Mr. KINLEY: It was a majority report and I take it that a majority report is the report of a commission. However, for his information I may tell the hon. gentleman that Judge Maclean, the chairman of the commission, dissented from the finding of his colleagues, though he qualified his dissent with the statement that the beam trawlers should be used only for the purpose of taking up the slack and that the fishermen should have the first consideration at all times. Then we had the Jones commission in Nova Scotia, and that commission also reported against the use of beam trawlers.

Mr. ISNOR: May I ask the same question with reference to that commission? Was that second report unanimous?

Mr. KINLEY: I must give the same answer; it was a majority report. The English professor who was chairman said he did not know enough about it to sign the report, but apart from that the report was a unanimous report. Mr. Alex Johnston, who was deputy minister of fisheries for many years, and Doctor Ellis, of the university of Toronto, were members of the commission. Also the price spreads commission reported adversely to the trawler.

It seems to me that when we in Nova Scotia stand up for the fishermen we are accused of being opposed to progress. Well, if it is opposition to progress to stand by the fishermen, then the commissions to which I have referred must have been against progress. The people of our province, I can assure the house, are a progressive people, and they are not against progress. But our fishermen have not at any time received for their fish a price equal to the cost of landing fish by the beam trawlers, and I do not hesitate to say that if allowed to do so they can perform every function performed by the beam trawlers for the fishing company that has the privilege of using the trawlers. The company that has the right to use these trawlers uses them as a means of keeping down the price to the fishermen, who have no bargaining power. The fishermen in Nova Scotia are therefore in a bad way.

If the fishermen were employed to catch the fish needed for the Canadian people it would increase employment fourfold, and that is the vital thing to-day. The reason we are opposed to the beam trawler is that we do not need it. There are only about eleven million people in Canada and there is not a sufficient market for the fishermen and for these auxiliary beam trawlers as well, and my contention is that the fishermen are entitled at least to the Canadian market. The fishermen are citizens of the country and they should have the first consideration.

I am not going to keep the house much longer because this is a short afternoon and I understand that it is the desire to get through with this debate. I repeat, however, that on the first of April the minister must make his decision. Three times the fishermen have won their case before royal commissions and once this parliament spoke. In 1929 a law was passed in consequence of which there was an order in council which would have eliminated the beam trawlers. The matter was taken to the courts, and then there was a change of government and it was withdrawn from the courts. Then another order in council was passed and has now the force of law. It reads:

1. A licence for a fishing vessel using an otter or other trawl of a similar nature, other than a small dragger operated by inshore fishermen, will not be granted, except under the following conditions:

(a) That the applicant for such licence shall furnish the Minister of Fisheries with evidence that will satisfy the said minister, that he cannot obtain an adequate supply of suitable fish to enable him properly to conduct and develop his business from the hook and line fishermen, and that if the licence is granted, the extent of his purchase of fresh fish from the said fishermen will not be adversely affected.

I realize that this is the law and the Minister of Fisheries must administer it, but before he comes to a decision I suggest that all sides be heard. I believe the deep sea fishermen were heard, but I do not know whether the inshore fishermen had that opportunity. They are all hook and line fishermen. I can assure the minister that if the licences are continued it will prolong a situation which will become aggravated as time passes, because the minister will be faced with other applications. I hope he will give the matter serious consideration and will study the question from all sides. If he does, I believe his judgment will be that the fisheries on the Atlantic coast can be properly carried on by the shore fishermen and the deep sea hook and line fishermen, because they could very well supply the market. I have telegrams from fish companies in Nova Scotia saying that there is an oversupply. The most successful company in Nova Scotia, which has plants in Lunenburg, Liverpool, Lockeport, North Sydney and one place on the Digby shore, never had beam trawlers.

Mr. ISNOR: What is the name of the company?

Mr. KINLEY: Lunenburg Sea Products. This company which has the beam trawlers to-day would be able to get its supply just as cheaply, and better fish, by buying from the fishermen. If the beam trawlers are given licences again at the present time, this will, as I said, aggravate the situation so that we shall be confronted with unemployment among the fishermen in Nova Scotia and may have to support them by giving them relief.

I leave the matter with the minister, believing that he will do his best to see that the fishermen get a square deal in this matter.

[Mr. Kinley.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I submit that the amendment to the amendment introduced by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) is not in order. The original amendment reads:

That all the words in the motion after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor: "This house is of the opinion that for the effective removal of poverty from Canada this government has neglected and is now neglecting to use the resources of the dominion as adequately as the people of this country have a right to demand."

In the course of the discussion on that amendment the members of the social credit group in the house had a good deal to say about social credit, but in the amendment there was nothing whatever about social credit. Then the leader of the opposition moved the following subamendment:

That the amendment be amended by adding thereto the following words:
"but that the adoption of the policies of social credit as enunciated by its supporters in this house would afford no adequate remedy for such neglect."

In that he is, of course, making reference to arguments which have been advanced in favour of the amendment, not to the amendment itself. Some hon. members of other groups in the house, as for example my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) last night advanced an altogether different proposal, but the subamendment affords no opportunity for the house to pronounce on the adequacy of his proposal. I think the rule in this connection is contained in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, citation 422:

The law on the relevancy of amendments is that if they are on the same subject matter with the original motion, they are admissible, but not when foreign thereto.

I claim that this subamendment is distinctly foreign to the original amendment. It is true that there are exceptions:

The exceptions to this rule are amendments on the question of going into supply or ways and means.

This subamendment, however, does not come under that exception. The exception is, of course, the introduction of an amendment that is quite foreign to the original question of going into supply. I take it that when an amendment is made to that amendment, it must be in keeping with the amendment itself, and cannot introduce new matter. From another angle, I think any hon. member will see that the subamendment must be quite out of order, because it will throw together people of utterly diverse views. It would have such an effect so far as our group is concerned; we would have to vote for the subamendment, because we do not share the views of our social credit friends in this respect. This would not clarify the situation at all.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But if the hon. member has confidence in the government, he could vote against both the amendment and the subamendment.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If we had confidence in the government, but this is a non-confidence motion so we shall have to vote for the original amendment. I suppose the only way we could clarify the matter would be for each group, when the subamendment is voted down, to substitute another amendment, which does not seem to be a very good method of procedure. Therefore, I submit that since the subamendment introduces altogether different matter from the original amendment, it is not in order.

Mr. BENNETT: I gave considerable attention to the rules of the house before preparing that subamendment, and I think it will be found that it comes distinctly within the rules. Citation 394 of Beauchesne provides:

A motion may be amended: (a) by leaving out certain words; (b) by leaving out certain words in order to insert other words; and (c) by inserting or adding other words.

The succeeding citation is as follows:

395. It is an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed. Every amendment proposed to be made either to a question or to a proposed amendment should be so framed that if agreed to by the house the question or amendment as amended would be intelligible and consistent with itself.

The relevancy rule referred to in citation 422, taken from Bourinot, 521-2, reads:

The law on the relevancy of amendments is that if they are on the same subject matter with the original motion, they are admissible, but not when foreign thereto. The exceptions to this rule are amendments on the question of going into supply or ways and means.

It will be remembered that the original motion before the house is that the Speaker do now leave the chair. To that the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) proposed an amendment the effect of which was, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) pointed out, to raise the question of want of confidence in the administration on the ground that they have neglected to use the resources of the country to the extent they should. I realized at once that to be relevant one must connect the subamendment with the amendment. So these words are added:

but that the adoption of the policies of social credit as enunciated by its supporters in this house would afford no adequate remedy for such neglect.

That ties the subamendment to the amendment, because, as was pointed out by the Minister of Finance on more than one occasion, and I think properly, while there was no mention of the words "social credit" in the amendment, the whole discussion was on that footing. The mover of the amendment himself in his speech dealt with that at some considerable length, and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) yesterday made extensive quotations from the works of Major Douglas and others dealing with social credit. The subamendment merely says that proposals made by one party in the house would afford no adequate remedy for such neglect, thereby completing the connection if it were adopted; for the effect would be to make a complete amendment of this, which is the rule with respect to relevancy; the words "such neglect" tying it to the neglect alleged. Then, if you read the two together—because the subamendment must make sense of the whole —you have a completed statement of the situation. I cannot see wherein the subamendment contravenes the rules cited by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre himself, and I confidently think that on a review of the authorities it will be seen that this is a subamendment which does come within the rules. It may embarrass those of us who have to vote, but I wonder if it occurred to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that had the matter been left as it was, it was somewhat embarrassing, as pointed out by the Minister of Finance. As the amendment stood, the obvious remedy suggested for the present situation was that the principles enunciated by the mover and his friends, whether you call them social credit or anything else, provided an ample remedy for the evils suggested.

Mr. HANSELL: I have listened with interest to the point of order which has been raised. I do not wish to discuss that point particularly, but I should like to draw the attention of the house to another matter which is quite relevant. It is this, that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) did not raise his point of order until several hon. members had spoken to the subamendment. I am not saying that the hon. gentleman is not within his rights in doing so at this time, but I believe the nature of the subamendment is such that we should be fair in every respect. I shall go so far, Mr. Speaker, as to request what I think has been done in courts of law; if your decision should be in favour of the point raised by the hon member for Winnipeg North Centre, and you should rule the subamendment out of order, I would request that you reserve your decision for the time being, because the leader of our group has not had an opportunity as yet to reply. I do not think this request is unreasonable, considering the nature of the subamendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have listened to the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), and also to what has been said by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). Under standing order 48, regarding privileged motions, paragraph 394, subsection (c) states that a motion may be amended by inserting or adding other words. In this subamendment the leader of the opposition has added certain words. Thus, in my opinion, the subamendment is in order, because the amendment and the subamendment both deal with the manner in which a certain situation may be improved. This is sufficient under the rule of relevancy. Therefore I believe the subamendment is in order.

Mr. WILLIAM HAYHURST (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, when I hear the quibbling about words and the use of words, and when I consider the number of words that are used in this house, I think possibly we should be more practical in our suggestions. The other day I heard one hon. member mention Bishop Berkeley, and I am reminded of the statement made by that gentleman at one time, that there was no matter. So the wags of that day said it was no matter what he said. Then, when Bishop Berkeley said, "All is mind," the wags said, "Never mind."

We have had a good deal of discussion in the house with regard to the vital question of removing poverty, and I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) would entirely agree as to the desirability of doing that. During this debate hon. members of different parties have made many statements with which we are all in entire accord. As I see it, this debate has been excellent in that it has provided much useful information regarding the banking system of this country. It has also shed light on the conditions that might lead to a further depression, as the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) suggested yesterday. Speaking generally, we are getting expressions of the opinions of prominent men with regard to the vital questions which are facing not only Canada but the whole world to-day. The spirit that has characterized this debate, on the part of members of all parties, has been gratifying to us, because we feel that a realization of these difficulties is dawning upon us all. If we are to make Canada a greater and happier nation we must come to some common agreement, and this debate appears to have brought out a spirit of tolerance and good will, at any rate in this house, although at noon to-day the hon. member for Yukon (Mrs. Black) told me that yesterday afternoon she thought it was more like a bear-garden.

With reference to the subamendment, may I say that no plan or policy has been enunciated from this corner of the house. We have been endeavouring to get a principle recognized; hence the introduction of this non-confidence motion. We have felt that at present industry fails to create effective demand for its own production, and therefore additional money should be issued, in the form of old age pensions or in other ways, to make up this deficiency. I should like very much to compliment the right hon. leader of the opposition, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley), upon their contributions to this debate. It seems to me their solicitude for the people of Canada is very real, and if we are to go forward together with the unswerving purpose of solving our difficulties, it is above all things necessary that we be frank in these discussions. As the leader of the opposition so ably stated, the deposits in the various banks, your account and mine, must be protected from those who would inflate their value to such an extent as to make them almost worthless.

In this country the results of a mistaken monetary policy are clearly evident. They can be seen in many ways: First, the widespread insolvency of agriculture, and that applies to the east as well as the west; second, the withering of exports and therefore imports; third, the insolvency of our railways; fourth, the serious straitening or straining of our municipal, provincial and federal finances; and fifth, the unemployment that we have on all sides. We cannot turn our heads away from or shut our eyes to these facts. Quiet deliberation will disentangle these knots if we are prepared to work together with understanding sympathy and knowledge. Yesterday the Minister of National Revenue referred to the loan council. It is my understanding that Saskatchewan adopted a modified form of the loan council, but that by the time Saskatchewan took this action Alberta had defaulted. This placed Alberta in an unenviable light.

There is a firm conviction in the average mind that there is no wealth without money.

To-day there exists far more wealth than there is the equivalent in money, but at the same time a great many people are under the impression that when you produce goods you produce money. This is entirely erroneous. That statement is borne out by the fact that in 1926 Saskatchewan produced 220,000,000 bushels of wheat for which the farmers received approximately $1 a bushel, or $220,000,000. In 1932 they produced approximately the same amount of wheat, and received only $56,000,000 for it. They sold approximately the same quantity of grain for one-quarter the price. While prices to primary producers had been thus driven down, there had been no similar decline in the cost of financial credit to the farmer. When the farmer borrowed a dollar in 1926, it meant borrowing the equivalent of one bushel of wheat. When he had to pay back this debt in 1932, the value of one dollar expanded to the equivalent of more than three bushels of wheat. It is no wonder the people in the west are demanding monetary reform.

It is quite evident from this that the production of goods does not create money. Money or buying power is created by the banks, and unless there is a constant flow of money or its equivalent to enable buying power or consuming power to keep pace with production, we shall be constantly faced with situations similar to those existing in Saskatchewan. I do not propose to discuss the matter in too technical a manner, although the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue have mentioned the A plus B theorem of social credit. As a matter of fact, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that subject really was not mentioned in the amendment.

I choose rather to speak about the situation as it appears to me. These days we hear much regarding the efficiency of Canadian banks. Some hon. members may be surprised to hear the statement I am about to make, from this section of the house. Banks in Canada have been adversely criticized, but we must realize that our Canadian banking system is on a much higher plane than is the case in some other countries. In the past, as compared with the system of the United States, the Canadian banking system has worked satisfactorily. The fact is that each branch bank relies not upon its own strength or resources, but upon those of the whole system. For instance, if banking in southern Saskatchewan, south eastern Alberta or other afflicted parts of Canada had in the past few years been in the hands of small, individual banks, investing a large proportion of their resources in the areas they served, it is possible that those stricken areas would have had to bear the additional burden of bank failures.

It may be unfortunate, but it seems to be true that large scale business requires large scale banking. Much more is demanded of banking to-day than was demanded a few years ago. This condition has given rise to the need for a central bank. Let us hope that our central bank will not become a political football. Many hon. members have said that the monetary system must be based upon the confidence of the individuals using it. It must be evident that many people would abuse any kind of credit, no matter in what form it might be given them, because their integrity and honour are not on a plane which would justify an extension of such credit. So that whatever system is developed, it must of necessity depend upon the type of individuals comprising it.

Whatever the future ramifications of our economic life may be, one thing alone will matter, and that is character. No banking system can grow amid uncertainty and distress. At this point may I read from the speech of the Minister of Finance:

> Government spending cannot make up for the paralysis of private enterprise and of private spending which is created by fear and uncertainty. Under an absolute dictatorship, with complete regimentation of business and the private citizen conditions might be different; but under an economic and political system such as ours it is essential to maintain the confidence of the millions of individuals and organizations that make their own decisions as to whether they will or will not spend or invest.

With that I entirely agree. At a later point in his speech the minister said that there is a shortage of purchasing power in the hands of consumers. That, of course, is well known by every hon. member. We all realize that while there is plenty we have poverty. As a matter of fact I have in my possession a letter from a man who served thirty-five years in the Post Office Department. He was one of the earliest settlers in the Northwest Territories, but because he did not pay to a contributory pension scheme he is now left on relief, and is pleading for work. I am reminded of a poem of Robert Burns in which he said:

> Who begs a brother of the earth
> To give him leave to toil.

If people will not spend or invest, trade must suffer. The reason some people do not spend or invest is that they do not have the money. A reduction in exports leads to a decline in industrial employment. On the other hand, industrial employment leads to effective demand; and effective demand is more completely generated by reducing the cost of goods, or by increasing purchasing power. The exchange rate tends to be regulated by the country's trade. More trade should lead to more consumption, and more consumption to more production.

Regarding the financial system as it exists in Canada, I can speak only from practical experience. It seems to me that in the past interest rates have been much to high. Consequently many people have been forced into liquidation or, if not forced into liquidation, they have had to fight an uphill battle in an endeavour to put themselves in a liquid position. The increase in private and public debt has made our financial structure too great a burden for us to carry. Some new policy will have to be devised. So far as I can see, it may be necessary to devise a policy of controlled inflation, based upon our gold supply. I merely make that suggestion, realizing of course that more money must be put into the stream of society. The government has made no statement regarding any policy it may have in this connection, and the people of Canada are anxiously awaiting an announcement of government policy.

With respect to expenditures Charles Dickens has been quoted. It will be remembered that the advice given to Copperfield was:

> Annual income twenty pounds, annual expenditure nineteen nineteen six, result happiness. Annual income twenty pounds, annual expenditure twenty pounds ought and six, result misery.

To put this in modern form, we should be able to balance our consumption with our production. It seems likely that the government is waiting for the recommendations of the royal commission now investigating the whole system of taxation in the dominion. We sincerely hope some positive plan will be suggested by the commission for recasting the financial basis of confederation, and halting the process of piling deficit on deficit and debt on debt, and that they will bring forward a definite method of dealing with the staggering burden built up by our governments since confederation. Discordant forces may defeat our national aims. Sectional differences may make Canada a more difficult country to govern. It is necessary for us to develop a better national conscience. This nation, dedicated to the great ideals of liberty, unanimity and fraternity, with its diversified population, should become a beacon to the world. We must choose for greatness; we must think of Canada as our greatest Canadians have thought of it, facing on the east the great nations of Europe and on the west the new and awakening teeming millions of the orient.

Under the present economic system it is expected that the consumer will buy back all the products of the country, but it seems that under these conditions we frequently have an undistributed surplus. A lowering of salaries and other types of purchasing power means that there is underconsumption, and thus the consumer is not able to buy back with wages what an article has cost, not only in labour but in machinery to produce. Arguments as to the technological development of mankind have been introduced into the house too often to mention them again.

We have two types of credit—the real credit which is the producing power of the people and the financial credit which is the purchasing power. These two types of credit must be kept equal and to do that is the duty of the government. Prices should be regulated in accordance with the country's production over a given period as compared with its consumption calculated from statistics taken from industry itself. As I see it, eastern and western Canada both have their troubles, and there must be fair play as regards both parts of Canada if we are to develop a true spirit of harmony. Looking upon the field of battle, we see some who are willing to cut debt and recover millions by taxation, while others are willing to issue millions and repudiate our debt by inflation. The battle-cry of all parties in the west has been monetary reform. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is reported by the newspapers as having said recently in Edmonton that we are fighting for this reform. He said that changed conditions must bring this about.

We must set our minds and wills toward a more generous and more just distribution of the means of life. This will not be secured by violence or by any war of classes which would in the long run be as shameful and as futile as a war of nations. Thus far no proposals have been made as to how this might be done, but it has been intimated on several occasions that that is the purpose of this particular group in the house. We have considered this question, and we believe that the purpose of industry is to produce goods for the sustenance and enjoyment of man. The purpose of science and machinery is to produce those goods in abundance and to save labour, and the purpose of money is to enable those goods to be distributed.

We have three proposals to offer: First, that the basis of the money system should be the country's productive capacity; second, that our financial wealth should be based on real wealth and, third, that prices should be regulated in accordance with the country's production over a given period as compared with its consumption calculated from statistics taken from industry itself. In a democracy the national welfare can rise no higher than its source, and that source is the general enlightenment of the people. As the people become enlightened, so do they demand better living conditions.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in connection with the amendment which was moved on March 8 to the motion to go into supply. The debate on this amendment was continued on March 14 and again on March 22, when the whole day was taken up. The afternoon and evening of March 29 was taken up in this discussion, and we are considering it again to-day. If it continues long enough it will reach its right place on April Fool's day next Friday.

I want to say to the hon. gentleman to my left, whom I highly regard, that I sympathize with the people of the prairie provinces. They are suffering many ills and hardships, but ills are one thing and remedies are another. If the patent medicines and quack cures and remedies proposed are what this country needs, then we had the same kind of patent medicines and palliatives in the days of the younger Pitt, of Burke and all the rest of them. All this reminds me of the principle underlying the League of Nations, which the hon. gentlemen support so much. There would seem to be relatively the same principle. If the problems of peace or war, of trade or commerce, of migration and immigration could be solved by formulas, all these problems would have been solved three or four hundred years ago. The same troubles were facing the world in the days of our Lord. He went into the temple and overthrew the tables of the money changers, and said unto them: My house shall be called the house of prayer; but ye have made it a den of thieves.

The hon. gentlemen to my left probably believe conscientiously that their cure is the right cure. They are entitled to their opinions. They have asked many times that some relief be granted to the people of the prairies; they plead so often and long for some lost cause. But let me call to their attention the fact that they have forgotten entirely the plight of the suburban worker. The greatest enemy of the prairie provinces is the doctrine of free trade. The real enemies of the prairies are not east of the great lakes, they are to be found in the west. The elevator combines and the grain combines have fleeced the farmers of the west out of their rightful high prices for their crops. We have had many private members' motions introduced at this session. The government has a total of 175 or 176 supporters in this parliament and we have heard many arguments between the free traders, the protectionists and the moderate protectionists in the government ranks. As the late Hon. J. Israel Tarte said, platforms were made to get in on and not to stand on. The policies of the hon. gentlemen to my left were made to get in on but not to stand on. But the people of the prairie provinces themselves are sick and tired of this battle cry of social credit which is not adapted to a country like Canada. This matter was raised the other day in the British house and Captain FitzRoy, the speaker, was called upon to give a ruling when reference was made to "social humbug." They questioned whether under the rules of the house that phrase was in order, but it was employed with reference not to an individual but to a policy.

Now in this "mother of parliaments" in Ottawa what have we this session? This is the forty-fifth day of the session. What have we done? All we have done is talk. The other day some hon. members had a good deal to say about foreign affairs. I have no quarrel with my hon. friends on the left who proposed and support this motion. I know them all, and I like them. I sympathize with what they say as to the failure of this country to solve the great question of distribution, the function of money and the basis of credit. I sympathize with the worker and the toiler, not only the agriculturist but the industrial worker. It is intolerable that in a land of milk and honey like Canada, with its vast resources, he should be in his present condition. So what I have to say is directed not in any spirit of criticism against hon. members on the left, but rather against some of their policies. As I have said, I respect their views and I recognize that they have given a great deal of attention to their duties here. But I cannot see where the policy they propose will solve the economic or social problems of this country. Those problems are not going to be solved by majorities in parliament or by parliamentary repartee; they cannot be solved by quack remedies which were proven two hundred years ago to be wrong. They call for broad national service and sacrifice on the same principles and basis as the sacrifices which were made during the war, and for a remedy as drastic as conscription was when then applied. So true this is that some people in this country, in face of the railway problem, unemployment difficulties, the situation of the municipalities, the way the industrial workers are treated in Canada, and the failure of parliament to act, begin to long for a dictator to arise in this country and solve our problems on a practical basis, and give quicker and saner relief.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Order!

Mr. CHURCH: These quack remedies, as I call them, of hon. gentlemen here—for that is all they are—cannot cure the present industrial and social problems of the country. This is a propaganda session. Up to the present time this government has done little or nothing to solve our difficulties. Take for example the motion of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross), of protection versus free trade, which was brought forward as a cure for the ills of the west. What was his attitude towards the people down east in Ontario and Quebec, the industrial provinces that are paying pretty nearly all that the Minister of National Revenue is going to collect until the end of April?

The last session was almost entirely a Saskatchewan session. Three members of the cabinet—the Prime Minister, (Mr. Mackenzie King), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) come from or used to represent that province. The farmer out there can deal with a municipality for his seed and feed and gasoline and all that, but when it comes to the poor industrial worker, who represents fifty-one per cent of the people of our province, they who also are suffering from drought, an economic drought, they are put out of their houses and homes, they are suffering from the drought of unemployment, but they get no protection from this parliament. Their mayors won't even be heard and must go to the provinces. Yet here we find people who are elected from the prairie provinces criticizing the economic system of the country.

Canada will have protection as long as it is a country. I have seen movements of this kind before in Ontario. I saw them rise in the province of Ontario in the days of the Patrons of Industry and the Drury days. Some of the followers of that creed were not farmers at all. They were represented in a later government, the Drury government, and they proposed some palliative or rather some quack remedy for curing the difficulties of the times. What did Mr. Drury say when he came to meet the present Prime Minister of this country? He presented a brief on behalf of the Canadian Council of Agriculture. The gentlemen to my left are in a sense his successors. What was the attitude of this 1923 council of agriculture? They denounced the industrialists and the industrial workers, the men who are paying in Ontario and Quebec eighty per cent of the cash taxes, the men who get little or no federal aid, but whose income tax is used to pay for the drought in Saskatchewan and to help carry the bankrupt provinces. Mr. Drury on behalf of the Farmers' government, the predecessors of the group to my left, the successors of the haycock Patrons of Industry movement, and speaking on behalf of the council of agriculture, denounced the industrialism of Ontario and Quebec. He said they were a lot of robbers, and declared that the farmers of the west had been plundered for many years by protection. The result was that no industrialists and no financial man would invest at that time a cent in industry in Ontario and Quebec, owing to the uncertainty as regards the tariff and the attitude of Drury and his supporters.

What have we in the prairie provinces? A free trade party. The predecessors of the group to my left, the C.C.F., who were in the house when I was first elected to parliament, were men with a great deal of ability; they comprised, I believe, what was called the Progressive group. One tends to forget these names, they are like the titles of the ministers, who are called by so many high sounding names,—for instance the minister of "natural resources," I think one is called now: when the free traders get through with Canada you will have to give that minister a new name. The Progressives were among those who supported free trade. They said our grain trade was a north and south industry instead of an east and west and overseas industry, going to the markets of the world. They wanted reciprocity and lower tariffs and free agricultural implements. All this erroneous talk of social credit has done much to ruin the farmers of the prairie provinces, but we hear it again during this session—this cure for all of Canada's ills, this propaganda session; for that is all that it is.

The other day I compared this parliament with the mock parliaments of Varsity and McGill, but in those universities they deal with more practical problems. I notice that some of the ministers sitting opposite have been addressing those students. You will hear far more practical speeches in those parliaments than you do listening to these social cures in this mock parliament, for that is what it is.

Mr. DUNNING: Let the hon. member speak for himself.

Mr. CHURCH: You are wasting your own time and everybody's time and you are not going to cure anything in Canada by this motion. The leader of the social credit group in Alberta used to be in the bible class game, which is a clean game. The game we are in now is at times a pretty dirty game. I used to be in the bible class game myself, although, unlike the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) I got out of the Sunday school work when I entered politics.

Yesterday my right hon. leader made a speech which is well worth the attention of every man, woman and child in this country. I am glad that he put that speech on Hansard. I lost pretty nearly all the money I had in 1930 through not taking his advice; had I seen the crisis coming I should have been on easy street to-day. His views to-day are, I believe, those of the business men of this country. The conduct of business should be left to those who understand it, the men who are in business, and there should be as little state regulation as possible. I believe that the present Minister of Finance does understand business. In my opinion we should drop all these quack beliefs and quack remedies and political patent medicines for our business and social ills and consider the good of all the provinces. Canada will continue to be a protectionist country. The right application of the doctrine of protection will solve the problems of all the provinces from Vancouver to Halifax.

Let me say to hon. members from Alberta that I recall, the second session I was in the house, pleading the cause of the coal mining industry in that province. The miners in Nova Scotia and Alberta and elsewhere I thought needed a national fuel policy, so that all the coal we used should be bought under the British flag. I advocated a measure of protection for coal and steel and iron. You, Mr. Speaker, were in the house and supported it. I favoured a system of bonuses and subventions and subsidies in respect of coal and steel and iron, all along the line; grain also in Canada. The doctrine of protection should, I said, be adopted. What was the result of that policy? I proposed a committee be appointed. Hon. gentlemen opposite opposed it. The late Sir Henry Thornton said that I was proposing a lunch-counter system of freight rates for the people of this country. I told him it was better to have a lunch-counter system—I do not know whether Sir Henry ever dined at a lunch-counter—to save these people on the prairies and in the maritimes by increasing their sales of grain and coal, than to send $52,000,000 to the United States to pay wages and the dividends of the Pennsylvania coal barons. Under that policy the coal industry in the maritimes has been converted to a prosperous industry and last year sent three million tons of coal to the head of the lakes, economically.

The day to day conduct of business should be taken out of the hands of commissions and professors and highbrows and people of that sort and given back to the business men. What is wrong with the prairies? It is not the manufacturers east of the great lakes that destroyed the west but the people themselves in the prairies, through their grain combines, their elevator combines, their transportation combines and all the combines which the Conservative party disclosed in the mass buying commission. If ever a political party in Canada worked for the toilers and the farmers of Canada it was the Conservative party, when my right hon. leader appointed that commission and appointed the mass buying committee. The commission revealed a state of affairs for toilers, farmers and industrial workers that made every Canadian hang his head in shame. It was discovered that the toiler, the poor farmer and the poor industrialist were the forgotten men.

Let me say to hon. gentlemen to my left that they are not the whole people of Canada. There are sixteen or seventeen members in the Social Credit party out of a membership of 245, but they prevent this house from getting into supply and making provision for the needs of our cities and towns, for our industrial workers. If you ask me, it is not altogether a sporting gesture on the part of hon. gentlemen to my left—and I know that many of them are good sports—to take up several days when other toilers cannot get their case before parliament.

The government has under consideration just now a measure which in my opinion will seriously jeopardize the prosperity of Canada. The greatest measure of prosperity we have ever had came from the empire trade agreements of 1932. They helped not only eastern Canada but the prairies as well. Mr. Chamberlain the other day told a Conservative convention in Birmingham that as a result of the British trade agreements trade had increased for the nine provinces of Canada and for the other dominions forty-two per cent, and that Britain's trade to the dominions went up 47 per cent. My leader's policy in that connection has been twice blessed; not only has trade increased with the mother country, but, as Mr. Chamberlain said in his last speech as chancellor of the exchequer, the policy of preferential trade between the dominions and the mother country has had another aspect: it has increased the flow of foreign trade between Britain and other lands.

I am sorry that the leader of the Social Credit party who introduced this motion saw fit to have this debate last so long. Their leader asked the house and members to discuss it and take part in this debate, but now that so many members have spoken I think it is well for someone to put before the house the condition of the industrial workers of Canada. I should like to take some hon. gentlemen from Alberta to my riding, to the district represented by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey), and other industrial centres in Ontario. The hon. member for Greenwood could tell them something about the Christmas funds of the newspapers—Christmas cheer for the toilers out of work. Let them visit the homes of some of these industrial toilers and other people and see the conditions. Many of them have been sold under the hammer, men who have had employment have been driven to the wall, because the time of parliament is taken up discussing Saskatchewan.

What is the government's policy for the amelioration of the condition of the industrial workers? I do not see the Minister of Labour (Mr Rogers) in his place to-day, but I can tell him the municipalities from coast to coast are anxious to know what the government proposes to do about the present tax structure. Where are we drifting? The mayor of Belleville, in the Globe yesterday, referring to this parliament, used rather strong language; he said that we did nothing but smoke cigars. I do not smoke cigars myself, but the impression exists nevertheless that, the mayor of Belleville said, we simply sit around committee rooms and appoint a minister to apply chloroform to delegations that come here seeking assistance for the workers. The municipalities are as much entitled to have their case presented here at length as my hon friends are to discuss abstract questions. We were called obstructionists because we spoke for half a day on relief, but my hon friends have been discussing the monetary question for several days now. And so far as the government are concerned, they seem to be pinning their faith to the proposed United States trade agreement which they are now contemplating. They are all for free trade when elections are on, and they have a different policy for every province; but when they come here they simply move the tariff up or down five or ten per cent.

In my opinion social credit has been a failure where tested. It is not adapted to our circumstances at the present time, and it could not be carried out. My hon. friends have been criticizing the financial and banking policy of the country and they have spent a good deal of time discussing the functions of money and the basis of credit; it started before confederation. My leader was absolutely right with reference to the Bank of Canada, and the present government will find that out to their sorrow. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) put a number of questions to the leader of the opposition. He is not here now; probably he has gone out to fire a few more officials.

The United States treaty which the government proposes to put through in the two or three weeks during the adjournment will not accomplish what they expect. When we came here at the opening of the session we saw forty-seven pages of items which the United States government suggested we should discuss with respect to further reciprocity with Canada, as reported in the local press on January 8. The people of the United States were asked to write to the trade department at Washington, stating their views with respect to all those items and after March 15 a public hearing was to be held. What will this government do? Will they consider adopting the same method and procedure here in order to give the business men of Canada an opportunity of being heard in the same way by letter and at a public hearing later, such as the hearing that took place in the United States on March 14, before any proposed agreement is consummated? Will the government consider consulting the Canadian industrialists and agriculturists regarding the effect of the proposed agreement on the Ottawa agreements? In England this course is being followed. Mr. Chamberlain has invited the people of England to write and tell him their views with respect to the certain matters of importance to them. Long before the mover of this amendment came to the house I pleaded for the workers of this country. Back in 1936 I contrasted the precepts of Christianity with the way in which our industrial workers are used, contrasting our professions with the ruthless competition, the cruelty and vice of present day business and industry. I said that here personality counts as nothing; the dollar is all supreme; modern life is all machine life, soulless, a life of standardization, high speed production, a highly efficient organization for the making of profit. Everything is done in the mass, and life is made uniform, monotonous and artificial. Dividends are the chief objective; to get dividends human beings are sacrificed. Wages are shockingly low, often below the level of mere subsistence, so that people are forced into immoral and criminal ways of life to eke out a precarious livelihood. The maximum is exacted in hours of work in return for the minimum in wages. Senior employees, whose lifeblood has been drawn from them by long years of faithful service, are in many cases cast out without retiring allowance to make room for younger and cheaper people. It matters not what suffering is entailed for human beings so long as the stockholders are paid their dividends. This amazing selfishness and shortsightedness of the modern industrial system is creating a progressively lower standard of living and a vicious struggle-for-existence philosophy on the part of the people, increasing the serious social problems which must find their tragic solution in either war or revolution. In the face of modern methods of competitive living, the royal law of love, "Bear ye one another's burdens and so fulfil the law of Christ," is a hollow mockery in Canada, a presumably Christian country. This is the contradiction of modern life; a truly wonderful appreciation of the value of the single soul in some quarters but an absolute denial of any such value in others.

Those words are absolutely true to-day of the position and condition of the industrial workers in the industrial provinces.

Trades unionism in Canada was given a great stimulus by Sir John A. Macdonald's national policy tariff of 1878, which with some variations has been continued by all parties to this day. This policy was, our own markets for our own products, our own work for our own workmen. That has been practically the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. as well as of this party from 1878 to date. The Conservative party was the author of that policy and has been consistent all these years. The trades union movement is a protectionist movement, and labour has been the back-bone of Conservative strength in Canada.

It is time that trades unionists should form a large and valuable part in the Conservative party. Members of trades unions have a stake in the country and in the welfare of Canada's industries, and standards of living and of craftsmanship to preserve for themselves. The real old-time trades unionist has never been much given to socialism either in England or in Canada. Socialism as tested in Canada has been a failure. It is built up on economic inaccuracy, errors in psychology, and demagoguery. Canada's socialists have been so preoccupied with foreign affairs, and some of them with their own advancement—professors I refer to—that they have had no time to help solve Canada's domestic problems. I believe that a right application of the doctrine of protection brought up to date will solve all the economic ills of the country. Agriculture has been traditionally associated with the Conservative party. The socialist movement in Canada has been largely directed by political adventurers and ill advised professors and intellectuals of little vision.

The Conservative party should make a union with the real trades unionists who, ever since 1878, have been Conservatives, and give them some support. The real trades unionist in Canada has but one object, to preserve and safeguard his own industry and advance the real standards of life of the men of his union. If communism in Canada is to be defeated, it will be by the Conservative party offering to organized labour in Canada something better than the mover of this amendment has to offer, and something better than a decaying international minded socialist party is offering, which has no real plan to solve the social and industrial problems of to-day. We shall have to get such a plank in our platform. Our party, since Macdonald's day, has commanded a large majority of the trades unionist votes.

At the time of the general strike in England Mr. Baldwin and Mr. Neville Chamberlain saved England from revolution by offering labour something of an alliance with the real trades unionists over there. We should do the same. We shall have to make some changes in policy to secure their support. We must concentrate on home building and owning and on domestic and social questions, preventing the exploitation of labour by big manipulating financial interests. We must bring our party back to the masses, who have always been its refuge and strength. We have always been the friend of industry, of agriculture and of municipalities. We must cease having anything to do with the big financial interests if we are to hold the great body of the working classes and those whom Disraeli called the suffering millions, and get back to government of the people, by the people, for the people.

We have been hearing propaganda until I am tired. It started on the government benches, between the free traders and others, and now it has spread to our colleagues on the left. I am sorry that so much time has been wasted. I think if the hon. member who moved this amendment would only devote a little more attention to the domestic problems of his own province it would be more useful. Let me direct the attention of the hon. member and his group to the oil industry; what have they done in the forty-five days we have been here to save the farmers on the prairie from the oil combine? Mexico has seized the Canadian and British plants. Canadians are dependent on imports of gasoline, and oil is imported, while in the Turner valley the output is limited to forty per cent, and yet the farmers on the prairies are crying out for oil. What are my hon. friend and his followers doing in the house? In the sessions of 1922 and 1923 I proposed that the dominion government should take over the Turner valley oil operations and by pipe line bring the benefit to the farmers of the west and the east. If it was done in the east with falling water and electricity, why can it not be done with gasoline? Hon. members from Alberta would be better employed in drawing the attention of the house to the forty per cent limit on the oil industry in Alberta, while Canada is importing oil through trusts and combines which have been before the tariff board and many commissions.

Our banking system may not be perfect, but I think it is true that for every dollar the prairie people have put in the banks they have taken out three or four. I wish that opportunity were extended to the industrial workers, that you put in a dollar and borrow four or five. I would like to get some of these social credit cheques to pay some of my debts. At one time I did not have any debts, but I have a few now. I should like to get some of their scrip; I shall buy it at five dollars a hundred, but I do not know whether I could get rid of it at that. Social credit has been a failure in England. These quack remedies have been held out since the days of our Lord and we shall always have them. If we are not going to be a useful parliament, let us go back home and have a dictator. If I sit here for another forty-five days like this, I shall vote for a dictator in the next election.

I wish the leader of our party were in charge of the affairs of the country. Hon. members opposite are simply adopting all his economic remedies. He is the head of this party, and long may he so continue. I hope he will reconsider his decision to retire. We do not want any imports from the duPont dynasty over our party. We have a leader whom we trust, the truest, ablest, most faithful and most courageous we ever had or the country ever had. While he may not now be the Prime Minister of Canada de jure, he is the de facto leader of this house and so head of the government, because they are adopting all his work and taking credit for his progressive measures. He saved Canada by his 1932 trade treaty with Great Britain, and the grain growing industry by hedging the grain and calling up the whole strength of the country. The Ottawa agreements have stood, and they were brought in by my right hon. leader, a man who has some interest in the working people, the first leader of a party since confederation to do anything in the matter of regulating trade and commerce and appointing a mass buying committee. One or two hon. members opposite are now laughing. Their party shunted the social legislation into the law courts, but they swallowed the trade policy of my right hon. leader holus-bolus. In their platform of 1919 they included unemployment insurance, but now they have shunted off all these questions to a commission, and rely on the law courts to save them. Why does not the mover of this amendment go to the Rowell royal commission, to which the municipalities are sent?

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) is one of the twentieth century Liberals, if you please; yet he refuses to receive the mayor and board of control of the city of Montreal. That is the new kind of Liberalism we have in this country; they refuse to receive the representatives of the people in the industrial provinces of Ontario and Quebec, which are paying eighty per cent of the cash taxes collected by the dominion, while the poor toiler has his property taken away and auctioned off. Day after day we sit here and listen to the talk about Saskatchewan, but we cannot get the same treatment in the industrial provinces. This year we are spending $36,000,000 in the prairie provinces, and last year it was $60,000,000. Who is going to pay for it all?

My hon. friends from Halifax were talking the other day about this question of aid to the municipalities, and I was glad to see them taking an interest in it; some of my colleagues to my right urged the same thing. Are we, representing the people of the industrial provinces of Canada, to sit here day after day doing nothing while, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer), a former mayor of Vancouver, said, many of these municipalities are bankrupt because this parliament has made a raid and taken away their revenues? The municipalities had the income tax from the time of confederation down to 1918. Then these greedy provinces came along and a second levy was made after a federal raid, so the municipalities had to lose the income tax and other revenues. If hon. gentlemen to my left want to do something practical, let them solve the railway problem, unemployment, restore private property and distribution. We had three railways when they were not wanted forced upon the industrial workers of Canada.

I did not intend to speak at this length, because I wanted to see a vote taken to-day. If that is not possible, let us talk until Friday and have the vote taken on April Fool's day. Then the people will know how much they can depend on the quack remedies and the patent medicines of these new Napoleons who have come out of the west. They think they can grab a hat and pull a social remedy rabbit out of it; that you can become a millionaire in a minute and pay your grocery bills, doctors' bills and so on by turning on the printing presses. They think it is a game. I went to the hockey game the other night for seventy-five cents, to see the Minister of Justice's (Quebec) team play. Social credit money is not acceptable in business or to pay to get in to see a game. They want a certified bill of the government of Canada. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) knows that, because I see him at these rugby and hockey games also. I do not see him handing any social credit scrip over the counter; he knows they would not take it in hockey or rugby games. Mind you, the banks have not done all they could. They are too hard on the retail man, and lending is not what it should be. The banking system has made many mistakes, but they are in the regulations, not in the general basic banking principle, and in not affording safer and much easier credit to farmers and others. The branch manager is guided by the city manager and the head office, and can hardly lend a dollar without consulting the head office inspector. That is a mistake.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. CHURCH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am glad I do not have to speak until April Fool's day, anyway.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I believe there is a general desire for a vote this afternoon, and I shall not take up so much time as to prevent the attainment of that desirable objective.

The debate on the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), the leader of the social credit group, has now occupied the house on a number of occasions. I agree with the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hayhurst) that it has produced a vast amount of information which is on record in Hansard. Of how much use that will be to the general public of Canada in acquiring an understanding of monetary problems is, of course, a matter of opinion, especially as Hansard contains not only information but also misinformation. As to who has been responsible for furnishing the one or guilty of perpetrating the other, that again is a matter of opinion, but I believe such debates do have value, particularly, as on this occasion, when the social credit group have had an opportunity in a full dress debate of placing before the house their suggested remedies for the conditions which their amendment sets out. One might disagree as to the accuracy of their statement of conditions. Many members of the house of course disagree with their proposed remedy, and many members have objected that their remedy has not been set forth in any understandable manner. At all events my hon. friends in the corner will admit, I think, that on the occasion of this debate they had ample opportunity to develop any concrete proposals which they had in mind for the purpose of dealing with the present economic situation in this country.

I think, too, after sitting in the house for three sessions, this being the third session during which the social credit theory has been represented by members in this chamber, they will agree with me that the debate now concluding has revealed that so far they have not succeeded, as far as I know, in convincing a single member other than those belonging to their own immediate group of the efficacy of the remedy which they propose for all Canada's economic ills. That being the case, I desire in all sincerity to offer to my hon. friends in the corner, the social credit group, what I believe to be a constructive suggestion. It is a suggestion based upon their own beliefs as to what the banking system of this country can do to remedy the economic conditions of which they complain.

The leader of the social credit group, when asked during his speech as to what he proposed to do, said that he would call in the chartered banks and give them orders to abolish poverty, and that, if they said they did not know how, he would supply them with experts. I am taking that as the text for the suggestion I am about to offer. My suggestion is that inasmuch as the social credit movement boasts considerable strength in one province of the dominion, and from that point of view at least, the provincial point of view, is a movement of major dimensions, those who believe that the banking system can be employed to put into effect the social credit theory and that the banking system has unlimited privileges such as have been outlined by my hon. friends, have within the four corners of the Canadian Bank Act the opportunity of their lives. All they have to do is, of themselves, to form one of these institutions which we call a Canadian chartered bank. The procedure is all set out in the law. True, they will have to come to this parliament for a charter, and I shall tell them here and now that if the social crediters of Alberta comply with that statute, with which all other Canadian chartered banks have had to comply and with which they must comply to-day, I for one shall be pleased to do all I can to facilitate the passage through this house of a bill granting a charter to a social credit chartered bank. In that way my hon. friends would have, under their own control, all of the privileges, and it is my duty to point out also that they would have all the responsibilities of a Canadian chartered bank. If, therefore, they wish to operate through the medium of what has been described loosely as fountain pen money, and through all of the other privileges which it is alleged the chartered banks have, and if it is true, as the hon. member for Lethbridge has said, that one could call in the bankers and tell them to abolish poverty, then my hon. friends would be in a position to call in their own bank, controlled by themselves.

There is nothing in the world to prevent that. I am serious in making that suggestion. Seeing that my hon. friends in the corner have not succeeded in making converts in this house, is it well to adopt an attitude of disruption of the whole of the rest of Canada, which quite apparently does not desire to adopt the remedy proposed, and does not believe in it? Is it not better, within that area in which the belief in the doctrine is strongest, to create the piece of machinery which the parliament of Canada has provided may be created? Parliament has provided the means of creating that piece of machinery which my hon. friends say is the piece of machinery of which they require control in order to put their theories into effect. If they are right, think of the glory which will come. Think of the great advantage which will come to the people of Canada! If my hon. friends prove to be right in all that they advocate, and if it is possible to do through the medium of a chartered bank what they claim it is possible to do, they will reap great glory all down through history for having shown the way not only to the rest of Canada but, I venture to say, to the rest of the civilized world; that is, if what they claim can be accomplished by the application of their theories turns out in practice to be a fact.

I suggest that in all seriousness, and I shall do the best I can to facilitate the formation of such an institution, within the four corners of this Canadian bank act, giving to my hon. friends and those who believe with them the exact privileges—all of them—which any and all of the chartered banks now enjoy, and placing upon them also all of the responsibilities which chartered banks must carry. I suggest that in all seriousness—not lightly—and I believe it to be a constructive suggestion, involving the possibility of a large scale experiment in that part of Canada in which the social credit doctrines have the strongest degree of support, and the possibility of carrying out the experiment in a manner which will not be injurious to the rest of Canada.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Is the minister dealing with a provincial or federal matter? Does he suggest that we, as a group, should open a bank in Alberta?

Mr. DUNNING: I shall make it plainer.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Is it a provincial matter?

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will take his seat, I shall answer. Any group of citizens in Canada may come together for the purposes outlined in the bank act of Canada. I am suggesting to my hon. friends that they are a group of citizens in Canada; that those in Alberta who adhere to their theories are citizens of Canada, and that as citizens of Canada believing in the social credit doctrine they can see to it that only those who believe in that doctrine may have any control or say in the chartered bank they may form.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I do not yet grasp the minister's suggestion. Is it that the social credit members sitting in the house should open a bank in Alberta?

Mr. BENNETT: No, get a charter.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not think I need go farther into the matter.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, while hon. members to my left are considering the proposition placed before them by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) I should like to refer to one point made by the Minister of Finance and also by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) which I think should not be permitted to pass without criticism. I speak respecting the establishment of an exchange fund, the purposes for which it was established, and the operation of the fund since the time it was established.

Chapter 60 of the acts of 1935 is an Act Respecting the Establishment of an Exchange

Fund. The preamble of the act states clearly the purpose of the enactment:

Whereas, in view of the uncertainties of the international situation as to currencies and foreign exchange values, it is desirable that a fund should be constituted which will be available as occasion may arise to aid in the control and protection of the external value of the Canadian monetary unit.

That is clearly the purpose of the whole act. Section 6 recites:

6. (1) For the purpose of endeavouring to control the external value of the Canadian monetary unit or of checking undue fluctuations in its exchange value the minister may directly or through such agencies as he may designate cause any balances in the special account to be invested in

(a) gold;

(b) foreign exchange as defined in section twenty-six, subsection two (b) of the Bank of Canada Act; and

(c) balances with any bank in London or New York designated by the Minister of Finance.

(2) Gold or other investments purchased under the provisions of the preceding subsection may be resold on instructions from the minister.

(3) This section shall not come into force until a date to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council, published in the Canada Gazette.

Therefore the carrying into effect of the whole purpose of the act depends upon the bringing into force of section 6, by order in council published in the Canada Gazette. Both ministers admit that no such order in council has ever been passed or published.

Mr. DUNNING: Did I understand the hon. member to say that no portion of that act is in force?

Mr. CAHAN: I am simply saying that the carrying out of the purpose of the act depends upon the bringing of section 6 into force. I think there can be no doubt about it. If the minister wishes to discuss the question I am willing to discuss it here, or otherwise, as he may see fit. I had preferred to discuss it otherwise, but the hon. member's temper was so short when I spoke to him yesterday after the address of the Minister of National Revenue that I did not reply at once—

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry if I conveyed that impression.

Mr. CAHAN: I did not reply at once, because I thought my own temper, following his, might carry me too far.

Mr. DUNNING: If I lost my temper I apologize to my hon. friend.

Mr. CAHAN: I am dealing with the purpose of the act and my statement is that the real purpose of the act can be carried into effect only by bringing section 6 into force by proclamation.

The first report of the Bank of Canada, after chapter 60 of the statutes of 1935 became effective, contains paragraphs pertinent to the issue under consideration. I quote:

The largest item on the asset side of our balance sheet is gold, valued at $180,509,342. When we commenced operations we acquired gold to the value of $106,584,355, of which $69,455,439 came from the dominion government and $37,128,916 from the chartered banks. Settlement for this gold was effected on the basis of the statutory value of $20.67 an ounce. Subsequently, the Exchange Fund Act—

That is the act to which I have referred and from which I have read one or two sections.

—required us to value the gold at the current market price. The resultant profit of about $73,500,000 did not accrue to the Bank of Canada. Section 30 of the Bank of Canada Act had provided that any profits on gold transferred to the bank would pertain to the dominion government,—

I shall not follow that any further. The report continues:

The balance of the profit, namely, $63,006,382, was credited to the exchange fund of the dominion government, and future profits or losses on gold held by us will be credited or debited to that account.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the law.

Mr. CAHAN: The special account was established with the Bank of Canada and a credit of $63,006,382 was created in the Bank of Canada prior to December 31, 1935. The Exchange Fund Act came into force on July 5, 1935, and the report I have been reading from is the first annual report of the Bank of Canada, and the first report published after the coming into force of the act.

My first comment is this. That sum of $63,006,382 was credited by the bank in special account to the exchange fund of the Dominion of Canada. It is to be remarked that no such credit appears in any return of the Bank of Canada that has been published from year to year.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course not.

Mr. CAHAN: The minister says, "of course not," but if money is placed to the credit of a fund in an account with a bank it immediately becomes a liability of the bank. The obvious alternative is that instead of the bank crediting this $63,006,382 to a particular fund for the benefit or in the right of the Dominion of Canada, it must be assumed that not appearing in the accounts, the Bank of Canada acts as a depositary or trust company for the purpose of carrying that fund and operating it in accordance with the express provisions of the law. I repeat that the fund does not appear as a liability of the Bank of Canada in any return published so far.

Mr. BENNETT: Or as a deposit.

Mr. CAHAN: Therefore, it is not an ordinary deposit in the bank. Secondly, I want to point out that the full purpose and intent of the act, as recited in the preamble, can only be carried into effect when section 6 and its various subsections have been given the force and effect of law by proclamation and publication in the Canada Gazette. That has not been done. Section 7 reads:

> The minister may from time to time cause any portion of the balances in the special account to be employed by the Bank of Canada in the purchase of securities of or guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada.

That is the only power.

Mr. DUNNING: Read on.

Mr. CAHAN: I shall read it all:

> In the exercise of the powers conferred by this section the minister is authorized to make such arrangements as in his opinion will conduce to the immediate availability of the funds employed as aforesaid. The proceeds of all sales of investments made under the authority of this act,—

That is the first part of section 7 provides the types of securities.

> —and all earnings and interest accruing thereon, shall be paid into the special account and shall be available for the purposes of the account.

That is for the purpose which I have mentioned already. The purpose of this act is the establishment of an exchange fund which will be "available as occasion may arise to aid in the control and protection of the external value of the Canadian monetary unit." I admit that a fund having been created in the manner provided for by this statute and there being a profit available of $63,006,382 in a special account with the Bank of Canada, that fund may be invested in the securities mentioned, from time to time, as the minister may authorize. I wish to add to that that in respect of section 7 the minister does not act in his own personal capacity, but as the Minister of Finance of Canada. His dealings under the authority of that section are dealings for which he is responsible, beyond doubt, to the parliament of Canada.

Both the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue proceeded to assert that no disclosure should be made, with regard to that fund, to parliament or to the public. In support of that extraordinary contention, if I remember correctly, the Minister of National Revenue read section 10, which reads as follows:

> (1) No person employed in the service of His Majesty or of the Bank of Canada shall communicate or allow to be communicated to any person not legally entitled thereto under the provisions of this act or by direction of the minister, any information with respect to the operation of the said special account, or allow any such person to inspect or have access to any written statement with respect to the said account.

Then there is a penalty provided for the violation of that provision. I submit with confidence that that provision with regard to those employed in the service of His Majesty or of the Bank of Canada does not include the minister who has authority, who has to deal with that fund and who is responsible to the parliament of Canada. That is just the ordinary and proper provision that no official or employee of the bank shall disclose information to the public with regard to the bank's transactions. But section 8 provides also that the minister may at any time he thinks it expedient to do so cause the said special account to be wound up forthwith. And then there is this provision:

> And the said account shall in any event be wound up not later than six months after the date on which parliament resolves that the account is no longer required for the purpose for which it was established.

Therefore parliament is entitled to certain information in order that it may determine in its wisdom whether that special account is required for the purposes for which it is established. It was such information to which I referred, not dealing with the items of particular transactions in respect to the account, but general information with regard to the account, how it had been employed—dealing generally—the investments made out of the account—dealing generally—so that parliament might be informed as to the general nature of the operations carried on.

Furthermore, I stated to the minister personally, and I will state it here to this house, that from the partial accounts which have been published there is a general belief in commercial and banking circles in this country that that $63,000,000 has been at least partly employed for other purposes than those mentioned in section 7 of the act.

Mr. DUNNING: I can give an absolute and unqualified denial to that, now, beyond the shadow of a doubt.

Mr. CAHAN: That is, that the $63,000,000 has not entered into any purchase of gold, any purchase of foreign exchange as defined in section 6, subsection 1 of the Exchange Fund Act, and has not been invested in any balances with any bank in London or New York designated by the Minister of Finance? Does the emphatic reply cover all those items?

Mr. DUNNING: I hesitate to get into a legal cross-examination. Subject to my hon. friend—

Mr. CAHAN: We are not dealing with legalities or legal cross-examination.

Mr. DUNNING: I can say that section 7 specifically sets out how that fund may be invested.

Mr. ILSLEY: Section 6.

Mr. DUNNING: Section 6 is not in force. It is section 7. I can say positively it has been invested in absolute accordance with section 7.

Mr. CAHAN: And not otherwise?

Mr. DUNNING: And not otherwise.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, there is some relief in having—

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, Mr. Speaker, I am merely answering rumours which come from banks which are evidently critical, for some unknown reason, of the central bank.

Mr. CAHAN: They have a perfect right to—

Mr. DUNNING: —start rumours?

Mr. CAHAN: No, not start rumours, but they have a perfect right to examine the accounts of the central bank, as every member of this parliament and every individual citizen throughout the country has the right to examine those accounts,—

Mr. DUNNING: Surely.

Mr. CAHAN: —to see what information is given. I thank the hon. gentleman for that plain statement. Now, if the fund called the central exchange fund was established by the statute of July 5, 1935, for the purpose of aiding in the control and protection of the external value of the Canadian monetary unit, and if during over two years and a half the fund has not been used for that purpose, the main object of the act has been thwarted, because the government have not brought section 6 into force.

Mr. DUNNING: Is "thwarted" a good word?

Mr. CAHAN: It is thwarted, because the intention of parliament has not been carried into effect. The incidental uses for certain other purposes were not the main object—in fact, so far as stated in the act, the principal object for which the act was enacted has not been effected. I say, if that has continued during two years and a half, it is a perfectly proper consideration for parliament as to whether the said account, which has not been employed for the purpose designated by the act, and for which purpose apparently there is no present intention of employing it, should now be wound up.

Mr. DUNNING: It is. Of course it is a proper subject for consideration.

Mr. CAHAN: Therefore the provisons of the act and the manner in which these provisions have been carried out are proper subjects for discussion in this parliament, and therefore the main object, as to the employment of the sixty-three odd million dollars, is a proper subject of inquiry in this parliament, and this parliament has the right to such general information as is necessary for parliament and its members to form a definite opinion with regard to the winding up of that fund. That is what I have to say. Therefore section 10 which was quoted by the Minister of National Revenue has no application to the request that such general information should be furnished parliament. Furthermore, I think the minister will have to assent that, where he is given the direction and control of any fund which is the property of the government of Canada, parliament has a perfect right to such general information.

Mr. DUNNING: What is "general information"?

Mr. CAHAN: First, we have a right to know the profits of that fund from year to year.

Mr. DUNNING: I think so, yes.

Mr. CAHAN: Since 1935.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: Secondly, we have the right to know whether the investments of that fund have been restricted absolutely, as the minister now says, to "the purchase of securities of or guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada."

Mr. DUNNING: Read on.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, that is all that is said.

Mr. DUNNING: Read the whole of section 7. It is not my language. That is the language I found there.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, I will read it. It is perfectly clear, I think, to one who understands English, and I have some idea that I can understand English.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend will forgive me, but it is incomplete unless the whole is read.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, I read it before:

The minister may from time to time cause any portion of the balances in the special account to be employed by the Bank of Canada in the purchase of securities of or guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada.

I repeat that.

In the exercise of the powers conferred by this section the minister is authorized to make such arrangements as in his opinion will conduce to the immediate availability of the funds employed as aforesaid.

Mr. DUNNING: Now, my hon. friend wants to help me. What did the government of the day mean by those words?

Mr. BENNETT: That section 6 should be in force.

Mr. CAHAN: It means this, undoubtedly, that the fund, which had been wholly or in part invested in securities of or guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada, might be employed under the provision of section 6 as well, when section 6 was brought into force. But, section 6 not having been brought into force, there is no other application of these funds that could legally or properly be made, in my opinion, by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. DUNNING: Other than under section 7.

Mr. CAHAN: Other than under section 7; and under section 7 there were only two alternatives—between the purchase of securities of or guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada or the sale of those, and placing the proceeds again in the bank to be used for the purposes of an exchange fund, which, when section 6 was brought into force, would enable the minister to authorize the purchase of gold or foreign exchange or balances in any bank in London or New York designated by the minister. If there is any misunderstanding by the general public as to the purpose for which this fund has been applied, and the minister now seems to suggest that he has applied it for other purposes than investment in securities or—

Mr. DUNNING: No, positively not.

Mr. BENNETT: The governor says otherwise.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DUNNING: Read what the governor says.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, there is one passage which, in view of the emphatic statement of the Minister of Finance, that I am bound to accept, may possibly be interpreted otherwise than it is being interpreted. In the return of February 25, 1936, after stating that the profits realized were $63,006,382, the report proceeds:

The balance of the profit, namely, $63,006,382 was credited to the exchange fund of the dominion government, and future profits or losses on gold held by us will be credited or debited to that account.

Mr. DUNNING: That is a different thing entirely; that is in accordance with the previous section of the act.

Mr. CAHAN: I understand the minister to say now that the question of future profits or losses on gold is to be determined not on any future purchases of gold but by the statutory value of $20.67 an ounce and the revalution of $35 an ounce or any range between the two values of gold at any particular date. The object of this act was to purchase gold and foreign exchange and balances in banks in London or New York.

Mr. DUNNING: The reference to gold made there applies to section 5 of the act. Let the hon. gentleman read section 5 and connect it with what the governor says and he will find it perfectly clear. The amount of any increase or any decrease—

Mr. CAHAN: I said that I understood, from the minister's emphatic denial that the fund had been used for any purchases of gold, that the statement which I read from the governor's report must apply to fluctuations as between $20.67 and $35.

Mr. DUNNING: There has been just the one movement.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, that is what I stated, quite clearly, I thought. I repudiate the suggestion that parliament is not entitled to information from time to time from the minister with regard to the directions he has given. I can well understand that an ordinary bank in making a proper report to its stockholders is not bound to enter into particular transactions with its clientele; that is obvious. Therefore, as regards any information which the bank withholds so as not to disclose operations which, if publicly known, would be prejudicial to the bank's interests, I can understand limitations being placed upon the dissemination of such information. But I think that parliament has a right to know what profits are made from year to year on the $63,000,000 of government funds, and what is the amount to the credit of the special exchange fund at the present time—

Mr. BENNETT: As a liability of the bank.

Mr. CAHAN: I think it is a liability of the central bank, because the bank is a bank; it is not a mere depositary.

Mr. DUNNING: It is placed in a special trustee relationship to this account by this statute.

Mr. CAHAN: The minister is suggesting that it is like going to a trust company and engaging part of its vaults for the keeping of one's securities, and that that sort of deposit is the deposit made in this case. If it is a special account in the bank—and the act says that it shall be a special account—a special account in a bank implies a liability of the bank to the amount to the credit of that account, which should be shown in the annual statement of the bank. However, I do not wish to labour that further.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does not the hon. gentleman think that the other two provisions, one subsection and one section other than section 10, make it clear that particulars of investment are not to be divulged even to parliament?

Mr. CAHAN: There is nothing about divulging to parliament.

Mr. ILSLEY: I never said there was, but the spirit and purpose of the act are clearly evidenced by one subsection and one section which take it out of the audit and revenue act, stating that the auditor general is not to say what he says about other accounts which he audits but is to give a general statement to the effect that the account is administered in accordance with the law. Why were those sections put there?

Mr. BENNETT: Because it was assumed that section 6 would be proclaimed; that is the reason. Surely the minister sees that. That is the whole story; it is the answer to the minister. Section 6 was to be proclaimed.

Mr. CAHAN: The very terms of section 8 imply that that account is to be wound up when parliament decides that it has served the purposes for which it was created.

Mr. ILSLEY: What about section 9?

Mr. CAHAN: I am dealing with that—

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman never read it.

Mr. CAHAN: —and that implies that parliament is entitled to general information with regard to the account. It is entitled to know what the profits and losses are; it is entitled to know generally as to the amount of dominion securities or securities guaranteed by Canada that are held in that account; and section 9 provides that there shall be an annual audit by the auditor general, and he is to find merely that in his opinion the transactions in connection with the account have or have not been in accordance with the provisions of the act.

Mr. DUNNING: And he has done so.

Mr. CAHAN: I dare say he has.

Mr. DUNNING: It has been tabled in the house.

Mr. CAHAN: In these terms, I suppose? I have not seen it; it was not published separately. Then will the hon. gentleman tell me, has the auditor general seen the written directions given by the minister with regard to the investment of that fund? Has he compared those written directions given by the minister with the transactions made for the fund—

Mr. DUNNING: That is mean.

Mr. CAHAN: It is not mean. If the hon. member is to sit as Minister of Finance and is to have the direction of investments—and no investments can be made except at his express designation—then it is perfectly proper to suggest that the auditor general must take those written directions into account, if he is to make a faithful return in accordance with the express terms of the act.

Mr. DUNNING: I said it was mean because I considered it constituted a reflection on the auditor general, whose duty under section 9 clearly is to do all the things my hon. friend asks whether he did. Section 9 says:

> An annual audit of the special account shall be made by the auditor general in such manner as he thinks proper, with a view to ascertaining whether the transactions in connection with the account have been in accordance with the provisions of this act, and he shall certify to the House of Commons that in his opinion, having regard to the examination, the transactions in connection with the account have or have not been in accordance with the provisions of this act, and that the records of the said account do or not show truly and clearly the state of the said account.

I submit that, the auditor general having certified that, it is a reflection upon him for my hon. friend to say: did he examine these things?

Mr. CAHAN: I am not giving the floor to the minister. My forty minutes is not up.

He has spoken before. I was making no reflection on the auditor general. I was seeking to ascertain from the minister, and I ask him now: In respect to every investment of that fund or every reinvestment, has he given directions in writing to the bank, which directions are there as a part of the records of the bank?

Mr. DUNNING: The bank has adequate directions in accordance with section 7, and the auditor general has certified that the account has been handled in accordance—

Mr. CAHAN: I know that, but I know as well that the Minister of Finance is evading a direct answer to my question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: One may say that an hon. member evades answering a question.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not evading anything. In cross-examination—which I should not permit across the house at this stage—by one of the leading lawyers of this country, he asks me trap questions. I have signed many thousands of documents in connection with the public office I hold; I have to sign them every day, and I would not state positively anywhere that I had signed every document in connection with every transaction. I cannot so state. But I can state that the auditor general, whose duty it is to examine these transactions and to see whether the law has been complied with, certifies that it has been. If in the opinion of the auditor general proper direction had not been given by the minister, my hon. friend knows what would have happened; the auditor general would have called the minister's attention to the fact that this and that had been done without certification by the minister. I have had no such communication from the auditor general, therefore I think I am correct in saying—if this answer will satisfy my hon. friend—that I must have done everything which the law required that I should do. More I cannot say.

Mr. CAHAN: That is a perfectly proper and frank answer and must be accepted not only by me but by parliament. But this is the point I have in mind; we have had a great deal of argument lately on the part of the government that this bank is under political control, that is under the direction and control of the government or nominees of the government, but this particular item is under the direction and control of the minister.

[Mr Cahan.]

Mr. DUNNING: I did not put it there; my hon. friends did.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That was always so under the old act.

Mr. CAHAN: I am dealing with this act. There was no old act dealing with a fund such as this; this is a new creation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): But this act was in force before the former private bank was changed to a public bank in 1936, and the provisions of this act stand as they were.

Mr. BENNETT: No one suggested otherwise.

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly, no one suggested otherwise. Therefore I wished to ascertain, and ascertain directly, as I have done, that with regard to the investments of this fund it is the minister who is acting and who has given the directions; that they are not the directions of the Bank of Canada, that is, of the directors or officers of that bank. That being so, I am satisfied, and I think the frank statement of the minister will clear up a great many misapprehensions with regard to this fund. But I do contend that the fund created has not been devoted to the purposes for which the act was passed.

Mr. DUNNING: Not yet.

Mr. CAHAN: After two and a half years. But it has been diverted under a subsidiary clause relating to any balances that might be available after operations have been conducted under section 6, if so conducted. Therefore I think that the minister on some early occasion should tell us of the present condition of the fund, as to what profits have gone to the fund, the amount of the fund as it stands at present—for that is a matter of great interest to parliament—

Mr. BENNETT: And if any gold losses have been charged against it.

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): In view of the observation of the Minister of Finance that it is desirable, if at all possible, that a vote should be taken on this resolution before the house rises this afternoon, I shall make my remarks as brief as possible. I trust hon. members who have taken part in the debate this afternoon will therefore excuse me if I do not make any reference to the various points raised by them. And I would not dare to engage in discussion of the question with which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) have just dealt, nor would I endeavour to follow the remarks of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) as he travelled so rapidly from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Those who sit in this house realize his ability to cover much territory in a very short time. Even in these days of rapid transit it is almost impossible to follow the hon. member for Broadview. But I should like to express to him my appreciation of his interest in the maritimes, particularly in his reference to his action of some years ago regarding subventions on coal. If there is any credit coming to the hon. member in that connection I certainly want to give him that credit.

My object in rising at this time is to say a very few words in order that the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) may understand that there are two sides to the question of steam trawlers as raised by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley). I quite appreciate the hon. member raising that question; it is one on which he is as well qualified as any hon. member of this house to speak—the fishing industry as it affects his own constituency. I appreciate the years of service my hon. friend has given to his community, and I fully realize that he is vitally interested in the fishing industry in his own constituency. No doubt he is interested to a very large extent as well. Certainly I would not want to harm him financially or otherwise, but we must deal with this matter in a broad sense; not as it affects one particular constituency, important though that may be. I believe we should look at it from the standpoint of the benefit of the fishing industry to Canada as a whole, and it is with this point in mind that I approach the question.

If I followed the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg correctly, he would completely eliminate the steam trawler. The hon. gentleman put the matter definitely before the Minister of Fisheries and more or less put the onus in this matter on the minister. I do not think that is an altogether fair approach. It is definitely laid down in the act that there are certain requirements which must be met. One is that a licence shall be issued if certain conditions exist. The order in council states:

> The applicant for such licence shall furnish the Minister of Fisheries with evidence that will satisfy the said minister that he cannot obtain an adequate supply of suitable fish to enable him properly to conduct and develop his business from the hook and line fishermen, and that if such a licence is granted, the extent of his purchase of fresh fish from the said fishermen will not be adversely affected.

Mr. BENNETT: In other words there should be no steam trawlers licensed unless the fishermen could not supply the necessary fish.

Mr. ISNOR: Perhaps that is as simply as it could be put. That is where my hon. friend from Queens-Lunenburg and myself differ. At the moment I may seem to be approaching this question from a somewhat narrow point of view, but at present in Halifax we have two large fish operators. It means a million and a quarter dollars a year to our immediate vicinity to have these trawlers operating, and for that reason I place before the Minister of Fisheries certain reasons why I believe he should issue or renew these licences.

One would almost believe, from the remarks of the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, that there were hundreds of licences being issued. I wonder if hon. members realize exactly how many licences have been issued. There are three, and as I understand it only two of those have been taken out, both by this large company which employs hundreds of men on our waterfront, in addition to taking supplies of fish from fishermen all along the shore. They are prepared to enter into an agreement to take such fish; they made the statement that they would take all the fish available between Halifax and Canso.

Mr. CAHAN: How many American trawlers are operating in the same vicinity?

Mr. ISNOR: The Minister of Fisheries says two hundred odd.

Mr. KINLEY: They cannot land their fish in Canada.

Mr. ISNOR: That is true; but, sir, we are after a world market. We are not simply selling to Canada, and for that reason I believe it is absolutely necessary that we should adopt up-to-date methods. As I have said, I am in sympathy with the desire to protect our inshore fishermen, but this was never intended to injure them, and I do not believe it will have that result. Rather I think it will result in increased sales of fish by the maritime provinces, which will be a direct benefit to the inshore fishermen and for that reason, not because I want to injure these fishermen, I am supporting it. If I thought it would injure them I would not be making these remarks to-day. I am just as sympathetically inclined towards our inshore fishermen as is the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg or any other member from Nova Scotia but, sir, those in Queens-Lunenburg, including my hon. friend, have not kept pace with the times. Modern marketing to-day requires modern methods of handling fish.

Mr. KINLEY: Is my hon. friend an expert in that?

Mr. ISNOR: I have made it very clear to my hon. friend from Queens-Lunenburg that I take off my hat to him. Certainly he has had much more experience in the handling of fish than I have had, but on the other hand I endeavour to keep abreast of the times by reading and studying methods of marketing which will bring the best results to our province.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the all-important thing; whether the old-fashioned way will bring a greater financial return to the maritime provinces or whether it is better to follow this modern, up-to-date method. I think anyone who studied the question, even without having had years of experience in the fishing industry, dealing with it in an unbiased manner and not from a narrow, selfish point of view, would immediately say: "Yes, if we are going to bring added revenues to our country we must keep up to date." Certainly we have made a real bid for increased markets, so why not adopt up to date methods in supplying these markets, as we have in connection with apples and other products of the maritimes?

The hon. member stated that we did not need these fish, that the market was not there for them. In reply may I say that a very short time ago, when the question arose as to whether an application should be made for an additional trawler, one company—and it is not the company that holds the licence at present—made the definite statement that it could not get sufficient supplies of fish from the regular sources, the schooners, to give more than three days employment for the men working in the factory; but that the use of one additional trawler would keep the plant working six days a week. I say that is a very important factor in our industrial life.

Mr. KINLEY: Would the hon. member permit a question? I understood him to say another company wanted a trawler. Was that the American company?

Mr. ISNOR: I hold no brief for American companies. I am particularly anxious to support the company that is engaged in the business at the present time, and I understand that a very large percentage of the stock is held by business men in the maritime provinces. If the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg wishes the name of the company I may tell him that I am interested in the Maritime National Fish Company Limited, and I do not think he will deny that this company is almost entirely owned by people residing in the maritimes.

Mr. KINLEY: I thought the hon. gentleman was referring to another company.

Mr. ISNOR: My reference to another company might have been to a subsidiary of an American company which is operating in the city of Halifax; but, as I stated, I hold no brief for that company nor am I particularly interested in it.

The hon. member stated he had received a telegram from one company, and on that argument he based his statement that the Minister of Fisheries should not be obliged to renew the licences.

Mr. KINLEY: I did not say "one" telegram.

Mr. ISNOR: Not five or ten, but between fifty and sixty have been received by me since last Friday, and every one, without exception, supports the renewal of trawler licences.

Mr. KINLEY: Merchants controlled by a monopoly.

Mr. ISNOR: I do not know whether or not they are controlled by a monopoly, but I do know, and I will say to the hon. member who has just interrupted me that I have made a careful check—the hon. member has had a chance to look them over—and they would almost convince me that he is on the wrong track. These are very representative and outstanding citizens. These men represent prominent business firms, hotels, and shipping concerns which handle fish in and out of Halifax. The telegrams come from supply houses, wholesale firms and retail fish stores, almost without exception. I have checked with the list of fish dealers in the Halifax telephone directory to find out the ones who did not send their names, and I learn, after my search, that practically every fish dealer in Halifax has either signed his name to a letter, or his name appears on a wire which has been forwarded.

I was surprised in connection with one group of telegrams, because they covered practically all of what we would describe as the expert fishing men in Halifax. These men have had experience as long as if not longer than that of the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg. I refer to such men as Mr. A. H. Whitman, and O. F. MacKenzie, the latter having sufficient knowledge to be chosen as one to be sent to South American ports to investigate possibilities of added markets. Telegrams received from such men, bearing the high reputations that they do in Halifax and throughout the maritimes, are worthy of consideration. I would read some of them, but I am trying to make my observations as brief as possible.

The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg did not dwell at length on the value of the industry to Nova Scotia and to Canada. In 1933 production was valued at $27,496,946, and Nova Scotia's share was $6,010,001. In 1935 there was an increase in the whole of Canada, from the figure I have given, to $34,427,854, and Nova Scotia's share increased to $7,852,899. In 1936, the last figures available, the production in Canada had increased to a value of $39,165,055, of which Nova Scotia's share—and it is in this part I am interested—had risen to a value of $8,905,268.

Hon. members will appreciate why I am interested in trying to protect this very necessary revenue in our province. If I wished to take up the time I could refer to a statement made by the hon. member in reference to the report of the provincial economic inquiry in Nova Scotia. Possibly he did not study the report as carefully as he should have, because in the report, signed by the three commissioners, I find the following:

> We were impressed by the need for more rapid and more frequent transportation and we recommend that every possible means should be employed to secure that end.

Rapid transit is one of the very necessary things in connection with the shipment and processing of fish.

Mr. KINLEY: We have the most rapid transport.

Mr. ISNOR: The twenty-one schooners in which the hon. member is interested go to the banks and return in a certain period of time—possibly a week, and perhaps longer than that.

Mr. KINLEY: Every day, if you want them.

Mr. ISNOR: That has not been possible up to the present time. The trawler, in turn, goes to the banks and brings in a steady supply, particularly in the summer. This is absolutely necessary if the operators are to receive a steady supply of fish, so that they may process sufficiently large quantities and be in a position to keep the market they have gained through strenuous effort and extensive advertising.

I was asked to make my remarks as brief as possible, and I shall endeavour to do so, because I do not wish unnecessarily to take up the time of the house. I am sticking as closely as possible to my subject, and have been content to answer one or two of the observations of the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg. May I point out to him, sir, that about forty per cent of the fish produced is resold in the maritimes and the rest of Canada. Sixty per cent is processed. Two-thirds of that quantity is exported, and one-third is sent to the markets in central Canada. It is the sixty per cent in which the two firms in Halifax are interested. For a long time we have been trying to bring outside money into our little province down by the Atlantic. If that is not good, sound business, then I am off on the wrong foot.

May I give three definite reasons why the trawler is necessary. First, it alone can land good fish in economic quantities all the year round. True, there are certain seasons of the year when the fishing fleet from Lunenburg and elsewhere might be able to give a supply, but I am saying that for the year round it is necessary to have the steam trawler. In the second place, as I have stated before, it is necessary that the supply be regular. The regularity of supply ensures more nearly continuous labour ashore, and the ability to reship in processed form. That brings me to one telegram which I almost forgot, namely from the labour union known as the Mutual Employees Association. This organization is represented by hundreds of men who state that if the trawler licences were not renewed such refusal would seriously interfere with their employment. And so, from the various angles—modern methods of marketing, the additional business coming to the maritimes, and the employment of labour—I believe the Minister of Fisheries would be justified in again renewing the trawler licences.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the rules of our house did not contemplate the existence of three or four distinct groups. Hence it is very difficult in a matter of this kind to make one's position absolutely clear. If this matter comes to a vote, I shall support the subamendment. That means that I shall vote with the Conservative party. If standing order 49 did not preclude an amendment to the subamendment, I should like to have moved as follows:

> That the adoption of the policies of the Conservative party as enunciated by its supporters in this house would afford no adequate remedy for such neglect.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, there has been one unexpected event after another this afternoon, and it would now look to be impossible to finish this debate to-day. On the understanding that there is to be a motion that the rules shall be suspended so that we may finish this debate to-morrow, I would move the adjournment of the debate at this time. I beg to assure you that at that time I shall endeavour to deal with the various matters that have to be considered in as short a time as possible.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 28 WITH RESPECT TO SITTING OF THURSDAY, MARCH 31

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) has just indicated, the government feel it would be advisable to have this debate concluded to-morrow if possible. However, to conclude it we would have to suspend standing order 28. If the house will give its unanimous consent, I would move:

That standing order 28 be suspended with respect to the sitting of this house on Thursday, the 31st of March, 1938.

If this motion is carried we shall continue with this debate as the first order to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 5.55 p.m.

Thursday, March 31, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY RESPECTING REPORTED LAY-OFF OF SHOP EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. SAMUEL FACTOR (Spadina): I should like to submit a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe). I have received a petition signed by a large number of employees of the Canadian National Railway shops at Leaside, protesting against their dismissal taking place to-day. I understood from the Minister of Transport the other day that he was conferring with the railway management and the heads of the unions concerning the matter of lay-offs. I wonder if he would mind giving the house the result of that conference.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): As a result of a conference held yesterday in my office between the railway management and a committee of the heads of the shopmen's brotherhood, it was decided that the situation would be again reviewed in the light of representations made by the management and myself as to the extreme undesirability of laying off men at this time. Following a quick telegraphic vote, it was decided that the reduction in work in the central and western regions would be taken care of by a reduction in hours; that is, instead of a twenty-four day month as the schedules now call for the men will accept an eighteen-day month, and no men will lose their employment.

In the eastern region, however, the shopmen decided that they must insist on the maintenance of the schedules; so there will be a lay-off at Moncton and at Riviere du Loup. However, I am happy to say that the business level in the maritime division is somewhat higher than on the rest of the system, therefore the lay-off will not be very extensive.

It was agreed that this condition shall stand until June 1. In May, all the railway brotherhoods are meeting in convention, and will review their position. If that meeting decides that the schedules must be maintained, that decision must be effective on June 1. On the other hand if the convention decides that the system now being followed is preferable, then that system will continue.

On my own behalf I wish to thank the brotherhoods and the shopmen themselves for taking care of this situation in such a way as not to increase unemployment. I fully realize that the senior shopmen in sacrificing their schedules have made a real sacrifice for the sake of the younger men who would otherwise be thrown out of employment. I think the spirit that has been shown is one that every one of us should commend most highly.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the minister if consideration will be given to the question whether perpetual bondholders are going to make any sacrifice?

Mr. F. C. BETTS (London): May I ask the minister how the situation will be met in London, Ontario, where there is a threatened lay-off of some seventy men?

Mr. HOWE: London, being in the central region, is meeting the situation by reduction of hours.

SUPPLY

USE OF CANADA'S FINANCIAL RESOURCES FOR ELIMINATION OF POVERTY—AMENDMENT OF MR. BLACKMORE AND SUBAMENDMENT OF MR. BENNETT

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Dunning for committee of supply, the amendment thereto of Mr. Blackmore, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Bennett.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I appreciate greatly, and so do the members of our group, the tolerance, courtesy and attention which so far have been accorded to us, not only in this debate but in the previous debates in the house. We realize, no one realizes more keenly, how strange our ideas must appear to hon. members, because all we have to do is to go back four years in our own experience and remember how we felt. We can therefore tell exactly how other hon. members feel. In the light of these things we have no fault whatsoever to find with the tendency on the part of some to scoff at our notions and treat them lightly. But notwithstanding this, we contend that when the realities of the situation and the facts of our proposals are fully comprehended, there will be on all sides nothing but respect and sympathy for our contentions, whether or not it is decided in the end that they are sound.

We have been accused of wasting time. We have deliberately refrained from participating in many debates in this house. There has been very little comment by social crediters on many measures, and little or no discussion of tariff matters; not because we have not our convictions and our beliefs, but because we were deliberately refraining from speaking so that the time we felt was rightfully ours could be devoted to discussion of the matter which we believe of greater importance to this country than anything else that could be discussed at the present time.

Yesterday the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) delayed proceedings while he put on Hansard some things of which some day he and his descendants will not be so very proud.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

An hon. MEMBER: He has no descendants.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is too bad he has none, because I think if he had he would be a wiser man. I heard of a story concerning his province; that the first telephone to be put into the office of one of the chief men in Ontario was indignantly kicked out of the office by that man and condemned as an utterly foolhardy device with which he would have nothing to do. If the hon. member has heard that story it should give him cause for thought. The hon. gentleman I believe urged that business men should be given charge of the affairs of this country, and I should like to turn for a moment to this matter of business men managing our affairs. If hon. members will turn to the Dictionary of American Biography, volume XVII, at page 514 they will find an enlightening account of the life of a certain man named William Stanley, who lived from 1858 to 1916. Of him these words are recorded there:

> He devised the multiple system of alternating current distribution, together with its equipment (patent No. 372942, issued November 8, 1887), but Westinghouse—
> A business man, mark you.
> —refused to finance its development until Stanley at his own expense had put the system into regular commercial service in Great Barrington, installing it in several stores.

From that invention up to the present time there have developed in the United States, I am told, businesses worth thirteen and a half billion dollars. Are business men wise? It hardly looks that way, does it? It takes more than business to make a man wise. At the same time Edison was the greatest authority on electricity in the world. Edison opposed this device as an impractical piece of nonsense. It would not work; it could not work; we did not need it. Again, Edison was a business man. Mr. Stanley's invention made possible the first alternating current transmission of electricity. From his invention came to be promoted the distribution of power by an alternating current system. It threatened the direct current system, in which Edison was deeply interested. Edison and other great authorities on electricity at that time ridiculed Stanley and opposed him by every means at their disposal. With such things as this in the records of history, Mr. Speaker, let us not be greatly surprised if even to-day new ideas meet with intolerance, misunderstanding and opposition.

While we are on the question of electricity I should like to suggest a little illustration which I believe will apply to the debate which has taken place up to the present time. Before men learned to use electricity produced from the energy of a stream they had to learn by painful experience that it was possible to change into electricity the energy contained in the ice cold waters pouring down from the mountains. When they were convinced that this could be done, they were prepared to consider the possibility of erecting a plant to do that thing. After they had learned the possibility of erecting such a plant it was time to consider the possibility of distributing the electricity. After that they could occupy themselves with the matter of using the electricity when it was distributed, and of safeguarding its use. In this debate we are contending in this house that pouring down the hills of the Dominion of Canada, so to speak, there are vast torrents filled with energy which can be transformed into a form useful to mankind. There is very little value in talking about the kind of plant we should erect or how to distribute it or safeguard it until we first determine whether or not the thing can be done. In this debate we have been occupied with the question, can the thing be done? Is it possible to change vast quantities of goods and services, which are being produced and consumed in this country in one gigantic stream, into money?

Yesterday the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) offered us an Alberta bank. I must spend a moment discussing this proposal. Yesterday I issued to the press, at their request, a statement which I think it is only fair should go into Hansard:

> The Canadian banking system can take a one dollar bill of the dominion or of the Bank of Canada and safely create ten dollars of cheque book money against it. This was definitely proved and acknowledged during the debate on the motion of want of confidence. In using this power, however, the banks have to go forward together in step, so to speak. This all well informed people know.
> An Alberta chartered bank under the present set-up in Canada would have to get its Bank of Canada bills from the Bank of Canada, just as any other Canadian chartered bank would have to do. This fact would force the Alberta bank to conform to the policy of the Bank of Canada. Further, if such Alberta bank began to pursue any other policy it would get out of step with other Canadian chartered banks and so become in danger of losing its cash to them. This would of course render it likely to fail. An Alberta bank alone would therefore be unlikely to help in the introduction of social credit.
> The Bank of Canada Act gives to the Bank of Canada the power to take one dollar of gold and create against it four dollars of Bank of Canada bills. If Mr. Dunning would offer to Alberta the power to give an Alberta bank this right then he would be conferring upon Alberta real monetary power with great possibilities. If in addition he would agree to recognize as legal tender Alberta one dollar bills with twenty-five cents of gold backing, as he does with Bank of Canada bills with twenty-five cents of gold backing, the possibilities would be still greater. The Alberta bank could then build upon one dollar of gold a currency and credit structure of $40, as the Bank of Canada with the Canadian chartered banks now can.
> The power of creating legal tender bills, however, is not in his offer, I take it, and will not, I fancy, ever be in his offer.

I might add these words, which did not go out to the press: It is not the banks we are after, but the system which gives to them and to them only the creation of Canada's money. An Alberta bank attempting to establish itself to-day would probably have about as much chance of success as an Alberta distributing house would have in competition with the T. Eaton Company.

I turn now to a consideration of my motion.

Mr. DUNNING: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. BLACKMORE: If Mr. Speaker will give me extra time I shall be glad to permit interruptions.

Mr. DUNNING: In his statement the hon. member asked if Mr. Dunning would do so and so. In that connection I wish to say merely this, if the hon. member will permit me, that the things he there states Mr. Dunning should do are not within Mr. Dunning's power. What my hon. friend asks there is that the parliament of Canada should turn over to the social credit party the complete control of currency and credit in Canada which is now vested in this parliament, and also complete control of the Bank of Canada. I cannot do that. My hon. friend may convince parliament—if he can—but it is useless to ask me to do more than I offered to do last night, something which it was within my power to do.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I gathered from the remarks the Minister of Finance had previously made that in him, the Minister of Finance, rested complete control of currency and credit in Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no; I repeatedly denied any such thing, and have stated directly the opposite. In this parliament, and in the instrumentality created by this parliament, rests that power. I hope the hon. member will not repeat the statement, which has been made by several of his group, that I control currency and credit in Canada. It must be within the knowledge of every hon. member of the house that I have never said that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: This is very good. In 1935, before the Bank of Canada was formed, I understand the dominion had delegated the power to create dollar bills, and credit, to each of at least eleven chartered banks throughout the country. I am going to ask this question, sir; whether or not one of the nine sovereign provinces of the dominion would be likely to mismanage currency and credit of Canada to any greater degree than would the group of men who constitute a bank. If the power lay in this parliament to give this complete power to banking institutions, before the Bank of Canada was formed, then it looks as though that power would permit giving a similar right to a province.

However, this is beside the point, although it has been an interesting sidelight. We are now discussing a motion made by the social credit group on March 8. That was a want of confidence motion, on the ground that the present government is neglecting to use Canada's resources for the abolition of poverty in the country. It is a most remarkable thing to me that, other than social crediters, hon. members who have participated in the debate have discussed anything and everything except the motion. That is a most interesting fact. Yesterday we even got to salt fish.

Mr. BRADETTE: We had electricity this morning.

Mr. BLACKMORE: No defence has been made. I challenge members of this house to point to one single place where a defence was made by any member or supporter of the government against the charge that the government has not used the resources of the country to remove poverty. In fact, there have been no answers to any of my contentions concerning money. I directed the attention of the house and the country to money, and the point has been completely sidestepped. A red herring was dragged in, and the time of the house was spent discussing the red herring, while the money question remained in abeyance.

In a few moments I shall show that not a single contention was disproved. Let me recall to the minds of hon. members the points I made. I shall review them briefly.

First: Money is either currency or credit. It could and should be created by the king or by the state.

Second: Our money now is created by and comes from banks. This has been abundantly shown in the discussion.

Third: What gives money value is goods and services, and the producing and consuming power of the community. Had the attention of the house been directed to a discussion of that proposition the time would have been excellently spent. When the truth regarding that proposition is fully recognized we shall be on our way to a change which might do us some good.

Fourth: The amount of money that Canada can have depends upon the number of exchanges Canada can manage to bring to pass within the country. Not one word was said about that. Yet, sir, next to the other one I have mentioned, this is the most important question which can be brought to the attention of parliament.

Fifth: King-created money is sound.

Sixth: Canada's financial set-up now enables her to create legally $80 for one dollar of gold. That was established in the discussion. But before it was established the people in Alberta were called all sorts of lunatics and fools, and withstood a great amount of abuse, from a wide variety of people because that was our contention. It is established, sir, and a great achievement has been brought to pass.

Seventh: Canada can produce abundance for all her people. There was no question about that.

Eighth: Inflation comes from having more money than goods and services. Not a word has been said about that. Yet if we wish to discuss inflation that is the point at which we must commence. This proposition is borne out by the best authorities now living.

Ninth: Canada now has vast amounts of goods no one can buy. She is equipped to produce immediately upon demand vast quantities more of many kinds. The distribution of money would immediately call forth more production. When the almost hysterical outbursts against inflation were in process, not a word was said about that—not a word. And yet that, sir, is the all-important point. If we spent $100,000,000, and by spending that money we immediately brought into existence $100,000,000 or more of goods, there would be no chance in the world of creating inflation—except a form of financial inflation, with which we can deal later on.

Tenth: Therefore, Canada can safely create, issue and use a great deal of money. There was not a word of discussion about that—with the exception of the outburst about inflation.

I said a few moments ago that not one of my contentions was met or answered—not a single one. I ask the members of the government this question: Why in the world was the whole question sidestepped? That is a vital point. Yet we have news sent clear to Australia stating how the Minister of Finance showed that social credit would result in inflation, that it would be most disastrous, and all that sort of thing. The Minister of Finance did not prove that at all, and he cannot prove it.

This debate has proved that $80 can be created in Canada for $1 of gold. It has proved that it can be created out of nothing but paper and pen and ink. That has been proved abundantly on the floor of this house. That is a wonderful achievement. The banks create all the money and they can beat the printing presses any day. We raise our hands in holy horror at the thought of printing presses, but we let the banks go ahead creating money far faster than the printing presses ever could. The banking system of Canada is the power plant that has been erected to serve the country. If we know how to use it we can change our streams of goods and services that are pouring through this country into money that can be used for the betterment of the country. But we must prove that we can do this.

A few moments ago I referred to turning water power into electricity. The first important point is to learn that water power can be turned into electricity. That was the question with which we were occupying ourselves and it had nothing to do with any of the other matters. Can we have money? —that is the question. I understand that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) rose in his place and said that it was impossible for us to get money in any other way except by borrowing or by taxation. That is the stand normally taken in Canada to-day, but it is a stand which is utterly not in accordance with the facts. As long as we continue to take that stand, we will continue to be bound and the problems of this country cannot be solved.

The next question with respect to the power plant is that the amount of electricity developed depends on the volume and speed of the water. The amount of money that we can create depends upon the volume and speed of our production and upon nothing else. Later on we shall deal with other matters. However, the Minister of Finance attacked it in this way. He did not stop to ask whether or not goods and services could be changed into money; he wanted to know immediately how to do it. If you came into the house ready to discuss the question whether or not water power could be turned into electricity, and you were asked about the details of constructing a power plant, would you consider that to be a fair question? I do not wish to be unfair, but I speak as I see it. This is the next question: He said we do not need electricity; in other words, we have enough coal oil and we do not need any electricity.

Mr. DUNNING: I never said any such thing.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I shall make it abundantly clear to my hon. friend in just a minute. I am simply using an illustration.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend has no right—

Mr. BLACKMORE: Let me make my point first.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend says that the Minister of Finance said that we do not need electricity. The Minister of Finance never said any such thing and my hon. friend cannot put words into my mouth.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am simply giving an illustration. If the Minister of Finance cannot follow figurative language, it is too bad.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend can use all the illustrations he likes, but he cannot put words into the mouth of an hon. member which that hon. member did not utter. I used the English language and nowhere did I use such words as those now attributed to me.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The point is this: The Minister of Finance argued that the A plus B theorem was faulty and there was no deficiency of purchasing power in the country as a result of industry. That is the same thing as saying that there was no need of electricity in the community. Why take all this trouble to create electricity? If that is not sufficient, I will take it all back. The trouble is the Minister of Finance did not allow me to finish what I was saying.

Speaking figuratively again, the next statement was that electricity will kill people, it will burn them—inflation.

Mr. DUNNING: Who said that?

Mr. BLACKMORE: It was said that the new money would create inflation, that that would mean disaster and chaos. That is the same as saying that electricity would burn people and kill them.

Mr. DUNNING: As long as it is clear that I did not say that, it is quite all right. My hon. friend is saying that, not I.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The next question was that you cannot get a transformer, you cannot get a fuse plug to enable you to control the electric current after you create it. Therefore, do not create it. The objection there was to the just price.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Will my hon. friend tell us now what he refused to tell us a few weeks ago? Who will be the transformers? Who will be the experts?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would my hon. friend permit me to finish without interrupting? I do not remember the exact words of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley), but I got the impression that he was saying that the Minister of Finance had demolished completely our contention because he had brought in this A plus B theorem. The Minister of Finance demolished nothing by bringing that in. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) dealt unchallengeably with the A plus B theorem, as reported on pages 1304 to 1308 of Hansard. Any hon. member can turn up those pages and find what was said. If you turn to page 19 of the New and Old Economics you will find Major Douglas' reply to Professor Copland of Melbourne and Professor Robbins of London where the same argument is made.

Then about the banks in the west. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) made a remark which I think implied that we were endeavouring to discredit the banks. That is not the point at all. Our point in discussing the banks is to show that they create money, that they do not lend savings. The banks are teaching the people that they lend savings, and the fact is that they do not lend savings. As soon as the people realize that this is so they will begin to say, "Why should we owe and pay interest on this credit which they have created?" That is the first intelligent question about money that men will ask. In our discussion we have tried to show what money is, where it comes from, how it comes and what makes it. We used the banks as an illustration to make those points clear to our people.

I should like to turn again now to the amendment. No one can honestly contend under the circumstances that the government is using the monetary resources of the country as they could be used. The only means used by this government to put purchasing power into the hands of the people is through exports, as far as I can make out. We assume that unless you practically throw great quantities of goods away in order to get rid of them, you cannot use any goods of that kind. Such an argument is a monstrosity. The only other means of providing purchasing power that we are using are relief, pensions, public works and rearmaments. I contend that we must use another means to put purchasing power into the hands of the people.

In his speech the minister first of all proceeded to give us a fine outline of the banking system. I believe the people of Canada owe him thanks for doing that, because it is one of the finest things ever put before us by a public man in this dominion. I appreciated it tremendously. He then turned to a discussion of the proposals of the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), just as though they had something to do with my motion. Why bring him in? I was not ready to meet what had to be said about him. As a matter of fact, the proposal made by the hon. member for Rosthern is not a social credit proposal. His proposal has merit, but it also has its difficulties, and it is not social credit. He proposed that an additional amount of Bank of Canada notes be created to carry on projects of various kinds. The Minister of Finance applied the principle of ten to one to show that we could reach such a tremendous amount of deposits in the banks as six billions of dollars, and he said that that would immediately cause inflation. I will grant that a great amount of money in a country might cause inflation, but in the United States they have over ten billion dollars of gold hidden in their vaults, and is that causing inflation? Of course not. Why? Because it is being handled right. You do not have to have inflation just because you have great quantities of money.

Under our present set-up, money cannot possibly get into circulation unless someone will come and borrow it. At the present time we are told the banks are full of money, and they cannot lend it to anybody, and they will not lend it. The result is that they are buying more government securities. Now will someone who thinks he knows tell us how, if you had six times as much money in the banks as we have now, you could get any more people to come and borrow it or get any of the banks to lend it? It has not been proved; maybe it can be proved, but certainly it was not proved. The question is, who would get the money? And again, where would they invest it?

Next there was an attack upon social credit. I am not going to deal with that at all at the present time because there are other matters which need attention. We did not bring social credit into the debate at all. We did not even mention the words social credit —not once.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is a scriptural quotation which could be used, but I shall not quote it now. We did not bring social credit into the debate at all because we had not reached the point where we were ready to consider the details of social credit. We were rather considering the question whether you could take the energy in our productive stream and convert it into money, because until you get that principle settled it is idle to take up other points of social credit.

Then the hon. member (Mr. Dunning) demanded concrete results. He said: These are only principles. But Mr. Speaker, before mankind could fly, you had to show men that it was reasonable to suppose they could fly, and we were simply discussing whether it was reasonable that Canada should be able to fly —that you could get electricity out of this great stream that is flowing by. That is what we were contending, and when that question is discussed openly, sincerely and frankly, hon. members will find that we shall be ready to take up other principles of social credit.

With respect to the speech of the Minister of Finance and the principles he enunciated, he said in the first place that money should be issued according to the needs of business. That is absolutely right, and I say that the real cause of the trouble in Canada to-day is that this government is not doing that very thing, and it cannot show that it is doing it. There is a great deal of agitation apparently for the purpose of making it appear that social credit principles are mysterious and difficult of understanding and all that sort of thing, that social credit would change everything, disrupt the whole of society. That is just pure nonsense. I am told that the Wright Brothers, in order to perfect the aeroplane, had to discover just one simple thing, and that was how to warp the tips of the aeroplane's wings. Everything else was there. And we contend, Mr. Speaker, that everything else that is necessary for social credit is here, that all that is required is just a slight change.

An hon. MEMBER: What is that?

Mr. BLACKMORE: There will be plenty of time to develop that. What business needs above all else in this country to-day is that there shall be markets. If you could manage to give an adequate dividend to every man in this country, you would take care of markets inside of a month; and if you bring in the just price principle you would take care of the problem of a stable price to a tremendous degree. To bring about prosperity we must have an even price level. The best thinkers realize, and have done so for hundreds of years, that you can take care of the price level mainly by the amount of money in circulation.

Next, business wants lower taxes. If the government could manage somehow or other to create money to finance some of the things which are breaking the backs of the taxpayers to-day, it would remove a great deal of t' trouble with business; and it can be done.

The question of inflation was also raised. I maintain, sir, that there is no inflation in the social credit contention. Major Douglas has stated time and again that he is entirely opposed to inflation. The only way in which you can possibly prevent inflation is by the introduction of social credit. I know there are many people who will say that that is not so; but that is so. And if I had more time I could read quotations from great authorities who cannot be questioned. I will refer to just one on this point of inflation. I quote from Paul Einzig, the great world economist, in his book World Finance Since 1914, published in 1935, where at page 17 he says:

> The more advanced definitions (of inflation) duly allow for any change in the volume of real wealth. Thus if the volume of currency and credit increases, and the production of real wealth increases in the same proportion, then there is no reason why the expansion of currency and credit should produce an inflationary effect.

Is not that just as clear as it could be for him who runs to read?

Money properly distributed does cause more goods and services to come into being; where there are plenty of goods the money can be expanded, and it must be expanded. Otherwise, you have a fall in prices; you have deflation. That can be proved by reference to any number of authorities right down to the present moment. I have not time to refer to them all, but I am going to refer to Paul H. Douglas, professor of economics at Chicago, and his book, Controlling Depressions, written in 1935. I will give hon. members the page number, to save time—page 137. There he points out that when you increase the money in circulation you automatically increase goods and services, because there are vast quantities of unused resources, great numbers of men unemployed, great amounts of productive equipment being only partly used, and the minute you distribute money wisely and get it to the right people, you set your productive machinery into operation and make it possible immediately to issue more money without causing inflation. In Paul Douglas's book, at page 126, you will find another comment of the same kind.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time is exhausted.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If I might have just a few minutes more, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I appreciate greatly the courtesy and consideration of the house, Mr. Speaker. There is a great deal to be said. I know the members want the facts, and I am glad to give them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Time.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has exhausted his forty minutes and can continue only with the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Speaker, I think I was responsible for depriving the hon. member of five minutes of his time, but I do not think more than that.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I had the impression that the house had given consent.

If hon. members will turn to G. D. H. Cole's Principles of Economic Planning, page 208, they will find the same principle set out there. The Minister of Finance assumed inflation. If you will go through his remarks with great care I believe you will find that every time he assumed inflation he at no time proved it. He told of the dangers that would come from inflation but he nowhere proved that inflation would come.

There is one other matter that I wish to deal with in the five minutes that have been granted to me; and if we are going to use the time let us use it without much disturbance.

A good deal was made of the question of the velocity of circulation, and it was implied that social crediters are not aware of the principle of the velocity of circulation. That is entirely untrue. We have not discussed velocity of circulation simply because we have not got around to it. Let me read something that will interest the minister tremendously—a quotation from Professor Irving Fisher:

> The latest and best studies on velocity show that in normal times it varies little; and even in booms and depressions its variations are much smaller than usually supposed, except for speculative transactions.

There are many people who imply that we quote out of context, and actually accuse us of doing so, and for that reason I wrote to Professor Fisher, before quoting this passage, to ask him where it could be found. On March 19 of the present year he wrote me a letter in the course of which he said:

> I do not now recall where the quotation from me on page 10 came from and I cannot now at this time make a search but it correctly states my views.

That is from Professor Irving Fisher of Yale, one of the world's great economists.

I have other material that bears upon the question, material of considerable force, but I have not the time to-day to discuss it. There is one question, however, to which I would refer here. Whenever the question of increasing money is brought up somebody rises and cries "Germany!" If hon. members will consult World Finance Since 1914 they will find at page 67 a complete statement explaining why Germany's issue of money failed. I contend that there is not one of those factors existing in Canada to-day—not one. Let hon. members read the book and form their own conclusion.

I greatly appreciate the extra time given me and the courtesy shown me. I submit that we were thoroughly justified in moving this motion of want of confidence in the government on the ground that, all things considered, the government has not adequately used the resources at its disposal to remove poverty from the midst of the Canadian people.

Mr. J. S. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I refuse to be associated with any hon. member in this house in the view that banks, whether chartered or central, can in practice elevate one cash dollar to ten dollars in credit, or do this in any other way than theoretically under present practice. I intended to speak on this and cognate matters, but the unusual progress of the debate precludes the possibility of that. I shall, however, bring my statements before the house on another suitable occasion.

Mr. EDWARDS: I was paired with the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. Elliott). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Main motion (Mr. Dunning) agreed to, and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

SOLDIER AND GENERAL LAND SETTLEMENT

To provide for payment to the government of the province of New Brunswick in accordance with the terms of the New Brunswick 500 British family amended agreement of April 30, 1935, in respect of (a) the indebtedness of settlers on farms taken over by the dominion government listed in the schedule attached to the said agreement to the extent provided in the said agreement and (b) the dominion government proportion of losses on interest under section 8 (b) of the agreement, $572,975.01.

Mr. BENNETT: What is this about?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): In 1927 a tripartite arrangement was entered into between the federal government, the government of New Brunswick and the government of the United Kingdom for the settlement of certain British settlers in New Brunswick. Under that agreement the New Brunswick government supplied the land and the British government, as I recall, supplied the money for equipment. The part played by the federal government was relatively small; my recollection is that it was confined to a share of the interest losses that might arise in the first two years. That arrangement continued until 1935, when a new agreement was made between the federal government and the New Brunswick government under which the federal government in effect purchased the land from the New Brunswick government, covered by such settlers as were still on farms at that time. The understanding was that the New Brunswick government would be paid by the federal government as collections were received from these settlers. During the difficult period since then the payments have not come in from the settlers except in very small degree; consequently the liability is still outstanding to the government of New Brunswick so far as the federal government is concerned.

There is this further aspect of the matter, that we are paying five per cent interest on our obligation to the government of New Brunswick, and it has been considered advisable that it be closed out as at March 31, which is to-day. This vote is necessary for that purpose. I might add that originally there were 359 settlers, of whom 240 are or were recently still on these farms in New Brunswick. Of the amount of $572,975.01 the sum of $521,000 was really principal as at the time in 1935 when the new agreement was made. The balance represents accrued interest from that time to the present.

Mr. BENNETT: The amount was in fact borrowed, was it not, by New Brunswick in the first instance on their credit; then they bought the farms and sold them to the settlers?

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot say whether the amount was borrowed—from the federal government?

Mr. BENNETT: No, borrowed from the public.

Mr. CRERAR: That is correct. At any rate New Brunswick found the money in 1927 to carry out its part of the bargain, either by taxation or by borrowing.

Mr. BENNETT: I was wondering whether we should take any steps to see that the money we thus pay goes to liquidate the outstanding obligations, because the money was borrowed for that particular purpose.

Mr. CRERAR: Just offhand I think that might be inadvisable. New Brunswick might charge us with an undue interference in their affairs.

Mr. BENNETT: I was just wondering whether there was anything in the nature of a trust as far as they were concerned with respect to that money.

Mr. CRERAR: No, I understand not; but after all the responsiblity is with the province of New Brunswick to look after its own financial obligations.

Mr. STIRLING: As this may be said to come under the head of assisted passage schemes, in view of what the press has told us in the last few days with regard to Canberra, that the Commonwealth of Australia is prepared to discuss the further use of assisted passage schemes, would the minister be prepared to make any statement with regard to the views of the government concerning such schemes?

Mr. CRERAR: I am not prepared at the present time to make any definite statement on that question. Of course that does not relate to the item under consideration.

Mr. STIRLING: This was an assisted passage scheme?

Mr. CRERAR: Not in the ordinary sense. It was the result of a three-cornered arrangement entered into between the federal government, the New Brunswick government and the British government in 1927. Under that agreement I presume possibly some assistance might have been given in regard to passage. I could not say.

Mr. STIRLING: Yes, there was some assistance.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is the amount being provided now the total cost to the government?

Mr. CRERAR: No, it is the total amount of our obligation to the New Brunswick government. If my hon. friend's question is whether or not this is the total cost to the federal government, the answer is in the negative. What losses will ultimately accrue to the federal government when the scheme is finally liquidated cannot be determined at this time.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Has the minister the total cost to the federal government to date?

Mr. CRERAR: The total cost of this New Brunswick family scheme?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes.

Mr. CRERAR: No, I do not know that I can give that information at the moment. This item, of course, has nothing to do with losses up to date. It deals with the carrying out of an arrangement made with the government of New Brunswick. The other information for which my hon. friend asks of course can be made available when the ordinary soldier settlement estimates are before the house.

Mr. BENNETT: The effect of the agreement was that we took over the liability of New Brunswick, which amounted to about $1,450 per farm, or thereabouts. We have taken their place, but instead of paying the purchase price in instalments the minister is providing this lump sum to defray the whole cost, and New Brunswick no longer has any interest in the lands.

Mr. CRERAR: Quite.

Mr. BROOKS: The minister said there were 359 settlers who came under this scheme and that 240 were still on the land. That would leave 114 vacant farms. What disposition has been made of these vacant farms, and how many are still vacant?

Mr. CRERAR: I am afraid I cannot give that information. I did not come prepared to answer a question of that type, or a question such as that asked by the hon. member for Weyburn. That information will be available when the ordinary soldier settlement estimates are before the committee. I repeat that this item is not concerned with losses on farms. It provides an amount to satisfy the obligation to the New Brunswick government which the federal government assumed when the arrangement was made in 1935.

Mr. BROOKS: These farms are being handled under the soldier settlement board, are they not?

Mr. CRERAR: That is correct.

Mr. BROOKS: And they make practically the same disposition of a vacant farm in connection with this scheme as they would under the soldier settlement board?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: They are not under the same statutory obligation.

Mr. CRERAR: No. We assumed all obligations in connection with the farms taken over in 1935, and that involved the total number of farms on which settlers at that time still remained.

Mr. BENNETT: Or had defaulted.

Mr. CRERAR: If there were any cases of default up to 1935—that is, where the settler had left the land,—we did not assume responsibility. We assumed responsibility simply where settlers were still upon the land.

Mr. BENNETT: Occupying the farms.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. SPENCE: The minister said a moment ago that 359 people came out under this scheme to New Brunswick. Did he mean 359 people or families?

Mr. CRERAR: Three hundred and fifty-nine settlers.

Mr. SPENCE: Sometimes there are ten or eleven in a family, and sometimes only five or six.

Mr. CRERAR: There were three hundred and fifty-nine settlers. Whether or not some of them were bachelors, I cannot say.

Mr. SPENCE: That would be a different proposition.

[Mr. Brooks.]

Mr. CRERAR: At any rate that is the number of settlers.

Mr. DOUGLAS: When the item is paid, what assets or security will the government have with respect to those farms?

Mr. CRERAR: It has a claim against the settlers who were still resident on the land at the time the arrangement was made, in 1935.

Mr. BENNETT: Their contract.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the matter concerning Lieutenant Frank Murphy, which I brought up some time ago, included in the item, or shall I have to wait until the other estimates are under consideration?

Mr. CRERAR: The matter to which the hon. member refers is one which might more properly be discussed when the general soldier settlement estimates are before the house. This item deals not with the general problem, but simply with carrying out the arrangement in New Brunswick.

Mr. MacINNIS: Are those settlers self-supporting now?

Mr. CRERAR: I am afraid some of them may not be, but I cannot give the information at this time.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Railway Service—Maritime Freight Rates Act: additional amount, in excess of the sum of $1,800,000 already appropriated, to authorize and provide for the payment from time to time during the fiscal year 1937-38 to the Canadian National Railway Company of the difference (estimated by the auditors of the said company and certified by the said auditors to the Minister of Transport as and when required by the said minister) occurring on account of the application of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, between the tariff tolls and the normal tolls (upon the same basis as set out in section 9 of the said Act with respect to companies therein referred to) on all traffic moved during the year 1937, under the tariffs approved, on the eastern lines (as referred to in section 1 of the said Act) of the Canadian National Railways, $587,505.81.

Mr. BENNETT: Does this mean that there was increased traffic which necessitated the payment of a larger sum than that estimated last year?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): Yes, that is the reason.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has it anything to do with subventions on coal from the maritimes?

Mr. HOWE: No. Subventions on coal is an entirely different matter.

Item agreed to.

Additional amount in excess of the sum of $700,000 already appropriated to provide for payment from time to time during the fiscal year 1937-38 of the difference, estimated by the Board of Railway Commissioners and certified by the said board to the Minister of Transport as and when required by him, occurring on account of the application of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, between the tariff tolls and the normal tolls (referred to in section 9 of the said act) on all traffic moved during 1937 under the tariffs approved by the following companies: Canada and Gulf Terminal Railway; Canadian Pacific Railway, including: Fredericton & Grand Lake Coal & Railway Company, and New Brunswick Coal and Railway Company; Cumberland Railway & Coal Company; Dominion Atlantic Railway; Maritime Coal, Railway & Power Company; Sydney & Louisburg Railway; Temiscouata Railway Company, $94,951.96.

Mr. HOWE: This is a similar vote, with the exception that it is for the Canadian Pacific and other railways.

Mr. BROOKS: How does the item compare with the same item last year?

Mr. HOWE: It is larger than last year's item, due to the larger volume of traffic which has been moving in the maritimes during the past year. Of course this is a statutory item and quite uncontrollable. The amount of it depends entirely on the volume of traffic moving in the region to which the rate is applicable.

Mr. BROOKS: This afternoon in explaining the conditions surrounding the laying off of men in other parts of Canada the minister stated that the union in Moncton did not agree to the lay-off. He also said there were not as many men to lay off at that point, due to the increased traffic on railways in the maritimes. Does he expect that increased traffic to continue after the closing of the winter ports at Halifax and Saint John, or will there be a considerable lay-off after the closing of those ports?

Mr. HOWE: There will be no additional lay-off of shop men on account of the closing of the winter ports. The lay-off there is timed to coincide fairly well with the closing of the rush business.

Item agreed to.

Hudson Bay railway: amount to provide for the difference between expenditures for operation and maintenance and revenue accruing from operation during the year ending March 31, 1938—further amount required, $40,000.

Mr. BENNETT: I should like to make it clear that we would like to discuss the whole question in connection with the operation of the Hudson Bay railway when the estimates for the ensuing fiscal year are before the house. There is no reason for going into the discussion now and again at that time.

Mr. HOWE: That is understood.

Item agreed to.

Interest on rails rolled for Canadian National Railways: to provide for payment under the terms and conditions of orders in council P.C. 1462 and P.C. 1533 of June 7, 1935, respecting orders of steel rails for Canadian National Railways—further amount required, $11,110.50.

Mr. HEAPS: What amount of rails is lying idle at Sydney? Evidently there must be a large quantity if the interest in a short period of time amounts to the large sums mentioned in this and following items. Is there any possibility that the rails which have been manufactured and rolled will be utilized in the immediate future?

Mr. HOWE: The difficulty in connection with the balance of the order is that more rails of 130 pounds per yard were rolled than the railway has been able to use. Practically all that are left are 130-pound rails. The original order was 40,000 tons to the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation Limited and 40,000 tons to the Algoma Steel Corporation.

Mr. BENNETT: That is all main-line steel, and it is not used because it is not required?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct. It has not been required in connection with maintenance.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the value of the steel?

Mr. BENNETT: It would figure out to about $1,360,000.

Mr. HOWE: I have not the exact figure, but there are 15,000 tons in one shop and 19,000 in the other, and the price is $42 per ton.

Mr. HEAPS: I believe this order was given to provide work in the steel mills of Nova Scotia?

Mr. BENNETT: And the Sault.

Mr. HEAPS: I have no objection to a policy of that kind being adopted within reasonable limits. But if orders are given in excess of requirements I believe there will be adverse reaction all the way round. From what the minister has said it will be some considerable time before the rails so produced in those mills can be used by the Canadian National Railways. In the meantime there must be considerable loss by deterioration. Although I do not know how fast steel will deteriorate, the minister's engineering experience may place him in a position to tell us.

Mr. HOWE: The steel is not allowed to deteriorate. There is no difficulty at the Algoma plant, but at Sydney there has been some rusting and pitting. There is an item, No. 448, to pay for rubbing the steel down, removing rust and oiling the rails. The difference between conditions at the Sault and at Sydney are purely climatic; at one point there is moist salt air, and at the other the air is dry.

Item agreed to.

To authorize the writing off to consolidated revenue fund of the amount of $53,895.18, being the amount charged to the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific railways, and representing the difference between the six per cent sales tax on which their contracts for railway equipment ordered under the provisions of the Supplementary Public Works Construction Act, 1935, were based, and the eight per cent sales tax imposed by chapter 45 of the Statutes of 1936: Canadian National Railways, $24,394.34; Canadian Pacific Railway, $29,500.84; total, $53,895.18.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it necessary to come to parliament for this item? Is there not power to remit the tax? The sales tax was increased from six to eight per cent and we are being asked to take care of the extra two per cent. Would not it be possible to deal with this under the finance and audit act?

Mr. HOWE: As my hon. friend is probably aware, the Department of Justice has always taken the view that a contract entered into prior to the date the increase in the sales tax became effective, is not adjustable to provide for such increase. I think that is why our law officers have decided that this should come to parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think it is necessary, but it is all right.

Mr. HAYHURST: Is the eight per cent sales tax added to the manufacturers' or wholesale price?

Mr. HOWE: To the manufacturers' price.

Item agreed to.

GOVERNMENT OWNED ENTERPRISES

Canadian National Railway Company—Additional amount, in excess of the sum of $35,000,000 already appropriated, and the sum of $6,890,000 authorized by governor general's warrant, to be paid from time to time, under such conditions as the Minister of Finance may prescribe, to the Canadian National Railway Company (hereinafter called "the National Company") and to be applied by the National Company in payment of the deficit arising in the calendar year 1937, including such supplementary contribution to the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railway employees' provident fund as may be necessary to provide for payment in full of monthly allowances under the provisions of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway Employees' Provident Fund Act, notwithstanding the limitation contained in section four of the said act, and including such supplementary contribution to the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada superannuation and provident fund as may be necessary to enable payment to be made of monthly allowances under the rules and regulations of the fund, notwithstanding the limitation contained in section thirteen of chapter sixty-five of the statutes of Canada, 1874, but not including amounts charged to proprietor's equity of the national railway system as defined in chapter twenty-two of the statutes of Canada, 1937, $455,867.99.

Mr. BENNETT: There will be a good deal of discussion in connection with some of the items in these supplementary estimates, especially the $6,890,000 authorized by governor general's warrants. It will be remembered that $35,000,000 was provided by the statute of last year and was dealt with in the special railway committee. I suggest that the item be allowed to pass on the distinct understanding that when the other matters are before the committee, we can discuss this matter as though it had not been discussed at all.

Item agreed to.

Trans-Canada Air Lines—To hereby authorize and provide for payment from time to time during the fiscal year 1937-38 to Trans-Canada air lines, to be applied by the said Trans-Canada air lines in payment of the deficit (certified by the auditor of the said Trans-Canada air lines to the Minister of Transport as and when required by the said minister) resulting from the operations of the said Trans-Canada air lines during the calendar year 1937, $111,005.07.

Mr. BENNETT: We shall want to make some observations in connection with this item. The minister will remember that we were in the midst of a discussion with respect to the air lines when the vote was before the committee. We were inquiring about the operations of last year, and at that time the minister was not in a position to give us the information. It will naturally take some time to discuss the whole situation in connection with the deficit. If the principle I have suggested is adopted and no question is raised as to our discussing this matter when the main estimates are up, there is no reason why we should delay the passing of the item.

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to discuss this item at that time.

Item agreed to.

National Harbours Board—to provide for payment to National Harbours Board of the amount of the deficit incurred in the calendar year 1937 in the operation of Prescott elevator, $23,858.32.

Mr. BENNETT: This item will be the subject matter of a long discussion. If it is understood that the passing of this item at this time is without prejudice to our right to discuss the operations of the past year, there is no reason why it should not pass. I am afraid it would take a long time to discuss it now.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Conciliation and Labour Act—further amount required, $13,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps we might have an explanation of this item.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): This item is accounted for by additional cost of printing, more particularly in connection with the Labour Gazette and supplements thereto which are published ordinarily at this time of the year. It was assumed that we would be able to meet the requirements of these publications for an amount less than has actually been necessary. The increase in cost is due in part to the fact that certain statistics which are published as a matter of record in the Labour Gazette have required additional printing. During the same period it has been found necessary to employ additional temporary employees, and these two considerations are responsible for the additional amount of $13,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister break down the item?

Mr. ROGERS: It is estimated that the printing accounts for January, February and March, chargeable to this vote, will be as follows:

January	$ 1,900
February	3,600
March (estimated)	8,400

Of the $35,000 voted in the main estimates there remains available a balance of approximately $900. Therefore, the estimated requirements to March 31 total $13,000.

Mr. HEAPS: I had intended raising a question under this item on a subsequent occasion, but I think it is well to take advantage of the first opportunity that presents itself to deal with one aspect of conciliation which I think is of considerable interest. I am sorry I could not give the minister advance notice of my intention to raise this question as in that event he probably would have had full information before him. My question concerns a dispute between the employees and the management of the Canadian Press which has been pending for some time. It seems that they are farther away from settlement at the present time than they were when the dispute first started several months ago. From information I have received it appears that the management has taken rather a high-handed attitude toward the employees and has refused consistently to recognize their organization. I have seen their representatives who have been in touch with the Department of Labour; but it seems that there are certain formalities to contend with, which, instead of having the effect of bringing the parties to a closer agreement have had the tendency of creating difficulties in the attainment of that particular objective.

The Canadian Press is a semi-public organization, and we would have thought that its management would have set a better example to the rest of the country than it has. Difficulties have been placed in the way of the employees organizing, and the employers will not recognize the organization or union which has been formed. In December of last year the employees sent a memorandum to the employers, and in view of the fact that there is before parliament a bill introduced by the leader of our group, having a direct bearing on this question, perhaps it would not be out of place if I read a few extracts from the memorandum. This is a memorandum prepared by the employees and submitted to Mr. Livesay of the Canadian Press:

> This committee, representing your telegraph employees, requested this conference for the purpose of formally seeking acknowledgment and recognition of our right to organize and to bargain collectively with the Canadian Press through representatives of our own choosing.

And further:

> To reach this common ground we believe it is essential the employees be organized, as the Canadian Press is organized, to permit representatives from both sides to meet as occasion warrants to discuss and agree upon terms of employment.
> To reach this common ground we believe it is essential the employees be organized, as the Canadian Press is organized, to permit representatives from both sides to meet as occasion warrants to discuss and agree upon terms of employment.
> However, we believe you will agree with us when we say that the Canadian Press has been organized and developed primarily in the interests of its members who make up the Canadian Press. In other words, for the benefit of the employer.
> We believe our desires in these respects can only be properly approached and considered if we are organized and are granted the right to bargain collectively through our chosen representatives.
> That is why we respectfully request the Canadian Press to approve our right to organize and to extend us the right to bargain collectively.

Further on in the same submission they state:

> We believe a union agreement between the Canadian Press and the employees will prove mutually beneficial.
> Such an agreement, when negotiated, would represent the best possible conditions and terms of employment that can be established.

I could go on and give quite a number of similar quotations from the submission of the employees asking their employers to recognize the fundamental right of the employees to organize into a union of their own choice. This submission, which was made to the employers on December 7 last, was refused by the company, and now, as a result of the terms of the conciliation act as it stands at present, the employees are compelled to take a strike vote before the Canadian Press need agree to a board of conciliation being appointed.

I should like to state the case of the employees in a little more detail to show what a strong case they have for organization. In Canada, employees in certain categories who are known as junior punchers receive an average wage of approximately $22.50 a week, and senior punchers receive approximately $30 a week. In this country their hours of labour are forty-eight hours a week. I want to compare these wages with those paid in the United States, and give the hours of work there. Wages for junior punchers in the United States are $45 a week, as against $22.50 a week in Canada, and senior punchers in the United States receive $52.50 a week as against $30 a week in Canada. In the United States they work from 36½ to 41 hours a week, as against 48 hours a week in Canada.

The men who are asking for recognition of the right of the employees to bargain collectively are members of the same international trade union as those who receive these tremendously higher rates of wages in the United States. But when the employees in this country attempt to band themselves together for the purpose of submitting their claims collectively to the Canadian Press, they are met with all kinds of obstacles, technicalities and difficulties when they request that a board of conciliation be appointed. I understand from the information which I have received, and which I think is reliable, that the Canadian Press has refused to accept a board of conciliation until such time as the employees have taken a strike vote on whether they will go out on strike to enforce improved conditions of employment.

One point I am trying to make is that I do not think it should be necessary for the employees in their organization to be compelled to go to the length of taking a strike vote before the Department of Labour will grant a board of conciliation. If a strike vote is forced on the employees, it only tends, I think, to create greater difficulties subsequently than would be the case if the board of conciliation were appointed without this necessary formality of a strike vote. I know the viewpoint of the department, and I am quite sure that had they been in a position to grant the employees a board of conciliation without a strike vote being taken, this would have been done. But in view of the circumstance that the department is not in a position to grant a board of conciliation in this case without the formality of a strike vote having first been taken, I would ask the minister if some ways and means could not be found of amending the existing act or regulations to give the department power to grant a board of conciliation without this formality of the employees having first to take a strike vote.

Mr. ROGERS: As my hon. friend has just stated, he advised me only a moment ago of his intention to bring up this question at this time. It is quite true that there has been a dispute between the Canadian Press and some of its employees.

Mr. BENNETT: What class of employees?

Mr. ROGERS: The teletype operator. It was the hope of the department that it would be found possible to settle this dispute by direct negotiation. As a matter of fact, it is my own view that whenever these disputes can be settled by direct negotiation and collective bargaining, it is desirable that they should be so settled. But as my hon. friend has stated, apparently there has arisen a difficulty which is not capable of settlement by direct negotiation, and application has been made for a board of conciliation under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. That application is now pending, and I am sure it will not be expected that I should make any statement at this time with respect to the merits of the controversy. That would be wholly improper, but I can assure my hon. friend that the application will be dealt with on its merits. Certainly there has been no intention on the part of officials of the Department of Labour to place obstacles in the way of having this application granted.

As perhaps members are aware, it is necessary, in order to avoid the setting up of boards sometimes for frivolous purposes, to require that certain declarations shall be made in connection with the application, and one of those declarations is to the effect that unless the dispute is adjusted or a board is set up there is a reasonable and probable belief that a strike will ensue. That, after all, is the reason why the Department of Labour sets up a board in such cases, to prevent a strike in industry.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is that equivalent to what is known as a strike vote?

Mr. ROGERS: A strike vote is commonly taken. I can assure my hon. friend of that, although I have not the statute before me. As perhaps will be recalled, a strike vote was taken at a later stage in connection with the dispute last year between the railway companies and their employees. I should like to say, however, that under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act a board can be set up without the consent of both parties. As a matter of fact, that has been done within recent months in a dispute which arose in the Minto coal fields. At the same time it is always desirable that both parties to a dispute should cooperate in selecting the personnel of the board. I am sure my hon. friend will appreciate the importance of that, and therefore the department believes that if and when this board is established, it will have the full cooperation of the management of the Canadian Press with respect to the nomination of a representative of the employers concerned.

Mr. HEAPS: I would emphasize that I have no complaint at all in this particular case against the Department of Labour.

Mr. ROGERS: I am just making the point that the application is pending and will be dealt with on its merits.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the department, in the minister's opinion, the legal right to establish a board against the consent of one of the parties to the dispute?

Mr. ROGERS: What can be done under one section of the act is to set up a board on the initiative of the minister. When that is done, we still ask both parties to the dispute to make their nominations to the board; but if one of the parties should refuse, that nomination can be made at the instance of the Minister of Labour. I mention that because that situation arose in recent months in connection with the dispute at Minto. The board was set up by the minister. The employers concerned declined to make a nomination, and the nomination was made by the minister in order to complete the personnel of the board.

Mr. HEAPS: Have any objections been raised?

Mr. ROGERS: In the Minto case objections were raised, but they were not pressed. The board was set up and has functioned.

Mr. BENNETT: The Snider case made it clear that jurisdiction with respect to some phases rests entirely with the provincial authority.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: It would be competent for the province to set up a board under the decision in the Snider case. We are operating under a sort of modus vivendi so far as the general application of the act is concerned.

Mr. ROGERS: After the decision in the Snider case was rendered, the provinces passed enabling legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: Not all of them.

Mr. ROGERS: Not all of them, but the majority did; and it is under that enabling legislation that the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act has functioned with respect to provincial undertakings or public utilities operating wholly within the boundaries of one province.

Mr. CHURCH: This act is not as useful as it used to be in industrial cities. For example, three people came to me with regard to applications. There is concurrent jurisdiction, the Ontario government having a department that does almost similar work. That department uses the conciliation and labour office for the same purpose. Has there been any overlapping since last year or the year before? I thought there would be a good deal less work. I had some correspondence with the labour department, and they referred me to the labour and conciliation department of the province. I wonder if there has been any falling off in applications from, say Toronto.

Mr. ROGERS: I have not that information before me at the moment; but I would say that as a result of the setting up of conciliation services in the larger provinces, particularly in Ontario and Quebec, there has been a moderate reduction in the work done by the conciliation officers of the federal Department of Labour. There are quite obvious reasons for that change. In both Ontario and Quebec, within recent years boards have been set up to deal with the regulation of wages. That has established a much closer contact between provincial authorities and labour and industry in general. Not only that, but some of the disputes that occur are referable in part to decisions which have been given by fair wage boards in the provinces. In this connection I might refer to the fact that disputes have recently occurred in Cornwall in the plant of Canadian Cottons, due in some part to a misunderstanding with respect to wage regulations which were put into effect by the wage and labour board of Ontario. The dominion Department of Labour enters a dispute at the invitation of the parties concerned. It is always ready to send a conciliator to deal with a dispute under those conditions; but where a dispute occurs in a province that has its own conciliation service, we do not as a rule intervene when the conciliator of the provincial department is dealing with the situation. I think the reasons are clear why it is not desirable that there should be intervention under such circumstances. We try to avoid duplication and conflict as between the services of the two departments. The chief interest of both departments is, of course, to settle disputes; the desideratum is cooperation between the departments involved.

Mr. BENNETT: One is a compellable jurisdiction and the other is not.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Employment Offices Coordination Act—further amount required, $2,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: What cooperation is there between the minister's department and similar departments in the provinces?

Mr. ROGERS: This item calls for an additional expenditure in the administration of the act. The additional amount is explained by the further printed forms which were required for distribution to the various employment offices throughout the country. Under the act the dominion government, through the head office, supplies forms to all employment offices, and during the past year there has been an unusually heavy demand. There is not a dominion employment service distinct from the employment service that operates in the various provinces. The employment service of Canada is provided for under the Employment Offices Coordination Act, which provides for an annual grant of $150,000. This amount is paid to the various provinces to assist them in establishing or maintaining a coordinated system of employment offices across the dominion.

Mr. BENNETT: Following the judgment of the supreme court, they were provincial and we undertook to assist them.

Mr. ROGERS: The function has always been recognized as a provincial one; but after a number of employment offices were established in several provinces, it was decided that it would be of advantage to have the various services coordinated, and in 1918 this was brought about under the Employment Offices Coordination Act. From that time forward the dominion government has paid a grant in aid of $150,000, divided among the several provinces to assist them in maintaining employment offices. The dominion branch is a clearing house for information and assists in the transfer from one province to another of those seeking employment. It provides forms to all employment offices, so that one might say that the service is cooperative in character.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

Public Printing and Stationery—codifying and printing 3,000 copies of the revised edition of the criminal code, 1927, English, $4,041.77.

Mr. MALLETTE (Translation): Is this item No. 453 for the reprinting of the code?

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): The criminal code is revised periodically. This amount is for printing 3,000 copies to be distributed in part in accordance with an order in council, the rest being sold to the public at $3 a copy. There is also a French edition, which was reprinted about a year or two ago.

Mr. BENNETT: What was paid for codifying the code, and to whom?

Mr. RINFRET: Three hundred dollars, to Mr. Ollivier, the law clerk of the House of Commons.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—Patent Record, further amount required, $3,500.

Mr. RINFRET: Last year's vote was reduced by $4,800, and we find that we shall need $3,500 to complete the year. We cannot say in advance the number of drawings and applications that we shall have to print in the Patent Record. There will be still a saving of over $1,000?

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister at some later date in the session make a statement as to the condition of the patent records? I am informed that the filing, classification and proper recording of patents are hopelessly in arrears. This may be due to lack of staff; it may be due to a huge number of applications for trivial matters scarcely to be classified as discoveries or inventions; but I am informed that the condition of the office records is such that officials have virtually thrown up their hands, and trust to the chance of the moment for the discovery of whatever is asked for. This is a serious matter, as there may be occasions when bona fide inventions have been made and application for patent filed, and others discovering something of the same kind, or perhaps seeking to copy it, also are filing applications, with the result that the original applicant may lose his right because of the improper condition of the records. It may be unfair to ask the minister to answer at the moment, but he might get the information and give it to us at a later date on the main estimates.

Mr. RINFRET: I appreciate my hon. friend's action in not pressing his point now. I think we all desire to expedite these supplementary estimates. We are fully aware of some conditions to be improved in the patent office. We have for the last year or so divided the work of the patent office from that of trade-marks; only a few weeks ago by order in council the trade-marks branch was transferred under a separate official in order to obtain as far as possible the very end my hon. friend has just mentioned. I shall be pleased on another occasion to supplement this information by a full statement.

Item agreed to.

Adjustment of war claims—Department of the Secretary of State, $13,990.78.

Mr. STEWART: Would the minister give an outline of this item?

Mr. RINFRET: I may explain that this item represents, not the payment of war claims, but additional legal costs incurred to cover the extradition and prosecution of Freeman Hatfield in connection with the loss of the Gypsum Queen and also in the case of Rex v. Logan in the same connection.

Mr. BENNETT: How much money was recovered from Hatfield?

Mr. RINFRET: The amount that was recovered was $23,013.48, and I must say that the total litigation cost will far exceed that amount. The matter is not yet closed, because there is before the supreme court an appeal in which judgment has not been rendered.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

Government of the Northwest Territories—

Expenses connected with the administration of the territories—further amount required, $15,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister give a short statement of how this amount is made up?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): A year ago the vote for the Northwest Territories was underestimated, or rather there developed in the territories conditions that were not foreseen. About half of this vote is for relief purposes, to Indians, white residents and Eskimos in the territories, and the other half is for increased hospitalization costs for the Indians and other residents of that territory.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the minister give particulars of that when the main estimates are up?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; I can do that.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—To provide for payments in connection with movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council—further amount required, $275,000.

Mr. BENNETT: More tons of coal at the same rate?

Mr. CRERAR: Precisely. It was underestimated last year, or in other words there was a heavier movement than anticipated.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Fruit—further amount required, $15,681.05.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Some hon. member asked for particulars regarding this vote when it was first brought up. The extra expenditure is made necessary, partly, because of movement of fruit this year to the western provinces as a result of the drought. There were extra expenses for inspection in connection with that movement.

An analysis of the fruit branch vote and the expenditures to date indicates that expenditures to the end of the fiscal year will exceed the amount provided in the vote by $15,681.05. The causes of the unexpected deficit are expenditures which could not be foreseen when the 1937-38 estimates were prepared. The estimated cost of inspection of fruits and vegetables purchased for drought relief accounts for part of it, and unavoidable expenditures which were not foreseen and provided for in 1937-38 estimates, for the other part.

In the cooperative arrangement with the bureau of economics, United States Department of Agriculture, it was arranged that there should be an interchange of inspectors for short periods of time so that our inspectors located at the principal markets might learn at first hand the United States interpretations of their grades and methods of inspection, and similarly United States inspectors might obtain knowledge of Canadian grades and inspection methods. As a part of this arrangement, senior inspectors McNiven and Jackson spent a period of time on the Boston and New York markets, at a cost of $285.25 to the department.

Cable, telegraph and telephone expenditures were higher than normal, as our collection of information regarding supplies and market trends for the use of the Department of National Revenue in its application of dumping duties was greatly increased over the year before. The appointment of an arbitration board to pass on complaints made by shippers, carriers or receivers under the licensing regulations provided for the appointment of outside members and the payment of any expenses incurred by them in attendance at meetings, and a daily stipend for all members other than government employees. It was estimated that these expnditures would approximate $500 for the current year.

These unforeseen expenditures, including estimated amounts, total $10,181.54.

Our experience this year indicates how difficult it is to estimate closely for our needs. For a number of years the fruit branch has been able to return a surplus to the treasury, and has consistently reduced its estimate, the 1937-38 vote being the lightest in a number of years. In 1937, crops were heavy, particularly apples, with the result that our inspection staff had to be maintained at strength for a period longer than usual. To indicate the increased amount of work, it might be pointed out that during the nine months ended December 31, 1937, 27,950 commercial inspections were made, as compared with 23,433 during the corresponding period of the previous year.

In order that we may meet our expenditures for the remainder of the fiscal year the additional amount of $15,681.05 is required. The total is made up as follows:

Drought relief project:
758 carlot inspections of fruits and vegetables at one day per car; 758 days at $5 per day		$3,790 00
Additional expenses in connection with above based on average transportation and meal expenses per commercial inspection; 758 days at $1.50 per day		1,137 00
Communication expenses—head office:
Telegrams	$410 24
Telephones	162 27
		572 51
		$5,499 51

In connection with the other extra inspection work the details are as follows:

Western Ontario
1 Inspector, salary		$ 945 00
Expenses to December 31		394 26
2 Inspectors (highway inspection Gravenhurst) salaries		722 88
		$ 2,062 14
Eastern Ontario
1 Inspector, salary		1,302 10
Expenses to December 31		761 46
Estimated January 1-March 31		100 00
1 Stenographer grade 1 appointment, August		438 00
		$ 2,601 56
Northern Ontario
1 Inspector, salary		1,431 61
Expenses to December 31		699 98
Estimated January 1-March 31		300 00
		$ 2,431 59
Technical equipment, ordered in 1936-37, but not delivered in time to be paid out of that vote		1,051 00
Special grant for purchase of equipment to be used in research connected with maple syrup problem		750 00
Exchange of inspectors — arrangement with U.S. Department of Agriculture, McNiven & Jackson to Boston and New York		285 25
Cables, telegrams, telephones—
Dump duties and export control regulations, estimated		500 00
Arbitration board—estimated expenditures		500 00
Total		$10,181 54

This amount, together with the amount for the special inspection of fruit purchased for western delivery, totals $15,681.05. I may say that the expenditure of $1,000,000 in connection with fruit and other supplies for Saskatchewan comes under another vote in these supplementaries, and can be better discussed under that item.

Mr. STIRLING: In the ordinary way the inspection fee is, of course, borne by either the producer or the shipper. Do I understand that in this case the government has taken over the whole cost of the inspection of these 793 cars?

Mr. GARDINER: The government took over the whole cost of purchasing these supplies for western Canada, and any charges in connection with that were paid out of departmental expenses.

Mr. MacNICOL: Were there any volunteers, any public spirited citizens who were willing to assist the country in its distress?

Mr. GARDINER: Speaking from memory, I believe there were between 1,000 and 1,200 carloads of commodities of all kinds shipped.

Mr. MacNICOL: I mean in connection with distribution.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; much of the distribution was made in that way; that is, by volunteer assistance.

Mr. PERLEY: Would the minister explain just why, in connection with the distribution of this fruit in Saskatchewan, Doctor Stapleford was employed at such a high salary, according to the answer given last week?

Mr. GARDINER: He was paid, not under this item but under the vote of $1,000,000 which we shall come to later on.

Mr. PERLEY: I understand, then, that under the other item we shall have an opportunity of discussing the whole question.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Miscellaneous—administration of the Old Age Pensions Act—further amount required, $10,000.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): This is to cover the expenses of medical inspection of blind applicants for pensions.

Item agreed to.

To provide for payment of honorarium to A. S. Whiteley, secretary to the royal commission on the textile industry, $1,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Why should he receive this?

Mr. LENNARD: Where was Mr. Whiteley otherwise employed?

Mr. DUNNING: I believe Mr. Whiteley is a clerk in the bureau of statistics, with a salary of $1,620 per annum. Apparently he has served on several occasions in connection with inquiries and was chosen by the commissioner for this service. The commissioner made a strong recommendation to the government that consideration should be given, in the manner which apparently has been followed on previous occasions when extra services of this kind were involved.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister must remember that he was given a per diem expense allowance.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, for his actual expenses; he was given no additional remuneration. Everyone connected with the inquiry, on both sides, paid great tribute to Mr. Whiteley's availability at all times, without regard to civil service hours or anything of that sort. The government deemed it wise to ask the house to recognize such services.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

MEASURE FOR ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide assistance towards the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress, and for such payments out of moneys appropriated by parliament as may be necessary for all or any of the purposes of the proposed legislation.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. ROGERS: This resolution precedes the introduction of an annual bill for the relief of unemployment and agricultural distress. The bill when introduced will be similar, in general terms, to the Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act, 1937, which expires at the close of this month.

Under the terms of the legislation, and subject to the appropriations made by parliament for the purpose, provision is made first for the initiation and execution of works and undertakings by the dominion government, in order to relieve unemployment and agricultural distress and, second, for financial assistance to the provinces, under appropriate agreements, in order to assist them in their efforts to deal with unemployment needs and also the serious conditions which have arisen in certain sections of the prairie provinces because of prolonged drought.

I realize fully that it will be the desire of members of the house to discuss the unemployment question at some length before the Easter recess, and with this in mind, on second reading of the bill which will be introduced following the approval of the resolution, I intend to make a full statement on behalf of the government. We propose to move second reading of the bill on Monday. Meantime, it is intended to-morrow to table and distribute the final report of the national employment commission. That, again, seemed to be a good reason why it was best that my statement should be deferred until hon. members had enjoyed full opportunity to read the report of the commission.

In these circumstances I feel I may fairly ask for the cooperation of the committee in expediting passage of this resolution in order that we may proceed on Monday with the second reading of the bill.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This seems to be a strange procedure. I have no desire to delay the regular business of the house; but it seems to me that the report of the national employment commission should be in our hands before the resolution is placed before the committee and, further than that, that the time to make the full statement the minister promises is during the discussion of the resolution, and not afterwards. Members of the committee are at this time in a position intelligently to discuss the resolution.

This resolution and the bill which will be founded upon it deal with the most important matter which has come before the house this year. It would seem to me highly desirable that we take no step whatever until the fullest information is before the committee, and therefore I take this opportunity to protest against this procedure. I am afraid that members in this little corner will have to ask the minister to make his statement before he may expect us to pass the resolution.

Mr. STEWART: I suggest to the minister that on the introduction of the resolution it would be appropriate to make a comprehensive and complete statement of policy, and a review of conditions in connection with unemployment. To many hon. members the legislation coming down will be the most important of the session. Unemployment has been with us for at least seven years, and I believe that, as on second reading of a bill we are limited to a discussion of the principle involved, there should be a more complete and comprehensive statement than the minister has outlined, or has intimated he intends to make to-night.

The principle of the bill will be a provision for the relief of unemployment. I am sure no hon. member would disagree with such a principle. Therefore, perhaps our discussion on that occasion would be to some extent limited. I am sure the minister is in a position to-night to review the legislation adopted by parliament during the seven years to which I have referred, and no doubt he is in a position to outline in more or less detail what is proposed, and also to give us a fairly comprehensive statement of the work of the employment commission. That commission has been working for a year. Does it suggest anything new? Is there any radical departure from the principles and methods adopted in the past five years in dealing with this question? What objectives has the government in mind? Particularly, how do those objectives differ in principle, if they do differ, from those which have been adopted in years gone by? Are we to have a supplementary estimate covering unemployment relief, and all that sort of thing?

I believe that in justice to the committee the minister ought at this time to make a fairly comprehensive statement along the lines I have indicated. I do not think anything else will satisfy the committee, and I believe the passage and understanding of the bill would be promoted by the timely and complete statement which the minister, with his accurate knowledge of conditions, could make.

Mr. ROGERS: I am entirely in the hands of the committee. So far as the question of procedure is concerned, may I say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that in submitting the resolution in this manner I am following the practice established in two previous years. I am quite sure I am correct when I state that in each of those years the committee accepted the resolutions after brief discussion, and our debates on unemployment took place on second readings, and during the committee stages of the bills. I say that only to assure the hon. member that there is no desire on my part to deviate from well established practice in this regard.

On the other hand I fully realize—and it has again been brought to my attention by those who have just spoken—that it is most desirable that there should be at this time a full and comprehensive statement on unemployment conditions. It was and still is my intention to make such a statement. On the other hand, I did feel, and still feel, that if that discussion is to be profitable, it is desirable that it take place after, and not before the report of the national employment commission has been tabled and distributed. Under these conditions and with the desire to meet the wishes of the committee as fully as possible, I would suggest that the resolution remain in committee. I shall make my statement after the report of the national employment commission has been tabled to-morrow; that is, in accordance with my original arrangement, I shall make it on Monday of next week. If this meets with the approval of those who have just spoken, I shall move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

The house again in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

To provide for feed and fodder relief in the dried-out areas — further amount required, $1,000,000.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I might suggest to the members of the committee that items 462 and 463 are for exactly the same purposes as items 469 and 470. All the discussion with regard to detail could take place under the other items, if that meets with the approval of the committee. The amounts provided for by items 462 and 463 have been found to be necessary since parliament opened. These were not provided for by warrant, but they are to be used for exactly the same purpose as those amounts provided by warrant and to be found on the back page of the supplementary estimates.

Mr. PERLEY: Does the minister mean that discussion can take place under items 469, 470 and 471?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is right.

Item agreed to.

Governor General's Warrants, 1937-38—

To provide for the purchase and distribution of feed and fodder for live stock in the drought areas, and in rural municipalities and local improvement districts not included in the drought areas, of Saskatchewan and Alberta; for freight charges and for the cost of moving equipment used in providing feed requirements; also expenses of marketing cattle in the drought areas (Governor General's warrants of August 6, and October 29, 1937, and January 19, 1938), $13,750,000.

Mr. COLDWELL: What supervision is given by the federal Department of Agriculture? I have had some complaints as to the quality of feed grain which has been distributed in some parts of Saskatchewan. I wrote to the minister this morning giving the details of one of these complaints, but of course he will not yet have received my communication. My information is that some of the grain shipped in was in such condition that the farmers hesitated to feed it to their hogs. I was wondering if the federal department is giving any supervision to the purchase and distribution of this grain or whether this work is being left to the local authorities. I should like to know whether complaints of this nature should come to the minister here or be sent to the Saskatchewan Department of Agriculture.

Mr. GARDINER: In connection with feed and fodder, the federal government provides the funds to pay the accounts, while the provincial government makes the purchases. The federal government has a staff of approximately thirty to forty which checks the grain and fodder for the purposes of grading. Most of the fodder is graded where it is purchased, some of it being graded on the farm where it is located. The grain is graded at certain points through which the cars pass when it is not possible to grade it where it is purchased. This grading occurs at points like Moose Jaw and Calgary. It may happen that the grain was threshed under conditions which were not too good. There was considerable rain in Alberta during the threshing season, and also in Manitoba during the latter part of the season. Of course, grain that was loaded into cars in a damp condition might arrive at destination not in too good shape. If we consider the quantity that has been handled, there has been very little reported to us as having been in poor condition.

Two or three weeks ago I received from southern Alberta a sample which I would have condemned. I did not know all the circumstances, so I sent it back to have them checked up. I do not think any inspector should have passed this grain. Occasionally cars or parts of cars get by the inspection, but one must understand that the ordinary channels of trade for grain in western Canada are east and west. Grain moves to Winnipeg or Vancouver. When you start moving grain across the regular channels of trade, that is from the north of the province to the south, you must set up an organization for checking and grading purposes. All grading organizations are now located at Winnipeg or at the other end, and it has been found necessary to set up more or less temporary organizations. It is extremely difficult to make a proper check as would be the case if the grain moved in the regular channels.

Mr. PELLETIER: I notice that this item refers to relief outside the drought area, and I should like to have a break-down of the figure. How much money was spent in Saskatchewan and in Alberta?

Mr. GARDINER: It would be difficult to give the exact amounts spent to date. The nearest I can get to that is to give the amounts which were provided. We entered into agreements with Alberta and Saskatchewan providing for maximum sums of money that the federal government would supply for feed and fodder for relief purposes in certain areas. In the case of Saskatchewan, up to August 6, there had been provided $200,000 in one amount and $2,700,000 in another. Those are the amounts covered by the agreement, not what was spent to that date. Then in October, for feed and fodder in the federal area in Saskatchewan, there was provided $5,000,000, and $1,000,000 for the area outside what has been termed the federal area.

Mr. PELLETIER: I should like to know the amount of money spent outside the drought area.

Mr. GARDINER: I shall give all the figures and perhaps the hon. member can separate them. This may save repeating them later on: For feed and fodder in the federal area, $5,000,000; for feed and fodder outside the federal area, $1,000,000. For feed and fodder in the federal area in Alberta, up to the same date, the amount was $750,000. For feed and fodder, on the same date, outside the federal area, the amount was $100,000. On January 19, 1938, inside the federal area in Saskatchewan, the amount was $1,000,000. Those are the total amounts up to the vote of $1,000,000, under item 462, for feed and fodder, which we put through a few moments ago, and which has to be added. The other vote that we put through was for direct relief, which may be spent partly in Alberta and partly in Saskatchewan.

Mr. PELLETIER: From the minister's figures it would appear that outside the drought area in Saskatchewan not much more than $5,000,000 has been spent, and yet there is a vote of $13,750,000. There seems to be a discrepancy somewhere, or the total amount has not been expended.

Mr. GARDINER: There is still $3,000,000 not accounted for by feed and fodder. That s in the cattle vote. I understood the request was for the feed and fodder figures.

Mr. QUELCH: Certain farmers who did not cut down their stock were not eligible for the grant, I understand, and loans were made this spring or during the winter. Would they be included in this estimate?

Mr. GARDINER: No; the loans are not included in this estimate. These are the warrants for the amounts that were advanced by this government.

Mr. QUELCH: What items do the loans come under?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The hon. member has mentioned an amount of $13,750,000 for local improvements not included in the drought area. What do the expenditures outside the drought area consist of?

Mr. GARDINER: The term "in and outside the drought area" is really a misnomer, as I was going to explain. One year ago in handling this matter, the plan followed was to some extent different from that followed this year. A year ago we took, on the first of September, a certain number of municipalities and accepted responsibility for them right through to March 31. We found by experience a year ago that it was extremely difficult to get decisions in the middle of the season. The provincial government would get an application from a municipality to be admitted to the area, and the province in turn would make application to us, and by the time the matter had been considered by three different authorities perhaps a month had gone by, while in the meantime people were having great difficulty. So this year we adopted a different system. We accepted at the first of September responsibility for all the municipalities that were admitted to the federal area. The federal government agreed with the provincial governments to take responsibility for 170 in Saskatchewan and fifty-three in Alberta from September 1 to March 31. We have accustomed ourselves during the winter to call that area the drought area. But outside and around the fringe of that area there are in Saskatchewan at least ninety municipalities, and in Alberta at least ten municipalities, which are in almost as bad conditions as the others. They are really drought area too; but probably it would not have been necessary to bring them in, if we had been dealing with the matter here, until the first of October in some instances, and the first of November, or the first of December, in others. They could have taken care of themselves to that time. So we said to the provincial governments that we would advance a certain cash amount to be used in those areas. In Saskatchewan the amount was $1,000,000, and in Alberta, $100,000.

The amount of $100,000 for Alberta was not our suggestion. We proposed $200,000 for Alberta, but the provincial government proposed an adjustment in the number of municipalities to be taken in and agreed to take half the amount of money for the outside area provided we made an adjustment. So we took in eleven municipalities that we would have preferred to leave outside the area for which we assumed full responsibility.

These amounts were set aside to assist in taking care of these people outside the area for which we took 100 per cent responsibility.

The provinces were administering the distribution of feed and fodder for the whole area, both the area for which we paid the entire cost and the area in which we gave assistance. So the set-up inside and outside is much the same, and the methods of administration the same; also any regulations governing persons who were obtaining assistance in the form of either direct relief or feed and fodder were intended to be the same. We made inspections to satisfy ourselves that the administration was the same inside and outside the area, once a community had been admitted in under relief.

Mr. PELLETIER: I understand from the minister's explanation that owing to the type of supervision exercised, it is impossible to determine what amount has been spent in Saskatchewan and what in Alberta; that it is impossible to segregate the expenditures.

Mr. GARDINER: It is not impossible at all. As a matter of fact, when the accounts are completed there will be an exact division as between the two. There is no connection at all between the moneys spent in the two provinces. The Alberta government spent all the money provided for that province, and the Saskatchewan government spent all the money provided for that province. We are not spending that money; it is the provincial governments who are spending it through their own organizations. All we are doing is to make a certain check to see that the money is expended in what we think is the proper way and in accordance with the proper regulations.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister said that certain adjustments were made when Alberta agreed to ask for $100,000 instead of $200,000. What were those adjustments?

Mr. GARDINER: The adjustment was this: There were a number of municipalities north and west of Hanna, in the area between Hanna and Edmonton, in the vicinity of Coronation, which the provincial government desired to have admitted to the area. We had selected forty-two other municipalities that we thought, according to our investigation, should come in; but the province asked to have about twenty others around the fringe of the area taken in, and we increased the number from forty-two to fifty-three; that is, we took in eleven more. These municipalities were mostly in the vicinity of Coronation and down towards Drumheller.

Mr. PELLETIER: So it was because some additional municipalities were included in the drought area that it was not necessary for Alberta to ask for an increased grant?

Mr. GARDINER: It was not a matter of an increased grant. The amount we originally suggested which they should have for the outside area was $200,000. They said they would prefer $100,000 for the outside area and for us to take in eleven additional municipalities for which the federal government would assume entire responsibility.

Mr. PELLETIER: Does any part of these moneys consist of loans to the provinces to be repaid to the federal government?

Mr. GARDINER: No; they are grants to the provinces and are not repayable.

Mr. PERLEY: I regret that we have not had an opportunity earlier in the session of discussing this question of relief in Saskatchewan, particularly the distribution of feed and fodder. The minister will remember that in the debate on the address I brought to the attention of the government the critical situation in that province with respect to feed and fodder, and at that time I also drew his attention to the fact that early last fall I had taken this matter up with both the provincial Department of Agriculture and the federal Department of Agriculture here in Ottawa.

The minister will remember that, speaking on the address himself, he stated that he was more concerned about taking care of the situation in March than he was in having feed there in the fall months. In the last three weeks I have been receiving protests and certain information from Saskatchewan indicating quite a critical situation with regard to feed and fodder and grain to take care of the spring work. To-day I received a letter from a farmer in the Indian Head district suggesting that it is almost imperative for the government to see to it that the farmers are provided with tractors and tiller combines to get the crop in, because the horse power is very low. The horses returning from the feeding pastures in Manitoba are in no condition to tackle the spring work. I suggest that the minister give us a detailed statement regarding the quantity of feed and fodder supplied each month, starting with September, to the drought area and semi-drought area in Saskatchewan. We should also have a statement regarding the quantities obtained in Manitoba, Alberta, and the states of Minnesota and North Dakota.

The minister referred to-night to the inspection that has been made of the feed and fodder shipped in. As he said, some of it was not in very good condition. Of course, in Manitoba particularly, from which a good deal of it came, the season was such as to make it difficult to turn it out in proper condition. If we consider the time it was cut and the delay in baling, the weather was such that some of it was damp. I saw some carloads that were shipped in before I left home and they were in poor condition. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said, the fodder was not fit to feed to animals that were expected to show any improvement. It was not fit for dairy cattle or for work horses. The minister has referred to the men inspecting the feed and fodder, for a list of whom I asked some time ago. I am referring to the inspectors whom he mentioned in his speech on the address—some forty-five of them. A return was brought down last week giving the names of some twenty, and I think he should give us the information with regard to the others. These are the men who are doing inspection work in connection with the distribution of relief.

Mr. GARDINER: I might deal with that point now. In my speech on the address I said that at the peak we would not have more than forty-five, and I found in answering the question that, as a matter of fact, we have never had more than thirty-five. At the time the question was asked there were twenty-nine, as the return shows.

Mr. PERLEY: This return shows twenty-eight.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, twenty-eight.

Mr. PERLEY: After receiving that return I asked a question with reference to one of these men in particular, the man at Broadview.

Mr. GARDINER: Agnew.

Mr. PERLEY: Yes. Let me read from the return:

Was A. S. Agnew of Broadview, Saskatchewan, employed in the purchasing of feed and fodder in Manitoba or Minnesota for the province of Saskatchewan?

The answer was that he was employed as a feed grader and used in Minnesota and North Dakota.

Mr. GARDINER: Not in connection with purchase, but as a feed grader.

Mr. PERLEY: Yes. The return goes on.

Employed from October 19, 1937, to February 21, 1938. $125 per month plus actual travelling expenses as follows: October, $137.59; November, $303.52; December, $278.68; January, $205.97; February incomplete.

That man in four months drew some $1,400 by way of salary and expenses.

Mr. GARDINER: He does not draw expenses.

Mr. PERLEY: His expenses were paid.

Mr. GARDINER: The government paid his expenses.

Mr. PERLEY: Yes, and that means that by way of salary and expenses he has cost the country $1,400 in four months. I call that an outrage. There are all sorts of good men available to do such work at a far smaller cost to the country. Would the minister give us the number of other inspectors engaged in similar work. I suggest that he take this list and set out what each one of the inspectors has done, how many were employed in the purchase of feed and fodder, and so on. I understood that there were one or two in Regina, but I do not see their names in the return. They had a commission, I understand, to go to Minnesota to secure feed and fodder, and I suggest that we should have a statement in that regard. Furthermore, the minister should give us a statement with regard to the number of cattle shipped out; the number shipped to different markets; the number shipped to the feeding ground; the number of horses shipped to the feeding ground and the number of those that have been returned. Were there any veterinarians employed in Manitoba to attend to the horses at the feeding grounds in Carberry? We should have all that information. The minister should tell us who these men are and give us their salaries.

I trust that the minister will not treat this request lightly.

He said the other evening that some of the matters I have mentioned were of no concern to this government; that they were of concern only to the Saskatchewan government. May I emphasize the gravity of the situation and the necessity for full information. It is regrettable that such information as we are asking for is forthcoming so late in the season. Early in February I asked for a return, which I suppose may be discussed under item 471, with respect to all commodities distributed in Saskatchewan for relief purposes, and only this evening has the minister been kind enough to hand me a volume containing the information. It covers from twelve to fifteen large pages, and no doubt we shall be asked to accept this document and pass upon it to-night. I must protest against this. The return was ordered on February 23 and I have just been handed it to-night. If the minister thinks we can go through this return hurriedly with regard to quantities of fish, beans and so on, the places of purchase and distribution; if he thinks it is fair to hand such information to us and ask us to consider it intelligently on the spur of the moment, I do not think he will find anyone to agree with him. I suggest that at least the matter should stand until we have had an opportunity to study this return carefully and to ask for any necessary information in connection with it.

I should like to have a statement with regard to the amount of feed supplied each month from Manitoba and the United States, and the minister might tell us something about the pools' offer in connection with the distribution of it. A good deal of money could have been saved in that direction, and I think it important that we should have a statement. We shall ask for certain other information as we go along this evening.

Mr. GARDINER: As to the remarks concerning the return, I saw it for the first time after leaving the house this afternoon. It was placed on my desk to be brought down tomorrow, and I brought it with me to-night and gave it to the hon. member so that he would have it. In fact, he had it within a few minutes after I received it myself. So if there is any information with which he is not familiar, neither am I familiar with it.

Mr. PERLEY: Just there may I say that the order for this return was passed on February 23. It had stood for quite a while owing to the fact that the minister was out west, I am not saying on what business. One of the ministers asked that it stand until he returned; we allowed it to stand, and as soon as the minister got back it was passed. That was on February 23.

Mr. GARDINER: For much of this information we have to send to Regina. The inquiry had to do with work that was done partly in Regina; all the distribution was done there, and so the return could not be completed here.

In regard to the discussion generally, this is not the last opportunity that will be afforded this session of discussing all these matters. Before the session ends, we shall have to put through estimates having to do with supplies for similar activities, and full discussion can then be had of all these matters.

I can give the committee some of the information, although practically everything that has been asked for involves obtaining information from Regina or Edmonton; it is not information that we would have here in detail at any time unless we sent there for it. It has to do with administration of affairs by the provincial governments. We are concerned largely with two things: First, seeing that the accounts are properly audited, making sure that the money is spent for the purpose for which it was voted, and, second, checking the activities to see that in the distribution of feed and fodder and direct relief proper service is being given to the area for which the money is being spent. Outside that we do not go fully into the detail. We receive from time to time returns showing what is being done; but to give the information in all the detail asked for by the hon. member would, I think, be impossible unless he is prepared to wait another two or three months while we get the information. I can, however, give in general terms the division, the amounts of money involved and the tons of fodder. The last summary I have is down to February 7.

On February 7 commitments in Saskatchewan were for 7,816,288 bushels of feed grain, of a value of $5,636,230.38. Amount under commitment at that time: Requirements, 6,944,872 bushels; estimated for cash sale, 346,620 bushels; commitments, 7,816,288 bushels; leaving commitments in excess of requirements, 524,796 bushels. That is a complete statement for the federal area of the drought section of Saskatchewan as far as bushelage is concerned.

In the marginal area, that is the area which is outside what some people call the drought area but which is still in the drought area, the requirements are 2,403,462 bushels; estimated for cash sales—that is bushelage which is sold to people who pay for it—91,603 bushels; commitments, 2,206,738 bushels, leaving requirements in excess of commitments, 288,327 bushels of feed grain.

The commitments for fodder in the federal area to February 7 were 269,000 tons; requirements, 301,000 tons as estimated at that time, leaving 32,000 tons requirement over commitments. The commitments there mean the amounts for which municipalities have asked and which the government has agreed to supply.

In the marginal area commitments are 50,000 tons and requirements 58,000 tons, leaving 8,000 tons of requirements in excess of commitments to that time.

That is as near as I can get to the detail in regard to feed and fodder in Saskatchewan during that period.

So far as the two provinces are concerned, there is a difference in the amounts of money supplied, but there is also a difference in the number of people and the area involved. In Saskatchewan there are 438,000 people on direct relief. In Alberta there are 64,420 people on relief. In dealing with those figures, one must remember that there are many people who are getting feed and fodder for live stock who are not getting direct relief

To give them feed and fodder for their live stock is one of the means of keeping them off direct relief. So there will be an even wider difference in the figures for feed and fodder than in those for relief. A careful check of what is going on over the drought area indicates that there is somewhere between eight and ten times as much area, and between eight and ten times as many people involved in Saskatchewan as in Alberta. If hon. members follow these figures through carefully, they will see that there is just about the same proportion in the amount of money being expended in the respective areas in order to take care of people and live stock there.

In regard to such matters as shortage of power with which to put in the crop and other such complaints, I can only repeat what I said the other evening; it is strange that I should not be getting those complaints. The farmers' organization in Saskatchewan some months ago circularized all its locals, according to the letter they sent to me, asking them to make complaints if there was any cause of complaint, and not very long after that the bulk of the complaints ceased to come. I have not received any considerable number of complaints recently, and since in that area there are in the neighbourhood of 500,000 people involved, I consider it strange that there are not more complaints if there is so much dissatisfaction. But when complaints are received, I do this with them: I write back to the individual who makes the complaint and indicate that the administration is being carried on by the provincial government; that he will get quicker action on his complaint if he writes to Regina or Edmonton than he will by writing Ottawa; but that in the meantime I am sending his complaint on to the officials in Regina or Edmonton and asking them to deal with it as soon as possible. Possibly if hon. members would do the same, we would at least get the assistance to those requiring it at the earliest possible date, if they are not being properly treated now.

Mr. PERLEY: I hope the minister does not think I am trying to exaggerate when I say that we are getting plenty of complaints. I have under my hand at the moment fifty or sixty letters of complaint, and just to-day I received from the secretary of a municipality a letter in which he said they had been informed by the department at Regina that they would not get half of what was required in the way of feed for this spring. That is not one of the 100 per cent areas, of course, but I believe in many instances the situation is just as bad in the 100 per cent districts. So I am not exaggerating at all. If I wanted to do so, I could produce at least fifty complaints of recent date.

Mr. GARDINER: Probably I could produce as many, more or less eulogizing this government and the provincial governments for the efficient way in which this work is being done; but I doubt very much if fifty letters from five hundred thousand people would prove anything one way or the other. An effort is being made by all the authorities, working cooperatively so far as possible, to have this particular job done. I can understand that members might at this time be receiving complaints from people who are a little anxious. The end of our financial year is March 31, and there has to be a cut-off somewhere in the payments that are being made by this government. Arrangements are being entered into as to those cut-off dates. That cut-off is the period between seeding activities and winter feed and fodder activities, and for that reason some people are wondering whether they are going to get sufficient feed and fodder to carry them through the seeding season.

The plans are that the feed and fodder in their possession now will be sufficient to carry them until about the middle of April, although the cut-off is at the end of March so far as the purchase and shipment of feed and fodder are concerned. An effort is being made to start the feed and fodder for seeding purposes moving immediately following April 1, in order to have it in the hands of the people by the time the other feed has been used up, and I think it will be found that there will be as little difficulty in connection with seeding operations as there has been in connection with winter operations. I do not want to leave the impression that everyone will be perfectly satisfied, but everything will be done to see that the work is carried on as efficiently as possible.

Mr. PERLEY: Is the required amount of feed and fodder in sight? Is the government pretty well assured that it will be available?

Mr. GARDINER: I read the figures a few moments ago. I do not know how much they mean to the committee, but they mean a great deal to those who have been finding feed and fodder. According to these figures, between 350,000 and 360,000 tons of fodder have been obtained and shipped into that area from elsewhere. That is a great deal of fodder. We have never required in any previous year to ship more than 260,000 tons; I believe that was the greatest amount ever shipped into that area, and even in years when fodder was available right in the province, when practically all of it could have been found within Saskatchewan for shipment to other parts of the province, it was very difficult to make arrangements to have that done in a way which would be satisfactory to everyone. This year scarcely any fodder was to be obtained anywhere in the province. It was necessary to go to Manitoba in the early part of the season in order to get fodder. Later on, it was necessary to go to Alberta, and I may say that in the early part of the season it was found very difficult to purchase fodder in Alberta because the authorities in that province wanted to make sure of their own supplies first. When eventually it was possible to purchase fodder in Alberta, and after everything possible had been done in those two provinces, they still were unable to get a sufficient supply. The next place they went was the state of Minnesota. Arrangements were made to get supplies, largely of hay, there. The only reason they went to Minnesota was because at that time the freight on hay from the province of Ontario to Regina was $18 a ton. Anyone knows that you cannot feed any animal a ton and a half to two tons of hay when the freight alone, apart altogether from the purchase price of the hay, is $18 a ton.

The first move made by the government of Saskatchewan was to go into the border states of the United States, where the freight rates would be low, buy hay and ship it into that area. But even after they had purchased all that they secured in those states at reasonable prices, they did not have sufficient. Then we brought further influence or pressure to bear on the railway companies in order to get the rates on feed from eastern Canada reduced. It was finally agreed to set a freight rate of $10 a ton on hay from anywhere west of Montreal to the drought area of Saskatchewan, and $10.50 from east of Montreal as far as Three Rivers. A similar arrangement was made in regard to British Columbia.

Mr. BARBER: What was the rate from British Columbia?

Mr. GARDINER: It was $10.50 from east of Montreal and $10 from west of Montreal.

Mr. BARBER: What was the special rate that was arranged from British Columbia?

Mr. GARDINER: There was a similar rate from British Columbia. So far as Saskatchewan was concerned the regulation was that they could not accept hay at a laid down cost in that province of more than $18 a ton, and under the special rate from British Columbia they were able to lay down hay for less than $18 a ton. They were also able to get hay from the eastern part of Canada, under those special rates, for less than that laid down price.

Mr. BARBER: I understood that the laid down price from British Columbia was $16 a ton; from Ontario, $17.50, and so on. Is that correct?

Mr. GARDINER: In that case I would say probably there was a difference of $1 or $1.50 in the freight rate from British Columbia as compared with the freight rate from eastern points. The only part we took in these negotiations was to assist the provincial government in getting special freight rates. They carried on all the other activities in connection with the matter. That was the case in regard to Saskatchewan. Alberta did not purchase outside the province.

Mr. SENN: What was the laid down price of hay and fodder coming in from the United States?

Mr. GARDINER: I could not give my hon. friend the exact figure; but it was considerably under that, probably in the neighbourhood of $15 a ton. It may have been as low as $14 from certain points in the United States, but I imagine the average would be somewhere around $15.

Mr. PERLEY: What was the average price paid in Manitoba?

Mr. GARDINER: The top prices that could be paid were set out in the agreement. The price for hay in Manitoba was $8.50 a ton; that was the top price which could be paid in western Canada for No. 1 hay, and then it was graded down to $6.50 a ton. The average price there would be somewhere between those two figures.

Mr. PERLEY: How much was purchased in the United States?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not the exact figures, but they would be somewhere between 75,000 and 100,000 tons.

Mr. TUSTIN: What was the price paid for hay purchased in the United States ?

Mr. GARDINER: The price there was governed by exactly the same regulations that governed the price in Manitoba and Alberta. It could not be more than $8.50 per ton. It was under that price.

There is one further remark I should like to make. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle tonight made the statement he made previously in his speech on the address in reply, to the effect that some men had been paid commissions to buy hay in Minnesota. I believe at that time I told the house my information was that no commissions were paid for purchasing hay in Minnesota; that the hay was bought in Minnesota at prices which were indicated in the agreements and sent up, and that no one in western Canada obtained a commission in connection with it. Some of it may have been purchased from agents in the state of Minnesota who had bought hay from farmers and who had it for sale, just as was done in Ontario and Quebec. The agents who had hay and straw sold that to the government of Saskatchewan. As to whether or not they made a commission, I do not know; I assume they made a profit. It is possible that men in Minnesota made a profit on hay purchased from farmers and resold to the government. But according to my information there was no commission agent acting for the government of Saskatchewan.

Mr. PERLEY: There was a great deal of hay purchased, though, was there not, from agents who had gone down to Minnesota from Saskatchewan, and who had accumulated quantities of hay there.

Mr. GARDINER: Not to my knowledge. There were men who went to Manitoba and Alberta, I assume—although personally I do not know of any who went there—and there probably were men who went to Minnesota and bought hay to ship to Saskatchewan. Some of that hay has been delivered to the municipalities, and the municipalities have sold it. As a matter of fact, I am buying hay this week, to put in my own crop, from a municipality which imported it from somewhere. I do not know from where it was imported. But I pay for the hay whatever it costs the municipality, plus freight and all other charges added. That has been done by municipal organizations throughout Saskatchewan, as a matter of convenience for the people in the municipalities.

There are no hay dealers in Saskatchewan, because we do not deal in hay. As a matter of fact, in the part of Saskatchewan from which I come we never feed hay. We have not done so in any year. But in a year like this, when we have to ship something in to feed our stock, it pays us better to ship in hay than to ship in straw or oat sheaves. There are no agents there to sell hay. There has to be an organization to do this, and the municipal organization is the one which is most convenient.

Someone may go to Minnesota or Manitoba, buy hay, and ship it in to the order of the municipality, and the municipality in turn may sell it.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. PERLEY: How many checkers were employed in grading the hay? I assume there were checkers employed in checking provincial government accounts. How many checkers were there in Regina checking the accounts for the federal government?

Mr. GARDINER: The comptroller of the treasury has full control over the checking of accounts, and he has placed a few men at each capital. I have not the number in my mind at the moment, but I know it is a very small number, not more than half a dozen, and probably only three or four.

Mr. DUNNING: He puts men there as required.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; he puts them there as required. At certain times there may be more than at others. So far as inspectors are concerned, may I say the hon. member has the list; at least he had it a few moments ago and was reading from it. It must be on his desk in front of him. I have not the list before me, but I do not think it would be of any use to read it. It means something to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, and it means something to me, because we know some of the individuals.

Mr. PERLEY: That is fine, if the minister is willing to admit that the list I have is one of government inspectors.

Mr. GARDINER: That is what the list the hon. member has says.

Mr. PERLEY: And that they draw similar salaries. The information shows a salary of $125 a month, and expenses in some months running as high as $300.

Mr. GARDINER: I would say quite freely that the men on the list the hon. member has are all getting $125 a month, and they are all away from their homes. I think, if he will read the list, he will find they are nearly all farmers, and I think are all out of the drought area.

Mr. DONNELLY: And all doing a good job.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, all doing a good job. They all know hay when they see it; they all know grain when they see it, and they are grading fodder. So far as their expense accounts are concerned, this is made up of a charge of seven cents a mile and living expenses while driving around the country, locating farms where hay is available, and grading it. They must locate grain and grade it, so that when it leaves the point from which it is to be shipped it may be known to be in proper shape. Then, we have other men at the other end who are checking to see that it arrives in proper shape.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Do they also locate where it is required?

Mr. GARDINER: No; the provincial people locate the hay in the first instance. They locate it, and notify us that they have ordered a certain amount of it at a certain place, and we send a man there to grade and check it.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Is it the provincial government which receives the application for relief, in that regard?

Mr. GARDINER: The municipality receives the application for relief, and passes it on, through a committee of council, on which a representative of the province sits. Those applications are then submitted to the provincial governments. We never receive the individual applications here.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I appreciate the problem which must be involved in distributing upwards of $27,000,000 or $28,000,000 of relief, through governor general's warrants, as outlined in these various items. I believe that, despite our sympathies with the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, all hon. members must agree that these are enormous amounts of money, and it seems peculiar that we should have items such as these, providing for "the purchase and distribution of feed and fodder for live stock in the drought areas, and in rural municipalities and local improvement districts not included in the drought areas, of Saskatchewan and Alberta; for freight charges and for the cost of moving equipment used in providing feed requirements; also expenses of marketing cattle in drought areas," and then, right below that, the item to provide for "direct relief expenditures," together with the items we have passed to provide for feed and fodder relief in the dried-out areas, and the further item to provide for direct relief in the dried-out areas.

That seems like a lot of items involving expenditures for the same purpose. What are the freight charges, and what is meant by "the cost of moving equipment used in providing feed requirements"? It seems to me that these items make it possible to provide relief or assistance in districts which are not in the drought area, and to provide money for the marketing of cattle and for the payment of freight—in fact for anything which may be wanted in that one province of Saskatchewan, whether or not the particular district is in the drought area. I do not wish in any way to minimize the problem or the great crisis Saskatchewan has endured, but this seems to be an enormous amount of money. Very wide latitude is also given to the government to make expenditures in connection with those who are in drought areas, and others who are not.

Mr. GARDINER: I believe there is some confusion in the terms "in the drought area" and "out of the drought area." The meaning is exactly as I explained at the beginning of the discussion. What is known as the area "inside the drought area" is what came in after the first of September, and continued right through the year, and in connection with which the federal government pays the whole bill. But immediately outside that area there is another which is just as much in need of assistance as the area inside the line. We took 170 municipalities, and there are ninety municipalities immediately outside which are in almost as bad condition as the 170. Those are the meanings of "inside" and "outside."

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): There are similar areas in other parts of the dominion.

Mr. GARDINER: But not as compared with these. I do not think there are similar areas anywhere. I find from the information before me that in that area the bushelage is about two bushels to the acre, and a considerable part of the area of which I am speaking is immediately outside.

The other point had to do with moving the equipment necessary to provide the fodder requirements. Some of the municipalities maintained that they could send equipment to Manitoba, for instance, and put up this feed or fodder much cheaper than it could be bought anywhere else. This equipment would consist of balers and mowing equipment. We were asked to have the equipment sent down, and residents of the municipality were employed to go down with it to put up the fodder in the adjoining province or elsewhere within Saskatchewan. That fodder cost the government just the cost to the municipality of putting it up.

There are instances where this was the only way in which one could get fodder put up in a locality. During the harvest season all the farmers would be engaged in harvesting, and it was necessary to send men down from the locality where the hay was needed. It was also necessary to send down equipment as there would be localities where there was no equipment available. The province has a considerable number of balers. The idea was to ship down some of this government equipment along with the necessary labour, put up the hay and ship it back to where it was needed to feed live stock during the winter. In these cases the government undertook to pay the freight on the balers and other equipment, and on the hay that was sent back.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): What is covered by expenses in marketing cattle? If the government pays relief to the farmer and provides feed and fodder for what cattle are left, what would be meant by expenses in marketing their cattle?

Mr. GARDINER: That is probably a long story, but that matter is covered by this item. There is $3,000,000 in this item that is not an expenditure; it is included in the first item of $13,750,000. In order to handle the cattle that were moved by the voluntary marketing set-up, it was necessary to have a revolving fund, which was provided by means of a warrant. Three million dollars of this money cover that fund. Probably I should give some information to the committee with regard to the plan followed.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): How many were shipped in 1937?

Mr. GARDINER: I shall give that in a moment. In previous years we have had some difficulty in securing feed and fodder, but it was obvious to everyone at the beginning of the season this year that there was not sufficient feed and fodder in western Canada to feed the live stock that was there. I said during the debate on the address that we made arrangements for 70,000 farmers to keep about 280,000 head of cattle. A total of 280,000 head of cattle consuming a ton and a half per head means a considerable amount of fodder. This is covered by the figures I gave a few moments ago. We made provision also for the farmers in the same area to keep an average of nine horses each. Nine horses each for 70,000 farmers mean 630,000 horses. When you start to feed that many horses at the rate of a ton and a half to two tons of hay, you must have a considerable amount of fodder.

It will be realized that the amount of feed and fodder which we shipped in was not nearly enough to keep that live stock through the whole winter. Much of this fodder had to be got together by the farmers and a good deal was of a very poor quality. At the beginning of the season there were approximately 600,000 head of cattle in that area. We said that the farmers could not expect the government to take care of more than 280,000 head, and we hoped the people would get rid of the difference between that number and 600,000. Everyone realized that that was quite a task with the ordinary facilities for marketing live stock, particularly when much of the live stock was not fitted for market. It was an impossibility to get rid of that much live stock without the farmers having to take a great loss while it was being done. So we decided to assist the farmers in the marketing of their surplus live stock.

Within a week of the time that we were convinced that fodder could not be obtained, we set up an organization. I am not going to maintain that no mistakes were made in setting up an organization to handle in the neighbourhood of 100,000 head of cattle. You cannot expect to set up an organization in a week's time to buy and sell that number of cattle without making any mistakes. There was recommended to us a Mr. O. Freer, living in the city of Winnipeg. At one time this gentleman had handled cattle for a cooperative organization and he was the secretary of an organization of stockmen. We asked him to take charge of the task of assembling and marketing these cattle and he agreed to do so. As I said a moment ago, he built up an organization within a week of the time when he was asked to do so.

Mr. Freer opened up an office in Carberry. He did this because we were fencing something over 100,000 acres as a pasture at this point. We hoped to bring many of the feeder cattle to this point and he set up his office there. There was a Mr. Bailey who was acting as clerk, and a Miss Baker, as stenographer. He had a staff of graders and buyers as well, a list of whom I have before me. These men were paid $6 a day and expenses to go through the drought areas in Saskatchewan and Alberta to grade and purchase cattle. We asked the secretary treasurers of the municipalities to take charge of assembling the cattle. We agreed to pay the municipal organizations for the use of their secretary treasurers for the three jobs that we had to do during the two or three months of the season. One job was to assemble the cattle; another was to assist in distributing food that had been purchased in eastern Canada and British Columbia and shipped into the drought areas, and another was to assemble all information necessary for the distribution of feed and fodder within the municipality. The secretary treasurer was paid $125 a month for two or three months to do these particular jobs. He arranged to have the cattle assembled at two or three points in a municipality.

He advertised that we would pay the Winnipeg price, less freight, for all butcher cattle that were ready to go to the abattoir. We would pay the Winnipeg price at the initial point for all feeder cattle, and we would pay $1.25 a hundred pounds for all canner cattle at the point at which they were assembled. With this information in their hands the individual farmers brought their cattle to the assembly points at which the grader and buyer graded them and bought them. The individual was paid cash on the spot just as though he had taken his cattle to the market. If the cattle were butcher cattle, they were taken to the abattoir in Edmonton, Winnipeg, Calgary, Moose Jaw or Regina. If they were canner cattle they were taken to various points and sold for what they would bring on the market at that time. The feeder cattle were sold on the stockyards to feeders from parts of the United States and other parts of western Canada or of eastern Canada, or were taken to the pasturage at Carberry and auctioned off to farmers who gathered there from eastern and western Canada. These farmers bought the cattle at auction and took them home, and if they shipped them to the east we paid half the freight on the cattle provided they kept them for three months before marketing them. We estimated at the beginning that we would require a considerable amount of money for this, but we found in the actual transaction that we did not require more than a fraction of the $3,000,000 included in the warrant provided in the supplementary estimates. The cattle were bought and sold. We bought 89,333 head of cattle.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): They were shipped out of the district?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; and the net purchase price of the cattle was $1,438,188.21; the net sales price was $1,250,102.07; so there was a loss taken of under $200,000 on 89,333 head. In addition to that, there were freight charges which bring the total loss, in round figures, to $3.80 a head, or $340,000.

Mr. SENN: That includes transportation charges?

Mr. GARDINER: Transportation, administration costs and all netted a total loss to the government of $340,000.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): How many of these cattle were shipped to the United States?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not the exact figures, but it was a very small number. Most of these cattle went to the abattoirs in Winnipeg, Edmonton and Regina, and to eastern Canada.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): There were a good many shipped to eastern Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: We estimated that out of this group there would be 20,000 head shipped to eastern Canada as feeders, but many more were shipped that did not come into this group at all.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): At present prices there will be another loss to absorb there.

Mr. GARDINER: Not on these cattle. The feeder cattle were purchased at an average price of $17.31, so they will not take much of a loss on those.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): It depends upon what the cattle were like.

Mr. GARDINER: They were good cattle or they would not have been purchased as feeders. The poor cattle were all culled out, and the feeders were graded in carload lots at the pasturage. All the breeding cattle taken to pasturage were tested for T.B. and Bang's disease, and those who purchased them took them out of the area clear of disease. So I do not think anyone who took those cattle out at those prices is going to lose very much money.

Mr. LEADER: As one fairly conversant with the situation in western Canada, I want to take this opportunity of congratulating the Minister of Agriculture upon the really first-class job he did in handling the situation. His energy and sagacity in dealing with this great problem are, I think, highly creditable to any man in the Dominion of Canada. He mentioned Mr. Freer of Winnipeg, who had given him great assistance. I should like to take the opportunity of mentioning also Mr. Byers of Saskatchewan and Mr. Davies of Manitoba, two gentlemen who I believe, also gave great service. On a visit to Saskatchewan last year, I met buyers from the old province of Ontario. Cattle men can usually spot each other without wasting very much time—birds of a feather flock together, you know. In conversation with these men I found they all said that the system inaugurated by the minister was the cheapest and the best as far as they were concerned. They could go to Carberry and buy at auction, at their own appraisal, the cattle that suited them best, and they were thereby saved the expense of a trip through the country which might take a week to gather up a load of cattle. The only fly in the ointment, I think, is the fact that many of these cattle came to Ontario for feeding purposes. When they were purchased they were worth the money at that time, but owing to the slump in the market at the present time I think the farmers who are feeding these cattle stand to lose some money or, at best, to break even. This is regrettable.

Miss MACPHAIL: They will lose money.

Mr. LEADER: They will lose, as the hon. member for Grey-Bruce suggests; on the other hand perhaps they made considerable money last year, and after all we make it one year and lose it the next. We have to take our chances as far as that is concerned. What I rose to say was that we appreciate the work which was done by the minister and his helpers in taking care of a grievous situation in western Canada.

Mr. SENN: I want to corroborate what the hon. member for Portage la Prairie has said, but unfortunately I am afraid that the farmers of Ontario who bought these cattle are not going to make much money out of them. I understand that some of them are very much disappointed with the results, no matter what the trouble is due to. However, I did not rise to speak about cattle.

I want to ask the minister to give us some more information about the price paid for feed grain. He told us that 7,618,000 bushels of feed grain for Saskatchewan had cost $5,636,000, which is approximately seventy cents a bushel. I suppose a large proportion of this feed grain was either barley or oats, and if one looks at the market quotations which appear in the papers from time to time, and the price in Ontario, one will see that it is very much below seventy cents a bushel.

Mr. GARDINER: That amount included the freight and shipping.

Mr. SENN: I suppose a large proportion of this feed grain was purchased in Manitoba or Alberta, so the freight from these points would not be very great as compared with the freight from Fort William. I should like to know where this grain came from, where it was purchased and the price, and what difference in the price the freight made. Seventy cents a bushel seems a high price to pay with prices for oats and barley as they have been in the last six months.

Mr. GARDINER: The average estimated cost, because it is impossible to arrive at the exact cost at the moment, is 72⅛ cents in the federal area in Saskatchewan, and a little less in Alberta; and in the marginal area the average cost is estimated at 65½ cents. The reason for the difference would be that in the marginal area you would be able to purchase small amounts of grain from individuals and move it to other individuals not very far removed. But I do not think that is a high price. Much of the grain that will be fed will be wheat. As a matter of fact, it is found in shipping grain considerable distances to feed stock in western Canada that you can ship wheat and feed stock at less cost than you can if you ship oats. They mix oats and wheat to feed horses.

Mr. SENN: That is feed wheat.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, and in some cases it is fairly good.

Mr. SENN: It is a low quality wheat.

Mr. GARDINER: There was no feed wheat this year, but they estimate the cost per pound of wheat as against oats or barley or anything else, and ship in the feed that will give the best returns. There is a considerable amount of wheat and barley, some rye and more oats; but even oats at the present time in the district in which I farm will cost between sixty and seventy cents a bushel. We are not in the federal area. For oats that is the cheapest figure we can get by the time it is shipped in from Manitoba.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I have been buying oats shipped to my farm from western Canada at fifty cents.

Mr. GARDINER: I wish the hon. member could ship some of that back to Saskatchewan; he must have had a preferential rate to get it down to that price.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): That is the market quotation; I bought oats two weeks ago at fifty cents.

Mr. EDWARDS: Has any arrangement been made by the goverment to assist in shipping to the markets in the old country feeder cattle that came to Ontario from western Canada last fall? The hon. member for Portage la Prairie has said that the minister did a splendid job in shipping cattle out of western Canada. I can assure him he would not find the farmers in eastern Canada quite so enthusiastic, not through any fault of his but through the circumstances that have developed. I am informed that in the county of Waterloo approximately 12,000 of these cattle were purchased by the farmers and they are now ready for the market. It cost the farmers from 5 to 5½ cents a pound to bring the cattle up to market condition, and the farmers are now compelled to turn them over to the United States buyers for their market, as there is not enough available space in the boats to take them over to the old country. I should like to know whether anything has been done to get the farmers' cattle into that market. I am told that it makes a difference of about $10 an animal whether or not the farmers can get them into the old country market, and in the county of Waterloo that will amount to about $180,000 or $200,000 to these farmers.

Mr. GARDINER: With reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, I suggest that the hon. member for New Westminster could probably explain the question of freights much better than I can. If the hon. gentleman were living in the west, he would find that oats can be shipped from the centre of Saskatchewan probably to the middle of Ontario cheaper than it can be shipped from some places in Manitoba to some places in Saskatchewan. As a matter of fact, you can ship grain from Saskatchewan to China, according to what our friends on the coast say, just as cheaply as from Saskatchewan to Vancouver, if it is to be used in Vancouver.

Mr. STEVENS: That is right.

Mr. GARDINER: The same thing happens in connection with grain rates all over the west. If you start to ship grain across the routes that grain travels under the Crowsnest Pass rates, you will find that the freight rate is considerably higher when you ship a few hundred miles between points in western Canada than when you ship all the way to the port in the east. You cannot, therefore, gauge prices in Ontario on the basis of what we may have to pay for shipping grain north and south across areas in western Canada or for shipping from eastern Canada west into Saskatchewan.

With respect to the question of shipping cattle to the old country, earlier in the session some hon. member asked a question on the orders of the day with regard to this very matter, and I indicated then that we had three men in Montreal working on the question for about a week, two of them representing the Department of Agriculture and one the Department of Trade and Commerce. These men saw all the shippers and everyone who was interested in shipping cattle to the old country, and they brought back a report to us to the effect that the chief difficulty was the question of getting freight with which to fill the holds of the ships this year in order to make it possible to ship cattle on the deck at the rates at which cattle can be taken to the old country. The chief reason is that very little wheat is going from Canada to European countries this year; there was little wheat grown. Our recent reports indicate that that situation has been relieved greatly during the last few weeks.

The reports which I get from day to day are to the effect that even now it is questionable whether it pays better to ship cattle to the old country than to Chicago. At the time when we were first discussing the question the price was around five cents a pound. I do not know what prices are to-day, but within the last few days it was seven cents on the Toronto market. I venture to say that any of the cattle bought under the scheme we have been discussing to-night, which have been fed and can be sold at seven cents a pound, will make good money for the farmers who bought them. We had a man checking the stables of most of those who brought down cattle from the west under this scheme. There are approximately 20,000 head of these cattle that are being fed. We have also checked the stables of some of those who have cattle which they bought from men who went to the west and brought back considerable numbers hoping to make something out of them. Certain individuals brought as many as 14,000 head into certain areas of Ontario and resold them. Last fall they were sold at prices which looked reasonable, but I have no doubt that at the present price of cattle some of these men—perhaps most of them—will take a loss. That, however, has nothing to do with the cattle which came down under the scheme that I have been outlining. They were brought down from the west by people who did a good service to western Canada. They went and bought the cattle, brought them down and placed them on farms in eastern Canada. There are others who went west under the half-freight plan, bought cattle themselves throughout the area and brought them back, and they are feeding them. It is possible that some of them paid too much for the cattle and will consequently lose money.

We have been making every effort to get shipping space for cattle for the old country. At the moment there is available space for between 40,000 and 50,000 head. We could ship many more than that to the old country this year if it were possible to get space. The main difficulty is the fact that three years ago they wanted to ship 6,000; the year before last, 36,000; last year, 9,000, and this year they want to ship 60,000. Anyone who considers these figures will realize that it is impossible for shipping companies to prepare for a trade which varies to that extent.

Mr. EDWARDS: The information which I received about three weeks ago was that space was available for about 40,000 head. The drovers tell me that they should have space for about twice that number, and they say that bottoms are not available for shipping to the old country owing largely to the increase in the quota to the United States the year before, running to between 180,000 and 200,000 head.

Mr. GARDINER: We shipped about 300,000 all told.

Mr. EDWARDS: Well, whatever the quantity was. They were diverted to the south. The story they tell me now is that the control of the space going to the old country is in the hands of three men, one in the old country, one in New York and one in Montreal. They are taking advantage of this situation to buy the cattle at the United States price, and bottoms not being available to ship them to the old country, the farmers have to take that price. The cattle stand them at the present time about five to five and a quarter cents a pound, some more than that, and they tell me they will lose not less than $10 an animal, which to Waterloo county will mean about $180,000. It is a serious situation. If that is right, and if this space has been taken up by three men and held in that way with the idea of beating down the price to the farmer, some action should be taken. I know the minister sympathizes with the situation, but cannot something be done to put a little pressure on to get these cattle across?

Mr. GARDINER: I have no brief for the three men who are shipping cattle and have the space; but as far as I have been able to find out, it is not a new thing, it has been the condition for many years. I think the hon. member for Kootenay East will agree with me that three men have controlled most of the space for a number of years. But they controlled it in the years when we were shipping 6,000 head and when we were shipping 60,000 head; they have had to take it both ways.

There is perhaps something more important to be done than merely getting control of the space that these men may have. Whoever had that space would have considerable difficulty in using it with satisfaction if we are to have such variation in the shipments of live stock to the old country. We may have to devise some plan to prevail upon our people to ship more regularly.

Mr. PERLEY: And ship fewer south.

Mr. GARDINER: It cannot be worked out in a moment. We have seen all the shipping companies that have space, gone fully into the matter with them, but have been unable to find any additional space in which cattle can be shipped to the old country at the present time to save anyone any money.

Mr. EDWARDS: Not only is the situation serious this year; but if unfortunately the same conditions that we had last year should recur in western Canada, I think there will be a great deal of difficulty, after the recent experience, in having feeder cattle again brought to Ontario. I am sure the minister is doing the best he can; but I know a number of farmers in the county of Waterloo—and I am sure the Minister of Trade and Commerce will bear me out in this—who are going to lose a lot of money, and they will be reluctant to go into a similar deal again.

Mr. STEVENS: There is no doubt about the difficulty of handling the export of cattle to the British market. The minister is right in pointing out that the tendency which arises from time to time to abandon the British market in favour of the United States market when the latter market opens up is an old and serious difficulty affecting the continuity of supply to the British market. There is no doubt also that over a long period of years certain large exporters have substantially controlled the existing space on ships going to the old country. Of course they are in the business in a large way, and they give the shipping companies some assurance of continuity of freight. The difficulty comes about in this, that it costs a shipping company a substantial sum to equip a ship to carry cattle, and when it is so equipped, that space is not suitable for general cargo returning to this country, so it is a handicap unless the supply of cattle moving to the old country is more or less regular. We found this condition back in, I think, 1931, and what was done at that time worked pretty satisfactorily and, I submit, might be again considered by the minister. The parliament of Canada voted a sum of money for equipping ships to handle cattle. If my memory is correct, this cost $14 a stall. Again speaking without the record, I believe a stall will accommodate three large animals or four small ones. The shipping companies were paid the cost of installation of these stalls, and we also took pains to assure a certain number of cattle being shipped over a period of time, so that the shipping company was assured of a reasonable return for devoting that space to this class of business. In that way the records will show that we moved in certain years quite a substantial number of cattle.

Mr. GARDINER: You guaranteed them so many trips.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. As a matter of fact the movement continued after that guarantee, and the movement of cattle was greatly facilitated. One unfortunate feature is that the small independent shipper, by the very nature of his operations, simply cannot guarantee continuity of supply. So the Department of Trade and Commerce joined with the Department of Agriculture in an effort to stabilize the supply by the smaller shippers, or made accommodation available to the smaller shippers so that supply could be guaranteed; and this greatly expedited the movement of cattle to the mother country.

In view of the circumstances mentioned to-night, it might be well to review the practice of those years and consider the advisability of again paying the cost of equipping ships for carrying cattle. The sum required was not large compared with the value of the service and the results achieved.

Back of it all lies this problem: The British market offers an excellent outlet for Canadian cattle, but we can hope to hold that market only if our cattle move forward with reasonable continuity and of suitable quality. These are essential factors in marketing Canadian cattle in the British Isles. If it were possible to organize the disorganized farmers so that continuity of supply to the British market might be assured, this would go a long way to solve the problem of the British market and at the same time to ensure that the shipping companies would provide continuous space for the cattle movement. I think the experience of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce in 1931, 1932, 1933 and 1934 might be considered in the present circumstances.

Mr. EULER: That continuity of supply applies to many other commodities.

Mr. STEVENS: It does, but this question of the movement of cattle is vital. There is serious distress; in fact, the interjection of the minister tempts me to point out that the price of cattle to the farmers in Canada is not a fair price or one based upon the law of supply and demand at all. It is fixed in Toronto by the heads of the packing institutions, and that condition is unfair to the farmers. I am going to have more to say about that later on. I feel strongly on this question, because next to grain, if not indeed equally with grain, the marketing of live stock is one of the largest items in the production of new wealth in this country. There is no question in my mind—and I have given the matter a great deal of study—that the farmers of Canada are to-day, and have been—I was going to use the word "defrauded"—deprived, and unjustly deprived, of millions of dollars annually that they should get. I am prepared to prove that, and I shall do so one of these days. I am almost tempted to proceed with an analysis of these conditions, but I did not rise for that purpose to-night. When it is suggested that these conditions apply to other commodities, that is true, but there is nothing in the whole realm of activity in Canada to-day comparable with the unfairness in connection with marketing live stock.

Mr. GARDINER: The officials who went to Montreal and other eastern ports at the time mentioned, three or four weeks ago, did review what had taken place along about 1931 and 1932, and had in mind an endeavour to arrange something similar at this time. That could not be done to advantage because of the fact to which I referred a few moments ago. Boats that are going to carry live stock on their decks must carry something else in their holds in order to pay for their passage across the ocean. We found that it was absolutely impossible to do what was done in 1931 if we were to be able to pay the additional cost of doing it. We would have to pay practically the whole cost of a boat going across the ocean and back again, and when we figured that into the costs it was found impossible to obtain anyone who would undertake the work at any price that we could pay. Then, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce says, we could not have obtained sufficient space in any case. There would have been a very small increase in the space that would have been available.

With regard to the last few remarks of the hon. member for Kootenay East, while there may be a great deal of truth in the statement that we are not obtaining enough for our cattle, I think it is pretty well agreed, particularly by those of us who are raising cattle, that there is a feature of the present situation which should be mentioned when we are discussing it from that point of view. Cattle were seventeen cents a pound live weight on the Chicago market at one time last year, and I think one day they were even eighteen cents. Someone says they were nineteen cents. When cattle are nineteen cents a pound in Chicago, no person, either in Ontario or elsewhere, is going to ship cattle to Great Britain.

Mr. EDWARDS: Did they have cattle to ship at that time?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, a great many were shipped at that time.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): How many were shipped to the United States at that time?

Mr. GARDINER: So many were shipped just prior to the time they were seventeen cents that we went beyond our quota in a month and a half when we had not expected to go beyond it at all this season. At the beginning of June we were thirty thousand behind as compared with the year previous, but after the middle of August our quota had been entirely taken up by the shipment of cattle to the United States. The fact of the matter is that beef got so high in the United States that people began to get out of the habit of eating it. When the price of beef rises to nineteen cents a pound in these times, many people cannot eat it. Whether or not that was the whole cause, something did happen in the United States, and beef went down to a very low price. Then for a few months it paid better to ship cattle to Great Britain, and the farmers went into the shipping of cattle to that market. But I am told by those who have been keeping in close touch with the market during the last week or so, that not very many want to ship to Great Britain. They want to ship to Chicago again, because the price is going up. In other words, these two markets, one on each side of the province of Ontario, do have some influence on the price of cattle in Canada.

If we should have an arrangement under which we could land our cattle continuously in the old country, and supply the market over there, we could do very much better than we are able to do by shipping spasmodically, as has been the case in recent years. When we were discussing this question over there two years ago, the main problem in the minds of the British people who were concerned about the matter was where they were going to get their meat supplies. They had no objection to arranging for meat supplies from Canada, but they had to be fairly well assured that they were going to get those supplies somewhere. If they were to undertake to cut down their supplies of meat from the Argentine, they wanted to be absolutely certain that we could send them their supplies every year. From my experience over there, I am quite satisfied that if we should give an undertaking to the old country that we could supply a certain number of cattle every year, the British market would take all the cattle we in Canada could fit for that market. But I think we shall have to be prepared to develop some plan under which they can be fairly well assured that if they get 60,000 head this year, they will get 60,000 head next year and the year following. If we wanted to put it up to 100,000 head, we could do so if we could so arrange matters that we could continuously supply that market with 100,000 head a year. I do not think, however, we can do that under anything proposed here.

Mr. WEIR: I should like to say just a word at this time with particular reference to the movement of cattle from western Canada into Manitoba. The discussion here to-night has demonstrated clearly the creditable accomplishments of the Department of Agriculture last fall in the handling of cattle from the drought areas of Saskatchewan and Alberta. We regret, of course, that the probable returns for the finished cattle on the feed lots, not only in Ontario and Quebec but also in Manitoba, may not be as good as one might have hoped, and no doubt some of the people are going to be disappointed.

I should like to make a reference to the pasture field at Carberry. A concentration point was established there, and in that pasture field there are 130,000 acres. It was all fenced by the dominion government; corrals were built; provision was made, as the minister has said, for testing these cattle for tuberculosis as well as for some blood tests in connection with cattle that were exported to the United States. The total cost was in the neighbourhood of $20,000, and some 18,000 head were handled through there. There is a splendid pasture field there, with plenty of water; and, by the way, last fall that field could have handled a considerably larger number than the 18,000 head which were there. So the cost per head was roughly one dollar, which is a very, very reasonable price.

The point I wished to mention more particularly was the attempt to establish auction selling. The accommodation was very good. These corrals were erected; there were sorting chutes, and so forth. Men employed there sorted these cattle into uniform lots; they were brought into a yard and then sold by auction. These sales were attended by men from all over the country. I think something was started there that is well worth following up. When we look at the heavy shipments of cattle that ordinarily come from western Canada in the fall of the year, loading our stock yards with a burden they can hardly handle, something may be accomplished in the way of securing a proper price for our cattle through auction selling. This concentration pasture for cattle certainly showed that auction selling could be done, and that people would come there to buy cattle. More than that, I was there on one or two occasions, and invariably the live stock commission men were not buying cattle, because they said they were too high. The result was that those cattle were being purchased by farmers in Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec, and also some from the United States as well. That, in my view, reacts to the credit of the Department of Agriculture in that they were able to organize a scheme whereby full value could be secured for those cattle. Often we hear that governments cannot do business as satisfactorily as private institutions. This is one illustration where a government has accomplished something very much to its credit.

A few days ago reference was made to horses which had been put in the same pasture fields, after the cattle were moved out. Some people said that many of those horses died, and that some were not in fit condition to move back to the places whence they came. I had occasion to make inquiry about them, and I find that some local people were taking considerable interest in the pasture field. The horses that are in there are put there by the Saskatchewan government, and not by the dominion government at all. A considerable amount of hay was provided for them, in addition to the pasture they could take from under the snow. Unfortunately the snow became deep, and hay had to be fed. As a matter of fact, a number of those horses were up in years, and their teeth were not in good condition. They were not in a condition suitable to stand outside wintering, and to get their own living from under the snow.

However, despite that condition, provision was made to bring those same horses to the corrals, and they were even fed some grain. Therefore, so far as the attention given to the live stock in that pasture field is concerned, I would say that it has been well cared for. My chief purpose in rising was to point out what really had been accomplished in the pasture field, and to indicate that, so far as my observations are concerned, it reflects creditably on the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. EDWARDS: To get back to what the minister said about the price of cattle last fall on the Chicago market, may I say that what he pointed out did not help the case I was trying to bring to his attention. These cattle are now ready for market. Seven thousand will be shipped out of Waterloo county in the next two or three weeks, and the point I wish to bring out is that there is only space for 40,000 cattle to go to the old country and to take advantage of that market, when a space for 80,000 is required. Under the circumstances I would urge the minister to accept some of the suggestions of the hon. member for Kootenay East with respect to making some arrangements to get these cattle into the old country market. If, as the minister has indicated, conditions have changed within the last two weeks, the problem may be partly solved. I must point out, however, that it is a serious one in my district.

Mr. GARDINER: I agree with that; we are doing everything we can. I am speaking from memory, but my belief is that we had succeeded in increasing by approximately 10,000 the number that could be shipped. That would still leave it betwen 50,000 and 60,000, despite an increase of 10,000 more than 46,000. Our information was that by following the plan which had been followed before, we could not get the results this year. We tried at every port, going as far south as New York, to make arrangements, but satisfactory arrangements could not be made. We are still keeping in touch with the situation, and trying to move as many cattle as possible to the old country.

Mr. STEWART: We are now discussing item No. 469, involving an expenditure of $13,750,000. The minister agreed that with that item we might discuss items Nos. 462 and 463.

Mr. GARDINER: Item No. 462 with the item the hon. member has mentioned, and item No. 463 with the following item.

Mr. STEWART: They are all similar.

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. STEWART: Item No. 463 is for direct relief in the dried-out areas, and provides for a further amount of $2,000,000. Item No. 462 is to provide for feed and fodder relief in the dried-out areas. I suggest that they are kindred subjects. Let us take those two items, with the $13,750,000 in item No. 469, the $7,640,000 in item No. 470 and the $1,000,000 in item No. 471, and add them together, and we have a grand total of $28,390,000. Those are the expenditures provided in these supplementary estimates, for two provinces.

The size of the amount must impress the committee with the seriousness of the situation, and the extent of the disaster which has overtaken those provinces. There is no doubt that conditions could not be entirely foreseen. Some provision was made in the special estimates of last year. I desire now to call attention to the fact that the items now under consideration involve an expenditure of $29,371,500 by governor general's warrants.

Mr. DUNNING: I think the hon. member has unwittingly enlarged the amount under the warrants. There are three amounts under warrants.

Mr. STEWART: The items on the other page are not under warrants; but if I am correctly informed, there are several items on the last page under governor general's warrants, and the first of those is one for $15,000.

Mr. DUNNING: No; that is in Ontario.

Mr. STEWART: But it is on governor general's warrants, and that is the point I am discussing.

Mr. DUNNING: As a whole?

Mr. STEWART: Yes. I think the minister will agree when I say that the amount under those items is $29,371,500.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, all by warrants.

Mr. STEWART: Yes, all governor general's warrants, and that is a large sum of money to be provided in that way. I recall over a period of years a very severe criticism of this method of providing money. So far as possible we should anticipate our requirements. They should come down in estimates to be voted by the house, and it is only in connection with extraordinary expenditures that resort should be had to governor general's warrants. Undoubtedly a considerable part of this expenditure is of that kind. It could not be foreseen—

Mr. DUNNING: The whole of it.

Mr. STEWART: I would not say the whole of it. I believe the government must have been well aware that a considerable amount would be required in Saskatchewan in this connection; conditions have been very bad. Then, to come back to the two items—the minister seems to shake his head at everything I say—

Mr. DUNNING: I was agreeing with the hon. member right along until a moment ago.

Mr. STEWART: We are coming now to the point about which I would rather have the Minister of Agriculture agree with me. There were estimates in connection with items Nos. 462 and 463 which are not items under governor general's warrants.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will permit me, I can clear that up immediately. The amounts covered by items Nos. 462 and 463 have been required since this house commenced to sit. My hon. friend will remember that a governor general's warrant cannot be issued while the house is sitting. Items Nos. 470, 471 and 472 are in connection with governor general's warrants which were issued prior to the meeting of the house. We could not take care of the further expenditures which developed as being necessary by that method, so we are asking the committee to vote items Nos. 462 and 463.

Mr. STEWART: Then there is some force in the contention that I first made, that the two items amounting to $3,000,000 should be considered along with the item of $29,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: Exactly the same thing.

Mr. STEWART: That is what I was starting out to make clear, that they were the same.

Mr. DUNNING: They are exactly the same.

Mr. STEWART: If I understand the minister aright, he admits that if the house had not been in session the two items amounting to $3,000,000 would probably have been provided for by a governor general's warrant.

Mr. DUNNING: Most certainly.

Mr. STEWART: That makes my case that much better.

Mr. DUNNING: This afternoon the minister undertook to discuss them together because they were the same thing.

Mr. STEWART: Then the requirements in connection with which there was no estimate in advance would total $32,000,000 instead of $29,000,000. That is the point I started out to make. I recall quite well, when we were putting through relief legislation in years gone by, that those who are now on the other side criticized us for putting through what they termed blank cheque legislation. Days were spent in criticism of that type of legislation. We were told to bring in an estimate of any amount that we thought reasonable and the house would approve. I submit that is the course which this government should have followed last year instead of resorting to governor general's warrants.

As I understand the use of governor general's warrants, the money provided in this manner is put in a special account; it is earmarked for a special purpose. If I understood the minister rightly, he said that some of the moneys provided for by this item were not yet expended; that the items were anticipating requirements to complete expenditures for the season. Am I correct in that?

Mr. DUNNING: So far as the votes are concerned, not the warrants.

Mr. STEWART: I understand that after the house is in session, moneys required for purposes of this kind would be provided for by votes similar to votes Nos. 462 and 463.

Mr. GARDINER: The moneys provided by items Nos. 462 and 463 have not all been expended, but those are not governor general's warrants.

Mr. STEWART: Has the whole amount of item No. 469, that is $13,750,000 been expended?

Mr. GARDINER: An amount of $3,000,000 for cattle is included in that, and as I indicated, there was only $340,000 of that ultimately expended.

Mr. STEWART: By governor general's warrant after the session began?

Mr. GARDINER: That was made available last year.

Mr. STEWART: Everyone admits that it would be irregular to pass governor general's warrants after the session has started, but in my opinion expenditures under governor general's warrants should not be made after the session begins. We should adopt the same course that has been adopted in connection with items Nos. 462 and 463.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will permit me, I shall try to explain that. With regard to the amounts involved in the governor general's warrants, everyone knows the test under the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act is whether or not the expenditure is urgently needed for the public good and could not be foreseen. In connection with the first of these votes, No. 468, we could not foresee the flood in western Ontario at the time this house was last in session. The amount for that purpose was urgently necessary for the public good.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Pretty small.

Mr. DUNNING: It was in the form of a grant to the Red Cross which I shall deal with when that vote is before us. When this house was last in session we could not foresee another drought in western Canada in 1937. We did make provision in the estimates for the fiscal year 1937-38 to take care of the conditions which had carried over from the previous drought. The expenditures contemplated in item No. 469 are due entirely to the fact that a new drought came along in 1937 after parliament had prorogued. The same is true of item No. 470 to cover relief expenditures in the drought areas amounting to $7,640,000, and the same applies to the item of $1,000,000. The item of $6,500 was emergently and urgently necessary because the radio station at Fort Smith burned down.

Mr. STEWART: I am not discussing that.

Mr. DUNNING: Item No. 473 provides for additional expenses of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations. We did not foresee the need of these additional expenses, but I shall deal with this matter in its proper place. The next item is for $6,890,000 and covers a matter which is always dealt with in this way. This is the course followed when the deficit of the Canadian National Railways has been underestimated in the main or supplementary estimates for the year in question. I may say that the underestimation of this deficit, making necessary this warrant, was brought about by the same emergent and unforeseen conditions as made necessary votes Nos. 469 and 470. The railway deficit would not have been greater than was estimated had there been a crop in the drought areas of western Canada.

There is one point brought up by my hon. friend in connection with which he is entitled to an explanation; that is, his reference to the handling of these cattle. We had to find the means of providing the money wherewith to take these cattle from the farmers and market them. The legal advisers of the government told us that the only possible means of getting money for that purpose was a governor general's warrant. We replied that we did not require all the money as we would be selling the cattle and most of the money would be coming back. They told us, however, that we must have authority for the whole amount which we planned to spend. That is why the $3,000,000 is included in the $13,750,000, in spite of the fact that all of the $3,000,000 will come back with the exception of the amount represented by expenses and loss, which I think the minister gave as $340,000. The amount necessary to be provided in the first place could be obtained only by a governor general's warrant.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why would the expenses be chargeable to the country?

Mr. DUNNING: The Minister of Agriculture has explained several times exactly how it worked. I am afraid my hon. friend could not have been in the chamber.

Mr. MacNICOL: I understood the Minister of Finance to say that all the money had come back except the expenses. Why has not the $340,000 come back?

Mr. GARDINER: The whole $340,000 did not come back. That is the loss we took on the cattle we handled.

Mr. MacNICOL: I cannot see why there should be any loss.

Mr. GARDINER: If the hon. gentleman will read Hansard to-morrow he will find it all in there.

Mr. HAYHURST: I should like to say a few words regarding this loss on cattle. We have a ten per cent exportable surplus of cattle in Canada, the other ninety per cent being consumed in this country. Our farmers are actually selling cattle at a loss ten times out of twelve, and that applies from 1920 to 1938. Yet here we are voting large grants of millions of dollars to buy feed for cattle which will be sold at a loss. That is what it amounts to. We have all done that, and we are doing it now. Go into the province of Alberta, where they have plenty of feed, and you will find that the farmers will not feed their cattle. They say: "What is the use of using high-priced feed for cattle which will have to be sold at a loss?" They prefer to sell their feed to the drought area because they can get more for their feed in that way than by feeding it to cattle. It pays them better to sell the feed. As a farmer I know perfectly well that as soon as I purchase feed and bring it to the farm, there is a loss.

We talk about railway deficits, and we talk of raising the wages of railway men and civil servants, and of consumers who would eat beef, but they will not pay the price for beef. We raise railway wages and the price of everything except the price of the very thing the farmer has to sell, and I would point out that the greater proportion of the people of this country are farmers. With increased wages the consumers of this country ought to be buying more of the products of the farm. We have a quota for our cattle shipments to the United States, and as we have a ten per cent exportable surplus of cattle, why should we not ship our cattle to Great Britain and have a quota there? The farmers in the western provinces, particularly in the foothills of Alberta, could produce live stock in abundance if they were given any opportunity of producing it at a profit; but we are actually producing it at a loss, and therefore we are submarginal in regard not only to raising grain but to raising cattle as well. You bring cattle down from the west to the east, and find that you have no market for them. The poor people in Wellington county have to use high-priced feed to feed the cattle and then sell them at a lower price than they bought them for.

Hon. gentlemen to my right are always seeking to make the wages of railway men higher, while the farmers' wages are brought down to nothing. We cannot get anything for our cattle. The people who have had their wages raised to the limit will not buy the stuff, and the result is that the farmers, who are the back-bone of Canada, are suffering. Hon. gentlemen to my right want industry to be prosperous and wages high, but people getting high wages will not buy beef.

There is something wrong with our economic structure and there should be some stabilization or equilibrium or equation whereby those who are the back-bone of this nation should be able to get the living they are entitled to. I am certain the Minister of Agriculture, when he goes over to Great Britain, can find a market for our beef over there. He may say that the boats are not available; but if we have not a steady flow of cattle and beef products going over there, naturally the boats are not going to be available. I guarantee that Alberta alone, if I went through the western foothills, would ship several thousand head of cattle a year to Great Britain.

Mr. DUNNING: Provided the price in the United States was not higher. That is the joker.

Mr. HAYHURST: I know that is the joker, but we cannot rely on the United States market alone. Therefore I say that we should be given a quota for the shipment of our cattle to Great Britain. When the hog quota was established a few years ago—I was not in politics at the time—I know our farmers were pleased and people went about Alberta telling our farmers to raise hogs because there would be a market for them in Great Britain.

Mr. MacNICOL: But the farmers did not show their appreciation by their votes.

Mr. HAYHURST: There was something wrong with the Conservative policy.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Conservatives got the farmers the quota, but the farmers did not show their appreciation by voting for the Conservatives.

Mr. HAYHURST: Pardon me, Mr. Chairman, for getting drawn into an argument on the side. My contention is that thousands of cattle in western Canada die every year because they cannot be fed at a profit. Hay is too dear, and what is the use of carrying cattle through several winter months if they are going to be sold at a loss in the spring? Our railways are running at a loss. Certainly they could be run more profitably than they are now if they were carrying cattle. Our railways run east and west. The Minister of Finance says that we should ship our cattle to the United States. Well, we have quite a quota there, and I think we should retain it, but at the same time I think we ought to be shipping cattle to Great Britain as well.

I have in my hand the Ottawa Citizen. I have no desire to run down any particular paper, but why does it not put the price of cattle on its stock market page? It has a heading: "Buying movement at Toronto flattens out as trading dries up." It gives news of the mining market and the price of mining stocks, but look for the cattle prices in Toronto on this page! You will find no section in it devoted to cattle prices in Toronto or Winnipeg. I looked in vain for cattle prices in the daily paper to-day. There is just a little sneaking piece about the price of carcass beef in Ottawa, and the price of veal carcass is given as from six to seven cents a pound. I wonder if that is a misprint.

Mr. MARTIN: That is a social credit paper.

Mr. HAYHURST: I am not saying anything about the editorials in the paper. They may be thoroughly satisfactory, but I suggest to the editor of the paper that he put on the stock market page news that country people around the city of Ottawa would like to read. Then we would probably get more votes for our cause.

Mr. PERLEY: A few minutes ago the hon. member for Macdonald came to the rescue of the Minister of Agriculture and complimented him upon the splendid system he had developed of shipping out the cattle. I can to a certain extent agree with the hon. member for Macdonald, because I think the government made a splendid job of cleaning out a lot of cattle from the province—and incidentally putting many of the dairy men out of business for a year or two. Many thousands of young breeding cattle and a great many cows left the province that should never have gone out at all. As the member for Macdonald said, many of them were sold to farmers in Manitoba. Some of them were sold to farmers in Ontario. I think a great injustice was done to many of the men out there who had established small dairy herds and were getting considerable revenue from them and who would depend next year upon that revenue if the cattle were there. As I say, they will not be there. The farmers who bought this young breeding stock will benefit to a great extent. I have protested a great many times in this regard and I shall not pursue the matter further than to repeat that a great injustice has been done to many men who built up small dairy herds.

With regard to horses, the hon. member for Macdonald said that he had investigated the matter to some extent and felt sure that many of the horses were aged, some of them without any teeth or with poor teeth. I believe the opposite. I know that farmers generally shipped young horses and kept the old ones at home where they could give them attention if they got the feed. That is only natural. My neighbour shipped a fine team of black horses weighing between 1,600 and 1,700 pounds when they left. They were one of the finest pairs in the district, and when they came back they weighed about 1,250 pounds. They had lost upwards of 350 pounds.

Mr. GARDINER: Why did men ship horses from north of Wolseley to the Carberry pasture?

Mr. PERLEY: They had no feed. Take my own farm. We did not thresh as much grain as would fill a bin twelve feet by fourteen feet, taking straw and everything.

Mr. GARDINER: That may be quite right, but the reason for shipping horses to the Carberry pasture was to ship them away from areas where it cost more to ship feed in than to ship horses out. While it may be true that in my hon. friend's district there was no feed, there was feed ten miles away.

Mr. PERLEY: In the minister's district they were very fortunate.

Mr. GARDINER: We were not fortunate in my district, but between my district and the hon. member's the farmers were.

Mr. PERLEY: They were 100 per cent better off—

Mr. DUNNING: May I interrupt to suggest to the committee that this is not the only opportunity they will have to ventilate and thoroughly discuss all matters connected with the items now under discussion. There must be items either in the main estimates or in supplementary estimates to come before the house for the new fiscal year covering matters precisely similar to those now under discussion. There will, therefore, be ample opportunity to discuss these matters. The estimates we have under consideration now are estimates for expenditures the authority for which expires at midnight to-night. No expenditures can be made under what is now being considered beyond March 31. It may be there is a desire on the part of the committee to discuss further the matter now under consideration, and I cannot complain if that is so; but I want to point out that there will be ample opportunity again to ventilate all these matters, so that the committee will not be losing anything by passing these estimates to-night.

Mr. PERLEY: I do not intend to hold up the estimates. I was simply trying to reply to the hon. member for Macdonald, who has left a wrong impression. Are we discussing more than one item now? If we are discussing item No. 471 as well, I would ask the minister to tell us under what item in the main estimates we shall have an opportunity to discuss thoroughly the question of relief apart from feed and fodder. If he will tell us that, I am willing to let this item go through.

Mr. DUNNING: There must be provision in the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year starting to-morrow. Provision must be made for carrying along the drought area until such time as something grows there to enable the people to take care of themselves, and in connection with that it will be competent to discuss any of these items that are now under consideration. There is no question about that.

Mr. STEWART: The same intimation was made on two or three occasions this afternoon, and the passage of these estimates has been facilitated.

Mr. DUNNING: Very much, and we appreciate it.

Mr. STEWART: There is no disposition to delay these estimates, but I do not think the minister will say that any member has asked for information to which he was not entitled or which he might not reasonably expect to receive at this time.

Mr. DUNNING: Quite right.

Mr. STEWART: The hon. member who is now speaking was endeavouring to clear up something which has arisen and to which, if a reply is to be made, it should be made here and now. I accept the assurance that on a future occasion, even though possibly there may be no corresponding item that is absolutely relevant, we may discuss some of these matters, particularly on some of the larger items. I take it that we may discuss them on any item that is similar. I suggest that we ought to facilitate the passing of these supplementary estimates to-night, and I assure the minister that there is no intention of holding them up.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not think there was.

Mr. PERLEY: I was going to ask the minister with respect to the numbers of horses that had been shipped to the Carberry pasture, the number that had returned, the number that had died, and also whether any veterinary service had been required during the winter. If so, who was employed and at what cost?

Mr. GARDINER: I have stated on three occasions that we had absolutely nothing to do with that. We built a fence around that pasture last summer, and this winter the provincial government asked for the privilege of shipping horses to the pasture. We built the fence to keep cattle there in the summer and they asked for permission to ship horses.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The provincial government?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, and they shipped about 1,500. Veterinary assistance was required for some of the horses early after their arrival. It was found at that time that over fifty were old horses, many of them without teeth, and they should not have been shipped. Some of them did die. How many of them have been shipped back, I do not know; the provincial government is handling that entirely.

Item agreed to.

To provide for direct relief expenditures in the drought areas of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta (Governor General's warrant of September 29, 1937), $7,640,000.

Mr. LENNARD: Does this item cover any of the assistance given to farmers and their families, and stock, moved from Saskatchewan to Ontario during the past year?

Mr. GARDINER: No. No expenditures will be taken out of this money for that purpose. I understand that the provincial government did pay freight on two carloads for persons who were moving from Saskatchewan to other provinces provided they first obtained the consent of the province and the county into which they were moved. My understanding is that there is some arrangement between municipal bodies in Saskatchewan and the county into which they go, under which arrangement relief is being paid. But that arrangement is not made out of these funds.

Mr. LENNARD: The federal government had nothing to do with it?

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the purchase and distribution of foodstuffs in the drought areas of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta (Governor General's warrant of September 29, 1937), $1,000,000.

Mr. PERLEY: I should like to have an opportunity to study this. Will the minister assure us that we shall have an opportunity to discuss it thoroughly later on?

Mr. GARDINER: There will be no other item that exactly covers this particular matter, but I shall give an undertaking to the committee to allow discussion on it, if the chairman of the committee will permit me at the time.

Mr. PERLEY: Under some item in the main estimates?

Mr. GARDINER: Under any item having to do with the provision of money for relief between now and the next crop.

Item agreed to.

To provide for additional expenses of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations (Governor General's warrant of January 19, 1938), $70,000.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): What was the total estimated expenditure for the royal commission? That seems an enormous supplementary for that purpose.

Mr. DUNNING: The amount provided last year was $150,000. The warrant now under discussion is for $70,000, but I am advised that the amount of the warrant will not be spent. Probably some $30,000 of the amount of the warrant will not be expended during the current fiscal year which ends to-night. So that it can be roughly said that the total expenditure will be about $190,000 in the current fiscal year.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The balance is for the coming year?

Mr. DUNNING: The rest of the $70,000 unexpended lapses at midnight to-night.

Item agreed to.

To provide an amount additional to that provided under vote 361 of the special supplementary estimates for 1937-38 to cover the net income deficit of the Canadian National Railways (Governor General's warrant of January 26, 1938), $6,890,000.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the balance of the deficit of the Canadian National Railways over and above the amount provided in the estimates last year.

Mr. STEWART: I note that the date of that warrant was January 26. That is just before the commencement of the session. I assume that the reason for not letting it wait, but passing a warrant so close to the beginning of the session, is that the railway year ends with the calendar year.

Mr. DUNNING: That is correct.

Mr. STEWART: And that they required this to balance the year; otherwise it would appear to me that the issue of a governor general's warrant on that date was perhaps not justified.

Mr. DUNNING: It has frequently happened, as I think my hon. friend will remember, that a similar situation arose just prior to the opening of parliament, the railway needing the money to close up their accounts for the year.

Item agreed to.

To provide for assistance to sufferers from the flooding of areas in western Ontario (Governor General's warrant of May 5, 1937), $15,000.

Mr. BETTS: This money was to provide assistance on account of the flood of last spring. Most of the damage was done in London. There was tremendous devastation and property destruction, and there would have been a frightful loss of life but for the fact that the water came up in daylight and not after dark. As it was, there was only one person drowned. But it created a very serious situation, and there was a threat of recurrence a short time ago. Some scheme was undertaken whereby the province of Ontario was to make a survey of the whole Thames valley in conjunction with the federal authorities, and to plan preventive measures. How far has that survey gone?

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry I have no information here in respect to that matter. It does not arise in connection with this vote. All that I have here is the explanation of this warrant. It was a special grant to the Canadian Red Cross Society to enable it to assist the sufferers from the disaster to which my hon. friend refers. Perhaps he will avail himself of some other occasion, when Public Works estimates are up, or some item on which the minister concerned can give the information.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): It was under discussion recently, was it not, between the provincial government and the federal government in regard to a conservation scheme?

Mr. DUNNING: I believe there was something under discussion, but I have no personal knowledge of it. It does not connect with my department, at least not yet.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—

Additional temporary grant to the province of Saskatchewan to enable that province to continue essential services pending improvement in crop conditions and pending report of royal commission to investigate financial powers and responsibilities of the dominion and the provinces, $2,000,000.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I do not want to hold up the committee so close to eleven o'clock, but this seems a most exceptional item. It is a further grant to the province; it is not in the form of relief or the cost of shipping cattle or fodder or feed or the movement of foodstuffs; it seems to be more or less a direct grant in assistance to the province. Perhaps the Minister of Finance might tell us what they are doing in the way of direct grants to Alberta. That province has defaulted on its bonds; yet we find that Saskatchewan has received about ninety per cent of these different grants, and now we find a further $2,000,000 being granted to that province for essential services. I only wish to point out that Alberta is perhaps recognized generally to be in more difficult financial circumstances than Saskatchewan.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no. I am glad to give the information upon which this vote is based. It became apparent during last September that the whole basis of living and tax-paying in Saskatchewan was disrupted to an extent which had never previously occurred in the history of any Canadian province. It will be remembered that last session votes passed this committee in exactly the terms of the one now under discussion, following an examination by the Bank of Canada and a report to the house with respect to the financial condition of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. When September arrived, it became quite apparent that the $1,500,000 previously voted would be completely inadequate to enable Saskatchewan to perform the essential ordinary services on a minimum scale for its people, in spite of the fact that they had imposed on themselves increased taxation by way of a two per cent sales tax in order to raise the necessary funds to keep their educational system going. I have some figures which would illustrate the situation in that regard as between the three provinces. The value of the wheat crop for 1935, 1936 and 1937 in each of the three provinces—

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I do not think it is necessary to put that on the record. I believe it is generally recognized.

Mr. DUNNING: But the figures are so staggering and bear so directly upon the question asked by my hon. friend that I think he must permit me to state that the value of the crop in Saskatchewan dropped from $101,000,000 in 1936 to only $38,000,000 in 1937, for the whole province. In Manitoba it increased from $23,000,000 worth of crop in 1936 to $46,000,000 worth in 1937. In Alberta it also increased from $60,000,000 worth in 1936 to $72,000,000 worth in 1937. That represented a tremendous cut in the income of the people of Saskatchewan, so that practically four-fifths of them have had to go on some form of relief, partial or entire. Consequently the ability of the people to pay taxes to support their institutions was simply nonexistent. After a careful examination with the province, following along the line of the bank's report of the year before, the government decided that an additional grant of $2,000,000 was necessary. On the instructions of the government I wrote a letter to the premier of Saskatchewan expressing our willingness to include in these estimates such a sum in addition to that which was voted in the house a year ago.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Did the minister say it was a million and a half a year ago?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: Would the minister tell the committee precisely what is included under the term "essential services."

Mr. DUNNING: All the services of the province.

Mr. COLDWELL: Perhaps it would be interesting if we had before the committee an outline of what those services are, because, as the minister says, the income of the province was cut so severely that none of these services could have been carried on. As a matter of fact, not only would the usual municipal officers have had to be dispensed with, but medical assistance in some instances could not have been maintained or forthcoming. I should like, of course, to have seen some provision made to assist the educational system of the province, which has suffered severely. I have outlined in the house previously the cuts in wages that the teachers have had to accept. Some of them, in fact all within the drought area, have had cuts amounting to sixty per cent of their salaries. In the drought area the average salary paid in cash amounted to only $10 a month in some instances, while some worked for $100 for the whole year.

These essential services are of interest to the whole dominion. They are not for any particular locality, because if the health of the people deteriorates or the children cannot secure education, this reacts adversely upon the entire life of the dominion. To my mind, this vote is one of the most deserving that the committee has been called upon to pass, and I hope it will be carried.

Mr. QUELCH: What do the words "temporary grant" mean? Is it in the form of a loan?

Mr. DUNNING: No; it is a grant.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): What is item No. 459 for?

Mr DUNNING: That was carried this afternoon. It is a federal district commission item, covering extra cost of snow removal and work in connection with four additional buildings, the grounds of which have been committed to the care of the commission.

I should like to thank the committee for its forbearance in this matter to-night, and to assure every hon. member that he will lose nothing in the way of opportunity for discussion by having cooperated in putting through these estimates. I move that the committee rise, report that it has considered certain resolutions, and ask leave to sit again. I shall not present the bill to-night, as it will be necessary to make other provisions. I spoke to the right hon. leader of the opposition with regard to interim supply, which we have to provide. In that connection there is this difficulty, that there are certain items which normally come down in supplementary estimates for the new year which are not yet before the house, and hence would not be covered by an interim supply vote. It may be necessary to introduce supplementary estimates for the coming year in order to take care of the needs for a month or two under items which would not be covered now by interim supply because they are not before the house. For that reason I should like to leave the bill over.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): They are not as large as these?

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no, thank goodness.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) the house adjourned at 10.58 p.m.

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO REOPENING OF MALTON, ONT., STATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) to indicate to the house whether the management of the Canadian National Railways has under consideration the reopening of the railway station at Malton, Ontario, in view of the prospective increase of traffic attributable to the location of the airport and certain new industries at that point.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is Malton in the county of Peel?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): The matter being entirely one for the management of the Canadian National Railways all I can say to my hon. friend is that I shall direct the attention of the management to the question he has asked.

ENSOL

DEATHS IN UNITED STATES FOLLOWING USE AS CANCER SERUM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. J. McCANN (Renfrew South): I wish to direct a series of questions to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power).

1. In view of the catastrophe at Orlando, Florida, where seven persons met their death following the use of a cancer treatment serum known as ensol, manufactured and distributed from Kingston, Ontario, what steps are being taken by the federal Department of Health regarding an investigation, and what protection is afforded to the Canadian public to prevent the occurrence of such an accident or incident in this country?

2. Is ensol licensed for manufacture and distribution in Canada?

3. Is ensol manufactured under government supervision?

4. Has the distribution of ensol been prohibited pending the holding of an investigation?

5. Has any attempt been made to recall batches of ensol made at the same time as that which was distributed to Orlando, Florida?

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health): My hon. friend was good enough to give me notice of this question. Some two days ago the department was informed through the United States food and drugs administration that a number of deaths had occurred at Orlando, Florida. Immediately the department dispatched Mr. Lancaster, chief dominion analyst, Doctor Harris, chief of the laboratory of hygiene, and Mr. James Gibbard, bacteriologist, to Kingston to inquire into the circumstances connected with the manufacture and distribution of the batch of ensol, No. 10170, under suspicion.

On examining the books in which the records of shipments were contained, our officers found that a certain number of vials containing ten cubic centimeters each had been distributed to different places in the United States and Canada. Upon the advice of our officials a telegram was immediately dispatched by the Hendry Connell Research Foundation to all recipients of ensol. This telegram ordered the recipients immediately to discontinue treatment with any of the ensol of batch No. 10170. The National Health Institute at Washington was advised, and Mr. Lancaster, the chief dominion analyst, telephoned the food and drugs administration in Washington, informing them that all consignees of this particular batch of ensol in the United States had been instructed by telegram to discontinue its use. Subsequently a list of all recipients of ensol since January 1, 1938, was prepared and a similar telegram dispatched to them. It should be pointed out that with every vial of ensol Doctor Connell enclosed printed instructions for use, in which he particularly warned those using the ensol that certain aseptic precautions should be taken. Inspection of the records shows that many doses of this particular batch, No. 10170, have been given to patients in Canada, with no ill effects reported. In the meanwhile all further distribution of ensol has ceased pending results of laboratory examinations and autopsies.

An application was made by the Hendry Connell Research Foundation to manufacture and sell ensol some two or three years ago, in 1935. A licence was refused and the applicant was advised that a licence would not be granted until such time as a pronouncement had been made upon the efficacy of ensol by a responsible medical authority. Under existing legislation the department is unable to supervise or control free distribution, as it has no authority therefor; nor has it authority to interfere with the making up and preparation of prescriptions by laboratories, by physicians themselves or by hospitals.

Further consideration will be given to the entire question as soon as all the facts have been ascertained upon investigation and through laboratory tests being made both here and in the United States.

INSTOW, SASK., FARMERS

INQUIRY AS TO CONDITIONS WITH RESPECT TO FEED OATS AND FODDER

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) whether or not the conditions that have been complained of with respect to feed oats and fodder at Instow, Saskatchewan, have been remedied. I was going to communicate with the minister before he came in, but possibly on Monday next he can give us some information on the matter. I think perhaps the situation has been corrected by this time.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Departmental administration, $425,720.

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, when I resumed my seat the other evening I had been commenting on the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil). Before I come to the matter I was discussing at that time I should like to take this opportunity of correcting, if that is necessary, an impression that might be gained from something I said in respect of the functions of a member of parliament as compared with those of one who does not have the responsibility of membership in this house or the responsibility of a minister of the crown. What I obviously meant was not that we should turn this place into a citadel of hypocrisy; but that what any hon. member said at this time in this House should be with an appreciation of the existing international situation. I did not mean that we should say things here differently than we would outside this house.

Regarding the statement of the hon. member for Vancouver North that we should acquire the legal right to assert neutrality, I should point out that as a matter of history, in respect of at least minor wars in which Great Britain was a participant, we have always taken the attitude that this was not our business. I could refer to the Fashoda incident of 1884, in which Sir John A. Macdonald refused to have Canada involved. Then one could make reference to the Chanak incident, when the present Prime Minister as Secretary of State for External Affairs took the stand of Canadian non-participation. I further contend that in the Locarno treaties there is an implied non-participation on the part of Canada in any major European war in which Great Britain should be involved. I also suggest that if the famous Balfour declaration of 1926 means anything, there is no question about our right to assume a position of neutrality. I do suggest to the house, however, that in any event neutrality is rather a matter of policy than a matter of legal debate. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver North that we should have the legal power to assert our neutrality, without commenting in any way as to any given event in regard to which we might exercise that right. My submission is that the Foreign Enlistment Act passed in this house in 1937, the amendment to the Customs Act of last year and the proposed amendment to the Shipping Act now before the house, clearly indicate that the administration has no intention of becoming entangled in foreign wars.

Speaking in this house on June 18, 1936, I made the plea that has been made by the hon. member for Vancouver North. I then asked that we should acquire the legal right to declare a position of neutrality if we so desired. On that occasion I quoted the words of the Prime Minister regarding neutrality in terms of constitutional and international law. Those words deserve to be repeated here to-day in order to remove what I think is a misconception on the part of the hon. member for Vancouver North when he discussed the position Canada would occupy in respect of a war in which Great Britain was involved, and in which we might wish to assume a position of either passive belligerency or complete non-participation. I repeat the words of the Prime Minister at this time, words uttered in 1926 and referred to by myself in this house in 1936, because I think they will help, as I have noted, to clarify the issue:

> There is a distinction to be drawn between the purely legal and technical position in which this dominion may be placed and the moral obligations which arise under treaties, depending upon the manner in which such treaties are entered into, upon the parties who are present, and the representative capacities in which they acted while negotiations were proceeding. Legally and technically Canada will be bound by the ratification of this treaty.

The Prime Minister was referring to the Lausanne treaty.

> In other words, speaking internationally, the whole British Empire in relation to the rest of the world will stand as one when this treaty is ratified. But as respects the obligations arising out of the treaty itself, speaking now of inter-imperial obligations, this parliament, if regard is to be had to the representations which from the outset we have made to the British government, will in no way be bound by any obligation beyond that which parliament of its own volition recognizes as arising out of the situation.

Somewhere Sir Arthur Berriedale Keith has expressed the view that this is a correct statement of the position. Let me remind the hon. member for Vancouver North, as he has been reminded already: assuming that in a given event we wish to be neutral, I trust he will appreciate the full significance of that desire in respect of the use of force. There is every bit as much likelihood, if not more, of our being called upon to use force to protect a neutral position, as there is if that neutral position be not asserted. Last year his leader, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) moved in this chamber the following resolution which I give in part:

> That in the opinion of this house the foreign policy of Canada should conform to the following principles,
> (1) That under existing international relations, in the event of war Canada should remain strictly neutral, regardless of who the belligerents may be.

In other words, regarding any conflict we should assert a position of neutrality. But the hon. member for Vancouver North, if I interpret correctly his speech of last Friday, does not agree with the statement made by his leader, because at page 1728 of Hansard he is reported to have said:

> I am not suggesting that we should attempt to make a prior declaration of neutrality and bind parliament.

So that at any rate we have this difference in the points of view of the hon. member for Vancouver North and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on this issue. In this particular the hon. member does not agree with his leader, and I think it should be stated whether or not, when the hon. member for Vancouver North was speaking, he was declaring his own position or that of his party.

With regard to this question of neutrality one should not forget the experience of the United States. It is significant that a former president, Mr. Hoover, recommended only the day before yesterday, following a return from Europe, the abrogation of the existing neutrality legislation of the United States. And there are growing evidences, in congress itself, of a change in this particular.

One should mention here, I think, that the anomalous position in which Lord Atkin has put us as a result of his judgment in respect of Canada's treaty making power. In passing I suggest this should be remedied at the earliest possible moment.

Speaking of the foreign policy of this country, which I now intend to discuss, I think one might well say by way of preface, that if a government party is expected to have a foreign policy, so, too, should all the political parties in this house. One wonders, for instance, if the speech delivered by the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Heon) the other day in Montreal, represents the point of view of the party of which he is a member, or whether one is to take the speech of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) as indicating more clearly the position of his party regarding these matters.

Even at the expense of labouring the point, in respect of the question of commitments I think I should place on Hansard one or two further declarations of responsible ministers, indicating the position of Canada, so that any hon. gentleman who should follow me will not seek to emphasize that while assuming there are commitments we at the same time display an unwillingness or a reluctance to indicate their full significance.

Mr. J. H. Thomas, speaking on March 9, 1936, in the House of Commons at Westminster, as Secretary of State for the Dominions, said:

> At the jubilee celebration in 1935 the United Kingdom government had explained to the dominion prime ministers that the defence position, since which the full content of the white paper had been communicated to them, and without a solitary exception every dominion not only acquiesced but felt that this was a policy that ought to be supported.

Obviously, if that was correct, the statement of the present Prime Minister—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that he has exceeded his time.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the hon. member for Vancouver North had a little more than forty minutes, and that it is to that speech the hon. member wishes to reply, I think he should have an opportunity to continue.

Mr. MARTIN: That is a very kind intervention, and I thank the hon. member for it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The good Samaritan.

Mr. MARTIN: If that statement were allowed to go unchallenged, naturally what I have said in respect of commitments would place the present administration and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) in a most embarrassing position. However, to take care of that matter, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on March 10, 1936, commenting upon the statement of Mr. Thomas, the then Secretary of State for the Dominions, said:

> A summary of the white paper which was recently laid on the table of the House of Commons at Westminster, describing the proposal of the government of the United Kingdom, for the strengthening of its defence forces and the reorganization of the committee of imperial defence, was communicated to us. The summary reached us at the same time that a full statement appeared in the press of the contents of the white paper. But we were not asked our opinion of the white paper nor were we asked to give any approval of it or any commitment with regard to it.

The statement of the Prime Minister would not be complete, nor would we have a complete disclosure of the foreign policy of this country, unless, in respect of the matter to which the Secretary of State for the Dominions had referred, one quoted the statement made in the house by the present leader of the opposition, when he was prime minister, in answer to a question by the present Prime Minister on May 20, 1935. The present Prime Minister had asked the present leader of the opposition if at the conferences in connection with the jubilee celebration any commitments had been made by Canada, and the then prime minister (Mr. Bennett) replied:

> At this moment I shall not do more than say that I think it is very desirable that I should at once make it clear that so far as this dominion is concerned no commitments were sought with respect to the matters to which reference has been made, nor were any given. I say that because it is desirable that there should be no false conceptions and no misstatements or misunderstandings abroad with respect to matters of such importance to us all.

So that the record is now complete. We have not only the present Prime Minister but also a former prime minister, representing the only other political group which has held office in Canada, telling us that we have no commitments, nor have we had any commitments with any unit in any part of the world.

These official statements effectively arrest the interpretation the hon. member for Vancouver North sought to give the other night. Then, finally, in a broadcast statement over the national network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, on July 19, 1937, after his return from Great Britain, following the coronation and the imperial conference, the Prime Minister said:

> In concluding what I have to say on the subjects of foreign affairs and defence, I should like to make perfectly clear that the position of the Canadian government, as asserted prior to the conference, of the full and untrammelled responsibility of the Canadian parliament for decision on the vital issues of foreign policies and defence, was completely maintained throughout. It was made clear in the conference discussions that Canada was not committed to joining in any Imperial or any league military undertakings; and, equally, that there was no commitment against such participation; that, in brief, any decision, on the part of Canada, to join in war would have to be taken by the parliament of Canada in the light of the circumstances and facts of the day, as they may exist in Canada, and in the areas involved. That position has been made clear in Ottawa, in Geneva, and in London, and it remains the position of the government of Canada. Neither at the Imperial conference itself, nor at any time, prior or subsequent to the conference, were commitments made with respect to matters on which the Canadian parliament would wish to be informed in advance; nor have policies with respect to any matter been enunciated or approved which were not wholly in accord with those of the government as known to the country, and previously expressed by myself or my colleagues in parliament.

I now leave this matter of commitments. I ask the house to agree that, if any hon. member suggests again that there are commitments, the onus will rest with that hon. gentleman to indicate precisely the full nature of the alleged commitments.

It is said constantly that we have no foreign policy.

Mr. MacNEIL: Would you not consider a contractual obligation to maintain naval bases for his majesty's ships in time of war in fact a commitment?

Mr. MARTIN: By no means. A contract of that sort can be ended. For instance, one can recite the case of Italy regarding an arrangement made with the Austrian government in connection with the Austrian Tyrol. That was denounced. That was a contractual obligation, but there is a difference between a contractual obligation and a constitutional obligation. As I pointed out the other night, there is no constitutional obligation on the part of Canada in respect to these naval bases.

I do not agree fully with all that this government has done by way of foreign policy, but I do say that this government has had and has a foreign policy. In the light of existing circumstances, it is the only foreign policy that this country could have, bearing in mind Canada's best interests. In the Italo-Abyssinia dispute, whether or not we liked the way our government acted, its foreign policy was clear and well-defined. Regarding our attitude toward the reoccupation of the Rhineland there was no question as to our official point of view. We had a definite policy respecting the proposed amendments to the covenant of the League of Nations. The Prime Minister made that clear to the assembly of the league when he spoke on behalf of this government in 1936. Hon. members may not have agreed with him, but he did not equivocate in the matter.

There is a disposition to say that the Brussels Conference was not a success and that this country had no foreign policy in connection with it. We must not overlook the important contribution made by that conference respecting the present conflict in China. I am sure I can give no greater authority for this statement than Doctor Hu Shi. At the Brussels conference, which met on November 24, there were represented many of the countries represented in Washington when the nine-power treaty of 1921-22 was drawn up. That treaty provided for the recognition of the sovereignty and territorial integrity of China, and the Brussels conference reaffirmed its provisions. While some hon. gentlemen may contend that there are no teeth in that reaffirmation, I should like to point out what Doctor Hu Shi had to say. Speaking in Ottawa the other day this great Chinese philosopher observed that he regarded the reaffirmation as being of tremendous importance. The policy of this government was to agree with the reaffirmation of the principles of the nine-power treaty. If that does not mean having a definite foreign policy in respect to that one matter, then what does it mean?

The position that we took is of great significance when we realize that Sweden, Norway and Denmark, all peace-loving countries, all members of that Scandinavian group traditionally strong collective security countries, made reservations and refused to vote for the declarations given. Hon. gentlemen opposite often hold up these countries as the best examples of consistent foreign policy. These three countries in declining to vote refused to affirm the declarations and Canada did, I presume because of the foreign policy of the present government. When you consider the number of countries represented you realize that there was a diminution as compared with the conference of 1922. Our country was not only represented, but went the full way with the other countries in expressing its horror at the use of force in faraway China. Hon. members may say that we should have done more, but I do not think we could in the light of the present world situation.

What do we mean by foreign policy? If hon. gentlemen opposite think that the government should have a declared formula for every question, then it is impossible to expect this or any other government to have a foreign policy. There are certain constant factors such as geographical position, economic interests, and the general state of community opinion which must be borne in mind. There are few men more astute in the conduct of foreign affairs than was Sir Eyre Crowe, at one time head of the western division of the foreign office. In a famous memorandum given on January 1, 1907, he laid down the basis of Anglo-German relationship. Anyone who analyses Mr. Harold Nicolson's estimate of that memorandum will appreciate the value of what I have said. In dealing with Anglo-German relationship, as conceived by Sir Eyre Crowe, certain considerations had to be borne in mind by the British government, among which was the fact that Great Britain was an island, facing the exposed flank of Europe. Being an island, she had to maintain food outlets and inlets. If that is true in the case of Great Britain, it is equally true in the case of Canada. What are the constant factors to be considered? Any one who is prepared to examine these constant factors will not fail to recognize the truth of what I am saying.

Let me digress for a moment. I am not saying that the present foreign policy of this country should be maintained continually or should have been maintained from the close of the war up to about two and a half years ago; I am simply answering the statement that we have at the moment no foreign policy. In a recent book on Canada, Andre Seigfried said:

> The foreign policy of Canada is based on three essentials, which are relatively simple and easy to summarize. They are first, the assertion of a distinct political status in international affairs; secondly, protection against menace from overseas powers; and thirdly, economic considerations, connected with the development of natural resources and the maintenance of the export trade. Whichever way we turn, we are sure to be confronted by one or other of these three propositions.
> The attitude Canada adopts is a function of either her proximity to the U.S.A., her connection with Great Britain, or her international trade, which in turn depends upon the maintenance of peace.

I do not think anyone will quarrel with the statement that these are the constant factors which must be kept in mind. When we criticize the absence of an external affairs tradition in this parliament we should remember that we are a comparatively new member of the family of states. We have not yet acquired the complete technique in these matters that is expected of much older and more experienced countries. I am not offering this as an extenuating circumstance; I am simply stating a fact. The progress we have made is certainly much greater than that made by the great republic to the south, having in mind the length of time that country has been a member of the family of states.

I have no apology to make for my statement regarding Canadian foreign affairs. I am speaking now, not of a situation I should like to see, not of a situation that I think should have been, but of a situation that is. In this respect I suggest that we have a very definite foreign policy. This foreign policy was given to the house last year by the Prime Minister, but it will bear repetition. There are at least seven principles of our foreign policy. The first and guiding principle in the formulation of Canada's foreign policy should be the maintenance of the unity of Canada as a nation. If this were not basic we would be faced with the absurd proposition of trying to keep peace in Europe at a time when Europe was not inclined to accept our assistance, and at the same time further jeopardizing the unity of Canada. That surely is fundamental, and no hon. member has stated that proposition better than the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), who speaking in this house in 1926, said—and I commend his words:

> May we not reasonably hope that those who succeed us in filling the highest offices in the gift of the people of Canada shall only undertake such inter-imperial and international responsibility as may be undertaken with the general approval of all sections of the country, and to ensure that the action of parliament, and of the government which this parliament maintains and sustains, shall have the approval not only of a majority of the electoral constituencies throughout Canada, but also have the substantial support and cooperation of the constituencies in every important section, district or province of the dominion?

If that was not our attitude then we certainly could not make an effective contribution under present circumstances to the restoration of peace in the world. Add to that the fact that we have normal problems in respect of lack of unity. If hon. members were to follow, for instance, the observations of the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Heon), or perhaps go the full way of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), is there any doubt of what the effect would be in this country? One has simply to remember the effect of conscription in this country; and by the way, talking of conscription, I for one deplore anyone in another place or in this House of Commons or for that matter outside Parliament advocating, in respect of a possible future conflict, that we should again think in terms of the conscription of our man power.

The second principle is that Canada's foreign policy is, in the main, a matter not of Canada's relations to the league but of Canada's relations to the United Kingdom and the United States. Whether we like it or not, this is the fact. We have certain affiliations; we have certain neighbours; and in the light of the uncertainty of world affairs, whatever we do must be done in the light of our relations with these affiliations and to these neighbours. There may be some who want us to withdraw from the Empire; there may be some who want a modification of our position in it; but no one, regardless of the position he takes in this respect, will deny the need for taking into consideration the fact that whatever we do must be done in the light of these two relationships.

Mr. MacNEIL: Does the hon. member consider that the separate right of neutrality may be claimed without conducting certain constitutional negotiations with his majesty's government in the United Kingdom?

Mr. MARTIN: Most certainly, but I do not quite appreciate how that touches what I have just said. That is involved in the new status which we have acquired, but in no sense is it related to the matter to which I am referring.

I am not afraid to assert in this house that we are a North American state. I am not afraid to assert that the very fact that we are on the North American continent should not only give us the right but should compel us to realize that our situation as a country on the North American continent does confer certain opportunities in respect of possible assistance in the event of a conflict, as well as certain orientations because of this geographical reality. But to state that we are a part of the North American continent and that we are a member of the British Empire is not in itself, I acknowledge, likely to take us out of the difficulties to which the hon. member has alluded. I am merely pointing out that in forming its foreign policy the government of this country, when it comes to make a decision, has to bear in mind these constant factors—and our relationship to Great Britain and our relationship to the United States are two very important constant factors. I believe in Canadian participation in the Pan-American Union, but I realize that if, as a matter of foreign policy, this government made a decision one way or the other at the present time with respect to that matter, greater disadvantage would come than advantage.

The third principle is that Canada should as a general rule occupy a back seat at Geneva or elsewhere when European or Asiatic problems are being discussed. With regard to the period from 1920 up until two years ago, I would not agree with that as an adequate formulation of Canada's foreign policy, but in the light of circumstances as they are, in the light of the attitude, for instance, of the Scandinavian countries, peace-minded as they have traditionally been, and in the light of the attitude taken by the greater powers generally, could we take at the present time any other position?

One of the most important figures in bringing about an earlier conception of the League of Nations, and conceiving the idea long before the war was at an end, was Lawrence Lowell, a former president of Harvard university; and here is what he says about participation at the present time in full measure in respect of the League of Nations, and in respect of any part of the Americas trying to bring about any real appeasement in Europe:

> Any general war in Europe would be a calamity to civilization that would drag us down with that part of the world from which we sprang; but in the present aspect of affairs we cannot help to prevent it, for it rests upon conditions there which we cannot change, upon the inability of European nations to act with harmony enough to settle their dissensions by peaceful means.

That surely is a significant statement. No one is stronger in the championing of collective action than I am, and it is because I believe in collective action that I do not want it to be disturbed by pious wishes which can only result, if translated immediately into terms of action, in disaster to the countries that adopt them, and to the collective system itself. Members of this house have a responsibility in doing their utmost to keep this country out of war. And to this end the present government dedicates itself.

The fourth and fifth principles, taking them together, are that Canada is under no obligation to participate in the economic and military sanctions of the league or in the defence of any other part of the commonwealth. I need merely mention the resolution of this house that was passed in 1926 in respect of economic sanctions. Of the position taken by us then, I need say nothing more I think than that it was contrary to our membership in the league at that time, but it does represent a foreign policy persistently pursued in this country and so directed as to preclude the slightest possibility of our being drawn into a European conflict. However, there is this to be said: Events confirm the stand taken by the government in sponsoring the 1926 resolution. We have from the beginning taken the attitude at the league that we did not by way of anticipation, want to be drawn into any armed conflict in respect of trying to carry out the provisions of the covenant of the league. In the light of the fact that the greater powers as well as some of the other powers of Europe have used the league as a means of preserving the status quo, I think that events have more than confirmed the judgment of successive Canadian governments in respect of economic and military sanctions.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If I may interrupt the hon. gentleman to ask a question, I remember the Prime Minister quoting those seven principles which I believe were taken from the formula by Mr. Escott Read. If I remember correctly, the Prime Minister gave rather general assent to them. Does the hon. member now suggest they represent the policy of the government, or his policy?

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member knows that I have no authority to speak for the government. I am simply giving my interpretation of what I understand to be the present foreign policy of this government. I concur in Mr. Reid's excellent summary of present Canadian foreign policy.

Seventh, Canada is willing to participate in international enquiries into international economic grievances.

In 1921 our delegate, the present chief justice of the Supreme Court of Ontario, took the attitude that the primary function of the league was to deal with political matters; the examination of economic questions—raw materials and accessibility thereto, the closed market system of the world, and the like—was not properly within the functions of the league. Now, since the present government has not indicated the extent to which in this particular it is prepared to go, there may be offered some legitimate criticism, although not to the extent that some hon. gentlemen may suppose. We now recognize that the peace of the world is to be effected mainly through recognizing the economic implications of the relations of one state with another. And the government of this country, when it comes to implementing its policy in that respect, will be faced with the duty of considering the question of Canada as an outlet for population and as a source of raw materials. I would ask hon. gentlemen whether, in this connection, they would assert with regard to immigration, for instance, that we should take a definite stand as to the contention that Japan has an insufficient area for the support of its population, or regarding the same claim on behalf of Italy? These are questions that cannot lightly be determined. While I believe that the peace of the world must be sought, once the present unrest has subsided, along such lines as these, I do not agree that anyone could reasonably be expected to make a particular pronouncement of policy at the present time in the absence of cooperative effort.

This program, be it satisfactory or unsatisfactory, is a program, and, as I have already suggested, one which in the light of existing circumstances is best suited to the interests of Canada. A country must not be unwilling to consider interests other than its own, but as, seemingly, this is a time when no country is willing to think of interests other than its own, it would be the highest type of folly for this government to take any course different from the one it is pursuing.

So much with regard to the present. I have already stated my position with regard to the past up to two years ago. I am going to vote for these estimates, but not because I believe we are thereby defending our homes. If a war comes, whether of aggression or of defence, it can mean only the destruction of homes and much else. I consent to vote for these estimates for the same reason, and no other, that a man would consent to the amputation of an arm. In doing so I do not absolve anyone or any country. The condition of the world represents the vacillation both of public opinion and of governments. It may be said with a good deal of truth that Great Britain might have staved off the present situation, but we all have a measure of responsibility with regard to the invoking of article XIX, respecting consideration of the claims of an earlier Germany, Italy and Japan—claims which, if recognized, might have delayed the mischievous advent of the totalitarian states.

With regard to the future, the necessary disposition and good faith assured, and only the future—because to try to implement at this time the following program would defeat the purposes I have in mind—I am of the opinion that if the present balance of power system could be dropped, if the concert of certain nations could be disposed of, if it is possible to get back to Geneva, we shall then have to decide whether we are going to return to Geneva through the employment of force or through the agencies of conciliation. But if we do get back to Geneva we should embrace a program involving the following:

1. The renunciation of economic warfare; and that, this government can do quite readily because of its traditional fiscal policies.

2. Economic disarmament to be accompanied by military disarmament.

3. Positive international cooperation to make it possible for all nations to improve the standards of living of their peoples by having assured access to the good things of life. This positive cooperation involves:

(a) Improving the standard of labour and living by international agreement, as is being done by the international labour office.

(b) A consideration of the raw materials inaccessibility argument. There is a lot of nonsense in connection with this argument, but so far as it is valid it should be faced squarely.

(c) Freer access to markets, so that nations may be able to sell that which they best produce, in order to obtain the exchange with which to acquire raw materials.

(d) Trading on a basis of equality rather than of discrimination; and that again, this government can afford to do in the light of its traditions.

(e) Currency stabilization and better coordination of financial policies.

(f) Possible extension of the principle of mandates or international development of certain colonial areas.

(g) Provisions for peaceful change.

Last, and I think most important:

(h) Readaptation of the collective system.

As regards this program I have sought not to be an apologist for anyone. I have criticized the past foreign policy of the present and other governments. But confining oneself for the moment to the situation in which we now find the world, no man in the position of responsibility occupied by a member of this house can urge the government to resort to any other course than it is following at the present time.

I merely express again before taking my seat, the hope that it will be possible to permit the agencies of conference to replace force as an instrument of national policy and as a means of settling disputes between nations, the hope that the law will supplant the will of any one man or ruler of a country. While I recognize that in the present situation it is almost futile to attempt to be idealistic, I am convinced, even if that conviction is based upon idealism, that the present system of heavy armaments and of foreign policies based upon them cannot preserve the peace of the world. Peace can come only by a revision of the concept of sovereignty and a recognition of the fact that, because of the economic and political interdependence of the world, nations have to be prepared to give and take in respect both of political and of economic matters. But the time for that has not come; we can only hope that it will come in the not distant future.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): In rising to speak to this matter of defence, may I say first that I would very much like to have more than forty minutes, but I feel that the indulgence of this house has already been extended on too many occasions, and I propose to try to keep within the rules in this regard.

First I desire to deal very briefly with some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). He has, I think, endeavoured, and quite ably, to make an apology for what I still consider to be the government's lack of policy. Having followed the hon. member's speeches from time to time on international affairs and the League of Nations, I am sure that what he undertook this afternoon must have been an uncongenial and perhaps even difficult task. In outlining the policy which he laid before the committee he said that he had no authority to speak for the government, yet he led us to infer that the government had a policy, and he laid before the committee a policy—

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. member permit me to point out that that statement is not accurate? I did not lay before the committee a policy. I laid before it what I understood to be the policy of the present government.

Mr. COLDWELL: I accept that explanation and say that the hon. member laid before the committee a formula, and the idea I got was that it was the policy which is governing the government's policy; yet the formula is not the government's formula but that of Mr. Escott Reid, who has no responsibility whatsoever in relation to the government of the country.

The hon. member twitted my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) the other day, saying he had changed his position in regard to some of the matters now before the committee. May I just quote the concluding paragraph from what the hon. member for Vancouver North said last year in discussing the problem of defence, as found at page 887 of Hansard of February 15, 1937:

> I submit we are being asked to support measures of defence which offer no defence. We are being asked to jeopardize our social security and to perpetuate social inequalities without the assurance that there will be additional security against danger from war. In the name of national defence we are facing commitments which mean anything but the defence of Canadian soil or Canadian homes. We desire peace, and we are taking the road to war. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the situation demands a straightforward statement from the government as to its intentions for the future.

In his address last Friday the hon. member for Vancouver North reiterated that position over and over again. Hence I would say that there was no change in the basic and fundamental principle from which he spoke this year as compared with a year ago. This year, as last year, we argue that defence plans should be based on a clear-cut foreign policy. We ask, as we did a year ago, what is that policy? So far this house has been given no definite statement from the government regarding it.

That is not my opinion only. It is the opinion of political observers all across Canada. As recently as last Saturday evening the Ottawa Journal, edited by a gentleman whose ability and powers of observation I think none of us will question, remarked that this house and this nation should be told the truth regarding the defence estimates, should be told what is implied by them. For, he said, anything else is not honest, and can bring only injury. That, briefly, is the opinion also of the group with which I am associated.

The hon. member for Essex East illustrated what he termed our policy in relation to international affairs by quoting from the recent Brussels conference. Last October at Geneva we associated ourselves with other nations in calling upon members of the league to give at least moral support to China. We were also at Brussels, and what did the Chinese delegation say at Brussels? According to a Canadian Press dispatch dated November 15, 1937:

> Canada has been a substantial contributor to Japan's weapon of war, according to a statement issued by the Chinese delegation to the nine-power treaty conference to-day.
> The statement analyses Japan's dependence on foreign supplies for raw materials. It says that in 1936 Japan imported aluminum, used in aircraft manufacture, valued at 12,000,000 yen ($3,480,000). Of this Canada furnished 71·7 per cent.
> In the same year Japan imported 33,000,000 yen worth of copper, of which Canada furnished 97·11 per cent.

In the same paper there followed a comparative table issued from Ottawa showing the increases in our sales to Japan last year.

Then the hon. member for Essex East undertook to read the hon. member for Vancouver North a lecture on our duties as members of parliament. He said:

> What he states here should be different and from a different point of view from what he would say if he were in the lecture hall of a university or making a public lecture apart from his responsibility as a member of parliament.

Surely if this advice were followed—

Mr. MARTIN: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. COLDWELL: Just a moment. I did not interrupt the hon. member, and I think he will be quite satisfied with what I am going to say when I have said it. Surely if this advice were followed the atmosphere of this chamber would be even more unreal than it already is, and we should sit here simply employing words to conceal our thoughts. In other words as the hon. member for Essex East this afternoon stated, this institution of democracy might become the citadel of hypocrisy. I can only suppose that over the week-end he has read those words a good many times—

Mr. MARTIN: You are quite right.

Mr. COLDWELL: He has seen their implications, and realized that it must have been in a moment of mental aberration that he said what he did on Friday. To my mind it illustrates this, that even one of the most liberal—if I may put it that way—of the Liberals who sit on the opposite side of the house can be affected by the reactionary influences with which he is continuously associated. Once in a while we see an indication of that, and I take it this was one of the occasions.

Now we are told in this house that we may not discuss foreign policy, at least not as frankly as they discuss it at Westminster, or we may start a war somewhere.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend when that statement was made?

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, I might withdraw the words that a statement was made; in fact I do not think I used those words. But, last year, again and again the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked what the foreign policy of this government was, and again and again we had no indication of it. The same thing has occurred this year; we have no indication of that policy. Yet day after day I read in the press of their frank discussions of policy at Westminster.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend, seeing he has referred to it, that I think he will recall that last session I made a very comprehensive statement with respect to the foreign policy of the present administration. I think he will also recall that at the present session I said our foreign policy had not changed in any particular from that set forth comprehensively last session. I believe I also said that I hoped every hon. member would feel free to discuss just as fully as he might wish the question of foreign policy in this house, but that when it came to statements by the government, these had to be made, having in mind the government's full responsibility for its every utterance in the light of conditions as they are known to be.

Mr. COLDWELL: I appreciate the explanation of the Prime Minister, and I accept his statement. May I direct his attention to the fact that all across the country in many of our leading papers, representing all shades of thought, the statement is continually made —and I sympathize with it—that we have no clear cut understanding in this house or this country as to what policy the Prime Minister really has in mind.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is not the fault of the government, and may I say one other thing. I think all hon. members of the house will see, if they look at Hansard, that for nearly two months I have been trying to have an item in external affairs taken up so that I might have a chance again this year to place before the house a comprehensive statement with respect to foreign policy. I wished to do that before the Minister of National Defence brought in his estimates. The minister's estimates have been proceeded with ahead of mine for the reason that if the expenditures are to be made, and made to the greatest advantage, they ought to be made very soon. On that account the minister has not been held back. But, as the records will show, for two months I have consistently asked for a chance to bring external affairs before the house. Personally I wanted to have the matter off my mind before the Easter vacation, but I am afraid that will be impossible now.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think what the Prime Minister has said is quite right; he has intimated to the house that he would like to introduce an item with regard to external affairs. But may I point out that we are not in control of the house; the government largely decides what business shall be taken up from day to day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that what has prevented me from doing so for longer than three weeks has been the amendment to the motion to go into supply.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I remind the Prime Minister that we have gone into a number of departments already; post office, national revenue, public works and others, and I think ample opportunity has been afforded to go into the Department of External Affairs had the right hon. gentleman so desired.

The hon. member for Essex East took exception to our saying that these estimates implied certain commitments. He asked this question: Against what countries are we committed to prosecute a war of aggression? He referred to some nations which he named, and said:

> The hon. member has a responsibility as a member of parliament, and in his sincere approach to his problem I think he should be in a position to give an answer to a question of this kind.

The hon. member for Vancouver North is neither the prime minister nor the minister of national defence. If he should be expected to answer the question as against whom we are committed to prosecute a war of aggression, how much more should the members of the government be prepared to answer the question: for what purpose are these defence plans being executed or from whom may we expect aggression? I would expect an answer to the latter question much more than my hon. friend should expect the hon. member for Vancouver North to answer his question. So far, as I have said already, in my opinion we have not had an adequate answer. Again I say the defence plans must be based on a definite foreign policy, and again I ask what is that policy. Surely the government can tell us whether it is a purely British Empire policy designed solely for the development and protection of empire interests; or a policy purely of north American isolation, with Canada living strictly apart from world conflicts, commerce and considerations; or a league of nations policy based upon loyal support of collective security for the maintenance of world peace; or that of a purely autonomous state endeavouring to relate its individual policy to the other three I have named. If the last is the case we should tell the British people and the world just where we stand; for in Great Britain there are many who believe that the Prime Minister was correctly quoted when the British papers alleged that he said at Paris that any threat to England would immediately bring Canada to her side. I have that report here, appearing in the Daily Sketch of July 3, 1937. I hope when the Prime Minister speaks—as I hope he will speak—he will tell us and Great Britain and the world exactly what he said; and, what is more important, exactly what the words really imply.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend would like me to do so I shall give the facts right now. I have before me a communication which I recently received from Mr. George Hambleton, who is well known to all in this house as a former member of its press gallery and the correspondent of the Canadian Press in England. Mr. Hambleton was present at the meeting in Paris at which I spoke, and he took down verbatim what I said in shorthand notes. Some time ago, I wrote Mr. Hambleton and asked if he still had his notes and if he could send me a verbatim account of what I said at the time. He replied to my communication as follows:

Boismuir,
Chiltern Rd.,
Amersham, Bucks., Eng.
Feb. 14, 1938.

Rt. Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King,
Prime Minister,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. King:

On my return from Ireland, I looked up my shorthand notes of your Paris speech of July 2, 1937, and enclose verbatim transcript of the passage at issue. You will notice that, in one or two places, it differs slightly from my cable to the Canadian Press but the differences are not material. They are due to my having to prepare a cable summary quickly.

My shorthand notes do not cover the entire speech verbatim but they are verbatim of the material passage. I have transcribed the material passage as I took it down at the time, with the preceding and following paragraphs.

I also enclose clipping of New York Times report of the speech, supplied to the Montreal Gazette. It generally bears out my own cable. Both the independent report of the New York Times and my own notes are at obvious variance with the version published in London.

With kindest regards,
Sincerely yours,
G. Hambleton.

The account of my speech as transcribed by Mr. Hambleton from his notes is given by him as follows:

Mackenzie King at Paris—July 2, 1937.

"Mr. Lapointe and I have just returned from the imperial conference. There, around one table, we had together the representatives of different governments of the British Empire. I know that, to many people on the continent of Europe, it may seem that because we come, in this way, representatives of different governments and have our legations as we have in Paris side by side with the British embassy, that this is a note indicative of a desire on our part to go off on our own and possibly to separate in some way from the British Isles themselves. People who have that view mistake entirely the real bond that holds the peoples of the British Commonwealth. Freedom is the essence of our life within the community of British nations. We like to manage our own affairs. We share with other parts of the empire in discussing questions of mutual interest. The fact that we have our own representation in several countries is an evidence of that liberty and freedom which above all else we prize and were it imperilled from any source whatever would bring us together again in preservation of it.

"We are glad to have the opportunity of taking even a small part in this great co-operative effort on the part of the government of France to help to show to the modern world the development of arts and crafts in their application to modern life . . ."

Such is the transcript of his notes, as taken down by Mr. Hambleton. I have here the report which was sent at the time by Mr. T. J. Philip, another correspondent, by wireless to the New York Times. This is the report of what I said in Paris as published in the New York Times and also in the Montreal Gazette:

King Holds Canada is World's Friend.

No country more fortunate in foreign relations, premier avers.

Opens Pavilion in Paris.

Says Empire's Units are Independent but Determined to Keep Freedom Jointly if Necessary.

Paris, July 2.—Opening the Canadian Pavilion of the International Exhibition here to-day, Premier W. L. Mackenzie King said that no country was more fortunate in its relations with other countries than Canada. He had just attended the imperial conference at London where all associated dominions of the British Empire met together with the mother country in perfect freedom and independence but united in a determination to keep their freedom jointly if necessary. With the United States Canada lived on most cordial terms of good neighbourhood and between Canada and France there was a sentimental link which would never die.

Canada, he said, was proud to take a small part in the exhibition which was designed to show how the peoples of every country lived by the genius and effort of men of all races, and how essential each nation was to the other.

Then, reference is made to some observations of my colleague, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe).

The Ottawa papers carried a report of what I said at Paris. The report appearing in the Ottawa Morning Citizen of July 3, 1937, is headed in these words:

Mackenzie King Discusses Trade Treaty at Paris.

This is a Canadian Press dispatch, via Havas, and reads:

The Prime Minister, arriving from his visits to German and Belgian leaders, officially opened the pavilion with its exhibits of Canadian industry, agriculture and mining.

He stressed the close bonds of sympathy and mutual understanding linking Canada with France, and warned his hearers to beware of any false interpretations of empire unity.

Anyone who believed that the fact Canada had her own legations in certain countries was an indication "of desire on our part to go off on our own and possibly separate in some way from the British Isles" was mistaken, he said. "People who hold that view mistake entirely the bond that holds the peoples of the British Commonwealth" he said. "Freedom is the essence of our life within the British Commonwealth. We like to manage our own affairs."

But, he added, the fact "we have our own representation in other countries is evidence of that great liberty and freedom which, above all, we prize, and were it imperilled from any source whatever would bring us together again in preservation of it."

I believe the Ottawa Journal contained the same dispatch, and I have read the dispatch from the Montreal Gazette. Then I have also here the report from its own correspondent to the London Telegraph. The article is headed:

Liberty as Basis of Empire Unity; Canadian Premier's Speech in Paris; An Example for Europe.

It states:

Mr. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada, inaugurating the Canadian pavilion at the Paris exhibition this morning, held up the British Empire as an example to the world of tolerance and understanding.

In an impromptu speech, he said that his visit to the coronation and his participation in the Imperial conference had convinced him more than ever of the value of freedom to the world.

Liberty, he said, was the bulwark of the British Empire. While the motherland and each of the dominions remained free, men of good will came together from time to time, talked over matters of mutual interest, and thus strengthened the union of the British Commonwealth.

His visit to the continent, he continued, had convinced him that men of good will in every country could follow this example and talk over their differences. People in Europe would make a great mistake if they concluded that, because various dominions had their own foreign legations, they lacked unity. On the contrary, this was but an example of their common freedom.

Those are all dispatches from different correspondents as to what I said, and they are in accord but differ from the one quoted by my hon. friend. There is the dispatch from our own correspondent in London who went to Paris to be present at the opening of the pavilion, the correspondent to the Canadian press. I think most hon. members know Mr. George Hambleton, and must know how accurate he would likely be in any report he would send. Mr. Hambleton still has his shorthand notes, and no doubt would be prepared to produce them at any time or place if that were desired. A correspondent to the New York press gives his version, which agrees with that of Mr. Hambleton, and the version of the correspondent to the London Telegraph is also in accord with Mr. Hambleton's. The other report which appeared and to which my hon. friend referred, is not in accord with any of these, and contains words which I did not use.

The context makes quite clear what I was speaking about at the opening of the pavilion. I was referring particularly to the significance of legations. I spoke of legations in that way because I was speaking in the presence of Mr. Brugere, the then French Minister to Canada and also in the presence of the British Ambassador. In some parts of Europe there would seem to be a deliberate effort on the part of some to have it appear that because Canada has her own legations in different countries, in some way or another she is desirous of separating herself from relationships with other parts of the empire.

My contention has always been directly the opposite. I have contended and believe that the bond which unites us and keeps us united is the bond of freedom of which complete autonomy is one expression, and autonomy which in Canada we enjoy in relation to foreign affairs, as well as with respect to domestic affairs. That was the point I brought out. My observations were made in the presence of my colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) who was Canadian commissioner at the exhibition, both of whom were on the platform at the time I spoke. They both heard my remarks, and both have since told me that neither of them had heard anything which could be construed after the manner of the dispatch the hon. member has just quoted. They did, however, hear me say what has been quoted in the dispatch of Mr. Hambleton and regarded it as wholly appropriate to this occasion. I have not gone out of my way to deny erroneous reports for the simple reason that I did not wish, by having people speculate on the meaning of this or the meaning of that, to embarrass the situation in Europe any more than was necessary. Sometimes it is just as well to let matters alone even if one has personally to suffer because of it. If any good purpose could have been served by making a restatement at the time, I should have made it. To have taken exception to the statement at the time might have given a significance to my words which in some quarters might have been still more misleading. I hope, however, that what I have now placed before the house will be sufficient to indicate exactly what was said and exactly what was meant.

Mr. COLDWELL: I would say simply this, that had the Prime Minister made a simple statement as to just what he had said and meant, I would have accepted it, without further evidence. I imagine the words which were interpreted in the manner I have indicated in some newspapers would be the words, "if that liberty were threatened it would bring us together again." No doubt the construction placed upon those words by some correspondents was the construction we have heard.

Subsequently, I believe it was on July 9, addressing a Conservative meeting in London, Mr. Chamberlain referred to the "remarkable speech given by the Canadian Prime Minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, at Paris" and he quoted the press dispatch. That, I believe, was the construction which was placed generally upon the dispatches which appeared in the British papers. I am glad we have had the explanation placed before the House of Commons and the country to-day.

Both the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) and the hon. member for Essex East deny that in the event of war we are committed. I wonder if they will state that when Great Britain is at war Canada can remain at peace. May it not be more realistic to admit that whatever the constitutional position may be, Canada's desire for freedom of choice would not, in all probability, be honoured by a belligerent enemy of Great Britain. If that is realistic, then would not a straightforward, concrete, downright Canadian foreign policy be a step in the direction of real world peace? We believe that, and that is why we are insistent that such a statement should be made before we are asked to support military, naval and air force estimates. We felt a year ago—indeed the estimates subsequently presented confirmed the analysis made by my colleague from Vancouver North—that Canada's program was closely linked with the policy of the British national government. I make a distinction in my own mind between the British national government, the present government of Great Britain, and the aspirations of the British people. We said a year ago that we distrusted their policy because it implied a desertion of the principles of the League of Nations and of collective security. I think everyone will agree that the events of the past year have proved that our fears were amply justified, and the recent resignation of the foreign secretary of Great Britain makes that more abundantly clear than it was before. As was stated by the hon. member for Essex East, the past months have been to many of us—I include myself—months of sad disillusionment. We believe peace can be maintained by a league of nations, a league reconstructed and reconstituted. But to that belief the policies and pronouncements of the national government have given blow after blow, until a short time ago Mr. Chamberlain shattered that ideal almost completely; at least for the time being.

We can no longer dismiss the fact that that for which the great war was said to have been fought has been lost. Great Britain declared through the lips of its war-time prime minister, Mr. Lloyd George, that the world must be made safe for democracy, but twenty years after we have another prime minister trying to placate the dictators who have destroyed democracy in their own countries and whose minions are prepared to destroy freedom throughout the world.

Canada is still a part of the British commonwealth. It is the senior self-governing dominion. Are we content, as it were, to simply follow along with the policy now being followed in Great Britain? If we are not, then I think we owe it to ourselves and to the British people to say so before the die is cast. Unless we do that, in the eyes of the enemy nations at least, when Britain is at war we shall be at war. As my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver North, said the other day, this parliament may be faced some day with the accomplished fact of war.

It is well known that a large and influential section of the British governing group never liked the league and have never really been loyal to it. I believe that the uncertain attitude, if I may put it that way, of Canada, in relation to sanctions from time to time rather played into their hands. I do not think that any government in Canada wished to play into their hands. I should like to say that I believe a little more courage on the part of the Prime Minister of Canada during recent years would have done much to persuade the British government to stand by the league. The British people, through the peace ballot, and by their attitude toward the Hoare-Laval controversy and the Eden incident proved their faith in the league and collective security.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend think the government should have had a policy of applying sanctions which would have involved military sanctions?

Mr. COLDWELL: This government did agree to the institution of sanctions against Italy.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Economic sanctions.

Mr. COLDWELL: Economic sanctions. Subsequently we withdrew ourselves from an advocacy of oil sanctions. My contention is that if the peace of Canada and of the world were endangered by one kind of economic sanctions, against minerals for example, then it would be endangered by all kinds of economic sanctions. We assumed some and we disallowed another.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Should this government have insisted on oil sanctions being imposed at that time?

Mr. COLDWELL: Having agreed to some sanctions being imposed, the most important of all sanctions, oil sanctions, ought to have been agreed to. It may be argued that that would have led to war—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure it would have.

Mr. COLDWELL: I disagree with that statement. As a matter of fact the recent book by the Italian General, De Bono, in which he discusses the entire Ethiopian affair, indicates quite clearly that had oil sanctions been applied he expected to have received orders to stop the Ethiopian campaign where he was. I think that that is the impression that is quite widespread across the world. The Prime Minister has a different opinion, but my opinion is that which I have just stated.

I believe that in Great Britain the attitude of the Labour and Liberal parties truly represent the heart of Britain. British liberalism is still true to its democratic tradition, and through the lips of its leaders, Sir Archibald Sinclair, and David Lloyd George, it joins with Clement Attlee of the labour movement in denouncing the repressions and hypocrisy of Hitler and Mussolini. Thus the Liberal and Labour parties in Great Britain follow the tradition of that British liberalism which demanded years ago the ejection of the Turkish oppressors from Europe bag and baggage. That demand did not lead to war. I believe that the famous phrase "bag and baggage" was used by Gladstone in connection with the Turks and Turkish atrocities sixty years ago. How far Canadian Liberalism is removed from the historic liberalism which gave it birth its present policies mutely testify.

Canada is my home and my country, the land in which my children were born and in which I hope they will live. I have a deep affection for the land which gave me birth and education. I am of its people, bone of their bone, flesh of their flesh. But when my overseas kin elect and support a government whose policies are a dark betrayal of the democratic ideals which I regard still more highly, then I think it is my duty to urge that we tell them in no uncertain terms that we shall not stand for the type of policy which has been pursued and which I believe will eventually bring about the loss of democracy throughout a large part of the world. For these policies we in Canada must assume no responsibility. However, due to the breakdown of the League of Nations, we in Canada are compelled to consider some measures of defensive rearmament. To that, in so far as they are defensive we in this group offer no objection; for the international scene has changed, and for the worse, since last year.

We insist also that in the light of recent events our government should make a clear statement regarding Canada's foreign policy, a statement that will leave no room for doubt in this country, in Great Britain and throughout the world. It should in my judgment be a policy wholly and completely independent of any understandings there may be between the national government and the European dictators. I believe the Prime Minister will agree with that. Until the British people have elected a government that is sincere in its attachment to collective security, we must pursue our own course, a course which looks first to the interests of the Canadian people, a course that will satisfy a democratic and freedom loving people.

By a striking coincidence, on the very day that Mr. Chamberlain deserted European democracy a United States cabinet minister, Mr. Secretary Wallace, broadcast a message to the British people. He said in part:

> Totalitarianism, either of the right or of the left, is alien to the spirit that dominates the English speaking democracies of the world.

He continued:

> Totalitarianism is subversive of the ideals upon which our democracies are founded.
> Those of us who continue to believe that it is better to be governed even badly by ourselves than to be well governed by others must be increasingly alert, especially against insidious fascism. It seems to me that fascism constitutes the greatest threat in the world to-day.
> To my way of thinking, fascism is a retrograde movement. It means a turning back of the hands of the clock. It means that liberty to live one's life, with only such restrictions as are necessary in order to assure the equal liberty of others, must be surrendered to a dictatorial power which will think and act for all.

He added that humans become economic and political robots under a fascist state, and must release "all the barbarities of super-savage modern warfare upon unoffending peoples" at the mandate of a dictator. He asked for cooperation by democracies of the world to prove the effectiveness of the principles upon which their plan of government is founded. He went on:

> Certainly, with the fascist countries of the world drawing closer and closer together in an ominous and bodeful phalanx it behooves

America and all other democratic nations to prove that under a democratic form of government the highest political liberty as well as the greatest economic security not only can, but will, be provided.

These words of the United States Secretary express also, I am certain, the sentiment of the overwhelming majority of the British and Canadian peoples. Yet the policy at least of the motherland to-day, in my opinion, is being directed by those who have strengthened fascist dictators who have released all the barbarities of supersavage modern warfare upon unoffending peoples without their borders. To me the blood of primitive Ethiopians cries aloud against it, and the wailings of Judah echo across the world in protest. Surely civilized peoples everywhere stand aghast at the barbarities recently perpetrated in Barcelona.

In common with other small nations Canada has everything to gain by the building up of a strong League of Nations. It is true that in order to achieve real collective security the pooling of sovereign rights under certain circumstances, as the member for Essex East has indicated, may be essential. The attitude of Canada in the past has not been conducive to the strengthening of the league. As I said a few minutes ago, in my opinion our attitude in connection with the Ethiopian affair and the institution of oil sanctions was in no small measure responsible for a league weakness at that time. The Prime Minister has argued that this might have led to war. We have already discussed that possibility.

But what is of more interest to us now is what, if anything, has Canada said to the British government recently. Have we tacitly or silently endorsed the destruction of the league by the present government of Great Britain? If not, do we still adhere to the League of Nations covenant with the reservations we have made from time to time? If we do, then what is our relationship to present imperial policies? I think these questions ought to be answered in the course of this or subsequent debate. The Prime Minister of Great Britain has stated in the house that the dominions have been consulted and that to some extent recent pronouncements in regard to Czechoslovakia are in part due, it is said, to the attitude of the self-governing dominions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Consulted, did my hon. friend say?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, consulted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not believe the Prime Minister of Great Britain has used that word. I may be wrong, but my recollection is that the Prime Minister said that we had been kept informed of what had taken place. But that we had been consulted, or that any advice had been given by the government, was not, I think, suggested.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think in certain press dispatches the word "consulted" was used. I know that when I was thinking of what I was going to say I took that word "consulted" from one of the dispatches. But if the right hon. gentleman says that that is not the word that should have been used, I take it that the government has been kept informed, and if there has been any actual or implied advice with respect to that information I think we should be given to understand what that advice may have been, if any has been given.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I can assure my hon. friend right away that no advice has been asked and none has been given by the present government.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am glad to get that assurance. The purpose of my suggesting that a statement should be made was that we might get such an assurance, and I am very glad indeed to get it.

It seems to me, then, that the world is now faced with two alternatives: Either for members of the league to go to Geneva, meet there and declare that they will join in resisting any new active aggression by whomsoever offered; or for the democratic powers to declare that they will resist any aggressive action against Czechoslovakia or any others of the smaller nations so threatened. These are desperate alternatives, and in the present condition of the league it is unlikely that league action will be taken or, I fear, that the democratic powers will act in unison. To my mind the best thing Canada can do is to exert all the pressure possible for the reorganization of the League of Nations and for effective security by these means.

As I said before, we should assume no responsibility for the effects of the disastrous policies of the present national government of Great Britain, and a pronouncement to that effect would, I believe, have a wholesome influence upon the people of Great Britain and would be an excellent antidote to statements made by expatriated Canadians, like Beverley Baxter, who arrogate to themselves the right to speak for this country at Westminster. In the meantime, and until the situation is clarified, Canada should confine her defence program to such arms as would protect our ports against sporadic raids; for all military authorities and the Minister of National Defence agree, as he did the other afternoon, that invasion of Canada is a very remote contingency. To the extent that military and naval estimates are based on the policy I have outlined I think the house this year should support them, but of course they should be scrutinized closely to ensure that they are not in preparation for a war which would not be in the interests of democracy and which might even fasten the evils of to-day on the generation of to-morrow.

I have somewhat exceeded the time I intended to take, Mr. Chairman, but I should like just to add this, that I believe all across Canada men and women are looking anxiously to this parliament to-day for a lead in relation to this problem. Fear of war is widespread. Canada is a peaceful and a peace-loving nation. We are far removed from the seat of any general hostilities that may arise. We do not desire to arm ourselves for any war of aggression. I have taken in the past an attitude that might almost be described as that of a pacifist. In the light of the conditions that face us to-day I am prepared to support that which is essential to the defence of our democratic institutions. But I want to be positively assured, before doing anything of the kind, that that is exactly what is implied by the estimates. I view with some misgiving the analysis which has been made by the hon. member for Vancouver North, in which he argues the indications are that the program is built upon the idea, which is held by many of our leading military men, that in the event of war we should be compelled to send an expeditionary force abroad. I think that idea should be dispelled completely. I am quite confident of this, that a large number of the young men of this land will refuse to bear arms in a cause in which they feel they have no interest. I have moved among many young people in the last few years, and I know that there are large numbers of them who, looking at the condition of their own fathers who fought in the great war, and seeing that nothing has come to them but disillusionment and misery, do not intend to be drawn into such a war if they can avoid it. So, in speaking to these estimates, I simply wish to say before I sit down that in my opinion Canada, as a nation at present apart from the streams of hates and fears that bring war in other parts of the world, can, if it will, through the means of an effective league of nations and the fostering of the ideal of collective security, exercise an influence towards a greater measure of peace than, perhaps, the world has ever known.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I fail to see how anyone can seriously disagree with any of the fine sentiments so well expressed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). I am sure we all agree that nobody in Canada wants war. I am sure we all agree that we are prepared to do anything to protect democracy. I believe there is a widespread feeling throughout the dominion that we should be prepared to make our share of the sacrifices which are necessary in case democracy is threatened.

We find, however, that we are greatly handicapped because of lack of knowledge of conditions as they are. I have wondered whether, if we were all in the position of the Prime Minister of Great Britain and knew all that he knows, we would be quite so certain as to whether he was making a mistake or not in each move that he makes. That has impressed me in discussions in the press or among people on the street. I find that whenever I am confronted with a situation about which I know practically all the details, I am often considerably at a loss to know just what to do. For me, therefore, to presume to say just what a man ought to do in a set of circumstances of the details of which I know practically nothing, is something to which I would hardly like to commit myself. Consequently, I am inclined to leave the management of Great Britain pretty much to the government which is charged with the responsibility for taking care of Great Britain's welfare. They may be wrong; they may be right. I find it sufficiently difficult for me to say just what Canada ought to do.

In the first place, with all other Canadians and, I believe, British people throughout the world, I am unalterably opposed to war. So are all social crediters. I think there is not an individual in this chamber who is not opposed to war. In order to clarify the minds of men in so far as they find themselves at all interested in the attitude of social crediters generally on the question of war, perhaps it will be well for me to make a few statements so that people within the chamber and without will know what we think and why we think it.

Major Douglas is, of course, the great leader of the movement. Consequently, his pronouncements are looked upon with considerable respect by all followers of social credit. He has advocated, consistently and earnestly, patiently and long-sufferingly, such a course of procedure as would be most likely in his opinion to prevent the people of the world from becoming involved in war. The first time I knew of social credit I read a statement wherein Major Douglas had said that unless the policies he advocated were adopted, the world would be inevitably plunged into war of a most devastating and universally destructive nature. He therefore urged as far back as 1923 that we change our economic system with the object in view of removing the causes of war.

He has done a great deal along this line. When he was out in Alberta in 1934, he used this potential danger of war as one of the greatest motives for our becoming interested in a new economic system. I should like to read a few short excerpts from a radio broadcast which Major Douglas delivered over the British Broadcasting Corporation system in November, 1934. In these excerpts he is not stating the causes of war; he has assumed that the causes have been neglected and that the patient is about to come down with the disease. He is telling us what to do about it. That is about the situation with us. We have not taken precautionary measures, whether we foresaw the danger or whether we did not. We are about to come down with the malady, and the question is, What to do about it all?

Major Douglas, says, first:

I have no interest, direct or indirect, in the armaments industry, but I am fairly familiar with big business, and I do not believe that the bribery and corruption, of which we have heard so much in connection with armaments, are any worse in that trade than in many others.

That is a significant statement, considering one of the great motives which have been heralded far and wide and laboured throughout the country, bearing upon the question of war.

Again he says this, and here he sets forth, by implication at least, the causes of war which he has laboured to remove:

So long as we are prepared to agree, firstly, that the removal of industrial unemployment is the primary object of statesmanship, and secondly, that the capture of foreign markets is the shortest path to the attainment of this objective, we have the primary economic irritant to military war always with us; and moreover, we have it in an accelerating rate of growth, because production is expanding through the use of power machinery, and undeveloped markets into which surplus can be poured are contracting.

That, I fancy, is perhaps the most significant remark we shall hear this day. At another place he says:

In the first place, I believe it to be, while the present financial system persists, merely sentimental to suppose that a weak nation, particularly if it be also a rich nation, is a factor making for peace. Quite the contrary. It is as sensible as if it had paper walls.

That sets forth, as well as it could be stated, my own attitude on the question of defence for Canada. I have always felt that if you wish to be free from war, it is a good thing either to be strong enough yourself or to be a member of a combination which is strong enough to make an attack on any of its members exceedingly dangerous.

A similar idea was advanced by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar when he advocated collective security. I am an ardent advocate of collective security, but I wish I knew with whom to "collect." And when I am "collected" with them, I should like to know exactly who would call on me to act, and upon what provocation; what kind of response he would expect me to make when he called upon me; where and when he would like me to make it, and a wide variety of other details.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And what the others would themselves be prepared to do.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am glad the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) reminded me of one important question I forgot. Yes; I say that too. I have been a most earnest student of this matter of the League of Nations, collective security and all that kind of thing. I may be a little simple; but I have found a number of people who seem to be most ardent advocates of collective security, rather disposed to scorn the other members of the British Commonwealth of Nations, who as far as I can see with my limited vision ought to be the most likely people with whom we could "collect" for collective security. I grant that is only the view of an extremely unimportant layman, but in my blundering way I cannot help reaching some such conclusion.

I continue with another quotation from Major Douglas:

International bankers are, almost to a man, strong advocates of national disarmament—

That is a weighty remark. If that is true, it constitutes a sort of handwriting on the wall.

—but their bank clerks, alone amongst civilian employees in this country, are armed with revolvers, and the strength of bank premises compares with that of modern fortresses.

I have weighed those words often, and the more I think about them the more I become inclined to national defence. Again he says:

Strength unaccompanied by a motive for aggression is a factor making for peace.

Those words express exactly my opinion. If, then, the Dominion of Canada wishes to be a factor making for peace, above all things let the Dominion of Canada be strong.

The question then arises, What constitutes strength? Strength does not lie in armaments or in large standing armies. This truth has been demonstrated many times in the world's history. Strength has its home in the strong hearts of a brave, contented people who feel that their country is a land to love. We in Canada to-day, I regret to say, have not so managed our economic life as to render our people contented and happy. We have not been able to accord to those heroes whose blood was shed and whose health was sacrificed in the last war, that measure of comfort which we wanted to accord to them. The result is the very state of mind which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar outlined, when our youth of to-day contemplate the possibility of going to war. We as social credit people say, and I am sure all hon. members agree, that it is our first duty to make Canada prosperous and economically sound, so that her people may be inclined to love her and ready to die for her as they were in 1914.

But in our modern day if we do not have, in addition to a strong, happy and contented people, the armaments which will enable us successfully to cope with those vast destructive machines which have been perfected, ready to be directed against us, our people are thrown under such a dreadful handicap as to render exceedingly doubtful the possibility of their emerging successfully from a conflict. Consequently, we need both a strong and happy people and adequate defences.

Much of what I am going to say pertains to how to finance these defence estimates. Trusting that my fellow members of the committee will continue to exercise that kind patience which they have thus far exercised, I am going to speak once more about a way in which we can raise money without drawing it from the very lifeblood of the people of this country, without depriving them of the relief and assistance of which so many of them are in desperate need. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) occupies a position which many times has made me feel the deepest sympathy for him. Before his election he was reported in the press as having said—and from my knowledge of the hon. gentleman's sincerity I am sure he meant it—that he would favour the creation of $500,000,000 of new money. The hon. gentleman meant that. With the character which I have come to believe the hon. member possesses, I doubt very much that he would have stood for election unless he had assurance that his promise was possible of fulfilment. Consequently, he felt that there was a possibility of creating new money with which to finance any project which might be found by the government to be desirable. May I revert to his own beliefs, which he expressed and which I am sure he still holds.

The CHAIRMAN: I would point out to the hon. member that he is out of order. He should confine his remarks to the estimates of the Department of National Defence, and particularly to the item No. 180, which is under discussion.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I believe it will be found that the main point of discussion in this parliament with regard to these estimates will be the cost, the ways and means of financing our defence. Therefore, I feel it is perfectly in order for me to discuss the ways and means of financing the defences of this country. If we could not find that money, I would say there would be no use in talking about defences at all. So with your permission, Mr. Chairman, and with the hope that you will inform me if I deviate too far from the course I have laid down, I shall proceed to discuss the ways and means of financing these estimates.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: According to my hon. friend's own words, what he wishes to discuss ought to be said, if at all, in committee of ways and means, not in committee of supply. He says he wants to talk about ways and means now, and this is not the time for that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I speak subject to being called to order, and if I am not in order I do not wish to discuss the point; but virtually every resolution we receive from Alberta—and that, of Canada's nine provinces, is the one which we represent—says either to oppose defences or to ask that the defences be financed by national money, so that the cost will not have to be deducted from the amount the government spends for relief and other projects. So whether or not we should support defences would depend in large measure, as the Prime Minister will recognize, upon how those defences are to be financed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I only point out to the hon. gentleman that there are two main committees of the house, one of which is constituted to deal with supply and the other with ways and means. At the present time we are in committee of supply. My hon. friend says he wishes to discuss ways and means, and I say he is out of order. When the house is in committee of ways and means will be the time to consider whether or not he is in order in discussing what he has in mind. Certainly he is not in order in discussing ways and means when we are in committee of supply.

Mr. STEVENS: Surely the Prime Minister is not going to suggest that when this committee of the whole is considering voting supply to the government, that is, authorizing the government to spend money, it is out of order for an hon. member to question the government as to the source from which it expects to obtain the money for the particular project, whatever it might be.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The question of the source is dealt with in the committee of ways and means. That is what that committee is for.

Mr. STEVENS: What I wish to submit to you, Mr. Chairman, before the final ruling is made, is this: If the rules of the house are interpreted in the narrowest sense, obviously fair discussion cannot proceed. It has been the history of the British parliamentary system that rules are fairly generously interpreted; otherwise we could not possibly conduct a discussion. There is scarcely a moment we sit here when we could not raise a narrow point of order, but the Prime Minister surely cannot press the point that because the hon. gentleman is about to analyse some suggestions made by the Minister of National Defence with regard to ways of raising the money which he wishes to apply to this particular project, he is to be precluded from carrying on that discussion. For the sake of fair and free discussion I would urge the Prime Minister not to press that point of view to the extent of having a ruling made upon that narrow point.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the committee will recognize that I desire to have the discussion just as free as possible, but I should like to have it in relation to the estimates under consideration, not with relation to monetary theories which is another matter altogether. We spent two or three weeks discussing the question of social credit, and now my hon. friend is quite frank about his purpose, much more so than his supporter at the moment, may I say. The hon. gentleman says what he wishes to discuss, and it is not to analyse some suggestion of the minister, which is what the hon. member for Kootenay East has just said. Quite frankly, in his own words, the hon. member has said it is the subject of social credit. Social credit does not enter into this discussion at all. The hon. gentleman referred to how the money is to be raised to make good this supply; the words he used were, the ways and means in which the money is to be raised. The ways and means by which money is to be raised is a matter for the other main committee of this house, namely the committee of ways and means. The present committee discusses what supply, if any, is to be voted and determines that matter. The committee of ways and means discuses the ways and means in which the money is to be raised with which to provide the supply. I cannot think of anything that could be plainer than that. All that pertains to ways and means is entirely the work of a different committee.

The CHAIRMAN: Does any other hon. member wish to speak to the point of order? In my opinion the point of order raised by the right hon. Prime Minister is well taken. As he has pointed out, we are in committee of supply, not in committee of ways and means. There has been a long debate which ended yesterday, in regard to social credit, and in my opinion the hon. member for Lethbridge was out of order when he followed the line he did in regard to monetary matters. Therefore, I would ask him to be good enough to confine his remarks to the resolution which is under discussion in relation to national defence estimates.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Of course we are new to the game and we do not know about all these things, but from my observation of what has been done in the house I would be inclined to think that what the hon. member for Kootenay East said was about right.

Mr. STEVENS: The strict rule has been violated a thousand times.

Mr. BLACKMORE: After all, what I was discussing was the suggestion made by the Minister of National Defence before the election. Certainly I do not believe he would call that social credit, but I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and will refrain from any discussion of this kind.

Mr. STEVENS: You are abandoning the social credit tendencies of the Minister of National Defence?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes. Mr. Chairman —and I assume I am in order in saying this, repeating what I said a moment ago to the Prime Minister—there is gathering in this dominion a tremendous body of opinion which would oppose national defence on this very ground. Dealing with the question of having a strong, united and happy people, I would say that unless a change of means of financing is made, there will develop in this country a greater and greater indisposition to support defences, an indisposition which may reach the point where the unity of this country is gravely endangered. I think I can safely say that without discussing what should be done.

Throughout Canada to-day there are great numbers of people on the verge of sickness from privation. No hon. member will question my statement that in this country there are thousands of men who served overseas for four years in the last war, who to-day are deprived of the very necessities of life. They have reached the point where they are almost in despair, and it is utterly impossible for them to find work or to enter into any kind of business through which they could support themselves.

The youth of the land see these men in towns and cities. I ask this question: Of what value is it to the youth of my home city of Lethbridge to go into Galt Gardens and see a splendid monument to those men who served overseas and, on the very benches not more than fifty feet away from the monument, see the remnants and wrecks of that war in clothes as shabby as would be found on any man in the city. On their faces are the most hopeless and despondent looks. Still they bravely stand up and face the world, with their chins up, "packing all their troubles in their old kit bags," as they did so heroically for four years.

If that condition continues to exist, and to be accentuated in Canada, to the extent to which the making of this country weak will risk the safety of democracy, just to that extent the government in power will be responsible for weakening the defences of democracy. I think no one can safely question that assertion. People not only in Alberta but in all the other provinces are beginning to feel very bitter about this condition. Therefore, I felt I would be quite in order if I were again to urge most earnestly the reasons why we need not take the dollars to be spent on armaments and to be spent on various devices necessary to making this country strong, from a military standpoint, from what has been devoted to the support of those who, through no fault of their own, are suffering.

However, I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and to the wishes of the Prime Minister and shall take some other opportunity to make my observations. But, just as sure as we are sitting in this chamber, this question of change of money policy must be met and it must be answered. It cannot be sidestepped indefinitely. One reason I thought it would be perfectly safe to discuss the matter was that the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) last year made a most superb contribution to the discussions in the house when he pointed out the colossal debt which had resulted from the past war, and indicated to the people of Canada the sort of absolute impossibility they would face if they should be plunged into another war of relatively similar proportions, with no means of financing it other than those used in the last war.

I conclude by saying, first of all, that we oppose war as do all hon. members in the house. We believe that the causes of war are economic. I grant that there is among some peoples a desire for national aggrandizement; that is one of the causes; but we would not have a Mussolini or a Hitler had there not been all around them thousands and thousands of people who saw no other way out. I submit, sir, that if in this country we develop a condition whereby thousands and thousands of people can see no other way out, we are setting the stage for something we would hate to think about. The cause of war is fundamentally economic. We believe that those causes can and should be removed. We maintain that in an age of plenty, where man's mind has perfected the most magnificent machines, and where there are plenty of resources, it is utterly unnecessary that man should suffer from economic causes. With the greatest assiduity, these economic causes should be sought and removed, and the efforts should not stop if we try once and fail.

At present we believe war is imminent. I hope we may escape it for another year or two; I shall even be so sanguine as to hope that we may escape it entirely. After a most careful scrutiny of everything I have been able to learn regarding Great Britain and the British government, I have concluded that she has done everything in her power to manoeuvre Great Britain out of war. If that is not so, then it is because I do not know; and if I do not know, it is because it has not been written, or I have not been able to find it. I would say that so far as they possibly could, at least during the last few years the British government have kept Great Britain out of war; and I shall go far enough to say that I believe the same is true of our own Prime Minister.

Just the same, we must realize the cold, bitter fact that we are in a world where war is imminent, and no one can forecast from what quarter the thunderbolt will strike. Consequently, to contend that we should not prepare would be the part of great indiscretion. I say that we must change our economic system—we must do it, even to finance a war. We should do it to finance the preparation for war. We should not sacrifice our people's necessities in order to prepare. We should use new money, debt free and interest free.

I shall close my observations by saying that I purpose supporting the defence estimates, steadily—scrutinizingly, it is true, and expecting results from every dollar spent—but steadily so long as I see matters as I see them to-day.

Mr. WILFRID GARIEPY (Three Rivers) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, when in the course of this debate the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Tremblay), who usually shows better judgment, bracketed under the collective appellation of communist all those who oppose the increased armament appropriations, he certainly was guilty of excessive zeal.

Still clinging to the views which I expressed last session on the matter under consideration, I view with alarm our mounting defence appropriations. Reduced under some items, increased under others, these appropriations are being maintained at unusually high levels, so much so that it can no longer be denied that we are gradually taking rank with the nations, great and small, which expend a large part of their revenue on rifles, on guns, on aeroplanes—in short on the whole machinery of war.

I wish to say to the hon. member for Dorchester that I am no more a communist than he is. He has misjudged me. A taxpayer of Quebec province, I have the mentality, the pride, the convictions, the faith which characterize my people. I am in favour of the Padlock Act passed by the Duplessis government; I consider it a safeguard against nefarious activities aimed at the safety of the nation.

There would be public protests should the Department of Justice arm itself with the power of disavowal in order to combat the legitimate autonomy of my province. We should be left free to protect ourselves against the ravages of error. That is my stand, and the hon. member for Dorchester should, before brandishing his excommunications, examine his own conscience and find his own way.

His Excellency Archbishop Gauthier had in mind a certain type of representative of the people when he said on March 15 last:

> It is far more important to know whether the reasoning of our young men does not contain some germ of truth and whether our weaknesses, our hesitations, our indecision do not really work out to the advantage of communism. We seem to lack pride and courage. Our province of Quebec has been for several months past the object of most unjustified attacks. Because we try to prevent a handful of communists from doing as they please, we are classed among the uncivilized tribes of darkest Africa. Has anyone risen in the Senate or the House of Commons to say what we are? And is it perchance in our province that the religious and educational liberty of the citizen is not fully respected?

Further on, His Lordship said:

> We are now asked to go into action in order to save democracy. The theme is not unfamiliar. In 1914 volunteer armies were raised and, later on, conscription was forced upon us with the cry: "Let us make the world safe for democracy." The professionals of communism no doubt think that a slogan that succeeded once will succeed again. So we hear to-day a refrain that greatly resembles the former one: "Let us save the life of democracy." There was reason to expect, we are told, that the sacrifices made during the great war would permit us to extend to backward peoples the blessings of the democratic system.

Quebec is neither selfish nor apathetic; it does not lack in nobility and whole-hearted patriotism. Ever since 1760, its intelligent and laborious people have contributed their share to the country's development.

The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger), in an effort not lacking in merit, has attempted to belittle the provinces. But the provinces are everything, as Sieyès said about the Third Estate: Le tiers état, c'est tout. Sir John A. Macdonald met with a reverse when he failed to obtain the legislative union which he had sought. It was Cartier who imposed the federation of provinces that is, an association based on compromise, a pact founded on sacrifice. The provinces surrendered some rights, but they preserved, within clearly defined bounds, their own autonomy which made them masters in their own territory. Thus it is that Oliver Mowat, a former Conservative, understood the matter when, as head of a Liberal administration in Ontario, he made his opinion prevail, as against Sir John A. Macdonald, before the Privy Council.

Unrestrained concentration is an evil, it is a virus which will destroy confederation if a remedy is not found.

No one in Quebec will want separation; no one will uphold the doctrine known as separatism, providing we are not crushed, providing we are left our freedom, providing we are not drawn into the whirlpool of militarism.

Quebec is loyal, and in proof of this I may say that every design of a new Canadian flag that has been submitted to me included, in some shape or other, the Union Jack. We are proud of being British subjects, and our aspirations are toward ideals in which prejudice, narrow-mindedness and fanaticism are unknown.

Since 1918, did you ever hear a member from Quebec, whatever his political views may have been, whether conservative, liberal or nationalist, who opposed any contribution to the soldiers' settlement fund? And this amounts to $100,000,000, eighty per cent of which was paid by the two oldest provinces of this dominion: Ontario and Quebec.

Our war debt exceeds $2,000,000,000, and interest charges are draining our annual budget. Did we ever falter when faced with these national commitments; did we ever refuse to honour the signature of our country and the memory of those who sacrificed their lives for the motherland?

These thoughts should have come to the mind of the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Bertrand) when, in the course of this debate, he tried to joke about the dangers that an aerial attack might entail for the city which I have the honour to represent.

The hon. member for Laurier would be well advised to limit his interest to the constituency which he represents. As a matter of fact he does not live there. He is an itinerant candidate who already tried his luck in Nicolet. He is known in our part of the country under the name of "Drop it or get out."

Let me tell him that by trying to be too witty one spoils what little wit one has. He spoils his case who tries to prove too much. There are no munition factories in the St. Maurice district. His observations were marked with childish malice. Why did he not talk about Quebec, Levis, Riviere du Loup, Roberval, Lake St. John and Gaspe?

Why are we not told where the attack will come from? What do we fear? Where is the cause for alarm? They are stirring up the bitterest emotions of the people through fears which are imaginary so far as Canada is concerned. Nobody threatened us, and no danger was disclosed.

The hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) reconsidered the stand that he took last year. He has a right to do so, just as I am entitled to ask why Canada is less secure because Japan invaded China, or Italy took possession of Ethiopia, or Germany absorbed Austria.

Since war is raging more than ever overseas, should we not be all the more cautious, and prevent any rash commitment on the part of Canada?

I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) for the illustrating and outspoken statement which she made during this debate and tell her that I concur in its general lines. That statement deserves a special mention, for it stands out with a peculiar brilliancy among all the other speeches.

Every member must do his duty to the best of his ability and conscience. It is not true that party discipline binds us to the point that all freedom and all desires for what is good be smothered.

In 1916, the hon. gentleman who was then member for Kamouraska did not secure a unanimous liberal vote when he submitted a motion to this house censuring the nefarious provisions of Ontario's school act. In 1917, the liberal majority deserted Laurier to rally under the banner of the Union government.

At present, like the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail), the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), the hon. member for London (Mr. Betts) and the people, I see in the military development which is outlined an organization which is liable and calculated to draw my country into all kinds of wars.

Should the alarm be given, whatever it might be, the emotions of the people will be so stirred up that the decision of Parliament will be an accomplished fact and will serve no more as a protection against participation in the conflict and the sending of troops to the theatre of war.

The suggestion that the colony should assume the cost of defence is not a new one, for long before 1867 the mother country endeavoured to carry out such a scheme which was one of the main arguments put forward in support of the merging of British American colonies into a federation.

Last year, the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) based his argument wholly upon the lack of a line of defence. But that line of defence is no more defined this year than it was last year. And we have, in addition, the threat of a widespread war in other continents.

Last week the hon. member for Laflèche-St. Maurice (Mr. Crète) again asked: "Where is the line of defence? Where is the line of demarcation? How far will our soldiers have to go?" Again no reply was forthcoming.

The Liberals as a party were identifying themselves better with the people when in Montreal East they administered such a crushing defeat to Sir Georges Etienne Cartier, the sponsor, nay the author, of the Militia Act. That act is still in existence, as was shown the other day by the hon. member for Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe), without any one disputing the point. That act is quite elastic and broad, and it is also fraught with danger. What does it say? Section 2, chapter 132 of the revised statutes of Canada says:

(b) "emergency" means war, invasion, riot or insurrection, real or apprehended;

Section 8 reads as follows:

All the male inhabitants of Canada, of the age of eighteen years and upwards, and under sixty, not exempt or disqualified by law, and being British subjects, shall be liable to service in the militia; provided that the governor general may require all the male inhabitants of Canada, capable of bearing arms, to serve in the case of a levée en masse.

Section 64 provides that:

The governor in council may place the militia, or any part thereof, on active service anywhere in Canada and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

Section 69 says:

The Army Act for the time being in force in Great Britain, the King's regulations and all other laws applicable to his majesty's troops in Canada and not inconsistent with this act or the regulations made hereunder, shall have force and effect as if they had been enacted by the parliament of Canada for the government of the militia.

Is that clear enough? Is that sufficiently convincing?

The right hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) may contend that the Military Service Act is dead, but such is not the case with respect to the Militia Act, whose far-reaching tentacles are ever threatening us, and which makes us liable to service beyond Canada.

That is a far cry from national defence confined to the boundaries and the interests of Canada. That is the imperialistic doctrine being revived, taking shape again, coming to the fore and overpowering us with its whole might—

Mr. LACOMBE: May I ask a question of the hon. member? Will he please tell me whether the Military Service Act is dead in Canada?

Mr. GARIEPY: Mr. Chairman, I am not discussing the Military Service Act; I shall be governed by the statement which the right honourable the Minister of Justice made the other day. My argument is based upon the Militia Act which unquestionably is still in force, which contains the sections I read a moment ago with respect to either matter, and which leads to a definite conclusion to be drawn by every reasonable man, by every patriot in whose mind the interests of our confederation are foremost.

I say that the imperialistic doctrine is being revived, is again taking shape, is coming to the fore and will be overpowering us with all its might unless parliament heeds the wishes of the people and confines our defence obligations to our geographical boundaries, unless, moreover, parliament defines beforehand the character of our external obligations and declares upon our neutrality within well defined limits. I think my stand is consistent with the true Liberal tradition.

Mr. LACOMBE: The hon. member has not answered my question. I would like to know whether or not conscription has become a dead letter here.

Mr. GARIEPY: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member had better consult the Department of Justice or else wait for another opportunity of discussing the question of conscription.

To conclude, Mr. Chairman, allow me to say, if the reference is not too personal, that I fought my first political battle in 1895, and I remember how we opposed the purchase of rifles by the Minister of Militia in the Tupper government, Alphonse Desjardins. Our reason was that we feared Canada's participation in European wars. Did not the province of Quebec, in 1911, protest against a navy that would have been Canadian in time of peace and Imperial in time of war, according to Mr. Fielding's formula?

The Liberal majority in the Senate voted, in 1912, against a $35,000,000 subsidy to the British navy. Men may go, but measures remain, as was evidenced when a minister of the crown secured the approval of His Excellency Archbishop Bruchesi in the matter of the National Service cards, on the faith of a solemn engagement that there would be no conscription in this country. The minister left the cabinet, but conscription was established, at which time occurred the series of unforgettable gestures which accompanied the creation in our country and the whole existence of the Borden-Rowell-Calder Union government.

Everybody now is sorry that conscription was ever established as it served no useful purpose, everybody clearly sees that Canada's contribution was out of proportion to her resources and her means, everybody knows that Canada did not benefit in any way from the Treaty of Peace, everybody deplores the colossal debt accumulated in those tragic years and one wonders how such a panic and such exaggerations could happen.

One wonders why Sir Thomas White, a former Liberal who was appointed Finance minister by Mr. Borden in preference to Sir George E. Foster, was allowed to engulf the country in debt under the cloak of patriotism, of imperialism and of every noble sentiment, either for the purposes of war or for the acquisition of railways.

The best part of our revenue goes for the maintenance of a national railway system which came to light at the same time as conscription, and the bonds guaranteed by the provinces were exchanged in Toronto for federal bonds, while our glorious 22nd was defending Vimy Ridge inch by inch.

We must not forget that, in order to defeat an oppressive administration, in 1921, Quebec returned 65 Liberal members. I do not question the motives of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), I admire his splendid talent and his scholarship, but I am of the opinion that he is launching the country on a dangerous road, and that he is paving the way for further panics and exaggerations in Canada.

Under those circumstances and in the absence of positive statements and formal pledges from the leaders of the nation, I am bound to think that the strictly national defence, which would be approved by all, does not call for, does not necessitate the sacrifices and expenditures which we are now asked to provide for and which are only a step towards greater sacrifices and expenditures.

Is the time well chosen to yield to the appeals of militaristic madness, while we are voting millions for seed grain to be given to distressed farmers in Alberta and Saskatchewan, while unemployment is now becoming a national institution, while depression is spreading, while the building trades are looking for funds, while our normal credit is hardly adequate to our national needs, while there are everywhere incentives, not to sink in deadly enterprises, but to lay out to advantage in constructive endeavours, the assets accumulated by ten generations of Canadians.

Under present circumstances, I am opposed to the military appropriations as tabled because I love my country, because I love the youth of my country.

Mr. V. J. POTTIER (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Chairman, the two important matters in the estimates before us for the Department of National Defence are the amount involved and the policy of the government. The item under consideration, No. 80, under the heading of departmental administration, forms a portion of the general defence estimates. I propose briefly to refer to the two features which, I submit, are important so far as this particular item is concerned.

First, I think the amount is an important feature. The second is the way the amount is to be expended. The total estimates for national defence for the fiscal year 1938-39 amount to $34,022,364.42. It should be noted that the estimates last year were $36,034,-371.42. In other words, there is a reduction this year of something over two million dollars.

Another feature which I think is important when considering the expenditure of Canada on defence for the coming fiscal year is to look at what other countries are expending and compare our expenditures with theirs. After all, defence means, generally speaking, protecting a country against an aggressor, and whether you are weak or strong depends in a large measure upon the strength or weakness of your opponent. To put it in another way, defence to-day is largely proportioned to the expenditures made by the various countries. A question, therefore, very important to determine is whether we are making adequate provision for expenditure for the defence of Canada, keeping in mind what other countries are doing.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), in presenting the estimates for the fiscal year 1937-38, gave us some figures of the per capita expenditure of Canada as compared with those of some of the other nations of the world. I have prepared a statement, taking the major part of my information from the League of Nations armaments year book, showing the different countries and their estimated expenditures for the year 1937-38. This book was, I submit, brought up to date and completed in the light of the most recent official publications. The various expenditures of the different countries have been converted into the value of Canadian dollars; the area and population of each country are given; and from that a deduction is made in dollar value of the area in question as well as the per capita expenditure. It has been impossible to estimate correctly the expenditures for Russia and Germany. Russia estimated her expenditure last year at something over twenty billions of rubles. Germany gives no figures about estimates of expenditures; all we are told is that the Minister of Finance is authorized to allocate in agreement with competent ministers the necessary funds and to decide upon the utilization of them. Some experts outside the league, however, tell us that the per capita expenditure of Germany for 1936 was $41.72, and in preparing these estimates I have taken those figures for last year. A number of interesting deductions are made from those figures, and I propose briefly to give them to the committee. I have left out five countries whose currency I could not convert into Canadian dollars; they are: Afghanistan, Saudi Arabia, Honduras, Liberia and Paraguay. Outside these, all countries that have a central independent government and have prepared an estimate for defence are, I think, considered. There are, in all, fifty-nine.

We find last year a total world expenditure for defence of $11,771,000,000. The average expenditure per square kilometre of the land area of those countries amounts to $126. If you convert that into square miles, it means that for the land area of those fifty-nine countries there was an estimated expenditure of $315 per square mile. Two and a half kilometres are about one square mile. The highest expenditure for any country per kilometre was in Germany, with $5,956. The lowest for any country was in Panama, and that was one dollar per kilometre. The estimated expenditure last year of Canada was $3.68 per kilometre. We are the third lowest of any of the fifty-nine countries which I have on the list. I have said that Panama is the lowest; Norway, with $1.45, is the second lowest; Canada is the third lowest, in the amount of $3.68 per kilometre.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Has the hon. member conveniently at hand the figures of density of population of the various countries?

Mr. POTTIER: I am taking next the population of each country as a whole. I know the density of population is a feature. I was dealing only with area.

I now come to the per capita expenditure, and this is what we find. The average per capita expenditure for war defence is $6.49. The highest for any country is that of Germany—as I have just indicated—in the amount of $41.72. The lowest for any country is, again, Panama, with sixteen cents per capita. Canada expended $3.18.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

PRIVATE BILLS

QUESTION OF PROCEDURE IN DEALING WITH APPLICATIONS FOR DIVORCE

Mr. H. R. EMMERSON (Westmorland) moved that the house go into committee of the whole on private bills.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): With regard to these divorce bills, they are said to come from the province of Quebec. But I have made a little list from those bills, taking a few of them at random. For instance, in the Williamson case the place of birth of the husband was Montreal; of the wife, Westmount; place of marriage Montreal. In the case of Cohen the husband was born in Russia, the wife in Rumania, and they were married in Montreal. In the case of McMartin the husband was born in Oyster Bay, New York; the wife at Shreveport, Louisiana, and they were married in Oyster Bay, New York. In the Hislop case the husband was born in Rumania, the wife in Russia, and they were married in Montreal. In the Oravec case they are people from Winnipeg and were married there. In the Klajner or Klein case the husband was born in Bendzin, and the wife in Bendzin, and the place of marriage was Poland. In the case of the Skinners there is no place of birth of husband or wife, but they were married in London. In the Resnick case both parties were born in Russia, and they were married in Montreal. In the Adams case the husband was born at Petrolia, Ontario; the wife at Marthaville, Ontario, and they were married at Sault Ste. Marie. In the case of O'Sullivan both parties were born and married in England. In the Macdonald case both were born at Saint John, New Brunswick and married there.

It surprises me very much that it was said afterwards that these divorce laws are for the people of the province of Quebec. I have quoted many instances of people who came from other provinces or from Russia, Rumania and everywhere. I do not see the propriety of having that kind of legislation on divorce in our statute books. The number of divorce acts in the statute books is almost incredible. I saw an answer which was given to the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemount (Mr. Fournier) the other day about the number of divorces and the fact is not at all as represented to him. I made a calculation for the years 1928 to 1937 inclusive, and found the number of private bills that were divorce bills was 1,069. That means that in 1,069 cases the House of Commons passed those bills through first reading, second reading, committee and third reading; the same thing was done in the senate, and His Excellency the Governor General, the representative of the king, had to put his name on each divorce act. We have more important things to discuss than those, especially when one picks at random the evidence in any one of those cases and finds it is always the same story. There is an investigator who looks through the keyhole and says, "I am the bell boy;" he gets in and sees a woman there with a man, a bottle of whiskey half full, two glasses, or perhaps the bottle is empty. They report that to the senate; the parties are asked if there is connivance, and the complainant says there is no connivance. Then the august body of the senate says, "We must grant them a divorce." We hear parliament spoken of as the high court of parliament. The only thing on which parliament is acting as a court is divorce. We are using our legislative authority in a judicial capacity.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the hon. member whether it would not be a good thing to have a divorce court set up in the province of Quebec as in the other provinces?

Mr. POULIOT: I thank my hon. friend for his suggestion, and I shall conclude by offering mine. Most of those people try to take advantage of the fact that they reside for a certain time in the province of Quebec to come here and bother us with their applications, which mean huge fees for the attorneys in each case, for the lobbyists who are here to bother hon. members about those divorce bills, and we receive no consideration at all. I wonder whether it would not be better to tell all those people that they should elect domicile in any province in which there is a divorce court rather than bother the House of Commons and the Senate and disturb His Excellency the Governor General to ratify their divorce. That is my humble suggestion. We have many interesting questions to discuss in this house, just as the senators have in the other house. Therefore, it seems to me that first of all no licence as a lobbyist should be issued in favour of any lawyer who is acting for anyone who asks for a divorce or is defendant in a divorce case. That would be one way to stop this sort of thing. Then the rules of the house should be amended in order that the clerk should have no authority to issue any licence to those lobbyists. The second point is that they would have no lawyers and they would be told to go and elect domicile in another province in which there are divorce courts, and give us peace. This would be so much the better for the House of Commons, the Senate and His Excellency the Governor General and the country at large.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

THE RESTIGOUCHE LOG DRIVING AND BOOM COMPANY

Mr. C. J. VENIOT (Gloucester) moved the second reading of Bill No. 66, respecting The Restigouche Log Driving and Boom Company.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

On section 1—Directors.

Mr. BENNETT: It appears that the hon. member in charge of the bill proposes, by resolution, to make anybody a director. The effect of this would be to make any person on the street or elsewhere, who secured a resolution of directors, a director of the boom company. When I look at the side note, I cannot think that that is what is intended. All that is necessary is to add the words "or a member of a corporation," because as the section stands now, it covers a director or a manager. All that was intended, I believe, is that anybody who is a member of a shareholder company could be elected to the directorate of the company in which a corporation is a shareholder. As the clause reads, it would be competent to pass a resolution of directors to make any of us here directors of the boom company. Apparently, from the note, that is not what is intended.

Mr. VENIOT: I think the intention of the company was not to make anybody on the street a director of the company. Perhaps it might be appropriate to give a few words of explanation in order to clarify the situation. In 1910, when the act respecting the Restigouche Log Driving and Boom Company was passed, logging and boom operations on the Restigouche river, or in the region surrounding the river, were confined chiefly to companies whose mills and head offices were located in Campbellton or Dalhousie or in the neighbourhood of the Restigouche river. The act specified that every owner of 100,000 superficial feet and upwards of logs intended to be handled by the Restigouche Log Driving and Boom Company may become a member of the company, and may attend and vote at all meetings for the fiscal year of the company.

Since that time the long lumber industry has practically gone out of the picture in the neighbourhood and has been replaced by the pulp and paper and rayon industries, in the hands of large corporations, such as The New Brunswick International Paper Company, Fraser Companies Limited, and others, with head offices and boards of directors located in the large cities, such as Montreal and Toronto, but with their operations still continuing in Campbellton, Dalhousie or other points in the neighbourhood of the Restigouche river.

It is to overcome this handicap of being obliged to send representatives, either directors or managers of the company, to attend these meetings, that this request is made. I think the companies would be desirous of having as their representative in the neighbourhood somebody who is more conversant with the logging and booming operations, such as, for example, the manager of a company located in Campbellton who knows exactly what the requirements of logging and booming may be. I think it might be appropriate to change the wording specified here to "a shareholder authorized by resolution of the directors of a corporation, which is a member of the company."

Mr. BENNETT: The only point I make is that it authorizes anybody, instead of a member of the corporation who is a shareholder.

Mr. MICHAUD: That is the object of the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: To name any person, whether he is a member or not?

Mr. MICHAUD: Any person authorized by resolution of the directors of a corporation which is a member of the company.

Mr. BENNETT: But the person selected need not be a member of the shareholder company.

Mr. MICHAUD: That is correct; he need not be. It is to avoid this inconvenience that the amendment is moved.

Mr. BENNETT: I am greatly surprised that any corporation would seek by a resolution of its directors to appoint a stranger to be a director of a company in which it was a shareholder. If they decided to appoint any member of the corporation that is a shareholder to be a director, that would be all right. That would apply to the president, vice-president and officers of the shareholding corporation. Surely you are not going to appoint as a director of the Restigouche boom company a perfect stranger who has no corporate holding in the enterprise. That is a new provision of company law; it is something that has never been done in this country.

Mr. MICHAUD: This company is owned by two other companies, the International paper company and the Fraser company. They found it difficult to have their own directors to act as directors of the boom company, and they want to select certain of their employees, such as the head of the woods department. He might not happen to be a director or shareholder of the holding company, but they want to make him a director of the boom company.

Mr. BENNETT: It is proper that a shareholder of a shareholding corporation may become a director of the boom company; but when you say that by resolution of the directors of the shareholder company they can elect a perfect stranger to be a director of the boom company, you are transgressing every rule that governs the conduct of corporations in any country. One of the qualifications has been that before a person can be elected a shareholder he shall in some way be connected with the enterprise. The usual practice has been to qualify him by transferring to him a single share. That is so in our Canadian National enterprises. This practice has been carried on in order to maintain the corporate identity of the companies. All that would be necessary to do to meet the ordinary requirements would be to change the word "person" to the words "member of a corporation." I would suggest that progress be reported and this bill considered at the next sitting of the committee. This would be a dangerous precedent for us to establish here, and I hesitate to see it done once attention has been directed to it.

Mr. CRERAR: If he were a shareholder in one of the two companies it would be all right.

Mr. BENNETT: That is all you want.

Mr. CRERAR: I take it that this amendment would not be necessary.

Mr. BENNETT: Let me put the situation in this way. We have a company known as Jones Limited. One of the shareholders of Jones Limited is Smith Limited, a corporation. As the act now stands, the president, vice president or manager of Smith Limited could be made a director of Jones Limited. This amendment seeks to make it possible for anyone to have a resolution passed by the directors of Smith Limited appointing a man on the street or elsewhere a director of Jones Limited. I think the minister realizes that such a thing is never done.

Mr. CRERAR: I admit that it is rather unusual, but I do not see where any harm would result from it here.

Mr. BENNETT: We would be doing something that has never been done.

Mr. CRERAR: The leader of the opposition speaks of appointing a stranger; but what would happen in this case, according to the explanation given by the sponsor of the bill, is that they would appoint the manager or some one of their employees.

Mr. BENNETT: The manager is a member.

Mr. CRERAR: He might not be a shareholder.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what the amendment provides for, that a stranger may be made a director of the boom company.

Mr. CRERAR: The manager could scarcely be described as a stranger.

Mr. BENNETT: It is in the bill now.

Mr. CRERAR: At the present time no person would be eligible to be elected a director unless he was a stockholder in the Restigouche Log Driving and Boom Company.

Mr. BENNETT: This bill changes that.

Mr. CRERAR: That is the fact.

Mr. BENNETT: No; that is not the fact. The original act provides that no one shall be qualified to hold office as a director unless he is a member of the company or a director or the manager of a corporation which is a member of the company. That is the present position. This amendment provides that the directors of this shareholding corporation can pass a resolution naming the deputy clerk sitting at the table a director of the boom company.

Mr. VENIOT: Would not the difficulty be overcome by changing the wording and substituting the words "or a person who is an employee of one of the companies authorized by resolution"?

Mr. BENNETT: All that would be necessary to do to meet what the hon. gentleman has in mind is to delete the word "person" and substitute therefor the words "or a member of the corporation which is a member of the company." He could be then given a qualifying share and we would be maintaining the theory which has always prevailed with respect to corporations. I do not wish to embarrass my hon. friend with his legislation, but I think it is my duty to point out that we are creating a dangerous precedent when we say that the board of directors of a corporation that happens to be a shareholder in a company can meet together and pass a resolution appointing a stranger to be a director of the company. That would be a dangerous thing to do as some one else will be coming here next year and wanting the same thing.

Mr. VENIOT: According to the suggestion of the leader of the opposition, the person who would become a director would have to be a member of one of the individual companies, whether he owned one or a greater number of shares. I think that difficulty could be overcome by changing the wording to that effect.

Mr. BENNETT: All you need to do is make the change I have suggested.

Mr. VENIOT: I see no reason why a member of one of these corporations could not be found in Campbellton or Dalhousie where the business is carried on.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Fisheries can see that this is a fair suggestion. He is interested in this company as it runs logs down the Restigouche. I have no interest in the matter except the interest I always have when a precedent is being established that may create trouble for everyone in the future.

Mr. MICHAUD: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. J. M. TURNER (Springfield) moved the second reading of Bill No. 67, respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

On section 1—Power to lease.

Mr. HOWE: I should like to know why this matter has been brought before parliament in this form rather than having been referred to the board of railway commissioners. I have no objection to the objects sought to be achieved by the bill as I am familiar with the situation, but the Railway Act provides that a lease can be arranged by the board of railway commissioners when each party to the lease has approved the terms thereof by vote of two-thirds of their shareholders.

Mr. TURNER: I can give the full particulars if I am permitted to make a statement at this time.

Mr. HOWE: I am not objecting to the principle; I am simply saying that this is an unusual way to deal with the matter when the necessary machinery has been set up under the Railway Act.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the bill been to the railway committee?

Mr. HOWE: No.

[Mr. Stewart.]

Mr. BENNETT: Would it not be desirable to move now that it be referred to the railway committee?

Mr. HOWE: The purpose of the provisions of the Railway Act is that interested parties shall be heard, and with the permission of the sponsor I move that this bill be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. TURNER: That will be quite satisfactory to me, Mr. Chairman.

Section stands.

Motion agreed to, and bill referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

NIAGARA FALLS OBSERVATION BRIDGE COMPANY

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 29, consideration in committee of Bill No. 15, to incorporate Niagara Falls Observation Bridge Company—Mr. Damude—Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

On section 8—Power to construct bridge.

Mr. LOCKHART: Mr. Chairman, I have one or two questions to ask the hon. member for Welland, and I wish to make a correction in connection with one or two points that came up in the discussion the last time the bill was before the committee. In the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, the hon. member for Saskatoon asked why the money was divided, $2,000,000 for construction and $2,000,000 for land. I would refer the hon. member to page 60 of the minutes of the meeting of the committee, where following a question that had been asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North as to how the money was divided, the Hon. Mr. McQuesten said:

Hon. Mr. McQuesten: As far as my information is now, we do not think it will exceed $2,000,000.

That was for the bridge. He went on:

And the other $2,000,000 was for purchasing land.

That was afterwards extended to include buildings also, and it was on that point that I was enlarging when the bill was before the committee the other evening.

There is one other point I wish to bring up, which has been brought to my attention by citizens of my community.

Mr. YOUNG: If the hon. member will permit me, I think what was said during the whole discussion was that approximately $2,000,000 would be required for each purpose, but they did not say that it would require the whole $2,000,000 in either case. They did not know what the land would cost or what the bridge would cost.

Mr. LOCKHART: The point is that it was divided in the manner I have stated, half and half.

Mr. YOUNG: But Mr. McQuesten did not say it would take the full $2,000,000 for either purpose.

Mr. LOCKHART: I have quoted from the minutes of the meeting to show how Mr. McQuesten understood the amount would be divided. Of course, no one would assume for a moment that an estimate could be given of what the land might cost because they were acquiring probably five acres.

It has been brought to my attention by someone who read the account of the discussion, that the hon. member for Winnipeg North said with reference to this project:

> I submit that when you build a bridge with an operating income of $273,000 a year and an annual expenditure of only $65,000, there must be a fairly large profit for those who own the bridge.

I pointed out to the hon. member, and he might have added, that carrying charges, interest on bonds and other items were included. From the way in which he gave the figures some may have thought that the difference between $273,000 and $65,000 left a tremendous spread which was altogether out of proportion, and I have been asked to have that corrected.

I notice in the press reports which I have been receiving daily from the city of Niagara Falls that a telegram was sent to the Prime Minister requesting him to see to it that a provision be inserted in the bill before it passes this house in order to protect the taxpayers against any loss of taxation. Could the hon. member for Welland tell me if such a telegram was dispatched to the Prime Minister?

Mr. DAMUDE: That is correct, and I understand that the telegram was referred to the Minister of Transport and replied to by him. I also received a telegram from the mayor of Niagara Falls, to which I replied the same day, suggesting that if the city council wish to make representations here they do so before the senate committee when the bill is before that body.

Mr. HEAPS: The hon. member for Lincoln has referred to figures which I gave this committee. They were correct so far as they were given, and if there was an insufficiency of figures supplied by myself, I want to assure the committee that this was not my fault. The fault lay with those who oppose the present application. Mr. Robertson, counsel for those who oppose this bridge, was requested by me and, I believe, by other members of the railway committee to furnish it with a proper statement showing the receipts and expenditures on the bridge for the ten year period from 1927 to 1937, and although he promised to submit such a statement, it was not forthcoming up to the time the railway committee reported the bill. The only figures he gave were those I gave the committee of the whole on the last occasion when this bill was under consideration. We have not the faintest idea even to-day how this $65,000 is made up, because no itemized statement has been submitted. When Mr. Robertson, representing the private corporation which is so anxious to have the present bill defeated, was asked if he could produce a profit and loss account of the bridge, he said he could not nor did he know where there was one in existence.

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Robertson gave a clear explanation of that.

Mr. HEAPS: No. He submitted balance sheets for the ten previous years of the whole operations of the corporation, nine-tenths of which had reference to utilities owned on the United States side.

Mr. EDWARDS: There was painting.

Mr. HEAPS: He made some statement to that effect; but there was no itemized statement showing how the $65,000 was made up, and I think other members of the railway committee will bear me out that in giving the committee of the whole the figures I gave of $273,000 of income and $65,000 of expenditure, I gave the only figures that, as I remember, Mr. Robertson submitted. There was one other figure he gave which strengthened the argument of those who opposed the bridge. He said there was two per cent placed in a depreciation account each year. The bridge having been in existence for forty years, with two per cent placed in a depreciation account for forty years, the bridge would have been debt free.

Mr. EDWARDS: No, no. What about upkeep?

Mr. HEAPS: Hon. members to my right, if they have any business acumen, and I believe they have—

Mr. WERMENLINGER: I ask the hon. gentleman if he ever handled a private business in his life; if so, how can he come to those conclusions?

Mr. HEAPS: I may not have handled one of my own; but I have handled public utilities, and I know a good deal more about them than some of those who are interrupting. The cost of painting a bridge is not capital expenditure, and anybody who has anything to do with business ought to know that. Painting is purely maintenance and comes out of operating revenue, and if a bridge requires painting every one or two years, that is not capital expenditure, and cannot be reckoned as part of the capital expenditure of the utility. The same applies to maintenance charges; they are not capital expenditure, as the hon. member should know. They represent part of the operation costs of the bridge; indeed, they are part of the $65,000, part of the annual expenditure of the bridge, and if two per cent were put in each year, as I said a moment ago, which caused the hon. gentleman to my right to become so excited—

Mr. EDWARDS: It was such a foolish statement; that is why.

Mr. HEAPS: The statement was made by Mr. Robertson, K.C., counsel for the private corporation. I am merely repeating what he said.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: I was a member of that committee, and everybody was speaking at the same time.

Mr. HEAPS: Unfortunately there was no printed record of the proceedings, but it was stated that two per cent was set aside for sinking fund purposes. What I claim is that if two per cent were set aside each year by way of amortization and put in reserve for the purposes of a sinking fund, at the end of forty years the bridge would be paid for and there would be no bonded indebtedness.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Two per cent for forty years would not represent more than seventy per cent.

Mr. HEAPS: Two per cent each year amortized over a period of forty years would be, as far as I understand arithmetic, approximately one hundred cents on the dollar, and not seventy, as the hon. member states.

Mr. EDWARDS: Seventy per cent is about right.

Mr. BENNETT: Two per cent of the bonds, not two per cent capital.

Mr. HEAPS: Well, if it is two per cent of the bonds, that is eighty per cent.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): That is near enough.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not wish to continue the discussion on this point because the facts are obvious even to my hon. friends. The issue is not whether the income was $273,000 and the expenditure was $65,000 a year. The question is whether there should be a bridge there owned in part by the province of Ontario, or whether we should allow a private corporation to construct a bridge which will be owned in perpetuity by a United States company whose head office is in that country. That is my main reason for supporting the present bill. I saw the old bridge a few weeks ago down in the Niagara river, and I think it was not a bad place for it to be. It is unfortunate for the people who owned the bridge that it is where it is; but so far as the people of Ontario are concerned, it would be very desirable from a purely Canadian standpoint, as a "Canada first" policy, may I say, to have the people of Canada own that part of the bridge which is located in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Why does the hon. member not put that in the statute?

Mr. HARRIS: I am glad to see the hon. member for Winnipeg North enrolled in the ranks of the "Canada first" party. Forty years at two per cent would be eighty per cent of the cost of the bridge; we can admit that.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. HARRIS: As regards this particular clause—

> The company may construct, maintain and operate a bridge across the Niagara river—

—the company owns only half; the legislation embodied in this particular bill does not make proper provision for the consummation of the work at the other end. In the committee of which I had the pleasure of being one of the members it was quite clearly shown that since the advent of the Peace bridge the revenue has gone down there considerably. The hon. member mentioned the cost of maintaining the bridge; to-day he goes a degree further and adds the depreciation charges; but what about the interest on the four million dollars which it is proposed to spend on this particular project?

Mr. HEAPS: I did not discuss the cost of the new bridge.

Mr. HARRIS: Interest costs money, and five per cent a year on four million dollars is $200,000 of the $273,000 mentioned. That leaves only $73,000—$65,000 for the operation of the bridge and less than $10,000 for depreciation—and anyone who is in business knows that is not nearly enough. Over and above that, do we know that $4,000,000 will be sufficient? Members of the committee remember that the original bill provided for some $7,000,000 if necessary and $500,000 for some other costs. Then they drop down to $4,000,000: they divide that up and show where it is going to be spent. Two million dollars is the cost of the bridge and two million dollars is the cost of the approaches on either side of the bridge.

An hon. MEMBER: Perhaps.

Mr. HARRIS: Somebody has said "perhaps," and that remark is well placed. But if it is one million dollars of assessable value taken out of the city of Niagara Falls, where is that city to get its assessment on which to levy taxes to keep going? What provision is being made for that? What provision was made for the city of Niagara Falls to come forward and state its case?

With regard to this particular bridge, as compared with the bridge of the International Railway Company, it is said that it will cost two million dollars. I should like to see a publicly owned bridge there, but I object to this extra two million dollars for the costs of the approaches on either side. I should like to hear some sort of analysis of these figures by the Minister of Transport before I vote on the passage of this particular bill. In the railway committee they called the company twopenny-halfpenny because it only had four lanes of traffic. In the case of the old company, foundations worth half a million dollars are there and will not have to be built again, but under the ownership setup of this new bridge they must be compensation to the International Bridge Company—another added cost to the new project. All this is going to make it a very expensive affair for the people of Ontario. Why should the province have to find $4,000,000 for a bridge which is being sponsored privately for the time being, because, according to the statement of the Minister of Transport, there is no other way to introduce the legislation? Then the owners will be bought out with the money of the province of Ontario. To my mind something more should come out with regard to this particular bridge. As someone suggests, there may be an Ethiopian in the woodpile. Perhaps between now and next Tuesday, when the bill again comes before the committee, the minister will tell us just where that Ethiopian is.

Progress reported.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Departmental administration, $425,720.

Mr. V. J. POTTIER (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): When the committee rose I was attempting to give the approximate per capita expenditure of the world for defence. I gave the figure of $6.49, saying that Germany had the highest, $41.72, and Panama the lowest, 16 cents, while Canada's per capita expenditure was $3.18. Out of the fifty-nine nations that I said were listed, Canada is twentieth from the bottom of the list; in other words, thirty-nine nations spent more per capita than our estimated expenditure for last year.

Another interesting deduction which can be taken from the statement I refer to is the expenditure of the chief dictator groups, Germany, Italy and Japan. It is estimated that last year their expenditure was $3,513,889,500. The next group that is interesting to study is the chief democracies, in which I include England, France and the United States. Their estimated expenditure was $2,708,838,375. The other group that we might consider is that which represents the communistic mode of thought. They spent something over $4,000,000,000 in national defence. When we compare those figures with the estimated expenditure for Canada of $34,000,000 for this year, we have a very small expenditure indeed.

Another important item that we should consider is the expenditure for defence on the North American continent. For last year it is estimated at $1,075,000,000. I include in that the islands adjacent to the continent. The per capita expenditure on the North American continent last year was estimated at $6.24. Canada's was $3.18.

Complete figures for the fifty-nine countries are as follows:

Afghanistan, Saudi Arabia, Honduras, Liberia and Paraguay are not listed on this table. I could not obtain any adequate rate of exchange.

I mentioned that these figures are given in Canadian currency. We must keep in mind, when comparing expenditures with other countries having a lower standard of living, that the same amount will produce more value in labour and material in such countries. As Canada has a high standard of living, it would make the proportion for defence less than in a foreign country for the same amount.

I have made no reference to colonies or dependencies, as they have themselves no budget for defence. They have police forces which act as defence guards, but their cost is not included in this statement.

I do not agree with the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey), when he said in effect that the expenditure for Canada is grossly inadequate. We have to keep in mind in connection with our expenditure for defence our internal possibilities, and a balanced proportion to other expenditures must be maintained. We cannot afford to spend all our money on training a new army when we already have with us an army on relief. The maintenance of Canadian unity is also a serious factor. It is just as serious to have bankruptcy and dissension from within Canada as war from without. I should say, however, that I support the suggestion made by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) that as our next step we must try to increase our air force and develop within the next two years say one thousand Canadian air pilots. I recommend this suggestion to the Minister of National Defence and to the government for their most serious consideration. In other words, I submit we should go as far as possible, keeping the expenditure within a reasonable proportion and maintaining an increasing defence in the air. The trend of defence in other countries in the development of their air forces is out of proportion with the other units of defence, and Canada must keep this in mind.

In this morning's paper we find a declaration from Rome yesterday by the premier of Italy in these words:

> Aerial warfare is destined to become increasingly important in the war of to-morrow.

Developments the world over substantiate that statement, and Canada must not forget this development.

I have gone over the amount of our estimates for defence as well as the estimates for other countries. We must realize that huge expenditures are being made throughout the world, and these expenditures are apparently on the increase, in that for 1938 the estimates for Great Britain, the United States, France, Germany, Italy and Japan are growing by leaps and bounds. We saw an announcement from Tokyo last Sunday stating that the government had introduced and gained enactment of the regular budget of $830,000,000 and a military budget of $1,400,000,000 to meet the cost of the war in China in 1938; in other words, more than three times the expenditure estimated by the League of Nations for Japan in 1937.

We have in this morning's paper a further declaration from the premier of Italy referring to the cost of war. He declares that by arming further, regardless of cost—note that—he intends to assure general peace, but above all "our peace." This may all end in the general bankruptcy of nations. I sometimes wonder whether that is not the next hazard of this world rather than that of war. The figures I have just given are food for serious thought in that regard. The expenditures of Canada, however, must be viewed from two angles: How much can we spend, and how far should we go? The proper course is not going to be that indicated by one extreme or the other; the proper course must be that followed by the best considered opinion of Canadians as a whole, keeping in mind the past, having a thought for the present, and an eye for the future. It appears reasonable that we should at least follow the other dominions of the commonwealth. We are in more or less the same position as they are. On looking at the estimated expenditures for 1937 of Australia, Canada, the Irish Free State, New Zealand and the Union of South Africa, we find a total of $88,000,000. Out of that Canada spent $35,000,000. Australia, it is true, has increased her expenditure this year. The average per capita expenditure for the nations of the commonwealth outside Great Britain amounted to $3.39 as compared with Canada's $3.18. I am of the opinion that the estimate which we are going to be asked to vote upon for national defence is a fair amount, having in mind our external situation, our financial ability and our geographic position, and I intend to support each item of the estimates when they are voted.

I have referred to expenditure. I now propose to deal with the policy of the government in making those expenditures, having particular reference to the maritime provinces. It has been declared by the Minister of National Defence that the Canadian defence policy is in the first place for the preservation of Canadian neutrality; in the second place for the defence of Canadian coast lines, ports and terminals, and for the defence of the focal areas of our trade routes in case of necessity. We in the maritimes are particularly interested in the defence of our coast lines, ports, terminals and trade routes. I think at this time it is fair to go back to the last war, 1914-1918, and try to find indications there of what we can expect in the next war. We find that on the Atlantic coast at the close of the war, as nearly as I have been able to get the correct figures, we had:

10 auxiliary patrol vessels
12 Canadian trawlers
7 trawler sweepers
36 trawlers
36 drifters
15 drifters (imperial and temporarily loaned)
6 United States submarine chasers
1 United States torpedo boat.

In all, on the Atlantic coast we had 123 ships. It should be realized by every hon. member that German submarines were within twenty-five miles of the Atlantic coast during the last war. I well remember vessels that I had seen a number of times which were sunk within seeing distance of the shore. This may surprise some hon. members, but in order that there may be no doubt whatever in their minds I should like to refer them to the report made by a commission appointed by this government. I refer to what is known as the reparations commission, which reported first in 1927 and again in 1930, 1931, 1932 and 1933. This is officially known as the report of the royal commissioner appointed by His Excellency the Governor General in Council in pursuance of the Inquiries Act to investigate and report upon all claims which might be submitted to the commissioner for the purpose of determining whether they were within the treaty of Versailles, and the fair amount of such claims. At page 21 of this report it is indicated that in class A, having to do with fishing schooners and fishermen, there were 758 claims amounting to $1,113,-384.09. Then on page 71 of the report there is an illustration of what was occurring:

Re Schooner Nelson A

Claimant is a Canadian. The schooner, 72 tons, was captured by enemy submarine August 4, 1918, and sunk by bombs twenty-five miles from Shelburne. She had sailed from Yarmouth in July and was returning from a fishing trip off the Nova Scotia coast, with a catch of 625 quintals of halibut.

There will be found in the report reference to twenty-one vessels that were dealt with in that way, a number of them close to the Atlantic coast.

Mr. MacNEIL: Were these vessels sunk by direct enemy action within Canadian coastal waters?

Mr. POTTIER: No; they were not within the three mile limit, if that is what my hon. friend means.

Mr. MacNEIL: Were they within the twelve mile limit?

Mr. POTTIER: No; they were within twenty-five miles of shore. As I have already indicated, in this report there will be found reference to no less than twenty-one such schooners, and there were some 737 claims, chiefly of individual fishermen or other persons on board those vessels. That was what happened in the last war. Just try to imagine what will happen if we have another war! We shall have submarines and airships to contend with, particularly if the same countries are involved. Can anyone argue, in the light of these facts, that we should not make provision for our defence?

In the maritimes we have two particular interests: First, the defence of our person and property and, second, the defence of our trade routes, as indicated in the policy of the government. There may be some people in some parts of Canada who care little for our person and property. I submit, however, that as Canadians we are entitled to defence proportionate to what the whole of Canada can adequately provide. It must not be forgotten that if one portion of Canada is seized, it means wreck and ruin for the remaining portion. A foothold anywhere in Canada means disaster to the whole country.

The second interest of the maritimes is the defence of our coastal trade routes to the United States, Great Britain, the West Indies and other parts of the world. We live by the sea. In my constitutency of Yarmouth-Shelburne-Clare, for example, the new wealth produced each year through commodities being shipped out of Canada comes from fisheries, lumber and farming. From fisheries we receive approximately $1,150,000; from lumber, approximately $250,000, and from farming, roughly $300,000. That is all new wealth created by reason of these trade routes. That is the only way in which we can buy the manufactured articles, clothes and flour produced in the other portions of Canada. Do away with these routes and we cannot buy. The people have nothing but starvation facing them, particularly in my constituency, if, for example, trade routes to the United States are interrupted in such a way that we cannot ship our fish, particularly lobsters. If that takes place, we can no longer buy from any other portion of Canada. One must also remember that through these trade routes pour out the products not only of the maritimes but of all the rest of Canada. Cut off these life lines, and not only the maritimes but every other portion of Canada will suffer.

These are all possibilities, and every serious Canadian must realize that such eventualities must be provided for. I ask hon. members to keep in mind what happened in the last war on the Atlantic coast in general. We were obliged practically to borrow a patrol squadron, and even with that the German submarines were all along our coast. At the same time I ask hon. members to try to visualize the probabilities in case of another war, to understand the necessity for maintaining as far as possible adequate protection of our coast lines and trade routes. I should like to suggest also to the Minister of National Defence that we in the maritimes look with what I might call a bit of jealousy, perhaps, at the steps taken for the defence of the Pacific coast. I suggest to the minister that so far as possible the defence of the two coast lines should be developed along the same lines and as nearly as possible at the same time. The amount estimated and the policy of the government in the expenditure of that amount should have the support of every hon. member.

In conclusion, I compliment the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) and other members of the government upon the sound and orderly procedure they are following in the defence of Canada.

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): Mr. Chairman, may I at the outset congratulate the hon. member who has just taken his seat upon the excellent address he has made. I listened this afternoon to the speeches, and I hope I may be pardoned if I do not attempt to follow very closely the observations which were made. These addresses seemed excellent, so far as the history of the League of Nations, the Locarno pact, and other matters of that kind are concerned; but unfortunately we are living in a practical world, and the conditions which face the people of Canada, and people outside Canada, are not particularly connected with the history of the past, but have a closer bearing on what may happen to us in the future.

One remark of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), which I am sure commends itself to all, is that our first duty is to keep our country out of war. I believe every Canadian has that ideal in mind, and it is our fond hope that Canada may never again be involved in a great war. The further question which presents itself is this: If we fail to keep Canada out of war, what preparation have we made to defend ourselves?

The debate during the last ten days on defence estimates must indicate that during the last few years Canada has become more defence conscious than at any other time in her history. It is not my intention to deal with the many pertinent events responsible for this attitude of mind among our people, but I believe one of the most striking examples of the change of attitude has been shown by the change of mind of certain members of the House of Commons during the past year. We remember that one year ago, when the estimates of the minister were before the committee, certain members of his party, and of the government, were strongly opposed to them. This year some of those same members have stated definitely that they are supporting the estimates for the present year although the amount is practically the same. This is indeed an evidence of the change of mind not only of people throughout the country but of members of the House of Commons.

Candidly, I believe this change of mind is more than justified. I believe it is prompted not by any great, national nervous sentiment sweeping the country, but by that age old instinct of self-preservation. We, in conjunction with other peace loving nations of the world, realize that in a world evidently gone mad with the false doctrine of brute force, the only thing to do is to make some effort to protect ourselves in the event of our becoming the object or victim of aggression.

I congratulate the minister upon his able speech delivered a week ago in presenting his estimates to the committee, and I also congratulate him upon his defence program, so far as it goes. I assume the minister required considerable courage to raise the estimates even to the amount at which they now stand, although still inadequate.

I should like to follow the observations of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Pottier) in discussing these estimates, and matters of defence as they apply to the maritime provinces. I believe I may be pardoned for limiting my remarks in this way, because members from other parts of Canada have discussed the estimates from a sectional standpoint.

It is generally admitted by all that our two coast lines are the vulnerable sections of the dominion. They are also the sections which require the greatest expenditures for defence and which must be guarded most carefully. We are very fortunate indeed in having two great oceans separating us from the warring nations of other parts of the world. Yearly those oceans are becoming narrower, and we are becoming more vulnerable on account of the inventions of war and methods of warcraft. Then, too, we are fortunate in having to the south of us a friendly nation. For over one hundred and twenty-five years the United States has been a friendly and peaceful neighbour, and I believe we are justified in feeling that that country will continue to be friendly and peaceful so far as we are concerned.

As was pointed out by the hon. member who preceded me in the debate, more money has been expended on the Pacific than on the Atlantic coast. When we ask ourselves why there is a difference in expenditures, the answer becomes obvious. As our first line of defence on the Atlantic coast we have the British fleet, a fact which was carefully pointed out by the minister. While we do not give general expression to the idea, we all realize that in eastern Canada we must rely upon the British fleet for our defence, but that on the western coast we cannot rely upon any particular fleet. For that reason we must spend more to defend that section of the country. I do not believe there are more potential enemies on the Pacific coast than on the Atlantic; but because we have England and the British fleet on the Atlantic coast we may feel more safety in that section of the country, and a justification for spending more money on the Pacific than on the Atlantic.

Many hon. members have said that the English navy is our first line of defence. May I point out that I believe it to be the only line of defence at the present time so far as eastern Canada is concerned, and it is not costing the people of Canada one cent. Nevertheless there have been very few words of appreciation uttered in this house for that defence. As reported at page 1650 of Hansard, the minister said:

> In regard to the exact position of Canada it is only fair to say that to-day the main deterrent against a major attack upon this country by a European power is the existence of the British fleet in north Atlantic waters. An attack on Canada's overseas trade at the most congested points on our coasts in the opinion of those most competent to observe and advise would be limited to minor raiding forces.

We all recognize that fact: The English fleet is our first line of defence.

What is the second line of defence for our eastern ports? It might possibly be considered to be the Canadian fleet. The Canadian fleet on the Atlantic consists of two destroyers and some mine sweepers. Does the minister consider that these ships can provide any defence for our coast should the first line of defence be defeated? I am satisfied that should the British navy be defeated and enemy battleships come to our coast, our destroyers with their limited gun range could offer practically no defence, even against one battleship.

Our third line of defence, as far as our ports are concerned, are the coastal batteries which are to be established. I understand that on the Pacific coast the first stage of development has been completed and that they are now continuing with the second stage. Perhaps I might inquire of the minister how many stages there are altogether?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The works on the Pacific will take about three years, that is for interim armament. That does not take into consideration any permanent ordnance in the form of heavy guns.

Mr. BROOKS: The first stage has not even been started yet on the Atlantic coast. As far as any defence batteries are concerned, the Atlantic coast cannot expect any protection for at least three years. I understand that it is very difficult to obtain guns of the type necessary to defend our coast.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is absolutely impossible as long as we insist on ordnance uniform with that of Great Britain.

[Mr. Brooks.]

Mr. BROOKS: I assume the minister wants to get the most modern defence equipment.

I come now to what might be considered our fourth line of defence, that is, our air force. It has been said that the people of Canada have become air-minded, but I was wondering if the statement made by the minister is borne out by the opinion of many military experts. On page 1649 of Hansard he is reported as follows:

> Let me say just one word with reference to the functions of the air force in connection with the government's program. A well equipped and efficient air force is, in my opinion, of primary importance for the protection of Canadian territory and waters, and in view of the rapidly increasing performance of modern aircraft the possibility of attack by such means is to-day a probability.

The minister says that our air force is to be our great defence against attack. In this connection I notice that four air fields have been established in the maritime provinces at Yarmouth, Dartmouth, Truro and Sydney, all in the province of Nova Scotia. In matters of defence I do not want to be at all narrow-minded, but I would point out to the minister that the two great ports on the Atlantic are Halifax and Saint John. If both these two ports are to be defended by means of aeroplanes, a landing field should be established in the vicinity of Saint John. It seems to me that when the question of the establishment of air fields was being considered, some consideration should have been given to Saint John as it is one of our great Canadian ports. The town of Sussex is the centre of a military training area for the province of New Brunswick. There are many splendid fields nearby which could be easily developed as airports. Any of these would be within easy distance of Saint John.

Reverting again to the value of aeroplanes for defence, I am sure that the minister and hon. members know that in the civil war now raging in Spain every arm is being tried out to determine its practicability. Experts of all nations have been watching the development of armaments in that devastated country. I should like to quote from a statement by Thomas R. Phillips, a member of the faculty of the United States general staff school and at present the United States army expert in Spain. His opinion of aeroplanes as a means of defence is as follows:

> Americans for many years have been subjected to the affirmation of an axiom to the effect that the best defence against aerial attack is our own air force. In Spain this has not proved true in its literal sense.

I think it was the hon. member for Vancouver North who referred the other day to the time required for an aeroplane to leave the field and reach the necessary altitude to fight off oncoming bombers or other attacking aeroplanes. I quote again:

The reason our own pursuit in our back yards cannot protect us is not complex, though it is little understood. In soldier terminology, it is a matter of time and space—time for warning, time to reach a fighting altitude, and distance to be flown before interception. Defending airplanes are presumed to be able to leave the ground fifteen minutes after receiving warning. This assumption is generous. It presupposes that the squadrons are alert—that is, pilots on hand and engines warmed up periodically to insure safe take-off. When planes are widely scattered on the ground and hidden from enemy bombers, the time allowed for take-off must be increased to more than fifteen minutes. After taking off and forming into squadrons, the pursuit must climb to fifteen thousand or more feet. Another seven or eight minutes gone. Thus a minimum of twenty-two minutes' warning is required to give the defenders time to get off the ground and make ready to fight. Translated into warning distance, the warning system, if the attacking bombers approach at 250 miles an hour, must give warning when the enemy bombers are ninety-two miles distant.

There is much more along the same line. As I say, it has been the experience in Spain that the aeroplane does not provide the best defence for towns and cities. It has been proved that it is better when used as an offensive weapon. The other day an hon. member inquired as to the feasibility of aeroplanes as a defence against attack by battleships. It is the opinion of many military experts that it is becoming more difficult for an aeroplane successfully to attack a battleship or any other type of ship. This difficulty arises from the height at which an aeroplane must fly. From fifteen to eighteen thousand feet up, to escape anti-aircraft guns on every battleship, the battleship itself appears as a mere speck on the ocean, and in view of the speed at which the aeroplane flies, and the apparent size of the target, it is almost impossible for an aeroplane to bomb a ship on the ocean.

Our fifth line of defence for our ports—and I think it is the most practical and useful a defence our cities and towns could have—is anti-aircraft artillery. This has been proven conclusively on the battlefields of Spain and in other parts of the world where conflicts have been taking place. I should like to quote again from the article from which I quoted a few moments ago:

Great success and dismal failures have been exhibited by anti-aircraft artillery in Spain. Both can be accounted for by the degree of training of the gunners and relative excellence of the equipment. Antique French guns, first used by the government, failed completely. New German equipment, with robot-operated direction finders which send aiming data electrically to the guns, have scored remarkably. The Englishman, Air Commodore Charlton, after a visit to insurgent Spain, wrote that the German gunners, in the first three or four salvos, would pip off a bomber at 12,000 feet practically every time, if it was flying a straight course.

That shows how effective anti-aircraft artillery has become. The article goes on to say:

The German anti-aircraft artillery of 88 millimetres calibre—about three and one half inches—fires accurately to an altitude of 25,000 feet. The government now has a large amount of Russian anti-aircraft artillery modelled after the German. Due to poor manufacture, as well as indifferent training of the gunners, it has not performed well.

Against low-flying planes, Spain is a proving ground for the German 20 millimetres—about 8 inch—automatic anti-aircraft cannon. This gun, with two barrels, fires high-explosive projectiles, 360 rounds a minute. Each shell is equipped with a supersensitive fuse which will explode on contact with airplane fabric. It is remarkably effective. The gunner follows the smoking tracers like the spray of a hose and quickly gets his stream of fire on the airplane.

The success of anti-aircraft guns in Spain has started all Europe feverishly building quantities of them. European nations see that cities and rear areas cannot be protected by airplanes; only the anti-aircraft guns are always ready and waiting. Great Britain bought the entire output, for three years, of certain types of anti-aircraft guns of the Bofors factory in Sweden. France has revised its production plans. Italy is dissatisfied with its combination anti-tank and anti-aircraft weapon. Their experience has proved that the anti-aircraft gun must be constructed for its special use.

I am pointing these things out simply to bring to the minister's attention that if we are to protect, especially during the three years in which we are building gun emplacements, our coastal areas and our cities and towns from bombing raids, which as the minister stated the other day is the most likely form of attack, we must have in these areas anti-aircraft guns. We should have effective anti-aircraft artillery in the city of Montreal, in the city of Quebec, in the ports of Saint John and Halifax, and on the Pacific coast.

Mr. MacNICOL: And in Toronto.

Mr. BROOKS: We might even consider it necessary to have anti-aircraft artillery in Toronto. I think the minister will agree that there is a great scarcity of these guns. The article from which I have quoted states that at the present time there are only forty-two such guns in the United States, and it would require, for the defence of New York city alone, nine hundred of them.

I point out these facts to show again that the only defence we have for our eastern Canadian ports at the present time is the British navy, and it is the only defence which we are likely to have for some time to come.

As an ex-militia man I wish to commend the minister for the attention he is giving to the different branches of our military services. The permanent force, I understand, is to be slightly increased, but not even the most extreme pacifist in this country or anywhere else could accuse us of being militaristic considering the small permanent force we have.

As regards the non-permanent force, I am sure the minister will agree that during the years of the depression and in past years, when it has been almost impossible to get money for militia purposes the non-permanent militia in Canada has carried on in an admirable manner considering all handicaps. I know of officers and men in different units who have been willing to go into camp on half pay, and other officers who have contributed all their pay in order that more men might be trained and the force become more efficient. It is also true—and this shows the importance of our militia to Canada—that during the last war the officers of the non-permanent militia formed the nucleus for the training of the battalions that went overseas, and I would suggest to the minister that any money which is spent on training officers is money well spent. It is not possible or desirable to train a large standing army in Canada, but we know that, if trouble comes, it is much easier to train the men and prepare the troops by virtue of having well trained, capable officers. We also know that it takes many years, especially in these days of technical equipment, to train men for positions as officers.

The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) mentioned training for physical fitness in Canada. I do not intend to stress that point, but every nation in the world to-day—and we in Canada learned this lesson in the last war—is aware that physical fitness is one of the ways in which any country must first prepare to defend itself in time of emergency.

A great deal has been said about Canada's foreign policy. I do not consider myself qualified to discuss the question; but I have my own humble opinion, and it is simply this, that we should be united for the defence of the empire. Britain's foreign policy, as it was given to the world a few days ago by Mr. Chamberlain, went further. He said that England would go to the defence of France if necessary, and to the defence of Belgium. I do not think it is perhaps necessary for us in this country to go that far. As a matter of fact, I would be loath to see Canada have to send an expeditionary force across the ocean again to defend any country except England or some other part of the British Empire.

As I said a moment ago, I believe that the foreign policy of Canada can very well be tied up with that of the other nations of the British commonwealth, for the defence of the empire collectively, and individually if necessary. Ex-Premier Baldwin, speaking a short time ago, said that Britain's first line of defence was on the Rhine. We in Canada have no assurance where the first line of defence for Canada may be. I do not think we can assert conclusively that our first line will be the shores of the Pacific coast or the Atlantic coast. It may be better for us, in conjunction with Great Britain and perhaps some other country, to stop the enemy from crossing the Atlantic and landing on our shores. I mentioned a little while ago, and it was observed by some other speaker this afternoon, that Canada is well qualified to provide airmen not only for the defence of our coasts but for defensive service abroad if need be. The aeroplane is an offensive weapon, and should it become necessary for Canada to join in the defence of the empire and act in her own defence, we might very properly, in order to strengthen what would be our first line of defence, send airmen overseas if England should be attacked. I am convinced—and I think every sane person in this dominion is of the same opinion—that if England should be destroyed, it would be too late for Canada to protect herself. We claim that we are a nation. As a nation, it is our responsibility to protect our citizens, not only at home but abroad. They should be able to rely upon the protection of Canada whether they are in this country or any other. A few days ago the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond), in an excellent speech, with much of which, however, I do not agree, said:

> Would England or the United States protect us? As far as England is concerned, we cannot expect from her anything that goes beyond her own interest.

As a Canadian, I object to that statement. I do not think it can be said that Britain has been concerned only with her own interests and the protection of her own people. For a hundred years England has helped to protect this country of ours. She did so before we reached the status of a nation, and, as declared in her policy, she is prepared to do so to-day. I should like to call the attention of hon. members to an incident which happened not very long ago in China, during the troubles there. Many hon. members must have read about it. It will be remembered that up one of the Chinese rivers a Canadian mission from the province of Quebec was in great danger, not only from Japanese forces but from bandits in the Chinese army. It was not a Canadian detachment that went to the defence of the mission; a British gunboat manned by a British crew and guided by one of the good fathers of the mission went to the protection of our people. England was protecting Canadians in that country, and it cannot be said that she was actuated by any selfish motive.

There is not an hon. member but can claim that since the last war England's policy has been one of peace. If she were an aggressor nation, there would be a reason why Canada and other nations would not care to join with her. But her national policy has been one of peace and non-aggression. If, as was stated here this afternoon, the League of Nations has failed, that failure cannot be laid on the shoulders of Great Britain. England has done everything that is nationally possible for a country to do to hold the league together. As regards the Locarno pact, the Washington treaty, and any other treaty into which she has entered with any other nation, she has done her share and more. I am satisfied that had other nations, members of the league, done as much as England did, the world would not be in the unhappy position it is in to-day.

Let it be remembered that other nations are seeking alliance with England. They are not afraid of the involvements of an alliance. In this country we hear much talk of collective security. We know that Canada could not stand alone; but if we wish for collective security, how can we hope to defend ourselves better than by uniting with other parts of the British Empire? If France, Belgium, and many other countries are willing to join with England, I am satisfied that we should be safer and our defence against aggression would be stronger if it were known that we are united with England as far as empire defence is concerned.

I have said that in these days we hear some boasting about our Canadian nationhood. We are all proud of Canada, and with good reason; we are Canadians first. It has been said that we should be proud to be a nation. I remember that during the great war it was the Canadian corps that placed the Canadian name so high in the opinion of the world at that time and as it stands to-day. It was through the achievements of the Canadian corps and Canada's fighting troops that Canada became a nation. But there was no great clamour among the men who fought overseas for "Canadian status." That was left to the politicians and those who remained at home. We were proud to wear on our shoulder-straps the word "Canada." But we were not particularly anxious that we should be known as a nation; it was enough for us that we were part of the British Empire.

I intend to support the estimates of the hon. minister. I wish him all speed with them. I hope that there will be no necessity to use the armaments he is preparing for the defence of our country, and I realize that time is the essence of the matter. In the meanwhile, until we have our coast defended, until we can obtain guns suitable for coast defence, until we have the anti-air-craft guns necessary to defend our cities, let us pray that there shall be peace at home and abroad; and at the same time, I believe, we shall be justified in thanking God that we have the British navy.

Mr. H. S. HAMILTON (Algoma West): Although we are in committee on one of the items in the estimates of the Department of National Defence, the discussion has been quite general on the defence policy of Canada; and as I have definite views on that subject, and as it is undoubtedly important, I feel a sense of obligation to express them. I have followed carefully most of the speeches. In considering them I find that there are some common grounds on which apparently most hon. members agree. My desire is to see what these common grounds are and then give my views in regard to the points where there are differences of opinion.

First, I should like to congratulate the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) upon what I consider the successful way in which he has fulfilled an extremely difficult role, finding a defence policy along what might be called the middle road, in which I am sure he will secure the support of the majority of the members of this house. By accident a few days ago I happened to read some remarks of the Right Hon. John Bright, delivered in Birmingham on January 13, 1878, on the danger of war with Russia. To me his remarks carry a warning by which I wish to benefit in discussing the subject now before us. I read from a volume in Everyman's Library entitled Selected Speeches of the Right Hon. John Bright, M.P., on Public Questions, at page 169:

> It is a painful and terrible thing to think how easy it is to stir up a nation to war. Take up any recent history of this country from the time of William III until now, for two centuries or nearly so and you will find that wars are always supported by a class of arguments which after the war is over the people find were arguments they should not have listened to. It is just so now, for unfortunately there still remains the disposition to be excited on these questions. Some poet, I forget which, has said

Religion, freedom, vengeance, what you will,
A word's enough to raise mankind to kill;
Some cunning phrase by faction caught and spread,
That guilt may reign and wolves and worms be fed.

"Some cunning phrase by faction caught and spread," like the cunning phrase of the balance of power, which has been described as the ghastly phantom which the government of this country has been pursuing for two centuries and has never yet overtaken. Some cunning phrase like that we have now of "British interests." Lord Derby has said the wisest thing that has been uttered by any member of this administration during the discussions on this war when he said that the greatest of British interests is peace. And a hundred, far more than a hundred public meetings have lately said the same; and millions of households of men and women have thought the same. To-night we shall say amen to this wise declaration. I am delighted to see this grand meeting in this noble hall. This building is consecrated to peace and freedom. You are here in your thousands representing the countless multitudes outside. May we not to-night join our voices in this resolution that so far as we are concerned the sanguinary record of the history of our country shall be closed, that we will open a new page on which shall henceforth be inscribed only the blessed message of mercy and of peace?

I wish personally to remember the warning how easy it is to stir up a nation to war, and what a painful and terrible thing it is. I have been impressed in the discussions before this committee with the obvious anxiety of all hon. members to let it be known that they and we, this house and the people of Canada, are anxious to follow as our foremost object the preservation of peace. It is because I feel the government have so carefully and studiously set their course to achieve that object that I wish to compliment the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the government upon their efforts toward that end.

I heard a question asked to-day by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) as to the policy of Canada on oil sanctions. For myself I thank the Prime Minister and the government for the action they took in that matter. It may be all very well for Canada to take responsibility for possibly plunging Europe into a terrible war, a war in which millions of men would be slaughtered, and Canada herself perhaps be able to stand aloof from participation in that war. If Canada had been responsible, as she might well have been, for a war of the proportions that might have broken out, I think it would have been a ghastly thing if Canada herself had not thrown all her force and strength and all her man power into subduing the conflagration which she had brought about. If Canada was ready to follow the possible consequences, well and good. If she was not prepared to follow those consequences, the course she took was a wise one; and personally I am pleased that she took that course.

The hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail), in commenting upon the fact that we do not prevent the exportation of raw materials which may be used in warfare, said that it just did not make sense to be sending out to other countries, potential enemies, material which might be used against Canadians. I agree with her; it does not make sense. Yet I think there is a just reason for it. To-night we have a terrible situation in Asia and in Europe. We feel sympathy for the British statesmen with such terrible responsibilities on their shoulders—how they bear them I do not know—striving as best they can so to adjust and direct their course as to avoid war which might otherwise result. I do not know the factors involved; I do not know how close they are to war; but I can see that the existing situation is precarious. European humanity is under a sword similar to that which hung above the head of Damocles, a naked sword, a terrible sword, a sword suspended by a hair. I believe that to-day statesmen who represent Great Britain and other nations are exerting their best efforts to ensure that that sword does not fall, with the terrible consequences which would result to humanity in Europe, millions of human beings who would be killed or suffer through the destruction of their homes and their country. My feeling is that I and other members of this house, as well as the government, should be very careful that, in ignorance or lack of information, we do not do something which might sever that hair. So, while I realize that it seems foolish to be sending munitions out of the country, without fuller knowledge we cannot afford to do things which might bring about such serious consequences in Europe.

I said that I thought there was some common ground on which hon. members were in agreement. I think this committee agrees that we are prepared to defend Canada. I believe the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) emphasized that fact, and I think other speakers have indicated that there is general agreement throughout this chamber that we should do those things which are necessary to defend Canada. The difficulty is in ascertaining what constitutes defence. What is involved in the defence of Canada? What are the limitations of defending Canada? It is apparent at once, I think, that what might be termed local defence, the actual repelling of invasion of our territories by hostile forces, either on Canadian soil or at our shores, constitutes defending Canada. I think that is agreed. The anxiety of some is that we are not framing our defence policy or building our defence force for that definite purpose, but that we have in mind not facing the issue on Canadian soil or Canadian shores but rather in some way participating in that defence beyond Canada. My thought in that connection is that if war comes, we shall be up against stark reality. It will not be speeches in this house, words, votes or resolutions; it will be reality in its starkest form that we shall be up against, and I have no doubt whatever what will happen. The sound war strategy that will safeguard our people will prevail. Call it war hysteria or what you will, our people will demand that measures be taken which will safeguard this nation. If the change in sentiment in this house that I think is obvious as compared with last year has been brought about by what has happened during the last few months, how much greater would the change be if the things that have occurred elsewhere had occurred in Canada? The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said that civilization stood aghast at the barbarities of Barcelona. What if those barbarities had occurred on Canadian soil? Though not as likely, they are as possible on Canadian soil as in Barcelona or Shanghai, and if these atrocities that have occurred overseas, which have brought about a changed opinion in this house, had happened on Canadian soil, the aroused sentiment that would result would be what would guide Canadian policy when that day came.

The Minister of National Defence, as well as the Prime Minister, has stated that we have no commitments. I am glad of that, and I think the committee will accept that assurance. The hon. member for Vancouver North intimated that, without our intentionally being committed, events themselves would commit us to certain lines of action. My thought is that what will commit us to certain policies will be the events which will occur and which, if they are of major significance, will cause the Canadian people to speak to this house in no uncertain manner, and so guide this house in the action that should be taken. Ours are not the commitments of the government or the commitments resulting from any policy brought into this house by the minister and put forward as the policy of the government. There are no commitments of that kind at the present time. I do not think there should be any. I believe in Canada we should reserve our decisions until events occur which make it necessary for us to choose our course. But if, when that time comes, there are nations such as we have to-day, world powers with the philosophies, the ruthless attitude and the arrogant aggression which guide some countries to-day to such a great extent, if there is any serious threat to Canada I think it my duty to say that I have no doubt at all that then Canada will associate herself with those nations which can and will preserve her integrity, and will fight to bring about that result, wherever sound war strategy suggests that such fighting should take place.

In such circumstances, when facing stern reality, if Canada thought the safety of her territory and her existence as a nation were in jeopardy, she would demand that some leader, some man capable of following sound war strategy, should guide this nation in doing that which was most necessary to preserve intact our liberty and our territory. I am not referring to local raids, which we must keep in mind; I do not mean safeguarding our coasts in a local sense against anything that might take place in major or minor conflicts. I am talking of real threats to the safety of our country. Then sir, is it not right that we should ask: Could this nation stand by, and would it stand by, and see Great Britain and possibly the United States defeated or destroyed, and not consider that the defences of Canada were being broken down. Can we avoid, or do we not in our souls feel that if Great Britain were crushed, our first line of defence, as it has been described, would go with her? I would feel it. If the United States were crushed or destroyed, or were rendered incapable of assisting or of cooperating with Canada, would we not feel that we had lost a very important element of our defence? I think we would; I would feel it. And if those great nations were either destroyed or rendered incapable of aiding or cooperating with us, then, sir, would Canada, under the circumstances I have suggested, be able to safeguard herself? I do not think so.

My thought is that for the time being we cannot decide what Canada will do in the event of war. That would depend upon a hundred and one factors. The bombing of Barcelona would be different from the bombing of London; the bombing of London would be different from the bombing of Quebec or Halifax. I do not know what would happen if the House of Commons at Ottawa were bombed while the members were in session.

Mr. HEAPS: More gas.

Mr. HAMILTON: These matters are not decided finally until the issue is before us. I am not taking exception to what I think is desirable—the education, if one would dare to call it that, which comes from these discussions and is sent out to implant in the hearts of our people a very real desire for peace, and a willingness to secure that peace not only by action but by inaction. And, sir, if we can decide what constitutes defence, the next question is: With what do we defend our country? With what do we defend it, either in the localized sense of coastal defence or territorial defence, or in the broader sense of association or cooperation with other greater powers, through safeguarding it wherever the war strategy of events may decree that we should defend it. I shall not attempt to discuss the technical end of what our force should consist. But in building a defensive force for Canada there are a few general matters which I should like to emphasize.

The first thing to secure in an armed force for Canada whether it be an air, naval or military force, is morale. That has always been considered one of the most important factors in any powerful, armed force, and I think it is brought about by confidence. There are things which poison the morale of an armed force. I believe any military man who has served overseas will appreciate that.

We have heard a great deal about profits made while men serve without much remuneration in a deadly game. I emphasize, in passing, that one of the most important matters would be to eliminate profit, with all its ramifications, should our forces ever have to take part in any warfare, and even in connection with the building up of our forces at the present time. I know something about this. I know the effect that things which occurred during the past war had upon me. There is a sense of injustice which must permeate the ranks of any force where, when they are risking their lives in a very real way, they are conscious of unfairness, and of advantage being taken of conditions in order to secure monetary or other advantages to which the people who seek them are not entitled.

If I were attempting in any way to say in advance what we would do in case of war—and I would not attempt to do that—in connection with profits alone I would have many suggestions to make. I wish to say this, however, that if it ever becomes my responsibility—and I hope it never will—to say what this parliament should do under certain conditions, involving the possibility of war, I hope and trust that I shall take a definite stand on the elimination of profits in connection with war. I would go even farther than that; I would think not only of money profits. We would have to see to it that there was some fairness in the decision as to who should serve in the front lines. If I were suggesting what might be advisable—and I do not profess to do so at this time—I might be inclined to suggest, as a brake on the possibility of our inconsiderately going into war, that the members of the House of Commons who vote for it, and who are under the age of fifty-five years, would have an opportunity of serving in the front line, and that parliament would see that they did have that opportunity.

Morale comes from confidence. Those in power and authority, and those who hold positions of strength, should use their powers fairly and for the benefit of those who are less able to take the advantages which some people higher up may take. I believe it was the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar who said that many of the soldiers who fought in the last war have become disillusioned, and that they have lost those things for which they fought—or words to that effect. I cannot agree altogether with the hon. member, and I do not like to permit his statement to go entirely unchallenged.

Great sacrifices were made by Canada, and many lives were lost. It is true that we are disappointed in many things. It is true that many things we thought we would attain have not been attained. But I think it is going too far to say that we lost those things for which we fought. We still have the integrity of Canada. We still have the existence and integrity of the British Commonwealth of Nations. It is not right to say what we lost until we know what would have happened, had the reverse occurred. Since then we have brought about what we hope will be a great and enduring force for the betterment of world affairs. Since that time we have brought about a British Commonwealth of Nations. It may be that the right to do this was preserved by the fighting which occurred in Europe over twenty years ago.

It has been said that any force which we might raise in Canada would be more or less useless for defence purposes. That may be true in the narrow sense. If the great powers with whom we are closely associated are destroyed and we have to depend upon ourselves, that might be true. As the hon. member who has just spoken has said, the Canadian corps is a comparatively small unit, but modesty compels me to say that it was one of the best fighting units on the western front. It contributed materially to the winning of the war by the allies. The army that Britain dispatched to the continent when the war first broke out was quite small. That army is known now as the Old Contemptibles, but on more than one occasion they saved the channel ports for Britain. Our defence forces when acting in cooperation with the defence forces of other countries can be a powerful military machine. Isolated and separated that may not be true; but if the final test comes eventually, we shall undoubtedly be associated with others and we can rest assured that a powerful fighting unit can be built up in Canada. This unit will not be too large, but we shall endeavour to make it as perfect as possible so that if it must be used it will be something upon which we can depend and of which we shall be proud.

The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) referred to the fact that the Minister of National Defence had mentioned the liberties enjoyed in Canada. He did not agree altogether with the statement that we enjoyed complete liberty and he went on to point out his reasons. For some weeks the group to which the hon. member belongs contested in this house the policies of this government. They have the liberty to try to achieve those things which they say do not exist at the present time. I admit that we have not complete liberty when we get into the realm of economics. Complete economic security is something that we must yet attain, and that should be the main purpose of this parliament. But we have that which is so essential and vital, the key liberties that must be maintained. We have the right of free discussion. We have a free House of Commons, despite all that has been said against that contention. We have the right to dissent and disagree. We have the right to move resolutions condemning the government. All these rights have long since disappeared from many parts of the world.

I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar say that one valid reason for a defence force was the necessity to defend democracy. There are three great democratic nations in the world. In any effort that is made to preserve democracy we must consider our relationship with Great Britain and the United States. I have lived in a border town all my life. I have been always able to see the United States on the southern side of the river. I have always seen the stars and stripes flying from their flagpoles; I have always heard the bugle calls from their barracks across the river; I have seen their men in uniform marching along, but ever since I was a boy none of these things has suggested anything but security, safety and friendship. I made this statement at the unveiling of a peace plaque at Sault Ste. Marie a few years ago, and I am glad to repeat it in this chamber. I forget his exact words, but President Roosevelt has said that the international boundary line is simply a line uniting the two nations.

I know that if the people in the town to the south of the town in which I live were in danger, we would feel as though our homes and our town were in danger. I am sure that if we were in danger they would have the same thought.

I think to-night of the terrible responsibilities and burdens carried by British statesmen. My heart goes out to them in the decisions they have to make. The whole world looks to Britain to guide the free nations of the world through the precarious situation that exists to-day. It is a prayer, perhaps inarticulate that:

> The meteor flag of England
> Shall yet terrific burn;
> Till danger's troubled night depart,
> And the star of peace return.

I believe that is the prayer in the hearts of millions and millions of people outside the British Isles. These are my personal views.

I end by saying that the greatest principle in our defence policy should be a united Canada. We must let the world know that we stand for peace and are ready to use our strength and resources to maintain it. We must let it be known that we are ready to bring it about where it does not exist. We must declare that when those things which we hold dear and precious are in danger, we are prepared to fight. I think the Minister of National Defence has gone a long way toward evolving a defence policy that will join together all parts of Canada. If the dread day ever comes and our armed forces have to march to war, I trust that beside them in spirit will march the whole Canadian nation.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Chairman, may I congratulate the member for Algoma West (Mr. Hamilton) upon the splendid speech he has just made. I think it was a most worth while effort.

While I realize that the minister has had a very heavy day, I doubt whether in all his long career in the public service he has listened so long and said so little in any one day. However, I know it will be both soothing and refreshing for him to finish out this bad day by listening to a few words from a fellow-townsman.

To me it is tragic that less than twenty years after the armistice we in this parliament should be forced to consider policies for the defence of the Canadian people in a world which appears to have gone mad. I am sure this is disheartening to every member of this house, and particularly to the minister and the other returned soldier members of parliament. However, it is a situation that has to be faced, and in fairness to our people I think we should consider fairly and fully this whole question of defence in order that they may have all the facts before them and be that much better able to come to a proper decision as to what policy Canada should adopt.

I have a few suggestions to make to the minister which I hope will be helpful, also a few criticisms which I hope will also prove helpful. I make them in no spirit of partisanship whatever, because on this question of defence I think partisanship should be kept to the minimum.

I intend to speak first of the local defence of our Pacific coast, and finally—I am afraid it will not be to-night—on the general problem of defence and the question of Canada's foreign policy.

I should like, then, first of all, to carry you away on a magic carpet to the Pacific coast, to help you to get the point of view of those Canadians who live beside the Pacific ocean, or, in other words, the people of British Columbia, of whom I feel quite certain there will be about one million when the next census of Canada is taken in three years' time. Canada is a nation with an outlook on both the Pacific and the Atlantic, and in that I think we are fortunate. It always stirs me when I read the motto over the main door of this building, "The wholesome sea is at her gates, her gates both east and west," because I think it means a great deal to us as a nation to have this outlook on the two great oceans. I am quite sure it makes our people all the more moderate and all the more understanding in their dealings with the other peoples of the world.

Like the people in the rest of Canada, those Canadians who live on the Pacific slope are a peace-loving people. I think their main aim is to be on friendly relations with the other peoples with whom they come in contact and with whom they do business. We are particularly friendly with our neighbours of the Pacific states and of Alaska. They occupy much the same position in the union as we do in the dominion. Their problems are very much the same as ours, and there is a great deal of travel between our province and these Pacific states and the territory of Alaska. I think the two peoples have a very good understanding of each other, and there is a warm friendship between them.

We also have a most friendly feeling for the people of our sister dominions, Australia and New Zealand. I have no doubt it is difficult for eastern Canadians to realize just how much we are concerned with and interested in what happens in these two sister dominions. We have had for decades a line of ships running from Vancouver to Australia and New Zealand. We have done a great trade with these other British people, and our feelings for them are the warmest.

We also have kindly feelings for the peoples of China and Japan. We have had business dealings with them for decades, and we have had a line of ships running from Vancouver and Victoria to the orient for many, many years. We have had many contacts with the peoples of the orient. For example, a great many of our own new citizens, particularly in the last few years, have been Britishers retiring from the orient, and this has meant that we have had a little different outlook towards the orient and perhaps a little better understanding of the problems which face the oriental peoples. I must admit that our relations with them have been made difficult by reason of the extensive immigration from the oriental countries to British Columbia. It has served as an irritant because we have felt that we could not assimilate these people. But apart from this problem there has been the friendliest feeling between the people of the Pacific province and the peoples of those two great oriental countries.

Summing it up, we are much interested in what goes on in all these countries on the Pacific, and we are also very much affected by what happens there. Also, like the great majority of other Canadians, I think our people are firm in their belief in the British commonwealth, and in the ideals of the League of Nations.

That is the background, but in the last year on the Pacific coast we have been very much concerned over the aggressive attitude of Japan towards China, and more particularly over the threats by Japan against Great Britain. Many people in our province believe that if the Japanese had decided to challenge the British commonwealth, for example, by attacking Hongkong—and for a short time last fall there seemed to be a chance that that would be done—we on the Pacific coast might very reasonably be faced with a raid. Many people thought that was a distinct possibility. The situation was made doubly menacing by the fact that on our coast we had no adequate defences; that there were settled in our province thousands of their compatriots in strategic positions, some at the mouth of the great Fraser river and others up the river, where they straddled the two transcontinental railways, our main communication with the east, and that there were at least twelve hundred fishing boats plying up and down our coast manned by Japanese fishermen. These things all made us think, and think very seriously, of the question of the defence of the Pacific coast. And remember that Japan is nearer to British Columbia than it is to Australia. I realize it is not a pleasant prospect.

It is not pleasant to realize that some Canadian people were in danger and could not be protected, but such was, and perhaps is, the case. The people on the Pacific coast remember that this is not the first time they have been placed in that position. In 1914, when war broke out, German cruisers of the China fleet got away on the Pacific. We had for defence one old cruiser—I believe it was the Rainbow—and one sloop—the minister will know the name—I think it was the Sheerwater. That constituted our defence. Sir Richard McBride, who was then premier of British Columbia, went to Seattle a day or two before the outbreak of war and was able to beg, borrow or steal—I do not use the last word seriously, because they cost quite a lot of money—two submarines which were there, having been built to the order of one of the South American republics. It was felt on the Pacific coast, whether rightly or not, that those submarines had a great deal to do with keeping the German cruisers away from Vancouver and Victoria. Later in the war our Pacific coast was protected by the Japanese navy, for which service we give them all due credit. I would point out to the committee that the Monroe doctrine was in force then just as much as it is now, but we on the Pacific coast were protected not by any unit of the United States fleet but by ships of the Japanese navy.

This ridiculous situation—as ridiculous now as it was in 1914—was caused by the fact that the Canadian parliament for years has been toying with the problem of defending the Pacific coast. Until early in the present century Great Britain protected it with a fleet, a garrison and fortifications at Esquimalt. Then Canada took over, and the result was that the fortifications were allowed to deteriorate and that we have never had on the Pacific coast more than one or two old ships until the last few years, when we had, first, one modern destroyer, and now we have two. I understand from the minister that the number is to be increased to four. A start has been made on modernizing the forts; some new fortifications are being constructed, and an attempt is being made to build up an air force—for all of which I give the minister and the government due credit. But, unlike the situation on the Atlantic, there is within thousands of miles no British fleet upon which we can rely for aid. Singapore is seven thousand miles away. Another British fleet is stationed in the British West Indies, also thousands of miles away and therefore of no practical use in the defence of our coast. It follows that we can expect no help from the British fleet. Apparently the government is relying upon the United States navy. In his speech the other day the minister said, at page 1793 of Hansard:

> Just as the British navy on the Atlantic is our greatest security in that quarter, so I think it might be reasonable to assume that in a major conflagration we should have friendly fleets—

He used the word "fleets," although I do not know where the other fleet was to come from.

> —upon the Pacific ocean, and the severity of raids upon our western seaboard would be limited—

Apparently even the minister does not believe that raids could be stopped at present, and they cannot.

> —by the strength and the position of these friendly fleets. Our major defensive buffer on the Pacific coast is not the Pacific ocean alone but the existence there of friendly fleets. There is no commitment or understanding in regard to these matters, but at this time I think reasonable assumptions are justifiable.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, it is a pious hope. Even then the United States fleet is expected only to limit the severity of the raids. We are apparently not in a position to protect our western seaboard from attack. I agree with the minister that the danger is from hit-and-run raids, possibly by a raiding fleet with an aircraft carrier or carriers. I believe that there is also, as he says, a danger of minor attacks to secure bases or to seize some of our resources. For instance, in the coastal area we have many pulp industries, copper mines and other resources, all of which might easily be held by an attack of that type. The Queen Charlotte islands, containing an area of approximately 3,800 square miles and almost uninhabited, would appear to be a splendid place for an enemy to attempt to establish a base. But I think the minister overlooked the fact that, in addition, our trade routes might be blockaded. There is an extensive trade going out of the ports of Vancouver, New Westminster and Victoria, and a considerable trade up the coast—my information is that over two hundred settlements on the Pacific coast depend upon boat communication for their supplies—and I fear that an enemy fleet might seriously interfere with all this trade. The danger is there, and the protection is not. I submit that the question for the Canadian government to answer is this: Is it in a position now to protect those Canadians who live on the Pacific slope? If it is not—and the answer certainly is no—then steps should be taken at once.

Mr. Chairman, I have not finished, and it is now about eleven o'clock.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Will the government lay on the table the list of 47 pages of goods on which the United States propose to discuss further reciprocity with Canada as published partly in the local press on January 8, and on which the people of that country were asked to write the Trade Department at Washington to give their views or objections on any of these items with a public hearing on March 14 afforded?

2. Will the government consider adopting the same method and procedure here in order to give the business men of Canada an opportunity of being heard in the same way by letter, and a public hearing later, before any proposed agreement is consummated, and not after it?

3. Will the government consider calling into consultation Canadian industrialists and agriculturists regarding the effect of same on the Ottawa agreements, before and not after any agreement or treaty is consummated or proposed?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. The hon. member apparently refers to a statement which the government of the United States communicated to the press of that country on January 28th. A copy of the statement is being tabled.

2. The procedure at present adopted by the United States government in connection with current trade agreements is based upon the fact that arrangements concluded under the Trade Agreements Act are not submitted to Congress for approval. As the situation in this respect is different in Canada, it is not considered necessary to adopt the United States procedure.

3. The present practice under which Canadian industrialists, agriculturists and others interested, may communicate with the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, or other ministers concerned, on all matters respecting commercial treaty negotiations, is believed to be adequate.

8. Who are the personnel of the Department of Transport's airways radio division?

9. What percentage of them are from the United States?

10. What company or companies have contracts for supplying equipment for the radio range stations?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Thirty stations.

2. Eleven stations have been completed; 12 stations are under construction and will be completed before July 1; 7 stations will be constructed during the fiscal year 1938-39.

3. Total cost of 30 stations—$1,500,000.

4. $50,000.

5. Primarily, yes, but all installations are made with provision for the installation of the fifth tower when conditions warrant it. Installation of the fifth tower will be made at Vancouver, Lethbridge, Edmonton, Regina, Winnipeg, Toronto and Montreal this year.

6. The Bureau of Air Commerce is installing a number of new stations of the five tower type and installing additional equipment at four tower stations to convert them to the five tower type; the reason being that the four tower type will not permit weather information and courses being given simultaneously, while the five tower system does. Where airways are congested it is to be preferred, but is not essential when traffic is comparatively light.

7. No. This point was given due consideration when the Department of Transport commenced its construction program in 1937.

8. See appended list.

9. Nil.

10. The Canadian Marconi Company of Montreal have a contract to supply radio range transmitters and the Standard Steel Construction Company of Welland, to supply radio range towers.

RADIO BROADCASTING

MESSAGE OF EAMON DE VALERA TO NORTH AMERICAN CONTINENT ON MARCH 17 LAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. FLEMING (Humboldt): Would the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) explain why President Eamon de Valera's message to the North American continent was not carried over the hook-up of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on March 17 last?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of the question. I took the matter up with the general manager of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and was advised by him that the speech of Mr. de Valera was an exclusive feature of the Columbia Broadcasting Corporation and was not available to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The hon. member will recall that on Wednesday, December 29, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation broadcast over their network President de Valera's inaugural address on the institution of the new constitution of Ireland.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILLS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): It is not the intention of the government to take up supply to-day, but the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has an interim supply bill, to make provision for two months of the present fiscal year, and also a bill relating to extra supplementary estimates for the last fiscal year. I would ask that the house give its consent to going into supply, for the purpose of getting these bills through, before proceeding with the next order of business.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $36,717,668.24, being the amount of each of the several items as set forth in the further supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1938, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1938.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DUNNING moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $39,057,624.49, being one-sixth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1939, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1939.

Mr. DUNNING: It is understood that the passing of this interim supply in no sense impairs the privilege of discussion of any of the items covered by it.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the only observation I wish to make about it.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. DUNNING moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1938, the sum of $36,717,668.24 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DUNNING moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1939, the sum of $39,057,624.49 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 88, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1938.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—$36,717,668.24 granted for 1937-38.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a provision in this bill of an extraordinary character. The estimates purport to grant to one of the provinces a sum of money for ordinary operating expenses. I cannot recall that in the history of confederation any province has found it necessary to secure money for that purpose.

Mr. DUNNING: There was a similar vote last session.

Mr. BENNETT: Not for operating expenses.

Mr. DUNNING: The same vote exactly.

Mr. BENNETT: Then I am misinformed. The Minister of Finance says that we did make a provision of this kind last year.

Mr. DUNNING: A million and a half.

Mr. BENNETT: I have a very strong opinion that in the bill, this grant should be subject to conditions; that it should be made perfectly clear that the utilization of this money for political purposes will be a criminal offence, that any person who makes canvasses for election purposes and endeavours to secure support by utilizing this as a weapon of offence should be subject to punishment under the criminal code. Matters have reached a stage where I think action is called for now and not some time hence. Men have been going into public meetings and marking names down in a book. They have been saying to people, "From whom are you getting your sustenance"? and "Who is providing your relief"? No threats are made, but the impression is left on the minds of these poor unfortunates that they must necessarily support Liberal candidates in the provincial election. I think that that sort of thing is just as bad as anything can be in this country, and it should be ended if at all possible.

When we grant a sum of money to enable a government to carry on, one of the conditions should be that any endeavour to utilize that grant for political purposes shall constitute a criminal offence and be punishable accordingly. I think the government should make it perfectly clear, beyond peradventure or doubt, that the time has come when this sort of thing should disappear. It is one of the matters that is causing great difficulty at the moment in this confederation. Anyone who has observed conditions in Canada to-day must be more or less concerned about the feeling in the two larger and richer provinces, as manifested by the utterances of public men, in connection with these provinces supplying money for this purpose. It is incumbent upon us to create a situation that will not enable that sort of propaganda to be continued. Nothing could be more fatal to this confederation than for large sums of public money to be taken from the richer provinces to meet the extreme conditions that prevail in several of our provinces without its being made apparent that that money must be used in the strictest sense of accountability.

There is another point. I think a condition should be inserted that with respect to this $2,000,000, it shall be utilized for the purpose of paying the salaries of teachers that are in arrears in the province. I can conceive of nothing worse than the condition indicated in various letters that I have received. I fancy every hon. member has received similar letters; I am thinking of a circular communication which indicates the dire necessity due to the arrears of salaries accruing to teachers in Saskatchewan and Alberta. Only the other day I had a communication from Alberta pointing out that the condition in Saskatchewan to which attention had been directed was not limited to that province, that in Alberta the teachers were in much the same situation, and that if action was taken in the one case it should be taken in the other. Apparently no request has been made by Alberta for a grant for operating purposes, but there is one from Saskatchewan. I suggest that it would be proper to provide that the moneys thus granted should be available for liquidating the arrears of salaries due to the teachers in the province.

The Minister of Justice is not in his place, but he must have had his attention directed to the fact that in Saskatchewan a direct tax has been imposed on trains and elsewhere for educational purposes. This is a percentage tax on the amount of the account. If my information is accurate, and it seems to be borne out by the records, the legislature of Saskatchewan has endeavoured to make this tax reach into other provinces. It is being applied to transactions that indicate the importation of goods into Saskatchewan from the neighbouring provinces of Manitoba and Alberta or elsewhere. According to the British North America Act there must be a free movement of commodities between provinces, and to impose a tax on such movement is entirely wrong. This tax has been imposed since we last granted $1,500,000 of money. Until the minister said the language was the same, I was not aware that it was, but this $2,000,000 should be considered in the light of the additional sum in excess of what was granted last year, and in the light of the tax properly imposed with respect to matters within the province and improperly imposed with respect to transactions originating outside the province.

In any event some assurance should be given, since we are providing the money, that it will be utilized for the purpose of providing for the arrears of salaries due to teachers in the province of Saskatchewan. I am not going to dwell on the hardships they have experienced or on the difficulties they have had to encounter, because every member of the house I think has received a communication in which the distressing facts have been very succinctly put forward. I think it would do much to satisfy the older provinces, which have sometimes made complaint, if it could be stated that a part of this money will be used, as urged by the organized teachers in various parts of the dominion, for the payment of the salaries of school teachers in Saskatchewan.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, I need scarcely say that as the minister from Saskatchewan I am surprised at the issue which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has just made of the fact that the province of Saskatchewan is under the necessity of asking for assistance from the federal government. The leader of the opposition has taken the rather high ground which he has been accustomed to take on a number of occasions during this session, of attributing to everyone else political incentives in connection with everything that any government in Canada which does not happen to be of the party to which he belongs undertakes to do. I can scarcely conceive of any more objectionable political issue being raised on anything that might take place in this house than that contained in the speech which has just been delivered to this committee.

The leader of the opposition has taken the opportunity which this vote of $2,000,000 presents, a vote arising out of the necessities of the people of Saskatchewan, to make a purely political speech, to put it on Hansard for the use of people in any election campaign which may take place in western Canada within the next twelve or eighteen months. The right hon. gentleman could not have made more obvious what his intentions were than he did in the early part of his remarks. He has run through practically the whole gamut of the activities of the provincial government, from those having to do with schools to those having to do with entirely different matters, in order to make it appear that some use might be made of these funds which would not be to the benefit of all the people of Canada.

In the first place no such use as he indicates can be made of these moneys because of the fact that this was an undertaking given to the province of Saskatchewan some months ago, and given on the understanding that this vote would be presented to the house during the present session. The expenditures for which this money is to make provision are expenditures which have been undertaken and carried out since the time that undertaking was given by this government and cannot in any sense be made a part of any appeal that may be made in Saskatchewan or elsewhere in connection with any election campaign that may be held in the future.

There has been a propaganda carried on recently throughout the whole dominion of Canada, coming from a source which those of us who live in Saskatchewan know something about, having to do with the school situation in that province. The leader of the opposition has just made use of that propaganda in placing his views before the house. The province of Saskatchewan, ever since its inception in 1905, has been quite capable of looking after its own school affairs, and when the leader of the opposition undertakes to bring the school affairs of Saskatchewan on to the floor of the federal house for discussion, he is assuming a responsibility that was never intended to be assumed either by the opposition or by the government of the Dominion of Canada. School matters are dealt with by provincial governments, and I might point out that whereas the previous government in Saskatchewan, because of the financial difficulties through which they were passing, found it necessary to reduce the school grant from $1.50 to $1 per day per room, the present government has increased the grant from $1 back to $1.50 per day, or an increase of fifty per cent, and is paying this increased grant.

In addition to that, the present government of the province has been making loans to the school districts of $30 a month to assist in the payment of school teachers' salaries; and the province itself, after the report which was received from the Bank of Canada, has levied upon the people of the province a sales tax of two per cent, which is a tax not only on meals on trains but on practically all sales made in Saskatchewan, an exception being made of some of the food products and other important necessities that are sold in the province from time to time. I have not heard that the government has made any attempt to put the tax on transactions outside the province. As a matter of fact, I think it has been very careful not to render its act ultra vires by attempting to do any such thing.

The government of the province has assumed the responsibility of taking care of the schools; and if any moneys advanced to Saskatchewan by this house were to be earmarked for school purposes it would result, I think, in this house assuming responsibility in connection with the administration of matters having to do with education which I am quite sure the federal parliament does not intend to assume. One could scarcely conceive of any suggestion being made to this house at any time that would stir up greater difficulties between the federal government and the governments of the provinces than that which was just made by the leader of the opposition to the effect that in making a grant of money to Saskatchewan for ordinary government purposes we should stipulate that a certain part of that money should be used for school purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what I said, Mr. Chairman. I said to pay teachers' salaries.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, paying teachers' salaries is a very important part of school purposes in any province. When the right hon. gentleman quibbled over "school purposes" to say he had in mind paying teachers' salaries, he was not only playing to the gallery, and to the political gallery at that, so far as Saskatchewan is concerned, but he was assuming something that the people of Saskatchewan will not assume.

Then some play was made of the fact that this vote was for ordinary government expenditures, and the question was raised whether this had ever been done before. The right hon. gentleman needs only to go back to the last period of government in this dominion and to look over his own records to find that in Saskatchewan his government provided very considerable sums in one of the years during that period, for the very same purpose,—

Mr. BENNETT: For special purposes.

Mr. GARDINER:—and no such conditions were placed upon that provision of funds as he is suggesting should be placed upon the grant of this particular amount. I suggest it has been fairly well proven to this house and to the Canadian people that Saskatchewan has been going through a very difficult period; that they do need some assistance from other parts of Canada; and I want to state on behalf of the people of Saskatchewan that we appreciate the manner in which other parts of the dominion have come to the assistance of that province. I know that Liberals and Conservatives, including the governments of the two old provinces of Canada and the people of Canada in general, have been satisfied that in respect of any funds which have been provided for the province the provincial government has shown the desire not only to play fair with all the people of Canada, but so to administer the funds provided as to give service to all the people of that province irrespective of what their political leanings may be. I would think that the committee should pass—

Mr. LENNARD: What about fruit and vegetables?

Mr. GARDINER: What is the question?

Mr. LENNARD: What about the distribution of vegetables during the past few months?

An hon. MEMBER: What about it?

Mr. GARDINER: What has my hon. friend got to say about the distribution of vegetables during the past few months? I venture to say that if he were to go out into the province of Saskatchewan and ask every single individual—and I could give him a list of the names of practically all of the recipients, if he desires to have it—whether that distribution of vegetables had been properly made, he would find that at least 999 out of every 1,000 would say it had been properly made. I suggest further to him that when certain interests in Toronto wrote letters to the wholesalers of Saskatchewan and asked them to send in letters that might be published indicating that there were criticisms with regard to the distribution of food in Saskatchewan and Alberta last fall, they did not publish any criticisms that they got, and certainly they did not publish the replies of the wholesalers to whom they had written. Criticisms were invited, but criticisms could not be found. If anyone were to go through Saskatchewan and Alberta to-day and follow that distribution of vegetables, cheese, beans, fish and apples, they would find, over the whole trail followed by those commodities, satisfaction on the part of the people who obtained them.

I think the time has come when these votes should be considered on their merits. The leader of the opposition has stood up all too often this session and waved before this house the flag of political corruption. I have been tempted on one or two occasions to remind him that if we were to bring into this chamber all the street corner stories that are circulated at election time and all the newspaper rumours that float around on such occasions we should probably not have to go further back than to about two weeks before the election of 1930 in order to remind him of some of the stories that appeared in the press of that time, calling attention to meetings cancelled and trips made to Montreal, calling attention to what was going to happen immediately after the election was over if his party were elected to office. I would only need to follow that up a few weeks later to find that everything which was then rumoured in the press was actually done on the floor of this chamber; and I might suggest to him that probably he is on rather dangerous ground when, on every occasion that a vote is brought before this house, he raises the political bogey and suggests that someone is going to make some political use of the moneys that happen to be voted.

Let me repeat that this two million dollars is money which is necessary to pay for things that have been done in Saskatchewan; it is necessary because of undertakings given some considerable time ago. It can in no sense be considered a vote of money to be used either this summer or a year from now, whenever any election may be held in Saskatchewan, for the purpose of influencing votes there, and I would ask the leader of the opposition to accept this statement and so consider it.

Mr. BENNETT: I assure this committee that I have no knowledge of any propaganda connected with a circular sent out by teachers with respect to payment of salaries. The first knowledge I had that there was anything of a sinister character attached to it came from the speech just made by the Minister of Agriculture. I received a letter pointing out that teachers were unpaid and that the Saskatchewan situation merited careful thought and consideration. Another letter came from teachers' organizations in other provinces asking that consideration be given to that thought. I wrote and stated that at the appropriate time I would mention this matter in the House of Commons. That is all I know of anything connected directly or indirectly with propaganda so far as schools in Saskatchewan are concerned. So far as I know the people behind the movement are earnestly concerned about the non-payment of teachers in that province; and when I saw this provision in the estimates, namely to enable that province to continue essential services pending improvements in crop, I regarded the payment of teachers as an essential service and I therefore brought it to the attention of this committee. I withdraw no word I have said with respect to it. I think it is a matter that merits not only careful consideration but the giving of some assurance that the money will be utilized in part for that purpose.

On Friday last the teachers' organization of Alberta sent me a communication pointing out that this provision had been confined to Saskatchewan; that they too required consideration, and that any effort which might be made by parliament to provide salaries for teachers should not be limited to Saskatchewan. Now the picture as presented by the Minister of Agriculture is entirely different. He says that this money is spent already, that we are voting two million dollars to cover an expenditure that has already been made by Saskatchewan, and that it was made in consequence of a promise which was given some time ago. Just how they got the money is a question which will have to be considered at a later stage, with respect to another matter. So far as that phase is concerned I can only say it is quite obvious that the money cannot be used to pay teachers if it has already been spent.

Mr. GARDINER: The obligation for its expenditure is already assumed.

Mr. BENNETT: If the obligation has been assumed for the amount, it is quite obvious that a free disposition of it is no longer possible. A condition has arisen which makes it no longer possible to apply it for that purpose. I am much obliged for that information. It is true that it is for the year ending March 31, 1938, but the provision was to continue essential services, and I assumed from the language that it meant to continue them beyond the date when we gave our sanction to the appropriation. However that does not appear to be so.

So far as the other phase of it is concerned, namely the question of the provision made by the province for the payment of its own essential services, I have only this to say, that the imposition of the sales tax and its application were, I thought, a very proper thing to do; but when I learned that it was endeavoured to apply it on the importation of commodities from the neighbouring province of Manitoba I thought there must be some mistake. I am told definitely, however, with respect to certain commodities that come from Manitoba that the two per cent sales tax has been applied, at the risk of the act being ultra vires, as the minister says.

I am not going to follow the distribution of vegetables to-day; I had no intention of doing so, because there will be a time and place in which we will follow that distribution. But I do desire to make it perfectly clear that there have been complaints—I have large numbers of them—as to the method of distribution and the method of acquisition of the supplies that were distributed by the federal government. This is a matter that the minister has now brought into the issue and I will not discuss it.

Mr. DUNNING: It was introduced in reply to a question.

Mr. BENNETT: That is true; the minister was answering a question asked him. However, I do not intend to deal with that matter now. There is an occasion in the estimates to deal with it, because we as a dominion have expended public moneys to purchase supplies of apples, cheese, beans and other commodities and, as the minister indicated some time ago, the particulars will be forthcoming, as to the names of the people to whom these commodities were distributed, the manner of distribution, and so on. For the moment, however, I was dealing with the one question of essential services and of the necessity of these essential services, if they are carried on with this money, being made subject to a condition, which would have no value now inasmuch as the obligations have been incurred and the expenditures made in part. But the minister made some observations which either meant something or meant nothing. If he desires to discuss the reason why I went to Montreal I am prepared to give it to him now. I went there because of his beloved Beauharnois, to make it quite clear that none of that fund went to the Conservative party in that election. That is easily verified, and if he suggests that there were any other discussions I can tell him, with a little effort in looking up some papers, where I was during the time I was there. I could give him considerable information if he desired to have it in connection with other matters that would be vastly interesting to this house and possibly to himself.

The purpose for which I rose has been entirely vindicated by the minister's intimation that so far as this item is concerned it has either been already spent or commitments have been made under it. But this is supply for the year ended March 31, and presumably there will be further appropriations for the year ending March 31, 1939, and then I will follow the observations which I have made by offering an amendment to meet a situation which I think should be met. I will not do so now. I wanted to have an explanation, which the minister has given, as to whether or not this money was for the year ended March 31, or whether it was to be used to continue essential services beyond that time. The minister has given an assurance, which ends that phase of the matter, that the money was for the year ended March 31, 1938, and that commitments have been made or expenditures already completed that make it no longer possible to impose any conditions. That serves entirely the purpose I had in mind.

May I assure the minister and the committee that if I seem to be anxious about some of these matters I am not thinking in terms of any political effect in other places. That was not my intention at all. But no thoughtful man who looks out upon the country to-day and realizes the disharmony and disunion that exist between the provinces can help being concerned. I am sure that the Prime Minister is. I am sure that every man in this house is concerned about confederation, and every effort that we can make, however trifling it may be, that will do something to render it less possible for the critic to make the observations that have been made will be all to the good. And these observations have been made not on the street corners, but in reputable magazines and papers; they are not gossip in the current press but calmly and carefully considered statements, well balanced statements with respect to these matters. In this light I did venture, as I believed it to be my duty, to direct attention to the possibility of removing one at least of the many causes of friction between component parts of this confederation. There never was a time when there was more need of our endeavouring to do so. If in consequence of the observations I have made the minister is annoyed, that is my misfortune and not my fault. But it is to be hoped at least that the concern for the unit, the confederation, the nation, will outweigh the considerations that each of us may have for the moment for the component provinces comprising confederation.

Mr. YOUNG: Those of us who come from Saskatchewan and are familiar with the very severe plight in which the teachers find themselves can all say how greatly we sympathize with that section of the population. I take it from what the leader of the opposition has just said that he approves of giving a grant to help to pay the salaries of teachers, which he describes as an essential service.

Mr. BENNETT: No; I do not want the hon. gentleman to misunderstand me. If the provinces are given a grant of money it is a very appropriate thing for us, who find the money, to say that a portion of it, without indicating what portion, should be utilized in liquidating unpaid teachers' salaries.

Mr. YOUNG: Well, that is exactly what I was saying.

Mr. BENNETT: It didn't sound like it.

Mr. YOUNG: There are other essential services in Saskatchewan, services that I know something about, such as taking care of the sick, for instance, and looking after women and children. Our doctors have had a very hard struggle. I do not know of any group of men who have been more unselfish and untiring in their efforts than the medical profession in my province. I know medical men there who have been going almost without their meals, running their cars to go and see people. I know of medical men who have mortgaged all they had to serve the people of the province. But I know something else, too. I know that during the years 1930-35 the medical profession not only in Saskatchewan but throughout western Canada were so concerned at the inadequacy of medical services being given in that part of Canada that there was a strong agitation among the doctors of those provinces to get together and find out what could be done. They did this. They visited the premiers of the four western provinces and put the situation up to them, and they received from those four western premiers, on behalf of their respective governments, letters suggesting that the federal government should come to the assistance of the provinces in order to help to carry on essential medical services. They came to Ottawa when the leader of the opposition was Prime Minister, and what was the result? They almost received the cold shoulder. At any rate, they did not receive one dollar to help along those essential medical services. And now that the right hon. gentleman is in opposition he says that we should come to the assistance of the teachers and pay their salaries. If it is a good principle now to come to the assistance of the teachers—and I am not saying that it is not—surely the right hon. gentleman is not the one to press it after turning down very definitely and positively the request made by the medical profession of western Canada to carry on essential services at the time to which I have referred..

Mr. McIVOR: I venture at this time to say a word on behalf of those men in Saskatchewan, the clergymen, who assisted in the distribution of vegetables and all the other good things that came from the east. I would not stand by and allow anyone to say there was a crooked thing done by any of these men or those associated with them in the distribution of the goods that were sent out. These men carried out that distribution efficiently, and often there was nothing left for them.

Mr. BENNETT: I wish to correct just one observation made by the hon. member for Saskatoon. It is not correct to say that any effort was made by the west. The representative of the doctors, Doctor Routley, attended here and asked that certain provision be made in relief measures for medical services. We said that was a matter that should be dealt with by the provinces, with respect to the moneys they received by grants in aid to enable them to carry on relief; that it was not our function so to do. We said the provinces could do as they pleased with respect to these matters, and that was the cold shoulder they received. Let there be no misunderstanding with respect to that.

With respect to teachers the same thing applied, only now this money is for the maintenance of essential services, in the terms of this grant or appropriation, and we have a perfect right to impose a condition that the money be utilized to liquidate any balance that may have accumulated. But the money having been spent there is not much use in locking the door after the horse has walked out or been taken out. Perhaps it has been taken for a ride; that may be the net result. That was the position with respect to medical services, about which I know a very great deal; and the hon. gentleman himself was not present.

[Mr. Young.]

Mr. YOUNG: The right hon. gentleman knows very well that nothing was included in the grants in aid for medical services, and I am not saying that it occurred only when he was Prime Minister. I just said that inasmuch as he was so solicitous for the payment of teachers I thought the record should be kept straight.

Mr. BENNETT: Even at the risk of correcting the record and putting it right I must say that I have never found the hon. member for Saskatoon to make a complete statement during the time I have been in the house. Part of the statement is always made and the rest is left in abeyance. One is imagination; the other is fact. On the question of supplanting imagination with fact the truth is that those were grants with respect to relief. This is a grant made to enable the province to carry on its business, and its business is to look after the teachers. The minister says the rate has now been increased from $1 to $1.50 a day, in regard to the assistance given the schools.

Mr. GARDINER: Per room.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, $1.50 per day per room. Presumably that is for the purpose of maintaining the efficiency of the schools. I was talking only about the question of the teachers' salaries. With respect to grants in aid for relief, the province may make the distribution it thinks best, but this is not a grant for relief; this is a grant for essential services. It is not of the nature of the grants that were made by the late administration, unless the hon. gentleman refers to grants with respect to roads. That is the only point I have in mind.

Mr. GARDINER: There were three-quarters of a million dollars of teachers' salaries unpaid even at that time.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not anticipate this sort of discussion arising at this stage of the bill; I thought it had been fairly thoroughly discussed the other evening, when this item was before the committee of supply. I quite understand that the right hon. leader of the opposition was not present on that occasion, and has a perfect right to take advantage of this opportunity. I should point out, however, as I pointed out the other evening, that the wording of this vote is very similar to the wording of the vote by which this house at its last session, following the investigation by the Bank of Canada into the affairs of Saskatchewan, appropriated $1,500,000. As I pointed out the other night, the examination by the Bank of Canada was based upon the conditions existing at that time, that is, a year ago. Along in the summer it became quite apparent that any estimate which had been made by the bank as to the prospective revenues receivable by the province of Saskatchewan during 1937 could not possibly be realized, because everyone could see that the worst drought in the history of the province was upon those people. Therefore the problem of carrying on the essential services of the province became much more acute.

Parliament provided a million and a half. This additional amount represents a careful further examination of what was imposed upon the people and the government of that province by the additional drought conditions of 1937. The Minister of Agriculture is quite correct in saying that, when the government of the province made representations to us last September as to the conditions, it was quite apparent that no authority existed for enlarging the amount which had been granted by parliament. The government had no such authority. The only thing the government could do, after examining all the facts and the provincial income—meaning by that the income of all the people, the figures of which I gave the other night, as between 1936 and 1937 in Saskatchewan, which represent the greatest reduction, I think, of the income of the whole people of a province that has ever occurred in the history of Canada—was to say, "We are willing to place before parliament at its next session a proposal to increase the amount of a million and a half which has already been provided, by a further sum of $2,000,000." Certain conditions were imposed, which I need not go into in detail now, conditions having to do with cutting of certain expenditures in which the dominion believed economies could be effected. In addition a very thorough examination was made of the purposes for which this money was required, which are the ordinary services of the province.

On the basis of the assurance given by myself on behalf of the government that such an item would be placed before parliament, undoubtedly the province in the interim has been able to carry on those essential services, and only because of that.

Mr. BENNETT: No doubt the Minister of Finance received a telegram from the general secretary of the Alberta Teachers' Association on March 8, a copy of which was sent to me, dealing with the request of Alberta to be assisted in the same way with respect to this educational matter.

Mr. DUNNING: There was no request from the government of the province.

Mr. BENNETT: No; I said from the general secretary of the Alberta Teachers' Association. At that time the minister's correspondent referred to the unanimous plea of the Canadian Teachers' Federation to the dominion government for assistance to be given in connection with the drought area of Saskatchewan; and the general secretary of the Alberta Teachers' Association points out that these conditions apply equally in that province in the case of some six thousand teachers.

Mr. DUNNING: In that connection I can only point out that the development of arrears of teachers' salaries in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta has been a progressive matter.

Mr. BENNETT: It began before you came into office.

Mr. DUNNING: It began some considerable time before we came into office; in fact in 1934, I think, the arrears in Saskatchewan were in the neighbourhood of three-quarters of a million dollars. It has been a growing condition. No government of Canada has yet taken the ground that in assisting the provinces, either by way of relief or by way of assistance in financing their essential services, the government of Canada or the parliament of Canada should earmark the precise purpose for which the sum so granted should be expended.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that has been done frequently.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps my right hon. friend would tell me when during his regime he made such a conditional grant.

Mr. BENNETT: It was done with respect to particular roads and particular undertakings under the relief legislation.

Mr. DUNNING: But that does not include services of this character, covering the whole province; it was by virtue of a fifty-fifty agreement to spend money on a particular material objective, which is a vastly different thing. In that connection we have proceeded exactly along the same line. I do think we would be creating very serious trouble in the future if in dealing with a province we attempted to dictate what they should do, because you must remember that it involves what they should do not only with our money but with their own. You cannot separate them. You cannot say, with respect to an expenditure of $2,000,000 by this government for general provincial purposes, that it must all go for this purpose and none for that, because we know perfectly well that to do so in practice would be to involve the withdrawal of certain provincial expenditures for that purpose and the application of the money to something else. If we start that it involves actual control by the dominion of the manner in which the province expends its own funds. I am afraid it could not be escaped. I appreciate entirely the desire of everyone to see that teachers are assisted, as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has indicated. They have been, in fact. I presume it is true that there are still arrears. But no one from the west will say that the condition of teachers has not been materially improved in Saskatchewan during the last year or two, partly as a result of assistance rendered by this parliament in the way of assistance of this kind.

I do suggest, not that the problem has been solved—heaven knows it is one of the most difficult problems with which we have to deal, with all its varied aspects which touch us so closely—but that everyone who has had the handling of it in recent years, and in this I give credit to my right hon. friend opposite as well as to ourselves, has endeavoured to approach the problem in a spirit of doing the very best it was possible to do for those afflicted, always having regard to the desirability of maintaining, as he puts it, "national unity", and at the same time dealing as effectively as we might with a problem which has been recognized by all as a national emergency.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I understood the Minister of Finance to say on Friday night that he would give an opportunity for a full-dress discussion of the subject of the distribution of relief in Saskatchewan. He intimated that in order to let this measure through the discussion could be had on some other item.

Mr. DUNNING: Quite. I did not give that assurance in connection with this measure, because as the hon. member knows it has nothing to do with distribution of relief. But I can assure him there will be no lack of opportunity to discuss anything connected with relief in Saskatchewan.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I have reference not only to the general subject of relief, but to the manner in which relief has been distributed in that province. On the ground of the assurance the minister has given—

Mr. DUNNING: I do not require to give that; the rules of the house will take care of it. I assure the hon. member there will be ample opportunity.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Reference has been made to the distribution of vegetables, and to a number of other matters connected with the distribution of relief in Saskatchewan. Statements have been made by the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Finance with which I, personally, do not agree. But I believe it would be better, and I understand the minister will agree, to leave the discussion of those matters to a later date; therefore I shall not continue the discussion at this time.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

Mr. DUNNING moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 89, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1939.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, considered in committee and reported.

Mr. DUNNING moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: Before the bill is read the third time I wish to make it abundantly clear that in agreeing, as we have, to this interim supply being passed, we have in no sense surrendered our right of criticism with respect to the various items which appear in the supply bill for this year.

Mr. DUNNING: That is understood.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe the Minister of Finance has already anticipated that, by making some such observations.

Mr. DUNNING: Correct.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SEED GRAIN

GUARANTEE OF LOANS FOR PURCHASE OF SEED AND OTHER ASSISTANCE IN SEEDING OPERATIONS IN WESTERN PROVINCES—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 78, to assist the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan in financing the cost of seed and seeding operations for the crop year 1938.

Mr. BENNETT: What are the amendments?

Mr. DUNNING: They are clarifying amendments which do not affect the bill in the slightest degree.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

MEASURE FOR ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS

The house resumed from Thursday March 31, consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution—Mr. Rogers—Mr. Sanderson in the chair:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide assistance towards the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress, and for such payments out of moneys appropriated by parliament as may be necessary for all or any of the purposes of the proposed legislation.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Chairman, at the beginning of the session I promised I would take an early opportunity to present a detailed survey of the existing relief situation, and review the results obtained under the several measures adopted by the government for the relief of unemployment and agricultural distress. Since that undertaking was given there have been three debates on unemployment, but apart from the debate on the address in reply these discussions occurred on resolutions, and were therefore somewhat restricted in scope. This is the first opportunity I have had to speak generally and at some length on the problem which has become the primary responsibility of the Department of Labour in so far as its federal aspects are concerned. Hon. members will recall that I had intended to make this statement on the second reading of the bill which would be introduced following the approval of the resolution now before us. However, it was the wish of the committee that the resolution should remain in committee and this statement be made during the discussion thereon. That is the present position.

It so happens that it is just over two years since I addressed the house for the first time on the subject of unemployment. The occasion of that discussion was a motion for the second reading of the bill to establish the national employment commission. In July of last year the interim report of the national employment commission was submitted and its publication authorized by the government. During the past week the final report of that commission was tabled and distributed to members. I realize it is the wish of the committee that I should deal with the subject matter of these reports, and particularly the main recommendations contained in the final report. I propose to do that before I have finished.

As I mentioned a moment ago, two years have passed since I spoke first to hon. members on the question of unemployment. At that time we were all keenly aware of the gravity of the situation that confronted the country, and I sought to deal with the question without any appeal to party prejudice or any resort to recrimination. Let me say at once that I intend to follow the same policy this afternoon. This does not mean that as a government we seek any immunity from criticism where criticism is due. We must be equally ready to give reasons for what we have done and for what we have refrained from doing. We are prepared to do just that. It does mean that after two and a half years in the Department of Labour I have not changed my conviction that the question of economic insecurity, or perhaps I should say the solution of the problem of economic insecurity, transcends all sectional differences, and it certainly transcends the political fortunes of individuals.

Without question it is the most vital problem which confronts all governments at this time, regardless of the measures that may be adopted to deal with it. I should like to suggest to the committee that in its wider aspects it involves our whole theory of government and it raises issues, as I have had occasion to mention before, which lie at the very root of our system of federal public finance. I shall do no more than mention these considerations at this time, but I shall return to them later in order to emphasize the interrelation of measures which may be adopted to deal with unemployment and other aspects of national policy and constitutional reform.

Before dealing with the work of the national employment commission, I think it will contribute to the information of the committee and place this work in a proper perspective if I deal first with a number of important decisions which were made by this government in relation to unemployment and the relief situation before the national employment commission was established. When we came into office in October, 1935, perhaps the most urgent question that met us was the determination of the grants in aid from the dominion treasury to the provinces for the relief of unemployment and agricultural distress. We met that problem, following a dominion-provincial conference and following very strong representations made by a conference of Canadian mayors held in Montreal at about the same time, by an increase of seventy-five per cent in the grants in aid payable to the provinces for the relief of unemployment conditions.

I want to speak of that at the present time because it is related to something that I shall have to say a little later. I think it will also be useful if I indicate to hon. members, particularly those who were not here during the last parliament, the train of events which led up to the system of grants in aid to the provinces, which, as I have said, was one of the first problems which confronted us as a government when we came into office. When direct relief was instituted in this country as a result of the abnormal conditions which had developed from 1930 onward, that system of relief was based upon the assumption that in constitutional practice the primary responsibility for dealing with unemployment and distress lay with the municipality, but when it became too great for the municipality it was time for the province to render assistance, and when it became too great for the province and assumed national dimensions, it was time for the dominion government to come to the assistance of the provinces.

That principle, if I might term it such, was expressed very clearly on a number of occasions by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) when he was Prime Minister, and also by the present Prime Minister when in opposition. I think I cannot do better at the moment than quote the words of the present leader of the opposition as of September 10, 1930, which was about the time when it was considered necessary to institute this system of direct relief through grants in aid from the dominion treasury.

Mr. BENNETT: It was not until the next year that direct relief came into being.

Mr. ROGERS: That is quite true. In the first year resort was had rather to a system of works by which this government assisted the provinces and the municipalities in the execution thereof. With that correction, I quote the words of my right hon. friend:

> But this dominion will not be engaging in that form of relief or business which primarily it is the duty of the provinces or municipalities to undertake; but to assist them in the discharge of that duty this grant is being asked for.

I come now to the next year, when on July 23, 1931, the present Prime Minister is reported on pages 4101 and 4102 of Hansard as follows:

> It is not wise from the point of view of principle for one government to raise taxes and pass them over to other governments to be expended. The government which raises the taxes ought to control their expenditure. I believe that was the principle laid down at the time of confederation. It was recognized that the provinces would need something in the way of subsidies to supplement their sources of income, but I contend that one of the bases of the confederation act was the idea that the federal and provincial governments would have certain definite fields of services assigned to them, that they should have complete control over those services, that they would raise the moneys necessary and see to their expenditure. If for any reason the division is not fair, then adjustments should be made by the paying of additional or altered subsidies.

Then I come finally to the close of the period during which the leader of the opposition was Prime Minister of this country, in 1935. The following quotation is from Hansard, 1935, page 166:

> Mr. Bennett: It has been common ground between the right hon. gentleman and myself that the primary obligation with respect to relief under our constitution rests with the small community, whether it be a municipality, a village, a town, or a city. The second liability rests with the province that brought those organizations into being, and if the question is of a national character the dominion must assist.

It was in conformity with those views of the relative obligations of the several governmental agencies set up under the federal constitution in respect of relief and distress that a policy of direct relief was built up in this country from 1931 onward. In the beginning that policy was based upon a three-way division of the financial obligation; the dominion government contributed 33⅓ per cent, the province contributed 33⅓ per cent, and the municipality an equal percentage of the total cost of direct relief.

That system continued until August of 1934. In July of that year the present leader of the opposition summoned a dominion-provincial conference, which canvassed very thoroughly the situation which had developed under the system which I have described. I have read very carefully the report of that conference. The report was not published, and I shall not refer to it in any particular other than to say what was later recorded, that under a system where the dominion government committed itself to a percentage of indefinite expenditures, there was a tendency towards waste and a tendency towards laxity of administration, and it was in view of those considerations that the government of that day changed the method of percentage grants in relation to the problem as it existed in each province to a system of monthly grants in aid of fixed sums, these to be paid to the provinces for their assistance in meeting that problem.

Mr. BENNETT: That was when the representatives of the provinces were here.

Mr ROGERS: Yes. That followed the conference of July, 1934. Those grants in aid went into effect in August of that year, and they were the grants that were in effect when this administration came into office in October, 1935.

Mr. BENNETT: There was some variation as to amounts.

Mr. ROGERS: My information is that there was only a slight variation in the amounts paid under the grants in aid agreements. It is quite true, of course, that the administration of my right hon. friend did deal with special emergency situations in the western provinces on a different basis, but I am referring here only to the grants in aid of unemployment and agricultural distress apart from what was done in the drought area. The grants prevailing from August, 1934, up to October, 1935, are as follows—my right hon. friend is correct; there was some alteration in the case of Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, but the grants to the other provinces I find are substantially the same: Prince Edward Island, $1,250; Nova Scotia, $40,000; New Brunswick, $25,000; Quebec, $500,000; Ontario, $600,000; Manitoba, $135,000; Saskatchewan, $200,000; Alberta, $100,000; British Columbia, $150,000. These were monthly grants in aid. The only changes were in Prince Edward Island, where there was a reduction from $2,125 to $1,250, and in Nova Scotia, from $40,875 to $40,000. That is to say, there were only minor adjustments. These were the grants that remained in force for the period of fifteen months before this government came into office.

When we came into office we summoned a conference of the provinces and asked the provinces to lay fully before us the situation which had existed in the preceding period and to indicate how far they believed that that system had operated injuriously to the structure of municipal and provincial finance. It was manifest at that time—and one must remember the cumulative effect of these things—that some immediate action was necessary on the part of the dominion government to relieve the position of the municipalities. The municipalities themselves complained that under the relief legislation of the preceding period they had in many cases been unable to raise by taxation their portion of what was required, and were now being confronted with the inevitable results of a process of increase of debt due to the funding of relief costs. At all events the situation as it was presented to this government appeared to be a critical one, and we met it in the manner I have indicated. We increased the grants in aid to the provinces by seventy-five per cent for the winter months, and in the order in council under which that increase in the grants in aid to the provinces was authorized we emphasized that the increase was designed particularly to afford relief to the municipalities.

It is quite true, as has been said before in this chamber, that in certain cases the provincial governments appeared to be reluctant to pass on these increases to the municipalities, but that occurred in only a very few cases, and as a result of communications addressed to the provinces by the Department of Labour we have reason to believe that certainly during the first quarter of the year 1936 the increase in the grants in aid was substantially passed on for the relief of the municipalities.

From that time forward we have by degrees, in conformity with the improvement in general conditions, gradually reduced the grants in aid to the provinces. I am not going to indicate at this time just when those reductions were made and to what provinces they apply. I merely point out that the first act of the government in relation to the relief situation was based upon a clear appreciation of the cumulative effects of relief costs upon junior governments. We did it to meet an immediate emergency during those first winter months, and as the situation gradually improved we as a dominion government have correspondingly reduced our grants in aid to the provinces.

The next question that confronted us as a government was the disposition of the relief camps. I am not going to deal with that subject at great length, but as I said before I think it is important that we should understand fully just what policies have been followed, and why they have been followed, in order that the committee may review the entire situation at this time. The relief camps had been established to meet an emergent situation which had developed as a result of continued drought in the western provinces and of great decline of activity in other industries. As is well known to members of the committee, the industries of logging, lumbering and mining are to some extent seasonal in character, and tend to attract to themselves a large body of fluctuating labour. With drought conditions prevailing in the western provinces it was not possible to absorb that labour in agricultural occupations. As a matter of fact, during successive years there was a steady migration from rural areas to cities.

The result was a concentration of transients in our larger cities. It was in the main to meet that situation that the relief camps were established.

When we came into office the relief camps had been in operation for a period of about two and a half years. They were established in every province of Canada with the exception of Prince Edward Island; they totalled in all 144. They stretched across the dominion from Nova Scotia to British Columbia. I think it might be useful to indicate to the house how the strength of these camps increased in the period to which I have referred. As of January, 1933, the number in the relief camps was 1,936; in January, 1934, it was 19,526; in January, 1935, it was 21,631; and in January, 1936, it was 20,241. So the tendency had been for the numbers of these single homeless men, as they were described, to increase during that period, and there was in the nature of things a very considerable pressure upon both the preceding administration and this government when it came into office to increase the number of relief camps in order to provide a refuge for larger numbers of these men.

We had to make a decision as to what should be done with these relief camps. It was announced originally that the administration of these relief camps would be transferred from the Department of National Defence to the Department of Labour. Immediately following that statement, the Department of Labour established a committee of inquiry to visit the camps and to report to the minister with respect to the policy that should be followed in relation to them. The terms of reference to that committee indicate clearly that so far as the Minister of Labour was concerned there was a desire, which of course extended to the government as a whole, to find out whether in the existing circumstances the camps really met effectively the situation created by unemployment and transiency, or whether it would be desirable to close them and deal with the situation in another way.

The terms of reference were as follows:

1. The desirability of continuing the relief camps on their present basis or in any other form.

2. The allowance or wage policy which should be followed in the relief camps during their continuance, and the relation of any proposed change in allowance to other forms of unemployment relief, and more particularly to existing schemes for farm placement carried out in cooperation with the provinces.

3. The adequacy of existing facilities for reestablishing men now in relief camps in industrial and agricultural employment.

4. The adequacy of existing facilities for general education, occupational training and supervised recreation.

5. Any other matter in relation to the administration of relief camps which you deem to be of importance in the formulation of the policy of the Department of Labour in relation to these camps.

The members of that committee consisted of Mr. Humphrey Mitchell, formerly a member of this house; Doctor E. W. Bradwin, president of the Frontier college, who has had a long experience in dealing with this type of single homeless men, and Mr. Rigg, the head of the dominion employment service.

The committee lost no time in making its investigation, and upon the basis of its report it was determined by this government that the relief camps would be closed. We stated that we hoped it would be possible to close the camps as of July 1, 1936. Meanwhile, again following the recommendations of the committee, we decided that the allowance of twenty cents a day, which had proved the cause of so much contention and ill-feeling in preceding years, should be altered, that the men in the camps should receive a wage allowance of fifteen dollars a month up to the time of their closing, and that that amount should be paid to them on a deferred pay basis in order that they might be assisted towards absorption in some other line of occupation. It was said at the time that the relief camps could not be closed. It was said that there would be riots. It was said that it would create a disturbance of the labour market, and that, regardless of the conditions which had developed in these camps it was better to continue them than to seek to close them at that time. Fortunately it was found possible, through the cooperation of three departments of this government, the departments of national defence, of transport and of labour, to work out a plan whereby the greater number of men in the relief camps would be transferred to useful and gainful employment on maintenance work on the great railway systems of this country. Special employment officers were also sent to the various camps in order to assist others in them toward other occupations. Many were enabled to return to agricultural occupations.

I should like simply to say at this time that the program as announced was carried out to the letter. There were no riots; there were no disturbances. Some ten thousand of these men went to maintenance work upon the railways, and so were placed in a position to earn money,—for the first time in a number of years, in the case of a vast majority of them. Many found other occupations, and the camps ceased to be an integral part of the administration of relief in this country as from dominion day, 1936. I should like to say too that in view of subsequent events, whatever may be said by hon. members as to the wisdom of that policy, it can be said that the policy itself was well timed, and also that those who were in the camps were enabled, by the adoption of other methods of dealing with this situation, to move into much more wholesome occupations. From that time forward, although there have been difficulties from time to time in certain of our larger cities, the problem of the single, homeless men has never attained the serious proportions it had prior to the closing of the relief camps.

The next question which faced us was the determination of the real dimensions of this problem of relief; the desire on our part to think of that problem not merely in terms of numbers but rather in terms of human need and of the occupational possibilities of those who had been unemployed and on relief for a period of years. So in February, 1936, we arranged, following the recommendations of the dominion-provincial conference in December of the previous year, to have a special trial registration and classification of the unemployed on relief. That was of very great value in laying a foundation for the more complete and more accurate registration which was conducted subsequently by the national employment commission.

The next decision taken by the government related to the assistance given to the provinces in connection with projects known as relief work. For some years, as I mentioned, the dominion government had assisted the provinces in the construction of highways and to some extent of buildings and municipal enterprises. The tendency was to concentrate expenditures upon highways and particularly upon sections of the trans-Canada highway which had not yet been built. The result of that policy was that there were in certain provinces, notably in Ontario, large concentrations of single men on these trans-Canada projects, and it was not found practicable to bring to them the heads of families on relief in the larger cities and towns of the province. We believed that it was reasonable in the first place that whatever expenditures were made for relief works should be distributed and located as far as possible in relation to existing employment needs, and we also felt that undoubtedly there would be full support both in this house and in the country for the stipulation in any agreement with the provinces that those working upon such projects should be taken largely from the relief rolls. The stipulation that at least fifty per cent of those working on joint projects should be taken from the relief rolls was inserted in the relief works agreements with the provinces covering the year 1936-37, and it has continued from then to the present day. We have had the assurance therefore, regardless of the extent of these programs, that they have contributed at least to the reduction of the relief rolls; and we have also had the assurance that the reduction has not been confined to single municipalities or areas but has been distributed as far as possible in relation to employment needs.

Those were the decisions that were taken before the establishment of the national employment commission, and that brings me to the setting up of that body. The second reading of the bill to establish the national employment commission was moved on March 30, 1936, and the commission itself was set up as soon as possible after the bill received royal assent. We made it very clear, when the national employment commission was set up, that we believed that there was a real need for an agency of this kind which could give its attention to certain aspects of this great problem of unemployment relief and also bring about a more effective co-ordination of effort among all governmental agencies having obligations in relation to that problem.

The house will remember perhaps some of the discussion that took place on the provisions of that bill, and it will be recalled in particular that it was emphasized at that time that the functions of the national employment commission were to be advisory. It is true that there is one provision in the bill whereby administrative functions could by order in council be conferred upon the commission; but in the debate it was emphasized by members on the opposite side that it would be undesirable to have administrative functions so conferred, and there was no question as to the feeling of the house that the main functions of the commission should be confined to advising the government with respect to measures to deal with unemployment and agricultural distress.

I should like at this time to refer to the functions of the national employment commission as set out in the act. They are:

The commission shall,

(a) carry out as soon as possible a national registration and classification of persons on relief in cooperation with the provinces, municipalities and private and public bodies;

(b) recommend to the minister conditions to be complied with by any province obtaining grants for relief purposes from the government of Canada;

(c) recommend to the minister effective means of mobilizing the agencies for relief both state and voluntary, and so coordinating their work as to avoid overlapping and abuses, and to secure when necessary, an effective supervision and auditing of expenditures of all moneys;

(d) investigate and report upon proposals for the carrying out of programs of public works and other projects to aid in providing employment;

(e) recommend to the minister measures with respect to programs of public works and projects of the dominion, the provinces, the municipalities, and other agencies, intended to aid in providing employment in a manner which will serve to mobilize and coordinate their activities;

(f) investigate and report to the minister on measures of cooperation with commercial and industrial groups in devising means under which provision may be made for the maintenance and increase of employment;

(g) investigate and report to the minister upon plans for the establishment of an apprenticeship system in industry;

(h) investigate and report upon ways and means of providing employment for disabled persons, and cooperate with the veterans' assistance commission in its efforts to secure suitable employment for ex-soldiers;

(i) recommend to the minister comprehensive measures constituting long-range plans of national development which may be proceeded with or discontinued from time to time as conditions may determine;

(j) take such steps to ensure publicity as in the opinion of the commission may be necessary to enable it effectively to discharge its powers and duties.

Those were the functions conferred upon the national employment commission, and I will now deal first with the personnel of the commission and secondly with the recommendations which have come from that commission, first in its interim report and subsequently in its final report, which was distributed a few days ago. First may I say this with regard to those who were appointed to the national employment commission and also to the two special advisory committees on youth employment and women's employment. Those who were appointed to the commission and the committees accepted their duties with a very keen sense of the importance of the task and a very keen sense of public obligation. I emphasize that at this time because there have been, and I suppose quite naturally, suggestions occasionally in this house that those who were employed on this work were perhaps not giving to it their full time and that the work might have been concentrated to better effect had there been a smaller commission or had those placed upon these committees been able to give their full time to them. In my own experience with the personnel and the machinery of this organization I am fully convinced that we could not have found in Canada a group of men and women more keenly anxious to serve the country in connection with this very great problem.

The national employment commission was organized in June 1936, and the first problems that confronted it were three. I referred a few moments ago to the problem of single homeless men and the measures taken by this administration to abolish relief camps and direct those in them to gainful occupations. It was necessary to anticipate the need for caring for single unemployed men and transients in the winter of 1936-37, and the first problem dealt with by the commission was this one, which past experience had proved had in it very serious elements of danger and disturbance. After a very careful study of that problem it was the view of the commission that we could best deal with that situation of transiency and the single unemployed by an expansion of the farm placement plan which had been in operation on a limited scale in previous years. The commission itself arranged conferences with representatives of various provincial governments in order to work out the details of that plan. As a result of the adoption of the plan and the full cooperation of the provinces in it, at least those provinces which felt that the question was a serious one within their borders, the farm improvement and employment plan was set up under which in the winter months of 1936-37 it was found possible to place in Manitoba some ten thousand men and women in farm employment.

Mr. MacNICOL: At government expense?

Mr. ROGERS: The expense being borne in part by the dominion and in part by the province, on an equal basis. The total in Saskatchewan was 14,850. The number remaining on the farms for the summer, in other words the number absorbed in agricultural occupations, was 4,051. In Alberta the total number of placements was 4,155 and supplementary plans, public works projects and forest conservation took care of another 1,509, making a total of 5,744. The number remaining on farms at wages for the summer at the conclusion of the agreement was 1,360.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would the minister tell us what the wages were, when he comes to that point?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not the wages received by those men who were retained on the farms, but my information was that they received the prevailing wage in farming operations in western Canada at that time. I take it that my hon. friend is not now referring to what was paid under the farm employment plan?

Mr. MacINNIS: I should like to have both.

Mr. ROGERS: In British Columbia under the farm placement plan the number placed was 300, and under supplementary plans 4,147. In Quebec the total placements were 5,506 and the number remaining on farms was 4,400.

Mr. MacNEIL: In the figures the minister gave for British Columbia does he refer to men who were placed on farms in British Columbia?

Mr. ROGERS: The British Columbia figures on farm placements are very small, for reasons which I think my hon. friend will appreciate. We understood the situation as well, so in British Columbia, where the farm placement plan was applied to a limited extent, we arranged for special projects under which certain unemployed men and transients were engaged in the great primary industry of that province, namely forestry. That was the case in 1936-37 and also 1937-38. While they are so engaged, as my hon. friend is aware, they are receiving wages, and in connection with those wages there is a deferred payment plan.

Mr. HEAPS: What wages do they receive?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not the wages before me at the present time, but I shall be glad to take note of that question and give my hon. friend the information in committee on the bill.

Mr. MacNEIL: Were there three hundred placements on farms within the boundaries of British Columbia?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, those three hundred placements were within the province of British Columbia.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister's figures in reference to Quebec show that practically four-fifths of those placed on farms during the winter at the expense of the government remained on the farms through the summer.

Mr. ROGERS: That is quite true.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the minister kindly explain that?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not an explanatory note on that point but I shall be very glad to try to get the information and give it to the committee. I should mention that in the province of Quebec no payment was made to the farmer under this plan. In the other provinces payments were made, in order to bring about a larger absorption of these single unemployed on the farms.

Mr. EDWARDS: Has the minister the figures for Ontario?

Mr. ROGERS: Although the plan was submitted to Ontario that province did not feel that the situation warranted the adoption of the plan. I may say that the proposal to deal with this problem of transiency and the single unemployed through a farm placement scheme was made available to all provinces, but those where the problem was greatest, the western provinces, naturally had the greatest number of placements. Quebec did adopt it; Ontario did not.

Mr. EDWARDS: There were no contributions to Ontario under this plan?

Mr. ROGERS: No.

Mr. LOCKHART: Would the minister give the reasons why the plan was not adopted by Ontario?

Mr. ROGERS: As I recall it the communication was to this effect: it was anticipated that increased logging, lumbering and mining operations in Ontario would very largely absorb the single unemployed, and at the time there was promise of a very marked expansion in those directions. Objection was taken to it also on the ground that the wages paid under this plan, if you can so term the allowances made, were well below what was normally paid farm workers in Ontario, and the department of labour of the province felt that it would be unwise to adopt the plan in view of those two considerations. I do not think I am misstating the situation as it was at that time.

Mr. McGREGOR: Could the minister tell us how much was spent on the whole project?

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be glad to take note of that question and furnish the information later. I may say, however, that this method of dealing with the problem has been far more economical and, as I mentioned a while ago, in our opinion far more wholesome and far better from the standpoint of the morale of the men and women involved than the former scheme of dealing with single unemployed in relief camps. So far as the expense is concerned, in the last year of their operation the relief camps cost some $9,000,000. On the basis of the increased wage allowance which we introduced in February of 1936 the cost of the camps, had they been continued throughout that year, would have been $12,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: At the increased rates of pay?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. The increased wages would account for the excess over the $9,000,000 of the previous year. Under the farm employment plan the actual expenditures last year I am quite sure did not exceed $2,500,000, and that amount would also cover the supplementary plans to which I referred, which were in operation in the provinces where the farm employment plan was not in force.

The next problem which was dealt with by the national employment commission was the persistent depression in the building industry. Members of the committee will recall that the employment commission put forward the terms of a plan which actually was put into operation before the house met last year, and which already has had the effect of bringing about a marked stimulus in the building industry. I refer to the home improvement plan. I do not think it is necessary for me to give the details of this plan. It involves encouragement on the part of this government, through the cooperation of financial and loaning institutions, of the repair of private homes. Up to date there has been expended directly under this plan, on home improvements, the sum of $15,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: In a little over a year.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. The plan is still in operation, and the results under it fully warrant its continuance. At the present time it is in full operation, and we believe there will be still further developments during the coming year.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the minister not mean that the government has loaned $15,000,000, but that the total amount spent would be up to $60,000,000 or $70,000,000.

Mr. ROGERS: No; the loaning institutions have loaned $15,000,000. I was going to say that the experience in the United States, in the operation of a similar plan, has been that for every million dollars loaned directly in this way for the improvement of homes there is an additional expenditure of some $5,000,000, which is induced by what might be described as imitation. That may appear to be an extravagant estimate, but it has been the experience in the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: But the $15,000,000 is the sum total the banks have advanced?

Mr. ROGERS: That is true. About eighty-five per cent of the expenditure is for labour. There is no doubt that the plan has contributed very largely to the improvement of conditions in the building industry. The advantage comes not only from the extent of the amounts spent, but from the distribution across the dominion. A great deal of it is spent in repairs in smaller municipalities, but I believe the scheme has fully realized our expectations in providing employment in those places in which it is most needed.

Certainly the commission was wise in its decision to deal first with the depression in the building industry. The next question dealt with by the commission was the matter of registration. I have no doubt that by this time hon. members will fully appreciate the advantage of having a continuous registration of the unemployed on relief. Certainly I can say that from an administrative standpoint there is a tremendous advantage in being able to obtain from the registration branch at any given time a statement regarding the actual relief situation in any district. We can obtain information not merely with respect to the numbers unemployed and on relief, but concerning the occupations from which they came and the facts with regard to ages and other matters of economic and social significance.

Before I have finished I believe I shall have been able to give the committee additional evidence of the value of having this means of continually measuring the fluctuations in the relief problem. A few days ago the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) directed attention to what he felt were some premonitory signals of a resumption of the depression in Canada. At the present time I shall not do more than say that at least so far as the relief situation is concerned, the figures at our disposal will enable us to measure with reasonable rapidity any changes which may occur from time to time in any part of the country. So far as employment is concerned, although there has been some falling off in recent months, I believe that falling off is certainly not enough at this time to justify our saying that there has been a definite reversal of the upward trend of employment in Canada.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does that apply to industry?

Mr. ROGERS: I shall deal with that.

Mr. EDWARDS: Surely the minister knows that the recession in industry is very severe at the present time.

Mr. ROGERS: I quite appreciate there has been some effect felt—

Mr. EDWARDS: Very much.

Mr. ROGERS: —in the border cities of Ontario, particularly,—

Mr. EDWARDS: All over Ontario.

Mr. ROGERS: —of a recession of manufacturing in the United States.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is not the point I brought up. I was not speaking about the border cities; I know nothing about them. But I do know that in central Ontario the recession is quite pronounced, and particularly in some industries.

Mr. ROGERS: If the hon. member will permit me to continue, I shall be pleased to deal a little later on with the point he has raised. After all, I quite agree with the hon. member that what we want is the truth. At the same time, while we should avoid excessive optimism, surely we should avoid excessive pessimism.

I come then to the recommendations of the national employment commission with respect to conditions to be attached to the grant in aid. During the first months of its existence the commission advised me, and I think properly, that it did not feel that it should recommend changes in grants in aid until it had had time to make a thorough study of the relief situation. In due course the commission made its recommendations concerning conditions which should be attached to grants in aid, and referred also to the coordination of what might be described as public aid with measures of voluntary aid given by welfare agencies.

The recommendations of the national employment commission were approved in principle by the government shortly after the publication last July of the interim report of the commission. It would have been possible for the federal government at once to have imposed those conditions, as originally recommended by the commission, upon all the provinces. We could have done so upon the basis, I suppose, of refusing to pay any grant in aid to a province unless it accepted the conditions laid down in the report of the commission.

At the same time I felt—and the commission agreed—that it would be desirable that before introducing new conditions with respect to grants in aid we should bring the provinces to us, one by one, and try to secure their willing cooperation in accepting recommendations which were designed to remove abuses in existing relief administration. We did arrange to bring officials of the various provincial departments of welfare to discuss their problems in administration with a committee composed of one representative of the Department of Labour, one from the national employment commission and one from the Department of Finance. Those conferences, conducted with each province, singly, extended over about two months. I did not feel that time had been wasted. Through those conferences it was found that some of the recommendations of the commission were not uniformly applicable. At all events, as a result of them a draft agreement was drawn up, the two main purposes of which were: (1) to remove the major abuse in connection with relief administration which, in some ways, had put relief in competition with gainful labour, through the tendency in certain places to raise relief scales above prevailing wages, and (2) to secure the cooperation of the provinces in trying to segregate for the time being, for the purpose of information, those on relief who were unemployable and who, therefore, in the strict sense of the term, were not in the category of those who might be directed into gainful occupations.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The minister referred to certain sections of the country where the relief rates were higher than the prevailing rates of wages. To what localities does he refer?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not that information immediately before me, and I am not sure that it is desirable at the present time to indicate them. I can say to my hon. friend, however, that in a number of provinces it has been discovered that the relief scales have been raised to a point where they have been competing with prevailing wages. I do not think anyone will seriously argue that that is a desirable situation.

Mr. COLDWELL: Or that the prevailing rates of wages have been brought down to the relief schedules.

Mr. ROGERS: So far as the prevailing rates of wages are concerned, the article in the agreement makes full allowance for what may be contributed by some other bread-winner who is a member of the family. There was no desire to apply it in a rigorous or inhuman manner; at the same time there was a feeling on the part of the commission, which is referred to explicitly in its report, that an effort should be made to see to it that relief did not compete with gainful occupations. These several agreements were entered into with the provinces after draft agreements had been sent to them for their comments.

I want to emphasize to the committee the fact that in dealing with this whole matter we, as the dominion government, have sought to cooperate with the provincial governments with respect to the administration of relief. Obviously there must come a finality to conferences; obviously there must come a time when the dominion government feels fully justified in saying that there has been enough of conferences; that in order to protect its position it is necessary that this or that action shall be taken. But I want to make it perfectly clear that in all that we have sought to do in these last two years, we have endeavoured to secure the cooperation of the provincial governments. We felt also that although it was true that we were merely granting financial assistance to the provinces to deal with the problem of unemployment and distress, the provinces might reasonably expect that we should give something more than grants and make an effort with them to find constructive measures to reduce the problem and to apply measures of effective amelioration.

I come now to the recommendations of the national employment commission which appear in the interim and final reports. Members of the committee who have read the final report will remember that a brief and concise summary of the recommendations contained in the interim report was given on the opening pages. I have touched already upon the main recommendations in the interim report. I have not, however, dealt with one of those recommendations, a recommendation which is given further emphasis in the final report. This refers to low rental housing, and I shall speak upon this matter a little later and in another connection. So far as the three measures that I have mentioned are concerned, I would stress that they have been applied to all the features of the larger problem; that they have been successful in their operation and that they are now being continued.

May I turn now to the recommendations contained in the final report. On page 10 of the final report, following references to these other measures which I have just discussed, the commission directs special attention to the importance of the tourist trade and the possibilities of expansion in that important industry. This question has been referred to at different times in this chamber. According to an estimate by the bureau of statistics, during the past year the tourist industry brought about expenditures amounting to some $300,000,000. One great advantage of the tourist industry is that it is not one requiring that kind of protection or assistance which tends possibly to place one section of this country against another. No tariff protection is needed to stimulate the tourist industry. Moreover, this industry will confer its benefits upon every section of the dominion, and within those sections benefits are extended to almost every kind of business and occupation. I think the committee will agree generally that in stressing the importance of the tourist industry and the possibilities of expansion, the national employment commission has touched upon a matter of great importance and upon a development with great possibilities.

Mr. BENNETT: There is nothing new in that.

Mr. ROGERS: I agree that there is nothing new in directing attention to the value of the tourist industry. On the other hand, it has a distinct value that we should recognize in its relation to the unemployment situation. In other words, it is an industry capable of encouragement and stimulus in a manner which, as I have just suggested, does not set one part of the country against another.

Mr. EDWARDS: How does the minister determine the value of the tourist business? What is the yardstick?

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be glad to get that information for my hon. friend. The value of this industry has been determined by the bureau of statistics over a number of years. My own feeling has always been that it could not be regarded as more than an estimate. Of course, there is a record of the number of motor cars that cross the boundary at the various points of entry. Estimates are also made of the expenditures of visitors while in the country.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a partial record of what they take out.

Mr. ROGERS: It is no more than an estimate, but that does not detract from the value and importance of the industry.

Mr. EDWARDS: It is a valuable industry.

Mr. ROGERS: In connection with the development of the tourist industry, the national employment commission makes a number of specific recommendations. It suggests what matters should be explored and stresses the importance of close cooperation in this regard between the dominion and provincial governments. The report reads:

> The commission submits that the following matters should be explored and advised upon:
> National tourist highways,
> Retail articles attractive to tourists on which import duties should be adjusted to reduce the sale price,
> Historic forts and sites, their restoration and marking.

They refer also to handicrafts, sports and competitive sports projects and so on. So far as the suggestions with respect to the tourist trade are concerned, they have been receiving the attention of the government for some time. In their relation to unemployment, they will certainly receive further attention.

During the past two years the government has been working along the line of a broad coordinated program of national development and conservation. I shall have occasion before I have finished to indicate certain lines upon which definite progress has been made within this program. Different features of it have been undertaken by a number of departments of the federal government, either with or without the joint participation of the provinces. It will be remembered by those who have read the report of the national employment commission that in its reference to public works projects there is a distinct recommendation that as far as possible each government, dominion, provincial and municipal, should deal with its own projects within its own jurisdiction, and that these should be financed and administered independently. With the displacement of joint public works, as recommended by the national employment commission, this program of what I have termed national development and conservation will be furthered by projects which will be controlled and administered within the federal jurisdiction. Within it we propose to give special attention to the proposals of the national employment commission for the encouragement and development of the tourist industry, and this policy has been in its earlier stages, and will be in its later stages, recognized as an act of faith on the part of this government in the future possibilities of a united Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the minister any details of what the plans are for the tourist business?

Mr. ROGERS: Before I finish I shall give certain details in connection with what has been done. As the leader of the opposition is aware, specific projects are dealt with normally, have been for some years at any rate, through supplementary estimates for that purpose.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the minister in mind cooperation with the Ontario government in its proposed flood control plan?

Mr. ROGERS: I do not think I should be or can be inveigled into a commitment of that kind at the present time. I am sure if I answered my hon. friend in the affirmative, there would be no lack of other members who would suggest suitable measures of cooperation in their own constituencies. In the nature of things we have had in recent years to deal with a vast variety of projects put forward because of their remote relation to unemployment or relief; but my own feeling has been, from the experience I have had during the last two and a half years, that we should concentrate, not on works projects as such merely for the purpose of providing employment, but rather on such projects as will develop this country, conserve its resources and make possible an increasing income, and, I trust, a permanent absorption of a larger number of our people into independent occupations. That has been our policy so far as we could bring it about through the programs which have been undertaken in the past two years. That is the policy we propose to maintain and to extend, and as I said a moment ago I believe it is a policy which will also play its part in counteracting some disintegrating forces which exist in this dominion at the present time. Within federal jurisdiction, under federal control, there are means of developing this country which will not merely contribute to the temporary alleviation of unemployment, though I do not disregard the importance of that, but above all else make it possible for Canada to increase its national income.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the minister anything particular in mind in that regard?

Mr. ROGERS: I think I shall be able to satisfy my hon. friend. As I have said, there are certain features of this program which are already in operation, and I shall refer to them before I conclude my remarks. There are other features of it which, as I have indicated, may have a special relation to the tourist industry, and which will be announced in due course.

Mr. LAWSON: May I take it that the features to which the minister proposes to refer before he finishes, are those in respect to which the policy of the government for the past two years has been the development of natural resources?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes; that and also the means we have followed in stimulating certain of the basic industries of this country in order that they may absorb a larger number of our unemployed. That is substantially what I have in mind.

I come next to the recommendations of the national employment commission with regard to what is termed rehabilitation, or plans for improving employability. In this connection I should like to refer back to another recommendation of the commission which was adopted by the government, and as a result of which there has been in operation during the past year a program of youth training through which, I am justified in saying, a new hope has been given to and a stronger morale built up in thousands of unemployed young people from one end of the dominion to the other.

The national employment commission received a report from the youth employment committee, and it passed on to this government a recommendation, based on the report of the youth employment committee, that the government should initiate training projects for unemployed young people. It will be remembered that last year we placed in the estimates an item of $1,000,000 for that purpose. There were some in this house who suggested that that amount was too small; there were others who suggested that it was too large. I think it may be said that the amount, although it might have been doubled with advantage, was perhaps what it ought to have been having regard to the experimental nature of this work. We lost no time as a government in following the recommendation of the national employment commission in that regard, although I acknowledge freely, as stated in the report of the commission, that so far as the expenditure was concerned, we did not go as far as the commission thought we might have done. Letters were sent to all the provinces in May last, following the prorogation of parliament, asking the provinces to submit to the dominion government projects for training unemployed young people, projects which would have a value in the restoration of physical health and morale, projects which would have what might be termed a recreational value for those who had been unemployed in our larger cities. In other words, we set out in our proposals to the provinces the framework within which these various projects should be made to us, and when those projects were received we dealt with them and adopted them if they fell within the categories laid down by the national employment commission. I am happy to say that every province accepted eventually the proposals with regard to training projects for unemployed young people, and from Prince Edward Island right through to British Columbia these projects have been in operation during recent months.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the minister a question in that regard?

Mr. ROGERS: Certainly.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have in mind that perhaps twenty-five to thirty thousand skilled men—toolmakers, machinists and so forth—have returned to the old country to work in the munitions plants there. What method has the government been following or what has been recommended to train youths between eighteen and twenty-five along these lines? I do not know of any—and I am thoroughly acquainted with many machine shops—who are being trained in these vocations. If we should need them to fill these positions we shall not have them.

Mr. ROGERS: The observation of the hon. member—which perhaps is rather an observation than a question—is quite properly made. There is no doubt that there has been an exodus of trained mechanics to Great Britain; but is my hon. friend also aware that in past years we have in the main drawn our trained mechanics from Great Britain?

Mr. EDWARDS: The technical schools of Ontario are supplying them.

Mr. ROGERS: They are training them to some extent; but I believe the hon. member for Waterloo South will find, if he consults with officials of trades unions and heads of industries, that many of our finest mechanics were drawn from Great Britain. In the last two or three years, in particular, with the great expansion of certain trades, especially the iron and steel industries, in the metal trades, in Great Britain, they have been drawn back to that country.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister does not intimate that any skilled mechanics of that kind are being drawn from Great Britain to Canada?

Mr. ROGERS: Oh, no, not at the present time. The movement is rather the other way. But apprenticeship, as the commission report indicates, falls in the first instance upon industry. That is to say that industry in this country, if it feels it has a lack, either now or in prospect, of trained mechanics, is in its own interest surely under an obligation to take some measures to train boys who will take the place of those mechanics who, as my hon. friend has said, have gone back to England and of those who are advancing in age and will soon retire. Some of our industries have recognized that problem.

Mr. STEVENS: How many young men or young women, as the case may be, have been or are being trained under these agreements with the provinces which the minister has cited?

Mr. ROGERS: I have all this information here and I shall be glad to place it before the committee.

Mr. COLDWELL: What steps are being taken to follow that work up? This training is good. What follow-up is there? If it is not followed up, it is lost.

Mr. ROGERS: First, as to the question put by the hon. member for Kootenay East, these questions are questions which naturally call for an answer, and an answer will be given. I have the information as to the total number who are receiving training, and I propose to give it to the committee. Certainly I have no desire to withhold it.

Mr. STEVENS: Why the secrecy now?

Mr. ROGERS: The matter of time is surely not so important. I should like to continue along the line that I had intended to follow. But as to the general question which has been put, as I have said, the first obligation for training mechanics lies upon industry. In the second degree that obligation has always rested upon the provinces, which, as this committee is aware, now control the relations between employer and employee, wages and hours and industrial conditions generally. For that reason I want to say frankly to the committee that we as a government did not feel it was desirable, at this stage at any rate, that we should by dominion legislation seek to invade the field of apprenticeship. There have been cases before—and they have been brought to the attention of the house—where the dominion government has by a grant in aid induced provinces—at least they have occasionally told us afterwards that they were induced—more or less, the assumption has been, against their will, into new directions of expenditure. I need only mention agricultural instruction and technical education. Once we have gone into those fields the tendency has always been to make what was designed as a temporary expenditure into a permanent expenditure, and in this way to bring about as it were a transfer of provincial obligations to the dominion by a back-door route, and that has not been a satisfactory method of dealing with the situation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the same objection not apply to these recreational projects which the dominion is now undertaking?

Mr. ROGERS: No, because we have proceeded by way of agreement with the provinces. There has been no dominion legislation dealing with the subject of apprenticeship, which, as I have said, does lie and always has lain within provincial jurisdiction.

So far as these youth training projects are concerned, we have dealt with them by agreements with the provinces. But I would say that, within the categories laid down by the national employment commission, we have sought to get the cooperation of the provinces, particularly the industrial provinces, by bringing about what are termed learnership courses; the learnership courses, while they do not constitute apprenticeship in the ordinary sense of that term, do actually train young men for absorption in private industry; and by our continuing these courses over a period of two years or three years, as the case may be, we are enabled to provide in some measure for this lack of trained young men in some of our larger industries. That is particularly true in Ontario, where more progress has been made in that direction than in some of the other provinces in which, after all, there is not the same diversification of industry or the same opportunity for these learnership courses.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But surely if it is possible to do that in what are termed learnership courses, it would be possible to do it in the case of apprenticeship.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall not quarrel with my hon. friend over the use of terms. But I shall say this, that, particularly at the present time, I do not think it is advisable that the dominion parliament should assume what might be regarded as legislative jurisdiction over apprenticeship. That is the point I have in mind. We can assist the provinces by agreement as we are doing in connection with training projects.

Mr. EDWARDS: Very wise.

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend agrees with that?

Mr. EDWARDS: I do.

Mr. ROGERS: I believe that anyone who has followed the actual results under these grants in aid, which usually have been given under pressure of immediate circumstances without any clear vision of what they may involve in time to come, will agree that that policy is not one which ought to be continued or extended at the present time. Fortunately we have now reached a position where we shall have a review, and I hope a thorough review, of these interrelations between dominion and province under these indirect arrangements through which the dominion has given financial assistance to the provinces to enable provinces to do what they are obliged to do under the constitution but which, in many instances, they are unwilling to concede to any other legislative authority.

Mr. BENNETT: Sometimes they concede it, but say they are unable to do it.

Mr. ROGERS: Sometimes that has been the case; and I think the leader of the opposition will also agree that we are suffering at the present time from the fact that we as a dominion government have been led under stress of circumstances—to meet emergencies, if you will—into making grants to provinces to enable them to maintain administration with respect to great social services, such as old age pensions, to which this dominion government contributes three-fourths of the cost. I do not believe any member of this house can consider that a sound method of conducting federal relations, and it is one which I hope will be rectified. I do not wish to extend that point at this time, having had occasion to deal with it some time ago. If I speak of it now it is because at the Department of Labour more than any other department one is conscious at all times of working in a field of indefinite jurisdiction where responsibilities are not precise and where, for this reason, there is always the possibility of misunderstanding, friction and recrimination. My right hon. friend referred a moment ago to the fact that there had been certain disintegrating influences in this country in the past few years. I am sure that part of that has been due to this very practice of dealing with some of these problems that touch human need upon the basis of dual and therefore indefinite responsibility as among various governmental agencies. It is not a problem that we can settle here at this time; but it is one of which I believe the country as a whole ought to be aware, and certainly we should not continue farther along a way which has been tried and found wanting in the respects that I have mentioned.

I have every desire that stimulus should be given to apprenticeship. There are certain things that can be and are being done by the Department of Labour here to encourage apprenticeship; but my point has been that it would not be desirable for this dominion parliament to assume anything in the nature of jurisdiction with regard to apprenticeship, practically all industrial matters being at the present time under provincial jurisdiction.

The hon. member for Kootenay East asked me if I would be more precise in connection with the projects which have been established under the youth training plan. In the first place it would be useful to give the various schemes that were proposed:

(a) training projects of an occupational nature devised to increase the employability of young unemployed persons pending employment;

[Mr. Rogers.]

(b) short term learnership courses, not exceeding one year in duration, devised to provide theoretical training concurrent with specific employment;

(c) work projects for young unemployed, incorporating reconditioning, training and conservation features undertaken for the purpose of restoring loss of morale among the young unemployed and conserving natural resources.

In connection with forestry work, for instance, the camps that have been established in a number of provinces would be in accord with that classification.

(d) training projects of a physical nature for young unemployed, to assist in the maintenance of health and morale pending employment.

I have before me in some detail the summary of the training which has been given, and later on I shall be glad to give the results in each of the provinces. The summary goes up to the latest date. I would point out in that connection that a number of provinces in the very nature of things took some time to develop the projects they felt best suited to their needs. It so happens that Ontario and Quebec, the largest industrial provinces, did not actually get into full operation under this plan until October of last year.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that to the first of March?

Mr. ROGERS: It is to the end of January, the latest date for which we have reports. Training was given to 16,072 men and 12,850 women, a total of 28,922.

An hon. MEMBER: Will the minister give the figures under each classification?

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be glad to do that with respect to the different provinces, but at the moment I have the figures arranged in a certain way. I shall give the summary now. I come next to those placed in employment, and that touches a point raised by an hon. member a few moments ago. It was felt by those dealing with this particular problem that the vital need was vocational direction. There is no doubt in the world that the impact of the depression upon the younger men who have come of age in the last few years and have not found work has been unsettling, and the tendency has been to create a kind of hopelessness which requires some sort of continuing direction. I am not going to say that I am satisfied as yet that we have developed a satisfactory system of placement; but we have had it very much in our minds, and we propose to appoint special placement officers in connection with these groups in all provinces and attach them to the employment offices. We have already made some progress in that direction, but so far as placements are concerned, in this limited time, the figures are these: men, 1,371; women, 731. The number of days' work given in forestry and mining, men, was 151,357. Next we come to the rural courses. There were: men, 5,998, and women, 3,427. In forestry there were: men, 2,416; mining, men, 519; physical training, men, 1,671; women, 4,302. The number of those taken off relief were: men, 2,565, and women, 1,173.

That is merely a summary of what might be termed the beginning of a sound enterprise which fully justifies its continuance. I know, from my own contact with some of those who received this training in various provinces, that to them it has meant something more than the reduction of one or two or three from the relief rolls. It has meant the possibility of receiving training for some definite occupation and has meant a restoration of morale and a new direction towards independence.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I ought first to the ask the indulgence of the committee as I continue the statement begun this afternoon. On the other hand, it will be remembered that the committee requested a comprehensive statement with respect to unemployment conditions. Certainly the problem itself justifies such a statement, and it has been my endeavour to place before the committee in as much detail as is possible at this time the situation existing at present with respect to unemployment and the results obtained under the various measures adopted by the government to deal with it. I propose, however, to move as rapidly as possible toward the conclusion of my remarks.

At six o'clock I was dealing with the youth training agreements. No doubt at a later stage in the discussion there will be ample opportunity to deal with the projects adopted in the various provinces for the training of unemployed young people. I pointed out this afternoon that all provinces had cooperated in the formulation of these training plans. At the same time we have assurances from all provinces that in view of the results obtained during the past year they are prepared to continue these projects to a greater or lesser degree during the coming year. May I say also that the initiation of these training projects for unemployed young people marks the first action taken by any government in this country in relation to this special aspect of the unemployment problem. In another connection the appointment of a women's employment committee—and certain recommendations from that committee have also found expression in youth training projects—marks the first attempt on the part of any government in this country to deal with that special aspect of the unemployment problem.

We believe that the experience gained during the past year in the development of these training projects for unemployed young people will enable us to improve them materially in the next year. I made it quite clear to the committee this afternoon that we have been moving, as it were, in an experimental way. We have asked the provinces to indicate projects which are best adapted to conditions within their boundaries, and we have sought to focus the training projects in such a way that ultimately they will lead to the absorption of those so trained, in industries which are fully established in the provinces where the training is being given. I also indicated to the committee that we attached great importance to the setting up of a proper placement service in connection with these plans, which, I believe, can be done, and we propose in particular to see that vocational guidance, if I may use that term, is related closely to the various training projects which will be established during the coming year.

In addition to the recommendations of the national employment commission with respect to training projects for unemployed young people, there is also a recommendation for training the unemployed in the older age groups. I may say at once that the government is fully seized of the wisdom of extending these plans so far as possible to unemployed men in the older age groups. We realize, as indeed anyone must realize who has followed what has taken place in the last few years, that many men have lost their former occupations, and unless something is done for these men which will assist towards their reabsorption in private industry, the outlook for them is more tragic in some respects than for the unemployed young people. Here again progress towards the improved employability of those who have been out of work during the depression years is dependent upon the active cooperation of the provincial governments. In connection with this question of extending rehabilitation to men in the older age groups, we have been in conference with various provincial governments. I am hopeful that we can make substantial progress in this direction during the coming year. The committee will understand that in dealing with matters involving education and apprenticeship, the dominion government may give a lead; the dominion government may initiate, but it must have the full cooperation of the provinces if these plans are to succeed. The alternative would be the setting up by the dominion government of educational services overlapping those already established in the provinces. Clearly that would not be a desirable way of meeting this situation.

I come next to another recommendation of the national employment commission, first made in the interim report and repeated at some length in the final report. That recommendation emphasizes the desirability of establishing a national employment service, a question which has been before the house on various occasions. It so happened that this recommendation by the commission was one of the first that was transmitted to the Minister of Labour. I felt as the commission indicated, that in dealing with an unemployment problem, of the dimensions to which that problem has grown within recent years, it was of great importance that we should have an efficient employment service which would operate along uniform lines so far as possible, and subject to some general national direction. At the time that recommendation was transmitted to me, the legislation passed by the late administration with regard to unemployment insurance was before the courts. I refer to the Employment and Social Insurance Act, which provided for the setting up of a system of employment offices across the dominion. In the circumstances it was felt by the government that it would be preferable to await the decision of the courts with respect to that legislation before giving consideration to the alternative of the dominion establishing of itself a national employment service. It will be remembered by members of the committee that the Unemployment and Social Insurance Act first went to the Supreme Court of Canada, and was then taken on appeal to the privy council, where it was declared ultra vires of the dominion parliament.

We were then faced, in due course, with what further action might be taken by the government in cooperation with the provinces to vest this parliament with full legislative power to deal with unemployment insurance. It is scarcely necessary to remind the committee that the government met the situation by seeking the cooperation of the provinces to secure the necessary amendments to the British North America Act to make it possible for us to establish a national system of unemployment insurance, carrying with it as a necessary corollary a national employment service. It may be urged that, regardless of the establishment of unemployment insurance, it would have been wise, or would now be wise, to proceed with the setting up of a national employment service, and I should like to say frankly to the committee that from time to time the national employment commission urged that course upon us. On the other hand, I should like to say with equal frankness it was my view that it would not be desirable to deal piecemeal with this question; that it would not be desirable, let us say, for the dominion government to have a national employment service in three or four or five provinces, and provincial employment services in the remaining provinces. I believe that we should at least make every effort to secure an employment service which would operate in all provinces of the dominion, before giving serious consideration to the alternative I have just suggested.

I think we must recognize that, as a matter of fact, under existing constitutional arrangements the provinces have direct control of and interest in industrial conditions. As I said this afternoon, the whole question of the relationship between employer and employee is now within provincial jurisdiction, as is the case also, for instance with wages and hours. No doubt it was due in part to this reason that the setting up of employment offices in this country was left within provincial jurisdiction.

At the present time, as the committee is aware, we have what might be termed a cooperative system with respect to employment offices. In 1918 parliament enacted The Employment Offices Coordination Act. Under that act the sum of $150,000 is set apart each year and is divided among the provinces upon the basis of their expenditures for employment services in relation to the total expenditures in the dominion for that purpose.

Mr. MacNICOL: What do the federal officials in those offices do?

Mr. ROGERS: With the few exceptions which I shall mention in a moment or two, there are no federal officials in the employment offices established across the dominion. The personnel of the employment offices of the various provinces is selected by the provincial governments. The dominion government has, attached to the Department of Labour, what might be termed a coordinating agency which operates as a clearing house for information with respect to employment offices under the control of the various provincial employment services. There was set up, too, in connection with the reestablishment of war veterans a service which consists largely of special attention being paid to the training and absorption in industry of disabled war veterans. There are some officials—I have not the number before me—appointed by the dominion in some of the provinces who deal with that particular aspect of the problem. Generally speaking, however, the personnel of the employment offices, under the existing system, is appointed by and is under the control of the provincial governments.

May I point out to the committee that under that system the dominion government has only a limited control over employment offices. For example, we cannot compel the provinces to establish employment offices in particular localities. We have no effective control over the selection of the officers in the various employment offices who deal with employment conditions. There is no doubt, I believe, that in some provinces the employment service has fallen below the standard one would wish to have in connection with this very important question.

As I have pointed out, the national employment commission made it quite clear that in their view, and in order particularly to deal with the question of rehabilitation, it was desirable that there should be a national employment service. I do not believe we should enter into competition, so to speak, with the provinces; we cannot compel the provinces to withdraw from the service. Some provinces in western Canada have indicated their willingness to withdraw from the present employment service arrangements, and are quite ready to have those services taken over by the dominion government. On the other hand, we have had no such intimation from the great industrial provinces, so that I feel it would be to the disadvantage of the efficiency of that service if we attempted to set up what might be described as a dual system.

We trust that in due course the various provinces may see the wisdom, in relation to the great problem of economic insecurity, of giving their full cooperation toward setting up a national system of unemployment insurance. If that is done, there is no real problem with respect to the establishment of a national employment service, because the very connection which would be established between unemployment insurance and industry would ensure a situation whereby a system of employment bureaus attached to an unemployment insurance scheme would soon prove its usefulness in competition with any provincial service, if, indeed, under those conditions the provinces desired to continue the existing services.

I turn next to the recommendation of the national employment commission with reference to rehabilitation through land settlement. I shall touch upon this matter only briefly to-night. Here, too, the recommendation is one which does not lay exclusive obligations upon the dominion government. The proposal is rather that in connection with the general problem of rehabilitation of those who are now unemployed and on relief, there should be an effective and continuing cooperation between the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities in the rehabilitation of suitable families on the land.

We have had some experience in this matter. As a matter of fact, we have had relief settlement agreements with a number of the provinces, which agreements have been in operation for several years. In the first instance those agreements were established by the late administration, and under them some thousands of families have been established on the land. It must be remembered by hon. members of the committee that last year the house was sharply divided as to the wisdom of that policy. I would go so far as to say that the success of any policy of the kind depends essentially upon selecting the right people for the right land. Undoubtedly—and I shall not deal with the reasons now—in the relief settlement plans, as they have operated in recent years, there have sometimes been unfortunate selections of people and unfortunate selections of land. Obviously this whole question is one which must receive the further consideration of the government in conference with the provinces. It may well be that based on the experience of the past it will be possible to develop a more effective scheme of rehabilitation than has existed in other years. It is a direction in which we should move carefully and surely because, in connection with soldier land settlement and other arrangements of this kind, this country has had a rather unfortunate experience.

I come next to the recommendation of the commission which incorporates certain proposals made by the women's employment committee. I quote from pages 17 and 18 of the report:

> The committee at an early date also drew the attention of the commission to the inadequacy of the existing employment service of Canada to meet the trying demands placed upon it in respect to unemployed women. They endorsed the recommendations of the national employment commission for a unified and extended service. In their final report the vital part which such an improved service would play in solving the employment problem of women, and the impossibility of successful attainment without it, are strongly emphasized.

And again:

Finally, the women's employment committee is of the opinion that the dominion government can render a genuine service to all gainfully occupied women, particularly in industry and trade, by establishing in the dominion Department of Labour a women's bureau to undertake research in connection with the employment of women, and to provide the machinery for educating the public to the point that working conditions and wages are improved, all to the end that employment conditions for women may become more attractive.

May I say in that connection that if and when it is possible to establish a national employment service, it is obvious that a proposal such as this is one which could best be expressed within the framework of such a service. Apart from that, however, we have in the Department of Labour at the present time certain research clerks, two of whom are highly qualified women who are, I believe, in a position to do useful work along the lines indicated in the report. They are being instructed to give their attention to this problem as outlined in the report of the national employment commission.

I come now to the recommendation of the commission with respect to low rental housing. I referred to it this afternoon and said that I would return to it before I had finished. The national employment commission made proposals to the government last year with respect to low cost housing. These proposals were later given the form of a draft bill which reached the government at a time when it was not feasible to give it the necessary consideration before the prorogation of that short session of parliament. This proposal is contained in an appendix to the report. I may say that the proposal is now before the Department of Finance and is being considered in connection with other plans for the stimulus of housing which are now in operation under existing legislation.

It may be known to members of the committee that during the past year there has been a marked increase in building carried on under the Dominion Housing Act. For a time there was good ground for apprehension that the results would be cause for disappointment, but within the past year there has been a marked improvement in the building carried on under this legislation. This has been due in part to the original provisions of the act and in part to certain regulations which were introduced a year ago and which made the act available to a larger number of people.

I turn next to the recommendations of the commission with respect to unemployment aid. In dealing with this section of the report I should like to emphasize that here we have what might be termed a contingent suggestion or expression of opinion upon the part of the national employment commission. That is, the commission, in fulfilling its advisory function and in recognizing an obligation to deal with the problem of unemployment, not merely as it exists immediately but as it might develop within a few years, took the ground that it would be well to consider what action might wisely be taken in connection with unemployment assistance, if and when it was found possible to introduce unemployment insurance on a national basis.

In its introduction to its discussion of this problem the commission emphasizes most of all what it terms a functional division of responsibility in connection with unemployment distress. I have no doubt that members of the committee have read this section of the report and I shall not enter into it in detail at the present time. In commenting upon this section of the report I should like to say that the government agrees in principle with the views expressed by the commission, that a functional division of responsibility for social services is preferable to a system of dual responsibility where the dominion government supports social services within provincial jurisdiction by the payment of grants in aid. This opinion has been expressed on various occasions by members of this government and, if I mistake not, by members on the other side. We believe it is a sound policy that financial and administrative responsibility should be united in the same authority and that the government which controls the spending of money for social services should be responsible for raising such money by taxation. We agree also that the method of supporting unemployment relief by grants in aid from the dominion treasury, with the administrative control remaining with the province and the municipality, is a method which tends to be wasteful and inefficient. This system, however, as the commission has recognized and as it has been recognized on both sides of the house, has been developed within the established principles of our federal constitution.

Until the constitution is altered the dominion government is under obligation to observe the existing distribution of powers and responsibilities in relation to social services. While the national employment commission recognizes that the system under which the dominion government assists the provinces by grants in aid for unemployment relief is one that should properly be followed within the constitutional structure, the majority report of the commission directs attention to the fact that the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations is now conducting an investigation with a view to the reconsideration and readjustment of the obligations and taxing powers now assigned to the dominion parliament and the provincial legislatures. The report observes also that the dominion government has sought the cooperation of the province in order to bring about a nationally administered system of unemployment insurance. The report proceeds in the following terms:

> This commission also recognizes that the establishment of a national system of unemployment insurance would necessitate a supplementary system of unemployment aid to meet those phases of unemployment need which experience abroad has shown cannot be covered by unemployment insurance. Such a supplementary system of unemployment aid would, in its opinion and for reasons stated later, be best administered by the dominion. This further step would necessitate determination by the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations of the financial basis on which such a system should be established, and in the light of relevant considerations, of the wisdom of further constitutional and financial changes. The national employment commission does not consider it to be within its competence to express an opinion on these changes, other than to record its considered judgment that if financial and constitutional considerations should permit, the coordination of a nationally administered system of unemployment insurance and employment offices, buttressed by a similarly administered system of unemployment aid, would have decisive advantages over the present system in coping with problems of employment and unemployment.

In summing up its views under this head, the majority report contains the following observations:

> In stating thus its opinion the commission is not judging the financial abilities of the various governments nor the sources from which the funds should be derived; nor has it given consideration to any compensating readjustments which might be considered a necessary part of such a system; all these things it considers to be beyond its purview.
> It is, however, recommending that the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations give consideration to the views here expressed, as well as to the many other relevant factors which fall outside the national employment commission's terms of reference.

The objections to the ultimate assumption of dominion responsibility for unemployment aid are set out in the dissenting report of Mrs. Sutherland. She expresses the view that "in spite of errors in the practices surrounding the giving of dominion financial assistance through grants in aid, the primary responsibility of the government closest to the applicant is fundamental." She states further:

> Although a change to a centralized system where the dominion assumes administrative responsibility may have some advantages in the mechanics of its application, any new system designed to finance and administer so uneconomic a national burden as distress resulting from loss of income because of no work, is liable also to many abuses.

In general the dissenting report stresses the importance of social assistance being administered by municipal officials with knowledge of local conditions, and with the restraint of municipal taxation operating as a deterrent to waste and laxity of administration. This view is still strongly held by some provinces of the dominion where direct relief has been eliminated or reduced to small proportions.

The dominion government has already indicated its willingness in cooperation with the provinces to secure a constitutional amendment which will permit it to introduce a national system of unemployment insurance. A national system of unemployment insurance will require for its effective administration a national organization of employment offices. In its majority report the commission has recognized that the establishment of a nationally administered system of unemployment aid must depend upon two conditions: First, the adoption of a national system of unemployment insurance; second, a revision of existing obligations and financial powers under the federal constitution. Since the subject of unemployment aid is bound up with the larger questions of redistribution of responsibility for social services and reallocation of revenue sources which are now before the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations, the government has decided to reserve judgment on this section of the report until that commission has completed its investigation and has submitted its findings. We feel that this is the only position we can properly take in the circumstances. Any other course at this time would involve either an arbitrary curtailment of the terms of reference already issued to the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations or a process in bargaining with the provinces on one particular feature of constitutional readjustment in advance of the more comprehensive settlement which it is hoped will emerge from the present investigation of dominion-provincial relations.

In this connection it may be stated that certain provinces have suggested that they would be willing to assume the entire cost of unemployment relief if the dominion government would consent to the reallocation of revenues now collected within the provinces under federal legislation. It is clear that any formal discussion of such a proposal would be equally impossible in advance of the findings of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations.

Mr. MacNICOL: Before the minister leaves that question, may I ask if the department has considered the United States system of unemployment insurance. They had similar constitutional difficulties to ours in Canada, but they overcame them by a different system of application. Has the United States system been considered by the government here?

Mr. ROGERS: The Department of Labour, in giving its attention to unemployment insurance, has given serious thought to the systems which have prevailed in other countries, and I assume also that the late administration gave the same serious study to the alternative methods of a national system of insurance and systems such as now prevail in the United States. I do not wish to comment adversely upon the arrangements which now exist in the United States; but at the same time I understand that the establishment of separate schemes in different states has led already to serious complications, particularly in adjoining states where there are large working populations, for instance, in the state of New Jersey, where many working people reside and yet go to work in the state of New York. I simply mention that in passing. I can, however, assure my hon. friend that we have gone very carefully into the systems of unemployment insurance which prevail in other countries.

In connection with its recommendations as to administrative machinery, the national employment commission suggests the desirability of setting up in the Department of Labour a small administrative committee which would assist in carrying out the recommendations of the commission. There is also the suggestion that this committee should act in close cooperation with a subcommittee of the cabinet which also would give special consideration to unemployment problems. A subcommittee of the cabinet already exists for the purpose indicated.

We have in the Department of Labour a number of officers each of whom is concerned with particular branches of the work of the department in relation to unemployment. It is my own thought at the present time that in carrying out this suggestion, instead of setting up a detached advisory committee, which would have had no intimate connection with the problems of administration, it would be desirable that the committee should be composed of these several officers of the department who have a day-to-day acquaintance with special aspects of the problem of unemployment. Certainly in our future action in this regard we shall do our utmost to see that there is a continuous and careful coordination of the work of the Department of Labour with that of other departments concerned with various aspects of relief and unemployment questions.

This report, and the main recommendations which I have discussed this afternoon and this evening, represent a genuine and useful effort upon the part of the members of the commission and the two advisory committees to give the government and the country some definite direction for the future in connection with this continuing question of economic insecurity. I say that regardless of whether or not I as Minister of Labour am in complete agreement with all the recommendations of the commission. It will be understood by this committee that this commission, and, indeed, royal commissions in general, are called upon to deal with problems under definite terms of reference. That is inevitable and unavoidable. But it has been found by the late administration and, indeed, by all administrations in this country, that a commission charged to deal with a particular problem under definite terms of reference will sometimes, and quite justly from its point of view, make recommendations which from the standpoint of the government it is necessary to reconcile with broader considerations of policy. That undoubtedly is the explanation of the failure on the part of governments—all governments—to accept and implement all recommendations which appear in reports of royal commissions. This government, let me say, feels that in connection with the problem of unemployment it has received able assistance from the national employment commission and the committees on youth employment and women's employment. I have indicated this afternoon some of the distinct and practical advantages which already have flowed from the acceptance by this government of recommendations of that commission, and these advantages will continue to operate during future years.

I shall have reason a little later to indicate to the committee that during the period the national employment commission has been in operation there has been a marked improvement in employment conditions. I am not suggesting that this improvement in conditions has been due wholly or even in large measure to the recommendations made by the commission which have been adopted by the government. I merely say at this time that the commission gave very careful thought to the problem committed to it, and that it made to the government various recommendations, some of which have been accepted, for the reasons I have given, some of which have been rejected and some others of which have been held in suspense, also for reasons that I have given. But of this I am very sure, looking back over these last two years, that the establishment of the national employment commission was a wise measure, and I can testify to the fact that during a very difficult period I as Minister of Labour received most valuable assistance from the chairman and members of that commission.

I wish to turn now to what might be described as another aspect of the unemployment problem. Thus far I have been discussing measures directed toward the relief situation or special measures proposed by the national employment commission to provide additional employment. But this government has never attempted to deceive the house or the country with the suggestion that the true cure of unemployment lay in any project which could be developed by an advisory body or which would assume the form of large public expenditures. This government from the very beginning has taken the view that in the long run, and looking toward any permanent solution of economic insecurity, if we can think in terms of permanence in that regard, the true path along which we should go is that of expanding trade and expanding industrial activity. And when as Minister of Labour I deal with the unemployment question, I feel that I would not be doing justice to the problem if I did not refer to the measures taken by this government to deal with the expansion of trade and the promotion of industrial activity. It may be recalled that the opinion was expressed in the house not long ago that it was impossible to revive foreign trade. There are those who said in explicit terms that foreign markets were dead, although I doubt very much if those who made that statement realized the full implications of it for the Canadian people—

Mr. BENNETT: Who said it?

Mr. ROGERS:—because, if foreign markets—

Mr. BENNETT: Who said it?

Mr. ROGERS: If I mistake not, the statement was made on one occasion by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that foreign markets were dead.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I cannot recall any such statement.

An hon. MEMBER: We can.

Mr. ROGERS: Although I acquit the leader of the opposition of making that statement in explicit terms,—

Mr. BENNETT: He certainly did not.

Mr. ROGERS: —I am at least bound to say that some of his policies indicated that so far as he was concerned he put his faith in economic nationalism and in the building up in this country of what might be termed a self-contained industrial structure. But this government has never adopted a defeatist attitude in matters of trade. We realized that great changes had come over the world in recent years, and that the result of the depression had been, so to speak, to cause nations to withdraw within themselves to find some delusive security behind the ramparts of high tariff walls. But we did not believe in that policy; we did not believe that such a trend was inevitable or permanent, and soon after we came into office we gave an earnest of our refusal to accept that theory. We obtained a reciprocity agreement with the United States under which a remarkable stimulus has been given to the great primary industries of this dominion. I shall give shortly some of the results which have been obtained under that reciprocity agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister would not call it reciprocity, would he?

Mr. ROGERS: I would call it reciprocity.

Mr. BENNETT: He is the only one who would.

Mr. ROGERS: I would also go further, perhaps, and remind the leader of the opposition of some of his predictions with respect to what would happen when that reciprocity agreement came into effect.

Mr. BENNETT: They are coming true now.

Mr. MacNICOL: Conditions are getting worse every day.

Mr. STEWART: We have only to wait a little while.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): His estimate of fifty millions instead of six under the item dealing with the $100 exemption for tourists.

Mr. ROGERS: The purpose of that reciprocity agreement was to obtain in the great country to the south of us assured markets for the primary producers of Canada. The leader of the opposition made a statement from which he would have us believe that the present agreement could have been obtained by him in its present form.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. ROGERS: Yet on another occasion he also made it clear that he had not concluded an agreement such as the present one because he feared that by doing so some injury might have been done to the manufacting industries of this country.

Mr. BENNETT: He never said that.

Mr. ROGERS: He was not willing to go the last mile in that respect.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not say that, so far as I can recall. What he said is on the record, without being paraphrased by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. ROGERS: Well, I have no desire to paraphrase the statements of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Which recommendation is the minister discussing now?

Mr. ROGERS: I am dealing with the unemployment question, and I propose to refer to what has been accomplished by this government and under this government with respect to the expansion of trade and the increase of employment which has come through the expansion of trade.

Mr. MacNICOL: That will keep us here till next August!

An hon. MEMBER: Yes. We do the job.

Mr. ROGERS: Notwithstanding the decline in cereal exports due to the poor harvest of last year, Canada has maintained her position among the countries of the world as the fourth largest exporter during 1937. I am now going to place upon Hansard some of the effects of the trade policies of this administration so that it may be clear to one who reads, that in those policies there has been an expansion of trade, and, on the basis of that expansion in trade, a resultant increase of industrial activity in this dominion.

Mr. MacNICOL: A contraction of employment in Canada.

Mr. ROGERS: Total trade: exports, calendar year, 1935, $825,284,114; calendar year 1937, $1,110,192,151. I should like to point out particularly the increase in the exports to the United States. In the calendar year 1935 the exports were $358,569,736. They increased in 1937 to $470,181,046. I could go right down through the list of countries with which this government has arranged trade treaties and point to a marked and continuing improvement in exports from Canada to those countries. It may be and indeed it has been said on occasion that the trade with the United States would have occurred whether or not there had been a reciprocity agreement. That suggestion has been controverted time and time again in this house, but I think it may be useful at this time to indicate exactly the manner in which our trade with the United States has increased.

I deal with domestic exports from Canada to the United States for the twelve months ending December 31, 1935, 1936 and 1937, and I shall take, first, items subject to reduction in rate of duty:

1937	64,582,861

In other words, there has been a steady expansion, an increase of 80 per cent in 1937 as compared with 1935. The next is items bound by a low rate:

1935	$3,482,351
1937	2,744,964

Next I take items bound to free entry:

1935	$129,813,279
1936	152,775,607
1937	189,350,813

Mr. BENNETT: The minister is of course aware of the fact that the president could not make any item that was on the free list dutiable. Therefore, so far as free entries are concerned, they must have continued.

Mr. DUNNING: Congress could have changed it.

Mr. ROGERS: The Minister of Finance has given the answer to the question. Congress could have changed it. At all events, what I am giving the leader of the opposition and the committee is the actual effect on trade between the United States and Canada flowing from the reciprocity agreement concluded by this administration.

Mr. HEAPS: May I ask a question?

Mr. ROGERS: May I be allowed to continue? I shall be under questioning before the committee, I know, and I am fully prepared for it.

Mr. HEAPS: But we did not expect this part to come in.

Mr. ROGERS: Perhaps I surprised my hon. friend in that respect. The totals of the figures I have given are:

1935	$169,018,633
1936	216,808,892
1937	256,678,638

I suggest to the committee that these figures carry the implication—

Mr. EDWARDS: Will the minister give the imports of manufactured goods from the United States?

Mr. ROGERS: I do not have them for the same period, but I am sure my hon. friend can secure them from the bureau of statistics. I may be able to get them myself for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. EDWARDS: It is one-way trade.

Mr. ROGERS: As a matter of fact, I would not be disturbed by increasing imports from the United States. I want to see what those imports are, and if my hon. friend will examine them item by item I suggest he will find that the increase in imports was due in very large measure to raw materials, goods that were used by our manufacturers. At any rate I make that prediction, and I say that they will form a substantial item in the imports from the United States. So much for the increase in trade which has taken place as a result of the trade policies pursued by this administration. No one can read these figures without realizing that this increase in trade has meant increased employment. It could not mean anything else.

Mr. MacNICOL: In the United States.

Mr. ROGERS: No; in this country. Not only that, but when we examine the improvement in employment conditions in Canada during the past year and a half we find that it has taken place mainly in those industries which received a new stimulus from the trade agreement with the United States. But the government has not by any means been content to let the matter rest there. We have gone from one country to another expressing our willingness to trade with them and we have entered into agreements that have laid a basis, we believe, for continuing expansion of our export trade. I am not suggesting that this trade will not be subject to fluctuations which may follow changes in international conditions; far from it. But I do say that with respect to its trade policies the government has made and is making a definite and practical contribution to the relief of unemployment in Canada and in the only way in the long run which is likely to mean the absorption of unemployed in independent and useful occupations.

I turn to another direction in which the government has stimulated industrial activity in Canada. I referred this afternoon to what had been done during the past two years under agreements with the provinces looking to the encouragement of the tourist trade. In cooperation with the provinces we have built sections of the trans-Canada highway and have built new and accessible roads to national parks, and now I propose to refer to the stimulus that has been given to the great mining industry by the policies adopted by this administration.

It may be remembered that two years ago it was felt desirable that in order to bring new mines into operation, particularly those mines which were far removed or considerably removed from railway communication, special assistance should be given through the building of roads. That policy was initiated by this government under the direction of the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar). In 1936-37 the dominion made a contribution of $1,272,000 for this purpose and the province contributed $610,000, making a total of something under two million dollars for the improvement and building of mining roads. In 1937-38 the dominion contributed $1,300,000 and the provinces $600,000, again making a contribution of just under two million dollars. The employment created by the expenditure of these sums represents, for 1936-37, man days of work, 353,000, and at least fifty per cent of those working on these projects were taken from relief rolls; and in 1937-38, 332,000 man days, at least fifty per cent being again taken from relief rolls.

It is not possible of course to indicate precisely the effect that these roads have had on increasing mining production. But this at least is true. The roads were carefully selected and built into proved mining areas, and this made it possible for prospectors and mining companies to bring in machinery and, in certain instances, to establish mills which otherwise would not have been set up. In the last three years there has been a remarkable increase in the gold production or mineral production of the country. These are the figures:

1937	456,000,000

That surely represents again a marked contribution to the relief of the unemployment situation. In that connection I should like to make it clear to the committee that the government assisted the mining industry in more ways than through the construction of roads. It may be recalled that in what I think was the first budget of this administration, additional encouragement was given to new mines coming into production. An amendment to the Income War Tax Act provided that all new metalliferous mines coming into production between the first day of May, 1936, and the first day of January, 1940, would be exempt from income tax for a period of three years. Here, too, there can be no question at all that this policy has been of substantial assistance in enabling many small mines to get properly on their feet and go into production. These mines have swelled the total production to which I referred a moment ago.

May I also refer to what has been done, partly for the relief of those in need and partly for the stimulation of a great industry, by another department of the government. I refer to the Department of Fisheries. The fishing population in certain provinces has passed through very difficult times; yet despite conditions of poverty with which many members of this committee must be familiar these fishing families in Quebec and the maritime provinces were most reluctant to go on direct relief. They have, in many instances, a very low standard of living. Anyone who is familiar with the work they carry on cannot but feel that no class of people in this country is more deserving of our consideration than these fishermen. This government took special measures to deal with the needs of our fishing population. Out of the appropriation of the Department of Fisheries for the fiscal year 1936-37, some $200,000 was spent, in cooperation with the provinces concerned, in order to aid in the reestablishment of needy fishermen in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Quebec. From the joint fund provided by the dominion and the respective provinces 6,649 loans to fishermen and 22 loans to fishermen's associations were made in the maritime provinces, while in Quebec some 8,930 fishermen received grants. During the last fiscal year, under another appropriation, the sum of $400,000 was used for the same purposes.

Mr. MacNEIL: Was any of this money expended in behalf of the fishermen in British Columbia?

Mr. ROGERS: I understand that British Columbia did not accept the scheme. Presumably it was not accepted because in the view of the British Columbia government the provisions of assistance as offered did not seem to have the same appeal there. In addition, the Department of Fisheries, through stimulus to marketing, has helped improve the condition of the fishing industry. Under those policies there has been a steady and substantial increase in the value of the exports of fish. I shall give just a few rough figures of the value of exports:

	1935	1936	1937
Fresh and frozen halibut..	$231,000	$418,000	$454,000
Fresh and frozen salmon..	466,000	707,000	548,000
Whale oil.	98,000	127,000	148,000

In these several references to the expansion of trade and of industrial activity in certain directions under the policies of this administration I have indicated a substantial enlargement of opportunity for employment. I now propose to give the committee—and with this I shall conclude—a statement, based upon registration, of the unemployment condition in Canada at the present time. I give first, the figures for January, from the registration branch, the registration which was set up by the national employment commission, but which will be continued now in connection with the Department of Labour.

Mr. BENNETT: Are those figures based on the original computations made by the commission, or is a fresh census taken of the unemployed on each occasion?

Mr. ROGERS: The answer to that is this: The first general registration made by the national employment commission was in September, 1936. The forms, which required a great deal of careful preparation, were then determined upon, and from that time forward the various provinces and municipalities have maintained a continuous correction of the figures from month to month. Each month the registration branch receives these reports from the provinces and municipalities. There is of necessity, as I pointed out some time ago, a time lag in the receipt of the information at Ottawa.

Mr. BENNETT: And it cannot be complete.

Mr. ROGERS: I think it can be as complete as any figures that could be obtained.

Mr. BENNETT: Except census figures.

Mr. ROGERS: Except census figures; but there again the trouble with census figures, as the leader of the opposition is aware, is that because of the magnitude of the task you do not get the figures until much later, and then they do not represent an existing situation. It may be remembered that last year the United States set apart an amount of something like $5,000,000, or possibly more, for a census of the unemployed. The census was taken through the post office, and when it was completed the head of the census, who was a prominent industrialist in the United States, acknowledged that he could not say definitely whether the unemployed numbered 7,500,000 or 10,000,000. There was that much uncertainty. The figures, moreover, were not available until some months later, and it just happened that those were months when there was a marked increase in unemployment in the United States, which was known to everybody. I think the method of registration which we have in operation at the present time is as effective as could be devised under the circumstances. Certainly it enables us, within what I acknowledge is some margin of error, to determine the fluctuations in the actual conditions.

To return to my original statement, in January, 1938, fully employable persons on aid numbered 161,000. In relation to our population that figure is far less than the United States figure, and I believe I am correct in saying that it is proportionately less than the figure of unemployed in Great Britain, despite the great industrial activity now existing in that country.

Mr. HEAPS: Are these the numbers of unemployed receiving relief?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes; I am now dealing with the unemployed on relief.

Mr. HEAPS: That does not give a picture of the unemployment situation.

Mr. ROGERS: It gives a picture of the unemployment situation in so far as it is a relief problem at the present time.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But the figure given by the minister is not comparable with the figure for Great Britain.

Mr. ROGERS: Otherwise what we would have—and I have referred to them from time to time—would be the estimates made by the bureau of statistics. Those estimates are based, in part, upon returns from the trade unions; in part, upon the annual increase in population, and in part, upon the figures which come in with respect to relief. They are estimates and no more.

Mr. HEAPS: The minister just tried to compare the figure he gave with the figures for Great Britain. Those figures cannot be compared.

Mr. ROGERS: I believe my hon. friend is correct in that, and I acknowledge it fully. What I am giving now is the number of the fully employable on relief. The total number of persons on aid, other than agricultural aid, including employable, unemployable and non-worker dependents, or, in other words, including children up to the age of sixteen, and wives, was 604,000, in January, 1938, according to unrevised figures. Farm population on agricultural aid shows a figure of 410,000. That is a significant figure, and one to which I shall refer in a moment. It is a reflection of the vast drought conditions in Saskatchewan. Then, there is a comparision of January, 1938, with January 1937, and December 1937. I should like to place those figures on Hansard, because at this time I think it is of the utmost importance that we should know what the situation is, as reflected by registration figures.

For January, 1938, fully employable persons showed a decrease of thirty-seven per cent from January, 1937. From December, 1937, the number of fully employable persons showed an increase of about seven per cent. All persons on non-agricultural aid in January, 1938, showed a decrease of thirty per cent from January, 1937. From December, 1937, to January, 1938, there was an increase of seven per cent in non-agricultural aid. Agricultural aid in January, 1938, showed an increase of 103 per cent over January, 1937. Of the January, 1938, total on agricultural aid, approximately eighty-nine per cent were located in Saskatchewan. Those are general figures, covering the entire dominion.

It seemed to me there might be some advantage in breaking down those figures of the unemployed on relief in the various geographical and industrial areas of the country. I believe I shall be able to convince the committee of the significance of such a break-down. It lies in the fact that we have conditions operating in British Columbia different from those in the maritime provinces, and conditions in the prairie provinces during the last seven years have been entirely different from those obtaining, let us say, in the great industrial provinces of central Canada.

I have had this statement prepared in order to show the changes which have taken place in these different areas from January, 1936, to January, 1937, and again from January, 1937, to January, 1938. I have divided Canada into four economic zones, namely the maritime provinces, central Canada, the prairie provinces and British Columbia, and I suggest there are sound reasons for so dividing them. The total numbers of all domestic classifications of persons on aid in January, 1938, compared with January 1936, showed reductions in three zones. There was a reduction of thirty-two per cent, or about a third, in British Columbia; 49·7 per cent in the central provinces, and 83·6 per cent in the maritime provinces. Only the prairie provinces showed an increase, and one to the extent of 49·7 per cent.

Material aid—that is, aid exclusive of agricultural aid—showed reductions in all areas, with the exception of the prairie provinces. The dominion reduction was 38·7 per cent. That in British Columbia was 29·7 per cent; in central Canada it was 45·1 per cent, and in the maritime provinces, 78·4 per cent. Agricultural aid showed a net increase for the dominion, from January, 1936, to January, 1938, of twenty-nine per cent. This was wholly accounted for by farm distress in Saskatchewan. The net increase in the prairie provinces over the two years was 83·8 per cent; but the three remaining areas showed reductions in agricultural aid of 44·9 per cent in British Columbia, 88·1 per cent in central Canada and 97·1 per cent in the maritime provinces.

With respect to these different areas, it is quite clear that particularly in the maritime provinces there has been what might be termed a virtual return to normal economic conditions. We have here a reduction, since this government took office, amounting to over eighty per cent of the relief problem, and it may be recalled that in the speech from the throne delivered in Nova Scotia this year, the explicit statement was made that there had been a reduction from 75,000 on relief in Nova Scotia in 1933 to 6,500 at the present time. Surely that is a remarkable improvement.

In New Brunswick direct relief is no longer being given. That province, however, is giving assistance to unemployed in need through what might be termed a works-test program, to which the dominion government has given a contribution.

The problem has been reduced by one-third in British Columbia during the period I have indicated. In the last two years the problem in the central provinces has been almost cut in half. In the prairie provinces, of course, there has been this unfortunate increase in the numbers receiving agricultural aid. And may I say this, while referring to conditions in the prairie provinces, that of course the increase in those receiving relief has been mainly due to the prolonged drought. The problem in the western provinces has never been susceptible to general economic influences, in the sense in which it has in the other provinces. I believe it is important that we recognize that fact.

As I said this afternoon—and it is acknowledged by everyone—there is every reason why we should seek the truth in these matters; but we should be sure it is the truth, and we should not speak of an unemployment problem as one including those suffering from continued drought conditions. We should not feel that we are not making progress with respect to employment simply because there is a continuance of those receiving agricultural relief in the drought areas.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I hope the minister does not intend to convey that there is no unemployment relief in the western provinces.

Mr. ROGERS: No; I am coming to that.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a relief problem, not an employment problem.

Mr. BARBER: Is it not true that large numbers have left the dried out area in the last few years and moved to other parts?

Mr. ROGERS: Quite a number have—some to British Columbia and some to the other provinces. One must hope that with improved conditions, or even with the prospect of improved conditions, there may be a return movement of those people to the farms which have been abandoned.

The point I was trying to convey to the committee was that in the western provinces the problem is one of relief, as the leader of the opposition has said; it is not an unemployment problem. When one comes to the cities of western Canada—and I think I understand to some degree their plight; for I have been in most of them, and from day to day I am brought into active contact with conditions prevailing there—one concludes that the employment in those cities is, to a large degree, a reflection of the persistent drought.

Mr. DUNNING: Absolutely.

Mr. BENNETT: Not wholly.

Mr. ROGERS: There is comparatively little manufacturing in western Canada—again I have the figures here, but I shall not weary the committee by giving them now. I have, however, figures which show that in those western provinces the bulk of unemployment in the cities exists in what might be called service trades, distributing trades or retail trades. Of course, where there is manufacturing, we have unemployment. But my point is that in western Canada we have had conditions—and they existed also during the time of the late administration—where improvement depended upon climatic factors, upon nature, if you like, and—

Mr. DUNNING: Rain.

Mr. ROGERS: —rain, yes, as the Minister of Finance has said. These are conditions which we must meet as a national emergency, and upon the basis of giving subsistence and further aid where they may be wisely given; this government has met this emergency upon that basis. I am not going into that aspect of it because the Minister of Agriculture has dealt with it already in one connection and will do so again. But we have met that situation and we have provided the drought areas of the west with subsistence. We have also given assistance toward the planting of the new crop which, given sufficient rain, is the one thing that will restore normal conditions in these western provinces.

Let me say further that the persistence of these abnormal conditions in western Canada and the withdrawal of ten of thousands—I am putting it conservatively—of our people from the production of income have had a natural reflection upon industrial activity in other parts of the country. When we consider the figures to which I referred a moment ago in the light of the fact that the great wheat producing area of the dominion has been largely out of production for seven years, I think we have reason for confidence and not for pessimism. We must all trust that the west will once more return to production. When that happens, there will be a quick reflection of these conditions upon such unemployment as does exist in western cities and upon employment conditions in central Canada.

It is well that these great industrial provinces should remember that although they are now required to assist the west, in earlier years they were aided in their development by the growth of the western market. It is very easy to forget that in these days, it is very easy for people to say that the east is supporting the west, but the west with its great primary industries has helped the east materially. I know of factories in the maritime provinces—and the same is true throughout Ontario and Quebec—that have been established or expanded upon the basis of that great western market. The east is as much interested in the revival of western Canada as is western Canada itself. Instead of each asking what the other is doing for it, it would be infinitely better for this country to realize that its different sections, no matter what their industrial occupations may be, are bound together by an economic connection, and that what benefits one, in the long run tends to benefit another. Our policies in relation to relief and unemployment must be policies motivated by a desire to preserve and restore national unity. It has been said on all sides of this chamber that this is the great problem confronting us at the present time; I have no desire to add greatly to what has been said on this matter. There is good ground for confidence in the existing situation in Canada, and if we are able to avoid sectional differences and cleavages there is no reason why this country cannot meet every problem with which it may be confronted.

In relation to this unemployment question I confess that sometimes it has seemed to be the labour of Sisyphus. If I may change my figure of speech, there have been times when we seemed to be ever climbing up a climbing wave. At that period I tried to be as frank as I have been to-day in presenting the actual truth of the situation. However, when we survey the record of substantial advancement during the past two years, we should accept it as ground for encouragement for the future. I believe we have made some mistakes and miscalculations, but on the whole I think we can look back upon what has been done in the past two years as a substantial contribution to the alleviation of our unemployment situation.

I do not think for a moment that any Minister of Labour, whoever he might be, could be satisfied with conditions as they exist to-day. He could not be satisfied in the light of the unemployment that still exists. But I believe we have pursued a sound policy and I think we may claim credit for having avoided some unsound policies. Upon the basis of what we have done, upon the basis of what we are still ready to do, I believe we may still ask for and receive the full confidence of the people of this country.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I think the committee will appreciate the careful and comprehensive review of the activities of his department which has been given us by the minister. I note that in the resolution before us we have included the alleviation of both unemployment and agricultural distress. It seems to me to be unfortunate that these two matters should have been included in the same motion. For the greater part of his time the minister dealt almost entirely with relief questions, but toward the end he gave us the impression that the relief which was necessary was caused largely by natural conditions on the prairies. The minister recognized in the earlier part of his speech that economic security was the most important question before the people of Canada. That is true; yet the Department of Labour, which deals with a great variety of questions relating to economic security is a minor spending department.

Until the latter part of his speech, the minister spent nearly all of his time in dealing with the problems of relief. He did not go into the question of the causes of unemployment. When he attempted to say anything about remedies for unemployment, he fell back very largely—if I can remember all of his three-hour speech—on the tourist trade and matters of tariff.

I believe the minister was right when he referred to the improvement that had taken place by getting rid of the relief camps as they were being conducted. But we still have the problem of the single homeless man. A number of these men have been taken care of under the farm placement scheme, but after all this has been rather a cheap way of boarding out these men. A great number of these single homeless men can be regarded as casualties of our industrial system. Instead of having our industrial system care for them, if necessary out of its reserves as has been suggested in the textile commission report recently tabled, we are throwing them out on their own or asking that they be taken care of in the agricultural districts. I do not think that is the way to handle a great problem of that kind.

Again, it is true that the department has made some progress with its home improvement plan, but I suggest that it has not been on a sufficiently large scale either to take care of the mechanics who have been displaced by the depression or to provide the necessary housing accommodation for our people.

The minister has told us that the government has adopted a broad coordinated program, but notwithstanding his lengthy speech I must say that he has not divulged to us very clearly the nature and terms of such a program. I really could not discover that he has told us just how the government proposes to solve this great problem. I do not want to be unkind, for I respect the minister very highly, but it seems to me that he spent a considerable part of his time in trying to tell us why we could not do anything. He raised the old constitutional objections as a reason why it was quite impossible to adopt the main recommendations of the commission.

The commission was appointed, we all remember, nearly two years ago. It was to help solve a pressing problem. Two years have gone by. There has been extreme distress in many parts of this country, and the distress is not confined to western Canada. I happened to be in New Brunswick only last week, and although they have withdrawn relief I find that the unemployed people in Saint John are complaining bitterly about the scheme that has been adopted, to which we have just been told this government is giving some assistance. According to the reports I heard, the scheme is far from satisfactory. So, although I am a westerner, I do not want the committee to get the impression that unemployment is confined to the west, because those of us who are closely connected in any way with the labour movement have it impressed upon us almost every day through our correspondence that there is still a vast amount of unemployment throughout the country.

In the two years that have elapsed since the commission's appointment there has undoubtedly been a certain recovery; but the commission has been so long in reporting that already, even before the commission's report was laid before us, we are apparently heading into another depression. The work of the commission has dragged along until it has got past the time when it could have most favourably reported, and we are already facing, as the leader of the opposition warned us the other day, a new depression. Worse than all, even according to the minister's own statement, the government cannot implement the recommendations of the commission until we have before us the findings of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations.

Really this appointment of commissions seems to be an excellent way of getting nothing done. The government appointed the national employment commission two years ago and asked them to advise us what to do on this problem of unemployment. They go on for two years, and before the end of the two years another commission is appointed—the commission on dominion-provincial relations. Then, when the national employment commission reports, it tells us that we shall have to await the findings of this new commission! The minister himself says he cannot accept the findings of the national employment commission until he has before him the findings of the second commission, and I suppose it will be another year or more before that commission reports.

Mr. BENNETT: The textile commission, too.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That was over two years ago. I am referring now, not to the textile commission, but rather to the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations. According to the minister, we cannot have the recommendations of the national employment commission implemented until the other commission reports.

I should like to raise what may seem like a very small matter, but it is extremely difficult for us to follow easily this rather complicated final report of the commission partly because, among other things, of the extremely involved sentences. I tried to go over the report over the weekend and I found considerable difficulty. Take this sentence, for example. I am inclined to think that two letters have been transposed and that for "on" before "statutory," we should read "no" in paragraph (b) on page 28. It reads:

(b) the qualifications for unemployment insurance (which involves a statutory right for the recipient), or for unemployment aid (which involves an exgratia allowance based on need carrying on statutory right for the recipient because no contribution has been made), can be made clear and precise, susceptible of proof and capable of being determined by a dominion employment service: stated briefly, they would be—having been self-supporting; having been employed; and/or being now capable of employment though unemployed.

I shall have to take a breath after that. Or take this sentence on page 30:

In the latter case the burden of providing for unemployment need in the case of those not covered by the insurance fund or for those who have exhausted their benefits, thus placed upon the provinces and/or municipalities, will only add to the popular agitation for extended insurance benefits the interested pressures of these provincial and municipal governments.

It is not the minister who is to blame for this, but I would suggest that someone be set aside by the government to step down these phrases into terms that could be comprehended by all of us.

Mr. MacINNIS: Get another royal commission to do it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Again, I think there are some rather artificial and arbitrary distinctions drawn in the report. For instance, aid; assistance; relief; voluntary aid—one needs to get the meaning of these terms very clearly into one's head if he is to understand the pages and pages of discussion that follow. Or, take the distinction which the minister himself emphasized between an apprenticeship and a learnership. I think the minister had hard work to explain to us the constitutional difference that sets the two so far apart. I am inclined to think there was a constitutional difficulty first; then a question of policy, and that these words were almost invented in order that the government might approve assistance to "learnership" although it would not approve assistance to "apprenticeship."

The main recommendation, I take it, of the commission was that the dominion government should become responsible for at least a part of the program for dealing with unemployment. That is why some of our more reactionary newspapers are condemning the report of the commission; and perhaps their opposition is one reason for my thinking there is something good in the report of the commission. The minister says he agrees in principle, and I suppose he speaks for the government, but I should like to know what it means to agree in principle and yet not be prepared to implement the recommendations or to do anything except, as he says, give them very careful consideration.

Mr. MacNICOL: It does not mean a thing.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I agree with the hon. member for Davenport that "It does not mean a thing." I wish the minister could take time during this discussion to tell us just what he considers it means when the government says it "agrees in principle" with this recommendation that places a certain definite responsibility upon the dominion government. I know it is stated that there is a certain functional responsibility. Again, that is a purely arbitrary arrangement. In any case, if we cannot carry out that functional responsibility because of the British North America Act; if the dominion government will not take any definite steps to see that the dominion has the power to alter it, and if the government refers the matter to the provinces under such conditions that it is practically impossible that all the provinces will agree to its endorsation, then what does it all mean?

We are back where we were two years ago, before the commission was appointed. It seems to me ridiculous that, with the distress there has been for some years in Canada, and with the fuss about the appointment of a royal commission, and the very heavy expenditures involved in the appointment of that commission, when the report comes in, almost all that is vital in it should be agreed to "in principle," but the committee should be told that really the government cannot do anything about it. It is just a case of "as you were."

The commission recommends that there should be certain changes in administration. The commission had no administrative functions; it was purely advisory. On page 43 it is suggested that we should have a small administrative committee to be entrusted with the practical application of national employment commission recommendations as approved by the dominion government. Apparently that recommendation is not to be accepted. We are to have a national system of unemployment insurance. Of course that cannot be accepted. Then we are to have an interdepartmental committee of officials, and apparently the minister considers that nothing more is necessary than that which we already possess. Under those circumstances it was high time, I think, for the commission to fold up. It was rather an inglorious ending. The minister was quite laudatory as to the great services which the commission had rendered to the department; yet in the earlier part of his speech he appeared to suggest that before the commission got under way the government had done almost everything that had been done. I do not know whether that is correct or not; but for the life of me I cannot see, from what the minister has given us to-day, what advancement is to come because of this report. There are, of course, certain small ameliorative projects. For example, we are to have training of girls for domestic service. That is fine. I do not quite know why it is that the dominion government should enter into that field—a domestic field if anything is a domestic field—but that is to be done. Again, we have the training of young people to a certain extent. They must not be apprentices, but they may receive some general training, especially along recreational lines.

Mr. ROGERS: Is my hon. friend opposed to that?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No. I think that is excellent. But I suggest that there is no valid reason why the dominion government should enter into spheres of recreation and general training when it refuses to give grants for carrying on either apprenticeship or technical work.

Mr. ROGERS: If I might just correct my hon. friend, I do not think he is stating the matter quite as I put it this afternoon. Under the agreements we can assist in giving occupational training. We are doing so in a number of provinces. My point was that I did not think it was wise that the dominion government should enact legislation dealing with apprenticeship. That was the point.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so. Well, I am not particular whether the dominion government enacts that legislation or not, but what I do suggest is that if it is possible through a cooperative effort to provide recreational centres in the provinces, it is surely possible through another cooperative effort to provide technical training for other young people in the provinces—

Mr. ROGERS: We are doing it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —and to do it on a larger scale. But we are constantly up against this: It seems to me—and I do not want to be unfair—that when the government does not want to do a thing, immediately this old constitutional question is trotted out.

I protest decidedly against the delay involved in the government doing precious little, awaiting the report of a commission. Take the case of the textile commission to which the leader of the opposition referred. It was appointed nearly two and a half years ago. Why? Because nearly a thousand men were thrown out of work in Sherbrooke; because the town council of Sherbrooke had called an emergency meeting to consider the situation. We have to wait for two years and a half before we are told that there was no need whatever of a lay-off at that time. And we did not get that information until last week.

Mr. BENNETT: And it cost $174,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It cost $174,000, and we did not get it for two and a half years. That is an absurd way of doing public business. When, as in this case, a commission reports and we are told that we cannot implement its report until yet another commission reports, it is a still more absurd way of doing business. In the meantime the people suffer. The hungry sheep look up and are not fed. That is the trouble. I came across in my old files only a few days ago a plea from certain miners of Cape Breton, nearly two thousand of them, who at that time were out of work; a miner wrote in to me:

> The stomachs of the men, women and children demand prompt action, and I thought the government might help.

Deluded man! He "thought the government might help." Oh, no. We must appoint a royal commission, and a second royal commission, and then seek some great changes in the constitution. "I thought the government might help." I would say, "deluded people," generally, and I am not putting it in an exaggerated form when I suggest that if we do not improve our ways democracy itself will show itself bankrupt. I am not one who wants a dictatorship, of either communism or fascism, but I say that they have come in different countries because democracy has not been tried or has failed, and unless we can deal in a much more practical way than we are doing with the pressing problems that face us in Canada, democracy is bound to fail in this country as it has failed in some others.

I wish to point out some of the actual situations that prevail. I shall cite first the conditions in my own city of Winnipeg and the province of Manitoba. It is not very often that in this house I have set forth specifically matters affecting my own city or my own province; I have tried to deal more largely with general questions. But I make no apology for taking up this question, because to-day our city is almost bankrupt. They are wondering whether or not they can draw on their sinking funds in order to give relief to the people and keep the schools open. The banks tell them that they are not to draw on their sinking funds, and I suppose, from the standpoint of sound finance, that is quite proper. They are trying to cut down on their school expenditures, and the school board says they must not do that because surely the children should not be made to carry the load. They are trying to cut down on their ordinary services all along the line; they are right up against it; that is shown clearly in the newspapers of the last few days. Now, as I have listened for three hours to the Minister of Labour as he has been expounding this report which it has taken nearly two years to prepare, I have been wondering what help there is for my city of Winnipeg and for the large numbers of people who are there unemployed. Let me read a passage or two from the Bank of Canada report. I think it is worth while doing this. I quote:

> But when the province suffered from six consecutive years in which the net value of its production was little more than half of that of the preceding period, discouragement and strain throughout the province were inevitable.

And again:

> The initial proposal was for a one per cent income tax and a sales tax, but the sales tax proposal was dropped and the income tax raised to two per cent, making it the heaviest income tax in North America in relation to small incomes.
> On the side of expenditure, further cuts were made in highway maintenance, education, and other items, reducing total ordinary expenditures for the year 1933-34, in spite of another increase in debt charges.. Capital expenditures ceased entirely.

Again, at page 22:

> We believe that during most of the period under review, and specifically during the last five years, the government of the province of Manitoba has made strong and commendable efforts to keep its budget balanced, and avoid unnecessary increases in debt, by imposing taxation on a scale at least as high as that of any other province in Canada, and by restricting expenditures as far as it was possible to go without curtailing services to an extent which would not have been in the public interest.

What more can we do in that province? Again:

> Notwithstanding this advantage and the efforts of its government, which, as we have indicated, have been very considerable, the province is either not in a position to carry on, or is able to do so with assurance for no more than a short period, unless some unexpected favourable factor should appear.

I ask the minister, What does he propose to do in that contingency? Here is the Bank of Canada making its report in which it says that the province is not in a position to carry on, or is able to do so with assurance for no more than a short period unless some unexpected favourable factor should appear.

Mr. ROGERS: Was that report prepared before or after the crop season of last year?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Before. The Bank of Canada's report for the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan was made public on February 15, 1937; March 15, 1937; and April 7, 1937, respectively.

Mr. ROGERS: There has been some improvement since then.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes; but one crop does not alter the situation any more than one swallow makes a summer. Let me give two other quotations, and I do so because I do not believe the members from the eastern and central provinces realize yet the situation in the drought area or the condition of the people in the industrial centres of the west. I quote from page 16:

> Some 84 per cent of all direct relief expenditures in the province have had to be made in Winnipeg and suburbs; including relief works expenditures the proportion is 74 per cent. Although Winnipeg's net debt was relatively low, the major portion of the provincial tax revenues were derived from the city, and there was little margin for increasing municipal revenues. Consequently, greater Winnipeg was early forced to rely on the province for assistance in meeting its share of relief costs, and by the end of the fiscal year 1936 had borrowed $3,500,000, or 95 per cent of total municipal borrowings from the province, excluding the drought area.

One other quotation:

> Of the $24,000,000 spent or loaned for relief purposes by the province, the dominion will have advanced $19,000,000 and will have paid an additional $20,000,000 for its own share, making with the municipalities' $9,000,000 a grand total of $53,000,000 relief expenditures by all agencies.

When we have figures like these it is high time that we gave a little more attention not only to relief on a much greater scale than has hitherto been contemplated but also to the question behind relief, of how we can provide against unemployment.

I wish to deal with one or two points with reference to the constitutional question, and I turn to Manitoba's case as presented recently to the Rowell commission. I propose to quote from page 41. May I say that we cannot wait until the Rowell commission reports before we deal with these problems. I am taking the case as submitted to that commission because it contains figures which I assume will be accepted by the government. Under the heading "Amendment of the Constitution," there appears the following:

> It may be said from the above that the original conception and the present position of the constitution of Canada are poles apart. It has been interpreted in a way which it can safely be said would have caused consternation in the minds of those who framed it.
> It will be apparent from the decided cases in such matters of the gravest national importance as unemployment insurance, weekly rest, minimum wages, hours of labour and other great social services, that we in Canada are practically at an impasse. The dominion, according to the decisions referred to above, has not the power to pass legislation in relation to such matters. The provinces alone have the power to pass such legislation, but they cannot in practice deal with such matters satisfactorily, as from their nature only national action in regard thereto can really be effective. In addition, to repeat what has already been emphasized, the provinces have not at present the powers of taxation necessary to meet the outlay for said matters and matters of similar import.

Let me quote one short paragraph further down:

> Hence one is led to the irresistible conclusion that our constitution as it stands at present has ceased to be an effective instrument of government. It should be amended so that the defects which have been pointed out can be removed, and so that it will meet the needs of to-day and will cease to be an obstacle to social progress and national development.

The minister has referred to constitutional difficulties, and I simply give this extract from the case as presented to the commission to show its practical bearings. But what does the minister propose to do? In theory he is very much opposed to grants in aid, and possibly that is correct from the purely theoretical standpoint. But what are we going to do in circumstances such as these? Are we going to wait another two years until the Rowell commission reports, when the city is on the verge of bankruptcy, and the people, if the city cannot give relief, will be faced with actual starvation? Is there nothing that can be done about the matter? I do not think we can simply allow the government to give us general and vague phrases and go on for one year more.

Last year the situation was bad enough. Everything reported by the Bank of Canada existed then, but the government had to hurry over to the coronation and participate in the ceremonies there; that was infinitely more important than caring for the people here! Therefore nothing was done last year; and now when this year we ask for some action, we are told that we must wait until some other commission reports or until all the provinces are agreed to constitutional changes. If some of the provinces are satisfied with the existing situation, very well; but some of us have to take action and to do so in the not too distant future. I have always done my best to frown upon anything like the advocacy of secession, but I say that people are being driven to despair by the situation that prevails. Secession would be a political move to try to solve an economic difficulty, and I do not think it would be successful in itself. But I urge that something must be done if we are to have that unity which the minister has pleaded for to-night. That unity must mean that the sections of the community which are in difficulties can have their difficulties met promptly and adequately.

I should like to give just one quotation from another section of this brief, dealing with federal monetary policy. I am afraid, however, that in making my notes this particular passage was not brought down to my desk. I am sorry; I should like to have quoted it. It appears on page 1 of part 3. Perhaps some other time I shall take occasion to read this quotation. Undoubtedly that monetary policy has borne very heavily upon the people of the west. They had to sell abroad, and the exchange relationship that existed worked a very great hardship on the western people. Further than that, one should remember the tariff policy, into which I shall not enter at this time; and still further than that, the difficult position of the school districts, even in Manitoba. To-day we heard a plea for the school districts of Saskatchewan and Alberta, but there are large numbers of rural schools in Manitoba in a serious predicament. Are we going to allow the education of our children in this country to be subordinated to other and lesser considerations?

What is the government prepared to do? Under the restrictions imposed by their charters and by the British North America Act the municipalities and some of the provinces are unable to provide for the unemployed. In the circumstances what are we going to do? That is the question I should like to ask the government. Let me repeat that my own city at the moment is almost on the verge of bankruptcy. It is in a very difficult position. It does not know which way to turn. The province is in a difficult situation. It does not know which way to turn. What is to be done to meet the situation?

Mr. DUPUIS: Has the hon. member a suggestion to make to the committee?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If the minister has no suggestion in all the time he has considered the problem, I do not think the hon. member can expect me to make one at the moment.

Mr. ROGERS: Will my hon. friend permit me to offer just a brief observation? The dominion government has not been at any time indifferent to the position of Manitoba or any other western province. I think if the hon. gentleman looks back over the record, he will acknowledge that. He has referred particularly to the city of Winhipeg. I am aware that the city of Winnipeg has been in a difficult position. Equally, other municipalities have been in a difficult position; but, as I have had occasion to point out before, there are two ways of meeting the situation. One is for the municipality to receive powers of taxation other than levies upon real estate. I believe an attempt was made in the case of Winnipeg to secure from the provincial legislature additional powers of taxation, but that attempt was only partly successful. I am quite sure that when my hon. friend speaks of the municipality being bankrupt, he does not mean that the people of that municipality are in a bankrupt condition; for the problem rests in part upon the relation between provincial and municipal finance. I do not suggest that as the whole story; but I think if he is putting a position before us, he should not forget that the city of Winnipeg did make certain proposals to the provincial legislature, and that those were only partly met.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not very much impressed by what the minister has said. I do not say that everybody in Winnipeg is bankrupt, but I do say that from the statement made by the Bank of Canada the minister can understand that we are in a pretty bad way in that city. Already we have taxed ourselves to the limit. I cannot see how most people can do anything further. I referred previously to the real estate tax, which has been terrifically heavy, so that many houses have had to be torn down because the owners could not afford to maintain them.

Mr. BENNETT: And they told the legislature they could not carry on.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes. You reach a certain point and you cannot go any further. What is to be done? And what are the unemployed to do? Are they to be allowed to starve?

Mr. ROGERS: There has never been any suggestion of that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is no suggestion of it; but if you read the Winnipeg papers for the last few days, you will realize the position of that city. There is no suggestion, the minister says; but what is your alternative? We have cut down our services to a point beyond which it is not in the public interest to cut further.

This government cannot escape responsibility for that situation. My colleague suggests that the city increased its relief debt by $10,000,000 in seven years. It is a serious situation. The minister made an eloquent appeal for unity; he pleaded that the eastern part of the country would realize what the west had done in the past. Well, the west is up against it to-day, and about all the minister can say is, "Why don't you tax yourselves a little more heavily?"

Mr. ROGERS: No; my hon. friend is certainly misrepresenting what I said.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not want to do that.

Mr. ROGERS: We have been dealing with the western provinces from the very beginning on the basis of grants in aid, to assist them in dealing with the unemployment situation. Not only that; but in the city of Winnipeg, as my hon. friend is aware, the late administration as well as this government made extraordinary provision in connection with the establishment of a sewage disposal plant. The expenditure there ran very close to $4,000,000, and the dominion government either advanced or loaned the money to the province and municipality. I do want the hon. gentleman to understand that we have not been indifferent to the situation in Winnipeg.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No; the government may not have been indifferent to it, but I do want—

Mr. ROGERS: Then why not state what has been done?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What I want the minister to understand is that to-day the situation has become almost impossible, and that nothing he has mentioned this afternoon or this evening as far as I can recall would give us the faintest glimmer of hope that this government is going to assist in that situation. That is what I want to bring out. Further I ask what the unemployed are to do under those circumstances. Are they to starve? Are we to wait until there are riots? That has happened in some cases in the past. Let no one say here that I am advocating riots, but I do urge that sometimes the dominion government has waited until riots occurred before it paid sufficient attention to the situation which existed.

Mr. DUPUIS: That is a nice suggestion to put in the minds of the people.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Just a moment; a little later I have a suggestion to advance. But, first, what are the minister's suggestions? One is that we should encourage the tourist trade; at least that is the suggestion which the minister takes over from the commission. Further, the commission suggests that we could sell articles to tourists at reduced rates. Well, now, is that to be one of the important parts of the relief program, to bring about the solution of the unemployment problem in this country; to encourage tourists and sell things to them? I suppose if we build enough highways, we could place all the unemployed along them and set them to work selling trinkets to the tourists; probably the trinkets would be made in Japan, but of course they would be made to look like Indian souvenirs. Really, I do ask the minister whether he is serious in telling us that for the solution of these things we have to depend upon the development of the tourist traffic. Are we to be employed largely in selling little things to tourists; are we to become a nation of wayside shopkeepers and hotelkeepers? Is that our ambition for this country? Surely the minister has not made much of a case for the policy of the government in developing the industries of the country, developing its natural resources and putting the Dominion of Canada on a self-reliant basis.

A moment ago an hon. member asked for a suggestion. I offer this, as a bare suggestion: The minister himself has emphasized the advisability of more housing. I think that is quite correct. It serves two purposes: It provides for the needs of the people—and we have need for more housing from coast to coast—further, it is generally conceded that almost immediately a large number of mechanics are employed. There is no one policy which would stimulate general activity more than increased activity in the building trade.

The commission has given some consideration to the low-rent housing scheme. I urge the government to consider it more carefully. The minister was very cautious in his statement; he said some such scheme was being considered. But we want something more than long term "consideration." We have had a commission, and we have heard its advice. Many of us would now like to have action! What the people want is not more commissions, more bureaux, more research; what they want, above all, is work,—work! And the government must give that work.

Some one may say: Why do the people not look out for their own jobs? We grew up in a pioneering country, where it was possible for a man to find a job for himself. But to-day I believe that with the exception of the farming industry about 85 per cent of all people who work for a living are working for somebody else.

Who must provide work? The people who have money say they cannot invest their money in productive enterprises so as to bring in a profit; so they are investing in bonds, if they can, or their money is lying idle. Under these circumstances it seems to me the government will have to step in and provide for the housing of the people, or set up other schemes of a similar kind.

The minister referred to the $15,000,000, the amount which I believe was put into the home improvement plan last year by the government. But that plan touched only the middle-class people; it did not touch the people who most needed homes. It did not provide for the clearance of slums which have existed for twenty-five years in Montreal, in Saint John, in Toronto—in almost all our cities. I would suggest that the government could not do better than place an estimate before the house for something like $100,000,000 for slum clearance, and the provision of low rent housing. Someone laughs! What is wrong with that? If last year we could provide $36,000,000 for national defence and $34,000,000 this year—some of it to be spent on useless armouries—I wonder why we cannot provide $100,000,000 to house our people and to provide work for the unemployed.

When I think of the enormous sums which have been spent in Canada for relief purposes, just thrown away, as it were, I wonder why we could not have some return! Somebody may ask: Where shall we find the money? I think it would be comparatively easy to find the money. Half that amount could be easily obtained through added income tax on incomes in the higher brackets. The minister says: Let the people tax themselves still further. I suggest that we impose a tax which would bear more heavily on those people best able to pay. And if the government do not wish to provide the other $50,000,000 in this way, then I would suggest that they might provide it by issuing new money.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I hear hon. members to my left in the social credit group agreeing with that. This is one instance in which I think new money might be issued to advantage. It would not bring about inflation, so far as I can determine, and so far as I can learn from consultation with people who know more than I do about financial matters. We have taken such action before in this house, and there is no reason why we cannot do so again. A program of that kind could be carried out without constitutional changes. That is one practical suggestion I would offer.

I quite agree with the minister that we must have a broad and comprehensive program. No one measure will accomplish the complete results. I have mentioned housing because in Canada there have been the strongest representations urging the necessity of a housing scheme. On the other hand, we still have a vast amount of unemployment which, at least in part, could be taken care of by a scheme of this kind. In turn, as the minister has pointed out, it would stimulate general activity across the country.

In closing, I wish to emphasize that, after reading patiently the report, and listening to the minister, it does seem to me that we have been given nothing which would seem to bring about any immediate solution of this pressing problem—certainly nothing that would meet the needs of the people who have been suffering throughout these years.

The minister talked about improved morale; but I can take him to the welfare agencies in this city, or, indeed of any of our cities, and the welfare workers will tell him that to-day morale is at a very low ebb. I suggest that the sums which might be involved in carrying out extensive employment schemes are very small, compared with the good which might be accomplished in the national interest of Canada.

Hon. J. EARL LAWSON (York South): To an audience less informed than members of the House of Commons, an historic review of the different measures taken to cope with the unemployment problem, such as was given by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) this afternoon in the first hour of his address, would indeed have been intensely interesting. He intimated the steps which had been taken by a previous government and by the present government to meet the problem. I have no desire to express commendation of one government or condemnation of the other.

Mr. THORSON: You are in the reconfederation cabinet.

Mr. LAWSON: That is the third time I have heard that, but I have not yet found out what it is.

To my mind the unemployment problem far transcends any question of party politics or political controversy. Let us say that the camps to which the minister referred were a temporary expedient to meet the needs of a particular time, and let us say that the employment commission, which has functioned, has collected some valuable data and has presented in its report some better ideas respecting the classification of unemployed and unemployables than we had before. But the question still remains: If every recommendation made by the employment commission was implemented by the present government, which apparently it is not going to do, we would still have an unemployment problem. I do not think the minister would suggest seriously to this committee that the implementation of those recommendations would prove a solution of our problem. As I said a moment ago, let us take it for granted that they gave us some valuable data, but I am sometimes doubtful of that.

This afternoon the minister gave some figures in connection with the unemployed. It was pointed out by him, I believe as a result of a question asked, that the figures referred only to the unemployed on relief. Recently I had brought to my attention an instance of how inaccurate such figures may be. The municipality of the township of York is in the constituency which I have the honour to represent. According to the latest figures there are supposed to be 750 young people between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one who are unemployed in that particular municipality which has a population of something less than 700,000. There happens to be a very active youth movement in that municipality, as the minister knows, composed of several youth organizations. A little while ago they undertook to make a canvass of every house in the municipality. Up to last week their voluntary job was two-thirds finished; but their census showed that instead of 750, there were 2,150 young people between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one years in that one municipality who were seeking employment.

I regret that the minister has not intimated that the bill to be founded upon this resolution will contain definite provisions for an effort, other than those which have been made, to meet the problem of unemployment. The minister dealt at some length with the home improvement plan and what it had accomplished. I would be the last to suggest that it has not provided some impetus and stimulus to and caused considerable expenditure in the building industry; but may I say to the minister I am convinced that so far as the promoting of the building industry in this country is concerned, it has but scratched the surface. The great impediment to progress in the building industry, as I see it, is the tremendous burden of municipal taxation which is now placed upon property. Until you relieve that burden you will not make any real progress in our building industry.

Some one will say that the municipality is a creature of the province; that this is a matter within the jurisdiction of the province, but it seems to me that there is a material and substantial contribution which the government of the Dominion of Canada could make to the solution of this problem. They should do that which almost everyone admits now should be done, namely, take off the municipalities and the provinces the burden of maintenance of relief of the unemployed.

I suggest that this is a concrete suggestion which will have two results. First, it would ease the burden of municipal taxation now upon the home owners and farmers in this country by eliminating that proportion of taxes which is now assessed against them by reason of the direct relief contribution being made by the municipalities. It will provide relief to those provinces which are unable to pay their way as they go and to which we are already advancing money to meet their share of the cost of unemployment relief. It will be noticed that I am distinguishing the unemployed from the unemployables. I say that by doing this you will make a great contribution, both to the stimulation of building and to relieving the burden of taxation upon those provinces and municipalities which are now in difficulties.

At one point in his speech the Minister of Labour announced that for two years the government had had a policy leading to the development of natural resources so as to secure further income for the future and thus provide more employment, rather than a program of artificial public works. By artificial public works I mean public works carried on for the purpose of providing employment. I was hopeful that before he had finished his remarks he would have told us something of what the government proposed to do in that regard. However, his remarks amounted to nothing more than the old, old, oft repeated policy of my friends in the Liberal party—trade, trade and the extension of trade.

Mr. DUPUIS: That is a nice song.

Mr. LAWSON: My hon. friend is a good songster and I would like to hear him sing it.

An hon. MEMBER: He is a little off key.

Mr. LAWSON: I realize that there will be always a division of opinion in this country as to the extent to which we benefit by trade agreements which throw our export and import trade out of balance. I am not going to attempt to argue at any length that age-old question of the benefits of expanding trade irrespective of the effect it may have upon our secondary industries as against the policy of protection for industry and equal opportunity for Canadians in their own market. However, I want to point out that nothing can be more misleading or less effective in argument than the mere recitation, such as the minister gave this afternoon, of increasing exports year after year, when one fails to give side by side with those figures the increasing imports or increasing world trade.

Mr. MARTIN: They both go together.

Mr. LAWSON: Of course they go together; they are inseparable. I can readily understand the argument by which one advances an increase of exports over imports as tending to show that a trade agreement is beneficial. I can readily understand the argument that an increase in imports may be beneficial if we are a creditor country and the imports come from a debtor country. Such an increase would indicate that at least we are getting payment of our debts. But to merely cite increases in exports without relation to the other factors which I have mentioned, is no evidence or proof of benefit to this country.

Had I anticipated speaking on this resolution I would have obtained certain figures to present to the minister. I am confident that if I had got them from the bureau of statistics they would have illustrated clearly the fallacy of stating merely an increase in exports as an argument in support of what the minister was saying. I remember in 1933 or 1934 when I spoke during the budget debate I advanced an argument which may not have been accepted by many but which I still think is sound. I took the world trade figures in 1929, and in the year in which I was speaking, and showed that whereas world trade had decreased 68 per cent and that of our great neighbour to the south 65 per cent, nevertheless in Canada, under the policies of protection inaugurated by the Conservative government then in power, our trade had decreased only 60 per cent, and I suggest to my hon. friend that if he would take the percentage of increase in world trade to-day over the world trade when the government of which he is a member came into power, and then compare with that Canada's increase in trade, he would find, I am confident, that these trade agreements to which he pins his hope for solving the unemployment problem in the future have not resulted in the benefits which he would lead us to believe.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I hope that when we have the bill before us it will contain some more concrete suggestion for a contribution to the solution of the problem of unemployment in this country than was indicated by the minister this afternoon, and I suggest for his very serious consideration that if he desires to bring about a great increase in the building industry—and I agree with him that a substantial increase in the building industry would make a greater contribution to the solution of unemployment than anything else I can think of at the moment—then this government must lead the way in taking off the home owner and real estate owner some of the burden of taxation which is now imposed upon them.

Mr. W. A. WALSH (Mount Royal): Mr. Chairman, speaking to the resolution before us, I notice that it is worded:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide assistance—

I would suggest that it has been expedient to do that for over two years, and that the thought of the government in considering the present time as expedient is a very long overdue thought.

As we all remember, this government came into office after having promised the people of Canada they would do what they suggested the previous government had not done, after having promised the people that they were the only party which could bring about an alleviation of the distress caused by unemployment because of their very close association with the then provincial governments in this country. Now, after two and a half years of office they at last suggest that it is expedient that something should be done.

I am sorry to have missed the introductory remarks of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers); but as I listened to him during the early part of this evening I was almost reminded of the days I spent in the lecture theatre, and was almost ready to commend him for his academic style of delivery and for the academic words of wisdom to which he gave utterance. Unfortunately, however, the problem with which we are dealing cannot be solved by academic utterances or by academically well-turned phrases.

I also notice that the resolution reads that it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide assistance "towards the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress." I would suggest that unemployment and agricultural distress should not be grouped together as they have been in this resolution. I assume that agricultural distress refers to the conditions which prevail and have prevailed for some time in western Canada; but I do not think it is fair to those farmers who are suffering through no fault of their own, not because of any economic ills that have come to the world and to Canada in common with other nations, but merely through an act of providence, through the workings of nature, to place those farmers who are suffering just as intensely as the unemployed in our cities and towns in the same category with them. I think the two groups should be kept separate and distinct, and those who are suffering agricultural distress should be treated separately and distinctly from those who are unemployed from other causes than have brought about the unfortunate conditions which prevail in that western country. Judging by the utterances of last year, I thought that this year we would see those suffering from agricultural distress treated separately from the rank and file of the unemployed; that we would have separate figures in respect to them and separate legislation to deal with them at this present session. Unfortunately the government has not seen its way clear to bring in legislation of that nature, and so we must deal with the situation as we find it.

Listening to the minister this evening, I did not hear anything which would lead us to believe that any concrete measures will be brought before the house to deal with unemployment in any definite way. I feel reasonably certain that if the unemployed had listened to the Minister of Labour this afternoon and this evening, and then had supplemented what they had heard by a careful reading of the report of the national employment commission, they would have gone away from this house very little comforted and with very little hope for the immediate future. As they pick up their paper to-morrow morning or to-morrow afternoon and read the utterances of the minister representing this government, I cannot see that they are going to catch that ray of hope they would naturally expect as a result of two and a half years' work on the part of such an important commission, whose labours they hoped would result in something more fruitful, which would be implemented by the government at present holding office.

The minister in the course of his remarks pictured in glowing terms the recovery that had been made by Canada, in more glowing terms, I think, than actual conditions at the present time warrant. I am not a pessimist, but in the present situation I for one cannot assume such an optimistic tone and outlook as the minister assumed in his remarks to-day. I feel absolutely certain that if we compare the recovery figures for Canada, to which the minister referred from time to time, with the recovery figures of other nations of the world, and with the figures for the world at large, we should find that Canada had made no more rapid strides on the road to recovery than many other countries of the world or, indeed, than the average country of the world.

As someone speaking in this debate has pointed out, the minister has made many suggestions, but not many suggestions of what could actually be done. He has pointed to what it would be impossible to do under present circumstances and conditions, but he has not been at all definite in showing the way to those who are looking for a lead in this connection.

When, some two years ago, I first spoke on a similar measure, I suggested that the minister was ill-advised in burdening this country with the expense of a commission to solve unemployment. I suggested that what he hoped to do through the efforts of such a commission could very well be done with a little reorganization within his own department, at far less expense and with much greater expedition than has been the case as a result of the appointment of this commission. I do not wish to say anything derogatory of the commission. They have done a nice piece of work; they have gathered together facts and statistics and made accessible material which was perhaps not previously available, but this could have been done by officials of the department with probably as much competence and a great deal more quickly than it has been done by the national employment commission. The result of the appointment of that body is that for over two years a practical solution of the problem of unemployment in this country has been delayed. When we get the report we find, blocking the way to dealing properly with the problem, a reference to another commission. One commission prevents anything from being done as a result of the report of another commission for which we have been waiting some two years. Evidently the present government have little or no intention of effectively dealing with the unemployment situation. What the government is doing is passing the question from one commission to another, hoping that, during the lapse of time between the reception of these reports and the giving effect to any recommendations they may have to make, world conditions will improve and reflect themselves in Canada; then this government will make an effort to persuade the people that they are responsible for an improvement which came about naturally in process of time.

These commissions entail a tremendous expense to the Canadian people. I hope during the course of this parliament to place on record in Hansard a complete list of the commissions that have been appointed, with their expensive and high strutting counsel, so that the people will know what a commission form of government really costs in the way of taxation, and what a so-called Liberal government is doing in the way of governing this country, not as a government but through the instrumentality of commissions, one appointed after another.

There is another point to which I wish to take exception. This lengthy report, containing as has been pointed out, somewhat laboured phrases and sentences, was tabled in the house on Friday; yet members are asked to give consideration to it on Monday. I ask the Minister of Labour, who, like myself, has been a teacher—

An hon. MEMBER: A professor.

Mr. WALSH: A professor, if he prefers the more dignified term to the word "teacher."

Mr. ROGERS: I am quite satisfied with "teacher."

Mr. WALSH: I think he, like myself, is quite satisfied with the word I used. We would not suggest, to even a fourth year honour class in a university, to take a report of that nature and over the weekend read and digest it and be prepared to come back on Monday and discuss it in class. But here the minister has tabled a lengthy and important report on Friday and asks consideration for it on Monday, hoping that in the meantime hon. members, with our limited mentality as compared with fourth year honour students, will be able to give it real and genuine consideration.

Mr. ROGERS: If my hon. friend will permit me, there are fifty pages in the report itself apart from the appendix. I would not have considered it too heavy an assignment over a weekend.

Mr. WALSH: I must tell my hon. friend that I was not in the privileged class of a Rhodes scholar, and that I deliberately endeavoured to assimilate this report over the weekend, but, I assume on account of age and other infirmities, I found it almost impossible to comprehend it, let alone thoroughly digest it and come here prepared to discuss it properly. In my opinion this report could have been and should have been brought down at least one week earlier and hon. members given the opportunity, to which they are justly entitled, properly and effectively to consider a matter of far-reaching importance to the country as well as to parliament. The report is one of the most important documents which could be tabled in this house, and I am sure that the time which has elapsed between the tabling and the discussion of it has been far too short to permit a logical and comprehensive study such as is necessary to discuss it in detail and with a view of doing something for the people who most need our help at the present time.

I noticed—and I compliment the minister upon the fact—that during the course of the first three hours of the discussion, for the most part of an academic nature, he was quite willing to answer questions and receive information. Unfortunately, when he got away from an academic discussion of this report and proceeded into the realm of politics, he at once dissociated himself from that more favourable atmosphere and refused to answer questions. He himself refused, and his satellites who sit in the immediate vicinity, the yes men who echo the sound of his voice from time to time, answered for him "no, no"; the questions were not answered, and the minister continued his tirade in the field of politics. That was not a commendable effort on his part. Possibly if he had taken his seat at the end of the three hour discussion and had refrained from continuing another hour and delving into politics, his remarks on the report under discussion would have been received with a great deal more approval, not only in parliament but by the press and the people of Canada. I know that in what I am about to say I shall be out of order; but the minister, according to his own suggestion, was not out of order when he brought political and economic details of trade and commerce and considerations of fiscal policy into this discussion, so I assume that on the same principle I should be held to be in order if I asked him a question regarding his suggestion that the past government withdrew into economic nationalism and founded their fiscal policy on the wrong principles. I endeavoured to ask him this question when his satellites interrupted.

An hon. MEMBER: And this is non political!

Mr. WALSH: This is dealing with the political aspect of a discussion into which politics should not have been brought. Would he characterize the trade agreement of 1932, passed by the previous administration, as "economic nationalism?"

Mr. ROGERS: I said that "economic imperialism" would perhaps be a better term. I hardly know how to answer my hon. friend, because apparently I am either academic or political, and in either case it is bad in his judgment. Offhand I should say that the agreements in the first instance did contain features which extended the idea of an exclusive trade policy operating within the empire. I think that at least in some particulars they have been improved by the revision with respect to the bound items.

Mr. WALSH: As regards the empire trade agreement, I hardly think the minister could refer to the previous government as continuing a policy of economic nationalism in view of that important legislation, which apparently not only met with the commendation later of the present Liberal government but was given an extension of time during which it was kept in force. I would also make this suggestion. I believe the minister will agree that the previous administration did make a serious effort to conclude a trade pact with the United States. Is that economic nationalism? Is it blocking the channels of trade to endeavour to make an agreement of that kind?

The minister goes on to take to task the preceding administration for not concluding a trade pact with the United States. I suggest to him and to the government in all seriousness that the previous government were prepared to conclude that trade pact, as has already been overemphasized, but they were not prepared to pay the price which the present government has paid in order to secure that agreement with the United States. It is very much like the case of a man who told me over the weekend of his endeavours last summer to purchase a house. He was offered the house at $10,500; but he was not prepared to pay that price, and last week the owner called him up and offered the house for $8,500 so as to get rid of it. Would that man have been justified in the first instance in accepting the first offer in view of the fact that he has now been offered it for $8,500. Well, the present government took the United States offer and sold out certain interests in Canada in order to conclude that trade agreement with the United States, and it is under that agreement that we are living to-day. I suggest to the government that that very agreement will eventually aggravate the unemployment situation and make it well nigh impossible for any government to deal satisfactorily with the question of unemployment. I want to give this warning to the government. If they propose to enter into a trade agreement with the United States, they will further aggravate and further increase unemployment in Canada owing to the importation from the United States of goods which could just as satisfactorily be manufactured in this country, giving employment to people here.

When the minister was speaking in glowing terms of the economic condition of those engaged in fishing, particularly in Nova Scotia, I noticed a strained look on the countenance of the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley). I could see that he was listening intently, waiting for some ray of hope as the minister pictured the conditions of the fishermen and told us how their lot had improved as a result of the enactments of the Liberal government in the last two and a half years; and then the hon. member fell back in his seat with a disappointed look; for he knew that what the minister had just said was not a reality in that part of the country from which the hon. member had just returned.

I would suggest to the minister that he be more careful in making statements as to conditions unless he has firsthand information. If my information is correct, the lot of these fishermen in Nova Scotia and in other parts of Canada is not too happy at the present time; they are among those who are only partly employed and therefore are in a worse position than those who are altogether unemployed.

I was pleased to hear the minister suggest that there would be new roads to our national parks. I am sure that the members from Prince Edward Island will immediately call attention to their various home towns and point out that there is need on that island of some new and improved roads in order to bring the proposed national park in Prince Edward Island into contact with the larger centres of Summerside, Charlottetown and other larger places on the Northumberland strait. There is some ray of hope there, and I trust the Minister of Public Works or the minister who will be in charge of that particular project will see that the suggestions of the Minister of Labour are implemented and that during the course of this summer we who are fortunate enough to spend a few weeks on the island will have an improved road over which to travel to our destination.

I am glad that the minister is so confident as to the future. I, too, am confident, just as confident as the minister; but I want to make this observation, and I do so not by way of political gesture but sincerely: I would be more confident if there were a different government in office. I would not care whether that government happened to be called Conservative or even if we had a Liberal government in power so long as it had a different set of leaders, who would actually give a lead to the people of Canada, leaders who would not equivocate, who would not just stand on the side-lines and hope for the best but who would give a very well defined lead. Under those circumstances I would say that there might be ground for the minister's optimism.

An hon. MEMBER: Whom would you suggest in place of the present government?

Mr. WALSH: When the people of Canada have an opportunity to express themselves, I hope they will be wise in their choice and will elect a government which will be well and effectively directed, so that they will know that they are being led in the right direction, and that the problems with which we are confronted, of which unemployment is only one, will be satisfactorily handled instead of being referred to commissions that are merely trying to kill time.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

RAILWAYS AND CANALS

Fourth report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Vien.

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED

Orvis A. Kennedy, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Edmonton East, introduced by Mr. Blackmore and Mr. Landeryou.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED DISMANTLING OF GUNS AND REDUCTION OF DEFENCE EQUIPMENT AT HALIFAX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) to a Canadian press dispatch which appeared last evening in the Ottawa papers in respect to the dismantling of guns at the city of Halifax. The dispatch states:

> Halifax is being stripped rapidly of any semblance of defence against possible war-time attackers.

I should like to read the whole of the dispatch, but shall be content to point out the importance of the statement so far as the garrison city of Halifax is concerned; I hope the minister has already been made aware of the article. I am asking him if the report is correct, and whether the defences of Halifax are being stripped in the manner indicated.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was kind enough to notify me of his intention to ask this question. I have observed the contents of the dispatch to which he refers, and may I say immediately that the dispatch in question is absolutely crowded with the most glaring inaccuracies. Not only have the defences at Halifax not been weakened in recent days, but they have been actually strengthened. More guns of heavy calibre have been moved to the vicinity of Halifax than have been taken away from there. Certain guns which were "unallotted," or "in reserve" for some years, have been moved from the district, but I can assure the hon. member, with reference both to guns and to munitions, that nothing whatsoever has been done to impair the effective defences of Halifax city. The reference in the dispatch to ninety naval families being transferred is equally untrue. A few key naval ratings may be transferred, but no more. I only express my personal regret that the Canadian Press saw fit to carry this dispatch, which several journals refused to print, without investigation at headquarters here in Ottawa.

RADIO BROADCASTING

ADDRESS BROADCAST BY MR. FERGUSON OF WINNIPEG FREE PRESS ON SUNDAY, APRIL 3

On the orders of the day.

Mr. F. C. BETTS (London): Before the orders of the day are proceeded with I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe). On Sunday last, commencing at 6.30 p.m., radio station CBL carried a broadcast by a Mr. Ferguson who is an editor or other employee of the Winnipeg Free Press. In the course of his remarks he suggested that Britain prefers a weak Spain in order that her line of communication to the orient may not be threatened and, further, that the failure of Britain to support General Franco in Spain is attributable largely to Britain's desire to protect her investments in Spain. I should like to ask the minister whether this broadcast was made after review by and with the approval of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. If so, I should like to know the name of the reviewing officer.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): My hon. friend was good enough to give me notice of this question. I am advised by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that no officer of the corporation had prior knowledge of the subject matter of the address, and no officer reviewed the address.

CATTLE SHIPMENTS

PROVISION OF SPACE ON VESSELS FOR SHIPMENT TO ENGLAND

On the orders of the day.

Mr. A. M. EDWARDS (Waterloo South): I should like to inquire of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) as to what progress has been made in securing boat space for the shipment of cattle to England.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): No further space has been obtained since we discussed the matter a few days ago.

POLITICAL EXPENDITURES

PUBLICATION OF RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES AND LIMITATION OF AMOUNT EXPENDED IN ELECTION OF MEMBERS

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting political expenditures, and to make provision for the appointment and the salaries or remuneration of certain officers and employees and the payment of certain expenses in connection with the administraiton of the said measure.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the legislation which is being introduced by this resolution will be known as the Political Expenditures Act. The preamble to the bill reads:

Whereas it is desirable that the source and disposition of sums expended for federal political purposes should be readily traceable and that the amounts expended in promoting the return of members of the House of Commons should be limited.

I believe those words express succinctly the objects of the proposed legislation. The first object is to make traceable and provide a public record of all receipts and expenditures for political purposes. The second object is to limit expenditures which may lawfully be incurred in promoting the election of a member. The bill is comparatively simple. This house acquires jurisdiction in connection therewith through its control over banks and banking and also through the right which the federal government has to constitute corporations for other than provincial purposes. The provision with regard to the limitation of expenditures will operate only during the electoral periods while the other provisions will operate at all times. I may digress here to say that with the provision for the tracing and publication of contributions operating at all times there is a probability that the public will become accustomed to the other provisions and more readily acquiesce in their operation when the electoral period comes around.

Political expenditures can be incurred only by special corporate bodies constituted by mere request into corporations sole. Political contributions can be made only to such bodies and such contributions must be deposited in a bank with duplicate deposit slips. All payments must be made by cheque. A return of expenditures and contributions will thus automatically be made by the transmission to the officer appointed by this house of the duplicate deposit slips and cheques. This officer, who will be known as the inspector general of elections, will have the duty of setting up corporations on request and making a return to parliament of all receipts and expenditures by those corporations. This return will be along the lines of that made by the auditor general and will be annual.

The limitation of the expenditure in any particular constituency will be achieved through identifying the corporation or corporations which are charged with the duty of promoting the return of any candidate to parliament. Any one else, a corporation or otherwise, will be forbidden to spend any money for that purpose. The amount of expenditures permissible will be calculated on the number of electors in a given electoral district. There is also a provision in the interests of the public placing a limitation on the amount to be expended on radio broadcasting, which limitation will be based on the number of electors. In as simple language as I can use, these are the chief provisions of the bill.

I have every reason to believe that this bill is sound both in law and constitution. It was drafted by Lieutenant-Colonel Biggar who for seven or eight years was chief electoral officer of Canada. There are certain features of the bill upon which I should perhaps enlarge. It was thought advisable in connection with the provision for the limitation of expenditures to leave blank the amount to be allowed to be expended in any given constituency. I submit that this amount should be fixed by the committee of this house which will be called upon to deal with the bill. A distinction has been made in the bill as between rural and urban constituencies.

Another difficulty had been solved, perhaps not to the satisfaction of everyone, in connection with the distribution of moneys expended from the central or national campaign funds. It was decided that the bill should provide that these moneys should be distributed equally among all constituencies. It may appear to hon. members that this provision will make the amount expended in any constituency appear to be somewhat large when it is charged with its portion of the national expenditure. It will certainly bring it out of line with the limitation imposed in other countries on expenditures in constituencies. In Great Britain, for example, if my memory serves me aright, the expenditure is five pence per name of elector in the constituency in boroughs, and six pence in counties. It is hoped that this difficulty, which is perhaps not a very real difficulty but one to which certain objections will be taken, can also be ironed out in committee.

The definition of political expenses and political purposes will perhaps not appeal to all those who are intended to be covered by this act. The definition of a political expense is so drawn as to include all outlays designed to affect public opinion or governmental action other than such action as is consequent upon judicial or semi-judicial procedure. And "political purpose" means:

> The purpose of promoting or opposing the selection of candidates or of any person as a candidate for membership in the House of Commons, the return of any such candidate, the enactment or repeal of any legislation either by parliament or affecting its legislative jurisdiction, the adoption of any resolution by either house of parliament or the adoption of any policy or the taking of any action by the governor general in council, and extends to and includes all and any analogous purposes.

This definition will at once appear to the house to be pretty broad. Certain associations and corporations who do not, generally speaking, consider themselves to be of a political character will inevitably when they engage in their normal activities be embraced within this definition. I could say, for instance. that if such an association existed as a civic reform league which wished to engage counsel for the purpose of promoting the passage of this bill, it would itself probably be the first to come under its provisions. But may I point out to the house that it is essential that all who take part in or undertake any political action must come under the provisions of this act. Otherwise there will be loopholes left for individuals and organizations, and it might be that the effectiveness of the legislation would be destroyed. We must, if this bill is to be of any effect whatsoever, take all precautions to prevent any evasion of its provisions.

I agree, and I presume this will be urged during the discussion, that we must not go beyond the lengths to which public opinion would want us to go. This may be perhaps considered as legislation similar to sumptuary legislation or to liquor prohibition legislation. It must have the support of the public, and this particular legislation must have the support of the persons most directly interested, namely, members of parliament. Otherwise it cannot be of any effect. I am quite aware it will be urged that you cannot make people honest by act of parliament. Perhaps you cannot make them honest by act of parliament but you can point out in legislation what their responsibility is with respect to the carrying on of perfectly legitimate actions on their part, and explain to them by that legislation that if they do not follow the prescribed procedure they will be obliged to submit to certain penalties.

I suggest that here is a draft bill which covers the main points of certain objections which have been made to our electoral system. Here in cold print the members of this house may see a means of getting away from the abuses which have been inherent in our system. It is their responsibility to study it, and I suggest that it is worthy of their study and attention.

Two points I think will be brought up during the course of the discussion, and perhaps I had better deal with them now. First, is a central campaign fund necessary and essential? To this question I reply that, although it may not be absolutely necessary or essential, it is undoubtedly of some advantage to the public. We in this house and in our political activities, however important we may believe our policies, our pronouncements, our discussions and debates may be, must realize that there are outside of this house and throughout the country many, many thousands of persons who are far less interested in us and in our activities and in governmental activities than they are in the sports page of the newspaper, or in the radio or the movies. These people, when election time comes along, must be educated. It is true that under our present system this education is partisan; it is carried out by political parties. But I submit that it is some kind of education, and it provides a means by which an informed verdict may be rendered at a general election. But I would also say this, that a large part of the expenditure made is unnecessary and wasteful, and that a great deal of it is made simply to keep up with the Joneses. If one political party sees that another political party has set up a billboard in a conspicuous place, immediately it must set up a billboard of its own. If one political party has a half-page cartoon in a newspaper, immediately the other parties must have a similar cartoon.

Mr. MacNICOL: Maybe a better one.

Mr. POWER: Possibly a more expensive one, which all goes to prove my point that a large proportion of the expenditure thus made on advertising, billboards and the radio, is almost wholly unnecessary.

With respect to the second suggestion, may I pause to deal with a suggestion that has been made that the state assume some responsibility for this expenditure in relation to the education of the people during a general election. It might be done, but I submit that the difficulties in endeavouring to apportion the moneys which parliament had voted for the purpose of an election as between the contending parties or the contending candidates would be so great as to make it almost impossible to carry it out—and I say that advisedly in the face of the knowledge which we have that in Great Britain it is possible, without too much complaint, for the British Broadcasting Corporation to allot certain hours to the different political parties for radio broadcasting. But even there, I have lately heard, all political parties and groups are not satisfied with the allotment given them by the British Broadcasting Corporation.

The second question, which is perhaps more important, is, will the publication of campaign contributions bring about the disappearance of such contributions altogether? I admit that it will curtail them somewhat. But we have the example of the United States before us. In the United States, first by voluntary action, I think in 1908, and later by enforceable legislation, the details of campaign subscriptions were made public, and even though we do hear that political parties have not on all and every occasion all the funds which they believe to be necessary, we know that they are able to raise considerable sums for the purpose of their electoral propaganda. But I believe that in this country, if once it were firmly established that no large contributions could be made and that no large funds existed, a very large number of people, stalwart adherents of the theories of government to which their parties were attached, would come forward, finding that their five dollars or ten dollars, which they feared would not be acceptable—on account of their comparative insignificance—under the old system, would now be acceptable, and would support their parties with such donations. In any case, I submit, democracy is in a bad way indeed if we cannot function without secret funds, backdoor subscriptions and underground contributions. What is perhaps still more dangerous is that the widespread belief in the existence of such funds leads to an insistent demand, sometimes very difficult to refuse, by constituency organizations for large sums of money to be expended on individual constituencies.

That brings me to the second object of the bill, that is to say, limitation of expenditure by candidates in promoting their election to parliament.

May I say here that I do not believe that a wholesale purchase of votes is any longer either effective, practicable or popular, whatever may have been the case thirty or forty years ago; and it is perhaps within the memory of very many of us—I know it is within my memory—that people were literally bought on the market place, gangs of forty or fifty men actually sitting on the fence waiting until funds were provided so that they could vote.

Miss MACPHAIL: No women.

Mr. POWER: Women were not allowed to vote in those days. There are some who will say that the present parlous state of our politics was brought about after the women were given the vote. I am not saying that. But I think I can affirm that the barter of votes as carried on in days gone by no longer exists except perhaps in certain backward communities and remote constituencies. Nevertheless the fact is evident that the cost of elections is getting higher year by year. I make no reference to any particular constituencies. My own experience has been that when the money was available it was spent and when there was no money the work was done just the same.

An hon. MEMBER: Perhaps better.

Mr. POWER: That gives me ground for the hope that if, generally speaking throughout all the constituencies, the same condition existed—a very small amount of election funds —the election would go on just the same and the result would not be any different. I also have some hope that if there was provision in the legislation for the publication of the detailed expenditures, a very large number of persons who now desire to be compensated for their services would out of very shame be only too willing to work without any compensation whatsoever. There has grown up in our body politic a class of racketeers, organizers, in some cases owners of newspapers—

An hon. MEMBER: Be careful.

Mr. POWER: —owners of public halls, pamphleteers, writers and others who believe that the election period is a very carnival for them in order that they may charge, during that election, rates which they would never dare to contemplate at any other time. Even the righteous are sometimes attacked by the same virus. It is within the experience of most of us that candidates are ofttimes saddled with the performance of innumerable good works which they are not in the habit of performing at any other time. They must subscribe to carnivals, to bazaars, to tombolas, to church festivals—

An hon. MEMBER: Sweepstakes.

Mr. POWER: —sweepstakes, and popularity contests, in order to make themselves solid with the electorate. It has been said, in a facetious way, perhaps, that the politician's extremity was the puritan's opportunity. Be that as it may, the demands on the purse of the poor unfortunate candidate are such that often it is absolutely impossible for the ordinary citizen to place his services at the disposal of the state. What must he do? He must turn either to his friends or to some one else, and more often to the party funds, for assistance. This assistance is often, indeed almost always furnished to him without his knowledge as to its character and certainly as to its extent; and perhaps I may say here, with no disrespect and no intention of wounding the feelings of any of my colleagues or calling into question the word or conscience of any member of this house, that they are, with premeditation probably, the most blissfully ignorant class in the whole world.

I said that "keeping up with the Joneses" was one of the reasons which brought about the expenditure in connection with general campaign funds. There is another motive which brings about large expenditures in individual constituencies. It is fear. No one of us would deliberately spend money for corrupt purposes. All the candidates and all hon. members, so far as I am concerned, are honest and law-abiding citizens, but in no other sphere of our life is there so ready an acceptation of the old axiom that "the end justifies the means," and that the other fellow is going to do it if we don't do it. What brings about the greater portion of unlawful, illegal, not to say corrupt political expenditure is the fear that the other side will do something similar and do it first. How many times, in discussing elections after the event, have not two or three or more men from different political groups or allegiances got together and said, "Surely it should be possible among ourselves, who in every other one of our activities, are honest, decent, law-abiding citizens, to get together and see to it that our partisans and supporters shall be obliged to hew close to the line and run a decent, clean and honest election." Now, if two opponents can do that, if in individual constituencies that idea can be carried out—and I am told that it has been done—why cannot we all here as members of parliament, who know that evils exist and know what they are, also get together and by agreement decide which of these evils should be eliminated and then sanction that agreement by legislation? And that is what this bill proposes to do.

The bill is not a self-denying ordinance; it is a self-protective ordinance so far as members of parliament are concerned. From the purely practical politician's standpoint it proposes to take steps to prevent an increase in electoral expenditure, and to bring it to the point where an ordinary citizen can face the prospect of an election with honest intention and clean hands. But altogether apart from our own purely selfish interests, there is perhaps a higher and more important aspect of the question. Undoubtedly there is growing throughout the country a contempt for politicians and distrust of certain phases of party politics. There is a belief firmly implanted in the minds of many thoughtful men that the result of electoral campaigns is not a true reflection of the views and opinions of the people, but that these views and opinions have been influenced by propaganda and sometimes by corrupt and corrupting funds raised by people who hope to profit by the advent to, or the maintenance of one party or another in, places of power and responsibility.

Personally, and looking over the results of more recent political campaigns, in general elections particularly, I am not inclined to agree with that view. I believe that almost any one of us, giving a little study to the course of recent campaigns back through the last quarter or half a century, will come to the conclusion that there were many other factors than that of the expenditure of money that contributed, aye, that influenced and carried the verdict of the electorate. But the real point is not that there exist these corrupt practices and these enormous funds for the purpose of manipulating elections. The real point is that if they continue to increase future campaigns might be so influenced. And more important still is the fact that the impression is abroad that actually, and in the future, campaign results will be influenced by the expenditure of large funds on behalf of some party or other. This impression, I submit, is harmful; it is detrimental and it brings our whole system into disrepute.

Our present democratic system is built on confidence. Destroy that confidence and the value of our institutions is almost entirely impaired. A greater threat by far to democracy than the "isms" that now infest our body politic is the belief that electoral manipulation, electoral manoeuvring, "electoralism" as it is called in our province, is undermining the very basis of democracy. We must, if we wish to firmly establish democracy again in the minds of our people, pay some heed to that belief and endeavour to cure the ills that appear at the moment to be inherent in the system. There is going on at the present time a world wide struggle between totalitarianism and democracy. It has its reflection in this country, and it devolves upon us, who believe in our present system of government, to endeavour to cure the ills that are inherent in it. I believe that we can accomplish this by cleaning house where housecleaning is necessary, and I also believe that if we do not soon clean house we shall be open to the charge of being indifferent and negligent in our duty.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): The very excellent address to which we have listened from the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) is, I hope, an augury of its reflection in adequate legislation. No matter has more engrossed the attention of thoughtful men than the question of electoral corruption, and in every country where democratic institutions have been established, an earnest effort has been made to secure their perpetuation by the generation that has had to deal with the problem.

It was not so very long ago that Walpole said that every man had his price; and yet great changes have taken place since that time. It was not so very long ago that we had open voting; and yet the introduction of the ballot did not result in what was very strongly hoped for at the time it was introduced. It was not so very long ago that the printing press made it possible to express the views of contending parties by the circulation of pamphlets in very large numbers throughout the constituencies; and yet the pamphleteer had his greatest innings in the eighteenth century. It was not so very long ago that we endeavoured in this house to deal with the difficulties of personation; and I can recall the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat when an effort was being made in that direction. I am bound to say that despite all the efforts that were made personation still continued and does continue in this country on a very amazing scale. It was not so very long ago that we talked about elections not being won with prayers; and yet I have it, on what I conceive to be not only sound but absolutely correct authority, that as much as $42,000 was made available for one seat in a local election in the province of Ontario.

That gives you some idea of what I mean. It was not so very long ago that we talked about the methods that were used for the purpose of circumventing the law. I do not think it would be very difficult to give the evidences, if I were called upon, of men who, canvassing, would ask for a glass of water and express a willingness to pay $10 for it. And I had it from a gentleman who himself was interested that not so very long ago, in fact within the last two years, large quantities of flour and sugar have been made available for very small sums of money to those who had the right kind of ticket to present in payment. Sometimes a cabbage would buy a substantial quantity of flour, or another vegetable would buy a substantial amount of sugar. I am not suggesting for a moment that one party had any monopoly of these matters; I never have. But I cannot but remember investigations that have taken place in this house. I was reminding some of our friends who were discussing this matter with me the other day of what reached its flood tide level in connection with the Huron West election. If any hon. member cares to look at the journals of the House of Commons to see what was done, he will find that schools were established for the purpose of teaching people how to have a blacklead under the thumb nail so as to be able to mark a ballot in favour of a given candidate while the real ballot never reached the ballot box. All these are things which, I hope, we are outgrowing, but have not entirely outgrown. If the bill to be presented by the minister will do anything to accelerate progress in that direction, it will indeed accomplish much.

But it is not with that phase of the matter that this legislation proposes to deal. It deals with the relationship of the candidate to the constituency. By the candidate I mean his party, his organization, and—from what the minister has said; of course I have not seen the measure—the central authority which directs the operations of the campaign, that is, the general staff. No one who is familiar with these matters will endeavour to minimize the difficulty of dealing with them. He would indeed be a fool who would suggest that they can be dealt with by a stroke of a pen; who thinks that all you have to do is to pass a bill through parliament and the matter is ended. What is more, in nine cases out of ten—I think it is not too high an average—it is over-enthusiastic friends of the candidate who cause the difficulty. When I say over-enthusiastic friends I mean men who very often have no public conscience at all, who look upon politics as a game and the prostitution of the electorate as something to be commended rather than otherwise. No one who has read, for instance, the records of some of the election courts during the last half century, or the reports of the special committees in this house, can fail to realize that there has grown up—not limited entirely to one party, let me say again—a class of men whose one purpose in life is to flourish at election times and see how much they can get out of the candidate and the use they can put it to for the purpose of prostituting the electorate. There is the man who is handy with money. He is always in evidence. I have seen such men even in more recent years, who are perfectly willing to be entrusted with substantial sums of money to meet legitimate election costs, and who unfortunately grow rich in the process while the electors become correspondingly poor.

When the minister said that the House of Commons was the most blissfully ignorant institution in the world in this regard I could not but recall an occasion on which I said: Will any hon. gentleman in this house say that his campaign has not been assisted by funds from another source than his own purse? I think there were two hon. members in the chamber who asserted their innocence, and one had such a bland and childlike countenance that I have never forgotten it. It was the personification of an innocence which could hardly live in the twentieth century, and was more entitled to the honour of sainthood than that of a member of parliament. It would be idle to disguise from ourselves as thoughtful men and as trustees for the future that this evil exists. The question is how it is to be met.

When I was away from Canada I endeavoured to ascertain how it was being dealt with by other democracies. I have studied to some extent conditions in the United States. I shall never forget what a distinguished man there said to me. As chairman of a committee connected with one of the service clubs, his duty was to do what he could during his term of office to advance citizenship. I asked him: "How do you manage, for instance, in a great city like Pittsburgh, in connection with elections"? He replied: "I really could not tell you, Mr. Bennett, how we deal with that in detail, but as far as I know the party says: We want a majority of say fifty from that precinct, and they take the necessary steps to get it." That was all he could say about it, which struck me as passing strange.

They have made great progress in the United States in dealing with the problem. The minister said he intended to give us some facts with respect to the progress made there; I assume that in committee he will do so. Each state has dealt with the matter from the standpoint of state elections. It will be recalled that the federal power utilizes the state machinery in connection with elections to congress, which take place every two years, and elections to the senate, which happen less frequently. They have made very great advances. Any hon. members who have read the life of Mark Hanna will readily understand what I mean: the tremendous cost involved in, for instance, the conduct of the last effort that he made to card index a state—I think Illinois—just before a very vital election.

The question of where the money comes from is very important. It is also very important to know where it goes. You may have a small sum of money and may use it for corrupt purposes; you may have a large sum and use it all for legal and correct purposes. The question of the end or use to which the money is put becomes of great importance. Therefore apart altogether from establishing the source of funds it would seem that the extent to which money may be used to accomplish a purpose becomes of transcendent importance. We talk of this democratic form of government as government of the people, by the people and for the people; it flows very glibly from our tongues. But the first question that is asked in connection with an election, especially a by-election, is, what is it going to cost? Expert testimony could be given on that point in this chamber, I have no doubt. In fact I might be able to satisfy the curiosity of some of our friends in that regard myself. The question of the amount that may be expended in an election becomes of very great importance.

In England this matter was very carefully studied, and the amount that may be expended by a candidate in an election has been fixed. But as one of my friends said, that involves at once the question of the uneven distribution of votes in constituencies in this country. I pointed out here some time ago, for instance, that we realize that the redistribution in the eastern end of Ontario is not a fair distribution in the sense in which you and I use that word in everyday life. Yet the long established character of the constituencies, the fact that they always were separate from a neighbouring constituency, was given consideration. The effect was, of course, that one constituency in the Niagara peninsula has a population nearly as great, we will say, as two, if not three, of those constituencies. They were rural constituencies, while in the Niagara peninsula you had large urban communities. That has a direct effect upon the question of limiting the amount of expenditures in elections. If it is four pence or five pence per head of the population—

Mr. POWER: I said four pence. It is five pence for an elector in a borough, and six pence in a county.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. I have called it ten cents, roughly, in our country.

Mr. POWER: Besides the personal expenses; they are not included.

Mr. BENNETT: No, it does not include that. The candidate pays for staying at a hotel over night, or for gasoline for his car, or the operation of a motor car. Those are expenditures made by a candidate for all purposes, but not for getting in the vote. For instance, there are halls, bands, radios, advertising and all that sort of thing included in the five pence for the county.

Mr. POWER: And there is a mailing privilege also, of so much a name. There is permission for two ounces of election matter free, which amounts to a thousand pounds in some cases.

Mr. BENNETT: A very large amount, I suppose, in some places. But roughly, the figure I have used in making the computation was ten cents. Five pence is substantially ten cents. In some constituencies that would limit the expenditure to a small sum of money. In some it would amount to a very large sum of money. In a large city constituency, for instance, there might be a very dense population, and the expenditure would be large.

I do not know to what extent we may be able, in a measure, perhaps, to deal with the matter, and I am not going to anticipate what the measure provides in that regard. All I can say is I regard it as absolutely essential that some such restriction should be provided.

The question of compulsory voting was not referred to by the minister. In a sense, it has nothing to do with this measure; in reality it applies more directly to the franchise measure. But I am bound to say that the experience in Australia in that regard has been exceedingly satisfactory—most amazingly satisfactory. For instance, let us consider one of the difficulties we have all had. The law says that you shall not employ motor cars on election day to bring out the vote. If I were to ask for all those who have not paid for motor cars to hold up their hands, members who live in cities, I believe there would be a dearth of uplifted hands.

Mr. DUNNING: Except from the innocents, who do not know.

Mr. BENNETT: Are there any? Well, if there are, I would like to see their photographs; but, be that as it may, that is the reason I say compulsory voting has become so very useful in a country like Australia. It would be useful in Canada. What is more, in the recent election down there I am advised it worked even more satisfactorily than in the previous one. I know that the gentleman who was entrusted by the government to obtain information to be made available to the special committee communicated with Australia and New Zealand, because while I was there his communications were being dealt with, and the gentleman in charge asked me if I knew anything about it. Would it be possible to deal with that phase of the matter? I do not know. At one time I believed it would be a very satisfactory method of dealing with one phase of our difficulty. It is a matter which I think we shall have to discuss in some detail.

We must consider also the method of voting, which also has something to do with the question of corrupt practices. Then we have what is the most difficult of all—the result of wrong practices. I had expected to hear the minister say something about that. Mr. Speaker, so long as we leave the corrupt elections act as it is to-day, we might as well conclude that we are wasting our time in passing this legislation. If a thousand dollars has to be put up as a deposit, and all the machinery of the law resorted to, with all the technicalities which can be relied upon by those who defend themselves against an attack on their seat, we are wasting our time.

I would like my friends in the house just to look at the records—and what I am about to say has no personal application at all. For instance, we provided that it was necessary to file returns. We provided that if they were not filed certain results would follow. They have not always been filed on time. Extensions have not been granted. Then, on an ex parte application, with just an advertisement in a newspaper, you go to a friendly judge and get an order on the ground that you did not think about it. Or, in the language of my friend the Minister of Finance, you are innocent of it.

All that must in some way be met. What is the sense in our passing this legislation if it requires the deposit of a thousand dollars to unseat a member who has relied upon these very things—all the technical machinery of the law, which may be relied upon, through the employment of skilled members of the legal profession? There must be some summary method of dealing with it, and that summary method must provide that upon proof of contravention of the provisions to which the minister has referred this afternoon, that man must forfeit his seat. And when you have men learning that their seats may be lost you will find a very great measure of care being exercised.

A great many election petitions have been filed in our lifetime, but I venture to say that not many hon. members can recall even five that went to trial and were dealt with. I venture to say there are not five we could speak of, from knowledge, during a period of thirty years or more. I believe the only one in Alberta in that period of time was one which I brought for the purpose of determining whether or not ballots marked with a fountain pen or an indelible pencil were valid ballots. I had a majority, if they were valid; I was in the minority if they were invalid. The court decided they were invalid, which was in accordance with the precedents of the past. That is the only one I can refer to, or with which I am familiar in Alberta.

In British Columbia I cannot recall one controverted election case in a quarter of a century. Certainly I know of none in Saskatchewan, with the exception of the one in Moose Jaw, with respect to which I believe action was brought by the now Mr. Justice Knowles against a gentleman named Johnston —I believe that was the name. That is the only one I can recall.

Mr. DUNNING: There was one connected with the provincial house, in the north.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, in the Prince Albert constituency—and it is a terrible story to read, as it is reported, at any rate.

Mr. STIRLING: And Athabaska.

Mr. BENNETT: Athabaska did not come, of course, under the controverted elections act. We appointed a commission in Athabaska. The commission made a report; it was proven beyond peradventure what had happened, and the seat was ultimately vacated. But in Manitoba there was once a great deal of difficulty. I am tempted to remind the house of the part women sometimes play in enforcing a sense of morality on the part of their husbands. I believe it is sufficient for my purpose to say that in one instance a substantial sum of money was paid to a man for looking the other way while votes were being counted. His wife discovered what had been done. The money was brought to court and deposited there on the ground that it was ill gotten and had been improperly taken. It was the influence of the woman which had made it possible for that to be done.

Mr. MacLENNAN: What happened to her?

Mr. BENNETT: I will tell you, my cynical friend, what happened to her: she had the proud satisfaction of self-respect. That is what she had, and that is somewhat important.

During the last twenty-five years I can recall no federal election protests in Ontario. Before that we had substantial numbers. We will remember that there was a very important one from London; and we will remember too the one concerning the Hurons, which it is unnecessary to discuss, and some others as well which need not here be gone into. In Quebec there have been very few in recent years, none so far as I can remember in twenty-five years in the federal arena. One of the most important ones you will find is in volume 1 of the supreme court reports. It had to do with that Minister of Public Works who was blamed for making a carpenter shop into the Supreme Court of Canada. I dare say that most hon. members are familiar with that story. Our supreme court, like the supreme court of the United States, was not dignified with very fine premises. As you know, the supreme court of the United States was not thought to be very important when it came into being and it was given a poor little room in which to sit. An old carpenter shop was turned into the Supreme Court of Canada. In connection with the question of the influence of the clergy in elections an appeal was taken by the late Sir Hector Langevin. The court decided against him and the Supreme Court of Canada never found other quarters.

Mr. DUNNING: And have not to this day.

Mr. BENNETT: And have not to this day. That was always the sort of tradition that attached to the story of the Supreme Court of Canada.

I ask this simple question: What are we going to do to make effective the provisions suggested by the minister? We have been making provisions of various kinds ever since we had an election law. We have been extending them year after year. I recall the observations of the then Minister of Justice who with the Secretary of State was dealing with the problem. The present Minister of Finance referred in a cynical way to the small effect that such legislation would have upon human conduct and action. At that time we were dealing with the question of impersonation, familiarly known down here as telegraphing. In western Canada we do not know it by that name and for obvious reasons we have had very little of it. I was much impressed then by the observations of the present Minister of Pensions and National Health in connection with the proposed legislation. He did not think it would accomplish much; I am not familiar enough with conditions to say whether it did or did not. But are we going to have this legislation accomplish anything, or are we going to fold our hands and say: Behold what we have done; look upon our goodly works! The same old story will go on and on in the same old way. Not so publicly, but nevertheless it will go on because we have not made the punishment fit the crime, in the language of the Mikado.

If we are going to pass this legislation, then an inevitable result must follow. And it must follow by summary process, by a summary judicial effort. It must not be necessary to deposit a thousand dollars, it must not be necessary to meet all the technical requirements now in the act. The inspector general of elections should be in a position, at the request of any elector in any constituency, to demand that action be taken and that that action should be summary. A man should forfeit his seat upon proof of an illegal condition existing. If he says he did not know, that is no excuse. It is the job of a candidate to know what is being done. That is the reason he is a candidate. If we once open the door by saying that all that is needed is to say that a candidate has no knowledge, and therefore the result of the loss of his seat does not flow from the proof of these conditions, you will be destroying entirely the efficacy of the law.

If we mean business, there is just one thing we must do. We must provide for summary process. In order to promote the effective and efficient administration of the law we must not hedge it about with conditions that make it impossible for the average man to take action. I am as satisfied as I could be of anything in the world that once we provide for summary process of dealing with these offences, you will see such a change in the electoral life of this country that you will hardly know it. I doubt if there is any greater offence against the sound conduct of elections, even in the payment of money for votes, than to have someone say on behalf of the government, "I promise you this if you will do so and so." I want hon. members to release me from any desire to make any personal application of this. That is a phase of it upon which I thought the minister was going to touch.

Mr. POWER: I shall come to that.

Mr. BENNETT: It might have been done better in the minister's opening statement.

Mr. POWER: On another bill.

Mr. BENNETT: That is very gratifying. It will probably have an effect upon all of us. When I say "all of us," I mean men in office and men who might be in office. As I do not intend to be in office any more, it is simple and easy for me to talk from a dispassionate viewpoint.

May I dwell once more upon one phase of this matter? We must by some means provide for a result when there is a violation of the statute. This measure as presented by the minister is admirable, but there are some expansions possible. I shall not go into them until we have the particulars; it is idle to talk about details when we have not seen the measure itself. But it will have to be expanded if we mean business. If we are to do something worth while, if we are to prevent the racketeer and the hoodlum, this combination which has been bleeding all parties during the years, from carrying on, we must provide a punishment to fit the crime. If a candidate is likely to lose his seat he will not have this combination going around handling his election. The minister quite properly puts his finger upon it. He has had more to do with elections than I and he knows what he is talking about. He said with great frankness that the danger lies in the fact that you have this type of person dealing with a situation about which he does not want the candidate to know anything, and about which the candidate does not want to know anything—where the money comes from that runs the election.

That is the only phase of it that I should like to dwell upon. It is the only hope I have for any improvement in conditions. I shall discuss the question of compulsory voting on another occasion when another bill is before us. I do not think it properly comes under this resolution, but apart from all that let me say that if we are to make this measure effective there is just one way to do it, and that one way we should follow. Legislators are always very careful about matters of this kind because they realize sometimes that they have an election to run in the not too distant future. They are always concerned about it. Here is a test of our citizenship. Here is a test of our love of democracy. Here is a test of our sincerity in dealing with realities and not with academic questions. Are we prepared to provide by summary means through a proper official that violation by an elected member of the provisions of this proposed legislation will mean the loss of his seat? If we do that, then we shall have really made a step forward, as they have done in other countries.

I confess, Mr. Speaker, that it was the hope of the late administration that we might be able to deal with some of these matters, and we had information prepared for that purpose, but the pressure of many things which the present government has happily escaped made it not easy to do very many things one would like to have done. But here is something which the government has brought into this house, and which each one of us can help to make effective, not as a party matter, but as representatives of this Dominion of Canada, under a representative system of government. If we mean what we say and say what we mean, then by providing for summary punishment by the loss of a seat in this house for violation of the provisions of this law, we shall have made a very long step forward and shall have made real progress—and progress, as I always say, is a change for the better, not mere change.

That is all I care to say at the moment, Mr. Speaker. I should like to examine the bill in its details before saying that to all its provisions I can give my support, but with the broad general principles that characterize the legislation I am certainly wholly in accord.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to make a speech but I should like to express a word of support for the measure as presented. One cannot sit in this house for any number of years without coming under the temptation of being somewhat cynical. However, I confess I was stirred by the appeal of the minister and I shall gladly take it at one hundred per cent value. We in this corner welcome this move towards cleaner elections, which, I agree with the minister, are essential if we are to maintain democracy.

Mr. R. A. PELLETIER (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my only purpose in rising at this time is because of the experience we have had in this house of a bill not following exactly the terms of the resolution upon which it was based, and I believe the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) is in a very good position to support me in that contention.

I must say that I had hoped that the legislation to do away with corrupt electoral practices would be much more sweeping than is indicated by the resolution before us. However, the minister mentioned that another bill would be brought down as supplementary legislation.

Mr. DUNNING: It is on the order paper now.

Mr. PELLETIER: Thank you. I cannot help recalling, Mr. Speaker, the remarks made in this house some time ago by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who told us that the things we had said were nothing but shadows and the government had no intention of fighting shadows. But I contend that the minister has perfectly justified us to-day because in introducing this legislation he said in effect that the present electoral system was bringing our elections into disrepute. He did not particularize but he did imply that there was something radically wrong with our electoral system; so I think it is clear that we were not speaking of shadows at all but of things that actually existed, indicating that action was necessary.

The Prime Minister not very long ago explained to me how a petition could be presented under the Corrupt Practices Act, chapter 51 of the revised statutes of 1927, which provides that twenty-five or more electors may present a petition upon the deposit of $1,000, and so on. I suggest that if we want to have cleaner elections in this country we should eliminate this requirement of $1,000, as the leader of the opposition himself suggested. I realize that if that were done it might be said that all and sundry would be bringing petitions to the attention of parliament without proper justification, condemning elections held in various parts of the country. I suggest that instead of asking any individual or body of citizens to deposit $1,000 before making any such charge, the deposit requirement be eliminated on the understanding that if the charge failed of proof a certain amount of money should be forfeited for the trouble that had been caused. I hope that suggestion may be looked into by the committee to which this bill will be referred.

The language of the resolution is:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting political expenditures—

It makes no mention of political contributions. It is important to have the words "political contributions" in the resolution, because we remember how a bill founded upon a resolution was brought into this house which, in our opinion, did not carry out the intent of the resolution. Perhaps the minister will give us the assurance that political contributions will be included.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, if no one else is going to speak I should like to say a few words, and I hope that any criticism I may make will not lead the minister or the house to think that I am not heartily in accord with the principle of this resolution. No one, I think, would doubt that, and no one, I think, would oppose the principle of the resolution. But there are one or two points on which I should like a little more information, and perhaps the minister may be able to give it to me in committee.

He spoke of a corporation sole. To my lay mind that carries visions of an incorporated company, and of the expenses that go with incorporating it. I am not clear on that point.

Mr. POWER: There will be no expenses.

Mr. NEILL: That relieves my Scotch soul.

Mr. DUNNING: You can be a corporation without any expense to yourself.

Mr. NEILL: Thank you. I also understood the minister to say that the amount would be based on the number of electors. Is that the number of electors on the voters' list, not those who actually voted?

Mr. POWER: On the list.

Mr. NEILL: That may lead us to see that as many get on the list as possible. I presume, too, the amount would apply to every candidate, whether there was one or six running, that each candidate would be allowed the same expense?

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: That is satisfactory. The minister also made some remark about each electoral district being charged, if I understood him, a pro rata allotment of the total national funds of each party.

Mr. POWER: That would not apply to my hon. friend, who, I take it, is an independent.

Mr. NEILL: I do not want to have anyone running in my seat charged with the expenses of one or other of the parties.

Mr. POWER: Provision is made for independent candidates.

Mr. NEILL: Thank you. Then I understood that he spoke about five pence or six pence, which, the leader of the opposition suggested, would be about ten cents. Am I right in suggesting that possibly that would be the amount?

Mr. POWER: There is no fixed amount in the bill.

Mr. NEILL: Well, will not that have to be inserted?

Mr. POWER: That is left to the committee.

Mr. NEILL: I see. Well, anything like ten cents, as suggested, will be wholly inadequate in a sparsely populated district. In the cities perhaps it would be too much, but in large areas such as the district I represent, and I think also the districts represented by my hon. friends from Cariboo and Skeena it would be utterly impossible to run an election on any such sum as is represented by ten cents for each of the voters, because the expense of canvassing these sparsely settled areas is very great.

I believe it was indicated that contributions to party funds would be published. On the face of it that is an admirable idea, but it is provided for now. The act requires each candidate to publish a statement of all his election expenses and how they are contributed. The way they get around that requirement is to state that a certain amount is contributed by "Mr. Jones and others"—which of course renders the whole thing invalid. If it were made obligatory to give the names of everyone who contributed it would meet the circumstances to a large extent.

Another point upon which, I believe, the leader of the opposition touched, and which may be dealt with in another bill, relates to this matter of election returns. As the successful candidate is compelled, as he should be, to put in the returns of his expenditures, the defeated candidate ought to be compelled to do the same. I can see no reason why the unhappy candidate who succeeds is subject to the loss of his seat, while the man who has done all kinds of corrupt things against him simply says, "Well, you can't unseat me; go to it."

Mr. POWER: The returns are automatic under this bill.

Mr. NEILL: That is very good. I was talking about the publication of contributions. I foresee this possibility of a danger which the minister probably has foreseen and guarded against. There should be some reasonable limit, some low point below which the names of donors would not be published. One can understand the situation of a man holding some small government position, or, someone working on the roads who might be asked by the government road foreman to contribute a five dollar bill to party funds. It would be very difficult for such a person to refuse to do so, and if he contributed, the money might go to the support of a candidate with whom he was wholly out of sympathy. Then after the election is over, the opposition perhaps having been returned, they look up the lists and everyone who contributed five dollars to the campaign funds of the losing party would be discriminated against in the way of road work or things of that kind. I suggest that small amounts, say up to fifty dollars, should not have to be recorded.

Mr. DUNNING: No civil servant will ever contribute under a law like this. Of course he will not.

Mr. NEILL: He might want to. Or he might be advised that it would be to his interest to do it, and it might be very difficult for him to refuse.

There is another point I should like the minister to deal with. Eventually the amount will be stated in the bill; I assume it will be so much for each district. How is a candidate to know until the election is over how much it has cost him? I suppose that very few of us in the bigger districts know within five hundred or a thousand dollars what an election is going to cost until it is over. The candidate will have this haunting fear over him all the time that when the election is over it will be found that he has exceeded the amount allowed by ten dollars, fifty dollars, a hundred dollars. It seems to me there should be some provision by which that can be avoided.

There is another point. The minister says, we will be very strict and say that we must not pay any illegal expenses or even legitimate expenses beyond so much. I think he said that if we had to disclose the names of every person to whom we pay sums of money in connection with an election many people would not ask for any return for their services. That sounds very well, but there is this other side to it. Supposing I hire a man to go to a certain logging camp, perhaps for nothing more than to put up notices that there is to be a meeting there, and it takes him three days, and he asks for fifteen dollars and his expenses: if I pay him that money I have indicated my appreciation of his services, and I am under no further obligation to him. I have paid for that service a man who is perhaps in poor circumstances and may have lost some days' work; it is a thoroughly justifiable and legitimate proceeding. But if he is prevented from accepting money or I am prevented from paying him, then the opposite side of the picture comes around. When the election is over he comes along and says, "I am a poor man; I lost several days working for you; what about it?" I shall have a political claim upon me which I am not entitled to recognize and which perhaps I am unable to recognize. If I had paid him a justifiable remuneration for his work I would not be under the same obligation to him as if he were able to say, "I have worked for you for nothing." That phase ought to be dealt with, or we shall be instituting an evil almost as great as the one it is desired to get away from.

There is just one other remark I should like to make in connection with something which was said by the leader of the opposition, although I understand he was dealing with what it now appears will be dealt with under another bill. He emphasized very strictly that the measure will have no effect at all unless the member concerned will lose his seat by a summary process if he or anyone representing him has been guilty of any infraction, however slight. If that is carried out in its entirety, no member will be able to sit here, because it is an almost impossible requirement, and it would be unfair. I am willing to go the whole length where a connection with a candidate can be shown. If the candidate has been guilty of or has lent himself to any corrupt practice, by all means unseat him. But one can conceive a case in a sparsely settled district or in a large city where a perfectly honest man, representing the candidate at a little polling station, has done something which is technically illegal. Perhaps some one has rung up and said, "I want to go down to vote"; it is voting time, and in his enthusiasm the helper sends a taxi out for that particular person, yet because he has done that the member will be unseated. That sort of thing is not in conformity with the intention of our laws, and if it is attempted to enforce it strictly, the very opposite effect will result. Judges will hesitate to unseat a man on such inadequate grounds. I can see the point when the leader of the opposition says, "You must not begin to tinker with the law, the only way is to have it strict." Yes, have it strict, but also have it work in a reasonable way. I have no doubt that my right hon. friend, as a great lawyer, knows cases where the very strictness of the law has led to its non-enforcement. I know of cases in British Columbia where it was desired in a small way to stop the evil of what is called pit lamping.

Mr. BENNETT: "Hard cases make bad law."

Mr. NEILL: The right hon. gentleman has put it in a nutshell. If you make the penalty too strict the law will not be enforced. My right hon. friend has expressed it much better than I could.

Mr. BENNETT: Those are not my words.

Mr. NEILL: We know of cases before a supreme court judge where a man, because he was personally entirely innocent of wrongdoing, has been relieved of penalities to which he would otherwise be subjected. But if the candidate is guilty let him be unseated, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. HEAPS: I appreciate the statement that has been made by the minister with reference to this bill. I realize how many difficulties stand in the way before we can have what we might term clean elections, but I feel that it is the desire and intention of every hon. member that the elections should be conducted in as clean a way as possible, and that so long as we continue in haphazard fashion as we have done in the past it will be difficult, for the reasons outlined by the minister, to have the elections conducted as we should like them to be. The suggestion I am about to make to the minister and the committee is not a new one. Compulsory voting was, I believe, put before the house first by the leader of the opposition; it was discussed by the committee which considered the elections act last year, and was rejected by that committee. I believe, however, that if it were put into effiect a good many of the difficulties of the past with regard to conducting clean campaigns would automatically disappear. I have in mind the example of Australia, where they have compulsory voting and where little is known of the difficulties with which we in Canada are confronted.

Mr. BENNETT: They had them once.

Mr. HEAPS: They may have had them in years gone by, but now as a result in part of compulsory voting there, that difficulty does not arise. I believe that in one of the last elections in the Commonwealth of Australia over ninety per cent of the people voted. If people were compelled to vote, or, if they were not in a position to do so, compelled to give some valid reason for not voting, the appeals that we have to make at the present time to people to vote, as we have to do in most constituencies, would automatically disappear. I would ask the minister, therefore, in his wisdom to consider the question of compulsory voting as one of the means of overcoming the difficulties that now operate against perfectly clean elections. I am sure it is the desire of every member of the house to see that result brought about.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Power thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 90, respecting political expenditures.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. BENNETT: Is this bill to go to the committee?

Mr. POWER: It is to be referred to the committee immediately on second reading.

Mr. BENNETT: That is, the special committee?

Mr. POWER: Yes. If there is no objection, I might move the second reading.

Mr. BENNETT: I think we should see the bill first. It is undesirable to refer to a special committee a bill we have not seen. The minister will appreciate that point.

Mr. POWER: Certainly

[Mr. Heaps.]

ELECTIONS AND FRANCHISE

MEASURE RESPECTING FRANCHISE OF ELECTORS, ELECTION OF MEMBERS OF HOUSE OF COMMONS AND PRINTING AND PUBLICATION OF ELECTION DOCUMENTS

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the franchise of electors and the election of members of the House of Commons and to make provision for the printing and publication of the Dominion Elections Act and instructions issued thereunder, the printing of voters' lists and other election documents, including forms and ballot papers, and to provide for the salaries or other remuneration of certain officers and employees.

He said: The bill which will follow this resolution is entitled, "An act respecting the franchise of electors and the election of members to the House of Commons." As drafted, it puts in legislative form the recommendations of the committee on elections which has sat during the past two sessions of parliament. It will be remembered that to that committee were referred the questions of proportional representation, the alternative vote, compulsory registration, and compulsory voting. There were also added, under a resolution of this house last year, instructions to make a study of methods employed in bringing about redistribution. With respect to this latter question no report has been made. As regards the first-mentioned matter the committee has made a report after a full and comprehensive study of proportional representation. May I commend to the members of the house the reading of the memorandum supplied to that committee by its counsel with regard to the alternative vote and proportional representation. After a complete study, and having examined into the legislation of countries wherein those systems are in force, the committee came to the decision that the alternative vote and proportional representation, however excellent they might be, were not suitable to conditions in Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: They have very little excellence.

Mr. POWER: My hon. friend says they have very little excellence, and as far as I know he was one of the most assiduous students of those systems. If he has come to the conclusion that they are not to be recommended to the house I, for one, am quite willing to follow in his footsteps and concur in his suggestion.

With respect to compulsory registration and voting, one depends upon the other. I think the committee pretty well came to the conclusion that there could not be compulsory voting unless there was compulsory registration. I do not intend to go into the details of that discussion. The point is that the committee studied very carefully all phases of compulsory voting and registration. As the leader of the opposition has said, information was obtained from Australia, which, I am told, is the only country in the world that has in force absolutely compulsory voting. Other countries, I understand, have some approach to it, but Australia has it in an absolute form. As I say, the committee made a very careful study. It was found, I believe, that compulsory voting had a tendency to decrease abstentions; that was admitted. It was the opinion of the committee that compulsory voting was not practicable without compulsory registration. I am speaking now only from a reading of the reports and from information, because it was not possible for me to attend many of the sittings of the committee. Therefore, if I am inaccurate in any of the statements I make, I have no objection whatever to being checked up by any member of the committee who attended last year.

It was also considered that, in view of the fact that the closed list was to be abolished, at least in rural constituencies, it was extremely difficult to bring in compulsory voting or registration without having the closed list in existence, because one of the sanctions of compulsory voting would be the dropping from the list of the name of the person who did not vote at the previous election. If there were an open list, however, there would be very little point to it.

Mr. BENNETT: That penalty was provided in British Columbia, where they had compulsory voting, but it has not always been included in compulsory voting legislation.

Mr. POWER: It was not in all, but it would appear to me to be almost fundamental that, if compulsory voting is adopted, provision should be made for dropping a person's name from the list if he did not vote. If there are open lists, there is no fixed list at all. The only alternative would be to provide that in case a man wanted to vote, say at a general election, he would be obliged to make some declaration such as this: "I did vote at the last election"; or, alternatively: "I did not vote, the reason being that I was caught in a snowstorm."

Mr. NEILL: In Australia they fine them.

Mr. BENNETT: The matter is dealt with by a provision for registration that takes place between the elections.

Mr. POWER: That question of provision for registration can apply only to closed lists.

I come now to the other sanction in compulsory voting, namely, prosecution. It was found by the committee, I believe, that prosecutions in Australia, were most infrequent and that almost any excuse was considered sufficient. I may be wrong in my figures, but I am under the impression that over quite a period of time only some three thousand persons were prosecuted in Australia.

Mr. BENNETT: There is provision there by which the chief electoral officer receives information with respect to these matters, and he determines whether or not prosecution should take place. I think in the last election something over ninety-one per cent voted.

Mr. POWER: I think that is correct; over ninety per cent of the people voted. The finding of the committee was, I understand, that the number of abstentions was considerably decreased. But we must remember also that the Australian system of voting differs considerably from ours. There one can vote under almost any conditions. One can vote by mail; one can vote in any polling subdivision in the province or state in which one resides. One can vote by what is called declaration, in case an elector's name has been omitted from the roll. So that would have a tendency to bring up the number voting. And one can register by simply sending a letter to the registration officer and receiving from him some kind of receipt. As I said, I did not follow all the discussion, but apparently the committee decided unanimously that compulsory voting and registration are not to be recommended. Since we have been considering these election bills, almost every hon. member who has discussed them with me seems to think the problem can be solved by the introduction of compulsory voting. It appears to be the general opinion both in the house and outside that compulsory voting would bring to the polls a very large number of people who do not now trouble to come. Whether that is true, I am not in a position to say because I have never given it sufficient study.

Mr. MacLENNAN: Not only would it bring more to the polls, but it would prevent them from putting cars on the road and asking the candidate to pay for the cars. It would eliminate that expense.

Mr. POWER: That may be so; I do not know. All I know is that compulsory voting was carefully studied by the committee of thirty members of this house during two years, and as far as I have been able to ascertain, that committee unanimously reported against it.

Mr. HEAPS: Not unanimously.

Mr. POWER: In view of the strong support among the public and in this house for compulsory voting, I would make this suggestion to the committee about to be set up, that they study this question at least once more in order to be able to give the house a clear and definite opinion as to whether or not this system should be accepted in this country.

The disposal of these matters, that is, proportional representation, the alternative vote, compulsory registration and compulsory voting, cleared the way for the preparation of an elections act. It was decided by the committee that the franchise act and the elections act of 1934 should both be repealed and one act substituted. It was decided that the system set up under the 1934 legislation, by which there was an annual revision of the electoral lists, should now be discarded and there should be a reversion to the procedure established under the Dominion Elections Act of 1930 whereby the preparation and the revision of the electoral lists were made after the date of the issue of the writ. It was recommended that a provision for absentee voting enacted in the 1934 legislation should be dropped. I believe it was found on investigation that the procedure was most costly, most complicated, and, moreover, ineffective. I have before me certain figures which indicate how costly the system was. Out of a total of 5,354 ballots there were 1,553 rejected, leaving only 3,801 valid ballots. The total cost of absentee voting was approximately $250,000, or more than $46 per electoral vote, and more than $65 for every valid ballot cast. The committee therefore recommended the abolition of absentee voting.

Mr. NEILL: Has the minister the cost of advanced poll votes?

Mr. POWER: I have not.

Mr. NEILL: For the purpose of comparison.

Mr. POWER: I do not know whether a comparison was made or not. I am referring now largely to the report of the committee. Connected with both the franchise and election machinery is the question of the respective merits of open and closed lists. An open list means that any person who is duly qualified as an elector in a rural polling division, but whose name does not appear on the final list of electors for such division, may vote by taking certain appropriate oaths and being vouched for on polling day. A closed list means that any otherwise qualified person whose name is not on the list may not vote at all. Open lists were authorized, in rural polling divisions only, at the general elections of 1921, 1925, 1926 and 1930 and at all by-elections held between 1920 and 1934. During that period urban polling divisions were those comprised in cities and towns of specified population. The minimum population required in any city or town to be treated as urban has varied with different years. In 1920 the minimum was 1,000; in 1921 it was set at 2,500; in 1925 it was set at 5,000; in 1929 it was set at 10,000, and in 1938 it is proposed to set it at 3,500.

The chief electoral officer informed the committee that during the period 1921 to 1926, with the exception of some abuses committed by summer residents in a few localities, the open lists appear to have given entire satisfaction.

In 1929, by amendments to the Dominion Elections Act, I think the question of summer residents was satisfactorily disposed of. Special legislation was provided, and as far as I am aware no complaints have been heard since that time.

It is provided in the bill, on the recommendation of the committee, that the chief electoral officer is authorized to declare urban any polling division of which the population is transient or floating, or where large gangs of men are employed at some special work.

In a locality wherein the population is less than 3,500, it is considered that closed lists are not necessary, because the people living within those localities know one another. I do not believe there is the great danger which exists where people are strangers to one another, and where the population is greater.

The committee devoted considerable time to the study of a matter mentioned by the leader of the opposition, namely, personation or, as it is sometimes called telegraphing. This is an extremely difficult matter to deal with. The person who commits the crime of personation lays himself open to the most severe penalties. Penalties as severe as could possibly be provided are already provided in the legislation; so I do not think any useful purpose would be served by increasing them.

What is sought is some means of preventing the organization of telegraphing. The former Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), who, I am sorry to say, is not at the present time in his seat, has on numerous occasions accurately described the offences committed by gangs of paid telegraphers.

Mr. BENNETT: They have at certain points the costumes to be used as disguises.

Mr. POWER: In other words, it is organized business. Certain gangs, mostly from the United States, will undertake to poll so many votes at an election.

Mr. BENNETT: For so much money.

Mr. POWER: Yes, for so much money. On many occasions the former Secretary of State has pointed out the difficulty of dealing with that kind of thing. I am told that it exists only in the cities of eastern Canada; that perhaps the western boundary is the Ottawa river and the other boundary the New Brunswick border.

Mr. BENNETT: It was practised in Kingston during the last provincial election. I have the evidence of the case.

Mr. POWER: A great deal of thought was given to finding some means of overcoming these telegraphing difficulties. This expedient was hit upon, namely, of giving to each householder in every dwelling house in a polling subdivision a full copy of the list of electors in that particular poll. In other words, if there were three hundred dwelling houses in a poll, there would be three hundred copies of electoral lists distributed. I believe it would not be necessary to have all children of voting age receive a copy. In actual practice I suppose they would see one. This procedure would have the effect, first of all, of bringing on the electoral lists large numbers of names which normally would be omitted, because the people affected would not, unless they saw the list, take the trouble to have their names added. Neighbours would tell them that their names were not on the list and they would register. Second, it would clean the electoral lists, because people would see names such as John Jones or William Smith, and would know that those men had died five years ago. They might complain to the electoral officers asking that the names be removed from the list. Again, a person might see the name of someone who had changed his place of residence, or of someone who did not have the proper qualifications. At any rate, it would place where it actually belongs, namely on the individual citizen, a certain amount of responsibility for seeing that we have clean electoral lists.

Mr. STIRLING: Does that take care of the apartment houses?

Mr. POWER: A dwelling house would include each dwelling within an apartment house. It is in apartment houses, boarding houses and places like that where this legislation would, I believe, be most effective.

A large number of further amendments were suggested in the committee's recommendations, all of which have been incorporated in the bill. Therefore, so far as the chief electoral officer and counsel for the committee have been able to carry it out, this bill expresses the will of the committee, and is an interpretation of that will in legislative form.

Of course there are certain routine provisions which have been in every electoral act for many years, and those provisions are retained in the bill. Certain clauses which were in the franchise act of 1934 have been dropped, however, and I think it is only fair to call attention to them. The disqualification clauses of section 4 of the Dominion Franchise Act, 1934, have been changed by the elimination of clauses (x) and (xii) of subsection 1. The clauses eliminated are as follows:

> (x) every person who is an inmate of an institution which is maintained by any government or municipality for the housing and maintenance of the poor;
> (xii) in the province of British Columbia, every Doukhobor person and every descendant of any such person, whether born in that province or elsewhere, who is by the law of that province disqualified from voting at an election of a member of the legislative assembly of that province.

Those clauses have been dropped from the disqualification section. However, I want to add that with those exceptions, in so far as counsel and the chief electoral officer have been able to do so, the bill carries out the wishes of the committee. Nothing has been added by officers of the crown, or by the government. There may have been some slight changes made at the suggestion of the chief electoral officer. Moreover, I have not endeavoured to make the changes which would make this election bill conform to the elections expenditures measure, because the committee have not as yet dealt with it. As can readily be understood, quite a number of the sections of the elections act, proper, would necessarily be altered or modified by the operation of the measure affecting election expenditures.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister be good enough to repeat his statement with respect to the deletions?

Mr. POWER: Two clauses have been deleted, one dealing with the aged poor, and the other, which may interest the hon. member, dealing with the Doukhobors. Clause (xii) which I have just read, and which I would repeat, if the hon. member so wished is being dropped in the present instance.

Mr. REID: Was it dropped by the committee?

Mr. POWER: No; as I understand it, the committee did not consider the matter.

The duty which now devolves upon the committee is to review the bill in the light of these recommendations, and to see to it that they are carried out in legislative form in the bill which will be placed before the committee. Because it was not considered advisable to introduce any new matter in the bill, it was thought well that certain amendments which, in the view of the government, might be of some use in any election act should not be introduced in the bill, but should be mentioned in the house so that they might be studied by members of the committee during the course of their deliberations.

It is suggested that examination be made into the practicability of inserting in the elections act a section or sections which would prohibit a candidate from seeking election on the ground, first, that he will, if elected, exert himself more actively or effectively than an opponent to promote the expenditure of public money in making money payments to any individuals, groups or organizations and, second, that the party or group of which the candidate is a supporter will, if it acquires power, consider proposals for making such expenditure more favourably than an opposing party or group. The language is not necessarily drafted in the form in which it will be submitted to the committee, but I think every hon. member will understand the principle involved.

There is another suggested amendment which would make it an offence for any person or persons, either singly or conspiring together, to endeavour to put force or constraint upon any speaker at a public meeting. In other words, this would do away with the practice which exists in some provinces—to some extent in my own province at any rate—of conspiring to break up public meetings by force. There may be some objection to this amendment on the ground that heckling and questioning are fair and legitimate. I believe they are, but the prevention of attempts to stop a candidate or a person discussing a public policy from speaking is something that can be done by legislation. Such a practice should be stopped if at all possible.

Another suggestion is to curb, if not to eradicate entirely, the practice which has grown up in recent years of submitting candidates to what I personally call a perfect plague of questionnaires, pledges and written undertakings that he will take such and such a course of action if elected. I am informed that this amendment may be very difficult to draft. It will be said perhaps that it is a negation of democracy. I am informed that in certain constituencies there were submitted to the unfortunate candidates no fewer than eighteen of these questionnaires, ranging all the way from pledges to abstain from the corrupt use of liquor during the election, a matter which is amply covered by the act, to pledges for the protection of property owners, a purely provincial matter. Our contention is that this forces a candidate to make a pronouncement, under duress, so to speak, on matters of which he cannot, during the election period, have had time to make a comprehensive study. It takes away from him and from the people themselves certain rights and is to some extent a negation of our democratic system of government whereby every member of this house represents all the people of Canada and not any individual class or section.

Mr. BENNETT: The bonus demand in the United States was the best illustration of that.

Mr. POWER: Yes. This practice would tend to make members of parliament mere delegates of classes or sections of the community, whereas those of us who still adhere to the old-fashioned theory, as laid down by Burke to the sheriffs of Bristol, believe that a member of parliament represents all classes and all sections and all people of this Dominion of Canada.

That is about all there is to be said with respect to this bill. The suggestions which I have mentioned will in due course be placed before the committee which, I am sure, will deal with them in its wisdom as it sees fit. When the appropriate time comes, I shall move that the bill be referred back to the committee from which to all intents and purposes it came so that it can be put into final shape.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Could the minister tell me if the government has given any consideration to the alternative vote in the western provinces? I was a member of the committee although I was not able to attend all the sittings. I know the majority of the members were not in favour of the alternative vote, but the minister has made reference to the fact that a member should represent all classes. I think if he reviews the votes in the last three elections in Saskatchewan, he will realize that all classes are not represented properly. I believe the introduction of the alternative vote is the only way to bring this about.

I have before me the figures for the last three elections in Saskatchewan. It was interesting to note that in the 1930 federal election the Liberal party polled 153,673 votes to elect eleven members; the Conservative party polled 129,420 votes to elect eight members, and all others polled 47,000 votes to elect two members. The total number of votes in that election was 330,093. In the 1934 provincial election there were 424,682 votes polled, or nearly 100,000 more than the number cast in the 1930 election. In this instance the Liberal party polled 206,191 votes to elect fifty members; the Conservative party polled 114,973 votes to elect no members, and the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation polled 103,518 votes to elect five members. In this instance the representation was not fair as far as the general public was concerned.

In the 1935 federal election the total number of votes polled was 262,404. I would direct the attention of hon. members to the fact that the total vote had dropped nearly 200,000. It will be seen what compulsory voting would have done in this case. A great number of people never came out to vote and possibly that influenced the results. The Liberals polled 107,427 votes to elect sixteen members; the Conservatives polled 55,402 votes to elect one member; the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation polled 50,675 votes to elect two members, and the social crediters polled 48,900 votes to elect two members.

In 1935 a private bill to amend the elections act was introduced into this house, and this bill, which was eventually taken over by the government, came up for consideration at the very end of the session. I remember the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) asked the government to withhold the measure because a discussion would prolong the session. He gave general support to the idea of the alternative vote being practised in one or two of the western provinces. The opposition, as well as the government members, gave a general expression in favour of it. However, because of the nearness of the close of the session it was decided to drop the matter. When we consider the vote in Saskatchewan in the last three elections I think we must realize the need for compulsory voting and the alternative vote. If the government would like to put this into force all over Canada, it would be all right with me.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Is my hon. friend in favour of the alternative vote being applicable to only one section of the country?

Mr. PERLEY: I would be quite prepared to have it applied to all Canada, but I think the results of the last three or four elections in Saskatchewan are evidence of the need for it there.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): As a member of the committee I should like to say a word in support of the general principles of the bill to be founded upon what the minister has said. Perhaps I might take a minute or two to explain why the committee did not recommend compulsory voting. The committee went thoroughly into the question and had before them the for and against arguments from every country that had had compulsory voting in operation. Most members of the committee had looked with a certain amount of favour upon compulsory voting; but, upon hearing the facts submitted, the committee decided not to recommend any such change. Compulsory voting had been tried in Switzerland, and had been a failure; it had been tried in Czechoslovakia, and had been a failure; it had been tried in Belgium and Holland, and had been a failure in both countries; it had been a failure in the Argentine; but apparently it was a success in Australia.

On the other hand, our present system of voting in Canada has not been such a dismal failure. It is true that in Australia, under compulsory voting, the percentage of those voting increased materially. The percentage voting in Australia under compulsory voting is between 91 and 95 per cent. On the other hand, the informal vote has been as high as 11·35 per cent. In Canada in the last general election the percentage of those voting was 74·17 per cent. That rose in Prince Edward Island to over 80 per cent, and in many individual ridings the number voting was between 85 and 90 per cent. In two ridings it was over 90 per cent. So Canada has not so much to feel ashamed of in the percentage of those voting.

Mr. HEAPS: Was not the 1935 figure an exceptionally high average, namely, 74·17 per cent?

Mr. MacNICOL: I would say no. The percentage may have been higher in previous elections. I would take 74·17 per cent to be the average.

In the 1935 general election in Canada the number on the list was 5,918,207, of whom 4,452,671 voted, or 74·17 per cent. But in Canada the informal vote was approximately one per cent; that is, the spoiled ballots comprised approximately one per cent of the total vote, whereas in Australia the spoiled ballots rose to 11·35 per cent. So in the aggregate, I doubt if we are very much worse off in Canada than they are in Australia.

The committee felt that if compulsory voting were adopted in this country, it would be necessary to provide against elections being held in the winter months of December, January, February and perhaps March, for a bad snowstorm on election day would mean a drop in the percentage of those voting and would result in a great number of people being summoned for not voting. Someone asked, while the minister was speaking, what was the number summoned in Australia for not casting their votes. Out of over four million voters on the lists, 3,750 were summoned and prosecuted for not voting.

I was not quite able to follow the minister and tell whether one of the suggestions that had been made by myself had been adopted. The suggestion was, I believe, allowed to stand for further consideration. It is one that would, I think, eliminate a good deal of the trouble and expense which now surround voting in the ridings, and I commend it to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who, I know, desires to frame an act that will be one hundred per cent perfect. My suggestion is this, that if the government appoints the deputy returning officer for each individual poll, the opposition, or the party which had the second largest number of votes in the previous election, should appoint the clerk. My idea is this, that if we had two men from opposite parties in command of the poll in the subdivision, this would eliminate the necessity for scrutineers, which is quite an expense in any event; it would cut down the expenses of every candidate, and in the second place it would be difficult for either the returning officer, the deputy returning officer, or the clerk, to do anything irregular. If that proposal is not contained in the bill, I commend it to the Prime Minister's consideration.

The minister also said something about the possibility of preventing questionnaires from being submitted to candidates, and I am heartily in accord with that. I do not see how any candidate can sign a document committing himself to this or that particular thing if elected, without surrendering his independence to vote as he feels he should on the matters that come up in the house.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) said something about the alternative vote, and gave one or two instances in Saskatchewan; but for every instance he gave, ten could be mentioned on the other side to prove that the alternative vote has generally been a menace to constitutional government.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

In Australia, for example, in one senatorial election held under the alternative vote, 860,000 votes were polled by the Liberal party and seventeen senators were elected; 820,000 votes were polled by the Labour party and one senator was elected; and 173,000 votes were polled for the Farmers' party, with no senator elected. I could give scores of similar instances of the failure of the alternative vote. It is a greater menace than even proportional representation, and they are both menaces. I am glad that the committee recommended that neither of them should be adopted in Canada.

Mr. C. E. BOTHWELL (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) has raised the question of the alternative vote, I think it might be well to put before the house the reasons why the committee rejected both proportional representation and the alternative vote. The question was referred to the committee and dealt with during the session of 1936. At that time we had three sponsors of proportional representation before the committee. We also had counsel for the committee make a study of proportional representation and the alternative vote. It may be well in the first place to put on record just what is meant by proportional representation.

Mr. BENNETT: Which system of proportional representation?

Mr. BOTHWELL: The system of proportional representation as defined by Sir John Fischer Williams is as follows:

> Proportional representation is the name given to all those electoral methods which aim at reproducing in the elected party the opinions of the electorate in their true proportions . . . all such electoral methods have this in common, that they reject the attempt to represent by one individual the electors resident in one geographical area . . . and require constituencies returning several members. The members thus elected represent the sections of electors whose votes have caused their election.

The best definition of alternative voting which was put before the committee was that of Hoag and Hallett, of the United States:

> The alternative vote has been devised to make it certain that in single-member constituencies no candidate can secure election unless he has behind him the support, if not of the majority of voters in a constituency, at least of a greater number than under the present system elects a member where there are more than two candidates.

Under proportional representation the method of voting—

Mr. BENNETT: —depends upon the system.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Well, the system that is generally adopted in English speaking countries is the one to which we gave the closest study. There are several different systems of proportional representation, but that most applicable to English speaking countries is the single transferable vote, and the other system most commonly used is the "list" system. The "list" system is used more particularly in Europe, although on occasion it has been used within the empire, but within the British Empire the single transferable vote is the system of proportional representation generally in use.

Mr. MacNICOL: Generally called the Hare system.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Yes. It was devised, I believe, by Thomas Hare, an Englishman, a great many years ago. The method of voting is to vote for the candidates in order of preference, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, etc. In the first place, the Proportional Representation Society of Great Britain states that "a five to seven member constituency is the preferable form of constituency"; if there are less than five members to be elected in any particular constituency the proportional representation system does not work satisfactorily. The voter marks his ballot according to his preference, numbering it, let us say, from 1 to 5. After the votes are polled, when the results are being tabulated, a quota is arrived at in this way. The total number of votes cast is divided by the number of candidates to be elected plus one.

Mr. HEAPS: One vote.

Mr. BOTHWELL: And one added to the result. That is, if there are five candidates to be elected, the number of votes cast would be divided by six and one added to the result in order to get the quota. Any candidate on the first count of the ballots who receives more than the quota on the first count is elected, and the surplus ballots over and above that quota are then distributed among the other candidates.

Mr. BENNETT: Including the ballots of those who have been elected by reason of obtaining the quota.

Mr. ROGERS: That is, the excess ballots.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Yes. It is only the excess ballots that are distributed.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Mr. BOTHWELL: And there does not seem to be any particular method of choosing which excess of ballots is to be used.

Mr. HEAPS: Oh yes, there is. The hon. member is not quite correct in that statement.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Well, that was the evidence given to us by this man Wright of Nova Scotia who came to Ottawa in order to give information to the committee.

Mr. BENNETT: We have the system in Calgary, and they have it in Winnipeg.

Mr. HEAPS: I have run into that system on several elections, and it is worked out on an exact basis.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Well, I have before me a report of the 1936 Manitoba election for the Winnipeg constituencies, and in studying the count in that election I find some things which are rather strange to me. For instance, on the first count Stubbs had 17,591 ballots in excess of the quota. Those were then distributed, and apparently Webb was elected on that second count. That is, a sufficient number of the ballots of Stubbs went to Webb to elect him.

Mr. HEAPS: May I point out to my hon. friend that there is a definite method by which that was done.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Then Webb's surplus ballots were not distributed. The transfer gave him surplus ballots, but his surplus was not distributed until the thirteenth count. In any event, to continue—

Mr. PERLEY: Will the hon. member explain how the ballots of Stubbs were distributed after the first count?

Mr. BOTHWELL: Well, there are quite a number of names here. Bardal got 334; Berry, 647; Benjamin, 359, and so on. On the distribution of that ballot it elected Litterick, giving him 17,971 votes, whereas the quota was 7,214, and it elected Webb by giving him a vote of 7,250, and the quota was 7,214. It is a rather strange count.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): How many Stubbs' ballots were given to Webb?

Mr. BOTHWELL: One thousand six hundred and sixty-nine.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is what elected him?

Mr. BOTHWELL: Yes. Well, there were two men elected on that first transfer of Stubbs' ballots—Litterick and Webb. Litterick's surplus ballots were then distributed, but Webb's surplus ballots were not distributed until the thirteenth count. Litterick's, for some reason which was not explained, were distributed on the second count. I do not know that any of us noticed, when the witnesses were before the committee, that the count was made in that way. In any event there is no explanation of it.

Mr. BENNETT: Does that not depend upon the relative position of the firsts on the first count? The hon. member does not have it before him, but my memory is that the distribution takes place in accordance with the position of the firsts on the first count. Thus, if Litterick was fourth, when they reached the fourth they would dispose of his surplus ballots; but if Webb was, on the first count, sixth, his would be disposed of when that point was reached, and so on.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It must be done on some definite basis.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, it is, I assure the minister. We have had the system in force in Calgary for mayor and council and in Winnipeg for mayor and council for long years. I took the trouble once to go over it with the city clerk, and I may tell my hon. friend that there is a definite method in dealing with it.

Mr. BOTHWELL: There were only two distributions there. They dropped the low man, the man with the lowest number of ballots, and his second choices were distributed, and so on, until you had the required number of persons elected. In each case the low man is dropped after the first two distributions.

Mr. MacNICOL: You deal with the elected ones first.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Yes. Then you take the low man and his second choices are distributed. In the alternative voting system you follow very much the same procedure. You strike no quota and have no surplus ballots to distribute, but you take the ballots of the candidate who has the least number of votes, and you drop him and distribute his second choices. There are said to be three hundred systems of proportional representation and the alternative vote in vogue, but for our purposes we confined ourselves pretty much to this system because it has been found the most effective.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Hare system.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Yes, the single transferable vote.

Mr. BENNETT: The grouping of constituencies would be the principal difficulty.

[Mr. Bothwell.]

Mr. BOTHWELL: Yes. We found that in Canada, if five constituencies were combined it would be practically impossible to put into effect the proportional representation system. The constituencies are too sparsely settled and too large. Many constituencies in this country at the present time are almost too large for a candidate to get over, and if you combined five of these the electors would probably never see their candidate at all.

This system of proportional representation has been tried in many European countries: Belgium, Denmark, Switzerland, Norway, Sweden, Finland, Germany, Austria, Poland, Luxembourg, Czechoslovakia, Esthonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Greece, Italy, Bulgaria, and France. Of these, five retain the system and apparently it works satisfactorily. These five are Denmark, Switzerland, Norway, Finland and Sweden. Other countries have given it a trial and many of them have actual dictatorships. In other countries, particularly Germany and Italy, they have not been able to elect satisfactory governments. I should like to read an extract with regard to the working of the system in Germany. Sir John Fischer Williams, writing in reference to Germany, says:

> It is the more necessary to examine the circumstances leading to the fall of parliamentary government in Germany because proportional representation was in use, and it has been asserted by many that the fall was due to the effects of P.R. The proportional system was not of the British type; it was different from the single transferable vote, with the free expression of choices which the latter affords. The German system was very rigid in form. The elector could vote only for a party as such: each party was given a number. The elector voted for, say, List No. 1, or List No. 5, or some other individual list; he could not vary names on the list or the order in which they appeared.

Mr. BENNETT: He had to vote the ticket.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Yes.

> The constituencies in which P.R. operated were much larger than is proposed in Great Britain.

However, we shall see what the results have been in Germany. In the first election after proportional representation went into effect there were twenty-four different parties or groups seeking election and twelve of those groups elected members, but no one party was in a position to carry on the government and there resulted government by compromise. In Poland the system of proportional representattion was adopted in 1921, and as a result of the election on November 5, 1922, the following parties were elected in the proportions indicated:

National Christian Union	163
Radical Peasant Parties	55
Moderate Peasant Party	70
Polish Socialist Party	41
Jews	18
Union of National Minorities	66
Ruthenians	5
Communists	2
Others	24

Again, no one party had a majority. In the Netherlands the system was adopted in 1917, and as a result of the election in 1922 the following parties were returned:

Catholics	32
Social Democrats	20
Anti-Revolutionist Party	16
Christian Historical Party	11
Liberty Union	10
Democrats	5
Other parties	6

In Denmark the system was adopted in 1915 and amended in 1920. The election results, April, 1924, were:

Liberals	45
Radicals	20
Socialists	55
Conservatives	28
Slesvig (German Party)	1

In Finland the system has been in operation since 1906. The results of the 1924 election were:

Social Democrats	60
Agrarians	44
Finnish Coalition Party	38
Socialist Labour Party	18
Swedish Party	23
Finnish Progressive Party	17

In Norway and Esthonia the results ended similarly; no one party was able to secure a majority to carry on the government.

Mr. BENNETT: But they did carry on.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Yes; but many of those countries that adopted the system of proportional representation, in the course of a few years became practically dictatorships.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the hon. member attribute that to the system of voting?

Mr. BOTHWELL: It might be attributed to that. We had evidence before the committee of countries in Europe where there were two or three elections inside of two years because no one party was able to carry on the government.

Mr. HEAPS: Did we not have the same condition here in 1925-26?

Mr. BOTHWELL: That happened, apparently, in one election in Canada. The committee found that in most countries the elections were much more frequent than they are here, and governments did have difficulty in carrying on. In that conection I should like to refer to an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press of March 26, 1938. Apparently the Free Press has always been very favourable to proportional representation and the alternative vote; yet in that editorial they say:

> Throughout the session of the legislature just prorogued the results of lack of leadership by the government were painfully evident. The principle of responsible government was for the most part renounced. When that happens in any legislative body, it is like a vessel on the high seas with no one at the helm, driven hither and yon by the changing winds.
> But what could be expected, with the government having a precarious hold on office—out on a limb so to speak? Towards the end of the session the views of the government were disregarded, and things which the head of the government was known to disapprove were done. And, because of the uncertainty of the government's position, the problem of Winnipeg's financial difficulties was dealt with in an arbitrary and extremely unreasonable way. It is safe to say that the result would have been different if there had been responsible government—by any group or combination of groups—instead of the state of disorganization that existed.

And the final paragraph says:

> Instability of government, such as has existed lately in Manitoba, is entirely unsatisfactory and cannot long endure. In one way or another, we must have settled government with responsibility definitely placed. It can be done, no matter what the circumstances, and the people of Manitoba, in their own interest, must see that it is done.

The following is in the published proceedings of the committee, but I think it might be well to draw the attention of the house to some remarks which have been made by those who have made a study of proportional representation. George Horwill, in his work describing proportional representation, says:

> A serious defect of proportional representation is a tendency to split combinations of persons who hold similar views on general matters into small groups with strong views on separate and less important subjects. In P.R. there appears to be a tendency towards the formation of small parties interested in some particular subject.
> In 1900 political life in Belgium was comparatively simple and there were two great political parties, the Liberals and the Catholic Conservatives. The one pursued modern democratic tendencies while the other was stoutly conservative. Belgium adopted the d'Hondt system of P.R. in 1900. . . .
> In 1922, after twenty years of P.R. development, although the great parties submitted lists in all districts, no fewer than forty-five different parties and groups were formed among the electors for the election of ninety-six members.

After giving the lists and results, he goes on to say:

> The P.R. results in the countries mentioned (Belgium, Sweden, Switzerland, Poland, Netherlands, Denmark, Finland, and Esthonia) show that P.R. has made a stable majority government impossible in countries where it existed before P.R. was introduced. A stable government representing a general majority opinion may indeed be defective. In operation it may sometimes be distasteful to minority and majority right, but it is effective; it does maintain stability in social relationships, it does give that security necessary for continuous development. Italy has not been mentioned because its policy deserves special attention. The elections of 1913 were conducted by the ordinary majority political method of election and the results were as follows: Constitutionalists, 318; radicals, 70; republicans, 16; socialists, 77; syndicalists, 3; Catholics, 24. At this period majority government was at any rate real. On January 19, 1919, a new Catholic party, known as the popular party, arose with the sanction of the Vatican, and it advocated P.R. As a result the P.R. method was applied in the elections of 1919. The results were: Socialists, 156; liberals and conservatives, 132; Catholics, 101; democrats, 80; social reformers, 16; republicans, 15; Giolittians, 8. No party now had a majority. P.R. destroyed the hope of majority government and stimulated minority conflicts to such a degree that ultimately physical force minorities assumed dictatorship. The fascists then used P.R. to stabilize minority dictatorship; the law of November 18, 1923, turned the whole country into one constituency divided into fifteen districts, and it permitted a single party which obtained twenty-five per cent of the votes passed to appropriate two-thirds of the seats in the chamber. This indicates the great social dangers which P.R. stimulates. It shows that minorities can not only prevent majority rule but can enforce minority dictatorship.

I think I should read another quotation from Mr. Horwill's work. He says:

P.R. advocates fear the majority; they fear oppression and tyranny which majorities might use. What is the alternative? Minorities in parliament will fight each other. When combined minorities form a majority, fighting and struggling will be the rule. Forceful energetic minorities will then seize power, and the majority will experience oppression at their hands. It is a fateful moment in social evolution. We have to choose either to train the majority so that a social mentality can be created whereby cooperation can play the major part in social life, or else—dictatorship of a minority. The present system enables the former, if we can seize its advantages; P.R. the latter.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 65, respecting Révillon Frères Trading Company, Limited, and to change its name to Rupert's Land Trading Company—Mr. Maybank.

THE RESTIGOUCHE LOG DRIVING AND BOOM COMPANY

Mr. A. G. McAVITY (St. John-Albert) (for Mr. Veniot) moved:

That the order for the house to go again into committee of the whole on Bill No. 66 (Letter E of the Senate), intituled "An Act respecting the Restigouche Log Driving and Boom Company," be discharged, and that the said bill be referred to the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Motion agreed to.

NIAGARA FALLS OBSERVATION BRIDGE COMPANY

The house resumed from Friday, April 1, consideration in committee of Bill No. 15, to incorporate the Niagara Observation Bridge Company—Mr. Damude—Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

On section 8—Power to construct bridge.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: When the bill was last before the committee we were considering section 8.

Mr. EDWARDS: Before section 8 carries, there are some observations I should like to make. The section provides that the company may construct, maintain and operate a bridge across the Niagara river, and so on. Since the destruction of the Falls View bridge, or what was commonly known as the "Honeymoon bridge," in January of this year, considerable attention has been given to the proposal to build a bridge which would become toll free after the capital cost had been taken up.

Proponents of the bridge have given a number of figures as to expected revenues and cost of construction which, at least to me, appear fantastic. While I am not opposing the idea of a toll free bridge, or a publicly owned bridge, and while I am not by any means advocating a private bridge, at the same time when the bill was before the committee many statements were made which appeared to me to be at least contradictory.

The Falls View bridge had been in existence since the 1860's and was owned by the International Railway Company. It took care of the traffic running between Niagara Falls, New York, and Niagara Falls, Ontario. It was a four-lane bridge, and we are told by an eminent firm of architects of Montreal, perhaps the most outstanding architects in Canada in the matter of bridge building, that this bridge was maintained in perfect condition, and at all times was capable of taking care of the traffic at that particular point. If any difficulties did arise, it was on what were known as peak days, such as the Fourth of July, the First of July, Labour day and other holidays. But only on four or five days of the year was there any difficulty in handling the traffic which passed over the bridge. Any difficulty which did arise on those days was due more to the fact that not enough customs officers were on duty to clear the cars, than to the fact that the bridge was incapable of carrying the traffic. It could hardly be expected, however, that the government would keep a large force of customs officers to meet the requirements of only a few days in the year.

This bridge paid taxes of about $12,000 a year to the city of Niagara Falls, Ontario. I have no interest in the matter whatever, more than to see that a proper bill passes through the house, but so far as I can learn the people of Niagara Falls were perfectly satisfied with the accommodation they received at that bridge. The bridge which it is proposed to build would be two hundred yards below the site of the Falls View bridge, and is to be known as the Observation bridge. Necessarily those in charge will have to purchase property on both sides of the river and will have to build an entirely new bridge at an estimated cost of $4,000,000. I might add, in passing, that the approaches and buildings connected with the Falls View bridge still remain.

We were given to understand, not only by Canadian counsel but by eminent counsel from the United States, that the International Railway Company have a right to rebuild their bridge, under a charter they now hold, without going to any legislative body for further consent. That, of course, was denied by those supporting the building of the new Observation bridge. Up to date, however, no satisfactory answer has been given to the statement made by counsel in committee that the International Railway Company have a perfect right to reconstruct their bridge.

If both bridges are built, serious objections will arise. In the first place there is not sufficient traffic to support two bridges. In the second place, if the Observation bridge is built at the spot indicated, at a point about two hundred yards below the old Falls View bridge, the same distance from the proposed new Falls View bridge, its value as an observation bridge would be destroyed by reason of the new Falls View bridge being between it and Niagara falls.

Evidently the building of a new bridge is a subject of lively controversy on the United States side as well as on the Canadian side of the boundary line. An article appearing in the Niagara Falls Gazette, Niagara Falls, New York, on February 12, is in these words:

> The earnings of a publicly owned bridge across the Niagara river to replace the Falls View bridge would be ample to ensure its being paid for in full and being made a toll free span within ten years, in the opinion of assemblyman Harry D. Suitor, this city, who plans to introduce a bill providing for the creation of a government commission authorized to build such a span in the state legislature early next week as soon as the necessary legislation can be drafted.
> Mr. Suitor declared to-day that on the Falls View bridge, figures on file in his office show that the International Railway Company—
> Listen to these figures:
> —earned $459,000 between April 1, 1935, and March 31, 1936, and that it received revenue of $540,000 for the period April 1, 1936, to March 31, 1937. For the period from April 1, 1937, to November 1, 1937, the bridge revenue totalled $521,000, Mr. Suitor declared. The bridge was wrecked by the effect of ice on last January 27th.

These are the figures which were given to the railway committee in connection with the proposed Observation bridge. In an effort to substantiate their claim to the right to build a $4,000,000 bridge, the company were calculating on these revenues to carry the load. What are the facts? The following are the facts which were produced by the counsel for the Falls View bridge. I understand that the two bridges are to be identical, each having four lanes for traffic. Therefore it is expected that the revenue which would be derived from the Observation bridge would not be greater than that which was derived from the Falls View bridge during the last ten years. I quote from the statement:

> The facts are that Falls View bridge revenue for the year ended March 31, 1936, was $237,403, not $459,000 as stated by Mr. Suitor. The revenue for the year ended March 31, 1937, was $280,449 and not $540,000 as stated by Mr. Suitor. The revenue for the period April 1, 1937, to November 1, 1937, was $282,335 and not $521,000, as stated by Mr. Suitor.

It will be seen that there is a wide variation in the figures presented by the two parties. The figures presented by the proponents of the Observation bridge are purely an estimate, while those presented by the owners of the Falls View bridge are the actual annual revenues over a period of ten years. I quote:

> As a matter of fact, careful calculations based on the actual revenue experience of Falls View bridge and the estimated cost of a bridge as proposed by the Niagara Falls Observation Bridge Company lead to the inescapable conclusion that the so-called "free bridge" can never become toll free.
> An expenditure of $4,000,000 for a new bridge at a new site would be conceivable. Assuming this cost, the bridge would be faced with an annual deficit of $50,000 before taxes. Assume an average annual income of $325,000, interest charges at five per cent would be $200,000; operating costs, $95,000; depreciation at two per cent, $80,000, or a total of $375,000, a deficit of $50,000 a year without allowance for taxes.
> Assuming a cost of $3,000,000, which is much closer to the reasonable maximum that could be spent prudently and wisely for a new bridge on a new site at Niagara Falls, the structure would earn a net income of $20,000 a year before taxes. If tax free, such a bridge would require 150 years to liquidate its cost, retire its securities and become truly a public bridge, toll free.

The question of taxes, however, is important. The Peace bridge between Buffalo and Fort Erie, operated by a public authority, paid last year in Canada taxes of $34,700. Proportionate taxes levied against the proposed observation bridge, even at an estimated cost of $3,000,000, would transform the small annual profit into a loss and would destroy all possibility of the bridge becoming toll free.

With particular regard to the tax situation, it is significant that more than half the revenue of Falls View bridge accrued during the tourist season. This large proportion of the receipts comes from persons living at a distance and visiting Niagara Falls for a day or two. If the so called "free bridge" paid comparable taxes it could never become toll free. If it did not pay taxes, the citizens and taxpayers would lose this contribution to governmental expense and would have to make up the difference out of their own pockets, largely for the benefit of transients.

The question may well be asked, when consideration is given to the revenue figures I have quoted: Why should the International Railway Company wish to replace their bridge? The answer is obvious. According to the estimate of their engineers, their proposed bridge will cost possibly $1,200,000 and not more than $1,500,000. They figure that the net revenue will be in the neighbourhood of $75,000, based on past performances.

I notice reports in several papers that considerable objection has been taken to the proposed new bridge by the local municipality. It is contended that they will lose taxes amounting to $12,000, which was the amount paid upon the old Falls View bridge. They will also lose the taxes on the land that will be expropriated for the entrance to the new bridge. The city of Niagara Falls, Ontario, faces a considerable loss in taxes should this new bridge be erected. I quote from the Niagara Falls Gazette of Niagara Falls, Ontario, as follows:

> Alderman John McAninch voiced a strong protest against the charter being granted to this company, without further information, stating that this city has been treated very discourteously by not receiving any information on the bill presented to parliament.

Speaking in this house on March 29, the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Damude) is reported on page 1979 of Hansard as saying:

> So that so far as the city of Niagara Falls is concerned, the province of Ontario, I am assured, will have no objection and will see that that municipality receives an assessment on this property.

Possibly the hon. member for Welland would be prepared to give us his authority for making that statement. It certainly does not appear in the bill and I think we must take the bill as it reads at present. I quote from the Buffalo Courier Express as follows:

> The old Falls View bridge, commonly known as "Honeymoon bridge," collapsed this winter due to heavy ice jams. The International Railway Company, owner of that bridge, opposed the bill because it claimed it had authority to reconstruct a bridge on the same site as the old one without any additional legislation.

We did not have any refutal of that statement presented to the committee. I quote from a Niagara Falls dispatch appearing in the Toronto Globe and Mail of March 29, as follows:

> The city council to-night, by a vote of four to three, decided to telegraph Prime Minister Mackenzie King asking him to withhold presentation in the House of Commons of Bill 15 to grant a charter to the Niagara Falls Observation Bridge Company, until the city has protected its rights.

So far as I know, the city has not been invited to sit in on the discussion of this bill.

What took place in the committee had the appearance of a real attempt to rush the bill through, and I protested in the committee because of the power play which was put on. I think that in neither our railway committee nor any other committee of this house to which bills are referred should any pressure or undue haste be applied. It is very much better to allow a committee to discuss a bill thoroughly, giving it plenty of time, even if one or two more sittings are necessary, because this procedure saves the time of the house in the end.

I noticed in last night's Ottawa Journal a dispatch from Toronto headed, "Hepburn protests Ottawa Action over New Bridge." It reads:

> Premier Hepburn registered "a formal protest" in the Ontario legislature to-day over what he said appeared to be "deliberate delay" of the federal government in passing a bill providing for a new bridge at Niagara Falls. Replacing the collapsed Falls View bridge, it is to be erected jointly by Ontario and New York state.

Well, Mr. Hepburn has a perfect right to protest if he wishes to do so, but just how effective his protest will be in this house I am not so sure.

I have nothing further to say. I object to this bill being passed for the following reasons, which I have summarized.

1. The International Railway Company claim to have the right to rebuild their bridge under the existing charter.

This claim has not been satisfactorily refuted.

2. There is not enough traffic for two bridges at this point.

3. The proposed Observation bridge would be two hundred yards below the Falls View bridge, and the view of Niagara Falls would be obstructed by the Falls View bridge.

4. The practical impossibility of the Observation bridge ever becoming toll-free under the present financial set-up.

5. Approximately $12,000 a year has been paid in taxes by the International Railway Company to the city of Niagara Falls, Ontario. No provision is made in this bill to pay any taxes to this municipality.

6. The great disparity between the cost of building the Observation bridge and the cost of rebuilding the Falls View Bridge, $4,000,000 and $1,500,000 respectively. These are the figures submitted by the proponents of the Observation bridge and the Falls View bridge respectively.

7. The estimated revenue from the proposed new Observation bridge was double the figures submitted by the Falls View bridge of its actual receipts over a period of ten years.

The traffic capacity of the two bridges would be the same, namely, four lanes of traffic.

8. The International Railway Company propose to rebuild their bridge at once. Plans are actually being prepared and the bridge is to be ready for traffic in 1939.

The Observation bridge could not possibly be ready until 1940. That is a very important point. The evidence in the committee was that the day after the destruction of the Falls View bridge, steps were immediately taken to provide for reconstructing the bridge, with higher spans and a wider spread so that there would be no danger from ice in the future. Those plans are in preparation and are coming along fairly well, and if the company is allowed to go ahead and rebuild the Falls View bridge, it promises to have that bridge in operation in 1939. The estimate is that the other bridge, the Observation bridge, would take three years to complete from the time they get permission to build. They have not yet received permission to build from the New York legislature. They might get permission at the fall session; but, if not, they will have to wait until next year. So it will be at least two, and possibly three years from now, before there will be service at that point by the Observation bridge, and hon. members can see what a disadvantage that would be to the merchants and those doing business in that city.

9. I am informed that arrangements can be made to have the Falls View bridge toll free when costs of reconstruction have been recovered.

That, I think, is a very important point, and it is something that should be fully considered. That is all I have to say, and I trust that the sponsor of this bill will have it referred back to the committee for further consideration.

Mr. DAMUDE: The observations made by the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Edwards) have, I think, been fairly well covered already in speeches made by other hon. members.

So that there may be no misunderstanding of the position of the city council of Niagara Falls with respect to this matter, I propose to read a resolution passed by that city council in session on April 4:

Moved by Alderman Thomas Grimster,
Seconded by Alderman Grant Donald, that

Whereas Bill No. 15 is a bill to grant a franchise to the Observation Bridge Company, and

Whereas this council has received assurance that taxation is a provincial and municipal matter in which the interests of the city will be protected, and

Whereas the granting of a franchise to individuals who will surrender their rights to the province is a matter of procedure as outlined by the Honourable the Minister of Transport, and

Whereas the tourist business is of prime importance to this city and to the country as a whole and every facility should be provided for that purpose, and

Whereas the terminal of the Niagara Falls, St. Catharines and Toronto Railway, a division of the Canadian National Railways, is situate at the bridge head of the proposed bridge and is dependent upon such a source for traffic to St. Catharines and other points in the Niagara district, and

Whereas the erection of the proposed new bridge will act as a gesture of good will and as an aid towards friendly relations,

Be it therefore resolved that this council believes it to be in the best interests of the city and of the country as a whole, to expedite Bill No. 15 through parliament and that it is essential the erection of a new bridge be started at the earliest possible date and that the clerk forward this resolution to the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King and to the Right Honourable R. B. Bennett, and the seal of the corporation be hereto affixed.

Mr. LENNARD: May I ask if that motion passed the city council?

Mr. DAMUDE: Yes; the motion was carried.

Further, in connection with this matter, the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart) addressed a letter, dated March 24, to the mayor of Niagara Falls—and I may say it was a very fine letter, taking up eighty-three lines of foolscap paper and consisting of 1079 words—asking the city of Niagara Falls to say whether it appreciated his efforts on their behalf. This is what the city council says about his letter:

Council Chamber,
March 28, 1938.

That was four days later.

No. 91—N. J. M. Lockhart, M.L.A.

It should be M.P.

No. 91—N. J. M. Lockhart—re bill before House of Commons re new bridge. Ordered on the motion of Aldermen Twidale and Scott that the communication be received and filed.

I may say that that resolution was carried. Then, here is item No. 63 of the minutes of that same meeting of the city council:

Moved by alderman Inglis, seconded by alderman Donald: Resolved that the council receives with general satisfaction and appreciation the announcements of the Honourable W. L. Houck, M.L.A., and Mr. A. B. Damude, M.P., that the interests of this city are being protected in legislation and bills now pending; and that this council deprecates the statement accredited to the federal member of Lincoln in press reports from Ottawa, that the condition of this city is one of virtual insolvency; which is untrue, as all obligations have been met in full; that a copy of this resolution be wired to the Honourable Mr. W. L. Houck, M.L.A., and Mr. A. B. Damude, M.P.

This resolution was lost by one vote.

I have no desire to take up the time of the committee, but I believe there are a few facts which should be brought to its attention to show the necessity of a proper bridge at this point. Some of the older members of this house will probably recall that in 1927 a bill was brought forward by the then hon. member for Welland, Mr. George H. Pettit, seeking a charter to erect a proper, adequate and safe bridge across the river at this point. At that time the bill was defeated. In 1928 the citizens of the community prevailed on him again and in that year he presented a bill which met with the same result. Again, in 1929, the then hon. member for Welland brought forward a bill, which passed the House of Commons but was defeated, I understand by one vote, in the Senate. Hon. members will therefore realize that even at that time it was regarded as important that a more adequate and safe structure should be erected. Probably it should be known where the opposition at that time came from. It came from the county of Lincoln, the same place from which it is coming now. Probably there is a reason for this. A remark was made the other evening that there might be an Ethiopian. That is an old saying. Where there is an Ethiopian there usually is a woodpile, and I think the woodpile will be found at St. Catharines. St. Catharines possesses some excellent citizens who are vitally interested in the lower steel arch bridge at Niagara Falls, a company which received from the Canadian National Railways a rental of $100,000 a year. The president of this company, and the secretary treasurer also, two very fine gentlemen live in St. Catharines; directors live in St. Catharines. For eleven years the opposition to the building of a bridge across the Niagara river has emanated from that point. To be frank, it came from a late hon. member and minister who resided in that constituency. Hansard will bear out my statement; hon. members have only to look up the records in 1927, 1928 and 1929.

Mr. SPENCE: I wish to say a word or two in connection with this bridge. I have listened with a good deal of interest to statements by various hon. members, and I have made up my mind that I am not going to support the bill for a bridge in this particular locality. I know the site very well. The lobbying and the pressure that have been put on the private bills committee to consent to the erection of a bridge there remind me of olden days, when the house was filled with lobbyists from all over the country asking that railway branch lines be built everywhere. We granted franchises and charters; some were built and some were not, and it would have been a good thing for this country if a great many had never been built, because they did us no good. The same with bridges; there were people coming from all over, straw men, men who had not a dollar in their pockets, getting charters to build bridges, having got the charters they went out to peddle them to somebody and make a few thousand dollars or, in some instances, up to a hundred thousand dollars, and if they could not make a deal with somebody who had money, the bridge never was built. I do not know whether that is so in this case.

I have no objection to the Ontario government and the state of New York building a bridge; but if it is built at all, it should be on the site of the old international bridge, for the convenience of the people of Niagara Falls. If the bridge is built six hundred feet farther down, the people of that city will be greatly inconvenienced. Many of them work on the other side, and they would have to walk six hundred feet further down, which is a considerable distance on a cold, wet morning. Why should the people be inconvenienced? If the International Railway Company can build a bridge for one and a half million dollars, why waste four million dollars, or why should Ontario contribute four million dollars to erect a bridge at that particular site, to please Mr. Hepburn or anybody else? I am not one of those who advocate public ownership all the time; in fact, I shall be frank and say that I do not do it at all, because I have never seen a public ownership project make a dollar for this country or any other. I would let the International Railway Company do the work. Some say that the promoters of this bill are trying to sell the balance of their franchise to the state of New York. I do not know whether that is so, but there seems to be a nigger in the woodpile.

Mr. DAMUDE: We have told the hon. member where it was.

Mr. SPENCE: I cannot see why we should rush this bill through to give a franchise to men we know nothing about. Perhaps the state of New York and the government of Ontario are willing to take the charter from these men who are seeking the franchise; but who knows? I do not know anything about the matter. There is too much secrecy about the whole thing. What is quite evident is that if a bridge is built on a site other than that of the old bridge, a great many people who have been travelling over the old bridge for many years are going to be inconvenienced. The whole city of Niagara Falls was built around that bridge. Why pass a bill which will involve much inconvenience to travelling people who live in the city of Niagara Falls? I suggest that the hon. member who introduced the bill should withdraw it and give us time to consider the matter properly. I am not trying to play politics. I know the situation there; I know what transportation is; for many many years I have been associated with highways. I happened to attend the railway committee for half an hour and heard somebody say that there was not sufficient room at the site of the approach to the old bridge to accommodate traffic going across on certain days such as the first and fourth of July. I think that is all a piece of nonsense.

The alternative is to spend $2,000,000 for a bridge and $2,000,000 to acquire land—from whom? From the friends of somebody who has land to sell. That is the whole trouble; that is why this thing is going through. Hon. members should be careful with the country's money and not waste it in extravagant projects of this kind. The solicitor who represented the International Railway Company told the committee that they could build a bridge for less than a million and a half dollars. Why waste $4,000,000 if a new bridge can be built upon the site of the old one for less than a million and a half dollars? But if the state of New York and the province of Ontario insist upon building the bridge, let us insist that they build it on the convenient site of the old bridge, regardless of what they pay for the franchise to the International Railway Company. I am sorry to think that this committee should respond to pressure such as I believe is being put upon them. I know something about city councils, perhaps as much as the hon. member who has just spoken. If you put pressure on many of the councils of this country, they will vote any way.

Mr. DAMUDE: I protest, for my council.

Mr. SPENCE: The hon. member does not need to protest, because I am just as familiar with city council work as he is. I have seen the council of the city of Toronto change its vote between eight o'clock at night and one o'clock in the morning.

An hon. MEMBER: That is only in Toronto.

Mr. SPENCE: Toronto is just as good as any other place in Canada. Toronto is not a city that does anything very wrong at any time. But councils change their minds; there's many a man can change his mind that cannot change his socks; and that is the very thing that has happened. I ask the committee to be careful about what it does and not inconvenience the people of Niagara Falls. The city has been built around the bridge, very much as some cities are built around a big industrial plant. There are not five hundred people living at the end of the city where it is proposed that this bridge be built, so why build it there?

An hon. MEMBER: To build another city.

Mr. SPENCE: To build another city, yes, but not Niagara Falls. It will change the whole plan of the city and ruin the people who have built it up and are carrying its burdens to-day. Again, how long may it be before the new company which is talked about begins to build this bridge? How long are the people at Niagara Falls to suffer for want of transportation? We are assured now that if the International Railway Company builds a bridge, it will be finished a year from next May. Why inconvenience the people more than is absolutely necessary? We have no assurance that the proposed bridge will be built in the next two or three years; the straw men might not get the money to put up for it. If Ontario proposes to put up the money, why does it not come out in the open and say so and let us know what it intends to do?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SPENCE: No; it is not carried by a long shot.

Mr. HARRIS: We have before us now an example of the manner in which public ownership of public utilities can be carelessly and loosely handled by administrations, sometimes not to the advantage of the public but for the benefit of some particular interests who at the moment may have control of the public purse strings. If it can be demonstrated to me that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) or the young member for Welland (Mr. Damude), with whom I have a great deal of sympathy at this time so far as this particular bill is concerned, has answered the questions which have been seriously put forward by this committee, then I shall be content to take my seat.

I am one of those who regard Niagara Falls, Ontario, as one of the greatest historic spots on the North American continent. More than that, it provides one of the greatest illustrations of the way in which public ownership can control and operate a public utility for the benefit of the people. That has been well and truly demonstrated by the conduct of the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission during the last two or three decades.

It is not often that I have much to say on these matters; but when I see a bill brought forward purporting to construct a bridge which in the first instance was going to cost upwards of seven and a half millions of the people's money and then see the provincial Minister of Highways taking his place at the right of the chairman of the railway committee and bringing that sum down to four millions; when I see those objecting to the bill coming forward and stating, on one of the highest authorities in the dominion, Colonel Monsarrat of the bridge company that built the Quebec bridge, that the proposed structure now under consideration, a four-lane traffic bridge of the same capacity as the one which the promoters are asking for, could be put up for the sum of $1,250,000, or up to $1,500,000—when I see all this, I do not wonder that a few days ago the question was asked, "Where is the Ethiopian in the woodpile?"

May I say a word or two in a kindly spirit to the hon. member for Welland? He is a new member, and I can recall the time, fifteen years ago, when I, too, was a young man making my first speech in this house. I know how I felt then. Inasmuch, however, as the hon. gentleman has introduced this bill, he will have to stand for what we say. In a kindly spirit, therefore, and as an old man I offer him this advice: Do not describe the straw men from St. Catharines as those that are looking after their own interests, until you answer the depositions that are on Hansard.

No doubt the hon. gentleman can, but there the record stands and it has not been answered. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) made this statement:

> I might say that the manager of the Niagara Falls parks commission or the solicitor characterized these men as straw men. I do not call them that, but that is how he designated them. I am not even sure that one member of the commission is the brother of the local member of parliament. I believe that one of the members is his son-in-law. But the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Damude) will know.

I say to my hon. friend opposite: Before talking about the woodpile in St. Catharines, smoke out your own woodpile. And is there not something to smoke out? He ought to know, because since the estimate dropped from seven and a half millions to four millions, we find that there is on record in the provincial legislature a deposition to the effect that it might cost three millions.

When I last spoke on this matter I said that I had an open mind and that I was ready to vote for the public ownership of a public utility which would give a tax free, toll free bridge over an international boundary in order to foster and extend our tourist trade. I firmly believe in that. On that occasion I asked this question: Are we going to lose one million dollars' worth of assessment in the city of Niagara Falls? The hon. gentleman has answered that question in part tonight but rather carelessly, and there has been a good deal of carelessness in the presentation of this bill to the House of Commons. He neglected to tell us something important about the million dollars to which the Minister of Highways of Ontario made reference, and a million dollars is a lot of money in these days; it would pay for a great deal of relief in the county of Welland. The hon. gentleman did not tell us whether that million dollars which the Ontario minister intimated was going to be spent on land and buildings represented a million dollars of assessment in that city. There is no answer. I asked quite seriously for an answer to that question but there has been none; yet we are asked to pass this particular section tonight without that information. The hon. gentleman wants to have our vote in support of this. We are anxious to vote for a toll free bridge as soon as possible, but these questions are not being answered.

The company, we are told, may construct, maintain and operate a bridge across the Niagara river. Construct?—yes, in a new place, as the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr.

Spence) has said, a new place away from the old business centres. There might be some advantage in that regard in relation to the Niagara, St. Catharines & Toronto railway. In regard to the old lands now owned by the International Railway Company, what did the minister say in the committee with respect to their rights when asked whether there would be compensation? He said, "Yes, there will be some compensation." What did the solicitor for the International Railway Company say in committee as to the value of their assets now there? Half a million dollars. Is that another half a million to be added to the cost of this bridge?

I admit at once that there might be some value in this new overhead bridge over the river road. I admit that there might be some value in having twenty-four fanlike outlets on a four lane bridge as against eleven on the other bridge. But when you saddle this public ownership enterprise with a structure which is going to cost the province of Ontario and the state of New York $4,000,000, whereas a bridge of the same capacity can be built for $1,250,000, there will not be sufficient revenue to take care of the amortization of the expensive structure, so that the result will be that no one within the sound of my voice will see the day when it has earned sufficient to permit of making traffic across the Niagara river free from tolls.

I ask hon. members to follow me for a minute while I state as briefly as I can how the picture appears to me. I apologize to my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps), whose mathematics I found it difficult to follow the other evening. On either bridge the maintenance would be $95,000 a year. Then there is depreciation. Some hon. members seem to have an idea that depreciation is unnecessary; that it is a reserve or profit built up for the benefit of the owner. But in any project depreciation is essential, and in my judgment two per cent is a fair and modest rate. I see the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore), who probably knows more about this subject than any other man in this house; will he deny that if the railways of Canada in days gone by had seen to it that in their bookkeeping not only their rolling stock but structures of all kinds had carried a fair depreciation charge, had it been only one or two per cent over all, and had the units written off when destroyed, that other great public ownership enterprise, the Canadian National Railways, would have been in a far better financial position to-day than it is? There is a glaring example of what happens when depreciation is ignored. At two per cent it would take fifty years, not forty, to retire the bridge. Two per cent on $4,000,000 is $80,000 a year, while on $1,500,000 it is $30,000 a year.

But there is something else, about which perhaps the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) knows more than anyone else, and that is the earning power of money. It is all very well for the province of Ontario to be behind this project; nevertheless if they invest $2,000,000 in a $4,000,000 bridge, the people of Ontario have to pay interest on that $2,000,000. It is true they can get the money at a little lower rate than a private company, but the difference between the cost of the two structures has its bearing. On a $4,000,000 structure interest at four per cent would amount to $160,000 a year; on a structure costing $1,500,000 it would be only $60,000 a year at the same rate. Money works for wages, and the wages have to be paid whether it is money that is earning it or human beings, and it will ever be thus.

Summing up the situation, what have we? On the one hand a $4,000,000 structure with two per cent depreciation, $95,000 maintenance charges and four per cent interest, or total annual charges of $335,000.

Mr. HEAPS: And what depreciation charges on the land?

Mr. HARRIS: I was careful to say that the depreciation on the land should be at times appreciation, but my hon. friend knows that it is not so now. The loss will result from the reduction in taxable assessment. The Niagara Park Commission taking over this land will not pay taxes to the municipality; the acreage now covered with buildings will become vacant land for parking space and what not, so the money therein represented must be retired.

The earning capacity of that bridge is shown in the figures given to the committee, which the hon. member for Davenport gave the other evening. They were as follows:

1929	352,434
1930	322,376
1931	282,126
1932	204,591
1933	192,585
1934	221,025
1935	235,896
1936	275,297
1937	221,039

Or an average, for the ten years, of $273,251. With an overhead cost of $335,000, how will it ever be possible for the bridge to become toll free, so that one can get the tourist traffic into this country without charge?

There is not a snowball's chance. We ought to take advantage of the proposition of the International Railway Company, and let public ownership work in conjunction with them on a project which will become toll free in a very few years.

Mr. MOORE: Has the hon. member a substitute measure to offer?

Mr. HARRIS: Yes, and one which is going to meet with the approval of the premier of Ontario, who according to the press wants speed. He wants the bridge built as quickly as possible so that the tourists will flow into the province across that bridge and spend their money there. My proposal is: Let this railway company, which now has a right of way there, which has half a million dollars in buildings and fixtures there now, which has plans well advanced to have its bridge in operation at least a year or two in advance of the other, come to the rescue and save the people of Ontario from the necessity of investing $2,000,000 in the bridge proposed to be built under this bill; let this company put up its own money; but tie the company up to a proposition that the bridge must become toll free within a short time, and the premier of Ontario will have a four-lane structure which will serve the tourist traffic one or two years sooner than the structure proposed in this bill. But, no, they want to adhere to their particular scheme; why, I do not know: Whether there is an Ethiopian, I do not know. But they know that while we sit here, the legislature of New York state has gone home, perhaps for a year, until next fall anyway, and has thrown their bill overboard. We have that on the evidence given in this committee. Yet section 8 of the bill provides that:

> . . . the company shall not commence the actual construction of the said bridge nor exercise any of the powers hereunder, until an act of congress of the United States or other competent authority in the United States of America has been passed authorizing or approving such bridge of the said river. . . .

Our hands are tied. There is nothing this committee can do, according to the very terms of the bill, until legislation is obtained on the United States side. I do not see how it is possible to meet the request of Mr. Hepburn. When he appeals to hon. members from Ontario, I imagine he is also appealing to me. I answer that appeal by saying: Get your legislation in accordance with section 8 which says that you must have authority from the state of New York.

Progress reported.

[Mr. Harris.]

ELECTIONS AND FRANCHISE

MEASURE RESPECTING FRANCHISE OF ELECTORS, ELECTION OF MEMBERS OF HOUSE OF COMMONS AND PRINTING AND PUBLICATION OF ELECTION DOCUMENTS

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Mr. Power that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the franchise of electors and the election of members of the House of Commons and to make provision for the printing and publication of the Dominion Elections Act and instructions issued thereunder, the printing of voters' lists and other election documents, including forms and ballot papers, and to provide for the salaries or other remuneration of certain officers and employees.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Before the house rose at six o'clock, I was quoting from Horwill on proportional representation. I have another quotation or two I should like to place before the house in connection with proportional representation and the alternative vote.

Munro, in The Governments of Europe, says this, with reference to Germany:

> The May election of 1924 left the German political situation in a state of very unstable equilibrium. The extremists were too strong to let the middle groups control. On the other hand, they were not willing to help maintain a coalition, except at a price which the social democrats were unwilling to pay. It soon became apparent, therefore, that another appeal to the country must take place, and in December, 1924, a new election was held. The result of this election did not help matters much, for although the extreme right and the extreme left both lost somewhat, the latter especially, it was not possible to form a middle coalition which could be certain of a majority in the Reichstag. Between 1919 and the early part of 1925 Germany had no fewer than eleven ministries.

In 1908 the British government appointed a royal commission to consider the question of proportional representation. I believe paragraph 105 of their report might be interesting:

> The exaggeration of majorities is as a rule no evil. Excessive majorities, of course, occur, but they bring their own correction against tyranny in increased independence; and they are at least preferable to insufficient majorities. The advocates of the transferable vote remind us that the object of a representative body is to represent; but the object of representative government is not only to represent but to govern. The greatest evil that can befall a country is a weak executive; and if a strong one can only be obtained at a cost of mathematical accuracy the price should be willingly paid.

That is a part of the findings of the royal commission appointed in Great Britain in 1908 to consider this whole question of proportional representation and the transferable vote. That commission rejected it, in so far as Great Britain was concerned.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) referred to the elections in Saskatchewan. I should like to draw his attention to the results of elections in Alberta, when they had the alternative vote, and proportional representation in the cities of Edmonton and Calgary. In 1926, in the Alberta elections—excluding Calgary and Edmonton—the United Farmers Association polled 68,921 votes, and obtained forty-two seats. The Liberals polled 36,693 votes and obtained five seats. The Conservatives polled 26,197 votes and got no seats. Labour polled 5,183 votes and got three seats. The Liberal-Progressives, polling 252 votes, got no seats.

Mr. BENNETT: That was in an election where there were more than two candidates in most constituencies.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Nevertheless the hon. member for Qu'Appelle was endeavouring, by this method, to get proper representation. The result in Alberta was just as I have given it to the house. It does not give representation in accordance with the votes polled.

Mr. BENNETT: Was that the vote after they had been distributed, or before?

Mr. BOTHWELL: The final vote.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; but we are distributing it. Those figures have no value, then.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I would imagine that the endeavour of the proponents of the alternative vote is to see that the people are represented. We find, taking the first of the parties named, that with 68,921 votes they returned forty-two members. Another party with 36,693 votes returned five members.

Coming to another election in Alberta, held in 1930, we find that the United Farmers of Alberta polled 70,957 votes and obtained thirty-four seats. The Liberals polled 34,187 votes—nearly half—and obtained eight seats. The Independents, with 23,832 votes, got three seats; the Conservatives, with 7,481 votes, got no seats, and Labour, with 6,156 votes, got two seats. It was impossible for the committee which had to deal with these matters to come to the conclusion that proportional representation or the alternative vote was going to solve the difficulties which seemed to confront the people who were agitating for this particular system of voting. As a result, the committee, for the reasons—

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member was going to give us the definition of the alternative vote, as the committee dealt with it. I wanted to see which definition the committee adopted. Would he give us that, if it is not inconveniencing him. I did get the definition he was good enough to give with respect to proportional representation; but I am now dealing with the question of the alternative vote, of which he promised to give a definition, as it was accepted by the committee.

Mr. BOTHWELL: The definition of the alternative vote accepted in the committee was one given by Hoag and Hallett, and was as follows:

> The alternative vote has been devised to make it certain that in single-member constituencies no candidate can secure election unless he has behind him the support, if not of the majority of voters in the constituency, at least of a greater number than under the present system elects a member where there are more than two candidates.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member read that before. I just wished to be sure.

Mr. HAYHURST: Would it not be better to make a division into rural and city electoral divisions? The alternative vote would not give the same results.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I gave the results of the alternative vote outside Calgary and Edmonton, where proportional representation was put into effect. After a consideration of what I have just quoted, the committee came to the conclusion that proportional representation was not desired in Canada. It was demonstrated to us that we should have from a five to a seven member constituency. The conclusions, to be found at page 194 of the evidence, are as follows:

> (a) Even a three member constituency throughout Canada, at any rate outside of the big cities, would be much too large.
> (b) Cost of the campaign would be too great. Printing and publications, etc., hire of halls, length of time required to campaign throughout the constituency.
> (c) Difficulty of candidates becoming known would be almost insuperable, there would be lack of the personal touch between the member and his constituents.
> (d) The elected member being one of three or five or seven in a constituency could not feel that he had a definite mandate as he does under existing circumstances.
> (e) While it is regrettable that there should be exaggerated majorities representation, it may be said, I think with truth, that errors in representation have a habit of balancing themselves.

An illustration is given on the same page of what happened in the elections in Great Britain. Further reasons were presented to the committee to show that neither system nor a combination of the two would give true representation. Alberta was used as an illustration, and I think the house will agree that a combination of the two systems certainly has not given true representation in that particular instance. The history of proportional representation in Europe has disclosed that it leads to a multiplicity of parties and groups, with no single party having a mandate to control. In my personal opinion, the use of second choices is really a lottery.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he has exhausted his time.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The hon. member has given the reasons why the committee opposed proportional representation, but those reasons would not apply to the alternative vote in a single member constituency. What reasons were given by the committee for opposing that?

Mr. BOTHWELL: I can only say that we analysed the votes in the different elections in Alberta and found that the use of the alternative vote in the rural constituencies and proportional representation in the two cities did not give true representation.

Mr. MacNICOL: Or in Australia.

Mr. BOTHWELL: The hon. member for Davenport says, "Or in Australia."

Mr. MacNICOL: Or in any state in Australia.

Mr. BOTHWELL: An analysis of the votes showed that true representation was not obtained under either system, and there is the additional danger of creating a multiplicity of parties and groups. I had intended to deal with compulsory registration and compulsory voting, but as my time has expired—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I appreciate the courtesy of the house in permitting me to say a few words on this question. There seems to be a disposition among many hon. members to put compulsory voting into effect. The committee of which I had the honour to be the chairman dealt with compulsory voting in the first place, separate and apart from compulsory registration, but we finally came to the conclusion that compulsory voting could not satisfactorily be put into effect without compulsory registration. The committee then wound up its deliberations by considering compulsory voting and compulsory registration together. We had before us the results of the attempt that was made in 1934. I believe that every member of the committee was well disposed in the first instance to the idea of compulsory voting; but after analysing the figures and taking into consideration the fact that Canada would be in a different position from that of Australia, the committee was doubtful whether any benefits would be derived from either compulsory voting or compulsory registration.

Prior to compulsory voting being put into effect in Australia, only some fifty per cent of the electors exercised their franchise. After compulsory voting, this percentage rose to as high as 95·17 per cent. The hon. member for Davenport has referred to the fact that there were a number of informal or rejected ballots, the percentage running up to eleven point something per cent. I believe the percentage of rejected ballots in the last election was almost five per cent. In the 1935 election in Canada we polled seventy-five per cent of the vote.

Mr. BENNETT: Not quite.

Mr. BOTHWELL: The actual percentage was 74·17. Prince Edward polled eighty-one per cent; Saskatchewan, seventy-seven per cent and so on, the average for all Canada being as I have stated. When we consider that the rejected ballots in Australia have run as high as eleven per cent the situation in Canada does not appear to be too serious.

Mr. BENNETT: Except that forty-six per cent of the votes cast for Liberals brought them in over 170 seats.

Mr. BOTHWELL: That has to do with the other question we were talking about, the type of representation that we should have.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): With proportional representation we might have had more.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. BOTHWELL: The committee looked into the matter. I had an opportunity of serving on that committee in 1934, and we thought at that time we were drafting an act which might be beneficial to Canada. When the committee got down to making the final report, there was a small committee of which I was not a member, but I have no doubt that every member of that small committee believed they were drafting a system of registration which would be in the best interests of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: I may say for the information of the hon. member that before that bill was introduced we spoke about it to the then leader of the opposition and he was in favour of a closed list, as I was, and that legislation was for the purpose of trying to secure for this country a closed list.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Of course, if we have compulsory registration and compulsory voting, necessarily we shall have a closed list; but it might be possible to make an exception in connection with certain individuals who have been left off, and how they can be vouched for.

I have here an analysis of the costs of an election under the system that was put into effect in 1934, and I shall take just a few constituencies at random.

In Glengarry, the 1934 registration, the 1935 revision, and the election of 1935 cost $5,763.40; in the 1930 election in the same constituency the cost was $3,521.01.

In Halifax, Nova Scotia, the cost under the 1934 act was $28,570.17; in 1930, $20,949.78.

In Lisgar, Manitoba, the cost under the 1934 act was, $7,651.32; in 1930, $3,774.25.

In Red Deer, Alberta, the cost under the 1934 act was, $13,399.01; in 1930, $8,554.36.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member must remember that was establishing the first list.

Mr. BOTHWELL: That is quite true; but as far as the committee was concerned, they requested an analysis of the figures dealing with elections held from time to time with annual revisions under the 1934 act, and the figures I am giving are the results of that analysis.

In that same constituency of Glengarry, the total cost of the election in 1930 was $3,521.01. If we take the 1934 act, which provides for registration and annual revision, with the life of parliament four years, the cost, if the lists were printed annually would be $6,498.40; if the lists were printed only in the year of the election, the cost would be $6,398.12; and if the lists were not printed at all, the cost would be $5,905.32, as against $3,521.01 in the 1930 election.

In Halifax, with the life of parliament four years, the cost would be, with the lists printed annually $24,155; with the lists printed only in the year of the election, $23,915.92; and with the lists not printed at all, $21,018.68.

In Halifax, Nova Scotia, with the life of parliament five years, and the lists printed annually, the cost would be $27,404.65; with the lists printed only in the year of the election, $27,673.77; and with the lists not printed at all, $27,149.46; as against $20,949.78 under the 1930 act.

I could go on down the list and give other constituencies of which we made a study. For instance, let us take Brandon. In the 1930 election the total cost was $5,155, whereas with a parliament of five years under the 1934 act and the lists not printed, the cost would be $8,333.56. In Red Deer, Alberta, the cost was $8,554.36, as against $14,734.18; in Lisgar, Manitoba, $3,774.25, as against $9,157.90.

Since the committee sat, it has come to my attention that in the constituency of Ottawa West, which was enumerated on October 15, 1934, there were in the constituency—I have not the exact figures—somewhere between 55,000 and 57,000 voters. In anticipation of the annual revision in June, 1935, a canvass was made of that constituency with the result that from one organization alone there were 15,000 applications made for revision, deletions and corrections, and on the revision in 1935 there were 3,000 additional names put on. On October 15, 1935, it is reported that in spite of the close attention given to the lists in Ottawa West there were 2,500 names left off the lists. I am informed that in St. James, Montreal, constituency, where they have weekly tenancies, the situation would be very much worse. As a matter of fact, a closed list made under the system that was put into effect in 1934 would be out of date inside a month.

Mr. BENNETT: No harm would be done because, if it was only a month, no one would be entitled to be registered.

Mr. BOTHWELL: The committee considered that, not being able to get correct lists, the additional cost was out of all proportion to the results which could be obtained.

Some reasons that led to the findings of the committee, which, as the minister said this afternoon, were not unanimous so far as compulsory registration and compulsory voting are concerned—some reasons that appealed to me as being grounds for rejection were, first, the consideration that the percentage of votes polled in Canada in the last election was 74·17 per cent, and in many ridings the vote ran between 85 and 90 per cent.

In Australia, prior to putting into effect compulsory voting, only 59·35 per cent of the vote was polled. Second, the number of rejected ballots in Australia is some indication that an intelligent vote is not cast under compulsory voting.

Mr. HEAPS: Is it not possible that the eleven per cent of rejected ballots in Australia may have been a protest vote against compulsory voting?

Mr. BOTHWELL: That may be; but it is remarkable that in Australia there is anywhere between almost five per cent and eleven per cent of rejected ballots, whereas in Canada in the 1935 election we had only ·61 per cent.

Mr. HEAPS: Because in the one place there is compulsory voting and in the other place there is not.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Well, if compulsory voting leads to a vote that is not counted, it is hardly worth while going to the expense of putting compulsory voting into effect.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. gentleman said ·61 per cent—less than one per cent?

Mr. BOTHWELL: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: This afternoon I said, one per cent.

Mr. BOTHWELL: That is the evidence given before the committee by the chief electoral officer.

Mr. BENNETT: Were these Australian figures of the election of last year?

Mr. BOTHWELL: No; in the election of last year it was, I think, 4·5 per cent; I am not just sure.

Mr. BENNETT: Less than five per cent?

Mr. BOTHWELL: Less than five per cent. That is the reason why I referred to the fact that it ranged from almost five per cent up to eleven per cent. The hon. member for Davenport mentioned that owing to climatic conditions in Canada we would be limited to certain months for having elections.

Fourth, the cost of compulsory registration and compulsory voting seems to be out of all proportion to the results to be attained.

Fifth, the vote of those who are not sufficiently well informed or interested to exercise the franchise must be of little value in determining the thought of the people of this country as a whole.

It was for these reasons that the committee saw fit to reject both compulsory registration and compulsory voting.

Mr. DAVID SPENCE (Parkdale): Just a few words in connection with this resolution. I do not believe in anything of a compulsory nature; I never supported it when I was in the city council, nor have I done so in this house, because I am satisfied that unless you have seventy-five per cent of the people behind you, you cannot enforce anything.

As far as proportional representation and the single transferable vote are concerned, I suggest that we forget about them altogether. Many of these new things are not true, and we should not become too radical and introduce too many new things.

I wish to congratulate the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) upon his pleasant presentation of his resolution and his efforts to stop corruption in elections. Things have been becoming so horrible during the last couple of years that I do not know where we shall end. What we need is an honest administration of the elections act. I believe that the house to-day is in harmony with that feeling, and I congratulate hon. members upon a general desire to get away from corrupt practices in elections. In the last Ontario election we had more corruption in Toronto than we have ever had before in our lives.

An hon. MEMBER: Federal or provincial?

Mr. SPENCE: Not the federal election; the provincial election.

An hon. MEMBER: What about Parkdale?

Mr. SPENCE: I shall not mention my own riding, because there never has been any corruption there; there never was any necessity for it. Toronto has been clean so far as both Liberals and Conservatives are concerned. Until a short time ago we never had anything in the nature of corruption, chiefly because Toronto was strictly Tory; the Conservatives did not need to resort to corruption, and the Liberals were too scared to introduce it, so they did not do so. The consequence was that we had no trouble of that kind until the last election.

An hon. MEMBER: What happened?

Mr. SPENCE: May I say that I never saw anything like it before. I drove around the city all day—

An hon. MEMBER: It seemed to do the trick.

Mr. SPENCE: No; they did not do the trick; but they did very well; they did more than they had any right to do. They managed through all sorts of trickery to win a seat or two, because Liberals in Toronto realized that they had some strength and wanted to show it. Through the system of enumeration we have to-day, the names of thousands of people who did not live in Toronto at all were put on the voters' lists. Their names were given as those of persons living in big rooming houses and boarding houses. For instance, an enumerator might come to my house and take a list, from my wife or the nurse or somebody, of those who are in the house, and the enumerator would go away satisfied that those people actually lived there. I know of one house in my riding where only three people live, but on election day thirteen people from that place were on the voters' list and voted.

An hon. MEMBER: For you?

Mr SPENCE: No, not for me. They were the wrong kind. But in two other ridings in Toronto where the Liberals were determined to win, what happened was terrible. Men were imported; I am speaking of the local election; this has nothing to do with federal affairs, because we have never had any corruption in federal affairs in Toronto either from Liberal or Conservative sources, and I gave the reason a minute ago.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member will have to be on the watch the next time.

Mr. SPENCE: Yes. A number of people landed in town that morning from Montreal. I can assure hon. members that I am telling the exact truth, because I saw these people, and I saw five of them arrested in the middle of the day. They were put in gaol, and let out after the polls were closed. One party who was working for the Liberals in Toronto and looking after the advance poll stole a considerable number of ballots and wanted to sell them the next day to a friend of his; he wanted to meet the other fellow, and I do not believe anybody bought them. He was brought up in court, and Magistrate R. J. Brown discharged him because, so the magistrate said, his act was not a criminal offence and they could do nothing about it. It should be a criminal offence to do what that man did, that is, steal ballots out of an advance poll, take them to his friend the next day and try to sell them. That morning a number of boys came in from Montreal. Probably they were the bunch that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) told us came from Boston on some occasion to vote against him. They may have been brought from Boston to Montreal and sent on to Toronto.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): They were not French speaking.

Mr. SPENCE: We do not want corruption from Montreal. If Montreal wants to be corrupt in its elections, at any rate we in Toronto wish to keep clean, and we shall endeavour to see that the next election is cleanly conducted, no matter who wins. Perhaps I should not have told this story, but it is really a shame that such things should happen in this country at the present time. The public are just as blameworthy as the candidates. There are ridings that you can buy and ridings that you cannot buy. I am told that in some rural districts farmers who go to vote, now insist on getting paid for the time they lose in going to the poll. It is hard to imagine that sort of thing; it would not have happened twenty years ago. It is because the farmers are hard up and need a little assistance. They do not ask five dollars for their vote, but they want to be paid for the time they are away from their farms. Something must be done; some teeth must be put in the law so that the country may be run properly and decently.

Somebody has suggested—and I think it is worth acting upon—that the minister might agree, while of course giving the Liberal party the best of the deal in connection with election appointments, to give the Conservative party the next best; that is all we can expect at the present time. The suggestion is, I believe, that the Liberal party would appoint the returning officers and allow the opposition, whoever they might be, to appoint the poll clerks. I believe that the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) mentioned this; I heard it confidentially and should like to be assured that there is something in it, because it would be no more than a fair arrangement, and I would insist, when our party came into power, that they honoured the agreement. It would help to reduce the cost of elections. It would avoid the necessity of putting scrutineers in the polling booths if there were a Liberal acting as returning officer and a Conservative or the representative of another party acting as poll clerk. In that case it would not be necessary for any of the parties to pay scrutineers in that polling subdivision. If the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation happened to be the official opposition, the right to appoint the poll clerk would be theirs. I consider this a fair proposition, and I hope the minister will give it some consideration. I believe that in 1930 the minister appointed a Liberal enumerator and a Conservative enumerator; they went together from door to door, and they played the game fairly well. We had no cause for criticism. I am not in favour of the enumeration being done very long before an election, because that causes the candidates no end of difficulty. People move from pillar to post and one cannot keep track of them.

In conclusion, I urge that every party be given a fair show. Give the party in opposition a show, no matter whether it be Social Credit or Cooperative Commonwealth Federation or the Conservative party. Whatever the opposition party may be, give it the right to appoint a poll clerk and allow the government to appoint the returning officer.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I have only a few words to say. I would not have risen but for the fact that the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) did not, in my opinion, make his position very plain in regard to proportional representation and the transferable vote. To my mind he seemed to consider that proportional representation and the alternative vote were one and the same thing and that they brought about the same results. Of course, any one who has studied the matter knows that they are quite different things and have quite different purposes. The purpose of the alternative vote is to ensure in single member constituencies that the member elected has a majority of the votes cast in that constituency. The purpose of proportional representation is to give political groups, according to their numerical strength in a constituency in which there is more than one seat, representation according to their number. And proportional representation does that very thing, while the alternative vote accomplishes the purpose which it is supposed to serve.

In Alberta, in the examples given by the hon. member for Swift Current, the alternative vote was used in the country districts and proportional representation in Calgary and Edmonton. If one examines the results one will find that they were exactly those intended by the two systems of voting. In the 1935 elections in Alberta, in the country areas the representation of various parties was as follows: The Social Credit party received 123,869 votes and got fifty seats; the Liberals, 47,050 votes and one seat; the United Farmers of Alberta, 30,603 votes and no seats; the Conservatives, 8,642 votes and no seats; Labour, 2,074 votes and no seats; others, 7,804 votes and no seats. It is quite clear that in those constituencies in which Social Credit members were elected, they received the majority of the votes cast in the constituency.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the whole point.

Mr. MacINNIS: Let us turn now to the results in Calgary and Edmonton. The votes polled in the two cities have been added together. We find that in Calgary and Edmonton the Social Credit party received 37,740 votes and obtained six seats; Liberals, 22,033 votes and four seats. The house can see clearly that the number of seats is proportionate to the vote. The Conservatives received 10,776 votes and got two seats; in other words, they got nearly half the number of votes received by the Liberals and they got exactly half the number of seats. Nothing could be fairer than that as a system of voting. The other groups evidently did not receive a sufficient number of votes to elect a candidate at all. Labour received 3,018, but got no seats; United Farmers, 2,092 votes and no seats; others, 2,800 votes and no seats.

I wish to give a true picture of this system of voting, so that before we either accept or reject proportional representation we shall at least know what it means and pass upon it on that basis. And the same holds good in regard to the alternative vote. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) points out to me very properly that the alternative vote wipes out minorities, or rather, does not give representation to minorities, but it does assure representation to majorities.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the point.

Mr. MacINNIS: On the other hand, proportional representation assures representation to minorities provided that they constitute a certain definite proportion of the electorate.

Mr. MacNICOL: I may tell my hon. friend that proportional representation has been abolished wherever it has been abolished for the reason that it does not always give in the house a vote in proportion to the supposed vote in the country.

Mr. MacINNIS: But that is not the result. I must inform my hon. friend. I have shown by the results in Alberta cities that it does give representation according to numerical strength.

Mr. MacNICOL: It did not do so in Ulster.

Mr. MacINNIS: It does it everywhere; it cannot fail to do it. It is not a matter of juggling with votes; it is a mathematical process, and it works in the way I have indicated.

I am sorry that the committee last year did not bring in a recommendation for the adoption of proportional representation. This government, I believe, is pledged to electoral reform. I have before me an editorial that appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of June 26, 1936, in which the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is quoted. The reference is to a speech he delivered on September 29, 1932, in the Huron South by-election, and he is quoted as having said:

> I believe, too, that the electoral law should be amended in a manner which will help to ensure as complete an expression of the will of the people and at as little cost as may be possible. In the promotion of these all-important aims, the Liberal party has from time to time advocated the adoption of the alternative vote in single member constituencies and the adoption of proportional representation in double member constituencies. . . . These and other measures with which I have not time to deal at the moment would, I believe, be of far-reaching benefit. They are measures for which the Liberal party will continue to press and for which, until they are achieved, I would ask the cooperation of all who wish to see them a permanent feature of our electoral system.

That is a clear statement for electoral reform.

I do not believe that by giving minorities representation or an opportunity to have representation in parliament there is much danger of multiplying the number of political parties. A political party cannot exist unless it represents a social and economic need. Political parties have an economic basis. I believe that political parties which have a certain strength should have an opportunity of having a voice in the parliament of Canada. Most countries of Europe, for instance, the Scandinavian countries, Belgium, France have proportional representation; the system differs from one country to another, but most of them have proportional representation. Generally speaking, I believe the government in those countries is carried on as efficiently as it is in countries which have not proportional representation. There is no reason why such should not be the case.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I shall endeavour to compress my remarks into a very few sentences. The whole basis of our representative institutions is bound up in this bill. When democracy was established, it is unnecessary to say that all the people used to meet together and the will of the majority prevailed. One well known writer said that the man who succeeded in inducing the will of the majority to prevail had rendered the greatest service to political institutions of any man in the world. When one thinks about that, one realizes the soundness of it. The problem before us is therefore a simple one: Shall we still cling to the rule of the majority governing, or shall we abrogate that rule and substitute for it rule by groups? That is the issue. Proportional representation involves the acceptance of the second principle; the alternative vote implies the acceptance of the first.

Let us analyse the problem for a moment. In a constituency there were cast 6,150 votes. Six members were to be elected. Dividing 6,150 by six gives 1,025. Adding one to that makes 1,026, which is the quota; any man who polls 1,026 out of 6,150 votes is elected. In other words, any group which has 1,026 votes and marks them all No. 1 will have its candidate elected. That is proportional representation. That is not government by the will of a majority. It is the negation of our understanding of representative institutions. For that reason I have set my face steadily against the adoption of proportional representation in this country.

There is a second reason quite as serious; that is, that the grouping of constituencies becomes almost impossible, for the reasons given by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell), which I adopt and shall not repeat.

We come now to the question of the alternative vote. I heard a minister say in this house in 1926 that this was the policy of the Liberal party. The present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) so declared, with certain restrictions. The statements made tonight with respect to the province of Alberta by the hon. member for Swift Current gave, I am sure inadvertently, an entirely erroneous impression. I sent for the Parliamentary Guide for 1931 in order that I might look at the results of the 1930 election there, and found, as I expected, that in that election, unlike the election of 1926, there had been in very few instances more than two candidates. Where there are only two candidates obviously the alternative does not apply. But in some cities they had to have more than one count. For instance, in the constituency of Clover Bar, Rudolph Hennig, running for the United Farmers of Alberta, had 1,338 votes; Christian Hein, independent, had 866 votes, and S. T. Bigelow, Conservative, had 692 votes. It will thus be observed that no one had a majority of the votes polled. A second count therefore became necessary, and the alternative chosen by the elector to his No. 1 vote was added, and brought about the return of Mr. Hennig by a majority vote. The purpose of the alternative vote is what they have clung to in France as being an essential of their democracy, namely, that every man who sits in the chamber of deputies shall represent a majority of the electors.

Mr. DUNNING: They hold a second election there.

Mr. BENNETT: I am coming to that. If on the Sunday of the first vote being taken it is apparent that with three or more candidates in the field no one has a majority of the votes, in practice the low man drops out, or the low men drop out; another vote is held on the next Sunday, and elections continue to be held until there is a majority. That is the law: The rule of the majority, the acceptance of that old principle with respect to representative institutions. In the very early days there had to be unanimity on the part of the clan or the tribe in order that action might be taken, and the substitution of the rule of the majority did not come at once. It was not something that was discovered at the very threshold of the government of mankind.

When the rule of the majority is thus established, the question for us—and it is a simple one—is: Shall we accept a plan which gives representation to groups, or shall we cling to the theory that the majority must be represented in representative institutions? That is the whole issue. I am not going to express any opinion except to indicate that the hon. member for Swift Current overlooked the fact that in Alberta in the 1930 election there were, for the most part, two candidates; the question of majority was settled at once, and the alternative vote did not come into operation. But in several constituencies in which there were more than two candidates, a majority was not obtained by any, and in order that the rule of government by majority should prevail, the situation to which I have referred arose.

The hon. member for Swift Current directed attention to the fact that at the last general election in this country something slightly under seventy-five per cent of the votes were polled; of the votes thus polled forty-six and a fraction per cent were given to the Liberal candidates, and the Liberals have over 170 members out of 245 in this House of Commons. It is unnecessary to say that forty-six per cent of seventy-five per cent is a very different matter from forty-six per cent of all the electors. The fact is that the 170 Liberal members in this house represent something less than thirty-seven per cent of the electors on the rolls.

Mr. REID: Under the alternative vote how is a voter prevented from plumping?

Mr. BENNETT: The provision with respect to that is that the ballot is invalid unless it is marked for all the candidates. I have sometimes found that a little difficult in practice, but that is the provision. That is what we have here. As I say, forty-six per cent of seventy-five per cent represents about thirty-five per cent of the whole. I am not saying that by way of complaint. I am merely recording the fact as the minister did this afternoon, with respect to another phase of the matter.

How can we secure the continuance of our institutions in their strength, force and power unless by some means we conceive that more than thirty-five per cent of the electors of Canada are represented by 170 members out of 245? That is the question. I suggested the question of compulsory voting only because of what I had observed with respect to its operations in the great Commonwealth of Australia.

It is quite true, as the hon. member for Swift Current has said, that the preparation of lists costs money. But I wonder if we should pause very long to consider the expense of a few thousand dollars, if the result is to endeavour at least to save democracy itself. We will put away in some very doubtful undertaking more money than would be involved in a question of printing the lists. I confess that the first list in this country cost more money than I expected it would. It must be remembered that we had no closed list prior to 1934. During the absence of the Prime Minister I mentioned the fact that before the bill was introduced I discussed the matter with him; I told him what my views were with respect to closed lists, and he said he believed that closed lists were desirable in any country. He said further that some provision should be made, if possible, whereby no one should be deprived of his vote. And certain arrangements were made to meet that difficulty.

Mr. POWER: I believe in closed lists, too.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. They cost too much money, of course; but closed lists, after once they have been established, have usually been found satisfactory.

Mr. POWER: That is the trouble; they have not.

Mr. BENNETT: In Canada we did not give them sufficient trial. In Great Britain, where they have such a tremendous population, their lists work to entire satisfaction. Of course the answer is this: Their population is within a comparatively small area, and the people take an active interest in matters of revision. But think of how they do it, with revising barristers and care, regarding, as they should, the franchise as being the priceless possession of the individual.

I can recall looking up the first lists of this country. I wonder if there are any hon. members who recall the franchise act of Sir John A. Macdonald with respect to farmers and farmers' sons, and how the printing of the lists was done. Once that began to operate, after the first lists were prepared, the difficulty was not great. The Liberal party of 1896 believed we should have provincial lists.

Mr. POWER: They objected strenuously to revising barristers.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, quite. As will be recalled, we adopted the revising barristers from the British system. They still have it. Then we had the provincial lists for some time; and that, as the house will remember I pointed out this afternoon is, with some slight modification, the acceptance of the United States plans. In that country there is no such thing as the double list in the sense in which we know it here. They use the state lists—or did—for their congressional elections. The hon. member may have been looking into that matter more recently than I have.

Mr. POWER: I think they are now largely made by municipal authorities.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; and that list is used alike by the state and federal authorities. In Great Britain, as I said a moment ago, it is amazing how smoothly and easily the matter goes. It is not difficult to understand why this should be so. But it is so, and they revise their lists annually. At one time candidates helped to pay for them; I am not quite sure what the law is to-day. I believe they made some amendments recently, and I have not looked the matter up for the purpose of satisfying myself upon the point.

I have not made up my mind that a closed list is a failure in Canada. It was expensive and difficult in a new country, and where one has to establish, as we do here, the minimum period of residence within the boundaries of a constituency, the difficulty becomes even greater. Where there is, for instance, a shifting population, for example, as was pointed out, in one part of Montreal, where it is difficult to say that in some sections of that city residents will remain for as long as thirty days even, there will be very, very great difficulty indeed.

But I think we should in some way take steps that would ensure a more truthful reflection of the mind of the people than can come about by having 35 per cent of the electors qualified to vote expressing their will through 172 members out of 245. That, indeed, would be my reason in favour of proportional representation. It certainly is not a good reason why we should cling to the theory of majorities, when we have no such majority. I confess the problem is difficult. I have not any easy road to a solution of it to suggest to the house.

If we had a closed list; if we had compulsory voting—if we had these two things working in harmony, I am satisfied we would have at least 85 per cent to 90 per cent of the people of Canada voting. I was surprised at the remarks of the hon. member for Swift Current, who is usually so very fair; for he must have known, as we all do, the difficulty which came about, in the first instance, through compulsory voting in Australia. There were so many spoiled ballots. But in the last general election on that great island continent it will be recalled that the rejected ballots were only a few over 4 per cent—less than 5 per cent. After all, when one remembers that they elect both senators and commoners by proportional representation, one can see the ease with which difficulties would arise, because the necessity for marking one's choice of every candidate is something which is sometimes easily forgotten, and the number of spoiled ballots increases accordingly.

When we first adopted this system in the city of Calgary I recall going down to the city hall for the purpose of looking into the matter, with the city clerk, and I found that in the first election a very large number of our people forgot to vote for more than, let us say, the five or six aldermen they wanted. They stopped at that, although there may have been ten candidates. The law is explicit with respect to proportional representation that you must express your choice for all candidates whose names appear on the ballots, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). If you fail to do that, you have not exercised your franchise, and your ballot is bad.

Having regard to that fact, I think it will be agreed that they have made tremendous progress in Australia, when in their last election only 4·27 per cent, or less than 5 per cent of the ballots were rejected. That is a great advance, when one stops to consider the number of ballots cast for both commoners and senators.

I should like to feel that we are making some progress in the matter. Certainly we are not making any, if we just leave it as it now stands; for, as the Prime Minister pointed out in the early part of this parliament, a very large number of members in the house are minority representatives. A very substantial number are the representatives of minorities; I forget the numbers he gave on that occasion, but I remember that he did give numbers. If hon. members will take the trouble to look into the matter, they will see that the number is affected more than they thought it would be. We do not represent the majority of the electors in the constituencies, and therefore do not constitute the representative institution that came down to us from the original establishment of the doctrine that the majority could speak for the tribe or for the clan or for the public meeting. From my reading of history it is plain that it was not the simplest thing in the world to get a body of men to agree that the majority should bind them all. The old warriors used to insist upon unanimity, and it was quite a while before they reached the point where they would agree to allow the majority to govern their actions. There was the same difficulty in connection with public meetings. Of course, all this is centuries old, but we are departing from the principle at this time. It gives point and substance to the observations made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, that if you are going to have minority representation in your house you should establish proportional representation which is the scientific method of giving effect to the right of minority representation.

There is no doubt about that in so far as we are concerned. The truth is that in Edmonton and Calgary there is a limit upon the number of men the old parties can elect. They cannot get beyond that, try as they will. The reason is obvious. If there are six to be elected, the electors must show their choices for all. Despite the most careful efforts that can be made, human nature being so different in Calgary and Edmonton from what it is in Ottawa or Toronto, there is always a lurking desire on the part of every candidate that his friends should mark "one" after his name, instead of scientifically adjusting their ballots so as to ensure a complete indication of their choice. The result is that there is a limit upon what can be done in the way of ensuring the return of one's particular friends. Of course, the establishment of group representation is brought about. That is obvious; the result cannot be otherwise. Each member of the group will put "one" after the name of the favourite of that group, and the result I have indicated follows.

I think this is a negation of democracy. It is certainly the exact opposite of the theory of representative institution, which is government by the majority. If we remain as we now are, we certainly are making no step forward to see that this institution called the Houses of Parliament is representative of the majority of the electors, which is the purpose we have in mind. I only hope that the committee will consider the matter carefully. Even although it is compulsory action, which the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) does not like, I think when he sits down and considers matters, he will realize that our life itself is a life of compulsion. On every side each must sacrifice something of his own personal liberty in order that all may enjoy some measure of it. Our laws are: Thou shalt not. So far as my memory serves me, the stone tablets had strong indications that "Thou shalt not" was the basis of the commandments upon which our laws are founded.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, although this matter seems to be one of academic interest, I must confess that I have not changed my mind in connection with the use of the alternative vote in single member constituencies. I favoured that system years ago; I even introduced a bill in the house and I am still in favour of that system, more particularly after the remarks of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). However, the matter seems to be of academic interest because a large majority of hon. members appear to be against the system and have so expressed their views in the committee which studied the matter last year.

As far as proportional representation is concerned, I cannot favour it because of the conditions that exist in this country. As has been stated, it would be impossible to join together four or five large constituencies such as we have in Canada in order to put into practice a system of proportional representation. But this would not be so in the case of the alternative vote in single member constituencies. I claim that a member elected under that system would more adequately represent the general opinion in the constituency. The electors who could not elect their first choice, at least would have somebody closer to their views. As the situation is to-day, we have members representing the minorities in the constituencies.

To illustrate the system as it is to-day, let me take one case in particular. In the last general election the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Wermenlinger) polled 5,602 votes and was elected. I am proud to have him in this house, even though the system is bad. There were eleven candidates in that constituency and the total vote polled was over 25,000. That is what can result under the system as it is to-day. If that happened in one constituency, it can happen in another.

Mr. BENNETT: Depending upon the number of candidates.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Depending upon the number of candidates. As the right hon. leader of the opposition has stated, that is not really rule by the majority.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the minister call what happened in the 1919 election in Australia rule by the majority? In that election 860,000 votes elected seventeen senators; 820,000 votes elected one senator, and 117,000 votes elected no senators. That was under alternative voting.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I cannot see how that could happen.

Mr. MacNICOL: Those are the facts.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That must be proportional representation.

Mr. MacNICOL: No; the alternative vote.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I cannot see how it could happen under the alternative voting system.

Mr. BENNETT: It could not happen?

Mr. BOTHWELL: Does my right hon. friend realize that the alternative vote is only part of the proportional representation system?

Mr. BENNETT: It is the opposite.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is a separate thing. Proportional representation assures the representation of the minority, while the alternative vote makes sure that the majority of the constituents shall elect the member. This is the system that prevailed in most European countries until something happened recently. They have not yet accepted it in Great Britain, although a royal commission, I believe appointed by the Asquith government, reported in favour of both.

Mr. BENNETT: MacDonald and Asquith spoke against proportional representation.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But the Labour majority in the house before 1927 was in favour of the alternative vote. I am sorry that after they got into power they fell from grace and left the Liberals alone in their advocacy of proportional representation and the alternative vote. The responsibility of government seemed to have changed their views with respect to the system, and proportional representation and the alternative vote seem to have been forgotten altogether. While I have no hope that we shall adopt the system in Canada during this session, at least, I think it my duty to say that I have not changed my mind about it and I am still in favour of it.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Power thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 91, respecting the franchise of electors and the election of members of the House of Commons.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. POWER: Mr. Speaker, by leave of the house I would ask that we revert to Government Notices of Motions in order that I may move the resolution standing there in my name to set up a special committee. I did not move the resolution earlier in the day on account of certain negotiations going on between the whips with respect to the membership of the committee and because of certain changes that are being made in the language of the resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: By leave of the house.

The house having reverted to the order for Government Notices of Motions.

ELECTIONS AND FRANCHISE

APPOINTMENT AND PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Mr. Speaker, I beg to move:

That a special committee consisting of Messrs. Bothwell, Brunelle, Cahan, Clark (York-Sunbury), Dussault, Factor, Fair, Glen, Heaps, Jean, MacLean (Prince), MacNicol, McCuaig, McCulloch, McIntosh, McLean (Simcoe East), Mullins, Parent (Quebec West and South), Pelletier, Perley, Power, Purdy, Rickard, Robichaud, St-Père, Stevens, Stewart, Stirling, Taylor (Norfolk), Turgeon, Turner, Wermenlinger and Wood, notwithstanding section one of standing order 65 in relation to the number of members thereof, be appointed to consider:

1. A certain bill intituled "An Act respecting the franchise of electors and the election of members to the House of Commons," and to make such amendments thereto as it deems advisable;
2. A certain bill intituled "An Act respecting Political Expenditures," and to make such amendments thereto as it deems advisable;
3. Such other proposed legislation relating to elections as may be referred to it by this house;
4. The method used to effect a redistribution of electoral districts in Canada and in other countries;
5. The evidence and report of the special committee appointed in the session of 1936 and reappointed in the session of 1937 to study the Dominion Elections Act, 1934, and the Franchise Act, 1934;

With power to call for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses and to report from time to time.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I apprehend, Mr. Speaker, that the provisions of the resolution dealing with redistribution do not foreshadow action but are rather for the purpose of ascertaining what have been the methods utilized in effecting redistributions in Canada and in other countries. Am I right in that assumption?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In other countries and in Canada, yes.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

MEASURE FOR ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS

The house resumed from Monday, April 4, consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution—Mr. Rogers—Mr. Sanderson in the chair:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide assistance towards the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress, and for such payments out of moneys appropriated by parliament as may be necessary for all or any of the purposes of the proposed legislation.

Mr. W. A. WALSH (Mount Royal): When the committee rose last evening, I had already covered a certain amount of the ground that I desired to cover. I had already mentioned that I did not consider that the government had done its full duty in waiting two and a half years before giving really serious consideration to some plan of action. I also suggested that it was unfortunate that the present session did not see agricultural distress separated entirely from unemployment as such and placed where it really belongs, namely, under the Department of Agriculture, and unemployment otherwise left to the Department of Labour. I also suggested to the minister that he had allowed himself to be carried away on a flood-tide of verbosity and had given utterance to words which conveyed little or no meaning but were merely pleasant and satisfactory to listen to, words which gave no ray of hope to the unfortunate people who are waiting for something to alleviate their present distress. I believe I also suggested that the method pursued by the present government of allowing commissions to be appointed to do work which properly belongs to a government, is not only costly but gives rise to long delays. Further, I pointed out that hon. members have not been given sufficient time properly to study the proposals brought in by the employment commission.

In referring to statements made by the minister over a period of more than three hours, I was reminded of a similar discourse of shorter duration which he made in the city of Pembroke during the course of the by-election last year. He suggested that a certain member of this house, speaking the previous evening, had given an address which, the minister declared, contained more inaccuracies and misrepresentations than he had encountered in any speech in years. When I read that statement I regretted that the minister's lack of experience had given him a false idea of facts. I want to assure him that when I deal with facts and figures I get them from reliable sources; I do not try to make figures represent what actually they do not represent. I know the minister will recognize this sheet, and will realize that if there were any inaccuracies in the speech made in Pembroke by a member of this house, they came direct from the Department of Labour and from nowhere else.

Mr. ROGERS: Was that the whole of the speech of my hon. friend—the sheet of paper he has there?

Mr. WALSH: It contained a very considerable amount of information, as the minister will readily recognize, and the officials of the department will recognize that it took them a considerable length of time to prepare. To show how accurate the minister is, he immediately followed his remark with this statement:

Where it had been suggested unemployment was increasing, the fact was that 60,000 wage earners had obtained jobs in the last 12 months.

Half-truths are sometimes worse to catch up with than statements which could be otherwise characterized. The minister switches from one phase of the subject directly to another phase of the subject, and then continues:

While Conservative leader R. B. Bennett would criticize in his speech here next Saturday—

He was anticipating the visit of the former Prime Minister.

—the cost of the employment commission, this cost had not—

And then he intrudes the little words "to date."

—to date, been more than one-third the cost of the late price spreads commission, Mr. Rogers said.

That is according to the report in this paper. It is a statement made to lead the people to believe that the cost of the employment commission was quite small as compared with the cost of the price spreads commission; but it was made before he had included his estimate of $275,000 to cover their work for the fiscal year upon which at that time we were about to enter. I refer to statements of that kind merely to show that misrepresentations are not confined to one political party. Personally I resent a suggestion that I have deliberately misquoted facts and figures in order to mislead the electorate of Pembroke or of any other part of Canada.

In the same speech the minister seemed to glory particularly in the fact that the courts of Canada and Great Britain had turned down the social legislation of the late Conservative government. He took pride in the fact. He pointed out to the people of Pembroke and, through them, to the people of Canada that that legislation had been rejected by the courts, as the Liberals had anticipated, and he was inclined to be boastful about the fact, I should have imagined that he would regret that social legislation instituted by a previous government for the good of the Canadian people had been treated in that way. But he expresses no regrets.

Mr. ROGERS: Well, but what else do I express, if my hon. friend wishes to state the situation correctly?

Mr. WALSH: He suggests here that:

Instead of advancing social security in this country Mr. Bennett retarded it—

Mr. ROGERS: Quite.

Mr. WALSH:

—by arbitrary appropriation of provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. ROGERS: Is there an expression of satisfaction that the legislation was thrown out?

Mr. WALSH: I shall read on.

The position taken by the Liberal party has been completely upheld by the Supreme Court of Canada and the privy council.

Mr. ROGERS: True.

Mr. WALSH:

All doubts have been removed by the Liberal party, so it will proceed with the working out of a co-operative program of constitutional means.

Mr. ROGERS: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. WALSH: Surely.

Mr. ROGERS: Does he really think it would have been to the advantage of this country to have had a program of social legislation actually placed in operation, an organization set up to deal with it, and then to have that legislation and the organization declared inoperative and beyond the competence of this parliament? Does he think this would really have contributed to social progress in this country?

Mr. WALSH: The point of view I always took in connection with that legislation was this, that if it had not been interfered with, if it had been put into effect, the chances are that there would not have been found anyone or any government in Canada to offer effective opposition to that legislation. Moreover, the courts would have been inclined, seeing that the acts were in force, to take an altogether different point of view.

I am convinced that when you take a stated case to the Supreme Court of Canada, you go there with a question mark opposite your legislation; and with that question mark staring the judges in the face they cannot do otherwise than carefully scrutinize the legislation and wonder why it is there. There must be some doubt in the minds of the authorities if they send it there. You go there with a question mark opposite your own legislation and there is a doubt; whereas if you put it into effect and have someone else direct attention to it, you at least stand on the ground of belief in what you have put into effect; you believe that it has some force in law. I may be wrong, but that is my opinion; I am not a jurist, simply a layman. I notice that the most competent authorities on the Liberal side laugh such an idea to scorn. Well, as I have said on different occasions, I am always happy to have the advice of lawyers when it is absolutely necessary; but where common sense is of more value than legal opinion, as it sometimes is, I would rather take the opinion of the lay mind.

The minister has quoted certain figures to show that unemployment has decreased. I do not doubt his figures as tabulated; but I want to point out to him that the distress in Canada is as great to-day as it was a year ago, as great as it was two years ago to-day. We have fewer people unemployed, but I can tell the minister that there is a large number of people in distress who are not on the unemployed list. They are being employed in factories for two or three days a week on a mere pittance, and for that reason their names no longer appear on the unemployed list. That gives rise to distress; that is a serious problem and one with which we should be concerned in this parliament. As I intimated last evening, however, I have very little hope that the problem will be seriously and courageously faced by those who are at present administering the affairs of the dominion. I am only hoping that some of my Liberal friends will take the opportunity to get into this debate and make a real effort on behalf of the people of Canada, instead of coming here to applaud others who are endeavouring to do something in the interests of their constituencies. If there were more thinking and less interfering with those who are trying to do some work, we might make more rapid progress even in this parliament directed by a Liberal ministry.

Mr. McCANN: That is the school teacher.

Mr. WALSH: Probably it would be better if we had fewer doctors and more school teachers. I suggest that this government is fighting shy of responsibility. It is undermining our democratic institutions by appointing commissions to do the work that the elected representatives of the people were presumed to do. It is handing over the legitimate work, the responsibility of cabinet and of parliament, to commissions who are in no wise responsible to the people. This, in my opinion, is undermining our democratic institutions and is taking a direct blow at democracy, for which many have struggled in the past in order to bring it to its present form, which we enjoy as a privilege. The sooner we get back to the democratic, parliamentary form of government, the sooner will the people be satisfied that they are living in a country in which they can expect their problems to be courageously faced by the representatives whom they send here. We are tired in Canada of the commission form of government and of a government in office who are continuously shirking their responsibility to the people and shifting that responsibility on to commissions or into the courts, in this way hiding themselves and their inability to handle problems.

There is one more point that I wish to touch on in closing. The minister made a three and a half hour speech yesterday. I have read it carefully, and I want to ask him, when the bill is finally introduced and comes up for second reading, to take fifteen minutes to outline to the house the real and genuine policy of the present government in dealing with the question of unemployment. I suggest to him that he dismiss all unnecessary words, dismiss all these fine academic phrases and get down to real hard, concrete facts—1, 2, 3, 4, and so on. Let him do this so that the people of Canada will understand that the problem is being satisfactorily dealt with; so that those who are unemployed, those who are partly employed, our young people who have not yet had an opportunity of finding employment, will all know that the parliament of Canada, led by even a Liberal ministry, is actually doing something in their interest and working out their ultimate salvation. I shall ask the minister to do that in just fifteen minutes. I shall ask him to give us an outline of the Liberal policy to show what they propose to do during the next fiscal year to meet this serious problem. The minister knows it is a serious problem; everyone knows it. I read in the press last week of 400,000 young people in the city of New York who had not yet been placed in industry or had not found work. The same condition prevails in our own country. What are we doing to help these people? The responsibility rests upon this government. What are they doing to assist these people who are looking to them? I leave the question with the minister and look forward to a concrete statement, taking about fifteen minutes when the second reading of the bill comes up, so that I shall know what to tell my people, when I return to my constituency, as to what they may expect from the present government in the immediate future.

Mr. J. M. TURNER (Springfield): The resolution before the house reads:

> That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide assistance towards the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress, and for such payments out of moneys appropriated by parliament as may be necessary for all or any of the purposes of the proposed legislation.

This resolution and the bill that follows should, in my judgment, constitute one of the most important pieces of legislation ever to come before this present House of Commons, because it touches upon the lives and very livelihood of nearly one million people in the Dominion of Canada, in short, one out of eleven of its entire population.

This vital question, yet unsolved, has been a menace to the Canadian people for the past eight years, and according to reports for the past three months or so we are again heading back into the woods instead of in the opposite direction. Relief and unemployment figures are still cause for alarm. It is therefore possible that we may be hitting into another depression without coming out of the one which started in 1930.

There is at present right across the dominion a general feeling of unrest and insecurity, which seems to be growing, and I think we can attribute that feeling to the great number of people who have no work, who are on relief and have very little hope of getting a job. I have several suggestions to make, some of which I gave in this chamber last year. Hon. members will be interested to know that until now unemployment relief has cost this government alone nearly $300,000,000. This is exclusive of money spent by the provinces and the municipalities. Therefore, let us assume that we are starting all over again, having that enormous amount of money to spend. I suggest that the government consider some of the following suggestions:

1. We should complete the trans-Canada highway from one end of Canada to the other, hard-surface it and make connecting links with the United States and to all our national parks, as a dominion unemployment scheme.

2. We should see how many of our unemployed we could get to go on the land, in districts which have never been in the dried-out areas. My own constituency of Springfield is one such district, and there are many others. I have had many letters from people living in the cities who have had some experience on farms, who would be willing to go back to the land if they got proper assistance.

3. Why should we not, with the abundance of surplus electricity given to us by providence, supply all the rural homes with the simple convenience of electricity? In my judgment, that is one of the reasons why the people of to-day, especially the young people, are so desirous of leaving the farms, and are found walking the streets of our cities. They have not any conveniences whatsoever to encourage them to remain on the farms.

4. We should do something to encourage industries, such as the sugar beet industry and canning factories, which would help not only the farmers and the labour market, but the consumers, who should be the first consideration of this dominion. I suggest that we study New Zealand's example, which at this time is establishing an iron and steel industry which will employ 1,500 men steadily, and I am informed that the money for this enterprise, some $25,000,000, is being advanced by a national state bank without cost to the taxpayers. We should also start a national slum clearance campaign, and also look to the opportunities afforded in the various mining developments. All these works would become assets of the Dominion of Canada, and revenue bearing as well.

Then I suggest to the Minister of Labour that this government should give serious consideration to the proposal that the employable unemployed should be a dominion government responsibility. Prepare the way now to commence on an all-Canada front and place these men on works such as I have suggested. If they failed to take advantage of opportunities afforded them for employment they would then have to seek other work themselves.

Coming back to the trans-Canada highway, with connecting links with the United States and various national parks, I believe it would bring thousands of tourists from across the line and, through the gasoline tax, etc., thousands of dollars into the treasuries of the provincial governments, particularly those in the west, which are almost bankrupt. Merchants, hotels, tourist parks, garages and other lines of business would similarly benefit. We must keep in mind that the tourist industry is the third largest industry in the dominion, and we should do everything to encourage it and at the same time help to eliminate the terrible unemployment that exists. Also the trans-Canada highway would increase the value of lands in the areas through which it passes. This is not to be overlooked.

Dealing with the extension of electrical service to districts which have not that service, I would point out that at this time the government of Manitoba has made wonderful progress in this direction and shows a surplus this year. I would ask this government, if approached by the Manitoba government, to lend their assistance in helping the Manitoba hydro in financing the seventeen extensions which they propose to build this year, and which will give employment as well. Some of those seventeen towns are in my own riding, where nearly all the electricity is generated for the province; I refer to such towns as East Selkirk, Lockport, Gonor, Narol, Tyndall and Garson.

This resolution is so important to the welfare of the people of our dominion that I believe the people generally care not whether they are relieved from misery and suffering by an unbalanced budget or monetary reform, if necessary, or any other method, as long as they are given opportunity to work and earn a decent livelihood. May I impress upon our worthy Minister of Finance not to be in haste about balancing the budget until the million people to whom I have referred are first taken care of.

With respect to the disunity that is so prevalent at the moment, I know of no other way that would help as much to hold the nine provinces together in a spirit of good will as the completion of the trans-Canada highway, so that the thousands of people of the east who now go to the United States and elsewhere will go west, and the people of the west will visit the east. In that way, through the exchange of thought, the feeling of friction between the east and the west will disappear and we shall have a stronger united Canada. The cost should be a secondary consideration. I have noticed time and time again in Winnipeg how few Ontario cars we see, hardly any from Quebec, and I do not remember seeing any at all from the maritime provinces. Such conditions are bound to affect our country. The trans-Canada highway should be a magnet to draw the tourist trade of the North American continent, and if made so the tourist business would double in no time.

May I say to the Prime Minister and to the committee that it is about time this supreme House of Commons should go rapidly forward in instituting an unemployment insurance scheme, and that this dominion should have the final authority in all such matters of supreme national importance. Look at what the mother country has done with respect to unemployment insurance.

I urge the Minister of Labour to bring in a bill, based on this resolution, wide enough in scope to relieve the terrible suffering and misery and supply the needs of the underfed and improperly clothed children who to-day in my constituency are wearing cotton clothes in forty below zero weather when they should have substantial woollen clothing. I care not whether we sit here until a year from to-day, or longer if necessary, if I could be assured that results will be accomplished to help our people. I am prepared to support this measure whole-heartedly, and any other legislation that leads in the direction I have indicated.

In conclusion, may I take this opportunity of thanking the Minister of Labour for the help afforded my constituency by way of road work, etc., and hard-surfacing part of the trans-Canada highway, which has tremendously increased our tourist trade and business in general, and better than that it has put some cash into the pockets of hundreds of our people who were greatly in need of it. May he lend his assistance to complete this year the work started in 1937.

Progress reported.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. LACROIX

PRESS REPORTS OF STATEMENTS MADE BEFORE THE PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE OF THE QUEBEC LEGISLATURE

Mr. EDOUARD LACROIX (Beauce) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege, and since it is a matter of great personal concern, I have written down what I intend to say. Yesterday, before the public accounts committee, at Quebec, my integrity was called in question by the prime minister of my province, as reported by several Canadian newspapers.

Taking for granted that the report published in La Presse of April 5th page 25, is an accurate statement of what occurred in the public accounts committee, which report was moreover substantially corroborated by all other Quebec newspapers, I notice the following words:

Hon. Mr. Duplessis: Do you know Mr. Edouard Lacroix, the federal member for Beauce?

Mr. Gagnon: Yes sir.

Hon. Mr. Duplessis: He is a lumber merchant?

Mr. Gagnon: Yes sir.

Hon. Mr. Duplessis: Tell the committee what you know about Mr. Lacroix's dealings.

Mr. Gagnon: Under a statute of 1910, it was forbidden to export to the United States any lumber coming from crown lands. Well, in 1924-25, Mr. Lacroix cut down several thousand feet of lumber which he shipped to the United States.

Hon. Mr. Duplessis: Where was that timber cut?

Mr. Gagnon: On crown lands in Daaquam township.

In reply to this first charge, I wish to state that contrary to what the prime minister of Quebec endeavoured to bring out according to what I have quoted, never, absolutely never has a single cord of wood from Daaquam township been exported to the United States either by myself or by any of my companies. So much with regard to that first malicious or politically sadistic falsehood.

Then the same individual further tried to show through a man in his pay that I had cut trees of a smaller size than that provided in the statute, in that same Daaquam township, and therefore that I owed $117,991 in fines to the provincial government. Well, Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a receipt from the government of the province of Quebec, showing that all the fines that I have incurred during the whole course of my life through regular development of our forests, and over which I had no personal or absolute control, amounted not to $117,991, as erroneously and maliciously stated by Mr. Duplessis, but actually to only $5,000.

Not only can I say and prove to the people that the offences to which I have referred were the only ones committed, but I have also before me all the proper receipts from the provincial government showing conclusively that I owe nothing, and moreover that I always paid regularly each year and in proper time the amounts which I was bound to pay under the law. And these amounts are not those which Mr. Duplessis also tried viciously to establish; I have paid $121,910.90 in excess of that, namely $244,601.98.

Mr. Speaker, if I am wearying the house with these personal details, it is not so much for me as for the sake of my wife and children of whom I may well be proud, unlike Mr. Duplessis, and to whom I shall leave the well known reputation of an honest business man, who always paid fair salaries to his employees, thus giving my family an example of christian charity, of honesty and of morality which I would be loath to compare with that of the prime minister of the province of Quebec, whatever he may say.

In fact, if the prime minister had been prompted by that spirit of justice which must always be based on christian charity, he would not have singled out the member for Beauce in connection with the logging operations in Daaquam township; he would have also referred to previous and later companies—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order order!

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Beauce—

Mr. LACROIX: —whose policy has been similar to mine, unless his purpose was to show once more his gratitude to the powerful companies for which he has so much sympathy.

Mr. WALSH: Mr. Speaker—

Mr, SPEAKER: The hon. member for Mount Royal has the floor.

Mr. WALSH: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I hardly think that on a question of privilege the hon. gentleman is in order in discussing a matter which has been and is being dealt with in the legislature of one of the provinces. I understand that the rules of this house allow a member to defend himself against an attack that has been made upon him publicly in relation to the discharge of his duties as a member of the house, but I do not think that the attack he complains of has been made on the hon. member as a member of this house. I raise that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other hon. member wish to speak to the point of order?

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, it is quite apparent, I think, without going into the authorities at all, that it is competent for any hon. member who has been attacked in his capacity as a member of this house to rise in his place on a question of privilege and make such explanation or statement as he may think desirable to negative the inferences to be drawn from any public statement attacking his honour or his fitness as a member of the house. But to rise in his place and discuss his relations with the provincial government with respect to lumber transactions and licences for the cutting of timber is to deal with purely a provincial matter, and if we are to listen for a quarter of an hour on a question of privilege to a statement that has to do with purely a provincial matter, where are we going to land? That is the question at issue.

I cannot but think that the hon. member will realize that he is dealing with something that might properly be dealt with in the legislature at Quebec, something having to do with his capacity as a business man, not as a member of this chamber, and the discharge of his obligations in connection with a matter affecting timber licences and timber rights in that province, over which we have no control. If every transaction that affects the question of a man's relations to provincial governments or to contractual obligations with respect to timber or sales of lumber in the United States is to become the subject matter of discussion in this chamber on a question of privilege, certainly, Mr. Speaker, this house is going to be in rather a difficult position.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, a few years ago, when a committee sitting in Manitoba had found something against a member of this house, the late Hon. Mr. Rogers, I well remember that he rose in his place in this house and answered the charges that had been made against him, not as a member of the House of Commons but as a public man in the province of Manitoba.

As far as my hon. friend from Beauce (Mr. Lacroix) is concerned, I listened to what he was saying. He was grossly attacked yesterday, not as a member of the House of Commons but as a man, and he takes the opportunity to defend himself and his honour in the only tribunal of which he is a member, namely, the House of Commons.

My right hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) may be right in saying that the hon. member should defend himself in the legislature or committee of the legislature of Quebec, but if my right hon. friend knew how proceedings are being conducted there, he would know that men are attacked and are not given the right to say even one word in their defence or in explanation of the charges made against them.

I merely want to add that all of the colleagues of the member for Beauce ought to support him in his endeavour to vindicate his honour as a man.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I have one observation to make with reference to what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has just said. I prefaced my observations by the remark that any statement made outside of this house that reflects upon the honour or fitness of a member to sit in this chamber as a representative of the people, he is within his rights in denying as a matter of privilege. He has the right to deny any insult directed against him outside of this chamber touching his capacity as a member; indeed his duty is to deal with it promptly in this chamber, but not to make an elaborate speech dealing with his relation as a business man and merchant and lumber man with the government of the province of Quebec or any other province. The distinction is clear. It is mentioned in the books with great particularity.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has made an appeal for our sympathy—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No sympathy at all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It was an appeal for sympathy, and I say that our sympathy may very well be warranted. But I suggest that we cannot play fast and loose with the rules of the house, and if the hon. member were living in some other part than in Quebec and belonged to some other party than the party in power, I do not think an appeal of this kind would be permitted. Hence it seems to me—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I say that is my opinion, and I do not withdraw. For that reason some of us who belong to minority groups might very well hope that there would be an extension of sympathy and every privilege possible afforded for any member who has been maligned to vindicate his honour. At the same time we must insist that the rules be kept; if they are not rigidly adhered to, it should be distinctly understood that the rule is for this particular purpose set aside, or such a matter might be quoted in future as a precedent. Citation 161 is very clear.

> Libels on members have also been constantly punished: but to constitute a breach of privilege they must concern the character or conduct of members in that capacity—

That is, in their capacity as members.

> —and the libel must be based on matters arising in the actual transaction of the business of the house.

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

If I understand aright, the matters concerned have not arisen in connection with the transaction of the business of this house: hence I do not see that in accordance with the rule this matter can be raised as one of privilege. If it is put on a sympathy basis I will vote in favour of it, but not as coming within the rules governing the privileges of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When my hon. friend who has just spoken makes the inference that his Honour the Speaker is according to the hon. member for Beauce a special privilege because he comes from the province of Quebec—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: He did not say that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —and that he would not be accorded the same right if he came from another province—and that is what he said—he is reflecting upon his Honour the Speaker.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I did not say that Mr. Speaker, nor do I imply it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say that I understood the hon. member to go further than that, and to indicate—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He says "no" before I have made my statement. What I understood him to say was that if the hon. member had not belonged to the majority party in the house he would not have been granted the privilege which he is being granted now—which also is a reflection on his Honour the Speaker and upon the house itself.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I did not reflect in any degree whatever upon your Honour. At the moment when I offered my remarks we were discussing a point of order. I consider that the Speaker is justified in listening as he has listened until such time as a point of order is raised; that is very frequently the procedure in this house; but once the point of order is raised, and the ground of that objection stated, then I think we are perfectly justified in basing our statements on the point of order itself. That is what I tried to do.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will pass on to the next move my hon. friend made, which was to quote from citation 161 set forth in the rules of the house. That citation had reference to the question of punishment for libel. I do not believe that that was a pertinent citation. If my hon. friend had quoted citation 157 instead of 161 he would have seen that the rules of the house are to the effect that interference with or reflections upon members have been resented as indignities to the house itself. When the hon. member who has raised the question of privilege has been reflected upon as one who is unworthy to sit in any house, surely that is an indignity to the House of Commons itself. In my opinion he should be allowed the fullest latitude to make clear his position with respect to all the circumstances that have occasioned the reflections which have been made.

May I add this, that the premier of Quebec stands in a very exceptional and very privileged position, and when, from his privileged and high position as premier of his province, he makes a charge against an hon. member of this house which cannot be replied to in the house in which it is made, surely that hon. member should be granted the fullest latitude to defend his honour and to make clear his position in relation to the situation referred to.

Mr. SPEAKER: With respect to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh), and referred to by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) I hold that it is not well taken. Standing order No. 16 states clearly:

Whenever any matter of privilege arises, it shall be taken into consideration immediately.

I have listened to the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Lacroix) and his explanation, and I think the facts he has stated justify him in rising in this house and stating his point of privilege. I would ask him to be as brief as possible, but he has a right to explain his point of privilege.

Mr. LACROIX (Translation): If the prime minister of Quebec had really been prompted by that spirit of justice which must always be based on christian charity, he would not have singled out the member for Beauce in connection with logging operations in Daaquam township, but would also have referred to previous and later companies whose policy has been similar to mine, unless his purpose was to show once more his gratitude to those powerful companies for which he has so much sympathy.

I may add that the Taschereau government never granted favours either to myself or to my companies, because I never requested any. Besides, I do believe that, under certain circumstances of which every one is aware, if I had been granted favours, they would have been made public.

The Hon. Mr. Duplessis endeavoured to show that I have shipped 40,000 logs from the Lac Portage district to the state of Maine, and this as long ago as 1924.

Here is my answer: never, absolutely never did I purchase from the Quebec government any timber in the Lac Portage district, and in order to show still further that Mr. Duplessis' statement was untrue, I have here, Mr. Speaker, the contracts whereby I purchased 227,484·29 cords of wood at a cost of $828,-922.02 from the company which enjoys Mr. Duplessis' friendship, that is John Breakey Limited. Under this contract, I was permitted by these same people, who are friends of Mr. Duplessis, to build a sluice, and to use the water of lake Portage for driving my logs into the state of Maine. Those same people, friends of Mr. Duplessis, had the government's authorization to sell me that timber. Such authorization was granted to them through another of Mr. Duplessis' friends, Mr. Thomas Maher, a forestry engineer and a former organizer for the Conservative party in the province of Quebec. And from the receipt which I found on Mr. Breakey's file at the time he transferred the title to me, I noticed that the other friend of Mr. Duplessis had received $10,000 from the Breakey Company for having secured that favour.

It will thus be seen, Mr. Speaker, that even under the former government, whose actions are now being scrutinized, the people who were receiving or requesting favours were not always those to whom Mr. Duplessis is referring, but rather people who were consorting with Mr. Duplessis.

Finally, Mr. Duplessis endeavoured to show that I had been desirous of securing an appointment as Minister of Lands and Forests, in Quebec. I am unafraid of any comparison between my ambitions and those of Mr. Duplessis but I am loath to discuss the subject. However, for the information of Mr. Duplessis, and in order to gratify wishes which are those of an inquisitor and a sadistic politician, I may tell him that in this respect he was again mistaken, because I might have been a minister, if such had been my wish, for the good reason that I was offered a portfolio.

Mr. Speaker, I may say in conclusion that I do protest, because my case is similar to that of a number of other Canadians from my own province, and because Mr. Duplessis, in order to hold his sway, is resorting in our province to the tactics used by a Stalin in Russia. Stalin kills, Duplessis debases.

3. What are their names and addresses?

4. How are they classified by the civil service commission?

5. What salaries do they receive per annum and per month?

6. (a) J. E. R. Blais is a medical doctor. Recent inquiries indicate that he practises his profession outside of his post office duties.

(b) J. P. E. Brosseau. Departmental information is that he has no other occupation.

(c) Eugene Nantel sells annuities in his spare time on a commission basis.

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

6. What salary does each one receive?

Mr. EULER: At the present time there is one employee engaged in driving an automobile at Montreal post office, namely:—

Emile Quintin, returned soldier, disability case, 2214 Visitation street, Montreal, who is classified as a postal clerk with salary at the rate of $1,740 per annum. He has been engaged in these duties since 1928.

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. Is Doctor Paul Emile Meloche, dentist, 8502 St. Denis street, Montreal, an employee of the Post Office Department at Montreal?

2. If so, what is his yearly salary?

3. What is his classification with the civil service commission?

4. When was he appointed?

5. Is he practising his profession as a dentist?

Mr. EULER:

1. Joseph Paul Ernest Meloche, a dentist residing at the address given, is an employee of the Montreal post office.

2. $1,440 a year.

3. Postal clerk.

4. Part time employee—12th November, 1929; Full time employee—26th May, 1930.

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. Is Mr. Rene St. Onge, 4537 Fabre street, Montreal, an employee at the Montreal post office, and also employed as teacher at St. Pierre Claver school? If so, did he pass the civil service examinations?

2. What is his classification with the civil service commission?

3. Who recommended and authorized his employment, while P.O.S. circular No. 8 was still in force?

Mr. EULER:

No. 8 in January, 1931. Subsequently, in 1933, he obtained employment as a teacher but the department had no information regarding this until recently.

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. Is Mr. Pierre Léon Vézina, of 1466 Aylwin, Montreal, a clerk in the post office at $1,740 per annum, the same individual as Pierre Léon Vézina who is employed as professor by the Catholic Schools Commission of Montreal, district east?

2. What is his classification by the civil service commission?

3. Who has recommended and authorized his employment when circular P.O.S. No. 8 was still in force?

Mr. EULER:

1. Recent inquiries indicate he is the same person.

2. Postal clerk.

3. Mr. Vezina has been employed since the 21st June, 1919. Circular P.O.S. No. 8 was issued on the 5th January, 1931. In 1932, Mr. Vezina was advised that he would have to choose between the two positions. He stated that his contract with the school commission had expired and that he, therefore, wished to retain his post office position. He was retained in the service on that understanding. He evidently entered into a further contract with the school commission without reporting his action to the department.

ROUGH BARK CREEK AND MIDALE DAMS

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn):

1. What was the total cost of putting in: (a) the dam at Rough Bark creek, near Goodwater, Saskatchewan; (b) the dam at Souris river, south of Midale, Saskatchewan?

2. Has the Minister of Agriculture received any report from the engineers on the recent destruction of these dams due to flood?

3. If so, what reasons were given for the failure of the said dams to hold the bodies of water for which they were intended?

4. Does the government plan to replace these dams at an early date?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. (a) $9,314.93; (b) $14,615.98.

2. There has been no destruction of Rough Bark creek dam. A 30-foot section of the Midale dam went out. Report was made by the engineers verbally and confirming written report is on its way.

3. Earth dams constructed from very dry soil need careful filling so the clay may settle permanently. The sudden severe thaw with rain caused a 17-foot rise in water at the Midale dam in such short time that the dry powdery clay core leaked and a section washed out. Unless clay filled dams are puddled during construction this risk during first filling always exists. No water was available for puddling even though the increased expense might have appeared justifiable.

4. The dam will be repaired at once.

Mr. AHEARN:

2. How much is paid in old age pensions annually in Alberta?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. As at December 31, 1937—9,755.

2. On account of adjustments between provinces, it is not possible to ascertain accurately, from the records of the dominion government, the total amount paid during any particular period to residents of the province of Alberta.

The dominion's contribution to the province of Alberta during the calendar year 1937 amounted to $1,531,343.11, which constituted approximately 75 per cent of the total amount paid out in old age pensions by the province of Alberta.

DOMINION-BRITISH COLUMBIA YOUTH TRAINING COURSES

Mr. O'NEILL:

What opportunities have been offered to youth under the dominion-provincial youth training program in British Columbia?

Mr. ROGERS:

Courses under the Dominion-British Columbia youth training agreement during the past fiscal year included numerous classes and activities of a widely varying character. Five main projects were operated, as follows:

1. Forestry training.
2. Placer mining.
3. Urban occupational training (for both men and women).
4. Physical training (for both men and women).
5. Rural training (for both men and women).

Forestry training courses proved attractive and successful and it was notable that very few trainees dropped out during operation. The placer mining project was of value chiefly in upbuilding morale and physique of trainees.

In connection with urban occupational training a partial list of activities provided for follows: For men: Wood-working, cabinet making, motor mechanics, practical electricity, plastering, cement working, camp cookery, Diesel engineering. For women: Household work, dressmaking, garment making, ladies tailoring, laundering, cookery, shorthand and typewriting, retail selling.

Rural classes for both men and women: Chick sexing, farm management and accounting, poultry husbandry, dairy-farming, beekeeping.

Physical training classes were outstanding. More than 3,000 unemployed men and women had been given physical education up to the end of last year. Dominion cooperation enabled the province to extend the benefits of its physical training program.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PAYMENTS TO MUNICIPALITIES IN LIEU OF TAXES

Mr. MAYBANK:

1. Does the government of Canada pay any money to any municipality in Canada (other than the city of Ottawa) in respect of properties owned by the Dominion of Canada either as taxes or as a grant in lieu of paying taxes, either for general taxes or for local improvements, or for police and fire protection, or arising from any similar reason?

2. If any such moneys are paid, to what municipalities and in what amounts?

BRITISH COLUMBIA LUMBER

Mr. CHURCH:

1. How many feet of British Columbia lumber was exported to Japan for the last year of record or in 1937?

2. What was the export price?

3. Were any protests made alleging a waste of Canada's natural resources owing to low prices?

4. At what price per thousand feet was similar British Columbia lumber, shipped via Panama canal, delivered in Toronto?

5. Have any protests against such competition been received from New Ontario mills?

6. Will any regulatory measures be adopted by the Department of National Resources to check such disposal of Canada's natural resources?

Mr. RINFRET: Return tabled.

CIVIL SERVANTS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. HANSON:

1. What is the total number of permanent and temporary civil servants in the province of British Columbia, showing each department separately?

2. What is the total amount of money paid to: (a) permanent employees; (b) temporary employees, showing each department separately?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S FLAG

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a copy of the dispatch, by the direction of His Majesty the King, from the Lord Chamberlain to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada dated December 22, 1930, relating to the flag now flown by His Excellency the Governor General.

PRIVY COUNCIL APPEALS

PROPOSED ABOLITION OF APPEALS TO HIS MAJESTY IN COUNCIL—CONSIDERATION OF BILL ON FRIDAY, APRIL 8

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the order for second reading of Bill No. 19, an act respecting appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council be taken into consideration after routine proceedings on Friday next, the 8th instant, and that this order have precedence over all other business on that day.

He said: If the house will permit me I should like to amend the motion by dropping the concluding words—

. . . and that this order have precedence over all other business on that day.

At the time I handed the notice to the clerk I assumed that as we were adjourning for the Easter vacation on Friday night it would in all probability be the wish of hon. members to have this particular bill occupy most of the time for discussion on Friday, and to have this known in advance. However, at the time I thought that greater progress would have been made with certain private and other bills in the interval. I see that on Tuesday night last the bill in respect to the Niagara Falls Observation Bridge Company in particular was again talked out. As the opportunities to discuss these measures are few we ought not I think to take away an opportunity on Friday night of this week. I might say in regard to the Niagara Falls Observation Bridge Bill that the government is wholly favourable to the enactment of the measure, and I think all hon. members on this side are in sympathy with it. At any rate if the motion in its present form were to stand I am afraid the impression might be created that it has been framed with a view of precluding discussion on Friday night of the measure I have mentioned. So I should like to have the motion amended in that particular.

In regard to the motion itself may I say that the government feels that the bill in the name of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) in respect of appeals to the privy council deals with a question of great interest, particularly at this time when constitutional questions are much to the fore. We believe it would be in every way in the public interest to have the measure fully discussed on at least one day during the session. Some little time ago the government gave the hon. member to understand that if he would not press his bill at the time, an opportunity would be given later for him to bring it before the house. I hope therefore that hon. members will see their way to adopt the motion.

Motion as amended agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED DISMANTLING OF GUNS AND REDUCTION OF DEFENCE EQUIPMENT AT HALIFAX AND VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): In view of the importance to Canada, and in particular to my own province of British Columbia, of the defence measures which are being taken to protect the Canadian coast, I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) to an editorial appearing in the Halifax Daily Star of April 5. I believe this paper is the evening edition of the Halifax Chronicle. The title of the editorial is What Goes on Behind the Scenes.

And it reads as follows:

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: He has a right to read it.

Mr. GREEN: The editorial reads:

During recent weeks there has been much ado in military circles around Halifax. Giant guns have been uprooted from their emplacements along the harbour mouth, munitions have been moved to and fro about the waterfront.

Most of the activities have been conducted under cover of night and everything done with the utmost secrecy—barring what gets told to every Tom, Dick and Harry around the military canteens.

First, the guns were torn from their positions, put on flat cars and started off for Vancouver—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The hon. member should state his question. What is he reading from?

Mr. GREEN: I intend to ask the minister for a statement in regard to this editorial, and I think in fairness to him I should read it so that he may know exactly what it says.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): On a point of order, may I suggest that this question refers to a question on the same subject asked in this house yesterday and replied to by the responsible minister. I think the rule is clear that outside comments on proceedings in this house cannot be read. I shall be very glad indeed to answer a general question.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): The minister is entirely in error. This is not a comment on what was said by the minister yesterday. This relates to the general question; it is a specific statement which I think this house should hear and have answered. It states something with respect to the movement of guns from Halifax to Vancouver and from Vancouver to Halifax, and an opportunity should be afforded to the government to answer categorically.

Mr. SPEAKER: A question can be asked based on the facts stated in the editorial, but I do not think the editorial can be read.

Mr. BENNETT: But it is the only way the hon. member can put the question properly. This is not a question of reading a telegram. We have discussed that before, and the sense of this house has been entirely against that limitation. I endeavoured to have that limitation imposed, but the Prime Minister was of the opinion that it was an improper limitation to impose and it was not imposed. If the reading of the editorial is the only way in which the question can properly be put—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But it is not in this case.

Mr. BENNETT: It is in this case, unfortunately. The Prime Minister has not quite followed the terms of the editorial. It contains specific allegations; it is not conjecture. It states that guns have been removed from their emplacements, put on cars and started for Vancouver, and, e converso, that they have been taken up from their foundations in Vancouver and started towards Halifax.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The question is now stated by my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: It deals also with the reasons. The only way the question can properly be put is by reading the statement. The Prime Minister in the course of debate frequently refers to what has been stated in the newspapers. I endeavoured to impose a limitation on that, both when I was in the government and when I was in opposition, but now by tacit agreement everyone refers to newspapers and reads from them. That happens right along. The editorial to which reference is made cannot be summarized so as to do other than leave a wrong impression. Therefore I suggested to my friend, and I think it is sound advice, that the only way he could be fair to the government as well as the country was to read the editorial so as to afford opportunity to the minister to make it perfectly clear that it is without foundation. I think the hon. member was good enough to give a copy of the editorial to the minister so that he might prepare himself to answer the question. The only reason the hon. member is reading it is that there is no other method by which he can properly ask this question. The question he proposes to ask, as he informed me, is merely: Will the minister make a statement as to the accuracy of that editorial?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If that question is put I shall be most happy to answer it, and I am only too anxious to make a complete statement. But I think the general rule is clear that it is out of order to read an editorial which reflects on a matter discussed here yesterday and in regard to which a reply was given by the responsible minister.

Mr. BENNETT: This was not discussed yesterday.

Mr. GREEN: The reply yesterday dealt only with the situation in Halifax; there was no mention of Vancouver or the Pacific. This editorial concerns the constituency of the minister as well as my own, and I think in fairness the editorial should be read to the house and an explanation given.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member cannot ask his question without reading the statements.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member should give a summary of the article and then put his question.

Mr. GREEN: That is difficult to do. I can summarize it more quickly by reading the rest of the editorial, dealing only in regard to the situation in Vancouver:

> First the guns were torn from their positions, put on flat cars and started off for Vancouver to protect British Columbia and Ian Mackenzie's constituents against the yellow peril. Then somebody changed their mind, according to the reports, and the guns came trundling back again;
> On top of all that, somebody began to rip out guns from emplacements at Vancouver and start them off for Halifax. Then that was stopped.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I still suggest that this is highly improper.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Surely an editorial which names an hon. member of this house is one that should not be read, particularly when it is so written as to appear to be reflecting upon the minister.

Mr. BENNETT: There used to be great glory taken in reading editorials reflecting on me by name. It has suddenly become a new law to be applied only when the present government is concerned. If the Prime Minister wants me to give references it can easily be done if I am given time to turn them up. Editorials from newspapers all over Canada were read—

Mr. DUNNING: Not on questions on the orders of the day.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there any difference between orders of the day and any other time?

Mr. DUNNING: Surely.

Mr. BENNETT: I fail to understand what it is, when it is a question of pressing public importance. The question that is being asked is as to the accuracy of a statement. The reference to the minister can be left out. I am familiar with the rules; I have looked them up to-day, but now what governs is a settled practice in this house, not these rules at all. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) need not shake his head. It has been settled in this house, over my protests both in opposition and as prime minister. The practice has grown up. I think it is not a sound one, but I have agreed to it and accepted it. I accepted it when I was in office and I accept it now. I have endeavoured to be very careful, in view of the ruling given by the Speaker the other day that you should not read telegrams but should say what is the purport of them, but it would be grossly unfair to do other than read that editorial. I have read it. So far as the reference to the minister is concerned, that can be very properly left out. I have always taken that view, but unfortunately I used to be the victim of that sort of thing, as perhaps some hon. members will recall. I make no complaint about that but, Mr. Speaker, in three minutes the hon. member could have read the rest of the editorial, and the question could have been answered. He could not summarize it because then it would be said that he was unfair in endeavouring to do so.

Mr. GREEN: There is only one more paragraph I wish to read:

> Everything was done in feverish haste, almost as if the entire imperial Japanese navy had already been sighted in Juan de Fuca straits and heading for Victoria.

I would ask the minister for a statement as to the accuracy of that report and also as to whether or not we have legislation in Canada to protect military secrets, such as the official secrets act in Great Britain. If not, such legislation would seem very necessary at the present time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think my hon. friend from Vancouver South (Mr. Green) knows as well as I do that this statement to which he refers—

> On top of all that, somebody began to rip out guns from emplacements at Vancouver and start them off for Halifax. Then that was stopped.

—is the most ridiculous nonsense in the world, because there has not been an emplacement in Vancouver in all the years he has been living there. In the second place, of course, the reference to the entire Japanese navy being headed for Victoria is absolutely fantastic and incorrect. This is the most absolute nonsense. Any minister dealing with a very difficult problem concerning the reallocation of armaments upon a scientific principle should have the cooperation of this house and of the press as well. If spurious articles such as this are repeated it may be necessary to resort to the provisions of the Official Secrets Act in order that the public may be protected in regard to these matters. Some very reputable journals refused yesterday to publish this dispatch—

Mr. BENNETT: This is not a dispatch.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This is an editorial which was written, I think, though I am not sure, before I gave my reply yesterday afternoon. In any case the assumptions made are absolutely incorrect. What has happened is this, that there has been a reallocation of armaments, as I said yesterday; guns were removed that were unallocated and in reserve in Halifax. Some are being removed to other points in Nova Scotia. Everything is being done according to a very scientific plan, and it was not in the public interest at any time to disclose or discuss the exact details or the exact calibres of the armaments that have been transferred.

Mr. BENNETT: I should like to assure the minister that those of us who sit to the left of the Speaker in opposition have always desired to give him every possible assistance in this matter. Last session I think we perhaps gave him more assistance than he received from some of his own friends. We regard it as gravely as he does that these things should be published in the form in which they are. When the hon. member for Vancouver South spoke to me about it he asked if he should go to the minister. I am sure my hon. friend would at once acquit the hon. member of any desire to embarrass either the minister or anybody else.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Oh, I did not suggest that.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) asked me if he should go to the minister, and he went to the minister for the purpose of showing just what was being said.

May I add one word more, Mr. Speaker, with your consent. The statement that appeared in the press in the early part of this year, just about the time the house met, must have been obtained from some official source, with regard to the calibre of our guns. I submitted to the minister then that he should order a departmental inquiry, and that whoever was responsible should not be in the service of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): With regard to that last point, if I may answer it now, that inquiry was held, and it was absolutely impossible to trace to any definite source the leakage in that case. But the investigation was held, through the district officer in command in British Columbia.

Mr. BENNETT: A public investigation would get it very quickly.

Mr. NEILL: May I suggest that the passage of my two bills Nos. 11 and 38 would go far to allay the fears entertained in British Columbia alluded to by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green).

Mr. CHURCH: In view of the emergency which has arisen, may I ask if the minister is going to recall for active service his wonderful fleet from the pleasure jaunt it is taking down to the West Indies?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

MOVEMENT OF SETTLERS FROM DRIED OUT AREAS TO BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): I should like to remind the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) that about four or five weeks ago I brought to his attention a matter concerning people leaving the dried out area and settling on the lower mainland of British Columbia. I furnished the minister with the full information on March 8th. The reeves' association and those connected with the municipalities are very anxious to have a definite statement from the minister in regard to this matter, and I wonder if he is prepared to make an announcement.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): It was necessary to communicate with the provincial governments in this connection. The administration of relief in the drought areas is under the provincial government, and as soon as I get the information I shall be very glad to convey it to my hon. friend.

LONG BRANCH RIFLE RANGE

INQUIRY RESPECTING EMPLOYMENT OF EX-SERVICE MEN IN DISMANTLING OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). I have been advised that the work of dismantling certain buildings on the Long Branch rifle range in the county of Peel is being proceeded with. Will the minister give immediate consideration to the employment of some forty unemployed ex-service men on relief in that district, who are ready and able to do this type of work?

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): I find that only $500 remains unexpended with reference to the dismantling work to which my hon. friend has referred, which is now in progress. Instructions have been given already to employ unemployed ex-service men so far as possible.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

MEASURE FOR ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 5, consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution—Mr. Rogers—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide assistance towards the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress, and for such payments out of moneys appropriated by parliament as may be necessary for all or any of the purposes of the proposed legislation.

Mr. A. A. BROWN (Hamilton East): Mr. Chairman, the sole purpose of my few and rather brief remarks is to direct the attention of the government to the increase in relief and unemployment that is taking place in this country and that has taken place during the last few months. Naturally I should like to find out what the government is going to do in order to deal with this condition. Last Monday afternoon and evening I listened carefully, and I may say hopefully, to the long address of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) introducing the resolution providing for grants in order to alleviate agricultural and economic distress. I say I listened hopefully, because I expected that the minister was going to suggest some scheme or plan to cope with our present unemployment problem, which the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said was Canada's most urgent national problem. However, I was greatly disappointed. The minister reviewed briefly the report of the national employment commission and dealt rather vaguely with the potential value of the tourist trade. He finished up by eulogizing the trade policies of the government, which he claimed had brought prosperity to this country.

The minister did not seem to be aware that during the past few months the industries of this country have been slowing down because of the importations of foreign manufactured goods which have been flooding our market. Hamilton, being a large industrial centre, has suffered more keenly than many other centres. It has felt the effects of the recession to a considerable extent and the increased burden of relief is becoming so great that the government no longer can evade the responsibility of assuming the maintenance of our unemployed. In December, 1937, there were 2,607 heads of families on relief in Hamilton. In January, 1938, the number had increased to 2,982. In that month there were 9,120 dependants and 684 individuals on relief, a total of 12,863 persons. In February the number of heads of families on relief had increased to 3,247; the dependants had increased to 10,050 and the individuals to 740, making a grand total of 14,037. I have not the exact figures for March, but I am informed that there is a considerable increase.

There are also hundreds and hundreds of men who are working two, three and four days per week. These men are merely existing, and unless conditions improve, in a short time they too will be on relief. There are also many men possessing abundant health and ability who are unable to obtain employment because of their age. Men of thirty-eight, forty-two and forty-five years of age find it exceedingly difficult to secure employment. Their condition is as bad as, if not worse than, that of the western farmer, who at least can hope for a crop some time in the future.

Foreign manufactured goods are being sold in this country at ridiculously low prices, prices with which our Canadian manufacturers cannot possibly compete. I was advised last week in Hamilton that shoes are being imported from a foreign country at a cost of eighty cents per pair. It would cost our manufacturers at least $2.50 to produce a similar pair of shoes. Dresses are being sold at $1.25; our Canadian manufacturers would have to charge $6 or $8 for a similar product. I could give innumerable examples of subsidized foreign goods and goods made with cheap labour being dumped on our home markets. This decreases the market of the Canadian manufacturer and adds to our unemployment. I attribute these conditions to the government's trade policies which have not adequately protected the home market in order that our Canadian manufacturers might obtain a fair share.

I have one other observation to make. It has been the policy of governments in depression times in the past to attempt to stimulate the construction industry by spending millions of dollars on public works, many of which were not actually needed. While these methods have met with some success, I do not think they are practicable to-day. This government has attempted to stimulate the construction industry by making available cheap and easy money, but it has met with only partial success. The reason for its failure is the fact that the bulk of our construction work is carried on in the municipalities. Because of debt charges and the increasing cost of social services, particularly unemployment relief, our municipalities are compelled to impose such heavy taxes on real property that it is no longer desirable or profitable to build, buy or even hold such property. As in the case of the automobile, it is not the initial cost but the upkeep that is so heavy. I urge strongly that the government assume the burden of maintaining our unemployed, making sure that the benefits of this policy are conferred on the property owner. If this were done I believe much good would result, not only to the municipalities but also to the government.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, I think the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) will readily admit that when he introduced his motion on Monday last hon. members gave him an attentive hearing. The people of this country were looking forward with a good deal of eagerness to what the minister would have to say. As a member of this house I awaited the minister's statement in the hope that he would divulge the plans of the government to meet the pressing problem of unemployment and relief. We expected him not only to tell us something about the relief problem, but to go fully into the policy that the government had in mind to meet the situation that now confronts us.

My own eager anticipation of that occasion was manifested by the simple fact of my taking a few sheets of note paper out of my desk and placing them before me, with the idea of jotting down from time to time anything of interest and importance. Like many other hon. members, within the next few days I shall be going back to my constituency. In my constituency, as in those of many other hon. members, there are many men and women who are in want, who are unemployed or on the verge of being unemployed. I was anxious to take back to my constituents and to others whom I would meet in other parts of the dominion some ray of hope, something in the way of a policy which the government had to meet the existing situation. So, Mr. Chairman, I placed these few sheets of paper before me, and I waited for half an hour in the hope that I could jot something down, but there was nothing to record. The hour went by and I still had nothing to write down. Two hours went by, and the sheets in front of me were still blank. Three hours went by, and still they were blank. Just after the third hour had gone by the minister sat down, and I was still looking at those sheets of paper in front of me and wondering what I could tell the people of the city of Winnipeg.

The minister did say something that was of interest and possibly of importance so far as the administration of relief is concerned. But relief is only part of the problem of unemployment, and I was not so anxious to hear the minister deal with relief as I was to hear him deal with the fundamental question of the unemployed in this dominion; and on that question the minister had very little to say. I will say this, however, that the few remarks he did make on that question did not give the unemployed very much hope for the immediate future.

The minister dealt, for instance, with the drought situation. He said that the conditions in the industrial centres in western Canada were reflecting agricultural conditions in that part of the country. There may be a certain amount of truth in that, but I do not think the minister, who is such a close student of economics, would agree or that he would teach a body of students of economics that the unemployment and the poverty existing in western Canada are due to the fact that western Canada has had poor crops for the last two or three years. If he would, then, speaking in an economic sense, what would the minister have to say as to the unemployment situation that developed between the years 1929 and 1933, when similar conditions prevailed in our industrial centres in the west, not because we had a drought in the west but because we had too much of everything at that time.

So the position is that we have poverty when we have too much of everything; and, if we happen to have a lack of moisture in western Canada, then we blame unemployment and poverty on the lack of moisture. I do wish that the minister when he deals with this problem as it affects the people of western Canada in particular would go a little deeper into the fundamental aspects of the question instead of dealing with it in a more or less superficial way.

The minister had two suggestions to make, two items, shall I say, which may be regarded as constituting the policy of the government in coping with the situation. One was the tourist traffic, and the other the Canada-United States trade agreement looking towards an expansion of our trade with the country to the south of us. In regard to foreign trade, if the minister and the government are going to take credit for the improved economic conditions that existed in this country during the past two years up until last fall, whose is the responsibility for the conditions that have prevailed since? If the Canada-United States trade agreement was responsible for the improvement in trade up until a few months ago, what is responsible for the recession that has set in during the past few months? I am one of those who voted for the Canada-United States trade agreement. I am in favour of liberating trade wherever we possibly can; I am in favour of reducing tariffs wherever we possibly can, but side by side with that statement I say that in the reduction of tariffs there is not to be found the solution for the economic conditions that prevail in the Dominion of Canada. And may I say to my friends to my right, in exactly the same way, that in increasing tariffs there is not to be found any solution for our economic conditions, because if an increase in tariffs would have brought about a solution of our problems they would have been solved immediately after the year 1930-31.

May I say a word in regard to the importance of the unemployment situation? Its importance is not to be measured merely by the numbers who are unemployed at the present time, or by the numbers who are working short time. Its importance must be measured also by the uncertainty which prevails amongst hundreds of thousands of men who are to-day engaged in industry but do not know how long their jobs are going to last. It is that very uncertainty that is one of the worst features of the whole of our unemployment problem. For these men unemployed or partially employed, to tramp the streets to look for that elusive job which they know in fact does not exist is one of the hardest tasks which men and women have to face. The average worker who is employed to-day is not very far removed from poverty. Two or three weeks' or a month's unemployment puts him in the poverty line, where soon he will be compelled, generally against his own wishes, to become the recipient of public or private charity.

I should like the minister to have given us a more realistic viewpoint of the existing economic conditions in this dominion. He told us of the expansion of trade during the past two years. I think we will all admit there has been improvement in that respect, and we were all in a way pleased to note the expansion of industry, but I should like to have had a concrete view, if possible, of the extent to which that expansion was due to preparations for war either in this dominion or in other parts of the world.

May I point out that the industries of this country are to a certain extent dependent upon what is taking place in other parts of the world, and not so much upon tariffs?

The minister spoke of the tourist traffic and hoped for its expansion. With improved economic conditions in the United States we have had an expansion of tourist traffic. The better the economic conditions in the United States were, the more tourists came to Canada. But if there is a recession in industry in the United States, you will find a decrease in the tourist traffic in Canada from the United States, which sends us more tourists than any other nation in the world. Anything the government might do to increase the tourist traffic would be of little value unless you have improved economic conditions in other parts of the world. Whilst I am on that aspect of the question, may I add further that we in this country are the beneficiaries to a very large extent of the expenditure of many hundreds of millions of dollars by the Roosevelt administration in an attempt to bring about better economic conditions in the United States. Money spent in the United States in some measure finds its way here through the purchase of our lumber, for instance, to improve the housing conditions in the United States, and through an increased purchase of our paper and other supplies. But a recession in industry in the United States was followed at once by a falling off in the demand from the United States for our lumber and our paper and other products. Of course, the government of this country, no matter what its political complexion may be, could take no credit for the vast spending that has been done in the United States under the Roosevelt administration.

I wish to make a few remarks in connection with the national employment commission, which has just about passed out of existence. That commission was ushered into existence with a great flourish of trumpets, but hardly a word was said when it passed out. For years we were told what it was going to do; great expectations were held out to the people as to what would happen when this commission was appointed. As far back as 1933, speaking in this chamber, the present Prime Minister, outlining the policy of the Liberal party, said:

> The Liberal party believes unemployment is Canada's most urgent national problem. It would deal with the present emergency conditions through a representative national commission, which would cooperate with the provinces and municipalities in the administration of unemployment relief and in an endeavour to provide work for the unemployed.

Is there any hon. member who would say that, such a commission having been appointed, its work is now finished? Why was the commission put out of existence? I am beginning to wonder whether it was ever wanted by the Department of Labour, because if it really was wanted and became an integral part of activities directed to providing employment, it would after having been in existence about eighteen months perform its most useful functions. But after an existence of about a year and a half it is put out of business by a stroke of a pen.

Mr. ROGERS: I take it that my hon. friend has read the final report of the commission, which of itself indicates that its advisory functions have been fulfilled. That as a matter of fact is the actual truth.

Mr. HEAPS: But it was appointed to discharge administrative functions as well.

Mr. ROGERS: No administrative functions were conferred on the commission, as I indicated in this chamber a day or two ago.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. minister is scarcely correct.

Mr. HEAPS: May I quote from the official report:

It is important that it be borne in mind that while provision was made in the National Employment Commission Act of 1936 for the commission to assume administrative and supervisory functions if the minister so decided—

Mr. ROGERS: Quite.

Mr. HEAPS:

—its functions have been practically advisory—

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: —

—with the exception only of the promotion campaign in connection with the home improvement plan.

Mr. ROGERS: That is quite true.

Mr. BENNETT: And it was abolished by order in council.

Mr. HEAPS: The fact is that they were never asked to be a part of an administrative body. That is admitted in their own report. They were not even asked to become a supervisory body, but just a consultative body, to tell the government that certain things were desirable; that they may do only certain things, but when it comes to the question of performing real tasks their services are no longer required.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Now, to go back to speeches made in this house in the year 1936, let me quote what the present Prime Minister stated on that very question:

The people of Canada will never know the cost of relief until there is some agency to bring together in one report the expenditures of all the agencies involved, government and private alike, nor will there be any substantial lessening in the amounts until they know the manner in which all the different agencies are supervising their expenditures and carrying out the works for which the expenditures are being made. That is one of the main purposes of this commission, and I venture to say that no agency other than a body such as we suggest can possibly carry it out.

Speaking on the same occasion, the Prime Minister made several references along the same line. I quote this one:

If a matter affecting municipal, provincial and dominion funds is to be dealt with satisfactorily, it is essential that the party who deals with it be above all, but not part of, any one of these particular entities. That is why we need a commission of this kind to assist in the distribution of outlays and in the supervision of expenditures.

I shall quote one other statement of the Prime Minister on the same day:

It is not to take responsibility away from any department of the government. The work to be done will be carried out under the several government departments, but there will be one body which shall have the power to supervise all the work and to see that it is properly correlated in affording the employment anticipated; also to advise the government with respect to what may be desirable courses to pursue. Not only that, the commission will have power to take a similar birdseye view with respect to what is being done to provide employment and relief in each and all of the provinces, what is being done in the municipalities, and what is and may be done by private industry.

None of these functions has been performed by this commission. I do not know why. Probably the minister knows better than any other hon. member. My own viewpoint is that he decided that the commission was an unnecessary adjunct of the Department of Labour, and possibly his department may be able to perform the functions that were being performed by the commission. But my main point is that for a period of two to three years the people of this country were led to believe that, with the appointment of a commission to deal with unemployment, we would have a body that would do something worth while to cope fundamentally with that problem, and no sooner had it been appointed and the members had, so to speak, warmed their seats, than they were told that their services were no longer required.

I come to some of the recommendations of the commission—which were unanimous—and the attitude of the minister thereto.

The first was the need for early action to provide low-rental housing. If I understood the implications of the speech that the Minister of Labour made in this chamber on Monday last, we are not going to have very much low rental housing at this session of parliament—

Mr. BLACKMORE: Or any other.

Mr. HEAPS: I would not go quite so far as the hon. member for Lethbridge. The Minister of Labour told us the other day that the present housing act is now providing more houses than it formerly did. When the minister imparted that information to the house I was inclined to believe he was telling us that there is not much use to hope for the introduction of a housing bill this year to provide a scheme of low cost rental housing; nor are we to have that much-heralded scheme of slum clearance.

I need hardly say that in the last election and prior thereto the people of this country were given definite promises that during this parliament the government would undertake large schemes of low rental housing and schemes of slum clearances. I believe they were told that over the radio just on the eve of the election. I should like to know why those promises were made and nothing done to fulfil them. I am aware that hon. members who sit opposite may ask what I would suggest should be done under the circumstances.

Mr. WOOD: We have been thinking that. What would the hon. member do?

Mr. HEAPS: I will tell hon. members. First let me say that "credit is a public matter, not of interest to bankers only, but of direct interest to the average citizen." I would advocate "the immediate establishment of a properly constituted national central bank to perform the functions of rediscount, and the control of currency issue, considered in terms of public need." That is one thing I would do. There are not many "hear, hears." I notice, just now.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. HEAPS: I would recognize further that "the problem of distribution has become more important than that of production," and I would say that "personality is more sacred than property." I would devote myself to "finding ways and means of effecting a fair and just distribution of wealth with increasing regard to human needs, to the furtherance of social justice, and to the promotion of the common good."

Mr. WOOD: Does the hon. member think that he could go to someone who had money to lend and get credit on his personality?

Mr. HEAPS: Let me finish the statement:

> I believe the country would welcome, above all else, a comprehensive scheme of urban and rural improvements. Such a scheme would appropriately include the clearance of slum areas, housing programs, the painting and repair of buildings and fences, both in the cities and the country; and, of scenic development, which would serve to make of Canada a country second to none for tourists, and to afford to the people as a whole fuller opportunities of recreation and the enjoyment of natural beauty.

I am asked from what I was quoting. I was just quoting from speeches made by the Prime Minister in 1935.

I come now to the other recommendations of the commission, the second being the creation of a national tourist committee. I do not think the unemployed will get very much consolation from that. The others deal more or less with agricultural rehabilitation and other methods of dealing with the question of relief. As I said before, relief is only a part of the problem of unemployment and I would rather have it done away with entirely. What I should like to see is provision whereby the people of the country might earn their own livelihood. Instead of devoting four-fifths of his speech to details of administration with regard to relief, however important that may be from the administrative standpoint, I think it would have been better had the minister given us some idea of the government's program for dealing with the existing situation. Since the minister made his speech it has been announced that the government is going to spend large sums of money for the purpose of providing employment. I have no objection to expenditures for this purpose, but I believe the minister will agree with me that no form of capital expenditure can be a cure for the problem of unemployment. In my humble opinion the piling up of a debt burden will only aggravate an already serious situation. If we are to tackle this important problem of unemployment we must deal with it in a more fundamental way than by merely expending large sums of public money which only add to the national debt burden.

So far we have had no indication of the government's policy apart from the expanding of foreign trade. We find that to-day there is a contraction in our foreign markets and we begin to realize at once how little we can depend on those markets as a means of enabling us to cope with our internal problems.

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend, I know, is keenly interested in this question. He says that what we should look for is employment and I agree with him absolutely. He has considered the possibilities of increasing employment, but he does not believe that there is any hope in an expansion of trade, nor does he believe that it is a wise policy to make capital expenditures for the purpose of providing employment. I agree with him that expenditures of that kind, if they are to be justified, must lead ultimately to an increase in national income. That is their essential justification. But I do not think that he has thrown any light on the situation. He has said that you cannot provide sufficient employment through expanding trade. He has said that you cannot provide employment usefully by means of large capital expenditures. He has also said that we ought not to continue relief. What does he suggest?

Mr. HEAPS: I did not say that we ought not to do those things; I said that they are not a solution.

Mr. ROGERS: What is the solution, then?

Mr. HEAPS: I say that capital expenditures are not a solution for the unemployment problem.

Mr. ROGERS: Nor is expansion of trade, according to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. HEAPS: The granting of relief is not a solution. The mere fact of obtaining wider markets for our products is not in my opinion a solution, and I think that is evident: throughout this period of seven or eight years we have been faced with acute unemployment. What can we do? I am in favour of a comprehensive housing scheme, a scheme of clearing away slums, to provide employment and at the same time give to the people of the country proper housing accommodation; and I believe in doing this through the public treasury without adding to the national debt. That is the difference between the hon. gentleman and myself. I do not believe that the government are prepared to do that. I would also provide for public works along the same line. In 1934 the previous government provided approximately $34,000,000 for public works through the creation of additional currency and nothing serious happened.

Mr. ROGERS: I think my hon. friend is incorrect as to the amount.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. HEAPS: I understand that $35,000,000 was printed and a part of it was used for a public works program. The money was printed as part of the government's policy and no harm came to the country. I suggest that we could enter upon a comprehensive housing scheme, with all our natural resources, without having to borrow from private interests. Personally I cannot see anything wrong about a principle of that kind, but the government will not accept it.

I would go a little further. The moment we suggest that the needs of our people should be satisfied first, before we look to the export of commodities, we are told that we are economic nationalists. What I am trying to do is to bring about economic sanity in the affairs of the country. The minister told us on Monday that from certain parts of Canada we were exporting to other parts of the world, halibut, salmon and apples. What consolation is it to the million people on relief to-day to tell them that we are sending out of Canada the foodstuffs that they should be given the first opportunity of consuming? Under a proper system of planned economy it would be possible to distribute those commodities among our own people. Our own Canadian people who in their general capacity have helped to produce that wealth should have the first claim upon it. That is where we differ from the government. They would rather export these goods to people in other parts of the world than see our own people consume them. I would prefer to see our own Canadian people given the first opportunity to acquire the goods produced in the dominion.

I wish now to deal with one or two other questions touched upon by the Minister of Labour in relation to matters contained in the report. We were led to believe, prior to the election, that we might have a scheme of unemployment insurance in Canada, and amongst those who believe they would become beneficiaries of such a scheme there are many who think that all the unemployed would automatically come within its purview. The commission, I believe, has correctly pointed out that the experience of other countries shows that no unemployment insurance system can carry the full burden of unemployment. Provision must be made for those who cannot qualify for unemployment insurance, and for workers who exhaust their benefits under such a plan through prolonged idleness. I am becoming more and more convinced as time goes on, especially with the recurring periods of unemployment coming in much shorter cycles than twenty or thirty years ago, that any unemployment insurance scheme introduced under existing economic conditions can reach no more than an extremely small proportion of unemployed men. Those whom an unemployment insurance scheme is likely to include are those in more or less permanent employment, the ones least likely to need the benefits. Consequently the hope that vast numbers of workers may have had of benefiting by an unemployment insurance scheme are not as great as it may have been in years gone by.

I remember when an unemployment insurance scheme was first introduced in the British house, about thirty years ago. At that time the government and those engaged in the statistical survey of unemployment could measure the amount of unemployment with reasonable accuracy. They could say that it would vary in a given period of years from five to ten per cent. But to-day the variation is ever so much greater. I think 160,000 was the number given by the minister the other day.

Mr. ROGERS: Of unemployed employables on relief.

Mr. HEAPS: But the total number unemployed is probably much greater. How much greater we do not know, but we may have a reasonable idea.

Mr. ROGERS: You can have an estimate by the bureau of statistics.

Mr. HEAPS: You can have a reasonable estimate. But you cannot say now what the number of unemployed is going to be within one or two years. To-day it may be 150,000 and two years from now it may be 750,000, as it was in 1933. In fact from the time the interim report was made public until to-day, when the final report of the commission is before us—in just those few months—there has been a vast change in the economic situation in this country. If such a change can take place in a few months, what is likely to happen in two or three years? The cycles recur more frequently and their magnitude is greater than in the past. Instead of a variation of five to ten per cent it may be as high as thirty per cent, and no unemployment insurance scheme that the government can introduce could ever take care of such numbers of unemployed as we have had in years gone by.

One thing I did hope the commission might recommend was something in the way of relief for our municipalities. But they have not touched that feature at all. In fact they suggest that we proceed on almost the same lines as before in dealing with this problem. And evidently that is about the policy which the government itself is adopting. I should like, however, to quote a few words spoken by the Minister of Labour in this house on March 30, 1936, because they are quite applicable to what we are discussing now. He said, as reported on page 1569 of Hansard:

> The problem of prolonged unemployment in this and other countries is a challenge to the political intelligence of our generation.

With that statement I am in full accord. Then he went on to say:

> As individuals we must guard ourselves against the complacent acceptance of conditions as we find them to-day. As members of parliament and as a government the placid acceptance of present conditions would be little better than a voluntary declaration of political bankruptcy.

But it seems to me that the government is now accepting conditions as they are. I could quote a number of other statements which the Minister of Labour made on that occasion. I have no doubt that when he spoke in this chamber on March 30, 1936, he did so with a sense of the onerous responsibilities devolving upon him and with the intention of doing all that was best under the circumstances, no doubt he thought he would be able to put into effect policies which would bring about the improved conditions which I am sure he desired then, and desires now. He said significantly that if he could not do that it was a challenge to our intelligence and an indication of political bankruptcy.

I wish now to deal briefly with the aspect of the question to which I referred to a moment ago, that of the burden of unemployment relief on the municipalities. We are bound to admit that the municipalities are not responsible for the condition of unemployment in Canada to-day. It is most unfair on the part of the national government and this house that the greater part of the burden arising from this condition should fall upon our municipal authorities. I do not know whether the minister was so sure in his own mind about the statement he made the other day as to the burden upon our municipalities. He said that in certain municipalities the standard of relief was such that it competed with the labour market in that area, the implication being that the standard of relief in those areas was too high. In fairness to the municipalities which may be implicated, and in order that they may refute the statement if they can, I should like the minister to say which municipalities were giving too high a scale of relief. I am wondering whether the minister had in mind the city of Winnipeg. I have heard it said that Winnipeg is giving the unemployed too much. I had sent to me recently a statement of the scale of relief which the municipal authorities of Winnipeg are giving to the recipients of public relief; here it is. A family of two persons, husband and wife, for unemployment relief food allowance and other sundries in the home, such as soap, etc., receives for a month the equivalent of $12.76. Three dollars a week for two persons to live on in Winnipeg! Is there any hon. member here who will say that is too high? Yet we are told that in some municipalities the standard of relief is too high. So the scale goes on until the highest is reached—$41.64 per month for food for a family of two grown-ups and six dependent children, in other words a little less than $10 a week for food for eight persons! I do not think a little over $1.25 per week per person in a family of eight could by the greatest stretch of the imagination be said to be too much. I think in fairness to the municipalities he had in mind the minister should state which cities were giving too much by way of relief, and give them an opportunity to state their side of the question.

There is also the question of the financial burden on the municipalities. In 1929 the city of Winnipeg spent $25,914 in the way of unemployment relief, and I think in a comparative sense the figures I am giving would be applicable to almost any large industrial area in Canada. The year 1929 was during the period which we commonly term the highest peak of prosperity in this country, although I must admit that it was only a onesided prosperity. In 1937, however, for its share of unemployment relief the city of Winnipeg had to spend the sum of $1,530,015. That is the extent to which it had grown. Over a period of seven years, from 1931 to 1937 inclusive, the city of Winnipeg had to spend approximately $10,000,000 in the way of public relief. How can any municipality stand such heavy expenditures? Winnipeg cannot. In 1929 and 1930 Winnipeg was one of the best financed cities in Canada. It had a sinking fund equal to the best to be found anywhere on the north American continent; but to-day, as the result of capital expenditures involved in connection with unemployment relief over a period of more than seven years, the banks refuse to grant the city further credit. That $10,000,000 means that out of revenue the city of Winnipeg must make an annual expenditure of $550,000 for interest charges.

I think in considering this whole question of relief the government ought to come to the aid of our municipalities and relieve them of this burden, in order that they may fulfil the functions they ought to fulfil as municipal bodies. Under present circumstances it is almost impossible for Winnipeg, together with a great many other cities in the west and probably in the east as well, to carry on. They find themselves on the verge of bankruptcy, due to this load of unemployment relief for which they are in no way responsible. I would plead with the minister that the government make additional grants in aid to the provinces so that this aid may be passed on to the municipalities, thereby recognizing the responsibility of the federal government for the unemployment situation in Canada. That it is recognized as a federal responsibility is shown by the fact that to-day we are told that the government will expend large sums of money for public works.

When these expenditures are being considered by the government I believe they should be made in municipalities where they are most needed. I do not care whether the municipalities are in the east or the west; I should like to see the government give most where the need is greatest.

Mr. DENTON MASSEY (Greenwood): I have carefully considered the speech delivered on Monday by the Minister of Labour, and at least one part of it impressed me profoundly. I refer to page 1983 of Hansard, where the minister says:

> Without question it—

That is, unemployment relief.

> —is the most vital problem which confronts all governments at this time, regardless of the measures that may be adopted to deal with it. I should like to suggest to the committee that in its wider aspects it involves our whole theory of government and it raises issues, as I have had occasion to mention before, which lie at the very root of our system of federal public finance.

I should like to congratulate the minister upon expressing that point of view, for indeed what he has said is no idle truism. Further, I should like to congratulate him upon his lucid speech, but as I read it I was reminded of the language of Winston Churchill, who, in speaking of another, said in essence that his own native lucidity of expression was a great handicap to him when he had so little to say.

The speech of the minister deals with a problem that goes to the very depths of our national life and is, as the minister himself states, without question the most vital and pressing of all the problems with which we have to deal. The minister spoke for a space of three hours, during which he purported to cover the whole broad problem. He dealt with many different points, but perhaps if he should ask himself what the man on relief feels to-day as a result of what the minister said in his three hour speech, he might well ponder upon the reply. Does the man on relief to-day feel encouraged as a result of the minister's speech? There are in this dominion at this very moment hundreds of thousands who are dependent upon the payment of relief and who look to the bounty of the government for mere sustenance. They are as well looking to the government to take some action to improve the lot in which they find themselves to-day due to no fault of their own. Is there any member of this committee who feels for a moment that those on relief to-day, those who are employable but unemployed or those who are employed for part time, can take encouragement out of anything that has been said by the minister? What hope is held out to these men and women?

I have under my hand the "final" report dated January 26, 1938, of the national employment commission. Within the covers of this report there is much to which all hon. members may subscribe. Unquestionably the commission has done its job honestly and well within the limits of its ability, but what is to be the fate of its final report? What is to be done with these recommendations? The house has witnessed during the last session or two what has happened to many reports. There have been interim reports of this commission, and what treatment have they received? I shall return to that in a few moments, but now we are told by the minister that the findings of the commission are to be held pending the report of the Rowell commission. One commission reports to another. It sounds very much like a double play in a baseball game, "Rogers to Purvis to Rowell." Here we have one commission set up to accomplish a definite purpose and to make recommendations to the government. Those recommendations are made, and now we are told that we must wait. The commission was fully conscious of its own position in this matter, for if we turn to page 8 of their report we find this language, referring to the work done by the employment commission:

> The extensive work done during the last twelve months will undoubtedly be of considerable value to the new commission.

This is an expression of opinion from the national employment commission, in its own report, referring to the new commission which is to follow it. After all, we in Canada to-day find ourselves faced with the well known Liberal policy of another year and another country, a "wait and see" policy strangely reminiscent to those who read history of the policies adopted by Lord Asquith by which he paved the way for the disintegration of the British Liberal policy. Wait and see! Well, Mr. Chairman, I think we have to admit that the government has great "weight" of numbers, but it seems to be completely at "sea" in this matter.

What great work has been done; what great accomplishment has been achieved by the government in connection with the matter before us at the present time? I shall not take up the time of the committee in attempting to cover the ground covered by the minister in his speech on Monday, or to review all that he said. I shall deal with only one or two phases of it.

It was with some degree of satisfaction that the minister reported what had been done under the farm improvement, employment and settlement plan. The minister realizes, as does the national employment commission, that this plan was not set up by this government, not even recommended by the national employment commission, but constituted by the former government. The present government has to its credit, let it be said, the fact that it adopted the principle of that plan.

Mr. MARTIN: Look at the difference in the results.

Mr. MASSEY: I have noted them. The plan under the former government was and still is a great success, but do not forget the origin and point from which it started, and give credit where credit is due. Fifty thousand men have been placed under the scheme and the minister is to be congratulated upon having accepted it. Surely the government and the national employment commission should not assume any credit for this plan. I think this answers the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). It is certain, however, that in connection with this plan the minister has not been able to break down the resistance of the largest province in the dominion. During a discussion on this matter in 1937, I asked a question of the minister, which is reported on page 2827 of Hansard of that year, as follows:

> Mr. Massey: A few moments ago the minister stated that Ontario had objected to participating in this scheme. In view of the experience of the past year I am wondering if the Ontario government had changed their minds and if they would now like to come into the scheme.
> Mr. Rogers: I am unable to answer that question at this time.

And a little later:

Mr. Massey: Will the province of Ontario again be consulted before the coming winter?

Mr. Rogers: I can assure my hon. friend that the matter will receive further consideration during the summer months.

The minister is reported on page 2161 of Hansard of this year as having stated the other day:

Mr. Rogers: Although the plan was submitted to Ontario it did not feel that the situation warranted the adoption of that plan.

And a little later:

Mr. Edwards: There were no contributions to Ontario under this plan?

Mr. Rogers: No.

Mr. Lockhart: Would the minister give the reasons why the plan was not adopted by Ontario?

Mr. Rogers: As I recall it the communication was to this effect: It was anticipated that increased logging, lumbering and mining operations in Ontario—

I assume he refers to preparing our logs for export to the United States, to be fabricated by United States, not Canadian workmen.

—would very largely absorb the single unemployed, and at the time there was promise of a very marked expansion in those directions. Objection was taken to it also on the ground that the wages paid under this plan, if you can so term the allowances made, were well below what was normally paid farm workers in Ontario, and the department of labour of the province felt that it would be unwise to adopt the plan in view of those two considerations.

Apparently the minister has not been able to overcome the objections raised by Ontario, and the result is that as far as Ontario is concerned this plan has had little or no effect. I shall refer to this situation again later.

Next, hon. members will recall that a million dollars was voted in the dying hours of the last session of this parliament for the purpose of reestablishing the youth of Canada or to take steps in that direction. What was done with this money? The report of the national employment commission which was tabled the other day mentions what has been planned for youth reestablishment. The particulars are set out on pages 11 and 12, and I quote as follows:

Training in forestry and conservation under the administration of the forestry services of the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

Technical and practical training in placer and hard-rock mining in the province of British Columbia, Ontario, Quebec and Nova Scotia.

Industrial apprenticeship and learnership courses, coupled with necessary amounts of technical instruction, in the provinces of Manitoba, Ontario and New Brunswick.

Occupational training and vocational guidance for young unemployed persons in all provinces except Nova Scotia.

Agricultural training and apprenticeship in the agricultural schools and by placing selected young unemployed persons in farm homes, in the provinces of Alberta, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

Women's training courses for domestic and household work, homemaking management, handicrafts and specialized services in all provinces.

Physical training and health education of varying character, suited to maintain the morale and improve the physical fitness of young people of the region or province, in all provinces.

Specialized services, in cooperation with the employment service of Canada, for the purpose of ensuring that training plans for young men and women lead up to placement.

On March 28 my very good friend, the hon. member for Essex East, asked two intelligent questions, as reported on page 1738 of Hansard. These questions, which had to do with the youth training program, read:

1. What opportunities are being offered to rural youth under the dominion-provincial youth training program?

2. What provinces have to date signified their intention of continuing the youth training program under the dominion-provincial arrangement of last year?

In answering that question, the minister outlined the courses which have been set up. For instance, in connection with Ontario, we find the following:

Courses for young women in catering (two-week courses) for tourists, rug weaving, dressmaking and sale of home-baked products.

In connection with British Columbia we find:

One course in chick sexing.

The total number of young people participating in all courses in all provinces is approximately 10,000. The complete answer will be found on pages 1738 and 1739 of Hansard.

On the same date the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) asked some questions in connection with the same matter, as reported on page 1742 of Hansard:

1. Upon what date did the dominion-Ontario (youth training) agreement go into effect?

2. How many unemployed young women have entered training for household work and specialized services under schedule "C" of said agreement since the said agreement went into effect?

3. How many have finished their course of training?

4. How many are still training?

5. How many schools or training centres have been established for the above mentioned purposes, and where are they located?

The minister answered as follows:

1. The agreement entered into with the province of Ontario with respect to youth training is effective from August 1st, 1937, to March 31st, 1938.

2. Up to February 28th, 425 young women had entered training for household work.

3. Up to February 28th, 144 had finished training and been placed in employment.

4. 188 were in training as at February 28th.

5. Seven training centres have been established one at each of the following points: Ottawa, Toronto, Hamilton, Preston, St. Thomas, Windsor, Sarnia.

Another question asked by the hon. member for Peel reads as follows:

1. Since the date of dominion-Ontario (youth training) agreement, how many unemployed young men have taken advantage of the courses of training in practical farming, as provided in schedule "D" of the said agreement?

2. How many are at present with farmers under the provisions of the said agreement?

3. How many of the said trainees have completed their courses of training under the supervision of farmers in the county of Peel?

4. How many of such trainees are still in training with Peel county farmers?

The minister answered as follows:

1. Up to February 28th, 115 young men have entered training in practical farming.

2. 93 were still with farmers in February.

3 and 4. The reports received from the province do not give the information by counties.

There you have it. The minister's own statement made in answer to these questions is that so far a total of 10,000 young people have taken advantage of the opportunities offered by this grant of $1,000,000.

Mr. ROGERS: In rural courses. If the hon. member will go back to the statement he will see that it covers courses given in rural areas. The hon. member has not dealt with the courses given in the larger centres of population.

Mr. MASSEY: I was simply taking the minister's statement.

Mr. ROGERS: I just state that in order to avoid any misunderstanding.

Mr. MASSEY: I read the whole answer from Hansard, and I shall read it again if necessary.

Mr. ROGERS: The bulk of the work has been in the cities.

Mr. MASSEY: I understand that. I stated distinctly that they were rural courses. So far 10,000 young people in the rural areas have taken advantage of the opportunities offered under this plan. The hon. member for Essex East seems to be nervous. Has he a question to ask?

Mr. MARTIN: I was not nervous, but I would direct attention to the fact that the hon. gentleman's observation has reference to the entire situation and not to the rural areas. In the light of that I do not think his observation was altogether fair or adequate.

Mr. MASSEY: Not at all. I read the whole question and I read the whole answer. I said that so far 10,000 young people had participated in the courses. I was referring to the courses offered to rural youth. The rural young people in the hon. member's riding have taken advantage of the opportunities offered by this grant of $1,000,000. Nothing could be clearer than that.

Mr. MARTIN: It is clearer than it was.

Mr. MASSEY: Let us look at the figures in regard to the youth of Canada without respect to rural or urban centres. This year in the Dominion of Canada there will reach the age of sixteen some 210,000 young men and young women. Of this number 70,000 will not finish or will not have finished elementary school; 105,000 of them will go to some high school; 42,000 of them will proceed to matriculation; 21,000 will go to university; and 6,000 will graduate from university. Thus, 168,000 of our young people who will reach the age of sixteen this year, will not matriculate.

I wish to make an assumption, and in it I wish to get the concurrence of the minister. Would he consider it a safe assumption to state that two-thirds of those who leave school prior to matriculation leave for the natural reason that they feel it is desirable or necessary for them to become at least a part bread-winner in the family and, as it were, pull their weight in the family boat.

Mr. ROGERS: If my hon. friend is putting that as a question, he will understand that I have no basis, and he has no basis, for doing other than making the assumption.

Mr. MASSEY: Is it a reasonable assumption?

Mr. ROGERS: I have no further information than my hon. friend has.

Mr. MASSEY: Possibly the minister will grant for the purpose of discussion that it is not too far beside the mark.

Mr. ROGERS: That is the hon. member's statement.

Mr. MARTIN: Marriage may be a minor stimulus.

Mr. MASSEY: The hon. member is in a better position to know than any other member of this chamber.

Let us say for the sake of argument that two-thirds of those who do not matriculate do not do so for financial reasons. I take that figure resulting from my own experience with young people. Then I assume that 100,000 of these 210,000 young people who reach the age of sixteen this year leave school prior to matriculation because they have not the necessary funds to carry them to that point. The government grant is $1,000,000, and thus, according to the assumption I have made, there are 100,000 young people who, we may assume, might desire to take advantage of that grant at the age of sixteen. In other words, if they have not the necessary funds to carry on their educational training and their learnership courses—that is a new word—they are definitely in a position to take advantage of this youth training. and of the opportunity provided under the $1,000,000 grant. This would mean that there would be available to each one of these young people the sum of $10, not a sum in cash but facilities provided that can be purchased with the sum of $10, and this is for only one age group, no consideration at all being given to those between the ages of seventeen and thirty, who are also eligible under this grant.

Mr. ROGERS: The sum was duplicated by the province, my hon. friend will understand.

Mr. MASSEY: I understand that fully, but I am speaking of federal responsibility, over which the minister has direct control. Apparently he has not so much control over the province. How about other young people who need assistance? The national expenditure for the whole of Canada in 1930-31 amounted to $4,750,000,000. Of this amount 3·5 per cent, or $165,250,000, was spent for our educational institutions, our schools and universities. On the same basis as that which I have just stated, that is, if we were to spend 3·5 per cent only of our national income for the purpose of training youth—and by national income I mean income for which this government is responsible—we would spend 3·5 per cent of $450,000,000, or $15,750,000, for the training of our youth. And yet we grant only one-sixteenth of that amount.

Hon. members will recall what was commenced under the Technical Education Act of 1919. Here a sum of money was granted to the various provinces, a grant in aid for the purpose of stimulating—I believe that is the correct word—technical education. The results have been most satisfactory as far as they have gone. In 1921, as a direct result of these government grants, technical education received a rare stimulus, so that ten years later we find that 121,000 young people were enrolled in our technical schools. Here it seems to me is categorical proof of the efficiency of direct grants in aid to the provinces for the purpose of education. At that time the bugaboo of interference with the provinces, of the usurpation of provincial rights by the federal government, was overcome without any difficulty whatsoever. The provinces accepted these grants and put them to a useful purpose, and they were glad to get them, with the result that technical education in this country received a stimulus which has been a great blessing to those who took advantage of it.

Let us compare the present situation with the past. Here we are to-day facing a national situation created by what has been called the depression, and which to-day is referred to as the recession, when tens of thousands of our young people are failing to get not only technical education but education of all sorts beyond a certain point. Surely the situation is far worse than it was in 1919-1920 immediately after the war. Surely the minister realizes himself that what was done then was a success, and that what can be done now could also be a success. But here we are granting only $1,000,000, and I protested in this chamber last session with all the vehemence of which I was capable against the small amount of this grant. The principle of it is sound. I am not criticizing any one of the courses set up as far as they go, but I do complain of the extent of the grant. When we were dealing with an emergency in the two western provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, we poured out of the treasury of this dominion, $22,390,000 under governor general's warrants because there was an emergency. I am not minimizing for a moment the desirability of sending that money to Saskatchewan and Alberta where it will be put to the most useful of purposes, the maintenance of life and of those things which maintain life. Here is an emergency situation; we sent $22,390,000 to the two provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan because we have to do so. That $22,390,000 is to cure nothing except an immediate situation; it is to cure no cancerous ill but is merely to meet an emergency. It is man's answer to an act of God.

It seems to me that here is an example of what we are doing in so many different ways in this dominion. We are temporizing with the results of situations which we have failed to face. We are not getting down to and dealing with fundamental causes. If we were to spend such an amount as we have sent out to Alberta and Saskatchewan, because we had to do so, on education and learnership courses or apprenticeships—call it what you want—no one can estimate what the results would be in this dominion for the possible returns are immeasurable.

Some of us have had an opportunity of visiting Sweden and Denmark in recent years, and one realizes that their young men and young women who have shown ability to assimilate education are provided with an opportunity to develop themselves into useful productive citizens by having made available to them to the fullest possible extent the country's educational system. The hon. member for Essex East last session introduced most ably a resolution in regard to scholarships. What has happened? We have our $1,000,000, but how far does it go? We must realize that when we spend $1,000,000 on youth reestablishment in this country, we are spending only one-fifth of one per cent of our national income and devoting only that relatively petty and puny amount to youth reestablishment. What shortsightedness is here!

Within the report there is much with which I agree. But on page 12 I read this paragraph:

> In view of its importance, the commission has, in recent months, discussed this problem with all provincial governments, and has also taken active steps to educate public opinion as to the necessity for action so as to provide the appropriate background for practical achievement.

With all respect for the commission, that is the remark of an adolescent. "To educate public opinion," in connection with that with which we are dealing! Surely it is obvious on every hand that public opinion is stirred almost to the breaking point, because the government are taking no direct, forward steps to deal with this question with which they perforce must deal. They are temporizing with the situation and not dealing with its fundamental cause. Educate public opinion! I should think the government would hope that public opinion would not be stirred up any further than it is at the present moment. "Wait and see."

Let us return to the minister's remarks of last Monday. As reported at page 1995 of Hansard, he said:

> For that reason I want to say frankly to the committee that we as a government did not feel it was desirable, at this stage at any rate, that we should by dominion legislation seek to invade the field of apprenticeship. There have been cases before—and they have been brought to the attention of the house—where the dominion government has by a grant in aid induced provinces—at least they have occasionally told us afterwards that they were induced—more or less, the assumption has been, against their will, into new directions of expenditure. I need only mention agricultural instruction and technical education. Once we have gone into those fields the tendency has always been to make what was designed as a temporary expenditure into a permanent expenditure, and in this way to bring about as it were a transfer of provincial obligations to the dominion by a back-door route, and that has not been a satisfactory method of dealing with the situation.

And then later:

> Particularly at the present time, I do not think it is advisable that the dominion government should assume what might be regarded as legislative jurisdiction. . . .

Those are the minister's comments with regard to apprenticeship. Does he really feel that an effort to reintroduce the apprenticeship system into the Dominion of Canada means that we are invading the provinces by the back door? Having the high regard I have for the minister, and the high respect I have for his native intelligence, I cannot but feel that he knows in his own heart that it would not be a back-door practice. It might appear such to some if they wished to misconstrue it, but the minister knows and I know that it is not a back-door method to do what was done in 1919 under the Technical Education Act. The minister knows full well that if it had not been for that act and the putting of it into practice as was done, technical education in this dominion would not be one-half as far along the way as it is.

Mr. ROGERS: The whole question is that apprenticeship is and always has been a matter of provincial jurisdiction. That is the position at the present time.

Mr. MASSEY: So is education, as far as that goes, but we invaded the technical education field because we felt it was absolutely necessary to do so.

Mr. MARTIN: Only through grants in aid.

Mr. MASSEY: The hon. member for Essex East told us that in this chamber.

Mr. MARTIN: Only through the agency of grants in aid.

Mr. MASSEY: The hon. member follows me to-day much better than he usually does. He has my congratulations.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I wonder if the hon. member for Greenwood would tell us what he thinks of the advisability and desirability of industry setting up an apprenticeship system as an economic measure, not as a government aided scheme at all, but for its own sake, for the sake of the community, and as some return for the great favours that have been shown to industry in this country by the public and by governments.

Mr. MASSEY: If industry were to return to the present government the "great favours" shown to it by that government, there would be no apprenticeship system at all. On the other hand, I appreciate the purport of the question asked by the hon. member for Melfort, and if he had not spoiled it by a political reference I would have answered it quite readily.

Mr. SPENCE: He cannot help it.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): It is an economic reference. In all sincerity I say that economically speaking this country has granted great privileges and great favours to organized city industry. My question is a sincere one, asked in order to get information from the hon. member, who has given much study to this question, as to the possibility of developing the apprenticeship system along economic lines.

Mr. MASSEY: I think it can be done, and perforce must be done. Of course it is being done, but not to the extent that it was done at one time or to which it might be carried on by industry itself. But there are some industries which, as a result of their own economic experience, find it extraordinarily difficult to set up and maintain an apprenticeship system, because they are not able themselves to absorb those whom they apprentice, and are therefore paying their own money for the apprenticeship of young men and young women who are going into other industries; and they cannot afford that experience.

I am now dealing with a particular case. The hon. member for Melfort asks a general question. I am coming, if he will bide his time just a second, to the recommendations, which I regard as excellent, of the national employment commission in this matter. But what I wanted to ask the minister was: We have in this report, I think it is on page 40, the following:

> The commission has recommended that the following provisions should be observed in the establishment of apprenticeship and learnership plans.

There follow sixteen points, which I shall read if the hon. member would like me to do so:

1. Clear distinction as between "apprenticeship" and "learnership" plans.
2. Definition of age and sex eligibility.
3. Qualifications for selection.
4. Fixed period for apprenticeship courses.
5. For apprenticeship only, a written indenture between apprentice, his parent or guardian and employer.
6. Compulsory government registration and supervision of all approved apprenticeship and learnership plans.
7. Maintenance of craft standards by definite schedules and standards of training—with periodic tests and granting of official diplomas.
8. Fixed period for class instruction of all apprentices and obligatory attendance thereat.
9. In the case of apprenticeship definite ratio of apprentices to journeymen.
10. Progressive wage scale to provide apprentice with regular income.
11. Plans to interlock with provincial vocational education.
12. Establishment of advisory committees under provincial supervision for each trade, where feasible, to work out methods most suitable for the application of plans in designated areas or for particular industries.
13. Appointment of vocational officers to cooperate with technical and secondary schools.
14. Employer and employee organizations to be given every facility to become familiar with the work of technical schools and with the employment service; permission to be granted by industries to senior students and teachers to visit and become acquainted with factory operations as far as may be practical.
15. Revision of school curricula from time to time to bring same into harmony with the practical requirements of industry.
16. Provision to be made in minimum wage laws for exemption of accredited apprentices where their wages are regulated by approved apprenticeship schemes.

That is the report on apprenticeship, by the national employment commission. The hon. member for Melfort can see that there are many different points connected with this matter. I fully admit that it is a complicated problem. But the question I want to ask the minister is: Have any attempts been made to make agreements with industry in regard to apprenticeship? What steps have been taken in cooperation with industry to reestablish what has been done in this regard? The minister in his speech did not make any reference to these matters, and I wondered, as I read the recommendations of the national employment commission—

Mr. ROGERS: What we have done, as my hon. friend is aware, is to enter into agreements with the provinces, and those agreements have contained schedules covering various training projects that involved occupational training which, in turn, involved cooperation with industry. But the administration of them has been with the provincial governments concerned, even as the whole question of apprenticeship has been under the provincial governments, and I do not think anything could emphasize that more strongly than the various references in the report itself as contained on pages 40 and 41.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes. I have read it.

Mr. ROGERS: A desirable thing is, it is suggested in the report, to link it up with technical and vocational training, which is provincial, and so on.

Mr. MASSEY: The question I had in mind was this. Perhaps there are two steps in the approach to the problem. First, there is the question of determining that provinces are willing to accept a grant in aid for such a reform; then, is the industry willing to cooperate with a provincial or any government as far as an apprenticeship system is concerned? Have any steps been taken to ascertain the latter rather than the former point?

Mr. ROGERS: I should say, both. But our contact as a federal government has been with the provinces. The provinces, in turn, have dealt with industry within provincial borders. There has been in some cases excellent cooperation on the part of industry. In other cases—I do not think I should make any invidious comparisons at this time—the cooperation has not been all that could have been desired.

Mr. MASSEY: The minister referred to the matter in these words:

> I do not think it is advisable that the dominion parliament should assume what might be regarded as legislative jurisdiction over apprenticeship.

Does he regard these courses already set up as involving legislative jurisdiction?

Mr. ROGERS: No.

Mr. MASSEY: Then we are comparing incomparables; the two are different. I could find in the minister's speech, or in the report no reference to the fact that industry had been consulted to see whether they were willing or not to cooperate in any governmental plan.

Mr. ROGERS: The provincial authorities, in carrying out the terms of the agreement, have been in consultation with industry.

Mr. MASSEY: But there is no mention of agreement or otherwise here. The minister refers to no such agreement.

Mr. ROGERS: Agreements have been made between the Department of Labour and similar departments in all the provinces covering the training projects.

Mr. MASSEY: Let me repeat what the minister said:

> I do not think it is advisable that the dominion parliament should assume what might be regarded as legislative jurisdiction over apprenticeship.

Who wants legislative jurisdiction?

Mr. ROGERS: A question was put to me by a member of the house, or there was criticism on the part of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. MASSEY: Let me read the context:

> Mr. Woodsworth: But surely if it is possible to do that in what are termed learnership courses, it would be possible to do it in the case of apprenticeship.
> Mr. Rogers: I shall not quarrel with my hon. friend over the use of terms. But I shall say this, that, particularly at the present time, I do not think it is advisable. . . .

My whole point is that it is not a question of legislative jurisdiction, but a question of cooperation, a question of working with industry—not working for industry, but working with industry. I repeat, I cannot find in the minister's speech nor can I find in the employment commission's report any reference that leads us to believe that industry has been consulted to see whether or not it is prepared to cooperate with any government, provincial or federal.

Mr. MARTIN: As the minister has pointed out, the administration of this problem is in the hands of the provinces, and while some of the provinces have not cooperated to the extent we should like, some have. In Ontario, in my hon. friend's own city as well as in Windsor, men have been appointed and at this moment are making a canvass of industry in the community to ascertain the extent to which industry is prepared to cooperate with the government in this problem.

Mr. MASSEY: In regard to apprenticeship?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. MASSEY: Well, since we are not clairvoyant, the minister will admit that we could not know it if it were not in his remarks.

Mr. ROGERS: I did not catch the remark.

Mr. MASSEY: I find no reference in the minister's speech to anything of the sort now mentioned by the hon. member for Essex East. I did not know that the matter was going forward in that capacity. All I know is that the premier of Ontario is reported to have referred to the minister's speech as a "headline and a headache."

Mr. ROGERS: That has reference to some other matter.

Mr. MASSEY: It is hard to say to what matter the premier of Ontario refers at any time. The hon. member for Essex East will, however, agree with me in this. We were told in the election of 1935 that there would be great harmony between the federal government and each of at least eight of the nine provinces, were a Liberal government elected. There was even a love-feast in Toronto prior to the election. But now harmony is conspicuous by its absence, which seems to be highly regrettable. It is extremely unfortunate that as we rise in our places here to make a few remarks in regard to such a matter, we have to conjecture whether there will be harmony or not. The minister himself admits that the whole matter hinges on such harmony. It was successful in previous years because the provinces cooperated. I have here a list of what was spent in those years. But to-day youth is handicapped because two Liberal prime ministers cannot get along.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Who said that?

Mr. MASSEY: I say it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought so.

Mr. MASSEY: I do not think the Prime Minister will contradict that statement.

May I now refer as briefly as possible to the question of housing. At page 1990 of Hansard the minister is reported in regard to housing; he had a few remarks to make on the subject. Later on, after the dinner recess, at page 2000, he made a further reference. In the course of his speech, which fills no less than twenty-six pages of Hansard, he devoted only half a page to the important question of national housing. Why was so little said upon this subject? Because so little has been done. Let us look for a moment at the home improvement plan. The minister reports proudly that under the plan, which was itself under the aegis of the national employment commission, the sum of $15,000,000 has been spent in a year—splendid, as far as it goes. But I challenge the statement that the home improvement plan is some sort of serendipity, so that as a result of it some $60,000,000 or $70,000,000 have been spent in the building industry, that this sum has been spent as a result of the home improvement plan.

Mr. ROGERS: The hon. member for Davenport reminded me of that.

Mr. MASSEY: I cannot challenge so eminent an authority as either the minister or the hon. member for Davenport. I am, however, stating my own humble views, and I say that in my opinion the home improvement plan is not a serendipity. The minister assumes that eighty-five per cent of what was spent under the home improvement plan was spent for labour, and that a $60,000,000 or $70,000,000 impetus was given to the building industry as a result of this plan, basing his figures on what was done in the United States. Well, let us see what has been done there compared with what we have achieved in Canada. The cities in the United States have done considerable work in slum clearance and home improvement. The housing division of the PWA has completed fifty-one projects, having expended $130 million. The minister probably knows of the Williamsburg homes in New York and other places. The housing division employed 102,000 men last year, and enabling acts were passed by various states without undue difficulty. Under the new United States housing act of 1937, twenty per cent of the cost of construction will be met by local and state government and twenty-five per cent by the federal government. And that was followed by the announcement on January 12, 1938, that $146,645,000 had been set aside for the use of forty cities—some $18,000,000 in New York, $4,900,000 in Buffalo, and so on. What have we done in Canada to stimulate building? Have we before us at this moment any low cost housing scheme? Has any such housing scheme been put forward to reduce unemployment? Definitely, yes. But the only direct action taken so far was taken under the Dominion Housing Act of 1935 before hon. gentlemen opposite came into office.

Let us turn for a moment to the final report of the national employment commission. At page 9 there appears this:

> However, the revival of activity in house construction has not kept pace with the revival in other lines. Despite the shortage of housing in most parts of the country, people show little disposition to invest money in this field. There are several reasons for this attitude.

The commission goes on to list five reasons which it regards as adequate to explain the apathy of people in regard to the scheme. The commission feels very strongly on the subject, however, for at page 36 we find this language:

> To direct expenditures on public works it is all-important that there should be added measures for stimulating private expenditures, of which successful examples are to be found in the Dominion Housing Act and the home improvement plan.
> There are inherent difficulties in subsidizing employment in private industry, but the expenditure of public funds to promote private expenditures in providing more suitable housing for the country is desirable. In the field of slum clearance and the development of low rental housing for those whose earning capacity does not enable them to live under conditions which are conducive to their own health and employability, or indeed to the public health, direct subsidizing of private and local initiative, whether by cash subsidy or by loan at less than commercial rates of interest, is desirable. This is only so, however, if adequate care is taken to ensure, first, that there is a supply of unemployed labour of the type required and, secondly, that the benefits of subsidization will go to the low income groups whose position it is desired to benefit.

Now, it is interesting to know on the basis of that thesis that the national employment commission were not derelict in their duty. They did submit a plan; it will be found on page 101 of their report, appendix E, "low rental housing plan." I shall not take the time of hon. members to read that plan, but it is worthy of being read with a great deal of care. There is much to warrant the exercise of critical judgment; there is much to commend this plan to our consideration. But when we turn to page 11 of the appendices we find this statement:

> The plan recommended by the commission was put before the minister some time after the opening of the parliamentary session of 1937, and it is understood action thereon has been held over.

A plan was submitted. They even went so far as to submit a draft bill. The plan was submitted towards the beginning of the session of 1937. Here we are now in the middle or towards the end of the session of 1938, and we are still waiting to see. Why? Why has this plan not been brought forward? The minister gave his reason the other day, as reported on page 2000 of Hansard:

> The national employment commission made proposals to the government last year with respect to low cost housing. These proposals were later given the form of a draft bill which reached the government at a time when it was not feasible to give it the necessary consideration before the prorogation of that short session of parliament.

Is that a reason? Does parliament have to be sitting before the government can consider these matters? Did we arrive here last January and find a draft bill ready to submit to this house for consideration? Is it necessary for the house to be sitting before emergency matters such as this can be given consideration by the government? And where is the legislation at even this late date? There is no legislation. We are waiting to see. Surely the minister will admit that his reason for delay is a lamentably weak reason for not having introduced a housing scheme. Surely the house does not have to be in session before the matter can receive the active consideration of the minister. We did not arrive here and find any plan ready for us. The employment commission reports, and we "wait and see," while another commission reports. Meanwhile what are we doing about slum clearance? What are we doing about low cost housing? What have we done about the report submitted a year ago? What are we doing in regard to farm housing? What are we doing about the dilapidated homes in the rural areas? Soon it will be too late to do anything. As I said at the beginning, we are temporizing with results rather than dealing with causes. We are failing to tackle directly any specific problem. We pay out millions of dollars for relief and flirt flippantly with the causes that make it necessary.

We are faced with many difficult problems which the minister touched upon or brushed in his three hour speech; I have mentioned only two to-day, youth rehabilitation and housing. Much could be said of a positive nature in this regard but I have already taken a good deal of time, and I shall reserve what I have to say of a constructive nature to a later occasion. Meantime we are to "wait and see" and mark time. We must "wait" for another commission to report, and "see" what they report. Meantime what of the employable unemployed? What about those employed part time? What about untrained youth? What about dwellers in slums and dilapidated farm houses? Are they to remain neglected? Is a vast percentage of our youth to remain untrained? Must we expect those who live in farm houses that have long outlived their usefulness to continue to live under such unspeakable conditions? Will slums not be cleared? How long is the government to continue this policy of "wait and see"? There is an emergency facing this dominion which calls for something more than a three hour speech, an emergency which goes to the very quick centre of our national life; for it affects the homes of the country and those who live in them. The government, by neglecting the training of our youth deprives them not only of the opportunity to earn, but to learn how to earn. We are compelling many of those who live in our cities and on our farms to live under horrible conditions while we "wait and see."

In the name of humanity, let us away with this policy of "wait and see."

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

PELAGIC SEALING

PROVISION FOR SANCTIONS FOR VIOLATIONS OF NORTH PACIFIC SEALING CONVENTION

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 98, respecting the north Pacific pelagic sealing convention.

Mr. NEILL: Explain.

Mr. MICHAUD: Mr. Speaker, in 1911 a convention was entered into between Great Britain, the United States of America, Japan and Russia in regard to pelagic sealing in the north Pacific ocean. The convention was ratified by the British parliament of the time, and later, in 1912, enabling legislation was passed by this parliament. But the enabling legislation did not provide for any sanctions for violations of the provisions of the act, and so from 1912 to the present day the sanctions provided by the Fisheries Act were applied. It has been found that this was leading to misunderstanding by the natives of the Pacific coast, and accordingly it has been thought advisable to recast the legislation relating to pelagic sealing in the north Pacific ocean to provide sanctions for violations of the act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT

PROVISION RESPECTING LEASES OF MINERALIZED AREAS AND ADVANCES TO ASSIST AGRICULTURE AND OTHER PURSUITS

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient, by amendment to the Indian Act, to authorize the governor in council to make regulations enabling the superintendent general to issue leases of land deemed to contain minerals and to grant in respect thereof the right to prospect for, mine and take away the same; and also to authorize advances of moneys from the consolidated revenue fund to assist Indians in carrying on agriculture and other pursuits, and to make provision for the repayment of such advances; the outstanding advances at any time not to exceed $350,000.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—MR. BENNETT

POINT RESPECTING STATEMENT ON APRIL 6 OF MR. LACROIX (BEAUCE) ON QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to mention a matter of privilege affecting this house. Yesterday I endeavoured to follow the observations which were made by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Lacroix), and while I realized that he was speaking about a question of timber limits and timber dues in the province of Quebec, not until I saw this morning the translation of his observations was I able fully to grasp their meaning. It will be observed from a reading of them that they had to do with matters entirely within the province of Quebec; but that is not the point which I desire to mention. We all have an interest in the maintenance of our institutions, and I do not claim to have any greater concern in that regard than any other member of this chamber. But I invite the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to look at that translation and ascertain whether he does not think that, after a conference with the hon. member for Beauce, certain observations should be expunged from the record. I will not even mention what they are, but they are of such a character as, translated, must convince any of us that had the Speaker been able to hear what was being said he would have indicated that those observations should not have been made in this chamber, because they cannot but have, I believe, a very serious effect upon the position of the House of Commons itself. I refrain deliberately at this time from making any reference to the language employed and the charges that have been made against those who are not in this place, about matters that have nothing to do, under our federal constitution, with this house. I think that when the hon. member for Beauce has perused them, as translated in the official record, and the Prime Minister has done the same, they will regard my observations as temperate and moderate and made for one purpose only, namely to do at least what we can to maintain in this generation respect for our institutions, which I think is a very heavy obligation that rests upon each and all of us at this time

GERMAN PLEBISCITE

POLLING OF VOTE OF GERMAN NATIONALS IN CANADA WITH RESPECT TO AUSTRIA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I noticed in the press this morning a short item dealing with the question of an endeavour being made to poll the vote of German nationals in Canada with respect to the annexation of Austria. Possibly it may be of value, as some conclusions have been arrived at, if the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) would indicate whether or not (1) any effort has been made on the part of the German government to have us provide facilities for a poll being taken; (2) what reply the administration made to such request, and (3) whether any steps have or can be taken to ascertain whether or not those who claim the right to vote have been naturalized in some instances as British subjects. The latter question is perhaps of the most pressing importance from the standpoint of the country as a whole. I did not get an opportunity to indicate to the Prime Minister that I intended to ask this question on the orders of the day, and if he thinks that it is inadvisable to make an answer without further consideration he can treat it as notice; but inasmuch as the press report indicated that some conclusions had been arrived at, I assumed that possibly the question of notice was unimportant.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any representations having been made by the German government to our government, but I will look into the matter and let my right hon. friend have a reply to-morrow.

SEED GRAIN

RELATION OF FEED AND FUEL ALLOWANCE TO GRANT OF SEED TO FARMERS IN WESTERN PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): On page 1790 of Hansard, Monday, March 28, 1938, I asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) the following question:

One more question. The minister said this afternoon that feed and fuel would not be deducted from the amount of seed a man could get under the schedule. Does that apply also to repairs?

To which the minister replied:

Feed and fodder and oil and gasoline and repairs have no necessary connection with the seed a man gets.

[Mr. Bennett.]

I am now in receipt of a telegram from a municipal council stating that the amount of repairs given to each farmer is being deducted from his seed schedule. Would the minister care to make any statement with regard to the matter?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): As this is a matter entirely in the administration of the province there is nothing I can add to what I stated at the time. Feed, fodder, oil, gasoline and repairs have no necessary connection with the seed a man gets. I imagine that the case of every municipality and every individual will be considered on its merits and some decision reached by the province, but there is nothing I can add to that statement.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

BILLS RESPECTING POLITICAL EXPENDITURES AND ELECTIONS AND FRANCHISE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Last evening, in announcing the business for to-day, I failed to make reference to two bills which appeared in the name of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power), one relating to political expenditures, the other to franchise and elections. There are obvious reasons which make it desirable to have the bills referred if possible before the Easter recess to the committee on matters pertaining to elections which was appointed the other day. If hon. members have any objections to proceeding this afternoon with these bills of course the government would not ask to have them taken up at the moment; but as there is an understanding that they will be referred to the committee, perhaps there would be no objection to proceeding with the second reading on this understanding this afternoon.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Obviously I cannot speak for all of those who sit on this side, but the bills stand for second reading, and as far as we were concerned we practically made up our minds that as the bills in any event were to go to the committee, no good purpose would be served by making any extended observations on second reading. I will content myself with saying that, having read the measures, I trust the Prime Minister will forgive me if I remark that one of them, at least, seems to have been fearfully and wonderfully made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We had the best counsel possible.

Mr. BENNETT: I would doubt that—not on the score of capacity to practise the profession, but from the standpoint of not being able to apply academic knowledge to realities. The two things do not go side by side.

Mr. POWER: It is the first time I have been accused of purely academic knowledge.

Mr. BENNETT: I assure you, Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of accusing the hon. member of possessing academic knowledge. Perhaps I might have said that he had great knowledge of realities, many of which I would prefer that he did not have.

POLITICAL EXPENDITURES

PUBLICATION OF RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES AND LIMITATION OF AMOUNT EXPENDED IN ELECTION OF MEMBERS

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved the second reading of Bill No. 90, respecting political expenditures.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to make it abundantly clear that in consenting to the second reading of this bill, which I think under the circumstances it is proper to do, I make the fullest reservation on behalf of those who are associated with me, as not adopting the principles that are contained in many sections of the bill; because it may be difficult to indicate what the principle is that governs the measure as a whole. There are many sections to which I think objection in principle must be taken, and I desire to reserve the right to the fullest measure of discussion with respect to the bill itself and to every section of it in order that there may be no misapprehension in the future.

Mr. POWER: That is thoroughly understood.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the special committee appointed to consider electoral matters.

ELECTIONS AND FRANCHISE

MEASURE RESPECTING FRANCHISE OF ELECTORS, ELECTION OF MEMBERS OF HOUSE OF COMMONS, AND PRINTING AND PUBLICATION OF ELECTION DOCUMENTS

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved the second reading of Bill No. 91, respecting the franchise of electors and election of members of the House of Commons.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to make a similar reservation with respect to this measure. Naturally, if the minister in charge of the bill were to present the case on second reading it might precipitate a lengthy debate. If, with the reservation I have mentioned with reference to the other measure, the bill is given second reading, I cannot see that any harm will be done, because we would reserve the fullest right of criticism with respect to the principles embodied in some of the sections, believing as we do that a closed list has much to commend it as against provisions that exist in some parts.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The government greatly appreciates the attitude my right hon. friend has taken towards expediting consideration of these bills, and care will be taken to see that the fullest latitude is permitted for discussion when they come up again.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the special committee appointed to consider electoral matters.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

MEASURE FOR ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS

The house resumed from Wednesday, April 6, consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution—Mr. Rogers—Mr. Sanderson in the chair:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide assistance towards the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress, and for such payments out of moneys appropriated by parliament as may be necessary for all or any of the purposes of the proposed legislation.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): Before the committee rose yesterday afternoon the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) was engaging in a speech of rhetorical excellence, an excellence which I could not hope to approach, let alone equal; however, I might endeavour to emulate him. At that time he was engaging in a criticism as spirited in manner as it was broad in scope, of the work and contribution of the Department of Labour in reference to this problem of unemployment. According to him, it would seem that the Department of Labour is very much like Nazareth of old, out of which apparently no good could come. It seems to me pertinent to remark that just as those who condemned that village were in egregious error, so too the hon. member may very well be in error no less egregious in seeking to belittle the work and the contribution of the minister of that very difficult department.

I do not intend to attempt anything in the way of an oratorical performance to be placed in juxtaposition in the journals of this house with the hon. gentleman's speech of yesterday, but I do think it is desirable that some facts should be dispassionately stated which perhaps might invite renewed reflection upon this problem so that possibly the result may hereafter be less emotion and a little more reason in forming and passing judgment.

I think it perhaps unnecessary for me to remark that I am by no means a complacent person. Whenever I have remarks to make they will not be solely of approbation of things done and of things as they are. I regard smug complacency as of greater danger in the national life than an absolute vice.

It seems to me that extensive criticism with regard to the lack of concrete proposals in the speech of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) is at the moment ill-timed. It ill becomes me to be dogmatic or didactic about such a matter, but merely from a reading of the resolution and from some slight knowledge of the place which a resolution of this sort occupies in the proceedings of parliament, I take it that we are discussing a resolution only intended to indicate the need for something being done, namely the spending of money; a resolution which under our parliamentary system is necessary in view of the fact that money is to be spent; a resolution which merely directs attention to a condition and to certain circumstances. All that is necessary, therefore, for the mover of such a resolution to do, is to speak in such a way as to give a general review of the situation. It is only necessary that the scope of the problem should be indicated rather than that details of remedies should be given; and perhaps in view of the broad scope of this problem it is not even desirable that an attempt to give full details should be made. If I might borrow a medical term, the remarks of the mover of a resolution of this sort should be diagnostic; no criticism lies because of the lack of complete disclosure of the various remedial plans. And full disclosure will come shortly when the bill is before us.

But while the minister may not have indicated exactly the measures to be taken, I apprehend that no one else is precluded from pointing out the steps that should be taken; and this is exactly what the hon. member for Greenwood did not do. As a matter of fact it is what I propose to do in presenting to the committee the ideas that occur to me—and I am going to present those ideas in complete and untrammelled freedom.

I have read with interest and profit both the interim report and the other publications of the so-called Purvis commission, and I have also read the final report. I must say I cannot see the force of the criticism offered by the hon. member for Greenwood when he satirically utters with tragic intonation the word "final"—"final, final"—with reference to this report. It seems to me this report shows a highly creditable discharge of an onerous and important duty. The job being done, what would the members do but write finis to their work Any person who completes a job, investigative, consultative and advisory in its nature, makes a report. The fact that it is a final report is surely nothing sinister; there is nothing sinister in the dissolution of the commission. If the government should do nothing about the report and nothing about the problem, that would be a different matter.

For my part I should like to see every proposal of the so-called Purvis commission put into effect. I think the housing plans advocated by the commission in its interim report should have been put into effect. I note that the report has certain negative proposals and certain positive ones. As an illustration of a negative proposal I might mention the remarks regarding the unwisdom of certain types of public works. But we should take the report as a whole and look upon its recommendations as complementary one to the other. We ought not to fall into the error of accepting the negative recommendations and failing to accept the positive. For instance, I endorse every word that has been written or spoken in respect to the desirability of a national housing and slum clearance scheme. If that proceeds I care not at all about the other public works which the commission does not favour.

In reference to unemployment I am a strong believer in a works policy so far as possible. I hold it to be true that the curse put upon Adam has since become the most cherished privilege of the human race. That man must earn his bread in the sweat of his brow is to-day a privilege. We are accustomed to speak of unemployment as the greatest national problem; and sometimes to repeat this seems almost trite. Yet that enforced idleness is the most serious national problem not only of this country but of almost all countries cannot be gainsaid. Long idleness undoubtedly makes clods out of sentient men and women.

> Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates, and men decay—

—said Goldsmith. We have not so much evidence of wealth accumulating, but we have had for a number of years a great deal of evidence that men decay as a result of idleness. Like many other hon. members I have kept a scrapbook, and a short time ago I clipped a little piece from the Atlantic Monthly, which I quote:

> The thing that numbs the heart is this:
> That men cannot devise
> Some scheme of life to banish fear
> That lurks in most men's eyes.

People with numbed hearts, with a fear of unemployment so great that it lurks in their eyes, cannot develop themselves fully and cannot make the contribution which they would and should make to the development of the human race. In the light of all this it can never be trite to observe once more that unemployment is our greatest national problem.

So far our critics and ourselves are in agreement. But one might infer, in listening to the hon. member to whom I have referred, with his spirit of criticism, that we, in this corner and on the other side of the house, are not sensible of the transcendent nature of this problem. It is worth while to recall again that since this government took hold there has been, chiefly as a result of the scientific manner in which the problem has been handled, a steady improvement. And, per contra, when the government of the chief of the hon. member to whom I have referred were in office, in consequence of having promised to cure unemployment absolutely and forever so that it would be completely forgotten, by reason of the hit and miss manner in which the problem was then handled it grew steadily worse.

The hon. member mentioned the farm placement scheme. The minister had said that as a result of the operation of that scheme large numbers had been taken off relief; I have not the figures before me, but the hon. member for Greenwood himself mentioned the figure of 50,000. He then sought to detract from the work and the contribution of this government by saying that this was not a scheme of the present government at all, that in fact his own party was the progenitor of the scheme. It will not be amiss to remind the hon. member that it is not enough to have a plan; what is really important is the manner in which the plan is executed. It is not enough to be a progenitor. Most people I think will agree that Doctor Dafoe has been of more value in the development of the healthy lives of the Dionne quintuplets than the progenitor. Dionne may not say so, an hon. member on my left remarks, but looking at it impartially I think we give more credit to Doctor Dafoe than to Mr. Dionne. The fact is that the plan I refer to is not really the plan of the former government either. That plan emanated from Manitoba and a great deal of pressure had to be put on the then government before they could be got to adopt it. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader), who sits in this house probably more than any other single person, is responsible for the adoption of that plan. He popularized the idea and "sold" it to a large extent to the Manitoba government; the Manitoba government in turn brought pressure to bear on the then federal government, and that is how that plan came to be instituted.

Great emphasis is placed upon this problem in its relation to youth. It is said that unemployment among youth is perhaps the most serious aspect of this problem. With that I am in entire agreement. Undoubtedly there are thousands of young men rapidly reaching man's estate who have never experienced the blessing and discipline of labour. Every person needs the discipline of work, and he who has not been trained under that discipline, and the thinking which practically always in some degree accompanies useful toil is handicapped in meeting the emergencies of life. It is worth while to remind ourselves that a very great and important part of the problem of unemployment among returned men is due to a youth-period engaged otherwise than in preparation for useful toil. Idleness is even worse in this respect than the war. The soldier did have some discipline, although perhaps not the best kind to fit him for commercial and industrial life. But idleness is a negation of all discipline. It encourages attack upon every idea which is a bulwark of civilization.

It may be worth while to remind the committee at this time of the blessing Canada enjoys in the character of her youth, and the difference between them and the youth of many other countries. In many countries youth is practically delivered over to designing people who have made of them in some cases tools of oppression, and also directed them into mass action of one kind and another provocative of strife. They have been Hitlerized here, nazified there; in another place made fascist; and in one country they have been made the spearhead of an anti-God ideology. Contrast that with our own youth in this country. Everywhere we have our young people banded together in councils and societies, spending their time and boundless energy, turning their fresh minds and buoyant spirits not towards the mere accomplishment of any selfish aims but in an endeavour to make contributions to the national life of this country, to do something of lasting benefit to all. The contrast between Canadian youth and the youth of some of the other countries to which I have referred is very great indeed. For instance, our youth are appearing at almost every sitting of the Rowell commission, in each case presenting to that commission some contribution that is worth while and beneficial to Canada as a whole. Likewise they are appearing before other public bodies presenting their views and in general influencing public opinion all over this country towards an appreciation of those things which in this nation are for the general good of all. In no case have we any such youth associations in this country engaged in the furtherance of anything that is harmful to the national life.

Personally I rejoice that the government which I support has seen the need of doing something towards the training and reclamation of youth, and I rejoice that now much more is to be done. It does not matter how much the government spends—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I may tell members of the committee that the Hansard reporters are having difficulty in hearing what is being said, largely due to the noise in the chamber. I would ask hon. members to keep order.

Mr. MAYBANK: I am sorry to interrupt some of the conversations that are going on. To continue, it does not make any difference how much money the government may spend on youth training and reclamation schemes; it is quite probable that I will not be satisfied, that I will think more should be spent. Frankly I know that I am greedy in respect to this matter; that my wants are insatiable.

But while we are considering this problem, thinking what ought to be done and endeavouring in this way to indicate what I think should be done, I am bound to contrast my ideas with those expressed in the speech of the hon. member for Greenwood yesterday, and to recall the high point of imagination set by the party which he now supports in their handling of the youth problem at that time. Then the high-water mark of imagination in dealing with this problem was to herd youth of all kinds, all types, all trainings and all ages into camps. Work? No; they did not even put them to work. They went into camps, miscalled labour camps, and they were completely without the beneficial discipline of labour. Had that system persisted it would have been the greatest crime ever perpetrated against youth in this country and the greatest crime that could have been perpetrated against the youth of any country, the most reprehensible policy any government ever put in force. The efficiency of those camps has been stated at times to have been in the neighbourhood of twenty-five to thirty per cent, but I visited many of those camps and I can say that it was much less than that. The youth of that day, under the aegis of the governmental scheme, neither played nor worked. There was a premium on idleness and sloth and all the rest of the things that result from that sort of treatment. Yet to hear the hon. member yesterday one would think he wanted us to go back to what according to him were the halcyon days of 1932, 1933 and 1934, when the unemployed youth prepared to march on Ottawa; when lives were lost in riots, and when something like $53,000 was spent in a commission of investigation, after it was all over. Sometimes there is criticism of the appointment of commissions. Well, I can say this, sir. It is a great deal better to appoint a commission to investigate a problem in advance, with a view to endeavouring to treat a problem in a scientific manner, than it is to wait until some harm results and then appoint a commission to investigate the difficulty that has arisen through your own acts.

In conclusion I should like to stress once more certain statements I have already made in this house. In my opinion the government should take over the unemployment problem in the main as its own burden, and relieve the cities and municipalities. The condition of my own city, and many more, indeed constitutes a national emergency. If a government contributes at all to the cost of unemployment relief it is because the matter is viewed as a national emergency. Now we have always admitted that unemployment is a national emergency, yet handling the problem in such a way that a municipality which gets its money only by direct taxation, and chiefly by direct taxation upon homes, must pay as high as fifty per cent of the total cost, is not a handling of the problem in a way that can be called national. I would say, take over the unemployment problem at any rate as far as the employables are concerned, leaving the unemployables if you will. The load in respect to them will be heavy enough, because it has increased greatly in these last few years. Thousands have been rendered unemployable by reason of the very long unemployment period they have gone through. The present condition is chilling to all enterprise. The brink of insolvency for the municipality is so close; the tax load, and the threat of an additional load, is so great that as a matter of fact people are beginning to fear the ownership of property. Hence there cannot be the building and improvements in the cities which otherwise probably would be the case.

This prompts me to say that in my opinion it would be highly desirable to spend money on all feasible schemes of rehabilitation in order to restore people to the work rolls. Aside from the purely human aspect of that matter it would be good business financially. A person who is allowed to slip from the class of employables into the class of unemployables becomes for many years, perhaps for the rest of his life, a threat to balanced budgets, to the extent of $500 or $1,000 per year. He may not be a threat to the balancing of the budget of the dominion government, but he is bound to be a threat to the balancing of budgets somewhere. After all, the problem is that of the people of Canada as a whole, not merely a problem of the people in relation to the jurisdiction of this dominion government.

I welcome everything that can be done with reference to the development of the trans-Canada route and the aids to the tourist business. I believe a very great deal of employment can be created by such plans. I also think it would be good business to deal with the railway question with a view to endeavouring to prevent unemployment there, and preventing further threats of lay-offs. If the general recommendations of the report are implemented I believe we may look forward hopefully, possibly not to a cure, but to a very considerable alleviation of the problem. We can then depend upon a long-term policy, the success of which, of course, would to some extent depend upon crops, of which we are always living in hope. Indeed it would seem as if the Lord has decided not to look sideways any longer upon that part of the country from which I come, and that the people west of Winnipeg, out in the great wheat empire of Saskatchewan, may probably next year be making their usual immense contribution to the economy of the country.

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): Mr. Chairman, I feel very sympathetic indeed towards the people in the areas of the west where great drought has been experienced. I realize, too, that we in the east may not fully appreciate the hardships which they have had to face and which they are experiencing possibly to a greater degree to-day. But I must add that I also appreciate the deplorable conditions existing in some parts of eastern Canada, especially in Ontario.

The minister stated that great numbers of people in the stricken areas had been moved to other parts of the country. Where did they go? I can tell you where some of them are; they are in Ontario. I know of some such families who have had to be cared for by the people of Hamilton within the past few months. One case in particular comes to my mind. A man and his family, with farm stock, were moved to Wentworth county. He did not like the property on which he was placed, and as a result was moved to another. After being on the second farm only a short time he sold the stock and used the money from the sale as the first payment on a house and property in the city of Hamilton. He has had to be kept by the city ever since; and Hamilton can get no relief from Saskatchewan for these people. Many similar cases are being dealt with in Hamilton.

I have before me a file containing information with respect to several unfortunate cases, but upon this occasion I do not propose to put the details on record. But the problem is a serious one so far as Hamilton is concerned; and the same condition exists in other cities of Ontario. Yet when eastern cities apply to the federal authorities for consideration in connection with increased relief costs, they are turned down flat.

In 1935 we were told to vote for King and get action. As other hon. members have indicated, we have had nothing but most decided inaction. All the government has done has been to tear down and destroy the social reforms of the last administration.

What did the Liberal campaigners tell us in 1935? They said that with all provincial governments except one being Liberal, the return of a Liberal government to Ottawa would bring about a condition of unity and cooperation and make of Canada a veritable political paradise. What has been the result? There is more disunity and inter-provincial ill-feeling in Canada to-day than there has been at any other time since confederation.

Unemployment insurance should have been adopted immediately, because the sooner it becomes effective and the sooner we pass through the initial stages of operation, the better. Great Britain adopted a scheme several years ago; where is she to-day? There could not be a major depression in Great Britain, because with her reserves of unemployment insurance the working man is assured of being able to meet his necessary obligations, and the internal trade of the country must at all times remain fully active.

Grants in aid are indeed necessary in some parts of the west, because we know that the people out there do need relief. But the working man in industrial centres finds himself in the position of losing his home, through lack of work, and is not receiving any grant in aid. Nor does he receive any assistance through home owners' creditor arrangements, to help him reclaim his home. If he finds himself out of work he must go on relief and accept the bare necessities of life. He may lose his home and be thrown out on the street.

During the course of his speech the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) stated that there was not enough of a falling off in employment to justify a change of policy; then at a later point he urged that we avoid excessive pessimism. How can one help being pessimistic when he realizes that in the city of Hamilton alone there are 600 more heads of families on relief now than there were two months ago? The minister stated he had made a thorough study of conditions. What has this government done in addition to making studies? We have had commissions, commissions, commissions—and now we are waiting for the report of another commission, which we may receive late in the year.

The minister said that the tourist trade might afford a way out of unemployment. With all the resources of a country of 11,000,000 people, is it possible that we must turn parasitic in order to exist as a nation? Are we to be another Bermuda, offering lilies, onions and trinkets? He stated further that the provinces seemed reluctant to cooperate. I would say that the reverse is the truth, and that the federal government has been the reluctant body. In a speech last fall in support of a candidate in the vicinity of Kingston the minister said, in effect, that while Mr. Hepburn disagreed with him on some matters, he hoped Mr. Hepburn would be returned to power so that there would be that unity between Ottawa and Toronto which was so essential. I believe the minister is not in a proper state of mind to cooperate with Ontario in relief problems. He may be at variance with the premier of that province, but that should not prevent him from cooperating to the fullest extent. When the mayors met in Ottawa some three weeks ago and endeavoured to place the facts before the minister, apparently they obtained no results. Mr. Hepburn is reported to have said that the relief problem as put forward by the Minister of Labour some few days ago was to him "a headline and a headache," and he is also reported to have used these words: "I must confess I am not in the confidence of the government at Ottawa."

That is a condition which should not exist. Men in public office, in the more important departments of government, should not permit such a condition to exist. They should get down to business and make an effort to cooperate, because the poor people throughout the country are suffering while they quibble.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would urge that the Minister of Labour turn his attention more to the urgent needs of the great cities and towns of Ontario and the east generally; and finally I would remind him that Nero fiddled while Rome burned.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Mr. Chairman, the resolution before the committee finds its origin in action taken in this parliament two years ago in the passing of an act intituled "An act respecting the establishment of a national employment commission." It will be recalled that on that occasion there was a definite discussion of the unemployment and distress problems of Canada, and many definite expressions of opinion were given. I recall very well, and perhaps the committee will do me the honour of recalling it also, that on that occasion I warned the government that the appointment of a commission as proposed in the then bill was not a solution of the problem of unemployment or of the problems of economic distress peculiar to the country at that time. I further stated that the employment commission could not possibly report within less than eighteen months. I was too optimistic, Mr. Chairman, because it has taken two years for the commission to make its final report.

I also warned the government at that time that in all probability, when the report was made, it would not show much progress towards a practical solution of the problems with which we were confronted. I do not wish to detract in any way from the splendid public service that has been given by those who constituted the commission, from its chairman down, but I must say, after reading the report very carefully over the week-end, that it appeals to me in this way, that the commission actually should have commenced where they ended. That is, the report really shows that we have spent two years educating this commission to an understanding of the problem. I will not deny that there are evidences in this report that the members of the commission now understand the problem of unemployment in Canada—that is, understand the extent of it, its nature and the way it works. But I can find nothing in the report, nothing of any importance, that discloses an understanding of the causes of unemployment.

But unemployment, as we have it, is an effect, and not a cause. It is the result of certain forces operating in our economic structure. The duty of the commission was to take the facts, which we knew then quite as well as we know them to-day; to study with the assistance of their experts the causes that lay behind, and then come to the government with their conclusions so that the government could present to parliament some definite proposals for remedying these problems.

I am not in the confidence of the government and I do not know what it is intended to bring before parliament as a result of this resolution. But I have some experience in parliamentary procedure and I draw from the resolution certain inferences which I imagine are fairly accurate. For instance, the resolution has one word in it which discloses completely the comprehension of the government of this problem, and that word is "alleviation." In other words, Mr. Chairman, the whole policy of the government as disclosed in this resolution is to be for the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress. From a humane point of view that is highly commendable, but from the standpoint of a two years' effort to understand the problem, and with tens of thousands of dollars spent upon the commission, it is not very encouraging to those who are the victims of these undisclosed causes. Surely after two years—after nearly ten years, as a matter of fact; for the unemployment problem started in 1928—surely after eight or ten years we do not need to be told by the commission in a report of some scores of pages a number of things such as it sets out—that registration was desirable, for instance. Of course it was, and we all knew that when they started. We all appreciated that registration and the classification of the unemployed into employables and unemployables, and so forth, was desirable. Every member knew it, and it is more or less an insult to every member of this house to suggest, after two years, that we need to be told that you must divide the unemployed into different classes. We knew it then—all of us knew it.

Mr. ROGERS: May I just interject that the duty of registration was conferred upon the national employment commission when appointed, and that registration has taken place. The recommendation is that the registration shall be continued.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. Now I turn to the act, and, by the way, a day or so ago—I have been waiting here patiently for several days for an opportunity to discuss this matter—the minister said that the commission was not clothed with administrative powers. Here is what the act says. I read the preamble which indicates what the intention of its promoters was in relation to the commission. The preamble is a guide to the interpretation of the clauses of the act. My hon. friend from Essex East (Mr. Martin) shakes his head, but I am bound to say the preamble is an indication and a guide to the interpretation of the clauses of the act. The preamble reads:

> Whereas unemployment has been for several years Canada's most urgent national problem—

Then it goes on to say that something shall be done:

> —to find ways and means of providing remunerative employment, thus reducing the numbers at present on relief . . . and whereas, to achieve a nationwide cooperative effort in reducing the numbers on relief and in providing employment—

Not to discover that it is advisable to have cooperation, but to achieve a nation-wide cooperative effort, and:

> —such nation-wide cooperative effort can best be effected through the appointment of a representative national commission, with power to cooperate with the provinces, municipalities and other agencies in respect of unemployment relief, and in an endeavour to provide work for the unemployed.

In an endeavour to provide work for the unemployed—that is in the preamble.

Now I turn to the powers of the commission. I shall not read the sections because the minister read them himself and others have referred to them. A number of powers are outlined, and then in section 7 we have this additional power which the minister said the other day the commission did not have.

Section 7 reads:

> The commission shall, under the direction of the minister supervise the expenditure of funds voted by parliament for purposes of relief and providing employment, and perform such administrative duties with respect to relief and employment as may be assigned to it from time to time by the governor in council.

So if the commission did not exercise any administrative powers, it is because the governor in council did not assign any such duties to them.

Mr. ROGERS: That is correct.

Mr. STEVENS: Then the government must take full responsibility for dereliction in this regard. But that is not all:

> The governor in council, on the recommendation of the minister, may make, amend or repeal such orders and regulations and prescribe such forms as may be deemed expedient for carrying into effect the objects of this act or for ensuring the due administration thereof by the commission. . . .

There was I am sure, no doubt in the minds of hon. members or of the great majority of the people that by the appointment of this commission two years ago we were to have an administrative effort by the government and the commission, working with the provinces and the municipalities, to solve these problems, and to deal with the causes of unemployment as well as the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress. It is not good enough to come to this chamber after two years have gone by and say, "Well, we have had some expansion of external trade". I will give the minister credit for consistency at least in this respect, that two years ago, and again to-day, he tied himself to external trade as the solution of our internal economic problems. What I tried to point out two years ago, and what I wish to emphasize now, is that while external trade is highly desirable, it is not a solution of the internal economic problems of this or any other democratic country. What good is it to say to the more than fifty thousand railway workers who have been thrown out of their occupations in the last few years, "Well, with external trade growing there is some hope of your being reemployed." In only partial degree is their unemployment due to the falling off of trade; because during the years that have just passed, and accelerated no doubt by the orders for larger units of motive power in the shops of the locomotive construction companies, the unemployment of these men has been largely due to changes in methods of transportation, and an increase in the number of automobiles. But the only solution suggested to them is that they may benefit by an expansion of external trade.

Mr. GOLDING: What did the hon. member say to them for five years when he was in office? What hope did he give them?

Mr. STEVENS: If the government and the people of this country had paid attention to what I said, they would probably have been further ahead than they are to-day, but they did not pay attention. I am going to say to-day what I said before the last election, and what I said when I sat on the treasury benches and after I left them.

Mr. GOLDING: Say it now.

Mr. STEVENS: I am going to say it now, if my hon. friend will let me. The cause of the unemployment of fifty, sixty or seventy thousand railway men is not a falling off in external trade; it is a change in economic conditions, which has been wholly ignored in connection with this matter.

Mr. ROGERS: Will my hon. friend deny that the increase in employment on the railways in the last two years has been due very largely to improvements in external trade?

Mr. STEVENS: There has been some improvement in employment.

Mr. ROGERS: And for that particular reason.

Mr. STEVENS: Because the parliament of Canada voted some millions of dollars, half to the Canadian Pacific Railway and half to the Canadian National Railways, to employ some thousands of men on maintenance of way work. At the time I said that I was very heartily in favour of it, but that is in the realm of alleviation—probably about a six million dollar alleviation, and not a solution.

The minister referred to the position of our youth; and in the whole gamut of his speech and through the pages of this report it is the one rather interesting and attractive feature. But let us see what it really amounts to. It shall not be said through any oversight on my part that I am belittling assistance to youth. I am all for it; I have been for some years and have spoken constantly in favour of it, and I commend the minister and the commission for what they have done, as far as they went. But it is no more than just a step or two in a direction in which they should have been forging ahead instead of lingering on the threshold as they are doing. I asked the minister when he was speaking to give us some information in the shape of figures with respect to the youth training plan, and he mentioned a total of 28,000 odd. That is rather imposing, but let us examine the figures a little more closely. Subsequently he gave further figures which indicate that in forestry and mining 2,102 youths have been put to work, and he added another figure which sounded attractive, namely 151,357 working days. What does that really amount to? Just fifty-two days each, in all that period of many months that this scheme has been in operation.

Mr. ROGERS: This, of course, in most provinces began only in the autumn of last year.

Mr. STEVENS: Of that 2,000, three-fourths were in forestry. The minister spoke of that as an achievement. The employment of those youths in forestry was the result of one of the most disgraceful things that have happened in this country, hundreds, thousands of young men crowded into the city of Vancouver, penniless and destitute, without food or shelter. They stood on the street corners with tin cans, trying to collect money; they were arrested by the hundreds and sent to gaol for thirty, sixty, ninety days. There was such an outcry in the province by public-spirited people, by the churches, boards of trade and other institutions, that these camps, about which we hear so much, to the closing of which hon. members referred a little while ago, were—some of them—reopened. Day after day, as I sat in my office in Vancouver during the cold, rainy days of late October, November and December, I saw hundreds of men standing around the street from eight o'clock in the morning until four o'clock in the afternoon; half and even two-thirds of them could not get to the registry gates and had to come back the next day and stand around for hours again.

An hon. MEMBER: Where are they now?

Mr. STEVENS: Some of them went to the camps. Those camps were reopened not because of the foresight and goodwill of the government or the commission, but under duress, because of the indignation of public-spirited citizens of Vancouver who felt that these young men were entitled at least to some chance of earning their own living. I walked among these men and questioned them. Possibly a few of them were reckless characters, but I know this, after questioning dozens of them, that I found but one desire, the desire for a job. The first thing I did was to shake hands with them and feel their hands to see whether they were chaps who were willing to work; for you can tell when you shake hands with a man whether he is one who will work or will not work. I would say that ninety per cent of them ask for no more than an opportunity to work. Hon. members may smile, but I say to the minister that he cannot take credit for having opened forestry camps. The province of British Columbia opened the camps; they were supported with assistance from the minister only after public opinion was so much aroused and expressed with so much indignation that something had to be done.

Mr. ROGERS: Of what time is my hon. friend speaking with reference to these occurrences in Vancouver?

Mr. STEVENS: I am speaking from memory, but I would say between the end of October and Christmas, or just before Christmas.

Mr. ROGERS: May I tell my hon. friend, then, that following the recommendation of the national employment commission letters were sent to all the provinces in September of 1936 asking the provinces to propose projects for the absorption of these unemployed single men, and plans were worked out in British Columbia accordingly.

Mr. STEVENS: All I have to say is that nothing was done until after the incidents occurred that I speak of.

Mr. ROGERS: Oh yes, it was.

Mr. STEVENS: I venture to differ with the minister, and I still say that nothing was done, as far as British Columbia was concerned, until after these incidents occurred.

Mr. ROGERS: I was in Vancouver shortly after some of these troubles occurred, and the hon. member for Vancouver will remember that plans had been made with the provincial government for establishing these camps, but the question was, who should be admitted to the camps. There were certain transients who were excluded and afterwards admitted.

Mr. STEVENS: I remember that very well. I may be out in my dates, but I say that it was not until after these men were incarcerated. It was not until after there was public indignation at hundreds of these young men being sent to prison.

Mr. ROGERS: My answer is that arrangements for these camps were made before these occurrences.

Mr. STEVENS: And my answer is that nothing was done until after these men were sent to prison. I do not wish to be delayed with undue argument over this point. What I am pointing out is that that is the choicest statement the minister had to make in his speech regarding youth, and that is the explanation of that one. Then when we ask him how many were taken off relief—

Mr. ROGERS: May I correct my hon. friend? He is reckless. These camps of which he speaks are not included in the youth training program at all.

Mr. STEVENS: They are included in the minister's statement.

Mr. ROGERS: That is true, but these other camps of which he is speaking are forestry camps for single, unemployed men. They are not included in the other.

Mr. STEVENS: They are included in the minister's statement.

Mr. ROGERS: They are an alternative to the farm employment plan during the winter months.

Mr. STEVENS: I am simply taking the minister's own statement at page 1996 of Hansard. His words speak for themselves.

I am telling him of the agitation that occurred before these young men were sent to the camps.

The minister laid great emphasis on unity, and I notice that the extent of the unity which had been achieved was apparently this. He spoke with great feeling of the difficulties of getting the dominion and the provinces together, and he emphasized the point that it was necessary to bring the provinces in one by one—these were his own words. He said that it was quite a task to bring in the representatives of the nine provinces to achieve the adoption of an agreement. I would take the minister's mind and the minds of his colleagues back to the days before the last election when the Prime Minister told the country that there was one hope for Canada and that was that, there being eight provinces with Liberal governments, if the people would put in a Liberal government they would have liberalism marching down the corridors of democracy to a revival of good times. Well, the government has been in power over two and a half years. I remember telling some of the new members in the first speech I made in this parliament, two years ago last January, that the Liberal party had the most wonderful opportunity to lead Canada out of its distress—a marvellous opportunity. But I did warn them of this: I said that there were certain things peculiar to the politics of Canada, among them being that insidious thing called patronage, which I feared greatly would obtrude its head from time to time and prevent the Liberal party from achieving its great destiny. How have my hon friends taken advantage of their opportunities?

I have before me statements made by Premier Hepburn a few days ago, and they are similar to many statements that have been made. I do not agree with him in all his policies, but I will say this about him. He is a young man, a Liberal; he is vigorous in the administration of his government; he may be doing things that some of us do not like, but he is a strong leader of a strong Liberal government in the biggest province in Canada. And there is no unity between the minister and that province—no unity. Who is responsible for that lack of unity? I do not know. It is not my duty to say, but I will say that there is a lack of unity between the Liberal government at Ottawa and the Liberal government in Ontario.

Then I turn to the great province of Quebec. The government in office there is not a Liberal government, it is true; but I ask the minister: Why the other day, as was indicated in a speech by the premier of Quebec, would he refuse to meet the mayor or representatives from the city of Montreal in regard to a great practical scheme to deal with unemployment?

Mr. ROGERS: Does my hon. friend wish the answer?

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to have the answer.

Mr. ROGERS: The answer was communicated to the mayor of Montreal and appeared in the press at that time. In matters of relief the dominion government has always had to deal in an administrative way with the provinces, and we have taken that position with respect to the city of Winnipeg, and with respect also to the cities and municipalities of Ontario, who were here in Ottawa a short time ago; and I simply advised the mayor of Montreal that we should be very pleased to meet that delegation if it would come at the request of the minister of labour of the province of Quebec, and if the minister of labour of Quebec would accompany the delegation here.

Mr. STEVENS: I expected the minister to make an answer of that kind. I find here, in his own measure introduced two years ago, the dominating measure indicating the government's policy with respect to unemployment in Canada, one purpose was to:

> recommend to the minister measures with respect to programs of public works and projects of the dominion, the provinces, the municipalities and other agencies. . . .

Mr. ROGERS: Through the provinces, certainly.

Mr. STEVENS: It does not say through the provinces at all. But I accept the minister's position; he can keep that position, and I say that is one of the tragedies of the situation. This report says that the government of Canada, the parliament of Canada should take full responsibility for relief. The minority report says no.

Mr. ROGERS: The majority report does not say that, as a matter of fact.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, it does.

Mr. ROGERS: No, it does not. What it says is this, that if and when unemployment insurance is established, and a national employment service set up across the country, then there should be a national system of unemployment aid. If my hon. friend knows as much about the relief situation as he purports to do, he must know that at the present time relief covers the unemployed and the unemployable. There is no suggestion in the report from beginning to end that the dominion government should take over relief one hundred per cent at the present time.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not say relief.

Mr. ROGERS: The hon. member did say relief.

Mr. STEVENS: I said that the recommendation of the commission was that the dominion government should take over responsibility for unemployment, and it is true that they did reserve to the municipalities that portion of relief which existed before the depression, such as sickness, indigency and so on. No one considers that as part of this program at all. It is like the poor of whom the good book speaks; there are a certain number of poor unfortunate people whom we have always with us.

The report certainly recommends that this parliament should take control of industrial unemployment. The minister, in the face of that recommendation, fixes himself firmly in this position, that he will do nothing with a municipality, no matter how important it may be, how large it may be, or how precise and definite may be its proposals, unless it comes to him through the provincial government. All right, let him take that position; one of the reasons why this whole problem hangs over Canada to-day is this quibbling about constitutional jurisdiction, this habit of "passing the buck," this quibbling about whether a particular officer of this particular government shall talk to another particular officer or not. Let us sweep aside these silly, incompetent administrative practices and face the issues frankly. If the city of Montreal is prepared to pay $3,000,000 and the province of Quebec is prepared to pay $3,000,000 towards a project, let this government definitely say yes or no to the project, and not quibble about these other matters.

But I disagree with the idea of the dominion government and the dominion parliament taking the responsibility, because in my opinion the whole question narrows itself down to one of economics and not to a dispute about constitutional authority. The economics are extremely simple. The municipalities are calmly told by the dominion, and sometimes by the province, that theirs is the responsibility. We, the dominion parliament and government, say: We shall be glad to render a certain amount of aid in the form of charitable contributions, but we insist that the responsibility is yours. At the same time we deny the municipalities and the provinces an opportunity to get sufficient revenue to discharge these obligations. There is not a city in Canada to-day that is not bankrupt or going bankrupt.

Mr. HOWARD: Go easy; that is not true as to Sherbrooke.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, I will say this for the benefit of my hon. friend, that as far as I know there is scarcely a city in Canada except Sherbrooke that is not either bankrupt or on the verge of bankruptcy. Why? Because of the intolerable burden of relief. Municipal taxes are raised to the point where building cannot go on, where real estate is dead, where the whole machinery of construction and building and housing is blocked because of the unholy height of municipal taxes. Yet we stand here, not only offering no assistance, but calmly telling the municipalities that theirs is the responsibility; that they must discharge that duty, and at the same time we deny them a chance to get a fair amount of revenue to carry out that responsibility.

The suggestion of the employment commission that certain phases of their duties cannot be discharged because the government has appointed another commission on the constitutional question is an insult to the intelligence of parliament. Does it mean that we shall quibble along about constitutional difficulties for another year or two, or until after the next general election, before the Rowell commission reports, when all the time it is not a constitutional difficulty at all but a question of economics? It is a question of taxation and of revenue. What we should have done, instead of appointing this commission, was to use the officers that we have in the employ of the government, men like Doctor Coats, Mr. Sim, Mr. Fraser Elliott, the head of the income tax branch, Mr. Sellar—I could name a dozen outstanding experts.

Mr. BLAIR: They are Tories.

Mr. STEVENS: No; they are not—well, I have no knowledge whatever of the politics of any of these men.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: They are not Tories.

Mr. MacNICOL: There will be a lot more Tories in the next parliament.

Mr. STEVENS: That interjection was unworthy of the hon. member. These are outstanding civil servants. What I was about to say is that these men—and I could name others—are men unexcelled in the United States or any other country for their ability to find the solution of Canadian problems.

Mr. FACTOR: Why did the hon. member not do it?

Mr. STEVENS: I did as far as I was able. Let me give my hon. friend an experience I had which warrants me in making that statement. There was brought before me as Minister of Trade and Commerce a question regarding a conflict between the accountancy systems of the provinces and the dominion in computing the tax for income and other purposes. So I asked Doctor Coats to call in the deputy ministers of the treasury departments of the provinces. We brought them here. I presided at the first meeting. I said, "Now gentlemen, this is a technical question in accountancy;" and I presented the problem to them. I left them to deal with it; they worked it out in about a week, and from that day to this there has been complete harmony in that extremely technical realm between the provinces and the dominion.

Mr. ROGERS: That was done under Doctor Coats.

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly, at my instance. I presided over the first meeting.

Mr. ROGERS: And I think it was a very good thing.

Mr. STEVENS: And exactly the same thing could be done now. When I suggest that these outstanding civil servants should be used, I do so because I have confidence in the civil service of Canada. There are dozens of men, men recognized in other countries as outstanding, who could be used. Let me cite one instance to support what I am saying. Our dominion statistician, Doctor Coats, is recognized in the United States and in every country in Europe as one of the outstanding statisticians in the world. We ought to be proud of him. There are other civil servants who in their spheres are equally competent. These are the men who should be charged with these tasks. Let them call in actuaries, accountants, provincial treasurers, tax experts from the large cities, and go into conference on these technical economic questions of revenue, taxation and the burden of relief upon the provinces and the municipalities, and there would be no more worry about the British North America Act or this passing of responsibility from one body to the other. The problem would be solved on a basis of mathematics and economics. This suggestion is, I think, worthy of consideration, and I ask the minister to reconsider his determined view that this is a responsibility solely of the municipalities. It is that thought perpetually advanced which is causing trouble throughout Canada to-day. Unless the municipalities are assisted in getting revenue from other sources than their present limited ones, so that they can lower their taxation on real estate, we shall never get very far with any housing scheme.

Mr. ST-PERE: That is the problem.

Mr. STEVENS: I have in mind the statement of the mayor of Calgary, that the dominion government should take over the entire cost of relief. It is a cry of desperation. He indicated that the city no longer intended to be financially responsible for a situation which was not of its making and which it was impossible for it to correct. We heard from Winnipeg a day or two ago, what it had to do; that it had spent some $10,000,000 in the last two years, and that it had to use its reserves and sinking fund. We know the state of Vancouver—

Mr. MacNICOL: And the same in Toronto.

Mr. STEVENS: And many other cities. We heard from Hamilton this afternoon, an industrial centre, where there has been peculiarly severe stress of unemployment. Take Moose Jaw, which unfortunately defaulted on some bonds when I was in London last year. That was a severe blow to dominion prestige and dominion credit. And need I do more than refer to the fate of the dominion government issue in London a matter of only two months ago, in order to indicate the extent of these conditions? What happened to that loan? It was very singular. The Dominion of Canada went on the London market for £10,000,000. That loan ought to have been snapped up very quickly, but what happened? It hung fire for a week or ten days, and then the underwriters took half of it. The same day that issue was put on the market, the city of Bristol—just a city—went on the London market for £3,000,000. They opened their books at nine o'clock in the morning; at 9.05 a.m. the books were closed with applications for £68,000,000. Why? There are a number of reasons, but one of them was the default of Moose Jaw, together with other difficulties.

I am going to say quite frankly that unless some step is taken—and the leadership must come from here—there will be a serious time ahead for the cities and municipalities of this country. The minister speaks of housing. Well, they painted a few verandahs; they repaired the old stoop at the back-door; they put in a few fence posts and probably there was a new wire fence built here and there. They put in a new bathtub and a few things like that, to the extent of about $15,000,000 for the whole of Canada in a period of a year and a half or two years. Does the minister or anyone else suggest that this is something we should be proud of as an achievement in the face of the fact, that there is not a major city—Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Vancouver, Halifax, Saint John, Calgary, Edmonton—that is not a disgrace to this country so far as housing conditions in a large part of the down-town districts and the older sections are concerned. I will say something further. If you go to the cities of the older countries of Europe, or of Great Britain, or South America, there is scarcely any city similar in size that does not put us to shame in regard to construction and housing. Some three years ago I said in Toronto and Montreal that within a hundred blocks surrounding the city halls of those cities there were thousands and tens of thousands of buildings that were menaces to health and fire hazards. The minister laughs.

Mr. MARTIN: I just want to point out to the hon. gentleman that the Canadian report of cities which was issued last year states just the opposite.

Mr. STEVENS: All right. All I have to say is this: I know every city in Canada personally; I have looked at them all, and I am expressing my own opinion when I say that our cities to-day, in their down-town sections, are in the main hazards to health as well as being hazards from the standpoint of fire, and ought to be rebuilt. Further, it will take us thirty years to build up our cities and towns to a reasonably decent level of construction. But the minister says that the municipalities are responsible for relief, and that he will deal with them only through the provinces. The minister and his colleagues will have to face this question sooner or later. They have failed to face it in the last two years; they have failed utterly to face it through this commission, because this report does not contain anything in that connection except some pious observations that we ought to have a housing scheme; that we ought to have unemployment insurance, and that we ought to encourage the tourists. Is there anything new about that? What about the tourist branch?

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend was in office here for five years. Did he advocate all these things at that time?

Mr. STEVENS: He did; but I would also suggest to the minister that I left office.

Mr. ROGERS: I am aware of that.

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly I advocated them.

Mr. ROGERS: In this house?

Mr. STEVENS: In this house and out of it. Since 1931 I have consistently taken a strong stand on this question of housing throughout Canada. I am speaking alone in this house; but I would remind the minister that while that is so, and while I can be very easily brushed aside as far as the house is concerned, I represent 384,000 votes. I am not ashamed of those votes. I am not ashamed of my record, nor am I ashamed of the policies I advocate. I am not ashamed of the policies for which I gave up office. What the minister says is no answer. He can, if he so desires, lay on me, as the last part of his speech indicated he was quite capable of doing, all sorts of political opprobrium, but that will not alter his responsibility one iota. He is the minister. He came to the house with this proposal two years ago, and at the time I warned him that we would hold him and his government responsible for results from this measure. That was two years ago; the results have been nil.

Let me complete what I was saying about housing. It will take us thirty years to catch up in that regard if we do not give the municipalities of this country relief from the burden of the cost of unemployment, either by taking over the whole responsibility or by giving them new sources of revenue, which we could do very simply and easily. Unless we do something of that kind, there can be no housing, because the municipalities cannot afford to do it and no one is going into a housing scheme with the taxes he has to pay to-day.

The minister referred to the tourist business. Of course the tourist business is good, but the minister just discovered it. He brings it to the house as a new discovery by this commission. They refer to the tourist business; it is one of their chief accomplishments. Why, Mr. Chairman, for some years we have had within the ambit of the government of Canada a department or a branch of a department dealing with the tourist business. We have been encouraging the tourist business through other departments. I noticed that the minister spoke about the Department of Mines and Resources, the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce. At first I thought the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was delivering the address.

Usually it is left to the Prime Minister to deal with the affairs of all the departments, but the minister spoke of them quite freely. The Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) has been doing very good work. I have commended him for what he has done in the expansion of mining; but when the Minister of Labour quotes figures showing the increased production of gold as an evidence of what the employment commission did, it is pretty thin. It may be good politics. It may be good stuff as a sort of sedative for dissatisfied Liberal supporters throughout the country. It may be, but I doubt it. But for the minister to suggest to the house that the increase in the production of gold in this country is to be credited to him and to this commission is stretching things pretty far.

Mr. ROGERS: There is no suggestion of that at all. My hon. friend can look up the record.

Mr. STEVENS: Must I read everything the minister said?

Mr. ROGERS: That had no connection with the commission at all.

Mr. STEVENS: I have in my hand a copy of his three hour speech, and in it he gave the increase in gold production.

Mr. ROGERS: That had no reference to the employment commission at all. I was dealing with the expanding trade policies of the government.

Mr. STEVENS: Was that not referred to by the employment commission?

Mr. ROGERS: There was no connection between the national employment commission and gold production in my speech.

Mr. STEVENS: Was it not referred to by the employment commission?

Mr. ROGERS: Not in this connection at all.

Mr. STEVENS: I hold in my hand three pages of this report devoted exclusively to the export business. The minister went ahead and quoted the increases in exports. What were those increases? As I said two years ago in my speech on the budget, had there not been hanging over the world threats of war—a condition which unfortunately has not clarified in the last year or two—our exports would have been very much less than they are. An analysis of our exports shows that a very substantial portion of the increase is for that class of export which is involved in the production of armaments. Yet the minister quoted the improvement in exports, the tourist business and the extension of gold production as evidences of a solution of these problems.

The whole question is one of confidence and unity. The whole question is one of leadership by this parliament. I am not now for the moment placing the onus of responsibility in this respect on the government. This parliament—and, by the way, a parliament can express its leadership only through its government—ought to give leadership to industry, leadership to finance and leadership to the provinces in the approach to the solution of this problem.

The question of debt and taxation lies at the root of the whole trouble. This government has heaped opprobrium particularly on the government of Alberta. It has gone out of its way to paint the activities of the Alberta government in every known possible term. Why? Because the premier of Alberta is the exponent of some peculiar ideas in economics, with which, by the way, I do not agree. But he is the premier of Alberta. In this house there now sits a young man who only the other day was returned from the capital city of that province, indicating that the people of Alberta are feeling very keenly and very deeply. What is the root of all the trouble? The awful burden of debt.

Nevertheless there is not a word in this report about that, the root cause, almost the main cause, of dissatisfaction, and of social and political dislocation in Canada. When the farmers of Alberta who, if I remember correctly, number about 500,000, realize that they have to pay eight, nine or ten per cent interest on mortgages on farms; when they realize that they have to pay from ten per cent to thirty per cent interest on deferred payments on agricultural implements—and I can produce a list of two hundred from one district alone—and when they find, after borrowing the money and during ten and, in some instances, twenty years paying more than they borrowed—that at the end of the period they owe more than when they started, then they must ask, "What hope is there for us? Where are we going to get assistance?"

Mr. Aberhart has at least done this: He has shown that he is desirous of lifting the burden of debt. His methods and processes may be wrong. I do not agree with the social credit theory; but I do agree with this, that the root cause of the dissatisfaction is the unbearable burden of debt. It may be that in the older provinces that condition may not be realized as keenly as it is in the west.

I wish to make a statement here which I think would warrant careful consideration, and it is this: There is a good deal of talk about the losses incurred by eastern financial institutions in western Canada. We hear a great deal about that. I venture this statement, and challenge its contradiction: In the last twenty-five years the farmers of the three western provinces have paid in interest rates in excess of six per cent more than double the total capital or interest lost in those three provinces by mortgage and loan companies. I repeat that, because it lies at the root of our trouble, when we talk about agricultural distress. True, the drought area is the first catastrophe, but it is not the sum total of agricultural distress out there. It is due to debt. I say that these farmers have paid in interest rates in excess of six per cent, which would be a moderate rate, more than double the total losses in principal and interest in the last twenty-five years. These men know that something is wrong, and they are asking for some relief. They are asking us to lift this burden of debt from their shoulders. Parliament may not be clothed with all the responsibility; but unless it gives leadership in the approach to the solution of this problem, there will be no cessation of dissatisfaction in connection with these matters.

So I say to the minister that this report, a major portion of which, by the way, is taken up in a discussion of export trade, and another portion in a discussion of the tourist business, lamentably fails, and the minister in his speech failed to indicate any worth while and practical methods of dealing with this great problem.

Before I take my seat, let me add one further word. I do not know what the minister is going to introduce, and it might be said to me, "You might have waited until the bill came down." But I am taking the proper, parliamentary procedure. This resolution, together with the minister's statement, is supposed to indicate the government's policy on this subject. If the minister has something up his sleeve, and if there is something to be disclosed later on which is much in advance of anything he has indicated or has disclosed in the resolution, then he is not dealing fairly with parliament. I am bound by what I can see and by what the minister has said. I take it for granted that he was honest and honourable, took the committee into his confidence and disclosed the government policy. That is the one and the only thing an honourable man could do. Taking that position, I say to him that I find, not no hope, but little hope for a solution of the problem. I question whether the minister himself is satisfied.

He came to this house a few years ago, a young man highly trained, a young man with an academic training, an economist of note, a man to whom the country looked as adding youth, virility and vision to the government. But as I listened to his speech the other day I realized that the first half of it was a laboured statement to justify the report, and the last half of it was a disquisition on the record of the government, dealing with every department of it, a speech which might have been delivered by the Prime Minister in connection with a budget, or on some other occasion of that kind. But it was not at all germane to this subject. He left us in a hopeless morass, so far as any solution of this stirring problem is concerned.

It is not good enough to say that we have supplied some means of training youth and to leave the underlying problems—and as an educated and cultured man, and a student of economy, he knows these problems exist—behind the dark screen. Either he did not have the courage or he was not allowed to disclose them. I think myself he would, had he been allowed, have brought them to the light of day. But he did not.

One point further, and it is this: It is rumoured that the government proposes to introduce a long list of public works, to be scattered throughout the various constituencies, as a contribution toward the solution of this problem. If that is done, all I can say is that it is an indication that an election is in the offing. That is no contribution toward the solution of the problem, and if it is contemplated I would plead with the government to abandon it. We shall see when it comes; we can only guess. But if it does come, I warn the minister it will be looked upon in that light. From what we are able to learn, there is little hope given to the unemployed; there is little hope given to the struggling manufacturer; there is little hope given to the distressed agriculturist.

Mr. MacNICOL: Nothing but abuse for the manufacturer.

Mr. STEVENS: I deplore very much indeed that this condition two years afterwards is the answer to the very bright speech which the minister made two years ago when he introduced the bill upon which this commission was founded.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speech just made by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens). It is needless for me to say that he was not looking at me when he said that this country was looking to parliament for leadership. I am a Leader by name only; yet I am proud of my name, and I am proud of my occupation as a farmer.

This debate on unemployment in Canada has been very interesting and instructive. I can think of nothing that affects more deeply the lives of the Canadian people than a solution of this great problem. I am thinking now of the eve of the general election in 1930, when the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), appealing to the people, at that time said that the greatest problem confronting the Canadian people was that of unemployment. "Give me power," he said, "and I will cure unemployment or perish in the attempt." And in the fortunes of political war he perished in the attempt.

Another government came into power, and after they had been in power for nearly three years we find a responsible minister saying that unemployment is the most vital question affecting the Canadian people. I am making these statements in order to indicate that we have not yet solved this great problem. It will take some years to solve it. It will take the united efforts of all the members of parliament to solve it, and I hope we get that concerted action.

I do not think the problem will be settled by the expansion of our tourist traffic, important as that is. I do not wish to minimize the value of that great trade, but I do not think it goes to the root of the trouble. Nor do I think that youth training is going to solve the problem of unemployment, very necessary as I believe that is, because, Mr. Chairman, what is the use of training young people for certain occupations if you cannot give them a job?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Hear, hear; now you are talking.

Mr. LEADER: I do not believe the setting up of employment agencies will solve unemployment, for the same reason that I gave a moment ago—what is the use of employment agencies if you cannot give the worker a job?

Perhaps my hon. friends sitting opposite do not believe that the expansion of our trade is of so much importance. I believe that it is of vital importance, and that the efforts of the present government have had the effect of developing and expanding our trade so much during the last two years that we have had more or less of a boom in comparison with conditions which obtained previously. I think the trade agreement which this government made with the United States was a wonderful achievement. The right hon. leader of the opposition said that he could have obtained the same trade agreement from the United States had he so desired. If that is so, then I believe the Conservative party were in error in not accepting it, and I want to commend the Liberal government for accepting that trade agreement with the United States. But that has not solved our unemployment problem, and it is the duty of parliament to find a solution for it and to provide the necessary remedy.

When I was elected a member of parliament—and by the way I represent 25,000 people in western Canada, and I am speaking here not in my own interests but in the interests of those who sent me here, and if at any time I express in this house sentiments that are contrary to those I know my people hold, I know I shall have to pay the penalty; I shall be the one to suffer—when I was elected I wanted to give a fair day's work for a fair day's pay, and I wondered what I could do to help solve the problems of Canada. Being a very humble member of parliament, but knowing the agricultural situation, and knowing that great numbers of agricultural workers throughout the country were unemployed and had drifted into our cities, I investigated the farm placement plan which had been adopted by the previous government. I felt that the administration of the plan had not gone far enough. I believed in the plan, but I thought that something more could be done.

I am not giving away any secrets, although perhaps I am giving information when I say that the farm placement plan was first suggested to the former government by the deputy minister of labour of Manitoba, Mr. MacNamara, but I want to give them credit for adopting the plan. The plan was for the federal government to pay the agricultural worker five dollars a month and another five dollars a month to the farmer for whom he was working. But after a few months the former government ceased to pay anything to the farmers and carried out only that part of the plan providing for the payment of five dollars a month to the agricultural worker. If the government is going to get credit for instituting the plan, it must also take the responsibility for making it a partial failure. I felt that if we could give these farmers, who were in dire need at that time, ten dollars a month to board these men, we could extend the plan and take in thousands more of these unemployed single men in our cities, and so I got busy. At the first public opportunity I took the matter up with the United Farmers of Manitoba, who were holding their annual convention in the city of Portage la Prairie that year. I discussed the plan at their meeting and presented a resolution asking them to endorse a policy whereby the dominion government would put the plan into effect, and the resolution passed unanimously. I came to Ottawa and submitted the plan to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), he discussed it in the house, and the plan eventually was adopted.

Mr. ROGERS: That is correct.

Mr. LEADER: Yes. Yesterday the hon. member for Greenwood, (Mr. Massey) gave credit to the late government for instituting the plan, which statement I have corroborated, but I have added that the late government must take responsibility for making just half a job of it. I have told the committee of the procedure I followed in introducing that measure into the house; I am now going to read the words of the minister himself, and I do not think he will deny me that right. Speaking in this house on April 9, 1937, he is reported at page 2824 of Hansard as follows:

> Mr. Rogers: I should like to say here, and I am glad of this opportunity to do so, that during the discussion of unemployment and relief a year ago the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) brought to the attention of the house the importance of enabling single unemployed men in the cities to go to the farms, particularly during the winter months, and also the advantage to the farmers of having that additional assistance during this period.
> The hon. member made a definite proposal, as I recall it, which has been largely carried out in the actual farm employment plan which has been in operation. I give that simply as one illustration to assure hon. members that those responsible for particular departments frequently profit, and ought to profit, from the suggestions which come to them from various quarters of the house.

I would add that a government should profit by opinions expressed on all sides, and should take heed to them. I think the government, in giving credit to an hon. member who happens to be a friend of the administration, should be glad that its supporters are in a position sometimes to offer constructive criticisms. Honest criticism coming from a friend should it seems to me, be regarded as perhaps the best advice possible.

I am sure that had the hon. member for Greenwood known the facts, he would not have made the statement he did make yesterday.

Mr. MASSEY: What statement?

Mr. LEADER: I shall read it. The hon. member was discussing the farm placement plan, and he said:

> It was with some degree of satisfaction that the minister reported what had been done under the farm improvement, employment and settlement plan. The minister realizes, as does the national employment commission, that this plan was not set up by this government, not even recommended by the national employment commission, but constituted by the former government. The present government has to its credit, let it be said, the fact that it adopted the principle of that plan.

Mr. Martin: Look at the difference in the results.

> Mr. Massey: I have noted them. The plan under the former government was and still is a great success, but do not forget the origin and point from which it started, and give credit where credit is due. Fifty thousand men have been placed under the scheme and the minister is to be congratulated upon having accepted it. Surely the government and the national employment commission should not assume any credit for this plan.

The hon. member was not in the chamber when I told the committee that Mr. MacNamara, deputy minister of labour of Manitoba, suggested the plan to the former government. I gave that government credit for adopting the plan, but I also censured them because they discontinued the bonus of five dollars a month to the farmer. That proposition was brought into the house by myself; only I suggested ten dollars a month to both the farmer and the farm hand.

I was going on to say that I am sure the hon. member for Greenwood did not know that those are the actual facts or he would not have arrogated to himself the duty of claiming this credit for the former government.

That the government has accepted the plan which was suggested gives me encouragement and prompts me to offer another. The plan I am about to mention has been alluded to previously in this chamber. It has to do with that part of the report which deals with the rehabilitation of agriculture. During the campaign I had occasion to speak over the radio, and I prepared a fifteen minute talk on how to rehabilitate agriculture, how we could devise some scheme to keep our people on the land, rather than have them drift to the cities. I have the statement before me. I am going to read but very little of it, as I wish to hasten on with my remarks. I told the people of the money that was being spent at that time. I believe the then leader of the opposition stated that over three hundred million dollars had been expended in unemployment relief, and that nothing of a concrete nature had been devised. I spoke of great public buildings which had been erected throughout the dominion at a huge cost to the taxpayers, not a dollar of the expense having been paid in cash, every dollar being borrowed money on which interest would have to be paid in perpetuity. I told them of the relief camps and what they were doing to the nation. By the way, before I get away from that point let me state, what perhaps I should have mentioned a few moments ago, that the adoption of the farm placement plan had the effect of closing those camps. Last year, I believe, over fifty thousand workers, men and women, were placed on farms, at a cost of something over three and a half million dollars to the taxpayers. The last year the relief camps were in operation, according to figures which, I understand, were given by the minister, the cost was in the neighbourhood of nine million dollars, and the prospective expense for the following year was twelve million dollars. But under the farm placement plan we were able to close the relief camps and reduce our cost by two-thirds.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Were as many men taken care of?

Mr. LEADER: Yes, far more. On an average there were, I believe, only twenty thousand in the relief camps, whereas last year fifty thousand men and women were placed on farms. I said in my address that the handling of the relief at that time was more or less of a political nature, because there was no employment commission, there was no real foundation on which the government could work, and many decisions were made at a time when matters did not receive mature judgment owing to the emergency, with the result that the work and the appointments were more or less political. Then I told them of the plan of the leader of the opposition at that time:

> The alternative method of handling the unemployment problem is found in the platform of the Liberal party as outlined by Mackenzie King. Mr. King and his followers pledge themselves to appoint a National Unemployment Commission which will represent all parts of Canada, all classes of society, and all interests of the community. That body will be non-political. It will be in a position to consider each relief project strictly upon its merits and to advise the government accordingly.

The commission was duly appointed. Perhaps all hon. members will not believe that it has accomplished much, but if it has not, this certainly was not the fault of the commission. I went on to outline a plan by which we could help the unemployed and keep our people on the land. We have heard from all parts of the chamber suggestions by hon. members as to electrical energy being placed at the disposal of the farming population. I do not know of any farmers in the west, unless perhaps there are a dozen or so around my city of Portage la Prairie, who enjoy the use of electrical energy in their farm homes. I believe it is for lack of this facility more than anything else that young people are leaving our farms. Men, and women, boys and girls, are going to the cities. They see the conveniences there, and are discouraged when they return home and realize what they have to put up with. This, we are told, is a machine age. It is true that farmers have a great deal of machinery to help them in their work; but farm women are without the devices which are at the disposal of city women, and so the younger generation tend to drift towards the cities because they have no pride in their occupation and no heart in their work. So I suggested this:

> We all know, and no one better than those who are engaged in farm work, that farm life is not so attractive as city life. Farm houses generally lack the modern convenience found so universally in the city. Although Canada has an abundance of electrical energy generated to meet the requirements of all citizens, our governments have not yet been able to place this power within the reach of the farmer's pocket-book. This is one reason why our young farmers, both boys and girls, prefer a doubtful existence in the city to the more permanent though humdrum life on the farm. These young people should be retained on the land otherwise they will displace workers in the city. This could be done in a large measure if our governing bodies would undertake to supply farmers with electrical energy and not limit the benefits of this modern labour-saving device to those residing in our towns and cities. Why, and it is a pertinent question, should not farm women have the same opportunities as their sisters in the city and simply by the pressing of an electric button be relieved of much of the drudgery of housekeeping?

Then I told them that I knew from personal observation and through contact of thousands of retired farmers or farmers who had lost their farms and who were living in our cities on relief. I said that those farmers would give their right arm to get back to the old farm again, but that there was no opportunity for them. I told them of farm workers who had laboured for years and years on the farm, but who, owing to the depression, could not go back with any chance of getting a job. I told them about the returned soldiers, and perhaps I should read the paragraph dealing with this class:

> Then, too, the returned soldier, who offered his all for the welfare of the nation should be taken care of. Perhaps he and his family would like to be reestablished on good land in a good district. The fact that he had failed in a previous experience should be no detriment. Perhaps our government was greatly to blame for his failure because we know that many of these men were placed where they had no chance to succeed owing to having started on poor land in a poor district and with expensive equipment. I know of many returned men who are separated from their families by force of circumstances that would welcome the chance to reestablish their homes on the land, had they an opportunity.

I am thinking now of one incident in particular that occurred while I was loading a car of wheat at a siding at Burnside. There was a man of perhaps forty years of age who was working for another farmer, and he said to me, "My wife and two children are back home living with her father and mother. We were placed on a farm and were anxious to succeed. But after a year or two we came to the conclusion that no man in Canada could make a living on it." Consequently they abandoned the farm and his wife and two children went back home, while he became a hired man. There are thousands of such cases, and the minister himself told us that many of these soldiers have not had a fair chance to succeed.

I should like to read the plan that I submitted then. Here it is:

Now I think that the Canadian government should undertake at the earliest possible moment to place these ex-farmers and the others that I have mentioned back on the land. They could be located on much of the land that is at present a burden to the resident farmer.

What I meant by being a burden to the resident farmer was this: In my own district of Portage la Prairie, I know of fathers who are themselves the sons of old pioneers who went there from Ontario and Quebec. They are now seventy years of age with four or five sons, not one of whom is at home. Where are they? They have gone to the cities, either in Canada or in the United States, to find employment. They would like nothing better than to take up a quarter section or half a section of the land belonging to their fathers, but they have not the means. The father, perhaps, has a big mortgage, or a small mortgage it may be, on the farm and he cannot get hold of any money for the purpose of establishing a son on a farm across the road. Consequently the son leaves home and goes to the city. And by the way, when the boys leave home it is a natural consequence that the farm girls do likewise. Therefore, it should be, and, in fact, it is the duty of the government—and I believe they recognize it—to try to keep these farmers' sons and daughters on the land where they were born. To continue:

In my opinion the federal government should undertake to finance this scheme. Money can be procured at the present time at a very low rate of interest. It could be loaned to the provinces who in turn would deal through the municipalities whose councillors would be in the best position to judge, not only the quality of the land but after investigation the capabilities of the land-seeker.

I believe the minister will discover some similarity between some of the recommendations contained in the report and what I have been reading to the committee.

In proposing that the federal, provincial and municipal governments should cooperate in the operation of this scheme I am endorsing the policy of the Liberal party as outlined in Mr. King's radio address in which he advocates unity of purpose if we are to achieve beneficial and permanent results. Furthermore, the plan could be carried out with a minimum of expense as it would not be necessary to engage a staff of government officials to add to our burden of taxation.

That could be done by our municipalities without costing the taxpayers one cent, and I believe it is what the report recommends. I believe that is the system which is recommended for adoption by federal, provincial and municipal governments. I do not know whether the farm loan board would take care of a matter of this kind, but it seems to me that is the agency through which we might work. The present farm loan legislation is, in my opinion, a mere pretence.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): A waste of good paper.

Mr. LEADER: It does not go far enough. In my opinion, the farm loan board's operations could be extended so as to enable it to buy a lot of this land from farmers who have now more than they can work economically. The result would be that the farmers' sons could apply to the board for a loan on some of the land. This money could be paid to the father who owns the land, and his son would be established. In this way two purposes would be served at the same time. The aged farmer would not sit down waiting for the old age pension; he would be relieved of his mortgage on the old homestead and would be quite content to live there the rest of his days looking across the fence or over the roadway and watching the progress of his son, happily married, carrying on the traditions of his forefathers.

I submit that our system has been all wrong. I do not think one dollar should be paid out in direct relief. All moneys paid out should go to men who work, unless they are unemployable, in which event they are the subjects of charity and we should look after them. I have here some figures given by the Hon. Mr. Garson, provincial treasurer of Manitoba. In the last five years there has been paid out in that province—I believe these are the total figures for the dominion and the province—for direct family relief, including the drought areas, the sum of $35,604,730.19. At the same time they paid out $818,699.12 for rural rehabilitation. In other words, they paid out over $40 for direct relief for which we get no benefit and from which we have no chance of ever getting a return, to only $1 spent for reestablishing our people on the land. That is the situation in Manitoba. That is why the minister mildly condemns the plan of rehabilitation which we have had up to the present time. The minister said, in answer to a question of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps), that capital expenditure should not be undertaken unless it provides national income. To that I most heartily agree. But if there is anything which will bring in national income and produce a better morale in this country, or any other country for that matter, it is having a happy, contented rural population.

Mr. R. H. McGREGOR (York East): I listened to the three and a half hour speech of the minister with great care, trying to find something that would be of some benefit to my people. Having found that there was nothing of that in it, I feel it my duty to bring before the committee some of the conditions which exist in the southern part of the county of York, and more particularly in that part of the county which I represent. This part of which I speak is situated on the outskirts of the city of Toronto. In years gone by, property there was fairly cheap, and many people from Toronto came to that district and built what we at that time called "shacks."

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

MEASURE FOR ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS

The house resumed consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution—Mr. Rogers—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide assistance towards the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress, and for such payments out of moneys appropriated by parliament as may be necessary for all or any of the purposes of the proposed legislation.

Mr. McGREGOR: Mr. Chairman, as I was saying when the committee rose at six o'clock, most of the people in the southern end of the townships of East York and Scarborough and the southern portion of North York moved out to those municipalities between the years 1916 and 1929, and built what at that time were termed "shacks." Most of these people worked in the building trades in Toronto during the day time and they built their houses in the evening. When 1929 came, most of them had fairly good working men's houses erected, and when they fell out of work they had no reserve. All they had left was their little home.

I want to give the committee some figures to show to the minister that the statement of the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) this afternoon to the effect that most of the municipalities in this country are bankrupt had a good deal of truth in it. I will give figures of the assessment, the levies, the arrears of taxes, the property taken over already and the property that is expected to be taken over by these municipalities in the year 1938.

In the township of East York we have an assessment of $14,497,000; the levy is $1,085,000, and the arrears of taxes, $1,040,000, or almost equal to one year's total tax levy. The property that has already been taken over by the municipality amounts to $325,244, and let me say to the minister that every time a piece of property is taken over by the municipality, no further taxes can be collected on it and the rest of the property owners must bear that extra burden. Properties on the tax roll that are expected to be taken over in East York in 1938 amount to $160,000.

In North York the assessment is $10,685,000; the levy, $670,000; arrears of taxes, $495,000; property taken over, $119,901, and the property that is expected to be taken over in the year 1938 amounts to $244,674.

In the township of Scarborough the assessment is $10,475,000; the levy, $620,000, arrears of taxes, exactly half a million dollars. I hesitate to give figures of the property that has been taken over by the municipality, but I have here a publication which has been prepared by the county of York, and it shows that this municipality has taken over $1,584,000 of property; those are the actual tax arrears owing on the property—not the assessment.

What is going to happen to these municipalities in another few years if they continue to take over property at this rate? It will mean that before very long the biggest part of this assessment will be owned by the municipality, and what are the other property owners going to do then? The municipality has paid interest on debenture debt at the rate of 3 per cent, but it has paid no principal since 1933.

In 1928 the township of East York had a building program of $2,600,000; in 1937 it had a building program of $360,000. The bill for relief for the month of January of this year was $53,138; for February, $57,477; and for March just closed, $58,802, of which the municipality is asked to pay approximately $12,000 a month. The number of those on relief in the month of January was 5,523, and in February, 5,977.

One big drawback that we have in these municipalities is that we have no factories. There are no industries of any kind, and consequently all the taxes have to be levied on the homes, which constitute the only property available for taxation. The school tax in some instances amounts to 50 per cent of the total tax levied, and in most instances the school tax, plus the relief tax, amounts to more than 50 per cent and in some instances to 60 or 65 per cent of the total tax levied.

The minister may say that there is no money to look after this situation. But I would point out that from 1935, the last year the Conservatives were in power, until this year the revenues of this country have increased by some $93,000,000, and if the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) went down to my riding and attempted to make a speech there, the first thing he would be asked would be: What are you going to do for the unemployed? If he told them that there was no money, they would say: There is plenty of money for Saskatchewan; there is plenty of money for defence, plenty of money to pay the deficits on the Canadian National Railways, and plenty of money to pay the interest on the bonds of the Dominion of Canada.

I want to give a few instances of men who have lost their property. One is the case of a gentleman who had given thirty-five years of his life to the public service of the municipality as school trustee, reeve, member of the county council, and so on. The five acres that he owned had been in his family for sixty years. Four years after he died his property was taken over by the municipality for arrears of taxes, and the rest of his family have not a dollar to live on. What is going to happen to them I do not know.

Another family have lived on their farm for 125 years, and cleared the bush off their farm originally. This property has been taken over by the municipality, and what is going to happen to the family nobody knows.

Another case I shall cite is that of a returned soldier. He built his own house, and when it was finished he and a number of other returned soldiers built a veterans' hall in the community. The municipality got into financial difficulties, and this man, who happened to be working for the municipality at that time, was laid off, his work being done by relief labour. He had a small mortgage on his home, and the mortgagee came to foreclose the mortgage, but a group of sympathetic friends rallied around the owner and prevented the bailiff from carrying out his orders, and so the man's home for the time being was left alone. The last time I saw him he stated that before he would be put out of his house—and that is the only thing he has left in this world—there would be murder. Whether that would happen I do not know. But I say that one of the reasons why we have what we call "reds" in this country, one of the reasons why this great scare of communism is over Canada, is the injustices that have been done to families along the line that I have indicated. I ask the minister, If he had worked all his life; if all he had left as a result of his work was his house, and if someone came along and took it from him because of a paltry seven or eight hundred dollar mortgage, taxes and interest, what would he do? Yet in the township of East York alone, five hundred people have lost their homes in this way. I do not know where it is all going to end, but conditions are extremely serious.

[Mr. McGregor.]

When the mayors and reeves visited Ottawa a few days ago I understood, from talking to one of them, that they were returning home with a good deal of hope. They expected the minister was going to do something for their relief problem. They said that Premier Hepburn of Ontario was prepared to do his share if the federal government would do theirs, and they gave me to understand that they were assured by the minister that something would be done. If the premier of Ontario is ready to do his share, I do not see why this government should not do theirs. I trust that before the session is over, the minister will do something for these municipalities, for they are in very bad shape financially.

Mr. WILFRID LACROIX (Quebec-Montmorency): I listened with deep interest to the Minister of Labour's magnificent survey of the unemployment situation, in the course of which he stated that the government is seriously contemplating a new plan designed to stimulate the building of low-cost dwellings. So far, it is well known, the wage-earning classes have been unable to take advantage of the Dominion Housing Act. May I be permitted to suggest to the minister a low cost housing plan which, in my humble opinion, would be within the reach of the labouring classes?

There is no doubt that the best solution of the unemployment problem lies in the construction of low cost working men's dwellings. Such a project, carried out on a large scale, would furnish considerable employment to labourers, carpenters, masons, bricklayers, plasterers, painters, etc., and also stimulate the building material industries. But there is only one way, in my opinion, to make such a plan practicable, and that is to construct dwellings at such a low cost that every wage-earner may own one by writing off his investment through a moderate monthly payment in the form of rent. To my mind the most practical way to ensure this is to adopt a system along the lines followed in Sweden, Norway and Italy, which consists in creating in the larger municipalities a local commission composed of an architect, a sociologist, and a secretary, who would give their services without remuneration. Such a commission would have a town planner draw up a governing plan of the area in which the municipality is situate. This plan, which would have to be approved by the proper authorities, would indicate the various sites suited to a development comprising groups of fifty to one hundred standardized houses costing no more than $2,400 each. I believe it would be possible to get down to this price by building a large number of houses at one time, thus effecting a saving on materials and transportation, and on other costs.

Such a commission, which would be under the control of both the municipality and the federal government but whose activities would be subject to the approval of a central advisory commission located at Ottawa, would, after drawing up the governing plan and making the cadestral subdivisions required for the construction of these houses, select from among the working men of the locality those to whom, after inquiry, it saw fit to assign a building lot, and after having thus distributed the lots among fifty or one hundred persons, would itself undertake the mass construction of the houses. I am convinced that, provided the commission selects working men in employment, a monthly payment of fifteen to twenty dollars would ensure the repayment within fifteen years of the cost of both land and building. The wage-earner will thus find his house fully paid with very little sacrifice on his part.

In order to attain this objective, two things are essential: mass production and a monthly payment of not more than twenty dollars. The existing act is useless to those who do not have a piece of land and some money; it is beyond the reach of the small wage-earner. Contrary to what has been said, it does nothing to improve living conditions among small urban wage-earners.

The government could lend the required funds, without interest, to the municipalities, which would guarantee the repayment thereof. The local committees and the municipalities could undertake the collection of the sums due, which, as they are collected from the house owners, would be immediately forwarded to the finance department at Ottawa or to the federal commission charged with the administration of the project. I believe that by lending to each Canadian municipality from $100,000 to $5,000,000 or even more, according to size, the government would solve in the soundest way possible the unemployment problem, while providing the country with a tremendously valuable asset and increasing municipal revenues by the surplus wealth thus created.

I would suggest that the government lend $100,000,000 to the municipalities for this purpose. I shall probably be asked where the government is to obtain this money which it will loan without interest to the municipalities. Here is my answer. Have the Bank of Canada issue $100,000,000 of paper money. St. James Street will say that is inflation. I say it is not; for the $100,000,000 of paper money thus issued by the Bank of Canada will be automatically refunded over a given period, say fifteen years, by the redemption fund constituted by the monthly payments made by the house owners. After a certain number of years, the Bank of Canada will have recovered all the paper money thus issued, which it will destroy as it comes in. In this way the bank will not lose one cent, and the government of Canada will add to the assets of the country and increase the resources of every municipality by providing new taxable property. Moreover, the $100,000,000 which is thus placed in circulation and which would become bank deposits, would place borrowing facilities at the disposal of commerce and industry. The stimulus given to all the building trades would attenuate the economic recession which is becoming more and more apparent and solve the unemployment problem pending a revival of business.

Let us see who are those who will object to such a policy. There are in the first place the banks, which would rather see the government make issues of bonds to which they could subscribe and, without trouble or risk, make a profit consisting of the difference between the interest which they pay to their depositors and that which the government pays them on its bonds. But all the money which the banks invest in government bonds is money withheld from commercial and industrial development. In the second place, there are the small investors, the holders of savings accounts, who may fear that their dollar will lose its purchasing power. To them I say that they are mistaken; for this operation of the Bank of Canada will be only a temporary one designed to create wealth, to provide work and to make money circulate. When it shall have been entirely refunded to the Bank of Canada, the dollar will have lost none of its value, as the situation will be the same as before the $100,000,000 was issued.

Besides, identical operations have been carried out in Sweden and Norway with no effect whatever upon the monetary unit. It must not be overlooked that this expenditure of $100,000,000 will not only provide needed employment and solve the slum problem which is daily becoming more serious in our cities, but also create a permanent national asset.

Such a policy seems to me to be the soundest possible. I find on page 101 of the national employment commission's report, under item (iii):

> The employment created by such housing projects will be greater and more widely spread than that afforded by large scale public works.

Public works, in most cases, are non-productive, whereas working men's dwellings, if built according to the plan that I have just indicated, will assuredly be paid for. Besides, should an owner fail to meet his payments, what is to prevent the municipality from taking over the property and keeping the amount already paid on it? Moreover, a $2,400 house is always salable, and the possibilities of loss, taking into account the payments already effected, are practically non-existent.

I might add that the action I am asking the Bank of Canada to take is not out of line with the bank's practice. In fact, when it increases the price to be paid for gold, it issues paper money and practises inflation. By so doing, it is following the example of the United States government.

I consider it sounder policy to create in this country an asset, which, while increasing Canada's wealth, will solve a pressing social problem and allow our working classes to live a little more comfortably than to augment the gold reserves concentrated in the Bank of Canada's vaults.

The policy that I am now urging upon the government is already being followed by some manufacturers. At St. Grégoire de Montmorency, in my constituency, the Dominion Textile Company employs 2,000 workers. During the first year following my election as representative of these working people, for whom I feel so deeply, I asked the Dominion Textile Company to adopt such a policy, but my appeal brought no result.

The working people of this small town in my constituency live in small houses where, in some instances, three or four families are crowded together. They would be delighted if the government were to adopt a policy such as I have outlined, which would give to each worker his little home and a garden.

In order to solve the social problems which confront us to-day, it is of vital importance that the working man be able to live under conditions which permit him to have, as other social classes have, a home of his own with space around it, where he can breathe freely, and where the sun can penetrate into every room. It is important that he be able to say to his children: I live in a country where it is good to live.

That man, living in such conditions, will hold fast to our national traditions, will cherish all the more the liberty that is ours and will, in such a state of mind, constitute our strongest bulwark against any subversive ideas that may seek to permeate his home.

The present living conditions of our city workers are untenable. It is essential to wipe out the slums in which the working man considers himself an outcast and where his surroundings make him curse the differences which unfortunately exist between men endowed with the same heart, with the same soul.

When selfish industrialists and greedy capital shirk their obligations, it is the duty of the government to come to the rescue with sound and vigorous legislation. This is what I am now asking the government to do.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): The resolution before us reads:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide assistance towards the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress, and for such payments out of moneys appropriated by parliament as may be necessary for all or any of the purposes of the proposed legislation.

One can easily understand the reason for bringing in this measure so far as agricultural distress in the drought areas in the west is concerned, but one can hardly understand the reason for it in relation to the alleviation of unemployment in general.

I wonder if the memory of hon. members is too short to recall the Liberal campaign cries in 1935. I wonder if the general public still remembers the nicely printed cards and flaming bill-boards: "Get off the relief roll; get on the payroll. Vote for us. Get action. King or chaos." Three years have now passed and the poor misguided electorate are still on the relief rolls or on the edge of the payroll. One would think that those responsible for these election cries had some concrete policy in their minds for the relief of unemployment. We have been waiting now for two and a half years for something concrete from this government elected on these promises, and now we are handed a report of a commission!

The three or four hour speech made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) was void of any immediate hope for the unemployed. No reasons for unemployment were given. The minister attempted to take credit on behalf of the government for such increase in employment as has taken place. Very little that this government has done has improved employment in this country. The improvement which started in the regime of the Conservative government has continued in spite of this government.

If a business gets into difficulties a concrete policy for betterment must be formed without delay. The board of directors must take action to get the business out of its difficulties. The shareholders will not allow them to "pass the buck" to some other independent body; the responsibility is theirs. The board of directors call in the heads of the various departments and the experts whom they have at their disposal in an endeavour to clear up the difficulties. They go to work step by step; they do not rush in with some theoretical panacea of foreign trade or such cure-alls and then wait for two and a half years for some outside body to report. If they did so, by that time they would have no business. They recognize that maladjustments must be discovered and corrected step by step. That is what the former Conservative government did. First of all they reestablished the Canadian home market. But the constructive program initiated by that government is well on its way to being wrecked by such action as has been taken by the present government.

Every phase of Canadian unemployment cannot be corrected at once. Canada is a young country. Canada was built up nationally. The forefathers of this country made sacrifices for the privilege of living under the British flag and under British laws and traditions, and to be a nation. The whole plant of Canada—our canals, our roads, our railroads, our water powers, our factories, and now our airways and radio—was built with this object in view. Our forefathers were for Canada first, and they expected us to follow that principle. Our national resources should be for the benefit of Canadians, not only those now living but future Canadians. Our forefathers saw the great possibilities and the potential wealth of this country, and we must recognize these facts if we are to have continued prosperity and economic security in this country. We must use our national plant and our national resources for the benefit of Canadians.

We have to go a step further, and recognize the advantages of empire nationalism. The commonwealth is held together by ties which were recognized by our forefathers. These ties were responsible for creating Canada as a nation in the commonwealth; these ties were responsibile for the building up of the commonwealth. It is right and proper that we should recognize the advantages of using our national plant and national resources for the benefit of the empire and of the British Commonwealth of Nations. Now that the whole world has gone national, it is ridiculous to think that a little country like Canada can hope to survive by sacrificing our home markets and Canadian industries for unstable markets in countries where these ties do not exist.

The government of the day are entrusted with our natural resources; they are trustees of the Canadian market for Canadians. But they have been remiss in their trust. Has Canada's board of directors followed a businesslike course? No. The people expected them to act in a businesslike manner. In the 1935 election, bill-boards and election cards cried out, "Get off the relief roll; get on the payroll; vote Liberal; elect us, you will have action!" When the Liberal party was elected and a new cabinet formed, this new board of directors should have directed all their efforts to constructive action. They should have utilized the machinery, such as the bureau of statistics and their experts, to the fullest extent. They might have utilized their elected members of parliament; but they did not; they set up a commission, which has cost the country two or three hundred thousand dollars. The government passed the buck, they have refused responsibility.

The least I can do is to do something better than the government has done. I wish to make a plea for national unity in the correction of unemployment. The policy of this government, rather than fostering national unity, has to a large extent created disunity. We have discord between one section of the country and another, between classes of labour, between labour and capital, between provincial governments and the federal government. They all have a chip on their shoulder, due to the actions of this government. People in one section of the country are led to believe that prosperity built up in another part of the country, is responsible for the privation and distress of their own section. Banks are blamed; railways are blamed; labour unions are blamed; the weather is blamed for unemployment; but the real blame lies at the door of this government. The people should be brought to realize that prosperity in one part of Canada does not make Canada prosperous; that there is very little chance of one section of the country being prosperous while other parts suffer poverty and distress.

One great difficulty is the enormous increase in federal and provincial debt; another is our tremendous cost of government, resulting in excessive taxation. Everybody wants to work for the government because jobs in industry cannot be had. They are looking for economic security, and that seems to be the only way they can get it. The government must give leadership in the formation of public opinion to correct this overgovernment.

Interest on our enormous public debt must be paid primarily by exports of goods or services which the creditor nations need and must have. No bargaining is necessary here.

Canada must pay in the equivalent of goods or services; there is no other way. Canada cannot afford to buy from foreign countries any more goods or services than are absolutely necessary, as to do so would still further increase our debt and our foreign obligations, and make unemployment greater. In this country we have everything that is necessary for abundant prosperity if only we had good government leadership. Canadians must have an opportunity for production. We have primary producers of many products which deplete our natural resources, such as pulp, paper, minerals, lumber and so on. We have producers of other products which repeat year after year, such as farm products, wheat, cattle, animal products and so on. We have service products in the tourist trade, the insurance business, the railways and so on. We have secondary producers, who are by far the greatest proportion of the population. Through lack of government leadership and also through unfair propaganda, prejudices have been created. One class of industry is sure that help for another industry will be prejudicial and almost an insult to itself. They want protection for themselves and none for others. In no class of industry can continuity of employment be assured without security to the workers in the other classes. The great fundamental fact is that primarily all the great classes engaged in industry, farmers, doctors, lawyers and everyone, require as much of the home market as they can obtain; the more the better, if we want continuity of employment.

The minister touched on almost every phase of the matter but that which is the most important. Our unemployment urgency requires national unity. That phase of this government's policy with respect to the home market, Canada for Canadians, is the phase on which the minister did not touch. Our unemployment urgency requires national action. It might require sectional sacrifice until such time as a proper balance of employment is arrived at in these various classes of industry. Those who are required to make sectional sacrifices should be properly assisted or compensated; this will be cheaper than the cost of relief for the employable unemployed.

Three years now have passed, and at last we have the report of the national employment commission which was set up in 1936. That commission established a statistical branch and went into action. Clerks, stenographers, secretaries, typewriters, adding machines, tabulating machines and so on all went into action in order that the commission could get the information which they have obtained. They collected statistical data. This information is useful and illuminating, and it should continue to be collected and tabulated. I think the bureau of statistics, with its trained staff, could do that work without much added expense. The compilation of all this information could have been carried out by that expert branch of the government without any very great increase in cost. Could not the machinery of the bureau have been used for this purpose, without the expenditure of two or three hundred thousand dollars? In any event a great deal of the information obtained was collected by the bureau. The municipalities carried out the registration and collected most of the information. The interim report of the commission was made in July, 1937. The final report was made in January, 1938, and was printed and tabled a few days ago. Why the delay from January to April? Was there difficulty with the report? Or was the report supervised by the government? Or is it an independent report by an independent commission? Surely in view of the gravity of the situation hon. members were entitled to see this report earlier than the month of April, when it was completed in January.

Having regard to the increasingly large number of unemployed, is that action? It is not. We are told that another commission will have to report on the ways and means of carrying out this report. This is action by commission, but it is not action for the benefit of the employable unemployed. As soon as they were elected in 1935 the government took action, observing that general business conditions were steadily improving and that we were recovering from the effects upon the country of the dumping of goods in 1930, due to the policy of the Liberal government of the day. We were recovering rapidly as a result of the Ottawa agreements and the policy of the Conservative government in enforcing dumping duties. This government, hoping that conditions would continue to improve, referred the Employment and Social Insurance Act to the courts. They did not even repeal the act. The hon. member for Témiscouata endeavoured to do so; but as usual this government passed the buck to the courts, spending thousands of dollars of the taxpayers' money in order to have the act declared ultra vires. They did not take steps to see if the provinces would fall in line and agree that necessary steps should be taken to bring this legislation into force. The provinces would have needed little persuasion at that time, but this government refused to approve this legislation, which had been passed by a Conservative government.

They refused to take action, in spite of their election cry, "Elect a Liberal government and we will be Liberal from coast to coast." Now we know that this cry meant nothing. This act might have been in force to-day with the machinery running smoothly if there had been action on the part of the government. Anybody with foresight could have seen that under our industrial set-up such legislation was necessary for a great many reasons, and now it has been recommended by the national employment commission, but we must wait for another year or so until we get a report from another commission.

Very little credit can be given the government for the improvement in the unemployment situation, but condemnation may be expressed because of their neglect to conserve the home market for Canadian workers. No one can deny that the dumping of Japanese goods, manufactured under a standard of living which is only a fraction of that enjoyed by our workmen, has taken employment from our workers here. The government refused to stop dumping; no action was taken. Canada has not been prosperous as far as her workmen are concerned. Canada's volume of trade is not the indication of the prosperity of the country. Our prosperity is indicated by the prosperity of the individuals throughout the nation, how much they earn each year, not each day or each week. That means how much work has been done. In three years this government has done nothing to increase the continuity of employment. It has given away the home markets of our secondary industries by not stopping dumping. The depression in the United States which started in October, 1937, has been steadily growing worse. That country had high inventories, which had to be liquidated. For the last four or five months these inventories have been liquidating at the expense of Canadian industry. Almost fifty per cent of our imports from the United States were of finished manufactured articles. Therefore I say that this liquidation has been at the expense of our workers. Our imports from the United States have increased, and our exports to that country have decreased. Our balance of trade with them has become increasingly against us.

What action was taken last October, November or December to stop a continuance of these conditions? Where was the imposition of dumping duties? No action has been taken, and yet the government takes credit for having done good work. It takes credit for placing youth in industry. For years it has been obvious that youth training was necessary. It has also been obvious that when conditions warranted, manufacturers would encourage that training. They would encourage it when there was a demand for their goods. It is also obvious that government assistance and cooperation were necessary, and I must say that very little credit is due the government for anything which, on the face of it, is so obvious. When conditions warrant, youth training in industry would increase. But what will happen to the trained youth and the old employees? When the demand for manufactured goods declines, the services of employees will have to be dispensed with. I ask this question: What is the use of training the youth if the manufacturers cannot keep them employed? What has the government done to ensure the continued employment of these people?

What is happening at the present time? They are being laid off, or are being told that they will have to work shorter hours. Thousands of young Canadians are reaching the age where they could take work in the industrial fields. What has the government done to ensure work for them? We know it has refused to impose dumping duties on imported goods. Is that the proper action? The work our workmen should do is being done by United States workmen, in order that some purchaser may save a few cents on the dollar. All this is done at the expense of the Canadian workman, and at a heavy relief cost to the government.

Canadian buyers for Canadian firms have orders from their headquarters not to buy. Business houses, because of the policy of the government, are afraid to make purchases. They realize that the government have followed a policy of doing nothing, and that there is uncertainty with respect to the proposed new agreement with the United States. Nobody knows what conditions may be a short time in the future. I know of four industries in Toronto whose business was so good last October that they were cramped for space. Had those conditions continued, they would have built extensions to their plants at a cost of from $10,000 to $40,000. But a Liberal government was in power, and the uncertainty with respect to tariffs and proposed new treaties discouraged them from building. They had the idle cash ready to use, but they still have it. They have put up a temporary accommodation at a cost of two or three thousand dollars, and Canadian workmen have been deprived of the work they might have had in the larger extensions.

Those companies are keeping their cash, to tide them through the coming depression—and it is coming. Provincial governments, through legislation, are trying to improve wage standards and hours of labour, and these improvements raise production costs. The manufacturer must have protection which protects, or go out of business. Surely he is entitled to a condition whereby he will have fair competition, and protection against dumping. But he knows he will get no action until it is too late. Had action been taken by the government to prevent dumping even as late as last November or December, we would not now be approaching the maelstrom of depression in which the United States now is. Action should be taken right away. Due to the stabilizing effects of the Ottawa agreements passed by the late Conservative government, we might not become involved as deeply as we did in 1930 and 1931. However, if four or five months of dumping takes place, it will take two or three years to recover.

This government is inviting Canada to step into a tail-spin with the United States. In October, November and December, when the indication of recession first became apparent, the urgency for action arose. Was there any action? In the closing months of the last Liberal administration, the early months of 1930, the handwriting of the approaching of the depression was on the wall; but the Liberal government then in power took the same attitude the present government is taking. They had ample warning, and I must add that action is as necessary to-day as it was then.

The condition with respect to employment is getting worse, and something will have to be done. The warning has been given, but there are none so blind as those who will not see. I hope sincerely I am not right in what I cannot help thinking and feeling from the indications, namely, that we are fast approaching another bad depression.

We now have before us the report of the employment commission. An efficient Department of Labour working in cooperation with the minister should have anticipated a great many of these recommendations, and acted upon them. Two and a half years has been lost. There has been a lot of theory, but nothing worth while. To my mind, any atempts which have been made in connection with unemployment, as a result of government action, have had about as much effect as one would bring about by pouring a pail of water into lake Ontario.

Chaos—where did I hear that word? I think the expression "King or chaos" is changing rapidly to "King and chaos." If we do not have proper and constructive action, we shall have much greater chaos than we have to-day.

[Mr. Ross (St. Paul's).]

The people of Canada want work the whole year round. They do not want to work half the year only. Our people want to eat and live decently. Farmers want markets. We know that the best market is the home industrial market, and that the farmer cannot be prosperous unless the industrial worker is prosperous. We must keep our Canadian workmen employed, because relief is repugnant to them. A lack of industrial work means a poor market for the farmer.

This government is doing its best to destroy the home market by refusing to stop dumping into Canada. It is giving work to foreign workmen. It would be better to import the workmen and increase the market for Canadian consumption. By its lack of effective policy in industry it has broken its pledge to the electorate. It has betrayed its trust and shirked its responsibility. The cabinet, the board of directors of the country, should be held responsible for gross negligence in trifling with the livelihood of the workers. It has sacrificed secondary industry for concessions in connection with natural resources. Again I ask this question: Are the workers off the relief rolls and on the payrolls? Have the workers who elected the government been given proper treatment? Those gaily printed cards and flaming billboards should have read: "Get off the payroll and get on the relief roll; King and chaos." The mayors of Ontario are not now making irresponsible threats, as was intimated by the minister a short time ago; they are stating facts.

Mr. J. C. LANDERYOU (Calgary East): Mr. Chairman, it is reports like that of the national employment commission which have created a feeling in the minds of the people of Canada that the setting up of commissions is of little value; for in this report we find that no careful analysis has been made of the situation to ascertain the real causes of unemployment. The three hour speech of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) contained no concrete proposals for the abolition of poverty or the settlement of this great problem of unemployment, and I was consequently not surprised to hear that the provincial premiers, particularly the premier of Ontario, were not satisfied with the results of the employment commission. The premier of Ontario said that the speech of the Minister of Labour was a headline and a headache:

Asked if he had any intimation of the nature of Ottawa's relief program, Mr. Hepburn said: "I must confess I am not in the confidence of the government at Ottawa."

Mr. Hepburn added, "I can't find a concrete program in it, and we are dealing with relief as best we can, having in mind the federal government has withdrawn its support."

Prior to the election the Liberal government promised the people of Canada that if returned to power they would issue money in terms of public need; but now we find that they have curtailed the grants to the provinces, even though many municipalities and provincial governments throughout Canada are bankrupt to-day. We know that these bodies may have their constitutional responsibilities and be responsible for maintaining certain services; They may be responsible constitutionally for maintaining indigent citizens and those who are unemployed; although those who are employable should not be a constitutional responsibility of municipal or provincial governments.

I have gone over the report of the national employment commission, and find in it a table showing municipal indebtedness, that tremendous burden of municipal debt which has so increased taxation that it is now almost impossible for the municipalities to meet their social needs. In 1926 the gross total bonded indebtedness of municipalities in Canada amounted to $1,050,206,121. There had been a substantial increase from year to year, until in 1934 the debt rose to $1,452,850,562.

An analysis of current developments in Canadian municipal finance points to the following facts:

I may say that this was prepared for the dominion conference of mayors at Ottawa in 1936, by H. Carl Goldenberg:

1. The duties and responsibilities of municipalities have increased without a proportionate increase in the power to raise the revenue necessary to meet their new obligations;

2. Having regard to these increasing duties and responsibilities, real property, the principal source of municipal revenue, is no longer an adequate basis of taxation;

3. Declining revenues accompanying diminished assessments and increased rates have necessitated a greater resort to borrowing, thereby increasing still further the charge against real property and discouraging new construction and home ownership;

4. Debt charges and the increasing cost of social services and particularly of unemployment relief are absorbing a continually increasing proportion of annual revenues and are tending to paralyze normal municipal services;

5. Forced economies in current municipal services are resulting in a huge accumulation of deferred maintenance and expansion.

6. Having regard to the heavy burden of debt charges, further economies in ordinary expenditures can afford no material relief to the taxpayers of the municipalities.

We find that the debts of the provincial governments are increasing. The reports show that the debts of the provinces have increased from $813,400,000 in 1925 to a total of $1,622,-100,000 in 1935. The increase in provincial debt between 1925 and 1929 is given as 22 per cent; between 1929 and 1932, 35 per cent; between 1932 and 1935, 21 per cent; and between 1925 and 1935, there was an increase of 99 per cent.

It should be apparent to anyone who has made a careful analysis of the debt structure of Canada that it is becoming impossible for many municipal and provincial governments to carry out their social responsibilities. They may be constitutionally responsible for the maintenance of their indigent citizens and those who are unemployed; but they find themselves financially unable to carry out their constitutional responsibilities, and now the federal government has cut the relief grants.

The Conservative government, when they were elected in 1930, faced a very serious unemployment problem. That problem was due to a large extent to the policies which had been pursued by the previous Liberal administration during their term of office. I admit that the Conservative party attempted to solve the problem, but they found how impossible that was under the present economic system.

The Liberal government promised to end unemployment in a different way. They promised to abolish poverty, to address themselves to the task of abolishing poverty in this dominion, and they were going to do so by the necessary adjustments in our monetary system so that money and credit could be issued to meet the needs of the people. They recognized that usury, once in control, would wreck any nation, and we therefore naturally expected that the Liberal party would at least make a determined effort to solve the problem of unemployment. When the national employment commission was set up two years ago, the people of Canada expected that they would offer some solution of the unemployment problem, but we find on a careful examination of the report that nothing of a constructive nature has been suggested. True, they have attempted to do something for the youth of this country. Training centres have been established for a small percentage of our unemployed youth, but we have heard nothing from the minister and there is nothing contained in the report that would indicate to the members of the house or the people of Canada what the government intend to do for these youth after they have been trained. There are hundreds and hundreds, yea, tens of thousands, of these young people in the various provinces who are not employed and are not in receipt of direct aid from the government, but are being supported by their parents. These young people are in a better position to-day than possibly their parents were before them to contribute to the economic development of Canada, but they are prevented from doing so. No opportunities are afforded them.

I suggest to the minister that he should offer something to the youth of this country; that he should bring in some concrete solution of the youth problem. I know that this will take money. I know that when we suggest a program of public works, or the payment of dividends to the people in order that they may have access to the wealth they are capable of producing, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) and other members of the government bring up the bogey of inflation. When we point out to members of the government that scientists and inventors have laboured for years to free mankind from the nature-imposed necessity of toil; that solar energy is displacing human energy; that the machine has largely displaced man's labour, and contend that, because of these new conditions, dividends be paid to the people and money issued for public works, they cry "inflation;" they reply: "You cannot issue money and credit without having something to back it up." Well, we do not suggest that money and credit should be issued without something to back them up. In this connection, I wish to refer to the world conference of agricultural economists which was held at St. Andrews, Scotland, in 1936. I shall quote two or three paragraphs from a synopsis of the proceedings:

> Problems of consumption of agricultural products were dealt with by E. P. Cathcart, professor of physiology, University of Glasgow, who treated the problems from the nutritional or physiological standpoint, and by R. B. Forrester, University College of Wales, who attacked the problem from the economic point of view. Those taking part in the discussion included F. L. MacDougal, Australia House, London; E. H. M. Lloyd, Market Supply Committee, London; F. Von Bulow, International Labour Office, Geneva; Hazel K. Stiebeling, Bureau of Home Economics, Washington, D.C.; M. K. Bennett, Food Research Institute, Stanford University, California; and S. Schmidt, University of Cracow, Poland.
> The general feeling expressed in the discussion was of the need for increased consumption, both from the standpoint of solving the agricultural marketing problem and from the sociological point of view. Means considered for bringing this about included, (1) increased real purchasing power for the masses; (2) decreased costs; (3) social measures.

[Mr. Landeryou.]

Thus we find that some of the leading agricultural economists of the world, gathered together at St. Andrews, Scotland, have recognized that we have already solved the problem of production and that there is a tremendous surplus of goods in practically every country of the world, and they have suggested that in order to get rid of this tremendous surplus of goods we must increase the real purchasing power of the masses, and by "increasing the real purchasing power of the masses," they meant increasing the amount of money in their possession. For we know what holds true of the world holds true of the Dominion of Canada. We have in this country a surplus of commodities and are capable of producing unlimited supplies if only we will make available sufficient credits for production, if only we will use the idle labour and the unused machinery so that goods can be produced. We know there are no people on earth who have more natural resources per capita than are contained within the boundaries of this country. We know there is no physical reason why there should be in this dominion such a condition as obtains at the present time, no real justification for the paradox of starvation in the midst of plenty. All we suggest is that Canada be developed for the Canadian people, and that the flaws in our economic system which have created the situation that now obtains be corrected. We believe that before reforms in our social or economic life are possible, our monetary system must be adjusted to reflect the truth of our productive capacity; it must really reflect our collective ability to produce and distribute wealth.

I remember that two years ago I directed a question to the Minister of Labour. I asked him whether in his opinion it would ever be possible under the present system to put all the employable unemployed back to work. He read a quotation from a book written by Thomas Carlyle in 1841, wherein Carlyle stated that he had no magic pills to correct the ills of his day, and the minister added, "I will say to the hon. member that I have no magic pills to correct the evils that obtain to-day." I do not place much value on magic pills; but I say that the Minister of Labour should by this time have made a careful analysis of our economic system so that he could tell the people exactly what is wrong; that it is the uncontrolled manipulation of our present monetary system by private individuals which has created these conditions, and that in order to do away with this circumlocutory system which exists we must cease going to private bankers and private money lenders and borrowing at interest money which is paid back to them time and time again. As the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) has pointed out, provincial governments, municipalities and private citizens have borrowed money, paid it back, and yet find themselves owing as much or more than the amount they originally borrowed. The same thing holds true of many other countries. In New Zealand the prime minister, speaking with respect to the functions of governments and bankers, says:

> They were not going to run the banking system of New Zealand. He was not a banker. His job was to outline the policy that would solve the problems facing New Zealand and the job of the bankers was to provide credit and currency sufficient to give effect to the will of parliament. Otherwise the banker was master and not the representative of the people.
> Away back in 1879 they raised cash in New Zealand to the extent of £4,364,000 and fifty years later they were owing £5,599,000 odd. They had been paying interest on the original sum for over half a century and they owed more than at the beginning.

I want now to place on Hansard a statement made at the time that Thomas Carlyle was writing his book, a statement made by Sir Robert Peel, Prime Minister of Great Britain from 1841 to 1846. He remarked that increased demand for manufactures would only increase machine power, and Punch at that time, nearly one hundred years ago, showed great prophetic vision when it commented upon Sir Robert Peel's remarks as follows:

> Machinery in its progress has doubtless been the origin of a terrible calamity. It has made the strong man so much live lumber. But as we cannot go back and must go on it is for statesman and philosopher to prepare for the crisis that is as sure as the morning light. How, when machinery is multiplied as it will be, a thousandfold; how, when tens of thousands of hands are made idle by the ingenuity of the human mind; how, when comparatively speaking there shall be no labour for men; will the multitude lie down and unrepining die? We think not. We are not sure. There will rise—and already we hear the murmur—a cry, a shout for the adjustment of interests, a shout that, hard as it is, will strike upon the heart of Mammon and make the spoiler tremble. We put this question to Sir Robert Peel: If all labour done by man were suddenly performed by machine power, and that power in the possession of some thousand individuals, what would be the cry of the race? Would not the shout be "Share, share"? The steam engine, despite themselves, must and will carry statesmen back to first principles. As it is, machinery is a friend to the poor; the time will come when it will be a beneficent angel.

We know how impossible it is for individuals who are unemployed, yet employable, to find work to-day. When they knock on the doors of industry they are told that sufficient is already being produced without their labour, and we know to-day that industry is unable to sell its products. Indeed, industrialists have resorted to selling products on what is known as the instalment plan. All the wonderful production of our machines we find placed on the market, a dollar down, and a dollar or a dollar and a half a week, or whatever it may be. If industry cannot sell its goods to-day without resorting to such methods, what is the use of increasing production? Industrialists realize that it is of no use increasing production unless you increase the purchasing power of the masses. I have here what has been suggested by a business man in the United States, a man who recognizes that the purchasing power of the people must be increased if we are ever going to be able to buy the products of industry:

> The generosity of Harvey Gravell, wealthy Pennsylvania manufacturer, has won him friends, praise, and publicity. Last New Year's he gave $90,000 to his employees, so they could pay off all their debts. This Christmas he is giving a $300 bonus to every woman in the family of one of his workers—a total Christmas present of $75,000. "I think the little woman contributes much to her husband's success and deserves a reward." Having made many friends on most front pages, manufacturer Gravell now pops this plan out to his large audience: The government give an annual dividend of $250 to every registered voter in America. That sounds a bit wacky, such open-handed giving away of money, but Mr. Gravell goes on to tell you what happens to your money anyway, and then his plan does not sound so nutty. As it works now, I put my money in a bank for safekeeping, the bank lends my money to the government, then to pay interest to the bank the government taxes me to pay interest on my own money. Who is loony now?

Many hon. members on the opposite side have been talking about this $25 dividend. They think it is remarkable that a government should declare that a dividend can be paid to its people. But I say this—and I say it without fear of contradiction from the minister himself—that it is financially possible to give every citizen in this country a $25 dividend. He may question the soundness of such a course; he may suggest that it would destroy the morale of the people or that it might encourage laziness; he might put up some such argument. I do not believe there is any question in the minister's mind about the physical possibility of providing goods and services to back up such a sum of money; and this is not remarkable when one considers that financial institutions, banks particularly, through the shareholders who associate themselves together, producing nothing themselves, are able to pay handsome dividends. If they are able to do that, why should it be deemed remarkable that the government of a province—the government of Alberta, for example—should suggest to the people of that province that by associating together and controlling their own credit and producing wealth, and being prepared to produce it, they could pay dividends to themselves. We know that it would take an increase in the amount of money to pay dividends to the people; but we know that precautions can be taken to prevent the evils of inflation, and we know also that the velocity of circulation would possibly increase and that it would not take as much as many believe it would to pay a dividend of $25 to every citizen in Canada. We know that if the people of this country were prepared to support the issue of dividends by their willingness to render services and produce wealth, such dividends are possible in this country.

We know that thousands of fishermen on both coasts are on relief; that thousands of fruit growers are not putting in new trees because they are unable to sell the fruit from the trees they have; that our lumber industry has slowed down; that our cement plants are closed or running part time; that our mines in the west are not turning out all the coal which could be produced; that we are not utilizing all the power which is developed in Canada to-day or taking steps to utilize our natural resources to the extent that is possible if our system of economics were properly ordered. We know that physically it is possible to provide the citizens of Canada with a high standard of living, but the present financial system prevents this. People are turning from the present monetary system, realizing that they cannot borrow themselves into prosperity or tax themselves into prosperity.

I turn for a moment to the housing problem. I know that the government attempted to put men back to work by encouraging the erection and repair of homes. Fifteen million dollars have been borrowed from the banks, but what does that amount to in comparison with the tremendous need of housing facilities in this country? Fifteen million dollars could be spent in Montreal alone in slum clearance, and the mess would not be cleared up. I expected, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said before the election that money would be appropriated for a national housing scheme, that money would be issued by the Bank of Canada in sufficient amount really to solve this problem. But that did not take place. On the contrary, an agreement was entered into with the private banks whereby $50,000,000 could be loaned to the people of Canada at a rate of 6·32 per cent interest, although in the great republic to the south and in New Zealand money for this purpose is provided at four per cent and less. Not only did we allow the private banks to collect 6·32 per cent interest, adding to the private debts of this country, but we guaranteed them against loss up to $15,000,000. The government is throwing the responsibility for the unemployed upon the individual citizens of the country, asking them to go further into debt without assuring them that the government is taking steps to remove this paradox of starvation in the midst of plenty.

I hope the news we hear is true, namely that the minister intends to bring down a bill which will provide for more than a mere alleviation of the situation, for something of a permanent nature, a real attack on this problem. If he engages in a scheme of public works, and if other departments of the government encourage industry, develop foreign trade, explore every possible avenue to improve the employment situation, I believe that it will not be necessary to carry on such public works indefinitely; that the time will come when public works can slacken off, because these men will become absorbed in industry. But until such time as industry is able to absorb all the unemployed who are employable, it is the duty and responsibility of the government to provide for their needs —and not with borrowed money. It is time for the government to take over the issue and control of money, not to wait for seven years or for any other period. It is not sufficient to have control of fifty-one per cent of the shares of the Bank of Canada, or to have the power to appoint a majority of the board of directors. What we want is a government which will change the policy of that bank, and take control of the issue of money and credit and so order it that there will be sufficient for those who need it in industry, and sufficient purchasing power in the hands of the people to enable them to buy the products of industry and the services which can be rendered by the citizens of Canada to each other.

The minister referred to relief rates. He said the employment commission had recommended that some of these rates be cut down.

The CHAIRMAN: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time is exhausted.

Mr. LANDERYOU: It will take me just one moment more, Mr. Chairman. I want to refer to the relief rates which are paid in these municipalities, and which the minister stated were competing with wage rates. I ask the minister if he will place on record the relief rates paid that are competing with wages, the highest relief scale paid anywhere in Canada, and the relief rates in force at present in the two largest cities of each province in Canada. If he will do that, we shall be able to make a comparison and see just in what areas the relief rates are competing with wage rates, because such a situation does not speak well for conditions in Canada, nor does it speak well for the record of this government.

Mr. R. J. DEACHMAN (Huron North): I found the report of the national employment commission particularly interesting. The last six pages are a mine of useful information on the distribution of the national income in the Dominion of Canada. As I turned over the pages of the report to-day, I noticed this peculiar fact, that the civil service now takes 1·52 per cent of the national income, which is thirty-eight per cent more than in 1926. Then I turned back to page 110, the last page of the report, which seems to be the natural place for them to put the farmer, and I found that after adjusting the gross figure to the net, the farmers' income now constitutes only 7·5 per cent of the national income. So, if in Canada we had five times as many civil servants as we have, they would be receiving a total income greater than that of the 728,000 farmers who produce so much of the national wealth of the dominion.

Let us turn back and look over these pages, because they reveal some very interesting things about the distribution of our national income. The other day I mentioned that the wages of money had declined; in fact, the wages of money and the earnings of the farmer apparently are the only two things in the dominion which have declined in the last few years. The wages of money, or the real value to the receiver of interest, stood at 100 in 1926, and according to this report it had dropped to 97·8 in 1936. I mentioned the income of the civil servant, based upon the proportion which he took of the national wealth; but when we come to the purchasing power in 1926 dollars of the average earnings of the civil servant of to-day, we find that he or she is getting 24·6 per cent more than he or she received in 1926. In the average earnings of the manufacturing industry the change is not so great. Based upon the 1926 level the worker receives 108·6; but, as is usually the case during a period of relatively hard times, the salaried gentlemen, the brass hats of industry, are drawing 12·1 per cent more than in 1926. In regard to the employees of the railroads, their rate is 17·4 per cent above the 1926 level. At no time since that year have they fallen to the 1926 level, and for the last three years their figure has stood, first at 114·4, or fourteen per cent above the 1926 level; than 11·7 per cent above and now 17·4 per cent above. In regard to the farmers I mentioned that their income had fallen to 7·5 per cent of the total national income; but if we turn to the purchasing power of 100 units of farm products we find that on the basis of 1926 equalling 100 they paid 144·2 for 100 units of manufactured goods in 1932. In 1933 they paid 137; in 1934 the figure stood at 124. Now it has dropped to 106·1.

I wonder where the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) is. I should think this would appeal to him. He was cradled on the sheaf carrier of a Massey-Harris binder. He is familiar with these implements. He ought to be in intense sympathy with the farmers in Canada to-day. He has a face which indicates that at least he has some of the milk of human kindness, even though he did not come from a farm. But this much is certain; when he looks at these figures he sees the condition of agriculture growing worse, while industry manages to keep up. I often wonder why these men who have been so closely associated in an indirect way with agricultural industry, do not pause to reflect upon the conditions existing to-day. I wonder why they fail to realize that the greatest thing that could possibly happen for manufacturing and industry of every kind in Canada is not, as the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) said to-night with upraised hands—Stop dumping; do not let goods come in, but keep everything out. Rather it is that there should be a larger measure of freedom of exchange, so that the farmer might exchange the products which he produces for the products of the manufacturer. Thus we could restore industry once more to a normal balance.

What are we doing in regard to this question of unemployment? It strikes me that everything we have done since 1930 has been done with the idea of causing unemployment rather than curing it. I suggest that we attack the problem from a slightly different angle. We have been making a frontal attack; we have attempted to cure unemployment by digging up jobs for men, which is just about as good a means of causing unemployment as one could possibly devise. I suggest that we move a little to the rear, or to the right or left flank, and see if we cannot make an attack from an angle different from anything we have had before. The remedies we have tried, as I have stated, are all specific causes of unemployment. What are they? Well, in 1930 we started with higher tariffs, and we continued with higher tariffs in 1931 and 1932. In 1933 we were still keeping them up; the same was true in 1934 and 1935, and we are still a long way from reducing them sufficiently to meet the situation existing to-day. Not only did we use tariffs; we used embargoes and restrictions. In fact, for a number of years the house has carried out the policy which was laid down a few years ago by the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), who was then also in opposition, when he said:

> All we endeavour to do, Mr. Speaker, is by every legislative means within our power, to use the words of a great Englishman, and with the tools that are in our hands, whether they be tariffs, regulations, bonuses, drawbacks, or bounties, to bend our efforts to one purpose and one purpose only, namely, to make the Canadian people a strong and virile nation, developing their own resources to the limit of their ability and thus become entirely economically independent of foreigners, whoever they may be or wherever they may be found.

If that is not running pretty close to the gospel of absolute exclusion, so far as trade is concerned, then I do not know what it is.

What did we do with the problem? Having blocked the channels of trade, restricted imports, checked national development, expanded the deficits on our railways and increased unemployment, we had to find more money. And so the sales tax of one per cent in 1930 moved up to four per cent in 1931. Then it went to six per cent in 1932. Meanwhile, in the ranks of the army of restriction the sales tax had been joined by a one per cent excise tax in 1931, and a three per cent excise tax in 1932. The three per cent tax was cut to one and a half per cent in 1934. In 1936 we reached the peak, with an eight per cent sales tax.

I now come to the practical suggestion I wish to make in regard to a solution of the unemployment problem. We have tried all these remedies; we have tried tariffs and taxes and public works of different kinds. Public works are only another means of creating unemployment, and the more money we spend upon them, unless they are real, productive public works, the more unemployment we shall have. I suggest to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) a striking and bold course. We have an eight per cent sales tax. Each one per cent of the sales tax takes $18,000,000 from the Canadian people, so far as the revenue of the country is concerned. But as the sales tax is pyramided, each additional one per cent will carry with it an additional pyramided tax—I do not know how much, but possibly one half of one per cent. In other words, when we have a sales tax of eight per cent, by the time it reaches the consumer it takes from the Canadian people approximately twelve per cent.

Let us reduce the sales tax boldly, at one stroke, by three per cent. Measuring it only as a payment of revenue, that would give a total of $54,000,000 to be added as purchasing power of the Canadian people. But allowing for the fact that it is pyramided, it would give an expansion of $80,000,000 of purchasing power to the people. Would not an addition of that much purchasing power improve business conditions in Canada?

Do hon. members think that by an expansion of public works or by the building of highways over which very little traffic would pass they could attain the improvement which would come through the remission of taxes? Do hon. members realize that public works—highways, or whatever they may be—unless they have an exchange value with the Canadian people more than equivalent to the cost of production, bring about a condition whereby, with every dollar expended upon them, you are decreasing instead of increasing the total volume of employment in Canada?

Further, by a reduction of the sales tax you spread the benefits over the whole nation; it is diffused. It is of more benefit that the construction of a road in some remote spot in northern Ontario. It is not spent on a useless building in a city, or on a public institution. It is something which is diffused throughout the nation, from the farthest point in British Columbia clean down to the maritime provinces. Would that not add to the volume of business throughout the dominion? Would that not improve conditions? "Oh, but," you say, "it will lead to a deficit!" Yes, it may—or it may not. It might lead to such an improvement in business that the deficit would be overcome. But if you expend the money in any other way, what do you do? You have a deficit, the only distinction being that you have practically nothing for that deficit, whereas by the plan I suggest there would be an improvement in business conditions throughout the nation. Not only is the benefit diffused throughout the whole area, but it reaches every class in the community. Of what value is a public building, or a highway in the north, to the farmers in my constituency who are drawing such a small share of the national income? I speak for the farmers in my own constituency, of course, but when I do so I speak for all farmers in Canada. How can you help them in any way other than the one I have suggested?

My method would reach not only the farmer, but the manufacturer, because the manufacturers are always talking about increased volume, and I believe there is something in the argument that increased volume of business brings about lowered costs, enabling them to meet competition and to increase the extent of their business.

Let us for a moment consider the table of the national income. At page 22 we find a comparison of the national incomes of Canada and the United States. This has been prepared on the basis of an index number. If one takes that index number and looks down both sides of the table he finds that in almost every year the national income in Canada is at a relatively higher point than it is in the United States. All their efforts to improve the conditions of the people of that country by a reckless and generous expenditure of money have fallen flat. Without that reckless expenditure in Canada we have made more relative progress than they are making. I venture to say that anyone reading the records as they affect the United States to-day will be convinced that they stand in a much more dangerous and uncertain position than we do. They have more unemployment, more unrest and more trouble, by far, than there have been in Canada. I attribute a great measure of the difference to a saner attitude on the part of Canadian labour; but undoubtedly one of the chief factors has been the sounder basis we followed in Canada during those years when we had lower tariffs, permitted a greater volume of increase in our export and import trade, and thus helped in the development of the nation.

In the United States to-day they have recovered only 64 per cent of their 1929 level of export trade, while we have recovered 94 per cent. To-day the leader of the reconstruction party (Mr. Stevens) mentioned the fact that he did not expect a development of trade to cure the problem. Well, the hon. member was always a pessimist. Back in 1936 he said the same thing, because I find that at page 1825 of Hansard he used these words:

> Here again we have an indication that the government is resting its hope of a solution of the Canadian economic and social problem of to-day upon the time when there will be a normal revival of trade.

He was pessimistic then. The export trade of Canada at that time was valued at $838,000,000, and it is now $1,124,000,000, or an increase of over 30 per cent since 1935. We are making progress.

Let us turn to the comparison of national incomes, as it is set out at page 110 of the report. In this connection there is a problem I should like to place before the committee. In 1936 our national income was stated to be $4,062,000,000. But the price level is now down to 80, so that with an income of $4,062,000,000 the purchasing power on the basis of the present price level is equal to the purchasing power of a national income of $4,930,000,000 in 1926. So that, actually, in purchasing power our income to-day is higher than it was in 1926. Will the committee tell me why we are not as prosperous to-day as we were then? I have the answer, and I think it is a sound one: It is because we are taking too much from the Canadian people in taxation, because our tax rate is higher than our capacity to bear, and because the tax rate is bearing down so hard on industry that, unless we reduce it in some way, we cannot hope to make the progress we ought to make.

I am going to quote one or two distinguished examples of men who hold a similar view. Take Henry Ford. He is the one outstanding manufacturer on the American continent who has recognized the fact that there are times when the best course is to strike out boldly, take the risk of a deficit, lower your price to the point where profits vanish, and trust to the increase in sales to make good.

There is another outstanding example, the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, the Bell Telephone Company here. They extended their lines, entered new territory; then they proceeded to develop their service at a lower cost, and they have given singularly efficient service at a reasonable price.

From the political standpoint the policy I suggest was always the policy of Gladstone, to look forward to expanding trade, to the development of the commerce of the nations of the world, and I ask this government and the Minister of Labour, and I would ask the Minister of Finance if he were here, to take their courage in their hands and strike out boldly. Remove three per cent from the top level of the sales tax. Knock off the old excise tax, which is a tariff in disguise, and if there is anything in national economy that is contemptible, it is a tax disguised and called one thing when it is really another. Going a little further, lower these impossible tariff barriers the first time the opportunity comes along, and that, to my mind, will be in the next budget. Going forward from that, we can have faith and courage, because we shall know we are on the right road and are on a sound basis. Then Canada will prosper because it has the men and the physical characteristics which make the men who know how to produce goods if only they are given the opportunity.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Chairman, in rising to take part in this debate relative to unemployment and agricultural distress, I do so with a full recognition of the problems that are involved in these two questions, which make us realize that they are of transcendant importance to the people of Canada as a whole. I believe the vast majority of the people of Canada are of the opinion that the problems of agricultural distress and unemployment, touching as they do the very roots of agriculture and industry, should receive prior consideration over any other problems with which the house is called upon to deal. Nothing short of a deliberate plan, a sustained attempt and concerted action on the part not only of governments, but also of the Canadian people cooperating with governments, will make any effective headway in a solution of these problems with which we are faced.

Members of this committee will recall being in the house in 1936 when the national employment commission was launched into action. Whatever may have been the motivating influences so far as the government was concerned, there was the transfer of this responsibility from the shoulders of the government to the shoulders of the commission it appointed. Whether it may have been an advisory commission or whether it may have had some administrative powers as well, the public, rightly or wrongly, gained the impression and had the belief that in the setting up of this commission there lay some hope of the unemployment problem being solved through its efforts and that of the government itself. They felt that ways and means might be found through the work of the commission for curing the cancer which had grown up in our body economic and in our body politic.

As a new member of this house I was greatly impressed with the possibilities of the commission when it was first appointed. I, along with other members on the opposition side of the house, was willing to give the commission a fair chance; but we all realized this, that in any cooperative effort the responsibility actually lay upon the shoulders of the government itself, and, Mr. Chairman, it must still lie there.

Statistics, of course, form a valuable foundation from which the problem may be attacked, but statistics themselves will not solve the problem. The problem cannot be solved on any such narrow ground as that, and we are still awaiting satisfactory results from the appointment of this commission by the government.

The speech of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), eloquent and well delivered as it was, and most interesting so far as its facts were concerned, should have been in my opinion the cornerstone upon which this nation through the government might have built its unemployment and agricultural distress policy. But I must admit, with all due regard for the Minister of Labour himself, that I was not able to find in it in any plain terms a governmental policy which would be worth while in solving either of these two problems which we have in our midst, and I think everyone found it impossible to find in the detailed account of his speech in Hansard any real solution or any real policy which would go far to remedying our agricultural distress and our unemployment problems.

May I say that it was not very encouraging to me or to the people of Canada, I believe, to hear the Minister of Labour say that, after all, unemployment insurance and the other social legislation which we have been expecting for some considerable time since this government took office would have to wait until such time as the commission on dominion-provincial relations would report to the house. In sporting circles they call that sort of thing shadow boxing, and for want of a better term I am going to apply that description to the minister's efforts with respect to the matters he dealt with in his address.

There is seldom any real reason for the appointment of the commissions we have had since I came into the house. We are sent down here by the people as their representatives, some of us to govern the country, and some to assist in that government by way of criticism and other activities. But, in addition to being sent down here, we are paid by the people to do that job. If that job is too big for the government and the elected representatives of the people of this dominion, then it is our bounden duty to see to it that the people know it, and know it soon, because we have no right to expect them to pay twice for the government they are sending us down here to give.

I pay this compliment to the Minister of Labour and the government and the members of the House of Commons, that I believe there are just as good brains and just as great a capacity and intelligence in this house as on any of the commissions which so far I have seen appointed in Canada. The commission form of government is, in my opinion, open to two or three grave objections. One objection I should like to note is that the commission is too far removed from the people themselves. The second is that there is the great danger, of which we have ample evidence, of serious delay in the presenting of its report, and this commission is no exception in that regard.

In addition, there is always the possibility that a government may attempt to still criticism against it by referring to the fact that the matter is under consideration by a commission which will report in due course. One commission dealing with a subject of this kind is bad enough; but when there are two commissions whose reports must be waited for, that is going just a little too far as regards the commission form of government in this country. There used to be in Toronto a belt line railway. Perhaps a number of hon. members will remember that old railway which went around the city. You got on at one point, paid your fare and made a circle right around until you arrived back where you started. Riding on these old street-cars, you had, when you came back to that original point, to pay another fare or get off. So far as this government's policy with respect to unemployment and agricultural distress is concerned, I would liken it in some respects to the old belt line railway. When the people of Canada have taken that circular ride and come back to the original starting point, they will not pay the fare; they will not get off; but they will change the motorman and the conductor who are running the line.

Pursuing this analogy a little further, may I point out this sequence. Prior to the election of 1935, the Liberal party sought a mandate to cure these cancers in our economic and political body. They received that mandate in the election of 1935. They then proceeded to form a government. The government decided to appoint a national employment commission. Then the national employment commission started to work. Afterwards, before the report of that commission was brought down, we had another commission, the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations, but still no report. Later there came the report of the national employment commission, which represents the stage we are at to-day. Now we are asked to wait until the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations has made its report before any real, strategic move can be made to deal with this great problem. I predict that when the Rowell commission's report has come in, the government will again meet and discuss it; a decision will be arrived at that nothing can be done about this question until the people have been again consulted, and another election will be upon us. In other words, we will have travelled all around the circle of the old belt line with regard to unemployment and agricultural distress, and will be back exactly at the place we were when we started out.

The report of the national employment commission does not, in my opinion, present a true picture of our national difficulties. Few hon. members represent a constituency more normally prosperous or better balanced than that of Peel.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GRAYDON: I shall except the constituencies of all those gentlemen who have said, "Oh, oh". The condition of the people in the constituency I represent shows the scars of unemployment and agricultural distress and the depression in general to an extent which I confess I do not like to see. I shall hand to the Minister of Labour to-night a few photographs taken in a southern part of the constituency of Peel, showing some of the housing conditions with which we are faced in a township at the lower end of that constituency. These pictures were given to me by an unemployed man who has been on relief for quite a long time. The visits which most of us have made from time to time to these poorer homes have familiarized us with conditions in a much more vivid way than the figures and statements of the national employment commission could possibly do.

Few hon. members live more closely in contact with the working man and his family than I do. If I were given to boasting I think I would boast about my position in that regard; for only those who day by day, week by week, and year by year are up against the facts of unemployment and the consequences which follow in homes and communities affected by it, can really understand the nature and magnitude of the problem. As one sees day after day the effects of the depression, I often wonder, great as were the trouble and distress inflicted on the country by the great war, whether the scars and wounds of that struggle were so very much worse than those which have been left by this tremendous depression which has struck not only Canada but the world at large. One can hardly view such conditions and go into homes where such conditions are to be found without having brought to mind the words uttered by Abraham Lincoln after having seen a female negro slave sold in one of the southern slave markets of the United States. What he said to himself at that time, as subsequently recorded by a great historian, was, "If I ever have a chance to hit this thing I will hit it hard". And he hit it hard, so hard that he saw the end of slavery in the United States before his life was tragically cut short in the president's chair years after. So I say to this government and to the Minister of Labour that this problem is ours. It is our job and a bounden duty we must discharge to hit it hard, hit it soon, and hit it often.

But the employment commission's report does not deal with all the major matters which are confronting us in this respect. Low wages have had a most undermining effect upon our morale and upon the condition of the people. Surely it is not expecting too much of a young and promising country such as this to see to it that everybody in the land shall have a decent living wage; that they shall have decent homes in which to live, a goodly measure of life's blessings, and some security in their old age. But there is no help for the low wage man in the national employment commission's report. I say to the Minister of Labour that people of that unfortunate class richly deserve something more at the hands of the government.

Before I come to a discussion of unemployment insurance and a national minimum wage scheme, I desire to make reference to the phase of the report which was a majority recommendation, advocating dominion administration of relief. As I said in the earlier part of my address, there are difficulties, serious difficulties, in respect of employment in some parts of the riding which I have the honour to represent. I notice that the report of the commission goes so far as to recommend in general terms that something more should be done by the dominion government towards taking a fair share of the load of responsibility of relief payments; it goes so far as to suggest that relief payments might be taken over by the dominion government in cooperation with a national unemployment insurance scheme. I am quite conscious of the possibilities in regard to the national government taking over the entire cost of relief. I can see, of course, possibilities perhaps of extravagance in administration. But surely it should be possible in Canada to place adequate checks on such a course and to see to it that the dominion government bears its proper share of the relief burden in this land, following out the terms of the report of the national employment commission. If these safeguards can possibly be made, the dominion should see to it that the municipalities are relieved of the burden which they are now struggling to carry.

We in this parliament from time to time vote large sums of money in connection with relief in western Canada. I do not believe that many of us would care to offer a word of opposition to this or of criticism to other parts of Canada, or would refuse to assist those parts which are in distress; for I am confident that the money is, in most instances, sorely needed. But I would point out to the minister and the government that emergent circumstances exist in other sections than western Canada. In some of the municipalities of which I have personal knowledge, the relief cost has become so great that actually the home and farm owner cannot bear the burden very much longer. It is no longer possible for men to sell real estate, at any rate in some sections of the province from which I come, especially in some of the urban or semi-urban municipalities, because no one wants to be burdened with the land and to pay the high taxes. Great sections of these semi-urban municipalities find themselves with plenty of land on their hands as a result of tax sales. In the township of Toronto in my district there were 1,200 people on relief in the month of March of this year. The taxpayers there are shouldering a burden which is now practically unbearable. I am told that during this spring the ordinary road work, which hitherto has been available in consequence of the provincial government's usual policy, is not likely to be had to the same extent as last spring. That increases the intensity of the problem itself. It has been suggested in some quarters—at any rate it is the information I have received—that many of the employable people on relief may have to be cut off or the mill rate of the municipality of Toronto township will have to be increased.

The minister, fair-minded as he is in regard to these matters, will see that either of these alternatives must be avoided if at all possible. There is a growing feeling throughout Canada, especially in many municipalities which are subject to these conditions, that the dominion government is not bearing its proper proportion of the relief burden. Not only is that feeling prevalent in the municipalities and generally throughout the dominion, but the premier of Ontario has also said that he holds the same view, and that almost makes it unanimous as far as I can see.

Sharing the views of the working men of my riding and of the dominion at large, I cannot refrain from expressing their keen regret that no provision has been made this session for a scheme of unemployment insurance or for some national minimum wage legislation. I have been hoping against hope that some time during this parliament something would be done. At the beginning of the first session I hoped that there would be some legislation in this connection, and at the second session I still hoped that something would be done. Now we are in the third session of the eighteenth parliament of Canada and no serious attempt is being made to put through an unemployment insurance measure. True, some negotiations have been carried on, but I say to the Minister of Labour in all sincerity that, in my opinion, he is not a very good salesman in relation to the provinces. If he were, he would have been able to sell the unemployment insurance scheme to at least some of the friends of his own party who do not seem able to agree with the terms of the proposal. No good salesman is ever discouraged so easily. I suggest to the minister that during the Easter recess he go back to the provinces and see if some measure of unemployment insurance, yes, and a minimum wage scheme as well, cannot be evolved which will be satisfactory to the dominion government and to the provinces, who now seem dissatisfied with the proposals made by this administration.

Back in 1919 unemployment insurance was mentioned in the platform of the Liberal party. I was glad to see that platform include unemployment insurance; but all through the years, from 1921 to 1930, no steps were taken to shift the unemployment insurance plank out of the Liberal platform and put it into the statute books of the dominion and to keep it there. During that time there was evidence of high wages, plenty of money, and so on, and apparently industry, labour and the government were in a position to contribute to an extent that they have not been since. But all through those years that golden opportunity was allowed to pass without being taken advantage of. May I say that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) must now be criticized for the course he took at that time, because opportunity knocks only once at the national door, and it was not opened on those occasions. In 1935 unemployment insurance legislation was initiated by the late Conservative government, and while they were criticized in many respects, one thing among others stands to their credit: They at least put an unemployment insurance scheme on the statute books for the benefit of the working man.

We have allowed two and a half years to go by since this government came into power. During that time there have existed conditions which, in consequence of armament programs and other international factors, have increased our trade and brought to fruition some of our hopes with regard to expanding business; and during some part of that period the industrial purse and the working man's purse would have been better able, than in the previous five years, to afford contributions to an unemployment insurance scheme. But after that experience of this period of mild prosperity the prospects are none too good for the immediate future, and still we are without the benefits of an unemployment insurance scheme in Canada.

I impress upon the Minister of Labour to-night, with all the earnestness and emphasis of which I am capable, the great importance of this matter to the national welfare and especially to the workers of Canada. May I point out to him that by the time the Rowell commission reports and the report is considered, and by the time the next election is held, it may be too late to bring in an effective scheme of unemployment insurance. I suggest that he give the most earnest consideration to this matter. May I go further. I have not yet been able to conceive why the Rowell commission was appointed only last year, because the same problems were facing us two years ago. The same problems that were facing us then are facing us now, but two precious years have elapsed and nothing has been done.

I attach no blame to the Minister of Labour as some may do, for bringing in other questions of national affairs and other matters in regard to unemployment, because all these things are in large measure bound up in one parcel. But when he states that the policies of this government are responsible for such expanding trade and increase of business as we have experienced, I respectfully disagree with him. I think there is no hon. member of this committee but would say that if the stimulus given to trade and business by the great rearmament programs throughout the world were taken away, any improvement which has resulted from the policies of this government would be a mere drop in the bucket.

We have in Canada fertile agricultural areas, great industrial centres, the basis of great primary industries, and an aggressive, ambitious and forward looking people. In other words, the Canadian people have all the material and equipment with which to work. All we need is leadership and a restoration of cooperative effort between governments and the people. A people working hand in hand with governments would stimulate a virile national pride in this country's future the value of which could not be overestimated. To accomplish this, confidence must be restored in Canadian governmental institutions. This will come about quickly if the government moves forward to do something definitely helpful for the people it governs. Without mentioning all the things which might be done in addition to those I have already dealt with to-night, because time does not permit, I suggest that we proceed at once to cut down drastically the cost of government. Further than that, we should abolish government by commissions. We should live within our means and commence to retire our national debt. In addition we must lift the intolerable burden of taxation from the centre of our national life, the home. And not the least, we should abolish these nuisance taxes which irritate the people beyond measure. We should courageously attack the glaring abuses in our capitalistic system. We should preserve the home market for and advance the interests of the farmers and agricultural sections of our country. We must promote and preserve the jobs of the working people in Canadian industry. Also we should set out immediately upon a five year plan of national development and economic rehabilitation with the object of making Canada the best governed and most prosperous country in the world.

In conclusion, let us be prepared as a nation, and as individuals and communities and governments, to undertake a concentrated offensive against our national shortcomings and problems. We would then command the confidence of every class of our citizens, which is so essential. We would then discharge our obligations to the farmer, the working man, the man in business and the youth of our country. We would eliminate sectionalism completely and create a national spirit of unity which would make Canada what it should be, the envy of the civilized world.

Mr. E. J. POOLE (Red Deer): Once again we have before the committee Canada's greatest national problem. Time does not permit me to say to-night all that I should like to say on that subject. But I cannot condemn the government too harshly for the fact that in this third session of this parliament we still find them bankrupt of any real solution of this greatest national problem, to use the words of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). Again we are hearing platitudes and utterly inadequate palliatives. I have glanced over the report of this national employment commission. I did expect something would develop from it; but lo and behold, what do we find? Briefly this, that we are to solve our unemployment problem by becoming peddlers selling golly wogs to United States tourists!

An hon. MEMBER: And hot-dogs.

Mr. POOLE: That is another prize suggestion from the commission. Is that not constructive, after seven years of suffering by the people of Canada? Also they speak of youth training. Has the government any suggestions as to where the youth of the country could be absorbed in employment even if they are trained?

Mr. KENNEDY: They could sell hot-dogs.

Mr. POOLE: Also the commission recommend low cost housing. I have heard that proposal commended on both sides of the house, but I have not heard one hon. member tell the committee where the government is to get the money.

Mr. EVANS: Can the hon. member tell us?

Mr. POOLE: Yes; this group has told the house many times—by the use of our national credit; not by placing upon the state another chattel mortgage which children yet unborn must pay. Mr. Chairman, it grieves me, as one of the youngest members of the house, to sit here day after day during three sessions and see a government with an overwhelming majority, a government in which the Canadian people put their trust, without a solitary concrete idea for the solution of this problem. I challenge any hon. member on the government side to tell us what the solution is. Have the government any to offer? I have heard some suggestions as to reduction of taxes; reduce the sales tax, they say. On the other hand, hon. members say, We must have a balanced budget. To me it appears like a madhouse.

Mr. EVANS: Will the hon. member tell us what his solution is?

Mr. POOLE: Yes; I am only too glad to place our solution before the committee, and we fear no intelligent contradiction of it. This problem will never be solved until such time as we use our national credit. The problem is an economic one. Once again I ask the government what the purpose of an economic system is. Listening to the discussions here I wonder why the government do not have a provision inserted in our criminal code making it an offence to place on the market any scientific instrument or invention that would displace labour.

For hundreds of years men have been endeavouring to overcome the problem of scarcity, to do away with human labour, to make life easier. Here in the twentieth century we sit in this modern parliament, with this gigantic machine at our disposal to bring about a better life and security for every man, woman and child in this vast dominion; yet we find men rotting in the bread lines of the country. If this were a temporary condition, one could well understand it. If it were because we had no place to put men, no work for men to do, again we could understand it. But we have the natural resources. Those are the facts which confront us; those are facts which even the government must admit. We have the natural resources. We have the need. We could initiate a scheme now that would mean the construction of 150,000 houses. The material is available here. The man power is here. The need is here. What are we waiting for? How can a democratic parliament sit here and do nothing? How can any party promise the people anything when we have given to somebody else the very thing which is essential if we are to fulfil that promise? If we were living in the days of 1742, in the age of scarcity, we might well understand the attitude of this parliament. In that age all men had to work or starve. But since the beginning of the steam age, since the invention of combustion engine, since electrical energy was provided by science, we have overcome the greatest problem which confronted mankind prior to that time; that was the problem of scarcity. But we are still basing our government policies on scarcity, while actually we are living in such abundance that it is embarrassing to the orthodox administrators in an age of plenty.

Many times I have said to the Liberal members of the house, and I say it again to-night: If you want to find the cost of unemployment in this country, I would advise you to leave at home your statistics and your costs in dollars and cents; find out what it has cost in human depravity. I wish some hon. members could have the experience I have had. How many hon. members have been in the soup kitchens across Canada? Maybe they do not want to go; maybe they have no sons there. How many have gone to seek a job? Have any of the Liberal members done that? One hon. member says, "ha, ha." Let me tell you, my friend, that you cannot laugh the problem out of existence. I challenge this government or any member of it to solve this problem without monetary reform. I say to my hon. friend that if he will go into the soup kitchens of this country; if he will go among the poor—and remember they are the only people not represented in this parliament—he will come back a more enlightened man and a far better member of parliament in terms of constructive suggestions to the government.

I have often wondered whether it is the Liberal party that is wrong or whether I am wrong; but every day in this house, no matter what the question, whether it be soldiers' pensions, whether it be old age pensions, whether it be public works, whether it be the building of highways or homes, everybody expresses a desire to do these things; and the strange part about it is that they even go on the public platform and promise to do them. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), who is not in his seat to-night, made those promises in the recent by-election. Those promises were made in 1935. They said, "We will build homes." I wonder if the Liberal party is just waiting until it is a little closer to the next election, so that it can go to the people and say, "Well, we have started. Do not put us out now, because if the Conservatives or any other party come into power, they will just stop all this work." It is a crying shame that the people of Canada should be subjected to this duplicity and betrayal.

I often wish I were in the Liberal party, for one purpose only, that is, to tell the Liberal party in caucus just what I thought about their policies. Of course there is always this danger, that any Liberal who opposes the government too strenuously may not remain in the party. But I do not value my seat in the house unless I can make some contribution. We were sent down here to do a job, not to pussy-foot around or to make such asinine suggestions as to build up the tourist trade and sell trinkets to tourists in order to solve our unemployment problem.

The greatest asset of a nation is the youth of the country. We may feel quite safe and content to-night; but remember that prior to 1914 the people of Germany were just as democratic as we are; and so with the people of Austria. They loved their democratic institutions just as much as we do; but when the crisis which confronts us to-night confronted Germany in 1932, a man, whether rightly or wrongly, took the helm and made one appeal. That was to the youth of Germany. It will not be very long before some man will make an appeal to the youth of this dominion, and it will not go unheard. Democracy is fine, provided it is working. It is not working in Canada. In 1935 this government told the people they were going to do something. The government came down here and, in plain English language, it does not seem to have the guts to do it. Listen to this: it is the Minister of Labour speaking, dealing with trade expansion:

> The government never suggested a cure for unemployment could be found in government spending on public works. It believed the true cure lay in expanding trade and expanding industrial activity.

Just let us give thought to that for a moment, and see how stupid it is. If we are depending upon foreign trade to absorb the youth of this country back into industry, I say we are going to fail. To-day Germany is producing more internally and becoming less dependent upon imports. Now, since Germany has taken over Austria, the same policy will prevail in the latter country. Japan is making its inroads into China, and will industrialize that nation. Every country in the world is marching towards economic nationalism, and personally I believe it is a sound policy. To me it seems stupid that before the people of Canada can consume part of their own goods they must sell the bulk of them outside the country. The greatest market we have is the home market right here. I can point to a million people in this dominion who could do with more clothes and who could eat more than they are getting. Thousands of children are suffering from malnutrition, while we are looking for foreign markets. Do not hon. members opposite think it is time something was done? It is time we checked up, and compared the orthodox with the new. Is it not time we faced facts, instead of blindly following some one who has no intention of doing anything?

I know more than any other hon. member what the depression has cost the youth of the country. I was one of them. I knew what it was, too, to seek a job. I waited anxiously for the government of that day to do something. What did they do?—the same as the present government is doing; nothing. That government did nothing, while those men spent the best years of their lives trying to bolster up their confidence in democracy and parliament. I am quite convinced this government will never move until its political solidarity is challenged, and I hope that in Saskatchewan this year we may see the Liberals get a sound licking. I would like to see them lose the majority in the legislature. Money will not win for them out there; it may have in the past, but it will not this time. The issues are too keenly felt in the minds of the people. I shall be in the field to do my best to tell the people that this government has failed to carry out its promises.

Hon. members opposite ask us what we would do. We would issue national credit. We believe that anything which is physically possible is financially possible. We believe, further, that an economic system must provide an abundance of all things for distribution to every man, woman and child, and we believe, further, that in an age of abundance every individual should have at least the same status as an animal, and should have security, food, clothing and shelter.

God did not give the big industries in Canada all the blessings they now have. They stole them, and cheated and chiselled the people out of them. Seventy-five per cent of the members of this house do not understand the greatest problem confronting them, namely, the problem of money power. They refuse to listen, because the views expressed do not meet with their approval. They are Liberals, who want to continue to be Liberals. They are progressives who continue to stand still and mark time.

Well, I believe I represent other views. Democracy suits me very well, so long as it works; but when my rights, and the rights of the generation to follow me are denied, I challenge it. When I see parliament refusing to do anything, and when I see the government pussy-footing around with the people, and fooling them, election after election, I for one will rise to my feet any day of the week and tell the government what I think of it. Either the government have not the intestinal fortitude to tackle the problem, or they do not know what the trouble is. I demand in the house to-night that the government bring in a concrete suggestion to absorb the youth of Canada into production. I demand for Canadians what the Liberal party promised them, namely, that they would bring about reforms, and that they would issue credit in terms of public need. Nothing short of that will satisfy the people of Canada; nothing short of that will provide a solution.

I should like to be like most members and speak in well modulated tones and in beautiful English. But my feelings are too keen. Many times while I sit in the house it is hard for me to restrain myself when I listen to hon. members discussing the vital questions of the day, and dealing with them in such an irrelevant manner. The problem is before us. It is a simple one, despite what professional economists may say. An economic system must produce goods of every variety. We have an abundance in Canada. We have youth, the greatest asset—human life. We have a great nation with vast resources. In the midst of this we have need. Will one hon. member sitting opposite tell me why, with all these things, we cannot bring security to the people of Canada? Will any one answer that? I know my challenge will go unanswered, and I know that a year from to-day the unemployment problem will be exactly the same.

One hon. member said during the debate that relief scales were higher than wages. That does not say much for wages in Canada, does it? It does not speak very highly for that legislation designed to deal with wages, does it? Reading in the press a few days ago, I came across an item wherein two men appeared before a magistrate, charged with some misdemeanor. The magistrate heard the case of the older man and, because he believed he was a deserving character, sent him to gaol for thirty days. The younger man, not so deserving, he turned loose. Is that not a bright system which hon. gentlemen opposite are supporting? That is only one case, but there are hundreds of cases across Canada just like that.

Our gaols are filled with young men who should have been good citizens. They might well have been absorbed into our industrial life. The intellectual sources of the country are deteriorating in the breadlines, while parliament sits and talks about democracy, expresses sweet platitudes, and has not the intestinal fortitude to get down to the job.

We talk about expanding trade. One of our best customers is our neighbour to the south. To-day United States congressmen are raising the dickens because Canadian lumber, fish, potatoes and other commodities are going across the boundary line. They claim their unemployment situation has been caused through Canada selling on the United States market. Shortly we shall see barriers placed against Canadian goods, and as a result we shall have more unemployed. What provisions have we made for that?

Unemployment is not our greatest national problem. We must forsake, for all time, the orthodox; we must take courage to go into new roads and face the facts. If we do not, then the youth of this country will.

Mr. Speaker, it is eleven o'clock.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
