchewan in connection with the reduction of debt. I bring this to the attention of the minister because I believe it should not have applied only to one class of individuals. Simply because some were soldier settlers they should not have been debarred from taking advantage of this debt reduction. I strongly urge the minister to recommend that the soldier settlement board get into touch with the government of Saskatchewan with a view to having these old taxes cancelled, in the same way that other citizens have had their taxes cancelled at other times.

Mr. FINN: I followed the observations of the hon. member for Weyburn, in which he pointed out that, as regards the requirements of the west, particularly his own constituency of Weyburn, he did not want it understood that he was in favour of discrimination as against the east or British Columbia. Before this government decides to grant millions of dollars to any particular part of Canada, it should be prepared, particularly the ministers from the east, to see that we get more than the lopped off branches which would be left after hon. gentlemen from the west get everything they desire for themselves. Our leaders from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island should be prepared to take this stand. I am not objecting to the necessary expenditure of money to alleviate conditions in the west, but I think it is only fair that something should be done for the people of the east who are suffering great hardships through unemployment and other conditions, in many cases having little or nothing to eat. I say this in all seriousness. I was surprised this afternoon to hear a minister from my own province, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley), move a resolution for the expenditure of $15,000,000 for seed in the western provinces.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is a guarantee.

Mr. FINN: I suppose if we could get $15,000,000 down in the maritimes we would have no trouble to get somebody to guarantee it. The point I am trying to make is that there seems to be no direct action taken by the ministers from the maritime provinces, and particularly the minister from Nova Scotia, to see that we get an equitable allotment. Nova Scotia is the oldest province in Canada. She was one of the first, together with New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario, to enter confederation, against her will, but is now satisfied to remain with the confederacy. But, Mr. Chairman, she will not be content to remain there unless she is given a fair and equitable share of the moneys of Canada. We are not asking for the expenditure of one dollar that we cannot defend. I suggest to the Minister of Mines and Resources, who is leading the house this afternoon, that he suggest to the government that when vast sums of money are being expended for certain provinces at least some intimation should be given as to what is to be done for the eastern section of this country, namely, Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes. Until that is done I am afraid there will be a wide gulf between us and there will be longer consideration given to these measures in debate than some hon. gentlemen expect.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I want to say just a word or two with reference to the cancellation of interest where there has been no crop. The minister says that the chief objection to this is that it would be discrimination in favour of one district as against another. I should like to point out to him that the dollar for dollar scheme, with which I am in agreement, also provides local discrimination. It discriminates in favour of the man who has a crop.

Mr. CRERAR: That may be, but there is no discrimination under the law.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If a man has a crop, for every dollar he can put in he gets another dollar, but the man who has not been able to raise a crop is not given this help. In view of the fact that you are helping the man who has a crop by giving him dollar for dollar, there should be no objection on the part of those people who would be benefiting by that piece of legislation if assistance were given to the man who has no crop. At least in those years when he has no crop he should not be called upon to make interest payments. If we are going to help the man who has a crop, we should be prepared to help the man who has none. I do not think that would be discrimination, any more than it would be favouring people who are a little more fortunate than others.

The minister also said in connection with the cancellation of interest that the farmer could benefit under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. If that be true, and it is true in certain provinces, what will happen if in the near future boards of review are not allowed by proclamation to take any more applications in certain provinces? If we are to judge from a bill now on the order paper, that is what will happen. The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act will not be operative in certain provinces. Does this mean that the discrimination of which the minister speaks is to be in effect against soldier settlers who might come in under a voluntary scheme such as was arranged last year in Saskatchewan? If the board of review is not in operation in that province, a man might find his interest payments continuing whether or not he had a crop, and they would continue to pile up until in some cases the total amount due would be more than the amount he had originally agreed to pay. Perhaps the minister would give serious consideration in the near future to doing something along this line.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I have one case I should like to bring to the attention of the committee. I understood that these matters were to be discussed when the estimates were before us, but now that the discussion has taken a wide range and our western friends are urging that certain concessions should be made to the people in the drought area of Saskatchewan, perhaps what I have in mind can be brought forward.

A man who had served overseas returned and purchased a farm for $5,000. He continued to farm that land for a number of years and finally reduced his debt to something like $1,100. If he had been able to raise that amount he would have had his farm free of debt, but he became completely discouraged and turned the farm over to a brother, also a returned soldier. Four boys from the one family served in the war. The soldier settlement board stepped in this year and got an order of the court to eject the soldier. The brother has to step out and give up this farm upon which thousands of dollars have been spent. This seems to me to be rather a hard situation. They claim that they cannot raise the money because of the action of the farm loan board not being willing to loan money on the soldier settlement board farms and also the provisions of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. These two pieces of legislation make the borrowing of money most difficult and these men have not been able to obtain a loan. There is nothing for them to do but go out and leave this property after having spent $3,000 or $4,000 on it.

I just want to point out to my western friends that they are not the only ones who are suffering. We made a plea for this man on the ground that there had been almost a complete crop failure in that section of the country. For the first time in the history of the province they have had to bring in feed for stock and seed grain in order to tide over the people. I have just been speaking to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) about this matter. I join with some of my friends from eastern Canada in voicing a slight protest in this house. When a claim is presented by our friends from western Canada it is given immediate consideration, but the attitude toward this situation in Prince county is that it is not of sufficient magnitude for the federal government to step into the picture; that the local government should be able to handle it. The man I speak of is a returned man, and his is not the only case by any means. He had no crop last year, and nothing to put in the ground this year, and he failed to get much sympathetic assistance from the departments here but it was true he failed to meet his payments regularly. I understand that the local government is able to guarantee the loans at the banks to enable those in this position to get seed and carry on their operations, but we would certainly appreciate a little assistance if this western grain is to be shipped all the way down by rail from western Canada at a reduced freight rate. The people of my province, and particularly of the section I have spoken of, would greatly appreciate some assistance.

Mr. COLDWELL: Might I say in reply to the hon. member that we of western Canada realize that we are discussing a matter for all Canada, and we are speaking of the conditions we know best when we speak of western Canada. I noticed from the figures of abandonments that have been made from time to time under the British and civilian and soldier settlement schemes that there were 1,072 abandonments in the St. John district, as compared with 1,611 in Calgary, which would indicate that the whole matter needs to be considered in a much more realistic way than it has so far been considered. I have before me, for example, a statement showing that there have been 14,480 abandonments, quit-claims, and so forth, by soldier settlers, civilian settlers and British families from the inception to November 30, 1937. The original number of soldier settlers was 25,017, and the present number is 9,888, so we can see the tremendously high proportion of abandonments. I believe that this legislation, while necessary so far as it goes, does not meet the actual conditions, and the minister and the department and the government should consider this whole matter more realistically than it is being considered at the present time.

I am fully aware that conditions in Ontario are not good. I have a letter, for example, from the municipal chapter of the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire of Toronto, in which, having observed that I spoke on this matter the other day, they draw my attention to the deplorable condition of settlers under these schemes in northern Ontario. Then only a few moments ago we heard from Prince Edward Island. And so, while each of us speaks of conditions that we know in the province from which we come, it is quite obvious from the figures of the department itself that a much more realistic stand has to be taken in connection with this whole matter than is indicated by this legislation. As a matter of fact, forty per cent of the total settlement has been abandoned already, and many of the settlers who remain are remaining there because they do not know what to do if they get off the land.

Mr. FAIR: Perhaps I am a little closer to the soldier settlement problem than some hon. members who have discussed it. I am living on a farm out there and have done so for the past twenty-four years. I do not speak as an arm chair farmer; I think those who farm from the arm chair or the office do not know the conditions that exist and the circumstances under which the soldier settler has to get along. I am not speaking simply for the soldier settlers of Alberta or Saskatchewan but for the soldier settlers all across the dominion.

From the inception of this scheme there were in all 25,017 settlers. A number of the men who took up farming were office men who went to work on the land without any previous experience in farming. When those who have had a life experience in farming are not able to make a living at it, we can appreciate how much harder it is for the man without experience.

In a number of cases soldier settler deals were made more for the benefit of somebody's friends than for the benefit of the soldier himself. I have in mind a half-section of land with some stock and implements, not very far from my own farm, which was sold for $8,000. That farm is subject to frost, and while the settler has done his best during all the time he has been on the land, at the present time he owes $13,000 on an original investment of $8,000, and he has paid out what he could since he bought the land in 1919.

The average original loan to soldier settlers was $4,155. As I said before, these loans were taken advantage of by somebody's friends rather than the soldier settler. We know that several poor farms were sold to settlers, and that balky or unsound horses, poor cows and poor second-hand machinery were turned over to settlers at prices that should have bought the best in each class.

At the end of December, 1937, gross advances on loans amounted to $110,945,926.08, and interest charges $30,643,796.76, or a total of $141,589,722.84.

Up to that time the soldier settlers had paid back in principal $37,161,859.12, and in interest $18,996,161.88, or a total of $56,158,021. In addition there were legislative reductions as follows: In principal and interest, $28,351,653.41; losses on resale of security principal, $17,612,419.28, making a total of $45,964,072.69. That does not include loss of interest on resale, the figures for which are not available; nor does it include interest on the 1922 amendment to the act, which is estimated at $10,269,108.87.

Having passed through this period of depression or oppression, whichever you like to call it, from 1929 down to the present time, we find that from January 1, 1931, to December 31, 1937, interest charges on soldier settler loans amounted to $11,606,721.53. Of this amount $3,701,399.79 was cancelled, leaving a total of $7,905,321.74. To this must be added the cost of administration for this period, amounting to $3,445,324.86, or a total of interest and administration costs for the seven years of $11,350,646.60.

Mr. CRERAR: May I ask what the hon. member is reading from?

Mr. FAIR: From information supplied by the minister's department.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend, I regret, has still failed to make himself clear. Is he reading from a return brought down to the house?

Mr. FAIR: No, I got it direct from the department. I am giving these figures because in my opinion the legislation under discussion is not adequate. The figures I have given are amounts charged up and we find that the payments during the period amount to: Principal, $5,501,726.83, and interest $4,350,389.93, or a total of $9,852,116.76, which is less than the amount of interest and administration charges during that period.

Coming to the year 1937, we find that the interest charged amounted to $1,280,956.06. The amount cancelled was $548,880.34. That left total interest charges of $732,075.72. Administration costs were $558,390. The total was $1,290,465.72.

The total amount paid in the calendar year 1932 was: Principal, $779,743.04, and interest $644,519.78, or a total of $1,424,262.82, which is very little more than the amount of interest and administration charges.

From the inception of the scheme to the end of March 1937, interest charges amounted to $30,643,796.76; administration costs for the same period, $23,765,179.70, or a total of $54,408,976.46. We find that the total amount of principal and interest paid since the inception of the scheme is $56,158,021, or approximately one and three-quarter millions more than the total amount of interest and administration charges.

The original amount of the loan was $4,155. At the end of March 1931, the average settler owed $2,311, or still fifty-five per cent of his original loan. At the end of December 1937, he still owed $2,271. That is to say, there was a reduction during the seven year period of $40, or a net decrease of about $6 per annum after the settler had supported his wife and family. At the end of December 1937, the settlers were in arrears, principal $5,475,608.29 and interest $5,394,202.12 or an average of $1,101, which is approximiately fifty per cent of the amount the average settler still owes on his land.

I do not know how long these settlers will have to continue working in order to clear their farms. When the recruiting officers were around the country in 1914 looking for soldiers they told the recruits that when they came back Canada would take care of them, but we find that the settlers are now taking care of some of our Canadian citizens and some citizens in other countries instead of Canada taking care of them. During the years following the inception of the scheme conditions were so bad that the government saw fit to reduce the debt in 1930 and I suggest that they should realize by this time that conditions since 1930 have become so much more serious that another drastic reduction is necessary.

About a year ago several members of this house had a communication from the Soldier Settlers' Union, with headquarters at Lloydminster, Saskatchewan, requesting that certain concessions be made so that if possible the soldiers might be enabled to get out of debt in the near future. Some of the recommendations were:

1. That our total debt be as it stood after the 30 per cent reduction and henceforth be a non-interest bearing debt. All payments made since that time to be applied to principal.

2. In the event of the death of a settler, clear title be given to his widow or dependent next of kin.

3. A complete revision of the present collection policy of the department.

4. A plan devised whereby settlers will be enabled to pay off their loans and at the same time maintain a reasonable standard of living.

* * * *

Legislation has been enacted to bring the officials of the soldier settlement department under the civil service, thus providing pensions and security for their old age. Brigadier General A. Ross, C.M.G., D.S.O., in presenting the case for these officials based his appeal on the grounds of their war service followed by their faithful service in the department after the war period. The soldier settler had war service also and were it not for the settlers there would be no department of soldier settlement, yet the settler has no security for his old age, but is instead faced with hopeless and increasing debt.

It would seem that the men for whom Brigadier-General Ross is speaking are enjoying a good living at the present time while the settlers are being treated in such a way as to suggest that to him that hath shall be given, and from him that hath not shall be taken even that which he hath. The officials of the Soldier Settlers' Union believe that their requests are very moderate and I am inclined to believe that if the government will survey the whole case of soldier settlers they will realize the importance of taking drastic action at this session. Last session we expected that something would be done but, in view of the coronation on May 12, this subject was pigeonholed. I hope that the minister and the government will now do something worth while for the soldier settler.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Time extended for credit on payments of arrears.

Mr. NEILL: I propose to oppose the passing of this section with all the vigour that the rules and decency of debate will permit. Unfortunately the method of presentation of this bill has been such as to convey an impression which I know is quite foreign to the character and intention of the minister—the impression of concealment. I say that quite sincerely. I know the minister is not responsible, but the method by which the bill has been presented has given that impression. When something is brought down by way of resolution in this house and goes out to the public meaning such and so—because after all the English language is interpretable generally along one line—and then when the bill brought down means something entirely different, this promotes dissension. Had the measure brought down given the soldiers concerned more than the resolution indicated there would have been no trouble; but when the legislation provides much less than the resolution indicated, this makes trouble for everyone. I think a large proportion of hon. members and certainly a large number of people throughout the country took from the resolution the meaning which I did, and which indeed its language conveys. This is how it reads:

. . . and to provide further that the period during which payments of arrears or instalments at present subject to bonus privileges may be made, be further extended.

It does not say extended to the extent of twelve per cent; it says "be extended." To the ordinary man on the street that means extending it to the same extent as it was before. I think we are in a sense flouting the governor general's recommendation in this. He recommended certain legislation, but we are doing something else. If logic and argument do not prevail I might think it worth while to move a point of order, that this bill is out of order inasmuch as it does not conform to or is not based upon the resolution as introduced. But let that go for the moment. The minister appears to have trusted a good deal to some conversation he had with someone as to what the legion at their convention thought about the matter. I hold in my hand the February number of the Legionnaire, on page 11 of which is a list of the resolutions, "some of the most important resolutions dealt with," and among them is, "that the dollar for dollar bonus be continued to soldier settlers." That means that it be continued, it does not mean that eight or ten or twelve per cent of it be continued.

Then again we find the minister saying, as reported on page 998 of Hansard, that, after all, things were not so bad; that it is a nice world anyhow, and that the soldier could get relief under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. But we have just passed an act making it possible for any province, apparently at the suggestion of the province, to do away with that act. So that is rather a broken reed.

Mr. CRERAR: Not necessarily at the suggestion of the province.

Mr. NEILL: Well, I do not know at whose suggestion; the suggestion of the dominion government, then.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act in its application may be suspended or terminated in any particular province by proclamation, but that would only be after all the purposes of the act had been in effect fulfilled. Every person who had made application for adjustment of his obligations under that act would still have his application considered.

Mr. NEILL: According to the language used in the debate, especially by hon. members from Ontario, the desire seemed to be to have that act cancelled at once. That certainly was not consulting the people who wanted to come under it; some hon. members seemed to be more concerned with those people who would be affected from the creditor's point of view. But we have passed an act making it possible for the dominion government at a moment's notice to cancel that act, and therefore the relief that the minister indicated the settlers might get in that way is extremely visionary.

There are two objections to this section, apart from the method of bringing it in, which could perhaps be remedied by taking the bill out and bringing in another resolution. But the two fundamental objections to this bill wherein it is unfair to the settler, are these: The old dollar for dollar bonus was allowed to any settler, whether he was in arrears or not when he made a payment on account of his indebtedness, be that indebtedness back interest or back instalments, or current interest or current instalments; he got $2 credit for every $1 he paid. And that is what the soldiers and settlers thought they were going to get when they saw this resolution brought down. Now it appears that they are going to get not that, but something which may apply to approximately one-third of them. Then there is a further deduction which I shall deal with in a moment. But the first patent injustice, as it seems to me to be, is that the bill is going to apply not to all settlers, but only to a limited few, somewhere about one-third. A man who scraped and saved and took the money out of the children's bank or the money his wife had inherited to pay right up, with some idea of pride, thinking, "For once we will show the government that I have paid up"; the man who paid his obligations right up to date, is not going to get any more relief. But the man who said, "Oh, well, the government must carry me. I will go and buy a car, or a radio, and let some of it lie back," is going to get the benefit of the dollar for dollar system. That is a wrong state of affairs, because it puts a premium on the man who hangs back and does not do what he can, something which we have not hitherto done in these transactions.

Well, that was bad enough. However, for the moment we swallow that; we have to. But there is a further thing which I noticed only to-day—and I must compliment whoever drew the amendment upon the subtle way in which it is worded. You do not see the nigger in the wood-pile until you study not only the language of the section itself but the explanation on the opposite page of the bill. You will notice it says:

> The total of bonusable indebtedness is not increased.

Why do they not say it is going to be very largely decreased? Why not be frank? Then they go on to say "as heretofore," which means, "as before", or "according to what has been done in the past."

> As heretofore, only such amounts as were due and payable before April 1, 1938, may be repaid on the bonus basis.

It is true they say, "due and payable before April 1, 1938"; but they use the words "as heretofore."

Now a further detriment to these unfortunate people who come within this abbreviated and curtailed bonus system is this: A great many of us thought they would at least continue to get the same advantages as under the old system. Does the explanation not say, "as heretofore"? They were allowed to get dollar for dollar for everything they paid on arrears of interest or capital or instalments due. One would think the settlers who were going to get this advantage would get that advantage too. But this is not so. You find that they get the dollar for dollar bonus only on the payment past due April 1, 1938. On the payment due in April or October, 1938, although the payment for April may be in arrears, they get no rebate. So that the amount we are giving them is very small indeed.

I am going to test the feeling of the committee—more to put the matter in concrete form so that it will be seen what it is and what it should be—by moving the following amendment:

That after the word "arrears" in line 1 on page 2 the words "or of any instalment" be inserted, and in the second line the figures "1938" be struck out and the figures "1941" be inserted.

So that it would then read:

73 (1) Any settler or person indebted in respect of any contract or agreement made prior to the first day of January, 1933, under the provisions of this act, who after the thirty-first day of March, 1933, makes payment on or before the thirty-first day of March, 1941, in respect of any arrears or of any instalment due and payable before the first day of April, 1941, shall, subject to the provisions of this section, receive credit toward payment of such arrears for a further sum equal to the payment made.

I think that carries out the absolute spirit of the resolution as introduced, at least as we read it, and also the spirit of fairness as regards the past, as well as having regard to the possibilities of the settlers; for, as someone said just now, we are talking about whether the interest on taxes paid and insurance should be seven per cent or five per cent, but what does this matter, when you are not going to get it anyhow, or have to cut it down very seriously? This would keep alive the promises made by the minister two years ago when he introduced this. I raised the question then of extending it for five years, and he said no; two years was enough, and if the same conditions prevailed two years later he would again renew it. This has not been done, though to all intents and purposes the conditions are the same. I shall move that amendment, just to put the matter in concrete form in order to show the difference between what is in this bill and what, in my humble opinion at least, should be in the bill.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot agree with the position taken by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. The adequacy—or inadequacy, which my hon. friend thinks is the better term—of the resolution was pretty well discussed when the resolution was before the house.

Mr. NEILL: It was discussed but it was not explained.

Mr. CRERAR: I have gone further into the matter, and there is no doubt in the opinion of the law advisers who drafted the resolution that it is full enough and broad enough to cover the bill which was introduced subsequent to the adoption of the resolution by the house.

Mr. NEILL: But the bill does not cover the resolution. That is the trouble.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend is now rather reversing his position. At first he stated that he was criticizing the resolution.

Mr. NEILL: Oh, no.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not, of course, wish to misrepresent my hon. friend, but I submit that the resolution is in conformity with the bill; or I shall put it the other way, that the bill is in conformity with the resolution. At the same time I admit that probably the resolution might have been a little more clearly drafted, but I would direct the attention of the committee to the wording of the resolution, which states:

That it is expedient to amend the Soldier Settlement Act for the purpose of reducing from seven per centum to five per centum the interest rate charged on certain repayments to the board of taxes and insurance premiums paid by the board in respect to soldier settlement lands in case of default on the part of the settler—

This is the important part:

—and to provide further that the period during which payments of arrears or instalments at present subject to bonus privileges—

That is, in connection with all those arrears of interest or instalments of principal which up to the 31st of this month are subject to bonus privileges, the bill proposes that the soldier settler who has not been able to take advantage of that provision may have an opportunity to do so within the next three years. I think that is quite clear. As I said a moment ago, it may be that the resolution could have been more clearly drafted, but I submit that it is sufficient for the purposes of the bill.

May I direct the attention of the committee to one other point. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni drew in contrast the picture of the returned man who had been frugal and saving, and who had made his payments.

Well, he obtained the advantage of the dollar for dollar bonus privilege up to March 31, on all his payments and all his interest arrears. That fact cannot be disputed. It is equally true that, if this legislation passes, he does not have that privilege beyond March 31. Now take the case of the other man, at the other end of the stick, who perhaps may have been in a position to take advantage of the dollar for dollar bonus privilege but who bought a car or went on a trip or did something else instead. In connection with those portions of his payment in arrears, both principal and interest, up to March 31, he can still claim the dollar for dollar privilege, but he cannot get that bonus on the payments that fall due after March 31 of this year. So in that respect he is on precisely the same footing as the frugal soldier settler who sacrificed creature comforts, let us say, in order to take advantage of the bonus. This does not discriminate as between them; it simply extends, very largely because of the drought condition in western Canada, to those soldier settlers who, because of crop failure, sickness or some other reason, have not been able to take advantage of the bonus privilege up to the present time, the opportunity to do so for another three years. I submit to the committee that this is reasonable and fair legislation.

May I add one further word. It is comparatively easy to exhibit a generous attitude of mind as far as the returned men are concerned. I find no fault with that, but I think the consensus of opinion—I am taking reasonable opinion in Canada—not only among our civilian population but among the vast returned soldier population, is that the returned soldiers have not asked and are not asking any special favours, except in the occasional odd case that one may expect to find. What they want is reasonably fair treatment, and I again point out to the committee the fact that I mentioned a little earlier in the afternoon. The returned soldiers who settled on the land, who took advantage of the offer of the government during the period immediately following the war, in a sense have been in a preferred position as compared with other returned men.

I recall the purpose of the legislation passed at that time. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni was not in the house when this legislation was passed. I was in the house, and I recall the discussion that took place. There was a good deal of opposition to the establishment of this system of returned soldier land settlement. At that time it was pointed out by some hon. members that precisely the evils or the difficulties which have arisen in the course of administration would arise. It was pointed out that there would be perhaps a very small minority of returned men who would feel that the country ought to do everything possible for them. But for good or for ill the plan was adopted. The vast majority of those who joined the Canadian expeditionary force, according to my information almost ninety-eight per cent, have not benefited through this soldier settlement scheme. There were numerous instances—I think every hon. member knows of them—of returned men who established themselves without the advantage of any assistance. Perhaps they were more enterprising; perhaps they had more of the spirit of independence and self-reliance, which unfortunately I think is going into a decline in this country to-day, than those who took advantage of the settlement scheme. Is it to be opened up so that those men will get some advantages also? Take the man who established himself in a small business. He has not had assistance from the government. I think on the whole this legislation and its administration must be tested on the basis of whether or not the treatment of the returned men who went on the land has been fair. I believe the whole record, from 1920 down to the present date, supports the view that it has been fair.

Mr. NEIL: Up to date, yes.

Mr. CRERAR: I think that is the view of the great majority of returned men. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni quoted from a journal as to the opinion of the legion respecting the extension of the privilege right across the board. I have not the resolution with me; but my information is—and I think it is correct—that the legion at its recent meeting at Fort William, passed a resolution which was practically on all fours with the principle embodied in the present legislation. For that reason I regret I cannot accept the amendment of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. GREEN: As I understand the matter, the effect of the bill is that there will be no dollar for dollar bonus on any payments falling due after April 1, 1938.

Mr. CRERAR: Correct.

Mr. GREEN: But there will be a privilege given to those who are in arrears with payments already due of making those payments on the dollar for dollar basis until April 1, 1941?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, they have three years in which to do so.

Mr. GREEN: I believe the dollar for dollar bonus was initiated in 1933. At that time it was intended to last for a period of three years. Then, in 1936 this parliament passed an amendment extending the time for a further two years. It seems to me the test as to whether or not that period should now be exended again is this: What are the conditions in agriculture in Canada at the present time? This afternoon we have heard about distress in the prairie provinces, in Prince Edward Island and in northern Ontario. I know there is great hardship among some of the soldier settlers in British Columbia. Suggestions have been made that the soldier settlers should take advantage of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act which, after all, is not as satisfactory a procedure as getting consideration under the Soldier Settlement Act. We have also heard the suggestion made that interest should be waived, and that other concessions be made.

I put it to the minister earnestly that conditions in Canada are not yet ripe for cancelling the dollar for dollar bonus. We have not yet reached that stage. I suggest to him that although he may not accept the amendment of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, he should himself bring in an amendment to the act which will extend for a reasonable period the time during which the soldier settlers may take advantage of the dollar for dollar bonus.

Mr. PELLETIER: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni stated what, in my opinion, is a definite and true fact. It was my intention to bring the attention of the committee to the wording of the bill. I am inclined to think the impression has gone abroad that people were going to take advantage of the dollar for dollar bonus. It would appear that the purpose of the bill is simply to give an opportunity to those people who have arrears due to take advantage of the measure. The individual whose instalments will be due later on will not enjoy the same privileges. I cannot understand why a man whose payments come due a year or two after the amendment comes into effect should not have the same privilege as one whose instalments are already due. As one hon. member has said, conditions in Canada do not warrant discrimination of this kind simply because of the dates upon which payments may fall due.

I support the view taken by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, and I believe that in this measure the government is not meeting the desire of the people, and is not meeting what the people were led to believe they could expect on the passing of the legislation. Therefore I strongly support the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): When the measure was before the house on another occasion I protested against the way in which the resolution had been drafted, and the way in which it was being interpreted. However, the resolution was accepted, and the legislation is now before us. I still think the resolution was drawn either carelessly or craftily. I do not know which term to use.

I hold in my hand figures which will illustrate what I mean by saying that many men had paid up their instalments, with considerable difficulty to themselves, and that others who had not paid and who were living in the same district were now going to have the benefit, over a longer period of time. This means that they will be able to have the use of money, for their own purposes, over a long period of time, at the expense of the government.

In three subdistricts of northern Saskatchewan with which I am familiar, and which I believe beyond the shadow of a doubt were the subdistricts in the best condition of any part of that province last year, the total, including arrears, due last fall, amounted to $314,380.33. The actual payments made totalled $41,255.01, or about twelve and a half per cent of the amount due. The number of settlers with payments due stood at 546. Of that number I find that 138 paid in full and that 161 paid in part. It would appear, therefore, that almost one-quarter of the settlers with accounts due paid in full, and nearly one-third paid in part. But by that number, comprising almost two-thirds of the settlers with payments due, only about one-eighth of the amount of money due was paid back. So that those who did not pay anything owed the great bulk of the $314,380.33. This condition has been going on for some time, and these people have had the use of the money. They live in the same district with the 138 people who paid in full. That money has been in use for a long time, and for the next three years they will continue to enjoy it at a rate of two and a half per cent. I say that, because the interest having been cut to five per cent, and the bonus payments being due on a fifty-fifty basis, the use of the money will cost two and a half per cent for interest, and the principal payments due will be cut by fifty per cent.

What will be the effect on the 138 men who paid in full and the 161 who paid in part? I know they have no legal claim; but human nature being what it is, it would be too much to expect that some of these men would not say, either to themselves or openly, that they had made a mistake; that they should not have made those payments, and that those who did make them were not faring any better than those who did not. Those who had made no payments were faring no worse because they had not made them. They were not disturbed on their land.

The last day the subject was before the house, and again to-day the minister told us that the convention of the legion at Fort William had not asked for anything more than what is contained in the legislation. That is true. I hold in my hand a copy of a resolution adopted at the seventh dominion convention of the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League at Fort William in January, 1938. Under the heading of soldier settlement, it states:

This convention realizing that among soldier settlers as a group there are a proportion who are in an exceedingly unhappy position in relation to their financial obligations to the board, urges the government to develop a policy which will enable them to continue to earn a livelihood on their farms notwithstanding the position of their accounts.

This convention further realizes that there are a number of soldier settlers to whom the dollar for dollar bonus has been of little assistance owing to adverse crop conditions and we would urge that this concessoin should be continued to this group or that some other means should be devised to afford them relief in lieu thereof.

The minister was perfectly right in what he said, but I do not think that resolution passed at Fort William was fair to those who in that same district had made their payments regardless of crop failure or adverse crop conditions, the term used in the resolution. These men are going to be shut out from the benefits from now on. Another suggestion was made, as follows:

Information made available indicates that many soldier settlers have secured a large measure of relief as a result of taking advantage of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and the convention suggests that all soldier settlers should carefully examine the provisions of this act and take full advantage thereof.

At the time that suggestion was made I do not think there was any knowledge of the fact that legislation was going to be introduced in this house providing for the termination of those benefits at some date to be set in the future. If this suggestion is followed, knowing human nature as we do, we know that some men will say to themselves, "They are not going to give us any assistance by way of a fifty-fifty bonus; we cannot come under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act as we are not insolvent; we do not want to go through bankruptcy; the thing to do is to refrain from making any further payments; we will use our money for other purposes and then when we become eligible for the bankruptcy court we can follow the advice given here." I find that the suggestion to come under the provisions of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act did not come only from that convention held in Fort William. I hold in my hand, "The report of the Department of Immigration and Colonization including report of soldier settlement of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1935," and on page 99 I find the following:

Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934

This act passed at the 1934 session of parliament is intended to provide a simple means whereby the debt burdens of the farmer may be adjusted to a level more consistent with the revenue producing capacity of the farm. The act makes provisions for farmers as debtors and their creditors to get together and arrange mutually satisfactory compromises and settlements.

The provisions of this act are applicable to debtors of the crown and therefore all classes of settlers under the department holding contracts with the director of soldier settlement are eligible to apply for the benefits of this legislation. The administative machinery began to function only in November, 1934, consequently it is too early to make any reliable estimate of the number of settlers likely to apply for reduction of their debt to the department or adjustment of the terms of existing contracts. To date 77 soldier settlers, ten British families and 83 civilian settlers have made application for reduction of debt or revision of terms of their contracts.

The report then goes on to deal with departmental cooperation with farmers' creditors act administration. The suggestion was made three years ago by the department that advantage should be taken of legislation which required that a man be insolvent before he could come under its terms. There is one other matter I should like to draw to the attention of the minister and the committee. I think it is to the credit of those who have spoken about the position of the soldier settler under the act, but we must not overlook the fact that to-day the majority of those concerned are not soldier settlers. I think if that fact were realized this matter would be looked upon differently. Even as early as three years ago only fifty per cent of the farms under the administrator were occupied by soldier settlers, and the percentage is less to-day. The report has this to say:

A total of 3,346 families came forward for settlement of which 183 withdrew from the scheme before receiving advances, and 1,335 withdrew after contracting loans, a total of 1,518 withdrawals. There are now 1,813 British families operating their farms under this scheme. Fifteen settlers have repaid their loans.

These lands either have been sold to civilian settlers or are still in the hands of the board.

The net result is that a large percentage of the relief and benefits to be given under this legislation will go to civilian settlers who purchased land from the board prior to January 1, 1933. Those who purchased land in 1932 at the depth of the depression and did not pay anything upon it are now able to take advantage of this legislation and obtain a reduced interest rate of two and a half per cent and a reduction in payments of fifty per cent. I do not know what anyone can do about this now, but those are the facts. This scheme was initiated twenty years ago and to-day the number of soldier settlers is only a small percentage of the total, while the original soldier settlers represent even a smaller percentage. That being the case, I suggest to the minister that this should be treated as an ordinary collection matter. It really represents money which is outstanding to the government, some of it by civilian settlers who purchased these lands. These moneys have not been paid, and it is merely a matter of collecting them in the most efficient manner. We have a farm loan board which I believe is collecting all payments that it is possible to collect. It might be a good thing for the committee and the department and the minister to consider the advisability of placing the collection of these outstanding amounts under the farm loan board. I would not suggest this to the committee if the majority of these settlers were soldier settlers, but that is not the case to-day.

Mr. BETTS: I deplore the suggestion that the dollar for dollar privilege be cut off at the present time. A few moments ago the minister said that the soldiers who had availed themselves of this settlement scheme were in a preferred position. In theory that may be so, but if the minister could see some of the farms in the district west of London upon which soldiers have been placed I do not think he would make that statement. I do not know why these farms were acquired by the board, but the fact is that they were. These lands will not produce and the soldiers who are still there are certainly not in any preferred position. They are fighting a little war of their own in order to keep body and soul together. My submission is that if this dollar for dollar bonus is cut off, we shall have more payments to make under the War Veterans' Allowance Act. In the end this will turn out to be poor economy. I urge the minister to continue this privilege until times are better.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I should like to refer to this question of the dollar for dollar bonus as there is a group of returned men in my constituency who are in desperate need of real assistance. A moment ago the minister said that a soldier would not ask for anything that was unfair. I think that is correct, but I believe, if the minister were a little more familiar with the conditions under which some of these returned men live, he would be more lenient. I do not think the bill as it is now before us is as good as it was in its old form. Just at a time when these men need consideration, this dollar for dollar bonus is going to be cut off. It is a shame that such a step should be considered when these people need the bonus so badly. In order that the minister may have the exact words of some of these soldiers, I should like to read a resolution I received the other day. The following resolution was submitted to a meeting held on January 16, 1938, of soldier settlers on the Pope lease, and unanimously approved:

> Whereas the dominion parliament at its session in 1933, by amendment to the Soldier Settlement Act, made provision for a bonus of a dollar for each dollar paid by or on account of each soldier settler; and
> Whereas the said bonus terminates on March 1, 1938; and
> Whereas owing to poor crops through hail damage and drought, together with low prices for agricultural products, the resident soldier settlers have been unable to take advantage of the bonus plan to any extent to date; and
> Whereas we believe that it would be for the advantage of the dominion that soldier settler liabilities be liquidated at the soonest possible moment;
> Therefore be it resolved that we the soldier settlers on the Pope lease ask the dominion government to seriously consider the advisability of continuing the bonus plan for a further period of five years;
> That the maximum amount bonusable in any one year be the amount of the settler's indebtedness;
> That interest, together with arrears of interest since 1929, be waived for a like period.

There is one point to which I particularly want to draw attention, and that is that this was a resolution from returned soldier settlers and was unanimously passed. I do not think they are asking for anything too much because they are in a very serious situation. They are in the drought area. I am not so much concerned about those who are in a position to pay because they were probably of a more speculative nature, have taken advantage of the dollar for dollar bonus, and have their land cleared of debt, but surely these other soldier settlers who offered their lives in the service of their country should receive a little consideration at this time. As I mentioned a few days ago when we were discussing this matter on the estimates, surely we should not deprive the soldier who may get a good crop next year and desires to clear off his indebtedness to the government, of the privilege of taking advantage of this dollar for dollar bonus, and getting his land clear as quickly as possible, but under the new bill he will not be permitted to take advantage of the bonus so far as new payments are concerned, because it applies only to arrears. While the extended period continues for only about two years—and of course that should be carried on—there is no good reason why it should not be continued even after the expiration of this bill. I think it would be in the interests of economy as suggested by the last speaker (Mr. Betts) that right now when people are so very hard up, especially these returned men, this dollar for dollar bonus should be continued and certainly not be cut off at this time.

Mr. BROOKS: May I ask the minister whether, in the payment of this bonus, the arrears or the current instalment must be paid first? In 1939, for example, would the soldier settler pay his arrears first, or would he have to pay the current instalment first, and then the arrears, and get credit for what he had paid?

Mr. CRERAR: If he has payments to make he can apply them on arrears of principal and interest and get the full advantage of the bonus. The worst that happens to him then is that he would be required to carry his 1939 payment, assuming that he could not meet it at five per cent interest.

Mr. BROOKS: If he has $100 to pay, he will pay that on the arrears, and get a credit bonus of $200?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, a bonus of $100.

Mr. NEILL: Provided he has paid taxes and insurance up to date. They come first. Is that not so?

Mr. CRERAR: Not necessarily.

Mr. NEILL: I think the minister will find that that is how the scheme works out in practice, at all events. Before the man can get the dollar for dollar bonus he must have his taxes and insurance paid up to date.

Mr. BROOKS: I quite agree with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) and others who have spoken on this bill, that conditions prevailing to-day are such that the government would be justified in continuing the same procedure we have had since 1933. The 1933 legislation was no doubt based on conditions at that time; its continuation was also based on the then prevailing conditions, and everyone who has sat in this house and listened to statements made by the western members, particularly those who come from the drought areas, or heard the hon. member from Prince Edward Island describing conditions in his province, must realize the conditions that now prevail.

The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) has also mentioned that a number of soldier settlers in the St. John district had to give up their farms; and in New Brunswick, principally in the potato-producing area of the province, these men have not been able to receive satisfactory compensation for the potatoes they produced, selling them at twenty-five to thirty or forty cents a barrel, while the cost of production was twice as much. In justice to the returned soldiers and to others who have these farms, this bonus should be continued not merely as regards the arrears for the past few years but also to give these men an opportunity to pay off their indebtedness. I realize, as the minister has said, that this government has been generous, and past governments have been more than generous, to the returned soldiers in this matter; but these settlers are in a more or less hopeless condition, and the government may as well realize the situation now as later and give these men the benefit of the bonus so that they may be able to help themselves in the future.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

PROPOSED APPLICATION OF CROWSNEST PASS RATES ON GRAIN WESTWARD AS WELL AS EASTWARD

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved the second reading of Bill No. 18, to amend the Railway Act (rates on grain).

He said: Without going into any lengthy explanation of this bill, I may say that, in brief, it asks that the same railway rates which apply on all grain and grain products from the three prairie provinces eastward to Fort William and eastern centres shall apply to all grain and grain products from those three provinces westward to British Columbia. Inasmuch as I have brought this matter up in the house every year since 1930, perhaps it will not be necessary for me to go into it as extensively in every detail on this occasion. However, as there are many hon. members now present who were not here when similar bills were before the house on previous occasions, it might be advisable for me again to go over some of the main arguments in support of British Columbia's appeal for equal treatment with the middle and eastern provinces in the matter of railway rates on grain and grain products.

Briefly, the history of the matter is this. In 1897 legislation was enacted whereby the Canadian Pacific Railway agreed to construct a railway from Lethbridge, Alberta, to Nelson, British Columbia. For this they received a large subsidy in money and a grant of land. In return they were to reduce the then existing railway rates eastward by three cents per 100 pounds. These rates, from that time on, became known as the Crowsnest Pass rates. As my time is limited I cannot go into a detailed history, but I may point out that in general these rates placed upon the statute book in 1897 have been maintained ever since. In 1925, however, the matter was again brought before parliament, and new legislation was passed by the house in that year confirming the Crowsnest Pass rates as established in 1897, but extending them to apply on all Canadian National and Canadian Pacific lines. The Canadian Pacific Railway gained by this move as commodity rates were taken out of the freight list. The rates on grain and grain products were left as before but they applied only to points eastward, and British Columbia was again ignored. British Columbia has contended that the people of that province are entitled to the same treatment as the people in other parts of Canada, but that, on the contrary, she has been grossly and unjustly dealt with, as I shall show presently. The unjust treatment meted out to the people of that province constitutes a grievous burden.

I am not going into a lengthy discussion of freight rates generally because I realize that this perhaps is not the place to do so; rather I shall confine my remarks to railway rates applying to grain and grain products eastward and westward. The House of Commons, having on previous occasions dealt with this very question, can and should, I submit, do so again. Before I discuss some of the injustices and anomalies of the situation, I wish to repeat what I have on previous occasions endeavoured to make clear, namely, that we have going into British Columbia the lowest grade of any railway line in any province. It appears that we from British Columbia have to repeat this statement over and over again because there are still some people who seem to think that, going through the coast range mountains to the Pacific, there are other grades to contend with. Not only have we the lowest grades but we have also the lowest upkeep expense on any portion of the trans-Canada railway—lower than in any other part of Canada. Construction costs were less and upkeep costs are lower than in other parts of Canada, as I shall show. In the sworn testimony given in 1925 before the board of railway commissioners information was given with reference to this matter. It was shown that the cost per mile of line between Kamloops and Hope, which is one of the heavy grades of railway going through British Columbia, was $133,563 per mile of 168 miles. From Montreal to Ottawa, a district all hon. members know fairly well, the distance is 111 miles and the cost was $178,614 per mile. Again, from Hope to Fraser Junction, a distance of seventy-seven miles, the cost was $51,544 per mile as against Joliette to Garnier Junction, a distance of 61·49 miles, which cost $62,394 per mile. As regards operating cost, I know that in the minds of many hon. members there is the idea that the grade through the mountains into British Columbia not only has cost more to construct but is also more costly to maintain. In the same testimony given at the time to which I have referred it was shown that the upkeep cost per mile in British Columbia was $3,825 per mile as against an upkeep cost in the prairies of $4,702 per mile.

One could take an entire evening giving data such as I have briefly touched upon, but I believe I have placed before the house enough to show that in the sworn testimony given before the board of railway commissioners it was made abundantly clear that in British Columbia construction costs were less, upkeep was less, and fewer double engines or, if I may so describe them, pusher engines are required than in certain parts of the prairies and of eastern Canada. There is no justification for a difference of between twenty and eighty per cent of increased railway rates in the west as compared with the east, and I am going to take time to quote a few of the different rates.

From Calgary to Vancouver the rate for export is twenty cents per 100 pounds over a distance of 642 miles, or 766 miles from Edmonton to Vancouver. Here I want the house to note the fact. While the Canadian Pacific railway is and has been taken as the yardstick by the board of railway commissioners, when it comes to computing the distance between the prairie province of Alberta and the province of British Columbia, they take the longer distance of the Canadian National, not the shorter distance of 642 miles, but 766 miles. They do not use the Canadian Pacific railway yardstick in that case. Of course it is to the advantage of the Canadian Pacific railway that the Canadian National mileage is quoted from Edmonton to Vancouver.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it not the other way about? From Calgary to Vancouver is 642 miles.

Mr. REID: Yes, that is correct. The export rate is twenty cents per 100 pounds. At the moment a temporary rate has been put in, with which I shall deal later on, which allows certain varieties or grades of feed grain to be hauled at a rate of some 31½ cents; but mill feed, the greater part of which is used in feeding poultry and dairy stock, is still charged 41½ cents, from either Edmonton or Calgary.

That is the rate westward on grain. Let us now see what the rate is going east. From Calgary to Fort William the distance is 1,242 miles. The grain rate for that haul is twenty-six cents. Strange to say, it is only when grain is going west that the railway companies differentiate between domestic and export rates. Grain leaving Calgary and Edmonton for Fort William and other points east is simply grain; in most instances there are no two rates. From Calgary to Montreal, a distance of 2,221 miles, the export rate is fifty cents, as against forty-six cents for domestic. From Calgary to Quebec, 2,215 miles, the rates are the same, fifty cents for export and forty-six cents for domestic.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it not the other way about, the cheaper rate for export?

Mr. REID: To some points in the east the domestic rate is lower than the export rate. From Fort William to Montreal, a distance of 995 miles, the rates quoted to me are twenty-four cents for export and only twenty cents for domestic. There were some exceptional rates put in there, and in some instances the domestic rate was really lower than the export rate, for reasons which I think will be explained by the minister. These figures were given to me by officials of the board of railway commissioners.

Now how does that work out? From Calgary to Vancouver the rate per ton per mile works out at ·654 cents as against the rate from Calgary to Fort William of ·418 cents. Or if you take the rate per 100 pounds per mile, from Calgary to Vancouver it is ·0327 cents as against a rate from Calgary to Fort William of ·0209 cents. The rate per ton per 100 miles—100 miles being the usual day's run of a train—is 65·4 cents from Calgary to Vancouver, and only 41·8 cents from Calgary to Fort William. The export rate to Vancouver as compared with that to Fort William is one-half cent more per mile. I mention that because it is often said that the twenty cent rate, which is the export rate from Calgary and Edmonton to Vancouver, is equal to the rate from Calgary and Edmonton to Fort William. These figures which I have just given disprove that statement, showing that even on grain for export British Columbia does not enjoy the same rates as the east, let alone the domestic rate.

I now mention one or two other rates to show the difference between east and west. From Windsor, Ontario, to Saint John, New Brunswick, the distance is 1054·6 miles and the rate is 18½ cents. If you were shipping the grain the same distance to Vancouver or New Westminster, the charge would be twenty-four cents. From Goderich, 962·6 miles, the rate is 18½ cents, while westward the same distance, from a place called Rusylvia, Alberta, 961·4 miles, the rate would be twenty-four cents.

One could take up considerable time placing before the house rates from various centres throughout Canada, but I think the few I have given amply demonstrate what I am endeavouring to bring out, that is that the rates westward are anything from twenty to eighty per cent higher than the rates eastward from Calgary and Edmonton. In passing may I point out that the railways seem to have a most idiotic rate structure, operating to the disadvantage of British Columbia. If one wants to ship butter or eggs from Vancouver or New Westminster to Calgary or Edmonton, a certain rate will be charged, but the farmer shipping similar goods from Edmonton or Calgary to New Westminster or Vancouver would have a cheaper rate. It is like charging a passenger so much for going in one direction, but charging him a different fare when he returned. I mention that to substantiate the argument I am making, that we in British Columbia are carrying an extremely heavy burden in the matter of freight rates. British Columbia is not asking for special treatment, and would any hon. member maintain that British Columbia should be forever discriminated against?

In arguing before the board of railway commissioners when counsel for both railway systems were present, I asked this question: Does the export rate on grain from the prairie provinces to British Columbia pay? No answer. Neither counsel would answer that question. I was hoping they would. If it does pay, why should they charge the people of British Columbia twice that rate for their domestic grain requirements? Again, if it does not pay, should the people of British Columbia be called upon to bear that load, while our competitors in countries like China, Japan and elsewhere receive good Canadian grain at half the freight cost at which we who live in British Columbia can get that same grain?

I now put to the house just what this means to the people of British Columbia. It is estimated by those who claim to know that five bushels of grain are consumed annually by the average individual, either in the form of flour—and including, of course, oatmeal too—or cereal. If we take the population of British Columbia at some 700,000 people, this means that they would consume 3,500,000 bushels of grain, equal to 160,000 tons, on which they are charged twice the rate paid on flour and grain going to New Westminster or Vancouver for export. This means that for many years past the people of our province have been paying $415,000 more annually for their flour and grain requirements than the people in the eastern and central provinces have paid.

There is close to my own home one cooperative organization of which I have some knowledge. I should like to show just what it would mean to them if we could purchase our grain requirements as cheaply as people in China or Japan can. They have a membership of some six hundred persons, and they are out to buy for their members grain as cheaply as possible. Each year there is a dividend declared, so it cannot be said by the minister or anyone else that if freight rates were lowered the saving would not be passed on to the consumer, because in this cooperative organization they do pass on the profits to their members. Last year they purchased over five thousand tons of grain for their members. If the Vancouver basis had been in force on 5,083 tons at 20½ cents per 100 pounds, they would have paid $20,840. Instead, on 3,646 tons they had to pay at the rate of thirty-one cents per 100 pounds, or a total of $22,969, and on 1,437 tons at the rate of 41½ cents per 100 pounds, a total of $11,927, or a grand total of $34,896. Even with the rate of thirty-one cents per 100 pounds on feed grains, which is a temporary rate, the members of that organization saved a great deal of money last year, namely $14,056.

Let me go further; I should like to point out what this would mean to the poultrymen. The figures in regard to the dairymen are harder to compute, but I have the details in regard to the poultrymen. If the people of British Columbia could obtain their grain at the export rate, it would mean a saving of twenty-two cents on each laying hen they have on the premises. Let me point out in passing that British Columbia is the greatest egg-laying province in Canada, and on the average flock of five hundred birds this would mean a saving of $110 per year. The peak year was 1928; each year since that time men have been going out of the poultry business, so that to-day I do not think there are more than thirty per cent of the poultrymen in business that there were some four or five years ago. Not long ago I had a letter from a man in Nakusp who ordered a ton and a half of feed grain from Vancouver. He sent me the bill he received from the railway company. The distance is 443 miles, and they charged him $31.77 in freight for some thirty-one sacks of feed grain. I ask those in eastern Canada who are complaining about high freight rates to take note of that, and to tell me if they have anything to kick about here in the east.

Then I have something interesting to say in regard to flour. Perhaps it does not pertain particularly to my argument, but people in British Columbia pay $1 per barrel more on the average than do the people in Ontario, due, I claim, principally to the freight rates. I have in my hand a report of the price spreads commission in regard to this matter, dealing with information and data that was laid before that body. The price quoted then in the province of British Columbia was $5.40; the price at the same date in the province of Ontario was $4.40. I am not going to digress from my argument to speak about the milling combine, but in passing I should like to say that when I happened to look up the data and figures in regard to Australia they indicated more clearly than ever the fact that we have a combine in the milling business in Canada. On May 20, 1935, the price in Australia for one ton of flour in forty-nine pound sacks was $29.81. The local price, worked out on a comparable basis, was $35 per ton. If you work this out, it means that the price in Australia was 1·75 cents per pound or eighty-six cents for a forty-nine pound sack, and bear in mind that the price of wheat to the farmer in Australia at that time was a little higher than the price to the farmer on the prairies.

Mr. BENNETT: Was that the depreciated dollar or at the ordinary rate of exchange?

Mr. REID: That is in Australian currency, in Canadian terms.

Mr. BENNETT: That is only $4 to the pound.

Mr. REID: I am comparing it with the Canadian price. It is not the old country pound or the old country price, that I have in mind. I am comparing it with the Canadian price in Canadian money. These figures are not my interpretation; they are the Canadian quotation in Australian money, so I think the comparison is quite fair. In Canadian funds a forty-nine pound sack of flour would cost eighty-six cents as of that date, while the price in Canada at the same time was $1.27 for a forty-nine pound sack. This is something well worth looking into. I know it does not directly touch the argument on freight rates, but I deem it worthy of mention as I proceed in developing my argument.

Mr. BENNETT: Why don't you try the Combines Act on it?

Mr. REID: That was suggested when the price spreads committee was sitting, but I do not think any action was taken.

Mr. BENNETT: All you need is six people to sign an application.

Mr. REID: All we were asking in this bill, and all we have been asking for many years is that we should be given equal treatment on the same terms as the other provinces. When one sees what the other provinces are getting in the way of help in regard to freight rates, one is surprised that nothing has been done for the far away province of British Columbia. As a matter of fact I believe there are a good many people in this country who do not know that we even exist. I am not complaining about what the maritime people get, but according to a statement I have before me from 1927 to March 31, 1937, some $24,669,745 was paid under the Maritime Freight Rates Act.

Mr. FINN: How much was that?

Mr. REID: I am not surprised that you are surprised.

Mr. FINN: I am not surprised; it should be more than that.

Mr. REID: I can see where I shall have one supporter for my freight rates bill. The figure is $24,669,745.

Mr. FINN: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. REID: Yes, but my time is short.

Mr. FINN: I shall not take long—

Mr. REID: I hope not.

Mr. FINN: —in asking the question. You may take longer to answer it. So far as the Maritimes Freight Rates Act is concerned, the hon. member knows that for forty-three years we enjoyed differentials or arbitraries on the old Intercolonial, as fixed by the then traffic manager, the late D. A. Story, and approved by the general manager, the late David Pottinger, who died last year at the ripe old age of ninety-three years. That road was later under the late Hon. A. G. Blair, Minister of Railways and Canals, and the late Hon. H. R. Emmerson who followed him as said minister, to St. Henry just out of Montreal, and then under the War Measures Acts 1917-18 those differentials were swept away, and we are not yet back to the normal rates we had under the old Intercolonial with any long haul not yet rectified under the Transcontinental Act.

Mr. REID: And even then you are twenty-five per cent below the rates of British Columbia. That is the point I was going to make. If there were no assistance given to the maritime provinces, the rates in those provinces would still be twenty-five per cent below what they are in British Columbia—and yet we get no help.

Mr. FINN: That is not my fault if it is so.

Mr. REID: I notice also that 264,195 tons of coal were moved last year, and that for the movement of that coal the country paid $2,450,050. It is very fine to hand out that $24,000,000 over a period of ten years, plus $2,450,050 yearly; yet when we in British Columbia come to Ottawa and ask that we be treated equally in freight rates, we are told that we are getting enough. I believe many hon. members are of the opinion that we are asking some special privilege. All we are asking is that we be treated like one of the family, instead of as an outcast, as has been the case for many long years.

I am giving my own views when I say that I do not think it is this parliament altogether which prevents us from getting our rights. There is such a pressure of eastern interests that every move made on behalf of the people of British Columbia meets with strong opposition, in case we in British Columbia develop too fast.

I was somewhat surprised when I read a statement in this evening's paper by the premier of Quebec. I do not know whether he is out to raise any sectional cry, but the statement appearing in the press certainly calls for some rebuttal. He says:

> Quebec shippers pay higher freight rates sending merchandise to western Canada than western shippers are charged on freight coming back the same distances to Quebec points. Quebec and Ontario pay seventy-five per cent of the federal taxes.

And listen to this:

> He is ready to do justice, but he does not want to be bled white.

Can you beat a statement like that from the premier of a province? I wonder if he has really given any study to the freight rates question. I wonder if he really knows that it is the province of British Columbia which is being bled white. I wonder how many members realize—and this applies to some voices we hear from Ontario—that British Columbia is one of the best customers Quebec and Ontario have. British Columbia has been importing from those two provinces an average of $50,000,000 worth of goods yearly, and in turn the two provinces have been buying back something less than $11,000,000 worth. Yet we have people from both provinces talking about being bled white! It is we, in British Columbia, who have every reason to cry out. However, I suppose the nearer one gets to Ottawa, the more attention is paid to that cry. I wish to take issue right now with the premier of Quebec when he tries to put it over—if I may use the term—that the people of that province are suffering in the matter of railway rates. I say to him: Give us in British Columbia the same freight rates as you have in Ontario and Quebec, and I do not think we will kick. When one looks over the rates and sees differences running all the way from twenty per cent to eighty per cent greater, on goods going into British Columbia than on goods going east, one wonders why such a statement would be made by the premier of Quebec.

I have looked through Ottawa and also when in Montreal for British Columbia goods and, with the exception of some good sockeye salmon, which, of course, they must have, I have failed to see any such goods. But it is a very different matter in British Columbia, because the people in the east can ship their canned goods cheaper and can pay their workers less than can the manufacturer in British Columbia, who must pay the minimum wage called for in that province. When the merchant or manufacturer in British Columbia wants to ship similar goods back to Ontario or Quebec, he finds that he is charged anywhere from twenty per cent to thirty per cent higher rates on canned goods than are the people in the eastern provinces who ship that stuff to us. "Stuff" is a good word, too.

Mr. FINN: Sockeye is better.

Mr. REID: If I have time I should like to deal with the arguments advanced by the minister, because on a former occasion he made some statements I did not have an opportunity to contradict. I should like now to take him up on this. I hope I am quoting him fairly when I say he said that Canada had the lowest freight rates in the world, and much lower rates than those of the United States. I do not believe it is a fair comparison to compare even the rates in the United States with those in Canada, because the freight structure or freight traffic in that country is entirely different from the freight structure or traffic conditions in Canada. In the first place, they have not the great grain trade that we have. They have more commodity goods. Then, the division of their passenger and freight traffic is entirely different.

It might interest hon. members to know that in the United States fourteen per cent of the revenue is from passengers; in Great Britain, thirty-seven per cent; in Germany, twenty-eight per cent; in Japan, sixty per cent and in Canada, twenty-four per cent. In an endeavour to prove that so far as grain is concerned rates in Canada to the west are not cheaper than the rate from central or eastern to western portions of the United States, let me give the following examples.

Cut Bank, in Montana, is 732 miles from Seattle. They have no export or domestic rate, as such, but operate only on one rate, and carry all grain for thirty-eight cents. In British Columbia we are charged 41½ cents for mill feeds over a distance of 642 miles. Bozeman, another point in Montana, is 764 miles from Seattle and the rate is 38½ cents. Billings, Montana, is 1,012 miles from Seattle, and the rate is 40½ cents.

I ask the minister and the house to compare that with a rate of 41½ cents for 642 miles from Calgary to New Westminster or Vancouver. Even if the rates in the United States are a little higher, they are hardly comparable when one takes into consideration the wages paid to the railway men across the line. The wages paid to railway workers in the United States average eighteen per cent more than those paid to Canadian workmen, while on the average the freight rates are only some seven per cent higher. As I have pointed out, it is hardly fair to compare a country like the United States with Canada because their freight structure and general traffic conditions are entirely different.

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the house might be termed a hardy annual. It bobs up every year; but so far it has failed to blossom or bear fruit, and from the attitude taken by the government through the Minister of Railways (Mr. Howe) during the last two sessions it is liable to remain dormant, at least as long as hon. gentlemen opposite are in power. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) is carrying out a pledge to his constituents when he told them that he would introduce this measure every session. As he has said to-night, he has faithfully performed that duty. Whether this continued action on the part of the hon. member without results will satisfy his constituents remains to be seen.

At the last two sessions the minister, speaking for the government, expressed his opposition to the measure, and I assume that if it is not talked out at this session, he will express himself in the same manner. I think the hon. member will agree with me when I say that the fate of this measure will be the same as it has been in the last two sessions. There is one good thing about the introduction of such a bill; it gives those of us from British Columbia an opportunity to bring before the representatives from eastern Canada certain facts which may enlighten them in connection with the difficulties that we have to undergo through being such a long distance from the seat of government and the great centres of eastern Canada.

I do not intend to go into the question of grain and feed grains as I discussed that matter during the debate on the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne. The hon. member has covered this matter quite fully to-night, but I should like to take this opportunity to refer to one or two discriminations against British Columbia. There is one in particular I should like to direct attention to, one which was brought to my attention a short time ago by the producers in my riding. In the lower mainland of British Columbia a considerable area is set aside to fruit growing, and it is necessary that a considerable quantity of fresh fruit be exported in order that the industry may have sufficient returns to place it on a healthy basis. I should like to give one instance of discrimination in connection with railways and their tariffs, and more particularly under the express tariff. I understand that an Ontario fruit grower shipping berries from Grimsby, Ontario, to Montreal, Quebec, a distance of about 495 miles, has to pay only ninety-five cents per 100 pounds express. But if a grower in British Columbia ships the same fruit over the same railway from, say, Vernon to Calgary, a distance of about 340 miles, the rate is $2 per 100 pounds express.

During the last few sessions when this subject has been up, the minister has been inclined to compare Canadian and United States rates. Here is one instance I should like to draw to his attention. The express rate from Fraser Valley points to Winnipeg is $2.40 per 100 pounds, in addition to which there are certain icing and stop-off charges. The rate from Oregon and Washington to Chicago is only $1.89 per 100 pounds. Those were the rates in effect last year and I believe the same rates are in effect to-day. Our growers have applied to the express traffic board for a reduction from the $2.40 rate to a flat $2 rate for points in the three prairie provinces, but so far no encouragement has been received.

I could go on and give a number of other discriminations, but perhaps some of them would not be in order. This afternoon a chairman of a committee when presenting his report referred to the freight rates on agricultural implements going west. A short time ago I brought to the attention of the house the fact that the rate on trucks had been raised on November 1 from $120 to $181 for large sized trucks, and from $120 to $152 for the small size. These trucks are used by the farmers and producers in our district. All along the line other discriminations could be pointed out against British Columbia.

The hon. member has been quite in order to-night in drawing these matters to the attention of those residing in eastern Canada. There is no doubt that these discriminations have hindered the development of many of the resources of our province. As far as the grain rates are concerned, I do not think there is much chance of success through the method pursued by the hon. member for New Westminster. I should like to suggest once more to the minister that he follow the example of the Minister of Railways and Canals in the previous government, the Hon. Doctor Manion, call in the representatives of the railways and urge them to get in touch and consult with the representatives of the four western provinces in order to make some adjustment in the rate differential that exists at the present time.

When I suggested this to the minister the other day, he came back with this reply, "The railways might not think it worth while to make another agreement." I am sure the minister speaks for the government. He has at heart the best interests perhaps directly of the railways; but I would suggest that it is the first duty of any government to consider the best interests of the producer, and in this particular case the minister can serve both because making it easier for the producers in our province to continue and increase their production means also more business for the transportation companies. So I suggest to the minister that he proceed along that line. I know he is not favourable to the present measure because he has so expressed himself in the last two sessions, and no doubt will do so again this session when the occasion arises; but I should just like to leave with him the thought that in the interests of British Columbia he call in the heads of the transportation companies and see if some arrangement cannot be made for a further reduction in the rate on feed grains and mill feeds which are used so extensively in our province.

On motion of Mr. Perley the debate was adjourned.

Mr. FINN: Mr. Speaker, moving the adjournment of the debate without giving any reason, and when other hon. gentlemen are ready to speak, is not in conformity with the rules of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I put the motion and it was carried. The motion is not debatable.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION

APPLICATION OF PROVISIONS OF CHINESE IMMIGRATION ACT, REVISED STATUTES, 1927, CHAPTER 95

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Neill for the second reading of Bill No. 11, respecting Japanese immigration.

Mr. J. G. TURGEON (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I am going to ask you to permit me to move the adjournment of the debate on this bill, not for the purpose of killing time, but because I have some remarks to make upon it, and I shall not have time in the five minutes remaining before nine o'clock. I therefore move the adjournment of the debate, for the purpose of resuming it upon a later occasion.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

IMMIGRATION ACT

AMENDMENT OF PROVISION RESPECTING PROHIBITED CLASSES

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved the second reading of Bill No. 38, to amend the Immigration Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. J. G. TURGEON (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate on this bill, which is closely allied to the bill respecting Japanese immigration.

Mr. NEILL: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. They are not allied.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

[Mr. Barber.]

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT

INTEREST RATE ON REPAYMENTS OF TAXES AND INSURANCE PREMIUMS—ARREARS OR INSTALMENTS SUBJECT TO BONUS PRIVILEGES

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 33, to amend the Soldier Settlement Act—Mr. Crerar.—Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

On section 2—Time extended for credit on payments of arrears.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, we have written off by statute large sums of money in connection with the purchase of lands now occupied by soldier settlers. That was done by the late government, and also by the government which preceded it; but it was regarded as very unsound business that we should continue to write off, by appropriations made by the Minister of Finance, vast sums of money in this way, and it was believed that a more urgent effort should be made to collect.

It was therefore determined to create an incentive to payment. It was believed that it would be a powerful lever in securing money if we undertook to credit a soldier with $2 for every $1 payment that he made. The effect of that was to get away from the necessity of making appropriations every year by the Minister of Finance based upon just crude estimates. On the other hand, it afforded an opportunity for those who so desired to make payments on the basis of their contract being about fifty per cent of the amount that was due under it. I plead with the minister to consider carefully the situation before he finally makes up his mind with respect to that. We extended until 1936 the time within which a payment of $1 would secure a credit of $2, and in 1936, since this government came into office, the time was further extended until March 31, 1938. At that time it was suggested that a little longer period should be granted for this benefit to continue for the soldier, but that view did not commend itself to the government at that time.

Mr. CRERAR: May I just correct my hon. friend on one point? The legislation as brought in provided for an extension of three years, but in another place that was reduced to two years, and the commons agreed to that amendment.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, quite right. Someone in this chamber had suggested five years; but that was not acceptable to the government; as events proved, it was not acceptable to the senate, and the period was reduced to two years. I suggest it would be well to extend the provisions of the section only for another period of three years; that is, from 1938 to 1941. I am not suggesting this with the idea that we are offering any great concessions so far as this country is concerned; but I firmly believe that if we do this we shall get some money, whereas if we do not do it, I am afraid we are going to be confronted with a situation that will compel us to make appropriations out of the consolidated revenue fund by writing down the value of the assets in connection with these lands that we have disposed of to soldier settlers. I am quite satisfied that if the minister will give the matter consideration from that angle, he will find on looking through the returns that if he does this and still offers credit of $2 for every $1 paid until 1941, he will have given a reasonable opportunity for those who desire to pay to do so and will have created an incentive on the part of those who desire to retain their places and who feel that they can undertake a reasonable responsibility but will not undertake the responsibility of paying at the prices the contracts now bear.

I can speak from personal discussion with many men who have had the benefit of this legislation, and I have been amazed at the zeal they have displayed securing money with which to make payment and thereby secure credit for twice the amount paid. I believe that we shall have done a good job for the Dominion of Canada and secured more money if we merely reenact the section as it appears, extending the period to 1941; or, if the minister feels that this is too long a period, I suggest that he might try it for, at any rate, a couple of years longer. I earnestly believe—and I say this entirely divested of any feeling in the matter except from my observations and inquiries—that we shall have secured more money at the end of 1940 if we make the period two years than we could possibly receive if we depended upon payments being made in the future on the basis of the present value of the contracts, except as the obilgations may be reduced by reason of the provisions of the legislation now before the house with respect to past instalments. That is my conviction, and I should like the minister to consider the matter from that angle, because it was that consideration which induced the late government to initiate the legislation. If the minister will look at the records I think he will agree that the hope then entertained has not been wholly without tangible results. I know of nothing that makes one feel worse than to realize the amount of money we have lost in this transaction. It is attributable not so much to wrong judgment as to a feeling of optimism, with respect to productive values, which was not warranted by results. In the same way we lost vast sums of money in connection with another enterprise we entered into during and after the war. We lost in the aggregate, I think, some $80,000,000.

The losses we have sustained in connection with the soldier settlement lands can be attributed not so much to maldistribution, to recklessness or to carelessness, as to an estimate of productive value which subsequent events have not warranted. If, however, the result that I have indicated were found only in soldier settlement lands, it would be good cause for alleging negligence and lack of proper supervision and care. But every one of us, from western Canada in particular, knows that the hope of productive value, the belief in high prices for wheat and large production, was widespread. I can recall a minister telling us in western Canada that all we had to do was to go forward and produce half a billion bushels of wheat, because everybody believed that, as the result of the war, it would be a long time before the belligerent nations would be able to satisfy their own requirements, and we would always be able to supply their demands. We have always been able more than to supply their demands, and it was on that basis that this settlement took place, and that the high values I have mentioned were attached to lands. Of course, they could not be realized at the present time, and the result has been that very large sums have had to be wiped out as depreciation in values; and, finally, we have had recourse to the method which I have indicated.

If it is not going too far I would suggest to the minister that he might give this matter further study and consider whether or not it would be possible to make an extension for a further period of, say only two years. For I believe—once again I repeat it; I cannot stress it too strongly—speaking from observation and inquiry, that we shall receive more money at the end of two years by continuing this policy, giving credit of $2 for every $1 paid, than if we adopt the method indicated by the bill, hoping to recover in full the balance of instalments in connection with the obligations incurred by settlers.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Mr. Neill has moved in amendment that after the word "arrears" in line one, page two, there be inserted the words "or of any instalment" and that the figures "1938" in line two, page two, be struck out and the figures "1941" substituted therefor.

Mr. CRERAR: It was arranged that the post office estimates would be taken up to-night at nine o'clock, and I think that arrangement ought to be adhered to. In regard to the point made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), I did give it very careful consideration. I refer to the possibility of securing larger payments by the continuation of the dollar for dollar bonus not only to those who have been unable to take advantage of it during the last five or six years or during the period in which it has been in effect, but also to those who have taken advantage of it. The difficulty is, of course, that there are probably some returned soldiers who are hoping and possibly expecting that they will not be required to pay any more on their land. There is a small organization in northern Saskatchewan and northern Alberta, to which reference was made this afternoon by an hon. member from that part of Canada, the object of which is to seek a complete wiping out of the whole obligation. In fairness to the Canadian people as a whole; in fairness to the returned soldiers who have completed their land payments—and there are quite a number of them—in fairness to those who have in good faith kept up their payments as far as they have been able to do so, I do not think this should be encouraged, and I fear that if we proceeded along the lines of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), which after all is simply a continuance of the existing arrangement for three years, this would give encouragement to a movement of that kind.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought it would have the contrary effect.

Mr. CRERAR: No, I do not believe it would. I should be glad to think it would, but I fear that it might have the opposite effect. We have to face that fact frankly. I am sure I am within the judgment of every hon. member when I say that the house desires to deal fairly and generously with the returned men, but I do not think there should be given to any section of the returned men encouragement which would induce them to trade upon the generosity of the house and of the people of Canada and expect to get off free from their present liabilities. However, as I have said, it was arranged that the post office estimates should go on to-night, and I am going to move that the committee rise and report progress. In the meantime consideration will be given to the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister look at the figures and see what the result has been since 1933 in reduction of liability on the basis of crediting $2 for every $1 paid?

[Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. CRERAR: Under the dollar for dollar bonus $4,409,000 has been collected.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Post offices, including salaries and other expenses of headquarters and staff post offices and supplies and equipment for revenue post offices, $14,624,470.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister give us a statement regarding any change in the number of post offices in Canada? I see by the annual report that there has been a decrease in Nova Scotia, and apparently there has been no increase in the Northwest Territories in spite of the developments going on there.

Mr. EULER: I cannot give the increases or decreases. I can give the total number by provinces:

Ontario	2,618
Quebec	2,578
Nova Scotia	1,546
New Brunswick	1,020
Prince Edward Island	114
Manitoba	796
Saskatchewan	1,498
Alberta	1,253
British Columbia	925
Yukon	18
Northwest Territories	20
	12,386

Mr. GREEN: Why is there a decrease in the number of post offices in Nova Scotia?

Mr. EULER: I am not sure as to the reason. It may be because there is rural mail delivery, or it may be diminution of business making it not worth while to keep the offices open.

Mr. FINN: Loss of population.

Mr. HEAPS: The other night I referred to the method of sale of stamps in the larger post offices. I stated that the information I have is that the government itself does not undertake the sale of stamps in some of the large post offices. Is such the fact, and, if so, why are private people allowed to sell stamps in public buildings?

Mr. EULER: What my hon. friend states is the fact, the reason being that in many cases the system is cheaper; the commissions are less than the cost would be if some official of the Post Office Department sold the stamps. It has been the practice for many years. My hon. friend brought it to my attention the other day. I do not know that, as acting Postmaster General, I particularly like to announce any change of policy, but I would think it is a matter worthy of consideration. That is as far as I can go.

Mr. HEAPS: I am very glad to have this admission from the acting Postmaster General, because it seems to me most absurd that we should establish large post offices and have wickets for the sale of everything except stamps, and that when it comes to the sale of stamps we hand it over to some private individual, who probably is a partisan worker who gets the concession and in his private capacity goes into a public building and there sells stamps. I know that in some cases the government have to go to the private party to buy stamps, buying, say $1,000 worth of stamps through this private party. It seems so absurd to have an arrangement of that kind that I hope it will not be long before the acting Postmaster General will take action to stop something which, in my opinion, should never have started.

Mr. FINN: As far as Halifax is concerned —and I speak now of the Halifax post office separate and apart from other post offices in Nova Scotia—the post office was under a postmaster; they have now merged the duties of inspector and postmaster and the one man is both. From time immemorial the stamps have been sold in the post office in a cage provided by the government, both in the old post office and in the new one. The two ladies who are the stamp vendors there have been there for years. They have the confidence of everyone; they are not party workers; they are not ward heelers; they have never taken part in politics, and my hon. friend has gone far afield when he says that it is a political reward. I have been nearly twenty-five years in public life, and no person has been appointed, while I have been in provincial or federal politics, as a party worker or ward heeler to any such position. These two ladies have the confidence of everyone in Halifax. They get a commission on the stamps sold and they are well deserving of it. I shall see that they are kept there as long as we are in power, and I believe hon. gentlemen opposite would also see that they are kept there, because they take no part in politics and are perfectly honest.

Mr. HEAPS: How many new post offices are in course of erection at the present time?

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend means buildings?

Mr. HEAPS: Yes.

Mr. EULER: That is a matter for the Public Works department.

Mr. HEAPS: Are any recommendations made by the Post Office Department to the Public Works department for the erection of such buildings?

Mr. EULER: I am afraid I am not sufficiently familiar with that to answer definitely; but I would judge that where it is proposed to erect a public building there must be some request from the Post Office Department, and perhaps also other departments, such as customs, which are going to use the building.

Mr. HEAPS: In past years post offices have gone up without the consent of the Post Office Department. I say so advisedly because I happen to know of such a case. I am just wondering if there are any buildings which are now being constructed by the Public Works department for subsequent use as post offices and of which the Post Office Department may not be aware.

Mr. EULER: Not to my knowledge, and not to the knowledge of the officials who are here.

Mr. HEAPS: To come down to a concrete case, take the post office which is to be erected here in Ottawa. Are the post office officials consulted in the matter; do they have the final say on the size and capacity of the building, or is the matter entirely in the hands of the Department of Public Works?

Mr. EULER: The work is done on and with the advice of the Post Office Department.

Mr. GREEN: Are any steps being taken to increase the business of the post office savings bank. I notice by the annual report of the department that there has been a decrease of about $167,000 in the amount on deposit, and it does seem to me some steps should be taken to increase the business.

Mr. EULER: A good deal of advertising is done to attract deposits, but I am informed that this really is a matter for the Department of Finance.

Mr. GREEN: What rate of interest is paid?

Mr. EULER: Two per cent.

Mr. GREEN: In the details which are given at page 167 of the estimates, I notice an item covering commissions to postmasters on savings bank business. That item has been reduced from $8,000 to $5,000. What is the reason for that?

Mr. EULER: It varies according to the amount of the deposits. There were fewer deposits; therefore the commission was smaller.

Mr. PERLEY: Has the department under consideration the purchase of certain bank buildings in the western provinces to be used for postal purposes? I believe it has been the policy of the Post Office Department under all governments occasionally to buy a bank building, particularly in western Canada, that has been closed. In the west there are a number of towns where there were three or four banks, and of late years conditions have been such that there has not been sufficient business for them all. They have sort of sawed off with each other, one bank closing its branch in this town and another bank closing its branch in the next town, and as a result there are some pretty good buildings available for post office purposes. They could be easily adapted for use in that way, and I know of two or three buildings practically for sale in my constituency. I think some negotiations have been carried on, and I wondered if the minister could inform us whether he has advised the Department of Public Works to purchase those buildings.

Mr. EULER: Could the hon. gentleman tell me at what points these excellent buildings are located?

Mr. PERLEY: Sintaluta is one.

Mr. EULER: I have no knowledge with regard to that. I am told that this has been done; that buildings have been purchased, but again this is a matter for the Department of Public Works. As my hon. friend knows, the handling of real estate and buildings, the erection of buildings and all that sort of thing, is in the hands of the Department of Public Works.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Mr. Chairman, I feel that something more should be done in regard to the savings bank branch of the Post Office Department. I find in talking even with members of the house that some of them do not know that there is such a branch, carrying on business and paying interest at the rate of two per cent. I have also run across lawyers who did not know very much about this branch.

Mr. MacNICOL: You are not surprised at that, are you?

Mr. NEEDHAM: They are supposed to be our learned friends. This summer I was talking with one lawyer, and I told him that I considered the post office savings bank one of the most convenient methods of financing while travelling. I told him that if he had a deposit with the post office in his home town, he could go into the post office savings bank in any town and draw out up to $50 in a day. I believe that amount has now been increased to $100, but he did not even know there was such a thing in existence. As I say, it is a most convenient way to finance travel anywhere in Canada. There is no exchange required, and of course, since you do not give a cheque but have your book marked, you do not require a three-cent stamp. I feel that something should be done in the way of advertising this branch, and I am amazed to see such a reduction in the deposits this year What were the deposits, say five years ago? Has there been a continual reduction?

Mr. EULER: I am afraid we have not that information.

Mr. NEEDHAM: If it is a matter for the finance department, I would urge upon the minister that the two departments get together and see if something cannot be done along that line.

Mr. EULER: I may say that the Postmaster General himself has under consideration the possibility of making it somewhat easier to withdraw deposits and perhaps in other respects to model the post office savings bank after the facilities that are offered in Great Britain. I must admit that I am not familiar with the branch, but I am informed that the Postmaster General has some improvements in mind.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Do the deposits go into the consolidated revenue fund?

Mr. EULER: Yes; they go right into the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. NEEDHAM: It seems to me that if this branch were advertised fully and, if necessary, if the rate were increased to 2½ per cent, this would be a wonderful means of assisting in the financing of the dominion. It would also give encouragement to the average fellow with five, ten or a hundred dollars to deposit. It seems to me it would give a wonderful stimulus to the circulation of dollars in the dominion.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am surprised to hear the hon. member for The Battlefords rising to-night to ask that some encouragement be given the banking institutions of this country. However, I am very glad to hear that he has some views which may be of some assistance to the acting minister. Is there any limit as to the maximum amount that a depositor may deposit in the post office savings bank?

Mr. EULER: The limit is $5,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the acting minister any information as to the number who have reached that maximum in the post office savings branch?

Mr. EULER: No, I have not that information.

Mr. PELLETIER: One of the few pleasures enjoyed by people in distant areas is that they can obtain books from various libraries in nearby cities. In the United States I believe there are cheap postal rates on books from public libraries. The Canadian department might very well take that point into consideration, and see if it is not possible to establish a special postal rate for books coming from public libraries, so that the people might be able to make greater use of such books. At the present time I believe the rate in the United States is three cents for the first pound, and one cent for each additional pound thereafter.

If these rates were made effective in Canada, I believe this would not in any way interfere with the revenues of the department. As a matter of fact those revenues undoubtedly would be increased because many people in the outlying areas would take advantage of lower postal rates. I am not prepared at this time to discuss the matter at length, but those are a few facts which come to my mind. I am sure, if the acting minister went into the matter carefully, he would find that a rate similar to that in the United States would be beneficial to everyone concerned. For the sake of the department and for the pleasure of many people, I would ask that he give serious consideration to the matter.

Mr. EULER: I suppose the hon. member knows there is already on the order paper a resolution dealing with the matter. I take it there will be a discussion on the point when the resolution is before the house, and as a result of that discussion some policy may be framed. Meantime the rate on books within a radius of twenty miles is five cents per pound, parcel post, a rate which does not seem excessive. However, it may be possible to make that rate lower. It is a matter of policy in the department.

Mr. PELLETIER: The resolution is far down on the order paper, and there is a possibility it might not be discussed.

Mr. EULER: That is true.

Mr. PELLETIER: I believe this is the proper time to bring the matter to the attention of the minister. Although the rate may be five cents per pound, I think we might very well adopt the rate of the United States, namely three cents for the first pound and one cent for each additional pound. I am asking that the minister give the matter full consideration, particularly in view of the fact that it will bring in greater revenue, rather than decrease it. After all, the cheaper the rate is, the more people will be able to use it.

Mr. EULER: I am sure the hon. member would not guarantee that, but we shall be glad to give the matter consideration.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): How much does the Post Office Department receive from the chartered banks in Alberta for the distribution of their pamphlets containing the speeches of Mr. Vernon Knowles. Those pamphlets were distributed through the post offices, and I should like to know how much they received for that service.

Mr. EULER: The rate is one cent for two ounces.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is not my question. I want to know how much the department received for that service.

Mr. EULER: I cannot tell the hon. member, because I have not the information here.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It would not be done gratis, would it?

Mr. EULER: Certainly not.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I wonder if we can get the information at some other time.

Mr. EULER: I fail to see why any one would assume that the post office is carrying mail gratis.

Mr. BENNETT: He said "distribution" by the post office.

Mr. EULER: It is performing a service. I understand it is not done free.

Mr. BENNETT: But that is his point.

Mr. EULER: The answer is no.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there any evidence of that?

Mr EULER: The evidence is—

Mr. BENNETT: Or is it just a guess?

Mr. EULER: Just what the officials tell me.

Mr. BENNETT: That the post office was paid for distributing those pamphlets—does the minister say that?

Mr. EULER: I do not even know the pamphlets were distributed. I have no personal knowledge of it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I have evidence of the fact, because almost every office in Alberta distributed them.

Mr. EULER: I would have to have knowledge first whether such an act took place. I do not know. But if any service was rendered through the post office, it had to be paid for it.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the reason I was struck by the fact that the hon. member seems to be in error. I can take a thousand pamphlets to a post office, pay them a given sum and they distribute them. That has been done—it was at one time.

Mr. EULER: It is still so.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe what the hon. member has in mind is that same form of distribution. As I gathered it, he left the impression that pamphlets had been distributed through the post offices, and he wanted to know what was received as payment by the Post Office Department for that distribution. There used to be such a provision in our law; I never say anything "is" now, because the department changes so from time to time that one does not know what might happen over night. But there was a time when I could take a thousand pamphlets to a post office; they would have a list, and they would distribute them to all the people, even though the pamphlets may not be addressed. In some instances they are addressed with the words "To the householder." That is called householder distribution, for which I know I have paid. It is that which I believe the hon. member for Bow River had in mind.

Mr. EULER: I am told any service of that sort is paid for. But I think the hon. member will realize that he could hardly expect me at this time to say how much was paid for a certain service at a certain post office in western Canada, or anywhere else. At any rate, I have not that information.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am not pressing the question at this time, but I should like to know how much the Post Office Department received for that service. If the postmaster himself received it, would it be recorded in the books which were sent on to the department? There should be some record of it in the Post Office Department.

Mr. EULER: I am told there are about 30,000,000 pounds of that carried in a year. I am not sure that it would be worth while to have detailed information in the department on the point. At any rate, we have not the information, and I am inclined to think it is not worth while to keep a record of those services.

[Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Then, the charge is left to the decision of the local postmaster, is it?

Mr. EULER: No; the local postmaster is not asked to keep that record.

Mr. STIRLING: There surely must be a standard charge for such service; it is very common.

Mr. EULER: For printed matter the rate is one cent for two ounces.

Mr. PELLETIER: Does that include the cost of distribution as well?

Mr. EULER: That is the standard cost for distributing them.

Mr. PELLETIER: The total cost to the party who mails them?

Mr. EULER: The total cost to the person who gets the service.

Mr. BENNETT: There are no stamps put on them, and I believe the hon. member concludes that it is a free distribution by the postmaster, as an individual, whereas, as a matter of fact I remember that a charge was levelled once that this was an interference with the postal laws of the country. For instance, you pay a fee; they distribute the material, and that is all there is to it. That goes on continually. I first learned about it by actual experience, and I found out that that was the way it was done. The postmaster himself gets nothing for it, except possible commissions on the receipts of his office.

Mr. BARBER: Could the minister give us the number of depositors in the post office savings bank in the last year?

Mr. EULER: There are 49,551 accounts. There were 6,233 new accounts opened during the year, and 4,854 accounts closed. The number of accounts open at the end of the year stood at 80,370, or an increase of 1,379. When I said the total number of accounts was 49,551, I should have said that that was the number of deposits.

Mr. BARBER: What was the total amount?

Mr. EULER: $2,830,193.07.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe it is more than that.

Mr. EULER: That is for the year. There is on deposit now a total of $21,879,593.13, a slight decrease.

Mr. GRAYDON: What main factors are taken into consideration by the department in deciding whether a postal delivery service shall be established in certain centres?

Mr. EULER: The chief factors are the revenue of the office and the population of the town.

Mr. BENNETT: It used to be 10,000 people.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the lowest population where a postal delivery service is in effect?

Mr. BENNETT: What place has pull enough to make the arrangement without the necessary population?

Mr. EULER: I am afraid I cannot give the name of the town with the lowest population or revenue. I would have to repeat that the population is supposed to be at least 10,000 and the revenue about $35,000, but that may vary. The population may be higher and the revenue may be a little lower, or the revenue may be unusually high and the population less. That is left to the discretion of the department.

Mr. BENNETT: And the question of pull.

Mr. EULER: It may have been that way in the old days.

Mr. BENNETT: It was prior to 1930 and has been since.

Mr. EULER: I imagine there is not much use in the pot calling the kettle black. I dare say that under both administrations there was a little latitude in these matters.

Mr. BENNETT: There were so few left by 1930 that we had not a chance.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am interested in knowing to what extent the concentration of population and the lay-out of the community would influence the department in arriving at a conclusion as to inaugurating a postal delivery service.

Mr. EULER: It may have a bearing, but I have no information.

Mr. BROOKS: Could the minister give us the dismissals of postmasters in 1936 and 1937 in the different provinces, and the reasons?

Mr. EULER: I have them for the last two years and for certain other two years. The figures I shall give now are for the last twenty-eight months, the period of the present administration:

Prince Edward Island	3
Nova Scotia	12
New Brunswick	17
Quebec	133
Ontario	6
Manitoba	..
Saskatchewan	6
Alberta	1
	179

I may say that in the corresponding period the dismissals were as follows—

Mr. STEWART: Who asked for that?

Mr. EULER: I am just giving it.

Mr. BENNETT: This will help to get your estimates through.

Mr. EULER: I am rather enjoying it.

Mr. BENNETT: This will help you to get them through.

Mr. EULER: I was wondering whether the asking of that question was intended to help me.

Mr. BENNETT: That used to be a commonplace question when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power.

Mr. EULER: I am not objecting.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly not; that is your job, but you should hardly volunteer information.

Mr. EULER: I do not require any advice from my right hon. friend on that point. I shall discharge my duty as well as I can. I am not particularly familiar with this department, and if my right hon. friend is hinting that he is going to make it more difficult, it makes no difference to me whatsoever.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister was asked a civil question to which he replied, and then he started to give information which was not asked for with respect to a previous administration. He thinks that is going to help him get his estimates through. If an hon. member asks a question, the minister should give an answer, but he should not volunteer information which may have a political bearing.

Mr. EULER: That is exactly the reason the question was asked.

Mr. BENNETT: It was not.

Mr. McNEVIN: I ask the minister to give us the information for the same period previously.

Mr. BROOKS: I asked the question simply for information.

Mr. McNIVEN: I ask for the same information for the previous period.

Mr. EULER: I am sorry I began to give that information, and if my right hon. friend thinks it would promote the work of the committee; I am quite willing to omit giving it.

Mr. BENNETT: It was volunteered, but now it has been asked for.

Mr. EULER: I shall not volunteer it now, I shall give it according to the request that is made for information during the previous administration. The figures are:

Prince Edward Island	2
Nova Scotia	68
New Brunswick	26
Quebec	35
Ontario	7
Manitoba	4
Saskatchewan	1
Alberta	1
British Columbia	..

Mr. BENNETT: I may say that in every case an investigation was held by a properly authorized commissioner. I should like to know what the twenty-eight month period covers, from what date to what date?

Mr. EULER: I shall have to add to the information that I gave. The dismissals I gave were those made on the personal statement of a member of parliament or on a postmaster's admission. Then there are those that followed as a result of investigation.

Mr. BENNETT: What dates are they?

Mr. EULER: Under the present administration the dismissals after investigation were as follows:

Prince Edward Island	..
Nova Scotia	7
New Brunswick	11
Quebec	107
Ontario	3
Manitoba	..
Saskatchewan	1
Alberta	4
British Columbia	..
	133

That is the information for the last twenty-eight months under the present administration.

Mr. BENNETT: Those are on investigation, and then there would be the dismissals on the say-so of a member.

Mr. EULER: I gave those.

Mr. BENNETT: The two together would give the total number of dismissals.

Mr. EULER: It would be 179 plus 133.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did the minister say just three in Ontario?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: I want to compliment the Liberal members from Ontario for not being hard-boiled Grits.

Mr. HEAPS: Where a member protests against the postmaster having been partisan in an election, what proof must be submitted before action is taken?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. EULER: You mean before an investigation is undertaken?

Mr. HEAPS: An investigation concerning the dismissal of a postmaster.

Mr. EULER: I think the Minister of Agriculture outlined the practice the other day. If a member states over his own signature that he has personal knowledge that a civil servant or a servant of the government has been partisan at an election, that is sufficient under an order in council to ensure his dismissal almost automatically. If anyone else makes a complaint, a commissioner is appointed, and if the minister regards his report as being sufficient to warrant a dismissal, the postmaster is dismissed.

Mr. HEAPS: It was that very answer which the Minister of Agriculture made in this chamber the other day which prompted me to ask that question. Personally I am not satisfied that any member of this house should exercise the prerogative of having an individual dismissed from the public service merely on the word of the member that to his knowledge the individual has been guilty of partisanship. If any member of this house, or an elected representative before he takes his seat, has knowledge that a person has been guilty of partisanship during an election, I think an investigation should be held anyhow, even though it be a member who makes the complaint. I know the acting Postmaster General is himself in a general way opposed to patronage, and I submit to him that, in all fairness, the individual accused of partisanship should be given an opportunity to submit his case to some body designated to investigate charges of that kind. The hon. member for Vancouver North the other day said that all that appeared in a communication upon which a certain person was dismissed from the public service was the statement that he had been guilty of participating in an election, and merely on a bald statement like that the man was dismissed. I do not think any hon. member will claim that that is fair to the individual concerned or that it is a good thing for the government of the country. If a member, I do not care who he may be, makes a statement charging a person with an offence, I think the least we can do is to ensure that the individual will be given an opportunity of replying to the charge. If justification be found for the charge that there has been participation in an election, then there could be little objection to dismissal after investigation; but I know of many members of parliament who, in their zeal to obtain a little patronage, might perhaps be a little more partisan in their activities than even postmasters during an election.

Mr. EULER: I am not sure that I have any particular fault to find with that; but the practice has obtained, and I am quite sure that an order in council was passed.

Mr. BENNETT: In the days of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir Robert Borden.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the minister not think it is time the practice was changed?

Mr. EULER: Possibly so; but so long as that order in council is in force, I suppose the departments concerned will carry out its terms. Before I sit down I might add that in the Post Office Department, in every case where the revenue of the post office is $400 or more, whether or not the member states over his own signature that he has personal knowledge of the conduct of the official, an investigation is made.

Mr. PELLETIER: Is that $400 a year or a month?

Mr. EULER: A year.

Mr. HEAPS: Is the accused given an opportunity of stating his case?

Mr. EULER: In the Post Office Department, yes, if the revenue is over $400 a year.

Mr. CLEAVER: How many were dismissed by the former administration for political partisanship?

Mr. EULER: In Prince Edward Island, 5; Nova Scotia, 45; New Brunswick, 48; Quebec, 246; Ontario, 3; Manitoba, 6; Saskatchewan, 10; Alberta, none; British Columbia, none; a total of 363.

Mr. STEWART: Does that cover a period of five years?

Mr. EULER: No; twenty-eight months.

Mr. STEWART: Which twenty-eight months, the first or the last?

Mr. PELLETIER: The minister mentioned that during the last twenty months there had been only one dismissal in Alberta; but I have personal knowledge of three postmasters having been dismissed, and I can give the names of the places: Acme, Newcastle and Falher. They were all dismissed for alleged political partisanship, and yet the minister tells us there was only one dismissed. I cannot understand that.

Mr. EULER: During the period mentioned there was only one dismissed on the personal statement of the member, and four were dismissed after investigation.

Mr. PELLETIER: Five altogether?

Mr. EULER: Five altogether.

Mr. STEWART: I should like to bring to the attention of the minister a matter of special importance, and one that is a little out of the ordinary course of departmental details. I assume the minister knows that there is in course of construction in the county of Leeds an international bridge. It is called the Ivy Lea bridge. It is unique in its character and because it is I wish to take about five minutes of the time of this committee in explaining its character.

The total length of the crossing from the Canadian side to the United States side is between six and eight miles. By far the greater portion of this distance is roadway, highways constructed on large and small islands. There are, as a matter of fact, only two spans of any substantial length, one in the United States channel and one in the Canadian channel, the intervening distance being occupied with islands and narrow crossings over narrow channels. This bridge passes through the whole of the Thousand Islands, and I have before me a statement that I am sure will surprise the committee when I say that it is issued over the signature of the advisory engineer of the Thousand Islands bridge authority. He says:

> Within one day's drive or three hundred miles radius, there is located one-third of the population of Canada, and one-fourth of the population of the United States.

Note that, Mr. Chairman: Within three hundred miles of the end of this bridge this large proportion of the two populations is located, including New York and all the eastern states, Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa and other larger centres of population.

This bridge is to be formally opened, I think, in the month of August next, and the idea I have in mind in bringing this matter to the attention of the acting Postmaster General is to suggest that he consider the issuing of a special stamp to commemorate the event. Similar action is being advocated at Washington, and I believe is being favourably considered.

In addition, the possibilities of the development of tourist traffic, in which we are all interested, and which brings in an enormous amount of revenue to this country, are practically unlimited with a unique feature such as this, and they are being carefully studied by those interested in the matter. It has been brought to the attention of the tourist bureau, the Department of Mines and Resources and the Department of Transport. That is the suggestion I wish to make.

It is said that on a clear day one can see for sixteen miles up or down the St. Lawrence river from the United States main span, and fourteen miles from the Canadian span, and that view is just studded with islands. I do not need to tell the members of this committee that the Thousand Islands in the St. Lawrence constitute one of the great scenic features of the world, and this bridge traversing about eight miles through the heart of these islands is really something unique. I think it is worthy of consideration by the minister, whether it would not be to the advantage of the department from the standpoint of revenue, as well as advertisement in connection with tourist traffic, that a special stamp be issued to commemorate the opening of this bridge. I do not know whether any very large amount of cost is involved; but there will be a tremendous sale of post cards and all that sort of thing, and I think it would help to stimulate and promote the tourist traffic and at the same time bring in some additional revenue to the department. All I shall do is to ask the minister to consider the suggestion, investigate to find out what is being done in the United States and, if possible, lend the assistance of his department to the advertising of this attraction, in the hope that tourist traffic will be stimulated and developed and that this can be done to the advantage of Canada and without any immediate loss of revenue in connection with the issue of this stamp.

Mr. EULER: The general practice, I believe, is not to issue stamps except to commemorate something of great national importance. I do not say that this is not of that type and I shall be glad to give it consideration.

Mr. STEWART: They are considering it in the United States. It is suggested that the Prime Minister of Canada and President Roosevelt should shake hands on this international bridge. I should be glad myself to have the minister come; I would shake hands with him.

Mr. EULER: That is quite an inducement.

Mr. GREEN: Apparently there are about 12,000 post offices in Canada, but only about one-tenth of that number are empowered to transact post office savings bank business. Will the minister explain the basis on which that privilege is given to a post office? During the last two years many of the chartered banks have been closed in the smaller towns. Would it not be helpful to the citizens in such places if the right to deposit with the post office savings bank were made available to them?

Mr. EULER: I cannot say that there is any definite rule. Sometimes it is according to the demand in the locality and the probabilities of there being substantial deposits to make it worth while. I cannot give any other answer. I believe that these branches are conducted in those post offices where money orders are issued.

Mr. GREEN: Is it a fact then, that only one-tenth of the post offices in Canada can issue money orders? Surely that is not right.

Mr. EULER: No, that is not the case, nor is the reverse the case.

Mr. BETTS: What was the total amount of mail, in pounds or tons, carried last year?

Mr. EULER: First-class mail, 17,888,243 pounds; second-class, 121,575,000 pounds; third-class, 29,649,779 pounds; parcel post, 68,494,364 pounds. These checkups are taken only every few years. This is for last year. The plans are now being made for another enumeration this year.

Mr. BETTS: Can the minister give the same information for the year before that?

Mr. EULER: No, I have not that.

Mr. BETTS: Could that be looked up?

Mr. EULER: The enumeration is not made every year.

Mr. BETTS: Could it be looked up for the committee before these estimates are completed?

Mr. EULER: I am informed that there is no information which can be given with regard to the poundage of the previous year. I am sorry, but we do not have it.

Mr. MacNICOL: I wish to bring to the attention of the acting minister something in connection with the appointment of a postmaster for the Beaverton post office. I shall not find fault with what the department has done, nor am I going to find fault with the civil service commission; for, having looked into both sides of the matter, I am satisfied that perhaps what was done was all that could have been done under the circumstances. These are the facts. Apparently according to custom, the vacancy in the post office was advertised, the postmaster having died, I believe. Six returned soldiers applied to take the examination, and, of course, the acting postmaster also made application. The acting postmaster having been there fifteen years, and apparently having been very well thought of in the village, he easily obtained better marks than the six returned soldiers, who had not the same experience. I looked into the particulars and found that they were different from what

I had been told, and, as I have said, I now believe that what was done was probably all that could have been done. But I felt that in a similar case in the future, if the department knows, as it probably will know, that an acting postmaster has been filling a position for fifteen years in the post office and has a good reputation in the village, the department should not place returned soldiers in the position of being defeated, so to speak. They should not be put in a position where they will certainly not have a chance to obtain the post after taking the examination. If the department was satisfied that this acting postmaster was the one who should logically fill the job, he should have been given the job and these returned soldiers should not have been embarrassed in the way they were and made to suffer defeat.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend knows that appointments of that kind are entirely within the purview of the civil service commission.

Mr. MacNICOL: I realize that and I am not finding fault with either the civil service commission or the department. What I am urging upon the acting minister is that if a similar case should arise in the future, and it is believed that the acting postmaster should be given the job, he should be given it without humiliating returned men.

Mr. EULER: I am inclined to believe that under the law they must conduct examinations. I doubt whether the civil service commission would have the power to appoint an acting postmaster.

Mr. BENNETT: He cannot be promoted under the regulations as they now are; he has to take his chance with others.

Mr. EULER: In this case they are not civil servants and therefore the principle of promotion is not involved.

Mr. HEAPS: Would it be possible in such a case for a person who had not been in the Post Office Department at all to come in and pass the examination with the result that the man who had been in the position for a number of years would not receive promotion?

Mr. EULER: It is possible, except for the fact, of course, that the returned soldier always gets the preference; otherwise it is within the power of the commission to appoint whom they please, and they would appoint according to the rank which the applicant took in his examination. It might work an injustice, of course.

Mr. MacNICOL: What struck me is that it seems hardly reasonable to examine these returned soldiers in a contest with a man who had already been acting postmaster and with fifteen years' experience. I am not finding any fault, but I feel sorry for the returned soldiers being up against an examination like that. If, as the leader of the opposition has said, the matter is purely in the hands of the civil service commission, I suppose nothing else could have been done.

Mr. PELLETIER: There is a point I should like to clear up concerning the protection of mail matter. I am sure the acting Postmaster General will hasten to assure me that once a letter is mailed with a three-cent stamp on it, the department is prepared to use all the force at its command to see that that letter is not tampered with and is properly delivered. In fact it is a serious matter to tamper with the royal mail. Then there comes to my mind the question of distribution of pamphlets at a rate of two cents an ounce, which I believe was quoted. If the minister is sure that the department will do everything in its power to protect mail, I should like him to give me some assurance. He must be aware that at the present time there is in effect in the province of Quebec a law known as the padlock law. If I intend to mail what I consider communistic propaganda in Quebec, is the acting Postmaster General in a position to tell me that he will rigorously protect my mail and complete the transaction by effecting delivery of the pamphlets no matter what may be said by any provincial law? I think the acting Postmaster General should make that clear. If I go to the trouble of paying the postage on this mail, does the minister intend to protect my property while it is in the hands of the government and to assure me that it will reach its destination in the province of Quebec, since that is a part of Canada as well as any other part of the country, notwithstanding any law passed by that legislature?

Mr. EULER: All mail on which postage has been properly paid has the protection of the law. Indeed, I am informed that the safeguarding and inspection of the mails cost the department a million dollars a year. All mail on which postage is properly paid will be protected by the department and delivered. If it is communistic literature such as my hon. friend refers to, I should think it would be subject to the laws of the country; if it is subversive of the law and advocates violence or anything of that sort, I think it might very properly be shut out of the mails. Otherwise I see no reason why it should not be carried.

Mr. PELLETIER: Of course that depends on what interpretation is placed upon the term "communism." It is commonly known that there is in Quebec at the present time this so-called padlock law, and that under various pretexts certain homes have been entered and books seized. But I want the acting Postmaster General to assure me whether, no matter what sort of literature it is, as long as it does not come into conflict with dominion law, the Post Office Department is prepared to fight to the last degree to assure me that my mail will be delivered in Quebec, no matter what interpretation the Quebec government may place upon it.

Mr. EULER: I can give my hon. friend that assurance very readily. If the mail matter does not violate a law of the Dominion of Canada, as far as I am concerned the mail will be carried. I am not supposed to have any particular knowledge of the laws of Quebec, and in any case I do not think the laws of Quebec override those of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. HEAPS: There has been a great deal of seizure of papers in the province of Quebec the moment they entered certain stations.

Mr. EULER: Not in the mails.

Mr. HEAPS: I am wondering whether that literature seized went by the mails or by other means of transportation.

Mr. EULER: None was seized in the mails.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister is in error as to that. The other day in the course of the discussion I directed attention to the fact that mail bags had actually been seized, and photographs of the mail bags were published in the press. My objection was to any provincial authority, because of an alleged breach of a provincial law, seizing a mail bag from the custody of those who had it under their control. The question arose in the United States on one occasion, as the minister will recall, and I was greatly concerned about this matter. However, I do not think the minister should answer this; it is a matter which the Minister of Justice should deal with, and, frankly, I do not think it is fair to ask the acting Postmaster General to answer the question. But I should like to know whether or not the statement and the photographs published in the press correctly represent the incident. That, I think, comes under his department. The legal inferences and conclusions to be drawn from the seizure are matters that can be dealt with by those whose duty it is. The minister can only give me information as to whether or not any mail bag was actually seized and taken out of the custody and control of those who had it because it was alleged to contain communistic literature, and whether or not that mail bag was held by those who alleged that it contained these papers and letters which it was said were being carried in breach of a provincial statute.

Mr. EULER: I have some knowledge of the incident to which my right hon. friend refers. There were certain photographs published in which mail bags were shown. It is quite true that the department supplied to the publishers of that paper, as it does to other publishers, mail bags for their convenience. But the contents do not become mail until they reach the post office, and although no doubt there were papers in these bags which were photographed, it was really not mail because it had not yet been delivered to the post office. The mail bags have been recovered.

Mr. PELLETIER: How did it get into the mail bags if it was not mail?

Mr. EULER: It is not mail until the postage has been paid on it.

Mr. HEAPS: Where were those particular bags sent from?

Mr. EULER: The bags were, I understand, delivered to the publishing house.

Mr. HEAPS: Where?

Mr. BENNETT: I think in Ontario, and the mail carried to Quebec. That is my difficulty.

Mr. EULER: I am not sure about that; but the point I want to make is that all these publishing houses, for the convenience of the publishers and, I suppose, of the Post Office Department, have empty mail bags delivered to them, and these are filled with the publication and taken to the post office, but it is not mail until it is actually in the post office. These were the bags that were seized and photographed.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not want to press the point unduly because I do not think the minister is in a position to answer the legal question involved—

Mr. EULER: No, I would not attempt that.

Mr. BENNETT: —but I think he has overlooked one fact. The information published in the press indicated that the mail bags furnished by the department for the carriage of the papers were furnished in Ontario, and the papers having been placed in the bags, the bags were placed in a railway mail car and transported to the province of Quebec. When they went into the mail car they went into his majesty's mail.

Mr. EULER: I would think so.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that is clear. And they were delivered at a railway station in Montreal and, under the alleged authority of a provincial statute, were seized before they could be taken to the post office for distribution. That is the story, as I gather it from the press. The photograph of the mail bags was published in the press. Now the issue is a narrow one; it is whether or not there is any authority to interfere with his majesty's mails on the part of those who allege a breach of a provincial statute, when the bags are in the custody and under the control of the Post Office Department; for those bags being carried in the mail car I am informed were under the control of the Post Office Department. They have vans which carry them on to the post office. In the first instance it gets down to a question of essential fact. I can only say that I am not informed as to that, beyond what I saw in the newspaper. I did mention it to the Minister of Justice the other day, and I think the matter is so serious that we should have some clear understanding as to just what are the circumstances.

Mr. EULER: I am afraid I have not all the information that perhaps I should have. Apparently I was mistaken when I said that these bags did not come from Toronto or Ontario. I understand now that they did. This representation is made to me, however, that those bags contained mail, technically mail, while they were in the baggage car or the mail car, whichever it was, which carried the mail into Quebec, but that they were then delivered into the custody of a publishing house in that province, which completed the work of the Post Office Department.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; their transit was over.

Mr. EULER: After that they were no longer in the custody of the Post Office Department. As to the legal aspect of the matter I am not going to express an opinion.

Mr. HEAPS: The point I made previously was that literature of that kind had been seized at the railway station.

Mr. BENNETT: That was what I saw in the press, that one seizure was made at the station, before the bags had been taken to the publishing house.

Mr. EULER: I have no information on that at all, nor have the officials.

Mr. PELLETIER: I do not wish to place the minister in an embarrassing position by asking him to decide any legal question this evening. It was not my intention to do that; I believe that was interjected by other hon. members who have taken part in the discussion. However, since the matter has been brought up, I might suggest to the acting Postmaster General that a royal mail car carries the insignia of His Majesty the King. In my opinion a royal mail car is the property of his majesty; therefore, while there is anything within that car, no person is permitted to enter the car unless he is authorized to do so.

However, I am not going to ask the minister to decide on any legal technicality. I want him to give me the assurance that if I place a three-cent stamp on a letter containing material which might be considered communistic propaganda in the province of Quebec but which does not constitute an infraction of Canadian laws, and mail that letter in a post office, he will undertake to deliver it anywhere in the province of Quebec.

Mr. EULER: I have given the answer already; my hon. friend asked exactly the same question previously, and I answered it. I do not suppose I need answer it again. I may say this to my hon. friend, however, that he is quite right when he says that once mail bags are placed in a car which carries his majesty's seal, no one can interfere with those bags; but I understand that was not done. That mail was delivered out of that car into the headquarters of this publication in the province of Quebec, and then the work of the Post Office Department was completed. In any event that is the information I have. If my hon. friend has any information that a mail car was entered, I can only say that I have no knowledge as to that.

Mr. BENNETT: Or that the bags were seized at the station, which is what the newspapers said.

Mr. EULER: Not according to the information I have.

Mr. PELLETIER: If there is even a thought that possibly the mails of Canada are being interfered with, it might be serious enough for the department to take some action in this regard, and inquire into the matter as fully as possible. If, for example, anyone attempted to even get near a car with the idea of seizing mail or for any other purpose, I feel sure the department would do everything within its power to see that the Canadian mail, or his majesty's mail, was fully protected. I feel that in this instance the matter is sufficiently serious for the department to take cognizance of it and fully inquire into all the circumstances in order to ascertain the exact position of the bags when they were seized.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister could easily say that he will give that assurance, because I think we are all interested in the matter, in order to ascertain what are the facts so that the minister may be able to state with authority just what has taken place in connection with the interference with these mail bags, whether they were then mail or not; whether they were in the custody of the crown, which is the Post Office Department, or whether the transit had ended. Certainly I feel that we should have those facts before us. I would, however, hardly expect the minister to have the details before him at the moment.

There is one other matter that I think the hon. member for Peace River should keep in mind. It is this: There is a right to interfere with his letter carrying the three-cent stamp if it contains lottery tickets, for instance, or matters of that sort. But that is not a provincial matter; that is power which is vested in the Post Office Department itself under the statute; for there is a certain amount of forbidden material in connection with which the department can exercise its jurisdiction.

Mr. PELLETIER: But through the federal officers.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. There are certain matters in regard to patent medicines, lottery tickets and so on; but the right of a provincial official or constable to allege that a mail bag contains something he does not like, and to take that mail bag out of the custody of the crown and impound it is something that, I believe, has been contested and fought against with great tenacity, and I think it should continue to be fought against. But, as the minister has said, everything depends upon the facts.

Mr. PELLETIER: Quite so, and they should be ascertained.

Mr. EULER: I think there is with regard to this matter a report which I shall certainly examine, but I am assured that this mail matter was not legally in the possession of the Post Office Department at the time the seizure was made. However, I shall make further investigation, and if the opportunity offers I may be able to give more complete details.

Mr. HEAPS: As far as I know there was more than one seizure made of papers and so on. I do not know whether they went through the mail or by express; but now that the minister has been made aware of the situation, I trust he will make his inquiries as complete as possible in order to ascertain all the facts in the matter.

Mr. BETTS: Could the minister explain the machinery for apprehending forbidden mail such as that mentioned by the right hon. leader of the opposition, lottery tickets and material of that type?

Mr. EULER: I am going to read my hon. friend the section of the act bearing on that point. I would not be too confident that I could describe to him in detail the machinery which is set in operation, because really I am not very familiar with it. But the act states:

> The Postmaster General may, subject to the provisions of this act—
> (d) make regulations declaring what shall and what shall not be deemed to be mailable matter for the purposes of this act, and for restricting within reasonable limits the weight and dimensions of letters and packets and other articles sent by post, and for prohibiting and preventing the sending of explosive, dangerous, contraband or improper articles, obscene or immoral publications, prints or photographs, or obscene or immoral postcards, or letters or postcards having printed, stamped or written on the outside thereof any words or devices which, in the opinion of the postmaster general, tend to injuriously affect the commercial or social standing of the persons to whom they are addressed—

I am not in a position to state exactly the procedure followed by the Post Office Department.

Mr. BETTS: The Postmaster General is given power to make regulations governing various matters. What are the regulations now in force along these lines?

Mr. EULER: The Postal Guide, I believe, has a great many of them. There are literally hundreds, and I suppose my hon. friend might obtain a copy of that publication and examine them for himself. I do not suppose I could give them all to-night, and in any case I do not have them here. Is there any particular regulation on any particular subject on which my hon. friend desires information?

Mr. BETTS: The particular point in which I am interested is to know where the duty is imposed? Do the regulations impose a duty on every postmaster and on every sub-postmaster, or whoever has charge?

Mr. EULER: The postmaster is instructed that when the appearance of anything in the mail leads him to believe that it contravenes the law, he must send it either to the dead letter office or to the inspector for the district who, in turn, sends it to Ottawa.

Mr. BROOKS: Why was it necessary to hold two separate examinations at different times to fill the vacancy of postmaster at Grand Falls, New Brunswick? Did any returned soldiers apply for the position?

Mr. EULER: The file is not before me, and I cannot give the information.

Mr. BROOKS: Would the minister undertake to give it to me at a later date?

Mr. EULER: I would be glad to get the information.

Mr. GREEN: In the particulars respecting this item there is a sum of $615,000 for temporary assistance, which represents an increase of $100,000 over last year. What is the reason for that increase, and what is covered by the item?

Mr. EULER: An increase in temporary assistance on post office staffs to liquidate the time due for statutory holidays, overtime and extra time worked at Christmas. There is a ten per cent restriction now on permanent appointments. That restriction applies in varying degrees to all the departments. Then, of course there is the increased business, and the necessity to cover emergencies and additional statutory holidays occurring in the year 1938-39.

Mr. GREEN: Does that account for the increase of $100,000?

Mr. EULER: Yes; so I am informed.

Mr. GREEN: I notice an increase of about $60,000 in the item for equipment and maintenance. What is the reason for that increase?

Mr. EULER: The general reason is the increase in business, and the buying of rubber stamps, stamp pads, cancelling rubber stamp ink, miscellaneous materials, scales, weights and so on. This item reflects the increased business, as purchases in many lines keep pace with the growing revenue. Advancing prices also in some measure account for the increased appropriation requested.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): What is being done with the rural mail clerks? Many hon. members have received letters drawing attention to their difficulties.

Mr. EULER: I do not wish to put my hon. friend off, but perhaps his question might better be discussed under another item.

Mr. BROOKS: I notice at page 167 of the estimates an item for forty-seven postal helpers who were employed in 1937-38 at a cost of $60,300, but who are not employed in 1938-39. Were those men absorbed by the department and, if their work was necessary in 1937-38, how is it now carried on?

Mr. EULER: The class of postal helpers has been abolished. They are now classified as mail porters, letter carriers and postal clerks.

Mr. BROOKS: They were absorbed?

Mr. EULER: They are still employed, but go under a different designation.

Mr. TUSTIN: How is the commissioner appointed when a charge is laid against and an investigation made in connection with a postmaster?

Mr. EULER: By order in council, upon recommendation of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. TUSTIN: Is he paid so much per case or per sitting?

Mr. EULER: The Minister of Justice will have to answer that. I am informed that the commissioner sends in his bill, and that it is taxed by the Department of Justice.

Mr. TUSTIN: Has the commissioner the right to call witnesses?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. TUSTIN: Are those witnesses entitled to remuneration?

Mr. EULER: I would think so, although I do not know.

Mr. BENNETT: The commissioner usually goes to the community.

Mr. EULER: Yes. In court the witness is entitled to his pay, but I do not know whether in these cases witnesses are paid.

Mr. BENNETT: I never have heard of their being paid.

Mr. EULER: The Minister of Justice would know.

Mr. BROOKS: Does the department always take the finding of the commissioner appointed, or does it review the finding? I know of several cases where reports of commissioners have created great injustices. I am sure if the department had investigated, as it should have, it would not have come to the same conclusions as those arrived at by the commissioners.

Mr. EULER: I am sure that in some cases reports of commissioners are not accepted. Although this matter does not arise in my own department, I do know where a commissioner recommended a dismissal, making a finding of political partisanship, but the minister did not regard the evidence sufficient to justify a discharge. I dare say in the majority of cases, if a commissioner finds a man guilty and recommends dismissal, his advice is followed. However, I cannot say to what extent that is done.

Mr. BROOKS: I am sure it would not have been done if the action of the postmaster had been investigated by the department.

Mr. TUSTIN: Does a commissioner always make a report after investigation?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

M. TUSTIN: Is there any set time in which he must make his report?

Mr. EULER: I do not know that there is any limit to the time within which he must report. I imagine that question does not arise.

Mr. BETTS: Could the minister tell us as to the frequency with which this machinery is invoked? For instance, how many investigations were held under this procedure last year?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. EULER: I think my hon. friend has his answer now. We were discussing that some time ago when he was outside the house.

Mr. GREEN: There are some 8,300 odd postal employees covered by this vote; are they all employed in the larger cities?

Mr. EULER: Only in the larger places.

Mr. GREEN: How many cities would be covered?

Mr. EULER: Eighty-five.

Mr. GREEN: What are the number of employees in each province?

Mr. EULER: We have the number by offices, not by provinces.

Mr. GREEN: Could the minister give the number for the ten largest cities?

Mr. EULER: I shall pick some out of the eighty-five, as follows:—

Guelph	41
Halifax	146
Hamilton	272
London	163

[Mr. Euler.]

Mr. GREEN: Would rural mail carriers be included?

Mr. EULER: No; those are all civil servants.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not desire to delay the committee; but in considering this question of saving banks I have formed a very strong opinion, and I made up my mind some time ago that I would express it. The truth is that we have had only $20,000,000 odd in the postal savings banks of the country for a number of years. In New Zealand the Post Office Department maintains the following services: First, the post office; second, the long distance telephone; third, telegraph services in any fairly large community, and, fourth, the savings banks. The manager of the New Zealand postal service, Mr. McNamara, deals with this whole service as a matter of business. No interest is allowed on money taken in during the broken part of the month; that is, the interest does not begin to run until the first day of the succeeding month. No interest is paid upon broken sums of money; that is, the interest is paid only on even amounts. This money is loaned to the treasury of the Dominion of New Zealand, which pays interest upon it. The result was that in one year a substantial amount of money was earned, and there were loaned to the government very substantial sums of money which proved quite useful.

In Canada the delay in getting money out of the savings banks is so great that they have, I am sorry to say, served no useful purpose. I realize it is quite unfair to direct these observations to the acting Postmaster General—we all regret the illness of the Postmaster General—but I want to put on record the suggestion that we should do something to increase our postal savings facilities. The need for these facilities is growing greater, in western Canada especially, as the chartered banks can no longer maintain many of their offices in the small communities, especially since these distressing days have arisen. The post office would always be in a position to receive deposits as they do in New Zealand and permit them to be withdrawn easily and quickly up to a certain amount. They have done something in this direction up to $50, but in practice there are apparently undue delays and it occurs to me that possibly something might be done to provide additional banking facilities, if I might use that term, for the population that has been denied the services of the chartered banks.

The present rate of interest is two per cent, and with all deference I suggest that if we want to do the right thing we should pay at least two and a half per cent to these depositors. That is the way in which it occurs to me. I believe if these facilities were increased, this would prove conducive to thrift in communities where thrift is desirable and where such facilities are no longer available. That is my conviction with respect to the matter, and I thought I would bring it to the attention of the department.

I was impressed when one day I stopped in a remote community in New Zealand to have lunch, went into the post office and found that the postmaster was a trained telegrapher. He also had long distance telephone facilities, the post office and the savings bank. All these conveniences were under the one roof. When I came back to Wellington I saw Mr. McNamara who operates the whole postal service as an enterprise under his immediate control. I found that the sums of money that he was able to lend to the dominion were very large. A useful purpose was being served in New Zealand, and I do not think we have extended these facilities in Canada to the extent we should. I think we could strengthen our position considerably, just as has been done in Great Britain, where the postal savings amount to substantial sums of money and where the savings certificates also bring in large sums.

Then in the United States, a very rich country, we find the treasury in Washington providing facilities throughout the country for the purchase of certificates paying rates of interest higher than two per cent and maturing at the end of five or ten years, as the case may be. These certificates are sold in multiples up to $10,000, but I do not think we could go as far as that. However, this might be a matter for consideration by the Minister of Finance.

I do not suggest that the acting minister is in a position to-night to deal with this matter of savings banks, nor do I expect him to, but he might consider the question from all angles. The first useful purpose to be served would be the providing of facilities to people who had no other facilities, and the next purpose would be the inducing of people, even in the little communities where small sums of money are saved, to acquire habits of thrift. What has been done in other countries could be done here.

Mr. BETTS: I notice an item on page 167 of printing and stationery, $167,500. That seems to be a large sum of money for this purpose and perhaps the minister could give us some details.

Mr. EULER: In former years a bulk amount for printing and stationery appeared in the estimates for civil government and the outside service respectively. This year the item appears under post office and five other votes. Under the law the department is required to secure all printing and stationery from the government printing bureau. Therefore, practically the whole proportion will be utilized to reimburse the government printing bureau for printing and stationery required by staff post offices and the headquarter units which administer those offices. These requirements include all kinds of printed forms used by post office and at headquarters, as well as the regular items of stationery. A small increase is due to the increased needs from expansion of business.

Mr. BETTS: Is the printing done by contract, or how is it done?

Mr. EULER: At the government printing bureau.

Item agreed to.

Inspection and investigation, $1,046,840.

Mr. BROOKS: I see the position of supervising dead letter clerk. What trouble is taken to determine the destination of these dead letters after they come to the dead letter office? Are there specialists who work on them and try to find the proper destination, or do they simply remain in the dead letter office after reaching Ottawa?

Mr. EULER: The letters are opened; anything valuable is removed, and an effort is made to find out to whom the letter belongs.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a dead letter office in each province.

Mr. EULER: They are scattered all over the country. I do not think they are limited to one in each province.

Mr. BENNETT: No; but there is at least one in each province.

Mr. BROOKS: How long are the letters held before being destroyed when you cannot find the proper destination for them?

Mr. EULER: If there is no indication whatsoever of the address, no reasonable indication to whom the letter belongs, it is destroyed immediately, and if there is any money in the letter it is placed in the consolidated revenue fund. The government makes that much out of it.

Mr. BETTS: In the details on page 169 of the estimates I see there are three postal chauffeurs. Where are they employed and what are their duties?

Mr. EULER: One each at Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto.

Mr. BETTS: Are they personal chauffeurs for the postmasters, or what are their duties?

Mr. EULER: They are attached to the district offices and are used for inspection purposes by the officers.

Mr. BARBER: What are the duties of the mail porters?

Mr. EULER: They handle the mail at the post office doors and at the station, transferring it from the vehicle to the trains and to the offices.

Mr. BETTS: There is a new position, on page 168, superintendent investigations division, salary $3,240. Would the minister tell us the duties of that officer, why he has suddenly been appointed, and how the department got along without him before?

Mr. EULER: The appointment of this officer is the result of the reorganization in Montreal. There will be a similar officer in Toronto.

Mr. BROOKS: Why did the office boy receive such a tremendous cut in salary, from $1,320 in 1937-38 to $540 this year?

Mr. EULER: It is because of the substitution of a lower priced employee for a higher priced one.

Mr. BETTS: The minister spoke of the reorganization of the Montreal post office. I notice another new officer, superintendent of services division. Would the minister tell us what his duties are, where he carries them out, and how the department got along without him before?

Mr. EULER: This man is in charge of the making of contracts in that district and has other duties as well.

Mr. BETTS: The superintendent of services division is in charge of making contracts?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. BETTS: In what district?

Mr. EULER: There is one each in Toronto and Montreal.

Mr. BETTS: I am afraid I do not understand that. The superintendent of services division is in charge of making contracts in Toronto and Montreal.

Mr. EULER: There is only one mentioned here for the district of Montreal; but a similar organization will obtain in Toronto, and the duties are as I have described them, the making of contracts and other duties.

[Mr. Betts.]

Mr. BENNETT: Services would hardly seem to be contracts.

Mr. EULER: I admit that the designation hardly seems to agree with the work, but that is the explanation which is given to me.

Items stands.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE FOR GOVERNMENT BUSINESS ON AND AFTER WEDNESDAY, MARCH 23

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Wednesday the 23rd March to the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence on Wednesdays over all business except introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I think this motion is debatable; I also think it is out of order. I also think it is unjust, but of course that is a matter of opinion. Taking the point that it is out of order, the house is governed by certain rules known as standing orders, arrived at by consultation in committee of the whole house, to which we adhere very strictly. Standing order 15 is one of the most important of these. I see that it was first introduced in 1867 and has stood the test of four separate revisions since then. That order prescribes the procedure of the house, and on Wednesdays it says the order shall be as follows: Questions, notices of motions, public bills and orders, government notices of motions and government orders. It does not forbid government orders; it only gives the other business precedence. Now we come along with this resolution which says we are not going to follow that procedure on Wednesdays, and we say nothing whatever about standing order 15. I submit that we ought to repeal or suspend it, or do something about it; otherwise we shall have two conflicting procedures, so to speak. As a precedent I might cite the situation which often arises in this house, when the chairman of a committee moves for the printing of a report, or evidence, or something like that. He always says, "standing order 64 notwithstanding." That has been omitted in this case, though of course that could be remedied on a later occasion.

With regard to the unfairness of the thing I would make this comment. There are sixteen resolutions on the order paper which as yet have not been heard even once. My resolution happens to be the third on the list. It will not be reached the day after to-morrow, so it will never be reached at all. I lodged that resolution with the clerk about a month before the house met, which seemed not an unreasonable time. Other members coming along later waited, as was their privilege, until the house met before presenting their resolutions, which by this motion are prevented from being heard. I submit that they should be given at least one opportunity to present their views. I agree with what was said the other day by, I think, the hon. member for South York (Mr. Lawson) who suggested that all resolutions on the order paper before a certain date should be heard, or alternatively I would suggest that Wednesdays always be left open for private members. We are supposed to be governed by democracy, and democracy is the expression of the wishes of the people by their elected representatives. While we may not like some of the resolutions —I wholly disagree with some of them— nevertheless I feel like fighting in order that they shall be heard, because in that is involved the right of free speech. If people are not allowed to relate their views, how are the government and the house going to be informed of their wishes? This takes away from private members their rights under the rules to which we all agreed, without saying anything about standing order 15, as I have already suggested. It is taking a little bit more away from our democratic rights. It may not be a very important thing; if none of these resolutions are heard I do not suppose the country will suffer very materially, but there is a danger involved. If this or any government—I am not singling out this government particularly—can come along and simply pass by a majority vote, not by unanimous consent, a resolution of this kind, it is possible to conceive of a government passing a resolution to the effect that members of the opposition should be heard for only five minutes, or only on Fridays, or something like that. There is a danger in that situation against which we should guard. We had better stop the leak in the embankment before it becomes overwhelming.

It has been suggested that this is necessary in order to save time, but I do not agree with that. Right towards the end of the session, when we were extremely busy, I have seen the house adjourn at six o'clock because it happened to suit the convenience of a certain group who wanted to go to a certain dinner, or something of that kind. I have even known the house to adjourn in order to listen to election results. I am not particularly asking the government to allow one more Wednesday in order that I might have my resolution discussed. I am trying to stress the point that here are sixteen members who have put resolutions on the order paper and, because of our peculiar rules, or because the government cuts off the rules, they are not going to be heard. The big parties wonder why the groups in the corner are increasing in volume and number at every election. Perhaps it is because people are getting suspicious. They do not see anything done, and they begin to think that democracy has been a failure. It is not that democracy has been a failure; it is that democracy has not been accorded the justice to which she is entitled.

I submit the motion is out of order on the one technical point to which I have alluded, namely standing order 15, and on the wider and bigger point of order, which is not founded on any rule, but on the fact that it is desirable in the name of democracy that resolutions by private members should have an opportunity to be heard during the session.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) knows, as do other hon. members, that a few weeks after parliament has been in session it is usual for the government to take Mondays and Wednesdays for its business, and that the method which has been adopted in that connection has been that of giving forty-eight hours' notice on the votes and proceedings. When the motion comes before it, the house may either give its unanimous consent or vote upon the motion.

This year in asking the right to take Wednesdays for government business the government is proceeding in the same way as have previous governments and the present one on all former occasions.

As to the suggestion that the motion is out of order may I say to the hon. member that the house has, at all times, control of its own business and may, by unanimous consent, or upon motion after forty-eight hours' notice, make such alterations in the order of business as it deems advisable.

Forty-eight hours' notice has been given. Notice was given on Friday last, and appeared in the votes and proceedings for that day. In the regular course the motion appears on the order paper to-day. No exception therefore can be taken on the score of the rules not having been complied with.

Mr. NEILL: What about the standing order?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Exception may be made to a standing order, where it relates to the business of the house, and where the consent of the house is given either unanimously or, if necessary, by vote. The hon. member knows that this is a procedure which has been followed every year he has been in the house. I may say to my hon. friend, what may be a matter of surprise to him, namely that I believe this year the government has been more generous in the number of days it has accorded to private members than has been the case in almost any year he has been in the house—and he has been here a long time.

The second point raised by the hon. member is that it is not democratic to permit the government to take from private members' days to carry on its business. He has said that in a democracy the elected representatives of the people are sent here to carry on the business of government. I take no exception to that statement, but I would add that the government represents the elected representatives of the people who have been entrusted with the business of government. If, after the people select a government to carry on the business of the country, we were to adopt a rule whereby the time of parliament would be taken up by private members who may not support the administration and who wish to discuss a number of questions of less importance than those the government may wish to present, we would not have democratic representation in the true sense of the word.

The hon. member has said it is necessary to give time for the debate of private motions, so that members may ventilate their views in connection with other matters. May I point out to him that there are many opportunities for ventilating views. When the house is moved into supply it is possible for hon. members to present their views on any question. Again, there is scarcely a subject touched upon in any private member's resolution which would not, at some time, come up for discussion in the committee of supply.

The hon. member has said that there are sixteen more private members' resolutions on the order paper, and that before taking an extra day for government business we ought to run through the list. If that reasoning were to apply, there is no reason why 360 resolutions might not be placed on the order paper, in the names of private members, should there be a desire to block the government in expediting its business.

Far from seeking in any way to limit hon. members in their customary rights, the government has proceeded in precisely the opposite way. We did not give notice for government business to take precedence on Mondays and Wednesdays until after a larger number of those days had been accorded hon. members than has been the case at any time since 1930. That is the condition, apart from the time taken up in the discussion of the debate on the address.

If the present motion is adopted, seven Wednesdays will have elapsed before any Wednesday will have been taken away from private members. Of those seven Wednesdays, five will actually have been used as private members' days. The house will notice that in my motion I have not suggested that government notices of motion and government orders should take precedence "on and after Wednesday the 16th March," which would be Wednesday next. I have purposely worded the motion so that it would apply a week hence. I might have done as has been done in previous years, namely insert the date of the 16th March, and then, as a result of a question such as that raised by the hon. members, have conceded an extra week. However, I thought it better to make it apparent at once that we were not seeking to take next Wednesday, but were prepared to give that additional day to private members, thereby making a total of seven Wednesdays since the opening of the session.

May I give the hon. member the figures respecting the Wednesdays which have been taken since 1932. They are as follows:

Session of	Number of Wednesdays elapsed between opening and date on which Wednesdays taken away as private members' day
1932	4
1932-33	3
1934	6
1935	5
1936	3
1937	6
1938	7

The same situation applies with respect to Mondays, as the following figures will show:

Session of	Number of Mondays actually available as private members' days
1932	5
1932-33	4
1934	4
1935	3
1936	4
1938	4

Those are the Mondays which were actually available, apart from the time occupied in the discussion of the debate on the address. Therefore I say that instead of an exception being taken to the request which has been made by the government, in their own interests as well as that of the government, hon. members should be prepared to accept the motion.

We have not been able to proceed as rapidly as we would have liked to with government business. There are many important measures which have to be discussed during the course of the session. I suspect as we get along in the session hon. members will be more anxious to conclude the business of the house than to continue its sittings on into the summer, if not into the autumn. The object of the motion is to try to get on with government business, and it is not in any way to take from hon. members any right or privilege they enjoy as members of the house.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member overlooked paragraph 130, to which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) referred. But it must never be forgotten that this chamber has complete control of its own procedure. The rule is that if we desire by a majority to change any order, be it standing or otherwise, we may do so. The government must determine its action in the light of its appreciation of the attitude of the members toward the action proposed to be taken. Personally I do not think there is any good reason why we should take more Wednesdays this year than any other year. We have taken as many Wednesdays this year as we have in previous years—more, in fact; and we have taken as many Mondays and Thursdays. I see no reason why the motion should not pass in the terms of the rules.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

AVAILABILITY OF WEEKLY CERTIFIED REPORTS MADE UNDER THE STATUTE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): On March 3 last the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) requested that there should be deposited with the clerk of sessional papers the weekly auditors' report of the operations of the wheat board. These reports have now been received from October 12, 1935, to February 24, 1938, and will be so deposited to-day. As each report is received from week to week it also will be deposited. Perhaps I should say that the time might conceivably arise when it would no longer be advisable to follow this practice.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): We have an absolute right to see these, and that is why the provision was placed in the bill. I thank the minister for offering this opportunity to inspect the reports without having to move for a lengthy return. I think the fact that he has been able to get copies of the documents in question and deposit them with the clerk of sessional papers will expedite business generally.

NIAGARA PENINSULA RIFLE RANGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) what group of properties were recommended by Mr. Ellis Corman as the site he most favoured for the rifle ranges that are to be constructed on the Niagara peninsula.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): I am informed that the gentleman referred to was not engaged by the department in connection with choosing this site. I understand that several sites were inspected and the department itself selected the one deemed to be the best from the point of location, economy and suitability. If I can find any further information, I shall be glad to give it to my hon. friend.

ABSENT CABINET MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): The safety of two of our members is a matter of very grave concern to many members of this house. Their devotion to duty has been such that one of them has been compelled to investigate the air mail route in western Canada while the other has had to observe the terrible inroads of drought and other evils that have overtaken western Canada. I have been asked to inquire as to their safety in this great devotion to public duty that has involved the risk of their welfare and possibly their lives.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The last word the government received is that they are perfectly safe.

RADIO BROADCASTING

COMPLAINT AS TO RECEPTION AT WILKIE, SASK., WITH REQUEST FOR CHANGE OF WAVE-LENGTH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOSEPH NEEDHAM (The Battlefords): I should like to direct to the attention of the responsible minister a telegram which I received a few minutes ago from Wilkie, Saskatchewan. This telegram has reference to radio reception, or shall I say the lack of radio reception, in that vicinity. It reads:

> Radio reception here terrible. CFQC Saskatoon entirely shut out by stations KOA and XER. Will you use your influence to have wave-length changed so that situation will be remedied. Surely something can be done to overcome this interference.
> F. R. Beggs,
> Mayor,
> E. H. Dulmage,
> President of Board of Trade.

I should like assurance that this condition will be remedied.

SUPPLY

USE OF CANADA'S FINANCIAL RESOURCES FOR ELIMINATION OF POVERTY—AMENDMENT OF MR. BLACKMORE

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Dunning for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Blackmore.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I did not intend to take part in this debate, but in view of the remarks of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), if I did not some hon. members might think that the minister's very able speech had convinced me that I was wrong. On the contrary I am still unrepentant and unconvinced in connection with the suggestion I made during the debate on the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne, and I desire to give a few of the reasons why. I cannot go into these at length, as the minister did, because my time is limited. On another occasion the house was most indulgent with me and permitted me to exceed my time, but I do not want to presume on that indulgence.

I am sorry the minister is unavoidably away from the house to-day because I am quite sure I shall not be doing the justice to the subject I would do if he were here to ask the questions he usually asks and make the statements he usually makes to put me right when he thinks I am wrong. I was certainly pleased that the Minister of Finance undertook to deal with the suggestion I made. Although he did not agree with it, I feel it was a distinct step forward when he took it up at all. In the short time I have been following the speeches in this house I have come to the conclusion that when things are brought up first they are generally ignored as being beneath any notice. Then if they are brought up often enough, eventually some notice is paid to them and the first thing we know the suggestion has been enacted into law. I feel that my suggestion has reached the second stage, and I have high hopes that something will be done. For example, when the suggestion was first made that we should have a central bank it was not received with any great favour, but in time it came to be adopted by this house. Even the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) had decided that a central bank would be an improvement over our present system. I have no doubt that everyone now agrees that the central banking system as we have set it up is a great improvement over what we had before. Some of our great leaders of public finance disagreed very strongly with the proposal for the setting up of a central bank, but it seems that as a general rule the things they oppose strongly are ultimately carried out to the great advantage of the people. I suggest that when some of our great leaders of public finance strongly oppose some of these ideas we should cast our minds back and see how often they have been wrong before. I would remind the house of the tremendous effort that was made to keep on the gold standard. In England, for example, the high priests of finance and the chancellor of the exchequer were all agreed that every effort should be made to keep England on the gold standard. But England went off the gold standard and immediately began to make a recovery to prosperity that has been nothing short of remarkable.

I do not suggest that the Minister of Finance and the government can learn anything from a humble member from the western prairies, but whether they learn or not, I am glad to have the opportunity of placing my views before an indulgent group of fellow members of this house. My suggestion is that the national credit should be used for national development purposes. I am quite satisfied that the very able speech of the Minister of Finance has not entirely disposed of that suggestion. The banking system of this country monetizes the credit of the country and we are asked to pay them a heavy tribute because of that duty which they perform. I am satisfied that it will take more than one speech by any member in this house to right that wrong, and it will take a good many hours of thought to realize how it may be fully remedied.

I should like first of all, Mr. Speaker, to make my position plain so far as the motion of want of confidence is concerned. I do not propose to vote in favour of the want of confidence motion. I have never concealed the fact that I should like to see a great deal more done by the government than has been done to date in the way of tariff reductions. Farm implements, for example, which are part of the raw material of the farmer, I should like to see placed on the free list. As to textiles, I should like to see a really substantial reduction made in the tariff on the goods that enter into the manufacture of clothing, especially in these hard times when many of our people are having so much difficulty in getting along. I certainly would like to have seen the tariff left as it was on furniture instead of the action being taken that was taken last session. If in reducing our tariffs we can obtain from the United States a quid pro quo, by way of reduction in the customs tariffs on Canadian goods imported into that country, so much the better, and I hope this government in its negotiations with the United States will be ready to go far enough in reducing the tariff to enable us to gain a real entry for our goods into their markets, increasing, on the one hand, the purchasing power, particularly of our primary industries and so their ability to buy goods in this country, and also reducing the cost of living to our people, who are having such a hard job getting along. I am satisfied that this government intends to go as far as it can in negotiating such a treaty; and if I should vote lack of confidence in this government I would be voting against their carrying on a work which I think is all-important to this country and should go forward. I would also be voting in favour of an alternative government which was not prepared to go even the small distance that was gone at the time the Canada-United States trade agreement was signed. So I could have little hope of any such government going the distance necessary in a new agreement to cure unemployment and the other ills from which we are suffering. I have no hesitation in saying that I owe it to my constituents and the future of this country that I should vote confidence in this administration, even though it has not gone as far as I should like in regard to the tariff.

I could say the same thing with regard to the control of credit. I have never made any secret of the fact, and I do not suppose I would be expected to, that I should like to have seen the Bank of Canada taken under one hundred per cent public ownership as well as control. The suggestion was made, and I still do not think it is sound, that private finance should have representation on the board of directors of the Bank of Canada. Tremendous power has been placed in the hands of the Bank of Canada. By increasing the cash base and thereby increasing the credit extended by the commercial banks of the country the Bank of Canada can cause, as it were, a rise in the general level of prices. Representatives of private finance on the board would know of such a decision, and since they would be elected by private interests, they would think it wise and proper to report to them the making of such a decision. If they hope to be reelected, they know they must serve those interests. When the members of this house are not told what the intention of the Bank of Canada is from time to time with regard to expanding or contracting the credit base, thus raising or lowering the level of prices and thereby making it either wise to invest, or wise to liquidate securities, I say it is not fair that representatives of private interests should have the opportunity of getting that knowledge. In my opinion there should not be a single representative of private interests on the directorate of the Bank of Canada.

But this government at least went the distance of taking over control of the Bank of Canada, and I supported it in so doing. I have never thought, indeed it is unwise to think, that in a country as broad as this, with so many varied and conflicting interests, any one group or province can have its own way; and if a government is proceeding in the general direction in which we would like to see it proceed I think we should give it our support, reserving the right to suggest that it should go further.

There is another matter in respect of which I feel I can support this present administration without any hesitation. On June 1, 1936, I spoke in this house very strongly in favour of an easy money policy. I sought at that time to cite the opinions of many prominent men all over the world in favour of an easy money policy, broadening the credit base, thereby stimulating the issue of credit and raising the general price level, thus decreasing the burden of public indebtedness and generally putting primary industries in a better position. My study, such as I have been able to make, of the policies of the Bank of Canada, confirmed by what the Minister of Finance said the other night, definitely indicates that the policy of the Bank of Canada for the last two years has been, and their present policy is, one of easy money. I think by so doing they have operated to raise the general level of prices, to improve the position of private industries, and to lighten the burden of debt. I am glad they have done it, and I commend the government because it has upheld them in so doing. The government by its trade policy has caused the value of our exportable surplus of goods to rise materially, and by its monetary policy—taking over control of the Bank of Canada, expanding the credit base, and raising the general level of prices—it has made a great contribution to the recovery that is going on in this country.

Somebody may ask me: Well, what is your position? As I said at the outset, I still believe —and possibly it is no credit to myself, and may suggest that my mind is not open to persuasion—in monetary reform. I have listened to everybody who held what might be called to-day the orthodox view, although it was not the orthodox view five years ago; and the only difference that I can see between the orthodox view to-day and the view taken by people like myself is that we want to go a little further. I do not accept the suggestion that has been made that we have already gone a certain distance and that it would be disastrous to go any further.

What I have in mind and what I suggest is a short range policy and a long range policy. The short range policy would be to issue sufficient currency to put the unemployed to work on a national development program until our long range policy has put them to work in the ranks of industry. That is all I intended to suggest in the speech I made in the debate on the address. This suggestion was not intended to be a definite long range policy, but I know, and I think that every member of the house will agree, that there are in this country to-day young men now reaching thirty years and over, who have never yet been able to find work, who have been out of work ever since they have been able to look for a job, and until our long range policies have time to absorb all the unemployed into industries where they can earn their own living, this government should definitely look after them, should do something in the way of national development work to give such people a job. It should be done not by imposing a further burden on industry but as a responsibility of the country by the use of national credit. In their ranks there are young men who actually enlisted, went overseas and risked their lives for this country without any thought of reward. They came back thinking that a grateful country would see to it that they were at least given a chance to earn a living, and I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that it ill behooves members of parliament, who have been very fortunate, to sit back and say we are going to follow steadfastly our present policy without modification, even if it means that those out of work may be out of work another three years or longer. We should take a much more sympathetic attitude towards these young men. We owe a great deal to them. They were all ready if necessary to make the sacrifice of their lives for this country.

Then there is of course a long range policy in regard to monetary matters which I suggest. I shall not have time to go into it at length this afternoon; I have referred to it before. It is a policy either of setting up a separate branch of the Bank of Canada, of splitting that bank in two, as the Bank of England is split into two, or of setting up a separate institution, a national bank which will monetize the credit of our governmental institutions at cost and avoid the burden of interest on public debt which is weighing down the people of Canada and preventing us from doing the things we should do for those for whom something should be done.

I wish first of all to deal very shortly with the long range policy of the government. As I understand it, there are still 132,000 employable unemployed receiving public aid in the dominion. Our long range policy is, I believe, absorbing the unemployed. If we in western Canada have a crop; if we make a proper treaty with the United States which sufficiently opens up the channels of trade with that country; if we continue the policy of the present administration and further lower tariff barriers in respect of other countries, these unemployed in my opinion will be absorbed into industry within the next eighteen months. But in the meantime, if we have the situation so well in hand, and if we need roads, for example, so badly, can we not safely get busy on a program for that purpose and look after these people?

Here I might say a word for the national park in my own province. People who have been through the Prince Albert national park know that it has one of the finest golf links in Canada, and splendid fishing, swimming and boating facilities. Two hours after you arrive there you can be at a lake where, probably, for days at a time you will not meet anybody; certainly in that park you can get solitude away from all the troubles of civilization. I have been told by persons who have visited all the national parks in Canada that ours has more recreative facilities than any other in the dominion. But what is the situation? One must travel over more than three hundred miles of dusty gravelled road in proceeding from the international boundary to that park. Time and again when people in the United States have been attracted, by the good publicity work done in advertising our national parks, as far as the boundaries of Canada, they have found this terribly dusty gravelled road ahead of them and have turned back. They are doing that by the hundreds. I submit that a policy which would look after our unemployed until they are absorbed into industry, and would hard-surface that road so that we would get thousands of United States visitors to the park where now we are getting only hundreds, would be good business, and is something to which this house and this government should give attention.

There is also the matter of irrigation. I do not know to what extent we can go into that, but I suggest that some of this money might be used for irrigation work, and if by this means homes were provided out west for several thousands of Canadians, homes would be made also for several thousands required to service their needs in other parts of the country, and anything which serves to increase the population of Canada is really worth while in the world troubled as this is troubled, and where it might be said by land-hungry powers that we are not making use of the resources with which Providence has endowed us.

I wish to deal shortly with some of the objections of the Minister of Finance to my suggestion. The minister stated in his speech the other evening something which I understood had been denied by most people in this house up until the time the Minister of Finance stated it. I may be wrong about that, but I am going to read the statement and then I will comment upon it. He said:

As we have seen, the Canadian chartered banks as a group think it expedient to maintain an average reserve of ten per cent, and consequently if, as a result of the purchase of ten million dollars' worth of securities by the central bank, the reserve of the chartered banks has been increased by ten million dollars, the chartered banks will seek to expand their assets and deposits by approximately one hundred million dollars.

I can remember when the suggestion that the banks loaned out ten dollars for every dollar of cash by which they increased their cash reserves was treated with a great deal of derision. The question was asked, how can anybody lend ten dollars if he has only a dollar? And I can remember it seemed to be assumed that that settled the whole matter. I should like to read what was said in this house, which indicates perhaps that. If I am wrong, I am in the judgment of the house in this respect. In the first speech which I had the privilege of making in this chamber, at page 349 of Hansard, volume 1, 1936, I said:

I find by this Macmillan report, Mr. Speaker, that in July, 1933, the average daily borrowings of the banks under the Finance Act was $48,552,000. What does that mean? It simply means that, under the Finance Act, if the Bank of Montreal or any other bank had one million dollars' worth of government bonds which were paying at that time in the neighbourhood of 5½ per cent, they could go to the Minister of Finance and get one million dollars' worth of new money for which they paid at that time 2½ per cent. They get that new money against the credit of this country; then on the basis of established banking practice they are able to buy nine million dollars' worth of government bonds. Let us trace what happens. The bank pays 2½ per cent on one million dollars, but, mark you, it is drawing 5½ per cent on ten million dollars' worth of bonds. And they call that wise public financing! There is no doubt about it at all; it is right here in this Macmillan report.

The minister is reported to have said:

No, it just isn't so.

Now at that time it was quite all wrong to say that a bank could take a million dollars, borrow a million dollars' worth of new currency under the Finance Act from the Minister of Finance, and thereby increase cash reserves and then buy another nine million dollars' worth of government bonds. That is just what I was suggesting at that time. Of course in order to do that the banks have to pay interest to their depositors on the money that is redeposited. But the bare fact remains that it is apparently now admitted that the banks do increase their loans or their purchases of investments—one or the other—to the extent of ten dollars for every dollar increase in their cash reserve.

Mr. BENNETT: On the assumption that the whole sum is deposited back in the chartered banks.

Mr. TUCKER: Yes. Well, practically the whole sum is. The entire argument of the Minister of Finance is based on that, because he said that if we increased the cash reserve by $350,000,000 it would find its way back into the hands of the banks and increase bank loans, bank investments and bank deposits by $3,500,000,000. That was the point made by the Minister of Finance. I will continue to read his speech from where I left off:

Thus it is that the security purchases by the Bank of Canada tend to expand bank deposits in the country by approximately ten times the amount of the transaction.

You may ask just how the chartered banks will expand their assets and deposits as a result of open market operations by the Bank of Canada. If the chartered banks can find good borrowers they will tend to increase their ordinary commercial loans, and by so doing increase their deposit liabilities by a similar amount. Otherwise they may buy investment securities—

And that is what they have been doing for the past three or four years.

—which will usually earn them a considerably lower rate, or they may expand partly in one way and partly in the other. Either move will increase the aggregate of deposits of the banking system as a whole.

I am purposely labouring that point because, when the time comes that something is accepted which formerly was apparently not accepted, it is wise to signalize the event and call people's attention to it to prevent the ground from having to be gone over again. If it is true that the banks can and do sell government bonds to provide cash to increase their cash reserves, and that they can and do thereupon make loans or advances to the extent of $10 for every dollar of increased cash resources they get, it is wise that we should know that and cease to contradict the statement that it is so. Now, this is known as monetizing the credit of the country. In that connection I should like to mention one significant fact. Before our present banking system and the system of using cheques on deposits for doing the business of the country came into effect, every dollar's worth of business was done with money issued by the government of the country. To-day, as the Minister of Finance said, ninety to ninety-five per cent of the business of the country is done by cheques on deposits in the banks. And the Minister of Finance pointed out that those deposits in the banks are the result of providing the banks with the necessary cash basis to make the loans or buy the bonds to create the deposits. Therefore we have the situation that the financial interests of the country create ninety to ninety-five per cent of the circulating and purchasing media of this country. We have departed from the old plan that the state itself should create this purchasing medium. What I am suggesting is that we should gradually but as rapidly as we safely can return to the system by which the state has control of and issues and creates the circulating media of the country. What is happening to-day? Has there ever been a time when this country was plunging into debt at the rate it is to-day?

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. TUCKER: I mean by that during the past ten years.

Mr. MacNICOL: No, the hon. member means during the last two years.

Mr. TUCKER: No, I heard the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) say "hear, hear." I did not want to leave him out of the picture. During the fiscal year 1936-37 the average rate of interest paid, by the dominion government, including the interest on short term debentures, was 3·745 per cent, almost three and three-quarters per cent. And the annual interest charge in 1936-37 was $136,278,193. Just to give an example of what is happening in this matter, I should like to indicate what we have paid in the way of interest on the public debt, and how it has grown, in the last eighteen years.

I hold in my hand a very informative pamphlet, which I suppose is familiar to every hon. member, entitled Dominion Public Finance, issued under the authority of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) and printed by the king's printer. At page 33 it gives a table of the public debt of Canada and interest payments thereon since July 1, 1867. I am not going back to 1867 but I think everyone here is interested in seeing what has been happening in connection with the public debt at least in recent years. I find that in 1919, after the war was over, the public debt of this country was $2,676,635,725. From then until 1936 we paid interest on that debt to the amount of $2,294,751,878. Remember that the total debt in 1919 was $2,676,000,000—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I tell my hon. friend that the amount of interest paid up to the present is $2,545,000,000.

Mr. TUCKER: Well, I wanted to be sure not to overstate by using the figures I find in this pamphlet. I find that the debt had increased by 1936 to $3,431,944,027. That is, after paying some $2,300,000,000 in interest on the public debt, that debt had increased in those eighteen years by over twenty-eight per cent. The development of this country had been hampered by high interest rates and the heavy taxation necessary to the payment of this large amount of interest; yet in 1936 the public debt was twenty-eight per cent higher than it had been eighteen years previously. And that is not due to the war; this is only our own federal national debt. The question is, can we go on paying over $2,300,000,000 in eighteen years and increasing the amount of the debt at the same time by twenty-eight per cent? There is no reason why it should not go on similarly in the future as in the past unless we change our system of public finance. We spent very little on national defence in that period. I am glad the Minister of Finance took the trouble to go into this matter because I am sure, now that he has taken it up, other hon. members will regard it as worthy of consideration and give it the attention it deserves.

I should like to remind the house what my actual proposal was. I quote:

> I suggest that with that amount of gold we have the right to issue on a sound money basis $718,000,000 worth of currency fully secured on a twenty-five per cent basis. We have $157,000,000 worth issued, which would leave $560,000,000 that we could issue to put our young people to work. Does anybody suggest that that would not be sufficient to put them all to work?

I went on to say:

> It may be suggested that this would mean inflation. My answer is that if there is any danger of inflation as a result of issuing what is required of that money you can take power to increase the reserves required to be kept by banks in the Bank of Canada. By law they are required to keep only five per cent. The central reserve system of the United States requires banks to keep with the central reserve a reserve of twenty per cent. If the United States, with its vast wealth, has realized the need of doing something like this to prevent inflation when it increases its currency issue, Canada can do the same.

There was my definite proposal. I did not suggest that we should forthwith issue that much money; I said we should issue what was required of that much money. If the whole $560,000,000 was not required—and I do not think myself that anything like that sum would be required—then it would not be necessary to issue it.

There was a suggestion made that I was mistaken in my figures, that that amount could not be issued. It was said that by virtue of the Bank of Canada Act the bank had to have a reserve against its deposits from the chartered banks as well as against the notes issued, and I suggested that that obligation could be waived by order in council. Just to keep the record straight I should like to read the Bank of Canada Act in that regard (chapter 43, 1934):

> 26 (3) At the request in writing of the board, the governor in council may suspend the operation of this section in so far as it requires the bank to maintain a reserve of gold equal to an amount not less than twenty-five per centum of its notes and deposit liabilities. Such suspension shall be for such period not exceeding sixty days as may be specified by the governor in council, but on the further request in writing of the board may be extended from time to time for further periods not exceeding sixty days each, provided, however, that no such suspension shall continue for a period longer than one year without the sanction of parliament.

Under this provision the government has it within its power to do the very thing I suggested. The central bank is not hampered by the requirement of keeping twenty-five per cent of its deposits from the chartered banks in the form of cash, because it can have that requirement suspended by order in council until parliament meets; and I suppose it could get parliament to ratify that suspension if it were in the public interest to do so.

The minister stated that, roughly, $210,000,000 could not be included because of the requirement of a twenty-five per cent coverage of gold in respect of deposits with the Bank of Canada by the chartered banks. Suppose it was not deemed wise to suspend that gold clause—and I do not necessarily suggest that it would be wise. Last year we produced $143,314,000 worth of gold. We could have used thirty-six per cent of that gold, and we would have looked after the objection raised by the minister; it would have covered those deposits quite easily, as well as the issue proposed by myself, that is, assuming that it would take the whole $516,000,000 to put the unemployed to work. But I do not assume that at all. I submit that a very much smaller sum would look after the problem in this country, would take care of these people, would give the unemployed as well as the country generally real satisfaction, and we would get real value for our money. Of course if there is a desire to preserve the present system without any change whatever, and the government will look after these unemployed and provide us with our hard-surfaced roads, I will support them in that policy without any hesitation.

I do resent very much, however, when for example I go from Saskatchewan to visit friends on the Pacific coast, having to go to a foreign country in order to find a good road to get there. When I return home from this parliament I do resent having to go through the United States in order to get a good road back to western Canada. There should be a hard-surfaced trans-Canada road from Halifax to Vancouver, and there should be hard-surfaced roads into every national park in this country, in order to take advantage of the vast tourist trade we could tap by virtue of these roads.

I should like to briefly examine a further objection. I quote again:

> An increase of say $350,000,000 in chartered bank holdings of Bank of Canada notes would increase their cash reserves from the present figure of about $250,000,000 to $600,000,000, and their cash ratio from about 10 per cent to roughly 21 per cent.

Then the minister went on to say:

> If the banks use their increased cash in the normal way, as a basis for the extension of roughly ten times as much in loans to the public, or for the acquisition of ten times as much in investments, bank deposits would expand by approximately an equal amount until the cash ratio was brought down again to approximately ten per cent. This would mean an increase in bank deposits from the present level of about $2,387,000,000 to something like $6,000,000,000, or more than 2·6 times the level of December 31, 1929. Am I merely old fashioned or orthodox when I say that this would mean a colossal measure of inflation?

My answer to that is that there are only two ways in which the banks could increase their loans. The first way would be by lending money to people who had good propositions to put before them, satisfying the banks that they had a chance to pay back that money with interest; in other words good, feasible, commercial propositions. If there is that much business waiting to be done in this country; if we can expand our cash loans from two billion to six billion on a perfectly sound basis which would satisfy the banks, I submit it would be a good thing to do that. On the other hand they might purchase government investments. If they purchased investments that were already out and there was competition in those purchases, the cost would rise and the return would be driven down so that there would be definite limits in this regard, and I do not suppose that a great deal of harm could be done in that direction. But if they were lending money to governments on their bonds this dominion would control its borrowings; it would not need to borrow except to repay debts on which it is already paying exorbitant rates of interest. The municipalities and provinces would also have to borrow from the banks. As far as I can see, the banks would not lend money, even if they had the cash reserves, if it was not a safe proposition, in each and every case, so that there is not much danger of the inflation which is suggested by the minister.

I would make this suggestion, however. To make doubly sure, the government could take power to increase the reserves required to be maintained by the chartered banks with the Bank of Canada. Then if there was any tendency on the part of the banks unduly to inflate or expand their credit so as to cause an inflationary movement in this country which would not be in our best interests, we could go the banks and say, "If you do not stop this inflation we will exercise this right to increase the reserves you are required to maintain with the Bank of Canada."

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry, but the hon. gentleman has exhausted his time to speak.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. TUCKER: I certainly appreciate this indulgence; I had not intended to presume on the kindness of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may continue, with the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. TUCKER: If we had that additional power over the banks it would in effect double the control we have at present. We feel we have control over them to-day, but with that added power we could if we wished go to the banks and say, "We have issued $350,000,000 worth of new currency. If you make the slightest move to lend a single cent of that, we are going to clamp on the increased reserve rate," and I think that would be sufficient to make the banks back up.

[Mr. Tucker.]

Of course we have been increasing the cash reserves. I think the minister suggests that this would be taken advantage of to the fullest extent; that the banks would lend ten dollars for every dollar in the increased cash reserve. We control them in that regard now to prevent undue expansion. We could continue to do so.

I will anticipate a criticism which I would have liked to deal with later on. The suggestion is that if we increased the cash of this country, that would be returned to the banks and they would have to pay interest on that increase which, in effect, would be a tax on the banks. If it is a valid argument to say that the banks can increase their loans to the extent of ten times the increase in cash reserves, it is fair to say that they could, without difficulty and in a sound way, by finding sound borrowers, increase their loans to the extent of the amount only of that money that is returned to the banks. Probably, as the right hon. leader of the opposition says, it will not all be returned. Let us assume that $300,000,000 is returned. I submit that the banks could be permitted to re-lend not ten dollars for every dollar but one dollar for every dollar. On that money, for which it pays its depositors one and a half per cent, it would be paid six or seven per cent. There would be no real loss or tax on the banks in that transaction and no large inflation of credit with the disastrous effects mentioned by the minister.

So I submit, Mr. Speaker—and I will terminate my remarks at once—the suggestion that inflation would inevitably follow is not necessarily true. When you set up that tremendous inflation as an objection, you are assuming something that is not necessarily so. I submit that you could control it—prevent it. When you suggest that it would be unfair to the banks, my reply is that you should control it, to the extent that they should be permitted to lend only one dollar for every dollar returned to them, so that it would not cost them a cent.

These were the two main objections, as I saw them. There were others which I should have liked to meet. I do not want to presume any longer on the time of the house. I should have liked to deal also with my suggested long range policy of getting away from paying the banks a tribute for monetizing the credit of Canada, which to-day costs us three and three-quarters per cent, amounting to the sum I have already mentioned. If we had the use of that sum we would be able to do more for the people who need to have something done to help them in these difficult times.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, first of all may I say the amendment would seem to declare that the government has failed to use the resources of this dominion as adequately as our people have a right to expect, for the provision of a satisfactory standard of living for the masses of the people. I believe that is an obvious statement of fact which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) in his very instructive address the other evening, did not destroy in any particular. I therefore propose, when the time comes, to vote for the amendment.

So far, however, the discussion has been centred only upon the monetary aspect, and hence has developed into an academic, and I think not very convincing, argument concerning finance and various types of credit. To my mind a discussion of this sort narrowed down to one particular point tends to confuse the issue which is really before us and which has been raised by the amendment, which states the government has neglected to use the resources of the country—not the financial system; not monetary matters, but the resources of the country, in the interests of the people.

In what do those resources consist?—surely in our natural resources, in our machinery of production, in our labour power, and so on. After all, the financial system is but a method of accountancy; it is but figures, as it were, entered into the ledgers of those who own the machines and the resources, and can therefore decide what human labour shall be utilized from time to time to operate our economic system.

In such a productive system the object of making and distributing goods is not their usability, unfortunately, but their salability at a profit. Hence within such an economic system abundance from time to time becomes a curse, and production is therefore artificially restricted; for only those things that are scarce can be sold at a good price and at a substantial profit. Selling, I repeat, not using, is the real object of our economic system; and within that system everything distributed, whether it be goods or money, must be sold at a profit, or production ceases.

Mr. BENNETT: Does not ability to sell depend upon ability to use?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes. The right hon. gentleman has said that ability to sell depends upon ability to use, and in that he is right. But may I say it depends more upon the ability to exchange or, in other words, to sell.

Only selfishness or stupidity would deny that there is something fundamentally wrong with a system which actually encourages scarcity and dreads abundance as a plague. My opinion is that, regardless of what we may think of social credit, its advocates have performed and are performing a service to our society by focusing attention upon this very problem. I believe, of course, that somewhere in the economic structure purchasing power has actually been issued against every item of production, but the trouble is that holders of potential purchasing power do not exercise it as such. They cannot use it for purchasing power, because they themselves have only certain limited human needs. Hence, to me the problem raised by the amendment is at once one of maldistribution and of increased consumption of consumable goods.

A few individuals have margins so far above their consumptive possibilities that they restrict the consumption of others at the other end of the scale. Last Tuesday, in discussing social credit, which applies also to what I am saying, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) said, as reported at page 1155 of Hansard:

> The false premise to which I refer is that, as an inevitable result of the working of our present economic and financial system, there is a chronic shortage of purchasing power in the hands of consumers. This deficiency is supposed to arise from the fact that, of the costs incurred in the production of commodities for sale, only a part have involved the distribution of purchasing power to potential consumers.

Then he went on to refer to the Major Douglas A plus B theorem, with which I am not concerned. And then he added:

> Now, the theory alleges that, as individuals who are the potential consumers always receive for their work in production less than the total cost of the products of industry, they never have enough purchasing power, enough money and credit with which to buy those products of industry.

I disagree with the statement that enough purchasing power is never distributed, but I would say the minister is quite wrong also in saying that sufficient purchasing power is placed in the hands of consumers, as consumers. The toll taken by monopolistic industries and individuals who produce for profit and who demand interest does not reappear in the purchase of consumption goods but goes into the savings, which, in turn, are used again for further exploitation of the producing masses. Herein, I believe, lies the chronic defect in the present economic system. The issue of more money will not rectify it. The very nature of the method of production and distribution, under the present system, demands that those who own the means of production retain the difference between all goods produced and the goods given to the working producers for their services and for their sustenance. That is the source of the accumulations of wealth with which we are confronted. It is the cause of depressions, as well as the cause of the lack of purchasing power in the masses. Figures representing these profits represent the amounts available for investment by the few who own and control the means of production. A few years ago they found profitable fields for investment of these enforced savings in industries within their own country, and afterwards abroad. To-day, as national self-sufficiency increases, overseas investments are becoming less. And so we find that government bonds are being purchased as an opportunity for investment.

Mr. BENNETT: Our investments abroad have increased.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, but I am speaking generally of all investments of all nations of the world. It is not altogether true of our own country at this time. May I say to the Minister of Finance that when he speaks of a balanced budget—which is desirable—a balanced budget under these circumstances may actually restrict the places where this money may be invested, and the very people demanding a balanced budget may be those who will suffer from a lack of safe places in which to invest their money,—although in my opinion that might have under some circumstances the beneficial effect of forcing the cost of money down and diverting it into industrial channels. That might be at least a good temporary effect.

Mr. VIEN: The hon. gentleman is in favour of a balanced budget, is he?

Mr. COLDWELL: I believe every intelligent man believes that we ought to be able to balance our consumption with our production; that, of course, is the kind of balanced budget I would like to see in Canada. There is also a factor which those who look to foreign trade as a solution will have to face; for, as it diminishes, the home market will have to consume the products of industry —and I am speaking not of one country but of all countries. This means that the national income must become more widely distributed within the nation and we must look more and more to our home market and the purchasing power of our own people for a way out of some of our economic difficulties. If we fail to reach this conclusion by a process of reasoning, I believe we shall reach it through hard experience. Surely we have a picture of maldistribution in this country. Poverty is rampant, unemployment continues in the midst of vast resources, efficient machines and labour are idle and yet we have impressive bank balances. Monopolistic industry and wealth accumulation are actually increasing while relief costs mount. But the government does nothing to meet the situation, and that I think justifies the moving of the amendment.

We are sometimes told—indeed the Minister of Finance indicated it the other evening, that wealth in Canada is widely distributed. He stated proudly that there were over 4,000,000 savings bank accounts in Canada and 6,500,000 life insurance policies. However, I find upon examination that 92·5 per cent of the savings accounts average slightly over $100 while 1·2 per cent average $289,000. That is, one per cent of the depositors own over 35 per cent of the total savings deposits. The minister also mentioned life insurance. The president of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, speaking on January 1, 1937, had said this of North America that some twelve per cent of all policyholders had less than $300 protection; 45 per cent had less than $1,000 and 90 per cent had less than $3,000.

The Life Underwriters' Association of Canada put it a little differently when they said that out of every hundred young men starting life at age 25, by 65 years of age, 36 will have died, one will be wealthy, four will be well to do, five will be still working and 54 will be dependent, wholly or in part, on charity, children or friends.

In other words, only five per cent of those still living will have achieved economic security. Our income and wage returns tell much the same story. Of 2,713,000—I am using round figures—adult persons, excluding farmers—they should be excluded because in 1933 in the two provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, only 76 persons whose principal work was that of farming had sufficient income to be assessable for income tax—1,526,000 or 56·2 per cent received less than $1,000; 643,000 or 23·2 per cent received between $1,000 and $1,500; 448,000 or 16·5 per cent received between $1,500 and $3,000; 85,000 or 3·2 per cent received between $3,000 and $10,000 and 11,000 or 0·4 per cent received $10,000 or over. Those figures were for the year 1930.

Mr. BENNETT: There is $1,000 that is exempt.

Mr. COLDWELL: These are people gainfully employed and all income is included. That was before the worst days of 1931, 1932 and 1933. It is useless to say, as is often said, that the standard of living is higher to-day than it was a century ago. It seems to me that we should judge it, not by what it is but by what it might be. Unfortunately, scarcity seems to be the keynote of the present economic system. May I add that that is the objective of trusts, of cartels, of selling rings, of selling agreements, yes, even ultimately of tariffs. Because of this, from time to time cotton, coffee, grain, automobiles and so on have been destroyed in order to raise prices and restore profits. Last year our government rejoiced when the fire sale wheat policy got rid of what was called a surplus, but which should have been a reserve, a reserve of which we are sorely in need at the present time. Had all the people in the world who needed food received it, there would not have been a kernel of wheat left over at any time. The same is also true of industry and of industrial products. A survey in 1929, our boom year, of our potential production showed that our paper mills were running at only 80 per cent capacity, our oil refineries at 50 per cent, our flour mills at 53 per cent, our bakeries at 35 per cent and so on. In the light of the statistics that I have quoted this afternoon, can it be said that we as a parliament or as a government have provided adequately for the people? I think not.

The other evening the Minister of Finance emphasized the increase in deposits and currency, but let me remark that that is the natural result of the business upswing. The building boom in Great Britain has had repercussions in this country and the huge rearmament program has undoubtedly affected us to a remarkable degree. We can thus account for the upswing. But I say this to the gentlemen of the Liberal party: All this will pass, perhaps is passing, but what preparations has this government made for the Canadian people? It seems to me that that is the pressing question at the moment. Nothing has been done commensurate with the urgency of the situation, and the evils disclosed by the mass buying probe remain. Agriculture languishes before the demands of all kinds of well-organized industry. We have been told that the promised medicine from the Liberal free trade bottle cannot be administered, because it would destroy confederation. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) made this quite clear. The hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) admitted it, and the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) asked for the compensating adjustments that some of us have been advocating for a number of years. Private members on the Liberal side of the house confess their inability to secure the free trade for which they fought and about which they talked so much in western Canada over a long period of years.

Mr. ILSLEY: Do not you think that is a misstatement?

Mr. COLDWELL: I think it is a perfectly correct statement.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is there not a difference between free trade and freer trade?

Mr. COLDWELL: I said "free trade."

Mr. ILSLEY: You said both.

Mr. BENNETT: In 1896 Laurier said at Brandon that he wanted free trade as it then was in England.

Mr. COLDWELL: Gentlemen who are today ministers of the crown and private members of the Liberal party certainly advocated not only a freer trade policy but what amounted to a free trade policy in their election speeches in western Canada. That being so, we ought to endeavour to understand and solve the internal problems of unemployment, agriculture, the depression and the poverty which surround us. It seems to me that these are the real problems raised by the amendment. The necessity for this can be seen from the fact that while we have hundreds of thousands on relief the gross dividends paid by corporations in 1937 surpassed the previous all-time record of 1930. In other words, the maldistribution of which I spoke is more obvious in 1937 than it was even in 1930. In our opinion, to rectify this serious cause of social unrest will require more than a change in monetary policy, although we regard monetary policy as one of the fundamentals of any policy.

Other fundamental requirements, if I may enumerate them briefly, are the operation in the public interest and on a national plan of mines and forests, water powers, monopolistic industries, together with effective social control of wages, hours of labour and the prices of farm products, guaranteeing to the farmer an adequate return for his labour, and so on, to ensure that we have purchasing power and the means of distributing goods within our own economy.

I would add this, that salvation in my opinion will not come miraculously or through any external commercial arrangements that we may make, but must be worked out within our own economy, and there is no single or even speedy cure. The road must be carefully planned and followed towards social security and economic justice. It is sometimes argued, of course, that the planning of our economic security or of society generally would be difficult because we would not know what goods to produce. As to that, let me quote from a report of the National Survey of Potential Productive Capacity in the United States—the Hoover committee, as we sometimes call it, because it was appointed by President Hoover—which reported on January 1, 1934. This is what that committee, in some respects a very conservative one, said:

> Strange as it may seem, it is easier to determine human needs than it is to determine the ability of society to extract raw materials. On the average, people of a given culture eat only so much food, wear out only so many clothes, live in only so many rooms. If "scarcity values" (of works of art, etc.) are excluded from consideration—and they naturally fall outside the scope of our study since our concern was with physical quantities—the amount of goods and services the population would like to consume can be calculated with an accuracy far greater than the accuracy with which we can determine the possible output of any industry.

Some will say that any kind of economic planning would lead to regimentation. To me economic security for all is the only road to real freedom and real democracy. That is why I advocate it. The present system regiments masses in poverty and in want because it places, as I said before, salability before necessity. It dooms the masses to scarcity and only enables those who own the productive resources to accumulate the profit on goods which they do not themselves produce. Only unorganized farmers, fishermen and other small individual producers are under economic compulsion to produce for less than the real costs of production. This problem the present government refuses to face; hence again I say the amendment is fully justified.

Where does the Liberal party stand in relation to this pressing problem? Before the election the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), whom I am glad to see in his seat, and the member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) told the people that the Liberal party stood for monetary reform, for those very monetary policies that were so vehemently denounced by the Minister of Finance the other evening. If I recollect, the Minister of National Defence was going to issue hundreds of millions of dollars, and I cannot tell what the member for Vancouver-Burrard was going to do. But I heard him speak, and I know he obtained thousands of votes in the province of Saskatchewan because of the very spectacular promises he made, ostensibly on behalf of the Liberal party. We said then that these gentlemen would never be permitted by the Liberal party to carry out the policy they advocated. But by these means, of course, they obtained thousands of votes. How can gentlemen rise on the Liberal side of the house and accuse social crediters of getting votes by false pretences when that kind of thing was done so widely all across Canada by prominent members of their own party? Why are these members silent to-day, and why have they been silent these many months in this house? Surely as sincere men, and I believe they are, they must be disillusioned as thousands must be who voted Liberal. But unlike the rank and file they have a place here and can speak, and this is the time and the place to speak.

The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) did rise and express himself again this afternoon, although I noticed a somewhat different tone in his speech this afternoon from the tone he used in the first speech he made on this subject, and to which he referred this afternoon. But I am glad that he rose to-day and said some of the things he did, and may I say to the other gentlemen that I think honesty and sincerity of purpose demand that they too should follow his example and rise in their places and let the house and the country know exactly where they now stand in regard to the preelection promises which they made. Let us look at some of them.

We were to have a nationally owned central bank, issuing national credit and national currency to meet our national needs. And what have we got? We have a central bank that is neither publicly nor privately owned; it is a hybrid affair. Personally I believe that a central bank can best function when it is completely publicly owned, and I do not believe a compromise of that description is ever very satisfactory or very effective.

Then, large public works were to be undertaken. The hon. member for Rosthern this afternoon mentioned some of the public works that might be carried out. I am sure that we in this corner of the house would be very glad to support a program which would give us a decent highway all across Canada. But what happened to the public works? They have been either restricted or discontinued, and unemployment remains with us. Indeed to-day there are literally hundreds of thousands of people on relief, and in my opinion—I have said this before—the most pernicious form of dole is the dole that we to-day have in the Dominion of Canada. The member for Rosthern spoke of young men of thirty who had never worked. I have seen the effect upon such men in later life also, at forty or forty-five years of age, men who have not worked for five or more years; and I am going to tell you that even if these men get the opportunity again, they will be physically unfitted to work. But they are never going to get the opportunity, exactly because of the conditions to which the member for Rosthern referred, namely, that thousands of young men of thirty and under are to-day seeking jobs, and because they are not married and therefore have no homes to maintain and are in the vigour of early manhood, they will be preferred for the jobs that are going.

Mr. WARREN: Is not the unemployment situation in the west largely created by the lack of a crop?

Mr. COLDWELL: The unemployment figures for the month of January show that employment is actually down in the east, and surely that cannot be accounted for altogether by the drought in the west.

Mr. FURNISS: It helps.

Mr. COLDWELL: Of course the relief figures in western Canada are due in part to drought, but in the west, in these relief areas, there are roads which are a disgrace to Canada, roads which are impassable; yet no public works of that nature are undertaken.

Mr. WARREN: Is it not true that a great many of the unemployed in western Canada have drifted into Ontario during the past year and added perhaps to the unemployment in that province?

Mr. MacNICOL: With the freer trade policy.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, until Ontario and British Columbia undertook to place barriers against the coming into their province of young men from western Canada, I, at least, thought this was a country where freedom of movement on the part of the people was guaranteed under the British North America Act. True, some young people have come into this province from the west.

Mr. WARREN: Many of them.

Mr. COLDWELL: Some. I was going to add that the first attempts which were made at economic planning and direction have gone. For example, we have lost the wheat board; it has virtually gone; our grain reserves, as I called them earlier, have been dissipated too. And we are miles away from really lower tariffs—miles away. The textile and other great industries continue just as before. Nothing whatever has been done about it. No wonder that Liberal newspapers like the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix on March 4 publish articles from their parliamentary correspondent stating definitely that the big interests, through the right wing of the Liberal party, are in complete control of that party and of Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: That is not true.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is not my statement. It is not the statement of an opposition newspaper. It is the statement of the official correspondent of the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, one of the outstanding Liberal papers circulating in western Canada; the hon. member will find the article in the issue of March 4.

Mr. ILSLEY: Why does the hon. gentleman say that nothing has been done in the way of lowering tariffs, in view of the new agreements with the United Kingdom and the United States?

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister is usually very fair, and I respect him; but I did not say that nothing had been done.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: I said we are miles and miles away from low tariffs.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): No—from lower tariffs.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, from lower tariffs. If, Mr. Speaker, hon. members regard as a low tariff a tariff which is 30, 35 and 40 or more per cent, I do not. And when I sat in this chamber last April and saw the Minister of Finance in this "lower tariff" government introduce a resolution increasing the tariff on furniture, increasing the already high tariffs on other commodities, then I realized that we were proceeding in exactly the opposite direction to the way in which the government said it was going, before it was elected.

Mr. ILSLEY: What "other commodities"? There are no other commodities.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What "other commodities"?

Mr. COLDWELL: What about felt hood forms?

Mr. ILSLEY: They were not increased.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think the minister will find that they were.

Mr. ILSLEY: They have not been increased at all.

Mr. COLDWELL: I felt sure they were. The duty is very high. I suggest that this parliament is drifting, that the present government is giving no leadership in the solution of the economic problems that confront us. As I said once before, there are in all parts of this house—in the Liberal party, in the Conservative party, in the groups in this corner—men who are anxious to see something done and who desire to move in the direction of orderly progress, and we should forget sometimes our party divisions and even, some of us, our pet theories—I admit that I have some. We could get together, it seems to me, a group in this house that could endeavour to give some progressive leadership at this particular time to the people of Canada. In my opinion this is necessary, because although we have seen a business up-swing, there are signs everywhere that within a measurable time we may face another "down-swing"—if I may put it that way.

So, Mr. Speaker, for the reasons I have given I intend to support the amendment of the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore).

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): I find myself in accord, generally speaking, with the statements of the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) and also, with one or two exceptions, of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I wish to deal chiefly with statements that were made in the earlier part of the debate and with one or two that were made prior to the debate.

I was much interested in some observations of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) on the subject of relief, and I was somewhat disturbed when these ministers stated that in their opinion the only money that could be made available for relief was the money that the government could tax from the pockets of the people. It seems very strange that such statements should come from members of a government elected on a platform of monetary reform. It seems even stranger that the Minister of Labour should make the statement that if the federal government were to assume the responsibility for all relief it would be necessary to increase taxation against the incomes of the people in the lower brackets, and also perhaps to raise the sales tax, which falls heaviest upon the poorer classes of people. Perhaps it would have been a good thing if the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had taken one or two of these ministers with him on the election campaign, so that after he had soared high, wide and handsome in the realms of monetary reform it would have been possible for the Minister of Labour to get up and bring people back to earth by telling them that the only way the Liberal party could make money available to meet the domestic and social requirements of the people was by increasing taxation against the poorer classes. Had that statement been made during the elections I should not have been criticizing the government to-day. But not only was that statement not made, but there echoed from one end of Canada to the other the Prime Minister's statements telling the people how currency and credit would be made available in terms of public need, showing how money would be available to meet the domestic and social requirements of the Canadian people.

The other day when the Minister of Finance was speaking and praising the policy of the Bank of Canada, he said the bank had made money available for the industrial requirements of the people. But there was no word said as to "social" and "domestic" requirements, words that were spoken so freely in speeches prior to the election.

I listened with great interest to the essay read by the Minister of Finance, but it was largely spoiled for me owing to the fact that in the latter part of it there was a large number of misstatements of facts and a large number of false charges against ourselves that cannot be substantiated by the minister. With those statements I shall deal a little later.

The Minister of Finance criticized the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) because he quoted somewhat freely from certain authors who are not believers in social credit. The hon. member never at any time quoted those authors as supporters of social credit; he quoted them as supporting certain principles which are fundamentals of social credit. I would also point out that whenever the hon. member for Lethbridge quoted these gentlemen he named the author, the title of the book, and the page on which the quotations could be found. When the Minister of Finance attributed statements to Major Douglas and ourselves and other social crediters he did not on a single occasion give the name of the book or the place where the quotations could be found. When the hon. member for Lethbridge challenged him and asked where the statements could be found, the Minister of Finance merely stated that he had read many books and these were his general impressions. I challenge the Minister of Finance to show where those statements can be found. I shall be referring to them later on.

Our motion points out that there is poverty in Canada and states that in our opinion the government is not taking the necessary steps to remove that poverty by adequately developing our natural resources. It is true that there has been a partial recovery in Canada, largely due to the fact that the world to-day is spending millions upon millions on armaments. In the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I read from a letter of the Canadian Bank of Commerce which makes that very clear. In order to obtain a proper perspective of conditions in Canada to-day I should like to draw a rough picture. On the one side we have a great productive plant working at only a small percentage of its capacity. We have abundant natural resources barely touched, tremendous sources of energy which can be developed, a large surplus of labour unemployed, and many who are working only part time. On the other side we see a sordid picture; a great army of people on the verge of starvation, about 900,000 on relief, and many thousands more whose standard of living is insufficient to provide the requirements of a healthy existence. Are not the people fully justified, then, in asking why in a Christian democracy it is not possible to employ that surplus labour in factories and industries that are working only part time, in order to produce from our wealth of natural resources goods which are so sorely needed by these starving masses? Is it a problem beyond the power of the government or of man to solve?

We have heard hon. members state that this condition of things is the fault of industry; they blame industry for not expanding. But how can industry expand when there is not a market for its goods? We have stressed time and again the reason why it cannot be done. We have shown why there is no effective market. The physical demand is there, but of what use is it unless it can be made effective?—and it can be made effective only by putting money in the pockets of those who need the goods. I have shown that it cannot be done unless you have a sufficient volume of capital production to pay out wages to restore the balance. I have pointed out that there must be a certain relationship between the production of consumption goods and of capital goods. I was therefore surprised when the Minister of Finance stated, as reported at page 1156 of Hansard:

> Another error which the social crediters make is to overlook entirely the fact that consumers do not buy the whole product of industry. A very substantial proportion of the total product of industry consists of producers' or capital goods—machinery, tools, equipment, etc—which never come into the hands of consumers and which they never have to buy. The firms which are producing these capital goods pay wages, salaries and dividends which constitute purchasing power in the hands of consumers for the purchase of consumers' goods produced by other industries. It is therefore absurd to contend that sufficient money could be placed in the hands of consumers to enable them to purchase the entire produce of industry.

The Minister of Finance states that consumers are not required to pay for capital goods. Does he suggest that the owners of the factories of Canada to-day are philanthropists, allowing their factories to be used to produce goods without charging for the use of the factories? When goods are produced in a factory, included in the price of those goods will be a certain charge to cover the cost of equipping and maintaining the factory. Therefore unquestionably consumers not only pay for consumers' goods but also their share of the cost of depreciation of the plant that produced those goods.

I have spoken on this subject several times in the house, and every time I have referred to the fact that industry cannot create its own demand unless there is a sufficient volume of capital goods produced so that the salaries and wages paid in their production will be equal to the deficiency that exists as between the effective demand of the people and the total price of the goods available for distribution. I stressed that fact the first time I spoke and on other occasions since then, yet the minister says we have always ignored that point. I am not blaming the minister for not listening to or reading our speeches, I know he is a busy man, but I think he should be a little more accurate than to make such a sweeping statement.

So we have said it is necessary to issue additional money or purchasing power outside of the industrial system in order to make up this deficiency. When we make that statement, it is claimed that such action would cause inflation. What is inflation? The hon. member for Lethbridge dealt with this subject at some length, so I shall touch on it only briefly. Inflation to a very large extent depends on the relationship between the aggregate of prices of desired goods available for distribution and the total effective demand of the people. In other words, if the total price of desired goods available for distribution was $2,000 and the total effective demand of the people was $2,000, the two would balance and there would be stabilization. If, on the other hand, the effective demand was increased to $2,500 and there was no increase in production, unquestionably you would have inflation; the price of goods would rise to absorb that surplus money. But if when demand increased from $2,000 to $2,500 production were stepped up to the same amount you would again have stabilization. Carl Snyder, chief statistician of the federal reserve banks of America, has pointed out, by a series of charts showing the relationship between volume of credit and volume of production over a long period of time, that so long as the volume of credit parallels the volume of production there is no variation in the price level. In other words, by dividing your volume of credit by the volume of production you find the price level at that time. In support of that statement I might quote briefly from a great world economist, Paul Einzig, in World Finance Since 1914, published in 1935, at page 17:

> The more advanced definitions of inflation duly allow for any change in the volume of real wealth. Thus if the volume of currency and credit increases, and the production of real wealth increases in the same proportion, then there is no reason why the expansion of currency and credit should produce an inflationary effect, even if it affects the spending power of the community. It is only if the increase of currency and credit is in excess of the additional production of real wealth that it is defined as being of inflationary character.

On the other hand, if the effective demand of the people falls below production, you would have deflation. By the old classical school of thought it was contended that prices would then fall until equilibrium was established. But to-day owing to combines and powerful groups in industry and the fact that a large proportion of the price of goods consists of overhead charges that are to a large degree fixed, instead of prices falling production becomes restricted in consequence of the inadequate buying power.

In support of that statement I should like to quote very briefly from the survey made by the Hoover committee, to which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has already referred. This is taken from the report of the director, Doctor Harold Loeb, in his book The Chart of Plenty, at page 70:

> In our modern industrial society we have arrested the practice of dropping prices. Instead when wages, profits and other payments fall short of acquiring the total of goods and services we restrict production. . . . With debt charges (which compose a large proportion of overhead expenses) fixed, and with prices free, a radical drop in prices bankrupts the producer. So to-day restricting production has become a necessity—which is another way of saying that the impoverishment of our people is compelled by our financial conventions!

Then, continuing on page 71:

> The total national monetary income in 1929 did not equal the total price asked for the goods which could have been produced by the plant then existing. But instead of dropping prices until monetary income was able to command full production (which is the classical answer to this situation), prices were maintained and production was restricted. Consequently, national monetary income did not in 1929, nor does it to-day, command the full production of our industrial plant. Which is another way of saying that the national income was not what it should have been. In fact, since 1929, the national monetary income has been commanding an ever decreasing volume of consumer goods, and the actual national income has become but a fraction of the possible national income.

As I have already said, this state of affairs has come about owing to the fact that industry does not create its own effective demand. The other day the Minister of Finance pointed out that economists, in attacking social credit, invariably attack the premise upon which social credit rests. He contended, and I quite agree, that if the premise upon which social credit rests is unsound, then the social credit proposals will naturally collapse. But, Mr. Speaker, I intend to deal briefly with the Douglas analysis, which I am absolutely satisfied is sound and cannot be refuted. It is true that attacks have been made by Professor Copland of Melbourne university and Professor Robbins of London university, and more recently by the Australian commission appointed to investigate the monetary and banking system of Australia. But if we take Major Douglas's reply to the attacks of Professor Copland and Professor Robbins, in his book The New and Old Economics, I think we will find that he has been able quite easily to place his finger upon the flaw in their argument. That book also answers very adequately the charges of the Australian royal commission.

Before dealing with that argument I should like to refer briefly to one argument we often hear. During the last election the president of the Liberal association just south of my constituency challenged me on this ground. He said, "I quite agree that there is a deficiency in purchasing power, but the error you make is in not realizing that industry is not the only source of income. For instance, there are professional salaries, the money paid to employees of banks, and the interest on bonds. These are paid outside of industry, and therefore they will make up that deficiency." Professional men obtain their income by charging their patrons. Those patrons obtain their incomes through salaries and wages. Then the interest paid on bonds is obtained by the government through taxation, which is imposed upon all people, the wage earner and the salaried man, and upon industry, which means that industry has to pay that income. Then in the case of the bank employees, we find that the banks pay their salaries out of the profiits obtained from the charges on loans made to industry. So in all those cases we find that the incomes are derived from industry.

Very briefly I should like to deal with Major Douglas's argument regarding the deficiency of purchasing power. In view of the fact that the Minister of Finance devoted a great deal of time to this subject I am going to spend a little time in discussing this question. We find that Major Douglas claims that the deficiency is due mainly to five causes: profits, savings, reinvestment, depreciation charges and deflation. Let us take the question of profits. If we find that in any one year let us say $10,000 is paid out in costs, then the total price of those goods cannot be less than $10,000. We will say that industry adds 25 per cent profit to that. Then the price of those goods cannot be less than $12,500, but we have paid out only $10,000 in costs. Ten thousand dollars cannot pay $12,500 in price; therefore there is bound to be a deficiency in purchasing power equal to $2,500.

The orthodox economists suggest that we can overcome that difficulty by borrowing the money from the bank and paying it to the producer for his profits in advance. Then that money can be spent to liquidate the charges represented by profits. But, Mr. Speaker, while that argument may be sound, if that is done, it is essential that as soon as the producers get that money, they spend it on the goods that are produced; otherwise there will be goods to that extent left unsold. Just here I should like to quote from the book put out by the Pollock Foundation entitled Profits, which shows that the profits of industry to the extent of approximately fifty per cent are not distributed. Therefore you have a deficiency in purchasing power equal to fifty per cent of the profits, because those profits are largely reinvested, and a little later on I shall show that its reinvestment of savings causes a deficiency.

The difficulty caused by the practice of not distributing profits is becoming greatly aggravated owing to the centralization and mechanization of industry. If we go back before the machine age we find that practically all goods were produced by handicraft, and that the price of an article was the material cost plus the direct labour cost. A man's labour costs were indistinguishable from his profits, and the whole of that profit was available as purchasing power. But to-day, owing as I have said to the centralization and mechanization of industry, we find that the profits of industry are so large that the beneficiaries, even though they explore every form of luxury, are not able to expend the total amount of their income. Therefore a part of this income is saved. So long as these profits are saved it stands to reason that the goods against which those profits are charged cannot be sold.

The Australian commission pointed out that so long as savings of the past are being spent at the same rate as the savings of to-day, there is no deficiency. Nevertheless, over a long period of time, if we draw a graph to represent savings we will find that the practice of saving is going on at a far greater rate than savings of the past are now being spent. Therefore there is bound to be a deficiency of purchasing power owing to the practice of saving. The commission points out that if savings are invested, then the savings are paid out in salaries and wages, and therefore will be available as purchasing power. But I want to point out that the reinvestment of savings causes a deficiency of purchasing power equal to the amount applied to reinvestments. In order to make it as simple as possible let us take two examples. We will say $10,000 is saved from the wages paid out by industry. Therefore there will be $10,000 worth of goods left unsold. Then we will say that these savings are invested in the production of new goods; that they are paid out in salaries and wages, and $10,000 worth of goods are produced. The goods saved in the first cycle we will call A goods; the goods produced in the second cycle we will call B goods. We will invest those wages again, produce another $10,000 worth of goods and call them C goods. We will now take the $10,000 paid out as wages in this cycle, and purchase the goods left unsold in the first cycle, namely the A goods. The goods are bought; the retailer is able to repay the wholesaler, the wholesaler the manufacturer and the manufacturer the banks, and the wages are cancelled. But we want to remember that we have left behind $10,000 of B goods and $10,000 of C goods, and we have no money in existence to balance those goods.

It is true that we have two investments there; but those investments are balanced by goods, and there is no purchasing power in existence to buy those goods so that the investments can be liquidated.

We will take another example of investing money in the building of a factory. We will suppose that we have $10,000 in savings. We leave the $10,000 of goods represented by the savings unsold, and use the savings in building a new factory. Salaries and wages are paid out to contractors and workmen, and of course as the workmen are not interested in purchasing the factory they are in a position to buy the goods left unsold. But when that factory starts to produce goods it will have to include in the price of those goods a certain charge, in order to collect back the cost of the factory. You have no money in existence to balance these charges; therefore you will have a deficiency of money to the extent of the charges. The question of depreciation charges may be brought in the same category, and therefore I shall not take the time to deal with them.

On the question of deflation the Australian commission points out that when loans are drawn in by banks they are reloaned immediately, and there is no deficiency caused. But of course in a time of depression, such as we experienced between 1929 and 1934, we find that over $900,000,000 was withdrawn from circulation, and undoubtedly that caused a serious deficiency of purchasing power. But I would especially refer to old debts, such as war debts, and would say that the only way the government can liquidate these old debts is by taxing money out of current production. If money that has been paid out in current production, instead of being left available to pay for the goods it has helped produce, is taxed by the government, and then paid on old debts to the banking system, undoubtedly you will have a deficiency of purchasing power to that extent, because when the money is paid to the bank it is cancelled.

I believe these statements will show quite clearly that there is a chronic deficiency in purchasing power to-day, and therefore it becomes essential to issue additional money, outside the industrial system, in order to make up that deficiency. Briefly to summarize, may I say this: Inflation depends upon the relationship between the aggregate of prices of desired goods that are available for distribution, and the effective demand of the people. Second, industry fails to create its own effective demand and, third, additional money may be issued, outside the industrial system, in order to make up that deficiency, without any real danger of inflation.

I do not wish to be dogmatic as to how that money should be paid out. Time and again we have stressed that it might be paid out by reducing the age for old age pensions from seventy years to sixty years, by making pensions available to all who are blind, whether or not they are forty years of age, and by making pensions available to all those people who are physically incapable of earning a living or taking care of themselves. Then, to ensure that balance is maintained as between effective demand of the people and the total price of goods available for distribution, a price discount may be given on goods. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Jaques) will discuss that matter fully at a later time, and I shall not dwell upon it.

The other day the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) challenged the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) on the question of potential productive capacity. He asked: How are you going to ascertain to what the production of a country can be increased? He seemed to take the stand, as taken by some other hon. members, that it would be impossible at all accurately to compute to what the production of a country could be increased, or to what point the consumption of a country might develop. With that in mind I should like to quote briefly from a survey that has been made. This is an actual survey, from which certain results have been found. I must point out therefore that it is not a question of whether or not it can be done, because it has actually been done. I refer to The Chart of Plenty, by Doctor Harold Loeb and associates, who deal in their book with the work carried out in connection with a national survey of potential productive capacity. The survey was set up by the civil works administration in February, 1934, before the findings of Brookings Institution's survey were available, to discover, among other things:

(1) The ratio of actual production to capacity production.

(2) The man-power required for (a) existing production, (b) capacity production.

(3) The degree of interdependence among industries to ascertain possible bottlenecks in the flow of materials from the natural resources to the ultimate consumer.

(4) What purchasing power would be necessary to command capacity operation of the existing plant, at any given price level.

The national survey of potential productive capacity was also empowered to—

(5) Translate capacity production into consumer goods and services, and

(6) Translate the consumption of these goods and services into terms of life (a) for society, and (b) for the individual.

After they had conducted their survey they found this:

By such working back and forth we finally arrived at a close approximation of the quantity of goods and services (the budget) which the people of the United States might expect if production were directed towards the satisfaction of their needs and reasonable desires, and if production were limited only by physical factors and the "product capacity" of the existing plant.

But also, surprising as it may seem, the budget lists with fair accuracy the goods and services which the American people would consume if their desires were satisfied! In other words, the budget is not only an estimate of possible production but also of possible consumption—excluding the assumption of a radical alteration in habits, such as would result if the practice of aeroplane joy-riding became general or if television sets came into popular use.

Then, I should like to read finally what the survey revealed:

The results are briefly stated. If the existing plant and man power in the United States were fully employed in the production of honest goods and services for the consumer, the total output, valued in 1929 dollars would be not less than 135 billions, or an average per family of approximately $4,400. This estimate does not presuppose any considerable change in the physical plant, the introduction of new processes, or the modernizing of old factories.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, the report shows clearly there would be no material difficulty in arriving at the potential productive capacity of the country.

The Minister of Finance advocated that we make certain definite recommendations, and I would therefore recommend that we hire other men, similar to Harold Loeb, for the purpose of conducting a survey in Canada similar to the national survey of potential productive capacity in the United States. Having done so we would be in a position to know what the productive capacity of the country would be, and could plan to make available sufficient purchasing power to build up the demands of the people equal to the possible production of the country.

I realize that there is always the danger of inflation, and not only that but the danger that certain industries are going to try to exploit the public. Therefore certain steps would have to be taken regarding price control. But that is effectively controlled by the just price factor concerning which the hon. member for Wetaskiwin will speak.

I should like to deal briefly with a subject touched upon by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), namely bank reserves. I am not speaking necessarily from the point of view of a follower of social credit, because I do not believe Major Douglas has ever stated that such a step would be necessary. I do feel that certain steps would have to be taken to bring about a more definite control over our banking system. For instance the hon, member for Rosthern advocated that we should increase the cash reserves of the banks up to 20 per cent of their deposit liabilities. Personally I should like to see the cash reserves increased to 100 per cent of their chequing deposits. Of course, that would not mean to 100 per cent of the savings deposits as there would have to be a distinct line drawn between chequing accounts and savings accounts. The money deposited in the savings accounts would be deposited for a definite period of time. That money would become the property of the bank during that period and it would be necessary to maintain only a 50 per cent coverage against the savings accounts.

It would not be possible for the banks to recall a sufficient quantity of loans to give them that coverage, and therefore I would advocate that the government buy up a sufficient quantity of the national debt in the form of government securities held by the chartered banks in order to give them that cash reserve. The result would be a great reduction in the national debt and in taxation, because the Minister of Finance has stated, if I remember rightly, that 43 per cent of taxation goes to pay the interest on the debt. It would mean also that we would have 100 per cent control of the banks and there would be absolutely no danger of a run on the banks. The figures on the stubs of your cheque book would be balanced by actual cash in the bank.

We have heard that the central bank has complete control over the volume of currency and credit, but I would suggest that the control which the central bank has at the present time is similar to the control you would have over a high powered car that had a worn-out steering gear. You would give the wheel a slight turn to the right and the car would take a violent swing in that direction; that is, the chartered banks would be able to multiply your action more than ten times and the result would be you would land in the ditch of inflation. Or you might turn to the left and land in the ditch of deflation. You would go down the road ricocheting from side to side without any adequate control.

It might be argued that this action would cut down the profits of the banks too severely, but personally I would not be worried if the banks were not able to pay a twelve per cent dividend as they have been paying during these times of depression. I would not be worried if it were not possible for the banks to build what might be called palaces on the street corners of our towns and villages. I would not be concerned if it were not possible for them to increase their reserves to the extent they have in the past. We would have a definite control over them; the national debt would be reduced and the banks would be on an absolutely sound basis. If the banks cannot operate on that basis, then the best thing to do would be to nationalize them.

In closing I should like to say that I am supporting the amendment because I feel that this government has not fulfilled the promises it made during the election with regard to monetary reform. It has not taken adequate steps to develop the resources of the country at a sufficient rate or to a sufficient degree to meet the present physical demands of the people.

Mr. R. J. DEACHMAN (Huron North): After listening to the social credit explanations I am not very much surprised that Mr. Aberhart suggested the need for calling in experts. At Cooking Lake last year he said:

> The people need not bother how these aims (the aims of social credit) might be accomplished—leave that to the experts chosen to do it. Don't let details bother you, ask for results. For goodness sake don't get an inferiority complex. You cannot get anything if you don't think you can get it. How? That is something you don't need to bother about. You go ahead with your farm work.

But the thing that puzzled me this afternoon as I listened to these speeches was why it was necessary to go abroad for assistance when we have such experts in this house. My hon. friend has suggested that dividends can be paid; that there is a surplus from which production can be distributed, but I am rather curious and I should like to get the advice of these experts. I think it is more than probable that during the last two or three years consumption has actually exceeded production in Alberta. When we calculate consumption in that sense we must take into account depreciation in the value of equipment and machinery which has not been maintained during the depression. The whole province has allowed its equipment to run down and deteriorate. Perhaps we have an explanation for Mr. Aberhart not coming through with his dividends. Dividends would have to be paid out of surplus, and it may be that after examination by his experts it was found that there was no surplus to be distributed. If he had been compelled to attempt the task, the only thing he could have given was a dividend in reverse; that is, the people residing in that province would have had to contribute to the state instead of the state contributing something to them.

The essence of the story presented by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), amounts to this:

> We are producing goods but people cannot buy them. Why cannot people buy the goods produced and how can we manage so that the people will be enabled to buy?

The contention of my hon. friend is the basic contention of the party to which he belongs. I do not accept that statement in the form in which it is presented; yet I think as it stands it deserves careful analysis. There is something wrong with our method of distribution when we find ourselves in the difficulties that confront us to-day, but I cannot follow their argument. I hold in my hand a book. Let us assume that it cost me $2 when I bought it from the store. I gave the storekeeper $2 and that $2 means purchasing power as far as he is concerned. He pays the wholesaler for the book; the wholesaler pays the publisher and the publisher distributes what he receives in the form of costs. Right back to the end of the line these costs are distributed.

Mr. PELLETIER: Would you say that if you bought the book at cost there would be a profit?

Mr. DEACHMAN: The profit would go back into purchasing power. Suppose the man from whom I purchased the book makes fifty cents on it. He can turn around and buy something from me in exchange if I have something to sell. The cost is, beyond question, distributed. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) used boots as an example the other night. Take whichever example you choose; in no way has there been a loss of purchasing power. When you buy a product, you pay for it and when you pay for it, you pay something which is purchasing power. Let me put it to my hon. friend in this way. Go back to the old days of barter. Instead of paying for that book with a two dollar bill, I pay for it with two bushels of wheat. The two bushels of wheat would buy something else, would it not? I cannot understand how there can be any possibility of misunderstanding in a simple transaction like this. You cannot find out, at least I have never been able to find a social crediter who could explain where the missing item was or where it had gone to. Is it up their sleeves? To find it is like looking in a dark room for a black cat that is not there. There is no possibility of its being there.

There is another aspect that deserves serious consideration. I refer to the picture presented this afternoon by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). The hon. member asserted that there was to-day a maldistribution of purchasing power in the Dominion of Canada and in practically every country of the world. I should like to give some facts which have been brought out by the Brookings Institution, which has been quoted quite often in the house. The findings of this institution are a direct challenge to the economic thought of the age. It is true the essential points are not new; they have been stated and restated in a hundred different forms; but Doctor Moulton has presented them in direct relationship to the needs of to-day. The figures given deal with the United States, but I shall give the Canadian figures later on. He said:

> Families getting less than $1,250, in the average, saved nothing in 1929.

That is in the United States. I think that is a rational conclusion.

Out of $15,000,000,000 of individual savings $13,000,000,000 were made by ten per cent of the population in the higher income classes. As a greater proportion of families moved into these classes over a period of years, a greater proportion of money income was saved. Only part of this went to build new plant.

In the past when I heard that statement I would have answered: Well, what is the matter? I would have said that this saving goes into the banks, and the banks lend the money. I would have said it goes for the purchase of bonds, the bonds of manufacturing establishments, or railways, or whatever it might be, and that again would go back into producing more purchasing power and giving employment to people. But we have to consider these things in the light of conditions as they are to-day. When business is active and accumulated funds seek productive investment, that would be true. In the conditions which existed in 1929, that would be true. But for some reason to-day, under different conditions, that does not follow, and I am now going to give the house figures which show how much has drifted into the form of bonds held by the banks of Canada, and how much is not being used of the available credit which might be used in the Dominion of Canada.

What do we find? Current loans and discounts of banks in Canada stood at $1,343,000,000 for the year 1929. Business was using the available credit at that time. The level was $731,000,000 on December 31, 1937, a decline of $600,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that the loans?

Mr. DEACHMAN: It is current loans and discounts of all the chartered banks in the dominion.

Mr. BENNETT: It does not include demand loans?

Mr. DEACHMAN: No, nor call loans. On the other hand, federal, provincial and municipal bonds, representing bank loans to governments and provinces, because a bond is after all a note, and investments in other securities, amounted to approximately $500,000,000 in 1929, and stood on December 31, 1937, at $1,500,000,000. What is the significance of these facts? We are not using our available credit for production. Savings are going into bonds and securities. Money is seeking a safe harbour. It is seeking a safe harbour because of fear, because of the situation which exists in the world to-day; and of course, being faithful to the cause I represent, I must contend that it is in part due to mistakes of government, perhaps even in part of this government.

I have here the report of income tax collections for 1936. It shows that 199,102 people paid income tax. In 1931 the total number of people gainfully employed was 3,927,230. Assuming that the number gainfully employed was the same in 1936 as in 1931—and the difference would not be large—we have 3,728,128 who came below the income tax levels. Of those who paid income tax 175,492 were in the bracket of $5,000 or less, and contributed a total of $4,204,731. The remaining 23,610 paid more than $28,000,000. When you pay your income tax, and your income is ten or twenty or fifty thousand dollars, I venture to suggest that in the great majority of cases it goes back not into consumer goods but into investments, into bonds or savings. While it might in normal times, or would in normal times, be employed in the production of capital goods it does not now go back into the production of capital goods because money is invested in capital goods for the production of consumer goods, and if there is no demand for consumer goods then money will not flow in capital production.

In Canada our population is more largely rural than in the United States. There is practically no saving so far as the farmers are concerned, so that we would have a larger number of people with small incomes on which they were incapable of saving in the normal course of events, and the savings which have been accumulated have been accumulated largely among the more favoured class.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course, the one thousand dollar income people are not included.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Yes, I recognize that. We have now this situation. There is unquestionably at the present time (1) maldistribution of income; (2) wealth, savings, credit power concentrated in the hands of relatively few; (3) a decline in the use of credit for industry. The capital goods market is at a low level.

In essence, therefore, we have a situation which is almost unique in Canadian history. The market for capital goods is not sufficient to absorb our excess production. There was a net capital export from the Dominion of Canada during the past year: that is, we bought back some of our production from abroad because there was not a good market for capital investment in this country.

In the past our periods of prosperity have been followed by a succession of depressions and booms. The idea occurs to me that while each successive boom actually rose to a higher level than the preceding boom and brought about a higher standard of living and more comfort to many people, we may now be reaching the point where there may be a recession in these peaks and I sometimes raise the question in my own mind whether we may not for some time to come fail to reach a peak as high as we have reached during the past boom. There are certain things which indicate this. Intensive nationalism such as has developed throughout the world calls for lower standards of living. I do not think there is anyone here so stern an advocate of protection and of the doctrine of exclusion that he would deny the assertion that when each little nation is cribbed, cabined and confined within its own narrow boundaries, the standard of living is not going to be as high as it would be in normal times. Second, we have rigid control of industry. We have fixed prices. There is so much of the economic area which is fixed that those who are outside the field of privilege, that is the farmer, the basic producers generally and the common labourer, are on a very low level, and they must have a difficult position during any period in which business is not above its normal level. Third, a highly mechanized industry produces at a low cost when it is running at 100 per cent level of activity; but when mechanized industry begins to produce in a period of depression, when the steel industry in the United States, for example, is down at a level of approximately 26, that is high cost production, and it means high costs in selling and high cost for its consumers. When these high costs are reached it is extremely difficult for the men in the lower income brackets to be able to buy back the goods which are produced, because they have no real purchasing power.

I say this further—and here is where I shall get into difficulty with the hon. member for Rosthern who, I am sorry, is not with me. I am not sure that we can solve all these problems by the new method of playing with the counters. We are now to have managed currency. Managed currency has to be managed by men. Men are capable of making mistakes, just as well as the old form of currency was capable of wrong use. But there is this that can be said of the gold standard, that at least it kept its word so long as men did not make it impossible for it to keep its word. The problem we have to-day is not so much to play with the money we have as to get goods exchanged and to develop markets, and this is a problem which we are not facing when we turn our sole attention to the problem of money.

Now what is to be done? The capital goods market has been more or less destroyed. There is maldistribution. Consumptive demand is insufficient. In the United States they have developed a certain solution or attempted solution of this particular problem. It is the great and glorious pastime of "soaking the rich." They have also tried the other method of expanding the demand for credit and money by means of government expenditures. Well, I suppose I have the right to differ from some of my friends in this corner of the house. The hon. member for Rosthern suggests that highways can be built and other large government enterprises undertaken. But I suggest that that involves the production of something which must have an exchange value equal to its cost of production; otherwise it is not profitable to the community as a whole to have it produced. For if the people of Canada have to be taxed to build a road to a park in northern Saskatchewan—and I am not singling that out for distinction as not being a good place to build a road; the same reasoning would apply if they had to pay taxes to build a road into Huron county—if they are to pay taxes for the building of a road, it must be because the Canadian people feel that that road has an exchange value equivalent to its cost of production; in other words, that the Canadian people as a whole or the people of some community in Canada will be able to exchange the product which they produce for the benefit of having that road where it is.

Mr. MARTIN: Would the hon. member permit me? Is he not considering purely the economic aspect of the problem and overlooking what is equally or more important, the sociological aspect?

Mr. DEACHMAN: Quite. But a nation which is in the midst of a period of hard times, when it is difficult for us to provide food, clothing and shelter, and when, as I noted from the record to-day, schools in Ontario are sending out money to support schools in Saskatchewan, can very well, in my opinion, turn its attention to the production of things which are needed more than are roads in any district at the present time, unless those roads have a value in service to the community and are worth producing for that reason. I am in no doubt so far as that is concerned. We may put up beautiful buildings and fine monuments, and they have a value; but when the government expends money upon the construction of a public building it is an entirely different matter from spending it upon a business enterprise. If we build a new post office in Ottawa, does it increase the payroll? Will there be more stamps sold? Will more money orders be bought? We may operate more efficiently in a new and better equipped post office, but it will do very little to add to the production of wealth in Canada.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. DEACHMAN: When the house took recess at six o'clock I had pointed out that in the United States they had tried a number of different means to restore prosperity, but despite these attempts the United States to-day seems to hold the lead in the drift into another depression. Some time ago the Natural Resources Committee in the United States made a report on the development of industry in that country. A summary of their finding appeared in the Index published by the New York Trust Company in November last. The investigation covered manufacturing, mining, steam railways and telephonic communication. I give you only one illustration, that of manufacturing. Taking 100 as representing the volume of output in 1920, production in 1934 stood at 94. The man hours required in 1920 for that year's production being shown by the index number of 100, the man hours required for the production of the reduced volume of 1934 were 52. This gives us a figure of approximately 56 for the man hours required to produce 100 units of goods in 1934 in comparison with 100 man hours for production of the same volume of goods in 1920.

I want to make that point clear. It took approximately fifty-six per cent of the number of man hours to produce the volume of goods in 1934 which was produced by 100 man hours or units of work in 1920. Measure what that means in volume of unemployment, if nothing else occurs to alter that movement. I admit at once that there are variations in the kinds of production between 1920 and 1934; also there are variations in the means of distribution. I admit that other factors may operate to relieve the volume of unemployment resulting from that decrease in man power required. But I want to ask the house just one question: If that number of men can be discharged from industry with the volume of production remaining practically the same, what becomes of the problem of employment in Canada and the United States unless some other adjustment is made?

Now what adjustment is necessary? Why is machinery installed? Machinery is put in because it will reduce the labour cost of the product. No manufacturer instals new machinery unless he believes that by doing so the number of men required to operate his factory can be reduced. I do not suggest for a moment that if the free play of natural forces were allowed to operate, that would mean, over the long period, a reduction of employment. But if there is something which enables the manufacturer, after dismissing these men, to continue to sell his goods at the same price, then there is unemployment, and the next step is to throw the burden of that unemployment upon the state. The only remedy as far as I can see is that the price be permitted to fall in order that there may be enlarged purchasing power, and the increase in demand for goods, although it may not apply to this particular factory, expands into other divisions of production, because the desires of man are limitless; as long as he has purchasing power he will go on buying. That is the only way as far as I know by which that balance can be effected. But if on the other hand we are going to hold prices up; if we are going to have, as we have in Canada now, rules and restrictions of every possible kind tending against reductions in prices; if we are going to pile up tariffs; if we have obstructions which restrict imports like sections 36 and 43 in the Customs Act, then the inevitable follows. It makes no difference what speeches we make about these questions; it matters not what we do at election time; the thing that matters is what we do when we assemble here trying to govern this Dominion of Canada.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) who spoke this afternoon, is in entire accord with me, I think, in the analysis I have given so far. We have moved along somewhat parallel lines. But he proposes an entirely different remedy. His idea, as expressed this afternoon, is that the government should take over the control of production and that we should move towards the socialist state. I fail to see how any man can hold that opinion in view of our knowledge of government efforts to-day in Canada and other countries. We have problems enough on our hands, with the hydro-electric development in Ontario, the Canadian National Railways, the operation of government owned utilities in different provinces. It seems to me that if the solution is to be found along that line our progress must be very slow. We have to develop step by step the ability to walk, the ability indeed to stand upright and to move at all, before we go on to face the problem of the administration of the entire industrial life of the dominion. Think of the complexity of the problem of trying to organize production and distribution of all the multi-complex lines of production and distribution and services in Canada if we remove free initiative and say that all has to be planned by government.

Last year I read the record in the Saturday Evening Post of some United States engineers who were working in Russia. Their great difficulty was that they had to compile so many records and so much time was consumed in making reports to this division and that, and in the voluminous correspondence, that they had no time to go on with their work. By the time they had the reports finished and plans prepared and approved, the whole thing was so completely mixed that it was surprising that they ever reached the stage of production.

The only remedy I can see is to face the situation by a return to freedom, by removing the barriers and permitting the free play of natural forces. What is there to control production except price? When the price falls too low we cease to produce; when it goes up we return to production. There may be waste in that process; mistakes may be made, as they made mistakes in the United States a short time age when they tried to control production and ran into a period of scarcity. But after all, over a period of years, the only possible way by which you can reach a reasonable level of production and price is by the free play of natural forces.

In discussing this question the other day the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) came to what I think is a reasonably wise conclusion. I have noticed some criticism of the efforts of the government in the past few years, and sometimes I am free with that criticism myself. But I am wondering what the results would be if my hon. friends in the other corner were in power.

Miss MACPHAIL: It could not be worse.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I wonder if it is not worse in Alberta. At least we have kept clear of some things in regard to which they are somewhat involved out there. If my social credit friends had absolute power in Canada I wonder if they would do any better or show any greater capacity for the direction of affairs than they have shown in Alberta. I wonder, too, how my Cooperative Commonwealth Federation friends would get along if they were directing affairs. One of my hon. friends remarks that things could not be worse. Well, in that connection there would be as much diversity of opinion as there sometimes is in this party, with perhaps no better sense of direction! My hon. friend the Minister of Finance made this remark:

> Fundamentally our need is an actual increase in material wealth, not a different yardstick with which to measure it.

I agree with that, but it is not the only fundamental need. It requires the redistribution of the wealth now being created so that the relationship between savings and consumption shall be altered in accordance with the needs of to-day. Change the direction of savings and of investment; and again I say the only means by which that can be done is by free competition, by lowering the prices of goods and increasing consumption, thereby establishing demand. We may hold prices, but when we do volume drops. After all, the total measure of goods and services which we secure for our work is the result of two variables, price and volume, and if you hold the price at a high level the volume of consumption will be decreased. Therefore in terms of actual goods you will be poorer than you were before. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance also caught the vision of that need, and I hope he means to apply it. In his concluding paragraph he said:

> Such an increase in material wealth can be best secured by facilitating the production of the many commodities which Canada is best adapted to produce, and by exchanging these products on as large a scale as possible for products which Canada cannot advantageously produce, receiving in return for our exports as much rather than as little as possible.

That is a delightful phrase. I might almost have written it myself, but the strange thing is that my hon. friends who hold out this admirable advice do not always follow it.

I referred to section 36 of the Customs Act. I want to read a word or two of that. This is a section of an act which is framed for the purpose of making goods cost more. It serves no other purpose. It reads:

> The value for duty of new or unused goods shall in no case be less than the actual cost of production of similar goods at date of shipment direct to Canada plus a reasonable advance for selling cost and profit—

In other words, when we bring in goods from the United States we have a section of an act here which says that these goods shall be valued at a price which covers the cost of production and a reasonable selling cost, plus a profit to the United States manufacturers. We are not to buy from United States sources unless we see that the United States manufacturer makes a profit. That is the essence of the story. Farmers in my constituency bought cattle last fall for six cents a pound. After feeding them all winter they will probably sell those cattle this spring for five and a quarter cents a pound, and there is not a word from either side of the house. Can you tell me what is the remedy? I do not know, but you ought not to insult these farmers by telling them that in the Customs Act there is a section which says that if they want to buy blue denim to make a pair of overalls they must be very careful to see that the United States manufacturer from whom they buy those goods is paid a price which allows him a reasonable profit. I wonder what would happen if one of my hon. friends, on either side of the house, were to employ a purchasing agent and send him out to buy goods. Would he give that agent a lecture first and say, "Buy where you like, but be sure that the man from whom you buy gets a profit." Yet that section remains part of the legislation of our country; it is in force, and was put into effect last year for what reason? It was done to prevent prices of cotton goods in Canada from being reduced, when they had fallen in the United States by virtue of the reduction in the price of raw cotton both in that country and in this.

That is what happened. That is the situation. We have legislation to keep up selling prices, to make us pay more for material we buy, and the same sort of things runs all through the Customs Act. I have on my desk a letter which I received from the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley); I am sorry he is not in the house. All it means is this, that a manufacturer in my own constituency bought some leather in the city of Chicago. A man was sent post-haste from Ottawa to Wingham in order to investigate that purchase—to see if the man paid too much for it? No; to see that he paid enough for it; to see that the price was sufficiently high, made so by government regulation, so that he would be compelled to charge a higher price for the gloves which he produced from that leather. When you face that situation; when you look at what we have done in regard to sugar, it makes you wonder. Under section 43 of the Customs Act we revalued sugar coming from Cuba at a price which took millions of dollars out of the pockets of the Canadian people.

We see the provisions contained in sections 43 and 36 of this act; we see this tariff piled as high as it is to-day, after we have been in office for some time, and I say this is evidence that you are not recognizing the fundamental problem which faces us in this dominion to-day. Whether it is applied by the hon. gentlemen on this side of the house, I mean those separated from me spiritually but not physically; whether it is applied by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house, associated with me spiritually but separated physically, and differing sometimes quite widely in regard to the questions I am now discussing, or whether it is applied by hon. members in the far corner; no matter how it is done, for what cause or on what excuse, I say the sure, certain, inevitable result of that policy is to lay the foundations, not for the expansion of employment in Canada, but for the still further restriction of the employment which we now have.

I appeal to you to-night to place this upon a reasonable basis. I am not making these statements merely to oppose somebody on this side or that.

In the debate of the last few days we have been trying to find out the causes of these conditions, to seek a solution—as I asked that it should be sought the other day, when I said that debate should be nothing but a search for the truth. There is no desire on my part to challenge the attitude of any party, no matter upon what side they may be, so long as they make an effort towards the solution of this problem. Do we mean to say that 245 members of the House of Commons, who are trained in political life, trained in economics and with a vast experience, are going to close their eyes and say that the problem is impossible of solution—impossible of solution, because it is impossible for us to blaze a new trail; impossible of solution because we cannot do something which has not been done before; impossible of solution for one reason, and only one, namely, that we fail to realize that we must live in conformity with certain economic laws, sternly set, built in the very fabric of our lives? Believe me, you cannot escape obeying them without paying the price—and that price is unemployment, higher taxes, disruption of government and, far, far above that, the payment in terms of broken lives. For that is what we do when we break the economic laws by which we are governed, and which we ought to obey, if we are to find a solution and make life happier for the people of Canada.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, since criticism has been directed against social credit, and since the founder of social credit is not here to speak for himself,

I would like to read a few quotations from the works of Major Douglas. He puts the root causes of our economic troubles as follows:

(1) Wages, salaries and dividends will not purchase total production. This difficulty is cumulative.

(2) The only sources of the purchasing power necessary to make up the difference are loan and export credits.

(3) All industrial nations are competing for export credits. The end of that is war.

(4) The major distribution of purchasing power to individuals is through the media of wages and salaries. The preponderating factor in production is improving process of the utilization of solar energy.

(5) This latter tends to displace wages and salaries, and the consequent distribution of the product to individuals. The credit factor in purchasing power thus increases in importance and dominates production.

(6) This production is consequently of a character demanded by those in control of credit and is capital production.

(7) The fundamental derivation of credit is from the community of individuals, and because individuals are ceasing to benefit by its use it is breaking down.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat has said that the remedy is to lower prices, so as to cheapen production. I would like to read Major Douglas's answer to that. He is speaking of that very policy which was put into force by the British government a year or two after the end of the great war, at which time there was a cry of "produce more and consume less." They thought that by so doing they could save enough money to pay for the war. Douglas says this:

Consider now the policy actually being pursued at this moment by the government——and the financial powers to deal with the problem. They can be summarized in one sentence—the reduction of costs, and more especially the labour costs. But labour costs are wages and form by far the most important item in the total purchasing power inside the country available for the distribution of goods. Even supposing that retail prices were reduced in exact ratio to wage reductions, which is highly improbable or even impossible, how is the distribution of goods to people in this country, which is the true object of British industry, thereby advantaged? As the prices fall by this method, so the amount of money to purchase also falls, and we are as badly off as before, with the added complication of the discontent evoked by the reduction of wages.

That is the British government.

As previous speakers from this corner of the house have intimated, the social credit remedy is the creation of credit, and its distribution direct to the consumer, to make up for the chronic shortage of purchasing power. The answer to that, of course, by the orthodox, is inflation. I would like to read Douglas' remarks on inflation, because social crediters, and particularly Douglas, are spoken of as inflationists. This is what Douglas has to say on inflation:

There is almost nothing to be said for a policy of deflation, as defined by the average banker, except that it provides a breathing space in which to consider what to do; the real argument against it is not that it reduces prices, but that it only does so at the expense of the producer, but a policy of inflation, that is to say a policy of increasing issues of money or credit, in such a manner that it can only reach the general public through the medium of costs, and must therefore be reflected in prices, has one thing and one thing only to be said for it at this time; that it is absolutely and mathematically certain to reduce any financial and economic system to ruins. It is in fact a capital levy of the meanest and most one-sided description since it taxes the purchasing power of those who obtained it by work, for the benefit of those who obtain it by financial manipulation.

When we are warned about the terrible consequences of inflation, the German example is always pointed out to us. But our opponents always omit to say that the German inflation was deliberate, and was caused so as to destroy Germany's internal debt and, as they thought, to give her a better chance of paying her external debt. That was done deliberately. However, I do not know of any instance in British history, or the history of any other country, where inflation has brought about any real ruin. On the other hand, since the end of the war deflation has cost in the loss of real wealth infinitely more than the great war itself. I had a letter from Senator Thomas, who is the senator from Oklahoma and, I believe, chairman of the agriculture and forestry committee of the senate of the United States, in which he said that since 1929 it was calculated that deflation in the United States had cost that country a loss of real wealth, that is, wealth which might have been produced but which was not, to the extent of $250,000,000,000.

We learned more about finance during the four years of the great war than I suppose we would have learned in four hundred years of peace. How was it possible to finance the cost of the great war amounting to tens of thousands of millions of dollars without inflation? The answer is that during war time finance was put to its proper use and financiers were put in their proper places. In peace times those who are in control of the financial policies, namely private individuals and private corporations answerable to none but themselves, deliberately and designedly bring about conditions of inflation and deflation. In war times the financier is put in his proper place. He dare not bring about such a condition for if it were known he would be put against the wall and shot. When we consider the misery that has been forced on the people of Canada during the last seven or eight years, then I say that those who caused it should be brought before the bar of this house and made to answer to this parliament for their crimes. When we do that, then we can say that this is a sovereign parliament.

It is a curious thing, but history is absolutely dumb on the questions of money and finance. I believe I had a reasonably fair education. I have spent a lifetime on the farm, but I have been always a heavy reader. I have read a lot of history, but I was fifty years of age before I knew anything about money. I do not mean knowledge of the manipulation or the accumulation of money; I mean knowledge of the nature of money. Until then I knew little more than I did when I went to school. A man could take the highest honours in any university and still know nothing of the fundamental part that money has played during the course of our history. We read of great famines and hard times down through the ages and in most cases governments and nature have been blamed. We realize now that it was nothing but financial manipulation. That was one of the great causes of bad times. As the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) said the other day, Edward III attempted to overcome this by debasing the currency. At that time the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) replied that Edward III was merely trying to get rich quick for his own benefit. I would remind the hon. member for New Westminster that Edward III lived before the conquest of England by Scotland.

Mr. REID: If you said that Scotland conquered England you would be correct.

Mr. JAQUES: It was when William Patterson, a native of Dumfries, founded the Bank of England in 1694.

Mr. REID: Douglas never conquered Scotland.

Mr. JAQUES: No; he reconquered England. Before I conclude I should like to remark that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) told us the other night that this government, or one might say, that he himself as Minister of Finance controlled the financial policy of Canada. One might as well say that a sultan's steward controls the sultan's harem, obviously the control is very remote. The house has heard Douglas's opinion of inflation, and I think it can be said that he is no more looking for inflation than is anybody else. He suggests a simple way of preventing it. Inflation is not, as so many seem to think, an increase in the amount of money. It seems to me that many people do not know the difference between inflation and expansion. Inflation means an increase of money accompanied by an increase in prices.

The orthodox speak about the inexorable laws of economics; but there are no such laws, there are merely rules. You might as well talk about the laws of whist or bridge. These are merely rules made by men that can be altered by men any time they care to do so. If I drop this book it falls to the ground according to one of the inexorable laws of nature. There is no altering that law, but I do not think it is right to say that the rules of economics are laws. I have only to mention the gold standard. A few years ago it was regarded as an inexorable law and we all know what has happened to that. I believe the orthodox view of inflation is based upon orthodox principles or rules of political economy. I would like to quote from Ricardo's Principles of Political Economy as follows:

> The natural price of labour is that price which is necessary to enable the labourers, one with another, to subsist and to perpetuate their race without either increase or diminution. It is, in practice, more likely to fall below, than to rise above, the subsistence level, but, after their privations have decreased their numbers, the market price of labour will rise to the natural price.

That is a "law" of economics. It is fairly obvious that our opponents regard any state of prosperity that is above or even a little below the subsistence level as inflation, and the only remedy they see, like the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) is to lower wages and purchasing power until the sufferings and privations of the labourers would cause a scarcity of labour and eventually a rise in its price. We do not see it in that way. We do not believe that is a law: we think it is a rule.

Douglas has provided a very simple way to avoid inflation. He suggests that retail prices be lowered to the extent necessary to equate production and consumption, and that then the retailer be compensated by the treasury for the amount which he would thus be out of pocket. That would prevent inflation because it starts out with a reduction in prices. In other words, Douglas proposes that the people be enabled to buy their retail goods at the real cost of production instead of at their financial cost. We say, and we prove—I have not the time to do so tonight—that the price of goods produced is, or ought to be, the cost of goods consumed; in other words, that consumption is the cost of production.

The just price, or the price discount, whichever you like to call it, is not a fixed price. It does not attempt to set a price. It allows prices to find their natural level through the free play of competition, but it does say that whatever the retailers find it necessary to charge for their goods in order to pay for their production and provide the retailer with a living, that level shall be reduced until the total prices in the country equal the total amount of purchasing power in the consumers' pockets. That credit would be created by the state—not by taxes, of course. I do not know why some people imagine and will insist that the only source of money which a government has is what it can borrow or what it can raise by taxation, and if we have done nothing else since we have been here, we have at all events persuaded the Minister of Finance to admit that banks can and do create money. And if banks can do it, I would like to be told why the state itself cannot do it. But apparently the inexorable law of economics in some miraculous way prevents it. The banks can do it, but the state cannot.

The easiest way to understand the subject is perhaps from a short illustration. Here I would like to read a statement that was handed to me by the Douglas Social Credit Bureau of Canada, headed Production and Consumption. They wish me to make this statement for them:

> In dealing with estimates or with actual figures of production and consumption, it is well to bear in mind that, for the most part, the statistics obtainable to-day are only approximately correct. They are sufficiently accurate, however, to permit definite conclusions to be reached.
> The dominion bureau of statistics gives actual production in Canada for the year 1935 as 2,554 million dollars and consumption as 2,036 million dollars, or eighty per cent of actual production. There is, however, a vast difference between actual production and potential production, for whereas consumption may be eighty per cent of actual production, it might be a mere fifteen or twenty per cent of the potential production attainable if our enormous plant operated at full capacity.
> The Rotary International social credit research committee—

The Rotary International set up a committee to inquire into social credit, and it brought in this report:

> The Rotary International social credit research committee in its report gave the following estimate:
>
> "The present potential output of industry is at least four times its actual output."

[Mr. Jaques.]

Thus we have a picture of consumption being eighty per cent of actual production and, in turn, actual production being twenty-five per cent of estimated potential production.

Further, the Dominion Bureau of Statistics gives actual production for the boom year of 1928 as 4,122 million dollars and consumption for the depression year of 1933 as 1,777 million dollars, or forty-three per cent of the "proved capacity to produce" attained in 1928, which in turn was less than the potential capacity to produce.

No physical deterioration had occurred between 1928 and 1933 and the capacity of Canadians to consume had not altered but a financial collapse had restricted purchasing power. This illustrates the vast difference between demand and effective demand. The desire for goods and services, which is demand, counts for little without the necessary purchasing power to make it effective demand.

Considerable effort has been made in some quarters to link rising prices or inflation with social credit, in effect confusing one of the injurious processes of the present financial system with its remedy. The Douglas price discount formula is a scientifically devised mechanism designed to act as a governor that will automatically prevent either inflation or deflation, maintaining a balance between supply on the one hand and effective demand on the other.

> The Douglas Social Credit Bureau of Canada, Inc.,
> Ralph L. Duclos,
> President.

Suppose we take the figures which are quoted here, that according to the bureau of statistics consumption this year equalled eighty per cent of actual production. I have said that retail prices would be reduced to the point where consumption and production would equate, and this would mean that we could reduce the prices of retail goods by twenty or twenty-five per cent. That is to say that an article retailing at a dollar could be sold to the public for seventy-five cents, and the retailer would then be compensated by the treasury for the amount he was out of pocket. In that way, whatever the people cared to produce they would be enabled to consume, and industry would become for the first time self-liquidating, so that it would be possible to continue without incurring debt—which is certainly impossible to-day. I might go into the details of how that is to be administered, but I do not think it is necessary. There is the principle; it is designed to prevent inflation by stopping it before it starts, because it acts by means of reducing prices, and you cannot have inflation unless prices increase.

Social credit is a great deal more than a system of economics; it is a philosophy of government and a philosophy of life. Douglas says:

> What are we trying to get? What are we aiming at? We are endeavouring to bring to birth a New Civilization. We are doing something which really extends far beyond the confines of a change in the financial system. We are hoping, by various means, chiefly financial, to enable the community definitely to step out of one type of civilization into another type of civilization, and the first and basic requirement of that, as we see it, is absolute economic security.

Now, as to the social credit idea of government, we believe that it is the privilege of the people to demand what they want, to demand results, and it is the duty of their representatives to obtain those results for the people who elected them, not by turning themselves into amateur experts but by engaging the experts needed to do the technical work. I have heard that idea laughed at, but how else do we do a thing when we have to accomplish something really big? I was not a member of this house when war was declared; but I am certain that hon. members did not then rise in this chamber and express their ideas of inflation and deflation and advise how this, that, and the other thing should be done. They were not concerned with exactly how these things were to be done; what they said was, "They must be done," and they ordered those who were responsible to get them done, because they knew that if those objects were not achieved they would be answerable for their failure to the people. If that be true in time of war, why is it not true in time of peace? In war time anything physically possible becomes financially possible, but in peace time only what is financially desirable is permitted to become physically possible. As soon as we say that you could cure unemployment; that you could reduce the age for old age pensions to sixty or even fifty years and could pension the blind, the lame and the halt if you really wanted to do so, what do we hear? What have I heard repeatedly in this chamber? "Yes, of course it ought to be done, but where is the money coming from? We cannot afford it." I should like to see any hon. member, if war were declared next week, rise in the house and say, "We cannot go to war, Mr. Speaker, for where is the money to come from?"

Mr. MARTIN: How do you know that will not be done?

Mr. JAQUES: It never was done and never will be done. A few years ago the people of Great Britain were faced with the consequences of unemployment and other social problems which occasioned great suffering; but no matter what was proposed by way of remedy, whether the dole, or widows' pensions, or mothers' allowances, or any other social service, always the objection was raised, "Where is the money to come from?" When, however, it became evident to the real rulers of the nation that their own property and lives were in danger from enemy action, did anyone say, "How are we going to finance ten thousand million dollars to increase our defences?" I am not arguing against the expenditure of money upon defence. If you want to, you can spend up to the limit of your physical capacity to produce. What I do say, though, is that if money can be found for war it can be found for peace. If this house is a sovereign parliament, as it is said to be, the money can be found. Unfortunately the experts, who, of course, are the only people qualified to carry out policies, formulate the policies themselves. As Douglas says:

> The experts should be on tap, not on top.

But that is where they are, all over the world. The financial expert is not so much on tap as he is on top. As Mr. McKenna says, bankers control the policies of governments and hold the destiny of the people in the hollow of their hands. The proof of this is that Canada, along with all other countries, was able to finance a great war. Before the outbreak of that war it was said that such a thing was impossible because there was not enough money to finance it. But the war did not stop for lack of money. Nobody ever said, "You cannot put these men into the firing line; you cannot pay them a dollar a day; we have not the money." The money was found; if there was any idea worth while it was carried out without reference to the money cost. And all this was done without any degree of inflation worth mentioning. There was prosperity in spite of the fact that the cream of the nation was either in the firing line or in the munition factories producing, not goods and services which the people needed, but shot and shell. Yet I repeat that in spite of these vast numbers engaged in munition factories or serving in the trenches, the mass of the people lived better during the war than they have ever lived, before or since. And the reason, the only reason, is that finance was put to its proper use and the financier put in his proper place. We have heard it said that the war impoverished the world, but it did nothing of the kind, apart from the appalling loss of life. In any material sense the world was infinitely richer after the war than before. The productive capacity of all countries was enormously increased. But having won the war we had to lose the peace. The financier lost it. What else could he do? It is an inexorable law that financial control by the financiers is absolutely certain to bring about the position we are in to-day of poverty and unemployment. It cannot do anything else; it is not meant to do anything else.

We believe that the people, and only the people, have the right to decide on policy. But the carrying out of that policy is the business of experts. Let me illustrate. Suppose a community wanted to build a bridge. They lived by a river and the only means they had of crossing was a ferry. As the population increased they found the ferry inconvenient so they began to consider the possibility of building a bridge.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to have to tell the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. JAQUES: Might I finish this illustration.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. JAQUES: A meeting would be called to discuss the question of building a bridge. Now that question of whether the bridge should be built is entirely for the public to decide. Having decided that, they would call an engineer to give an estimate of its cost. The engineer would say, "Well gentlemen, what kind of bridge do you want? Do you need a foot-bridge or a bridge for motor cars or one to carry street cars and a railway?" That question having been settled, the engineer would examine the site, prepare plans and present them to the people, probably with an estimate of the cost. They would decide whether they were willing to spend that sum and, if so, would instruct the engineer to go ahead and build the bridge. The actual design of the bridge they would leave to the engineer, as an expert; he would be responsible for the design of the structure. That is what we mean when we say the people settle the policy and the experts carry it out. That is the policy of the Alberta government at the present time. Those men were elected to obtain results. I know many of the members of the Alberta legislature myself, some of them intimately. They are not here to speak for themselves, so I want to say something in their defence. I can speak for myself and you can judge me as you please; I do not care what you think of me. But, knowing these men, I say that no people were ever represented by a finer, more honest and hard working lot of representatives than the present members of the legislature of Alberta.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): May I remind the house of the exact wording of the proposed amendment:

That all the words in the motion after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

This house is of the opinion that for the effective removal of poverty from Canada this government has neglected and is now neglecting to use the resources of the dominion as adequately as the people of this country have a right to demand.

[Mr. Jaques.]

I read that because I am going to deal first with what the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) has said and then follow that by attempting to show that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) in his rebuttal did not attempt to refute the argument of the hon. member for Lethbridge. In fact one is tempted to think that the speech of the Minister of Finance was not prepared in any terms whatsoever as a rebuttal of the argument put forth in that debate. The Minister of Finance dealt a good deal with what the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) said a year ago and then launched into something of an attack upon the Douglas social credit philosophy.

The hon. member for Lethbridge dealt first with the question, What is money? He showed the difference between currency and credit, and used a term which, I think, was unique for this house at least, advocating "king-created" money. Of this the Minister of Finance made no particular mention. The hon. member for Lethbridge then dealt with the sources of money, and contended that money is in the last analysis created. I should like to amplify that a little. When one talks of money there seems to be some little misunderstanding regarding its source. In fact while the hon. member for Lethbridge was speaking along this line and attempting to show that there was only one source from which money should come, an hon. member on the other side said, "Why, you can earn it." This did not get into Hansard, but the remark was heard by myself.

I should like to point out that there is a difference between the source from which money comes and the avenue through which it comes. Some months ago I was having a bit of an argument with a gentleman, and I asked him where money came from anyway. He said, "Why, if I have a farm out here and grow a crop of wheat, the money comes from my wheat." I said, "Well, sir, you do not mean to tell me that money actually grows on your land?" "Yes, yes; of course it does. That is it." For the life of me I could not seem to drill into that gentleman's mind that there was a difference between his receiving money by means of the sale of a crop of wheat, and the source from which money originally came.

I believe a year or two ago the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) raised the same question, and I know he is well informed upon this subject. At that time he suggested that all money comes through production. I think I am right in that reference, though I am trusting to my memory. It was either a year ago or two years ago. Of course the Minister of Labour was right in what he said; but I should like to point out to hon. members that if he had said that money comes from production he would have been wrong, and I think he is aware of that fact. In other words, that is a difference between money coming through the process of production and money originating with production. The hon. member for Lethbridge attempted to point this out. Money does not grow on trees. We do not dig it from the ground, and at its source we do not earn it. It is created by the banking system, and it gets out into circulation only by way of a primary loan. Whether or not all the hon. members are aware of this I do not know; but the result is that when loans are paid money is taken out of circulation, and I think it goes without saying that all the money which is in existence has a debt attached to it by reason of the fact that the only way it came into existence was through a primary or initial loan.

This argument the Minister of Finance neither confirmed nor denied. In the next place the hon. member for Lethbridge dealt with what gave money value. He said that in the first place it was confidence; that in the next place Canada was behind it as a nation, and that what gave value to money were the goods and services, the producing and consuming power of the nation. I think the minister would agree with that, although he did not touch it in his speech. The hon. member for Lethbridge then went on logically to discuss how much money Canada could have, and he showed that it all depends upon the use Canada can make of the money, that is upon the number of exchanges the people of Canada can be enabled to make. In this connection I am going to do some quoting, from Planned Money by Sir Basil Blackett, at pages 103 and 106. I hope my hon. friends opposite will not be too much discouraged when we give these quotations, though it is beginning to appear that citations from eminent authorities are a little bit annoying to them. This is the quotation:

> The purchasing power of the medium of circulation depends solely on the relation between the quantity in which it is available and the work which it is at any given moment called upon to perform.

A few pages later this quotation occurs:

> It is customary in most countries to place strict limits on the amount of notes which the central bank may issue. Such restrictions are usually bound up with laws and regulations regarding the amounts or proportions of the total issue which must be covered or backed by gold or particular kinds of securities, internal and external. There is no need for any such restrictions in the local currency system now under discussion—at any rate, in one which has no foreign contacts. The right amount of currency in circulation at any given moment is that amount which will do the work required of it at a given level of prices. If it is too much, prices will rise. If it is too little they will fall.

The next question my hon. friend asked was whether king-created money was sound. The Minister of Finance rather agreed with this, not in his speech but in some comments that he made at the time. Then my hon. friend went on to point out that the present financial set-up is such that for every dollar of gold which the Canadian banking system can create, eighty dollars of money—that is, four Bank of Canada bills and $76 in bank credit—can be issued. Here I should like to give a quotation from The Canadian Banking System, by Professor James Holladay, doctor of philosophy and professor of economics at the university of Alabama. This appears at page 140:

> The Bank Act of 1934, however, sets up a specific quantitative reserve which the chartered banks are required to hold against their deposit liabilities. In form, this reserve must consist of a deposit in and notes of the Bank of Canada. In amount, it must be equal to five per cent of the deposit liabilities in Canada. As a result, the chartered banks as a group can legally create deposits amounting to $20 on the basis of a one dollar reserve. A much larger secondary expansion is made possible, however, for the Bank of Canada is required to hold only a twenty-five per cent reserve against its liabilities, which in turn constitute the reserves of the chartered banks. Consequently, the Bank of Canada can expand a dollar into four dollars of liabilities which, if borrowed by the chartered banks, will enable them to lend an aggregate of $80 against a primary deposit of one dollar. This compares with a possible legal expansion of $28.50 under the federal reserve system in vogue in the United States.

Then the hon. member for Lethbridge went on to show the tremendous extent to which money can be created in Canada out of virtually nothing. We contend that what the system can do for the profit of the banking system, surely the government ought to be able to do for the profit of the people.

I shall not deal at length with the matter of inflation, because the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) dealt with it this afternoon, and the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Jaques) again this evening. I wish to point out, however, that over and over again the hon. member for Lethbridge urged hon. members not to think of his suggestions as a conflagration, but suggested that we look at the matter as we would a fire in a kitchen stove which need not necessarily spread so as to cause great destruction. He used the illustration of the rain storm, and asked why it should be necessary to think of a great destructive thunder storm, bringing its floods and its destruction of life and property, rather than think of the shower of rain.

However, in spite of that the Minister of Finance entirely ignored the approach of the hon. member for Lethbridge, and immediately plunged into a discussion of the terrible conflagration which would have to be met if the proposals of the hon. member were carried out. Further reference was made to the German inflation. It is always the bogey man hon. members like to poke up when they speak in rebuttal on matters of inflation.

At this point may I read an interesting quotation from Paul Einzig. I refer to World Finance Since 1914, published in 1935, and particularly to page 67:

> These were the circumstances in which inflation attained extreme stages in Germany. There was the currency already weakened by inflation during the war. There was the exhausted state of the country; there was the defeat and revolution which reduced the capacity of the executive power to keep monetary developments under control; there was the necessity of replenishing food and raw material supplies by weakening the technical defences of the currency; there was the necessity of making huge reparation payments, with their effect upon the budget and exchange. There was the wholesale flight of capital from Germany; and lastly, there was the political and financial effect of the Ruhr occupation. Is it conceivable, we may well ask, that the effects of such a formidable series of adverse factors should repeat themselves in circumstances totally different from those prevailing in Germany during 1918 to 1923. To the minds of all but the fanatic deflationists, the answer must be emphatically in the negative.

Now, notice this:

> And yet time after time we are told that if France were to devalue the franc to the extent of twenty per cent, or if the British government were to continue its policy of cheap money, or if President Roosevelt were to spend a few milliards on public works—

May I pause there for a moment. Let us make no mistake about this matter of inflation. We are well aware of the fact that a milliard is a thousand million; and Professor Einzig is referring to the possibility of a few milliards being spent by President Roosevelt on public works. The quotation continues:

> —France, Great Britain and the United States would share the fate of post-war Germany.

[Mr. Hansell.]

And let us listen to this:

> The argument could be regarded as childish, if it were not so thoroughly dishonest.

The hon. member for Lethbridge continued by saying that, like the rest of the American continent, Canada can produce plenty for all her people. He showed that production is increasing at the rate of three per cent a year, compounded annually. He showed, further, that this was like a growing boy. He particularly pointed out that we need new money, as a growing boy needs new blood. Personally I thought this analogy a very good one; yet the Minister of Finance did not touch it when he replied. If the banking system creates the money—and it does—the banks get the profits. The nation gets the debt. Our contention is that the nation should create the money, get the profit and remove debt and poverty.

In the little time I have left to speak there are one or two matters with which I should like to deal. The hon. member for Lethbridge did not mention social credit as such. He was dealing with monetary matters, showing that we could use our resources in Canada to give a high standard of living to all our citizens. But when the Minister of Finance replied, in an attempt to explode this, he brought the philosophy of social credit into the picture. He brought in the A plus B theorem. That is something which hon. members in this corner of the house have not stressed in any particular way. But the Minister of Finance brings it in and attempts to show that there is a false premise.

I am wondering whether the Minister of Finance thought his speech had entirely exploded all Major Douglas had ever written or proposed in connection with his social credit doctrine. The hon. member for Lethbridge has claimed that the government has failed, and the Minister of Finance did not repudiate the suggestion.

I should like to say one or two words about the battle the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) promised to carry on. I do not mind worrying our hon. friends opposite by continually reminding them of the battle that was supposed to be fought. I am still at a loss to know when it was fought. I am still at a loss to know who won the battle. I believe the people of the country might very well ask themselves that question. I should like now to read the observations of the Prime Minister in his speech on June 17, 1936. This is his quotation of what he had said on a former occasion:

> The Liberal party believes that credit is a public matter, not of interest to bankers only, but of direct concern to the average citizen.

I want to emphasize the fact that the Prime Minister brought the average citizen into the picture. He continues the quotation:

It stands for the immediate establishment of a properly constituted national central bank, to perform the functions of rediscount, and the control of currency issue, considered in terms of public need.

I would emphasize the expression, "considered in terms of public need." Let me pause for a moment to suggest that just as long as there is one poor man in the country, just so long has the government neglected to see to it that currency is issued in terms of public need. In this country the government has not seen to it that currency is issued in terms of public need. I quote a little further:

A central bank is necessary to determine the supply of currency in relation to the domestic, social and industrial requirements of the Canadian people.

Once again I suggest that so long as there is one poor home in the Dominion of Canada, the supply of currency has not been regulated in relation to the domestic and social requirements of the Canadian people. I shall not quote the Prime Minister any further. We all know, "Once a nation parts with the control of currency and credit," and "Usury once in control will wreck any nation." and so on. That quotation has been worn almost threadbare. I should like to quote from the Prime Minister just once more; in connection with the banking legislation he said:

There is the pledge which was given to the people of Canada over the radio by myself as the leader of the party. I say that every word and every line of that pledge is being literally and absolutely fulfilled in the legislation that is before us.

I leave it to hon. members to judge whether the government has done that since it gained the apparent control of the central bank. Let us refer again to this battle. I imagine that the very moment the governmnet commenced to wage this battle which the Canadian people expected them to wage, we would have had some degree of protest from the financial interests. But we did not hear any protest. It was as though they said, "That is fine; that suits us quite well." Let me quote from the Financial Post of March 26, 1936, just at the time when this banking legislation was being considered. They say:

With the announcement of the government's legislation to "nationalize" the Bank of Canada, all danger of any important change in the existing set-up of this institution evaporates.

Then I quote from the London news bureau dispatch to the Evening Citizen, dated March 23, 1936:

Bankers and financiers in London express no anxiety at Premier Mackenzie King's proposal for state control of Canada's new central bank.

"It should not be assumed," says the financial editor of the Times, expressing the opinion of 'The City,' to-day, "that government ownership either in Canada or New Zealand will bring about any change of real importance. It is probably true that in neither country has the government any intention of making any revolutionary change in banking or monetary policy."

The Times financial editor, however, sees danger if at a future date a political party—obviously the social credit party is meant—should obtain power to "pursue some dangerous monetary experiment."

They refer to the dangers to the city of London.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They knew the battle would start then.

Mr. HANSELL: The battle has commenced in Alberta.

Mr. BENNETT: With a heavy casualty list.

Mr. HANSELL: I can assure you that there are some casualties. You can depend upon it that there will be a protest when we begin the battle against the money powers.

The hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) referred to the province of Alberta. There is one thing we can say; we have attempted something out there and it is only because the financial interests have showed fight that we have been deterred in our progress. He referred also to our Cooperative Commonwealth Federation friends and asked what they would do if they were in power. Perhaps a fight would commence then. While I do not agree with everything that they propose, I am sure it must be a source of satisfaction to know that some of the things they advocated for many years, perhaps not as the cooperative federation but more as the Fabian or socialist philosophy, have since been adopted. We are initiating these things, and it would not be surprising to us to find in a few years that the government in power, even though it be a Liberal government, had adopted them.

I shall not take up any more of the valuable time of the house. I am going to vote for the amendment because I believe that this battle which was supposed to have been carried on, especially in its first reference, is simply an election blind. I want to see the time come when the government that sits in power to-day will actually do something to alleviate the conditions which now exist.

Mr. E. J. POOLE (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have an opportunity once more to join my group in a vote of want of confidence in the government because I think their record is one of failure. I fail to find one redeeming feature or one piece of legislation that they have brought down since they were elected in 1935 which has alleviated the distress of this country in any degree whatsoever. I noticed that when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) spoke the other day he skilfully switched the debate. I suppose he believes in that old tactic of offence being the better method of defence, and he endeavoured to place social credit on trial. But it must be obvious to the people of Canada that social credit has never had a trial. When we wanted to place it on trial in Alberta this government stepped in and did what the bankers could not do openly.

I was also struck with a note in the speech delivered by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) in Edmonton. I fail to understand why the Liberal party should be so anxious to win this by-election as they have all the strength they need in this house to put through anything they desire. The issue in that by-election seems to be one of defence, but I cannot understand who has disagreed with the government on that question.

Mr. HEAPS: He promised them pensions at sixty years.

Mr. POOLE: The Liberal party promises anything to get in and does nothing when it succeeds.

Mr. FINN: How do they stay in?

Mr. POOLE: I want to show you, Mr. Speaker, the contradictions among the Liberals themselves. The Minister of National Defence, speaking at Vancouver in 1935, said: "If the Liberal party is elected to power we will issue $500,000,000 of new currency."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POOLE: Yes, and then speaking in Edmonton he said: "We believe there is a sufficiency of purchasing power, but it is maldistributed." Now which is right? The issue on every platform in that election was not national defence but monetary reform; but the Minister of National Defence skilfully endeavours now to befog the issue by raising the issue of defence, to get away from explaining the failure of this government to carry out the mandate which was given to it by the people. The Minister of National Defence has a seat in this house, and he has the opportunity to answer. I wish he would. I wish he and the others who spoke like him would speak as strenuously here as they did on the platform in 1935. There is a Liberal candidate now, true to form, promising pensions at fifty-eight years of age, but he will have to have a lot more influence with the Liberal party on the benches opposite to bring that about.

I think we were justified, Mr. Speaker, in moving a motion of want of confidence because I do not see how the people of Canada can have any real confidence in a government that has done nothing.

Miss MACPHAIL: They are good lookers.

Mr. POOLE: They are good bluffers. According to the Minister of National Defence, if they got into power they were going to issue new currency, have a public works program, and do away with relief; but lo and behold, three years later they have the nerve to stand on the platform in western Canada and tell the people that they had carried out to the letter the mandate which was given to them in 1935. I will say this for the Liberals sitting on the benches opposite, that they are showing very little spirit, certainly not the spirit of true Liberalism, to allow the people of Canada to be fooled as they are being fooled by this government at the present time. This age demands more than bluff; it demands action, and demands it now—not just before an election. We cannot continue with just promises. In other countries, the liberties of the people have been taken away. There is a cause for all these things, and the cause exists right here in this country, just as definitely as it did in Russia and in Germany. The reason why the liberties of those peoples have gone is because democratic governments failed to carry out their promises.

Unemployment is still rampant in Canada. There are still 900,000 of the youth of this country registered who cannot find a job.

Mr. ROGERS: Many of those are under the age of sixteen. My hon. friend is not giving the figures of the unemployed.

Mr. POOLE: I think the minister will agree that there are many unemployed who are not registered, farm boys, for example. The difference between economic conditions in this country now and prior to the election of this government is due to a speeding up in armaments, which has resulted in increased exports. But the proportion of unemployed, comparing our production and export of to-day with those of other years, is greater now than it was then.

The Minister of Finance, speaking in this debate, endeavoured to take us into the technicalities of economics, but the people are not interested in such technicalities. It is not the job or the duty of a democratic people to go into the intricacies and details of economics. The people of Canada have given this government a mandate; they have told them just what they wanted; they have elected them to power and told them to do the job. Have they done it? That is the question.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The same in Alberta.

Mr. POOLE: I shall deal with Alberta in a moment. Remember, Alberta did not have the power. Had Alberta had the power, it would have done it.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What did you promise the people of Alberta?

Mr. POOLE: We promised to give the people of Alberta economic security, and had the Liberal party kept out; had they played the game; had they cooperated to bring prosperity to Alberta; had they, for example, set aside for a moment a clause in our constitution so that we could issue our own credit, then this would have been done. But whether Alberta won or not, there is no question at all as to the power this government has in this house, and what has it done? The Minister of Finance has told the house: "We have the instruments." In other words he says: There is nothing to stop us—only one thing. When the Minister of Finance told the house that this government had the power to control, I wondered who controlled him and his colleagues. That is the question which arises. I have heard time and again in the house such statements as: We have overproduction. And if you ask them the simple question, Why cannot the people get the goods if we have so many of them, they simply turn around and make some kind of statement which does not amount to anything. If, when they tell us we have not enough, they are asked to put the people to work to produce more, then they tell us that we have not any money. You may argue on the A plus B theorem and switch the debate to something irrelevant, but the best evidence on the A plus B theorem is the 900,000 unemployed in this country.

Mr. ROGERS: May I correct my hon. friend again? There are not 900,000 unemployed in this country. The actual number of employable unemployed receiving non-agricultural aid is not in excess of 150,000. He is including dependents under 16 years of age. They are not, strictly speaking, unemployed.

Mr. POOLE: If they are 16 they still have the right to a job and cannot get it. There are thousands on the farm who have not been registered.

Mr. MARTIN: You should be where they are, at school.

Mr. POOLE: I hope it would be a different school from where my hon. friend got his education. I should go to school? When the government here, responsible to the people of this country, does not know enough to distribute the goods we have the ability to produce.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Who has the goods?

Mr. POOLE: You have the unemployed; is that not potential wealth? Let the hon. member get on his feet and answer the question. He asked me one.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Why does the hon. member not answer it?

Mr. POOLE: The hon. member asked me where the goods were. I tell him, they are where the unemployed are. There is the machine.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I asked the hon. member who has the goods.

Mr. POOLE: It makes no difference who has them. They are available for sale. That is the point, is it not?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Well, will the hon. member's group confiscate them?

Mr. POOLE: Why split hairs? There is no need to confiscate. Give the people purchasing power. Is that not what we of the social credit movement advocate in the house? Give the people effective demand. I should like to ask members of the government, seeing they are of a different school of thought from my own, What is the purpose of the economic system? Is it not to produce in abundance? Is it not to distribute total production? Is it not to make life richer? What is it for if it is not for these purposes? And has not the government failed to bring about this happy condition, this "abundant life", as the president of the United States terms it? What have the government done? They have waited, of course, for some miracle to happen. They are waiting for an expansion of trade, hoping for that happy day when it will be proved that Mars is populated and that we can export to that planet. But it is too long to wait for that. Long before then the people of Canada will have passed into oblivion. We know where our market is.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Why does Aberhart not pay out the money he promised?

Mr. POOLE: The money power is in the Dominion of Canada. Will the government hand over that power to us? All we want is a chance.

Mr. YOUNG: What power is my hon. friend referring to?

Mr. POOLE: The power to issue money, credit.

Mr. YOUNG: Is the hon. member referring to fountain pen money?

Mr. POOLE: Yes, "fountain pen money," that which is loaned by the banks, that which is responsible for the fixed charges and the uncontrollable expenditures in every province. In almost every province of Canada the fixed charges amount to over fifty-one per cent of the total income. That condition was brought about through "pen and ink" money. That is how we became indebted. The banks can issue money. Surely the people of Canada can use the sovereign power which belongs to them to issue it in terms of public need. What was the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) going to use when he mentioned "money" in 1935? What kind of money did he intend to use?

Mr. DONNELLY: Why do hon. gentlemen not start their own bank in Alberta?

Mr. POOLE: We want the right to create money.

Mr. DONNELLY: Let them start their own bank and make their own money.

Mr. POOLE: We may start a citizens' bank, but not a government bank.

Mr. DONNELLY: We will give the hon. member's party a charter.

Mr. POOLE: We may take the hon. member up on that.

Mr. DONNELLY: Well, we will.

An hon. MEMBER: It would be only another bank.

Mr. POOLE: If you give us a charter we want to make our own terms of operation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. POOLE: Not your terms. The platform upon which this group was elected was one of monetary reform. The platform upon which the Liberal party was elected was that of monetary reform; yet now we find the Liberal party in power denying the right to a province to carry on the mandate which they themselves told the people of Canada they believed in. It reminds me of how Liberals in Alberta appeal to the people. They have two catch phrases: One. "Down with Aberhart"; the other one, "Put good, sound business men in government." Turn for a moment to the history of "business" administration in Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. Taking first our own province, lo and behold we find that the government debt alone of Alberta amounts to $168,000,000, which debt was created by these same "sound" business men. We turn to Saskatchewan and find the same condition. It was not Aberhart, but these sound business men, who were responsible for that; and now they expect the people to be so stupid as to believe that this sound business policy of sound business men is all that is needed. They should have learned by this time that there is a big difference between private business and public business. When industry wants to reduce its expenditures because it is selling a smaller volume of goods, it fires its employees and assumes no further responsibility for them. But a government cannot do that. When these people pour out of the back door of industry they come to the front door of government. That is the important difference.

So the western country is insolvent, and, according to the brief submitted by Saskatchewan to the Rowell commission, the indebtedness per acre is greater than the value of the land itself. We find the debts of the municipalities pyramiding year after year. We find the debts of the provinces increasing. Yet when someone in this corner of the house mentions monetary reform, the issue of money in terms of public need, he is held up to ridicule. Well, I believe that the times and the circumstances of the times are with us. The Liberal party may win a few more by-elections; no doubt it may and it will express many platitudes and much sympathy for the people of Canada. But winning by-elections and singing sweet praises of "our industrious people" are not enough. The day is past for that kind of thing. What the people want is action. They do not want platitudes; they demand economic planning. The youth of this country are asking for a chance; they want life and opportunity. If they do not get these in a few years from now they will not ask this parliament any more; they will do as they have done in Germany; they will throw our opponents out where they should go if they do not get on with the job. These are the facts.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POOLE: It is all right to laugh.

An hon. MEMBER: The hon. member ought to know.

Mr. POOLE: It is too serious a matter to laugh about. I shall express my feelings plainly: it is all very well for hon. members who are getting four, six and ten thousand dollars a year to smile and giggle; but two or three hundred yards from this building they will find, in the homes of the poor, young men deteriorating while the Liberal government goes on. It is no laughing matter. Hon. members should be ashamed of themselves. An attitude of levity is not the proper attitude for parliamentarians to take. I hope a certain hon. member will groan to an entirely different purpose before very long; and when the Minister of Finance goes out to Edmonton, as I trust he will, let him tell the people there all that this Liberal government has not done.

The world to-day is a small world; people everywhere are turning their minds to the question of money. They recognize that it is the key position to the solution of many of our social evils. They know, as indeed any boy in kindergarten knows, that if a nation can produce plenty there should not be starvation. I wonder if they taught that in the Liberal school. Even an ass when he is hungry will not pass a pile of hay without taking a nibble; but human beings are deprived of that privilege; if they go into a restaurant and get a meal for which they have not the means of payment they are put in gaol and termed communists or classed with disreputable people. But when war comes, that evens everything up. The thin shoulders of the poor snap back; they are the first to have a uniform; then they get a dollar ten a day and are treated as Canadians, taking their place in Canadian society.

An hon. MEMBER: That is true. It is a true picture.

Mr. POOLE: It is a true picture, and hon. members cannot laugh it out of existence. These are some of the A plus B theorems as I know them. To-day all the people of the British Commonwealth of Nations are turning their attention to this thing called money. They want to know the nature of it. History tells us that in the past most parliamentarians knew nothing of money, and the situation has not changed much since. Listen to men who have passed on, men who made great contributions to their country. For instance Thomas Jefferson said:

> I believe that banking institutions are more dangerous to our liberties than standing armies. Already they have raised up a monied aristocracy that has set the government at defiance. The issuing power should be taken from the banks and restored to the people to whom it properly belongs.

F. G. Bonfils, former owner and editor of the Denver Post, said:

> All gold produced in the world in 428 years would make a block thirty-eight feet square. Nearly two billion people are tied by the leg to this golden fetish.

Mr. S. P. Chase, secretary of the treasury from 1861 to 1864, chief justice of the United States supreme court from 1864 to 1873, said:

> My agency in promoting the passage of the National Bank Act was the greatest financial mistake of my life. It has built up a monopoly which affects every interest in the country. It should be repealed; but before that can be accomplished the people will be arrayed on one side and the banks on the other, in a contest such as we have never seen before in this country.

Now let us review for a moment the latest campaign in the United States when seventy-five per cent of the press was against President Roosevelt because his battle was against money, a battle for the liberties of the people. With whom do we find the press aligning itself? Exactly the same thing happened in this country with social credit in Alberta. People who fight against the money power can expect no mercy and no justice from the press. I am glad to see that some men in the Canadian parliament have seen the difficulty which faces us. For instance, the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) said:

> Canada on the dole is like a young and vigorous man in the poorhouse. The dole is a condemnation, final and complete, of our economic system. If we cannot abolish the dole we should abolish the system.

With that I agree. Men are not made for systems; systems should be made for men to use. That, I contend, is the duty of this government. The time for apathy, for political manoeuvring and bickering in this Canadian parliament should be past. An engineering problem confronts us. It makes no difference where the suggestion comes from, or from what party, we should all be associated together in grappling with this problem. I turn to the ministerial benches; I ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) this question, Have you any solution within the framework of the present monetary system to provide employment for the unemployed in this country?

Mr. HANSELL: He will have to say no.

Mr. POOLE: Without causing inflation? I turn to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) and ask him, Have you any method of dealing with the railway deficits under the present system? I turn to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) and ask him, Can you give the ex-service men of this country an adequate standard of living commensurate with the services they rendered to this country and the productive capacity of the country? And they answer, We have no money. We find that money is the root of the whole thing. Splitting hairs over irrelevant matters will not bring us one step nearer the goal. It has been said by the leader of our group that we are not a political party; that we are an economic group. We believe that the duty of parliament is to call in experts to carry out the mandate given by the people. Parliament should place upon the statute books the necessary legislation to carry out the mandate of the people. It is from the people of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific that we get our power; it is their wishes that we come here to fulfil, not some pet theory of the Minister of Finance.

Many people are taking an interest in monetary reform. Let us turn for a moment to the church; let me quote from a letter from the Very Rev. Paul Stacey, of Coventry, England:

> In the past they have endeavoured to link the need for monetary reform with an understanding of Christian values, and to obtain united Christian support. This policy has caused many misunderstandings, but it is now generally realized that we have been working along the right lines.

Commenting on a statement issued by various churches concerning the need of monetary reform, a United Christian petition campaign is being started, and a petition to parliament prepared, similar to the petition to the king in council, to be used simultaneously in England and the dominions. The object of the parliamentary petition is to enable the dominions to bring pressure to bear upon their parliaments while cooperating in the empire petition to the king, and to enable Christian people in other countries to join in the united action by petitioning their legislative bodies and arousing public opinion. The relation between the monetary reformer and the Christian petition movement is obvious. The petition is an instrument for mobilizing public support which will enable the new economies to be given a fair trial. The statement of the various churches referred to maintains that:

> The notion that our souls may find salvation whilst we are indifferent to the needs of our brethen whose souls are warped through living under evil social conditions, or, on the other hand, through amassing great wealth by methods injurious to their fellow men—a condition contrary to Christian teaching and to common sense.
> Widespread poverty in an age of abundance, and the inability of great nations to find employment for hundreds of thousands of their citizens—except when they are preparing for war—are the major symptoms of the general disorder.
> One of the primary functions of the state is to safeguard and foster the material and spiritual wellbeing of the individual and the home. As long as the state fulfils this function it is entitled to respect and has a rightful claim on our loyal allegiance.
> The church must reject financial dictatorship, because it treats man as a machine, whereas in fact he is a child of God.

Under the leadership of the Pope and the Archbishop of York respectively, a group of leading men in both churches have declared that we must work to suppress the private monopoly of credit. And both are explicit as to the means and objective.

I could read dozens of quotations from prominent church people. When I spoke last in this house I challenged the ministers of the crown for just one hour in their busy lives to put aside their parliamentary duties and go and see how the other half lives. Go down to the soup kitchens; see these men shovelling snow for relief. The press accuses them of cheating and chiselling. It is a crime the way we are making cheats and chisellers of the poor. We make them sign an affidavit that they have not earned $2 outside their relief. A man has to choose between swearing a false affidavit or buying a child a pair of shoes, and like a Christian he swears the false affidavit and buys the shoes. I could go on and on, but I wonder whether anyone will ever rise in this house and make an impression upon the government as to what faces them. I wish hon. members would lose their incomes for a while; I wish they were cast adrift like thousands of Canadians; then they would get a more complete education in six weeks than they have had in the last twenty years.

The Minister of Finance, again speaking in Edmonton, told Alberta that if it voted against the Liberal party it would be a clear indication that it wanted to remain away from the other provinces. Well, just a moment; since when was there such unity among the Liberal governments of Canada? We find a motion introduced in the Manitoba legislature by Mr. Turnbull calling upon this government to bring about monetary reform, and that resolution was adopted. We find some disagreement between Mr. Duplessis and this government; we find some disagreement between Mr. Hepburn and this government, and I have a suspicion that even the members of the party in this house do not all agree.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I should like to say a few words about western Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. POOLE: Oh, I know my hon. friends would like me to finish, but they will hear plenty more along the same line in this house; no matter whether they like it or not, they will hear it anyway. I came here to represent the people of the west, not to represent the opinion of one little party and just be a good fellow. I want to say a few words about western Canada. It is history that we have continually made attempts to convince this government that they have a responsibility with regard to relief payments on the part of the cities and municipalities. So far we have been unable to convince them of the need of centralizing this responsibility. Again, we have asked them time and again to relieve us of this burden of debt which is crushing the western provinces, and time and again in this house the west has been referred to as the pampered child of the east. The truth is that even in depression years the four western provinces annually buy between three and four hundred million dollars worth of goods from the east. The same goods might be purchased for twenty-five to fifty per cent less if tariffs were abolished. In other words, the western provinces have paid to eastern manufacturers tribute amounting to a hundred million dollars a year, even in depression years.

I should like to see a new set-up in Canada. I think the interests of east and west conflict too much. If this government finds that it cannot do anything for the west, then I would respectfully suggest that it leave the west to its own fate. Certainly we will never be any worse off. For instance, the four western provinces might well be given the power to create and regulate their own tariffs, and to operate their own money machine. We would be prepared still to remain part of Canada, still to come under the same administration of justice, still to take the same interest and the same responsibility with regard to defence, and the same responsibility with regard to postal and railway deficits and the national debt. But if you cannot find a solution, do not remain in the way of men who are doing their best. Step out of the field. Leave it to the west to solve its own problems. Give us our own financial autonomy. That is what we ask, and that is what will come unless we have a new deal for western Canada.

So, Mr. Speaker, I close with this one thought in mind. I believe that we are at the crossroads of our national destiny. I would suggest to some of the Quebec members, some of the eastern Liberal members, that they take a tour through the west and find out what our people are thinking and how they are living. Even their courage, great as it is, cannot forever keep their heads above the river of debt. I am pleading now that the young men of this country be given a break. If they all feel as I do they are extremely tired of the slowness with which you move. We are tired of your apathy. We want action. These conditions confront us now; we must have action now, not to-morrow. So I would suggest that when the Liberals next get together in caucus they should show a little pioneering spirit. Do not be dictated to from the top down. Remember, your people sent you here; the youth of this country rely upon you, and platitudes will not solve our problems. They are real, even though the A plus B theorem may be wrong.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the reply of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) the other evening indicated that he had to rely on the advice of his technical advisers with respect to the highly complex monetary questions with which he was dealing. It was painfully apparent that he was reading an essay prepared by his technical officers, and he stayed very closely with the text. The occasional annotations, if I might use that word, are some of the matters to which I should like to direct attention.

At the same time I think it is a very bad practice for this house to follow the procedure of the congress of the United States and extend remarks on to the record in the form of written essays, as they do in the Congressional Record there. I recall securing one of Henry George's books in that way, as an extension of a speech that a member delivered in congress. The essay of the minister, delightful as it was, in my judgment added very little to the matters that were under discussion. But the annotations of the minister were interesting.

It might be well to remember that the central bank act was passed in 1934 by the late administration, and that the passage of that bill was very strongly opposed by the chartered banks. It is true that the Liberal party had intimated that they would pass such an act if they came into office; but having regard to the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that the most important matter which would engage the attention of this parliament was the battle with the money power, and having regard to the lack of any sign of battle with the money power since they came into office, it might be well to ask ourselves if we would ever have had a central bank in this country if the Liberal party had not found the legislation on the statute books when they came into office. The general consensus of opinion is that there never would have been central bank legislation passed by a Liberal government, having regard to the manner in which they have kept their promise to do battle with the money power.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I direct attention to the fact that this act was placed on the statute books by the late administration. The second point to which I direct attention is that when the present government came into office in October, 1935, it found in operation the central bank. The bank had been organized, the directors elected, the governor and deputy governor appointed, and provision made for taking over the offices of the receiver general in the several provinces, except in British Columbia, where a branch of the Bank of Canada was organized in the city of Vancouver. I point that out, because it is important in the light of what has been said on several occasions to-day and on Tuesday last.

The bank was in operation, and this government came into office and found it in operation. In addition to that it has been said that this was a private bank. I should like to deal with that for a moment. When the bill was introduced I went down to the banking and commerce committee and explained to them the reasons why the bill provided for a private bank. At the same time I made it quite clear that, so far as the then government was concerned, it was quite content that the bank should be wholly owned by the people—a state owned bank. But the reasons I gave them were reasons that so impressed my mind at the time as to induce me to change my original conception of the bank.

When we determined to organize a central bank we intended, as I pointed out to the committee, to organize it as a publicly owned institution. But so strong did the pressure of patronage become before the bank had assumed form and before the statute was passed, and so many were the clamorous demands upon the various members of the house and upon the government to find positions for innumerable people, that we reluctantly provided that this should be a privately owned institution. If hon. members will turn up the records or minutes of evidence of that committee they will find that I told the committee there were four considerations which apparently governed men's minds with respect to appointments to positions in the Bank of Canada. One was the place where the man lived; the second was his religion; the third was his race, and the last was his fitness.

That is exactly the position, and I told the committee, as I tell this house to-night, that I did not think we could have successfully organized that bank had we not taken the steps we did to try at least to keep it out of the slough of patronage into which it threatened to fall.

I said in the house, and I repeat, that the government was quite content, once the bank was organized, to make it into a publicly owned institution. I stated that frequently during the campaign of 1935, and I say it to-night. I say again that I think the manner in which this government dealt with the matter was extremely inept. They should have done as was done in New Zealand, namely taken over the private holdings, by expropriation, if necessary. There was no difficulty in doing so. The shares had a par value of $50, and they were selling at a premium. In New Zealand they took over a privately owned institution, or that portion of it which was privately owned, and that was the end of the matter.

The government have not accomplished the public ownership of this bank. They still leave it half public and half private, except that a trifling amount more than half rests with the government, which of course gives them control in voting power, and the selection of directors. But it does not place this bank in the category of a publicly owned institution—and this could have been simply accomplished. But it did more; it raised the capital to $10,100,000 and this bank, as everybody knows, has no use for that extra $5,000,000. That was just $5,000,000 upon which four and a half per cent is being paid to the country. The use to which this is put, may I point out, was first of all for bank premises. That is to be seen in the last report, and now the amount is on the way up to $2,000,000. The other was an item, to which I may have to refer, as indicating a loan for a purchase, shall I say, made by the Bank of Canada, of securities which never should have been acquired.

That is the position with respect to the matter when the late government went out of office and this government succeeded. They kept a promise by increasing the bank's capital to $10,100,000, and they left the margin of $100,000 more than half as an amount sufficient to create a majority of shares in the part held by the government.

But they have not changed the essential character of the bank. If the house is interested and will look at section 13 of the Bank of Canada Act, it will find these words:

13. (1) There shall be an executive committee of the board, consisting of the governor, the deputy governor and one director selected by the board.

Then there is provision for a deputy minister to be a member of the executive committee, but without vote. Now, it will be observed:

(3) The executive committee shall be competent to deal with any matter within the competence of the board but every decision of the committee shall be submitted to the board at its next meeting.

The rate of discount and rediscount is settled by the executive when the board is not in session. Minutes are to be kept, and all actions must be concurred in by the governor or deputy governor before any resolution arrived at by the executive can be validly effective.

Bear in mind that that section has not been amended; it has not been varied. It is the section which governs and controls the operation of the bank; and that section confers upon the governor, the deputy governor, and that member of the board of directors selected by the directors, designated as the executive committee, powers completely to control the organization in the absence of action being taken by the board, which of course means but seldom, and results in the whole conduct of business being carried on by the executive committee.

Then there came in connection with this bank a further matter to which I think the observations of the minister necessitate my directing attention, and that is this: We provided for a twenty-five per cent gold coverage, and we also provided by the statute that the bank might, in addition, hold certain other forms of security. That is, it might hold securities of gold countries, exchange with the United States and the United Kingdom, balances at the Bank of England, balances in the Bank of International Settlements, and such other investments and securities as may be designated and regarded as the equivalent of gold.

That, of course, had the effect of broadening the provisions of the Dominion Notes Act. It will be recalled that the Dominion Notes Act, under which dominion notes were issued, provided for a coverage of gold to the extent of twenty-five per cent up to $120,000,000. It had originally been less than $50,000,000; then it was increased to $50,000,000, and then to $120,000,000. After that it was to be dollar for dollar. But in the Bank of Canada Act we altered that and provided that metallic coverage should be twenty-five per cent, without limit. The gold to be held by the bank was not only twenty-five per cent of its note issue but also twenty-five per cent reserve of its deposits. Those are the provisions, roughly, of the statute in that regard.

From time to time some of our friends wonder what value metallic coverage has, and why we should talk in terms of gold coverage at all. Some people assume that this country went off the gold standard in 1931 or 1932. As a matter of fact the Dominion of Canada was off the gold standard when the late Mr. Robb shipped $40,000,000 in gold to New York to meet obligations there. I did not intend to speak to-night believing that the Minister of Finance might return before I had time to say what I have said, but I remember distinctly the circumstances under which that $40,000,000 in gold was shipped out of this country to meet maturing obligations in New York. It was wrong to have done this and the effect of it was to throw us off the gold standard, having regard to the then provisions of our statute dealing with the issue of dominion notes.

I can recall—I can say this now—telling our hon. friends in caucus in 1930 that this country was in a rather difficult position and that we should not make any reference in the house to the facts to which I have alluded. Shortly after that the present Minister of Finance, who became Minister of Finance, having succeeded the late Mr. Robb, was confronted with just exactly what the caucus had been advised would happen. An enterprising man in New York acquired half a million dollars worth of Canadian bank notes. He proceeded to Montreal and converted them into legal tender at the chartered banks, into Dominion of Canada notes. He thereupon went to the receiver general's office, or had his agent proceed there, and demanded gold. To have parted with that amount of gold at that time would have been highly inadvisable and inconvenient and the Minister of Finance made the necessary arrangements to meet the situation.

The basis of a country being on the gold standard is the interchangeability of its currency with gold. Those of us who recall going to the old country for the first time will remember that Bank of England notes were being converted into sovereigns, half sovereigns and silver currency. When a country can no longer interchange its paper for gold, it is no longer upon the gold standard. That interchangeability must be absolutely unlimited or you are off the standard. This country is off the standard to-day, and it must be a matter of amazement to some of our friends when they take a bill out of their pocket and see it stated thereon that the Bank of Canada will pay on demand ten dollars. What does that mean? You walk into the Bank of Canada with a ten dollar bill and you get two fives, five twos or ten ones, all in paper.

I pointed out last year that Australia, realizing this, had passed a statute by which the form of their bills or currency was changed entirely. Their bill states that it is a certificate; that it is legal tender for the payment of obligations, which of course is the proper method to pursue. As it stands now, Bank of Canada notes are legal tender, but Bank of Canada notes are interchangeable only for Bank of Canada notes. When you go to the bank you do not get metal as you would in a gold standard country, whether it be small or great; you get other pieces of paper issued by the same bank aggregating in the pieces the amount of that which you had presented to the bank for payment.

Perhaps this leaves a wrong impression on the minds of some people who secure our currency. The value of the gold standard, to which reference was made by the minister the other evening, divides itself into three. First of all, there is the old, traditional and historic value that attaches to it. It is not my purpose to-night to discuss how that grew up. The bankers in London were the originators of it, and it was because of the great commercial and financial power of England that they were able to impress that view upon all the nations of the world. It will be recalled that Germany did not adopt it until she had received the indemnity from France. That is the traditional and historic side.

Then you have the fact that gold has always occupied a peculiar position in the economy of the world. There is in the library a book dealing with this that makes strange reading. We little realize the extent to which that value attaches to gold as compared with the value attaching to any other metal. That aspect of the matter is important. Then there is the use of gold for the settlement of international balances. If this country in its trading account shows that it has imported more than it has exported, obviously it must settle its obligation with something which will be accepted by the country that we owe as being of value in the terms in which they have made their arrangements or contracts with us.

Of course that is the reason why the world is so disturbed at the moment. There is no longer a gold standard prevailing among all the nations of the world, and the settlement of accounts between nations becomes increasingly difficult because of the inability to secure the gold with which to make settlement. I think that is well known. I shall give an illustration. When Russia needed gold with which to buy machinery for the purpose of entering upon industrial activities, she had to sell anything she could at a cheap price in order to secure the gold. That is why she sold wheat at sixty cents a bushel; that is why she sold various other commodities cheaply enough to secure the gold to enable her to make payment for machinery and her other necessary industrial requirements. But to-day Russia is the second gold producing country in the world and this year she may possibly reach first place. The result is that she no longer has to sell commodities at any price she can get for the purpose of obtaining gold. She has gold in very large quantities and, as I say, may become the first gold producing country in the world.

[Mr. Bennett.]

There is a matter arising out of this bank act of ours. Having dealt for a moment with the gold side of it, I should like to point out that we provide in our original act that a return shall be made by the bank every week. If any hon. gentleman will be good enough to look up section 33 of the Bank of Canada Act he will find these words:

> (1) The bank shall as soon as practicable after the close of business on Wednesday of each week, make up and transmit to the minister in the form of schedule C to this act a statement of its assets and liabilities as at the close of business on that day.
> (2) A copy of every such statement shall be published in the next succeeding issue of the Canada Gazette.
> (3) The bank shall also as soon as practicable after the close of business on Wednesday of each week, make up and transmit to the minister a statement of the amount of its notes in circulation on each business day during the preceding seven day period.

Then there is provision for a monthly statement of assets and liabilities. Then subsection 6 reads:

> The governor in council may from time to time, as he deems necessary, amend the form of schedule C to this act.

That form, schedule C, is the form which was adopted for the purpose of enabling the public to have complete knowledge of what the bank had been doing during the week or month, as the case might be. I hold in my hand a return made by the bank, being a statement of assets and liabilities as of October 23, 1935, that being as close as I could possibly get to the date on which the government assumed office. Bear in mind that that return is in the form provided by the statute. Let us look at the information which it gives. Under "assets" we find:

1. Reserve:
   Gold coin and bullion.
   Silver bullion.
   Reserve in sterling funds.
   Reserve in U.S.A. funds.
   Reserve in funds of other countries on a gold standard.
   Total
2. Subsidiary coin.
3. Bills discounted:
   (a) Commercial bills.
   (b) Agricultural bills, etc.
   (c) Dominion government treasury bills.
   (d) Provincial government treasury bills.
   Total
4. Advances to:
   (a) Dominion government.
   (b) Provincial governments.
   (c) Chartered banks.
   Total
5. Bills bought in open market not including treasury bills.
6. Investments:
   (a) Dominion government short term securities.
   (b) Provincial government short tem securities.
   (c) Other dominion government securities.
   (d) Other provincial government securities.
   (e) United Kingdom, other British dominions or U.S.A. securities of a maturity exceeding three months.
   Total
7. Bank premises.
8. All other assets.
   Total

That detail was included in form C of the act passed in 1934, and it gave the casual reader as well as the banker complete knowledge of the operations of the bank. It indicated what loans had been made to this dominion and what loans had been made to the provinces; for you will remember, Mr. Speaker, that difficulties arose because two or three of the provinces charged that the Bank of Canada had not been giving them the accommodation to which they claimed they were entitled.

With respect to short term loans, it will be recalled that at the last annual meeting the governor of the Bank of Canada indicated to the Canadian people that mostly they were dominion government treasury bills. He indicated also that the $86,000,000 included in the accounts were largely dominion government treasury bills.

The first sale of treasury bills in this country was brought about by the late administration. It was said to us that we were not able to make a market for treasury bills in Canada. We questioned that, and we began to make sales of treasury bills. It was extremely difficult at first, but as days went by treasury bills—it will be realized they are for not more than three months—became more and more negotiated. I recall that the president of Barclays Bank, Mr. Goodenough, when he came over from London, told his bank here to take a substantial holding of treasury bills, and despite the fact that the Canadian bankers told me—I was Minister of Finance at the time—that we would not be able to establish a market for treasury bills, the fact remains that to-day we have $150,000,000 of treasury bills outstanding. That form of security has come about by reason of what was done by the late administration. And all that the present government did was to succeed to that practice. It was a small issue of treasury bills in the first instance, but it has gradually increased until to-day this country is borrowing $150,000,000 on its treasury bills. The governor of the bank a few days ago pointed out at the annual meeting that when you see in the return, as you do, short term securities, it has reference largely to treasury bills, and he gave the average holding of treasury bills by the bank during the year. He indicated also that the major part of the $86,000,000 was treasury bills of this dominion.

But mark you, in form C there was a provision, as it was originally framed, indicating what were provincial short term securities and indicating also the advances made to provincial governments. But, Mr. Speaker, you cannot get that information now. This government altered that form which had been provided under the statute. It had the power under the clause I have read, subsection 6 of section 33, to alter that form, and it did so, and I am presently going to point out why. See what the result was. I hold in my hand now a report of the Bank of Canada for the second day of March, 1938, and let us look at the change in the form:

Assets:

1. Reserve:
   Gold coin and bullion.
   Silver bullion.
   Sterling and U.S.A. dollars.

Sterling and U.S.A. dollars, not separated, but linked together, by reason of an order in council passed by this government. It will be recalled that the reason why form C originally separated these two items was that the bankers of this country said that in the ultimate analysis you are trusting to a governor and his executive committee as to the extent to which they will buy either sterling exchange or United States exchange. And he said: Our deposits are there. That is the reason why this Dominion of Canada gives its guarantee with respect to these deposits.

It is important to the bankers and to the public of this country that it should be known how much the Bank of Canada holds in value of sterling securities, on the one hand, and of United States exchange on the other, so that the banks may know as they read that return how the moneys of the Bank of Canada are being placed for the purpose of conversion into gold if the occasion should arise or the necessity should demand. Let us see what follows. I am quoting from the same report of the Bank of Canada, March 2, 1938:

Other currencies, of countries on a gold standard.
2. Subsidiary coin.
3. Bills discounted.

Now in the original form C, under bills discounted, we had no fewer than four divisions: commercial bills, agricultural bills, dominion government treasury bills, and provincial government treasury bills. All that has been wiped out. That information is no longer available. It is true, though—and I think one should say this—that the Bank of Canada has not rediscounted any bills to any extent during its existence, and I am going to point that out as being an exceedingly interesting fact, a most significant fact to every man in this chamber who is concerned about the question of currency. One of the great purposes for which a central bank comes into being is to afford an opportunity for rediscounting the banks' paper. That is, it contemplates such a move in business, such activity commercially, that money may be required to enable the banks to function with their customers, and to do that successfully they will rediscount their paper. Provision was made also for the kind of paper that might be rediscounted—commercial bills, agricultural bills, dominion government treasury bills and provincial government treasury bills. That wording has been changed under the order in council, and the wording now is merely: "Bills discounted." Then we come to No. 4:

4. Advances to:
(a) Dominion government.
(b) Provincial governments.
(c) Chartered and savings banks.

The word, "savings" has been added. Then you come to what were called open market operations by the Minister of Finance the other evening, namely, the purchase of bills in the open market, not including, of course, treasury bills. The growth of the bill market is one of the most interesting stories connected with the history of banking in England. The story of Lombard street is the story of the purchase and sale of bills.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Let me give an illustration. The great firm of Morgan's have a branch office in London, and they agree, we will say, to finance the operations of the International Harvester. The International Harvester will draw a bill on Morgan's; they will accept it. Then that bill will be sold openly on the bill market from time to time, and it is bought for the chartered banks, and in turn very often finds its resting place before it matures in the Bank of England. The bill market is the great method by which England carries on her commercial and financial operations.

A better illustration perhaps is that of one of our own banks down, say, in Buenos Aires. It makes a draft, with the insurance policy and bill of lading attached, on a cargo that leaves Buenos Aires for London. The draft is drawn upon the bank in London. The bank accepts it. Then the owners of it go out and sell it on the open market, the bill market. We have not developed that in this country, or in America; but in the old land it is the standard method of doing business, and the provision in our form C was to provide for bills bought in the open market. I only wish there were a demand for the purchase of bills here in the open market; that may come in time.

This comes through the matter to which I wish to direct particular attention—6. Investments. Bear in mind that the original form provided for five details being furnished, namely dominion government, provincial government, other dominion government than short term, other provincial than short term, and United Kingdom, other than British dominions or United States of America with maturity exceeding three months. How does it read now? What has been done with it by order in council, by this government that talked about orders in council? No matter. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) smiles. It must make him think of days long since past. By an order in council they have now provided that instead of these details are the following:

(a) Dominion and provincial government short term securities.
(b) Other dominion and provincial government securities.
(c) Other securities.

There is no separation between the dominion and the provinces, no method by which one can ascertain the extent to which the bank holds securities of each of the several provinces or holds securities of the provinces as a whole. What is the reason for this? I fancy that every member of the government knows the reason. Perish the thought that there could be anything of this sort in a Liberal administration, anything where every member did not know everything about the transaction of business! Be that as it may, what are the facts? The facts are that Ontario was refused accommodation—that was known in the public press—and the premier of that province made fairly strong statements about it. But one province which I cannot mention to-night, the minister not being here, managed to get three million dollars from the Bank of Canada. Of course the money had to be paid in three months. It could not be paid, and there was only one way by which the bank could continue to hold it, namely, by converting it into an investment. It was no longer a short term security but an investment security. So about that time form C was changed, and no longer does it appear that there is an advance to a province of three million dollars. I cannot say how it stands at this moment; but there was a time not so long distant when they still held the three millions in the vaults of the Bank of Canada, earmarking it now as an investment, and assuredly it is an "investment." It is one of those long term "investments" with which we who live in western Canada are too familiar.

That is what has happened to our Bank of Canada since the government came into office, through order in council plus the legislation that I referred to, in 1936, by which the capital was raised to $10,100,000. The executive committee remains as it was created in the original statute. Now I put this to the government. Will they or any one of them say that their control over the Bank of Canada has been greater than was the control under the former administration? "Each looks at each and wonders why."

Mr. EULER: No. We are looking at the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is no question about that.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly there is no question. The Minister of National Defence is right. There is no change. If there has been an interference, what is it? It is not upon the records. Is there an order in council we have not seen? "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard." Nothing of that sort? Then I should like any member of the government to point out a single particular in which there has been any more or greater control of the Bank of Canada since October, 1935, than there was between March, 1935, when the bank was established, and October of the same year. It is true that the bank had then been in operation for only a short time; from March to October is not a very long time; but the essential fact is that the bank was controlled by the same men under the same powers except as the return was modified by order in council to remove from the realm of public knowledge the details of the operations to which I have referred. That cannot be gainsaid.

Bear in mind something further that I wish to say with respect to the bank. The bank was brought into being by a former administration, and the officials whom the minister refers to as having been so excellent—with which I agree—were officials who in the first instance were selected by the government, to the extent that they had to do it, but they left the bank afterwards wholly responsible for their staff. Mr. Rhodes was then Minister of Finance, and I recall clearly and distinctly the form of letter that he wrote to various people, that we had nothing to do with respect to the staff; that this matter had to be dealt with by the governor and those associated with him, except to the extent, of course, that the government of the day had to assume responsibility for the appointment of the governor, and for the securing of the deputy governor, who was loaned to us by the Bank of England. Perhaps the Minister of National Defence will be able to enlighten us as to the extent to which, not his monetary policies have been carried out—oh, no, nothing of that sort—but the extent to which there has been a disregard of what was done in the days before October, 1935, what has been done by the new government that had not been done previously.

An hon. MEMBER: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I had not intended to speak to-night. I suppose I shall have to adjourn the debate.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, March 15, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

FARM IMPLEMENTS COMMITTEE

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT PRESENTED APRIL 8, 1937

The house resumed from Friday, March 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) for concurrence in the second report of the special committee appointed to investigate farm implement prices, presented to the house on the 8th of April, 1937.

Mr. GEORGES BOUCHARD (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, as vice-chairman of the committee on farm implement prices I have much pleasure in seconding the motion for concurrence in the report of our committee which was presented on April 8, 1937, as moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston). As everyone knows, the inquiry was first conducted by the standing committee on agriculture and colonization, according to the order which reads as follows:

March 2, 1936: Ordered, that an immediate inquiry be made by the standing committee on agriculture and colonization into the causes underlying the high price of farm implements, with particular reference to the advance in prices for the year 1936.

After twenty-five sessions of this standing committee it was felt that a more compact group of members should proceed with the work, and the following recommendation was made to this house:

Your committee recommend:

1. That the inquiry be continued at the next session of parliament by a special committee of the house.
2. That such special committee be appointed as early as possible after the commencement of the next session of parliament.
3. That during the coming recess of parliament the government take into consideration the necessity of continuing such investigation as may be deemed advisable for such continued inquiry.
4. That the records, exhibits and evidence filed with or taken by your committee be placed in the custody of the Minister of Agriculture, and that such records, exhibits and evidence be made available to such special committee upon its appointment.

Acting upon the recommendations in our report, instead of entrusting the continuation of this work to a standing committee composed of sixty members, the government moved on February 1, 1937, the following resolution:

That a select special committee of the house be appointed to continue and complete an inquiry begun by the standing committee on agriculture and colonization, pursuant to a resolution of the house on March 2, 1936, into the causes underlying the high prices of farm implements, with particular reference to the advance in prices in the year 1936.

I want to thank the government for this decision, and I wish to offer my most hearty felicitations to the Acting Deputy Speaker, who presided over this special committee, first, because he was the first one to bring the question at issue to the attention of the house, and, second, for the able and courteous manner in which he presided over the deliberations of the committee. It was no uncommon achievement for a chairman to have merited an expression of satisfaction from an hon. member with a parliamentary experience as long as that of the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), and one whose competence in part had been gained in presiding over the price spreads committee. That hon. member said, as reported at page 1207 of the report of the farm implements committee:

There has been harmony here, and your presiding has been excellent; there is nothing to complain about at all, and I am not complaining.

I believe it will be agreed by all hon. members who served on the committee that we sat in an atmosphere of peace and yet of activity. The very competent officers—the clerks, accountants and solicitors—contributed to making our sittings most enlightening. We have no complaints with regard to the witnesses. They were fair-minded, and I do not believe they used words to conceal their thoughts. This was a fact-finding committee which made a report on proceedings extending over 1,300 pages, a report which should be of value to the general public, to the expert, to the student, to the economist, to all who can take advantage of it. I admit I do not know many men who could grasp the significance of the report, but I must point out that the investigation should make for a closer approach to harmony among different social activities.

When one first hears about manufacturing costs and retail prices he is inclined to think that the manufacturers are robbing him. But, as one who often injured his little finger with a sickle, I suggest we owe a debt to the manufacturers for the modern implements which help the farmer of to-day. I am not fossilized to the extent that I am unwilling to admit the great help to the farmer brought about by improved machinery. But on the other hand the agricultural implement companies should not forget that in a certain way they live in partnership with the farmers, and that they should trade on a basis of mutual advantage. Although some may say it is a truism or a platitude, I believe one of the first recommendations of the committee, that the prosperity of the farm implement industry is directly dependent on the prosperity of agriculture, is a basic principle.

The third recommendation reads in this way:

That, as a result, the price level of farm implements during the next few years is of the greatest importance to agriculture.

Without any desire to antagonize the agricultural implement companies, beyond the limits of the evidence adduced or the limits imposed by the fair-mindedness of any public man, I believe I should make the following observation. Throughout the years of the depression between 1930 and 1935, agriculture in Canada suffered perhaps more than it did in any other country. Importing countries had raised tariffs against our products. They adopted quotas, and restricted supplies. While experiencing severe competiton in foreign markets, the Canadian farmer had to purchase his production and consumption goods from industries which were afforded the greatest protection in Canada's history. Not only had he to face tariffs, but he had to face a monetary policy which forced the prices of his products to disastrously low levels. When recovery from the depression commenced, industrial organizations, in order to rehabilitate their own position first, began to exploit primary producers.

During the course of the inquiry it was generally agreed that the problem of the farm implement industry did not lie so much in low prices as in the inability to secure a normal volume of output and sales. Since the volume of sales has improved, the machinery companies are in a much better position than they were four or five years ago. At the beginning of the depression the tariff on farm implements was increased to twenty-five per cent. The argument has been advanced that in spite of the increase in tariff, the companies did not increase their prices. It should be pointed out that the years following 1930 were characterized by a general decline in prices so that in fact the prices were relatively raised. With the drop in duty from twenty-five per cent to twelve and a half per cent, under the Canada-United States trade agreement, effective on January 1, 1936, the implement companies still have plenty of opportunities to raise prices to the Canadian farmer without inviting increased importations.

It should be pointed out that while the tariff on implements was reduced to 7½ per cent in May, 1936, the present excise tax of three per cent on imported goods makes the rate 10·72 per cent. It will be argued that the farm implement industry in Canada is a large employer of labour and that by giving more protection to this industry it will be enabled to employ more Canadian labour. In this regard it is interesting to look at the average number of men employed by the industry during the past years. The following figures are taken from a table to be found at page 87 of the evidence:

1920	12,838
1926	10,091
1927	11,011
1929	11,408
1930	7,405
1931	4,471
1932	2,758
1933	3,039
1934	3,706

During the five years 1925 to 1929, the average number of employees in the farm implement industry ranged from 7,559 to 11,408, or an average for the five years of 10,187. After the increase in the tariff in 1930, the average number employed in the period 1930 to 1934 ranged from 7,405 to a low of 2,758. The average number of men employed in 1932 was only 24 per cent of the average number employed in 1929. There are not many industries with such a record of unemployment, especially an industry with a tariff protection of 25 per cent plus a three per cent excise tax. For the period 1930 to 1934 the average number of men employed in the implement industry in Canada was 4,276. These figures show that tariff protection does not stabilize the economic life of the country. Employment and agricultural production did not decline as did the farm implement industry. Agriculture is the greatest stabilizing influence a country could have, and Canada is sacrificing her agriculture on the altar of industrial development. I invite the house to consider recommendation 17, which reads:

> That reduction in the tariff should and does, in the long run, tend to lower the price level to the farmer, depending on the extent of free price competition in the industry.

Coupled with that is recommendation 16, which reads:

> That it is the opinion of the committee that the cost of cream separators to the consumers should be reduced and with that end in view recommends that this item be placed on the free list.

I urge upon the government the necessity of placing cream separators on the free list, as they were before 1930. A cream separator is an essential piece of machinery on most farms. It is not like a binder that may be used only for two or three days in a year and sometimes not at all; this piece of machinery is used twice a day every day during the year.

I direct attention also to recommendation 18, which reads:

> That in the farm implement industry there is competition in the matter of sales but little effective competition in the matter of prices.

The problem of combination and monopoly is a very complicated one. Though there is no evidence to that effect, the lack of competition in prices should make the government cautious in its supervision. I am confident the implement companies will favour recommendation 24, which reads:

> That the companies should encourage the further standardization of replacement parts in the same implements manufactured by different companies and in addition standardization of the implements themselves.

The following recommendation, number 27, will give comfort to the farmer, more particularly to those whose credit has not been impaired by bad times. It reads:

That the cost of credit to the farmer purchasing farm implements on time is excessive and the companies should take immediate steps to reduce these credit charges.

The further standardization of parts should make easier and less costly the sale of replacement parts. This is referred to in recommendation 28, reading as follows:

That the profits to the farm implement companies on the sale of replacement parts is excessive and the price of these to the consumer should be materially reduced.

I am glad to see a notice of motion in the name of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) on the order paper. This will give an opportunity to hon. members to discuss this matter. It reads in part:

That this house recommend to the government that they encourage farmers to organize in provincial units for the cooperative distribution and servicing of farm implements.

I invite the attention of the house to recommendation 32, which reads:

That after due consideration of all the essential factors, the committee is of the opinion that any suggestion of a further increase is not justified at the present time.

Let me refer for a moment to the improvement in the financial situation of the companies in the years 1933, 1936 and 1937. I read in the Montreal Gazette, for instance, of February 8, 1938, under the heading Jump in Earnings of Massey-Harris, the following:

Operating income $3,044,267, against $1,523,344 in preceding year.
Working capital up—Net profit of $1,043,728, first since 1929, compares with $58,414 loss a year ago.

Then in the Financial Post of February 26 I read:

Shareholders of Massey-Harris Company were told at the annual meeting on February 22 that the company was successful in increasing its turnover in every country in which it operated last year.

The manager, Mr. Duncan, in concluding his remarks said:

Under the circumstances, however, the future is somewhat beclouded, but we do believe that in view of the very marked improvement in the economic position of the farmer in the majority of the agricultural countries of the world, and the undoubted progress which your company is making, that subject always to the hazards of crop and weather conditions upon which this business is ever dependent, we are justified in looking forward to 1938 with confidence.

The profits of the Cockshutt Plow Company also showed a wide gain last year.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say, with my colleague from Lake Centre, that the rehabilitation of the agriculturists of this country is a pressing national problem, and I believe the government should explore all the avenues leading to more and more successful agriculture.

(Translation) Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, may I be allowed to express the hope that the farmers of my province, who met the depression with such undaunted courage, may still rely that the government, which never failed them yet, will obtain for them a decrease in the cost of their implements.

Mr. E E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, as stated by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Bouchard), who has just taken his seat, and who was vice-chairman of the committee that inquired into this matter, the inquiry was first suggested by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston) on March 2, 1936, who moved that an inquiry be made to ascertain the causes of the increased prices of agricultural implements in January of that year. The question was referred to the agriculture committee under the chairmanship then of the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir). Counsel and auditors were provided, the committee held many meetings and heard many witnesses, in particular the heads of the different companies manufacturing farm implements.

I should like here to pay my respects not only to the members of the committee, who I think made an honest effort to get at all the facts with respect to that increase in price, but also to the witnesses, and the heads of the implement companies for the way in which they tried to assist the committee by giving us every possible detail with respect to every branch of the industry.

When the house was ready to prorogue that year it was felt by the members of the committee that we could not present a satisfactory report within the time available, and it was therefore recommended that the evidence be tabled and that a special committee be set up at the following session to continue the inquiry. A committee was duly set up and continued the inquiry under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Lake Centre, our Acting Deputy Speaker. Last year the committee decided to proceed along somewhat different lines. The auditors were given authority to go into the head offices of the different implement companies and audit their books, and finally a report was presented to the committee by the auditor and reviewed with him by the committee. Different witnesses were called and questioned on the auditor's report, and we certainly secured further details with respect to the manufacture of implements and many other branches of the trade; but I think we could almost as well have made as satisfactory a report at the end of the committee's work in 1936 as last year or in the report we are considering to-day. As a member of the committee I endeavoured to give the subject the closest possible attention and to hear as much of the evidence as possible, and I drew this conclusion, that the prices of implements in Canada at that time, and to-day, were more or less controlled by the International Harvester Company of America.

The report quotes a mass of figures, draws certain conclusions and makes certain recommendations, to which the hon. member for Kamouraska has referred more particularly than I propose to do to-day.

The hon. member for Lake Centre, in moving adoption of the committees' report, enlarged on the conclusions and recommendations of the committee; and he drew certain conclusions himself, which appear in Hansard of March 11 last, at page 1243. I must say that the procedure was a little out of the ordinary. The chairman generally moves the adoption of the report and makes certain references to the recommendations, but it is not often that he goes as far afield as the hon. member for Lake Centre did in moving adoption of the committee's report. But the hon. member for Lake Centre did draw certain conclusions of his own, and then made this statement, "These conclusions are made by me." I agree with all the conclusions he draws. I think they were admirable in themselves and almost as good a set of recommendations as the committee would have made if they had condensed their report and conclusions into such a brief space as the hon. member took. I am not quarrelling with him very much in that respect. I only want to point out that he went far afield in dealing with the report in that way, and I trust that other members will not be criticized if we also transgress and go a little far afield.

The hon. member quoted certain figures which were not altogether relevant with respect to agricultural production and other matters. I certainly do not agree that increases during 1936 and 1937 in the prices of implements in Canada can be charged to a high tariff; for these increases took place, as the hon. member for Kamouraska has just stated, after very substantial reductions in the tariff rates. The first reduction was fifty per cent.

The hon. member for Lake Centre referred to the resolution introduced in 1911 by the Hon. Arthur Meighen. May I remind the house that the tariff which was introduced and passed by the house in 1919 was the lowest with respect to farm implements that we have had under any government in this country. I refer to a certain number of implements, and particularly to tractors and parts thereof; as we know, they were put on the free list. What happened? Following that enactment, and as a result of that tariff change, some twenty concerns that were manufacturing tractors or parts thereof in Canada went out of business, and there was then a steady increase in prices up to 1929 or 1930. I could quote the prices which prevailed during that period, but the facts can be found in the report by anybody who will take the trouble to review it.

It will be clearly seen that from 1919 to 1930 the increase in price was very considerable. In 1930 a change of government occurred, and the prime minister saw fit to introduce measures which provided for some increase of the tariff on agricultural implements. In doing so, an agreement was made with the manufacturers that they would not increase prices. We know what happened during the ensuing period; we have the figures here to show that there was some reduction in price. Taking for example the year 1935, it will be seen that a very considerable reduction in price of certain agricultural implements took place. The report indicates these price decreases, from 1930 to 1935. In 1936 the tariff was lowered, and again the implement companies began to increase prices. No conclusive evidence was given to the committee on which it could base the conclusion that this state of affairs was related in any way to the tariff.

Reference is made in the report to the high cost of distribution. I think that is one of the principal findings of the committee. In recommendation 33 it is stated:

> That the committee is of the opinion that the cost of distribution of farm implements is unnecessarily high and constitutes an important factor in the prices to the consumers.

I believe we all agree with that, and certainly the industry itself is of the same opinion. But certain things must be taken into consideration in connection with distribution. The western business of necessity is a credit business. The farmers out there have been in desperate circumstances during the past few years, and it will be necessary for many years to come for the implement business in that country to be conducted on a credit or a time basis. Also, when we consider the evidence produced before the committee to show the percentage of business done in Canada by wholly Canadian manufacturers as compared with the amount of business done by United States manufacturers, it will be seen that Canadian manufacturers are under a very serious handicap.

I believe the figures indicated that the Canadian manufacturer has about thirty-two or thirty-three per cent of the Canadian business, and that United States manufacturers and importers have the balance of sixty-odd per cent. Hon. members will appreciate what the heads of the Canadian factories made very apparent to the committee, that if a condition could be brought about whereby they would have sixty per cent or more of the Canadian business the cost of distribution would be considerably less, owing to the larger percentage of business; if that should happen we should have, I believe, a reduction in price from that cause alone.

United States manufacturers control a very considerable amount of business in western Canada. I believe it was stated by the head of the International Harvester Company that its business in Alberta amounted to four per cent of the total business done by them on the American continent. It must be recognized that under a system of free entry that company could set a price in Alberta which might involve them in considerable loss as regards that particular part of their business, but when considered in relation to the total business done by them on this continent it would not amount to hardly anything, although it would put the Canadian manufacturer in a very disadvantageous position.

The question of freight rates was brought into the debate by the hon. member for Lake Centre. I wholly agree with what he said on this subject. We have come to the time when we should consider a reduction in freight rates, and not merely on agricultural implements. The subject might well be further considered. All of us must agree that freight rates have had nothing to do with the trend of prices of implements, either up or down, because the rate has been steady since 1897. When the hon. member for Lake Centre suggested that we should revert to the rate which was in force prior to the establishment of the Crowsnest rates, that is, prior to 1897, I found myself in entire agreement with him.

The hon. member made some suggestions of his own with respect to the prices of farm products: here again I certainly agree with him. There is no one in this chamber more anxious than I am to do something for the agriculturist, to assist the farmer in every practicable way, to make it possible for him to pay for the implements which he will have to buy in the next few years. I have suggested on various occasions in this house a reduction of freight rates. I succeeded in one year, I believe in 1934, in obtaining from the then minister of railways a statement as a result of which an order was issued to the board of railway commissioners asking them to consider a reduction in the differential as between the domestic and the export rate. I also had much to do with the bonus of five cents per bushel which was given to the farmers of western Canada, under which there was paid out about fourteen million dollars. And I had considerable to do with the framing and the passing of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, a piece of legislation which, if it had been given a chance to operate, would have meant much to the farmers by way of getting them an increased price for their wheat.

The time has come when this government should act upon some of the reports that have been handed down in the last two years, particularly this one. Why all this meaningless talk about tariffs, which we have listened to during that time? I well remember, and no doubt it is within the memory of many members of this house—possibly the Liberal party is running true to form—that in the legislature of Saskatchewan a resolution was passed annually for free furniture and implements of production. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), when he was premier of the province supported these annual resolutions to have furniture and implements of production put on the free list. But we have never had any action in this regard, notwithstanding that both he and the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) supported such resolutions in the legislature. They have sat in this government in the last two years and have done nothing, although we have heard a lot of talk from back benchers. I wonder if the back benchers are going to continue this session talking along that line. If they do, I trust they will force the government to take some action. We ought to know something definite now, and the only way we can find out is for the government to make a move in one direction or the other.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): May I suggest to the hon. member that a reduction from 25 per cent to 7½ per cent represents some action.

Mr. PERLEY: That is true, and if the government go any further they will find out that lowering the tariff does not help us to get any reduction in the prices of implements.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Why do you want action then?

Mr. PERLEY: We want the government to do something concrete, but instead we have nothing but talk from western members supporting them. Let these hon. gentlemen go back to the west and say to their constituents, "This is what the government has done"—let them do this or stop talking.

And what about the wheat board? The hon. member for Lake Centre mentioned it in his speech when moving concurrence in the report. A resolution was passed in the legislature of Manitoba a few days ago recommending that the government take steps to bring the wheat board act of 1935 into operation, to bring coarse grains under the act, and to issue participation certificates. In this connection an amendment was moved to amend another amendment that had been put forward. It read:

> That the said amendment be amended by adding at the end thereof the following words: And that this house regrets the practice of nullifying a federal statute by the passing of a federal order in council, thereby preventing the actual delivery of grain to the grain board except at low market prices.

That motion passed the Manitoba legislature with only one dissenting voice. I believe it was the member for South Winnipeg that voted against it, but the premier and the members of the government and the opposition as well all voted for it. Will hon. members from Manitoba and Saskatchewan who support the government in this house press such a resolution on this government with a view to having something done in that respect.

After dealing with the cost of distribution, which was the main recommendation, the report in its thirty-fourth recommendation proposes:

> That the companies themselves should make every effort to reduce these costs, or the farmers should be encouraged to organize for cooperative distribution and servicing of farm implements.

As regards the first part of the recommendation, surely it is unnecessary to state that the companies themselves look upon the cost of distribution as one of their major problems. If, therefore, there is any way of solving that difficulty, we can rest assured that the companies will endeavour to find it.

The thirty-four recommendations of the report give the government a good deal of latitude in preparing legislation and I trust that the cost of this investigation will not have been wasted and that some action will be taken to assist the farmer. There may be some difficulties to overcome, but the government is given a good deal of latitude in this report. In conclusion, may I commend the work of the committee. I believe that every member of the committee made an honest attempt to deal with the problems referred to the committee, and I wish to congratulate both the chairman of the present committee and the chairman of the one that preceded it upon the manner in which they conducted the investigation. Further, I believe it is only fair to say that the heads of the Canadian manufacturing industry in Canada and those who came from the south endeavoured to cooperate with the committee. They tried to give the committee all the details that were available, and I do not think that any of them made any effort to withhold anything. They are to be congratulated, and I trust that something concrete will result from the labours of this investigating body.

Mr. JOSEPH NEEDHAM (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee I should like to consider the report from a slightly different angle. In the first place I wish to put on the record the amounts of machinery sold in the east and in the west respectively and to follow the distribution through. According to the report we find that of the Canadian sales of the International Harvester Company, 77½ per cent are made in the west and 22½ per cent in the east; and of the Massey-Harris Company's sales, 66½ per cent are in the west and 33½ per cent in the east. These figures give us some idea of the quantities of machinery sold in western Canada and in other parts of the country. In freight rates, nine per cent of the farmer's dollar spent on implements goes to pay freight, so far as the west is concerned; in other words, freight takes nine per cent of every dollar spent on implements, whereas in the east it takes four per cent.

Let me give the value of farm implements sold in Canada at the factory compared with the price paid by the farmer, taking the total for the years from 1920 to 1935. Value at factory is $492,250,017, and total paid by the farmers $660,737,871, or a difference between the factory cost and what the consumer pays of $168,487,854. It will be seen a little later how these figures work out in the comparison between factory value and price to the farmer.

I notice that the peak year in sales was 1928, while the low year was 1933. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston) mentioned the tremendous backlog which has been built up because of the conditions that have existed, especially in the west, and it is anticipated that there will be a tremendous sale of farm implements some time when the farmers are able to buy them. Owing to the financial situation that exists at the present time, however, there is not much hope for any increased sales this year. I was startled to learn, from one hon. member of this house, that seventy-five per cent of the farms in Ontario were mortgaged and that the average income of the farmer was less than one dollar a day. We know the conditions in the west, so that the prospects do not look very bright for increased sales this year. Of course the higher price matters very little to the fellow who has no money, but I am thinking of the farmer who is just on the border line, who must either make a purchase or go out of business. To that person an increase in price, of the percentage given by the chairman of this committee, is a very serious matter.

In that report there is something else that is rather startling. It is stated that from 1913 to 1936 the price of farm tractors dropped fifty per cent, while in the same period the price of horse drawn implements increased fifty per cent. We all know that there was a pronounced change in the tractors in those years; nothing like the same material went into the tractors in the later years, but when you consider that there was very little change in the horse drawn implements, and that only one farmer in seven possesses a tractor, it looks even more serious. When we look at it from the standpoint of the farmer and the conditions surrounding him in regard to making any commitment, as compared with the manufacturer, we see that the one can play safe while the other is very unsafe. The farmer has to contend with hail, rust, frost, grasshoppers, cutworms, gophers and a lot of other things. On the other hand the manufacturer can set his price, and if the farmer cannot meet that price the manufacturer hangs on to his implements. With these increases in debt and interest charges, together with increased taxes, municipal, provincial and federal, the future of agriculture does not look very bright. The farmer cannot pass on to his customer the added cost of operation. I find that the International Harvester Company exports about one-third of its factory product, while the Massey-Harris Company exports to an even greater degree.

I should like to touch as briefly as possible on the financial position of the various companies, as set out in this report. From 1903 to 1912 the International Harvester Company earned $3,500,000 and paid interest on all advances from the parent company, on a capitalization of $1,000,000. Not bad pickings, was it? From 1913 to 1919 this company earned $3,000,000, plus profits retained by the parent company estimated at $4,200,000 and paid interest on all advances from the parent company, on a capitalization of $1,000,000 until 1917, when the capital was increased to $10,000,000. Later that was again increased to the present capitalization, estimated at $39,000,000. From the dividends paid it has been a pretty good thing for the shareholders.

[Mr. Needham.]

From 1926 to 1935 it works out at $2,450,000 per annum, or at the rate of 6·3 per cent during that period of ten years. The auditor for the committee placed it at 7·7 per cent.

The report indicates that from 1891 to 1912, on the original capitalization of $3,500,000 plus $1,000,000 added in 1911, the Massey-Harris Company returned to its shareholders cash dividends amounting to $11,212,349 and stock dividends of $8,500,000, a total in dividends of $19,712,349. In addition a rest account was created amounting to $6,500,000; a special contingent account was set up of $1,680,000, and $1,061,000 was retained in surplus account, making a grand total of $28,953,349.

During the period 1926 to 1935 the Cockshutt Plow Company and the Frost and Wood Company combined sold $45,600,000 worth of implements in Canada and $7,772,000 worth of implements outside of Canada, and showed a profit of $20,760. The committee estimated that the John Deere Plow Company would have an investment in Canada of $16,000,000, and that during this ten year period it returned profits of about $8,000,000, or an average of $800,000 per annum. So it would appear that in spite of the low sales and the undoubted high bad debt losses during those ten years, these companies did not fare very badly. Going back to the time of the origin of the companies may I say that the business has been quite profitable, especially in view of the development in warehouses and other equipment throughout the country.

Distribution is a very important factor in the price structure as between factory and farmer. There are different systems in Canada and the United States. The dealer in that country is on a different basis from the Canadian dealer. He buys his implements outright, following a suggested price list supplied by the company. In Canada to a great extent the implements are sold on consignment, and price lists are set to which the dealer must adhere. As indicated by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), in some cases costs of distribution are tremendously high. Entering into that factor are the special salesmen used by the companies, the high cost of collection, and so on.

The Massey-Harris Company, to which reference is made in the report, placed before the committee a report made by Ford, Bacon and Davis stating that the company had engaged this particular firm to give guidance in managing their affairs and readjusting their business. Some of the items in the report of the company which acted in an advisory capacity are very interesting. It states that the mechanical farm implements being produced by the leading companies are excellent, but that the selling and distribution methods are below the standard recognized as first class in other fields of business. When one compares the motor car of to-day with that of ten, fifteen or twenty years ago, he finds that it is far better in construction, durability and mechanism, and yet, proportionately, it is much lower in price than it used to be. The same condition does not apply to farm implements.

In making a comparison of costs of distribution in the different companies, the report shows the following costs as percentages of gross sales:

	Per cent of gross sales
International Harvester Company ..	19·61
Massey-Harris Company..	25·70
John Deere Manufacturing Company	17·65
Cockshutt, and Frost and Wood:
East of Peterborough..	19·49
West of Peterborough..	14·35

Another matter of grave concern to agriculturists is the credit charge imposed by implement manufacturers in connection with time sales. I find that in eastern Canada the prevailing rate is six per cent before maturity and seven per cent after maturity, while in Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia it is seven per cent before maturity and eight per cent after. In Saskatchewan there is legislation stating that the rate must be the same before and after, and as a result it is now seven per cent before and the same after. The rates used to be seven per cent and nine per cent respectively.

The following table gives the loading policy on credit sales by the different companies:

	Eastern Can.		Western Can.
	One Fall	Two Falls	One Fall	Two Falls
	Per cent		Per cent
International Harvester Company..	6·52	8·11	7·51	9·75
Massey-Harris Company..	6·82	8·79	6·16	9·93
Cockshutt Plow Company..	4·92	7·61	6·57	11·23
Frost and Wood..	4·77	7·49	....	....
John Deere Manufacturing Company..	....	....	5·87	11·06

May I now give an illustration of how this works out on an arrangement of half cash and the balance one fall, with particular reference to an eight foot binder:

Cash price, $281.
Half payment on delivery, balance on October 1, $289.
Difference between cash and credit prices, $8.
Balance due, $144.50.
Date purchased, July 15.
Days to due date, in which interest would accrue, 81.
Rate of interest, 7 per cent.
Amount of interest, $2.24.
Total credit charge, $10.24.
Rate per annum, 33·8 per cent.

These figures are based on the Regina price.

A similar table, with the arrangement of cash and two October payments, gives the following results:

Cash price, $281.
Two payment price, $297.
Difference between cash and credit prices, $16.
Balance due to October 1 (first year), $148.50.
Date purchased, July 1.
Days to first due date, 81.
Rate of interest, 7 per cent.
Amount of interest on first note, to first payment, $2.31.
Balance due to October 1 (second year), $74.25.
Amount of interest, $5.20.
Total interest charges, $7.51.
Total credit charges, $23.51.
Rate per annum, 24·6 per cent.

The companies claim that this credit charge should not be classified as interest, and that it is put there to encourage the farmer to purchase the implement at the cash price. They say that during a ten year period it has taken all of that charge to meet losses on collections and bad debts.

May I now touch upon the facts with respect to repair parts. All companies examined admit a substantial mark-up in the price of repair parts as compared with the price of a complete implement composed of the same parts. This mark-up amounts to 65 per cent. The committee claims that this percentage is excessive, in view of the fact that the repair parts are generally sold for cash, with no cost load for credit as in the case of the complete implement. For that reason the committee states there should be a drastic reduction. Ford, Bacon and Davis in their report in connection with the Massey-Harris Company, refer to repair parts in the following words:

> This business is of the greatest importance to the company as the net profits therefrom in the past two years have been more than half the total net profits from the business.

That is very startling. The matter of standardization of repair parts was discussed with the representatives of the various companies. In the lack of standardization is found one of the greatest difficulties in keeping up a machine to perfection. A machine may change hands and the farmer who buys it may go to the local dealer for a section of a binder, for example. He will find that there are five different sections manufactured by the same company, each one just a little different so that they will not fit. This is a great inconvenience both to the dealer and to the farmer. The committee recommended that the companies themselves should do something to bring about a greater standardization of replacement parts for the convenience of the user.

It was very clear to the committee that there was no competition in prices among the various companies. Whenever the prices changed, all the companies changed at the same time. The companies claimed that there was no gentleman's agreement, that this was only a coincidence, but I am sure the committee was satisfied that there was no competition in prices. It may be that the one company would wait until another had published its price list, but the committee was satisfied that there was no competition in this regard. There is great competition in connection with sales and tremendous expenses are incurred in distribution. If there is a prospect in any community every dealer knows about it and, if the prospect is worth while, the dealer gets an expert salesman to come out. Four or five different salesmen may go to see the farmer to try to close the deal. These expenses should be eliminated and there should be no high-powered salesmanship.

Mr. SPENCE: What would you substitute in its place?

Mr. NEEDHAM: Let the farmer go to the merchant and buy a machine when he wants one, just the same as he would buy a pair of shoes or suit of clothes. There should not be this great expense in the distribution of farm machinery. With a strong financial position and efficient management it should not be necessary to increase the price. These advantages should be passed on to the customer. It would appear that the shareholder is the first consideration rather than the customer. The executives cannot be blamed for this, because they must show profits or lose their positions. That is the case in many walks of life to-day. We find the same thing in the chain and departmental stores and in other lines of industry: the management is left to executives who must produce results. I submit that these companies should mark time until the farmer is in a position to take advantage of cash sales. The prices should be kept as low as possible.

What can the government do with this report? The committee has completed its work and has made certain recommendations, but what can the government do? The government cannot force the implement manufacturers to sell at a certain price. The report shows the position of the manufacturers, and we all know the condition of the farmers. However, there is one thing that can be done; farm implements could be put on the free list. The manufacturer could be told, "You have had your innings ever since you started to manufacture implements; it is now the farmer's turn to see whether he can gain anything along this particular line." If that is not sufficient, I would suggest the recommendation made by the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell), that there be some compensation as well.

I ask the government to try this for a period of years to see whether it will not help to rehabilitate the farmer. The agriculturist is the mainstay of the country. No country can be prosperous when its agriculture is not prosperous. I ask you to say with President Roosevelt: We will try anything once; if it works we will work it some more, if it does not work, we will try something else. I suggest that for a while we try free trade in farm implements.

Mr. W. R. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Mr. Speaker, in every industry there are three interests: the capitalist, the worker, and the consumer. I do not put them in that order for any special reason; I might just as well have said, the worker, the consumer and the capitalist; or the consumer, the worker and the capitalist. Under our system of government they are all necessary and no country can exist without the three. Every hon. member who has spoken so far seems to think there is only one class in Canada, namely, the farmer. I pay my respects to the farmer; I know he is very necessary indeed, but we must remember that at least half of the population of this country lives in our cities. The farmer is necessary, the capitalist is necessary, and the worker is necessary. There must be cooperation; the three must work together for the good of all. If this investigation does no more than bring these three together, then I feel that the effort we have put into it and the long hours we have spent in the inquiry shall not have been entirely in vain.

I desire to pay my respects to the chairman of the committee for his fairness, for the kindly manner in which he received all those who came before him, and for the way in which he allowed questions to be asked. However, at times it appeared to me that the manufacturers and workers were on trial. At times the committee took on the form of an inquisition rather than an investigation, as though they had done something wrong and we were out to condemn them. That was not so all the time, but I do feel it was so part of the time. In fact I believe the farm implement industry has been discriminated against. If you look back you will see that in parliament after parliament it has been investigated, or there has been some change in the tariff affecting the industry. One government comes in and the tariff on farm implements is changed; another comes in and the tariff is changed again, and it is probably changed two or three times in the life of each parliament. We had a price spreads investigation, when the farm implement industry was subjected to very critical examination. Then we had the agriculture committee of this house investigating it, and last year a special committee was appointed to investigate it again. Here we are in the third session of the eighteenth parliament, and we are still discussing the farm implement industry.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that the farm implement industry has been and is a great asset to this country. There are some people, as the president of one of these companies has said, who look upon manufacturers as public enemies, and the agricultural implement manufacturers as public enemy No. 1. Surely they are not an enemy of this country. Surely they have contributed something to its greatness. They have given the farmers the best in agricultural implements. They have employed their capital to go into research, to develop the very finest of implements, in order that our farmers may produce the greatest possible amount from their land with the least amount of labour. They have given employment to thousands of Canadians, who have a right to live on a fair scale, on a high scale the same as the farmer and the capitalist. I would like hon. members of this house to come to my city of Brantford. There you will find working men, the finest class of men in this country. I will take you down street after street and show you their homes, neat and tidy, with industrious housewives, children growing up—happy homes. Surely, Mr. Speaker, nothing should be done to lower the standard of living of the thousands and thousands of these working men and their families.

Mr. QUELCH: Is the hon. member suggesting that farmers have a high standard of living at the present time?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I am hoping that the standard of living of these working men will not only be maintained but raised, and I have the additional hope that the standard of living of the farmers will also be raised. The hon. member apparently has missed my point. In speaking to-day I hold no brief for the capitalist, the farmer, or the worker. I feel that we must endeavour to benefit all, and I trust that no one will interpret my remarks to the contrary.

It has been mentioned in this house that profits have been made by this industry. But since when, Mr. Speaker, did it become a crime for industry to make profits? If we take the figures year after year we shall probably find that the profits were not as high as some might imagine, but when someone states that a certain industry has made profits some hon. members of this house immediately assume that industry is committing a misdemeanour. Surely my hon. friends cannot object to reasonable profits, fair wages to the worker and fair prices to the consumer.

It has been said that one implement company in Canada last year made a million dollars, but an analysis of the business of that company will show that three-quarters of that amount, namely, $750,000, was made from implements sold outside Canada, and only $250,000 from implements sold within Canada.

It has also been stated that during the earlier years of the agricultural implement industry, from 1891, we will say, to 1911, great profits were made by this industry. I agree that great profits were made at that time not only by the agricultural implement industry but by practically every industry in this dominion, and I would also remind hon. members that great profits were made by the farmers in those years. The farmers were prosperous from 1901 to 1911; everyone was prosperous in those years, and surely we cannot complain of that. But our investigation was into the current prices and current profits of the implement companies. I have taken the trouble to go back over a period of twenty years from 1935, and I have averaged the profits or losses, as the case may be, of the implement manufacturing companies, and have then gathered them together, and I find that for the twenty years prior to 1935 the Canadian companies did not make money but lost ·37 per cent. During the fifteen years immediately prior to 1935 they lost 3·89 per cent. During the ten years immediately prior to 1935 the Canadian companies lost 5·59 per cent, and during the six years prior to 1935 they lost 12·26 per cent.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Are these figures taken from the report?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): They are taken from the report. In some years the companies made money, in some years they lost money, just as in farming operations the farmer makes money one year and loses money another. But taking an average of the implement companies during the last ten years, while in certain years they made money and in certain years lost money, on the average they lost 12·26 per cent in the last ten years.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): Is the hon. member grouping all the implement companies together in that statement?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): It is the Canadian companies.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): All doing business in Canada?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): No, just the strictly Canadian manufacturing companies.

Mr. DUPUIS: Where are those figures taken from?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): They will be found in the financial reports submitted to the committee by the implement companies, and if hon. members will take the trouble to look into those reports they will find that my statement is correct.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Has the hon. member the figures for individual companies as well as the average of all taken together?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): No, but that could be easily ascertained, and if the hon. member cannot obtain it himself I shall be glad to obtain it for him.

Mr. EDWARDS: The figures are all in the price spreads report.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Yes. During the past twenty years or more, farm implement prices have been on a basis, so far as the Canadian manufacturer is concerned, that has not been profitable, and any industry which would deliberately establish its selling price on a basis which returns less than cost would be committing commercial suicide. In the case of the implement industry, with their extended commitments to their customers in the way of service and repairs, that could not possibly be of advantage to the farmers of this country.

The third recommendation of this committee states:

> That, as a result, the price level of farm implements during the next few years is of the greatest importance to agriculture.

True, the price level of farm implements is important to agriculture, but to focus its degree of importance one must consider the proportion of the farmer's dollar which is spent in the purchase of farm equipment. According to the Nor-West Farmer, a prominent rural magazine in western Canada, from which I quoted last year, it was estimated in 1935 that the Canadian farmer spends three cents on implements and repairs, nineteen cents on food, sixteen cents on clothing, and nine cents on autos, trucks, upkeep, etc. I want to be fair to my hon. friends and agree that before the committee it was stated that the percentage spent on farm implements was somewhat higher than three per cent; and although official figures from the department of agriculture of the United States indicate also that the farmer spends three cents of his dollar on farm implements and repairs, I will admit, for the sake of argument, that the farmer spends, we will say, six cents, which is twice as much as the Nor-West Farmer states, on implements and repairs. Just what effect is this going to have on his own particular budget? We can put it this way. If a farmer spends $100, a maximum of six dollars only goes towards the purchase of implements and repairs. On this basis a decrease of ten per cent in implement prices would affect the farmer's $100 purchase by only ten per cent of six dollars, which is sixty cents. In other words, if the price of farm implements were reduced ten per cent the farmer's outlay would be only sixty cents less out of every hundred dollars than it is at the present time. From this it will be seen that the price of implements does not play such a fundamental part in the prosperity of the farmer or his ability to purchase as one might suppose. The farmer's problem during the depression and to-day in the drought areas is not so much the price he has to pay for his implements as his lack of purchasing power, due to the low price which he obtains for his product, or scarcity of it.

A number of hon. members have referred to the increase in the price of farm implements and have stated that it should not be. I should like to draw their attention to the increase which has taken place in the prices of raw materials. As far back as December, 1936, these prices were rapidly advancing, and they reached their peak at the end of the second quarter of 1937; at that level they have remained ever since. A number of increases which have taken place are as follows —I ask hon. members to note the percentages:

	Percentage of increase
Hot rolled bars, banks, plate, etc..	23
Cold drawn bars..	14
Blue sheets..	31
Black sheets..	34
Galvanized sheets..	23

Also in 1937 two distinct wage increases were given to the employees of most of the factories. In one company there was an increase on February 1, 1937, and another increase on April 17, 1937. Combined, these brought the wage level to a point approximately 8·1 per cent higher than it was in 1936.

I quote these figures so that hon. members may realize that there has been a sustained increase in the price of raw materials and an advance in the wages paid. I ask, how can manufacturing concerns continue to do business and keep the men of our country busy if in spite of the increased costs of raw material and labour they reduce their prices to a point where they are losing money? I say it cannot be done. We have heard a great deal about the high prices of farm implements in Canada. Again let me emphasize that it is my desire, as it is the desire of every hon. member, that the farmer should buy his implements at as low a price as possible. At the same time I do not suppose there is an hon. member who wants to put any farm implement company out of business nor to throw men out of employment. Are the farmers paying more than they should for their agricultural implements? Let us look at farmers in other parts of the world. I make this statement advisedly, namely, that farmers on this continent buy their implements at a lower price than that paid by farmers in any other part of the world. I quote some figures—prices delivered Winnipeg.

	Delivered cost
An 18-section oil-bath mower:
Canada	$116 84
Great Britain	150 13
South Africa	147 50
New Zealand	144 00
Argentine	167 00
Six-foot binder with sheaf carrier and truck:
Canada	288 00
Great Britain	343 00
South Africa	359 00
New Zealand	324 00
Argentine	338 00
32-tooth rake, 10-foot:
Canada	62 22
Great Britain	94 84
South Africa	75 00
New Zealand	None sold
Argentine	98 56

I could go down through the list. In every instance, I repeat, where there are purchases of any large implements, the price that the farmer in any of the foreign countries I have mentioned pays is considerably greater than is paid by the Canadian farmer.

I come now to the question of the cream separator. The committee recommended that the cost of cream separators to consumers should be reduced, and with that end in view they recommended that this item be placed on the free list. Very little evidence was taken by the committee during the inquiry except from importers of foreign cream separators. In all probability, had the question been investigated more fully, the recommendation that the duty be removed would not have been made.

The price situation with regard to cream separators is confusing, because mail order houses sell imported machines through their catalogues and without services, whereas the Canadian manufacturer includes this important and expensive advantage. One of the Canadian cream separator industry's problems at present is the rapidly developing Scandinavian imports. In 1920 these imports were just 5½ per cent of the imports of all cream separators, but in 1936 the percentage had increased to fifty-eight. In the Scandinavian countries separators are being manufactured on a basis of seventy-five per cent female labour at sixteen cents an hour and twenty-five per cent male labour at 31·4 cents per hour, an average of 19·6 cents per hour. In Canada the rate is around fifty-five cents per hour. If in Canada cream separators could be manufactured on the basis of 19½ cent labour, the cost of machines could be reduced by thirty-eight per cent, or $16.68. The duty of twenty-five per cent which importers of Scandinavian machines have to pay on machines comparable to those manufactured in Canada amounts to only $5.50.

The Canadian industry can meet Scandinavian competition on even ground only by reducing labour costs to a comparable basis; but this, with the lower standard of living which it would involve, would not be acceptable to the Canadian working man and would be entirely out of line with the policy of this government.

When it is suggested that cream separators should be put on the free list we should remember that the farmer to-day enjoys protection of from eight to twelve cents per pound on butter. Does the farmer contend that this protection of from eight to twelve cents per pound on butter should be maintained, and at the same time ask that cream separators be put on the free list? I would also remind hon. members that oleomargarine cannot be sold in Canada, and representations have recently been made that vegetable oils be put on the dutiable list.

It is often said that the farmer gets no protection from the tariff, but there are many commodities on which he is protected. Let me give a few figures on importations from the United States:

Commodity	Duty
Live cattle	2 cents pound
Sheep	$2 per head
Hogs	1¼ cents pound
Fresh beef	6 cents pound
Lamb	6 cents pound
Canned meats	30 per cent (canned hams less 20 per cent Polish agreement)
Baby chicks	4 cents each
Bacon and hams	1¾ cents pound
Beef in brine	3 cents pound
Lard	1¾ cents pound
Tallow	17½ per cent
Eggs in shell	5 cents dozen (with countervailing proviso)
Cheese	7 cents pound (less 15 per cent under French treaty)
Butter	12 cents pound
Hops	10 cents pound
Powdered milk	5 cents pound

Mr. BLACKMORE: Are those the rates on commodities coming into Canada from the United States?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I am talking about farm products coming into Canada from the United States.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Has the hon. member the figures from New Zealand?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): From New Zealand there is a substantial duty on butter.

Mr. BENNETT: Five cents.

Mr. EULER: Plus exchange, which amounts to between three and four cents.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): In conclusion I would point out that the forcing of Canadian manufacturers out of business would with the resulting unemployment involve a tremendous loss to Canadian economy and leave the farmer dependent entirely upon foreign sources of supply. It has been a matter of consistent observation that any country which is entirely dependent on foreign sources of supply invariably pays more for its products. I would refer my hon. friends to a statement I read showing that farm implements cost more in other countries than in Canada. The Canadian farmer would be the loser if farm implements ceased to be manufactured here or were produced on a very much smaller scale than at present. The best interests of the Canadian farmer, of the working man and of this industry itself would be served by the maintenance of a reasonable tariff, especially if it were established on a basis of permanency. A reasonable tariff, I suggest, would be one which would be low enough to assure a reasonable price to the consumer and high enough to ensure steady employment to the working man.

Mr. J. T. THORSON (Selkirk): I wish I could be as eloquent on behalf of the dairy farmers of Canada as the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Macdonald, Brantford City) has been on behalf of Canadian manufacturers. I intend to confine my remarks to the subject of cream separators.

The statement was made in this house some days ago by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) that no evidence had been taken from the Canadian manufacturers of cream separators. A similar statement was made a day or two ago by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett).

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say "not any," but "not any adequate evidence." I think you will find there was some evidence.

Mr. THORSON: I accept that. To-day the hon. member for Brantford City stated that very little evidence had been taken on the subject. It might be desirable, therefore, that hon. members should note the evidence that was given before the special committee on farm implements with respect to cream separators.

There are four principal companies in Canada that manufacture or assemble cream separators—the International Harvester Company of Canada, Limited; the Massey-Harris Company, Limited; the De Laval Company, Limited, and the Renfrew Machinery Company, Limited. Questionnaires were sent out to the two larger companies, the International Harvester Company and the Massey-Harris Company, and full replies were given by them. One of the questionnaires asked the companies to supply full information with regard to a number of typical farm implements, including cream separators. Cream separators, therefore, received exactly the same amount of attention as any one of the other typical farm implements in respect of which information was requested and given.

The officers of these two large companies appeared before the special committee and gave evidence freely, frankly and in great detail. They were examined by counsel to the committee, Mr. R. T. Graham, K.C., and cross-examined by members of the committee; they had the fullest possible opportunity of placing their case before the committee. Detailed evidence was given as to costs of cream separators, manufacturing costs, distribution costs, selling costs and sales realizations. These details were given with regard to all the typical farm implements in respect of which information had been requested. In the case of the International Harvester Company there were nine typical farm implements in respect of which information was requested and given. Their No. 2 cream separator was in this list. If anyone is interested in the information that was given to the committee he will find it all in the tables that appear on pages 138 to 146 of the evidence. Comparable information was given in respect of the Massey-Harris Company, in so far as it is possible to compare it with the information given by the International Harvester Company. It is not possible to give absolutely comparable information because of the differences in the systems of accounting of the two companies. In the case of the Massey-Harris Company there were seven typical farm implements listed, and included in this list was their 500-pound cream separator. The tables for the Massey-Harris Company will be found at pages 1092 to 1100 of the evidence. These tables were compiled as the result of facts and figures given by the companies themselves. The companies cooperated fully with the committee and its auditor, Mr. Walter J. Macdonald, in giving the basic information that was desired, and there were no complaints made at any time by the officers of the two companies to which I have referred.

With regard to the two other companies, the De Laval Company and the Renfrew Machinery Company, special questionnaires relating to cream separators were sent to each of these companies. The De Laval Company made a full reply to the questionnaire sent to it, and one whole session of the committee was devoted to the evidence given by the officers of that company. Their general manager, Mr. Breyfogle and their auditor, Mr. Cutmor, appeared before the committee and gave full and detailed information that was very useful to the committee. The Renfrew Machinery Company made no reply to the questionnaire that was sent to it. I understand that the auditor of that company was in consultation with the auditor of our special committee, and that he promised that the information requested in the questionnaire would be given, but no information was ever furnished at any time by the Renfrew Machinery Company. They were given every opportunity to do so, and now they have no cause for complaint. In addition, evidence relating to cream separators was given by correspondence from MacLeod's Limited, and there was also evidence given with regard to the effect of tariffs, customs rulings and freight rates upon the prices of cream separators. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the special committee had a great deal of evidence before it; it gave very careful study to the question of cream separators before arriving at the following recommendation:

(16) That it is the opinion of the committee that the cost of cream separators to the consumers should be reduced and with that end in view recommends that this item be placed on the free list.

This recommendation was made unanimously; I submit that it was justified by the evidence that was before the committee and that it is justified by the needs of the dairy farmers in every part of Canada. There is an unanswerable case for the recommendation thus unanimously made by the special committee on farm implements.

What is the history of the tariff on cream separators? For over thirty years before 1932 cream separators came into Canada free. This is as it should be; for there is no farm implement so important to the needy mixed farmer, the needy dairy farmer, as the cream separator. It has often been described as "the handmaiden of thrift." It is the cream separator that provides the poor farmer with his cream cheque, which is practically the only cash that he gets, and it is of more importance to the dairy farmer in hard times than it is in good times that his implements of production should be provided at the lowest possible cost. A change was made in the tariff in 1932, when the Ottawa agreement was entered into. The tariff was then increased to 25 per cent under both the intermediate and general schedules. It remained on the free list as far as importations from the United Kingdom were concerned, but note this. Not a single cream separator had come into Canada from the United Kingdom for three years before the Ottawa agreement was concluded. They had come mainly from the United States, Sweden or Belgium. The average importations of cream separators into Canada during the years 1930, 1931 and 1932 amounted to $833,000 per year. None came from the United Kingdom during these three years. Seventy-five per cent of the importations came from the United States, thirteen per cent from Sweden, six per cent from Belgium and the balance from Finland and other countries. So in 1932 the tariff was jumped up from the free list to 25 per cent on importations of cream separators from all countries except the United Kingdom, which for three years had not exported a single cream separator to Canada, and which was itself a large importer of cream separators.

But this was not all, for article IX of the Ottawa agreement guaranteed this 25 per cent margin of preference to the United Kingdom in respect of cream separators for the whole lifetime of the agreement. Therefore during the five years that the agreement was in force it was impossible to make any reduction whatever in the tariff on cream separators, and for five years this high protection was clamped on against the dairy farmers of Canada. In the first speech I made in this house during the session of 1936 it was my privilege to describe this clause of the Ottawa agreement that guaranteed this margin of preference as a vicious clause, and I urged its deletion from the agreement when it was to be reconsidered in 1937. In that year we made some progress. The Ottawa agreement was revised. There was no reduction in the tariff on cream separators but they were no longer tied to the margin of preference to which I have referred. Cream separators are not mentioned in schedule 5 to the Ottawa agreement of 1937, and therefore they are not tied to this guaranteed margin of preference of 25 per cent. In the session of 1937, further progress was made through the recommendation made unanimously by the special committee on farm implements, of which I was a member, that cream separators should be put upon the free list. This present session therefore, Mr. Speaker, is the first since 1932 that the government has been free to act in the matter of tariffs on cream separators, and I sincerely urge upon the government that it should carry into effect at this session the unanimous recommendation of the special committee on farm implements, that cream separators should be put on the free list. This recommendation should have the active support of every hon. member who represents a rural constituency in which there is mixed farming, and in which there are dairy farmers. There are in Canada 2,600 butter factories or creameries, of which 1,200 are in the province of Quebec. There are thousands of farmers in this country who depend upon cream separators for the only cash they receive. There is no implement more important to these small farmers than the cream separator.

What has happened since 1932? The evidence given before the committee shows some startling facts. In the first place it shows clearly and conclusively that while prices of cream separators were not increased after the tariff was put on, the prices were artificially held up. May I refer hon. members to the comparative statement of prices that appears on page 131 of the evidence.

[Mr. Thorson.]

The International Harvester Company, giving evidence with regard to some typical farm implements, gave a statement of comparative prices. The information with regard to their No. 2 cream separator shows the cash price at Regina, Saskatchewan, and also the cash price at Billings, Montana. Prior to 1932 there was comparatively no difference between the price on the United States side of the line and the price on the Canadian side. In 1932 the price of the No. 2 cream separator at Regina was $103.50; at Billings it was $102.30. But let us now see what happened after the tariff was put on. In 1933 and in 1934 the price of the cream separator at Billings, Montana, dropped to $90.90, a drop of $12.40. What happened on the Canadian side of the line? The drop was merely one from $103.50 to $102.50. That is fair evidence, Mr. Speaker, that the price of the cream separator on the Canadian side of the line was artificially held up by the imposition of the tariff of 1932.

There is also clear evidence given by Mr. Morrison of the International Harvester Company, when he said that his company could supply the agricultural implement requirements of the farmers of western Canada from its plant at Chicago, pay the duty and let the farmers of western Canada have these implements at less cost than they could be supplied at from its factory at Hamilton. Then, in reply to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) Mr. Morrison stated that the amount of duty was decidedly a factor in the cost. I would prefer to have the statement of Mr. Morrison to the statement recently made by a member of this house. Undoubtedly the rate of duty is a decided factor in cost.

Furthermore, the evidence of all three companies shows that the cream separator has been loaded with heavier selling costs for commissions than any other typical farm implement. For example, in the case of the International Harvester Company the percentage for selling costs for commissions in the matter of cream separators is 28·17 per cent, whereas the average for all typical farm implements is only 15·89 per cent. In the case of the Massey-Harris Company there is a similar state of affairs; the commission percentage in the case of cream separators is 21·26 per cent, whereas the average for all typical farm implements is only 12·53 per cent.

Then, the evidence shows one other striking fact. Two of the companies are related to United States companies. The De Laval Company is affiliated with the De Laval Separator Company of New York, through shareholder control. The International Harvester Company of Canada is a subsidiary of the International Harvester Company of the United States. These Canadian companies imported parts and materials for use in their factories in Canada. These parts and materials came in free of duty, and yet in each case the United States company billed its Canadian subsidiary or associate with the cost of production, plus 25 per cent. It has been stated that they followed this practice because of rulings made by Canadian customs officers. Whether the rulings are correct or incorrect, the result has been that the United States companies in each case have retained in their pockets this 25 per cent profit arising from Canadian business. This additional profit ought to have been used by Canadian companies for the purpose of reducing the price of cream separators and other farm implements made in Canada. In any event, this practice has produced profits for United States companies in the United States, at the expense of Canadians.

Furthermore the purpose of the tariff increase of 1932 has completely failed. I do not think I would be accused of unfairness if I were to say that the fundamental purpose of the Ottawa agreement of 1932 was to divert from foreign countries to the United Kingdom importations into Canada, so that our trade with the United Kingdom might be enlarged. But the imposition of the tariff has not helped the United Kingdom to any extent, and it has not served the purpose—

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what they say.

Mr. THORSON: —of keeping out foreign farm implements. With the leave of the house, if I may have it, I should like to put on Hansard a table showing the importations of cream separators into Canada, since 1929.

Mr. BENNETT: Giving the countries from which imported?

Mr. THORSON: Giving the countries from which importations came.

Mr. BENNETT: And the number of each?

Mr. THORSON: Yes, the number of cream separators and also their dollar value. The table is as follows:

I should also like to put on record a brief statement showing the production of cream separators in Canada from 1920 to 1936, giving the number made and their selling value at the works. The table is as follows:

Production of Cream Separators in Canada, 1920-1936

Years	Number	Selling value at works
1920	31,001	$1,683,634
1921	13,596	934,923
1922	15,895	727,655
1923	14,279	854,067
1924	11,155	724,909
1925	11,897	816,468
1926	17,649	1,096,215
1927	16,643	1,061,213
1928	14,921	995,237
1929	13,431	830,227
1930	8,616	568,695
1931	7,218	508,335
1932	3,324	203,201
1933	6,652	413,530
1934	9,963	675,165
1935	12,107	791,346
1936	10,902	710,003

These tables show that in 1936 approximately 12,000 cream separators were imported into Canada, approximately 11,000 were produced in Canada and only approximately 1,000 came in from the United Kingdom. It follows that in 1936 the United Kingdom supplied less than five per cent of the requirements of the Canadian dairy farmers for cream separators. Therefore, it follows that the Canadian dairy farmer has been penalized by this protection and duty to the extent of ninety-five per cent of his requirements. In 1937 importations of cream separators increased from 12,000 to 20,000 with an increase in value from $306,000 to $479,000.

The United Kingdom has not been greatly assisted by the imposition of this tariff. I understand that there are only two concerns in the United Kingdom that are engaged in the manufacture of cream separators. There is the Lister Company of Dursley which formerly handled a Belgian make of cream separator and which only recently has commenced to make cream separators itself. Then there is the Wolseley Sheep Shearing Company of Birmingham which engages in the manufacture of cream separators only as a side line.

Let us look at this table of imports of cream separators and consider the importations from Sweden and the manner in which they have increased notwithstanding the heavy duty of twenty-five per cent. In 1932 a total of 3,937 cream separators came in from Sweden. In 1933 the number dropped to 2,359. From then on the story is one of ever increasing importations. In 1934 the number of cream separators imported from Sweden had risen to 4,984; in 1935, the number was 8,529; in 1936 it was 9,520, and in 1937 it had increased to a total of 15,503. The tariff has not served to keep out Swedish cream separators. Why? The Canadian farmer needs a small separator. This small separator fills a need which cannot be filled by the United Kingdom and which has not been filled by Canadian manufacturers or operators of assembly plants. The De Laval Company admitted that they could not compete with the Swedish separators for a number of reasons.

Mr. McCANN: On what grounds?

Mr. THORSON: For a number of reasons. They have themselves imported Swedish cream separators to be sold as their junior model. The dairy farmer has to pay 25 per cent duty on every cream separator brought into this country. It is the small dairy farmer who is particularly affected and he is the one who can least afford to pay this heavy duty. The large dairy producer usually has a fluid milk contract upon which he can rely, but the small dairy farmer has nothing but his cream separator that produces his cream for which he receives his cream cheques.

I submit that there is no need for the retention of this duty. Whom does this duty help? It does not help labour to any extent. So far as cream separators are concerned, the De Laval Company is not a manufacturing plant; it is simply an assembly plant. The cream separator end of the business is a very small proportion of its total business. Mr. Breyfogle stated at page 1191 of the evidence that the cream separator end of the business was a comparatively small portion of its manufacturing. The amount paid for Canadian labour is only a small fraction of the cost of the cream separators assembled at the De Laval plant. For example, out of a total factory cost of $59.65 per separator, only $1.69 is paid to direct Canadian labour. What is the evidence with regard to the Massey-Harris Company? This company builds a 500-pound cream separator, which is their main separator.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): They build a small one now.

Mr. THORSON: I said it was their main one. This 500-pound cream separator represents only 2·2 per cent of their total volume of Canadian made implements. In the case of the International Harvester Company the percentage is even less.

Whom does the tariff then help? It helps only these four companies. It has helped the United States parent of the International Harvester Company and the United States associate of the De Laval Company to retain in the United States profits from Canadian business which should be used to reduce Canadian prices. I have also heard that Canadian companies compete at Chicago, for example, with foreign cream separators. I have heard that they are able to make quotations in Chicago and have captured business from foreign exporters of cream separators. If they can do that, why do they require any such tariff protection as they now receive?

Mr. BENNETT: Was there any evidence of that?

Mr. THORSON: I was careful to say that I had heard that that was so. If that is so, then they require no protection from this parliament.

Whom does this tariff hurt? It hurts every dairy farmer in Canada. The Canadian tariff on cream separators is the highest of any country in the world. New Zealand is one of our chief competitors in the production of butter, and yet the New Zealand farmer gets his cream separator in free. We export cream separators to New Zealand, but the Canadian farmer who has to compete with the New Zealand farmer must pay 25 per cent duty on every cream separator imported into this country.

I wonder if hon. members realize the importance of cream separators to the dairy farmers of Canada? It is a matter of prime importance to them that they should be able to get the maximum butter fat content out of their milk. They are entitled to the benefits of all improvements that are made in cream separators anywhere in the world. It is essential also that they should get their cream separators as cheaply as possible. Dairy farming is the hardest of all farming occupations. It goes on every day in the year. The dairy farmer uses his cream separator twice every day and every day in the year. He is entitled to get as large a return as possible from his hard labour, and he is entitled to have his implements of production supplied to him at as low a cost as possible. The removal of this duty, Mr. Speaker, would lessen the costs of production of the dairy farmer. The removal of this duty would also do another thing: it would enable the independent dealers to handle cream separators, and they could do so at less spread for distribution, at less cost, than the large companies with their wasteful systems of distribution. There is no implement so necessary to the dairy farmer of Canada as the cream separator. We in western Canada are trying to build up mixed farming. We should have assistance in doing this. In eastern Canada mixed farming and dairy farming are their most important industries. Therefore every member of this house has a direct interest in this recommendation. He can help his dairy farmers by supporting the unanimous recommendation made by the special committee that cream separators be placed on the free list.

For the reasons I have stated, Mr. Speaker, I urge upon the government that it should carry into effect this unanimous recommendation of of the special committee on farm implements. The tariff of 25 per cent on cream separators has failed in its purpose. It has not served to help the United Kingdom to any great extent; it has not helped labour. The table that I placed on record shows that more cream separators were made in Canada before this tariff was imposed than are made in Canada now. The present tariff serves only as a bonus to a few companies, whose cream separator business is merely a small percentage of their total volume of business, and it penalizes a large and important class of primary producers.

The Liberal party is pledged to tariff reduction. On this item we expect the government to carry out its pledge. We have heard of compensating adjustments. At a later date in this session I hope that I may have an opportunity of saying something on the subject of compensating adjustments, but in respect of this item we want no compensating adjustments. We want this tariff removed altogether in accordance with the unanimous recommendation of the special committee, and we want it removed this session; for this is the first session in which the government has been free to act in the matter. The farmers of Canada generally will expect this recommendation to be carried out. I urge this, Mr. Speaker, in the interests of agriculture, and when I urge it in the interests of agriculture I urge it in the interests of the whole of Canada; for upon the welfare of the primary producer, whether he be farmer, fisherman, miner or lumberman, the welfare of the whole of Canada depends.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, in Canada to-day as in all other countries of the world we have two types of farmers. One is the type that farms the land; the other is the type that farms the farmer. Whether it is my good or my bad luck, I belong to the type that farms the land, and I must say that for a number of years I have not been satisfied with my lot in that respect.

Under ordinary business conditions the farmer should first of all see to it that he gets a decent living for himself before providing a decent living and luxuries for the farmer who farms the farmer.

Speaking a few moments ago, the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) suggested that the farmers were enjoying pretty well the same standard of living as the manufacturers, although I do not think he really meant that. But if he wanted us to take it as truth we must dispute his statement flatly. Living in Alberta as I have for the past twenty-four years and farming all that time, I strongly disagree with that statement of the hon. member. Time after time in this house statistics have been given, showing the kind of home the western farmers live in, and giving the percentage of farm homes that have radios installed, that have running water, electric light, bathtubs, the number of farmers driving automobiles, and so forth. I do not think it is necessary to make any exception of the east or central provinces, because only two years ago we were told in this house by a practical farmer representing an Ontario constituency that when he wanted to take a bath he had to take it in a wash-basin, which goes to prove that conditions in Ontario among the farmers are not very much better, so far as domestic facilities are concerned, than they are in the west.

During the last war, when farmers were in a position to make a little money, with wheat prices going up, the government then in power undertook to keep the price of wheat down by bringing a wheat board into operation. But immediately the war was over and it was to be expected that prices might drop—and here the board could have been of considerable assistance to the farmer—the government saw to it that in a very short time the board was removed. For the other class of farmers we find that something to help them put their prices up and keep them up was not removed, but has been maintained ever since.

During the 1936 and 1937 sessions we had investigations into prices of farm machinery. I would not for a moment agree with all the estimates and figures which have been given to the committees that inquired into that matter. For a number of years we have been told that figures lie and liars figure, and from some figures which came out during that investigation I am inclined to believe that that statement is true.

Referring to the question of cream separators, which the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) dealt with just before I rose to speak, I should like to show the house this small part of a cream separator which I have on my desk. It is just a little piece, one of a number of pieces that go to make up a cream separator. No later than last month a farmer in Saskatchewan had to pay $1.65 for this little piece of machinery. In case some of the armchair farmers have not looked at it, I again hold it up for them to see, and if they want to examine it more closely it will be here on my desk. Back in 1932 it would take eight and a half bushels of No. 1 northern wheat to purchase this little piece of cream separator. According to dominion government figures, in 1932 it cost the farmer $8.07 to produce enough wheat to buy this little piece of separator. Yet we are told that the farmers are in a pretty good position and are not being soaked by the farmer who farms the farmer.

Going back a number of years to about the time I came to this country, we find that prices of farm implements were not anywhere near what they are to-day. I will instance just two necessary implements used not only in the west but in all parts of the dominion: The seed drill, with which you put in seed; and the eight foot binder, which you must use to take your grain off, provided you happen to have any. In 1915 the seed drill cost $147 and the eight foot binder, $165. For purposes of comparison I will use five year periods. In 1920 the drill cost $243 and the binder, $288; in 1925 the respective figures were $253 and $288. In 1930, when that burden of man-made depression struck the farmers and the workers generally with such violence, the drill still cost $252 and the binder, $283. We come to 1935, when we were paying a tariff on a 25 per cent basis; the drill then cost $237 and the binder, $262. These prices are all f.o.b. Regina. At the 1936 session a reduction of 17½ per cent was made in the tariff on farm implements, bringing the rate down to 7½ per cent. But see what happened. In the case of the drill we find the price had increased to $248, while the binder cost jumped to $280.

Some people say that the Conservatives are and have been the high tariff party; but in view of the figures which I have given, what difference does it make which party is in office? We have a cut in the tariff of 17½ per cent, and yet a net increase in the prices of these implements.

I join with other hon. members in asking the government at this time to abolish entirely the tariff on farm implements, and not on implements alone. I suggest that the government investigate the figures constituting the balance sheets of these companies, and where those figures lie, have them corrected; not only that, but the government should make the companies sell at fair prices. Overhead and items of that order are padded, if I may use that term, and we find also that in industry there is such a thing as secret reserves.

As regards my own home town, I can quote from memory the prices of eight foot binders in 1935 and 1936. In the former year the price was $272.52 cash. After the 17½ per cent reduction which I mentioned a few minutes ago, the price had jumped to $290 cash. This refers to the product of the International Harvester Company. The profits of that company for 1935 amounted to $19,618,000, and for 1936, to $29,760,000. That corporation, like all the others, has been doing pretty well. During the investigation it was also found that a little secret reserve of $40,000,000 existed in the accounts of the International Harvester Company. I have nothing whatever against that company; but I am bound to say that there is every evidence of a combine among these machine companies, and I believe that if the government would investigate the financing of these companies, the secret manipulations of their assets, and so forth, they would be justified in making very substantial reductions in the prices of farm machinery. I am not pleading that this should be done because I am a farmer; for if the other fellow can get along, I am Scotch enough to get along too. But I believe everybody realizes that until the farmers of Canada are in a prosperous condition, the economic position of the rest of the country cannot be sound. At this time, I believe, the government has all the necessary information, and if it also possesses the pluck of which it talked so much prior to the election of 1935, it should not be necessary for us to finish this session without some drastic action having been taken to put the implement manufacturers in their proper place and to utilize them for their proper use.

Mr. J. J. McCANN (Renfrew South): At the outset I wish to congratulate the chairman of the committee who made this report on the thoroughness of it and on the manner in which the question was reviewed from every aspect. Perhaps, however, in making some of the representations, particularly when he included his own personal observations and recommendations with reference to what might be done, and did so at a time after the committee had risen, he may have misled members of this house and the Canadian people into believing that those expressions of his were the conclusions of the committee.

I do not entirely agree with him in some of his conclusions, more especially with reference to the requirements of western farmers in the line of general agricultural machinery. In his observations he says in part, as reported in Hansard of this year at page 1237:

> The annual requirements of farm implements in this country amounted to $51,700,000, and that during the period 1926-35, on account of the depression and farmers not being able to purchase their annual requirements, there had grown up in this country a backlog of requirements amounting to some $200,000,000.

Then he goes on:

> If this estimate is anything like correct and I think well within the mark, and if this backlog is to be taken up in the next few years, it will be understood that farm implement manufacturers have in prospect a period of large sales, probably equal to the days when western Canada was being settled. When we consider the financial statements of the implement companies during that period we find that they experienced very prosperous times. With that annual requirement of $51,700,000 plus the backlog of $200,000,000, hon. members will understand how vital this matter of price is to the farmers of this country.

I cannot agree with the logic of the statement that the backlog of $200,000,000 is likely to be taken up. The time is gone when those sales could be made, and to accuse the farm implement companies of being in a position or of attempting to take advantage of that is, to me, entirely illogical.

With the report, generally speaking, I am in accord. It has several recommendations which, if put into effect, surely should bring about those conditions with reference to farming to which the industry is entitled. However, I propose to speak principally with reference to recommendation No. 16, which has to do with the proposal to remove entirely the tariff on cream separators.

The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson), referring to the Renfrew Machinery Company, manufacturers of the Renfrew separator, said that a questionnaire was submitted to them and that they paid no attention to it. I submit that the Renfrew Machinery Company had not sufficient time in which to compile the data necessary to answer that questionnaire. It is true they were invited to answer a questionnaire sent out by the auditor of the special committee on farm implements requesting information as soon as possible. The officials of the company proceeded to secure the necessary information and to compile it in the form required for submission to the committee, but before all the data could be gathered the sittings of the committee ended and parliament prorogued. The evidence and information which the Renfrew Machinery Company could have supplied were not given to the committee, and it is the suggestion of the company that certain facts should be brought forward—facts which might have altered the committee's findings.

Some hon. gentlemen in discussing this motion speak entirely from the standpoint of the farmers. I can quite understand their position because they represent entirely rural constituencies. But when one comes from a constituency that is part rural and part urban, one must take into consideration the needs of all the people in the constituency and not those of one set of individuals. I happen to represent a constituency that is partly rural and partly urban. The Renfrew Machinery Company in the manufacture of cream separators employ 225 people, most of them heads of families. Altogether there depend upon the company for support from 800 to 1,000 people in the town and from 1,000 to 1,200 people throughout the country. All these people depend upon that one particular industry for support.

Let me call attention to the policy of the Liberal party with reference to industry, the policy as enunciated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the federal campaign of 1935. I myself heard him say—and he said it from one end of the country to the other—that it was not the intention of the Liberal party to destroy any legitimate industry. I submit that if the tariff is entirely removed from cream separators, that promise which was given to the people of Canada will not be implemented, because the Renfrew Machinery Company differ from other implement manufacturing concerns in that they are specialists in the manufacture of cream separators. They have manufactured over 50,000 of these machines, which are in use from one end of Canada to the other.

The committee in its recommendations contends that the farmers have a right to expect the price level of farm implements to be based upon the most economical and efficient manufacturing and distribution costs. It is apparent that such results will not be secured, so far as cream separators are concerned, by the implementing of recommendation No. 16. Such legislation would tend to destroy entirely the competitive factor in cream separator sales and prices, thus increasing the cost of the machine to the Canadian farmer and allowing exporters, particularly in Sweden, to secure still wider margins of excess profit at the expense of the Canadian consumer, the Canadian suppliers of this product, and their dependents.

The hon. member for Selkirk took pains to remind the house that the Swedish manufacturers could undersell the Canadians, but he did not say why. The hon. member for Brantford City answered that in his remarks. The reason is that in Sweden the labourers, artisans and mechanics work on an average for 19½ cents per hour as compared with 55 cents per hour and up, in Canada. If the hon. member for Selkirk wishes to reduce Canadian artisans and machinists to the level of those in Sweden, then he is alone in that particular wish. It is quite true that their machines can be brought into Canada at a lower price than that at which Canadian machines can be manufactured; nevertheless we have a duty to perform to our Canadian manufacturers, and particularly to those whom they employ, and we are not doing our duty if we allow our manufacturers to be undersold by Swedish manufacturers.

After all, this government has done a good deal for the farmers. Are we not treating the dairy farmers fairly when we attempt to get them a decent market for their products? The price of butter will prove to anyone that the dairy farmers are enjoying at the present time the best price that they have had for a number of years. Those who work for the Renfrew Machinery Company—and the same is true of other manufacturing concerns—are customers of the farmers, and they too are entitled to a fair wage with which to buy the products of the farm.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. McCann.]

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT

NEWSPAPERS AND PERIODICALS—PUBLICATION OF NAMES OF OWNERS, STOCKHOLDERS, ETC.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved the second reading of Bill No. 20, to amend the Post Office Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is commonly known as the newspaper bill. This legislation was introduced into the house in 1909 by one of the most prominent members of the Liberal party, a great, patriotic citizen, the late Hon. Mr. Lemieux, who so ably presided over this house for many years. It is the law in England, the United States and Australia.

This bill has been before the house since 1925. It came up in that year and in 1926; in 1927 it passed the House of Commons unanimously. It was brought up in 1928, 1929, 1930 and 1935, and now it is being brought forward once more in 1938. That makes eight times it has been introduced in this house. In the other place this bill has been rejected, but no grounds have been given for that rejection. This bill is valid, as was decided by the Supreme Court of Canada the other day in connection with the Alberta legislation.

Mr. Justice Cannon on behalf of the court delivered a strong judgment, in which he said that the Alberta press bill was an invasion of the field of criminal law and a retrograde step to an early day when any criticism of the government was a crime. Mr. Justice Cannon said:

> The federal parliament is the sole authority to curtail, if deemed expedient and in the public interest, the freedom of the press and the equal rights in that respect of all citizens throughout the dominion.
> These subjects were matters of criminal law before confederation, have been recognized by parliament as criminal matters and have been expressly dealt with by the criminal code.
> No province has the right to reduce in that province the political rights of its citizens as compared with those enjoyed by the citizens of other provinces of Canada.

The subject matter of this bill has been before the house for many years. As is well known, the object of the bill is to identify the ownership of the newspapers. For many years past the newspapers have been coming to parliament and securing privileges. Prior to 1882 newspapers were carried free by the Post Office Department. This bill requires what is the law in England, the United States and Australia, namely, a sworn statement of the names of the owners, editors, publishers and stockholders of every newspaper, magazine, periodical or other publication, which shall be filed with the Postmaster General semi-annually. It is not proposed that the Postmaster General shall say what shall appear in the newspapers. That is for the editors or the directors to say; but the Postmaster General is in charge of the administration of the postal laws of this country, and he possesses the same privileges, rights and functions as are possessed by the Postmaster General of England. He may deny the use of the mails to anyone he wishes, without giving any reasons at all. There is in my bill an exception covering religious, fraternal, temperance, scientific and other similar publications, and it is not necessary to file the names of the small stockholders, those owning less than one per cent of the total amount of the stocks, bonds, mortgages or other securities. Any publication which fails to comply with these provisions is to be denied the privileges of the mails. Paid advertising shall be plainly marked, and statements required under the act shall be made in duplicate and delivered to the Postmaster General, who shall make regulations for carrying out the provisions of the act.

I introduce this bill solely in the public interest and in the interests of the press of a liberty-loving country. The bill speaks for itself. It passed the House of Commons unanimously on a previous occasion, but was turned down in another place. There are some thirty-six newspapers in Canada which are in favour of the bill; I need not cite them. This legislation is also supported by the assistant postmaster general of the United States, whose letter will be found in Hansard for 1935. He states:

> The purpose and intent of the law is to discover the real owners of publications entered as second-class matter and to let the public know who controls the editorial policies of the publication. It has been helpful in many instances where it was necessary to ascertain the actual ownership of publications and has also been beneficial in the case of daily publications which are required to show the average daily paid circulation in correcting the practices of some publishers in representing to advertisers a greater circulation for their publication than actually obtained. The law on the whole has been beneficial in its effect.
> The law embodied in paragraph 2 of the above mentioned section, requiring editorial or other reading matter for the publication of which money or other valuable consideration is paid, accepted, or promised to be marked with the word "advertisement," enables readers to determine what is advertising and what is reading matter, and since the advertising portion of publications entered as second-class matter, with certain exceptions, is subject to postage at graduated zone rates, according to distance, the rates ranging from one and one-half cents a pound for the first and second zones to seven cents a pound for the eighth zone, while the reading portion is subject to postage at the flat rate of one and one-half cents a pound, regardless of zone, it also facilitates the collection of the proper postage.

So there is a bonus, a subvention, a subsidy given the press through the Post Office Department.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on the principle of the bill, because that is all I can deal with on second reading. I cannot go over the various clauses until the bill reaches committee, but I would submit that it is undoubtedly within the jurisdiction of this parliament. I would go further and say that chain newspapers in this country are sounding the death-knell of democracy and of the party system in Canada. If this goes on until 1940 those newspapers will bring about the end of the party system of government. It is not in the interests of the people that we should have these chain newspapers sending out chain letters from Ottawa, one to a Liberal newspaper and another, containing the same subject matter, to a Conservative newspaper, so that the people do not know who is behind it. A few years ago the Canadian Press—I think it is still in existence though I do not know where it is this year—was given a subsidy of $50,000 a year. That was questioned in the house in 1919, when Sir Thomas White defended the vote. I believe the two major parties, as well as the other parties to my left, are entitled to have their views presented fairly in the newspapers of Canada. In Ontario the two great parties had that right from the time of confederation, but recently it was taken away. In some newspapers only one side is presented. In my opinion the Canadian Press is just a "me, too" organization. It supports the government of the day, whatever the government of the day happens to be.

Public opinion is not going to be always silenced in the province of Ontario by chain newspapers and so on; the political parties are entitled to place their views and policies before the people. That is what newspapers are for. A newspaper is, or should be, more than a mere business, though of course there is the business side to it and the most important of all to them. I sympathize with the newspapers in the increased cost of production, and I pay tribute to what the newspapers have done during war times and other periods of unrest. As reported at page 2473 of Hansard of 1935, I paid a great tribute to the press of this country. I said:

> The contribution which Canadian newspapers made to the community, the country, education, social benefit, the satisfactory outcome of the war and during the depression; what it did to promote the cause of the poor and needy and of charity and philanthropy and to further every worthy movement on behalf of the soldiers and of the nation at large was invaluable and finds its place on the proudest pages of Canada's history. It was the press that helped very largely to restore Canada to her normal position. Nor can one say too much for the honour and integrity of the press of Canada. The tendency of our Canadian newspapers is decidedly forward, and not backward, and notwithstanding the high cost of material and labour and the depression and the social situation their prospects are bright. I have no doubt that the genius of our newspapers will help to make this country great industrially and socially and in every way, so that Canada will march triumphantly on from strength to strength.

Since that time the position has been to some extent modified. The newspaper is the only medium through which public opinion in the country may be expressed. In that connection possibly I should except the radio. If the free press goes, so go liberty and freedom. Freedom of the press is a social and economic necessity, and was never more necessary than it is to-day. It is essential in connection with popular education.

All the gold in the world will not buy public opinion in Canada. I am sorry that the old Toronto Globe, the organ of George Brown, has since been sold, and has been swallowed up in a merger with the Mail and Empire, a rather independent paper. We all know about the late Harry Anderson, the Jaffray family and others who stood for high principles. We might not have agreed with them, but I can tell the house that I introduced the bill because of remarks made to me by the late John R. Robertson, the great battling editor of the Telegram, a patriot and a man who stood for freedom and liberty of the press, and who worked all his life so unselfishly for the common worker, the forgotten man in Canada.

Second, there was H. W. Anderson, the late brilliant editor of the Globe, a Liberal, a man respected in this country. Then, third, and not least, the late Speaker of the house, the Hon. Mr. Lemieux, who deserved credit in connection with this newspaper bill. These three gentlemen persuaded me to take up this work, and I have worked on it for eight years.

In that time there have been newspaper mergers, newspaper chains, and as a result some of the press has been silenced. We have what I would call newspaper cannibalism in Canada. They have been gobbling and swallowing up papers all over Canada. In connection with this newspaper cannibalism may I refer to what the late Speaker of the house, the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, said in 1919, as reported at page 1563 of Hansard of April 16 of that year.

> Let me give a case in point. The Montreal Herald, for over a century, was an old and faithful adherent of the Liberal party. It was the old, recognized organ of the Liberal party amongst the English-speaking minority of my province. It had a large clientele. Suddenly, after the election of 1911, Mr. Brierly who had become the proprietor of that paper, mysteriously sold it first to Mr. McGibbon, then to Sir Hugh Graham, who afterwards became Lord Atholstan, both being Tories. But Mr. Brierly was the mask; he was still generally supposed to be the owner. One day Mr. Brierly disappeared. As I said, he first sold the paper to Mr. McGibbon and Mr. McGibbon finally sold it to Lord Atholstan, and during all that time the paper retained the appearance of being a Liberal paper, whilst it was kept in existence by Lord Atholstan, only to prevent a rival from coming into the field against the Montreal Star. This was disclosed in a celebrated case in Montreal, and the respectable English-speaking Liberal people of Montreal were shocked to find that such a game had been played at their expense.

In connection with that particular newspaper may I say it was admitted by a gentleman in another section of this building that for many years he was president of that paper, but did not know who owned it. That was admitted right in this building in another place when a similar bill was under discussion.

Newspaper cannibalism has descended on the county of York and the province of Ontario. The old independent newspapers, the old, country weeklies, have been put out of business by trusts and combines and through restraint of trade. They have driven the independent press, and the views expressed by that press, to the wall. That is the condition so great has been the pressure.

In the city of Toronto we used to have six newspapers. First of all the old Toronto World was driven to the wall. Recent events in Canada call public attention to the question of newspaper ownership and identity. The need for the present measure was never more felt than it is to-day. Where a newspaper owner's treasure is, there will his heart be also. He cannot serve God and mammon. He cannot serve two masters, as the Montreal Herald tried to do. The tied newspaper is a menace to democracy. As I say, if it gives only one side it will destroy the party system by 1940. A newspaper should have no tied financial interests to serve. Some trade journals and fashionable social weeklies may render service to the banks, and so on. But a tied newspaper has neither eyes to see nor ears to hear when it has the financial people behind it. It cannot speak out on an issue of the day. It cannot be loyal to the public, to its readers and at the same time to its financial, invisible backers. I believe it was Macaulay who said that John Wesley had said, in the early days of the new church, "You do not make rich men necessary to you." Those are words of wisdom in connection with a newspaper. A tied newspaper has to look to the invisible man behind the scenes for a statement of policy. The newspapers which are respected are those in the hands of old respected families, the sole concern of which is the operation of newspapers. The chains are the property of those whose outside interests are more important. They are just the loud speakers for the interests they represent.

I am not complaining about the three Toronto newspapers. We know who own them; their identity is well known. I am dealing with the press of Canada as a whole. At page 454 of Hansard for 1928, hon. members will find my observations on the second reading of a bill I introduced at that time in connection with newspaper ownership, and the arguments I adduced in favour of the bill.

The Hamilton Herald has disappeared. The London Advertiser, both morning and evening editions, and the Mail and Empire have all disappeared in a short time. The Herald was founded in 1889, and the Advertiser in 1863. The Mail, which ceased to exist on November 2, 1936, was founded in 1872, and absorbed by the Empire in 1883.

There has been a disappearance of newspapers in the larger cities of Ontario, Toronto, Hamilton and London, and the discontinuance of those newspapers has thrown many able newspaper men and fine citizens out of work. The name "Mail and Empire" was a name applied to a merger. The Mail was founded in 1872, as a spokesman for Sir John A. Macdonald and a supporter of the national policy. Then it continued operations until it was absorbed in 1937.

As I have said, since confederation the two old political parties had through the press a way of placing their opinions before the people of the provinces. They have had that means since confederation, but now it has been abolished. Money-bags may buy a newspaper; they may bring about mergers and chains; but they should not be allowed to buy public opinion in this country.

We must look at the way in which the liberty of the press has been interfered with in other countries. In the last few days news respecting Germany has been in the forefront. We know that Germany has had propaganda in British newspapers for twenty years. The Morning Post, one of the old patriotic newspapers, has gone. When it ceased publication, the last of the patriotic journals in England vanished. It has been taken over by another paper, the Telegraph. It is interesting to recall some of the speeches delivered at Nuremberg. It seems strange to hear these speeches boasting of what Germany had done delivered at a time when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was visiting that country. This is what Doctor Dietrich said:

> Liberation of the press from the freedom of the press is one of the greatest historic feats which nazism and fascism have ever accomplished. We have wiped out this freedom of the press—and it is a most glorious achievement.

Is it not a topsy-turvy world when the great rulers boast of having enforced slavery upon their people? If the British Empire is dissolved, the whole world will be in darkness and our lives and liberty will be no more. The decay and decline of the freedom of the press are taking place the world over. There is, in my opinion, no longer any freedom of the press, nor is there any freedom of the pulpit, the legislatures or the universities. We can say nothing right here in this house about foreign affairs; no newspaper will mention foreign afairs; but on Sunday I heard over the radio representatives of United States papers relate what this parliament was going to do in regard to foreign affairs. That is what happens when we are afraid to open our mouths in this house in connection with our foreign policy.

The press of this country are largely to blame for the present state of foreign affairs. With five or six exceptions they failed in their duty. They have all been ready to give lip service to the League of Nations which is now bankrupt, and they have been giving this service for seventeen years. They allowed the finest army and air force and fleet in the world to be scrapped for the benefit of Germany. They encouraged and allowed the armies of France and England to be decreased while Germany was rearming. In my opinion the press, with five or six exceptions, are not doing their duty.

It is interesting to note that the same element is to be found in Great Britain. They are trying to foist a political Anglo-American treaty on the people of that country. This United States agreement will destroy the dominion and the British Empire, and great harm will be done to that Anglo-Saxon federation known as the British Empire. I believe this parliament should do something about the railway situation. I am not going to allow the Canadian National Railways to be thrown to the wolves of private ownership on the urging of newspapers. I believe this parliament should meet this problem as they have done in England and solve it as they did there without anyone losing his job and thus put an end to the $40,000,000 annual deficits.

I do not wish to take up too much time, but I should like, in conclusion, to refer to one or two matters. The Supreme Court of Canada, in upholding the liberty of the press, has rendered a good service to the country. Its decision was that the Alberta press legislation was ultra vires of that legislature. I should like to refer briefly to a report of a special committee of the United States senate which investigated lobbying activities at Washington. Before I quote from this report let me say that a similar condition existed in this country in connection with the evidence given before the mass buying committee. One newspaper was told that if they did not stop referring editorially to the proceedings before that committee certain advertising would be taken out of the paper by big interests. According to the evidence given before this committee of the senate, a similar state of affairs existed in Washington. This investigation was carried on in connection with the president's bill practically to dissolve all holding companies. It was revealed that the duPonts, the Morgans and the Youngs had $12,000,000,000 invested in holding companies. The public utilities power ring attempted to intimidate the New York Times, which was told to stop its criticism of the public utilities or certain advertising would be taken from the paper. I quote from page 987 of the evidence before the United States senate committee as follows:

The Chairman: Well, I might refresh your recollection. Do you remember a telegram that appeared—do you remember an editorial that appeared there that you thought did not show the right spirit on the part of the New York Times, which brought about a desire to consider cancelling advertising with the New York Times?

Mr. Hopson: Yes; I remember that I told our people over the telephone that I thought that the New York Times with their editorial policy on public utilities did more harm than all the advertising we could do, did good, and I saw no advantage in putting any advertising in a paper which accepted the money of business corporations who were trying to protect the property of their investors, and then had editorial writers who had so little knowledge of the business and the problems which we were up against that they destroyed all of the advantage of it by half-baked editorials.

The Chairman: The long and short of it is that you told them to go and see about stopping those editorials or cancelling the advertising?

Which they did. Canada has been the happy hunting ground of these United States corporations. They have seized the public domain of this country and have control of the resources of our mines, the sea, the soil and the forests. They are able to intimidate our newspapers and they even came up here and intimidated the members of the mass buying committee. They went to one newspaper in this dominion and told them that they must stop writing editorials with reference to the mass buying committee or advertising would be taken away from them. That is the same state of affairs which this committee in Washington investigated.

I have no desire to be unfair to the newspapers. Probably my remarks would not apply to 95 per cent of the newspapers in this country. I have paid them a tribute before. The natural resources of this country are controlled by United States companies, and many of our industries have been underwritten in New York. The duPonts were referred to in the investigation at Washigton. They came across into Canada, and their influence was so great that the head of one of their companies was put in charge of the employment commission. Canadian Industries Limited has underwritten a number of companies in Canada engaged in production and distribution and agriculture. The head is one of the duPont industry in Canada.

I have about forty different Canadian editorials here which I could read in support of my bill, but I shall not do so to-night. Another investigation was held in Washington in connection with the newsprint paper industry.

That was in response to senate resolution No. 337. I do not say that conditions are altogether parallel here in Canada, but I know that in England the German ambassador, Joachim von Ribbentrop told Lord Halifax, the British Foreign Secretary, that he wanted these attacks in the British press on Germany to stop, and stop now, and then he flew back to Berlin. But he was told right in the House of Commons that Great Britain was a free country. He also protested to the United States last fall against attacks in the New York press, and they told him the same thing, that the United States was a free country; and that the government could not control the press.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, has been before the house eight times. I can show that the bill is intra vires. I can cite the opinion of the Minister of Justice in 1935, the Hon. Hugh Guthrie, who, when he was asked by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) whether subsection 2 was intra vires, replied:

> I have no objection to expressing my own personal opinion, but I believe it is the rule that it is not proper to ask for legal opinions from the Minister of Justice in regard to these matters. However, I think that the section referred to is within the competence of this parliament if it sees fit to enact it.

When the bill is in committee I shall be glad to answer any questions in regard to the clauses of the bill.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as the house in the session—

Mr. CHURCH: Would the minister defer answering for four or five minutes so that others may speak?

Mr. EULER: I have no objection to any other hon. member following me, but perhaps my hon. friend will be satisfied with what I have to say. I was going to say that as the house in the session of 1935 accepted unanimously a measure proposed by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) in terms practically identical with this one, the government has no objection to the bill now under discussion.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO PERMIT SWEEPSTAKES ORGANIZED BY PROVINCES FOR BENEFIT OF UNIVERSITIES OR HOSPITALS

Mr. ERNEST BERTRAND (Laurier) moved the second reading of Bill No. 28, to amend the criminal code.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is to amend section 236 of the criminal code, by repealing paragraph (e) of subsection 6, which is an exception to the holding of lotteries in Canada, and replacing it with the following:

> (e) sweepstakes organized by the government of a province of Canada by or under a law of the legislature of such province: Provided there shall not be held more than one sweepstake in any province in each calendar year, and provided also the net proceeds of the sweepstake shall be applied exclusively to or divided amongst recognized and legally constituted universities and/or hospitals of the province as may be determined by the said province.
> For the purposes of this paragraph "sweepstake" means a gaming transaction on horse races in the United Kingdom or in Canada and authorized by the legislature of the province of Canada in which the sweepstake is organized.

This question has been debated before in this house. In 1934 the subject was debated when a bill that had passed the senate came before the house. My idea is that the senate is about the same as it was in 1934. Any changes that have taken place in it might or might not be for the better, according to whether we sit here or in another section of this chamber. But the house itself has changed a great deal, and, I would say, for the better.

This is not a political bill. It is a bill on which I understand we can speak our minds, whether we sit on this side of the house or the other.

In the province of Quebec a law was passed in 1934 permitting the operation of lotteries. It is still on the statutes but can not come into operation without an amendment to the criminal code permitting each province to pass a similar law. In the city of Vancouver a plebiscite was held on this question in 1934, with the result that those in favour of lotteries numbered 25,735, as those against, 9,777. I know that in the province of Quebec nobody protested against the law passed during the regime of the late provincial government, and if a plebiscite were held there I am quite sure the result would be almost unanimously in favour of the statute.

The Trades and Labour Congress, on February 14, 1934, also passed a resolution favouring lotteries controlled by government, and that organization represents about 200,000 working men in Canada.

It is a coincidence, Mr Speaker, that the province of Quebec, which has already passed a law for the operation of sweepstakes, and that Vancouver, the metropolis of British Columbia, by plebiscite, should both favour sweepstakes by a large majority, for only a few years ago Quebec and British Columbia were the first two provinces that dared pass a law for government control of the liquor business. How viciously were they attacked all over Canada for that, and not only in Canada but in the United States! Yet to-day, after a lapse of only a few years, all the other provinces of this dominion have followed the example of Quebec and British Columbia, and the federal government of the United States has also followed suit.

The first reason why I am presenting this bill is to put an end to illegality. Lotteries are being held in Canada whether we like it or not. In Montreal, which is no better and no worse than any other city, we can buy lottery and sweepstakes tickets in every club. They are sold in every club in the city. All the brokers are selling them. Janitors of big buildings have them for sale; not only that, but in many buildings they go from one tenant to another asking him to buy tickets. The elevator boys in downtown buildings have them for sale. If we wanted to stop the sale of these tickets our combined mounted, provincial and municipal police would not be numerous enough; we would have to enlarge the gaols of Quebec to lodge there all those who have been selling and purchasing tickets. Tobacco stores at the corners of the large streets have them for sale, and I know a lot of people who are buying them.

Mr. EULER: Members of parliament?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Even members of parliament. If lottery tickets can be sold in this open fashion in the metropolis of Canada, and if such large amounts of money are going out of the country every year, why not divert the business and get the money for charitable institutions in Canada? It seems to me that this paragraph which I ask should be replaced, in section 236, has the effect of enabling a levy to be made on Canadians in favour of Great Britain and Ireland. Our prohibitory law does not prohibit this business; as it stands, it is a farcical law. Let me explain what I mean. Section 3 reads as follows:

> Every sale, loan, gift, barter or exchange of any property, by any lottery, ticket, card or other mode of chance, depending upon or to be determined by chance or lot, is void, and all property so sold, lent, given, bartered or exchanged, is liable to be forfeited to any person who sues for the same by action or information in any court of competent jurisdiction.

Quite often I have seen reports in the Montreal newspapers that the morning after the drawings of the Irish sweepstakes, relatives of persons who had won tickets ran to court to lay an information against their relatives in order to protect them from action by strangers to have the money confiscated.

Mr. BENNETT: It now goes to the crown.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes, that is right. To-day that is so, but a few years ago it was not the law. Speaking as one who has been crown prosecutor in Montreal for seventeen years, I must admit that lately the crown has never had a chance to secure the confiscation of amounts coming to persons who have won tickets in the Irish sweepstakes.

To-day there are thirty governments sponsoring lotteries; and curiously enough, England and the United States, where lotteries are prohibited, indulge in them to a larger extent than any other countries in the world. A few years ago a royal commission investigated the sale of Irish sweepstake tickets in England, and reported that for the first eight sweepstake drawings—and there are three drawings a year, so this happened in a little less than three years—£18,745,000 was sent to Ireland by residents of England. When I reflect that over $90,000,000 was sent to Ireland from England in so short a time, I think that sweepstakes should be allowed in England. In Canada there has never been a royal commission to investigate the amount of money that is withdrawn from the country in this manner; but we know that in four years $3,000,000 has been paid in prizes to Canadians by the Irish sweepstakes alone, and I think we can justifiably arrive at the conclusion that five or six times that amount has been sent to Ireland for the purchase of sweepstake tickets.

There are thousands of persons who do not pay any taxes, and if this bill were passed almost everybody, even the unemployed, would readily buy a ticket to take a chance on a sweepstake for the benefit of our hospitals and universities.

I pointed out a few minutes ago that in Vancouver a plebiscite showed that 25,735 people were in favour of sweepstakes and only 9,777 against them. If this bill should be defeated, and if another bill were passed asking for a plebiscite to be held at the same time as the next general election, I am quite sure that a very large majority would favour sweepstakes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Liberals might make that a new plank in their platform.

Mr. DUPUIS: It would be very helpful to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The hon. gentleman is suggesting something that we on this side of the house do not need. We simply refer to the last general election. We are satisfied with the progress that we have made.

Mr. BENNETT: Forty-six per cent of the voters.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): A large number of tickets have been seized during recent years in the principal cities of Canada; but as the law is applied, the police seized the lottery tickets after some of them had been sold for some time, with the result that the lotteries did not take place and the promoters retained the money for the tickets which they had sold. Action of this kind does not repress crime; it is rather an encouragement of it. I sometimes ask myself whether or not the good-for-nothings who are profiting by this system are going to fight the bill affecting this matter, and I am more convinced that, if these good-for-nothings oppose it, the bill is good legislation. Those who would be most opposed to it are those who have been illegally holding lotteries and sweepstakes all over Canada. Some of them are operating in the north country, in the bush, around Lac Tremblant, north of Montreal; they are selling their tickets not only in Canada but all over the United States.

If this law were passed, it would provide large sums to all the provinces for universities and hospitals. I know that every one in this house thinks this bill is intended perhaps to help the university of Montreal. I readily admit that fact, and I ask hon. members who are fortunate enough to come from provinces in which there are universities with rich foundations, universities that do not need to appeal to the poorer sections of the community for assistance, to give favourable consideration to the university of Montreal when they are called upon to cast their votes. After all, universities like Oxford, Harvard, the university of Paris, were all started on lotteries; yet to-day these institutions are not looked down upon because they were born in sin, so to speak, if we do think, as some of our fellow-countrymen do that lotteries are sinful. In the Reader's Digest there appeared, some time ago, an article in which the calculation was made that the sum of three billion dollars was taken out of the United States in three years by foreign lotteries. This does not include the bootleg lotteries operated in the United States. In one instance $17,000,000 worth of tickets were seized, and according to certain figures quoted before an inquiry held in New York I understand that $8,500,000 worth of lottery tickets are sold in New York and New England a month.

We hear a good deal about the moral aspect of lotteries. Well, I respect all opinion so long as it is sincerely expressed; I even respect the opinions of those who are not of my race or religion. I do not believe, however, anyone can argue that sweepstakes held for the benefit of hospitals or universities are immoral in themselves. After all, if the lotteries are immoral—and I do not admit that they are—they have been permitted for a considerable time in our criminal code, where the object to be won represents less than fifty dollars; and through this section I am seeking to have replaced I do not think that matters will be made any worse.

I have here a book by H. M. Muller on Lotteries. May I read a short passage from it. It is very well written, though I do not think I would go quite as far as this writer does. He says:

> A parliament which declines, on grounds of public morality, to countenance national lotteries, while drawing revenue from the drink traffic, and taking toll from public gambling on horses—

He adds dogs, but in Canada we have no dog races.

> —is guilty of muddled thinking, or hypocrisy, or both.

These are very strong words, and while I would not be prepared to go quite as far as this author does, I quote this passage because I think it is well for every hon. member as well as the public outside to know exactly what other people think about the subject.

I have received a large number of letters, newspaper clippings and resolutions passed by labour unions and municipal councils all in favour of the bill. I have also a statement on gambling and lotteries which has been sent to all the members by the Social Service Council of Canada. As I said a few minutes ago, I respect all opinion, but I find one reason given in this statement which I think should be aired. Let me read it:

> Churches, not supported by the state, had to develop a sense of financial responsibility in their membership and created sacrificial giving. To-day, the demands made by the government in various forms of taxation and the multitudinous appeals for secular charities tend to reduce that kind of giving which is created in a sense of religious obligation to meet the needs of our fellow men. It is increasingly difficult for the churches to appeal to the sense of stewardship, and if, to all the other difficulties, that created by the establishment of national or provincial lotteries is added—

This is what I wish to emphasize particularly—> —the springs of genuine philanthropy will be dried up, and with it the sense of personal responsibility for the well-being of our fellow-citizens.

I do not think the argument is sound that we should not have national lotteries or lotteries held under the authority of the provinces, lotteries for charitable purposes, because the churches are afraid that they will not receive as large sums from their adherents. I do not think the reason is a good one, either from the point of view of the churches themselves or from the point of view of the hospitals and universities. After all, if everyone has a chance to buy a ticket, knowing quite well that his chances are very small indeed, in fact that he has practically no chance of winning, and chooses for the mere pleasure to take that chance, believing that at the same time, even if he loses, he is helping some hospital or university, how will that prevent millionaires from making donations to hospitals and having their own names commemorated in connection with a pavilion or something of that sort? I trust that some better reason can be advanced.

FARM IMPLEMENTS COMMITTEE

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT PRESENTED APRIL 8, 1937

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) for concurrence in the second report of the special committee appointed to investigate farm implement prices, presented to the house on the 8th of April, 1937.

Mr. McCANN: When the house rose at six o'clock I was speaking to the motion of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston) for concurrence in the report submitted by the special committee appointed to investigate farm implement prices. I said that while I concurred in the major part of the report, I did not agree with recommendation No. 16 with reference to cream separators. That recommendation is that the tariff on these machines be eliminated. I pointed out that this was a fact-finding committee and that it did not have all the data upon which to make the recommendations which it submitted in its report.

In addition there were also recommendations on matters which had not come before the committee at all. I pointed out that in a matter of this kind, although it is assumed to affect the farmers in dairying communities more than anyone else, consideration should be given to those persons in urban communities who manufacture these farm implements. I was making particular reference to the Renfrew Machinery Company who, I may say, are specialists in the manufacture of cream separators. As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, in 1932 the previous government put a tariff of 25 per cent on the importation of cream separators. I want to show that, though one would expect a manufacturer of this commodity to take advantage of that tariff in order to increase prices, the Renfrew Machinery Company took exactly the opposite course. Let me read a letter which they sent out in June of 1933, the tariff having been imposed in September, 1932. This circular letter reads:

Change in Selling Policy—Lower Prices Authorized!

Dear Madam:

We are very pleased to be able to announce to you that an entire and radical change in the sales policy of this company has been authorized by our directors to become effective right away. This change has been brought about by the fact, that the prices of farm produce have fallen to such an extent, that they are now completely out of line with the prices of farm equipment, hence the necessity for substantial reductions in prices of such equipment.

The question arose as to what method could be adopted to reduce the costs of marketing our products, namely cream separators. . . . Finally we decided on a new method of selling and by so doing we are able, not only to make a reduction but to bring the prices on Renfrew lines down to a level entirely in keeping with the present returns from farm produce. Incidentally, there are other advantages in the new system that you will find most beneficial.

This method will also improve our service to our customers and, furthermore, we can assure you that in lowering our prices we are not changing in any way whatever the quality, workmanship or material going into our goods. We are reducing our costs in selling, not in manufacturing. We positively guarantee to our customers the same quality of goods that this company has been noted for during the past twenty-five years.

In my opinion that conclusively demonstrates that this company did not take advantage of the tariff which was imposed, but rather passed on to their customers any advantages that existed. In order to substantiate that statement I want to quote some of their prices in 1932 and 1933, indicating the reductions both in dollars and in percentages. The type of machine called 12-K sold in 1932 for $93. In 1933, after the tariff was imposed, it sold for $67, a reduction of $26, or 27·9 per cent. Type 14-K sold for $105 in 1932 and $69 in 1933, a reduction of $36. Type 18-K sold for $125 in 1932; the price was reduced to $74 in 1933, a reduction of $51, or 40·8 per cent. The picture is the same in three other lines; reductions were made running all the way from 26·6 per cent to 36·1 per cent. This, to my mind, is sufficient to justify the statement that this company, who specialize in the manufacture of cream separators and who are not general manufacturers of farm implements, did not take advantage of the tariff in order to increase their prices, as it is often claimed that other companies do.

In his remarks the other day the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston) said that the policy of the implement companies had been continually to increase their prices, and that they had put on an increase only last November. I took particular care to find out from the company of which I am speaking what their action was in this regard last November. In reply to a letter written to them a few days ago I received this communication this morning:

> We did not increase our prices in the fall of 1937, as was inferred by the member for Lake Centre. . . . We understand other manufacturers of cream separators have increased their prices for 1938. We are just now completing the compiling of our 1938 price list, to become effective about March 15th or April 1st, and we are not increasing our prices on cream separators.

Here again they have demonstrated that they are not taking advantage of the tariff which now exists in order to pass on an increase to the users of these agricultural implements. It is true that on occasion they have increased the prices of cream separators, but those increases were due entirely to increases in the price of materials.

Now let me briefly review the cream separator field in Canada. Some idea of the extent of that industry in this country may be obtained when I say that in 1936 there were 10,985 separators manufactured in Canada, while 17,077 were imported. Of this total of approximately 28,000 machines comparatively few were used for export purposes. For the purposes of the present discussion the figures indicating the number and value of the machines manufactured in Canada or imported into this country during the calendar years 1933 to 1936 inclusive will be given. Figures are not available to show the number of machines made in Canada and exported during those years, or figures showing the number of machines imported and later exported, but such information would not be of special value at this time. In 1933 the number produced in Canada was 6,652, with a value of $431,530. In 1934 there were 9,963 separators produced, with a value of $675,167, and in 1936 the production totalled 10,985, with a value of $717,969. These figures are taken from a commodity bulletin issued by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. The bulletin also indicates that five firms in Ontario produced cream separators in 1935. The figures for 1936 have been taken from a letter from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics dated June 3, 1937. In 1933 there were 9,560 separators imported: From the United Kingdom, 535; from the United States, 4,235; from Germany, 427 and from Sweden, 4,234.

Now I am going to jump from 1933 to 1936, when the total number imported was 17,077, with a value of $412,706. From the United Kingdom there were 1,994; from the United States, 958; from Germany, 577; from Sweden, 13,174; and from other countries—Belgium and Denmark—something over 200. The Canadian separator market, by virtue of its close relationship to the huge Canadian dairying industry—it is actually a branch of the dairying industry—is much more extensive even than the above figures indicate. The number of farmers in eastern Canada owning cows stands at about 329,000. The number of farmers in eastern Canada using separators is approximately 80 per cent of that number, or 263,000. The number of farmers in western Canada owning cows is 209,000 odd, and of those using separators is 167,000, or approximately 80 per cent. The total number of farmers in Canada owning cows is about 538,000, and of those using separators 431,000.

Every farmer with a cow is a prospect for a cream separator sale. The sale of new separators is not the only factor which interests the supplier or user of separators. Repairs and replacements are of paramount importance, and are constantly to the fore. A farmer uses a cream separator usually twice a day, every day of the year. The result is a large annual demand, from necessity, for replacements. The average recognized life of a cream separator of the quality made by the Renfrew Machinery Company, and similar machines, is approximately ten years. Obviously if one machine is better looked after than another, with respect to care of operation and so on, it will outlive the machine which has not been given as good attention, or even abused.

I should like to point out the value of this industry to Canada. An analysis of this situation indicates that the annual cream separator replacements call for 43,127 machines. The manufacture and sale of over 43,000 separators annually represent an industry of considerable importance. The supply houses affected, the transportation costs, handling charges, and so on, of raw materials, as well as of finished products, together represent the employment of a large number of Canadian workmen, as well as put a great deal of money into circulation throughout the country.

To supply the annual demand for over 43,000 cream separators in Canada is an industry that quite properly belongs to Canadians. Surely Canadian manufacturers of cream separators should be given sufficient protection by a tariff against foreign made machines coming into this country, to prevent these machines from continuing to come in at a very low valuation, for duty purposes, which from present indications appears to be what is happening, and then to be sold to Canadian farmers at long prices.

Surely 430,000 Canadian farmers who are using cream separators deserve to be considered sufficiently to permit them to buy these cream separators at the lowest possible prices. From the above it should be evident that the question of supply and demand or, in other words, the extent of the cream separator market or cream separator industry in Canada is not a small or insignificant one. The Renfrew Machinery Company is not so small or insignificant in its turn as perhaps the committee investigating it has been led to believe.

I should like to pass on from there and point out the policy which has been pursued with reference to the tariff. Prior to October, 1932, cream separators from all countries entered Australia free of duty. In the twelve months ended June, 1932, Sweden shipped 11,873 cream separators into Australia, valued at £98,000, or at an average value of £8 3s. 10d. each. In October, 1932, Australia imposed a duty of fifteen per cent ad valorem on cream separators from foreign countries, with the result that the average value of cream separators shipped from Sweden into Australia dropped to £7 7s. 10d. each. The quantity shipped from Sweden to Australia during the twelve months ending June, 1933, was 17,037 separators, valued at £132,220. This gives the average price of £7 7s. 10d. each.

Cream separators have been admitted into New Zealand free from all countries for a great many years.

Mr. BENNETT: They do not make them.

Mr. McCANN: No, they do not make them in New Zealand. In the calendar year 1932 Sweden shipped into New Zealand 7,958 cream separators which were valued at £87,953, equal to an average valuation of £11 each. No change was made in the tariff of New Zealand as a result of the imperial economic conference. Cream separators continued to enter New Zealand free of duty under all tariffs from any country, and in the calendar year 1933, Sweden shipped into New Zealand 3,847 cream separators valued at £45,010, showing an average value of £11 7s. 10d. each. These figures are taken from the New Zealand Statistical Report on Trade and Shipping. 1933. This latter figure should be compared with the former price of £11 to New Zealand and with the Australian prices of £8 3s. 10d. before the tariff and £7 7s. 10d. after the tariff.

The New Zealand publication, Statistical Report on Trade and Shipping, 1934, gives revised figures for the years 1932 and 1933. These figures show that in 1932 New Zealand imported 7,958 cream separators from Sweden. These were valued at £96,748 with an average value of over £12 each. In 1933 Swedish imports to New Zealand numbered 3,847, costing £56,262, with an average value of over £14. For 1935, figures supplied show that New Zealand imported 2,513 cream separators valued at £41,081, with an average value of over £16. These additional figures, which may be verified upon application to the Department of Trade and Commerce at Ottawa, indicate that the value of cream separators imported into New Zealand has been increasing year after year.

Similarly in the case of Canada, until after the imperial economic conference cream separators entered Canada free from all countries. In the calendar year 1932 Sweden shipped into Canada 3,030 cream separators, valued at $70,951. The average value converted into sterling at par is £4 4s. 5d. each.

In October, 1932, due to the imperial economic conference agreement, Canada imposed a duty of 25 per cent ad valorem on all foreign cream separators, leaving them free under the British preferential tariff. Yet during the calendar year 1933 Sweden shipped into Canada 4,234 cream separators, valued at $66,492, which equals an average valuation of £3 1s. 5d. each.

After the application of duty on Swedish cream separators, resulting from the imperial economic conference, the average invoice price to Australia and Canada was lowered by the amount of duty imposed, and the invoice price to New Zealand, where no duty was applied against Sweden, did not fall but increased.

Upon a review of these figures it is apparent, as it was apparent to some New Zealand people interested in this business, that the manufacturers themselves, instead of the dairy farmers of New Zealand, are benefiting by the admission of cream separators to that country free of duty.

These facts allow the conclusion to be drawn that the Swedish manufacturer is making the New Zealand dairy interests pay in part for the reduction in price that was made for Canada and Australia, after the tariff was imposed. I think it is logical to assume that if recommendation No. 16 of the committee is implemented, the same result will be achieved in Canada. That is, prices in Canada will rise immediately the Canadian manufacturers have been put out of business and that process may not be a very lengthy one. The committee to investigate farm implement prices did not consider these broad and more serious features of the situation. Witnesses were not called to explain these features and this recommendation was made without the committee having all the facts before it.

I am of the opinion that, unless we have the competitive feature, the same policy will be duplicated in this country. If Swedish manufacturers are to be allowed to export their machines to Canada free of duty, they are going to put Canadian manufacturers out of business. What will they do when that competition is removed? They will duplicate their policy in New Zealand and Australia. When the Canadian manufacturers are out of business, prices will go up. It will be very difficult to induce Canadian capital and Canadian business men to go back into the business from which they have been driven. I submit that if the tariff is removed entirely in the guise of doing something for the dairying industry, in the long run the farmers of Canada will have to pay more than they would with competition in the country.

Mr. GOLDING: Did that happen before 1932?

Mr. McCANN: In New Zealand?

Mr. GOLDING: No, here in Canada.

Mr. McCANN: Did what happen? I do not understand the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. GOLDING: What you describe as going to happen; did that happen before the tariff was imposed at all?

Mr. McCANN: They were not in business to the same extent in Sweden at that time. As I pointed out when I was speaking on this same subject, is it fair to the Canadian workmen to be placed in the same position as Swedish workmen? The average wage paid in Sweden is 19·5 cents an hour, while the average wage received by mechanics in this line of business in Canada is 55 cents an hour.

I want my position with respect to tariffs definitely understood. I am not a high protectionist, neither am I a free trader. I should like to take a medium course, not because that is the line of least resistance but because under our present economic system we must raise money by taxation to keep the affairs of the country going. With the customs tariff and the excise tax bringing in a revenue of approximately $100,000,000, no political party in this country will dare to come out and say that they are in favour of the removal of all tariffs. Such a policy would not be economically sound and it cannot be done.

Our artisans and mechanics and manufacturers are entitled to protection just as are our farmers. Our farmers are being dealt with fairly. I have found no particular criticism of this item from the farmers of Ontario. It appears strange to me that most of the criticism should come from the farmers of the west. What have the farmers of Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan been doing these last three years? They came down here in 1936 and 1937 with empty carpetbags and took them back in the spring filled to the brim. They have come back again this year to do the same thing.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Many of them live off the cream can.

Mr. McCANN: Yet they want to remove the only measure of protection there is for these manufacturers. I see that my time is nearly up, but I should like to make a suggestion in this regard. I suggest that the question of the duty on cream separators be referred to the tariff board to be inquired into in detail. I for one will be ready to abide by any decision they may make. If this particular recommendation is acted on and the duty is removed from cream separators, it will mean the closing up of the Renfrew Machinery Company. That will mean that 225 mechanics will be thrown out of employment and they and their dependents, totalling 700 or 800 people, will be forced on relief. It will mean that the 1,000 to 1,200 men who are out in the field selling these machines will have to look for other jobs. I think these are matters that the government might well take into consideration. I should like to remind the Liberal government, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in particular, of the assertion made prior to the election of 1935, that it was not the policy of the Liberal party to put any legitimate business out of commission.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to join with other hon. members who have expressed their appreciation of the efficient and fair manner in which the chairman and officers of this committee conducted their inquiries. Having said that, I should like to discuss this matter from the standpoint of what I believe to be the declared policy of the present government. I realize that I am addressing myself to a Liberal government having the largest majority which any government has enjoyed at any time in the history of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COLDWELL: Some of my Liberal friends say, "hear, hear;" but lest we forget, I am going to quote from the tariff plank of the last national convention of the Liberal party.

Mr. FINN: That is our chart.

Mr. COLDWELL: Let us see how far you have kept to that charter.

Mr. FINN: Chart.

Mr. COLDWELL: I beg your pardon; I should have said "chart." I quote as follows:

That the best interests of Canada demand that substantial reductions of the burdens of customs taxation be made with a view to the accomplishing of two purposes of the highest importance: First, diminishing the very high cost of living which presses so severely on the masses of the people; second, reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the dominion; the vigorous development of which is essential to the progress of our country.

That to these ends, wheat, wheat flour, and all products of wheat, the principal articles of food, farm implements and machinery and repair parts thereof; rough and dressed lumber, gasoline, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils, etc., nets, net twines, and fishermen's equipments; cement and fertilizers, should be free from customs duties, as well as the raw material entering into the same.

Skipping a paragraph which is not material, I read this:

—and the Liberal party hereby pledges itself to implement by legislation the provision of this revision when returned to power.

That platform was adopted by the Liberal party in 1919, and since 1919 that party has been in power eleven years. I think it is noteworthy that the opposition we have heard in this debate to the lowering of the tariff or the elimination entirely of the customs duty on certain farm implements should come from hon. gentlemen who were elected to this house as Liberals. We are told from time to time that the fundamental difference between the Liberal and Conservative parties is that the Liberal party is low tariff while the Conservative party is high tariff. To-day we have witnessed the spectacle of Liberal members rising in their places and urging the retention of present tariff or tariffs.

The report now before the house cost the country a great deal of money. As a member of that committee and as one who is interested in the recommendations contained in this report, I should like to ask the house and the government what we are going to do now that we have the report and its recommendations. To-day various speakers have discussed features of the inquiry brought out during the evidence submitted last summer, and I do not propose to rehash what has been already said to-day. The hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Needham), the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) and others touched upon certain features which I had very much in mind myself.

But what stands out in the report, and in the discussion which led up to that report, was to me the tremendously great spread between the costs of manufacturing farm machinery and the price the farmer had to pay for it when he bought it. We asked the president of the International Harvester Company what he thought about the costs of distribution, and he admitted that they were too high. We asked him what he proposed to do about the matter, and he said they had been endeavouring to discover more efficient ways of distributing farm implements. I asked him, if the western farmers established cooperative societies for the distribution of farm implements, would his company, the largest in North America, supply the cooperative societies with implements for distribution? He evaded that question. But a little later in the inquiry the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), at page 492 of the evidence, asked very definitely if the company would supply cooperative societies with agricultural implements, and the answer was a very emphatic no. Consequently I am particularly interested in the recommendation which deals with that very point. We recommend in paragraph 33:

That the committee is of the opinion that the cost of distribution of farm implements is unnecessarily high and constitutes an important factor in the prices to the consumers.

And in paragraph 34:

That the companies themselves should make every effort to reduce these costs or farmers should be encouraged to organize for the cooperative distribution and servicing of farm implements.

To me that is more than a pious hope, and in view of the fact that the farm implement companies have not yet attempted to reduce the admittedly high costs, but on the contrary have in some respects even raised them, I hope that the government in considering the report will make some recommendation to the house for the establishment of cooperative selling agencies at least for the distribution of farm implements in order that they may be distributed at prices more nearly in line with what they ought to be.

The hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) this afternoon defended the companies very ably, I think, but I found myself in disagreement with him except when he deplored the frequent investigations of this industry and the few results that had accrued to the people of Canada. But after this latest and very thorough inquiry I think the government should act upon such recommendations of the committee as are found to be sound. I believe that the recommendations arrived at, after very careful investigation and very careful consideration of all the evidence, are sound; but so far, as I said before, the companies have done nothing about the matter themselves.

Again I would ask the government and the majority supporting it what they propose to do about this matter. I have not forgotten that some of us two years ago agreed with those who raised this question in the house, with the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston), for example, when he complained of the price of implements; and as will be remembered, when the Canada-United States trade agreement was before the house I moved that farm implements be placed on the free list, as a gesture against what was then being done. But that motion was not pressed because of the inquiry which was then being undertaken. I am hoping now, two years having elapsed, and having had a sufficient opportunity to look into this matter, that the government will take effective steps to see that the farmers not only of the west but of the east are given their agricultural implements at a reasonable price; and not only their implements at a reasonable price, but that the cost of repairs and servicing be looked after for them also, because when we inquired into the cost of repairs we found they were entirely out of line with the cost of new machines.

We are sometimes told that one of the factors accounting for the increased prices is an increase in labour costs; but may I point out that in the last few years the improvements in machinery, reducing the number of men employed and increasing the total output per man in the factory, has in effect not added to the actual cost of labour, and in that respect I find myself not altogether in agreement with one of the conclusions of this report. One difficulty, of course, which we have to face in Canada is that there is a tremendous capital investment in these companies. Like many of our other Canadian industries they have been established and have grown up with the idea that there was more or less an unlimited market, and their capitilization in the aggregate is out of line with the actual requirements of the country in which we live.

Then of course we found, too, that the price of agricultural implements tended to be set by any company which had a virtual monopoly of certain lines of machinery. We found in our investigation that one company, the International Harvester Company, controlled some sixty per cent of the agricultural implement business in Canada; and although that company denied—and I believed the president when he made that denial—that there was any collusion between the several companies with regard to price fixing, nevertheless I think that practically all the members of the committee were of the opinion that the smaller companies set their prices after they had seen the prices set by the larger implement company. Therefore, in effect, the International Harvester Company did set prices in most lines of machinery for the entire industry.

To those who defend the tariff I would say again that on the prairies, where most of this very high priced machinery has to be used—not is used, but has to be used—the farmer sells his product on the unprotected markets of the world. Consequently, if we are going to give industries and organizations from which he has to buy, protection in this market, obviously we shall have to consider those proposals that have been called in this house "compensating adjustments" of various kinds. If we are going to guarantee to the industrialists a price for their products, then we shall also have to guarantee to the producer minimum prices for the products which he produces.

I confess that in this house there seems not very much likelihood of substantial tariff reductions, because after a period, extending into years, during which the Liberal party have had every opportunity to make those reductions to which they are pledged, and listening to the debates in the house, watching the budgets that have come down, noticing—as I said yesterday—actual increase in the tariff on one necessity of life, furniture, and high duties on other necessities of life, I do not see very much hope from this government in the direction of really lower tariffs.

The hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann) spoke of the competition given to local manufacturers from cream separators imported from Sweden. He attributed Swedish ability to export and lay down cream separators in Canada at a much lower price than that at which they could have been manufactured here to the fact that Sweden has a lower standard of living than we have. I do not know where he got the information regarding the average wage of the Swedish worker which he placed at 19½ cents an hour, but I do say this, that the International Labour Office at Geneva and observers generally throughout Europe make the statement that the Swedish worker today is the best housed, the best clothed, the best looked after, and in many respects the best-off worker in any European country. Consequently, how can it be said that it is the low standard of life in Sweden which accounts for lower costs of production there is more than I can understand. Long hours are not in effect there either; the workers are well organized, and the government of Sweden has the most advanced social legislation of any of the European countries.

The hon. member for Renfrew South also said that the reason for the increase in the price of separators laid down in New Zealand in recent years over preceding years was the fact that the Swedish manufacturers had eliminated competition there. I do not know to what extent that is true; but I would draw this to his attention, that in the past few years one factor at least which must have operated was that the New Zealand pound has been greatly depreciated, which means that it would buy less in the markets of the world. Consequently the tendency would be to increase the price as stated in New Zealand pounds; for if four New Zealand pounds of seven or eight years ago have the purchasing power of only five pounds at the present time, it is obvious that a foreign nation exporting to New Zealand will have to increase the price to at least that extent. I would draw that to the attention of the house when we hear of the increased price of cream separators in New Zealand.

As I said before, previous speakers have covered the ground which I intended to cover, and therefore I do not propose to repeat what they have said, because that is wearisome to the house and to anyone discussing the matter. I would simply say again to the government: There is the report on the table; there are the recommendations; the government has an overwhelming majority, a majority which enables it to fulfil every pledge that it has ever made, and one of the definite pledges which the government made through the party which elected it and which formulated the Liberal platform upon which it appealed to the country, was that farm implements would be admitted into this country free of all customs duties. And I say to the government, What are you going to do about this?

Mr. T. A. THOMPSON (Lanark): I should like to make a few observations upon the matter under discussion. I was not a member of that committee and was not conversant with their findings, and I have not had time to study their report, but I have listened attentively to the addresses which have been delivered to-day, and I was amused to hear this afternoon the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) and the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann) making speeches in this house that might well have been made from the Conservative benches.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Never.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. THOMPSON: It might not be a bad idea to invite them to come across here; we have a few empty seats, and I can assure them that they would be welcome. But it may be better to leave them where they are. A little leaven leavens the whole lump, and no doubt they would be able to do better work where they are than they would do over here.

An hon. MEMBER: Don't rub it in.

Mr. THOMPSON: The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Bouchard), speaking this afternoon, made the statement that between 1925 and 1929, when the Liberal government was in power and there were low tariffs, more people were employed in agricultural implement factories than from 1929 to 1932, at a time when the tariff had been increased by the late government. Everyone knows that comparison is most unfair. From 1924 to 1929 were four of the most prosperous years that Canada has ever known. The country had abundant crops; farmers had the purchasing power and were able to buy machinery, and that is why the people were kept at work. In the years between 1929 and 1932 Canada, in common with other countries, was going through one of the worst depressions the world has ever known. There were no crops; farmers had no purchasing power, and the machine companies could not manufacture the machinery because they could not sell it. The tariff played no part in those conditions.

We have been told in the course of this debate that 32 per cent of the agricultural implements sold in Canada are manufactured here, and that 68 per cent of them have been imported into this country. That means that we are sending 68 per cent of our money into a foreign country to pay foreign labourers and to build up foreign institutions instead of having these machines manufactured at home.

There seems to be a common impression among hon. members opposite that high tariffs mean high prices to the consumer. The very opposite is the fact; high tariffs have always meant cheaper goods to the consumer. Take, for instance, farm implements. The former government had a tariff of 25 per cent and along with that an agreement with the companies that if they raised the price to the farmer, that tariff would be reduced. This government came in and cut that tariff down to 7½ per cent, which nullified the agreement made by the former government, and up went the price of farm machinery. Nothing else could be expected, for this reason, that if United States manufacturers are allowed to come in and take 68 per cent of the business of Canada, with the small turnover that our own manufacturers have, the manufacturers here must necessarily obtain a larger profit or they cannot live. Therefore the lowering of the tariff has cost and will cost our farmers some millions of dollars. History is only repeating itself. We all remember, at any rate I can remember when binder twine, barbed wire and coal oil were put on the free list. What happened? They just doubled in price, and putting these things on the free list has cost the farmers of Canada millions of dollars in the extra money that they have been obliged to pay for barbed wire, coal oil and binder twine.

I have often wondered why our western representatives come into this house and talk the way they do. I have been here for a number of years and I find that year after year they rise in their places and denounce the tariff. They cry for free trade. They would kill the industries of eastern Canada, the industries of Ontario and Quebec; they would put them out of business, and by so doing they would be putting their own customers out of business.

Mr. FINN: What about the maritimes?

Mr. THOMPSON: The maritimes are all right. As I say, these hon. gentlemen would destroy their own customers; and yet some of them will rise in their places here and ask for a few million dollars to buy seed wheat, knowing perfectly well that these very industries in Ontario and Quebec will be called upon to meet the cost, because these two provinces pay between 75 and 80 per cent of the taxes of the entire dominion. Yes; they would bite the hand that feeds them. That is exactly what they have been doing for years. I am willing to help the western farmers, and I think we do help and are only too glad to help them when the grasshoppers eat their crops or when the frost blights them or the drought burns them out. Whenever the western farmers suffer these calamities we come to their assistance. But there is a limit to what we can be expected to do when these very men come here and seek to kill the industries of the country upon which our eastern farmers depend; for let me tell the house that it is the men and women engaged in the industrial life of the country who make the home market for the farmer.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Did the increase in the tariff on furniture result in a decrease in price last spring?

Mr. SPENCE: We are talking about farm implements.

Mr. THOMPSON: The importations of furniture have increased and the price has also increased. It is higher to-day than it ever was. Let me point out what has happened in connection with farm implements. In 1934 there was $2,850,000 worth of farm implements imported into Canada and in 1936 with the duty lowered the amount was $8,811,000.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Were they not practically all tractors?

Mr. THOMPSON: No, they were not. In 1937 Canadian farmers sent $16,275,000 for farm implements to fill the pay envelopes of a foreign country and to build up foreign institutions. Then we send men to Washington to get down on their knees and beg these people to allow us to send over some food to them. Our own people should have been manufacturing these implements in Canada and then they would have used our own farm products without hindrance. If we were manufacturing not only farm implements but textiles, also sufficient to supply our own people, there would not be an idle man or woman in the country to-day.

Mr. TUCKER: Why were there idle men in 1931?

Mr. SPENCE: The Liberal government was too long in power.

Mr. THOMPSON: The policies which my hon. friend enunciates in this house would beggar the country if they were ever put into operation; they would simply ruin us and make us a nation of beggars. In the Globe and Mail to-day I was struck with something I saw on the front page. The premier of Ontario is reported to have said that in October there were 160,000 people on relief in the province, and that in February, last month, there were 260,000. That will be found on the front page. What is the cause? It is the tariff tinkering of this government, which is putting our people out of work. I know one man who owns several factories. He owned one in a certain town in the Ottawa valley and he decided to tear it down. Why? He said that every time the government changed they were faced with the danger of being put out of business. He said he could employ two hundred people if he could be guaranteed the protection he had between 1930 and 1935, but he would not be tormented by the tinkering with the tariff. He simply decided to tear down his factory, level the ground and turn it into a park.

Our people to-day are being put out of business; people are being forced into the relief lines because our industries are not given the protection they should get. Do you expect the people of Canada to come down to the standard of living that obtains in these foreign countries from which competition comes? We are proud that Canadian workers can live comfortably and bring up their families and educate them as good Canadians and British subjects, and we do not want to see our standard of living lowered to the level that we see in those countries which are attempting to dump their goods here.

Mr. TUCKER: What about the United States?

Mr. THOMPSON: Who is shouting now? Oh, it is some more of the economists. It appeared to me that the hon. member for Renfrew South placed this matter in a very fair light. He said that if we permitted these companies to go out of business, we would pay a great deal more for our products when they were controlled by a foreign country. As I said a moment ago, we had an example of that in connection with binder twine and barbed wire. What about our binder twine to-day? These United States manufacturers sit down in Chicago and set the price that will be charged in Canada for binder twine. We have allowed our binder twine to get into the hands of a foreign country, and we have been paying through the nose for it. In 1896, when the duty was taken off, we had twenty-five small factories manufacturing binder twine in this country. They were the nucleus of a big business that we might have had, but they were crushed out by the mass production of the United States. Then, when our people were out of business, the United States concerns had us where they wanted us, and to-day they charge what they wish.

Mr. TUCKER: What about the—

Mr. THOMPSON: My hon. friend over here has taken up a great deal of the time of the house, and whenever he makes a speech he asks for a little extra time. I do not take up very much time, and I try to talk reasonably and sensibly when I am addressing the house. I have been obliged to listen to a great deal of bunk, and I have listened without interfering with the hon. member; I have let him go on with it.

Let me say here that we are getting off on the wrong foot in this country when we bring about any differences between capital and labour. They are not enemies; they are partners in the development of this dominion, and you could not place upon the statute books any law that would reflect upon one that would not work back to the other. We must stand or fall together in this country; we must work together for its development. Industry looks to the farmer for a market, and the farmer produces the food for industry. Each is dependent upon the other, and we must cease flying at each other's throats. I am confident that if we were manufacturing in Canada the goods that we consume in this country, we would give employment to every man and woman here, and to a great many more men and women who would be very pleased to make this the land of their adoption. We have listened long enough to this cry of free trade, and I think brighter days are coming. When two men, elected as Liberals, such as the hon. member for Brantford City and the hon. member for Renfrew South rise in their places and make such speeches as we have heard to-day, the future does not look so dark.

Mr. DAVID SPENCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, at five-thirty this afternoon I was on my feet, and I thought I had a fairly good speech to deliver. Since then, however, I am afraid I have had to scrap most of it, because it has been said by other speakers. Consequently I shall have to satisfy myself by making a few observations. When one follows the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson) on our side of the house, there is not much left for one to say, because he covers the ground so thoroughly, and I wish to congratulate him upon his splendid address.

I do not agree with the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) when he advocates bringing cream separators into Canada from foreign countries free of duty. He is always good at discussing academic questions, which I do not fully understand; but after all, with all the knowledge he has, he does not seem to appeal to me as a good Canadian, and I do not mind saying so. He is always advocating something that is detrimental to the working people of this country, such as he has suggested to-night.

I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) who made a splendid address, in regard to which his country and his own riding should be tickled to death. It was well delivered, and what he said was absolutely true and to the point. That would have been so regardless of whether it was delivered by a Liberal or a Conservative.

Miss MACPHAIL: It does not matter, really.

Mr. SPENCE: The hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann) did the same thing, and I say he deserves credit for giving us full information as to the difference between wages paid in Scandinavian countries and those paid in Canada. I was proud of him to-night as he stood in his place and delivered an address equal to any I have heard delivered in this house by any Liberal during the seventeen years I have been here. It is not often that the Liberals talk really good common sense, when it comes down to business. They are always opposed to something that will build up the nation. I do not know where they get their ideas.

With my hon. friend the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) I cannot agree at all. He seems to be out of touch with things. Instead of something sane that a government could adopt, which one would expect from the brilliant chap that he is, we had a stupid recommendation to-night. Everybody knows this country cannot live without protection, and those who do not know it might as well get it into their heads. I see that gradually the light is beginning to dawn. It will seep in further and further until after a while you will get to the point where you will do something for your country. I hope it will not be too long delayed.

I happened to be on the committee that investigated the prices of farm implements in 1936, but fortunately for the committee, or fortunately for myself, or something, they got rid of me in 1937. A smaller special committee was appointed, and I was laid off. I listened to a great deal of evidence given there that I thought was of very little importance. Some of it was rather amusing. I think some hon. members on that committee suggested that the prices of farm implements were entirely too high, and that the people in the west were getting so little for their grain that they could not afford to buy implements at all. They even suggested that these farmers should be allowed to pay just what they thought they could pay, and that the balance should be absorbed by the government or by some organization appointed by the government. That was the kind of stuff one heard on that committee; that was one of the arguments advanced there.

An hon. MEMBER: Who argued that?

Mr. SPENCE: I do not know. I never keep notes of what hon. members say in the house, so I cannot tell tales. But if you will go back to the records of that committee meeting you will find that two or three hon. members from the west made that suggestion. If there is anything more ridiculous than that, go back to the west and find it. I do not see how you can.

It is unfortunate there is so much time wasted. Hon. members cannot say that I waste much of the time of the house—perhaps ten minutes a week. Some hon. members start in at three o'clock in the afternoon and do not stop until eleven o'clock at night. Half a dozen of them talk all day, and nobody else gets a word in. Do not forget that. But if I am going to pound a little common sense into some hon. members I must take some time to do it.

We are losing a great deal of time in discussing things of the past. I say we are here to legislate for the future. Let us forget the past. Let us start in to do something for the people here in Canada at the present time. Let us try to get this country back to normal—which we are not doing. We have wasted a lot of time in discussing economic questions and radical resolutions. I think all hon. members and particularly those members to my left, will admit that. A great deal of time has been spent in discussing questions which, in the end, amount to nothing. We have now wasted about two months of the session, and have done nothing. The members of the senate have been going back and forth to their homes. They adjourn for a month; then they come back and adjourn for a week, and still, with the exception of a couple of bills which passed this house, they have had nothing to do. Is that not a waste of time?

Let me tell hon. members that if the people in our ridings could see the way we act in the house, they would ask for a dissolution of the house at once, and advocate the formation of a committee of one hundred, or something of the kind, to run the country. Sometimes I would like to see that myself, because it is a waste of time to have the house sitting with sometimes not more than twenty-five members who are taking any interest in the proceedings. What interest is taken by the members who are supposed to occupy these two lines of benches? You may look anywhere in the house—everywhere. They might as well be home, and not be in Ottawa at all.

An hon. MEMBER: Why don't they go?

Mr. SPENCE: They have lots of places to go.

An hon. MEMBER: They are working in their rooms.

Mr. SPENCE: Are they? They are playing bridge in some corner! Such intolerable ignorance of business affairs is displayed by some hon. members, something which is astonishing to one who from boyhood has been trained in the business world. It is astonishing to listen to people in the house who have never sold even a box of matches, or never made a trade in their lives, tell us how to run the country. It is amazing! It is useless discussion.

There can be no doubt that prices of commodities rise and fall. I shall cover this point later on when I discuss the investigation into farm implements. I would repeat that supply and demand will always regulate prices, regardless of any attempts made by governments to regulate people's business and to regulate prices. You cannot get away from the old law of supply and demand, so you might as well make up your minds that you will have to get back to normalcy before the country can make headway.

Many members of the house should still be in kindergarten, so far as any knowledge of business is concerned.

Mr. FINN: You should be the teacher.

Mr. SPENCE: Calamity howling is the principal act in the House of Commons. I came down on the train from Toronto yesterday with a gentleman from Saskatoon, a brilliant chap who said to me that the people in the House of Commons from the western provinces are not representing the viewpoint of people in the west. He said that he disapproves the tactics used by those members who picture the sad scenes of people in distressed circumstances, and all that sort of thing. He said it was not advertising for Canada or for the prairie provinces.

An hon. MEMBER: But they are true.

Mr. SPENCE: They are not true at all; he says they are not true. There is in the house no more brilliant man than the man with whom I was duscussing the subject yesterday, and he was a Liberal from Saskatoon. You may pick out who he was. He says that Saskatoon is paying its debts and pulling itself out of the hole. You can hear nothing in the House of Commons but calamity howling, all the time. I think that man was a Liberal, although I did not ask him. It makes no difference to me what a man's politics may be. I like to discuss business, whether a man be a Liberal or a Conservative.

An hon. MEMBER: He was not brilliant, then.

Mr. SPENCE: He was brilliant, too. I would admit that certain Liberals are brilliant; there is no doubt about that.

When the investigation began into the price of farm implements, it was shown that between 1930 and 1936 commodity prices had increased. It was to be expected that to some extent farm implement prices should increase. The old stocks on hand were gone, and new stock had to be bought. If there were increased costs we could not expect the manufacturers to sell at a loss. One hon. member has suggested that the government should absorb the difference between what the farmer could pay and what the manufacturer should get. Did you ever hear such talk as that in your life?

Mr. TUCKER: We have heard it from Conservatives for a long time. Protection means the same thing.

Mr. SPENCE: Some hon. members on the committee assumed a different attitude. They criticized some facts in connection with the buildings used by the Massey-Harris Company in Toronto. They questioned the propriety of the Massey-Harris people adding overhead costs to the cost of farm implements. Their argument was that that company did not need the buildings to-day, and that there was no reason why they should charge overhead on the farm implements. If you could hear any more ridiculous argument, then I should like to hear it. Anybody knows that all manufacturers write off a certain amount on buildings every year, because they want to keep the assessment as low as possible, and thereby keep down the overhead. The paying of taxes in cities like Montreal and Toronto is an important item for any manufacturer.

That was one of the arguments adduced by two or three members on the special committee which investigated the price of farm implements. It was shown before the committee that at least some of the farm implement manufacturers lost large sums of money during the depression. But you could not convince a farmer that he had not been robbed, and that the manufacturer had made barrels of money. That is the great difficulty.

Let me tell the house this: Jealousy and competition in business keep prices reasonable, regardless of the views of hon. members. If some hon. members had had some training in the business world they would realize just how difficult it is to make a profit. Your neighbour may be in the same business; he may be a competitor, and he will not permit you to make a business profit.

You can look into the different businesses in Canada which have been ruined because a certain class of people have got into them; I shall not say who they are. Big businesses have been wiped out in the last six or seven years. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been lost by men of high integrity in the business world. Men with $250,000 to $500,000 have lost because unscrupulous people got into business and drove out those men who were doing business properly. That is the state of affairs in the business world.

Let me go back to what I said a moment ago about the Scandinavian manufacturer of cream separators. I maintain to-night that if those manufacturers are permitted to ship into this country, free, that will be the end of cream separator manufacturing in Canada. I say that because there is no possible chance of that industry surviving when rates and wages are so low in Scandinavian countries and so high in Canada. I am not saying they are too high in Canada, but I say they are much higher than in other countries. It is the same way in Holland, a country with which I do a great deal of business. Wages are about a third of what they are in Canada. There is no possible hope of this country competing with Scandinavian countries, or with any other parts of Europe. In many European countries wages are not as high as they are in Holland.

For these reasons I say that we need protection in Canada, regardless of whether you are a farmer, a merchant or a manufacturer. Protection is just as much in the interests of the farmer as in the interests of everybody else, because if you have not protection to keep industry busy, you have not a market for your goods, no matter what they may be.

Take that part of Ontario which lies between Toronto and Niagara Falls. In that district you will find a great number of fruit growers and truck farmers. The markets for the products of these farms are to be found in Toronto and Hamilton. If industry in Toronto and Hamilton is killed, the truck farmers and fruit growers in the Niagara Falls district might as well shut up shop because there is no other market for their products. There is a high tariff against these products going into the United States and there is no hope in that direction.

I have probably rambled a little bit and some of my friends are having fun at my expense. I am sorry if I have taken up too much time, but I appeal to the house not to adopt the recommendations of this special committee. They should be thrown out entirely and not sent to the tariff board, as was suggested by the hon. member for Renfrew South. I do not think I would want them to go even that far. It would be a shame to ruin four or five manufacturers of cream separators simply because the farmers can buy these machines a few dollars cheaper in some other country.

Mr. L. P. A. ROBICHAUD (Kent, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the highly amusing speech that has just been delivered I wonder whether you will care to listen to me at this late hour. Until just lately I had no intention whatever of taking part in any discussion at this time. However, inasmuch as I was the only government supporter from New Brunswick on that special committee, I feel it is only proper that I should make a few observations on the motion of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston). I do not intend to go into the details of the findings of the committee as that has been done by previous speakers, and I desire to be brief.

While I do not assume to speak for all of my colleagues from the maritime provinces. I am convinced that I voice the views of the vast majority of the people of the maritime provinces when I plead with this government to reduce, yes, to wipe out entirely the tariff on farm implements, and for that matter on all instruments of production. In support of my contention that I represent the views of the people in the maritime provinces may I be allowed to quote from a report of a speech delivered the other day by Premier Macdonald of Nova Scotia. The report reads:

While federal subsidies "were of some benefit to the government in a sense that they make government financing a little easier, they do not, except in a very indirect way, benefit the people of the province," Premier Angus L. Macdonald said in Nova Scotia's legislature to-day.

Continuing the debate on the address in reply, he said, "The fundamental disability of this province . . . is the effect of the tariff." He followed opposition leader Percy C. Black, who had referred to the difference in retail price of cars sold in the United States and in Canada. "Is not that due to the tariff?" asked the Premier, who referred to a brief presented by Professor Norman McL. Rogers (now federal labour minister) to the Jones commission. The brief showed that, "in 1931 the total net loss caused by the tariff to the people of this province" was $4,478,000.

"I do not think he (the opposition leader) can find one economist in this country, or one commission which has ever investigated the effect of the tariff on the maritime provinces, who will agree with him that the national policy of Canada has been in the interests of these provinces," Premier Macdonald said.

"It has injured our trade. It has increased the cost of the commodities which we import. It has resulted in the concentration of business in central Canada, and the closing up of many a small business in this province. It has added to the burden of our primary producers. It has seriously injured our economic life."

"Had the reciprocity agreement of 1911 gone into effect, who will doubt that the lot of the fishermen in Nova Scotia would have been improved?" he asked. "I would like to have seen Nova Scotia go on under a complete system of free trade." With such a system, "we would be able to run our steel and coal industries and face the world."

I should like to go back to the last sentence in the second paragraph, which reads, "The brief showed that in 1931 the total net loss caused by the tariff to the people of this country was $4,478,000," and also to the third sentence in the fourth paragraph, which reads, "It has resulted in the concentration of business in central Canada, and the closing up of many a small business in this province." In connection with these two sentences may I be permitted to quote from an editorial that appeared in the Moncton Transcript of March 1, entitled The Milch Cow. This reads:

In the matter of federal taxation, says Premier Hepburn, Ontario has been the milch cow for the rest of the dominion. Ontario contributes, "about half the dominion's entire revenue." Figures can be very deceiving, and never more so than in the case of bookkeeping items when one does not know to whose ledger they belong. The pasture upon which the Ontario milch cow has been feeding belongs to Canada.

The Ottawa Journal sets Mr. Hepburn right on this point when it says: "Statistics show Ontario paying the bulk of income taxes, with Quebec next. The explanation, of course (it has been given authoritatively several times), is that the great majority of the largest corporations in Canada have their head offices in Toronto or Montreal. These corporations derive their profits from all over Canada, operate all over Canada, but because their tax returns are made from Toronto and Montreal (and similarly the personal income taxes of their officers and chief executives) Ontario and Quebec get the credit for everything."

Similarly with the customs tax. The Journal says: "The customs tax is collected at the port of entry, credited to that district. The goods imported may be sold all over Canada, with the tax paid by consumers all over Canada, but the city or district which happens to be the headquarters of the importer gets credit for the tax. That, of course, swells the figures for Toronto and Montreal."

Moreover, while Ontario has become the great industrial province, it has become so largely by virtue of the protected Canadian market. Before the Rowell commission, Premier Macdonald, of Nova Scotia, had at his finger tips the facts and figures to show the tribute that his province paid as a result of the protected market given the industries of central Canada in Nova Scotia. To tear down suddenly these tariff barriers, which have been standing for seventy years, might disrupt Canada, as Honourable Mr. Rogers said, but Mr. Rogers would be the last to deny that many industries of the strategically placed central provinces exist at the expense of the east and the west.

Yet, on a per capita basis, taxation in Canada is roughly the same and the talk about Ontario carrying all Canada's financial obligations on its shoulders is the superficial talk of a politician who long ago proved his knowledge of economics shallow, not profound.

Those are not my words; they are the words of the Moncton Transcript.

I was not a little disappointed and chagrined when I listened to the statement made in the house that the abolition of tariffs at this time would disrupt confederation. Is it to be implied from that statement that the imposition of high protective tariffs on the maritime and western provinces would have been justification for those provinces to disrupt confederation? Personally I do not for one moment believe that it ever would disrupt confederation. I well remember the session of 1927, when the tariff on automobiles was reduced, and the violent protest, the clamour—I was going to say the howl—that arose from the automobile manufacturers, who even went to the extent of threatening to close their factories if the tariff was reduced. But their bluff was called, and they were told in effect that if they closed their factories means would be found of opening them and keeping them in operation. So they went home, and what happened? The two following years were the most prosperous in the history of the industry.

Mr. STEWART: Is the hon. gentleman aware that subsequently to that deputation very important changes were made in the budget and concessions granted to these manufacturers?

Mr. ROBICHAUD: Concessions were made by reducing the tariff on their raw materials; I have no objection to that. Why were they so successful in the two years following the reduction? It is easy to see why. It was for the simple reason that prices went down and people bought automobiles more freely, and although the manufacturers had to accept a smaller profit on each automobile, their aggregate profits at the end of the year showed a large increase. After all, what is the secret of success in any line of merchandising? Is it to sell one article a day and make fifty cents profit on the sale, or is it to sell ten articles a day and make ten cents profit on each article? The more goods you sell the more profit you make and the more service you can give.

Here may I quote, with approval, the statement made by the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman): "There has never in Canadian history been a tariff reduction which did not benefit Canadian manufacturers, but they fear it." Ah! Fear! Fear! That is it. Fear, which at one time was no doubt the natural and normal reaction of man in his primitive state and was intended as a necessary shield for his self-preservation, has to-day become a heavy and burdensome armour, impeding him in his upward march towards a higher civilization. That fear which in those days was a physical, bodily fear, and quite normal, has to-day become simply an atavic, mental and moral fear—the curse of humanity, and man's greatest enemy.

If I were—I was going to say if I were king, but I will put it in a more modern way—if I were the dictator of Canada, do you know what I would do, Mr. Speaker? I would issue a decree to take effect to-morrow morning, establishing absolute free trade in this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: It may surprise some hon. members, since I am not a resident of the west or a farmer, when I proclaim myself a one-hundred per cent unadulterated free trader. But someone will say: "If you do that, you will flood the country with foreign goods." I say then, and in the spirit in which the apostle of the gentiles uttered his famous exclamation "O Felix Culpa," Happy flood, blessed flood! The flood would continue only so long as we were able to pay for the goods, and so long as we were able to pay for them we would be prosperous indeed.

If, however, my decree is going to disrupt confederation, and if we are everlastingly to continue bonusing and subsidizing industry at the expense and to the detriment of the primary producers and of the consumers of Canada generally, then I say, Mr. Speaker, let us have an honest-to-goodness, open and above board system of bonusing. Let us, as I said, abolish tariffs, and then at the end of a year, or semi-annually, let us bonus the legitimate natural industries of the country which prove themselves unable to carry on under a system of free trade. We have been bonusing wheat in the past, and bonusing to some slight extent the fishermen of the maritime provinces; but we know exactly to a cent what these bonuses have cost us, and I am sorry to say that on many occasions we have begrudged granting these bonuses to the poor farmer and the poor fisherman. But we do not know, and we cannot tell, how many millions or hundreds of millions of dollars we have been giving in bonuses to industry in Canada by means of the tariff. I think we should take the means to know, and the only way to know is to bonus them directly. Let us have free trade; let them compete with the goods coming from other nations, and let us bonus those industries that cannot carry on under free trade. But many of them are artificial industries which should never have been established in this country. They are economically unsound, and under free trade they would be given a chance to disappear as, to my mind, they should disappear.

As I have said before in the house—and I am convinced of it—the economic situation of this world will never be righted before we have free trade throughout the world and before the nations of the world make up their minds to manufacture the commodities for which they have the raw materials. Does it stand to reason that nations should spend millions and billions of dollars in removing natural obstacles from the channels of trade, in building railroads, and digging canals, and then the moment after erect artificial obstacles to trade by way of tariff walls? No, Mr. Speaker, it does not stand to reason. The thing is unnatural, and for that reason it will have to disappear from the face of the earth. And so it is with great pleasure that I support the motion of the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to refer to some of the remarks made by hon. members who have spoken to-night.

The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson) claimed that 68 per cent of our machinery was imported, and he deplored that fact. We might deplore anything of that nature under certain conditions; but in a country like Canada we must import if we are going to export, and it stands to reason that if we are importing so many of these implements or any other products and are paying out so many millions of dollars for them, that only enables us to sell millions of dollars worth of our own products abroad. I know the hon. member for Lanark pretty well, and respect him very much. I remember he came into my constituency in 1925 and was instrumental in defeating me at that time. I have no hard feelings against him for that. But I wish the Conservative party would send him out at the next election and let him make a speech like he made to-night.

Mr. THOMPSON: I will do it.

Mr. LEADER: You are invited, and I hope they will do that.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) not want to come back here again?

Mr. LEADER: I am sorry that the hon. member found it necessary to use the words, "The western people would bite the hand that feeds them." He followed that up, it seemed to me, in an apologetic way by saying that we should cease flying at each other's throats

Mr. THOMPSON: Certainly.

Mr. LEADER: He said we should have binder twine manufacturers in Canada. Perhaps we should. But let me tell the hon. member that the machine companies have "high pressure" salesmen going up and down the fields of Canada, particularly western Canada, when the roads open up and telling the farmers—at least some of them do—"Your old horse-drawn binder, or even the binder you now hook to the tractor, is obsolete.

What you need is the latest make; what you need is a combine." That is the kind of machinery which they are trying to sell us now. But if you use a combine you do not need any binder twine. So one thing works against the other.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston), who introduced the resolution, and the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Bouchard), who seconded it, went quite thoroughly into the preliminaries of the investigation, and I shall not repeat what they said. I wish to point out, however, that we spent nearly two months and heard 1,700 pages of evidence on that committee, and worked very hard; I know that I found it extremely hard work. I will not go into the organization part, but I do desire to associate myself with the members of the committee who have paid tribute to those who were associated with us, the officers, and particularly I want to pay my respects to the witnesses. I do not believe we could have had from any body of men more satisfaction, more reasonable cooperation, than we received from the witnesses who came from this country and the United States.

I am glad that we have reached the stage where we can discuss the problem in this house. The steady increase in the price of farm machinery in the face of existing agricultural conditions has alarmed our people, and they are looking to this parliament for some measure of protection. Having served as a member of the special committee which was appointed in the session of 1936, I am offering my own observations, along with those who have already spoken, and what I have to say will have special reference to the prairie west, although not omitting, I hope, Canada as a whole.

I belong to that class of individuals who are often read about, sometimes seen, but seldom heard. I am what is called an honest-to-goodness dirt farmer. I was born on a farm; I have worked there all my life, and I expect to continue working on a farm as long as I am in good health. Therefore I know something about the conditions of my people, and something about the Canadian west in general. That country has often been referred to as the granary of the empire. Millions of dollars have been reaped in the northwest, and it is capable of producing millions year after year, which may not always be true of some other industries, even of mining. Mining and the tourist traffic are sometimes spoken of as two of the greatest institutions and industries that Canada has; they are great revenue-bearing institutions. I am pleased that we are developing them; but a nation like Canada will make a great mistake if it should ever forget agriculture and what it means to our people, and relegate it to a secondary position. I can safely say that western Canada has contributed very largely to the wealth of the whole dominion. The development of its agriculture business has had the effect of establishing great manufacturing plants in the east. The industrial east owes much to western Canada. We are dependent the one upon the other; we should work together; and together we shall create a great nation.

That we are dependent each upon the other is particularly true of agriculture and the manufacture of agricultural implements. When one prospers the other prospers; when there is failure in one there is failure in the other. We are partners in a great industry. When the agriculturists of western Canada realized that the 1936 price of agricultural implements was raised, there was indignation. We felt that we were partners with the manufacturers of farm implements, and that we had suffered, and suffered grievously. It is true that the manufacturers had also suffered, though not, I believe, to the same extent. But we were alarmed and grieved to think that they had increased prices at just about the time when we could see daylight and hoped the depression was over. That was the reason why the hon. member for Lake Centre introduced his resolution asking that an inquiry be made into the price of farm implements.

The inquiry was ordered. One of the first reports which the committee brought in was to ask that the manufacturers of farm implements should not put into effect the 1936 increases until the result of the inquiry was known. That request was either refused or ignored, and that was the first indication we had that this great partner of ours was not prepared to play fair with the farming population of this country. They claimed that they were justified in increasing the price of their products. Why? They said it was on account of the high cost of manufacture. When we got into the evidence upon this inquiry we found that that claim was not justified. We found that the cost of manufacturing had not risen in the few years immediately preceding the 1936 increase. I hold in my hand a table clipped from the evidence which was taken by that committee. It gives the cost of manufacturing a binder, following it right up until it is laid down in the city of Regina. We had a list of implements that were investigated, and the eight foot binder was chosen as typical of the others. There appears this note in the report:

The companies agreed that all information submitted with regard to a binder could be placed on the printed records of the committee in order to give concrete information as to manufacturing costs and selling values in the industry. The binder was found by the auditor to be in most particulars close to the average of all the smaller typical implements selected by the committee. For this reason the undernoted tables as to the binder can be treated as truly informative.

This is indeed an informative table. I do not wish to analyze it all, that would take some time, but I should like to go over it briefly and ask that it be placed on Hansard. Let us take the year 1913, because that was the year when prices of farm products were comparable with those we had to pay for other products, and let us take the binder by way of illustration. The figures are grouped, all in their different columns, showing material, labour, total material and labour, overhead or burden, experimental work, total cost, price to the farmer, commission and freight. In 1913 the material entering into a binder was $45.56; labour $11.97; overhead, $17.96; experimental work, $0.34; total cost, $75.83. The commission was $30.45, and the freight, $17.80. The total profit on the binder was $42.94.

To substantiate my statement that the cost of manufacturing the binder had not risen in the last three years preceding the increase in price, I would point out that in 1932 the material entering into the cost was $87.01; labour, $27.16; overhead, $40.74; commission, $46.50; and freight, $25.12; and in 1933 the material was, in round figures, $79, or about $9 less than in 1932. In 1934 it was $75, or $4 less than in the previous year, and in 1935 it was $70, or $5 less than in 1934. This disproves the contention of the manufacturers that it was owing to the high cost of material that they were compelled to increase their prices.

Before placing this statement on the record I should like to give some figures with regard to net profits on a binder during those years.

1919	46 71
1920	43 33
1921	63 47
1922	61 09
1923	65 67
1924	100 60
1925	78 86
1926	67 39
1927	76 20
1928	78 70
1929	74 54
1930	67 69

Now we are getting into the period when the tariff was increased to twenty-five per cent, and we shall see that the net profit to the manufacturer was less than it was when the protection was a great deal less.

1931	$52 97
1932	36 83
1933	59 90
1934	61 79
1935	69 31
1936	79 26

Note.—Burden is stated as a fixed percentage of direct labour in each year (150%).

Mr. EDWARDS: How do the sales compare in those years?

Mr. LEADER: The sales had a great deal to do with their profit, because, as I said at the beginning, we were partners in a great business, and when one partner was a little bit down, not as flush as usual, the other suffered also.

Mr. EDWARDS: But how were the sales in those various years? Was production up or down?

Mr. LEADER: The sales were not so good after 1930. Possibly that was because the tariff had been increased and there may have been other causes; personally I believe the depression had a great deal to do with the matter, because there was not the purchasing power.

Mr. EDWARDS: A great deal would depend on the number of units built in the year.

Mr. LEADER: That is so. It would be interesting to the house to have a comparison of the farmers' position during those years. I have here a table prepared at my request by the bureau of statistics. I have selected eight farm implements which the ordinary farmer must have if he is to make any pretence of farming, and in the same table I give the prices of steers. The table shows what the farmer had to pay in hundredweight of steers for these various implements. These are the prices of steers at Winnipeg. If I may put the whole statement on Hansard I shall not go into the figures extensively tonight, but shall cite simply one or two. In 1913 we received 6·63 cents per 100 pounds for "good" steers, live weight, at the Winnipeg stock yards. And remember, over fifty per cent of the steers are not graded "good." However, to give the manufacturers the benefit of the doubt I am quoting these figures. In that year, 1913, we could buy a walking plough for 300 pounds of steers. In 1920, although the price of walking ploughs had gone up, we could still buy a walking plough for 300 pounds of steers. In 1926 the price of steers had gone down and we could buy a walking plough for 500 pounds of steers. In 1932, with a still lower price for steers, we had to give 700 pounds in exchange for a walking plough. In 1913 we gave 2,600 pounds of steers for a binder; in 1920, 2,300 pounds; in 1926, 4,800 pounds; in 1932, 6,100 pounds; and in 1936, 6,100 pounds.

The table is as follows:

PRIVILEGE—MR. PELLETIER

QUESTION OF INTRODUCTION OF BILL TO REPEAL THE MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917

On the order for notices of motions:

Mr. R. A. PELLETIER (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, before the notices of motions are proceeded with, I should like to speak to a question of privilege. I desire to introduce a bill in this House of Commons, but for some reason the clerk of the house has refused to accept it or to permit me to introduce it. I raise this question of privilege, not with any resentment but simply because I am anxious that the situation concerning this particular bill should be cleared up once and for all. I am going to ask you, sir, to permit me to present the facts as to whether or not this bill is in order so that you may determine whether I should be permitted to introduce this measure. The bill that I desire to introduce asks for the repeal of the Military Service Act, 1917. A similar measure was introduced in this house in 1922 by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), and at that time the then Speaker, the late Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, ruled it to be out of order on the ground that it was repealing a statute which was already spent. However, I believe that since that time certain things have happened in this house to reverse the decision then given.

I have in mind chapter 19 of the statutes of 1937 introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). This was to revive an act which had been declared to be spent. The bill introduced at that time was in exactly the same position as the one I wish to introduce. I hold in my hand volume V of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, which contains an index of the statutes of this country and the disposition that has been made of them. On page 27 the Military Service Act, 1917, is shown as being spent and on page 45 the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, is also shown as being spent. Both those pieces of legislation were in exactly the same position at that particular time. If it was possible for the Minister of Finance to introduce a bill last year to revive and amend the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, an act which is listed as spent, then I maintain that the decision given in 1922 by the then Speaker has been reversed.

However, I believe I have still greater authority than that which I have just cited. If we look at the votes and proceedings of the house for 1937 we shall find, at page 109 and continuing, reference to decisions given by the Supreme Court of Canada concerning certain legislation which had been enacted by parliament. Then, if we go further, we find that certain bills to repeal these measures were introduced in this house by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). Those bills were introduced to repeal acts which were not on the statute books and which in fact were no longer operative. In the face of what has taken place, I submit that the decision rendered in 1922 by the then Speaker has been changed. If we refer to the remarks of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) when the hon. member for Temiscouata introduced his bills, we find that apparently the minister had no objection at all; he simply said they were purposeless and there would be no objection if the member felt that they should be introduced. I ask you, sir, to consider the bill that I desire to introduce. With the authorities I have quoted I submit it should be possible for me to introduce this bill. Before I sit down let me say again that I do not raise this question of privilege with any feeling of resentment; I desire only to make my position clear. I believe it will be in the interests of the house to have this question settled once again as the authority seems to have been changed since it was settled before. There should be a definite decision as to whether it is possible to introduce a bill to repeal an act which has been spent.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I do not know anything about the matter referred to by the hon. gentleman except from what I have just heard. The Military Service Act contained a clause to the effect that it would be in force only for the duration of the then war which ended in 1918. According to the provisions of the act itself, it expired with the war. An hon. member, I do not know which one, introduced a few years ago a bill of the same kind as the one which my hon. friend wants to introduce, and the then Speaker said that that law was no longer in existence. I cannot remember, but I think I said that there was no use in killing a dead horse. My hon. friend refers to the bills introduced last year by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). The acts referred to in those bills were still on the statute books. The decisions of the privy council and of the supreme court, which have been cited very often in this house, were as to the legality or validity of the acts, but they did not have the effect of repealing those acts. The laws were still in existence and the bills introduced by the hon.

member for Témiscouata were in order. The hon. member will realize the great difference between his bill and those introduced by the hon. member for Témiscouata. As far as I am concerned, I have no objection to his introducing his bill, but I think it would be hard to kill the act again because it is dead.

Mr. PELLETIER: I have no desire to debate this question at this time, but I might remind the minister that when he says that this is simply killing a dead horse, the fact is that when a dead horse has lain around without being buried it may create an awful stench.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is why you should not touch it.

Mr. PELLETIER: It could not be touched if it was buried. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I simply ask you to tell me whether I am to be permitted to introduce this bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: If it is necessary to make a statement on the matter, I shall do so later.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT ACT

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR ADDITIONAL CREDIT ON PAYMENT OF ARREARS OR INSTALMENTS—MOTION WITHDRAWN

Mr. R. A. PELLETIER (Peace River) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the expediency of amending section one of "An Act to amend the Soldier Settlement Act," being chapter ten of the statutes of 1936, as follows:—

That the words reading "up to and including the thirty-first day of March, 1938" which appear in that section, should be changed to read as follows: "Up to and including the thirty-first day of March, 1941."

He said: Mr. Speaker, this resolution was placed on the order paper on January 27 last. Since then I have been highly gratified to find that the government has followed my lead, anticipated my motion and brought in a bill to amend the Soldier Settlement Act. I shall, therefore, with the consent of the house, and after saying just a few words, ask permission to withdraw the motion.

May I add that last year I brought in a resolution asking for a commission to investigate certain western problems, and one was appointed; this year I bring in a motion for the enactment of certain legislation, and once more I find the government following my lead and bringing down the legislation. I could not help being much gratified.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has moved an amendment to the bill brought down by the government. I do not agree fully with the bill as introduced, but I shall reserve my remarks until the house again goes into committee on the bill. I desire only to say in conclusion that I hope the government will continue to follow the lead I give them in respect of any further good measures the introduction of which I may suggest.

With the consent of the house, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the motion be withdrawn.

Motion withdrawn.

CORN

PROPOSED IMPROVED MARKETING FACILITIES AND PROVISION FOR STORAGE, DRYING, GRADING AND INSPECTION

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East) moved:

Whereas the creation by parliament of a board of grain commissioners indicates governmental interest in the movement of grain throughout Canada for both domestic and export sale;

And whereas, from time to time parliament has enacted measures dealing with the grain trade, providing for inspection and other necessary services;

And whereas, in the southwestern peninsula of the province of Ontario the bulk of the production of corn in Canada is to be found, this production being an important factor in the income of the farming community and the economy of the area generally;

And whereas, the facilities for the marketing of the said production are inadequate,

Therefore be it resolved,—that, in the opinion of this house, the government

(a) should consider the necessity for improved marketing facilities;

(b) should consider the need for providing adequate storage, drying, government grading and inspection facilities in order that the quality of the corn be improved and its production increased.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise to-day to speak on the subject of corn, which Mr. Ritchie, the first Chancellor of the Exchequer in the government of Lord Balfour, characterized as "in a greater degree a necessity of life than any other article. It is a raw material; it is the food of our people, the feed of our horses and our cattle." I trust that no one will regard me to-day as being local in my outlook. On previous occasions when I had the pleasure of addressing the house, I should like to think that I gave evidence of an interest not purely in sectional problems but in those which concerned the nation as a whole. If to-day I speak on a resolution which deals particularly with the area from which I come, it will not be from a lack of appreciation of our greater problems, but rather because of the realization that this particular problem greatly concerns the farmers of southwestern Ontario, and indirectly the people living in the towns and cities of that area.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who unfortunately will not be in his seat to-day, speaking in my constituency last June, said:

> That shows that the question of the rehabilitation of agriculture is not altogether confined to the drought areas of western Canada. There is something wrong with the whole economic system upon which agriculture rests.

In respect of southwestern Ontario, commenting upon this statement of the Minister of Agriculture, I suggest that the reasons for this condition are four: First, faults in the marketing system; second, a very great lack of grain-conditioning equipment; third, a total lack of governmental inspection and grading of grain; fourth, a complete inadequacy of storage facilities which would bring about what I might call a "market place" for the grain in this area.

This is not the occasion to go into the history of this particular problem. I should like to begin with the imposing of the tariff by the government of the right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Bennett) in 1931, at the instance of the corn growers on whose behalf I am speaking. That tariff sought to protect the corn growers of western Ontario and other parts of Canada against the great corn-growing area of the United States and the Argentine. However, when the tariff was imposed, corn came in free from the British Empire; in effect, from South Africa, under the British preference. The result of the tariff, while I do not deny its great value, was to substitute for the Argentine and the United States, as competitors against our corn producers, the Union of South Africa. The great difficulty of the latter competition was that a situation existed which did not exist with the other two competitors, because our farmers had then to compete not only against a properly graded and inspected commodity, but more particularly against a corn grower who was subsidized to the extent first of nine cents, and later twelve cents, a bushel in respect of all corn exported from South Africa. In addition, the corn coming in from South Africa —and this was the case not only when the right hon. gentleman opposite was Prime Minister but also during the present administration—was conveyed to Canada in the ships of the Elder Dempster line, which received and continues to receive a subsidy at the hands of the government of this country. So on these two grounds alone the corn growers on whose behalf I am speaking to-day were doubly prejudiced.

While this problem is sectional and partly local, it has not, in my judgment, been effectively brought to the attention of parliament, certainly not of this parliament to my knowledge. Consequently I am submitting this motion to-day. But that does not mean to say that the departments of government, Agriculture and Trade and Commerce, have not been alive to the problem. Three surveys have been made, in 1932, 1935 and during last year, and certainly two of them—only two have been made public—indicate the strength of what I am trying to say to-day. I ask the government, and particularly the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) on his own behalf and in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, to realize the consistency between what I have to say now and what these reports indicate. The great anomaly is this, that in a country as fertile as Canada so far as the growing of corn is concerned, domestic production is below domestic consumption, and we have to import from other areas as far as 6,000 miles away a product which can be grown in this country satisfactorily and in adequate quantities. The reason is, not better sales methods on the part of South Africa or the Argentine, but that in Canada we suffer from a total lack of facilities whereby there could be a definitely desired relation between the producer and the consumer trades generally.

An hon. MEMBER: And cheaper freight rates.

Mr. MARTIN: Some one says, "and cheaper freight rates." That certainly is one aspect of the problem; I thank the hon. member for mentioning it.

I propose to be as factual as I can—to state the problem and then briefly, upon the basis of these facts, to state what I think should be done.

There are at least five great corn-growing areas in the world—Roumania, the Argentine, the United States, South Africa and Canada. The average yield of corn for the fifteen years from 1919 to 1933 inclusive is as follows:

	Bushels per acre
Roumania	18
Argentina	27
South Africa	13

I have not broken down in the cases of the United States and Canada the average yield during the same period, but over a forty-five year period the figures are as follows:

	Bushels per acre
United States	26
Canada	45·9

This of itself is extremely convincing. It demonstrates that our soil is as well adapted to a heavy production yield as that of any country in the world. In addition, if one were to examine the record of the corn growers in my county of Essex and in the counties of Lambton, Elgin, Norfolk, Kent and Middlesex, one would find a great record of achievement at shows held in Regina, Chicago, and at other important grain shows, particularly by the farmers of Essex and Kent counties, which fully vindicates the quality and the great potentialities of the soil in these counties.

The major argument which is levelled against the thesis I have in mind is, "You cannot satisfy the national consumptive needs of Canada. We have to import, because you cannot grow in southwestern Ontario and in parts of Manitoba enough corn of the proper quality to satisfy our needs."

Let us see if this is true. In 1903 Ontario produced from 378,924 acres a total of 19,525,259 bushels, some 4,000,000 bushels more than the present total domestic consumption. In the twenty years 1895 to 1914 inclusive Ontario produced an average yield of 15,596,871 bushels from an average area of 326,087 acres. The total acreage devoted to corn in 1936 was 164,399 acres, with a production of only 6,082,942 bushels. With the permission of the house I shall place on Hansard the following statement showing the production from 1931 to 1936:

Husking Corn Production in Ontario

Year	Area	Production	Average price Cents per Bushel
	Acres	Bushels
1931	123,960	5,434,159	42
1932	130,257	5,056,623	45
1933	136,596	5,054,297	59
1934	161,137	6,797,863	65
1935	167,710	7,764,981	45
1936	164,400	6,083,000	70*

*Provisional estimate.

This, compared with the heavy yield of 1903 and successive periods up to the advent of the corn borer, indicates a substantial difference as compared with the earlier period. Our greatest production in the period from 1931 to 1936 was 7,764,981 bushels. The highest acreage was 167,710 acres. When one considers that the average yield from 1892 to 1935 was 11,737,231 bushels, and compares it with the fact that now we are producing slightly under half of our total national requirements, it appears that something is seriously wrong. If we take the six counties of Essex, Kent, Lambton, Middlesex, Elgin and Norfolk, the figures reveal that in these counties is to be found the great corn belt of Canada; the acreage in these six counties for the year 1936 amounted to 137,448 acres, and the total production, to 5,218,710 bushels. This table which I am summarizing and which I also wish to place on Hansard accounts for 84 per cent of the acreage devoted to corn in Canada and 85 per cent of the total yield, and the counties of Essex and Kent provide 64 per cent of this total acreage and 65 per cent of the total yield of the province.

If we take the six counties of Essex, Kent, Lambton, Middlesex, Elgin and Norfolk, the acreage and production for 1936 were as follows:

County	Acreage	Production bushels
Essex	55,373	2,048,801
Kent	49,025	1,931,585
Lambton	10,271	415,976
Middlesex	5,007	163,228
Elgin	10,050	381,900
Norfolk	7,722	277,220
Total	137,448	5,218,710

This is a factual recitation, but I hope that for the next few minutes the house will bear with me as I lay before it statements from which I may be able to make certain deductions. There can be no question that the corn belt of Canada is in southwestern Ontario. The charge is constantly made, as I said earlier, "But you do not supply our national requirements. That is why we have to import from South Africa. That is why, in the case of drought in South Africa, the tariff has to be suspended and we have to import from the Argentine." May I address myself to that aspect of the problem? There are in these six counties—and I confine myself to them because of their priority—3,232,064 cleared acres of assessed land. Of this assessed land, 2,753,156 acres are actually in cultivation.

County	Acres of assessed land	Acres cleared
Essex	416,382	279,905
Kent	568,486	505,590
Lambton	662,540	551,186
Middlesex	754,113	679,802
Elgin	436,863	365,220
Norfolk	393,680	271,453
Total	3,232,064	2,753,156

I wish to discuss briefly a table showing the importation, consumption and production of corn, not only with respect to these six counties but with respect to the whole of Canada. It will reveal, as the right hon. gentleman opposite once said in this chamber, a great anomaly, that an agricultural country like Canada, which at one time in its history produced more corn than was required for the national needs, at this time finds itself compelled to import corn from abroad. The reasons will, I hope, be clear before I have resumed my seat. For the years from 1930 to 1935 we find that the heaviest production in Canada was 7,765,000 bushels; the highest importation, 11,432,000 bushels, and the highest consumption 16,581,000 bushels. The table is as follows:

Year	Production (in thousands of bushels)	Importation	Consumption
1930	5,149	11,432	16,581
1931	5,434	9,664	15,098
1932	5,057	7,214	12,271
1933	5,054	5,508	10,562
1934	6,798	8,327	15,125
1935	7,765	8,525	16,290

Surely it is evident from the facts I have presented that we can grow corn in satisfactory quantities and of satisfactory quality. But we are importing corn from abroad, and in consequence the farmers who grow the same kind of corn are losing one of their best cash crops from which, as I shall show, they could derive a handsome revenue. The above table indicates that from 1930 there has been a definite improvement in the production of corn in western Ontario, for a number of reasons, not the least of which is the almost complete arrest of the corn-borer with its terrible infestation. The great question that faces us is: Can corn production in western Ontario be increased to a point where it would satisfy Canada's complete consumption requirements? The answer is definitely yes.

If we take the wider field of the six counties which were devoting 137,448 acres to corn out of a total acreage of cleared land of 2,753,156 acres, it would be a simple matter to increase the corn acreage by a mere 175,000 acres; it would mean simply a return to the corn acreage of 1895 to 1914 of 326,087 acres.

Anyone who will glance at the income levels of the rural area from which I come will find that our farmers are devoting a good portion of their cleared land to the production of commodities which do not yield as remunerative returns as do some others. One of the most distinguished corn growers and one of the leading farmers of my constituency, Mr. William Wallace of Woodslee, Ontario, president of the Ontario Corn Growers' Association, wrote recently:

> Our land is too valuable for the profitable production of oats and barley beyond what we need for feed and seed. The farmers in the corn belt of the United States found this out long ago, and while in the years of exceptional yield like two years ago, an oat crop will pay dividends, the average crop usually cannot be sold at a profit.

Commenting on that statement I call the attention of the house to a table which appeared in a recent number of the Ontario Department of Agriculture's statistics branch, entitled Production and Value of Principal Farm Crops, 1936, in the western Ontario area. That table shows that fall wheat brought $26.71 per acre; oats, $13.68; barley, $21.60; peas, $18.91; beans, $26.66; corn, $25.16. Oats is in point of financial return one of the lowest of these commodities, one in which southwestern Ontario competes against western Canada. We are actually devoting 24,191 more acres to oats than to corn, and the six counties, comprising the corn belt, are devoting 249,195 acres more to oats than to corn.

Mr. BENNETT: It is because of the demand from the Quaker Oats and other companies.

Mr. MARTIN: Partly. But another reason is that we have not the facilities to deal with our own corn so as to reach a much wider market. I am glad the right hon. gentleman has interjected. He is aware, I have no doubt, that at the present time corn for starch and cereal purposes comes into Canada free. We have two large starch companies in Ontario, one at Cardinal, and one at Port Credit. I have it on their own authority that they consume 2,500,000 bushels a year. This corn comes into Canada from the United States. They will not buy the corn of western Ontario because of its moisture content, the absence of grading and government inspection, and the fact that the corn does not reach them in a proper state and in sufficient bulk and readily enough to make it a secure market. Let me quote the president of one of these companies in this respect. He says:

> We have found it quite impossible to buy corn in sufficient quantity for our requirements from all the different dealers and farmers who have it for sale, but who will only let us have a car or two at a time. You will naturally understand that this is not a dependable source of supply for us, considering the fact that we use five to six cars per day—there is no chance of our getting any Canadian corn by water as there is apparently no place where it can be loaded.

Next I would quote with reference to the Port Credit company, from a bulletin issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce in 1932:

> This firm uses over 1,000,000 bushels of white corn annually, and cannot see why their present sources of supply, which are bought at Chicago, should not be obtained in the corn belt of western Ontario. Have purchased Canadian grain from Essex and Kent when they could get it, but have given up hope of effecting satisfactory arrangements for regular shipments, pending adequate handling facilities in the Canadian producing zones.

These two statements could be added to by buyers throughout the country. They indicate not an unwillingness to buy the Canadian commodity but a natural reluctance to buy a product which they feel they cannot obtain in proper condition and with respect to which they cannot obtain a guarantee, as is the case in South Africa, on the strength of a government certificate of inspection. Moreover, the corn is not readily available in bulk.

Another contention is that this corn should be used for feed. It is argued that it should go into hog production. What has happened in the Argentine is true in Canada, and as this is an important point I shall dwell on it for a few moments. Speaking of my own county, Essex, in 1908 we had in live stock:

Swine	124,615
Cattle	54,212
Sheep	19,742
Horses	22,325

In other words, a total of 220,894 in terms of live stock. The trend in our area was steady until 1917. It dropped in 1918 to 92,414 and remained under 100,000 for five years. In 1926 there was a drop to 95,026. This is what I would impress upon the minister in case he should labour this argument. While, formerly, 80 per cent or more of the crop in Essex county—and this would apply generally to western Ontario—was fed locally, this has now been reduced to from 50 to 60 per cent. Ever since 1926 there has been a steady decline until 1936, when the live stock figures for Essex county were:

Swine	37,674
Cattle	29,298
Sheep	11,606
Horses	14,588
Total	93,166

What deduction does one draw from this? It is the obvious one that farmers are inclined to grow cereal crops and sell for cash rather than to turn some of their land into pasture and raise grain on the rest of the land to be used as feed as was done thirty years ago. The grain production of western Ontario finds a home market in Canada. Those interested in live stock and its production sell in a highly competitive export market. Is it therefore any wonder that there should be this evidence of a decrease? And the same is true of the Argentine and other great corn-growing countries. To prove this I quote Mr. J. A. Strong, Canadian Trade Commissioner, Buenos Aires, in The Commercial Intelligence Journal of the Canadian Department of Trade and Commerce of February 6, 1937:

> Whereas Argentina beef exports are now less than fifty per cent of the 1927 level, the acreage sown to all cereal crops was increased by 10·01 million acres between 1926 and 1927 and 1934 and 1935. The acreage in grain was increased steadily over this period, despite the general downward trend of wheat and corn prices. This does not indicate that cattle prices necessarily decline relatively more than grain prices, but rather that the large landowners, although they could not make a profit in producing beef were always able to find tenant farmers ready to cultivate their land.

So I do not think any hon. member would seriously advance the old argument that in the case of this fertile area we should exclusively feed corn to hogs. I am frank to admit that while the soil of Essex county and western Ontario generally is capable of this high quality production, the fault lies at home. Corn coming here from South Africa has a moisture content of twelve per cent, due largely to climatic conditions, together with adequate drying, grading, marketing and storage facilities which they have in that country. In Ontario, November is generally the period for husking corn. At this time the moisture content runs between twenty and twenty-five per cent. This is, of course, most unsatisfactory. It has run in wet periods as high as thirty per cent. Our moisture content is pretty much the same as that of the United States; but in the case of the latter, the great corn belt in the midwestern area of the United States has its drying and grading facilities by which this disadvantage is obviated.

There are two ways of drying corn. Here again we have the traditional argument that the natural way is the best way, putting it in cribs. The alternative is artificial drying. The artificial drying of corn may be done within an hour or an hour and a half. The natural drying of corn in the area of which I am speaking takes six or eight months. The result is that naturally dried corn in Canada cannot get the benefit of rising prices, and is unable to take advantage of credit facilities which in the case of South Africa assure a steady flow of corn to market, permitting the farmer to take advantage of favourable prices.

I contend that the Canada Grain Act is not being applied. Our grain act requires that No. 1 and No. 2 corn shall contain not more than sixteen per cent moisture, No. 3 corn a maximum of nineteen per cent. Yet corn in Essex county—I speak of Essex because I know it best—reaches market after husking with from twenty to twenty-five per cent or, in some instances, as high as thirty per cent of moisture. The provisions of the grain act in this particular are not being complied with.

As South Africa is our main competitor, I think I should put on record the comparative chemical contents of the corn produced there and in Ontario:

	Ontario Per cent	South Africa Per cent
Moisture	17·05	13·00
Starch	52·29	55·30
Oil	3·85	4·13
Protein	9·62	8·70

This shows that the quality of corn from both countries is relatively equal.

Dr. Grisdale, former Deputy Minister of Agriculture, reporting in 1935, said of western Ontario corn:

> Corn thus husked not in shape to sell or ship or store shows eighteen to twenty-two and twenty-three per cent moisture. To ship or store safely it should not have a moisture content of over thirteen or fourteen per cent.

It seems to me that having in mind the provisions of the grain act there can be no justification for not applying them to Ontario as well as to western Canada. If that were done, corn growers in Western Ontario as well as farmers generally would find themselves enjoying advantages now denied them. With the permission of the house I wish to place on record a statement showing a comparison of prices of South African and Ontario corn.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not permissible to hand such statements to Hansard unless the hon. member reads them. It is only by the courtesy of the house that the Minister of Finance has been allowed to do so in making his budget speech.

Mr. MARTIN: I am coming to that. This table shows a comparison of prices of Ontario corn with corn from the Argentine and from South Africa, during the years 1934, 1935, 1936 and 1937. Ontario corn sold at a discount of about twenty cents a bushel under South African or Argentine corn when, in the case of the latter country, the tariff was suspended.

Mr. REID: At what point?

Mr. MARTIN: At any point. I am taking the average—maritime provinces, Ontario, or even as far as British Columbia. The average discount is about twenty cents. Why? Because of the lack of those facilities which would send our corn to market dried, graded and properly inspected by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask how the hon. member proposes that the corn shall be dried?

Mr. MARTIN: I intend to come to that. These facilities the Argentine and South Africa have. The comparison of prices reveals that during the late summer and early fall Ontario corn commands a relatively high price, because buyers then know that the corn of the previous year, having been naturally dried, is available in the condition in which corn from South Africa would be immediately after husking, because of the drying process which it undergoes there. Apart from moisture content, apart from lack of government grading, Ontario corn would then be seen to be equal in every respect to the corn from other countries.

Now I come to the kernel of what I have stated. These are the facts. What does South Africa do? What has the Argentine done to process properly and facilitate the marketing of the corn grown by its farmers? In the case of South Africa, until last year, over a five year period $4,075,000 was paid in subsidies by the government of the Union of South Africa to the corn growers of that country in respect of corn exports to other countries. In the case of Canada, as a result of the trade agreement of August 30, 1932, the subsidy was not to apply to shipments to Canada. Actually—if one had time one could prove—that the consumer in Canada paid the subsidy, which, under the treaty, was not to be extended to the South African corn grower.

Here I quote from the year book of the Union of South Africa for 1937, summarizing what is done in that country:

> A well appointed system of grain inspection and testing at shipping points has been established, and every endeavour is made to maintain a regular and cheap overseas service for the export trade of the country. South African maize—

Or, as we call it, corn—

> —is marketed overseas on a "Government Certificate Final" basis. These certificates are accepted by the Overseas Corn Trade Associations. All South African maize and maize products are graded at the ports or at inland centres by government graders.

That is South Africa, where there is government grading and government inspection. A test is made of the moisture content of the corn. The corn is not allowed to be sold in certain channels unless it satisfies the test. Obviously, having in mind the moisture content of western Ontario corn, and having in mind the severity of these requirements, the Canadian corn producer cannot possibly compete, to a measure of satisfaction, with this imported corn.

In the case of the Argentine the measure of control is even more startling. It is curious to note that the measure of control there is based upon a grain act, which is the exact model of our own grain act. In other words, a grain act, based upon our own act, has been adopted in the Argentine, and its provisions, identical with ours, are actually put into effect —government inspection, government grading, adequate storage facilities and the like. But these are denied us.

May I now take a moment to analyze our grain act. I would first call the minister's attention to section 9 of the act which provides:

The board and the chief commissioner shall have jurisdiction, upon or without complaint made, to inquire into any matter relating to

(a) The grading of any grain;

(b) The weighing of any grain;

(f) The deterioration of any grain during storage or treatment.

Then section 12 provides:

The board may make regulations or orders not inconsistent with this act—

To bring about:

(d) establishing inspection districts and fixing the boundaries thereof from time to time;

Again, farther down in the section, the board shall have power:

(r) In particular, fixing or approving the maximum charges to be made for the discharge of grain into and out of elevators, and for the insurance against fire, storage, cleaning, treatment and handling of grain while in any elevator.

Then, sub section (t):

(t) Governing the procedure to be followed at elevators in respect to the receipt and discharge of grain and the handling, treatment and shipping thereof while in such elevator.

Then, in part of section 25 the board is given power to appoint an eastern committee, and the section goes on to say:

—which committee shall have jurisdiction to select and settle the standard samples to be used in the current crop year in connection with the grading of eastern grain,—

I might add—as seems best in the national interest. I submit that in the national interest, and certainly in the interests of western Ontario—and that is not contrary to the national interest—if nothing else is done, these sections in the grain act should be applied to improve marketing facilities, grading facilities, inspection facilities, weighing facilities and storage facilities of the farmers in my area, so that they might be able satisfactorily to compete with the farmers of other countries.

Mr. EULER: What does the hon. member mean by storage facilities?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has exhausted his time for speaking.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MARTIN: I should like to make one or two further observations, if the house will permit me. I mean that there should be an opportunity provided—and it will be up to the Department of Agriculture to decide—whereby any one who wants corn in bulk, based upon government certificates, will be able to get it. At this stage I do not propose to make any further proposals, except to state that, having in mind the situation in South Africa and in the Argentine, it is inconceivable that there should not be a "market place" which would obviate the present inadequacy of storage facilities.

I have stressed the need for government grading and government inspection of corn. I do not think I am asking too much. Surely the western farmers, who have those privileges in respect of wheat, would not deny them to eastern farmers. In answer again to what the minister has just asked may I explain, as definitely as I can, what I have in mind. It should be possible to assemble stocks of corn in quantities. It should be possible to have records of these stocks, so that any purchaser in any part of Canada would have some knowledge of the situation and some assurance that he could get corn in large quantities, backed by certificates, which would give the authority and security accorded in other countries and, as someone has suggested, would assure a continuity of delivery.

Mr. MacNICOL: How would you dry it?

Mr. MARTIN: I would dry it with artificial driers, working in harmony with the drying facilities now in existence and these, in turn, working in harmony with the country elevators. The country elevators in my district are performing a great service, and they would be partners in the general scheme I have outlined.

Before resuming my seat may I summarize what I have said: I do not think it is my job to seek out under whose jurisdiction this problem may come. I suspect a good deal of it is a matter for the Department of Agriculture, and I suggest that much of it should be borne by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

With regard to the Department of Agriculture, I suggest its mandate is this:

1. In essence there are two types of corn, white corn and yellow corn, each having several varieties. The Department of Agriculture should provide the direction necessary to supply farmers with seed of those varieties best suited to the soil and climatic conditions of southwestern Ontario.

2. Starch and cereal manufacture require the white type of corn. Consequently the Department of Agriculture should make a census of the requirements of these.

3. The yellow type of corn is used in the feeding and other trades, the distinction in colour requirements being extremely precise. The Department of Agriculture should give direction in this particular. This is already being done in part by the efficient seed branch of the federal Department of Agriculture, together with the experimental farm at Harrow, in Essex county.

4. The quality of the Ontario farm crop should be approached, first through the introduction of an early maturing variety suited to the requirements of the manufacturers. Again this is a matter for the Department of Agriculture.

I do not wish to take advantage of the privilege extended to me of speaking too much beyond the limited period, but there is one matter I should like to bring to the attention of the house. In this connection I refer to the Commercial Intelligence Journal of November 23, 1935, to reveal what the Department of Agriculture in the Argentine has done in respect of these four items:

Control over the growing of grain is further strengthened by forbidding farmers of institutions producing seed of any new variety of grain without the approval of the ministry of agriculture. Producers wishing to introduce new varieties will be required to submit samples for approval and, if accepted, a certificate will be issued recognizing the right to deal in the seed; this certificate will give details regarding the grain and the zones most suited for its development. New varieties will only be authorized, however, when they represent some new advance over those already produced in the country, and they will be grown under the control of the ministry of agriculture.

I am not an expert on agricultural matters, but am merely a member of parliament speaking on behalf of the people who have discussed this subject for a number of years and, seemingly, are almost discouraged, believing that they will not get any government in the country to take an interest in their problem or to deal with it as seriously as they wish. I am complaining not only about the present government, but about successive governments.

5. Provision should be made for greater adequacy of drying and storage immediately after husking, to enable the farmer to ensure a steadier flow of corn to market in order to take advantage of favourable price opportunities and to ensure the satisfactory warehousing of corn by purchasers and consumers, this in addition to already existing facilities.

6. There should be adequate government grading and inspection facilities so that consumer confidence may be established in Ontario corn, resulting in better prices for producers.

7. There should be government weighing facilities thereby eliminating disputes regarding weights. I wish I had the time to go into this matter in detail. The farmer has never had an opportunity of knowing with any degree of accuracy whether the statement on his record of weight, when he sells, is correct.

8. We should also consider the possibility of bringing about cheaper freight rates, having in mind the opportunities of water transportation and the like at the disposal of those living in western Ontario.

My final requests are based on a report prepared before the advent of this government. This report was authorized by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) when he was Minister of Trade and Commerce. A summary of the report is as follows:

(a) The six counties are an excellent grain producing zone and could apply their acreages much more profitably.

(b) The greatest menace, namely, the corn borer, is definitely under control.

(c) Freight rates by rail from points in these counties to the large consuming markets are too high to permit competition with imported grain.

(d) The drying facilities are entirely incompatible with the amount of grain to be treated.

(e) The assembly of the widely distributed grain at a central point is indispensable to the proper marketing.

(f) The producers will receive a higher price only when their grain is properly conditioned and graded.

These are important requests made on behalf of the people, not only in one county but in six.

May I say in conclusion. I represent a constituency that grows perhaps more corn than any other area in Canada. Its population is made up of people representing the twin cultures of this country, French and English speaking. The French have a tradition that goes back before the days of confederation, to the days of the formation of this area as a British colony. They are a happy and contented people, but they are a struggling people who demand attention. They are worthy of the concern which I have shown on their behalf in making this plea. The same is true also of their English speaking neighbours. There are others in my constituency who speak neither French nor English but the tongue of central European countries and other parts of the world. In the rural as well as the urban areas of my constituency are men and women who are doing their best to improve their economic level. I am convinced that if this resolution could be regarded in the spirit in which it is offered, the people on whose behalf I am speaking will have everlasting gratitude toward the government of this country.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I find myself to a certain degree in accord with the resolution, and I desire to say a word or two in support of it.

The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) has presented a splendid case for the corn producers in the six counties in the province of Ontario which he has named. He has set out the difficulties under which they are labouring with respect to grading, storing, drying and marketing. If the hon. member had been speaking from about the seat now occupied by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glen), we might have thought that the former member for Essex South, Mr. Eccles Gott, had been returned to the house. I can remember the former member presenting on many occasions the case for the corn growers for that part of Ontario in about the same tone of voice. Many times we heard him presenting their case and advocating better facilities for the grading and storing of corn. I am surprised that the member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) did not go as far as the former member and advocate the building of an elevator at Windsor.

The former member also suggested and supported the duty that was placed on corn in 1931. The production of corn is fast becoming an important branch of agriculture, and certainly the facilities for grading, storing and marketing should be improved. The hon. member has said that the present lack of these facilities affects the six counties to which he has referred. The area in which corn can be produced in Canada is gradually moving farther north. I shall not go into the production figures—the hon. member has given them in detail—other than to say that the annual production of corn is something over 10,000,000 bushels.

I would remind hon. members that corn has been produced and successfully brought to maturity in each of the three prairie provinces. At Macgregor, Manitoba, at Indian Head, Saskatchewan—both at the experimental farm and in the surrounding country—and at Swift Current, corn has been successfully grown and matured. Corn produced and brought to maturity at Indian Head was in the prize list at the international grain show held in Chicago a few years ago. It was commented upon by the judges as being a splendid sample. I could put on record some of my own experiences in growing corn, but I do not think they would serve any useful purpose.

There is a considerable market for corn in British Columbia, which imports from 2,500,000 to 3,000,000 bushels for purposes of dairy stock and poultry feeding, and we should endeavour to get the British Columbia market. The hon. member says that we certainly should have the Ontario market. He referred to the fact that in 1931 a duty was imposed on corn from the United States and the Argentine. That duty was imposed, partly because certain members from Ontario presented an argument to the government similar to that presented to-day by the hon. member, but more particularly because the then member for Souris, Mr. Errick Willis, and myself, urged this move upon the government. We took this action in an effort to get the British Columbia market for coarse grains. We wanted the grains grown on the prairies to replace corn coming in from the United States and other countries. That was the real reason why the duty was imposed.

I have a suggestion to make to hon. members, one that I think is worthy of consideration. The bill to amend the Canada Grain Act is to come before the agriculture committee within the next day or two. No doubt representatives of the board of grain commissioners will sit in with the committee, and I suggest that the subject matter of this resolution be presented to the committee—possibly the hon. member for Essex East himself would appear before the committee and present the case—when we have the commissioners present. I think if the hon. member would take it up with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) that could easily be arranged. The agriculture committee is I believe the proper place to discuss this question. While many members of the house come from parts of the dominion that are not very much interested in corn, undoubtedly the agriculture committee would be interested, and I think we should avail ourselves of the presence of the representatives of the board.

Mr. EULER: The chairman of the board of grain commissioners will be here in connection with a small amendment that is to be made to the grain act, but later on it is proposed to have a complete revision of the act—

Mr. BENNETT: This year?

Mr. EULER: I hope so, and this matter might be more appropriately taken up at that time.

Mr. PERLEY: I thank the minister. But I would suggest that at least it be mentioned to the chairman of the board when he is here, and possibly arrangements could be made for a hearing.

Mr. EULER: I have no particular objection.

Mr. PERLEY: In conclusion I would suggest that when the production of corn in Canada becomes such that it will be sufficient at least to take care of the domestic market, a duty should be imposed that would secure that market to the Canadian producers. I have pleasure, Mr. Speaker, in supporting the motion, and I trust that my suggestion may also be considered.

Mr. G. W. McDONALD (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I wish to concur in the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). True it deals altogether with corn, but it mentions marketing facilities, and it is along that line that I wish more particularly to speak.

It is quite true, as was stated by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) that we can grow corn in western Canada. We have been growing corn there for some time, and I am pleased to say that the province of Manitoba has encouraged the production of corn. There are boys' and girls' corn clubs all over the country, and in the adjoining constituency of Lisgar they are producing corn by the carload. They have a drier, and one man there is making considerable money out of it. He is able to produce seed corn the equal of that imported from the United States. I believe that as time goes on we shall grow more and more corn. I do not believe any wheat-growing country long continues to grow wheat alone. That has been our experience in Canada. I remember when we grew a lot of spring wheat in Ontario, but the rust took it and we had to turn to fall wheat, and that was none too favourable. I do not think the Ontario farmer is trusting very much to-day to wheat to make the bulk of his income. We in the west, I am happy to say, are able to do that, but the time may come when we shall not be able to produce such large quantities of wheat, and we are therefore giving considerable attention to the growing of corn.

We have efficient and well organized grain inspection system and grain weighing departments in the west, as was stated by the mover of the resolution. They are conducted by the government. It is quite true that all the farmers are not satisfied all the time, but I cannot see how the inspectors and weighers, who do not know whose grain they are weighing or grading, can make many mistakes. The odd mistake may be made, but on the whole I think the system is highly efficient.

I am not too sure about the marketing end of the system. I believe it is efficient, but it is conducted on the principle of the auction, and auction sales we know sometimes are not too favourable to the man who has goods to sell.

I heard the hon. member for Qu'Appelle say the other day that this government had put on a fire sale of wheat. I am not satisfied with that statement. It is a statement that is quite easy to make; but, looking back, would he have made it three years ago? Could he have said it with the same certainty of getting as many farmers to believe it, if we had had bounteous crops in the meantime? I should like to remind him that day after day during the years 1932 and 1933, where the freight rate on grain was 25 cents per hundred, wheat was selling on the streets in all the western towns for 20 cents, oats for 5 cents, and barley for 7 or 8 cents. Those I claim were the fire sales. Never again—I do not care what government is in power—should we let prices slip to such low levels, away below the cost of production.

But as I said, it is the marketing that I wish particularly to discuss. I know that very many favourable things can be said of the highly organized grain trade that we have in this country, but the day will never come when the makers of farm implements or other goods in this country will allow their goods to be sold on a commission basis. They will never take any such chances, and how can the farmer take such chances? He cannot do it unless he is prepared to go out of business. There is no good reason why a commodity as staple as wheat or any other of our farm products should be allowed to fluctuate so widely in price. Wheat has been known to fluctuate as much as twenty cents a day; I have seen that myself, and nobody can say that that is a good system.

I have always had the suspicion, Mr. Speaker, that the pool was allowed to go on the rocks because those who had their money behind it did not want it to succeed. I was never very enthusiastic about the pool, but I know the farmer has just as much right as anybody else to sell his goods the way he wants to sell them. The bankers knew how the pool should have protected themselves. The banks have financed the grain movements of this country for years and years, and they knew how it could be financed on a safe basis. But the fact remains that the pools were allowed to buy futures when they were carrying the actual grain. What they should have been doing then, when they were carrying the actual grain, was selling wheat, but the men who encouraged the contrary policy knew well, I believe, that some day the pool would drift on the rocks, and that is what happened.

I made a strong statement against the banks the other day when speaking on the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and that is one of the things I had in mind. The banks are willing to go into all kinds of business when there is a chance to make big money. When credit is easy they encourage people to borrow, but when a depression is on they take to cover mighty quickly. When they got into trouble with the pools I say that the governments of this country had no more right to go to the aid of the banks in that particular deal than it would have to come to my aid if I were in business and got into trouble. But how easily the bankers can get the ear of the government! I am pleased to say it was not this government, or any federal government; it was the provincial governments. If I had happened to be a member of the legislature at that time, the chances are I should have voted for what was done just like all the rest. The fact remains that the big interests, the bankers, know how to protect themselves, how to saddle the loss on the people and protect their own money.

I quite understand that in this country corn has not quite reached the place of importance occupied by wheat and other hard grains, but I have no doubt that when it becomes as large a crop as it is bound to be in the future, adequate storage and drying facilities will be provided, as well as a system of government marketing, weighing and grading, so that the farmer will have no reason to complain that he is not getting a square deal.

I notice that this resolution calls upon the government to help both the export and the domestic business. We are all much interested in the export end, but the domestic should be encouraged too. I contend that the incidence of our freight rates is entirely unfavourable to the encouragement of the domestic exchange of grain. I cannot understand why that is so. We have a board of railway commissioners who, we claim, are experts. Well, they do some funny things. Consider the trouble that the railroads are having and the great burdens they impose upon this country, and then look at the bus and truck competition. I have noticed that in a part of the country where we have had depression and drought most of the time for the last eight years there is considerable bus and truck competition; they operate routes which parallel the railroads, they buy new equipment, they wear it out and then buy better equipment and they seem to be busier and busier all the time. What is the trouble with the railroads? We live on a branch line, and I do not think they are running as good a train as they ran twenty years ago; yet along that same line we have an up-to-date bus service. All this has been accomplished by the bus lines in the depression years, and I do not believe they are foolish enough to sink their money in a losing game. The railroads stay with the old methods. I cannot understand where the trouble lies. I know they have the brains. But for some reason or other there is a suspicion among a lot of people that the men in control realize that the railroads are no longer a paying proposition and they want to unload them on to the government. I do not know whether that is true, but I do know that truck companies and bus companies are making some progress, even in these days.

The domestic sale of grain from British Columbia to the maritime provinces should be encouraged, and the way to encourage it is to reduce freight rates and put them more on an export basis. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) referred to the tariff. Tariffs are funny things, and I am not going to mix up the tariff with the discussion of this resolution; indeed it has not much to do with it. But I am reliably informed that in the last five years two cargoes of corn passed each other in the St. Lawrence river, one bound from South Africa to Canada, the other from a port on the great lakes in the United States to a port in Europe. Here are two countries living side by side, and this is what happens. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle takes great credit for the imposition of a duty on corn when we had a considerable quantity of barley in this country. I am not going to blame him too much. But is it reasonable that we who are living alongside the United States should have to ship in corn from South Africa? Surely that illustrates some of the absurdities of the tariff, I could continue along that line, but I believe we do not wish to intermix the tariff too much with an important subject such as corn or grain.

I am quite satisfied to support the motion, and I know it will receive consideration by the government. Further, the government will do all it can, I am sure, to assist the marketing of our products. It is very important that some consideration should be given to that matter, and for that reason among others I should like to see a marketing board established. I do not believe that the farmers of this country are able to get the information which will enable them to sell their goods to the best advantage. I know the department is issuing advice along that line, but more should be done to dispose of wheat and cattle and other agricultural products. I am talking from the farmer's standpoint, because the constituency I represent is purely agricultural; but I want to make it clear that in my opinion there is not a member of this house who is in any way opposed to the manufacturing interests of this country. We do not care where we buy the goods so long as we get them at the right price. I do not think we should have the least enmity against Canadian manufacturers; it would be better for us if they were all prosperous. The point I wish to make is that at present the farmer is not, in my opinion, in a position to get the right information by virtue of which he can intelligently dispose of his goods—that is, to get the best market price for them. For that reason I favour a marketing board and I hope that the government will soon bring down a measure for that purpose.

Mr. H. W. WINKLER (Lisgar): That the present resolution should be introduced by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), one of the representatives of the great corn growing district of southwestern Ontario, is quite right and proper. Thirty or forty years ago every school boy in Canada knew that Essex and Kent counties were noted for their corn. I am sure that the same thing holds true to-day. The figures that I have obtained from the department of agriculture as to acreage in the year 1934 will serve as an illustration of this. The county of Essex had planted in that year 53,000 acres, and the county of Kent 40,000 acres, making a total of 93,000 acres, or about 65 per cent of the total acreage devoted to corn in Ontario. That, compared to the Manitoba acreage of 76,000, shows a considerably larger figure for Ontario, but the Manitoba figures are an indication of the strides which corn-growing has made in that province during recent years. It is since 1931 that the increase in Manitoba has been most apparent, the increase being from 7,000 to 76,000 acres.

The constituency of Lisgar, which I have the honour to represent, is very favourably located geographically for corn growing; I believe it grows more corn than any other constituency in Manitoba. That is by the way; but because the production in a certain section of my constituency has a special bearing on the resolution before the house I should like to discuss the resolution in relation to two small areas known as the rural municipalities of Rhineland and Stanley. These comprise only nineteen townships, but to-day they are the Essex and the Kent of Manitoba. This year these two municipalities ran into severe difficulties, and because of those difficulties corn marketing will be in chaos until regulations concerning corn growing, similar to those existing in the grain trade in many countries, are brought into being.

I wish to make a brief comparison of the acreage of this small section and the rest of Manitoba. The Department of Agriculture estimates that the Manitoba bushelage in 1937 was 400,000. The number of acres sown was 11,000. The Department of Agriculture estimates that these two small municipalities to which I have special reference produced 100,000 bushels in 1937 on 2,800 acres, or approximately one-quarter of the bushelage of Manitoba's production from nineteen townships. The department this year estimates the seed requirements for Manitoba for next year's crop at approximately 20,000 bushels. These two small municipalities have saved 7,000 bushels and will require 5,000 for their own seeding purposes, which leaves a surplus of 2,000, which will go towards the provincial requirements of 15,000, still to be supplied.

In order to show the bearing that marketing conditions have, in these two small municipalities, on the resolution now before the house and the bearing which they are likely to have to a greater degree in coming years, I should like to give a very brief sketch of the area. In doing so I shall touch to some extent on the historical side.

This district was settled in 1875 by emigrants from Ontario and also by German-Dutch people known as the Mennonites, who came direct from Russia. These frugal, industrious people settled on the prairie sections while the Ontario settlers went to the hilly and treed sections of the district. The Mennonites settled on the prairies because they were accustomed to prairies in the old land. As a result of their industry and thrift they accumulated a great deal of wealth, and because they had large families it was necessary for them periodically to migrate in large numbers to other parts. As a result of this migration we had districts like Rosthern and Swift Current in Saskatchewan springing up. The original community of Mennonites expanded considerably and as a result of their industry they began to acquire much of the land occupied by the other settlers originally from Ontario. This situation existed until the early 1920's, but in the agricultural slump that occurred at that time there was a very severe setback to the Mennonite community. They had bought heavily of land and had set up their children, even going into debt themselves. The two church trust companies, which had been models of thrift for the whole dominion, had failed; the backbone of the colony having been broken, conditions became so acute that in most cases children were thrown back upon their parents. The result was that a congested condition began to develop. To aggravate the situation, mechanized farming had become increasingly profitable for large holdings, and those who had money took advantage of the slump to increase their holdings. They bought additional holdings with the result that the land requirements of the district were curtailed. On top of it all, we have had drought conditions for six years, reducing a large part of the area to comparative misery.

The bright spot in the picture appeared when the dominion experimental farm system developed an early maturing selection of Northwestern Dent corn. The district is too remote from any city to serve market-gardening purposes, and consequently the inhabitants, if they wish to remain there, must engage in some form of agriculture. The fact that this new variety of early-maturing corn was developed made it possible for the small acreage unit farm to begin operations. Furthermore, another helpful discovery in the agricultural field was that corn could be planted much earlier than had been theretofore supposed. While corn nearing maturity will not stand frost the young plant will stand, if necessary, freezing back several times. Theretofore a favourable climatic condition had permitted some corn to be matured in this district, but now the scheme could be embarked upon as a commercial operation. In other words, employment in agriculture had been found for the surplus population, thanks to the reasons mentioned; 45,000 bushels in 1934 became 50,000 bushels in 1935, and the bushelage for 1937 was estimated at 100,000. There is a great demand for the seed of this hardy Manitoba-grown corn. But not all corn is fit for seed. Much has to be sold for feed, and what before that time had presented no problem, became a real one. One of our progressive grain companies instructed its buyers at two points to buy corn on the cob. It is being stored in improvised bins. This company bought about 50,000 bushels and there remains about another 50,000, part of which was fed during the past winter. But the drought of recent years has so affected the ground water level of the district that most farmers are limited to the stock they can keep by the water their wells will supply.

There is no reason why, with improved marketing facilities such as are enjoyed by wheat and other grains, the amount of corn grown in this area should not be multiplied several times. The present acreage sown to corn and oats is slightly in excess of one-half of one per cent of the total, which, of course, is a very poor comparison with the present acreage in Essex and Kent. The market will absorb some corn readily, but our experience has been that when there is great production a good deal of confusion results. From the standpoint of the producer it appears that there will be a great improvement if marketing facilities are provided, and the same would apply to the consumer. I believe that possibly the benefit would be equally great. The inferior material on the market has, as in the case of grain in the past years, penalized both consumer and producer.

With the part of the resolution dealing with marketing facilities I am in complete accord. I should like to quote an abbreviated portion of the report of Doctor J. H. Grisdale in 1935, on the corn situation. He said:

> The department has made two investigations within the last two years and states that one difficulty in marketing corn produced in Canada in competition with corn of other origin is inadequate official grades and inspection.

That recommendation is in harmony with the resolution. I believe it is in the interest of all hon. members, whether they live in corn-producing counties or not, to take an active interest in this resolution. I am not entirely convinced of the necessity of the part relating to drying and subventions. Of course in the west our corn carries a lower moisture content than corn in Ontario, consequently drying is not such an important factor.

Mr. MARTIN: What is the moisture content?

Mr. WINKLER: I believe it is about five per cent below the average in Essex and Kent; that would be about sixteen per cent. As the hon. member for Souris (Mr. McDonald) mentioned, there is a corn-drying plant in our area. It has been one of the most profitable enterprises in the area, and as long as there is a profit element in it I see no reason why the government should undertake to erect drying plants there. Until we find that the corn cannot be properly marketed through these privately owned drying plants I would hesitate about giving my approval to that part of the resolution.

I noticed that the hon. member for Essex East mentioned cheaper freight rates. I hope that we can rely on his support when we ask for the restoration of the Crowsnest rates on western moving traffic.

I think on the whole the resolution of the hon. member is a very worthy one and deserves the consideration of all hon. members.

Mr. F. C. BETTS (London): I have listened with much interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr Martin), and should like to congratulate him on his very informative and excellent presentation. I notice that in his resolution he calls on the government to consider the necessity for improved marketing facilities and the need for providing adequate storage, drying, government grading and inspection facilities, in order that the quality of the corn may be improved and its production increased.

I do not know whether the hon. member is going the most direct way about achieving the very laudable object which he seems to have in view. I should like to draw to his attention some of the provisions of the Natural Products Marketing Act of 1934. Under the powers of the board provided in section 4 of chapter 57 of the statutes of 1934 we find the following:

(1) The board shall, subject to the provisions of this act, have power

(a) to regulate the time and place at which, and to designate the agency through which the regulated product shall be marketed, and—

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. BETTS: Well, we allowed the hon. member to speak without any interruption and I should like the same privilege. Perhaps if I do not exhaust my time I will answer questions afterwards. The section continues:

—to determine the manner of distribution, the quantity and quality, grade or class of the regulated product that shall be marketed by any person at any time, and to prohibit the marketing of any of the regulated product of any grade, quality or class.

And later in the section we find that the board shall also have power:

(e) to assist by grant or loan the construction or operation of facilities for preserving, processing, storing, or conditioning the regulated product and to assist research work relating to the marketing of such product.

My submission is that within the four corners of that act, and the regulations which the board was entitled to make pursuant to the act, all the relief which the hon. member seeks was to be obtained. That act had been invoked with entire success in connection with the marketing of a number of products. I know from personal observation that it resulted in placing many millions of additional dollars in the pockets of tobacco growers in Norfolk and of apple growers and others throughout the dominion. By the present government that act was referred to the privy council for determination of its constitutional validity, and as has been stated more than once in this chamber, the reference was made as an abstract theoretical question, which in my submission was entirely improper; and in the course of the argument before the privy council counsel for the Dominion of Canada, whose duty it was to support the validity of the act, virtually threw the case away by admissions he made. I would remind the mover of the resolution that his party voted against that act in this chamber, with the exception of the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherville) a former minister of agriculture, whose views on matters of that sort are particularly sound. I would therefore suggest to the mover of the resolution that if he really wants to obtain the orderly marketing of corn produced in Essex county—and I should like to have it for our corn from Middlesex county—he had better come over to this part of the house where constructive efforts have been made towards improving the marketing of natural products.

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. member permit me to ask a question now?

Mr. BETTS: Yes.

Mr. MARTIN: If what the hon. member has said is true, when the act was in existence why was not corn brought within its operation?

Mr. BETTS: The Liberal party allowed the act to remain in operation for only a limited time. It was applied to many natural products, but Rome was not built in a day.

Mr. MARTIN: It was not applied to corn.

Mr. BETTS: The researches as to corn had not been completed and regulations had not been put into effect before the government changed over.

Mr. S. M. CLARK (Essex South): I shall not take up much time this afternoon, since the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) has covered the situation very ably. But I might summarize what I believe are the problems relating to corn, and why this resolution should be considered by the government.

In the first place it has been proved many times that we grow high quality corn. We are able to compete at international shows and come away with our share and more than our share of the awards. As the hon. member has pointed out, at one time western Ontario produced as high as 22 million bushels of corn a year, proving that we are more than able to produce enough corn for the Canadian market, which I believe has an average annual consumption of about 14 million bushels. We have had difficulty in some years past with the corn-borer, but I believe it is now fairly well under control. Our next difficulty in competing with foreign corn was our lack of facilities to put our corn into proper condition. First, we must consider the drying of that product. As the hon. member for Essex East has pointed out, the average moisture content of our corn, in the early fall, is around 23 per cent or 24 per cent. To bring that down to 12 per cent or 14 per cent requires facilities which at the present time we have not in that district.

As he pointed out, we have to compete with well graded corn. We have no graders in connection with our corn industry at the present time. As has been pointed out, there is no government inspection, so that anyone buying our corn cannot have a government certificate certifying that he is getting the quality he purchased. Then, we have no market place, no place in which to concentrate or collect our corn so that it can be moved in quantities.

Those are the four deficiencies in the present system. May I say a few words to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley). Possibly the reason the former member for Essex South, Mr. Gott, is not in the seat in the house now occupied by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glen) lies in the fact that during the regime of the previous administration no group of farmers was treated as unfairly as the corn growers, or had to compete with the unfair competition they had to face. First, they had to compete with free corn, corn subsidized by the South African government and carried on boats subsidized by the Canadian government. All that happened under the high protectionist policy of the previous administration.

Mr. PERLEY: I suppose the hon. member will support a tariff on corn?

Mr. CLARK (Essex): Yes.

Mr. PERLEY: Another convert.

Mr. CLARK (Essex): That is probably the reason the former member for Essex South is not in his seat. Apparently his influence in curing the ills of the corn growers was not very great.

I trust the present government will give the resolution of the hon. member every support. I am pleased to support it in every way, and I hope that in the very near future results may flow from it.

Mr. J. GORDON ROSS (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to congratulate the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) upon moving the resolution now before the house. Hon. members opposite have said that great interest was taken in the matter by a former member of the house. I do not remember any occasion in which he moved a resolution touching upon the matter.

The hon. member for Essex East has made out a good case in support of his resolution. He spoke of the adaptability of certain counties in Ontario to the growing of corn and, if his figures in regard to yields, were correct, I believe if given proper facilities for inspection, grading, sale and the like, the growers in those counties should have no difficulty in competing with other countries. If the yield in that section of Ontario is 45 bushels to the acre, against 26 bushels in the United States and only 18 bushels in the Argentine, certainly the Ontario farmer must be producing corn at a lower cost per bushel—or should be, provided he has proper facilities for its disposal.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): You would not suggest that the duty be taken off?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The hon. member would probably suggest more duty. I have taken my stand in the house as a free-trader on all things.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Consistently.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The hon. member for London (Mr. Betts) suggested placing this matter under the marketing act which as I understand it, is not now in existence.

The resolution refers to the work of the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada. I can remember that many years ago in western Canada there was a great battle waged by the farmers for facilities for the grading, weighing and proper inspection of their grain. The hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) was one who instituted that fight in western Canada, and great credit is due him for the part he played at that time.

The board of grain commissioners, chiefly I believe because it was instituted in the first instance to handle that great exportable surplus of wheat grown in western Canada, is under the Department of Trade and Commerce. At times there have been difficulties in the house in connection with placing certain provisions under the grain act. At all times the question has been raised as to whether or not the grain act should be federal. The board of grain commissioners and the Department of Trade and Commerce have set up in Canada the finest system of handling grain to be found anywhere in the known world. We have the best grading and inspection facilities, the best weighing facilities, and the best facilities in the world for the bulk handling of all kinds of grain for export.

Year by year improvements in our system of handling grain have been made, and those improvements have been to the advantage of grain producers in Canada. In my mind it has always been a question as to whether the inspection, weighing and grading of grain should be under the Department of Trade and Commerce, or whether that part of it done in Canada might more properly be done by the Department of Agriculture. Here we have a situation in which possibly, were the handling of grain under the Department of Agriculture, in connection with their present work of finding markets within Canada for our farm products, they might be able greatly to assist the producers of corn in the counties indicated.

I believe the board of grain commissioners have rust research laboratories under their control; no doubt those would be properly under the Department of Agriculture. I am not criticizing the work of the board of grain commissioners, under the Department of Trade and Commerce, because I believe they have done excellent work in past years; to-day under the present minister they are doing even better work than they did in the past.

I can remember the fight in western Canada for the grading, inspection and weighing of grain, and I can well understand the position of the farmers in a certain portion of Ontario who are endeavouring to obtain those facilities for the handling of their grain for which we fought so long for the handling of western products. In connection with this matter I notice the resolution states that the marketing facilities for the product are inadequate. On other occasions, both in and out of the house, I have referred to the lack of marketing facilities in Canada for the products of the farm. In practically every industry except agriculture great stress has been placed upon merchandising, advertising and the sale of the product. We have lagged behind in agriculture.

Through our federal and provincial departments of agriculture we have endeavoured to teach our farmers better cultural methods. We have endeavoured to keep their live stock free from disease and we have set up quarantines on animals coming in from other countries. Through our experimental stations we have endeavoured to produce new and better grasses, grains, fruits and the other commodities which our farmers grow. Through these departments we have endeavoured to provide the farmer with a certain amount of information with regard to possible markets for his products; but until now we have never gone seriously into the business of educating the agriculturist in the preparation of his products for export, nor have we seriously tried to find world or domestic markets in which these products could be sold efficiently.

I want to congratulate the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) upon the work that has been done by the grain committee of the council, of which he is chairman, in Great Britain and other countries in connection with the sale of Canadian wheat. For many years people in Canada thought it was impossible properly to market wheat, but through the Canadian wheat board action has been taken in Great Britain to popularize bread made from Canadian flour. So far the results have been astounding. An advertising campaign has been carried on in connection with certain types of bread which must of necessity be made from flour containing a high percentage of protein, which is obtainable in quantity only from Canadian wheat. The result is that these types of bread have become very popular in England. About sixty per cent of Canadian wheat must be used in the milling of flour for this bread. If hon. members could see the advertising that has been put out in Great Britain to bring about the use of a greater percentage of Canadian wheat, they would agree with me that perhaps the grain committee, under the chairmanship of the minister, has done some of the smartest advertising ever carried out in the British market. Fortunately we have enough high grade wheat this year to carry through until another crop is harvested; but with the increased sales which will result from this advertising we can expect that a larger percentage of Canadian wheat will be used next year and the following years in the mix. This is bound to be the result if the work of the wheat board and the Department of Trade and Commerce is continued.

Many people have said that it is difficult to advertise and merchandise farm products, but I have never believed that. I think it is easier to sell something that people actually want than something they do not. The successful industry is the one that goes out and puts on a real sales campaign. I know of one organization that was able to keep out of the red in the depression years from 1930 to 1934 and 1935. I refer to the California Fruit Growers Exchange. It should be easier to sell wheat, butter, eggs and beef than it is to sell oranges, which are more or less a luxury product. In order to show what salesmanship can do it is interesting to note that 95 per cent of the oranges from the United States that are purchased in Canada are sold by the California Fruit Growers Exchange, even though not over 50 per cent of the oranges produced in the United States are produced in California. Florida oranges could reach Canada with perhaps a shorter freight haul than those from California, but these are the results obtained by this organization through advertising their produce in this and other countries.

Mr. GLADSTONE: It is because they are of a better quality.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): There are two kinds of oranges. They grow at different times, but I do not think there is any great difference in quality between the Florida orange and the California orange. California certainly sells both kinds, the Valencia and the navel orange, and it sells them at the same season of the year that Florida has her great production on the market. I give that simply as an instance of how farm products can be advertised and merchandised, and I believe that we in this country should take a leaf out of their book and endeavour through our departments to sell our products in other countries of the world by following the same methods.

I know the Department of Agriculture last year started their marketing branch, and they had exceptionally good results in the Dominion of Canada. I have not the exact figures, but I know that just recently there appeared to be a large surplus of apples in the dominion, so large that producers of apples both in Ontario and British Columbia became alarmed whether they would be able to find a market for their apples. They got in touch with the marketing branch of the Department of Agriculture, and that branch agreed to help them endeavour to find a market within Canada for their surplus of apples, and within the last five or six weeks the major portion of that surplus has been sold within Canada itself to the Canadian people. The net result is that the apple growers are now in a position to market their product in the ordinary way and are no longer afraid of a glut on their market in this country.

My hon. friend's resolution brings up the question of the inspection and grading of farm commodities. We do inspect and grade some of our farm commodities in Canada, and in years gone by we have run into considerable criticism when any new grading system was moved for in this house. I well remember the time when the hon. member for Melville put through, as Minister of Agriculture, regulations for the grading of eggs. I can remember that members of the house were very much against that measure at that time, and farmers generally throughout the country were against it. I believe that the idea of the Minister of Agriculture at that time was to endeavour to find a market for our eggs in the old country. But a peculiar thing happened after the grading of eggs was an accomplished fact, and that was that the consumption of eggs in Canada itself rose to practically double what it was prior to the establishment of grading. That is easily explainable. When people can depend absolutely upon procuring a quality product they will buy more and more of it, especially an article like eggs. Those who like a boiled egg for breakfast would be finished with eggs for weeks if one morning they knocked the top off an egg and found that it was not quite right; but after the egg-grading regulations came into effect gradually the housewives throughout Canada found they could purchase eggs anywhere and be sure of a high quality product, and the result was that the consumption of eggs throughout the dominion doubled. That is one of the best kinds of salesmanship which I know of with regard to agricultural products. You must see that quality goods are placed upon the market, whether in Canada or abroad, in good condition, and in order to do that I think we should go further in the grading and inspection of those farm commodities which we have to sell.

I believe that we ought to have markings for our farm products in the export markets just as we have our certificates for No. 1, No. 2, No. 3 and No. 4 northern wheat. On the markets of the world to-day our wheat is designated by government inspection certificates setting out the grade, and all buyers of that grain know exactly the quality they are purchasing. In regard to other farm products I think it is equally important that we in this house should see that the departments of government put into effect in Canada a proper inspection and grading system for all farm products which are to be exported, and no farm product should be allowed to be exported unless it is graded, and the grade designated. If this is done, our customers overseas, when they bought a No. 1 grade Canadian article, whether it be bacon, beef, eggs, butter, cheese, apples, peaches, canned goods or any other farm product exported, would know that they were getting a high quality article. I do not see how we can ever expect to place our farm products on the export market, or sell as many of them as we might do in this country, if we do not arrange matters so that the buyers of the products will know that they are getting the highest quality article when they pay for the highest quality article. We spend a great deal of money in many of our departments. I have often criticized the government for not spending sufficient money in the Department of Agriculture, and here is one place where I think a considerable amount of money could be spent to advantage by the dominion government in a way that would bring a tremendous return not only to the Canadian farmer but to everybody else in Canada, because after all most of the people in Canada are dependent upon the purchasing power of the farmer.

In connection with the sale of different agricultural products for export and of products that might be imported into this country, may I point out this fact in regard to grain being produced in one particular area of the country to be sold all over the country. Most of us know that Russia is a great grain-growing country, and yet Russia exports grain by the Black sea, and imports grain at Vladivostock, the reason being the tremendous freight haul from one end of the country to the other. That, of course, has some bearing upon this resolution. It hardly seems possible to me that a freight rate could be put into effect that would take corn from, say, Windsor, Ontario, to Vancouver, British Columbia, or to Vancouver island, when corn can so easily be brought in there by water from other countries.

Mr. MARTIN: If I may ask the hon. member a question in reference to the statement he has just made, has he taken into consideration that with the great water facilities which we have in western Ontario, the transportation costs from, let us say, Windsor to Vancouver, would be relatively cheaper than the costs now for transportation completely by rail?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): If corn can be shipped from Windsor to Vancouver by water—and I know there is water all the way—the question still remains whether the bottoms are available. I think a tremendous haul like that might make it impossible for us to sell our corn on the west coast, although I believe that practically all the corn which can be grown around Windsor could easily be consumed at points that are not so far distant. I do not think the feeder on the west coast should be penalized on account of an endeavour to ship corn from Windsor by an all-rail route.

Mr. MARTIN: We can offer it to you as cheap as and cheaper than you are getting it now.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Well then, we shall certainly buy it. I never saw a man in my part of the country who would not buy in the cheapest place. As a matter of fact one of our great protests in this parliament has been against our inability to do so. I wish to be able to buy in the cheapest market, no matter where it is.

I am not opposed to this resolution; I am all in favour of the farmers of Ontario having the facilities that have already been given to farmers in other parts of Canada. I believe, however, that those facilities could better be given were all this business of inspection, grading, etc., of farm products under the one federal department and under the same department which is endeavouring to find markets within Canada for these products. As regards markets external to Canada, that was dealt with by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) some time ago.

It is, I believe, the business of the dominion Department of Agriculture to inspect, grade and prepare for marketing products for export, and to inspect, grade, prepare and find markets for those same commodities within Canada. But I believe it is the right of the Department of Trade and Commerce to take from the Department of Agriculture responsibility for those commodities when they are shipped overseas or to other countries, and to extend to all farm commodities the work they have already started with regard to grain, so that the farmer may be placed in a somewhat similar position to those large industries which have established their own marketing facilities. After all, the farmer is an individual, and it is very hard for him to spread his sales force all over the world. We now have a department which is getting in touch with buyers in every country in the world, and if the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) would, where necessary, add to his staff of men who have knowledge about farm products, and push the sale of farm products generally as he is now pushing the sale of Canadian wheat in Great Britain, he would be doing the greatest service to the farmers that can be done at the present time.

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): I am prompted to say a few words in this debate, largely because of observations made by my two very good friends the hon. member for Souris (Mr. McDonald) and the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Winkler). Lest the house may think that corn-growing in Manitoba is confined to those two constituencies, which by the way are boundary constituencies, the fact of the matter is that corn-growing in Manitoba has been progressing with leaps and bounds during the past number of years, and so far from being confined to the area directly tributary to the United States boundary, has now spread largely over the whole province. This is particularly the case, I think I may say, with respect to lands which, though I would hesitate to call them submarginal, are certainly of the lighter type, where the difficulty of producing our ordinary cereal crops is becoming greater and greater. Here corn-growing is gaining considerable ground. I refer particularly for the moment to the area immediately adjacent on the north to the area to which the hon. members have already referred, and which is equally proud of its success so far as corn-growing is concerned; I believe that more and more corn will be grown there as time goes on.

The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) might be surprised, were he to come to Manitoba, at the extent to which corn is being grown in that province. May I add, as a little sideline to the observations which have been made this afternoon, that last fall we had in my own constituency what so far as I know is the first corn-husking competition in Canada. Those who have had an opportunity of paying some attention to similar events in the United States can probably realize the interest it created. In the United States they go even to the extent of making such affairs a national event and the performance is broadcast at the time of the competition. We were therefore very proud of the distinction of holding in our own locality the first corn-husking competition.

With us, of course, corn has gone through quite an evolution. It started out, as naturally one would expect as a fodder proposition. Our immediate difficulty was, however, to provide for keeping it for use in the winter time. The old idea of stooking it up in the fields and attempting to bring it in in the winter time created a very serious difficulty on account of freezing down and deep snow. The extra labour required in that regard discouraged rather than encouraged the use of corn. Afterwards, from the fodder point of view, the silo idea came into being. Here again the fact that the corn had to be cared for at the same time that our ordinary cereal crops required attention, raised an additional difficulty. Moreover, owing to frost, the stave upright silos have not been altogether satisfactory in our climate. From that we drifted to the idea of trench silo, but here again we encountered difficulties. In the last two or three years there have been developed various methods of keeping corn fodder through the winter and I have had an opportunity of seeing many of them tried out. Some farmers go to the extent of taking the corn from the binder and piling it in stacks, packing it hard, and that method has been fairly successful. Others cut it up. The latest idea—it is not a new idea by any means—seems to be a lower silo of considerable size. A representative of one of the lumber companies in northern Manitoba told me a few weeks ago that the biggest business they had at the present time was in the sale of the snow fences we see along the highways. These fences are used for silo purposes. Paper is put inside and the ensilage is put in that, and this has proved satisfactory.

Another thing that has encouraged corn-growing in our province, and I think it will do a good deal to maintain its popularity, is the fact that during the drought periods corn has suffered less than any other crop. Fortunately the grasshoppers did not attack it to the same extent. Many times we have had other fodder crops, particularly oats and barley, completely destroyed by grasshoppers, but we found that the corn came through reasonably satisfactorily, from the standpoint of fodder. It is true the cobs looked as if a man with one tooth missing had been chewing at them, but at any rate we were able to obtain fodder. The result has been that a good many people have turned over a few acres to corn so as to be sure of a fodder crop to carry them through the winter.

As regards the resolution which my hon. friend has proposed, as I read it it seems to relate more to the mechanics of handling the corn. I really believe, although I have not had an opportunity of studying the matter very fully, that the Canada Grain Act already provides what my hon. friend has in mind so far as grading is concerned. It may be news to the hon. gentleman, but I was told by the chairman of the board of grain commissioners a few months ago that they were already handling corn through the grain inspection department in Winnipeg. I presume that that would be corn grown in Manitoba or farther west. From the standpoint of grading, therefore, the Canada Grain Act provides what is sought by the resolution. Observations have been made in this discussion with respect to control of corn. It has been said that there should be a greater control of corn. These observations, I believe, were largely directed to the suggestion that the state or some department of government should give an assurance as to varieties that were being sown. Last year in this house we passed the Seeds Act, 1937, one provision being with regard to the control of seed corn. There was an amendment the purpose of which was to bring about a more strict control in this regard. So much seed corn happened to be transported from place to place by trucks that it was difficult for the seed branch to keep control of it and to be assured that it was of a type satisfactory to the district in which it was grown and also that it had the proper qualities as to germination. In this regard, therefore, the Seeds Act provides protection.

One thing in connection with which I see a difficulty from the point of view of my hon. friends throughout Ontario, with an increase in corn production, is the question of drying. At the head of the lakes, of course, we have facilities for drying wheat. These facilities are provided for the most part by the elevator companies that handle the grain, additional charges being made for the service. In wet seasons they are used to a large extent. I do not know whether the same facilities would be satisfactory in the handling of corn, but I fancy that they would. In the country from which I come, where a good deal of corn is grown for seed purposes,—either for fodder or for seed—the corn is dried in most cases. In fact, I presume that it is always dried, and every device imaginable is brought into play. Some people have set up elaborate drying apparatus, forced draught and all the rest of it, but I do not believe that they are able to dry the corn in the length of time my hon. friend suggested. I understand that not more than two batches a week can be dried.

Mr. MARTIN: They are antique.

Mr. WEIR: Well, we use what facilities we have at hand. The hon. gentleman might be surprised to know that the commercial incubator used in the spring hatching season is used to dry a good deal of corn.

So far as the marketing of corn is concerned, in the particular area from which my hon. friend comes, the production is local though it may be extended to other sections; but I presume that there is much localized production of seed and grain corn as well. Experience in many places in the west has shown that where such communities are specializing in a certain type of crop it is not so difficult to organize some sort of marketing concern among them. I refer particularly to the alfalfa growers of southern Alberta and another group of alfalfa growers in northern Manitoba who have specialized extensively in the production of alfalfa seed. These organizations, through their very careful selection of seed and their careful cleaning of it, have established a reputation, and as a cooperative organization have joined together in the matter of sales with the result that they have gone along very well.

While listening to other hon. members discussing this question it occurred to me that in some of the statutes that have already been passed some assistance might be given to the corn growers in connection with drying. I know that a subvention is provided for between the dominion government and the government of the province for the purpose of establishing seed-cleaning plants in different parts of the country. In our province there are a number of them. There is one not far from where I live where brome-grass-growing is specialized in. There the two governments cooperated in equipping that organization with a splendid seed-cleaning plant. If that is necessary for seed-cleaning probably it is equally necessary for drying corn, and something might be done to assist the corn growers in that regard.

I wish my hon. friend the very best of luck in the consideration which will be given by the government to his resolution. I have nothing against the resolution, but hon. members, particularly those on the agriculture committee, are interested in the matter, and I imagine if he would press it there would be no difficulty in having the agriculture committee meet on one or two occasions to deal with the matter, merely for the purpose of securing additional information, calling before it departmental officials and others interested, probably including some from his own district. I offer that suggestion to him.

Reference was made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle to the tariff on corn imposed by the former government. At that time I stated that I did not see what difference it made to put a duty on corn. The idea they were propounding then was that by placing a duty on corn they could increase the consumption of barley, which at that time was a drug on the market. My observation was to the effect that I could not see what difference it made whether our barley was competing with corn in a foreign market or corn was competing with our barley in this market.

As the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) may wish to make a few remarks on the resolution, I shall make way for him.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact I have no extended comments to make on the resolution. In the few minutes at my disposal I might take the opportunity to compliment the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) not only on the mass of valuable information he has placed before the house, but also on the manner in which he did this. I was particularly interested when he said that the corn grown in the western Ontario peninsula is of as good quality as corn grown anywhere else in the world. I admit that while I have no intimate knowledge of the corn question, the information I had rather led me to believe that because of the greater moisture content of Canadian corn it was under somewhat of a disability as compared with corn produced elsewhere. But if it is true that in western Ontario or anywhere else in Canada we can grow corn which is as good as that from any other country in the world, surely it is an anomaly that we cannot at least supply our own Canadian market.

This matter of the production, grading, drying and storage of corn to some extent comes under the care of two departments, the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce. I need not say to my hon. friends, especially those across the way, that these two departments co-operate in everything in the highest degree—

Mr. STEWART: Sometimes.

Mr. EULER: —and they are quite willing to do so with regard to the production and sale of corn. The factors in the situation which have been discussed most particularly seem to be marketing, storage, drying, grading and inspection. All of these affect the quality of the commodity. I am glad to know that inherently the quality of Canadian corn is what my hon. friend says it is. The question of quality has not been brought particularly to the attention of the Department of Trade and Commerce. I cannot recall that the matter of grading and inspection was ever brought before the department. I know that the question of storage was brought before the Department of Trade and Commerce in the time of the former government, and also of the present government. That particular matter is not being stressed to-day, and I might leave it with this statement, that there is not wanting in Canada at the moment equipment for either storage or drying of corn. I regret that my colleague the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is not here to-day, because many of the matters under discussion come more particularly within his province.

I might summarize the results of some investigations made by members of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce: There is much poor quality corn, resulting from admixture of varieties, too many varieties and poor varieties; also poor culture and harvesting practices, and lack of suitable corn cribs on the farm. This is not entirely consistent with the statements which have been made that Canadian corn is just as good in quality as other corn, but this is easily capable of correction. Then there is the matter which has been mentioned, that much of the corn has too high a moisture content, which causes heating in storage after shipping and is therefore a serious drawback. There are insufficient hogs in the corn area to consume at a profit the inferior corn and keep it off the market. There is also still a good deal of damage caused by the corn-borer. Finally—and this touches the Department of Trade and Commerce—the official grades and inspection services for both seed and commercial corn are inadequate. As far as the seed corn is concerned, I think that is entirely a matter for the Department of Agriculture, but grading and inspection are for the Department of Trade and Commerce, through the grain board, which is under the jurisdiction of that department.

Now my time is up. In conclusion I should like to say that as far as the matters discussed to-day affect the Department of Agriculture, I am sure my colleague the Minister of Agriculture will take due note of what has been said. I shall further bring it to his attention. With regard to the matter of inspection and grading, in 1936 the Department of Agriculture reported that an adequate system of inspection and grading of commercial corn was vital to any successful development of market practice, and recommended that the whole question of commercial grades of corn should be reviewed. It has been brought before the board of grain commissioners, and they reported that the machinery for inspection and grading was inadequate, contrary to the expression of opinion by the hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Weir). Section 36 of the Canada Grain Act provides:

> No inspecting officer in the eastern division shall be required to inspect any grain which is not in the district to which such officer has been assigned, or to inspect any grain in such district more than five miles from his office unless the person requesting such inspection has first paid to the inspecting officer a sum sufficient to cover such officer's travelling expenses between his office and the place where such grain is and return, and also such an allowance for his time as the board may direct.

There is only one grain inspector for Ontario, and he is located in Toronto. But as a result of consultation between the Department of Agriculture and the board of grain commissioners, it was arranged:

1. That the Department of Agriculture would consider the present definitions of the different grades of corn, and suggest to the Board of Grain Commissioners any changes which they might feel were necessary.

2. That the Board of Grain Commissioners as an experiment would provide for the local inspection of corn in Ontario under the Canada Grain Act, and that officials of the Department of Agriculture would, as far as possible, carry on inspection services under the direction of the board's chief grain inspector, all actual details of the procedure to be worked out later, after discussion between the Board of Grain Commissioners' chief grain inspector and officials of the Department of Agriculture.

When the general revision of the Canada Grain Act is undertaken, we hope such amendments will be made as will meet the wishes of those who have spoken here this afternoon. In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the carrying of the resolution.

Motion (Mr. Martin) agreed to.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. PELLETIER

QUESTION OF INTRODUCTION OF BILL TO REPEAL THE MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917—RULING OF MR. SPEAKER

Mr. SPEAKER: With reference to the question of privilege raised yesterday by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier) as to his right to introduce a bill to repeal the Military Service Act, 1917, I beg to state that I have looked into the matter most carefully and have read the statute in question and have examined also the revised statutes of Canada, 1927.

The main contention of the hon. member for Peace River is that since it was possible for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) to introduce a bill to revive and amend a statute which is listed as spent, then he has the right to introduce a bill to repeal a similar statute. Reviving a dead law is possible and permissible. If the hon. member's bill provided that the Military Service Act be revived, it would be in order, but he proposes to repeal it after it has been actually repealed by this house. It is listed in schedule A of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, which is entitled: "Acts and parts of acts repealed, from the date of coming into force of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927."

When the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) asked for leave to introduce his bill in 1922, the Military Service Act was spent but it had not yet been repealed by statute. This is the reason why the bill was placed on the order paper, but Mr. Speaker Lemieux ruled it out because the act, although still on the statute books, was spent.

[Mr. Euler.]

If that decision were right, and I am sure it was, there is a better reason this year to rule out the bill of the hon. member for Peace River. That reason is that the Military Service Act has disappeared from the statute book.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

*GRANTS TO IMPERIAL VETERANS IN CANADA

Mr. JAQUES:

1. How much money has been allowed by the imperial government for the assistance of imperial men in Canada since October 14, 1935, what money was in hand before that date, and what was the cost of administration?

2. How much money has been allowed in Alberta, and to whom should a man apply for assistance?

3. How many of such men have received assistance in Alberta, and how much? What are their names and addresses, and the name of their respective regiment, together with their regimental number?

4. What is the allowance for man and wife, and how much is allowed for each child under 16 years of age?

5. If a man is unemployed and has no other means, does he qualify for assistance such as food, clothing and shelter, dental treatment or other necessities, and to whom should he apply?

6. What grant is made to each branch of Canadian legion, if any, out ot imperial funds, and by whose authority was the grant made?

7. What are the names of the members of the said administration, and are they imperial men or Canadians?

Mr. POWER: Mr. Speaker, if I were required to give a categorical reply to the question asked by the hon. member, I would reply that no money has been allowed by the imperial government for the assistance of imperial men in Canada, either before or since October 14, 1935. It is possible, however, that the hon. member has reference to grants which were received from another source, as follows:

In 1926, the United Services' Fund of Great Britain transferred the sum of £5,000 to Canada for the benefit of men who served in the imperial forces. At the request of the management of the fund, a board of three trustees not in any way connected with the government service was appointed and confirmed by order in council P.C. 1964, dated December 1, 1926, which stated that the board—shall be empowered to make such regulations regarding the administration of the said fund and the granting of benefits therefrom as it may deem advisable, such regulations becoming effective upon approval by the central board of management of the United Services Fund.

The trustees appointed were: Colonel G. E. Sanders, C.M.G., D.S.O., of Calgary, Alta.; Brigadier-General J. A. Gunn, C.M.G., D.S.O., of Toronto, Ontario; Lieutenant-Colonel A. A. Magee, D.S.O., of Montreal, Quebec; and it was agreed by the board of trustees and the management of the United Services Fund that each trustee should personally assume the supervision of an area as follows:

Colonel Sanders: British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan.

General Gunn: Manitoba and Ontario.

Colonel Magee: Quebec and maritime provinces.

Regulations were promulgated by the trustees, of which the following are extracts:

Priority in granting assistance shall be given to those who are suffering from a war disability.

Assistance in the form of medical treatment may be given to those who are suffering from a non-service disability.

In the event of the death of an ex-member of the imperial forces, temporary assistance may be granted to his widow, children or dependent parents.

No portion of the said fund shall be used for unemployment relief or for cases for which adequate relief is available from other sources.

Grants from local funds were limited to $50 to any one person and any larger loan or grant could only be made from the general trust fund on the recommendation of any two trustees.

As pressure of business caused General Gunn to resign, he was replaced by Colonel B. O. Hooper, D.S.O., M.C., of Toronto, by authority of order in council P.C. 23, dated January 11, 1929.

An additional grant of £5,000 was received from the management of the same fund in June 1930, and administered by the trustees, who received their final allocation from the grant in April 1931.

I am advised that the entire accounts have been exhausted since the end of 1932, and wish to make it clear to my hon. friend that the grants were received from the United Services Fund of Great Britain and not from the imperial government.

Neither the government nor the Department of Pensions and National Health, as such, had any control or jurisdiction over the disbursement of these moneys.

[Mr. Power.]

ROCK SPRINGS, ONT., POST OFFICE

Mr. STEWART:

1. When was a post office first established at Rock Springs, Leeds county, Ontario?

2. When was the location of said post office changed from Rock Springs?

3. How far from Rock Springs is said post office now located?

4. Why was said change made?

5. Who requested the change in location?

6. Who recommended the change?

Mr. EULER:

1. 1st June, 1883.

2. On the 17th August, 1936. The Rock Springs post office was closed and a new office established at Bell Crossing.

3. Bell Crossing is 2½ miles east of Rock Springs.

4. In the interest of the boxholders on the former Rock Springs R.R. No. 1 and No. 2.

5. D. E. Lewis of Brockville.

6. District director of postal services, Ottawa.

FOREIGN POLICY AND EUROPEAN SITUATION

Mr. CHURCH:

Has any action been taken by the government to assure His Majesty's government of Great Britain of Canada's moral support, interest, cooperation and aid in the present foreign situation, and will any papers relating thereto be tabled?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, the answer to the question as drafted is in the negative. As already indicated in answer to a question by the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) on March 1, the government has been receiving from the United Kingdom government certain communications relating to the international situation. Such communications are continuing. As indicated in that answer and in answer to a question by the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), on February 25, these communications are in the nature of information rather than consultation upon policies. As such, they are helpful to the Canadian government in assisting it to understand the actual facts of the current situation.

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Is the government yet in a position to review the reply given here last week and the week before in the light of Germany's action as it relates to Canadian foreign policy?

2. Will any papers or correspondence be tabled?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. The questions to which reference is apparently made dealt with the policy of the government of the United Kingdom in respect to the League of Nations and to Italy. The action to which the present question refers does not appear to call for any revision of the answers then made.

2. Answered by No. 1.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PEOPLE OF FRENCH EXTRACTION IN NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. LACROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

1. What is the total population of the province of New Brunswick?
2. How many persons of French extraction are there in such province?
3. How many federal employees are there at the experimental farm, at Fredericton, New Brunswick?
4. How many of these are of French extraction?
5. How many of them can speak French, if any?
6. How many graduates in agricultural sciences does the federal Department of Agriculture employ in the province of New Brunswick?
7. How many of these are of French extraction?
8. How many of them can speak the French language?

DOMINION FRUIT AND VEGETABLE INSPECTORS

Mr. LAPOINTE (Matapedia-Matane):

1. How many fruit and vegetable inspectors does the government maintain in each province of the dominion?
2. Are they appointed by the civil service commission? If so, since when?
3. Was knowledge of the French language always required by said commission from such inspectors in the province of Quebec?

PETITIONS OF RIGHT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) of which I gave him informal notice some days ago.

During the session of 1936 the Minister of Justice gave an assurance that a bill would be prepared by the Department of Justice to amend the existing law with respect to petitions of right against the crown. On March 24, 1937, the Minister of Justice informed the house that a draft bill had been prepared and submitted to the various departments of the government, preparatory to being submitted for approval of the governor general in council, but that more time was required for the final preparation of the bill. The Minister of Justice, however, then renewed his assurance for the present session of parliament. Is it the intention of the government to introduce such a bill during the present session of parliament?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the matter is one which presents certain difficulties, and as I said last year, the various departments of the government have been communicated with in regard to this matter. As a result of that consultation a draft bill has been prepared which would meet at least to a large extent the views of the hon. gentleman. This draft bill, I must say, has not yet been considered by the governor in council, and I am awaiting the first opportunity to lay it before my colleagues. I hope it will be possible to introduce it afterwards.

CURRENCY AND CREDIT

REPORTED STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE AS TO CONTROL—INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Pursuant to press reports that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has stated in Edmonton that the government expects to have complete control of currency and credit by 1945, I would ask: is the legislative program of the government complete for this session, and if not, may we expect any legislation to be brought down that will change the present structure of the banking system?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the press report to which my hon. friend has referred. I would wish to see the statement itself and also to ascertain how accurate it is before attempting to comment upon it.

With regard to the question which my hon. friend has just put concerning the legislative program of the government, I would say to him that the program will not be completed until the session of parliament itself is completed. As to whether any legislation of the character mentioned will be brought down, I can only say that the government will make its policy known on that as well as on other matters as the occasion arises.

SPANISH CIVIL WAR

EMBARGO ON EXPORTS—EUROPEAN SITUATION—ARMS AND MUNITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, before we proceed with the orders of the day I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). As it is now definitely established that the German and Italian governments have sent large numbers of troops, equipped with all the essentials of modern warfare, to fight against the legitimate government of Spain, will the Canadian government immediately remove the embargo imposed last year on exports to Spain? Failing that, will the government extend the embargo to include exports to Germany and Italy?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend was good enough to give me notice of this question. I would say to him in the first instance that his question appears to be a little out of order, in that it seeks to convey information—whether accurate or inaccurate I cannot say—rather than to seek it. However, my reply to the question is this: no embargo has been placed on exports to Spain. The embargo imposed last year applies only to exports of arms and munitions. This action followed similar action by the members of the non-intervention committee, representing twenty-seven European countries. Though Canada was not in a position to supply any appreciable quantity of arms or munitions, this course was followed in order to prevent exports from Canada contributing in any way to render ineffective the efforts of the signatories to confine the struggle to Spanish territory. The European countries primarily concerned have taken no action such as is proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). The Canadian government does not propose to take such action. No exports of munitions have been made from Canada to Germany or to Italy.

May I add to what I have said in the way of a formal reply to my hon. friend that at this time we are witnessing momentous events on the continent of Europe. We are witnessing also momentous events on the continent of Asia. Canada lies midway between the two as a part of the continent of north America. Unless it is the desire to have it appear that our country is anxious to participate in these events, to become a party to or a part of what is happening on the continents of Europe and Asia, it is desirable, I believe, that all persons in positions of authority and responsibility in this country and who have anything to do with the shaping and moulding of public opinion, whether in parliament or in the press, should refrain from taking any steps or making any representations which would appear to have a contrary aim and purpose. Moreover I think we should be particularly guarded in what we say and what we do for the further reason that we should wish at all cost to avoid making the present appalling situation on the two continents I have mentioned more embarrassing for the countries faced with it, in their efforts to work out a solution.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In view of the Prime Minister's statement, will the government then put an embargo on war materials going into Japan?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I had hoped that possibly without inquiry the Prime Minister would be disposed to make some statement to this house regarding the government's appreciation of the European situation. While Canada is a part of the north American continent, we are profoundly concerned about what is now happening in Europe; and with the wider knowledge and fuller information that the government possesses, it did occur to me that the Prime Minister might think the time had come to make some statement, as I have said, on the government's appreciation of that situation so far as it affects this country. I concur in what the Prime Minister said a moment ago, but surely if in the parliament of Great Britain a discussion can be carried on of the kind that the newspapers report, no harm can result from having the head of the government in this country indicate what the government's appreciation of the situation may be. There is a vast difference between an acrimonious debate and a statement or appreciation of a position. We may easily fall into a wrong attitude of mind with respect to this matter. It is idle to say that we have not the right to discuss any matter that affects the welfare of the Canadian people. If England can discuss it in the manner in which it was discussed, surely Canadians are not doing them a disservice if we ascertain the views of the government with respect to these matters in the light of their fuller information than is accorded to the average man.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was going to precede what I had to say, although on second thoughts it did not seem necessary to do so, with the observation that I hoped no one in this house would seek to draw wrong inferences from my statement. Practically all statements are capable of different interpretations. There is no statement that can be made at the present time with respect to world affairs which, if persons wish to be partisan in their attitude, cannot be interpreted in different ways. What I said will be understood, I believe, by the Canadian people as being a frank expression of the view which the government takes regarding the events which I have spoken of as happening on the continent of Europe and the continent of Asia. I have said nothing whatever to indicate any desire on the part of the government to limit in any way freedom of debate in this house with respect to any question. That freedom exists at all times; it is the right of every hon. member to exercise it in his own discretion. My right hon. friend, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), has just said that the government gets wider information and gains a fuller knowledge of conditions, through dispatches which it is receiving from Europe, than possibly hon. members may obtain through the agency of the press. In regard to that may I say that such knowledge and information as the government have received through the dispatches which have come to us from Europe and from Asia only serve to confirm the wisdom of the statement which I made a moment ago in reply to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). I wish to repeat that if any useful purpose is going to be served, in respect to the situation either in Europe or Asia, by having these matters debated at great length, then, if hon. members so decide, the government will seek to place no restriction upon their utterances; but the government must, with respect to its own utterances, make them in the light of the responsibility which attaches to everything the government says at this time.

ELECTRIC POWER

TRANSFER TO PARLIAMENT OF CONTROL OF EXPORT EXCEPT IN INTERNATIONAL EMERGENCY

The house resumed from Thursday, March 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the second reading of Bill No. 21, to amend the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): As I see it, after listening to the very able speech delivered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the object of this bill is to relieve the government of any responsibility for initiating legislation in connection with the export of power. Just why the government is afraid to take responsibility I do not know.

What is the proposal that is before the house at the present time? The government proposes to turn over to a private member, in relation to a matter so important as this, the right to initiate legislation. Both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) have characterized it as legislation of very great importance, and in my opinion it is altogether too important to be turned over to any private member or to any private bill. Behind a private bill there is always the motive of profit, whereas international amity should be the purpose of the government in a situation of this kind.

I agree with what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) said. If the government really desires to give parliament the power to pass upon the exportation of electricity, all it has to do is to accept his suggestion and amend the statute so as to provide that before any measure to export power becomes effective it shall have the approval of this house.

It is not my intention to deal with the bill at any great length, but I wish to deal particularly with one aspect of it, namely, the question of the revocability of licences. In the course of the debate so far, three cities have been mentioned, Massena, Niagara Falls, and Chicago, and I will try to show, from our experience in connection with the development of electricity through water diverted at each of these centres, that it is next to impossible to revoke a licence for the exportation of power.

Let us take, first, Massena. During the last year of the great war, in 1918, the aluminium interests at Massena, New York, a branch or subsidiary of the Mellon interests in the United States, were the greatest exporters of that metal to the allies. In 1918, wishing to divert more water from the St. Lawrence, they applied, through the International Joint Commission, I believe, for the right to erect a weir in the south channel of the St. Lawrence river, above the head of the Long Sault. Of course, the government of the day objected. It was a violation of one of our international treaties, the Ashburton treaty, which stipulated that no obstruction should be placed in any international navigable channel between Canada and the United States. But when it was represented to the government of the day that the aluminium company were supplying a very large proportion of that metal used by Great Britain as well as by Great Britain's allies in the prosecution of the war, the government consented to the erection of a weir in the St. Lawrence river on the condition that it should be removed "five years hence," that is to say, in 1923.

What happened? The weir was erected and the aluminium company diverted from the St. Lawrence 25,000 cubic feet of water per second through a power canal over to Massena, situated on the Grass river in New York state, and there from a head of approximately 25 feet they were able to develop from 80,000 to 90,000 horsepower. What was done in 1923? Indeed the company did not wait until 1923, because, before that date, they asked for an extension of the lease, notwithstanding that the war had then been over for practically five years. In 1928 they went after something very much more important, namely, permission to raise the weir another six feet. That is far different from carrying out the agreement to remove the weir at the end of the five years. To-day that company is diverting 25,000 cubic feet per second. It is developing from 80,000 to 90,000 horsepower from 25,000 cubic feet of water, 12,500 of which belongs to Canada.

I should like the Prime Minister when he speaks again to tell us whether that agreement can be revoked. I do not believe it can, because the interests are too strong, not only in connection with the electricity but in the realm of oil. The same interests are behind both, and they have shown great strength. Hon. members may be familiar with what took place in Colombia, South America, when the Anglo-Persian Oil Company, and the Gulf Oil Company—the latter belonging, I am told, to the Mellon interests—were trying to obtain oil leases in that country. The effort resulted finally in the overthrow of the government. The incoming president, Doctor Herrera, tried to obtain a loan, just as the outgoing president had done; and what did he do? He went to Washington and was there given a banquet; and the gentleman who sat beside him was none other than the Secretary of the United States treasury, the late Andrew Mellon, then head of the Mellon interests, who controlled, I am told, the Gulf Oil Company, and the aluminium company on the Grass river at Massena, New York. Well, what was the upshot? Instead of cancelling the lease for oil for the Gulf Oil interests in Colombia, which it was alleged had been obtained illegally, as a result of the president's visit to Washington Colombia extended the lease and obtained its loan of $4,000,000. That is one instance of how revocation did not take place, of oil in that case, of electricity and water in the case of Massena. The second instance is Niagara Falls. Most hon. members are familiar with the situation there. It would seem that Divine Providence, in laying out the course of the Niagara river, knowing that this great territory of Canada has a cold climate and for heating would require a lot of white coal for a large part of the year, and that in Ontario teeming millions of people would in due course be settled, determined that ninety-four per cent of the flow of water in that river should pass over the Horseshoe falls on our side of the line.

In due course it was realized that there were great potential power resources at Niagara Falls, and in 1909 the two countries made a treaty to prevent the robbery of the water that flows over the falls. Later came the International Joint Commission, and it was arranged that for the preservation of the beauty of the falls not more than 56,000 cubic feet per second of water should be taken for power purposes, and of that 56,000 cubic feet it was stipulated that 36,000 should belong to Canada and 20,000 to the United States. That was not nearly as generous to Canada as would appear on the face of it; for what was the situation at that time? The Niagara-Hudson interests, which control all or practically all the power in the whole of western New York state, had a plant on the Canadian side of Niagara Falls, either in operation or about to operate, known as the Canadian Niagara Power Company plant. They were diverting 10,000 cubic feet per second, and all of the power that they generated with our 10,000 cubic feet of water was exported to the United States, barring a small quantity on which I am told the Ontario Hydro has a call if required.

In determining how much water Canada should have out of the 56,000 second feet this 10,000 second feet diverted by the Niagara-Hudson company or the Canadian Niagara Power Company was charged to Canada, which left us with only 26,000 second feet. Again the Ontario Hydro, or at that time the Ontario Power Company, had a long-term agreement with United States power consuming interests by which these interests were supplied with 60,000 horsepower, requiring the diversion of 3,600 second feet from the Niagara river. In other words at the time the allocation was made of 36,000 feet to Canada and 20,000 to the United States, the United States were already obtaining from Canada 13,600 second feet; so we were left with 22,400 second feet. That was the situation at Niagara Falls. It is a situation which cannot be revoked. The hydro long-term agreement for the exportation of their 60,000 horsepower does not expire until 1950, and I do not know how long the term is of the Canadian Niagara Power Company plant which diverts 10,000 second feet of water. So that at Niagara as well as at Massena we are getting the short end of the stick.

Our power resources are gone from us, whether we would use them or not. Who does not know what happened during the great war, when the power shortage in Ontario was very acute? At that time I was associated with a large plant which used a great deal of hydro power, and I know that there was great difficulty in obtaining power to run that plant. Why did we not revoke the licence to export the power generated from the 13,600 second feet taken from us? I am not saying we did not agree to do it, but we cannot revoke the agreement.

What is the situation at Chicago, the third instance to which I wish to refer? At Chicago, in spite of anything the premier of Ontario says, Canada does lose a lot of water. I made a speech recently in London, Ontario, in which I discussed the Chicago situation, and later the premier of Ontario said that I must be wrong, because water does not run uphill, and he is reported in the press as saying that on account of lake Michigan being several hundred feet higher than lake Huron therefore no Canadian water can run out at Chicago. But of course the premier of Ontario is not always right; in fact is often wrong, and on this occasion he was very far wrong. As a matter of fact those two great lakes are on the same level, to all intents and purposes one lake, joined by a channel twenty miles wide, the straits of Mackinac. So that the water pouring into those two great lakes pours into one common reservoir. The watershed on the Canadian side from which water flows into those two great lakes is larger than the watershed from which water flows into them from the United States. And of the water diverted at Chicago half is Canadian water.

Now what is the situation there? For the twenty years from 1915 to 1935, the diversion at Chicago for domestic purposes, for power purposes and shipping, has approximated 10,000 cubic feet a second. Thirty-six miles west of Chicago at the town of Lockport, where the Chicago drainage canal drops into the Des Plaines river, Chicago develops 36,000 horsepower of electrical energy, half of which is developed from Canadian water because half of the water diverted belongs to us. Prior to 1900 water was diverted at Chicago in small quantities. In those old days they used to pump it over the height of land ten miles west of Chicago, a height of about twelve feet. They pumped the water and sewage over and poured it into the Des Plaines river. But since 1900 it flows by gravity through a canal twenty-four feet deep and two hundred feet wide, and they can take almost any quantity they want. Up until 1935 they were diverting approximately 10,000 cubic feet per second, and to-day while they are not taking that much they are still diverting about 7,000 cubic feet per second. I am aware that by 1939 they have to reduce the amount taken to 4,000 second feet, but if the bill now before the United States congress passes—and they will move heaven and earth to see that it does—instead of 1,500 second feet plus about 2,000 feet for domestic purposes, the 1,500 will be changed to 5,000.

Canada has protested for years against the diversion of water at Chicago, but can we revoke it? No, we cannot. It has had a disastrous effect on lake levels, apart from the question of power. But the fact is they are developing power with it, and on the rest of the river, the Illinois river, between Chicago and the Mississippi, down which our water flows along with the United States water, there are six other power sites. Some of them develop a small quantity of power, but the whole six, when in full operation, will develop another 70,000, or, plus the one at Lockport, approximately 100,000 horsepower. A large proportion of the water used in the plants down the river will be water diverted from lake Michigan.

If the government of Canada cannot revoke the situation at Chicago and cannot do anything towards revoking the situation at Niagara Falls—and it cannot do anything to change conditions at Massena—what can it do if in a short time it enters into an agreement to export to the United States another hundred or more thousand horsepower? It cannot do anything. I do not believe the government can revoke any contract to export it may enter into with any other government or any organization of producers.

There are the three pictures. May I at this point recapitulate: at Massena 80,000 to 90,000 horsepower has been developed, one-half of which is developed from Canadian waters. If that water were diverted on our side of the line we would have at that point about 40,000 or 45,000 horsepower. At Niagara Falls we receive only that power for ourselves which is diverted from 22,400 second feet; our share of that water should be 36,000 second feet. This is the condition, in face of the fact that 94 per cent of the water at Niagara Falls flows over the Horseshoe Falls on the Canadian side. Canada is getting the wrong end of the stick, if I may use that expression, in connection with each of the three great power developments which have come about from diversions of water one-half of which is from our side of the line.

In the white paper presented to parliament a short time ago I find at page 104 item No. 54, respecting an order in council. In this order in council there are very important statements which bear out my statement to the effect that once power is exported and used in the development of industries on the other side of the line, it is impossible to cut it off without international difficulty.

I have known many large industries in the United States which have used Canadian power, and have gained that information from my association in a business way with some of those great industries. I do not see how it is possible to cut off power from large industries which may be using it. For instance, how can you cut off power from the Lackawanna Steel Company, if they are using it? It is one of the largest steel plants in the United States. If they are not using it, then I know that other companies are using power developed from water diverted from the Canadian side of the line. That power cannot be cut off, because they have long term contracts, and those contracts must continue in operation.

Let us now give some attention to item No. 54 in the white paper. We are told that it is a certified copy of a report of the committee of the privy council, approved by His Royal Highness the Governor General on the 25th August, 1914. The text is as follows:

The committee of the privy council have had before them a report, dated 16th June, 1914, from the right honourable the Secretary of State for External Affairs, calling attention to a recent opinion of the public service commission of the state of New York in the matter of the application of the Canadian-American Power Corporation for permission to import an additional 46,000 horse power of electrical energy from Canada into the United States.

Then, omitting the remainder of the letter, we will read from the middle of page 105, where we find the American opinion with respect to the importation of power.

Without going into details, it seems sufficient to say that the prohibition of exportation from Canada of this present electric power which now comes into this country would paralyse business and industry of many kinds and would deprive numerous localities of electricity for light. American-produced Niagara power is so far from supplying the vital needs of the sections of the state above described that the immediate results of such prohibition would plainly amount to a great public calamity.

How are we going to revoke power, the prohibition of which would cause a great public calamity? I am surprised to find that the government wants to place in the hands of a private member, no matter how brilliant he may be, the introduction of a bill which might bring about a great public calamity, and embroil this country in troubles with the country to the south of us. I am sure the Prime Minister would be one of the last to condone any such action because, I am pleased to say, it would appear that on every occasion he tries to keep this country on an even keel internationally, and out of any possible trouble. I continue the quotation:

The form of securing a licence yearly from the dominion government is required by the dominion law, but such licence has been granted yearly to the other great producing electrical corporations of Canada, and no reason appears for apprehension that any discrimination would be made against the Electrical Development Company or the Toronto Power Company, lessee. We have nothing before us but the suggestion that the Dominion of Canada may at some future time forbid this exportation. This commission must assume that international relations affecting so important a subject as the means of continuing great industries which have grown up in reliance upon the use of this imported power, and as well the interests of the Canadian producing companies themselves, have become fixed—

As I said, they certainly are fixed at Massena; they certainly are fixed at Niagara Falls; they certainly are fixed at Chicago——and subject only to such changes as will fully protect the great commercial and industrial interests and rights now served by this power brought from Canada. The time has long since passed when governments proceed ruthlessly from pure national rashness or anger to destroy the settled accepted commercial relations and formally vested rights of persons and corporations.

That is just as true to-day as it was when it was written.

In conclusion I will say that if the Minister of Justice, as he intimated on March 10 might be possible, can persuade the Prime Minister to adopt the suggestion of the leader of the opposition, there will not be much need to find fault with the bill.

Mr. A. J. ANDERSON (High Park): Mr. Speaker, this bill is of great importance to the province of Ontario, one of the constituencies of which I represent. I am opposed to the export of electric power. I believe electric power is an asset of which we should not deprive ourselves, and one which we should use to the greatest extent for the benefit of our people.

We have in Canada another asset of very great importance; I refer to gold. Gold enters to a great extent into the monetary and economic life of the country. It has been found necessary to refuse permission to export gold except for purposes of the adjustment of international balances and foreign trade. Gold is a product of the earth just as electric power is a product of the water that flows over the dam. Electric power is necessary for the welfare of Canada and its export is a different matter from the export of cereals, lumber, cattle or such other products. Canada is fortunate in having great water powers; in fact we are congratulated upon having them in such abundance. It appears to me that the duty devolves upon us of carefully guarding these water powers, and the electricity produced therefrom should not be allowed to go out of the country.

The practice followed was established by an act which has been on the statute book since 1907. That act practically prohibits the export of power, except in a few cases where licences are granted. The bill we are now considering deals in the main with the manner in which we may permit the export of power, but I think there is behind it a more important principle, namely, whether we will permit it at all. As I said before, I am against the export of power; I believe we should develop the power in this country. The late Sir Adam Beck spent many years of his life in furthering the development of the water powers of Ontario, and we are all proud of the hydro electric system in that province. It has done a great work in bringing power to the people at rates cheaper than ever prevailed before. Power is being delivered to the people of Ontario at a rate which is probably less than that paid in any other country.

The object of this bill is to permit the exportation of electricity from Ontario to the United States. The question to be decided is who will grant the licence. The other day the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) placed on Hansard a sketch of what had happened in connection with the export of power from 1907 up to the present time. He furnished us with a great deal of accurate information. During the course of his remarks he directed attention to the attempt made by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) in 1928 and 1929 to take away from the governor in council the right to grant or to refuse these permits. The Prime Minister referred also to the fact that Mr. Hepburn, the present Premier of Ontario, was a member of this house when the bill was passed in 1929. I do not know why the Prime Minister referred to Mr. Hepburn in the middle of his speech, unless it was because of the attitude of Mr. Hepburn with regard to this legislation.

The Prime Minister stated that three applications were made to the government in 1937 for the export of power, two being from the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company, and one from Ontario. The two from Montreal were made to the government prior to November, 1937. The Prime Minister stated quite frankly that the government had come to a decision that it would reconsider who should give the permit for the export of power. This decision was arrived at in connection with the two applications from Montreal, and when Mr. Hepburn came forward with his application, the government had decided to leave it to parliament to decide whether or not export should take place. It now appears that prior to the opening of parliament, when reference was made to this bill in the speech from the throne, at any rate before the bill was introduced in the house, the Montreal applications had been either abandoned or withdrawn and the only application before the government was the one from Ontario.

For this reason I may be pardoned for referring more or less in detail to the Ontario position. I do so because the Prime Minister, speaking on the second reading of the bill, felt it necessary to place a great deal of detailed information on Hansard. A peculiar position exists in the province of Ontario. When Mr. Hepburn came into office he came to the conclusion that the hydro electric contracts were not profitable or economical. Instead of trying to seek a market for the surplus power, as he is evidently trying to do now, he proceeded to repudiate the contracts under which electricity was furnished to the hydro electric system of Ontario. He threw the whole matter in the air, as it were. Subsequently he made arrangements with some of the companies for reduced quantities of power at reduced prices and in that way stopped any possible litigation on the part of the companies. But he did not succeed in making an amicable arrangement with the Beauharnois company. That company did not take his action lying down; they sued the government and got judgment for something like $600,000 or $700,000. Since the judgment was sustained by the supreme court, the only way out for Mr. Hepburn was an appeal to the judicial committee of the privy council, but he did not take this course, because the judgment had been upheld, I believe unanimously, by the supreme court.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I think it was by the appellate court.

Mr. ANDERSON: Mr. Hepburn then found that he had to humiliate himself and negotiate with Beauharnois, which he did. He entered into an arrangement with that company for the delivery of a quantity of power, not much less than that covered by the original contract, for a long period at a price of $12.50 per horsepower. The price under the previous contract was $15 per horsepower. Mr. Hepburn took all the advantage he could of this change of contract which reduced the price and extended the period with respect to a smaller quantity of electricity. But he found that he was left with an excess of power, and in order to save the province some money he asked this government to consent to the export of this power to the United States.

The export of power is a national matter. It should not be considered a provincial matter, and certainly not a county or district matter. It is something that affects the whole country, and any policy in connection therewith should be the policy of the federal government. Export comes within the jurisdiction of the dominion government. One may ask why, that policy having been followed for over thirty years, the government of Canada should hesitate in 1937 to deal with any of these applications, and particularly with the one coming from the province of Ontario. What has happened in the meantime? We have the assurance not only of the Prime Minister but also of the leader of the opposition that for a number of years no new applications for the export of power have been granted, that the only applications that have been granted are renewals of licences that have been running for some years—and in regard to those I do not think they have been altogether justifiable, because they are not national in character. They have not served to satisfy any particular emergency in connection with the nation. They have been granted solely and only for financial purposes, in order that the hydro-electric commission and companies exporting electric power may have their books better balanced than they would have been without such export of power. That is not a national matter, and personally I feel that the export of power, if it be permitted at all, should be permitted only for purposes which are emergent in their nature or national in their character, and not provincial.

Then we come to the other principle of the bill. There is first the question whether we should allow electric power to be exported, and then there is the question of the method of granting the permit. I have asked, why did the cabinet refuse to deal with the application when it came before them? All I can say is that I look at it very much as the man on the street does. We have to take our information as we get it through the press and otherwise, and rumblings have been heard that our friend Mr. Hepburn, of Ontario, is not particularly enamoured of the Liberal party at Ottawa. In fact, he has gone so far as to say that he is not a King Liberal but of some other branch of Liberalism. I do not know what he means by that, but when a man occupying the position he does makes a statement of that kind against the prime minister of the dominion, it indicates a certain amount of animosity and ill-feeling, and I have no doubt that the Prime Minister and the cabinet were quite aware of the feeling existing between the premier of Ontario and the federal cabinet.

I do not know that the feeling between the premier of Quebec and the cabinet is altogether friendly. I would imagine from statements that have appeared in the press recently that the premier of Quebec cannot be regarded as a very close friend or much interested in the advancement of the Liberal party in the federal arena. The feeling in these two provinces was no doubt well known to this government, as it was to every hon. member of this house or the man on the street, and the question naturally arises: Why did this government hesitate to deal with the application? I cannot say, but after thirty years of experience with the practice that was established under the act of 1907, and in view of the fact that in recent years no new permits have been granted, it appears to me that the power of granting or refusing permits was in very safe hands in the dominion cabinet. Then why should there be any hesitancy in assuming the responsibility that falls upon the cabinet? We have responsible government, and the government were given the power under that act to refuse or to grant the permit. They have the same power with regard to the export of gold, and they do not hesitate to exercise it, and so far they have done very well in controlling the export of gold. Why should they not exercise the same power with regard to the export of electric power? It looks as if they were animated by a certain feeling of fear, a desire to throw off responsibility—I was going to use the word "shirk"; perhaps that is rather offensive. But it looks very much like that, and the man on the street will say that the government are shirking their responsibility in not exercising their power to grant or refuse this permit.

How does the government get over it? By a private bill. I am not going to deal with that, because my leader dealt with it extensively the other day, and showed the absurdity of the position of the government; and it has already been referred to this afternoon by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). Whenever a matter of public concern is allowed to be brought before the house in a bill sponsored by a private member, it is simply a cover for the government in power behind which they can take refuge and evade the responsibility of deciding the question for themselves; and I am frank in saying I think that is what this legislation is for.

Let me go a little further. We are endeavouring to establish the rights of the federal parliament under the British North America Act. Time and again we have heard it stated, and it is true, that the powers of the federal parliament are being reduced or invaded by the provinces. But here we have a bill by which the right to say whether or not power shall be exported is left, not to the cabinet, not to the governor in council, but to the lieutenant governor in council of the province from which the electric power is to be exported. Is it not apparent that the Prime Minister and his cabinet are admitting a great amount of weakness? They are not courageous enough—I do not want to say that offensively; but they have not shown courage in dealing with the matter. And have they not shown, by wanting to throw responsibility on the lieutenant governor in council in the province, that the cabinet of the dominion, the governor in council, is not capable of making a decision that would be acceptable to the people?

When the private bill comes in, what are the conditions that are a sine qua non, which must accompany it? The application must be accompanied by a certified copy of an order in council of the province, in this case, Ontario, that they can do without that electricity, and that its export would not injure the province in any way. But it goes further. It so happens that a large amount of this excess electric power originates in the province of Quebec. It comes into the province of Ontario and is sought to be exported to the United States through Ontario; and in such case the petition and the private bill must be accompanied by an order in council of the province in which the electric power originates. It looks to me like fear of the opposition this government is going to get from Mr. Hepburn of Ontario and Mr. Duplessis of Quebec, and so they seek to put the responsibility upon the province and lift it from the governor in council. They ask that the lieutenant governor in council decide.

When the bill comes here, what will be the result? I have been favoured—I do not know how many other members have—with a copy of a letter sent by Mr. Hepburn to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) applying for this permit. Mr. Hepburn certainly wants the export of this power, and if he were asked for an order in council or a certificate that the power could be exported without injury to the province, he would certainly grant it. The Ontario government being Liberal—I am not concerned as to whether friendliness exists between the government there and the government here—the request of that Liberal government would be very acceptable to the administration at Ottawa, Liberal as it is to-day. They would not turn it down, because the electorate which elected the premier and the government of Ontario is the same that elects the members from Ontario to this house, and those members would not wish to offend the provincial government. The same applies in the province of Quebec. But what is the logic of leaving it to the lieutenant governor in council of a province to decide whether it is justifiable to export power from that province, the government of the dominion taking advantage of that position and running to cover under orders in council or certificates of the province? My feeling is that this bill is brought in for the purpose of allowing this government, first, to unload the responsibility upon the provinces, and second, when it comes to the house, to unload the responsibility upon the individual members of the house rather than upon the government itself. This government was elected with a tremendous majority, yet it does not show enough courage to assume the responsibility of making it a national matter.

So far as I am concerned, I am against the export of power at all; and if in the course of the discussion on the bill it should be decided by the house to permit export, I yet believe that the power should be vested in the governor in council; let that body be responsible to the house and to the country for the policy of the people they represent.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): We are debating at this time of its second reading the principle of the bill with respect to the export of power. May I at the outset, remind hon. gentlemen opposite that the principle of the bill which is now before the house is, to all intents and purposes, the same as that of the bill which was introduced by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) in 1929. The principle of the bill which was introduced in that year by the hon. member was that no export of power should be permitted without the approval of parliament. It was a bill intended to give parliament greater control over the export of power.

Mr. BENNETT: The licence was still retained, though.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just a moment. The principle of the bill was as I have set forth. That is the principle of this bill. The present bill, however, goes a little further in the matter of prohibiting the export of power than did the bill of the hon. member for Leeds. The bill of the hon. member for Leeds provided that there should be the approval of parliament, without indicating how that approval was to be given. So far as the export of power was concerned it remained permissible with the governor in council. This is a bill which takes away that permissive power from the governor in council and prohibits the export of power. That is the difference between the two measures. In its terms the present measure specifically prohibits the export of power. That is the principle underlying the general bill. It does, however, contain a provision that, while the general law is that of prohibiting the export of power, exceptions may be made if parliament in its wisdom deems it desirable and right that exceptions to the general law should be made.

My reply, in a word, to all hon. members opposite, who say that the government in the procedure it is adopting is actuated by fear or favour or any other ulterior motive they may ascribe, is that in so saying they are simply passing condemnation on themselves for their support of the bill which was introduced by the hon. member for Leeds. I believe that practically all hon. members who have spoken from the opposite side were in the house when that bill was passed. The measure introduced in 1928 received first and second readings. As re-introduced in 1929, it received first, second and third readings unanimously. They all supported it. I ask the hon. members who have spoken, when they supported that bill, Were they seeking to have the government get rid of responsibility; were they seeking to take away responsibility from the ministry and put it on parliament; or were they trying, as I believe they were, to make it more difficult for the export of power to be made, by requiring that the approval of parliament should be given in the first instance?

Mr. BENNETT: May I answer the question?

Mr. MacNICOL: If the right hon. the Prime Minister will allow me to correct him, I was not in the house at that time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps my hon. friend was not. That was the loss of the house. As between the matter of having the house approve the export of power and of having the governor in council approve its export, might I remind hon. gentlemen opposite, as members of the Conservative party, of the position taken by Sir Robert Borden, who was the leader of the Conservative party at the time the 1907 bill was introduced.

Mr. BENNETT: Might I answer the question which was asked by the Prime Minister?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: May I answer the right hon. gentleman before he proceeds? He asked that the question be answered, and I am ready to answer it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, all right.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 5 of the act as it now stands states:

> No person shall export any power or fluid without a licence, or any power or fluid in excess of the quantity permitted by his licence, or otherwise than as permitted by such licence.

An absolute prohibition, at the present minute.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Without a licence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Without a licence.

Mr. BENNETT: Now we are substituting a private bill for a licence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The existing statute gives the governor in council power to issue a licence that is permissive. The first thing my hon. friends would have said, if the present government had granted the application of the Ontario government, is that the governor in council had taken that action either out of fear of or of favour for the administration at Toronto; that they had been afraid to leave the matter to parliament, notwithstanding they had declared as respects the earlier applications from Quebec to leave the matter to parliament. That is what we would have been hearing to-day. May I say to hon. gentlemen opposite that, as far as the Ontario government is concerned—and I have reason to know its mind in this matter—it would have much preferred to have had the old bill remain exactly as it is and to have had the governor in council grant a licence for the export of power with or preferably without the subsequent approval of parliament than to have the matter of its application referred, as it is being referred under the present bill, for approval to parliament itself. That, I believe, is the truth of the matter.

However, I was recalling the position taken by the leader of the Conservative party at the time the bill regarding export of power was introduced in 1907. Sir Robert Borden then said—and I think he was right in his contention—that the governor in council was the last body which should be expected to decide a matter of this kind. He gave his reasons; they were quite explicit and applicable to what some hon. gentlemen have been saying—that the governor in council is concerned with matters of policy; that council has not the opportunity to get the full and exact information with regard to these matters enjoyed by other bodies, such as a committee of the House of Commons or the railway commission, which are able to bring before them the parties that make the application and to place on the parties themselves the onus of making good the case on their own behalf. Sir Robert pointed out that an administration would have to depend in large part upon the word of some official of a government department as to what it might be best to do with respect to any particular application. But he went a step further, and said there was another reason why the governor in council should not be trusted with this power, namely, that the council was actually and necessarily a partisan body, composed of members of one party. He did not think it right that members of one party should have it within their power to grant or withhold applications for licences to export power, which if granted might mean a great deal to their friends, and if refused for partisan reasons might mean a great loss to those concerned.

Mr. CAHAN: Those arguments did not prevail in that case.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Those arguments did not prevail in that case, but they are prevailing to-day. What I am pointing out to my hon. friends is that such is the argument we would be hearing from them to-day if we had proceeded in any other way than as we are proceeding. Let me ask the house this question: What would have been the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite if we had retained the act of 1907 as it stands and, under that act, had either granted or refused the application of the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission at the present time?

Let me say at once that, so far as this bill is concerned, I think that as a general act it ought to be considered wholly apart from any application for the right to export power. The government's decision with respect to having this question referred to parliament at this session was made before we had any knowledge whatever that an application would be forthcoming from the government of Ontario or from any organization connected therewith. The evidence of that is to be found in the written documents, the replies made to the Montreal Light, Heat & Power Company and to Aluminium Limited, wherein we pointed out that, in the past, parliament had been gradually taking the position that it should have more in the way of control over the export of power. For that reason, we were unwilling that the cabinet itself should grant further applications without allowing parliament to express its view. We felt—which is the true sequence of the matter—that the bill which my hon. friend, the member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart), introduced in 1928, and which, in 1929, was given its three readings unanimously in this house, contained a principle with respect to which there could be no question at all at this time. If the house had been willing at that time unanimously to permit the export of power, subject to the approval of parliament, we felt that at the present juncture, with the added knowledge and experience that has come with the years, it would be prepared to support a bill embodying a similar principle and indeed, if anything, rather strengthening that principle, namely, the principle of parliamentary control of the export of power.

Let me come back to the question of what would have been said to-day had we adopted any other attitude. After having stated in writing, to the Montreal Light, Heat & Power Company and to Aluminium Limited, the decision to submit the matter at this session before taking any action with respect to the applications, so that parliament might review the whole situation, suppose we had granted the application of the Ontario government. What would have been said by hon. gentlemen opposite? Why, we would have been told that what we had refused to do for the province of Quebec, we had done for the province of Ontario. We would have been asked, why had we refused in the case of Quebec what we had granted in the case of Ontario? And their answer would have been Because the government of Quebec was a Conservative government and the government of Ontario a Liberal government. Every hon. member knows that is what would have been said in the strongest terms by hon. gentlemen opposite. But they would have gone further. We have only to consider what the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) said at Petrolia the other evening, and what he and several other hon. members have repeated in the course of this debate. They would have said there was yet another motive for the government's action—I do not care what motive it was. And that is the reason why we cannot escape in this discussion making some mention of the application that has been received from Ontario since the government's decision with respect to Quebec applications was made. Suppose we had said, "We will grant this application of the Ontario government and leave it to a resolution of the house," as the leader of the opposition says.

Mr. BENNETT: No, not a resolution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, then, a bill, approving the action of the governor in council.

Mr. BENNETT: Ratifying and approving the order in council granting the licence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let us see exactly what the position is. My right hon. friend says that what we should have done was to approve that application.

Mr. BENNETT: Or disapprove.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And then we should have brought the order in council to this parliament and introduced a bill asking for the approval of the action of the governor in council.

Mr. BENNETT: Or disapproval.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): You could have refused it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says we should have disapproved it.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): No; I said you could have refused it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let us take both views.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Then we would not have had a bill afterwards.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let us see where we would stand on either count. Assuming that we had approved, the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, who has just spoken, would have repeated what he said at Petrolia the other evening; he would have said that the government had approved the application out of fear of the government of Ontario.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Not if you refused it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But if we had granted the application.

Mr. BENNETT: Subject to approval in this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend would have said that the government at Ottawa had been dragooned into approval by the government at Toronto, that Mr. Mackenzie King was afraid for his life of Mr. Hepburn; we would have had all that sort of talk. This would have been given as the reason why the application had been granted. And what would the leader of the opposition have said? He would have said, "What greater pressure could the government have put upon its following to support its action than to make a government measure of this matter? The government has granted the application and now it comes to parliament and says to its following that it must approve its action by an act." Well, what would the government be saying, by implication, in such circumstances? It would be saying, "You have to support the act or the government will be defeated; if you do not support it you will be voting against the policy of your own administration." And then the right hon. gentleman would have added, "Under the circumstances, what freedom is there on the part of any member of this house to decide for himself, on the merits and to vote as he likes?" That is what he would have said.

Mr. BENNETT: I desire to point out that the right hon. gentleman is conducting a debate upon a supposititious statement, which under the rules he is not permitted to do. He is not permitted to say what other people would have said but must deal with the situation as it is. Anyone who dignifies that sort of thing with the name debate cannot have a proper realization of the misuse of words.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is a natural inference.

Mr. BENNETT: No; that is nonsense.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The truth of the utterance must be coming home to my right hon. friend, or he would not take exception to it.

Mr. BENNETT: That is in keeping with the right hon. gentleman's other statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I know his line of argument better than he does himself.

Mr. BENNETT: You have been going around the country misstating it long enough.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have been sitting opposite my right hon. friend for a good many years, both in office and in opposition, and have come to understand his tactics fairly well, and I know that no matter what attitude—

Mr. BENNETT: The rules do not permit one member to assert what another member would have said but only what he has said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: All I have said is that I know certain things, and one of the things I do know is this—that whatever I propose my right hon. friend is going to find ground to oppose.

Mr. BENNETT: The records do not show that, do they?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh yes, on these party matters; on questions where there is party controversy.

Mr. BENNETT: They show quite the opposite; they do show unfairness. Look at the British treaty, for instance.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not want my right hon. friend to get into a quarrelsome mood.

Mr. BENNETT: No, but I am prepared to quarrel over that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, if my right hon. friend is prepared to quarrel, I am not going to quarrel with him; I want him to keep in a quiet frame of mind.

Mr. BENNETT: Too proud to fight.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I am not going to quarrel with him; he is not in a condition of health at the present time to quarrel and I shall not start quarrelling with him.

Mr. BENNETT: What a shameful statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is a shameful statement?

Mr. BENNETT: That one, as every decent man here knows.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is? If I have said anything that hurts my right hon. friend's feelings, or the feelings of anyone else, I am deeply sorry for it, but I am sincere when I say I have no desire to quarrel with my right hon. friend or have him get into an unpleasant mood. There is no need for it.

Mr. BENNETT: On the point of order I raised, I desire to point out that under the rules it is not permissible for anyone to make statements as to what somebody would say. The record of what anyone has said governs, not what another member says he would have said. More than that, I say that this is well defined by the rules, so well defined that it is hardly necessary to mention it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure I have a right to draw the inference as to the line of argument that would have been adopted.

Mr. BENNETT: But it was not adopted; that is the answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am afraid I cannot follow my right hon. friend in his interpretation of the rules. What I am as sure of as that day follows night is that if this government had come into this house, having approved an application of the Ontario government, and asked its following to support the application because the government had granted it, the government would very quickly have been told, and the country would have been told, that we had put pressure upon our own following so that they had to support the application. On the other hand, assume we had refused to grant the application—the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe nods his head—what would he and the others have said? Immediately they would have said, "This is resentment on the part of the present Prime Minister of Canada because of what has been said about him by the premier of Ontario." That is what would have been said from one end of Canada to the other; that there had been no judicial appraisal of the situation; that the application had not been considered on its merits, but, because the head of the government of Ontario had been unpleasant and critical and said some things unworthy of him about the Prime Minister of Canada, the latter had taken his revenge by refusing to grant the application made by the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission. I am not going to permit hon. gentlemen opposite to say that now, or at any time to come. I wish to make it plain at the present time that, if this bill passes and a private bill is introduced, based upon it, hon. members on this side of the house are to be free to vote as they please on that measure. I shall ask them to do what they think is right in the light of their own best judgment, regardless altogether of what view I may take. I know the position I intend to take; there has been no doubt in my mind all along as to that. But no greater compliment could have been paid me by hon. gentlemen opposite than their taunt, "We do not know where the Prime Minister stands at the present time." Why do they not know? For the simple reason that I have not said and do not intend to say a word to any hon. member on one side or the other as to how he ought to vote on the private bill when it comes to the house, except that I shall expect every hon. member to consider the bill on its merits. That is the reason I have been silent with respect to my own attitude on the private bill. When the bill comes in, I shall, of course, have to say what course I deem the wisest and best.

In order, however, that the action of the government with respect to the present measure may not continue to be completely misconstrued as it has been by hon. gentlemen opposite, I want to make it perfectly plain again that the intention of the government with regard to this measure had been reached before any application came from Ontario at all. The policy decided upon prior to that time was to take the course we are now taking among other reasons because we believed it would command the unanimous approval of hon. members of this house, and that we would have no debate as to the wisdom of the course, seeing that already all hon. members in a previous house had on two occasions supported the principle of greater parliamentary control. These are the reasons for the policy adopted by the government. There has been no change of attitude on the part of the administration from the time it considered this matter, when the first Quebec application came to it, up to the present.

Another criticism has been made, namely, that the present bill requires that the provinces give their consent in advance to the export of power. Here again a provision is made which accords with what was the unanimous view of the house a few years ago. I spoke the other day of the resolution introduced in 1925 by Mr. LeSueur of East Lambton, at the time a member of the Conservative opposition. The resolution, when introduced, read that there should be no export of power except off-peak power. The discussion on the resolution brought out some differences of view. The government of the day suggested that Mr. LeSueur's resolution should be amended by striking out the words "off-peak power" and substituting "only with the consent of the provinces concerned." The Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, who was leading the opposition at the time, said that he would agree to that amendment. Why? Because he believed that it would bring unanimity in the house on the question of the export of power. He added further that he believed no provincial government would want to export power. But it was for the purpose of attaining unanimity that that resolution was amended, and that as amended it came to be accepted unanimously by this house at that time.

Now, if in the present bill we had omitted that obligation on the part of the provinces would there not have been criticism from hon. members opposite? They would have asked, Why is the province of Quebec not to be consulted with regard to the export of power that belongs to it? Why is the province of Ontario not to be consulted with regard to power that belongs to it? Here is the creation of more in the way of friction between the provinces and the dominion, another constitutional difficulty arising, an effort on the part of the federal administration to take exclusively into its hands the whole question of the export of power, to determine it at Ottawa, whereas the power belongs to the provinces and not to Ottawa at all. Remember the position as to this matter. So far as the power in question is concerned, it is admitted that the power belongs to the provinces; that it does not belong to the dominion. Where the dominion's jurisdiction comes in is in dealing with matters that pertain to trade and commerce. For that reason, when it comes to exporting power beyond the boundaries of Canada, the provinces are not free to do as they will with their own. That is where the jurisdiction of the federal government arises. I say then that, since the provinces own the power themselves, it is only reasonable and right that the dominion, before taking a stand as to what is to be done with respect to the export of that power, should ascertain whether the provinces are agreeable and willing to have the power exported. Supposing we had not made this provision, what would be said of the legislation we are presenting to this house now? It would be said that the federal government, without even consulting the province of Quebec, or the province of Ontario, or any other province concerned, was taking their power and granting the right to export it, regardless of how exporting this power might affect the interests of consumers, might affect industrial interests on this side of the line, or serve to create competitive interests on the other side. We would deserve to be condemned strongly if, in the bill which we have before the house, we did not say that before export of power is permitted by a private act of the federal parliament, it must be ascertained that the provinces concerned are agreeable to the export and have safeguarded the interests of consumers in the provinces.

It was the present hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) who first raised the point the other evening. What do I find? I find, on looking over the debates in this house at the time of the LeSueur resolution, that the hon. member's objection at that time was in a precisely opposite direction. He contended that all we were providing for by that resolution was that the province from which the power was to be exported was the only province to be considered; that the power might be generated in another province, and, instead of limiting the consent to the province from which it was proposed to export it, we should, he said, go further and require the consent of every province concerned; exactly what we are doing in this present measure. The hon. member said on June 15, 1925, as reported on pages 4279 and 4280 of Hansard:

> Take the case of a water power which may be located in one province but vitally affects the rights of another province, for instance the Winnipeg river—I am not citing that specifically but merely as a general illustration—one province might be willing to consent to the export, but the other province, vitally affected by that export, might be opposed, and yet would have no voice in the decision by reason of the amendment suggested by the Prime Minister.

My amendment, as he thought, had reference only to the province from which the export was to take place. My reply to him was:

Mr. Mackenzie King: In what I suggested I used the expression "with the concurrence of the province or provinces in which it is proposed to develop such power."

In other words, by inserting that very provision, namely, that the province from which the power was to be exported—and if there should be another province concerned, the province generating it, should be consulted—parliament declared that power which the provincial government considered was needed in the province should not be exported under licence. At that time we were merely taking a position which was reasonable and just, and which the hon. member for Kootenay East then endorsed. But now the hon. member imagines all sorts of evils with respect to the insertion of this particular provision. He says, "We know this is equivalent to an invitation compelling the government to give licences when applications come before parliament." He says that once you require a province to indicate its consent, to all intents and purposes you are obligating yourself to meet that consent. That is a diametrically opposite position to the one he took in the discussion in 1925.

I must say I do not think we would be justified, as a federal parliament, in legislating to authorize the export of power under a private act, unless we were perfectly certain that the provinces in question were agreeable to the export, and unless we were assured, by the province itself, that the authorization we were proposing would not in any way injure the interests of which it ought to be guardian. I believe that explanation completely justifies the clauses requiring consent of the provinces.

The hon. member for East Kootenay next took exception to the fact that certain permissive powers given to the governor in council with respect to licences, are to remain in the statute where they apply to the export of fluids, but are to be eliminated where they apply to the export of power. He thought there was something sinister about this, and that we must have in mind in some way giving larger privileges to private interests, in connection with power, than those now existing.

What is the reason for having omitted those permissive restrictions? There is none, other than the fact that we were taking from the governor in council and giving to parliament itself the right to grant authority, and parliament has the power to impose any restrictions it pleases. The reason that there were certain restrictions put in the original legislation was that parliament was delegating certain functions to the governor in council, and in delegating to the governor in council these functions, care was taken to indicate within what particular limits they might be performed.

But here the situation is reversed. Under this legislation we are taking from the governor in council the power to grant authority and we are leaving it to parliament itself. We are leaving it to parliament to insert any provision it may please as to conditions, as to the duration of the contract, as to only surplus power being exported, as to whether there shall be an annual review or power of revocation by the governor in council, as to the price at which the power is to be sold—if it is to be exported—and as to any other matter which may be of interest and concern to the public of Canada in the export of power.

But if it will serve to remove any suspicions, and if in the minds of any it will make for a little more effective control of the export of power, to have more in the way of detail set forth in the general act, I shall have no objection whatever, when the bill reaches committee, to proposing an amendment, which I have drafted and now have before me, to provide that, with respect to any private bill which may be introduced, certain provisions which are set forth must be complied with. Among those provisions will be one having to do with the sale only of surplus power; one with the price at which power can be sold, if exported to another country, as compared with the price to be charged in this country; a provision with respect to the duration of the right to export; and the right of the governor in council to terminate the right to export; and provisions with respect to one or two other particulars, which I shall outline when I introduce the amendment.

So far as provisions of the kind are concerned, which would be certain I believe to find their place in any private act respecting the export of power which might be passed by this parliament, there is no need for concern on the part of hon. members.

I come now to a somewhat singular statement made by the leader of the opposition. The other day my right hon. friend said that the government is leaving it to a private member to bring in a bill respecting the export power, when never before in our history has a measure of this character and importance been submitted to parliament by a private member. He asked if any one had ever heard of such a proposition in all the history of this parliament. One would have thought that the right hon. gentleman knew all the history of this parliament, and that he could not possibly err in making a statement of the kind.

What are the facts? The facts are that the first bill permitting the export of electrical power from Canada was a private bill passed in this parliament. The very first bill respecting the export of power was a private bill, introduced by a private member in the house. The Canadian Power Company was incorporated in 1887 by private act of parliament, 50-51 Victoria, chapter 120, giving authority——to contract in writing with any company which may have heretofore erected, or which may hereafter erect, a bridge across the Niagara river, for permission, upon such terms as may be agreed upon, to carry one or more wires for electric light or other purposes, upon and over the said bridge towards the United States shore of the Niagara river, and connect the same with the wires of any electric light company, or other company in the United States, and may also contract with such company to work the said electric light, or other power, jointly.

The act of 1887 was amended in 1891, but the authority to export was not affected. By implication, the authority to export was extended by chapter 89 of the statutes of 1893, by giving the Canadian Power Company authority to connect——any other wires or cables which the company may lay across the said river.

That had reference to the Niagara river.

My right hon. friend has said there never was a precedent for anything like this in the history of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not the same thing at all.

Mr. STEWART: The act to which the Prime Minister refers was passed long before the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act of 1907.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: Which entirely changed the policy, I submit. Does the Prime Minister think the effect of that act would be superseded by the provisions of the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act of 1907, and has not a licence been taken out under that act?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say the first right to export power from Canada was given by this parliament, not under a public act, but under a private act. That is the point at issue.

Now may I come to what my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition said in conclusion. It was, I think, a reflection upon every hon. member of both houses of this parliament. He suggested that to permit the introduction of private bills to authorize export of power would result in lobbies of a character that it would be difficult for hon. members of this parliament to resist. My right hon. friend has once or twice stressed the fact that what he wanted with respect to the further export of power was an act of parliament. He wanted that because the bill granting authority to export would have to go through both houses of parliament and be assented to by the crown. This bill will have to pass both houses and the private bill, if one is introduced, and is to become law, will have to pass both houses. The private bill will have to go before a committee and the justification of the measure will rest upon the applicants. Hon. members will have all sides of the argument presented and will be able to form their own opinions. But notwithstanding the fact that such a bill would have to go before both houses of the Canadian parliament, the right hon. leader of the opposition says that because a lobby may develop, the government should not make provision in this legislation for the authorization to export power to be given by parliament under a private act.

The same thing was said by the hon. member for Kootenay East. He recited his experience in connection with what he termed a most terrible lobby at the time of the application for the export of Carillon power. What was the result of the lobby in connection with the export of power from Carillon? The application was not granted; the lobby was of no effect whatever! The application went before the private bills committee and it was killed there. That shows how much members of parliament of that day were influenced by what the hon. member for Kootenay East termed the worst lobby he had known in his experience in public life. I wonder if the members of the present parliament are not to be equally trusted, if their integrity is not as great, if they are not equally sensitive as respects their honour, if their personal character is not as high; are they to be expected to exercise less in the way of judgment, less in the way of prudence and wisdom, less in the way of patriotism than was the case with members of a previous parliament? I say it is wholly unworthy of my right hon. friend to make a suggestion of the character he did.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved that the house go into committee on the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: If there is to be an amendment of any importance I should like this to be taken up in committee on another day. We have a few amendments to offer, two of which are exactly the same as those suggested by the Prime Minister. Perhaps we could go into committee of the whole and then the Prime Minister might be good enough to place on the votes and proceedings or on Hansard the details of the proposed amendments. I think that would enable us to deal with the matter more expeditiously than we otherwise could.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The course suggested by my right hon. friend is, I think, a good one. I shall be only too pleased to follow along the lines suggested.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—"Export" and "exportation" defined.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The only change here is the addition of the words "or contrivance." In order to make clear the provisions of the act in so far as they relate to the export of fluids, may I say that there is in the present bill no change in any of the provisions of the existing act other than a slight redrafting. A distinction has been drawn in the present bill between the provisions of the act relating to the exportation of fluid and those which relate to the exportation of power and the provisions with respect to each have been kept separate and distinct, the reason being that the exportation of power is being provided for by a private bill instead of by licence as has been the custom heretofore.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Licence to export fluid.

Mr. BENNETT: I think we have reached the point where we should rise because there is involved here the whole underlying principle of the statute. I should like to state this more clearly. It was unanimously agreed on two occasions that licences for the export of power should be issued with the approval of parliament. There was a prohibition in section 5 against any export, and that is the point to which I desire to direct attention. There was an absolute prohibition in the section of the old statute, which reads:

> No person shall export any power or fluid without a licence, or any power or fluid in excess of the quantity permitted by his licence, or otherwise than as permitted by such licence.
> 2. No person shall, without a licence, construct or place in position any line or wire or other conductor for the exportation of power, or any pipe line or other light contrivance for the exportation of fluid.

[Mr. Bennett.]

The only method by which you could get around that prohibition in the old statute was by means of a licence. The suggestion contained in the bill introduced by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart), to which the house agreed twice, was that a licence should be subject to the approval of parliament. Now we are changing that and no provision for a licence is being made in the new statute. It is proposed that the question of licence shall be dealt with by a private bill, but I submit that a private bill is not the proper place in which questions of licence issued by this country should be dealt with. It is the public bill that deals with the granting of a licence by Canada; it is under the authority of the public bill and not the private bill that the licence issues. If we are going to do away altogether with the question of licence, then all those problems to which the Prime Minister directed attention a moment ago, which we desired to submit as questions of policy, and all the conditions to be urged with respect to the licence itself arise. There is nothing about the licence left, and that was the reason I was going to suggest here that the question should be reconsidered from the standpoint of how the permission of the Canadian parliament was to be expressed. The private bill is intended to deal with that and it is going to impose conditions, but clearly a private bill should not authorize the granting of a licence. I think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) will admit at once that it is wholly unworthy of this parliament to have a private bill—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Section 3 of the present bill applies only to the export of fluids.

Mr. BENNETT: I am raising the question now because the question of electricity is left entirely out of the new section. There is a differentiation between fluids, such as water or natural gas—which is not a fluid—or oil.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There is nothing new in principle with regard to fluids.

Mr. BENNETT: Electrical power is taken out of the section.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, but it will come later.

Mr. BENNETT: This is the section where we begin to consider the question that arises —I mention it now because I think it is the beginning of it—as to whether or not the licence feature is to be continued with respect to electricity. Just as it stands now, there is nothing that permits a licence to be issued. I think the Minister of Justice will admit that it is entirely wrong that a private bill should make provision with respect to a licence because the granting of a licence is the act of the whole government of Canada. To do this without a licence would create extreme difficulty in administration, and I might say to the committee that the amendments we have deal also with the period of time during which the right to export should exist. At the present time the licence to export expires on the 31st day of March each year; it is then renewable for only one year, and the provision that I was going to suggest in order to meet any difficulty on that ground was that it should be made clear that, in accordance with the general view of the order in council of 1914, the conferring of the right to export power created no vested or other right of any kind. I think that is essential.

The other question, in order that it may be before the committee, is that of surplus power. The question of what is surplus power would in my judgment be a matter that would arise for consideration each year. That is, where you have a yearly licence which expires on March 31, and may then be renewed for another twelve months, what was surplus power in the preceding twelve months might not be surplus power in the following twelve months. In other words, the demand for the use of power at home may be so great that surplus power no longer exists; whereas if you take the standard of surplus power at what it was in 1938, then you have a continuing licence notwithstanding what might be the demands for the use of power at home. It was to overcome that difficulty that I have also drafted a short amendment, and I mention it at this stage because this is the section which takes electric energy out of the provisions of the general bill and no longer makes any provision for the issue of the licence.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Of course, Mr. Chairman, I still think, this section having regard only to fluid, that some of the remarks of the right hon. gentleman would come more properly when we reach the section with regard to power.

Mr. BENNETT: I agree.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But I would ask at once, Is my right hon. friend not making a mistake in saying that the bill, which was introduced by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart), and was passed by parliament, retained the system of licence with regard to power as well as with regard to fluid? The bill of the hon. member for Leeds repealed section 5 of the old act, which provided:

> No person shall export any power or fluid without a licence, or any power or fluid in excess of the quantity permitted by his licence—

And so forth. There is established a distinction as between power and fluid. With regard to fluid the bill of my hon. friend maintained the situation as it was:

> No person shall export any fluid without a licence.

But with regard to power it did away with a licence altogether. It said:

> No person shall export any power without approval of parliament.

There is no previous licence. It is the first step.

> No person shall export any power without approval of parliament or on any terms or conditions other than those approved by parliament.

I think my right hon. friend is wrong when he says that the purpose of the bill of the hon. member for Leeds was, first, to have the licence issued by the governor in council and then a bill introduced in parliament approving it.

Mr. BENNETT: I agree as to that.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Well, then, there is a distinction to be made as between the two. I really believe that section 3 of the bill applies only to fluid, and as it remains as it was before I think it might be allowed to go through, reserving the discussion of the export of power until we reach section 4.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps I did not make myself sufficiently clear. I indicated that that was one method by which the matter might have been dealt with, merely approval of the licence. Perhaps I did not make sufficiently clear what I now see is the difficulty in the legislation introduced by the hon. member for Leeds, that it did not indicate clearly when the licence was to issue. Presumably it would be provided for in the private act. It may be my lack of clarity that has caused the difficulty. If the minister will be good enough to look at section 3, he will see that it now for the first time deals with the question of licence, and eliminates for the first time the question of granting a licence with respect to electric power. In other words, the section becomes no longer applicable to electricity, and inasmuch as it is not applicable to electricity it would be incongruous that a private act should deal with the higher exercise of power by the government, namely, the granting of the licence. It would be putting in a private act so-called a provision with respect to the exercise of executive power by the government of the country, namely, the issuing of the licence itself. The private act should not do that. Perhaps I have not made my point as clearly as I should.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Oh, yes; but does my right hon. friend say that a private bill cannot give the power to export without dealing with the issuing of licences as well?

Mr. BENNETT: I certainly would answer in the affirmative; quite so; I agree with the minister at once. But there should be, in my judgment, a licence, because an act of parliament extending for a year would involve, in the very nature of things, the passing of another act of parliament next year and every year.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Oh, yes; but an act of parliament may be for more than a year.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite. But in view of our past history in this matter and the order in council of 1914, consequent upon what was said by the utility commission of New York, I submit that in the private act the provision for the licence should not occur because it is a high executive act, and we should put it in a public bill and make provision whereby under authority, if you will, of the private act the licence and the record of it and everything of that sort would be kept by the crown.

Mr. FACTOR: You mean after the private act was passed?

Mr. BENNETT: Quite, and we should make provision for it here in the broad public legislation dealing with the question of export. I entirely agree with the minister that our jurisdiction is only with respect to export. We have nothing to do with power qua power except such as is developed in the St. Lawrence, and we have something to say there because there is the question of navigation; but with respect to power created by private enterprise, the provinces have to deal with that. But we have trade and commerce under federal jurisdiction. What I cannot contemplate is that there should be no record of the authorization except the statute. There should be information that this licence is on record. But if we do not contemplate that, this section need not stand so far as I am concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With regard to that section, I am proposing to move the following amendment:

— That section 4 be amended by adding the following subsection:

[Mr. Bennett.]

(4) Every such private act shall, unless it is otherwise expressly provided therein, be read and construed as including provisions that,

(a) The quantity of power to be exported thereunder shall, notwithstanding any provision therein fixing the quantity of power to be exported, be always limited to the surplus power in excess of that required for distribution for use in Canada;

(b) the power exported shall not be sold outside of Canada at a price less than the price of power produced and sold under substantially similar conditions for use in Canada;

(c) the said private act may be repealed by proclamation of the governor in council, at any time, upon such notice as the governor in council shall prescribe, or, if the governor in council is satisfied that the conditions imposed by paragraph (a) or (b) of this subsection are not being complied with, without notice;

Mr. BENNETT: I hesitate to remind the Prime Minister that he negatives his argument of this afternoon by saying that the governor in council may by proclamation repeal a private act. At least it detracts a great deal from any force that attached to his argument, because this amendment gives the governor in council power to put the matter back "as you were." It is a very unusual power. For that reason I suggest that the right hon. gentleman might permit the committee to rise and then, with this amendment on Hansard, we shall have an opportunity to read and study it, because there are one or two matters which I do not believe are covered. They are covered if we accept that broad one, namely that a proclamation may repeal a statute. There are some other sections as well which may be looked into.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am told that there are precedents for such a course.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I am thoroughly familiar with them. But I should like, if it were possible, that we have an opportunity to study that amendment.

Mr. CAHAN: Could we not have all the amendments which the government now propose put in the votes and proceedings to-morrow, or read now on the record, so that we can consider them all?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is the following additional amendment of section 4:

That section 4 be amended by inserting, immediately after the number 4 at the beginning of the section and before the word "section," the following words:

"Subject as hereinafter in this act provided."

The effect of section 4, among other things, is to repeal certain of the provisions relating to the existing system of licensing export of power. It is the intention to retain this licensing system with respect to licences at present in force. The purpose of the minor amendment which the government wishes to effect is to make clear, as will be specifically set forth in section 9 of the bill, that the authority of the governor in council to renew or revoke existing licences to export power is not impaired and still subsists.

Mr. BENNETT: That is pretty nearly there now, in section 9.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then, coming to section 5, there is a similar amendment:

That section 5 be amended by inserting, immediately after the number 5 at the beginning of the section and before the word "section," the following words:

"subject as hereinafter in this act provided."

For that the explanation is similar to what I have already given.

That section 9 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"9. The said Act is further amended by inserting after section 10 thereof the following:

"11. Nothing in this act contained shall affect any licence existing at the date of the commencement of the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act Amendment Act, 1938, and every such licence may notwithstanding the repeal of any of the provisions of this act by the said Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act Amendment Act, 1938, be renewed from time to time or revoked by the governor in council in the like manner and circumstances and with the like result and subject to the like terms and conditions as if such provisions had not been repealed but remain in force."

The object of the amendment to section 9 is to remove any doubt which may now be felt as to the adequacy of the section, as it appears in the bill, to provide for the legal continuance of the existing licences and the authority of the governor in council, under the act of 1907, to renew or revoke these licences.

This amendment, together with the minor amendments to sections 4 and 5, continues the authority of the governor in council to renew or revoke the licences at present in force, which exists by virtue of the act of 1907, and the regulations made under that act.

Mr. BENNETT: Those are the amendments?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Those are the amendments. I may have one additional amendment, but I wish to consider it further before placing it on the record.

Mr. CAHAN: With regard to section 6 of the bill, which provides a new subsection 2 for section 8 of the act, I can find no authority for parliament to enact such a section unless as preliminary thereto parliament declares such lines, wires, conductors, and contrivances to be "works for the general advantage of Canada". The only way in which it is possible, I believe, for parliament to obtain legislative jurisdiction over the lines running through any province is by declaring them to be "works for the general advantage of Canada," and I should like the minister to consider an amendment to section 8, the first subsection to read something like this:

(1) All transmission lines or lines of wire or other conductors for the exportation of power and all pipe lines and other like contrivances for the exportation of fluid, from any place in Canada to any place outside of Canada, are hereby declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada.

I think that might be followed by a subsection which is contained in the bill—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): May I say to my hon. friend that the amendment as it is is merely the old section, subsection 2 of section 5 of the old act.

Mr. CAHAN: May I say to the minister that that is perfectly true; but when we came to consider certain questions with regard to the Beauharnois and other hydro-electric undertakings, we were all, I believe, of the opinion—all of the lawyers who were consulted at that time with regard to the new licence for Beauharnois—that that section at present existing is ultra vires of parliament unless there is, preceding it, a declaration that the transmission lines constructed in a province for that purpose are to be deemed "works for the general advantage of Canada." I am merely suggesting that for consideration, because I propose to move an amendment.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The suggestion of my hon. friend recommends itself to me, as it probably will to other members of the committee. I shall take time to consider it.

Mr. CAHAN: I was about to suggest another slight change in section 8. Perhaps I can read now the entire section 8 which I propose to move when the bill comes before the committee. It would read something like this:

6. Section 8 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

8. (1) All transmission lines or lines of wire or other conductors for the exportation of power and all pipe lines and other like contrivances for the exportation of fluid, from any place in Canada to any place outside of Canada, are hereby declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada.

(2) Subject to any regulation of the governor in council in that behalf, the governor in council may grant licences for the construction, placing or laying of any transmission line or line of wire or other conductor for the exportation of power, or of any pipe line or other like contrivance for the exportation of fluid.

(3) No person shall, without a licence, construct or place in position any transmission line or line of wire or other conductor or contrivance for the exportation of power or any pipe line or other like contrivance for the exportation of fluid.

That makes a change, first, in order that parliament may clearly and beyond doubt obtain legislative jurisdiction; and, second, I suggest that any line for the transmission of electric energy might very well in this section be called a "transmission line," because the technical term is really "a transmission line" or a "line for the transmission of electric energy," and the mere word "line" without the word "transmission" is not technically sufficient to be clear without judicial interpretation.

Mr. BENNETT: The proposed amendment takes notice of the distinction between export to a foreign country and export interprovincially.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Would it be too inquisitive to ask whether there are other projected amendments?

Mr. BENNETT: Frankly, some of us had in mind several additional amendments, but I am inclined to think they are all met by the suggested amendments that have just been read by the Prime Minister. My view is, if I have a correct appreciation of the extent and value of these amendments, that they cover practically all that we had in mind in the suggestions which we proposed to make to the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps it would be best then for the committee to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

WAR VETERANS' ALLOWANCES

EXTENSION OF ALLOWANCES TO INCLUDE CERTAIN OTHER CLASSES—ENLARGEMENT OF MEMBERSHIP OF BOARD

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved the second reading of Bill No. 35, to amend the War Veterans' Allowance Act.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Before the bill is given second reading, perhaps it would be in order to congratulate the minister upon having awakened the government, this sleeping giant of a government, long enough for it to do something about the problem of the 5,100 odd unemployed veterans with service in an actual theatre of war who were found by the veterans' assistance commission to be wholly or partly unfit to work. I believe the minister will admit that in the task of rousing this sleeping giant he has been aided by some gentle prodding by members on this side of the house and also by a most emphatic recommendation from the veterans' assistance commission, which will be found at page 69 of their report, as follows:

Unfit Veterans

That the War Veterans' Allowance Act be amended by removal of "age 55 years," where it refers to the granting of an allowance because of disability, preaging and general unfitness;

And further:

That the act be amended so as to permit a more liberal interpretation of legislation covering the granting of the allowance at any age to a veteran who saw service in a theatre of actual war and who, because of his unfit condition, or other handicaps, is unable to maintain himself.

As the house will see, that was a most emphatic recommendation; but I am afraid, from what the minister said the other day, that this sleeping giant rolled over and went to sleep again before the minister was able to get him to do anything about the 10,000 unemployed veterans who served in a theatre of war and who are fit. It appeared from the minister's remarks that nothing was to be done about these 10,000 fit veterans.

If it is intended to cover all the 5,100 odd wholly or partly unfit veterans, then probably everyone in the house will agree with the principle of this bill, and the minister himself, speaking the other day, said that such was the case. His remarks will be found at page 1041 of Hansard where he is reported as follows:

All those who are partially fit or unfit will be looked after under the provisions of this legislation.

If that is the intention of the government, we can all approve of the bill; but there are one or two reservations I should like to make. In the first place, it seems to me that in the new section 4 an element of permanency is introduced. As the minister knows, our amendment in 1936 provided that veterans of a certain class need only be temporarily incapable of maintaining themselves; they did not have to be permanently disabled. In this section, however, we find the words, "and unlikely to become capable of maintaining himself," which I am afraid may be interpreted as adding a feature of permanency, which would mean that a veteran must be permanently disabled. As against that, the veterans' assistance commission have recommended that the men be given every incentive to get work and to reestablish themselves and get off the allowance. I suggest that the section should be amended to make it quite clear that the veteran, in order to get the allowance, need not be permanently disabled. Further the resolution which was passed the other day and on which this bill is based did not mention anything of that kind but simply referred to those "incapable of maintaining themselves," although the minister himself, speaking in reference to these men, said that they should be men who would not likely again become self-supporting. In my opinion it would be unwise to restrict this new classification in that way.

Another feature of the bill which should be looked into carefully is the provision that if the recipient is drawing old age pension he cannot get the war veteran's allowance. The minister may be quite right in his amendment on this point, but I hope the effect will not be to enable the government or the war veterans' allowance board to force veterans onto the old age pension. After all, they prefer to get the war veterans' allowance. The benefits under the War Veterans' Allowance Act are greater than benefits under the Old Age Pensions Act: for example, a veteran's widow can get an allowance for a year after the veteran's death under the War Veterans' Allowance Act, but that is not the case under the Old Age Pensions Act; then under the War Veterans' Allowance Act the soldier may have a home of a value of $2,000 without its being taken into consideration in setting his allowance, which also is not the case under the Old Age Pensions Act, and there are several other respects in which it is of much more benefit to come under the War Veterans' Allowance Act than under the Old Age Pensions Act. This particular section of the bill dealing with the Old Age Pensions Act should be carefully considered.

Then I have a new suggestion to make in regard to the War Veterans' Allowance Act. We have now had experience for several years in the administration of the act, and there are many instances in which recipients of a war veteran's allowance are unable to get medical treatment. These men are indigents; they have no money to go to a doctor or a hospital or to get dental treatment. I suggest that it would be wise if the government at this time took steps to provide for giving some hospitalization and medical and dental treatment to recipients of the war veterans' allowance. It might mean that if a man were treated he could go out and earn his own living and go off the allowance, whereas at present he probably cannot get treatment at all unless he gets it from the city authorities, and in many instances gets worse and worse and has no chance whatever of getting off the allowance.

I think the same thing applies to pensioners. Our pension law at the present time requires proof of pensionable disability. We have seventy or eighty thousand soldiers who have suffered gunshot wounds but are not drawing pension at all; many of them have never applied for pension; yet if they have trouble with their wounds they cannot get treatment unless they can prove that they are suffering from a pensionable disability, which means that they must put all the expensive pension machinery to work to prove entitlement to a pension, whereas all they really want is treatment. I think the time has come when the government of Canada should give serious consideration to this whole question of medical and dental treatment, and hospitalization. In that connection I would refer again to the report of the commission, a significant finding. At page 35 they say:

> We were much impressed on the occasion of our public sittings to see the evidences of ill health in a group of men who were the finest physical specimens in the country when they enlisted. It is of course difficult to measure good health or ill health by a casual inspection. There is one test of ill health, however, that is observable. The teeth of the veterans whom we saw were in a deplorable condition. How good health could possibly be retained with such poor teeth is difficult to understand.
> It was perfectly obvious to us without being told—though we were told it on many occasions—that these veterans could not afford the dental treatment they needed. Certainly they could not afford the new sets of teeth that were dictated in most instances. Yet it was equally obvious to us that the country could not afford the physical deterioration resulting from these bad teeth.

I throw out that suggestion to the minister, that he give serious consideration to the question of treatment.

Another feature of this bill is that while it covers some of the South African veterans, it does not, as I understand, cover any Canadians who were domiciled in Canada before the South African war and who went to England and enlisted with the imperial forces there, nor does it cover soldiers who came to Canada for the first time after the South African war, although they may have been domiciled here since 1903 or 1904; the bill merely covers Canadians who served in a Canadian contingent in the South African war.

This bill will place on the war veterans' allowance board serious responsibilities. At present they have a very wide discretion; but by the bill they will be given even wider discretion, which means that their task will be much more difficult. In fairness to them I should like to say that in my short experience in public life I have never come across a board or a governmental authority which has received so much favourable comment. On every side one hears that this board, under Mr. Walter S. Woods and his associates, is doing splendid work. I should like here to pay tribute to the members for that work; they are rendering splendid service to this country, and I believe they may be relied upon to exercise in a satisfactory manner the increased discretion given them in this bill.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Some of the remarks of the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Green) would perhaps have been more applicable in the discussion in committee. But since he has introduced them and as it is nearly six o'clock, may I add a word which perhaps the minister will consider during recess. Subsection 3 of section 4 reads:

> An allowance shall not be awarded or continued under this act to a veteran or a recipient while such veteran or recipient is in receipt of an old age pension. . . .

The point I would like to make is this: A war veteran if married is entitled to $40 a month; but an old age pension is limited to $20, unless the man's wife also has an old age pension, and it would be unfair, as the hon. member suggested, if the attitude were adopted of compelling them on reaching the age of seventy to go under the Old Age Pensions Act, in which case their pension would be dropped from $40 to $20 a month.

There is one other point I should like to mention. It is not in criticism, but I should like the minister to confirm the apparent meaning of this section. I remember some years ago when a somewhat similar bill was up, dealing, I think, with the soldier settlers; there appeared to me to be some ambiguity in the language, and I asked the minister, with his deputy before him, whether the words in the bill meant so and so, which appeared to be the favourable interpretation. The minister assured me most emphatically that it was so. Six months later when I tried to see that the act was enforced in that way, that same deputy assured me that he was under no obligation whatever to pay any attention to anything the minister had said in the house, that he was guided solely by the legal meaning, and he entirely repudiated the meaning which the minister had positively given in the house. It may be my suspicious nature, but I am not quite clear whether the language used in paragraph (c) of section 4 is definite enough. It says that they will give this award to those who are:

> . . . incapable and unlikely to become capable of maintaining himself because of economic handicaps combined with physical or mental disability or insufficiency.

[Mr. Green.]

The old section read:

> . . . permanently unemployable by reason of physical or mental disability.

We always run up against this case; we would say to the board: "This man is incapable and permanently unemployable." They would say: "No, he is not; he could run an elevator." Perhaps the man was a logger or something. They would say: "Oh, well; this man could do something; he could flag a train at a railway crossing." They could always see some possible situation in which a man, unless absolutely bedridden, could do something, disregarding the fact that a logger could not become a bank clerk or something of that kind, and elevator jobs are very few. And we wanted the term introduced—I think it was introduced later—"economic disability"; but still it is a little vague. I should like the minister, if he could, to assure us after eight o'clock that that provision, "economic handicaps combined with physical or mental disability," will positively mean what it appears to mean, and we shall not have to prove that a man is almost bedridden before we can get him this award; otherwise very little benefit will result over the old act. The words, "economic handicaps combined with physical or mental disability," might compel the man to prove he was practically bedridden.

Mr. POWER: He could be a member of parliament.

Mr. F. C. BETTS (London): May I point out to the minister that in making the two appointments to the board he has undertaken a grave responsibility. These are important positions, carrying salaries of $6,000, and I have heard it suggested that the appointments should be made by the civil service commission. I do not urge that, but I would emphasize the extreme importance of maintaining in this board the same humane disposition in dealing with cases coming before it that has been manifested in the past. Needless to say, the men to be appointed will have to be capable, and will have to possess qualities of the head. But it is essential that they have, too, qualities of the heart, because particularly in dealing with returned soldiers' legislation a great deal depends upon the administration of the act.

There have been items of war veteran legislation, the utility of which have been entirely destroyed by a too technical administration and interpretation of certain provisions. I hope when appointing two new members to the board the minister will dismiss from his mind all political considerations, and install men who will make their first consideration the welfare of the veteran. Most emphatically, the appointees should be returned men, men who have had a reasonable amount of service in the line. This is not a job for staff officers, unless they have had considerable regimental duty as well. There is no man so well qualified to deal with the veteran as one who has shared his hardships and his problems.

May I remind the minister of something he knows very well: the veteran will stand discomfort and hardship, privation and danger quite cheerfully, but he will not put up with what he describes as being chevied about. Under that heading fall all sorts of technical refinements, that disposition to introduce a mass of precedents in dealing with returned soldier legislation, which has been regrettably present in the attitude of certain other boards and commissions dealing with returned soldier legislation but not, I repeat, in connection with the war veterans' allowance board.

I should like to have seen in this legislation some provisions entitling those who draw the allowance, but who are not in receipt of a pension, to treatment and hospitalization in departmental hospitals. Perhaps that is something which may come later on in the session. I should like to see a provision for the payment of transportation costs of applicants to the nearest points at which they can be examined. As to the general purpose of the bill, may I quote from the minister's remarks in the debate on the resolution. At page 1039 of Hansard he is reported as follows:

> It may be said that in passing this legislation we shall be fulfilling to the utmost the requests of the returned soldiers themselves as expressed through the dominion convention of the Canadian legion held in Fort William early in February when a resolution was passed on the subject of cash bonus to veterans of the great war. The resolution reads in part:
> "That this convention endorse the resolution, passed by the dominion executive council to the effect that it is unalterably opposed to the principle of any bonus for service in the great war, conceiving it to be the responsibility of the government of Canada to adequately provide only for those disabled as a result of war service and dependents and dependents of the fallen and to ensure adequate assistance for those who saw service in a theatre of actual war and who are now by reason of economic conditions combined with their disability, tangible and intangible, resulting from war service, unable through no fault of their own to secure employment."

I am not going to discuss the matter fully, because I believe my remarks might be more appropriate in committee under section 4 of the bill. May I go on record now, however, as submitting that as it now stands section 4 will have to be drastically revised if the intention of the resolution passed by the legion convention is to be carried out. At present I shall not go farther than that.

I should like to add my words of congratulation to what has been said, subject to a revision of section 4, which would bring the measure entirely in line with the minister's remarks I have just quoted.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, because I welcome this bill I do not propose at this stage to speak at length upon it or to indulge in any carping criticism. I believe the measure will receive general commendation. I speak at this time rather because I fear that certain restrictive provisions in the bill may tend to impair its general usefulness. I desire to give the minister full credit for his intentions with regard to this measure, but I believe it is only proper to point out that the parliamentary inquiry of 1936 proved conclusively the necessity for such a measure. I think we should not overlook the fact that the two years' delay in caring for a certain category of veteran has meant growing misery and harrowing insecurity for the men in this category.

I am at a loss to understand why we should always have to wait until conditions become most acute before remedial legislation is introduced. I feel sure that such a policy will result in additional cost to the country as well as increased suffering and misery for those affected. If we review the history of legislation dealing with ex-service men, I think we shall find that the rather grudging attitude taken toward legislation of this kind has increased the ultimate cost. We should keep this experience in mind as we try to bring legislation of this sort to its final stage. I am particularly anxious, if we accept responsibility for the category of ex-service men as defined in this bill, that we should make certain that the responsibility is adequately and justly discharged. As I say, I have a definite fear that certain restrictions in the bill may detract from the reception it will receive from ex-service men in general.

I should like to refer particularly to the sections of the bill dealing with those who served in the South African war. As has been pointed out by preceding speakers, the benefits are limited to those who served in the Canadian contingents. I am bound to bring to the attention of the house the large number of men who served in the imperial units during the South African war and who very shortly after their periods of service established domiciles in Canada and have been residents of Canada continuously since that time. They have become closely identified with our national life and our national enterprises, and it seems unfair to discriminate against them in a measure of this kind. I should like to direct attention to this additional fact, that a large percentage of those who served in imperial units during the South African war enlisted for service in the great war of 1914-1918.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. member is in order when he discusses different clauses of the bill on the second reading. He should discuss the principle of the bill at this time and discuss the different clauses when the bill is in committee.

Mr. MacNEIL: I shall abide by your admonition and endeavour to speak to the general principles incorporated in the bill. It seems to me that one of the principles in the bill is restricted by certain clauses in the bill, and I shall have several suggestions to make in this connection when the bill is in committee stage. As I say, it seems to me to be unfortunate that the restrictions mentioned should suggest some discrimination and therefore detract from the general usefulness of the bill.

There is incorporated in section 3 of the bill a definite principle which I think should be discussed on the second reading. This section provides the kernel of the measure as it creates a new classification of veteran who will benefit under this bill, but I fear that that which is given by one section may be taken away by another. This section provides that allowances under the act shall be paid to those who are incapable or who are unlikely to become capable of maintaining themselves, but in the succeeding sections are to be found certain restrictions with regard to that benefit. The suggestion is conveyed to me at least that definite benefits are provided for in one section and then those benefits are restricted by succeeding sections.

I assume that some attempt will be made to determine a man's eligibility for benefit under this act and that the factor of physical or mental disability will be considered along with any economic handicaps which may exist. It seems to me that the economic handicap feature is completely nullified by the succeeding sections. When the bill reaches committee stage I hope that the minister will take action to remove what appears to be an apparent contradiction. It is important that we should realize that the average age of ex-service men, according to the findings of the veterans' assistance commission, is now forty-nine years. A man who is forty-nine years of age is unwanted in Canadian industry to-day. This is proven by general experience. Such an age is a definite economic handicap and when combined with some physical or mental disability, it means the denial of access to employment under conditions as they obtain to-day. I suggest that this contradiction should be ironed out when the bill is in committee stage.

Like the preceding speaker, I think it is important that we should consider provision for medical treatment in conjunction with this bill. It would seem to me to be definitely in the public interest that prospective applicants for war veterans' allowances should be given access to medical treatment when it seems necessary. It seems unwise to deny medical treatment to an ex-service man who may be suffering from a tangible or an intangible disability as a result of service when such treatment may return him to a condition where he would be enabled to present himself for employment in the labour market.

I hope the minister's remarks on the resolution preceding this bill are not to be taken as suggesting that in dealing with this measure the house will be dealing with the entire problem opened up by the final report of the veterans' assistance commission. There was a hint of that in the remarks of the minister to be found on page 1040 of Hansard of March 4, when he said:

> To some extent I am dealing with the provisional economic allowance. The commission recommended, in one part at least, that a great many of these men—five thousand of them who are going to be covered by the war veterans' allowance—should receive a provisional economic allowance amounting to $18.75 per month for single men and $30 for married men.

I want to point out that the commission made specific recommendations with regard to this War Veterans' Allowance Act and proposed that that should deal with 5,000 men. It was suggested that the provisional economic allowance would take care of the remaining 10,000 of the total of 15,000 graded as having served in an actual theatre of war and being found partly or wholly unfit for employment. This measure as far as it goes is excellent as it will provide considerable relief to a class of veterans who have been suffering in recent years; nevertheless it does not dispose entirely of the problem. We shall take occasion at a later time to discuss that matter.

I bring it up now in order to make it clear that this bill does not cover the whole problem as raised by the final report of the commission.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

On section 1—"The South African war."

Sir EUGENE FISET: As section 1 deals with the South African veterans I should like, in the name of my old comrades, to convey to the hon. minister (Mr. Power) my sincere and grateful thanks for bringing the South African veterans under the provisions of this bill. I never had any doubt, knowing the minister as I do, that he was one day bound to accede to our requests, and I can assure him, if I can judge from the numerous letters I have been receiving since the introduction of this bill, that his name, perhaps for the first time in his life, is going to be blessed from one end of the country to the other.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain just what class of veterans who served in South Africa will be covered by this section?

Mr. POWER: As is well known to hon. members, the War Veterans' Allowance Act heretofore restricted the veterans' allowance to those who served in the great war. This section extends the act to veterans who served in the Canadian contingents in South Africa during the hostilities commencing on October 11, 1899, and ending on May 31, 1902. Representations were made before the parliamentary committee of 1936, and again during the last session of parliament, among others by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). I told him at that time that there might be certain difficulties, but that I would go into the matter thoroughly in an endeavour to bring these men under the provisions of the War Veterans' Allowance Act.

As has already been suggested, a goodly percentage of these Canadians who served in the South African war served also in the great war, so they would in any case be eligible under the provisions of the War Veterans' Allowance Act. As to the exact number, we had some discussion about that last year.

Mr. BENNETT: That is just what I was about to ask the minister.

Mr. POWER: I am able to say this: There were 7,366 veterans who left Canada in the Canadian contingents for South Africa. Only 5,325 of these saw service on land during the campaign, the rest having arrived subsequently to the cessation of hostilities and many of them never landing in South Africa at all. After deducting mortality from this 5,325, we estimate those now living to number approximately 3,500, and it is believed that at least half of these saw service also in the great war—this, of course, is only an estimate—and would therefore have entitlement under the act as at present. That would leave 1,750, of whom it is doubted if more than ten per cent are indigent and unprovided for, so that the total to be looked after by this amendment would not be more than 200 to 250. The expenditure is estimated to be from $30,000 to $35,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask the minister in reference to a case I know of, that of a Canadian-born who served in the South African war and went with the corps to the relief of Mafeking, where Baden-Powell was besieged. This man came to see me a few days ago, and in the course of conversation told me his story. I am not sure that I can relate it with an absolutely clear understanding of all he said, but I understood him to say that after he reached South Africa he was transferred—he was in "C" battery—to Rhodesia. I assume he was transferred to some imperial corps. Would that soldier be qualified under this amendment? After he came back he studied for a doctor, and then went west to practise. He is now over sixty years of age, and has been back in Toronto for many years and is destitute. I was wondering if his being present at the relief of Mafeking would make him eligible for the war veterans' allowance.

Mr. POWER: If he enlisted in the Canadian unit, I do not think there is any doubt that he would be eligible.

Mr. MacNICOL: Thank you.

Mr. STREIGHT: I think I can explain that to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). After the siege of Mafeking Rhodesia borrowed some artillery from the imperials, they took "C" battery from the Canadian forces, and those men went and served in protecting the border around Rhodesia, but they were still under Canadian pay and allowances.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the minister what allowance he would receive?

Mr. POWER: Up to a maximum of twenty dollars a month if unmarried, and forty dollars if married, provided he is eligible under the other sections of the act.

Mr. STIRLING: I should like to draw the attention of the minister to the phrase, "theatre of actual war" and the interpretation placed upon it.

Mr. POWER: In connection with South Africa?

Mr. STIRLING: It appears in the explanation in connection with the bill. The case I desire to draw to the minister's attention has to do with the great war, but the same phrase is used with regard to the South African veteran. The War Veterans' Allowance Act sets out quite clearly what "theatre of war" was intended to mean, but as soon as the board undertook the administration of this act it was necessary to have a closer definition of what "theatre of war" meant with regard to the act. What I say is in no sense a criticism of the board. Rather would I associate myself with the well-chosen words of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) this afternoon in appreciation of the work that the board has done. Cases have arisen, not many in number, which do not seem to me to be receiving the intent of parliament—shall I put it in that way? The particular case I drew to the board's attention was that of a man who was on the strength of the military police at Folkestone. He was sent over to France in 1917, to carry out certain duties entrusted to him with regard to the election. I am told that others who were sent on similar duties actually were killed.

Mr. POWER: Some of us think they should have been.

Mr. STIRLING: Possibly, but I was not for a moment looking at the matter from a partisan point of view. There seems little doubt that the car this particular man used was demolished by a direct hit. True, he was not in it. He has now come to a physical and financial disability, and his age is such that there is no question, I think, of his being eligible but for the fact that he does not come within the definition laid down by the Department of Justice. That definition is that to come within the category of those who served in a theatre of actual war a man must have been on the strength of a unit that was so serving. I was present in the house when this statute was passed, and it does not seem to me that that case is receiving what parliament intended such cases to receive.

I am told there are one or two other cases, not many in number I believe. There was one of a man sent over on conducting duties, and another of a man sent over on post office duties, and he was actually wounded, but he does not receive the benefits of the War Veterans' Allowance Act. I would draw the attention of the minister to these cases rather with the request that he should see whether, if they are not numerous—and I understand that they are not—they could not be brought within the meaning of the act.

Mr. POWER: I am familiar with the cases submitted by my hon. friend. The particular case he mentions is one of those borderline cases that are very difficult to deal with, very much like the case of the conducting officer. There may be some discussion between us as to whether the man was actually serving at the front when he was engaged in the work of a political campaign—

Mr. STIRLING: He was carrying out the duties he was sent there to perform.

Mr. POWER: I assume he was employed by the government, and not by a political party. I take that for granted.

Mr. STIRLING: I assume that.

Mr. POWER: I take that for granted. In any case the whole question turns on the interpretation of the term, "service in a theatre of actual war." As my hon. friend has pointed out, the fact is that the Department of Justice has ruled that conducting officers could not properly speaking be said to have served in a theatre of actual war, and for that reason it ruled that they were not eligible under the provisions of the War Veterans' Allowance Act. I do not know that anything can be done about the matter. I would hesitate to propose an amendment which would still further enlarge this definition of service; it might allow eligibility to a very large number of persons for whom it was never intended that there should be provision in legislation such as this. After all, it must not be forgotten that these men were not wounded in the discharge of their military duties. People coming under this act are those whose disability cannot be attributed to their war service. They did not necessarily suffer injury or disability at the front; their disabilities are post war or such as may be assumed to be due to the war, owing to the strain and hardships which they underwent. It is perhaps difficult to imagine that a man whose duty was purely a civilian one such as that of a returning officer in an election would be put to any strain or hardship comparable with that of those who saw actual service in the trenches. However, I have no objection to giving consideration to the case submitted by my hon. friend.

Mr. MacNEIL: Would the minister give consideration to those who served in the South African campaign as members of imperial units and who established domicile in Canada almost immediately after the close of the campaign? The reason I ask consideration of such cases is that a very large number of these men enlisted in the Canadian expeditionary force during the war; they were in some degree the back-bone of the instructors required; many of them, through no fault of their own, did not see service beyond England or Canada, and therefore, unless in receipt of a pension, are not eligible for the benefits of this act. As I endeavoured to point out before until I was reproved, if they have established twenty years' residence in Canada and are now over sixty years of age and in destitute circumstances, I see no reason why they should not be taken care of under this act, particularly as they no longer can establish even a remote claim in respect of the imperial government. They have been closely identified with our national life all this time, and I think it would be quite proper that they should be given consideration, particularly as many of them served in the Canadian expeditionary force and did valuable work and, because of the very fact that they gave such valuable service, were not allowed to proceed to France and are therefore excluded from the benefits of this legislation. I ask the minister if he has given consideration to their case.

Mr. POWER: I have.

Mr. GREEN: As it stands at present, the War Veterans' Allowance Act provides for an allowance being paid to a person domiciled in Canada at the time of the great war even though he served in the imperial forces; but as I understand this proposed amendment to cover South African veterans, a Canadian domiciled in Canada before the South African war who went to England and served with the imperial forces would not be eligible.

Sir. EUGENE FISET: Is the hon. member aware of the fact that every single Canadian who went to South Africa became an imperial soldier when he arrived there? We were all on the same footing. The imperial government provided for all gratuities as well as pensions. The Canadian government had nothing whatever to do with the matter.

Mr. GREEN: Yes, I believe the imperial government provided the pay of the soldiers and defrayed all expenses. But that is not the question I am asking. I think we should cover the case of Canadians who went to England and enlisted with an imperial unit. This amendment covers only those who served in a Canadian contingent.

Mr. POWER: I doubt very much if there are very many of those, and I hesitate to recommend to the committee at the present time that we pass legislation with respect to them. If it is found that there is any hardship with respect to Canadians domiciled in Canada who went to the old country to enlist during the South African war, perhaps those cases can be dealt with later, but I would not like to enlarge the act at present to do so.

Mr. BENNETT: Is the statute broad enough as it now stands to deal with this last number of cases—those domiciled in Canada who went to Britain?

Mr. POWER: No.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not broad enough?

Mr. POWER: I do not think so. It says, "any former member of a Canadian contingent" who served in the South African war.

Mr. GREEN: Could that not be clarified so that it would also include those who were domiciled in Canada but enlisted in an imperial unit?

Mr. POWER: I do not think that would apply to more than a very few officers, who are not likely to require such a provision.

Mr. BENNETT: There are some privates.

Mr. POWER: The only cases I have in mind are some of which I have personal knowledge, men who went over in cattle boats or on transports and afterwards joined some unit or another. A great many, I believe, joined Lord Roberts' Horse or some of the independent or so-called irregular units. If there is any real demand, I do not think there would be any difficulty about making provision later, but I should not like to change the act now.

Mr. BENNETT: But there will be difficulty in the next year. The thing cannot be done except by parliament. The only suggestion I have—and perhaps the minister would consider it—is whether we might not say, "in the case of domiciled Canadians" serving in the South African war, instead of "members of a Canadian contingent." I do not know whether the minister thinks that is going too far or not. That is in subsection 3 of section 2. I just put it to the minister.

Mr. POWER: I have no objection at all to giving the matter consideration although the numbers are so few that it is really hardly worth while bothering about. At the same time, as my hon. friend says, if there be only one, perhaps it is worth doing it to rescue him from destitution.

Mr. BENNETT: It would be, in view of the nature of this legislation.

Mr. POWER: If the committee would be willing to let that subsection stand, I would have no objection.

Mr. BENNETT: Why not let the section stand, if one paragraph is to stand?

Mr. POWER: Yes; let the whole section stand.

Section stands.

On section 2—War Veterans' Allowance Board.

Mr. POWER: I suggest the following amendment:

That subsection 5 of section 3 of the act as enacted by chapter 48 of the statutes of 1936 be amended by adding after the word "subsection" in the fourth line of the original bill the words "or from the date of his appointment to the board."

Subsection 5 of section 3 reads as follows:

Any member of the board who, prior to or at the time of his appointment, was or is employed in the public service of Canada, shall be eligible upon application within three months from the date of the coming into force of this subsection, to become a contributor under the Civil Service Superannuation Act. . . .

That referred to the coming into force of that subsection, which was in 1936. Should it so happen that any member of the civil service of Canada was appointed as a member of this board, he would not be eligible to elect to become a contributor unless we added the words which I now propose, "or from the date of his appointment to the board."

Mr. GREEN: Is it intended that there shall be two boards sitting? Provision is being made for five members. How is the work to be divided among them?

Mr. POWER: The act requires quorums of two and two signatures for each decision. It might be that, if there were a rush of work, two quorums could sit.

Mr. GREEN: It is not intended to provide for a full board of five in every case?

Mr. POWER: No.

Mr. STIRLING: Will they always sit in Ottawa?

Mr. POWER: Up to the present it has been found more advisable, almost necessary, for them to sit here.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. DUNNING: I move:

2. (1) (a) Subsection five of section three of the said act, as enacted by chapter 48 of the Statutes of 1936, is amended by adding after the word "subsection" in the fourth line thereof, the words—

"or from the date of his appointment to the board."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. POWER: There is another amendment I wish to propose. It is not in the printed bill. It reads:

2. (3) Section 3 (a) of the said act as enacted by chapter 48 of the Statutes of 1936, is repealed, and the following substituted therefor—

"Subject to the provisions of this act, the board shall have full and unrestricted power and authority and exclusive jurisdiction to deal with and adjudicate upon all matters and questions relating to the award, increase, decrease, suspension or cancellation of any allowance under this act and to the recovery of any overpayment which may have been made: and effect shall be given by the department and the comptroller of the treasury to the decisions of the board."

This is similar to a provision in the Pension Act passed by this house in 1936. The purpose is to make it quite clear that this board is entirely free from any influence or intervention on the part of any person.

Mr. BENNETT: It has sole jurisdiction in the premises.

Mr. POWER: Yes. There was a similar section which I am now asking the committee to repeal in favour of this because I want to make it as strong as the provision in the Pension Act.

Mr. DUNNING: I move the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 3—Veterans to whom allowances payable.

Mr. BETTS: This is the section about which I was speaking before dinner. It will be remembered that in the old section there were defined three classes of veterans who became eligible for allowances under the act. First of all, there were those who at the date of the proposed commencement of the allowance had attained the age of sixty. That was one class. Then there was another class who, in the opinion of the board, were permanently unemployable by reason of physical or mental disability. That was the second class. There was also a third class, who having served in a theatre of actual war had attained the age of fifty-five and were, in the opinion of the board, incapable of maintaining themselves because of disability, pre-aging, or general unfitness. My understanding of the intention of the legion convention at Fort William and of the resolution passed on that occasion, and also of what the minister intended to convey in his remarks on the resolution introducing this bill, was that the first two classes would be maintained as they now exist; and by the present section 3 that is done. The only difficulty or uncertainty or unsatisfactory condition I see is as to the third class. As I say, my impression of what was understood at Fort William was that the third class would be preserved very much as it existed except for the fact that the age limit of fifty-five would be swept away; in other words, those who were eligible only if they were fifty-five years of age would now be eligible irrespective of their age. I doubt whether the present section 4 which is being substituted for the old section 4 has that effect. I would refer to paragraph (c). In attempting to define this third class, section 4 provides:

> Subject as hereinafter provided allowances under this act shall be payable with the approval of the board to any veteran who has been domiciled in Canada for the six months immediately preceding the date of the proposed commencement of the allowance, and who—

Then it defines classes one and two. Then in paragraph (c) it deals with the class I have described as the third; that is to say, it describes them as those who do not qualify by age or disability under the two preceding paragraphs, but having served in a theatre of actual war are, in the opinion of the board, incapable and unlikely to become capable of maintaining themselves because of economic handicaps combined with physical or mental disability or insufficiency.

The point I would make is that in the old definition no regard was had to the question whether the applicant was likely to become capable of maintaining himself. The sole question for determination was whether he was or was not capable of maintaining himself. Those words, "unlikely to become capable of maintaining himself," introduce a restrictive feature which was not heralded in the remarks the minister made on the resolution, and was not the understanding of the convention at Fort William. I suggest that the intention of all parties in the house would be carried out if the words, "and unlikely to become capable," were omitted.

Then I am very much afraid that subsection 2 clips the wings of the board almost entirely in dealing with the third class to which I have reference. Subsection 2 now reads:

> The provisions of paragraph (c) of subsection 1—

And paragraph (c) of subsection 1 is the paragraph which would let in this third class.

> —shall not be construed to apply to any veteran who is, in the opinion of the board, physically and mentally capable of maintaining himself if work were available.
