Canadian farmers have been delivering wheat and barley to the United States, often clearing Canadian customs without a Canadian Wheat Board export permit. On Tuesday, three American trucks hauling barley from Canada were seized by customs as they tried to enter the United States. Previously, these same trucks with the same product were allowed to enter the United States.

Is it legal or is it illegal? Are exports permitted or are they refused? Will the minister tell confused farmers why some trucks are seized and others are not?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the law on this point is very clear with respect to export of wheat and barley from Canada. Obviously the appropriate paperwork and authorization from the Canadian Wheat Board are required. When that paperwork is not provided the export is contrary to the regulations. Those regulations are enforced in due course as the law requires. I trust the Reform Party is not advocating violations of the law.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, actually the law is not always enforced. Farmers do not know what the law is because there is no standard.

The minister in charge of Canadian customs, the Minister of National Revenue, has received notice that today trucks carrying farmer owned wheat and barley will pull in at Canada customs at the Peace Gardens in Manitoba. I would like to know if the minister has given orders to customs officials to seize the trucks or if he has given orders to let those trucks pass through into the United States?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the officials of the Government of Canada, whether they work for my department or Revenue Canada or any other department of the Government of Canada, need no instructions to do their job. They know what their job is and they will exercise their responsibilities.

* * *

[Translation]

OFFICIAL DEVELOPMENT ASSISTANCE

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs. It appears that members of the Bloc Quebecois cannot decide whether or not they want the federal government to spend money in Quebec.

Does Quebec get its fair share of economic benefits from official development assistance?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, finally a question that will certainly interest our friends across the way.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice, Lib.): Excellent question. We had been expecting it for a long time.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, they obviously do not like being given figures that clearly show how good Canada and the Government of Canada are for Quebec businesses and to Quebecers.

As for official development assistance, 30 per cent of supplies come from Quebec, and 33.4 per cent of registered consultants are from Quebec.

An hon. member: One hundred per cent of them Liberals.

Mr. Ouellet: More than one third, or 36.3 percent, of all contracts go to Quebec.

I can hear a voice shouting: "Liberals". I will remind my hon. friends opposite that one of the organizations that benefit the most from CIDA's assistance is Hydro–Quebec.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Ah.

* * *

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. On Monday, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and the Prime Minister both said that Quebec was receiving more than its share of federal moneys for science and technology. However, the secret document prepared for Operation Unity clearly shows that, in 1993, Quebec only received 17.1 per cent of the federal moneys spent on research and development.

Given the figures provided by Industry Canada, will the Prime Minister recognize that he was wrong when he claimed that Quebec was getting its fair share, and that in fact our province was treated unfairly as regards the establishment of federal research centres?

• (1500)

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, surely the hon. member is aware of the efforts made by the government of Canada to ensure the establishment of a very important industry in her own riding.

It always comes as a surprise to hear opposition members ask questions on sectors in which Quebec is undoubtedly the leader among all Canadian provinces. I thought the hon. member would have been pleased by such a success in her own riding.

* * *

[English]

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on Monday the membership of the Frog Lake reserve in Alberta ousted its chief and paid him $25,000 to leave. It is frustrated that the Indian Act does not empower individual band members.

When will the minister introduce a mandate for other government departments such as Revenue Canada and the auditor general to ensure accountability of federal funds so that members of bands will feel protected, and not just their chiefs?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Frog Lake band situation is not as simple as that, as the member should know since she lives approximate to it, although very seldom visits it.

On Frog Lake there is an issue between those who want to have housing and those who want to have a band office to the extent that the chief's health—he is a good chief—has deteriorated significantly and he wants to leave.

The hon. member would serve her constituents in a budding band in a more fruitful manner if she would go there and help that chief because he is in a very difficult situation and in ill health.

* * *

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The government continues to indicate that social and health programs are the major cause of debt and deficit but as the minister knows and has said in the House, it is tax loopholes and the high interest rate policy.

Today's auditor general report reaffirms that Canada's level of foreign indebtedness is the highest among major industrial nations and that this foreign indebtedness is threatened by control of monetary policy.

I ask the minister if he would consider two measures to start taking control of our monetary policy. One is whether he would reinstate reserve requirements for the chartered banks with the Bank of Canada which would allow the bank to assume more of Canadian debt, and whether he would reduce the 20 per cent foreign investment option with RRSPs which would encourage Canadians to invest in Canada.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development –Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has properly identified a problem the government in its deficit reduction program has identified and is seeking to address, the very high level of foreign indebtedness which exists primarily in the private sector and in a number of provincial government borrowings.

I do not believe, however, the solutions brought forth by the member really suit. We must increase the percentage of Canada's savings.

As far as the reserve requirements of the banks, if we are to create jobs we want to make sure our banks are competitive with other banks.

As far as the 20 per cent rule, we have looked at it. As members know, there have been recommendations that the 20 per cent rule be increased. Those are not recommendations I would be inclined to accede to at this time.

The Speaker: This brings to a close question period. I have the usual question for Thursday. I will take that first and then go to a point of order.

* * *

[Translation]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the leader of the government in the House. I want to ask him if the legislative agenda of the upcoming weeks will be as light as the one of the last few weeks.

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised the opposition House leader does not consider major measures with respect to public safety like witness protection and updating our parole system and improving the system of regulation of transport as serious and important.

• (1505)

The hon. member and his colleagues have fully participated in these debates. I think the public will agree, even if he does not, that we have had and will continue to have a serious and important legislative program.

Our priority today and tomorrow will be third reading stage of Bill C–64, the employment equity legislation. I wonder if he is saying to one of his colleagues he does not consider that an important bill. If this bill is not completed when we adjourn tomorrow we will resume its consideration on October 16.

Following that, we will call Bill S–9 involving the U.S.–Canada income tax convention, followed by any other bills that have been or are about to be reported from committees. A number of bills are in the late stages of consideration in committees and we hope to have them reported soon.

We will then call second reading of the bill creating the Law Commission of Canada to be introduced tomorrow, followed by the tax convention legislation that was introduced this morning.

I am pleased to give this statement of the important and substantial government business, the balance of which we will be calling for this week and after we return from the break for Thanksgiving.

* * *

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this arises out of question period when the minister questioned my commitment to Frog Lake. I would like it on the record that I have lived on the reserve and taught on the reserve. I have had foster children living with me from that reserve. There is no way to question my commitment to those people and the crisis they are facing right now.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

HUMAN RIGHTS AND STATUS OF DISABLED PERSONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think you will find unanimous consent for the following motion:

That four members of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons be authorized to travel to Halifax, Nova Scotia to attend the meeting of provincial disability advisory councils October 17 and 18, 1995.

(Motion agreed to.)

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY ACT

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.) moved that Bill C–64, an act respecting employment equity, be read the third time and passed.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as the House leader said a few minutes ago, this is a very important legislative initiative by the government.

In introducing it on third reading, I take the opportunity to thank several colleagues in the House. As members will recall, we introduced the bill with something of a legislative experiment. Rather than going to the normal first and second readings, we introduced it after the first reading so that a legislative committee would have the full opportunity to actually shape the bill. In this way it would not simply be a matter of responding to a series of government propositions but would actually take a major role in defining and designing the elements it felt would be most important.

I thank the members of the committee on human rights and disabled people for their enormous amount of work, the number of hearings and the amount of time they have given. That applies to members on all sides of the House.

I also give my appreciation to the Secretary of State for Youth and Training and to my parliamentary secretary who have both worked very diligently in making sure the bill was again effectively presented to the House. At report stage we were able to get, as I see from Hansard, a very effective debate and response.

• (1510)

A good sign of the way that worked is when the opposition party presented amendments which improved the bill and we were prepared to accept those amendments and work with them so the bill would be a better piece of work. I compliment those members who have worked so hard on this legislation.

Bill C–64 has one fundamental purpose, to remove the systemic barriers that prevent people from going to work. We can put it all together in one sentence but since I have 30 minutes I will take more to elaborate.

What we really mean is that over the years practices, attitudes and conventional habits have built up in a wide variety of workplaces which have prevented people from using their God given talents and abilities not because of their merit but because of some label attached to them.

I am not referring to outright bigotry or discrimination but the kind of informal practices and rules that develop over the years, over generations, that simply build up a series of handicaps, barriers and obstacles which prevents people in the workplace to get their full rights to participate.

Numbers of women, aboriginal people, disabled people and visible minorities have been denied equal open access to fully develop and explore their potentials in the workplace.

Ten years ago I had the privilege of establishing the Abella royal commission, headed by Judge Rosalie Abella from the court of Ontario, to look into this large question of systemic discrimination in the workplace. Justice Abella tabled a very historic report. Unfortunately by the time the report was tabled the people of Canada had decided in their own good wisdom to send me and a number of my colleagues on an extended sabbatical on the other side of the House. Therefore I was not in a position to fully implement those recommendations. It was up to the previous government to implement the recommendations of the Abella commission.

It brought in the Employment Equity Act which passed in 1986. It required employers in the federal jurisdiction that employ over 100 people to implement employment equity and to report on their progress.

If we look at the original Employment Equity Act, while it was full of wonderful language and high sounding objectives and phrases, it lacked some very major components. It was a form of legislated volunteerism. There was no enforcement. It was simply a good wish list of things people were allowed to do.

Therefore when it came time when we wanted employers to take positive steps to improve the access and openness of the workplace and they refused, there was nothing to be done. As a result there have been over the years a number of incidents in which employment discrimination has continued to prevail.

The other major flaw in the 1986 legislation is it did not apply to government. It was the classic case of do what we say, not do what we do.

It was in recognition of those two major flaws of the original bill that in the red book we put forward to the electorate in 1993 we committed ourselves to making major changes in the Employment Equity Act.

The legislation before us today on final reading is designed to meet those two major omissions. It is to fulfil the commitment we gave to the Canadian people in 1993 when they gave us a mandate to implement it. It is to give the Employment Equity Act some authority to carry out measures to reduce discrimination and to make it applicable to the federal government in its own workplace.

The bill increases the authority of the Canadian Human Rights Commission to conduct an audit of public and private sector employees to ensure they are in compliance with the principle of employment equity.

• (1515)

It also provides that the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal, when needed, can in effect transform itself into an employment equity tribunal to guarantee that the legislation respects the rights of all Canadians regardless of whether they are employees or employers. There is a right of appeal.

[Translation]

This bill will have a positive impact on Quebec. More than 150 employers and approximately 350,000 employees will be affected by this initiative.

Those Quebecers will be entitled to a stronger system, with the human rights commission and a tribunal if necessary to ensure that employment equity is being implemented.

As well, application of employment equity measures within the public service will be fairer. It will give women, the disabled and other designated groups equity in employment, training or promotion. I feel that this represents a proper response to the demands of Quebec women and the needs of the disabled, aboriginal people and visible minorities.

It is my belief that the bill demonstrates the commitment of the federal government to take progressive measures for Canadians and for Quebecers.

[English]

Despite some of the comments concerning the bill, it is not about quotas. Let me make that very clear. That language was used in debate yesterday. It is not about quotas. In fact the legislation specifically prohibits quotas. Anybody who attempts to insert the notion that we are following in some cases the example of the legislation the Americans introduced 20 or 30 years ago is not being fair or straightforward when the word quotas is used since the act specifically prohibits them.

Neither is the bill about reducing qualifications to allow more non–qualified people to enter the workforce. It is a bill about lowering barriers, not lowering standards. That is the basic purpose of the bill.

We are attempting with this legislation to make sure the Canadian workplace fully reflects the richness and diversity of our population, that all individuals will have an equal chance of being considered for a job, a promotion or a chance to improve their specific place and status in the workplace.

The bill is not about replacing the merit principle with something else, far from it. I make the case it strengthens the merit principle by making sure in no uncertain terms that everybody who has merit will not be overlooked. Over the years people with enormous qualification, with enormous merit, with enormous sense of ambition and motivation never had the chance to fulfil that potential because in the workplace have been obstacles, barriers, filters and screens that oftentimes have been built up without people noticing they were there.

Sometimes qualifications were based on size. Sometimes qualifications were based on saying that women for example could not do certain physical tasks even though it had never been proven. Yet in the last few years in police forces, the armed forces and fire prevention forces women and men have been shown to be equally capable of carrying out the entire multitude of tasks required in those dangerous occupations.

• (1520)

Equity in the workplace means a better workplace. Study after study show that those companies that introduce equity as a fundamental principle in human resource planning become better companies; more productive, more competitive, more efficient, more effective.

I listened with some interest and read in Hansard some of the comments from members of the Reform Party about the legislation. I suppose if I were to summarize, and I do it with great hesitation because I do not want to put words in the mouth of the hon. member, but it basically says, let the market decide. Let it choose who it wants to use and what is best for it.

Some progress has been made. Some companies have moved forward and I give them full credit. However I say to members of the Reform Party that more is needed. Where we are now is not enough. I want to quote to members a couple of interesting comments. There are times when they may be tempted not to take my word as gospel, but let me try on them the United Nations report on development.

I quote from this year's report: "The free workings of economic and political processes are unlikely to deliver equality of opportunity". The market can do some things wonderfully well. It can make products, deliver services, make a profit, generate growth and jobs. However it is not very good when it comes to ensuring there is full equality of opportunity for everybody. That is why we have government, to provide a balance and make sure there are some rules, make sure that everybody is treated fairly.

The happy consequence of being a Canadian is that we have always found a nice balance between the public service consideration and the market consideration, that we find a way of working the two in tandem. I believe the legislation in Bill C–64 is a good example of that.

To make the point further, I quote from the Business Council of British Columbia, which is made up of senior business representatives from throughout the province: "Employers alone cannot achieve employment equity. Employers want to be part of the solution in partnership with government, unions, employee representatives, educational institutions and designated group organizations". When speaking, they used a very important word, partnership, a partnership to achieve equality. If I had to put a label on this bill I would say that is what it is about; partnership to achieve equality in the workplace.

The reality faced by many women, members of visible minority groups, aboriginal peoples, those with disabilities is not the reality of the average white male when it comes to employment and earnings. We have been a privileged group for generations. As a result, other members of society have fallen behind.

Fifty–one per cent of women are employed in sales, clerical work and service positions as compared to 20 per cent of males. Women earn only two–thirds of what men earn, even holding education as a constant.

Everyone in the House, I am sure, was cheered by the recent United Nations development index which put Canada number one in the world on matters of literacy, training and education, investment in people and quality of life. When gender is factored into the equation we fall to number nine. It simply shows that something is wrong. This bill is designed to correct that.

I heard comments in the debate yesterday about visible minorities and that maybe they should not be included. Again, the facts counter that because the visible minority group, which on average has a higher education than the average Canadian, makes close to $10,000 less. The correlation in that should tell us something. The workplace is not being fair, open and accessible.

• (1525)

We hear every day the eloquent words of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development of the plight of First Nations people whose levels of unemployment are sometimes 40 per cent, 50 per cent or 60 per cent and whose average income is less than $10,000, which is one–fourth of what the average Canadian makes.

An article in today's Globe and Mail is headlined: "Canadian business chided for ignoring native market". Ms. Pamela Sloan is a principal in the Toronto consulting firm of Hill Sloan, which just published a report on corporate aboriginal relations. The article states that the public and private sectors have made successful attempts but it is not enough. She says to the business community: "You should introduce measures of equity because it makes good business sense to do it".

It was interesting to hear as we have gone through this debate how broadly recognized that fundamental fact is. Canadians have come to understand, whether they are in the public or private sectors, the need to address the systemic exclusion of individuals on the basis of gender, race or physical condition from the opportunities to grow, contribute and develop. They understand that this bill is an attempt to create a more level playing field for all Canadians.

I want to cite a statement made in the House. In a sense this gentleman is an officer of Parliament. We have entrusted to him the responsibility of overseeing human rights issues across Canada. That individual is Mr. Max Yalden. When challenged by certain members that this bill somehow is reverse discrimination and works against the interest of males, Mr. Yalden said that "far from falling behind, able-bodied males appear to be getting more than their proportionate share of hiring. Such data hardly convey a convincing portrait of reverse discrimination".

This bill does not take away from some people to give to others, it simply opens it up for all. It ensures that there is fair and equitable treatment.

We should discard the mythology. It is time to get rid of further divisions by somehow putting over here the plight of a male versus the plight of everybody else. We are all engaged in the enormous task of ensuring employment for all Canadians. The workplace is going through a transformation unlike any it has gone through in the history of human kind. With new technology, global competition and varieties of change, it is tough out there. The only way to succeed is to make the workplace and the job market equally accessible to everyone so all those talents will be put to work. One group should not be put on the sidelines and treated differently.

People ask how do we succeed as a country? How do we meet the challenge of a new workplace and avoid the phobia and fear which the Jeremy Rifkins are talking about? I sincerely believe that in today's age the key ingredient which really makes this country tick is its human resources. I may be biased because my department is named human resources, but I feel privileged to be given that responsibility. I see it as such an important element in making this country work. That means everybody has to work—not 50 per cent of the population, not 75 per cent; everybody has to be given the chance to liberate their talent, to free up their creative potential, to give full open choice for them to make the kind of contribution they can make in the workplace.

• (1530)

I will digress for a second, if I might. A few days ago I was asked a question by the member from Regina about the statistics that were tabled last week by StatsCanada on the falling income of Canadian families. It is worth repeating. It pointed out that increasingly the falling income is a product of the increasing lack of participation of women in the workplace, single mothers in the workplace. Over the last several years that participation rate has dropped by almost 15 per cent. That is one of the most significant causes of the falling income of the Canadian family, in particular families headed by women.

We as a government are trying to turn around and devote our efforts to changing the basic structures to prevent that kind of decline. We are looking at a serious initiative on child care, trying to work with provinces and aboriginal groups. We are rewriting our employment legislation to make it more available for women coming back into the workplace to get the tools they need. We are looking at how we can better support young people to get back into the workplace.

That is the kind of response to our evolution, which is not to throw up our hands in despair, not to retreat into the den wardens of the past and try to hang on to the shibboleths of 30 or 40 years ago, but to try to say we can do it, we can make a difference, we can take initiatives and we can pass a law like Bill C-64. That is what we are all about.

There is an impression being left in this debate that somehow this is working against the interests of the private sector and that private enterprise is going rise up in revolt if this bill passes.

If we look at statements made before the committee that my hon. friend from Winnipeg North very ably chaired, look at the organizations that have supported this bill. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Canadian Bankers' Association, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce told the committee that they were convinced that employment equity is actually value added. These companies told the committee that they had discovered that diversity pays a major dividend. It does not cost them money, it makes them money. It gives them improved access to a greater number of highly qualified personnel to choose from. That is what employment equity is about.

Why do we go off running after rabbit tracks and trying to create smokescreens and trying to create a sense that somehow there is this widespread apprehension? It is even interesting to point out that when we look at the debate generated in Ontario during the campaign about the impact of employment equity, most of the employers in Ontario said they want the bill. Do not get trapped by some ideology. Do not get trapped into imported arguments that are taken from some fundamentalist group in the southern United States that thinks employment equity is next to the devil. Our business groups are saying—

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Why make it a law then?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is a little upsetting that the hon. member from wherever who arrived in the House about two minutes ago did not hear the first part of the speech where we pointed out why business said they need the law in order to make sure that everybody gets treated fairly.

• (1535)

I have heard from the hon. gentleman opposite, so let me give him a list of other companies from his own region that are endorsing it: Canadian National Railway, the Bank of Montreal, Sun Life, the Royal Bank of Canada, B.C. Hydro. Alberta Government Telephones is endorsing it. I do not know how far he wants to stretch the case, but by extension I suppose we could say that Ralph Klein is in favour of this, or at least his crown corporation is.

To make the point more directly, in a Compas poll that was done of Ontario companies when the debate was going on, only 8 per cent of Ontario companies said they would stop their programs if the employment equity law was repealed, and 68 per cent, more than two–thirds, said that they would continue with an employment equity program once it was established and they had learned the value of it.

There is a value in fairness. Canadians understand it, businesses understand it. The only people who do not seem to understand it are certain members opposite, who are still probably reading whatever strange imported foreign based literature they derive their ideas from. Perhaps if they could look at the Canadian case, look at the practicality of how it has worked, look at the value it has, then we might get more light and less heat from the members opposite.

I am going to speak for a moment to the members of the Reform Party.

Mr. McCormick: There are three here now.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Three important members of the Reform Party.

I think it is very important that the members of the Reform Party understand there are things that government can do and must do well. When they said in their minority report—

Mr. McClelland: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I assume that it is not customary to refer to the absence or the non–absence of members.

The Speaker: I did not hear anything about the absence or non–absence.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am ready to address myself to the vast hordes of Reform members who are on the opposite benches. It is simply a function of education. There are times when I fall back into old habits of trying to say let us learn together in the House.

When they put out in their minority report their opposition based on a false premise, one has to take issue with it. One wonders, as we found today in question period, whether some members of the House actually read the legislation we present. We heard today from members of the Bloc that they had not read the bill on HRD. We tabled it four months ago and they got around to raising questions four months later, which has something to do with a certain date at the end of October, I suppose.

Clearly Reform members have not read clause 6 of this bill: "The obligation to implement employment equity does not require an employer to hire or promote unqualified persons". With respect to the public sector, it requires that hiring or promotion be based on selection according to merit. In the report there are many references to merit being done away with and quotas being imposed, yet the legislation says the opposite.

Clause 33, which I know is way down the bill and takes at least five minutes to get to, reads: "The commission may not give a direction and no tribunal may make an order where that direction or order would impose a quota on an employer". Is that pretty clear, that no commission or tribunal can make any order imposing a quota?

Again, why does the Reform Party, in its members' speeches, its minority reports, in its public language, say that quotas are being imposed? Does it have a secret bill we do not know about? Has it written something we do not know about, which it is going to pop unsuspectingly on the Canadian public? It could be, but it has nothing to do with Bill C–64. It is important we understand that.

• (1540)

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Tell them about the RCMP, Lloyd.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): He is the one who calls the RCMP all the time, not me.

How much clearer can we be? When we ensure that all deserving people have more chance, more opportunity to apply for a job, get training, get a promotion, does that not mean a better achievement of the merit principle?

When we ask companies to examine their own assumptions about the tangible and intangible qualities it takes to do a job, when we examine what it is we want from our workers, how we can improve their skills, how we can ensure that there are not false barriers based upon old habits and old wisdoms impeding the development of that human resource in the workplace, does that not also improve the achievement of merit?

The employment equity bill is about making merit work. It is real and demonstrable in a practical way in the workplace. It is about opening doors that have been closed for far too long and for far too many people. That is why I believe Canadians support this legislation. They know that our society will work better if everybody has a chance to work.

I quote from a letter I received from a young woman who works in the construction industry. She has been having trouble keeping her job because only 2.4 per cent of construction workers are women. I should say by way of information that we have established a special program in my department called women in trades and technology. We have put together a council of employers across Canada to specifically promote internships and apprenticeships for women in the trades and technology areas, where only two per cent or three per cent are represented.

This woman did not write to complain or to ask for special privileges. There was no special pleading. She simply wrote to urge me and members of the House to put an end to discrimination in her industry and other industries. She ended her letter by calling on all members of Parliament to pass Bill C–64: "When you review Bill C–64, think of my five–year–old niece, who wants to grow up to be a builder, just like me".

I invite all members on both sides of the House to join in the spirit this young woman represented. She has asked us to be builders, to build something better, something more open, something fairer, so that all Canadians, men and women, those with certain disabilities, those with certain colours of skin, those with certain handicaps that they have faced over time, can all contribute to the building of this country. That is what we are all about.

I believe this legislation, Bill C–64, gives us a tool to be a good builder, all of us. I hope all members will support this bill.

[Translation]

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate, at third reading, on Bill C–64, an act respecting employment equity.

As we have said many times before, the Bloc Quebecois supports the principle of employment equity. It also recognizes the importance of this legislation, which must absolutely be effective.

Let us look at the events which lead to this bill. In 1970, in the wake of the Royal commission on the status of women, the federal government set up its first affirmative action programs. However, it was not until 1984, following the report of the Commission on equality in employment, better known as the Abella commission, that the foundations for the current equity policies were laid. The Abella report emphasized the need for special measures to ensure equal opportunities for all, regardless of one's gender, race, ethnic origin or handicap.

The current employment equity legislation, which was passed in 1986, applies to employers and crown corporations governed by federal regulations and employing at least 100 people. The act requires that employers improve job opportunities for designated groups, namely women, aboriginal peoples, persons with disabilities and members of visible minorities.

• (1545)

The act also requires that employers eliminate rules and procedures which adversely affect members of these groups, and that employers take concrete action to increase the representation of these groups within their organization. The current provisions also provide for the development of a plan stating the objectives to be reached during a given year, or in subsequent years, as well as a timetable.

Moreover, employers must file an annual report to the Department of Human Resources Development providing all the information relating to the implementation of the act within their organization. That essentially sums up the current legislation on employment equity.

Bill C–64, which is now at third reading, completely replaces that act. The main amendments are as follows. The act will also apply to the federal public service. The elements that must be included in business plans will be better defined. The Canadian Human Rights Commission is now responsible for determining employers' compliance with some of the provisions. It has the power to investigate. An employment equity tribunal is also provided for.

The bill as it stands today by the government is an improved version. During the first debate on this bill 10 months ago, I denounced some of its flaws. I am happy to note that the witnesses who appeared before the standing committee succeeded in convincing some members to improve the bill.

Nor should we forget the amendments proposed by my colleague from Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, some of which were accepted. Unfortunately, there were two with which the committee disagreed and to which I will get back in a moment.

Contrary to what my Reform colleagues claim, I think that a law on employment equity is both desirable and necessary. Let us listen to what Glenda Simms, President of the former Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, said when she appeared before the standing committee last February: "We have been defending since 1975 the idea that the Employment Equity Act is a way to achieve equality for women in the work place. Over the past decade, the extent to which women, as a group, are facing serious and systemic inequalities on the labour market, particularly in terms of compensation, working conditions and job access, is explained at length in many reports both within government and outside. Women are not evaluated on the basis of personal merit, but rather their race, their sex and whether or not they are disabled".

Consequently, women are overrepresented in lower paying positions. Approximately 60 per cent of all women to whom job equity applies have clerical jobs and they are severely underrepresented in management positions. White males without disabilities still hold 78 per cent of management job in the public service.

About the impact of systemic discrimination against women, Ms. Simms said the following: "The cost of discrimination should not be underestimated. Ample proof has been given of the correlation between sex and poverty in Canada. Many studies conducted by the government confirm that women are poorer than men and that, among poor women, those who have disabilities, are immigrants or belong to visible minority groups, as well as native women, are the poorest".

It is not true to say, as my hon. colleague from Edmonton–Southwest and others suggested the day before last, that "it is reverse discrimination, that is means that one can get a job, be promoted or hired on the basis of physical characteristics instead of merit".

This reflects—please excuse my bluntness—a sexist and macho view of the situation.

It is a refusal to face reality, the everyday reality of thousands of Canadians and Quebecers, both women and men. I refer of course to those groups addressed by the bill: women, the disabled, visible minorities and aboriginal people.

This is the reality referred to by Ms. Simms and many other witnesses who came to represent their less privileged fellow workers.

• (1550)

A few figures clearly illustrate their demands. Statistics Canada indicates that in 1993 women working full time earned 72 per cent of what men earned. This is even the way it is at the present time in the federal public service, where women are earning 72 per cent of what men are earning. I trust that rectification of this situation within the federal public service will not be long in coming.

The average income of immigrant women workers, however, was 54 per cent of what immigrant males were earning, and close to 80 per cent of disabled women had an annual income of less than $10 000. This is an alarming situation, therefore, and the way we must adjust our aim is to pass a law such as this. We are also aware that 75 per cent of the ten lowest paying jobs in Canada are occupied by women. According to the Council on the Status of Women, the proportion of women in the lowest paying jobs has increased four times more than their proportion in the best paying jobs. The explanation offered by the council is the division of work along gender lines, leading to an undervaluation of women's paid work, which naturally leads to salary inequities.

The women who organized the great march on Quebec City last spring were reminding us that this state of affairs, this inequality of earnings between men and women, compromises the economic security of women both now and when they retire. As for the other designated groups, we know from the figures of the Department of Human Resources Development itself that they are characterized by a serious underrepresentation of aboriginal and disabled persons and a concentration of members of these groups in the less well paying jobs. The situation is apparently particularly acute for aboriginal people, whether female or male. This is why we need employment equity legislation.

Not content to denigrate the very foundations of employment equity legislation, our friends in the Reform Party blithely deny the harsh reality experienced by our fellow Canadians in the designated groups. Two days ago, my colleague for Edmonton Southwest said: "The premise is that somehow or other Canadians are a mean, regressive, racist, discriminating people. Canadians are nothing of the sort. We are not that. No such discrimination exists in the workplace". So they deny the problem.

"The workplace, particularly outside the federal government, is progressive. Industry leads. It is a totally unnecessary law". This is ostrich politics. We have to ask ourselves why a certain segment of the population refuses to acknowledge that their fellow citizens are victims of discrimination every day.

We have to ask ourselves if it is not because these people do not suffer the systemic discrimination repeatedly confirmed by studies in this area. As a general rule, white men do fairly well compared to other groups. So, contrary to what some people think, we, as a society, need a law promoting employment equity.

As I mentioned earlier, the existing legislation was lacking and needed improvement—hence the bill before us. In Quebec, women have a promise from government that a proactive bill on pay equity will be tabled soon. Under that bill, business will have to create a balanced mechanism for evaluating jobs, in order to identify those who are relatively underpaid. Business will then have a period of time to adjust salaries.

The following sentence in a document produced by the committee for the bread and roses march made it quite clear: "Whereas discrimination is not the exception but the rule and affects all female workers, the adoption of pro–active legislation is necessary". Reform members, if we go by their speeches, have no understanding of the situation in Quebec or of the kind of society we want to become. If they want to try their luck in Quebec, they will have to adjust their thinking to the situation in Quebec and consider the social values we want in our society.

• (1555)

Of course this was about wage equity, while the bill before the House is about employment equity. In fact, the two are closely related. In both cases, the purpose is to close the gap between men and women, between white people and members of visible minorities, between persons with a disability and those who have none. It is about social justice and government policies that will help to deal with the problem.

As I said at the beginning of my speech, the Bloc Quebecois proposed two amendments which unfortunately were not accepted by the committee and which, in our opinion, would have improved the bill.

The first amendment concerns clause 14 of the bill and deals with the preparation of the employment equity plan. We would have preferred to see the plan prepared jointly by the employer and the employees. As the bill stands, the employer only has an obligation to consult with the representatives of the employees which, we feel, falls far short of being satisfactory.

Spokespersons for the National Association of Women and the Law also pointed out that opportunities for employees, their representatives and members of designated groups to participate in the development and implementation of employment equity plans were few and far between. We deplore their absence from this process.

We also suggested that the employment equity plan be posted in public areas in the workplace, for the purpose of informing employees.

Finally, we believe that it would certainly be in keeping with the intent of the legislation for the tribunal, consisting of three persons, to have at least one representative for workers and designated groups. I think it is essential that one of these persons should be designated to sit on the tribunal. The National Association of Women and the Law expressed its surprise that the bill did not contain a measure to that effect.

The association also recommended that both compliance officers and members of tribunals should be specialized in employment equity and represent designated groups.

This would be, to use a familiar phrase, putting your money where your mouth is.

The stakes are high, for women and for all designated groups. Ms. Simms, president of the now defunct Advisory Council on the Status of Women expressed it very well in her presentation when she said in concluding that the council encouraged the government to follow the recommendation to ensure that employment equity succeeded in giving women the opportunity, free of prejudice and sexism, to prove themselves on the labour market and, at the same time, to show that they have a right to dignity, respect and equity in our society. This is just as true for the other designated groups. What is good for women, is also good for aboriginal peoples, persons with disabilities and members of visible minorities. We must have this awareness.

I therefore invite the members of this House to support all measures of social justice that help reduce the gap between the most disadvantaged and the most affluent. It is unfortunate that we are still debating the passing of such legislation when, in my opinion, our energies would be better focused on implementing corrective measures to ensure that the target groups achieve equality one day and that discrimination becomes a thing of the past.

It should be our hope that everyone has access to well paid work, that no one has to face discrimination and that working conditions are adjusted for certain people to enable them to grow in the workplace. We should also aim for equality of opportunity and employment equity.

In closing, I would like to ask the government how it will enforce such a law, which is praiseworthy in itself? Having participated in the Beijing conference, I know the government has announced that a strategy will be established to evaluate, according to the sexes, all policies to be made, department by department.

• (1600)

Therefore, with the new social program reform, which has not yet been announced but will probably be announced after the referendum, I would like to know whether the impact of such a strategy, of such a social program reform act, has been assessed and how this strategy will affect people. It seems to me this is only natural. We all know that, with the upcoming social program reform act, women, people with disabilities, members of visible minorities will be the ones who will have to pay for all the cuts to be made in the public service. So the bill is praiseworthy, but will the government's efforts be equal to this legislation?

[English]

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to the dissertations by my hon. colleagues opposite.

At the outset, I want to make it very clear on behalf of my party that we do not ascribe any negative motive to the Liberals for bringing this legislation forward. As a matter of fact, we think they probably in their heart of hearts think they are doing the right thing. We just think it is stupid, unnecessary and counterproductive.

We do not ascribe any motive that would be negative to them other than the fact that in their heart of hearts they wished they lived in a perfect world but we do not. We cannot make a perfect world through legislation. It might be possible to advance the world to perfection through education, but there are some things in life which just plain cannot be satisfied through legislation and this is one of them.

Regrettably, the underlying foundation of employment equity or affirmative action in our country presupposes that Canadians in some way or another are now, have been and will be a systemically meanspirited lot of people who discriminate against others. That is not true. It is not the case.

Earlier this afternoon the hon. minister opposite made reference to members of the business community being in favour of employment equity and that those who came to the committee said so. When people are invited to make a submission before a committee on something like employment equity, what are they supposed to do? Are they supposed to say that they do not believe in the notion of employment equity and that they would just as soon discriminate against people? That is just not the case.

Our country's business community is very progressive. It is way ahead of the government. As a matter of fact, the average business has never seen a visitor from the employment equity police for the legislation that is now in place. Most Canadians, including most Canadian businesses, do what they do out of enlightened self–interest. As I mentioned the other day, there is nothing wrong with enlightened self–interest; it gets the job done.

In my few minutes today I will try to rebut some of the arguments made in favour of affirmative action or employment equity and also to give a sense of what this legislation might mean as it gets its iron grip on Canadian society.

The most significant provision of Bill C–64 results in the legislated mandate of affirmative action for the federal public service, including the RCMP, the military, public security agencies, federally chartered businesses and any business of 100 or more employees that does business with the federal government. That is quite a collection of people. Imagine the number of equity police that will be required to police that to make sure it is working.

The nature of this proposed legislation is intrusive into the marketplace. Under the proposed legislation an employer is obliged to submit an employment equity compliance audit by an officer acting on behalf of the human rights commission.

• (1605)

Based on the results of such an audit, the Canadian Human Rights Commission may direct that an employer comply with the provisions of the Employment Equity Act. Failure to comply with such a directive renders an employer subject to a fine at the initiative of the minister responsible for the administration of the Employment Equity Act of up to $50,000. The responsible minister has not yet been determined but we assume it will be the minister of human resources.

It is important to note though that the term employment equity will be heard from the Liberal side and the Bloc, but you will hear members from this side using the term affirmative action. Liberals are slow to use the term affirmative action because that term is not particularly well regarded even by those who were purported to have been helped by affirmative action 30 or 40 years ago primarily in the United States.

In the last election in Ontario, the notion of affirmative action was roundly discarded when the New Democrats were thrown out of office by the Conservatives. They said in large part in their election mandate that they were going to get rid of the employment equity law.

That really causes one to wonder why the Liberal government opposite would introduce this legislation at this time. Giving credit where credit is due, the Liberals believe in their heart of hearts that what they are doing is the right thing, that they will go ahead regardless. Dam the torpedoes because the torpedoes surely will be in the water at the next election when they are trying to explain why they introduced reverse discrimination and codified it throughout the land.

Through this legislation the Liberals will have planted the seeds of resentment that will burn in the bellies of the thousands and thousands of people who will be denied opportunity that is rightly theirs. They will be denied that opportunity because there is a quota for others determined by race, by gender. People will look at that and ask: Is this a free country? Is this what is meant in article 15 of the charter of rights and freedoms where it explicitly states that all Canadians are equal regardless of race, creed or gender? Of course the next paragraph says, except for designated groups, which then allows legislation of this type to come forward.

The foundation for the notion of affirmative action versus employment equity was really made about 10 years ago by Judge Rosalie Abella. The royal commission recommended employment equity legislation rather than affirmative action legislation because affirmative action and the term affirmative action had been so widely discarded because it just plain does not work.

It is important to keep this in mind. You can dress this baby up any way you want but it does not matter what kind of cook you are, you cannot make mutton taste like lamb. If it is not lamb, it is never going to be lamb. You cannot dress it up in any way. It is a tough old bird that is not going to fly.

There is a suggestion from this side of the House that employment equity or affirmative action legislation really does involve social engineering and forced acceleration of the effects of demographic change. I am going to present an interesting set of statistics.

Canada's demographics are changing rapidly. The make–up and composition of this House is not representative of the changing demographics of our country today. If we look around us in the House, the vast majority of people representing constituencies of the Liberals, of the Bloc and of the Reform Party are white, middle aged males. That is not our fault; it is changing. It is changing slowly, but it is changing.

• (1610)

According to the 1991 census, 9 per cent of Canadians aged 15 or over, or 1.9 million people were visible minorities. Of the 9 per cent or the 1.9 million people who were visible minorities in Canada, only 15 per cent were born in Canada. Very few of the visible minorities that live in Canada today were born in Canada. Thirty–five per cent of the visible minorities in our country have arrived since 1983. Sixty–seven per cent of all visible minorities in Canada have arrived since 1972.

In a relatively short period of time in the 130 years or so that Canada has been a nation, the changing demographics of our country in visible minorities has only really been apparent in the last 30 years. To suggest that there is systemic discrimination in our country is wrong. We have not had the chance to have systemic discrimination.

The demographic composition of employees at all levels in a country which is 128 years old cannot be radically changed as a result of demographic social change over 30 years, and most significantly within the last 12 years. These changes will occur, but it will take at least one or two generations, if allowed to occur without legislative compulsion. As I said before, if we look at the demographics of the House of Commons, we will see that is the case.

Attempting a statistical matching for equity purposes, that is, x per cent of a particular race means that x per cent of that race must be in an occupation for there to be equity, involves the unreasonable assumption that the extent of association to Canada and the extent of Canadian work experience are irrelevant to workforce entitlement or promotion considerations. Does it not make sense if people have been in Canada and have participated in the labour force that their participation rate and their advancement rate would be higher based on the amount of time they have been here or their familiarity with Canada?

That does not mention the fact that all of the government agencies covered by this bill and many private contractors are covered by unions in which people have problems moving up and out and being hired or fired based on the unions. It has nothing to do with management, it has to do with the union. It has to do with whether a person is in the door first.

Let us talk about goals and targets. Are goals targets and are they quotas by another name? Exception was taken to the fact that members on this side of the House referred to goals as being quotas. Under the Employment Equity Act an employer is not required to hire or promote unqualified persons. It says that right in the legislation and I acknowledge that. Employers are not required to hire or promote unqualified persons or to create new positions in the workforce. The Canadian Human Rights Commission cannot impose a quota on an employer where a quota is defined as a requirement to hire or promote a fixed or arbitrary number of persons during a given period.

However, the other shoe is about to drop. In circumstances where under–representation of designated groups has been identified, the employer is required to prepare a plan in which short term numerical goals for hiring and promotion of designated groups are established plus longer term goals for increasing the representation.

• (1615)

What a minute. Just a second. Hold it. Did I not just say the act says they cannot have quotas? Wait a minute, it does say they can establish numerical goals. But what is a numerical goal if not a quota?

If in the opinion of the human rights commission investigator an employer has not made reasonable efforts the employer can be fined $50,000. It sounds like a quota to me. If it looks like a quota, sounds like a quota, acts like a quota and the results of it are like a quota, the chances are it is a quota. It does not matter whether we call it employment equity; it is still affirmative action. It does not matter if we call it a goal or a numerical target. If it restricts the number and the access by number, it is a quota. That is all it can possibly be.

Just in case there is a possibility someone thinks that quotas are not already in force in the Government of Canada hiring practices, just try getting hired by the RCMP, as a constituent in Edmonton tried. Barry Ceminchuk who lives in Edmonton called me and said: "Please talk about my problem. I wanted to get a job with the RCMP. They will not even take my application". The RCMP will not even take it and he has done some digging.

This is information from the employment equity guide from the Department of Justice. Is that not amazing, there is an employment equity guide from the Department of Justice.

For those of you out there in television land, when the census comes next time and you are wondering why they are asking what race you are, all of a sudden the light will come on. The reason people want to know your race is so they can check out demographically whether or not the companies in the local areas are hiring enough people of the various races located in that geographic area. That is why that question is there.

This is from the Department of Justice, and we do not have quotas here folks, but we do have employment equity targets. In the spring of 1991 Treasury Board introduced a new target setting strategy as a means for achieving the equitable representation and distribution of designated group members in the department. The new strategy is flow based, which means that it focuses on an equitable share of recruitment and promotions of designated groups.

It goes on to list the groups and then states what its non–quota quota goals are for women. For scientific and professional: recruitment, 43.8 per cent; promotions, 43.6 per cent. For administrative and foreign service: 39.9 per cent for recruitment and 66 per cent for promotions. If you happen to be a woman in the Department of Justice in an administrative or support position, you have it made, but you had better not be male because women are going to get 93 per cent of the promotions.

We hear clapping from the opposite side. It has nothing to do with whether they are the best qualified but they are going to get it because of their gender. That is absolutely wrong.

My daughter is a totally capable person in her own right. She just goes up and down a wall every time somebody thinks that she has got somewhere or she has a job because she is a woman, because of employment equity or affirmative action. She is an electrical engineer and works in a male dominated field. My daughter achieved what she achieved because she is a damn good electrical engineer. It has nothing to do with the fact that she is a woman. It has to do with the fact that she is a damn good engineer. She just goes crazy when those feminists say she is a victim. She is not a victim.

• (1620)

In any event let us keep talking. Let us talk about qualified versus best qualified. The legislation says in clause 6 that an employer cannot be required to hire or promote unqualified persons. However, the other shoe drops. At the same time, an employer is not free to hire the best qualified as a matter of course. The concept of best qualified does not reflect systemic prejudices. Subjectivity in hiring is largely eliminated under this legislation. Attitudes cannot be legislated.

I am getting a fair amount of static from my friends opposite. They are most uncomfortable because they will soon be standing to justify this draconian legislation.

Ms. Clancy: I am just as comfortable as I can be. You have no idea how comfortable I am.

Mr. McClelland: They are going to try to make this turkey look like a chicken and they are going to have one heck of a time doing it. I wish them well. When they take this boat in the next election, there are going to be torpedoes coming at them from every direction.

Part of me is saying that I cannot wait to see this legislation get off the ground because the government is going to have to live with it. It is like the dog that chases a car: what does he do with it when he catches it? My friends opposite are going to catch this car at the next election.

Let us talk about statistics and the employment equity legislation and the supposition that it is grounded on unreliable statistics. Much of this requires self–identification. The affirmative action police will go into a place of business and pass out a form to be filled out. People will be required to self–identify. Anybody who is going to try to get a job with the government now has to identify their race or whether they are part of a minority group. It is all part of the legislation.

The employment equity police are going to require people to identify themselves. I do not know if the House of Commons is trying it because it is such a progressive place or whether it is test legislation. At the time this was done there were 1,700 employees in the House of Commons. The response rate was 23 per cent and only 50 of those respondents identified themselves as belonging to a designated group.

People do not like to self–identify. As a matter of fact that was indicated in the Department of Justice paper I referred to a little earlier. It talked about the effectiveness of self–identification.

Let me quote from the Department of Justice employment equity guide: "The effectiveness of the self–identification process is questionable. Treasury Board is currently reviewing the process to improve it. There will always be a certain number of people who choose not to identify themselves as members of a target group for various reasons. One of the strongest reasons is the concern about being labelled a token employee and not seen as someone hired for their qualifications or because they have earned the position". This is from the Department of Justice.

Whoever drafted this legislation over in the Department of Justice must have been popping Tums all day. It must have been a long, hard day at work.

Interestingly, there was a 30 per cent increase in Canadians reporting a disability between the 1986 census and the 1991 census. We have to ask why in a five year period there would be a 30 per cent increase in the number of people reporting themselves as having a disability. Why has this identification occurred, particularly in view of the incentive to falsify self–identification surveys? I know that might sound kind of meanspirited but there is the potential for people to self–identify themselves one way or another in some of these surveys in order to gain an advantage in promotion or hiring.

• (1625)

Mr. Bevilacqua: Come on.

Mr. McClelland: Now that might happen. Just imagine. There are people out there who might just say: "Gosh, how am I going to go about getting myself a job here? I know I have the same qualifications as the vast majority of other people that are applying. How am I going to get a job? I know what I might have to do. I might have to self–identify myself into one of these groups".

This brings to mind an anomaly in the whole notion of visible minorities and disadvantaged groups. Based on statistics obtained from Statistics Canada we know that Japanese Canadians have among the highest incomes and the highest education levels of all Canadians, yet they would qualify under this legislation as a disadvantaged group. Figure that out. Does that make any sense?

There is deafening silence opposite. Give them a minute to think about it. We have a demographic group in our country that has the highest single average education, the highest single average income, but members of that group qualify as disadvantaged because of the colour of their skin.

Mr. Bevilacqua: What is the story with visible minorities?

Ms. Clancy: Tell us about visible minorities.

Mr. McClelland: Hold it, let us go back one more. Let us talk about the Portuguese Canadians. Interestingly, Portuguese Canadians do not rank at the same income level as Japanese Canadians, but guess what? They are not visible minorities because their skin is not a different colour. They are curse of curses, shame of shames, white. Therefore, they do not qualify under the statute. Does that make any sense whatsoever? That is the fallacy of creating legislation in a free and democratic society based on race, colour, creed or gender. There is no place for it.

What we should be doing in our society is making sure the human rights commission works so that when people are discriminated against for any reason, regardless of their sexual orientation, regardless of their colour, regardless of their gender, they have a place to go.

Let us talk about useless legislation in our country. Right here in the precincts of Parliament Hill there is 10 years and $100 million of reconstruction going on. A woman was working on the construction site but she was fired because she was a woman and one of the men did not want to be working with her. She went to the human rights commission and was turned around and sent to the provincial human rights commission.

If we want to do something, we should get our act together and get a human rights commission with teeth. We should get some semblance of uniformity between human rights laws federally, provincially, municipally and human rights legislation in the workplace.

We could be doing something worthwhile. If somebody is discriminated against in this country, what do they do? They are absolutely lost. They go to these commissions and get in line. There is a line–up that takes six months to a year to get through. That is where we should be putting our effort. We could be educating people about why it is wrong to discriminate for any reason. We do not have to legislate this sort of thing.

Then we have to make sure that people who are discriminated against for any reason have redress. They presently have no redress. It is not criminal. People can discriminate against anybody they want to; it is not a criminal offence. What one has to do is go through hoops in order to get some kind of satisfaction. We should be making that easy instead of doing this. It is ridiculous.

• (1630)

Since the human rights commission is the agency charged with the responsibility of enforcing this, how much money is going to the commission to enable it to do the job? What is being done to enable Mr. Yalden and the Canadian Human Rights Commission to do the job? Make a complaint to the Canadian Human Rights Commission today and see how long it takes to get satisfaction. Dump this responsibility on it and how long is it going to take to get from point A to point B?

Let us think about it. Think about the last bit of employment equity legislation that came through the House and see what has been done anywhere in the country to ensure that it has been done. Absolutely nothing has been done. What happens when persons who feel they have been discriminated against go to the human rights commission? They grow barnacles. Nothing happens there. Therefore, what do we do? We bring in more legislation to do nothing. The Liberals are just giving lip service so that they can further consolidate their position by saying: "We looked after all of these target groups. We are their great benefactors". The Liberals are not their great benefactors.

Mr. Bevilacqua: You are.

Mr. McClelland: Members opposite say, pejoratively I suspect, that I am. Mr. Speaker, I take that as a compliment because damned right I am. I will address these things honestly and through the front door. I will not do it sliding in the back door.

Ms. Clancy: I have never come in the back door in my life.

Mr. McClelland: Members opposite are heckling me. I am having trouble not laughing because some of their heckles are fairly funny. People listening to their televisions cannot hear what they are saying so I will have to try to ignore them.

I am going to finish my dissertation with a challenge to the Liberals opposite. They control everything in this House. They have a majority. If they do not want something to happen it is not going to happen. As a matter of fact it is not really the Liberals, it is the cabinet. It may not even be the cabinet, it might be the Prime Minister's office. It might not even be the Prime Minister's office, it might be one or two people trying to figure out how they can keep him elected.

However, whoever it is that pulls the strings over there, I offer those people a challenge: extend employment equity legislation to the House of Commons. Why is the House of Commons excluded from this legislation?

Ms. Clancy: It works for me.

Mr. Bevilacqua: Are you in favour?

Mr. McClelland: The member opposite says to extend this. I offer them a challenge: extend employment equity legislation to the House of Commons.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Lévis—government subsidies; the hon. member for Halifax West—foreign affairs.

We shall now proceed to the next stage of debate, which will allow the hon. members a maximum of 20 minutes to speak, subject to a 10 minute period for questions and comments.

[English]

Mr. Rey D. Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish I had the time to debate my colleague point by point. It may not be allowed, but I will do it at committee where the member sits.

As the member of Parliament for Winnipeg North, I rise today to bring the sentiments of my constituents to the House during third reading debate of Bill C–64. Bill C–64, an act respecting employment equity, reflects the soul of our nation. It reflects our shared value of equality. It reflects our humility to recognize the presence of inequities. It reflects our ingenuity as a people to craft solutions to problems.

Systemic discrimination remains an endemic problem, a national malady, a barrier to equality in employment. In the 1960s discrimination in employment was seen as a human relations problem, the result of malice and intentional bias. Thus human rights legislation was enacted, but proved ineffective in addressing the overall problem. That is what the Reform Party would like us to do, retreat from our progress.

• (1635)

Pilot affirmative action programs on a voluntary basis were tested in the 1980s but they failed to achieve the desired results. Women, aboriginal peoples, visible minorities and persons with disabilities continued to be disadvantaged, experiencing higher than average unemployment rates and, if employed, were often concentrated in low paying occupations and were not represented in upper management.

It soon became apparent to the national leadership of the day that discrimination resulted not only from intentional bias, but also from outdated hiring practices and systems. In other words, a seemingly unprejudicial employment policy had an adverse impact on job opportunities for certain individuals and groups because of their race, gender, colour and disability. The phrase systemic discrimination refers to this type of unintentional barrier to equality.

The persistence of this problem stirred the national consciousness at a time when a new era was dawning in Canada. In 1982 the Canadian Constitution was repatriated and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms was born.

Section 15, paragraph 1 of the charter speaks of the equality of Canadians before and under the law, in benefits and in protection. What a powerful national statement on equality, one in which we can all take pride.

No doubt conscious of the presence of unintentional bias in the workplace and no doubt aware of the need to eradicate it, the framers of the charter saw to it that any future Canadian government would not be handicapped in drafting programs to treat this societal ailment.

Hence, the addition of paragraph 2 to section 15. This additional paragraph gives government the authority to design programs aimed at creating an equal and level playing field for those disadvantaged in society. It gives Parliament the authority to enact laws aimed at achieving equality, not preference, not superiority, in employment for the disadvantaged groups, laws that will withstand constitutional scrutiny.

These two paragraphs in one section of the charter reflect Canadian ingenuity, reflect our genuine pursuit of equality and reflect our national foresight in social legislation. This section allows Canada to acknowledge, respect and accommodate the differences among her people.

Equality in the workplace does not and cannot be allowed to mean only identical treatment for all. Equality includes improving the condition of disadvantaged people or groups, which sometimes requires treating them differently to ensure equality. Thus there is maternity leave for women, to cite one example, but not for men.

Seizing on this national foresight now entrenched in the charter of rights and freedoms and wanting to redress systemic discrimination, the Liberal government of the day soon struck the Royal Commission on Equality in Employment. Chaired by Justice Rosalie Abella, the commission issued its landmark report, Equality in Employment, in 1984. It confirmed that discriminatory practices, intentional or not, yielded the same outcome: low rank, low pay or no job at all.

It confirmed that certain systems and practices unwittingly may have adverse effects on certain groups in our society. Therefore it prescribed a system based approach to remedy the situation. This ultimately led to the enactment of the current Employment Equity Act in 1986. This law has helped advance equity in employment, but not far enough.

The current federal government knew this before it took office in October 1993. It therefore sought and was given the mandate by the Canadian people to extend coverage of the act to the federal public sector and to include practical enforcement mechanisms. The government wanted to fulfil this mandate in a fashion that will further advance equality in the workplace without adding an onerous burden on employers and businesses.

• (1640)

Bill C–64, tabled in the House last December 12 and amended in committee and at report stage fulfils our national agenda. I was privileged earlier this year to chair the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons which conducted a full review of employment equity and obtained input from Canadians from coast to coast.

We heard from 52 associations and individuals and received 18 written submissions. The views of employers, labour organizations, designated group organizations and many interested Canadians were fairly represented in the evidence before the committee.

I am honoured to share with my colleagues in the House, my constituents and other fellow Canadians some of what we heard from witnesses.

Says the Congress of the Assembly of First Nations Chief Mercredi: "Although a lot of times Canada is presented as a nation that believes in equality of opportunity, when you really undress the country there is no equality there for aboriginal people".

Says the Congress of Aboriginal Peoples: "We point out the high participation rate in the workforce of our people to stress that aboriginal people want to work but the structure of the Canadian economy seems to leave them on the outside looking in".

From the National Association of Women and the Law: "A rather bleak picture of the employment and economic situation of women is evident at a glance. In general, women occupy most of the short term jobs and are clustered in low paying services and administrative support work positions".

Says the Canadian Ethnocultural Council, a coalition of some 37 national ethnic groups around the country: "The reality now is the visible minority population labour force is under utilized. That speaks to the economy of Canada and to the future of our country".

From the Canadian Paraplegic Association: "Clearly for people with disabilities there are still numerous barriers to employment—until more attention is paid to education, training and skill development for persons with disabilities, reasonable representation in the Canadian work force will continue to be an illusion".

Clearly in this body of evidence, only a sample of many, we can see the plight of disadvantaged groups.

From the Canadian Labour Congress: "By ensuring the diversity of the Canadian population is reflected in all employment areas under federal jurisdiction, the Government of Canada is creating an enriched work environment".

Says the Canadian Security Establishment: "I am pleased to advise that the establishment feels it can comply with the requirements of the bill without special consideration".

Says the RCMP: "Under the recruiting process, what we would do is hire the best and highest rated persons from all groups" in compliance still with the Employment Equity Act.

Says the CRTC: "If the ultimate goal was to sensitize people so they would do these intelligent things instinctively—then we are definitely going in that direction".

From the Canadian Bankers Association: "Canada's banks, and I speak most particularly for the six major banks, have been committed to employment equity objectives since the current act was passed in 1986. We think employment equity not only has had a positive impact on the way our organizations manage their work forces but also it has proven good for business.

Let me quote from Mr. Alan Borovoy of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association: "The idea then in setting numerical goals is not to play catch up. You do not have to ask to get to the same balance as the rest of the community. You set the goals in order to pressure the employers not to discriminate. That is the objective of the setting of the goals. You choose a numerical target that would accord with how many the employer would get if he recruited vigorously, set fair job standards, and at the end of the day did not discriminate improperly". That is from the Canadian Civil Liberties Association leadership.

• (1645)

The chair of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, Max Yalden, stated:

> —let me make it clear that employment equity is not about quotas. A quota is an arbitrary number of positions in the workforce that must be filled regardless of whether qualified candidates exist for the jobs.

I hope these testimonials will convince even the doubting Thomases from across the floor that the disadvantaged groups, their advocates and civil libertarians of renown are not the only supporters of Bill C–64. Employers from all sectors equally praise the bill. They recognize that equity in employment enhances productivity and business and inspires initiative and creativity.

The Minister of Human Resources Development has already refuted the myth the Reform Party wanted to propagate about qualifications, merit and quotas. Those issues have been dealt with by the bill. For the sake of time I refer the hon. member opposite to the bill to see for himself his arguments are flawed.

During debate he told us he would object to census taking because it would ask for the individual's race. I am not afraid and I am not ashamed of my race. I am not ashamed of my heritage.

If he is really concerned that Canadians from the Portuguese community are now not covered under the act, that is true. If they are determined disadvantaged, then they will be given programs by the government. That is one beauty of having this type of census, so that we can get the facts and figures we need to formulate good, sensitive legislation which will answer the needs of Canadians.

I repeat the bill is not about redressing the past mistakes of history. It is about not wanting the past mistakes of history to be repeated on our present and future generations.

I heard earlier in the debate about wanting to hire the best qualified. I believe the Reform Party would be surprised at one of the witnesses from the Manitoba Telephone System, Ms. Katawne, director:

> I would suggest that those people who believe it is a highly scientific art to determine who the best qualified person is are dreaming. They are in la-la land. That is not what happens on a selection committee.

We need an employment equity act.

In addition to making several clause by clause amendments to the bill, our committee issued a separate narrative report entitled "Employment Equity: A Commitment to Merit". I suggest that members who object to the bill give it careful study. I hope at that time they will have a change of mind and a change of heart. The report reflects the committee's confidence that Canada's new employment equity law will ensure the pre-eminence of merit and the elimination of systemic discrimination in employment practices.

What we have in the bill is a win-win situation for employers and employees alike. The report and the bill reflect the uniqueness of Canada as a leader among nations, committed to excellence in human endeavour and profoundly committed to social justice in general and to employment equity in particular.

Chairing the national hearings on Bill C-64 was a very meaningful experience for yours truly. It reconfirmed for me why I am so proud to be a Canadian.

• (1650)

Let me close with something I will always carry with me from my time as chair of the committee that studied this bill. It is a letter from the Filipino Technical Professional Association of Manitoba, an ethnic community to which I proudly belong.

The association stated that its members were proud of the efforts of the Canadian government to show the world that we as a society care about our citizens' human rights and shared the pride that the United Nations recognized Canada as the number one country in the world in which to live.

It emphasized there are already a lot of skilled immigrants and new citizens in Canada unable to get a job in their respective fields of training and experience because their professional credentials and training are not systematically given recognition. There is not even an orderly process for accreditation. Employers in a lot of cases insist on Canadian experience which also closes a lot of doors for employment. To the members of the association this amounts to no less than systemic discrimination.

I can certainly agree with its view that it is very distressing and undignified for a person to be systematically prohibited from practising his or her chosen career which he or she spent a lot of years mastering.

It recognizes, as I do, that employment equity may be one way of dealing with this problem, but again this will not work if systemic barriers are not dealt with.

Working together we can carry on this country's proud tradition of championing equality, creating opportunity and building a better country for us all. Employment equity is Canada's commitment to merit to social justice, a framework for awareness, a search for inclusion, a win-win for all. Canada has a duty to oblige.

I am proud to be part of a government that has taken the leadership. I therefore urge all hon. members from across the floor in the Chamber to join together and vote in favour of Bill C-64.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening very intently to the speeches regarding Bill C-64. I am also finding myself agreeing not with the bill but with a lot of statements, particularly from the last speaker on the need to work on equality. Equality is essential. We want that. Everybody in Canada wants that.

I find it a little discouraging, however, when we come to talking about wanting equality. We want all to be Canadians. We want equality. That is what everybody wants.

Now we come to the time when we will have to ask the questions that may differentiate between equality and non-equality. That goes back to something talked about during the election. It was talked about by a lot of people who did not like hyphenated Canadians. They thought how great it would be if we could only come to the day when we can be Canadians and we do not have to be French-Canadian, Japanese-Canadian, aboriginal-Canadian, Colorado-Canadian, Irish-Canadian or whatever. They would really like to see that disappear. That message was loud and clear. Every member in the House has heard that.

I think people would agree that is what we would like to see. All of a sudden we see a piece of legislation coming out prior to a census asking "what is your race?" I have already talked to a lot of people who are concerned about that. They wonder what will happen if they write Canadian. These people could write hyphenated Canadian because they are not the same as me.

• (1655)

People in my riding of a different ethic background are asking what they are supposed to write. A good friend of mine, a sheet metalist, asked: "Am I supposed to write African–Canadian because I am black?" He refuses to do that because he was born a Canadian. He said he will write Canadian and so will his kids. I admire that kind of attitude. There is a perfect example of an individual who would like to work toward being considered equal. Government legislation is requiring him to declare otherwise.

My colleague said the legislation is stupid. That is why it is stupid. It is forcing a lot of people to declare they are not Canadian because of a hyphen. They do not want to do that.

A lot of business people have told me they have practised this kind of legislation all their lives. The last thing they want to be is discriminatory against anyone. Everybody in the House can go to their ridings and talk to entrepreneurs of all kinds who have practised this kind of thing.

Of the 30 years I have been in Canada, 20 were spent in a supervisory position in which I had to hire people. On a number of occasions we made certain we did not mistreat anyone on the basis of gender, race, et cetera.

I recall several teachers who came from all walks of life I was involved in hiring who were excellent. It was long enough ago that we did not think about colour. We did not think about anything but their qualifications and their ability to perform. Now we are to force those same businesses that have those hiring practices to take into consideration colour, race and gender.

Here we go again. There are a lot of entrepreneurs out there who are up to their eyebrows in taxes and are having one heck of a time making ends meet. The biggest reason is government got into everything imaginable and interfered constantly with all the different regulations. Businesses have been made to become tax collectors through GST and other forms of taxes, which causes business to add costs and hire people to do the work for the government. Now we are to present them with more legislation.

I think all entrepreneurs all across the country of all races are just about fed up. They are liable to say to my friends across the way: "You blew it. What we do not need is more government involvement. We are grown individuals. We are intelligent. We are Canadian. We will manage our own affairs, thank you. Stay out, butt out, and get out of our lives".

No, for 30 years I seen that the government knows better. The government knows what is good for Canadians, so it has to make sure it gets in there, gets involved and starts forcing things to happen that have probably been happening all along. If they have not been happening we have a mechanism to make certain that people are punished when they do break the law by being discriminatory. We have that. It is called the Canadian Human Rights Commission. No, the government knows better.

• (1700)

This has been the practice for how long? Remember the metric system? Not many people wanted it, but the government gave it to them whether they wanted it or not. Remember the language law? A whole pile of people did not want it, but the government gave it to them whether they wanted it or not.

Let us go back to just recently. Consider the GST. It could not have been more obvious. People did not want it, but we have it.

Mr. McClelland: But the Liberals want it now.

Mr. Thompson: The Liberals want it now, that is right.

We get promises about those kinds of things. The government tells the whole world, all Canadians, that it knows best. It will tell you how to run your business, what you have to do, who you have to hire and how you have to do it.

Who do we think we are? I thought we came here to govern, not to rule.

Ms. Clancy: They did not come here to govern. We came here to govern.

Mr. Thompson: That is right, Mr. Speaker. We came here to govern; they came here to rule. This legislation is a perfect example of it.

I think it is a shame. I think it is a shame when the Liberals do not even recognize that 70 per cent of the mothers who are working have declared that if they did not have to work they would rather be home with their children. Why do we not do something to make that possible? It may be a shock to our members across the way, a shock to the member for Halifax, that there are a lot of working mothers who would really like to be home with their children. Let us make it possible. Let us cut some taxes. Let us see what we can do to help them out; but no, bring in things like this because the poor dumb Canadian businessmen do not know what they are doing.

I looked at another thing that was handed to me. We are up to six now in my riding. I congratulate the government; it has made it happen. There are six individuals, including my 22–year–old son, who have gone south of the border because down there they can work and up here they cannot. These six individuals are young males, I would like very much to see remain in Canada and be Canadian. My son has to go south because he has wanted to be a cop since he was six years old, and you do not have a hope in the devil of being a cop in this country because governments are ruling like they are today. I thank the Liberals very much. They have confirmed that my son will not be Canadian because he cannot even get a job as a fireman, as a cop, as an EMP, nothing, none of those things, because he does not fit: he is white and male.

There are five others in my riding who have received their green cards and have notified me that they will be gone. Congratulations to the Liberals. They have chased some out. I do not suppose that is discriminatory, though. That is probably just good government. If that is good government, they can have it. I am sick of that.

During the next election, if the Liberals want to keep pursuing these kinds of ventures, if they want to keep telling businessmen and women that they do not really know what is right, that only we in Parliament know what is right, they will be in for a rude awakening. I am certain I am going to stay healthy enough to stick around and watch it. I will laugh and laugh, just as they laugh today when we make the comments we do with regard to the kind of legislation they bring down, legislation that causes racism and discrimination. It cures nothing. Wake up and smell the coffee.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as was noted by my hon. colleague, the member for Winnipeg North, one of the groups that supports this legislation and has called for this legislation and has worked very closely with the government, the Department of Human Resources Development, the minister, the parliamentary secretary and others, a group with which I worked very closely on the area of employment equity when I was in opposition, is the Canadian Bankers Association.

● (1705)

When I list radical groups out there fighting for social policy and holding down the left wing in this country, the Canadian Bankers Association is not one that automatically leaps to mind. However, I congratulate the Canadian Bankers Association for its far sightedness. It has had in place for a number of years, certainly as long as I have been a member of the House of Commons, employment equity groups. It has met with representatives from the various banks. It has worked within its own organizations for the promotion of women, minorities, the disabled and so on, and has done a fairly good job.

Now I would not want my friends in the banks in Canada to think that I am saying they are absolutely perfect, because they have a long way to go. There are a number of things I could suggest to them in areas of employment equity where they could make their record better, but they have certainly been very much in the forefront.

I do not question the member's 70 per cent of working mothers. What I do question is the interpretation of the statistics. I have many friends with children of varying ages, and there is no question that for women the ability to juggle domestic and professional duties is fairly severe. The superwoman syndrome is very hard to deal with. When you have small children it is particularly difficult to spend a lot of time away from them. However, it is more difficult not to provide them with the necessities of life like food, shelter and other things.

If the hon. member is suggesting that we tell all mothers of small children to stay home and that we therefore will increase the national debt by paying a salary to mothers who stay at home, I find that very interesting. Along with the member's explanation of why a group like the Canadian Bankers Association supports employment equity, I would like to know whether the Reform Party is advocating that we pay a salary out of Canadian taxpayers' dollars to mothers to stay at home to raise their children. I also ask him how much he thinks that salary should be.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure how to answer that. I will start with the bankers.

Hurrah for the bankers. If they think this legislation and the practice of affirmative action is good, then let them do it. Nobody cares. If that is what they want to do, they should be entitled to. That is democracy.

What I do not think should happen is that somebody be forced into doing something that may not be the right thing to do in terms of the business, whatever that might be. I think we have to trust the judgment of employers to make certain they do not discriminate. If they wish to have a hiring practice that resembles employment equity or affirmative action or whatever, that is democracy. Let it be their choice. There is nothing wrong with that.

I do not believe that mothers with children who choose to stay at home want to be paid. I do not think that is their request, any more than they like to pay day care and babysitters. However, I do believe that if the government were listening to some of the tax proposals and tax incentives, there are things it could do that would make it possible. The government talks about spending more money by letting mothers stay at home. I do not understand. Let them work and you are going to spend money paying day care. Do not pay for day care. Save that money so mothers can stay home with their children and give tax breaks to the providers of the home.

• (1710)

Maybe the government has a problem understanding arithmetic, but it makes sense to me. It used to be that married couples with one staying home were able to do so, but now they are not able to do so because they are treated the same way as married couples who are both working.

We can do a lot in that area. I suppose that is another topic. Mothers do not expect to be paid. If we are going to give extra money to other women who can work, if we are going to pay others to look after their children so they can work, then if we want to be equal I guess we will have to do the same thing for the mom who decides to stay home.

There are not many things she said that made any sense to me. That is understandable, considering the source.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I am unlucky or lucky. Each time an issue dealing with things such as employment equity, discrimination or fairness in hiring comes up I always speak after the member for Wild Rose. What it means is that I normally do not have to worry about going back to a speech that somebody else wrote for me. He usually incites me to find things inside that are germane to my very being, that are at the core of what I am and the reason I got into politics.

Some of the nonsense I hear espoused by that member does a great disservice not only to the constituents he represents but to the party he belongs to and the Parliament he sits in. This member consistently and constantly gets up and shows that it is okay to speak in the Parliament of Canada—and I do not deny him the right or the privilege to do so—and pretend that things are other than what they are.

I listened to this member say "what about the white male?" He told everyone who was listening tonight that his 23–year–old mailman son, I think he said, had to go south of the border, had to get a green card. I am sorry for that. I hope that my son will be able to get employment in this country when he is ready to enter the labour market. I want to give him a wake–up call. There are many sons of people in my constituency whose colour is not the same as mine or the member for Wild Rose, whose native language is not the same as mine or the member for Wild Rose, whose fathers cannot get employment in this country, not because the jobs do not exist but solely because of the colour of their skin, the language they speak or their cultural heritage. That is the reality in this country.

If the member for Wild Rose wants to be shown, I will issue him an invitation to come down and I will walk him through the back streets of Preston, Nova Scotia, and he can meet the people who for generations have fought to be included. They have not asked to be given special treatment, they have not asked to be singled out. They have asked to be treated like his white male 23–year–old son to participate to the fullness of their ability in the labour market. That is what this is all about.

For the hon. member to deny this tells me that this individual and the fact that he can get up and speak the way he does in the House is more a testament to the tolerance of the democratic institution called Parliament than it is to the point of view he espouses.

The member opposite and the Reform Party get up and use this high office called Parliament, what John Turner used to refer to as the highest court in the land, and it is, to put forward points of view they know are dishonest, saying there is no need for the federal government to put out in policies and programs what it believes are standards that should be followed in its own bailiwick, with its own employees in the areas it regulates, in federally regulated industries.

• (1715)

To listen to the member and those of his ilk over there one would believe that everything is rosy, that the status quo is something not just to be maintained but to be heralded. This is the way we have done it. This is the way it should be.

Mr. Thompson: That is why you are doing it.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, it is not that many generations ago that blacks in Nova Scotia were not allowed to walk into theatres and sit with whites. It was not 100 years ago. It was in the early 1960s when that came to an end.

The member should look at history to find out when native Canadians, the first people in this land, were finally recognized as people and given the right to vote. That is within my generation and my lifetime.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. We are talking about employment equity. I have never once indicated in my life that there should be any form of racism. I am glad racism does not exist.

An hon. member: That is not a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. Clearly—

Mr. Thompson: I'm not going to take that crap.

An hon. member: Language, language.

Mr. Thompson: I never called anybody a racist at any time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): This is the House of vigorous debate. There are strongly held views on all issues. This one is bringing out some equally strong views. I say respectfully to the hon. member for Wild Rose that he was engaging in debate and did not have a point of order.

While I am on my feet, I would appeal to members on both sides of the House. On issues such as this which are critical and sensitive we should be respectful of the institution and one another.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I want the record to show that this hon. member has not alluded to anybody in the House and indicated that he or she was racist or bigoted. I am not trying to impugn the motives of members of the House. I want the record to show that the reality is in Canadian society today. Although we have come a mighty long way, there is still a mighty long way to go.

It is well within the responsibility of good government to continue to push that agenda item, the envelope as it were, to ensure the standards that Canadians want in the private work place and in the government work place are continuously upgraded and pushed forward.

I merely want to tell anybody in the House who does not know or does not understand that inequality has been a fact of life since European settlers first came to Canada. That is the reality.

It does not mean that society in and of itself is racist. It does mean that sometimes the majority in society have to understand that there may be built in barriers to participation by minority groups. It has to be understood that those barriers may be systemic and that even people from those groups, if we open the door to full participation, may not feel that the door is open.

What this bill seeks to do is not to recast the dye. It seeks to build on the original legislation that was passed in the House to include more industry in the private sector and the federally regulated area. That is all it does.

It says to employers that there may be an imbalance in the labour market. We do not want them to set quotas or numbers because I do not approve of that. Minimums become maximums in this game. It seeks to establish that there is a problem and that industry can solve the problem themselves. That is all it seeks to do.

If members come to my area or the area of the member for Halifax in our part of Nova Scotia, there are real barriers to participation to a whole variety of groups. A company should not say it wants a black with a university education, and it does not matter what the grades are, any more than it should walk in and say that it does not want a black with a university education.

• (1720)

It means that we should look at the labour market in the area we are in. If it is obvious there are visible or invisible barriers to participation in that labour market, that we seek as a conscious policy effort to remove those barriers. That is it. There are no quotas. There is nothing nefarious in this legislation. It simply states that the federal government believes that wherever inequality exists, it has to consciously work to remove that inequality. That is all that it says. In areas of a federally regulated workplace that is what it says.

I am not one of those individuals who believes there should be quotas because inherently it is wrong. Many times individuals are hired or are put on a board because of a quota system, either an official or unofficial quota. They could be the best qualified persons for the job, but their co–workers will not see them as a qualified individuals. They will see them as individuals that was put there simply because the number had to be filled for that particular race, gender or whatever.

We seek to break those borders down. This legislation goes in that direction. It states as a public policy that employers should work toward making sure, wherever possible, that their labour component is reflective, as best as it can be, of the mix in the labour market. In areas of large populations of blacks, indigenous blacks in Canada, the federal public service has to work toward making sure that they apply for those jobs and, if qualified, that they are hired.

Most of all, it should be seen that if they do apply for the job that they will be considered. The reality is that in many non–traditional roles for females in the public service, women do not apply any more because in the past they have been turned down so often.

If the employer is a crown corporation or a federal department and has a policy of encouraging the greater participation in the labour market of women, for instance, it sends a signal out that, yes, if the woman is qualified she can apply and should have every reason to believe that she will be judged based on her qualifications and will not be excluded based on her gender.

It is the same when dealing with blacks and it is the same when dealing with native Canadians. Go to some of the ridings where there are high numbers of natives in the population. Do the numbers in the population respond to the participation in the federal workplace? In some cases, yes, but in some cases they do not. This bill seeks to recognize that in areas like that where these factors are a reality, that a plan be put together to encourage individuals in minority communities to participate. That is it. It does not do any more than that.

It does not say we have to hire three white people who have Gaelic ancestry. It does not say that we have to hire 15 women. It says: "We want you to be conscious in the way that you run your operation that you should try to encourage participation from minority groups who traditionally might have been excluded". It is nothing more than that.

I am going to conclude my remarks because I know the member from Halifax is waiting to speak. I want to encourage this House to tone down the rhetoric a bit. I know I have been pretty upset today. I watch what I say in this place because I have a great deal of respect for the chair that I occupy. I may have certain strong opinions but I try to temper them when I stand in this place.

I have a great deal of difficulty after seven years here to look across in this place and hear people put things on the record that may incite, maybe not by design, but may add to a lack of understanding and a lack of conciliation among all Canadians and may take away from the desire of Canadians to be fair and reasonable.

The hon. member opposite who spoke before me indicated that this law means that we are going to see colour, that we are going to have to look for colour, we are going to have to look for language, we are going to have to look for gender and that in the past that was not the case. Unfortunately he might have been right. In the past nobody saw colour when he hired because he did not hire people of colour. Nobody saw gender when he hired because in many cases he did not hire women. Nobody saw linguistic groups because in the past he did not hire linguistic groups.

I look forward to the day when we do not have to worry about those factors. The reality is the problems are caused by the fact that those factors have been overlooked in the past. The only way we can rectify it is by public policy. This bill goes in that direction and I support it fully.

• (1725)

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the last speaker and it sounds as if he has a valid concern. However, it seems to me that the legislation he is addressing is discriminatory and the government is trying to resolve that with a concept called employment equity.

I could be corrected on this, but I believe it was last year when we had recognition of women's day in the House, a women Liberal MP suggested that the House had a long way to go because over 51 per cent of the voters in the country are women but only 18 per cent of MPs are women. Where lies the problem? Women have the vote. Women have the intelligence to vote.

Ms. Clancy: Could I answer this?

Mr. Gouk: People have the right to run as candidates. A number of women ran for election and were not elected. I ran against two women in my riding. People have the choice to make that selection. Women have the vote the same as men and they make a choice.

The air traffic control system started talking about affirmative action because there were not enough women air traffic controllers. At the time I happened to work with a very competent female air traffic controller who was asked to participate in the affirmative action program to get more women into the air traffic control system. She agreed that she would take part in a program to attract more women to apply and to learn about the system. But nobody in the system, male or female, was prepared to alter the practices so that a woman who was less qualified than a male candidate would be chosen.

Would the hon. member see a system where for the sake of balancing quotas, and there is no other way to put it, that the system has to take someone other than best qualified candidate because there is an imbalance in the precious quota system?

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question. I believe it is a legitimate one.

I want to make two distinctions right off the bat. This bill is not about quotas. I do not support a quota system. It is not the right way to go. What I do support is a legislative framework that tells employers in the federal section, crown corporations and federal government departments that there is a reality out there. There are many members who are still in denial about the reality of barriers to participation in the labour market. They are real.

This direction in legislation I hope would never say someone has to be hired who is not qualified for the job. That is not what it is about. It sets in process a conscious mechanism so that a business, department or crown corporation can make sure that if there are no natives employed but they are 22 per cent of the population, that there must be some barriers to participation somewhere. If the barrier is simply that no native has been hired, then by setting targets for the participation of native employees sends out a signal.

But no, I do not agree. I would not support a bill that tells an employer to hire someone who is not qualified for the position. The member knows as well as I do, if you are dealing with an entry level or mid-level position, many times the minimum qualification for the job does not mean the applicant has to be a rocket scientist but may require a grade 12 education, someone able to lift a box, punch a typewriter or a keyboard, or operate a furnace. I do not know.

This bill does not compel anybody to hire an individual based on gender or colour.

• (1730)

It compels the corporate sector within the federally regulated area and the federal government to ensure that where those inequities are identifiable they have conscious programs to try to encourage the participation of qualified minority candidates.

It does not do anything other than that and if the member thinks it does I feel sorry for him. I ask for him to reread the legislation because I think he is off in a direction not consistent with the goals of the bill.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I believe that when the member opposite says he does not believe in quotas he is quite sincere. It does not matter how it is dressed up. If there is a numerical target that is a quota. It does not matter how it is dressed up, it is a quota.

I ask the member opposite to respond to two brief questions. In his comments earlier the hon. member said it was wrong that a woman should not be able to get a job because she was a woman. Is it also wrong that a man should not get a job because he is a man?

The Department of Justice in its employment equity guidebook uses an employment equity target with a table that specifies the following. It will recruit 2.2 per cent of aboriginal peoples with promotions at 1.1 per cent; 2 per cent of persons with disabilities with promotions at 2.8 per cent; 4.4 per cent of visible minorities with promotions at 2.7 per cent of the total staff. If these are not quotas, what are they?

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the members opposite do not get. This is a very simple piece of legislation. There is a history to this legislation. It is an amendment to an existing act. I cannot recall anybody contacting my office in the last seven years and complaining that the federal government through the existing employment equity legislation was excluding anybody qualified from participating. I have not had that and I have a lot of public servants in my area.

There are many people who do not get a job and run out and say there was a black hired and they must have been hired because they were black. There are plenty of minorities, black, linguistic, there are many women who in the past have not been hired not because they were not qualified but simply because of who they were, because they were females, because they were black, because they were immigrants or because they spoke a different language as a mother tongue. That is the reality.

This is not about quotas. I do not support a quota system. However, I will not as a federal legislator shirk my responsibility to pilot policy for the public sector which we are responsible for to indicate that it appears there is a discrepancy in the hiring patterns and policies of many government departments.

Either one subscribes to the the fact that people of colour or women are unable to attain certain standards, which is why they are not hired, or one can encourage the setting of targets whereby the organization or the private sector company will examine whether its employees are reflective of the mix of the labour market it can draw from, and where it is not reflective to encourage that employer to set forth a plan to get participation by the labour market as close to the mix of the labour market by qualified candidates.

I do not agree with quotas but I do agree that we will get nowhere by going into denial and pretending there is equity in the workplace. There is not. This bill will help to establish that it is a priority for Canadians and for the government. I am proud to say I am a part of the government that has taken the initiative to put this back on the public agenda.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Due to a ministerial statement and responses earlier, Government Orders will conclude at 5.46 p.m., at which time we will proceed to private members' hour.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, when I look across the House it is interesting. I see more ties that bind us than divide us even on such a sensitive issue as employment equity, which we oppose.

• (1735)

The hon. member gave some very eloquent points on issues where we have a lot of commonality. We in this party deplore and oppose with every strand of our bodies discrimination against anybody. We would fight to a person against anybody who was committing these offences on our soil.

Therefore I find it amazing that the government wishes to put forth employment equity which by its very nature is discriminatory and against our charter of laws and freedoms.

The original ideals of employment equity, affirmative action of fairness, equity and a level playing are what we in this party are fighting for. That was the original intent. Unfortunately what has happened with employment equity is it is being distorted. It has been plasticized and distorted so it does not resemble its original.

Tragically employment equity now holds up that people will be advanced on jobs or acquire jobs on characteristics designed by the government to advance people. The characteristics have nothing to do with ability and merit but have everything to do with characteristics that have nothing to do with the important aspects of getting a job, merit and ability.

This in effect is discriminatory by its very nature because it is promoting people on non–objective criteria and it is also very harmful to the economy. It is also very insulting to the individual getting a job for characteristics that have nothing to do with their education, their ability or their merit. I do not think that was ever taken into consideration by the government.

I do not think the government has put itself into the shoes of those individuals getting jobs like that. Furthermore it causes divisions and discrimination within the workplace. That is not fair and it is not good for the soul of the country.

The logic of the new employment equity law is clearly a flagrant abuse of the charter of human rights and freedoms. If one looks at the charter one can argue quite persuasively that employment equity is discrimination and should be thrown out on that ground alone. In other areas of the world where employment equity has been put forth such as California and in the province of Ontario, it has been thrown out. Why has it been thrown it? It does not work, it is discriminatory and it causes incredible social divisions within the populations it is supposed to help.

That is not what we want in Canada. We want a country in which everybody is treated equally, in which people advance on merit and in which people can look at each other face to face as equals with mutual respect and admiration.

We do not want Canada to uphold policies that are divisive and which pit groups of people against each other. That has gone on for far too long. I challenge people in the government to go into the streets and ask people in the workforce about this. Tragically that is what has happened. We should not have that in such a beautiful country as ours, a country that has historically done an admirable job of merging so many ethnic groups in a peaceful environment. That is something all Canadians need to be proud of because very few countries enjoy that.

Employment equity also seeks to promote quotas. No matter what members of the government say on the other side, employment equity means quotas. It means numbers. Any employer will say that is what they are obligated to do.

The unfortunate thing that employment equity brings forth is the whole aspect of work for equal value. It is an artificial designation that tries to have the government determine what kind of work should be paid for equally with another disparate work. What kind of work is supposedly of equal value in an economy? The only legitimate place to decide what work should be paid for and its value is in a free market economy. That cannot be designated by government power. It must be decided in a free market economy. Anything less is extremely destructive.

• (1740)

Governments must argue for laws which are anti–discriminatory. The debate which took place a few moments ago involved my colleague and a member of the government. What struck me as very interesting was that they were both arguing the same point. They both want laws which are anti–discriminatory and feel the government's role is to ensure those laws are on the books and that they are applied.

The second role of government is to apply equal opportunity. It is imperative, particularly for those most dispossessed in our society, to have equal opportunity. That is one of the failings we see. Many people who are in the lower socioeconomic strata do not have that opportunity. It is important we create that opportunity so they can become the best they can become. That is the legitimate role of government. We in this party would strive very strongly for that and we would help government members to put forth strong plans and strong legislation to create the greatest opportunities for people.

The other aspect is to create fairness. It does not matter whether a person is black, brown, polka dotted, aboriginal, male, female, Jewish, Christian, Muslim or Hindu. What matters is that the laws and the opportunities to get jobs are applied equally.

The hon. member brought up the point of people applying for a job and being discriminated against. We completely agree. We are arm in arm with enforcing those laws so that when a person applies for a job they are treated on their ability and their merit.

The other role of government is to create skills. Tragically we saw that money was pulled away from post–secondary education very recently. We understand very clearly the situation all governments across the country are in with fiscal problems. There is a way around that. We can cut from the federal budget but give the provinces the ability to raise the moneys themselves for education. We cannot build a strong economy and provide individuals with the skills necessary for them to get jobs in the 21st century if we cannot make educational opportunities available to them.

The single most important determining factor in getting a job is post–secondary education. It is important for us to support the post–secondary educational facilities so they understand what the needs of the economy will be in the future. We must provide them the ability to communicate those economic needs to the students, particularly when they are in high school, so they can plan for the future.

I hope we do not pursue employment equity. It has been a failure in other parts of the world. It is discriminatory. It is a tragic example of Orwellian social engineering, a type of social engineering we do not need.

We are very sensitive to the needs of the disadvantaged. The hon. member mentioned the plight of the aboriginals. I have worked with many aboriginals under the most tragic and harrowing circumstances. It breaks my heart to see what they have to endure. It is very important for us to understand that historically we have created an institutionalized welfare state in which the souls of these people have been broken. It is important for us to address their needs in a sensitive fashion and to provide them the skills and opportunities to enable them to take off the yolk of poverty and discrimination which they have endured for so long.

However, it is not the job of government to push people into jobs based on their characteristics. I hope the government will take this to heart. I hope the minister of aboriginal affairs will engage in activities which will help these people help themselves. I hope we can create a country that is free of prejudice and full of opportunity, that makes sure that Canadians are treated equally and we can look at each other face to face as equals in an environment of peace and harmony.

I know we in this party would like to stand together with all members in this House to ensure that legislation is effected to enable all Canadians to live in that environment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 5.46 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

UNDERGROUND ECONOMY

The House resumed from September 27 consideration of the motion.

Ms. Susan Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak today on Motion No. M–382 introduced by the hon. member for Mississauga South.

The issue of the underground economy is of concern to me and should be of concern to all Canadians. Most Canadians have been faced with an offer to pay cash for a lower price. When someone offers a lower price for cash and does not provide an invoice, at least two things happen: one, the consumer has no protection or recourse against poor workmanship; and two, governments lose revenue.

The greater the activity in the underground economy, the less revenue there is available to governments. Underground economic activity creates unfair competition for honest businesses. Jobs are lost and honest taxpayers are forced to pay more than their fair share of taxes.

I have spoken with the people of my constituency about the underground economy. Those who follow the law and pay their share of taxes do not like having to pay higher taxes because others are trying to cheat the system. Entrepreneurs who are trying to make an honest living say they do not like being at a competitive disadvantage to businesses and tradespeople who ask for cash payments to avoid paying taxes.

My constituents worry over how lost revenue is affecting the government's ability to maintain the social and economic programs so important to our well–being. When we accept the terms of a cash deal, what we end up doing is condoning a crime and promoting tax evasion.

As consumers, Canadians have to say no to offers of work for cash. It is in their interest to do so. First, work performed under the table means consumers are at risk if the work is poorly performed or the result is not of the quality expected. Second, as I said, it means taxes higher than they should be. Third, it means essential social services we all benefit from are being put at risk.

Businesses must recognize that in the end conducting business in the underground economy will do more harm than good. Honest businesses are put at a competitive disadvantage because they cannot offer a customer the same deal as that offered by someone who will do the work but not collect the taxes. Furthermore the reputation of an entire business sector can be damaged by just a handful of under the table entrepreneurs whose work is of poor quality.

I hear stories in my riding of Essex—Windsor about businesses that operate out of basements or backyard garages and only work for cash getting their referrals for jobs by word of mouth. These businesses usually give two quotes: a quote for doing work for cash and a second higher quote which includes the proper taxes. Many individuals and businesses engage in these illegal transactions as a way to avoid paying taxes. They think all they are doing is cheating the tax department but as I said a moment ago, their actions make victims of us all.

The negative effects of activity in the underground economy show up in the form of reduced essential savings and services, taxes higher than they would otherwise be, unfair competition and a reduced standard of living for the honest taxpayer. Governments cannot afford to allow this practice to go unchallenged. People have to know that there is fairness in the tax system, that honest businesses have a level playing field and that people who try to cheat the system will be dealt with appropriately.

The government has introduced measures for addressing the underground economy to ensure there is fairness in the way in which the tax system is being administered. The Minister of National Revenue's action plan calls on Revenue Canada:

First, to encourage voluntary compliance by making clear why compliance is important and explaining the consequences.

Second, to work closely with the provinces by setting up exchanges of information to better target and improve enforcement actions.

Third, to strengthen the department's program to identify non–filers and non–registrants.

• (1750)

Fourth, to establish special audit teams to focus on areas of high non–compliance: construction, home renovations, jewellery, hospitality, car repairs, and other service sectors.

Fifth, to work closely with other federal departments, key industry groups and professional organizations.

Last, to explore ways including legislative changes to improve reporting, to enhance the effectiveness of penalties and to improve audit and investigation techniques.

The results of the action taken to date are significant. As of last March 31 over $860 million, over three–quarters of a billion dollars, in additional taxes have been assessed as a result of the government's underground economy initiative. I should point out that the underground economy initiative is only one part of Revenue Canada's overall enforcement efforts, efforts which generated $3.7 billion in additional taxes assessed in the 1994–95 fiscal year.

The government has also established close working relationships with a large number of associations whose members know often from firsthand experience how the underground economy can hurt Canadian business. Revenue Canada has consulted with more than 240 groups, such as the Certified General Accountants Association, the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, the Canadian Home Builders Association and the Direct Sellers Association.

These groups have described how revenues and jobs are being lost. They know how businesses face unfair competition from those who do not play by the rules. Consumers lose out when they get goods and services through the underground economy since they forfeit any guarantees of quality backed by reputable firms. With their assistance, Revenue Canada is refining its strategies identifying areas of non–compliance and exploring measures for improving compliance.

In my riding the department has been in touch with the Home Builders Association and is getting information that might be useful in identifying non–compliance.

Revenue Canada also has close ties with the provinces. Co–operation arrangements are in place with all the provinces. Revenue Canada has moved beyond the simple exchange of information and the department is doing joint audits with the provinces. It is sharing audit strategies, training materials and expertise. The provinces have supplied Revenue Canada with databases containing such information as PST registrants, liquor licences, building permits and vehicle registration information as well as the names and addresses of new and used car dealers.

There is also federal and provincial co–operation in terms of ensuring that taxpayers have information to help them voluntarily comply with the law as well as information on the consequences associated with non–compliance.

For example, Revenue Canada has carried out community visits with representatives of provincial tax administrations. During these visits, businesses are given information on the underground economy and information and assistance to help them comply with the tax laws. Departmental officials also ensure that businesses are properly registered for tax purposes and when necessary, encourage businesses to comply with the law where they are not.

Across the country more than 40 community visits have been conducted involving more than 10,000 businesses. The department has increased and targeted its audits to focus on areas of high non–compliance and strengthened its ability to identify non–filers and non–registrants.

In 1994–95 an additional $245 million was assessed through the non–filer program and an equal amount through the non–registrant program. Nearly 11,000 audits were completed in the high risk sectors which resulted in a further $90 million in taxes being assessed.

Revenue Canada has increased its publicity of convictions for tax evasion. During 1994–95 there were more than 170 convictions for evasion of income tax and GST. There has been a doubling in the number of voluntary disclosures as a result and the department now receives about 19,000 referrals a year from Canadians who are tired of their neighbours and friends not paying their fair share of taxes.

Revenue Canada's preferred approach is to encourage voluntary compliance. It works. Ninety–five per cent of all revenues are collected without the need for enforcement action. A great deal has been accomplished since the Minister of National Revenue launched his action plan for addressing the underground economy in November 1993.

While the government has introduced concrete measures for addressing the underground economy, it is not exclusively the government's responsibility. All Canadians must do their part, individuals and businesses alike.

Canadians need to talk about the negative consequences of the underground economy. They must resist the temptation and simply say no. I urge members of the House to carry this message back to their constituents. I urge members of the House to work diligently with their constituents to come up with the answers.

I would like to thank the member for Mississauga South for putting forward the motion allowing us to debate an issue of extreme importance to all Canadians. The motion has forced members on both sides of the House to talk about a serious problem. I am hopeful it will eventually result in those now in the underground economy returning to the legitimate economy. I am confident that we are making the right progress in dealing with the problem.

• (1755)

Mrs. Rose-Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to make a few comments on Motion No. 382 sponsored by the member for Mississauga South.

Let me say from the outset that I have spoken with a number of people who run businesses in my riding of Lambton—Middlesex about the underground economy. Those who respect the law and pay their taxes do not appreciate having to pay higher taxes simply because others are trying to cheat the system.

Entrepreneurs and small business people who are trying very hard to make a living do not like being at a competitive disadvantage of businesses and tradespeople who ask for cash payment to avoid paying taxes. My constituents also worry over how lost revenue is affecting the government's ability to maintain Canada's social and economic programs which are so important to our well-being.

The issue that is the focus of this motion is of major importance to all Canadians right across the country. The greater the activity in the underground economy, the less revenue there is available to government. Underground economic activity creates unfair competition for honest businesses. Jobs are lost and honest taxpayers are forced to pay more than their fair share of taxes.

There has been a great deal written about the size, extent, nature and causes of the underground economy. As members are probably aware, estimates on the size of the underground economy vary widely depending upon the methodology used, anywhere from 2.5 per cent to 3 per cent of GDP to over 20 per cent, or from $20 billion to $140 billion a year. Regardless of its size, there is no disputing the fact that the underground economy exists and its corrosive efforts are exacting a huge toll on Canadian society.

Why then do people make the decision to go underground? There are many reasons. However, I would submit that none of these reasons is legitimate. There is the myth that everyone is doing it, so I may as well. There is the perception of the GST as an unfair tax which enables someone to rationalize their behaviour as acceptable. Others perceive the tax system as too complex and cumbersome to even bother with it. Then there are those who feel that it is easy to get away with it, so why not take the chance?

We have to also acknowledge a widespread disrespect for government and politicians and the accompanying perception that government is wasting the money it takes in from Canadians and that they are getting poor value for their tax dollars.

While none of these reasons can justify not paying one's fair share of taxes, the fact remains that an unfortunate snowballing effect is created once the decision is made to go underground. There is the fear that once one has gone underground, it is too difficult to come out.

There is the perception that if people have gone underground long enough, they might not be able to come out even if they wanted to because there would be no possibility to pay the taxes, let alone the interest and penalties, simply because there would be no paper trail made up of bills, invoices and so on. Faced with this set of circumstances, those who would like to reform their bad habits perceive it cannot be done. They are somehow stuck.

One of the most attractive aspects of Motion No. 382 is the provision for a limited amnesty on interest and penalties otherwise payable when a taxpayer voluntarily declares income previously undeclared. The inducement to go straight would allow the previously delinquent taxpayers to voluntarily come forward without penalty for a limited time and start paying his or her fair share of taxes once again.

Another component of the motion is a proposed tax credit to taxpayers on home improvements and renovations. This would provide an inducement to create an essential paper trail and to serve as one of the primary vehicles for a country wide information campaign.

The motion before the House demonstrates a desire on the part of the member for Mississauga South to get Canadians talking about the negative consequences of the underground economy and to hopefully find ways to encourage as many people as possible to return to the legitimate economy.

There must be a public campaign which emphasizes that tax evasion is a crime and that it is certainly not a victimless crime as is often argued. All Canadians are victims, because tax evasion leads to job loss, increase in the deficit, honest taxpayers carrying more of the burden, and legitimate businesses operating in an environment of unfair competition, sometimes leading to their bankruptcy.

• (1800)

I believe the co-existence of the amnesty program and the tax credit for home renovations with more traditional public awareness campaigns would serve to educate Canadians on the facts of the seriousness of the existence of the underground economy and how they can help to eliminate it. I also believe there will be a change in the attitude of Canadians toward paying their fair share of taxes if they can be convinced that government is upholding its responsibility in enforcing the law in a tough but fair fashion.

To his credit, the Minister of National Revenue, through a series of thoughtful initiatives over the past year and a half, has been successful in recovering over $800 million in unpaid taxes. But the department has done more than just collect unpaid taxes. Through consultation with over 240 groups and associations, the department has learned how to refine its strategies, identify areas of non-compliance, and explore measures for improving compliance. For example, the government's recent budget announcement of a measure to address the problem of the underground economy in the construction industry is a direct result of its consultation efforts.

The department has increased its publicity of convictions for tax evasion. As a result, there has been a doubling of the number of voluntary disclosures. The department now receives about 19,000 referrals a year from Canadians who are tired of some of their neighbours and friends not paying their fair share of taxes.

The motion before the House demonstrates a desire on the part of members to get Canadians talking about the negative consequences of the underground economy and hopefully find ways of encouraging as many people as possible to return to the legitimate workplace within the mainstream economy.

I would like to take this opportunity to fully endorse the motion brought forward by the member for Mississauga South and I would encourage all members of the House to do likewise.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this private member's bill by the member for Mississauga South. I hope his constituents will appreciate the hard work he has put into this. I know of his deep concern. Members of Parliament have all heard this concern from our constituents. Perhaps there is no concern that hits as close to the heart of every citizen in the country as what is taking place in the underground economy. I applaud the hon. member for trying to address the problem.

The underground economy is costing the Canadian economy upwards of $90 billion every year. The underground economy is a clear response from the taxpayers that they are angry and fearful. They are angry because they see more and more of their pay cheques being eroded and they receive less and less money to provide for their needs. It is becoming increasingly difficult to survive in this country. Perhaps the single most important reason for this is because of our tax structure. I will look at the reasons a little later.

The high taxes have also damaged our ability to compete internationally. For a country such as ours, which relies on our export potential to maintain our standard of living, there is perhaps no other factor within our economy that is so damaging to the ability for us to do that. We worked so hard to get agreements on the NAFTA and the free trade agreement, but we have unfortunately hamstrung the ability of businesses in the country to compete internationally. The single most important reason we cannot do it is because of the tax structure. We have seen many business go under. When I go back to my home in Toronto, I see many businesses that have been passed down from generation to generation that have gone bankrupt. The reason is partly because of the tax structure.

• (1805)

We see many businesses that flock south. People hold up the free trade agreement as a reason that is so, our inability to compete. The real reason most companies have actually fled south is because of the high tax structure, which strangles the ability of Canadian companies to compete internationally. We have one of the highest tax structures in the world.

Yesterday we saw that the IMF has actually downgraded our ability to get money from the IMF. The reason is because our ability to get our debt and deficit down is not good enough. The high taxes that we have are the result of the high debt and deficit that we have in this country, nothing else. It has been a consequence of course of the high spending that Canadians have endured for years and years, overspending by successive governments. This has combined with an extremely complex tax structure and high administration costs to create the terrible tax structure we have today. The result of that has been the underground economy, which is costing us $90 billion or more a year. That is why the hon. member for Mississauga South has put forth these endeavours.

I will talk for a moment on what I agree with and what I disagree with. Part C of the hon. member's bill, which would provide a tax credit for individuals who wish to hire other individuals in their homes to do work, is a very good one. It will provide transparency in a system that is currently opaque. A good member from my community in Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Mrs. Shirley Wilde, put forth a similar idea. We have presented this to the Minister of National Revenue. I look forward to a response from him in the near future. I hope this is something we can work together on in this House.

I disagree with part A of his bill, the information campaign, for the simple reason that it will entail costs and expenses for the government and will add to the tax burden of Canadians.

I suggest the government look at new ways to get our spending under control, to get the deficit down to zero, and to attack the true ogre in this equation, which is the debt. We presented our zero in three deficit reduction plan, which I hope the government will look at, because there are very sensitive but very concrete ways in which we can get our spending down so that it will not hurt the people in our country, in particular those who are most dispossessed, which is something we share a common interest in.

We have to get the GST down and simplify it. When we go out to the business community, no other single complaint so irks them as the GST, a system that is unfathomable, entirely complex, and whose administration costs chew up over one-third of the moneys that are generated.

We have to decrease taxes overall. Back in 1992 the government of the day did decrease taxes. Interestingly enough, it found that its revenues increased. What did it do? It began taxing wildly. This wild taxing spree, instead of increasing government revenues, actually decreased them. There is a lesson in there for any government: decrease the taxes and the public will become more honest in their representations and will spend more. In fact, there will be a stimulation to the economy.

I ask the government and the Minister of Finance and Minister of National Revenue to look at the flat tax that has been proposed by our party. The flat tax will provide equanimity to all Canadians.

One of the things that make Canadians extremely furious is they feel that the more they work the less they have to take home; the harder they work, the more they give to the government. Little erodes the soil of the Canadian economy or any economy more than if a worker feels that if they work harder they are going to take home less. We have to institute the incentive factor back into the soul of the Canadian economy. Right now it is dead. Canadian workers wonder why they should work harder when they are giving more and more tax money to the government and less and less money is left for them to spend.

• (1810)

I ask that we provide the Canadian people with increased earning power, with an increased ability to keep more money at home. The only we way can decrease the extent of the underground economy is to get spending by the Canadian government under control. Canadians are fed up with the overspending. We must do this not only for the future of the people in this House and our families but for future generations.

I appreciate the hon. member's introduction of this private member's bill. I hope we can look at part C of that bill to discover new ways to increase transparency in the economy we have now so we can decrease the extent of the present underground economy so there will be more money in the public coffers and fairness and greater equanimity among the tax structures we have.

We are working on this together. I hope we can come together to develop a tax structure that is fairer to all Canadians, a tax structure that provides the government with the ability to get its spending under control while providing more money for Canadians to spend.

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the member for Mississauga South on Motion No. 382, which addresses the ongoing problem of the underground economy. The motion demonstrates his interest in the problem. It encourages debate on something that really has bedevilled the government in our attack on both the deficit and our desire to pursue and maintain our social programs, because the collection of revenues is impeded.

I hope this debate allows Canadians to focus as well on the problem and to reflect on the difficulties created by the underground economy. In my constituency of Windsor—St. Clair I hear regularly from constituents who understand the problem and who resent their neighbours who operate within the underground economy.

Cash business transactions, cheap smuggled beverage alcohol, under the table employment, and other practices of this type shortchange all of us. When we do this we do not remit taxes. The taxes themselves would help to maintain our health plans, our roads, our universities, our social programs. When we do this we help to create unfair competition for honest businesses who do remit taxes. When our neighbours do it, they help ratchet up our own tax bills.

This motion calls on the government to consider establishing initiatives to address the underground economy that exists in Canada today. A great deal has been written about this phenomenon: its size, the social and economic costs, the reasons people abandon the legitimate economy in favour of under the table transactions, and suggestions for dealing with the problem.

The issue is of concern to me and it should be of concern to all Canadians because the underground economy has significant implications for all of us. The greater the activity in the underground economy, as I said earlier, the less revenue available to governments. The creation of unfair competition for honest businesses has driven some small new businesses, marginal businesses, out of operation. This results in lost jobs and in us paying more taxes.

I agree with the hon. member for Mississauga South that Canadians must act on the problem of the underground economy. I say all Canadians because the responsibility for dealing with the issue does not rest entirely on the shoulders of the government. We all have a responsibility and a role to play. Public confidence in Canada's tax system depends on all of us paying our fair share and having the confidence that our neighbours are doing so as well.

Individuals and businesses involved in underground economic activity are not playing by the rules. Governments cannot afford to allow the practice to go unchallenged. People have to know there is fairness in the tax system. They have to know that honest businesses have a level playing field and that people who try to cheat are going to be dealt with appropriately.

Public confidence depends on effective government measures as well. It is for this reason that our government has introduced measures to address the underground economy and other forms of non–compliance. Revenue Canada has put in place a compliance strategy that supports self–assessment and voluntary compliance through assistance, education, services, and responsible enforcement. It seeks to ensure that revenues legitimately owed to the government are collected. The strategy is comprehensive, covering the entire portfolio of Revenue Canada and all dimensions of revenue administration. It is also dynamic because it is sensitive to modern business practices and the changing forces at play in both the national and local economies.

• (1815)

It is a targeted program which makes use of modern technologies, compliance research and a cross–matching of information from Revenue Canada's extensive databases, other federal departments and provincial revenue administrations.

The department's approach also recognizes there are many different kinds of taxpayers, individuals, corporations, salaried employees and others.

The department has launched special projects as well to address areas of systemic concern, as in the case with its underground economy initiative announced by the minister of revenue in November of 1993. The department has established special audit teams to focus on construction, home renovation, jewellery, hospitality, auto sales, repairs and other service sectors which are areas of high non–compliance. Under this initiative we have put agreements into place with all of the provinces to co–ordinate actions and to ensure progress.

The government's underground economy initiative also involves working closely with business, unions, industry and professional groups to identify ways to further strengthen Revenue Canada's enforcement efforts and to encourage voluntary compliance. During the last year departmental officials consulted extensively with more than 240 groups. They know that tax evasion cheats honest workers out of steady, secure employment and compromises the ability of governments to provide service. They want to help.

Specifically I will address that part of the motion which suggests some relief or limited forgiveness on interest and other penalties which would be payable when a taxpayer voluntarily declares previously undeclared income. This section of the motion calls for an amnesty. The suggestion is an interesting one in terms of how it might facilitate the return of individuals and businesses from the underground economy to the legitimate economy. In no way, however, should it be possible for taxpayers to get away with not paying the taxes they owe. There is merit to the thrust behind the suggestion but I think there are some problems with it as it is framed here.

Opportunities already exist for Canadians who may have deficiencies in their tax reporting to come forward and get a clean bill of health from Revenue Canada. The preferred approach to non–compliance is voluntary disclosure. The department has a voluntary disclosure policy which I as a lawyer in my previous life was able to use to assist clients who had been following business and personal tax practices which did not comply with the law.

This policy allows individuals, partnerships, corporations, trusts, non–profit organizations, charitable and other organizations to come forward to correct deficiencies in their reporting to the department. When a disclosure is made voluntarily before the department has started its audit or other enforcement action, then no penalties or other sanctions such as prosecution for tax evasion will be imposed. The taxpayer will have to pay the amount of taxes or duty owing plus interest. This is a fair policy. It is a form of amnesty which has been available for some time.

I do not agree, however, that interest should be set aside. The interest owed reflects the true value of the money. It also recognizes the fact that those who have not paid their taxes on time have had the use of these funds, which essentially they were holding in trust for the government.

Revenue Canada under its voluntary disclosure policy takes a responsible approach to collections. Arrangements can be worked out so that the taxes owing to the government are paid in a manner which does not cause undue hardship for the taxpayers. This aspect is particularly important to those individuals or businesses operating in the underground economy for some time that feel they would face onerous penalties if they were to come clean and operate honestly.

A person can make a voluntary disclosure by contacting a Revenue Canada office directly or by having someone do it on their behalf, such as an accountant, a lawyer or a friend who wants to assist. A disclosure will be considered voluntary so long as it is made before Revenue Canada has basically started its audit or any other enforcement action.

• (1820)

As a result of co–operative agreements Revenue Canada has with the provinces, we are working toward developing a co–ordinated voluntary disclosure policy with all of the provinces. It is our view that a consistent policy among the federal and provincial governments with respect to disclosure will make it easier for taxpayers who have decided to rejoin the legitimate economy.

I believe we need to be careful about tax amnesties. When tried in the past, more extensive tax amnesties than what are available under the voluntary disclosure program, they have had only limited effect. They may actually create more non–compliance. This happens because people believe that once an amnesty is in place others will follow and so they can wait and delay co–operation. The result is less compliance, not more.

People also believe that when there is an amnesty policy in place that will forgive interest it becomes their right to avoid paying interest on taxes.

A great deal has been accomplished since the Minister of National Revenue introduced his action plan for addressing the underground economy. The initiative has resulted in more than $860 million in additional taxes assessed. Revenue Canada's ability to identify non–filers and non–registrants has been strengthened. The department has put co–operation agreements in place with all of the provinces and is working in partnership with private sector groups.

It is clear Canadians are concerned about the underground economy and that Canadians are willing to work together to find solutions. I thank the member again for this motion. I congratulate him on it because it demonstrates a desire on his part and on the part of his constituents to get Canadians talking about the negative consequences of the underground economy and to find ways of encouraging as many people as possible to return to the legitimate economy.

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will make a few comments in support of Motion No. 382, sponsored by the member for Mississauga South.

We as as government are asking people to make significant sacrifices in the name of deficit reduction. I believe most Canadians understand the seriousness of the situation and are prepared to make these sacrifices.

While they may grumble about taxation, Canadians in general are quite prepared to contribute a fair portion of their income in return for the services they want. They have made it very clear the services they want include medical care, solid infrastructure and transportation systems, safe communities and income security for all Canadians.

However, I also believe they are fed up with seeing their hard earned money wasted over the years in ways they would never countenance. They want us to spend their money the same way they spend it, carefully, thoughtfully, with due consideration of what it took to earn the money in the first place. That expectation is fair because after all it is their money.

The public is watching us very closely. When it hears of lavish spending or wasted funds at any level of government, federal, provincial or municipal, its confidence in all governments is eroded.

We as a government recognized this right from the start and have taken many steps to ensure that taxpayers get their money's worth. This is extremely important and I urge all members to keep up their vigilance in this area.

When people see government as a black hole, sucking their money in and giving nothing back, they tend to wonder why they should pay tax on that kitchen renovation or that load of gravel.

• (1825)

For many individuals and businesses, participating in the underground economy has become a convenient way not only to avoid paying taxes but to take some small action against what they see as governments they do not trust placing unfair burdens on them.

They may feel their financial situation justifies their actions. It may be several years since their last pay raise or even their last regular pay cheque. They may have lost their previous job because of government cutbacks or downsizing. They may feel the tax system is too complex or unfair.

Whatever the reason, it is of paramount importance they come to understand the damage they are doing to the economy of the country and ultimately to themselves. Estimates on the size of the underground economy vary widely depending on the methodology used from $20 billion to $140 billion a year.

Even if one were to assume the lower figure is more correct, that is still $20 billion not available to governments to provide necessary services for their taxpayers.

Underground economic activity creates unfair competition for honest businesses, jobs are lost, honest taxpayers are forced to pay more than their fair share of taxes, and once again they feel cheated. It is a vicious cycle and people must understand the underground economy makes victims of us all.

We in the House as well as all Canadians must consider the real cost of underground economic activity. The cost is huge. It shows up in reduced essential services, taxes that are higher than they would otherwise be, unfair competition and a reduced standard of living for the honest taxpayer.

How does the underground economy affect the legitimate business person trying to be competitive? Right from the start honest business people are at a competitive disadvantage because they cannot offer a customer the same deal offered by someone who will do the work but not collect the taxes. The end result is that the legitimate business person faces unfair competition and jobs are lost.

The consumer who takes the lower price and pays cash must understand that he or she is cheating the system and becoming party to the evasion of taxes. They must come to understand they are benefiting from the full range of government services but that by engaging in the underground economy they are no longer paying their fair share. They are taking part in a transaction that jeopardizes our health, education and other essential economic and social services.

The motion before the House suggests the government educate the public and encourage its participation in addressing the problem. I support this suggestion wholeheartedly. Canadians need to know the facts about the seriousness of the underground economy and what can be done to reduce it.

The government has recognized this essential truth and has made education a fundamental element of its action plan to address the underground economy.

During the past year officials of Revenue Canada have been actively consulting with individuals and associations across Canada.

With the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, for example, the department established a working committee to investigate the causes of the underground economy, examine audit techniques and identify training that would assist in tracking down unreported or under reported income and identify opportunities for reducing the cost and administrative burden of compliance for businesses and individuals.

These groups are taking the message of the risks of dealing in the underground economy back to their membership. The message is simple: Every citizen and every business has a role to play in eliminating the underground economy. Individuals can start by refusing to deal with businesses and tradespeople who ask for cash payments. Businesses can do their part by turning down demands to do work off the books.

• (1830)

The increased publicity given this problem by the minister of National Revenue is having an effect. The number of voluntary disclosures where people come forward to voluntarily correct their tax affairs has doubled in the past year. The member's suggestion that a limited amnesty on interest and penalties be offered to taxpayers who voluntarily declare income previously undeclared is a good one and will result in even more honest Canadians coming forward.

I am confident that we are making progress in dealing with the underground economy and other forms of tax evasion. I applaud the member for Mississauga South for his efforts to stimulate discussion on the issue. I urge members of the House to carry the message back to their constituents.

We in government have recognized that we must take positive action to restore respect, trust and confidence in government and we are doing our part. I urge members to talk to their constituents about the underground economy, its seriousness and how it can be reduced. I urge Canadians to do their part to discourage this harmful activity.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): This brings to a conclusion the debate on Private Members' Motion No. M–382.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

(Motion agreed to.)

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

GOVERNMENT SUBSIDIES

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I wish to go back to an answer I deem unsatisfactory which the Minister of Human Resources Development gave to a two–part question on unemployment insurance and training I put to him during question period on September 28.

In his reply, the Minister of Human Resources Development made a comment which I would describe as somewhat improper in that he responded, not accepting my position with respect to training, that:

> —there is something the matter with the hon. member. I have a letter he wrote me asking for my support in a youth project sponsored by the federal government in his riding. I am very pleased to say I would certainly like to give him the assurance of supporting that project if he can give me the assurance of supporting the no vote on October 30.

Mr. Crête: Unacceptable.

Mr. Dubé: As my colleague for Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup suggests, totally unacceptable because this shows a contempt for democracy.

Yet the Minister of Human Resources Development is an experienced parliamentarian. A parliamentarian who has been in opposition for at least nine years. For nine years, and I have read and reread many of his speeches, he has been severely critical of the accomplishments of the Conservative government, as it was his role to do. I find no fault with that. When he was in the opposition, it was his role to criticize government programs.

In this case, he refers to one letter, yet the next day the parliamentary secretary indicated to me that there was a second letter on two projects. As for the projects in question, there was a project sponsored by Ateliers Jeunesse in my riding, a project called JET created to set up a part time job bank for high school students. It had nothing whatsoever to do with training.

• (1835)

The next day, the parliamentary secretary, substituting for the minister, mentioned another project connected with Youth Service Canada. Sure, I criticized Youth Service Canada, but this was for an incubator program. My complaints about Youth Service Canada were about the fact that the training components contradicted of Quebec's policy on manpower training.

I was consistent in supporting the project submitted under this program because there was no manpower training component. The emphasis was more on an incubator program to help young people create their own business.

I would have a lot more to say about this, but since there is so little time, I would say it is a matter of principle. As I see it, this is blackmail, an attack on our democratic system.

I was elected by the people of my riding to represent them. That was my purpose when I sent projects to the minister for his approval. Now he asks me to support the No side, and if I do, he will approve this project. That is unacceptable.

If it were an isolated incident, I would say it was just a slip of the tongue. In that case, the minister should have said: "Listen, I spoke without thinking. That is not what I meant". But the next day he was not in the House, and he let his parliamentary secretary answer instead, who proceeded to criticize my criticism of this program.

I think that is unacceptable, especially in the present circumstances when comments of this kind keep cropping up. For instance, in a secret document prepared by Industry Canada, companies were listed according to their political allegiance, to see whether the projects should be funded.

I think that is unacceptable. I am making this speech today within the precincts of the House of Commons, where we meet as democratically elected representatives. I invoke the right we have in this House to demand that this be rectified, that members opposite on the government side stop their blackmail, because we will not tolerate this.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me this opportunity. It seems no one will bother to respond. Very democratic indeed.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to point out that the Minister of Human Resources Development was rather surprised at the support shown by the hon. member for Lévis for a Youth Service Canada project in his riding.

This was the same member who had previously said Youth Service Canada was an invasion of provincial jurisdiction. It is therefore difficult to account for the enthusiastic support shown by the hon. member, considering his opinion of federal initiatives.

Nevertheless, as the Secretary of State for Training and Youth pointed out to the hon. member in a letter dated September 5, 1995, the proposal is still quite interesting, but we need a few details.

The promoter, Alliance–Jeunesse, was asked to revise its proposal, and the Youth Service Canada secretariat offered to send one of its representatives to provide assistance. As soon as we receive the proposal, I can assure the hon. member it will be processed immediately.

Meanwhile, I think the hon. member will be pleased to hear that the minister has already provided a great deal in the way of employment assistance in his riding. In fact, according to the latest figures, those available for 1994–95, assistance for residents in the riding of Lévis totalled $7.7 million. That is a very substantial amount.

This would seem to argue against the assumption of the hon. member that the minister allocates funding on the basis of the way the member for the riding voted or intends to vote.

Clearly the hon. member's allegation has no basis in fact.

• (1840)

[English]

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today in question period I asked a question about the share of spinoffs from Canadian international development aid that goes to Quebec. From what I have heard over the past few weeks in question period from Bloc Quebecois members, it seems they cannot decide whether they want the federal government to spend money in Quebec.

The Bloc claims that Quebec would be better off outside Canada in a separate country. However the facts and even the reports put out by the Parti Quebecois government in Quebec show that is not true. They show that Quebec is much better off inside Canada than it would be as a separate country.

One example of those kinds of facts is the case of international development aid.

[Translation]

For the year 1992–93, the last year for which provincial comparisons were made, nearly 30 per cent of IDA supplies came from Quebec. One third—which means 33.4 per cent—of registered consultants are from Quebec. More than one third—which means 36.3 per cent—of the contracts go to Quebec. The value of these contracts—a little less than $100 million—represents about one third or 33.1 per cent of the national total.

[English]

It is very clear that with approximately 25 per cent or a little less of the population of Canada or about one–third of these contracts in relation to international aid, Quebec does very well under the CIDA programs and under programs relating to international aid.

On the other hand, in the past at least Atlantic Canada has done so well. Atlantic Canada in recent years has received less than its share of international development aid spinoffs. We are seeking improvements in that regard.

I had the pleasure of serving on the foreign affairs committee until recently when I was moved to the justice committee. Last spring we had the president of the Canadian International Development Agency before our committee on the estimates. I had the opportunity to question her about a number of things. One of the matters I asked her about was the share of development aid contracts and spinoffs going to the Atlantic region. She agreed that there needed to be work done to improve that number. She recognizes or should recognize that Atlantic Canadian companies can perform as well as anyone else. I think we showed during the Halifax G–7 meeting that Atlantic Canadians can do things as well as anyone in the rest of the country and in fact the rest of the world.

I am looking forward to seeing the results of this year. I am hoping to see considerable improvements in regard to the level of the share of CIDA contracts going to Atlantic Canada.

Atlantic Canada has other complaints in other areas where we feel we do not necessarily always get our share. However we believe very strongly in the country. I think the majority of Quebecers believe strongly in the country; they believe strongly in Canada. Like the majority of Quebecers, we believe we can continue to work together to work out our problems. We can continue to improve and build Canada, the best country in the world.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, all of Canada's regions, without exception, benefit from the spinoffs of the official development assistance budget. The Government of Canada is not shy about drawing on the know–how of Canadians, who have both the necessary skills and the desire to contribute to the growth of a developing country.

Quebec has a wealth of such skills. It has always been committed to helping the most disadvantaged peoples. The Government of Canada is fully aware of this and regularly draws on this knowledge and goodwill in carrying out its assistance program.

This is how a number of Quebec companies have obtained contracts from the Canadian government enabling them to export their know–how. Permit me to name a few whose contribution is well known. They include the Société Vitronov of Montreal, which this year won the award of excellence from the Canadian Exporters' Association for an innovative project in biotechnology in Morocco. Other companies include SR Télécom, ADS Associés, Tecsult, to mention but a few.

The fact is that Quebec receives much of the spinoffs of Canadian ODA. Nearly 30 per cent of ODA procurement is done in Quebec. More than a third, 36.3 per cent, of contracts are concluded in Quebec.

Of the 45,000 jobs created in Canada by official development assistance, over 12,000 are in "la belle province".

Like other Canadians, Quebecers are opening up more and more to the world. They understand, as the century draws to a close, that the planetary stakes are so high we must pool our resources and strengthen existing partnerships.

The ODA program tries to resolve problems that present a real threat to security, both in Canada and in the rest of the world. The Government of Canada intends to continue to draw on Quebec know–how in helping to make the world a richer and a fairer place.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 38, the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24.

(The House adjourned at 6.47 p.m.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, October 6, 1995

The House met at 10 a.m.

Prayers

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY ACT

The House resumed from October 5 consideration of the motion that Bill C–64, an act respecting employment equity, be read the third time and passed.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, one thing that makes me most proud about being a parliamentarian is the opportunity to be a part of the passage of legislation like Bill C–64.

When each one of us makes the decision to run for public office it is because we have certain agendas, certain policies we want to put forward. Seven years ago next week, when I was first nominated to run for public office, I had an agenda and I still do. That agenda has a great deal to do with human rights. It has a great deal to do with regional disparity. It has a great deal to do with feminism and it has a great deal to do with fairness. Bill C–64 is a piece of legislation that certainly fits into my agenda. It fits into one of the reasons that although I was born into the great Liberal Party I chose it again as a student in university and later when I decided to run.

There are frequently misunderstandings about the expression employment equity. For example, there are people who confuse employment equity and affirmative action. Employment equity and affirmative action, while complementary, are not the same.

I used an analogy when I spoke at report stage and I will do it again because it bears repeating. At report stage I talked about the fact that we could use a medical metaphor. Employment equity is preventive. It is a preventive measure. It ensures that we do the right thing from the beginning. Affirmative action is curative. I might add, for those people who through misunderstanding find affirmative action repugnant, that affirmative action is enshrined in the charter of rights and freedoms and as such is something Canadians have taken to most strongly, not just Canadians of this political stripe but the majority of Canadians.

Affirmative action would not be necessary if employment equity were the rule rather than the exception.

• (1005)

A couple of phrases and a couple of taglines have arisen throughout the debate that need to be dealt with. The one I have to talk about is the usage of two words together in the English language whenever we talk about employment equity. Those two words are competent and woman. When I hear my colleagues say a competent woman should be allowed, another word I truly love, to advance as far as anyone else, I sit here in vacant and in pensive mood and wonder why we never use those words together about competent men.

Why are we always so afraid that some woman might slip through and might not be competent? With the greatest of respect—and I have already said on several occasions in this debate how fond of men I am in general—there are some incompetent men. We have seen them and they have not suffered in the employment equity wars as have perhaps legions of competent women.

The hissy fit I just had was a little patronizing. I did it deliberately. We can argue the merits of employment equity. Certainly these expressions irritate a number of women on this side of the House—and I look at my colleagues from Oakville—Milton, Windsor—St. Clair and Etobicoke—Lakeshore—as much as they irritate me. Perhaps it is not as much as they irritate me but they certainly are irritating. Perhaps I have become more irritable in these discussions. It may be because I have been having these discussions in the Chamber longer than my three aforementioned colleagues.

Whether we are patronizing, whether women or men are competent or incompetent, whether there is a feminist agenda, whether there is a Liberal agenda—and of course there is a Liberal agenda called the red book—it is important that the bill continues the legacy of fairness. It must continue the legacy of sound social policies which have made this country the envy of the world, which have made this country the country rated number one in the United Nations survey. Everybody here knows that in their hearts, in their minds and in all their lives. It has been a great blessing for all of us either to choose to come here or to have been born here.

We enjoy longer life expectancy, higher educational levels and a greater real income than anyone else in the world. This is an outstanding record of which anyone in Canada can and should be proud. However, it is based on a history of fair legislation, human rights legislation and employment equity legislation.

It began back in the days of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. It followed through with Mackenzie King, to Louis St. Laurent, to Lester Pearson, to Pierre Trudeau and now to the current Prime Minister. It is a legacy we in the Liberal Party are justly proud of and it is one that we will continue to further.

It would be dangerous, however, to sit back, to rest on our laurels and say that because of this history Canada is somehow a perfect place. It is not a perfect place. It is not a perfect place if one belongs to a visible minority. It is not a perfect place if one is a woman. It is not a perfect place if one has a disability. It is not a perfect place if one falls under any of the prohibited headings in the charter of rights and freedoms. We know that discrimination is still a fact of life; every one of us knows it. The whole reason for discrimination is fear of the unknown, fear of people unlike us, fear that somehow people who are unlike us will take something away from us or away from our children. However there is a Canadian tradition that rises above fear.

• (1010)

We are only now emerging from one of the worst recessionary periods in our history. Most of us in the House of Commons belong to that amorphous mass known as the post–war baby boom. This recession was the first real attack on our very privileged lives. Many of us were lucky enough to weather it without huge injury but many of us were not.

I stood in the House on many occasions in opposition and talked about the cost in human terms of the recession. I talked about the rate of bankruptcies, the small business losses. I talked about the number of young people, both men and women, who were not getting jobs and did not have any hope.

We are recovering. We know it and we see it. It is not coming perhaps as fast as we would like but it is coming. Consequently, because Canada is coming back to its accustomed prosperity, the time has come for legislation like Bill C–64 to shore up our employment equity promises and to ensure that all Canadians have fair opportunity.

There are times when it is important to deal with questions of gender equality with a relatively light touch. Members of the female gender remind male colleagues that life is better from womb to tomb for the lords of creation.

I said in the House the other day that in spite of the fears of some of our colleagues in opposition, white males get 50 per cent of federal government jobs. They get 60 per cent of the jobs nationally in both the private and public sector combined. Even more overwhelming, white males get 90 per cent of the promotions. With figures like that I believe it would be safe to say, and I do not think anyone would argue with me, probably the white male is not exactly an endangered species in the economic climate.

An hon. member: It is if we keep drinking the water.

Ms. Clancy: That may well be. I have spoken frequently to the hon. member for Edmonton Northwest about the amount of water he consumes in the House of Commons. I will not make any comments about the amount of air he deals with or the temperature.

However there are people in the country who suffer because the federal employment equity act does not have teeth until we pass this amendment. It cannot really be enforced. Bill C–64 brings in needed enforcement measures.

I talked about the fact that in opposition I was the vice–chair of the committee to review the employment equity legislation. We heard witnesses from all over the country. I remember in particular a group from the province of Saskatchewan that fell under federal jurisdiction and had taken to heart most seriously the whole question of employment equity.

• (1015)

These people very proudly showed us that their employee roster reflected the demographics where they lived and effectively the national demographics. There was probably a higher demographic percentage of aboriginal people because it was the province of Saskatchewan, but on a gender basis, disabled basis and so on, the demographics were extremely reflective of the society where they did their business. They also showed us the excellent quality of their labour relations and profit margins.

I do not understand what it is people fear from legislation that is clearly put on the books to ensure fairness for people who for generations, for thousands of years since the dawn of time have been systemically discriminated against because they are female, they are black, they are aboriginal, they are disabled, or for whatever reason under the blanket condemnation of discrimination enshrined in the charter of rights and freedoms. Why do people fear legislation that promotes fairness?

Why do people fear something which says if there are two equally qualified people and one of them comes from a disadvantaged group that it is time to give the benefit to the member of the disadvantaged group? Why is that a frightening thing? Is it because there is a lack of confidence in their own ability to succeed? Is it because there is that fear of the unknown which I spoke of earlier, the fear that someone with a different skin colour, or a female of the species, or someone who needs extra help because of a disability will surpass you and show you that in spite of the perceived disability or the perceived discrimination that person is possibly a finer or a more productive person than you are? That kind of response is unworthy of Canadians. It is unworthy of a society that is held up as an example to the world.

All of us have unworthy thoughts. All of us have fears. We all have great trepidations about what the future will hold, not just for ourselves but for our children and for the generations to come. All of us here in the House have a particular responsibility which is to somehow get over those fears and to deal with those fears. We have to look at the larger picture of Canadian life and do our very best to legislate in a way that will benefit the largest number of Canadians.

I said at the beginning that all of us came here with an agenda, with things we wanted to see accomplished. I said that one of the things I wanted to see accomplished as a member of Parliament was a furtherance of human rights and fairness. Bill C–64 again is one of the reasons I am proud to be a member of Parliament. I support this bill and I will be delighted to see it pass.

[Translation]

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the official opposition has given its support to this most praiseworthy bill. We have been listening to the comments of the third party since yesterday, and I do appreciate what the members across the floor have had to say, something the opposition can rarely state.

I would, however, like to ask the hon. member the following question. Eloquent words are good, very eloquent words even better, but better still are not words but concrete actions and accomplishments.

• (1020)

Let me give the example of the wage inequity that exists at this time for women in the federal public service. It has been evaluated at 72 per cent. How can that be remedied when Treasury Board has undertaken to cut 45,000 positions?

How will the legislation be implemented so that, in the public service for example, there can be a move beyond mere words to concrete actions toward restoring the balance?

[English]

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. However, he may be confusing his apples with his oranges.

The member first talked about the fact that 72 per cent of the Public Service of Canada is female. That is true, but in talking about the public service—and I do this in spite of my great respect and affection for the President of the Treasury Board—we still have a way to go in ensuring that women reach higher echelons in the public service. They must be able to break through glass ceilings. The federal government has a responsibility to be an example to the private sector.

I believe that with the passage of Bill C–64 and the other projects and policies of the government we will see the federal government continuing its role as an example to the rest of the country. One of the ways it has to be an example to the rest of the country is to put its financial house in order.

I am not exactly sure where the hon. member's riding is in the province of Quebec but I can tell him that I represent the third largest public service town in Canada. The largest is of course Ottawa. The second largest is Montreal. Halifax is the third largest. I have shared with the hon. members for Dartmouth and Halifax West in excess of 30,000 employees of the federal government. With the greatest of respect to the hon. member, I do not need anyone to tell me about the problems and concerns of public servants.

With the downsizing which we all know has to be done the public servants in Halifax who are going are taking retirement packages and are finding that the federal government is dealing with them in a fair and open way. This project is moving along at an even faster rate than a number of people had thought. Thus far I have received little or no complaints from my constituents who, I can assure the hon. member, are extremely vociferous and quick to get in touch with me if there is something they are unhappy about or something they feel is not going their way.

If the hon. member is worried about public servants, perhaps he would like to come to Halifax. They would tell him that they are not quite so badly off as he might think.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the dissertation by the member opposite representing Halifax, the bastion of public service in Canada.

I remind the member opposite that Canada is not a perfect place for the people she listed in her dissertation, all of the groups that were designated. It is not a perfect place for men either. The world is not a perfect place.

In my experience the drive to perfection is better achieved through education rather than legislation. We cannot legislate tolerance; we can educate tolerance. We cannot legislate wisdom; we can educate wisdom. There are some things the government just plain cannot do. I leave this aside and recognize that this legislation will pass.

Why, if this legislation is so good and so necessary for the public at large, are there two sets of rules? Why do we ask Canadians to do one thing while we do another? Why do we ask Canadians to do with less when we are prepared to accept our pensions the way they are? If this legislation is so good, why does it not extend to the House of Commons?

• (1025)

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, there were several questions and I will be delighted to deal with each one.

First and foremost, I have to disagree with my hon. friend from Edmonton Southwest, one of my favourite members of the third party. On the question of education for tolerance as opposed to legislation, the point is that we have to do both. I think my hon. friend from Edmonton knows that.

Sometimes we do have to legislate. That is why we have human rights acts with which I am sure my hon. friend would not disagree. That is why western democracies have frequently had to drag portions of their populations kicking and screaming into the latter part of the 20th century. Sadly but truly, part of that is in the area of human rights law in all its ramifications. If we have to do that, we have to do that.

On the question of pensions, I do not think we are debating pensions, but yes, I opted into the pension. I am proud to do so and I will continue to be proud to do so because, in the words of that Clairol commercial, I am worth it.

With regard to the question of why the employment equity legislation does not relate to the House of Commons, there is an option for the House of Commons. I too agree with the hon. member but with legislation, one of the things I have learned in my seven years here is that sometimes we must crawl before we walk. This is a great step forward from the old act. The improvements and amendments will keep on coming in all areas of policy while the Liberal government, our Prime Minister and the cabinet make the policy for Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague from Lévis has already said, we support Bill C–64, on which I believe we have worked very hard in committee. We heard a number of witnesses and tried in good faith to improve the bill.

It is worthwhile keeping in mind, I think, that the bill before us on employment equity goes back as a concept to 1983 and the Abella commission. The Abella commission provided us with a very clear understanding of the fact that, while individual discrimination still exists, often in the form of prejudice or negative attitudes toward certain social phenomena within our society, a more systemic discrimination still exists as well, related to the system and to certain practices, rules and usages which are still sanctioned and upon which it is not easy, as an individual, to make any impact to bring about change.

What Bill C–64 asks of us is to ensure that the composition of the labour market reflects the composition of the Canadian population. I do not see anything in such an objective that is unreasonable or beyond our grasp as a society.

When it comes to systemic discrimination, discrimination within the system, which is most certainly the hardest to get rid of, four categories of individuals have the most difficulty claiming their rightful place in the work force. First and foremost in the four groups listed in the bill are women, and we shall come back to this, since they make up more than half of the Canadian population and still lag considerably behind in the workforce, particularly where wage policies are concerned, as the member for Lévis mentioned.

• (1030)

The second group is visible minorities. They say we live in an increasingly cosmopolitan society. This implies there are more and more people who do not belong to the majority, who are not white, and these people also have specific problems such as getting promoted and getting a job with managerial responsibilities in the workplace.

And of course we have persons with disabilities. This has become a fact of life. Our society can expect to have an increasing number of people who are functionally challenged. There is certainly a connection with the increase in people's life expectancy, especially among women who seem to have a philosophy of life and a knack for taking care of themselves from which men would have a lot to learn.

The last group covered by this bill is aboriginal peoples. Aboriginal peoples represent approximately 4 per cent of the Canadian population but have managed to occupy only 1 per cent of the jobs available.

In federally–regulated companies with more than 100 employees and throughout the public service—more on that later—we are being asked to find ways to ensure better representation of these four groups in the labour market.

We asked ourselves two questions when considering this bill. First, whether other groups or individuals in our society suffered systemic discrimination.

It was pointed out that older workers may have been discriminated against, since it is not easy when you are laid off and lose your job, and you are 40, 50 or 55 years old, to find a job somewhere else. I think we can safely say there is some hidden discrimination against this group.

The question also arose whether in our society young people, the under thirties, also have that problem. We tried to get some statistics to have a better picture of the problems facing these people. We concluded on the basis of the information we had in committee that there was no specific indication that young people and older workers had suffered systemic discrimination during the past few years.

Under the employment equity bill, it is also possible to invoke the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The charter is a mixture of the best and the worst. The best being, of course, the will to ensure that every citizen, irrespective of his income, origins, or profession, has certain rights. I would say the worst part is the provision which attempts rather awkwardly, without reflecting much concern for the interests of Quebec, to support multiculturalism. But that is another issue. In any case, section 15(2) of the charter allows for specific measures aimed at the same designated groups we find in Bill C–64.

Why do I mention this? Because very often there is an assumption that employment equity legislation, and this includes federal as well as provincial legislation, may not be compatible with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Upon closer scrutiny that is clearly not the case, and as I said before, section 15(2) of the charter allows for measures to deal specifically with designated groups.

The overall picture, before we get into the details, is the following. There seems to be a pretty standard profile of economic discrimination on the labour market against women, persons with disabilities, aboriginal peoples and visible minorities, and the situation is not improving. I would say there are four characteristics that are a constant in access to employment for the four designated groups.

• (1035)

Generally speaking, the unemployment rate is higher for women, aboriginal peoples, members of visible minorities and persons with disabilities. The level of unemployment of people in these groups is often higher than the national average, despite the fact that we have had employment equity legislation since 1986. This is the first characteristic of a general economic profile.

Also, generally speaking, we can say that these people are in poorer paying jobs, that is, again as compared with the national average.

When we look at the employment profile and the type of jobs these people hold, we realize that they often occupy lower level positions, not executive or management ones. For certain groups, and I am thinking particularly of women and aboriginal peoples—I was very surprised to learn—the lower level positions are often clerical jobs, junior positions. Here again, nothing has changed since 1986.

The final characteristic of this general profile is that the people in the four designated groups are employed in jobs with low growth potential. This means that, in the course of the changes the job market will undergo in the next few years, these are the jobs that will be threatened, because of their low level of specialization.

I think it important to keep this profile in mind, because, once we realize the situation, it is impossible to rise, like some of our Reform colleagues have done, and state that everyone is equal in the labour market. It is not true that everyone is equal, and it is not true that everyone has an equal opportunity to occupy the same jobs.

But that does not mean that progress has not been made. I think we would be misinformed as parliamentarians if we did not acknowledge what has been achieved since 1986.

I would like to outline for you the percentage of jobs held by each of the designated groups in relation to the jobs held by the population as a whole.

Let us take members of visible minorities, for example. We are told that, as of the last census, they represented 9.4 per cent of the population. In 1987, one year after the Employment Equity Act came into effect, they occupied 5 per cent of the jobs in the labour market. Between 1987 and 1993, with the legislation still in effect, progress was made, because members of visible minorities now represented 8.9 per cent of the labour force.

Obviously, 8.9 per cent is lower than the absolute proportion of the population they represent, which is 9.4 per cent.

Women, of whom the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration spoke so eloquently, represent 52 per cent of the population of Canada. As we know, this is a widespread phenomenon, there is no hiding it. Just think, in 1987, they occupied 40 per cent of the jobs available on the labour market in Canada. By 1993, things had improved and women held 45 per cent of available jobs.

Nevertheless, when we analyze the figures a bit,—and this is where we realize it—we see the need for employment equity legislation. I wonder, in the case of the pages, whether we have achieved a balance between men and women. I would guess from what I have seen that, in this session, the women outnumber the men. But we will get hold of the statistics on this.

The aboriginal peoples represent 4 per cent of the Canadian population. In this case, things are really dramatic. In the case of the aboriginal peoples and persons with disabilities, progress has been particularly pitiful and there is the greatest cause for concern for us as lawmakers.

The aboriginal peoples represent 4 per cent of the Canadian population. In 1987—hold on tight, Mr. Speaker, you are in for a shock—they held .66 per cent, that is, not even 1 per cent, of jobs on the labour market. In 1993, they occupied 1.4 per cent of the jobs.

• (1040)

This is a recovery. There is a pressing need to change course. Handicapped people, who represent 15 per cent of the Canadian population, held 1.59 per cent of jobs in the work place in 1987 and 2.56 per cent in 1993. Even today in 1995, we see discrimination, a gap, an imbalance between the relative size of some designated categories and their participation in the labour market. This is what Bill C–64 is designed to correct, and I do not understand how a member of Parliament, a representative of the people cannot subscribe to these principles.

One thing surprised me throughout our numerous committee hearings. Of course, I do not deny that there is a cost and some paperwork attached to employment equity, but I was pleasantly surprised to note that what employers came to tell us is that an employment equity strategy is now part of a sound staff management policy.

Removing employment barriers against certain people is in everyone's interest. In a context where businesses are asked to be good corporate citizens, to maintain close links with their communities, striking just the right balance between a business and its environment is in everyone's interest. This is a provision of Bill C–64 on employment equity.

The law is no longer perceived strictly as an anti–discrimination device as it was in its first few years. It is seen as an important component of sound management and enforcement of a human resources management policy.

When we stop to think about it, there is a cost attached to delaying employment equity. If it is true that handicapped people, people with functional limitations who can hold a job are denied this opportunity, if it is true that these people represent 15 per cent of the Canadian population and that 60 to 80 per cent of them are unemployed, we must realize that there is a cost attached to this because the productivity they could contribute to Canadian society is lost to us as a society.

Provisions like this one in the employment equity bill are to be commended.

What pleased committee members the most—and this was also one of the recommendations adopted by the previous committee in the previous Parliament during the five year review—is that the Employment Equity Act will now apply to the public service of Canada as a whole.

The act previously applied to perhaps 5 per cent of employees working for some 300 employers. This act will now apply to twice as many workers, since the entire public service of Canada, which employs close to 300,000 people, will now be subject to it.

Of course—and we agree with this—, provision has been made for some organizations that will now be subject to Treasury Board regulations because of certain strategic imperatives concerning them. These organizations include the Communications Security Establishment, the RCMP, the Canadian Forces and the Canadian Security Intelligence Service.

All committee members expressed the wish to be subject to the Employment Equity Act once the amendments have been made.

I heard on several occasions a fallacious, hypocritical, deceitful and dishonest argument from our Reform colleagues, who told us that employment equity meant hiring incompetent people.

• (1045)

That is the basic argument that was used throughout our deliberations by our colleagues from the Reform Party, who do not support Bill C–64. This argument does not stand up to analysis, however, because the legislator provides in the bill, more exactly in clause 56, that this is not employment equity.

It provides for three things. Employers to whom the legislation will apply, because they have 100 employees or more, are told that employment equity does not entail opening new jobs. We can appreciate that, in the current economic conditions, not all industrial sectors are experiencing growth.

In fact, you must admit that the government's financial plan is rather shabby, despicable and mediocre. One cannot ask that new jobs be created for the sake of implementing an employment equity policy. Employment equity does not mean creating new jobs, no more than it means setting quotas. There is no mention of this in the bill and I think it is ill–advised to say otherwise.

How will all this work in everyday life? What employers are asked to do is to prepare an annual employment equity plan and file it by June 30 with the human resources directorate. This plan must contain three things, more or less. It will have to set out how the workforce composition will be assessed. Having assessed the composition of the workforce within his business, where underrepresentation has been identified, the employer will be required to set out what measures he intends to take in order to remedy the situation both qualitatively and quantitatively.

That is a major change introduced by the bill. Not only is the employer required to assess quantitatively the composition of his workforce, but he can also provide qualitative information, which was not the case previously.

We are dissatisfied with certain aspects regarding the employment equity plan. Personally, I would have liked this plan to be prepared and implemented jointly by union and management, as a requirement. We have presented amendments to make this a joint responsibility, a mandatory and binding responsibility, because we do not think that employment equity is possible unless it is something that all parties want and agree to.

Unfortunately, this amendment was defeated and I think that the government made a major mistake there because there was a consensus among the interested parties about this provision. In addition, we would have liked that a copy of the employment equity plan be distributed to each employee and the contents of the plan to be posted in common display areas, as provided for in the Canada Labour Code for instance, where the employer is required to post his policy regarding sexual harassment.

We believe that the bill would have been greatly improved as a result, had the government bowed to the opposition's arguments. Unfortunately, this has not been the case and we were told, quite wrongly I would say, that the employment equity plan would contain strategic information, information which, by virtue of its highly confidential nature, could put the businesses' competitive position at risk. To this, the unions and our party naturally replied: "But if all employers are subject to the same requirements and all of them have the same plan and are willing to make it available within the organization, it is hard to believe that some of them could be penalized, since this standardized policy would be implemented across the board".

To conclude, let me say that it is with great pleasure that we support a bill which, without being perfect, is a major step forward as far as employment equity is concerned.

• (1050)

[English]

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have worked with the hon. member for Hochelaga for the last couple of years and I know him to be a very earnest, honest, hard working and credible person. I know that when he speaks about this employment equity legislation he is speaking from the heart, that he really does think this will improve society in Canada and prevent discrimination.

I want to ask the hon. member what he thinks will happen as a direct result of this legislation when people who are just as qualified, not more or not less qualified, are denied a job or advancement because of the colour of their skin, because of their race, because of their gender. Does the hon. member feel this will contribute to hard feelings, contribute to discrimination and plant seeds of dissension that would not otherwise be in our society?

[Translation]

Mr. Ménard: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his good words. I think exactly the same of him. It was a pleasure to work with him, because he seems to represent the progressive wing of his caucus. That wing is not as large as it should be, but that issue will not be solved at this level.

I want to give him an example. It goes without saying that if we agree with employment equity, we support the objective of making more room for designated groups. Let me give a concrete example which is related to my personal life.

I have a twin brother who suffers from cerebral palsy, and I am convinced that he wants to earn a living, just like I do. He is as intelligent, hard working and willing as I am. Had it not been for the fact that a number of organizations have specific policies urging employers to hire persons with disabilities, my brother would probably never have found work. We have to recognize that it is not a natural tendency for an employer to hire handicapped people. Nor is it a natural tendency to hire members of a visible minority group. Employers are still very reluctant to hire women who might give birth in the near future.

When my twin brother was hired, had he been chosen instead of an able-bodied person, that person might have resented the fact and that would have been understandable. However, we must go beyond such considerations, which means that, in a number of cases, preferential treatment should be given to the four designated groups mentioned in the legislation. I agree with that principle.

The minor distinction which I would make is that, in order to achieve genuine and real employment equity, it is necessary that when people apply for a job, their application be reviewed based on their ability to do that job. When my disabled brother was hired, he had the basic skills required to perform the duties involved.

The bill includes a very explicit provision which provides that an employer is not required to hire unqualified persons. It can be assumed that, given personnel management policies, employers conducting interviews to recruit staff will reject applicants who are not deemed qualified. However, when a number of people have equal skills, including persons with disabilities, then a collective effort should be made to help these persons get the job.

[English]

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I ask the hon. member if this employment equity legislation will address an issue of discrimination by using discrimination itself.

• (1055)

Although the legislation as he interprets it may not be doing that, we do have a situation in which those who are not covered by employment equity legislation are being told not to even bother applying for some of these positions that are open because they happen to fall outside of the categories of this protection.

How fair is it to not even be considered for a job? I am referring to the RCMP as a prime example. I have had a number of young men complain because they have been turned away at the door from even applying because they do not fit into this little category. How fair is it to those individuals to be denied even the opportunity of applying to see if they are equally capable of doing the job?

[Translation]

Mr. Ménard: Mr. Speaker, like my colleague, I will admit that some people are being frustrated. Let me say this to her.

It seems to me that it would be a great deal easier as parliamentarians to reach a consensus on the justification for an employment equity act if we were in a context of job creation. Surely, we must hope that there are enough jobs to go around. The misfortune at this time, the reason there has been the heavy backlash on employment equity, is that there are too few jobs available and that the jobs available are not accessible to everyone.

I agree with the hon. member on this. Where our opinions diverge is that over here in my seat for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve I feel that a full employment policy is not possible in a country that stretches across a whole continent, as Canada does. Those countries that have adopted successful employment policies—because trade is a worldwide affair, but unemployment is not, and I would be delighted if we could have the 5 or 6 per cent unemployment they have in Austria and other countries—are small countries with populations of seven, eight or ten million and countries with great cohesiveness. And Quebec possesses those characteristics.

The Speaker: It being 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), we will now proceed to statements by members.

STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

[English]

COMMUNITY ACADEMIC SERVICES PROGRAM

Mr. Andy Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I pay tribute to a program in my riding called the Community Academic Services Program, CASP. It is a community program dedicated to upgrading adults in English and math up to the grade nine level by setting up classrooms in community facilities such as church basements, Lion's clubs and schools. It is province-wide and has been very successful in helping people gain new skills.

CASP was recently awarded the UNESCO international award for literacy at the Beijing world conference on women. The importance of literacy cannot be overstated. It is an essential tool in increasing employment opportunities and improving the quality of life for people across the country.

I congratulate Maryanne Bourgeois and her staff from Literacy New Brunswick in particular for their hard work and dedication. As a member of the Fredericton Community Literacy Committee and as someone who has been involved with CASP from the beginning, I am encouraged to see the program is getting international recognition.

* * *

[Translation]

AIDS

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this National AIDS awareness week has given us members the opportunity to reflect on this significant problem for society, as between 42,000 and 45,000 Canadians and Quebecers are now infected with HIV.

It is our duty to step up our efforts to eradicate HIV transmission and to ensure that infected individuals receive the support they require. The battle against AIDS, however, also includes a battle against homophobia, and that is precisely the theme of the 1995 awareness campaign.

Putting an end to homophobia requires a positive atmosphere, an atmosphere of solidarity toward those who are seropositive, and a positive representation of homosexuality. My closing wish is that all members of this House will contribute to overcoming homophobia and thus to winning the battle against AIDS.

* * *

[English]

THANKSGIVING

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on this Thanksgiving weekend Reformers would like to thank a few Liberal members who have really stood out in this session.

First, we would like to thank all of those unknown backbenchers for filibustering the government's own pre-referendum stay asleep "snooze bar" legislation.

Second, we would like to thank the Minister of Finance for his Walter Mitty, feel good, two-year revolving target approach to fiscal forecasting which if nothing else will make weather forecasters look good.

Third, we would like to thank the Deputy Prime Minister for helping us put together a working definition of the term racist. Thanks to her we now know that a racist is an individual who is winning an argument against a Liberal.

Finally, thanks go to the minister of HRD whose job creation initiatives have ensured that thousands of young Canadians will utter the words "do you want fries with that" upon graduation from university.

We would like to thank the Minister of Justice for his unwanted gun control bill, the treasury board minister for his expensive infrastructure program, and a special thanks to the Minister of Health for her great impersonation of the hon. member for Macleod.

ARCTIC WILDLIFE REFUGE

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the members of Vuntut Gwich'in first nation and various wildlife and environmental groups will soon begin a cross–country tour of the United States to gather support for the declaration of the Arctic national wildlife refuge as a United States national monument and for the protection of the area from exploitation.

The wildlife refuge is a primary calving ground of the Porcupine caribou herd which migrates across the Yukon–Alaska border. This herd is unique and constitutes an irreplaceable national treasure while providing subsistence for First Nations people.

The Prime Minister and the American president have said they support the protection of the herd. In recent statements the president has said he supports the establishment of a national monument. However the U.S. Congress wants to open the area to oil and gas development.

I urge the Prime Minister to intervene personally by lending his public support for the national monument declaration and by reaffirming Canada's commitment to protect the herd.

* * *

NATIONAL IMMUNIZATION MONTH

Ms. Hedy Fry (Vancouver Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today I gave a flu shot to Bob Marks, director of the Canadian Lung Association. With that one shot Bob got protection for the whole winter. However Bob alone does not benefit from that shot; all of society does.

Over 2,000 Canadians a year die from pneumonia and influenza. The number of work days lost due to flu and the cost to business and the health care system are exorbitant. Yet only 33 per cent of at risk Canadians take advantage of this protection.

During October, National Immunization Month, we are changing that. We are asking Canadians to do themselves a favour by getting a flu shot.

Polio used to paralyse our children. Not any more. Diphtheria and whooping cough caused death among our young. Not any more. National immunization programs put an end to those days. Now we are on guard against influenza. In every province thousands of at risk seniors, the chronically ill, children and HIV positive patients can get free flu shots because it is good preventive medicine.

As a physician I ask every member of the House to recognize National Immunization Month by getting a flu shot. I will give it to them personally. Let us all say no to the flu.

The Speaker: I am all for that and I will be happy to meet with you right after question period.

S. O. 31

HIV–AIDS

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today I wear this red ribbon in remembrance of those who have died of AIDS and for the approximately 16,000 Canadians who have been diagnosed with the HIV–AIDS virus.

The AIDS virus has most seriously affected the homosexual community. However the virus does not discriminate on the basis of gender or sexual orientation as many women and children have died of the virus in addition to the thousands of men.

While our views may vary one thing is very clear. Those who suffer from AIDS are human beings. They deserve our support and compassion.

I applaud Canadian researchers for their relentless search for a cure. While progress is being made every effort must be made through education and lifestyle change to stop the deadly transmission of the disease.

As we take time this week to support AIDS awareness and education programs, I encourage every member of the House to inform themselves about the disease so as to eradicate prejudice and homophobia and treat those suffering with AIDS with the dignity and compassion they so rightly deserve.

* * *

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Judy Bethel (Edmonton East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I commend the auditor general on his study on environmental management systems and its recent release. The co–operative effort of the many government departments involved in the project should be acknowledged. It is a good example of the wide range of initiatives in which all parts of the government are sharing information and best practices to green government operations in as rapid and cost effective a manner as possible.

The Government of Canada, through its greening government operations initiative, has established guidelines for all federal departments to follow in order to integrate environmental considerations in their operations.

• (1105)

The auditor general has provided us with a useful study. Implementing an environmental management system is a vital first step to improving environmental performance in key areas such as procurement, fleet and facilities management, and land use.

This is only one step the government is taking to meet its commitment to Canadians to make sustainable development a reality.

[Translation]

AEROSPACE INDUSTRY

Mr. Maurice Godin (Châteauguay, BQ): Mr. Speaker, according to the secret document prepared for Operation Unity by Industry Canada, in the event of Quebec sovereignty, because the aerospace industry worldwide maintains close relations with their respective governments, if the governments of Quebec and Canada can maintain co–operative relations in this sector, the aerospace industry will not be affected. The document also indicates that partnership is more the rule than the exception in this industry, throughout the world generally. It seems clear that, in the country's national interest, Canada will try to negotiate a partnership with Quebec in the aerospace sector.

The blackmail, intimidation and threat of reprisals have to stop. It is time Quebecers were told the truth, and the truth is that a partnership is not only possible but desirable for both Canada and Quebec. Canada will negotiate a partnership agreement with Quebec not out of charity for its former province, but because it is in the national interest to do so.

* * *

[English]

GOVERNMENT GRANTS

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, once again I stand in the House to tell Canadians about the wasteful practices of the Liberal government.

In particular I list some of the outrageous grants being handed out by the Minister of Health. A group known as Positive Straight Men received $10,000; the prisoners with HIV–AIDS support action network, $63,000; the Committee on Seniors and Sexuality, $117,000; and let us not forget that pauper of the financial industry, the Royal Bank of Canada that received $55,000.

The only thing that Canadians are asking is that their tax dollars be spent responsibly. This is a minute part of the $10 billion of grants and contributions in 1994–95, much of which has been poured down the proverbial drain.

* * *

WOMEN ENTREPRENEURS

Mrs. Georgette Sheridan (Saskatoon—Humboldt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on September 22, 1995, the office of The Women Entrepreneurs of Saskatchewan was officially opened in Saskatoon to serve businesswomen in rural and urban communities across the province.

Women entrepreneurs enjoy an enviable success rate in business. In spite of this they have historically faced obstacles which often prevented them from getting started in the first place such as banks demanding a husband's signature on a loan, high interest rates or excessive collateral. We must factor in as well fear of the unknown and isolation resulting from lack of business networks.

The women entrepreneurs office, funded by western economic diversification, will go a long way to breaking down the barriers by providing loans at market interest rates, advisory services, mentoring and seminars related to entrepreneurship and business skills.

Congratulations to Jeanne Martinson, Pamela Warden, Marie Jensen, Donna Dixson–Bernard and Ann Chatfield, the board of directors, for making this dream a reality. Finally, well done, Andrea Scott.

* * *

[Translation]

FRANCO–ONTARIAN FLAG

Mr. Raymond Bonin (Nickel Belt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to invite my Liberal, Bloc and Reform colleagues and all the other members present today to join with me in congratulating Franco–Ontarians on the 20th anniversary of their flag.

On September 25, I had the honour of participating in a ceremony at the University of Sudbury, in my riding, to honour the Franco–Ontarian flag and to celebrate the contribution made by Franco–Ontarians to Canada and to our shared heritage.

Since September 25, 1975, the date of its birth, the Franco–Ontarian flag has become an important symbol of our accomplishments, our culture and our language. Today, Franco–Ontarians continue to grow and develop within a strong and united Canada.

Franco–Ontarians, all proud Canadians, first and foremost, owe a large debt to their predecessors, to those who created the flag and to the University of Sudbury.

* * *

NATIONAL DEBT

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the PQ premier once again raised the spectre that an independent Quebec might not assume its fair share of the Canadian debt.

In a speech delivered in Matane yesterday evening, the separatist leader said: "But if you do not want to sit down and negotiate, stay away from the table but don't expect to see any cheques".

Once again, the separatist leader used that threat to make people believe that he will be able to force Canada to negotiate a partnership agreement if Quebec separates.

• (1110)

Quebecers are reasonable and responsible people. They know that a partnership project based on threats and blackmail will not work, and this is another reason why they will vote no on October 30.

* * *

CANADA–QUEBEC ECONOMIC UNION

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Châteauguay was absolutely right when he said that Canada would negotiate a partnership agreement with Quebec. Indeed, even Industry Canada recognizes, in a secret document prepared for Operation Unity, that: "Should Quebec separate, and should there be a breakdown in the co–operation between federal research institutions based in Quebec and those located in the rest of Canada, the scientific and technological efforts of the two states would suffer a real prejudice".

If there is a partnership, there would be no such breakdown. Forget the gloomy speeches; it is obvious that the interests of Canada and Quebec call for a partnership treaty. This is particularly true for the space industry, as well as the science and technology sector.

* * *

[English]

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Environment forgets that she is not the only minister of the environment in the country. There are 12 others and they make up the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment, a forum for co–operation and joint action.

The federal minister thinks that environmental policy revolves around her. In contrast, the CCME is committed to developing the environmental management framework agreement which would reduce duplication and overlap.

Is the minister in support? Not a chance. Now harmonization has been put on hold.

The environment minister has pushed the provinces around too much. She has also cancelled any provincial negotiations on financial support to Habitat Canada which the provinces said they would assume by increasing waterfowl hunting fees.

The minister does not care for a program that would save the government money; she is only scared of devolving her assumed power.

Are her feelings hurt? Co–operation is a two–way street. It is time the minister got off her pedestal and listened to what the provinces have to say. She may even learn something about political sustainable development.

[Translation]

QUEBEC ECONOMY

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette–Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, once again, Quebecers are not going to be represented at an important economic and trade meeting with Chinese officials because the PQ premier decided not to attend that event. Just like he did when Team Canada conducted its very important and successful Asian tour, the PQ leader prefers to stick to his separatist creed, rather than co–operate with our partners from the business world, to promote economic recovery and job creation.

Quebecers are primarily concerned with economic issues and job creation. Unfortunately, that does not seem to be a priority for the PQ premier. On October 30, Quebecers will say no to the separatist project, a project which does nothing to promote economic recovery and create jobs for them.

* * *

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Mauril Bélanger (Ottawa—Vanier, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, at a meeting with UQUAM students in management studies, the PQ finance and revenue minister said: "It seems that business people are not overly grateful when it is the Parti Quebecois which does something". Are we to understand from the minister's comments that he is trying to enlist business people in the Yes camp?

The PQ minister must stop using provincial subsidies and other benefits to force Quebec businesses to support the Yes side. Earlier this week, his colleague, the Bloc Quebecois leader, said that enlisting business people was undemocratic and unacceptable.

* * *

[English]

LAND MINES

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, land mines and anti–personnel devices are a humanitarian disaster. There are over 100 million of them seeded in over 60 countries of the world. From Mozambique to Chechnya, from Cambodia to Angola they lie silently in wait for their next victim.

They cost between $30 and $70 to make and are made by such countries as the United States, Italy and even Canada. Most are designed to maim and not kill, and some are even designed to look like toys so that children will pick them up and get their arms blown off. This is a perverted logic if ever there was one.

The majority of the victims are innocent women and children.

• (1115)

In developing countries wracked by civil war, it costs between $300 and $700 to remove them. Last year we removed 85,000 but seeded two million at the same time.

I put a private members' bill forward on September 21 asking the House to ban land mines and anti–personnel devices. I hope for the sake of the most impoverished people in the world the House joins hands to do just that.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

SOCIAL PROGRAM REFORM

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in the past few days it has become increasingly clear that this government is trying to hide the devastating impact that a number of reforms planned by Ottawa will have, especially in the case of social programs.

The government keeps postponing the release of the details of these reforms until after the referendum. Furthermore, the last budget announced cuts totalling seven billion dollars in transfers to the provinces for the financing of social programs.

Will the Prime Minister acknowledge that cuts in payments to the provinces for social programs, irrespective of the criteria the federal government will use, will cause a major shortfall in funding for spending on health care, post–secondary education and social assistance in Quebec, a shortfall that, depending on the criteria applied, is estimated at between $1.9 and $2.5 billion over the next two years, and this is only in Quebec?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, contrary to what the hon. member for Roberval says, we are not hiding a thing. We announced our schedule for transfers to the provinces at the beginning of our mandate. We gave them three years. We told them from the outset: we will continue to increase a little bit next year, and that was 1994, and then in 1995 we will go on increasing, and the cuts will come in 1996 and 1997.

However, next year the subsidies we pay will still be higher than they were at the time we formed the government. The Minister of Finance explained to the provinces that he would give them time to adjust and that he would even continue to increase payments during the first two years. However, they were told to expect adjustments.

The provinces were aware of this and initiated their own cuts. For instance, last year in December, Quebec's health minister announced cuts totalling $500 million. We still gave slightly more than the previous year, but he made cuts. Obviously, everyone has to make adjustments. Provincial governments across Canada are making adjustments. The Government of Quebec has started to do so as well, and it will have to make more adjustments after the referendum.

We told all provincial governments ahead of time what to expect. I think this is all very fair and very open and shows a government that has absolutely nothing to hide before, during or even after the referendum.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): In fact, Mr. Speaker, it is the future we want to talk about. The Prime Minister seems to appreciate talking about that.

We know that in the future, the federal government is planning cuts in unemployment insurance and old age pensions. We found that out last week here in the House, but the bad news will not come until after the referendum.

Would the Prime Minister agree that by attacking the most vulnerable members of our society with cuts in his own programs that are targeted to the needy, he is hitting them twice with cuts in payments to Quebec that will total between $1.9 and $2.5 billion in two years' time, which will force the Quebec government to add to the cuts made by the federal government? Does he not realize he is hitting the neediest in our society from both sides?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first of all, the unemployment insurance program was explained in the budget, and we are preparing legislation that will be tabled very shortly.

Just this morning I received a call from a provincial premier who wanted to see me to discuss the legislation, and who begged me not to go ahead immediately because he had a number of representations to make.

• (1120)

I told him: "Fine. As soon as I have time, we will have a meeting, and we will table the bill as soon as possible, because we want people to have time to discuss it".

The hon. member referred to senior citizens. I made it clear here in the House that we have no intention of affecting senior citizens. I made that quite clear. But I also said that we will have to make sure we can still pay the old age pensions of the people who will retire in 2005 and 2010. Good government means planning for the future. And people who are retired now do not have to worry.

We want to be able to pay old age pensions in 2005, 2010 and 2015 because many of us will still be here, although there may not be that many on the other side, and we have to consider the future. As far as pensioners are concerned, they do not have to worry, I made that clear, and old age pensioners will not be affected, not in November and not in the finance minister's next budget.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister admit that at the rate the federal government says it will cut transfers to the provinces, in other words, money used by the provinces for social programs and education, at the rate the federal government plans to cut these expenditures, according to our most accurate estimates—although the criteria have not yet been released, but we tried a series of criteria that seemed likely—we can say that in four years time, if Quebecers say no in the referendum and decide to stay in the federal system, in four years time the federal government will no longer pay a cent in transfer payments for social programs, education and social assistance, and on top of that, under the tax points system, Quebecers would again have to send part of the province's tax revenues to Ottawa to help fund social programs in the other provinces?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, under the present system, there is a decline in the amounts to be spent on transfers to the provinces.

That being said, one of the reasons we decided to proceed with these reforms, and this was explained by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Health, and I said it myself here in this House, was to reverse this trend while maintaining a certain level of money in these transfers. In other words, we intend to freeze these amounts to stop this decline, for reasons we discussed with the provinces, in other words, the federal government firmly intends to remain involved in improving social programs in Canada.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the documents attached to the last federal budget mention that transfers to the provinces will be cut by $2.5 billion in 1996–97 and $4.5 billion in 1997–98. In 1997–98, if the federal government distributes the Canada social transfer on the basis of population, as suggested on page 40 of the federal budget speech, Quebec alone will absorb over 40 per cent of the $4.5 billion in cuts.

Does the Prime Minister not agree that, on the eve of the referendum, he has a duty to stop hiding his intentions from Quebecers by disclosing publicly how the federal government intends to distribute among the provinces the $4.5 billion in cuts planned for 1997–98, so that Quebecers will know the real impact of federal policies?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Human Resources Development and I intend to sit down with provincial officials to determine how the country and the provinces can restructure their finances.

That said, the hon. member has just quoted figures that have been used by other separatists. As I said before in this House, they are basing their arguments on something that is quite preposterous.

• (1125)

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this is a revelation. I did not know that the Minister of Finance was a separatist, as these are his figures.

Does the Prime Minister confirm that, whatever the distribution criteria adopted, in 1997–98 alone, Quebec will be deprived of between $1.2 billion and $1.9 billion for the funding of its social programs? The PQ government was not the only one to predict these cuts. His friends in the Liberal Party in Quebec, including his colleague, the current Minister of Labour, said the same thing when they were in power.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I said before, the hon. member's analysis is quite preposterous. It is quite clear that no decision has been made on distribution. Second, I think that the hon. member should also consider equalization, which is a very important factor.

The hon. member seems unwilling to talk about it, but let me tell you that, in 1996–97 for example, equalization payments to Quebec will amount to $4 billion or 42 per cent of federal equalization payments to the provinces.

* * *

[English]

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. The government's record on Somalia is not terribly open, but openly terrible.

This week we have seen evidence that national defence headquarters altered documents. The punishment, it gets to investigate itself. We have evidence that Lieutenant-Colonel Kenward destroyed evidence and obstructed justice. The punishment, he got promoted. We have evidence that Colonel Labbé uttered unlawful commands. His punishment, he has been put in charge of the army staff college to teach leadership.

The minister must have had files on these events. Why did he wait so long before he acted?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member had a distinguished career in the Canadian forces before he entered politics. I am quite surprised and disappointed that he would ask that sort of a question. He talks about openness. The government has no axe to grind. We want the commission into the deployment of the Canadian forces in Somalia to get to the bottom of whatever happened. He talks about being terribly open. If he wants to know what I mean by terribly open I can tell him. It means transparent, unfettered and above board.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the government has gone kicking and screaming into the Somalia commission. We in the Reform Party are the ones who demanded a commission of inquiry.

The Somalia commission, which the minister called only after pressure from this party, is headed by top–notch people and will come to its conclusions in due course. There is a complete abdication of leadership within the Department of National Defence. The Prime Minister's expression of confidence in the minister and the chief of defence staff cannot change that fact.

Officers are named in police reports. They are implicated in criminal activities, falsifying documents and offering incentives to subordinates to commit murder. Does the minister consider these to be examples of good leadership?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised, disappointed and somewhat disillusioned not only by the tenor of the question but by some of the implications of the question.

The members of the third party talk about calling for this inquiry. I happen to have personal knowledge and I will inform the House of it. Other members will remember when we were in opposition—I want the hon. member to check the records—I asked for this inquiry in April 1993.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it took two years for the government to act. Originally it wanted an internal investigation. It was only under our pressure that the government opened up the investigation.

The Prime Minister said that these troubles occurred under the previous government. Yet after two years nothing has been done to fix the problems. If the minister knew previously of the evidence that has been revealed this week, he has complicity in covering it up. If he did not know, he is guilty of contempt in the highest order. The minister's management of national defence over the—

• (1130)

The Speaker: In our questions we are making giant leaps. I would ask the hon. member to please put his question.

Mr. Hart: My question: The minister's management of national defence over the past two years has only compounded—

An hon. member: Order.

The Speaker: Please, my colleague, the question now.

Mr. Hart: Will the minister resign?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a little problem today. From watching the hon. member I realize not many of them will be re–elected when they act like that.

The member talks like that about the Canadian Armed Forces which have been an honour to all Canadians. Those Canadians have been doing a great job in Yugoslavia for the past three and one–half years, yet a former member of the armed forces is using those kinds of words about his colleagues who were with him in the army, who have always been a great part of the Canadian strength. We have the best soldiers in the world.

Not long ago I was talking with the President of Croatia and the President and Prime Minister of Bosnia. They told me the best soldiers in the former Yugoslavia were the Canadian soldiers.

When I see a former soldier acting like the hon. member, I know those members will not be back in great numbers after the next election.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

* * *

[Translation]

TRANSFER PAYMENTS

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The federal government reallocates to the Quebec government, in the form of transfer payments, a portion of the taxes collected from Quebecers. As a result of the numerous cuts made by the federal government, the amounts handed back to Quebec are constantly being reduced, and transfer payments have become an unstable and inadequate source of funds for Quebec.

Does the Minister of Finance confirm that, since 1980, the proportion of Quebec's revenues coming from federal transfer payments, including equalization, has dropped by 28 per cent and that the situation will get progressively worse as a result of the last federal budget given that, by 1997–98, transfer payments from Ottawa will account for only 12.7 per cent of Quebec's revenues?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, again—and this is unfortunate—separatists do not have a firm grasp of figures.

At present, while receiving approximately $29 billion from Quebec, we give that province approximately $41 billion, which means a net gain of $11 billion for Quebec. What we must ask ourselves is this: Should Quebec ever achieve independence, what will the separatist movement do to bridge that gap?

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): It is a pity, Mr. Speaker, that I will have to put my question in writing because I was unable to get an answer.

Since it is becoming increasingly obvious that, within four years, Quebec will no longer receive any money from Ottawa for social program funding—I repeat, social program funding—how can the minister justify his plans to set up new structures and implement new manpower training initiatives that will increase duplication, when these structures and initiatives are to be funded from surpluses in the UI fund, to which Ottawa will no longer contribute as much as a penny?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Again, Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat the same thing. The government, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Health and myself have all stated in this House that one of the goals of the current reform is to reverse the trend, stop our reserves from shrinking and maintain a level that will allow us to set the amount to be transferred to the provinces, including Quebec.

* * *

• (1135)

[English]

CANADA PENSION PLAN

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development on behalf of all Canadians.

A new poll shows that only 19 per cent of Canadians under age 50 expect to get anything out of the Canada pension plan when they retire. Their confidence in the plan has gone down since the Liberals replaced the Tories in 1993.

Does the government have any plans at all to correct the Canada pension plan problem? What will it do to assure Canadian workers and employers that the money they are contributing to this plan is not just going down the tubes?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a curious question about money in the Canada pension plan going down the tube. The money goes to provide for retirement security for senior citizens. It goes to provide for a basic income benefit for disabled Canadians. It goes to provide a basic benefit for widows and their children.

The Reform Party's proposals as it puts them forward would mean a substantial reduction for disabled Canadians, a substantial reduction for widows, and a substantial reduction for 1.8 million pensioners. How can the hon. member stand up and tell us to do something to protect the system when his own party is proposing a way of slashing the program?

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the difference between the Liberals and the Reformers is that we would have a plan that would be actuarially sound. This one has never been sound. The Liberals were informed of that when they first brought in this plan. They fired the adviser who gave them that advice 30 years ago.

I ask again: What will the government do specifically to make the Canada pension plan actuarially and mathematically sound and sustainable? That is what Canadians demand.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member well knows, we announced in the last budget that we would be presenting a paper containing a series of proposals as to how we can deal with the sustainability of the Canada pension plan. The Minister of Finance will be meeting with his counterparts later this year to talk about this. As the hon. member should know, this is not just a federal government plan but one we share with the provinces. It is a joint plan and therefore we have to make those kinds of arrangements.

Let me give the member one very quick example of the kind of measures we are taking. On July 1, I announced a series of changes to the Canada pension plan that will allow those with disabilities to go back to work so that they can have a bigger incentive to be employed and not simply draw the benefit. It once again goes to the very heart and soul of what we are trying to do in our reform which is to provide for economic security by giving people a good chance at a job.

* * *

[Translation]

YOUTH UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development. Despite a slight dip in unemployment after ten months of zero net employment growth in Canada, we find that the unemployment rate among those under the age of 25 has again increased. Even those who manage to find work are often in an extremely precarious positions. In fact, this is the lowest level of youth activity in the labour market in 20 years.

What concrete actions does the government plan to take to help young people, since the youth unemployment rate has again risen in September, from 15.7 per cent to 16.4 per cent?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased the hon. member raised that question. It does give me the opportunity to tell members of the House in case they have not heard that this morning the unemployment rate fell to 9.2 per cent which is the lowest rate since 1990. The hon. member will be particularly interested to know that in the last two months in the province of Quebec 16,000 new jobs have been created which is the highest job growth in any region of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister is not answering my questions. I was asking about youth employment. Does the minister acknowledge that the youth employment situation has deteriorated since the Liberals came to office, with 27,000 fewer jobs for young people since November 1993. Is he prepared to acknowledge this?

• (1140)

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's figures are not correct. The unemployment rate has gone down for young people but not sufficiently so. Looking at the figures, one of the reasons is that still far too many young people are dropping out of school far too early and therefore do not have the required skills to get a job.

That is the reason the government introduced the youth internship program. It is a partnership with the private sector to create opportunities enabling young people to move from school to work with a full transition in a partnership way. This year over 24,000 young people will be enrolled in that program.

* * *

IMMIGRATION

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the average Canadian cannot afford to travel in expensive limousines and yet the Department of Citizenship and Immigration gave over $20,000 to a Toronto limousine service to ferry immigrants around town.

My question for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is why?

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Citizenship and Immigration promotes open government and release of information to the greatest extent possible. I am certain the information the member has come up with probably came to him through this or other measures.

We are glad to promote open government and I am happy he has this information. I will pass it on to the minister to give the member a fuller answer at a later time.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I thought my question was why we are ferrying immigrants around town in limousines, not about open government.

To continue in the same vein, the Department of Citizenship and Immigration spent $200,000 at Big Bill's Furniture and Mattress Warehouse in Kitchener. It gave $152,000 to Zellers to buy furniture for some immigrants. Again I ask the parliamentary secretary why?

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I again compliment the hon. member on his question.

With regard to taxi services which he clearly wants to call limousines, a car is a car. On the other hand if he wants to look at settlement services and what we do for immigrants coming to Canada, it is a program of which we are very proud. It is a program we are determined to preserve because on this side of the House we believe in the importance of immigrants in that they help build this country.

* * *

[Translation]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux-Montagnes, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. While the federal government has cut CN's debt by $900 million in order to make it more attractive to investors, CN has signed a $300 million contract with GM to purchase new Ontario-built locomotives.

How can the minister justify the decision to renew CN's locomotive fleet at the taxpayers' expense, when this ought to have been left for the new shareholders to pay for after privatization?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is no doubt aware that locomotives are not kept on a lot somewhere like cars are at a Ford or GM dealership. Let me assure the hon. member that the locomotives in question will be delivered to CN long after privatization.

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux-Montagnes, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I take it that the minister prefers this huge order from Ontario to be made by a crown corporation. How can the minister allow CN to add $300 million to its debt load by purchasing new locomotives at our expense when he has just injected close to one billion dollars of Canadians' tax money to reduce that same debt and to make CN more attractive to investors?

[English]

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the hon. member does not understand.

The restructuring of the debt for Canadian National has to do with the IPO that will be made available to the investment community in November of this year.

• (1145)

As to the order for locomotives for CN's operations in the years to come, those locomotives have not been built yet. They have not been paid for yet. They will not be delivered nor will they become a liability for CN until a number of years down the road.

As to how CN is to run its operations, obviously it needs new rolling stock. Locomotives built in London, Ontario are sold not only to CN but to CP and all around the world. Only last week we had representatives in from the Congo looking to purchase locomotives from the GM shops in London because they are the best in the world.

* * *

[Translation]

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

Many Canadians are worried about the economy stagnating in recent months. We have even heard some members of the official opposition talking about no net job creation since January.

Would the minister once again set the record straight on Canada's employment situation?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we all know that the job market is going through some very major changes. That is one reason it is so important we modernize our structures to enable Canadians to make the adjustments, to get new employment tools to respond and particularly to provide new choices.

Within those very positive figures we had this morning of the unemployment rate coming down, 70,000 of the jobs created were manufacturing jobs. They are well paying, full time jobs.

This shows that the fear of the jobless recovery is not quite accurate. The reality of the Canadian economy, through the kind of stimulus that has been provided by the Minister of Finance in his budgets and in other areas, is that manufacturing and exports are leading job recovery in this country. That is why we have to continue to provide that enormous support and confidence. That is the most important key to creating jobs.

* * *

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, earlier in question period I think that most Canadians would have been appalled to see the Prime Minister defending some of the things going on at DND by wrapping himself in the name of the peacekeepers and the job they are doing, putting their lives in danger, trying to defend the country.

Does the Prime Minister really think that when we read about the stonewalling of police investigations, about the cover–up of criminal activity, and about the falsifying of documents this in any way does any service to the men on the ground who are defending Canada and trying to keep peace in foreign countries?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have said to the House many times that we initiated the public inquiry into the matter. Now I see the Reform Party is taking credit for that.

I was in opposition when the parliamentary secretary was on his feet asking for an inquiry. We are having a public inquiry and all the documents are available.

Of course there are problems in the army. In any department there are problems. We are working to solve them. We will accept the recommendations if they are valid and we will change what has to be changed.

To try to create the impression that we have a terrible army in Canada when it is lauded by everybody around the world I think is going the wrong way.

The young member has a lot of personal ambition. He should tell his colleagues to slow down, because there will not be much of a Reform Party very soon.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, all Canadians know it is not the army that is terrible, it is the Minister of National Defence's running of that portfolio.

We have been pursuing this inquiry. The opposition Liberals, as he knows, called for this two years ago. We had to call for it for nearly two years before we got it.

The Minister of National Defence has been sitting on this material, which has been under his nose for two years. Was there complicity in this? Did he know this was happening, or was he simply incompetent and did not provide this material in the first two years of this administration?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Defence got up many times in the House and explained that under the laws of this land when there were cases in front of the military courts we could not proceed with an inquiry because it could have invalidated trials that were going on. It is the way we operate. There were some charges against some military people and we could not have a public inquiry on the same element of proof because it would have been used by the different lawyers or the prosecution to destroy the case.

• (1150)

We have to respect the law of the land. After the judgments were rendered we had a public inquiry. We could not have both together. With time, when he gains experience, he will know the law of the land a bit better and perhaps one day he will be ready to take over what will be left, if anything, of the Reform Party.

* * *

[Translation]

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In Quebec, there are 25 federal research facilities employing 3,000 workers, which represents 13.4 per cent of the jobs in federal facilities of this type in Canada, whereas, in Ontario, the Chalk River nuclear research centre alone employs 2,227 people. Overall, federal centres employ 11,000 researchers and technicians in Ontario.

Will the Prime Minister acknowledge that the federal government has consistently penalized Quebec in the area of research and development, undermining its scientific and economic development? Would he also explain why, under such conditions, he is cutting funding for research in the DIPP program, which is crucial to the aerospace industry located primarily in Quebec.

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as regards the DIPP, the hon. member should be aware that, in recent years, nearly 50 per cent of funding has gone to Quebec, to business in Quebec.

We have to be realistic when we talk about the DIPP, because we have long known the size of the defence industry in Quebec. When the transition was made with the DIPP funds, almost 50 per cent of these funds were, in fact, paid to businesses in Quebec.

As far as research and development is concerned, we acknowledge that the proportion spent in Quebec is approximately 25 per cent, which is still very close to the proportion of the population.

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in Quebec we receive only 17 per cent of funds intended for research and development. According to the Minister of Finance, the figure is 13 per cent.

How does the Prime Minister justify this imbalance between Quebec and Ontario in the distribution of federal research facilities, whereas Hull, Gatineau and Aylmer are within the National Capital Region and could have received a greater proportion of these facilities?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs has repeatedly explained, there are a whole lot of people in the greater metropolitan area of Ottawa–Hull working at research and development centres. Let us leave this aside.

The hon. member should note that, even though the Bloc Quebecois and the Government of Quebec claim 17 per cent of federal funding for research and development goes to Quebec, we contend and are prepared to show proof that approximately 25 per cent of the Government of Canada's funding for research and development goes to Quebec.

* * *

[English]

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in November the Alberta government will ask grain farmers whether they are in favour of having the freedom to sell their wheat and barley to any buyer, including the Canadian Wheat Board, into domestic and export markets, yes or no?

In response, the federal minister of agriculture states the Alberta plebiscite will not be the last word on this issue. When will the minister of agriculture give farmers the last word on this issue and have a plebiscite across the whole Canadian Wheat Board area to settle this issue?

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri-food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the minister of agriculture has made it very clear for a number of months that farmers will be involved in the future of the Canadian Wheat Board in Canada.

To emphasize that, he has recently put in place a very expert panel to go right across western Canada to talk to farmers, chat with farmers, and consult with farmers in all of the industry about their views on the future of the Canadian Wheat Board.

We will continue to deal with everyone and consult with everyone in the industry in order to talk about and deal with the future of that great wheat board.

• (1155)

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, panels, studies, commissions and reports, and it has been two years and nothing has been done.

Alberta farmers are being asked for their opinion on the issue because the Alberta government believes that farmers have the right to make this decision. Who will have the last word on whether farmers should have the freedom to sell their wheat and barley into all markets? Will it be the farmers or will it be this father knows best minister of agriculture?

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri-food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I remind the hon. member that farmers will be consulted. I also remind the hon. member of the disappointment of all of us when the third party in Parliament recommends to farmers to break Canadian law and supports them in this.

We will follow the tradition of our party and consult. However, with regard to the wheat board, the Reform Party thinks it knows best and is requesting and supporting farmers to go against the rules and laws of the land with reference to the wheat board.

* * *

MINING

Mr. Benoît Serré (Timiskaming—French River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Natural Resources.

Although I recognize that there has been a substantial increase in exploration expenditures in the mining industry in the last few years, there are still some serious impediments to investment. What does the government intend to do to help Canada's investment climate in mining?

Mr. George S. Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question. First, it gives me an opportunity to express our condolences to the families and friends of those nine people who lost their lives in the helicopter crash in Kyrgyzstan. Our thoughts and prayers are with them at this very difficult time.

Second, it gives me an opportunity to give some good news to the House. We are having excellent results as far as mining is concerned in Canada, with exploration expenditure up 32 per cent in 1994 and it looks like it will go to $675 million this year. Twenty mines are opening and only two closing permanently, and there are 2,000 to 3,000 new employees in the mining industry.

This is all due to the excellent financial position the Minister of Finance has set out for the country, the Whitehorse mining initiative, and the efforts of the government to build a more innovative society and remove the overlap and duplication in our regulatory regimes. Science and technology is leading the way in this industry.

* * *

[Translation]

NUCLEAR INDUSTRY

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, since the inception of the Canadian nuclear program, the federal government has spent over $12 billion on nuclear research and development, mostly in favour of the Ontario nuclear industry, of course. Through its subsidies worth $175 million a year, the federal government has created an industry that now employs, directly or indirectly, 60,000 people in Ontario.

My question is for the Prime Minister. How does the Prime Minister explain the fact that the federal government has provided such large subsidies for electricity generation in Ontario, when Quebec has never received anything from the federal government to generate its own electricity?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the development of a nuclear industry in Ontario came about because that province had fewer hydroelectric resources than Quebec. Canada's development is based on potential, resources and population. I am sure that some provinces did not receive anything for nuclear energy development because they do not have the necessary resources.

Quebec received federal assistance. Hydro–Quebec has nuclear facilities in Gentilly. Quebec got its share, but the fact is that it did not need as much nuclear energy as Ontario. That is the way it is in Canada. This is a diversified country. Although we are trying to distribute everything among the various parts of Canada, some things cannot be distributed solely on the basis of population, as I was saying the other day. We are not about to start digging rivers in Saskatchewan so we can give that province its share of the national ports budget.

* * *

[English]

BLOOD SUPPLY

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health on behalf of all Canadians.

The Krever commission is investigating the state of our national blood supply. Recent reports have revealed deep organizational breakdowns within the system.

Canadians want action now. Their health continues to be threatened by leaks in the blood supply system. Last week here in Ottawa about 1,800 units had to be recalled because of a breakdown in that system after it was learned that some units had not been tested for hepatitis B.

• (1200)

Now Canadians are outraged to hear through the Krever inquiry that a U.S. drug company was allowed to distribute AIDS tainted blood products in Canada that affected six British Columbians including five children.

Could the minister tell the House and Canadians what plans if any she has to reform the system and implement the commission's recommendations in order to restore confidence in our national blood supply system?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will know that we have not waited for the Krever commission to begin to do some work within the blood supply system. We are nevertheless funding the Krever inquiry.

Since I have been Minister of Health we have doubled our resources in the Bureau of Biologics. We have increased the inspections of blood collection centres; we now inspect them once a year. We have made it possible for the results of these inspections to be made public. We have set up an advisory committee on blood issues so we can keep ourselves informed.

We continue to do everything possible to monitor all new technologies that are emerging in order that we can have them in Canada and that we can have the best and the safest blood supply system in the world.

* * *

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

The Speaker: I wish to draw the attention of hon. members to the presence in the gallery of His Excellency Victor Chernomyrdin, Prime Minister of the Russian Federation.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Speaker: I also wish to draw to your attention the presence in the gallery of a delegation from the People's Republic of China led by Liu Fusheng, Chairman of the standing committee of the People's Congress of Hunan Province.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

* * *

POINT OF ORDER

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary to the minister of agriculture in his response to my question earlier stated that Reform MPs were counselling farmers to break the law regarding some of the oppressive actions of the Canadian Wheat Board. That is totally untrue.

Reform MPs have never counselled farmers to break the law and I think it is important I set the record straight on that.

The Speaker: May I once again caution members on the use of language which seems to be getting more and more aggressive as we go along.

It is true that in the House of Commons we are used to strong language, but at times we get carried away with ourselves, one side saying one thing about the other and the other side retaliating by saying that someone else breaks the law.

We are entitled here to free speech, of course, but sometimes when it comes close to transgressing our parliamentary rules I will intervene. I would once again ask all hon. members to be very prudent in the language they use as it is offensive not only to individuals but it could be offensive to the House.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

• (1205)

[English]

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8) I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to two petitions.

* * *

LOWER CHURCHILL DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Mr. George S. Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2) I am pleased to table, in both official languages, the 1994 annual report of the Lower Churchill Development Corporation.

* * *

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

FINANCE

Mr. Barry Campbell (St. Paul's, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the 19th report of the Standing Committee on Finance concerning Bill C–90, the Excise Tax Act and Excise Act.

[Translation]

PROCEDURE AND HOUSE AFFAIRS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table the 89th report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs, which deals with the list of associate committee members.

With leave of the House, I intend to move for concurrence in this 89th report later this day.

* * *

[English]

LAW COMMISSION OF CANADA ACT

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–106, an act respecting the Law Commission of Canada.

(Motions deemed adopted, bill read the first time and printed.)

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE AND HOUSE AFFAIRS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if the House gives its consent, I move that the 89th report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs, presented to the House earlier this day, be concurred in.

(Motion agreed to.)

* * *

PETITIONS

BOVINE GROWTH HORMONE

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to present three petitions.

In the first petition the petitioners are asking that Parliament take steps to keep BGH out of Canada by legislating a moratorium or stoppage on BGH use and sale until the year 2000 and by examining the outstanding health and economic questions through an independent and transparent review.

VIOLENT OFFENDERS

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in the second petition the petitioners pray and request that Parliament rescind mandatory release legislation where violent offenders are involved; that Parliament ensure all information on violent offenders, including prior offences and refusal to enroll in treatment programs, is provided to those making decisions on release or parole; and that Parliament ensure all violent offenders will be separated from society until it can be proven that they will not reoffend.

CRIMINAL CODE

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in the third petition the petitioners are requesting that Parliament not repeal or amend section 241 of the Criminal Code in any way and upholds the Supreme Court of Canada decision on September 30, 1993 to disallow assisted suicide or euthanasia.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Barry Campbell (St. Paul's, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I present a petition which calls on Parliament to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.

I am pleased to present the petition on behalf of these constituents.

• (1210)

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–64, an act respecting employment equity, be read the third time and passed.

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in my comments today on Bill C–64 I want to focus on one important point. This employment equity legislation is a Canadian answer to a Canadian reality.

[Translation]

That Canadian reality is that persons in designated groups are not doing as well as they should in our labour force, given their qualifications.

That Canadian reality is that many instances of systemic discrimination can still be found.

[English]

I refer to a study released only last week by Simon Fraser University which states very clearly that male immigrants who are members of a visible minority earn 15 per cent less than white males born in Canada with the same education, in the same industry and in the same city.

We have heard a lot of debate on Bill C–64 that seems to deny that there is a problem, that action is necessary and that leadership by the Government of Canada is necessary. While it is a lot less nasty, to quote the same study, white immigrants still earn 2 per cent less than native born Canadians.

The figures become quite substantial. Let me quote: "Mean earnings of immigrant male members of visible minorities were down 22.6 per cent from those of Canadian born white males".

We could talk about each of the designated groups and make it clear that in the private and public sectors being well qualified is not enough if a person happens to be a member of a visible minority, a woman, an aboriginal or a person with a disability. Those things work against them. They seem to cloud perception of their ability to do the job and to take on more senior responsibilities. It happens throughout every sector of the economy.

Let me come back to the Canadian reality. The Canadian reality is that our citizens want and deserve a country that breaks down these barriers to success. Two years ago that is what our country offered to Canadians and ever since we have been living up to our commitment.

Let me go back to the red book. It offered a vision of Canada with the economic strength it deserves and the social strength that draws us together as a community. At the beginning of the red book, the man whom Canadians chose as their Prime Minister and whom they continue to support wrote:

> The result is a Liberal plan for Canada firmly anchored in the principle that governing is about people, and that government must be judged by its effectiveness in promoting human dignity, justice, fairness, and opportunity. This is our approach, and this election is about presenting that choice to Canadians.

Our platform was based on jobs and growth that would enrich everyone. We understood that people have expectations for their society, not just for their own wallets. That was why one of our commitments was a stronger employment equity act. We were determined that the federal government should do what it could to ensure that Canadians have a fair opportunity to get ahead in life. It draws on the willingness of employers to take a hard look at old practices and to move to a workplace that welcomes the talents of all our citizens.

• (1215)

Quite simply, this bill is about identifying and knocking over barriers that keep some people on the outside looking in or on the bottom looking up. It rests in the best tradition of opening the doors to full participation in Canadian society for all our citizens with all their diversity.

That puts the members of the Reform Party in a bit of a bind as they debate Bill C–64.

[Translation]

They know that incompetent members of designated groups will not take over the workplace. They know that no arbitrary quotas will be imposed. They know that this bill takes into account the concerns voiced by small business. And they know that the bill is fair and reasonable.

[English]

They are reduced to appealing to the worst in people instead of to the best. They are reduced to philosophical musings that are irrelevant to the case before the House and worst case, individual stories pulled from the murky depths of the American right wing. They cannot even get the name of this process right in their efforts to score political points. They seem to believe that if they use the term affirmative action they can polarize the debate.

One of the most destructive things that can be done in a society or in a Parliament is to polarize the debate, to pit one group against another, rather than to build ties and mutual respect among us.

If they want to talk about the American system, let us look at the record there and then let us compare it to what the government wants to do in this bill so that Canadians, despite the Reform Party members, will know the difference between the American system and ours.

Some 30 years ago the United States began to come to grips with the impact of centuries of racial discrimination. By 1970 Richard Nixon brought in the first affirmative action policies for the U.S. government. Let me remind my hon. friends that Richard Nixon would never be called a bleeding heart, but he did what he knew was right at the time and what his society needed. Other governments, public and private institutions took similar steps.

[Translation]

As the New York Times noted recently, this process has yielded results. "In the past 20 years, it said, a substantial number of black families have been able to climb the social and professional ladder. While positive action is not the only reason for this, it certainly played a major role".

[English]

Has the American process been perfect? Has it been what we want to model ourselves on? Absolutely not. In some cases arbitrary approaches were imposed. There were decisions that struck those of us at a distance as odd and unfair. In response that American system too has evolved but they too know there is still much to do.

Ask anyone who watched the public reaction to the Simpson trial and to the ultimate verdict. Race is still an issue in American life. The right wing there and their junior auxiliary in the Reform Party here cannot wish it away.

I believe that Canada begins from a better starting point than the United States. We do not have a clean history when it comes to racism and discrimination but we do not have the same burden of history that the Americans do.

Nonetheless there are barriers still to the full participation of members of designated groups in the economy and therefore to their full participation in society. Creating opportunity through ensuring fairness is the point of Bill C–64. We have chosen a Canadian approach. We have been guided by what works.

I had to go back to the dictionary. After listening to the debate for several days, I was starting to question whether I really understood what the word equity means. This is the Employment Equity Act, not the employment special preference act, as the Reform would have us believe, not the employment discrimination act, as Reform would have us believe. It is the Employment Equity Act.

• (1220)

Let me quote from the dictionary: equity; fairness. If one goes to the second definition, it says the application of the principles of justice. Equity; justice. Those are Canadian words. Those are words that Canadians have taken to their hearts and have identified now for decades as a fundamental of what this country is all about.

Let me go to the word equality: the state of being equal. It is not one better than the other, but equal. That too is a term that our society and our country has stood for not only at home but around this globe.

Our approach in the bill is founded on a human resources planning approach to workplace issues. It is founded on creating a climate that encourages diversity through real action, not empty rhetoric. It is founded on a compliance process that has been based on those best Canadian values of negotiation and co–operation.

It is founded on giving employers the tools, the information and the incentive to recognize the ability in everybody who comes forward and applies for employment, in everybody who is in their employ and is looking for opportunities to advance and to improve.

My colleagues on this side of the House have talked about how this system will work. We do not have to rely on speculation. This is not new legislation. With some minor changes in applying it to the public service, it is the same employment equity legislation that has been in place in Canada since 1987.

My colleagues have talked about employers who see the value in this legislation to do the right thing. These employers have spoken of the flexibility and realism that is the foundation of our approach.

I sat through weeks of hearings of the human rights committee where numerous employers' organizations came before us in support of the legislation. They were not in support of every detail of it. They asked for some changes and most have been made. Not every equity group approved of every detail in the legislation. They asked for some changes and some of those have been made.

In true Canadian spirit, we are trying to achieve a progressive goal for all Canadians, a goal that is good for our economy, good for our society and good for individuals within our Canadian society.

We have not, as always, done what everybody would have liked but we have reached the best accommodation possible of the many different interests involved.

[Translation]

We have taken a made in Canada approach to employment equity. Admittedly, there are problems, but we can find effective, sensible and user friendly ways of dealing with these problems. This means no quotas, no reverse discrimination and no arbitrary preferential treatment. This means creating a fair and rational workplace for all.

[English]

I ask the hon. members opposite to quit falling back on the tired slogans of American politics, to quit pretending that the Canadian way is the American way. It is not. Look to this country. Look to our reality. Look to a better future and more opportunity for all Canadians, not just the select few. Look to a solution that makes sense. That solution, I believe, is found in Bill C–64 and the continuation of employment equity in Canada.

• (1225)

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the member who just made her presentation spent some time talking about discrimination in Canada, saying that members of the Reform Party deny that there is discrimination. I do not think one Reform member of Parliament could be found who would deny that there is discrimination and that it is not a problem. I do not deny it and I do not think any of my colleagues would deny it.

If discrimination finds its way into the workplace, as members of the Reform Party have said, it should be dealt with in a tough manner. We do not tolerate it and we must not tolerate it.

The member also gave statistics to show that legislation is needed. I present a few statistics and ask the member to respond to them. These are from the 1994 employment equity report. The report said that 570,000 people are currently regulated by the present Employment Equity Act. The member spoke about this not being new legislation, that there is an Employment Equity Act in place. Of this number 45.6 per cent are women. In the Canadian workforce about 45.9 per cent are female. The difference between those in the employment equity program and those outside is .3 per cent.

In total, women occupy 47 per cent of government jobs, while 47.3 per cent are available for work. Again, a .3 per cent difference. The civilian staff of the RCMP is 82.6 per cent female; Citizenship Canada, 74 per cent female; Transport Canada, 75 per cent male. What are we going to do in these departments? Are we going to make sure we get the right quotas, get rid of women in one department and get rid of men in the other? What are we going to do?

The overall statistics in government and outside government show the employment equity program has very little effect.

Before the member responds to these statistics, the polls consistently show that Canadians are against employment equity. Approximately 70 per cent to 80 per cent of Canadians are against employment equity programs, such as this Liberal program.

I want to ask the hon. member how the Liberals can totally disregard the will of a large majority of Canadians and ignore these polls on the issue when they are so willing to accept the results of their own polls on other issues?

Ms. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat that the Reform Party obviously needs to educate itself. The member for Vegreville just said "if discrimination finds its way into the workplace". It is impossible to look at any statistics from the workplace and not accept that discrimination finds its way into the workplace.

I will quote some additional statistics from a recent report by Simon Fraser University. Canadian born Greek males earned 16.2 per cent less than Canadian born males of British background. Even those earnings paled beside the ones for black and Filipino immigrant males who posted earnings that were respectively 21 per cent and 20.2 per cent lower than those for Canadian men of British background. Double jeopardy operates for women. Visible minority immigrant females earned 7.2 per cent less than white Canadian females. I therefore ask the hon. member to please take the if out of his statements about discrimination in the workplace.

• (1230)

Employment equity is not about being able to get a job; it is about having an equal opportunity to get as good a job if the person is as good. It is true that over 80 per cent of employees in the clerical category in the Government of Canada are women. Those happen to be the lowest paid jobs. That may be why there is such a high representation of women. Employment equity is about giving all groups the opportunity to earn the same as anybody of similar competence. Within that group of clerks the top levels are more likely to be occupied by men. Even within that group of clerks women are not allowed to progress.

The member referred to the fact that equity has been achieved. It has not. Notwithstanding the qualifications, we must look at the quality and the rate of pay, rather than simply being able to access the lowest paid jobs.

I sat through a couple of months of committee hearings on this bill. There was only one poll which came forward which said that Canadians were not in favour of equality in employment and it was a flawed poll. If the Reform Party had more polls with more validity to bring forward at any time during those hearings, it had every opportunity to do so, but it did not.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this country is managed by statistics. The hon. member pulled out statistic after statistic about who is where in our society. I wish government members would go to their ridings and talk to the people one at a time. Maybe then they would understand more about what is going on in the country.

I am very happy to speak to Bill C–64, the legislation of a Liberal perfect world. It was interesting to hear the debate over the last two days, but it is somewhat disheartening. Let me go back to an issue which is somewhat related to this. Let us look at what the Liberals know about the workplace.

Today in Halifax we learned of how the minister of patronage in Atlantic Canada is meddling in the job market. Surprise, surprise. Once again the friends of the minister have mismanaged millions of taxpayers' dollars at Cornwallis Park Development Agency in what has been called potentially the biggest boondoggle in the last two decades.

Jobs, jobs, jobs. What does it mean to the Liberal minister for Atlantic Canada, the minister of public works? Once again we see that the minister of public works has his own version of job equity. A person has to belong to one of two categories in this country: either donate to the Liberals or become friends with one. That is the only way to have an equal shot at a job in Atlantic Canada.

I do not think the government has any idea of what job equity is. Who a person knows and whom they donate to are what really count.

The seeds of dissension are here among our young. They are not there for lack of a job equity bill; they are there because many of them see themselves as not being able to get jobs because of quotas. Government will deny the use of the word quota. I will explain exactly where I get this terminology: right out of the bill.

• (1235)

This is social engineering at its worst. Ontario has just elected to do away with it. We are not talking about America, as one of our Liberal colleagues over there said. This is Ontario. Apparently there is a mismatch now. The Ontario government says it will do away with it while the Liberal government in Ottawa is about to impose it on the rest of Canada.

It is also interesting that the last speaker from the Liberal Party said that we in the Reform Party talk about affirmative action which is all wrong. However, the Liberal member for Halifax in a partial quote said this morning, "affirmative action would not be necessary if employment equity were in existence" or something to that effect.

Mr. Forseth: What is the difference?

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): That is exactly what she was talking about and the other one said: "You are talking about it over here".

What is the answer? The answer is: "We will fix it. We will fix it for everybody in Canada. We Liberals have the answer". Let me show what their answer is. Goals versus quotas, are they the same thing? Under the Employment Equity Act, section 6, an employer is not required "to hire or promote unqualified persons" which is good, nor "to create new positions in its workforce", which is very good.

Also under the Employment Equity Act, section 33, the Canadian Human Rights Commission cannot impose a quota on the employer where quota is defined as "a requirement to hire or promote a fixed and arbitrary number of persons during a given period". This is very good. People say: "That makes a bit of sense to us. We could probably buy into this legislation".

What is not talked about by the Liberals is section 10. In circumstances where under–representation of designated groups has been identified the employer is required to prepare a plan in which short term numerical goals for hiring and promotion of the designated groups are established. We will be getting employers to look at short term numerical goals, but these are not quotas. Also longer term goals for increasing the representation of persons in designated groups are also established.

If in the opinion of a Canadian Human Rights Commission investigator—there is an investigator; hire him like the ethics counsellor who is not used either—an employer has not made all reasonable efforts to implement the employment equity plan, including the goals, the employer may, if negotiations fail, ultimately be subject to an action by an employment equity review tribunal for contempt of process similar in nature to contempt of court leading to imprisonment until the directive is complied with. This is from sections 25 and 31, mark it down.

An employer, believe it or not, can also be fined up to $50,000 by the responsible minister, who is yet to be determined, for failure to file an employment equity report, for failure to include required information in the employment equity report, or for providing false or misleading information in the employment equity report. This is from section 36, write it down.

Tell me the Liberal government does not have quotas. Tell me this is all voluntary, completely voluntary. Then tell me what it means to have an investigator on staff checking them out.

• (1240)

Tell me what it means to force organizations to have short term numerical goals for hiring and promotion of designated groups and long term goals. If they tell the investigator they cannot make it or they cannot do this or that, then they negotiate. If that does not work, there will be a tribunal. If that does not work, they will be put behind bars.

Listen up. What is the government doing? This is not a fun exercise we are going through to get votes and spend money. What this government is legislating here is serious. It has nothing to do with racism but has everything to do with rights and privileges in this country.

Who will the government fine up to $50,000? Why will it fine someone up to $50,000?

What will the government do when it has a quota in a town where perhaps there are not the right number of people? Will it get its investigator to find somebody to take to a tribunal? What if someone is found who is absolutely not suitable for the job? Will that person be placed in the job anyway? That is a great way to get Canada competitive in the global market. The brilliance of social engineering.

Let us look at a couple of application forms. One of these forms was given to me by a backbench Liberal who is not very happy with what is going on here. Among the things asked on this application form is to self–identify. Look in the mirror or perhaps determine what kind of person you really are. Let us self–identify: cultural, racial or linguistic minority person. Explain that and define it. Lesbian, gay man or bisexual. What the heck does that have to do with employment? That is where social engineering hit. That is just one application.

Here is the government's application. The longest thing on the application is the group with which one has to self–identify: Black, Chinese, Filipino, South Asian, Indonesian, Pakistani, Japanese, Korean, Southeast Asian, Burmese, Cambodian, Laotian, Thai, Vietnamese, visible minority west Asian, North African, visible minority Latin American, Oceanic, Polynesian, Micronesian, Melanesian. What is the government doing to this country?

These are application forms. The government is intent on social engineering quota systems. If something is found wrong then it will get its investigator out. He will chase it down, much like the investigator it has under the Official Languages Act. He makes his report.

Mr. McClelland: That might answer the census question.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Perhaps.

This is the politically correct Liberal government days in our Canadian society. Government members will impose on the rest of us those things we do not necessarily want. Do they really think in a community like mine that many visible minorities do not get jobs? In fact they are the majority of employees in many businesses in my community. Do they think other people say that is not fair? We have to try to employ everyone in society regardless of race, colour, creed, religion or sex.

• (1245)

We cannot engineer society through legislation, but the Liberals will do it because they have a majority government. The mess will be there, which they will leave behind when they are turfed out of office.

Let us talk about SMIP. Probably not one of them knows what SMIP is. Do they know? What is SMIP? They have no idea what SMIP is. That is special measures initiatives program, a new program just introduced by the Liberal government. What is it all about?

It retains the successful elements of previous special measures programs. It has new initiatives to support the development and retention of designated group members. There is a recruitment component in SMIP that is similar to old programs but is directed at other groups such as aboriginals, visible minorities and so on.

What does SMIP do? It spends money. It spends $768,000 on aboriginals; $508,000 on all employees; $992,000 on all employment equity groups; $838,000 on more than one but not all employment equity groups; $382,000 on women; and $225,000 on visible minority groups. The list goes on and on.

There is not a person in the House today on that side who even knows what SMIP does. A lot of it buys votes; it enables the government under yet another program to go around the country handing out money.

The Liberal government is involved in quotas. I have explained how and why. If someone would like to stand on the other side and explain what I said, if I were wrong about my discussion on goals and quotas, I would love to hear it. Am I wrong about sections 25 and 31? Am I wrong about section 36? If I am, let us talk about it.

How is it right to ensure fairness in an employment system while at the same time telling some people they need not apply because they do not fit into a category? The government will say that is not really so and they will get another portion of the workplace.

Young people are saying to politicians all the time, not just Reformers but Liberals as well, that they cannot get in there, that they need not apply, that they need not submit an application form to the RCMP. I have had them in my office and I asked why not. They say that they do not fit, that they are excluded from the category. How does it make it right on the one hand to exclude people and on the other hand say it is fair and equitable?

• (1250)

An hon. member: That is baloney.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): One member says that is baloney.

An hon. member: It is.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): It is absolutely accurate. I need not say much more about it. It is extremely frustrating to listen to Liberals on the other side giving their version of the Liberal world out there without a reality check with the rest of the country.

When they refer to "those bad Reformers" it must be a racial thing with them. If they took a good look at who we are and what we represent in our communities—people of all races, colours, creeds, religion and sex—they would be a little disappointed in themselves. They should look in the mirror and wonder what they said in the House of Commons about Reformers. That is probably the lowest we can get in debates like this one. It is fine if they wish to use it but they will not get it from over here.

If the goal system is not a system of quotas, exactly what is it? What is it when we need an investigator to ensure these things are being done? What is it when people can be fined and become a criminal for not living up to a quota established by government? What is that?

It is a frustrating exercise to try to get the debate on a level that the government will understand. Its members are intent on pushing this through. They are intent on having it their way. They are intent on giving average Canadians what they think is best for them even if average Canadians do not think it is.

Mr. Andy Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief.

The Reform Party was born of a sense of feeling excluded from the power and the decisions made in the country. If I am wrong in that regard I would certainly want it pointed out. However, it is my understanding that essentially the Reform Party was born of the notion that the west was feeling left out and did not feel it was part of it.

That sentiment should cause the member to understand exactly the principles behind the bill. The desire to allow all people to feel a part of the system of government and so on is very important. Members representing that party opposite should be the first people to understand that notion, given where they were born.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, the member's first presumption is inaccurate. Not only the west wants in. He has it all wrong. The east wants in. Central Canada wants in. The difficulty is that people across the nation are alienated by the traditional tactics of that party.

It was not just politics, for instance, that had us opt out of the MP pension plan. That traditional party at the trough will take the money and run, which alienates people across the country. It has alienated us here. The traditional approach to the Senate of that party and the other party that is gone is wrong. It has alienated most people in the country yet the Prime Minister continually appoints Liberals to the other place.

• (1255)

It is not some Reformer coming out of Abbotsford, Langley or Aldergrove, British Columbia, saying that he is angry. We do a fair bit of travelling ourselves and we hear it across the country.

That presumption the member just made will sink the Liberal ship. It truly will because they are basing the dissatisfaction of people on something they feel is western alienation and that is wrong.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I attentively listened to the hon. member's speech. I was somewhat puzzled by some of the conclusions he drew from the bill we are debating.

I should like to ask a question of the hon. member. Does he believe aboriginal Canadians, women and visible minorities choose to work in low paying jobs, choose alienation from the Canadian economic system and choose their lifestyle?

We have lived for decades without employment equity and thanks to employment equity we are now seeing progress. We are seeing, for example, that women's salaries have gone up. Not enough. They are still not equal to men's salaries. The gender gap still exists.

Since the hon. member seems to have all the answers, I will go back to the original question. Does he think that women choose to be ghettoized in certain sectors? Do visible minorities choose low incomes because they like low income jobs? Or, is it because there are systemic barriers in society that do not allow these individuals to achieve their full potential?

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, no one in this country or any other country chooses to make less money than anyone else. Males do not choose that. Females do not choose that.

Everybody in this country has an equal opportunity. It is not necessary to legislate it. It is not necessary to imprison people or to fine people that do not abide by the rules.

It is a lot like any other distribution within society. I stand beside the member from Coquitlam who is female. I do not think she makes less than I do. I do not think she has any particular advantage over me or I have any particular advantage over her. She got where she is today the same way I did; she worked hard for it.

The presumption being made is that any inequity in the country can be legislated. They cannot legislate morality, although I am sure they will try hard enough. They cannot engineer a society. Have they not stopped to think about what has happened in Ontario and why? Is it just because the Ontario government is Conservative and they are not? Is that the reason they put it away?

Ms. Catterall: Yes, exactly.

Mr. Stinson: How many female leaders have they ever had and in how many years?

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): It is interesting to note the number of female leaders the Prime Minister's Liberals have had.

Mr. Stinson: Yes, and after how many years?

• (1300)

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I think this is a government of double standards. A few minutes ago I described what happened with the minister of public works in Atlantic Canada. Talk about double standards. Hiring friends. Does this guy look at employment equity? Only if you know a Liberal and donate to the party. That is employment equity to those people over there.

An hon. member: Most people call it patronage.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): This is a party of double standards. Fortunately for Canada we only get their double standards once every few elections and then we throw them out.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the member. He accuses others of having double standards. Yet he is against equity, the purpose of which is to ensure as much as possible that the double standards that exist are rectified.

The member is beginning to understand a little. In another 120 years, to use an expression he used, his party should have it down pat.

The member said in previous remarks as well that he and his colleagues have travelled around the country and know very well what is going on. Is he aware of an article in today's Cornwall Standard Freeholder in which the Grand Chief of the Akwasasne community in my riding talked about the extensive travel of the member across the way: "Three Reform Party MPs who toured Akwasasne Wednesday to check out smugglers alley should be arrested for trespassing, says the furious Grand Chief Russell Roundpoint". He identifies the members for Calgary Northeast, Wild Rose and Fraser Valley West.

I wonder if the member is familiar with that and what some people think of his travel plans. Does he not think that when he does those kinds of activities he just bragged about that the least he could do is have the courtesy of informing the local elected officials, and I am thinking here of the Grand Chief of Akwasasne?

There is a perception of insulting the community by the failure of members to do so, and showing disrespect for the minority and also to stereotyping them as all being part of an illegal activity. If he does not want to give that perception, will he at least tell us now that the failure on his part and that of his colleagues to show that kind of respect was wrong and will he apologize to my constituents who live in Akwasasne?

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, if this member were doing his job we would not have to travel to his riding.

If that member realizes what is going on down there and the problems they are having and the people we talked about, he would not be in the House whining about it.

He is trying to do exactly what is going on in the House. He is trying to turn a situation where we were looking at some real problems of crime in his riding into a racial issue. That is what is wrong.

We have been talking to the solicitor general about the crime problem in this area and we have been getting very poor answers. There has been no recognition from the government, no real action to curb it. We have been down in the member's riding because we were asked to go. If he does not like the way we travel, that is really just too bad.

I belong to a party that goes out and talks to the people rather than these pompous Liberals who complain that Reformers are in their ridings dealing with issues. They turn a crime issue into a racial issue. That is exactly what is wrong. He has a crime issue in his riding.

• (1305)

They do not have the courage to deal with the crime because they are so sensitive about something they call a racial issue.

Mr. Barry Campbell (St. Paul's, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will be splitting my time with the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore.

[Translation]

I am pleased to discuss this bill, which seeks to make the workplace fairer for all Canadians, particularly those who have traditionally been disadvantaged.

This is also an opportunity to reply to some very severe criticism made by Reform Party members in terms of this bill's probable impact on the Canadian business world.

[English]

I wish they would stay with us long enough to hear some of these responses so they do not come back uneducated. They asked a lot of questions. They want responses. I am going to reply to some of their concerns and it would be great if they were here to hear them.

[Translation]

This criticism has dire consequences, because it seeks to undermine the efforts made to ensure fair treatment of Canadian workers.

[English]

Mr. McClelland: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I note that it is customary and appropriate that we do not make reference to the absence or the attendance of other hon. members.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I thank the hon. member for raising the point. His interpretation is correct. If that assessment is correct I would ask the hon. member for St. Paul's to deal with it. We should all be mindful, as the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest has raised the issue, that we are not at any time to make reference to the absence of members from the Chamber.

Mr. Campbell: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to speak to this bill and to have the attention of all members of Parliament.

[Translation]

So, I want to take a few minutes to discuss the provisions of this bill and explain how they will not only benefit disadvantaged people in the workplace, but also employers.

This legislation reflects two basic values which Canadians really care about: fairness and equality. It also takes into account the need to promote business development, in order to create jobs and opportunities which will ensure a good future for all Canadians, whoever they are and whatever their situations.

[English]

This bill seeks to achieve a critical balance between competitiveness and compassion which is so vital for assuring opportunities for Canadians.

While we in government are seeking to enhance fairness and opportunities for Canadians, some opposition members either do not see the need for such measures or feel that no improvements are required to existing legislation. In my opinion they simply do not get it.

They have never had the experience. They do not understand what it is to apply for a job, to have all of the qualifications and to somehow suspect that their colour, their gender, their disability or their orientation precludes them from a fair chance at that job.

I do not necessarily ascribe malevolence to interviewers or people who do the hiring. It is human nature. We have all felt it ourselves. When we face candidates before us we tend to like those who are just like us better than we like everybody else. We feel more comfortable. We feel more at home. We can see ourselves working with them.

We have only to look at the membership of the third party to see that they have the same problem and perhaps need a plan to deal with it within their own ranks.

An interesting study was done recently with respect to hiring. Employers were asked to consider applicants on the basis of their applications only. There were no personal interviews. It was interesting to see employers hire people without regard to colour, gender or disability and only find out later their colour, gender or disability and then say: "I do not care. I will make whatever arrangements are necessary. Whether it is a ramp for a wheelchair, or whatever it is, I want that candidate".

When faced with a person in front of them, by human nature or otherwise, the tendency is, after years and years of good intentions, for employers not to move fast enough. They need some assistance in seeing a way through to doing what they know is in the interests of their businesses which is to have a diversified workforce.

• (1310)

Much progress has been made under current employment legislation and the current act but much more remains to be done. Women are still concentrated in lower paid clerical, sales and service jobs. Maybe that is the place where some hon. members want to see them stay but that is not where this member or this party wishes to them stay.

In the case of aboriginal people, the percentage in the workforce under the act currently is 1.4 per cent compared to 3 per cent in the Canadian population. It is roughly the case with respect to persons with disabilities. They are roughly 6.5 per cent of the overall population but a far lower percentage in the workforce. That is wrong. It denies Canadian businesses the work and dedication of devoted and capable people who can be accommodated and should be received and welcomed as should people who are otherwise among the designated groups.

However, those people still find themselves on the bottom rung of the economic and social ladder. It is not just their problem, which is what I suspect hon. members from the third party think. It is a problem for all of us since restricting the participation of such individuals in the economic life of our country damages the competitiveness of Canadian businesses. Businesses themselves understand that. They endorse many of these proposals. They have been doing a number of things on their own. They have been working with us to develop programs to give effect to the guiding principles encompassed in this legislation. It is good for business and it is good for Canada.

Those businesses realize that recruiting, promoting and retaining people who are representative of the Canadian population helps them provide better and more responsive service since diverse experience and perspectives are a bonus not a burden.

It is useful to note that many business representatives, not usually identified as left wing radicals, appeared before the standing committee in support of the bill. They told us the bill would help them develop a more diverse workforce and give them a competitive edge over less diversified competitors. Diversification in business just is not about one's product line. It is about one's employees as well.

Contrary to the accusations of some members, this bill is not some piece of wild–eyed radicalism, totally divorced from the realities of economic life and experience. Rather, it is a moderate document which seeks to promote equal opportunity in the workplace without imposing an onerous regulatory environment on business which we recognize is already hard pressed in an increasingly global, competitive marketplace.

For instance, while the act seeks to encourage employers to address under–representation by members of designated groups, it does not require them to hire unqualified people, to create new positions, to create undue hardship or to contradict the merit principle. What we are anxious to see is people hired on their merits regardless of their gender, their colour and other characteristics which have gotten in the way of people with equal merit getting an equal opportunity.

The impact of the bill will be limited since it will only involve those public and private sector organizations and enterprises covered by the Canada Labour Code, about 10 per cent of the workforce. It does not impose quotas or some draconian regime directed from Ottawa as some have suggested. Rather it seeks to help organizations and enterprises develop their own targets for themselves which will allow them to develop a more representative workforce.

To do this, the act will rely on self–identification by employees rather than forcing people to be singled out. There is every indication that such a system should be successful since employees have shown themselves increasingly willing to identify themselves for the purpose of this since the first act was passed in 1986.

In addition, enforcement of the act will not be a reign of terror as conjured up by members of the third party. There is no intention of hounding companies which, not yet fully in compliance with the targets they set, are sincerely trying to reach their goals. Our approach in such situations will be of helping, not harassing. We hope to encourage co–management of this program within enterprises. This means getting workers and management to work together in partnership to ensure the success of the program. While management will bear responsibility since it has the ultimate say in how it manages its affairs, there will be considerable opportunity for both sides to work together on the setting of targets, timetables and implementation strategies.

• (1315)

Success in the area of labour–management co–operation could well prove so rewarding that both parties might then decide to extend this collaboration to other areas of common concern, which would in turn benefit the enterprise as a whole.

Canadians are justly proud of the progress they have made in ensuring fairness and equal opportunity. While the Employment Equity Act of 1986 has led to a number of successes, much remains to be done. We in this party will not cease in our efforts to improve upon what we have done in the past. History does not stop. We gain new experiences every day and we see ways in which we can implement our policies more effectively as time goes on.

We realize though that progress must not hinder the success of Canadian business, which is so vital for creating jobs and opportunities Canadians need. This act seeks to provide this vital balance and contains provisions that will benefit not only employees, particularly those traditionally disadvantaged, but employers as well. As such, it represents a win–win situation where everyone gains.

For this reason I will be supporting this legislation before the House and would encourage all members to do so.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before giving the floor to the hon. member for Lévis, I simply wish to remind the House that the period for questions and comments lasts five minutes.

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, first, I want to say that the official opposition supports the legislation, even though we feel it does not go far enough—

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dubé: —in spite of the protests made by the third party. At the same time, a member of that party alluded earlier to the government's double standards. In a sense I agree with him, but obviously not for the same reasons.

There are the following points. First, the government introduces legislation like this one, which is in general very praiseworthy and, at the same time, it passes other legislation, including one piece of legislation last year, suspending job security in the public service for three years. Administratively, they will cut 45,000 jobs over this period, and yet, when it comes to employment equity for women, for example, in the public service, it seems to me that a government should first set the example itself, before it asks business to do something.

It should be beyond reproach in this regard. In fact, we can see, and all the statistics indicate, that no progress has been made in the federal public service; nothing has changed. Pay equity is in the order of 72 per cent. Even for jobs requiring the same qualifications, women were paid less than men. Women are in lower paying jobs, because these jobs are lower down the ladder.

With the cuts and the legislation ending job security, there was the phenomenon of voluntary departures, buy–outs. In cutting other positions, a discretionary formula was used, and guess by whom, by the managers of the various government services. The vast majority of the positions involved are held by men, very few by women.

Can we call this a fair practice? This is what I mean when I talk about a double standard, it may be alright for the third party to support it. It is all very well to make speeches in the House, to pass fine laws, but I know, coming from Quebec, that some people expected a lot from the Official Languages Act, for example, in promoting employment equity for francophones, those from Quebec, and even those from outside Quebec, and still nothing has happened.

Last year, a minister was obliged to issue directives to enforce a 20–year old law, and nothing has improved.

We will support this bill, but I have a question for the hon. member. In his opinion, since he is closer to the minister, are there any indications of a reversal of the double standard trend, that is, the trend of passing fine laws, but changing nothing? On the contrary, revisionist measures have been taken leading to regression and a return to the past by, for example, suspending job security in the public service.

What is preventing the government from passing antiscab legislation?

• (1320)

So, this is my question to the hon. member, who seems to have progressive ideas. I want him to reassure me as to the value of what he is saying, in terms of its impact on the government and on cabinet.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I remind the hon. member for St. Paul's that while he indicated to the Chair he would be splitting his time, if he wants to give his colleague the opportunity to conclude her intervention before the end of government orders his response should be brief.

Mr. Campbell: Mr. Speaker, thank you. I do want to allow my colleague that opportunity.

I thank the hon. member for his intervention and for reminding the House that the official opposition does support the bill. We appreciate that support. Obviously they recognize, as we do, that there are improvements that can be made in the way in which we do business in this country.

He raises some good points to the effect that the public service should be mindful of the laudable merits of this statute as it begins to apply to them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I thank the hon. member for his co–operation and I regret the period of question or comment is terminated.

Ms. Jean Augustine (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to join with my colleagues on this side of the House in support of this important piece of legislation, which many disadvantaged Canadians have long dreamed of.

Yes, I use the word "dream". I am proud to be a member of a team that dares to dream, one that has such faith in our capacity as individuals and our capacity as a nation.

In the Liberal Party the vision was set out in what we called "Creating Opportunity: The Liberal Plan for Canada ". In that document the government reinforced and spoke about the social fabric of the country. We promised to strengthen our employment equity legislation to ensure that we meet a very simple but profound commitment. That commitment springs from the belief that everyone in Canada is entitled to equality.

I remind members that the red book speaks of a future where all Canadians, regardless of gender, race, or physical and intellectual attributes, enjoy a standard of living and quality of life equal to those of other Canadians. With this legislation we are moving forward and ensuring that that future will become a reality.

I want to talk about Bill C–64 in terms of the strength we hope this will build in our society, in our communities, and among us. It is capitalizing on the diversity. It is about creating jobs and growth. It is about removing barriers to full employment. The modifications of the act are designed to streamline and strengthen its existing provisions to ensure that the philosophy behind employment equity becomes the everyday practice in the federally regulated workplace.

This constructive piece of legislation builds on the significant progress we have achieved since the Employment Equity Act was introduced in 1986. I remind the House that Canadian banks, airlines, broadcasters, some of the largest and most visible companies in the country, have been implementing employment equity programs for a decade. They have recognized that without such plans their businesses would become less and less representative of the clients they serve, a point which must not be lost on us as government.

As a result of the federal policy and the dedication of business to implement it, the numbers of designated groups have risen, without backlash but with plenty of benefits to our society. Bill C–64 is a continuation of our efforts to create real equality of opportunity in the federally regulated workplace. It goes further than our existing legislation by expanding the act's coverage and clarifying what employment equity will and will not do.

This legislation will help explode the many myths we hear coming from across the way in this House. These folks have circulated many of those myths: employment equity challenges workplace norms that reinforce existing patterns of power. This can be threatening to people who are satisfied with the status quo. They do not understand the need to accommodate differences because they are satisfied with the way things are.

• (1325)

The so–called playing field is already tipped in favour of those for whom it was constructed, so it is not surprising that there are attempts to find reasons to justify resistance to more inclusive employment policies and practices.

We have heard the myths coming from the other side of the House. We want to affirm that employment equity, with its emphasis on fairness toward all Canadians, shatters all those unfounded assumptions.

The legislation requires only that employers consider all qualified candidates, I underline qualified, when seeking new employees or choosing among workers for promotions. The act does not allow quotas, and it certainly has no mandatory preferences when employers choose new workers or consider their existing employees for promotions. Somehow those two concepts, the qualified candidates and no mandatory preferences, seem to be lost on the opposition.

This bill is not about preferential treatment; it is about equal treatment. If it is given a chance to work, everybody will benefit. The legislation is meant as an unobtrusive human resource management tool that would educate and assist employers as they create more equitable workforces. Would that we could do this in the House.

The whole point of this bill is to enhance this country's economic performance through the removal of barriers that prevent members of the designated groups from contributing to the workplace. It is as much about economics as it is about justice. Clearly it is about both. We want to achieve a better balance, one that assures fairness and dignity for disadvantaged Canadians and works to our country's social and economic advantage.

We are not interested in compiling statistics. The act is not about counting numbers or instituting reams of new regulations. We are talking about Canadian people, work ready individuals anxious to demonstrate their abilities in a fair and welcoming environment, who must be given that choice.

We need to rethink how we relate to one another as groups of people. That is exactly what our improved employment equity legislation asks us to do.

Bill C–64 asks Canadians to open their hearts and open their minds to the many advantages of workplace diversity. It asks that we put into practice the democratic principles we profess to believe in: fairness, access and equity for all, regardless of gender, race, disability, orientation. It insists that we live up to our moral and legal obligations by upholding the rights and freedoms enshrined in our Constitution.

Clearly employment equity is not an impediment to business or an infringement on anyone's rights. It is a catalyst for improvement to the workplace and progress in our country. It is the foundation of Canada's future. More than just the stuff dreams are made of, this legislation can dramatically impact the standard of living and quality of life of disadvantaged Canadians, the millions of women, visible minorities, persons living with disabilities, aboriginal people, et cetera, who are an important part of our great nation.

I remind my hon. colleagues that these people are counting on us to do the right thing. They are counting on us to endorse this crucial legislation. There can be no debate. Bill C–64 is the right thing for Canada. It is the right thing for us to do. It is the right thing for us to do right now.

Let us get on with the job. Maybe the myth carriers and those who would stand in this House and continue to have those myths circulate will begin to understand that Canadians are counting on us to ensure that fairness and equity exist in this country.

Let us get on with the job. Let us support this legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I see members seeking the floor on questions and comments. I remind colleagues it is 1.30 p.m. I can only proceed by unanimous consent.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 1.30 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

CORRECTIONS AND CONDITIONAL RELEASE ACT

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River, Lib.) moved that Bill C–242, an act to amend the Corrections and Conditional Release Act, the Criminal Code and the Young Offenders Act (improvement to public safety), be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have this private member's bill reach the floor of the House of Commons. As members know it is not an item of private members' business which will be voted on. We all know and believe, because we have to, that our private members' business arrangements sometimes shine a light, point the way and give direction in the field of statutory and policy reform. If it does not happen here it is not going to happen anywhere.

My bill—perhaps I should not call it my bill because a lot of people, events and persons contributed to the bill—reflects six or seven years of experience in this House as a member of Parliament, regionally and nationally and more particularly the seven years I spent on the House of Commons justice committee. Some of the things in the bill actually evolve directly from that experience on the justice committee.

To be sure there continue to be flaws in Canada's criminal justice system. We all recognize that. The challenge is to find solutions and make corrections.

I am not one of those who would say that the whole system is in disrepute. I have a great deal of respect for the Canadian criminal justice system, notwithstanding some of the flaws that it has. Let us be honest, there is not a criminal justice system in the world which will not over time develop flaws and show need for change.

In the past year and one–half the government that I sit with proudly has made a number of changes in the criminal justice area. I will mention the Young Offenders Act, the Corrections and Conditional Release Act, the new sentencing act, amendments to the Criminal Code to deal with DNA testing and other areas and last but not least the institution of a new national crime prevention council.

The council recognizes that we have a long way to go, maybe forever. The business of reducing the potential for crime will go on forever. The business of addressing society's needs in a way that will reduce the propensity of our citizens to resort to crime will always be there and will go on.

Last night, by coincidence I guess, I had the opportunity of watching on one of our Canadian networks an interview with the French and Mahaffy families following the conviction of the accused Paul Bernardo for the murder and other crimes in relation to their daughters. Thanks to television and to those families, we were able to enter into the homes of these two Canadian families. I could not help but sense that the families were hoping for a reconciliation with Canadians to meet the challenges in their personal lives. I cannot imagine that had anything to do with why they agreed to do the interview.

• (1335)

I want to thank them for doing the interview and I hope that Canadians have been made aware of several things. It shows how vulnerable we all are in terms of public safety. We share our vulnerability to a psychopath or any criminal intimately with every one of our fellow citizens.

Last night's interview permitted Canadians to understand how important this area of law and policy is to all of us. I hope those families will forgive me for even attempting to suggest what they wanted to convey. I believe one area where we still have some reform ahead of us is the criminal justice area. I hope they would agree.

There are still reforms that we must address. The bill before us today is a short list. It is not comprehensive. It contains six areas of reform. I am going to walk through it now. I believe it is fair to say that not every element of the six areas will have universal support. That is rarely the case when one tries to make a change in the criminal justice system. However, I would like to think that there is a sizeable consensus that this list is just part of the reforms still out there for us to accomplish.

The first item is the denial of statutory release for serious, repeat offenders. A serious repeat offender in this case is a person who while on any form of early release, has been convicted of an offence for which that person has been sentenced to five years or more. The subsequent second offence which would result in the denial of early release is certainly a serious offence. It would have drawn a sentence of five years or more.

I am not being particularly aggressive in this. In April 1993 the standing committee on justice reported through its 14th report and recommended that the sentence for the subsequent offence be set at two years. It is the same recommendation of denial of parole and early release but the threshold was two years. In my bill I have selected five years.

I hope I will not be accused by anyone of wimping out. The Liberal Party of Canada in May and August of the same year adopted the report of the justice committee as part of its criminal justice policy package. The House of Commons justice committee unanimously endorsed the provision and referred it to the House. The Liberal Party of Canada adopted the entire justice committee report. At the moment that recommended reform has not yet been adopted.

• (1340)

One of the most glaring examples of why reform is necessary is the case of the conviction of Albert Foulston in Edmonton for the murder of a police officer in 1990. This person has had 48 separate convictions so it is fair to call him a convict. This convict was in prison serving a sentence of approximately 10 years. I do not know whether anybody really knew exactly how the 10 years was composed because the sentencing mathematics contained in the Criminal Code and in the CCRA are very complex. In any event, he was released.

On several occasions while he was on early release he committed other offences. I will not go through the list. It is part of the public record elsewhere. While on early release for the umpteenth time he participated in the killing of an Edmonton police officer for which he was fairly promptly sentenced to 20 years.

The sentence calculation resulted in his total sentence looking like 30 years because it was consecutive. However, because of the way we calculate sentences, he was eligible for parole one year and five months after he was convicted of the murder. With his life sentence he was eligible for parole one year and five months after he was convicted of murder. That is absurd. The absurdity has been recorded in public journals.

One is moved to say that the system is obviously in some disarray. I will leave that as an example of why the existing provision must be changed.

My bill says that if a person is on early release and is convicted of a crime and sentenced to two years or more that person loses the right to early release.

I accept that there must be at the end of the consecutive sentences a period when the offender will be integrated. That has to be in the statutory release portion because I do not want that guy being released at the end of 30 years and sitting on the Bay Street bus the next day beside my kids. I want a period of integration.

The bill would close a loophole which allows offenders to avoid serving time for new offences if those new offences occur while they are on early release or even while they are in prison. If a person is sentenced to seven years for a particularly bad crime and during the fifth year that person gets out, beats somebody up and steals his money, that would normally draw a sentence of a couple of years. The way the law is currently written it requires that person to start the two years back at the beginning of the seven year sentence.

I am not going to take time to read that section of the Criminal Code. It is a public statute and anybody can read it. They can read the Corrections and Conditional Release Act and the appropriate section of the Criminal Code.

• (1345)

Basically the second offence is what I call a freebie. There is no sanction. You can steal a car, steal a purse, commit an assault, and provided of course that the sentence for the second offence does not exceed the length of the sentence you were first on, you do not have to serve any additional time. This needs to be corrected.

We tried in the House in the last Parliament, I know we tried in this one, and we are getting closer. We have made amendments, but officials seem to be reluctant to alter the system too much, because every time you change a sentence calculation it costs money, and they do not have the money in their budgets. They are very cautious about making changes to the way we sentence people and keep people in our correctional institutions. I accept that.

In any event, I am still on the case and many of our colleagues in this House are still on the case and we are slowly getting to those reforms.

The third area is the lowering of the age of criminal responsibility from age 12, where it is now, to age 10. That has been misinterpreted in a lot of quarters. People ask how you can throw the Criminal Code at a little 11–year old. That is not the objective, any more than it is the objective to throw the book at the 13–year old or the 14–year old. What we have done in this country is arrange for intervention into the life of a young offender when they are under 18 years of age. What this does is allows the appropriate intervention for a 10–year old or 11–year old. At present there is no intervention.

I remember in the last Parliament, the day before I introduced a similar provision in private members' business was the day of that unfortunate killing in Great Britain where the two 11–year old boys were involved. If that had happened here in Canada there would have been no intervention. In some provinces there would have been a social worker, but no Young Offenders Act. The social worker procedures vary from province to province. This would allow intervention at an early age, the same way we intervene for all young offenders.

The fourth area is a provision that deals with the community scourge of crack houses. Municipalities are crying out for some way to deal with this. I suggest the solution is to redefine what we call a disorderly house or a bawdy house in the Criminal Code and allow the same procedures that communities use to deal with bawdy houses and disorderly houses, where there are procedures to deal with what we call found–ins and procedures to deal with landlords. There is nothing else out there. It is a simple amendment, and many communities I know would want to take advantage of it to deal with crack houses.

Fifth is stiffer bail provisions for two categories of cases, where you have people out on bail or on peace bonds committing other offences. This proposal deals with being on bail or on a peace bond and committing an offence on the peace bond or committing another driving offence while on bail for a driving offence. There are very serious implications for the public to have a drunk out driving again when he or she is on bail on a driving offence. To reverse the onus in the bail does not mean they do not get bail; it means that it is up to them to show the judge why they should be released. The onus or the burden of proof changes in terms of entitlement to bail.

Last is a matter that has been discussed publicly. It would allow victims of sexual assault to have the blood of the accused tested only under a judge's order and in such a way that the evidence of the blood test would not be used against them in the trial. This provides something for the victim to make sure that he or she has not been infected with many of the sexually transmitted diseases that are out now. There are half a dozen of them. Some of them are lethal. We have to have some compassion for victims where you make a prima facie case in front of a judge and the judge says there will be a blood test. In this way the victim can be assured, as best we can using the medical testing we have, that he or she has not been infected with one of these STDs.

• (1350)

Those are the six parts. I have had a lot of help preparing this, first from my constituents, who have given me a lot of latitude here in Parliament to deal with a lot of issues. I hope the bill reflects their concerns. I received a lot of help from Canadians. I will mention some of the people with whom I have had contact over the last few years: Margot Blackburn, who has gone public, Priscilla de Villiers, who has gone public, Mrs. Mahaffy, the Rosenfeldts, and others. These people have all been direct or indirect victims who want to see change. I have also spoken to public interest groups, Victims of Violence, CAVEAT, the Canadian Centre for Victims of Crime, financed by the Canadian Police Association.

I am grateful to my colleagues in this House for their continuing support. Sooner or later, I hope these initiatives will bear fruit.

[Translation]

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to speak on private member's Bill C–242 tabled by the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River. I shall be addressing in particular clauses 3 and 8 on lowering the minimum age of criminal responsibility.

Before I begin, I would like to stress that I find it a bit strange that we are today debating a private member's bill from a member of the government party. He himself began his speech by stating that he was on the House of Commons justice committee for six years, nearly two of those while his own party formed the government. I find it somewhat strange that he is proposing this again today. I wonder, is it because he has not managed to influence his own minister of justice? Yet, as a member of the justice committee he has studied these specific aspects.

I am a bit surprised therefore to see a former member of the justice committee proposing such a bill. Perhaps this means—and I think some of the hon. members opposite might have something to say on this—that the matter was looked at somewhere and the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River was no doubt told that his bill was not in line with the government's intentions.

I am therefore prepared to debate it, but it is my impression—not that I want to say we are wasting our time—but that the energy expended by the hon. member, his good intentions notwithstanding, could have been better expended if he had worked on the office of the Minister of Justice, particularly the minister himself. But, there you are.

The members of the opposition, who have no real power, can see that the backbenchers of the government party do not have much power or influence over their cabinet colleagues either.

As I have stated, my speech will be on clauses 3 and 8, because they are aimed at dropping the minimum age of criminal responsibility from 12 to 10 years.

I recall being present here in the House when the Young Offenders Act was being discussed. That debate succeeded in lowering the age by two years. At that rate, and considering the number of debates there have been over time—you may think I am laying it on a bit thick—but if we keep dropping the age down every two years, in ten years they will be saying that the Criminal Code applies to babies. This is not logical, but there you have it. In Canada, government members, with the backing of the third party, are going along with a trend that is really reinforcing the ideas of the right, ideas that our young people really need measures to control them better.

I cannot get over this. Before coming out with such things, did anyone think about the message we are giving to our young people at the present time? Ten to twelve year olds are still just children, or adolescents at most.

The hon. member is suggesting a change in the definition of a child and an adolescent by lowering the age. At 10 they would be recognized as adolescents.

• (1355)

True, our children are bigger than they used to be because they are healthier and better fed. It was recently reported that their IQs might be 10 per cent higher as well, for a variety of reasons, than what they were 20 years ago. I am willing to agree that these conditions are improving, but I still feel ten years is too young.

I am sure that this has not succeeded in influencing the Minister of Justice and therefore is not likely to be implemented. I trust that this debate will not influence others. One never knows if, after Quebec becomes sovereign, another party, the Reform Party for instance, were to come to power in Canada, well then it would be—

Mr. Gagnon: It would be dreadful.

Mr. Dubé: Although I did not put words in the mouth of the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine, for once I agree with him. It would be dreadful to see such measures made more stringent.

We in Quebec have a tradition. Although we apply the Canadian Criminal Code to those under the age of 18 years. there is a provision for rehabilitation. When a crime has been committed by a young person, it must be interpreted as a sign to the parents and to society that something must be done for this young person.

I recall the words of a member of this House, whom I shall not name as he is not present. You would have cautioned me, Mr. Speaker, that we must not speak of the absent, but once warned, twice shy.

Who among us can boast that we did nothing bad as children. It is true that there are some extremely isolated cases, for instance the two young boys aged between 10 and 12 who committed a murder in England. This is unacceptable, but these are isolated cases. Let us have a look at the statistics.

What is the real state of affairs? According to statistics issued by the Conseil permanent de la jeunesse du Québec, in 1992–1993, 35 per cent of violent crimes in Canada were committed by individuals aged 25 to 34. On the other hand, the 12 to 17 year old group was responsible for less than 15 per cent of these crimes. I repeat, less that 15 per cent.

Excluding the elderly, the very old—I am sorry to say the very old, but I will soon be joining them, since in 12 years I will be 60—statistics issued by Statistics Canada show that young people are less violent than any other age group in terms of serious violent crimes. Let us keep this in mind.

I do not want to impute motives to the member, but he is jumping on the bandwagon in favour of harsher measures to better control our young people. Was increased funding for prevention and better education ever considered? Were increased resources in these areas ever considered?

I did not see anything to that effect coming from this government. Unfortunately, some provincial governments want to cut this sort of services. A case in point is what is going on in Ontario. I have not closely checked it out but I understand that Alberta has made drastic cuts in these areas. This is a dangerous trend.

We all have kids and we know how firm we have to be with them. We cannot be naive. We have to be firm with them, and, as adults, give them good advice. We must not always think in terms of punishment. We must give ourselves better means to help those who tell us that society leaves to be desired, that they have problems and need our help. I think we should debate those things.

One last point. Time flies and I have only one minute left.

I have kids living at home and friends in the same situation and I am always amazed to see how easy it is for them to view violent movies. Why can we not take adequate measures in that area?

• (1400)

I cannot give you specific statistics today, but I am sure that the many murders and attempts at violent acts that a young person can see depicted on film in one evening have a negative influence on our youth.

Why are we not conducting serious studies to limit the influence of such programs on our youth? I would be an interesting approach. We could at least try.

After all, we did bring these kids into the world. There is a song which says: "We gave them birth, maybe we could listen to them". So maybe we could listen to what they have to say and try to find out why these violent individuals act the way they do, even though they are only a minority.

We must, as a community, be it Quebec or Canada, take the necessary steps to help these young people. If I am still here later on— which is doubtful, but if not here perhaps elsewhere—someday I will suggest ways to help young people avoid the negative influence of such television programming.

[English]

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise in the House to speak on Bill C–242. It is a very rare occasion to see anything concrete coming from the government side of the House that makes any sense and actually deals with the real issues. I guess it is because it is coming from the back benches and not from the government that I can appreciate we are dealing with the real issues here.

Having had the opportunity to sit on the Standing Committee of Justice and Legal Affairs with the member for Scarborough—Rouge River, I can appreciate his approach to legislative changes. During his tenure on the committee the member for Scarborough—Rouge River has been able to identify problems with the current laws, propose legislative changes before the committee and try to promote them. Unfortunately he has had very little support from members of his own caucus.

He is attempting with Bill C–242 to deal with the real issues, the real concerns, and to suggest legislative changes. There is nothing earth shattering about the changes he is recommending. Serious repeat offenders should be denied statutory release. Loopholes should be removed from the calculation of parole eligibility which allow repeat offenders not to serve their full new sentences. Victims of sexual assaults should be allowed to request that their assailants provide blood samples to check for infectious diseases. Bail procedures should be toughened up. Crack houses should be outlawed and the age of criminal responsibility for young offenders should be reduced from 12 to 10 years old.

The member for Scarborough—Rouge River has identified a number of flaws in the justice system and has offered workable solutions to these flaws. Either that, or I would suggest he has been reading the Reform Party's policy book again. Bill C–242 reads like it came directly out of the criminal justice reform section of our policy book. In either event the Reform Party certainly supports each and every one of the amendments in Bill C–242.

It is a shame that these issues will only receive one hour of debate this afternoon and then will die. All these amendments have the support of the Reform Party. I am certain they also have the support of an overwhelming majority of Canadians. Canadians are demanding justice reform. There are just too many cases where the law is not protecting the average citizen.

Canada's justice system needs to adopt one underlying principle: when the rights of a convicted offender are in conflict with the rights of the victim or the rights of society as a whole, the rights of the victim or of society shall take precedence every time. A prime example of the need for this principle is contained in clause 7 of Bill C–242.

The need for legislation sprung out of a case in Quebec a few years ago when a mother was sexually assaulted by an inmate on parole. The inmate had previously been incarcerated in an institution with a very high number of AIDS cases. Since her assailant had been an intravenous drug user the victim was naturally concerned that her assailant may also have carried HIV. When her assailant refused to voluntarily give a blood sample the victim went to court to have one given. Her request was rejected because conducting a blood test against the offender's will was deemed to be a violation of his rights under the charter.

• (1405)

This is a prime example of what is wrong with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. This offender who committed a serious crime of sexual assault should have lost some of his rights. One of the rights he should have lost was the right to refuse to take a blood test.

On the day of the sexual assault the victim's life was irrevocably changed. Sexual assault leaves emotional scars that never leave the victim. One additional burden should not have been her daily concern about whether or not she had been infected by HIV or any other sexually transmitted disease.

Clause 7 would have addressed that issue. Unfortunately Clause 7 like the rest of Bill C–242 will never be enacted.

In the last days of June we finally got the government to move on the question of taking DNA samples. Why could blood samples not be given the same consideration where there is justifiable cause?

Another aspect of Bill C–242 I should like to address is the amendments the member for Scarborough—Rouge River wishes to make to the Young Offenders Act. He felt it was necessary to lower the minimum age from 12 years to 10 years. The member for Scarborough—Rouge River cites the example of the murder case in Great Britain where two 10–year old boys murdered a 3–year–old. The member correctly pointed out that had the offence occurred in Canada the police would have had little recourse but to simply accompany the boys back to their parents, and that would have been the end of it.

It is interesting this example was used because I have used it myself on many occasions. I have been criticized because such a horrendous event has not occurred in Canada and therefore it is inappropriate to use it.

Then I switched to my Mikey Smith story. Mikey Smith is an 11–year old boy from Surrey who has for the past couple of years been one of the most active car thieves in the lower mainland area. While I am not sure what his current total is, it is probably well over 100 cars. Mikey Smith publicly admitted that he would continue to steal cars until he was 12 years old because there was nothing anybody could do about it.

Mikey's mother asked that he be charged before he either killed himself or somebody else, before he reached a point where he could not turn his life around. The Surrey RCMP would have been more than happy to have accommodated the mother but the law did not allow it. The Surrey crown counsel would have loved to have been able to have accommodated Mikey's mother, but as the Young Offenders Act currently stands there was nothing they could do.

I questioned the Minister of Justice about it in the House and in committee. He expressed concern about the issue. He basically said that while they can do something about it they are not prepared to do so.

In the meantime one of my constituents was going home one afternoon, going through an intersection on a green light, and was sideswiped by a car stolen and driven by Mikey Smith. Fortunately no one was seriously injured, but it is incomprehensible that this kind of situation can continue to be allowed and that Mikey Smith should be allowed to continue the mayhem.

One response I received from the federal government was that it was a case in which the provincial social services should have intervened. Just for the government's information, they did. They sent Mikey on a wilderness program so that he could develop a better attitude. The program helped so much that on the day Mikey returned to Surrey he stole a car to celebrate his return.

Unfortunately Mikey is not the only youngster under 12 to be engaged in crime. Youth gangs are recruiting 10–year olds and 11–year olds to carry out some of their crimes because they know that they cannot be charged. Still there is no hint from the government that it will support this kind of change. In fact when the Reform Party put forward a votable motion last year not one Liberal voted in favour of it.

In conclusion, Bill C–242 is a good example of how some Liberal backbenchers have proposed good legislation but how the government is not prepared to let the legislation be enacted. It is apparent to me that the only way these criminal justice reforms will ever be enacted is if there is a more Reform minded government in place. I assure the member for Scarborough—Rouge River that such a government would be much more sympathetic to supporting these initiatives.

• (1410)

Mr. George S. Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it has been interesting to listen to the debate.

I have looked at some aspects of the bill and think it would make good law. However when I hear the position of the Reform Party then I think I must be wrong.

I have studied the proposals that have been put forward. Some I agree with and some I do not. When trying to come up with criminal law we must always look for a balance. The protection of society is always a primary concern. That has to be balanced with the rights of the accused. In recent years the interests of the victim have also come to the fore.

I believe that the bill put forward by the member for Scarborough—Rouge River tries to strike that balance, particularly in the area of someone who continues with the commission of crimes while he or she is out on early release. The proposal for change so that the person will no longer be eligible for statutory release is a good one.

The threshold for statutory release is also good because it is not at the two–year level but at the five–year level, which indicates that a rather severe crime has been committed. Therefore, more sanctions for the protection of society require that we have this type of an amendment. The example used by the member for Scarborough—Rouge River of a person who commits a murder and would only have to serve roughly a year and half before being eligible for parole is something that needs to be amended. I support those two aspects of the proposed changes in Bill C–242.

I share the concerns of members from the Bloc about changing the age for people who have committed a crime. It seems to me that lowering the age is really not the proper direction to proceed. Perhaps what we have to do is what has been done in some jurisdictions, which is introduce more flexibility. Rather than trying to come up with age limits, we should allow the court in specific circumstances to determine whether the child has the capability of understanding the crime he or she has committed and whether the process would be better served either inside or outside the criminal justice system, rather than come up with some magic line drawn in the sand.

In that sense I cannot support the part of the bill calling for change to a 10–year age limit, although it is very convenient when we hear the stories put forward by the Reform Party for Mikey Smith or the stories that come forward from the situation in Great Britain. Most often we hear of the extremes but we have to come up with laws that deal with the norms. Therefore, I see no real benefit in that aspect of the proposed bill.

There is some benefit in looking at stiffer bail procedures, crack houses and those types of things to see whether we can grapple with those issues and come up with a system that works.

On the face of it these seem to be good. It is too bad the bill will not get the opportunity for committee study and input. Maybe there are other approaches, other ways to fine tune the bill. However, to me it looks very positive.

I talked earlier about balancing one aspect against another. I can think of nothing worse than a person who has been the victim of a sexual assault being doubly victimized by not knowing what possible diseases may have been transmitted as a result of that sexual assault. When I try to balance the rights of the individual who committed the crime and the rights of the victim, from my own point of view I come down on the side of the person who has been victimized. If a blood test would give any comfort to that person after enduring that situation, then I think society would require that we do something.

• (1415)

In that sense this bill proposes a methodology which would allow the court to review the circumstances to decide whether or not an order should be granted. Therefore the rights of the individuals in that balancing act we have to go through are protected to a degree, but the rights of the victim are also protected.

In conclusion and as a general comment, the main thrust of the bill deals with the issues of the people who commit a crime once they are out on statutory release, the eligibility for bail and the calculation of sentences. Those issues are well aimed. We need some changes in the law in that area.

I do not support the member in his position with respect to the change of age. The member for Scarborough—Rouge River and I have discussed this issue over some period of time.

I do support the general direction. I would be interested in hearing from experts but I think the bill requires the right balance between the accused and the victim in dealing with blood tests. It is unfortunate this bill is not going before committee where we would have the input of others as to how we can make our criminal justice system better.

[Translation]

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on Bill C–242, an Act to amend the Corrections and Conditional Release Act, the Criminal Code, and the Young Offenders Act. I know that the hon. member from Scarborough—Rouge River has invested a great deal of time and energy in bringing this piece of legislation before the House.

The thrust of the hon. member's proposals is to deal more stringently with repeat offenders, particularly those who commit crimes while on day parole, full parole or statutory release.

In particular, these proposals address anomalies in the current legislation which have been of concern to various interest groups, particularly the police and justice system officials.

Under that legislation, many offenders who commit multiple crimes or who re–offend during their sentence may remain eligible for release and may even avoid custody altogether.

On June 21, 1994, the Solicitor General introduced Bill C–45, an Act to amend the Corrections and Conditional Release Act and related statutes.

The bill received third reading and is now before the Senate.

The amendments contained in Bill C–45 will ensure that offenders who get new sentences will feel the effect of those sentences. This will help restore confidence in the sentence calculation process in the following way.

Under the government's proposals, any offender who receives a new custodial sentence while on conditional release would be automatically returned to custody.

In the case of a consecutive sentence, the offender would have to serve the parole ineligibility portion of the new sentence before becoming eligible again for parole.

This means a third of the new sentence, or one–half of the sentence in cases where the court has made an order that this would have to be served. The net effect is proportionate to the new sentence and respects the decision of the court to serve an additional period of time in custody.

[English]

These proposals were developed on the basis of extensive consultations with a broad range of groups and individuals including judges, lawyers, police, provincial corrections and justice officials, as well as representatives of various voluntary service organizations.

Last March the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs conducted a review of Bill C–45. During that process, the committee heard from over 60 witnesses who represented 32 different organizations, including victims groups, police organizations, professional groups, women's groups, aboriginal organizations, as well as a range of organizations from the voluntary sector.

• (1420)

During its clause by clause review, the committee debated a number of motions to amend the sentence calculation provisions of Bill C–45 and endorsed them in their entirety. These provisions were also recently passed by the House of Commons.

[Translation]

While I believe that the hon. member's bill is well–intentioned, I am also concerned that it falls short of the impact intended by Bill C–45 for the following reasons. First, the changes proposed in Bill C–242 do not take into account the inter–relation of the various sentence calculation provisions in the Corrections and Conditional Release Act.

By changing two aspects of the law, we will create an imbalance with other aspects of the legislation. This would necessitate significant re–drafting of the law as it now stands. Bill C–242 also deals with the complex issue of sentence calculation in a limited manner. Implicit in these proposals is the assumption that an offender under sentence will receive only one new sentence.

In such cases, sentence calculation is simple and straightforward. The offender would lose any eligibilities for conditional release on the original sentence, and would have to wait out the parole ineligibility period of the new sentence before becoming eligible again for conditional release.

But how would a sentence be calculated if the offender receives four or five new sentences of varying durations, some consecutive and some concurrent, at different points in the original sentence? The bill fails to address this complex and very realistic matter.

The law must be equipped to deal with multiple sentences and all possible combinations of sentences in an equitable manner consistent with the court's intent. And while this government supports the principle that repeat criminal behaviour should be dealt with more stringently, particularly when it occurs during conditional release, I also believe that the courts can take this into consideration when imposing a new sentence.

Bill C–45 will address the shortcomings of the current sentence calculation provisions I mentioned earlier. In doing so, the bill does not lose sight of the purpose of statutory release which is to provide offenders released from prison with a gradual controlled transition period back to the community to assist them with their reintegration and minimize public safety risk.

I would like to assure the members of this House that where any offender is at high risk of committing a violent or serious drug offence before sentence expiry, the National Parole Board has the authority to detain the offender until warrant expiry. All the measures I have mentioned aim to ensure that offenders are not arbitrarily held in prison longer than necessary, and that due consideration is given to their individual cases and level of risk to the community.

We must take heed that discretion is fundamental for ensuring that all cases are dealt with fairly. I believe that an individualized approach based on risk assessment is preferable to blanket removal of statutory release for a category of offenders.

[English]

During witness hearings on Bills C–45 and C–41 regarding sentencing reforms, it was frequently heard that imprisonment should be used as a last resort for the most serious offences. Many witnesses who appeared before the justice and legal affairs committee also stressed the merit of providing offenders with gradual, structured release programs combined with ongoing treatment and support to ensure long term community protection. It is well known that simply locking them up for longer periods of time will not achieve the goal shared by all Canadians for improved public safety.

• (1425)

[Translation]

The proposals set out in Bill C–45 are a thoughtful reflection of the collaboration with many groups and individuals, including members of the opposition.

I look forward to seeing effective and balanced reform—such as that presented by the government in Bill C–45—move forward, and anticipate that Parliament will deal fairly in addressing the anomalies which the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River has brought to our attention.

[English]

Mr. John O'Reilly (Victoria—Haliburton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak in favour of Bill C–242, the public safety improvement act, introduced by my distinguished colleague from Scarborough—Rouge River. Before I address the specifics of the bill I believe it is important for members to understand the history of our colleague's complex initiative.

As many members know, since his election to Parliament in 1988, the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River has been a strong advocate for criminal justice reform. He first introduced this bill in the late stages of the last Parliament. At that time the bill received a great deal of attention for three main reasons.

First it was and still is a thoughtful, well drafted and complex piece of legislation which attempts to fill numerous cracks in the criminal justice system. Second, national police and victims groups rallied around the bill because it addressed many of their concerns. Third and perhaps most significant of all, the bill was co–sponsored by the former member for Red Deer who at the time was a government member who shared his opposition colleague's concerns for the issues which the bill aimed to address. Today, more than two years later, we are still debating those same issues in the House.

As previous speakers have noted, this is an omnibus bill which deals with six key areas of the criminal justice system. They include statutory release, sentencing, young offenders, crack and bawdy houses, bail provisions and the rights of victims. To a degree some of us are asking why the government has not already addressed these issues. To a degree it has.

We have had the DNA legislation, amendments to the Young Offenders Act, a new child registry for sex offenders, tougher immigration and deportation provisions, and the list goes on and on. The government has done a good job. We have done a lot more to improve public safety than any government before us and that is not just Liberal rhetoric.

The deputy bureau chief for the Sun news recently reported: "This Liberal government has actually done more to toughen up the system in two years than the previous Tory government did in nine". Although we have accomplished a great deal, there is still more to be done and this bill addresses some of those problems.

The hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River has proposed that an offender who commits a crime while on early release and who is sentenced for five or more years for that crime would no longer be eligible for statutory release. That proposal makes a lot of sense. The purpose of statutory release and for that matter all forms of early release is to prepare the offender for his or her ultimate reintegration into society. If an offender commits a crime during the trial freedom period, they obviously do not appreciate their freedom and therefore should not be trusted again.

In 1988 had Joseph Fredericks, a convicted pedophile with a long criminal record, not been entitled to statutory release, or mandatory supervision as it was known then, Christopher Stephenson, an innocent 11–year old Brampton boy, might not have been brutally murdered. It is for this reason that serious consideration should be given to this proposal by my colleague from Scarborough.

The issue of an offender committing a crime while on early release for a previous crime brings us to another section of the bill which deals with an area referred to as corrections math. Currently, if an offender commits a new crime while still serving a sentence for a previous crime, the new sentence begins on the start date of the original sentence. I am certain that anyone listening to this is confused, as I was when I first learned about sentence calculation many years ago when I was in Millbrook on the other side of the table doing parole hearings.

It still makes me angry. An offender serving a sentence of seven years for armed robbery commits another crime while on early release in year five of his or her sentence. Although the offender is sentenced to an additional three years in prison for the crime that was committed while on early release, they will not serve additional time in jail because the new sentence will be merged with the original one. Basically they are allowed to commit a free crime.

It is 2.30 on Friday afternoon and everyone wants to leave. It is the end of the time. I am sorry I was not able to finish my speech, but I want to tell members that I support Bill C–242 and the amendments to it. I hope the justice minister is listening.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I thank the hon. member for Victoria—Haliburton for his co–operation.

The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96, the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

Before adjourning, I wish all of you and yours a very happy Thanksgiving.

[Translation]

I would like to wish you all a wonderful Thanksgiving Day.

It being 2.30 p.m., this House stands adjourned until Monday, October 16 at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Orders 28 and 24.

(The House adjourned at 2.31 p.m.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, October 16, 1995

The House met at 11 a.m.

Prayers

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

ACCESS TO INFORMATION ACT

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.) moved that Bill C–309, an act to amend the Access to Information Act (disclosure of results of public opinion polls), be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, most Canadians believe that this is the best country in the world. However, that does not mean they agree with the status quo and do not want changes. Canadians want constructive change and near the top of every list is the desire for a more open and accountable government.

Open government means a free flow of information between the government and its citizens. It means that government informs the public rather than manipulating them. Open government means that when tax dollars are used to commission polls about the thoughts and opinions of Canadians, everyone has the right to assess the results of these polls in a timely manner.

Canadians who want access to poll results should not have to jump through bureaucratic hoops in order to get the answers. Unlike the last Parliament which was very secretive this Parliament must change the system. Never again should Canadians be faced with the situation where the information commissioner has to take the Prime Minister to court to force him to release publicly funded poll results as happened in the Mulroney regime.

The kind of backroom government that has been so common here in Ottawa must change and it must change quickly. The Canadian public will not accept that sort of secrecy any more. They will not put blind faith in their politicians. They have learned through experience that left to its own devices, government will take advantage of the situation.

Government will selectively release important information to manipulate the public and advance its own agenda. In fact, we recently witnessed a perfect example of just this type of behaviour by the Parizeau government in Quebec. While this example did not involve polls, it did involve a series of publicly funded studies that examined the consequences of separation.

As all members are probably aware, the Parizeau government realized that some of the studies cast serious doubts on the viability of a separate Quebec. These studies responsibly pointed out the economic pitfalls that would invariably be associated with separation and the Parizeau government did not like it. Instead of releasing all of the taxpayer funded studies, Mr. Parizeau only released those that reinforced his own position.

• (1105)

The point therefore is to make all polls public in a timely manner. Not only was this manipulation by the Parizeau government dishonest, it also was an example of the need for legislation that specifically prevents this kind of behaviour.

The current government has not been as secretive as the previous one. If the Liberals truly believe in the concept of open government, then they should not be afraid to put their money where their mouths are. By making open government the law of the land, Parliament can show all Canadians that times have changed and that the rights of citizens to know what their government is doing is a fundamental one. If Parliament is really serious about open government, then all members should give their consent to make Bill C–309 votable and then we should pass it.

The bill would amend the Access to Information Act to ensure that all federal departments, boards or agencies that commission public opinion polls gave notice to the designated minister and the Speaker of the House of Commons. The designated minister would then be obliged to submit to the House of Commons the results of the polls and report the following: a description of the nature of the poll; a copy of the questions asked and a summary of the responses given; the period when the poll was conducted; and the cost of the poll. The minister would be required to lay this report before the House no later than 15 days after the poll was completed. If the House is not sitting, the report would be deposited with the information commissioner within the same deadline, published in the Canada Gazette and then presented to the House of Commons during the first five days after it resumed sitting.

If Bill C–309 was made votable and passed, the results of all public opinion polls commissioned by federal government bodies would become public in a very timely fashion. This prompt disclosure would make the results available while the information is still relevant to the current concerns of the public and is what the Canadian people are demanding.

Although I hope I am wrong, I predict Liberal members will speak against the bill. Members opposite know very well that they made election promises to "make open government the watchword of the Liberal program". I doubt they are willing to live up to that promise.

This reluctance of the Liberals to honour their red book promises was clearly demonstrated earlier in the year when they were the only members from any party to vote against open government by defeating Motion No. 304. I proposed this motion. It would have opened up Parliament and crown corporations to scrutiny under the Access to Information Act. I was told it was not to be passed at that time because the whole question was under review and massive changes were to be made to the Access to Information Act. Everyone agrees that it needs revision. I wonder if we will hear the same reasons now.

Even though Liberal members had been given assurances that M–304 would not breach the confidentiality of their offices or disrupt the competitive edge of crown corporations, Liberal members unanimously voted against that motion. This was especially strange considering that several members had told me privately they favoured the motion and thought it was a great idea. We all know what really happened. Instead of allowing their members to vote freely on the matter, the top brass stepped in and cracked the party whip. Even though the chief government whip has given his word to the House that Liberal members are allowed to vote with their consciences on private members' business, those members are told what to do and as always they do it.

I would now like to anticipate the line of argument from my colleagues opposite. I predict they will say that since they have been in government Treasury Board policies on communications and information management have been changed in order to address the problems of disclosure of public opinion research. I predict we will hear that these guidelines and the promises of the public works and government services minister make Bill C–309 unnecessary. The problem is already solved, they will say, but this is not correct.

• (1110)

It is true the change in the Treasury Board guidelines tinkered with the old Mulroney system but this did not mean the problem was solved. It was not and the government knows it. News clippings abundantly reveal the continuing problems with the new and improved Liberal system. Two headlines in the Globe and Mail recently say it all: "Liberal poll results rules much like the Tories", "Liberals will still allow polls to be kept secret". A Winnipeg Free Press article entitled "Imitating Mulroney" says:

> Public Works Minister David Dingwall called the new guidelines a "breakthrough". In fact, they are little more than Brian Mulroney's policy warmed over with a little red sauce for artificial flavour. These flimsy guidelines will not require ministers to reveal information gathered at public expense, if in the opinion of the minister that information is considered advice to the government.

What does it mean, advice to the government? By tradition, advice must stay locked up in a bomb–proof vault until the minister passes on to a better place or until the paper it is written on turns yellow and disintegrates.

Let me move on to a very interesting article that was published in the normally Liberal friendly Toronto Star after the new Treasury Board guidelines were put in place. Its title is: "Liberals restrict access to poll results". It reads:

> —previous Conservative governments were attacked for keeping taxpayer paid for polls secret, including constitutional polls. Now, the Liberal government seems determined to do an even better job of delaying and hiding poll results.

We are talking about millions of dollars of taxpayers' money being spent on public polls and their findings not being made open to the public or to this House. The author of this article, Ken Rubin, correctly calls the government's new access scheme fraudulent. He describes the flawed new process as follows:

> 1. The lengthy up to 90 day period for publication of poll reports goes far beyond the already too long 30 day release period possible under the Access to Information Act. There will be instances in which publication is well after 90 days.
>
> 2. The up to 90 day period for publication release begins only after a final written report is received from the pollsters. That's even though the polling results are immediately conveyed—sometimes months earlier—orally or in draft written form to the government.
>
> 3. A summary report of polling results could be all that is published, leaving out the guts of the research usually found in the technical tables.
>
> 4. Some polls still will be kept secret through applying partial or total exemption of poll results under the Access to Information Act.

It will be up to the minister to decide.

> 5. The Treasury Board directives formally encourage departments to consider applying for exemptions under the Access to Information Act. This policy endorses the view that polls are something other than publicly paid for, routinely released results of public response to government commissioned questions.
>
> 6. The Treasury Board's practices will make more progressive federal departments think twice before publishing certain "sensitive" poll data; after all, departments have to go to the Treasury Board to fund their polls and focus group research.

7. Once the government has decided to publish a poll result, that poll is no longer covered under the Access to Information Act. This means recipients could lose the right to complain, all the way to the federal court, about the polling results received after late receipts and publishing delays.

There is much more in this report, but we all get the point of the problems with this new legislation. The change in Treasury Board guidelines was a finesse by the government, not an honest attempt to address the existing problem. This is unacceptable and more concrete steps have to be taken.

• (1115)

I do not claim Bill C–309 by itself can fix the problems of secretive government. It cannot and no one would say it could. However, if this legislation were passed it would be a step in the right direction.

Parliament can talk about open government until the cows come home but unless we are willing to legislate change it means nothing more than words. It is time to legislate open government.

In the sincere hope that members will have the courage to act, I ask for unanimous consent to make C–309 a votable item. If this is done all members of Parliament will have a chance to get on the record on this very important issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House?

Some hon. members: No.

Ms. Susan Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to commend the hon. member for this proposal to extend the application of the Access to Information Act.

I am a firm believer that open government is essential to the preservation of the respect which members of the public give us as politicians and to the trust they place in their government. The Liberal Party is committed to the principle of open government.

I am not sure, however, this amendment is necessary. It is my understanding the act already provides for access to public opinion polls. Section 4 of the act provides that everyone has a right of access to any record under a government institution. In so far as opinion polls constitute such records, they are covered by the act. If specific poll results are not disclosed to the public it is because in specific circumstances a legitimate interest that competes with presumption of access is invoked. It should be noted the act performs a careful and complex balancing between a variety of interests. I am concerned that amending the act to address a specific and limited aspect of the act would disturb the various balances within the act.

In 1992 the trial division of the federal court pronounced on the question of release of public opinion research in the case of Information Commissioner v. Prime Minister. That case dealt with public opinion polls commissioned during previous constitutional negotiations. The decision of the federal court trial division of November 19, 1992 provides guidance on disclosure of such information.

In addition to section 4 of the act, the Treasury Board secretariat has issued guidelines for federal institutions on the release of public opinion polls. The Treasury Board communications policy amended last July provides that first, government institutions must make every effort to disclose results outside the formal resolution process prescribed by the Access to Information Act of public opinion research.

Second, in the spirit of the Access to Information Act, institutions are encouraged to make the final report of public opinion research available within 30 days of receipt and should resort to the 90–day allowance only if constrained by publishing requirements.

Third, in those cases in which a minister elects not to disclose the final report in response to an access to information request, the minister must send a letter to the information commissioner informing the information commissioner of his or her decision inciting the provision of the Access to Information Act that the minister has exercised. A copy of the letter will be sent to the Treasury Board for purposes of monitoring implementation of this policy.

With section 4 of the act interpreted by a recent court case dealing with opinion polls, and with a new government policy which guides government institutions on the disclosure of public opinion polls, it is not at all clear to me that there is a present and pressing problem with respect to the release of public opinion research that justifies an ad hoc amendment.

Another reason I would not support Bill C–309 is that the Minister of Justice has announced his intention to reform the Access to Information Act. I understand a review of how public opinion polls are disclosed or not disclosed to the public will be part of that review.

I trust the Minister of Justice will reform the act in providing for more open government, including greater access to polling information. I am concerned that Bill C–309 would amend the act in an ad hoc fashion.

It has been about 12 years since the act was first passed. A parliamentary committee and the information commissioner have both made extensive recommendations for reform. I believe it is time for a fundamental review that would look at all aspects of the act.

• (1120)

In addition I have concerns with specific details in this proposal. The requirement that every public opinion research contract be reported to the minister and to the Speaker of the House of Commons and that reports be tabled in Parliament or with the information commissioner and published in the Canada Gazette seems like overkill.

An amendment that provides that no exemptions apply to the release of public information opinion research would have been sufficient for members' purposes. The media, citizens and parliamentarians are quite familiar with the relatively easy process of filing access requests. In any event the Treasury Board policy calls for informal dissemination public opinion research. New and duplicated reporting requirements merely add red tape and cost, which we can ill afford at this time.

Another problem I have with Bill C–309 is that it would apply to any department, branch, office, board, agency, commission, corporation or other body established by or pursuant to any act of Parliament or established by or pursuant to any proclamation, order in council or other instrument made or issued by or under the authority of the governor in council.

By defining which institutions are covered by this proposed amendment in this way the proposed amendment goes entirely against the way the rest of the Access to Information Act is structured. The act applies to all government institutions listed in the schedule, approximately 140. The purpose of listing the institutions is to make it clear to everyone which institutions are covered by the act. Going away from a list approach creates the possibility of confusing the issue of whether the act applies to a particular institution. It may mean having to go to court to find out whether the act applies to a particular institution in a given circumstance.

As a result of Bill C–309 some institutions not currently subject to the act will be subject to the specific amendment. For example, Canada Post is not subject to the act but will be subject to the proposed clause 5(1).

I am also concerned about the definition of public opinion poll, which I find extremely broad. It could include quantitative and qualitative research conducted among members of the public using a prepared questionnaire or interview schedule. A good proportion of this research would be of very limited public interest.

I do not believe Bill C–309 is needed. There is already a right of access to public opinion poll research under the Access to Information Act. There is recent case law that provides guidance to the government in disclosing such polls. There is a government policy on disclosing poll results. The Minister of Justice has stated his intention to reform the Access to Information Act.

Given all this, I do not think it is appropriate or necessary to proceed with an ad hoc amendment on the specific issue of public opinion polls. I have problems also with the fact the bill would introduce significant new bureaucratic reporting requirements, deviate from the way the rest of the act defines government institutions and potentially could apply to research of very limited public interest. For all these reasons, I cannot support the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of Bill C–309 tabled on February 22, 1995 by the hon. member for Red Deer is to amend the Access to Information Act. Its main objective is to oblige the government to disclose results obtained and methods used in public opinion polls commissioned by the government through various agencies.

The proposed legislation provides that the government shall lay before this House a report of the results of public opinion polls it has commissioned.

We support this initiative because it encourages openness and the democratic exercise of power. The debate on public opinion polls and the need for making this tool more transparent is mainly about whether these polls undermine the democratic process by influencing the behaviour of society in general.

Recent studies have shown that publication of these polls can have an impact on a close race, especially towards the end of the campaign. The publication of public opinion polls can have a positive or negative impact on the morale of volunteer campaign workers and donors.

• (1125)

Party strategists complain that it is hard to retrieve lost ground when the media have decided, on the basis of public opinion polls, that a party is no longer in the running. Opinion polls may be purposely misinterpreted, if the technical information provided is too incomplete to assess the validity of the results.

Clearly, the secret use of this powerful instrument is a first step towards arbitrary use of power and a practice that is a threat to democracy. What seems to be a highly scientific instrument that confers a certain authority becomes, in the hands of unscrupulous politicians, a tool for political propaganda and manipulation. I am thinking, for instance, of the group for Canadian unity, a special unit of the Privy Council of this government.

Working on behalf of the no coalition, the intergovernmental affairs office, located in an office tower in downtown Ottawa, attempts to implement the vision of the no forces, the status quo, which will make debtors and paupers of all Quebecers and even Canadians. This anti–referendum unit funded with public money has a budget of more than three million dollars. Part of this money is spent to commission public opinion polls whose methods and results are used to influence the democratic process in the Quebec referendum.

This Canadian unity group, more obscure and secretive by far than the centre for Canadian unity was during the 1980 campaign, commissions public opinion polls on a weekly basis and uses them to manipulate public opinion in a democratic society.

In fact, because of the secret nature of these polls, nothing prevents this government from using methods that are questionable from a scientific point of view and thus commissioning results that will influence the vote.

Nothing prevents the government from only disclosing polls that are favourable and eliminating those that might be less favourable to its negative vision. Polling companies play a role that has an impact not only on elections but also on policy development. Governments use public opinion polls to define their positions on various controversial issues and to determine their priorities. Federal ministers therefore take the initiative of commissioning polls to test public reaction to various options. In short, the government is no longer concerned about the content of its policies but focusses on their form based on public opinion polls. The famous Axworthy reform is an excellent example.

The amounts allocated by the federal government for public opinion polls are astronomical. During the period from April 1990 to November 1991, a mere 19 months, apparently over $10 million in expenditures were approved by the Department of Supply and Services and committed by the federal government for public opinion polls. That amount does not include contracts awarded directly by departments.

For all these reasons it is essential for transparency to become the main objective of democratic governments when they make use of public opinion polls. Bill C–309 calls for effective measures to ensure government transparency when public opinion polls are used. The report submitted to the House of Commons must therefore indicate the nature of the public opinion poll, the questions asked and a summary of the responses given, the name of the person or firm commissioned to conduct the poll and, finally, its cost. This is a bill with the potential to change the face of Canadian style democracy.

• (1130)

Speaking of surveys, I would like to comment very briefly if I may on the results of the survey carried out by Léger and Léger for Le Journal de Montréal and the Globe and Mail, released last Saturday, the day before yesterday.

With two weeks to go until referendum day, the yes side shows a solid 49.2 per cent compared to 50.8 per cent for the no side. In only a few weeks we have taken over five of the federalists' percentage points, reducing the difference to a mere 1.6 per cent.

This considerable advance is in large part due to what the press is calling the "Bouchard factor", but it must be pointed out that this week we gained only two percentage points.

Before distribution of the undecided voters, 45 per cent of respondents stated that they would vote yes to the referendum question, while 42.4 per cent indicated that they would vote no.

Among those whose minds were definitely made up, I must point out that 52.2 per cent of francophone respondents stated that they will be voting yes, compared to only 34.3 per cent who will vote no.

There are a number of explanations for this upturn in support for the sovereignist camp. We have the most popular, most credible, most loved leaders in Quebec on our side in Mr. Bouchard, Mr. Parizeau and Mr. Dumont. Lagging far behind them are the spokespersons for the no side, the Prime Minister of Canada, the Minister of Labour, Mr. Johnson, and the hon. member for Sherbrooke.

We will win this coming October 30 because we are promoting the project of a just society that is fair for all, a project of generosity and compassion for the most disadvantaged segments of our society: the unemployed, welfare recipients, immigrants, refugees, pensioners and so on. On the other hand, the blueprint for society of this government, of the Liberals, the Conservatives and the Reform, is to protect big capital, those who are already advantaged. The program of the ministers of finance and of human resources development, of Ontario's Mike Harris and Alberta's Ralph Klein is to protect the rich and neglect the poor.

In conclusion, I state that the Bloc Quebecois supports Bill C–309.

[English]

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak for a few minutes in support of the private member's bill of the hon. member for Red Deer who has done some excellent work on the issue.

In 1980–81 I had the privilege of working on the original access to information bill. I believed then and I still believe now the intention of the government at that time was to do the very thing the private member's bill suggests.

In the last 13 years to 14 years the whole access to information process has become locked in a system I call the bureaucratic MAD treatment, maximum administrative delay. As a government member I have had great difficulty on more than one occasion in getting the access to information system to work for me.

The objective of the hon. member for Red Deer is to refer the bill to committee. He has not asked the House to accept the bill line by line, comma for comma. If small amendments are required I believe they can be accommodated in committee.

• (1135)

The whole discussion on access to information is something that would serve the government and serve the House well. What the member is saying in the bill is very much a part of our government's red book wherein we were committed to operating a much more transparent, a much more accountable, a much more open government.

Day after day the Prime Minister lives a life of transparency. We all know that these polls are being conducted and there are the results of the polls. We have nothing to hide when we conduct polls. They are done to advance public policy in a more refined and better way for all Canadians.

We on this side of the House celebrate that members of Parliament should work hard at developing and thinking some of their own ideas. This example very much fits that description. The member for Red Deer has put forward the idea that all public opinion polls should be much more accountable to Parliament and I support him in that regard.

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in support of Bill C–309, an act to amend the Access to Information Act (disclosure of results of public opinion polls).

As I look through the bill it makes complete sense to me. I am sure that anyone who believes in the democratic process would agree that the bill is simply common sense. Every day public polls are conducted by media outlets, associations, academics, and especially by government departments.

There are two principal differences between the groups I have listed. First, the government is the only one funded solely by the taxpayers of Canada. Second, the government is the principal one that does not make the results of its polls easily and readily available to the Canadian public. Is there a paradox in this situation? Last year the Winnipeg Free Press in an editorial wrote:

> During the election last fall, the Liberals made transparency and openness in government a central theme. What a difference a victory makes.

yes, what a difference a victory makes. We all know that the former Conservative government was obsessed with public polling. In 1992 the Conservative government spent an unprecedented $140 million on public polling. Most of that money was awarded to chums of the Conservative Party, a firm called Decima polling.

How nice it would have been to be working at Decima in 1992. I see why the Liberal government criticized the Conservatives during the 1993 election campaign. Expenditures on polling prior to 1992 were about $10 million a year. With an increase to $140 million, who would not want to make it an election issue?

I will briefly outline the history. It is important the House knows why the Liberals are arguing against Bill C–309. Liberals will tell us that there is no problem when comparing their policy to that of the Progressive Conservatives. This may be true. Hopefully no government will ever again reach the total polling expenditures the Conservatives did in 1992.

The one key point that must be clear in the debate is that the Liberal government is doing very little to change the old style polling established by the Conservative government. The Winnipeg Free Press stated last year:

> By tradition, advice from polling must stay locked up in a bomb–proof vault until the minister passes on to a better place or until the paper it is written on turns yellow and disintegrates.

• (1140)

This tradition is still alive and well with the Liberal government. In May 1994 the Liberal government introduced what it said was an alternative to this tradition. It introduced a series of polling measures that the Minister of Public Works and Government Services said were based on "principles of transparency and openness". The only thing transparent is the Liberal commitment to tell the Canadian people what the Liberals want them to know. The only thing that is open is the Canadian taxpayer's wallet as he or she pays for the veil of secrecy created when government polls are conducted.

Bill C–309, an act to amend the Access to Information Act, prohibits the blatant manipulation of public information gathered by government departments. The bill would force any government department or unit that commissions a public opinion poll to give notice to the appropriate minister. The minister is then obliged to submit to the House of Commons the results of the poll. The minister would present four key components of the poll: first, a description of its nature; second, a copy of the questions asked and a summary of the responses given; third, the period of time when the poll was conducted; and fourth, the cost of the poll.

This seems to be a logical progression of events. Ministers of the crown should not even need legislation compelling them to submit poll results. By their very nature as chief representatives of departments in a democracy, all information gathered at the department should be open to public scrutiny. As it stands, the ministers are picking and choosing the poll results that are most beneficial to them in promoting their policies.

The government will argue that it has answered all the concerns of Canadians about access to public polls. The government will claim that in May 1994 it released guidelines to ensure that information was made public. However last December the Toronto Star called the guidelines "a fraudulent new access scheme". The Toronto Star was absolutely correct.

There are a few catches that the Liberal government failed to mention when it introduced the new guidelines. It failed to mention that the government still has the ability to keep some poll results secret. It is able to do so if the individual minister feels the results would be injurious to the public interest or to federal–provincial relations. That seems to give the ministers room to impose total personal discretion. What one cabinet minister may see as injurious to public interest may be necessary information to the average Canadian.

Mr. Kenneth Rubin, an expert on government documents, called this ethics package "so vague it is hard to criticize it precisely, but the specific rules for withholding polls are what the Tories practised". This vagueness is a blessing only for cabinet ministers as they are able to interpret it to their own benefit.

Another benefit to cabinet ministers and their friends in the polling companies is that they are given 90 days to release poll publications, which is an absolute absurdity. After 90 days the issue is likely dead and Canadians have little interest in old news or dead issues. Also quite often the government has already used the information to its advantage by this time.

The 90–day period of silence is stretched even further as often the polling companies give the government a verbal or a brief written synopsis of the results. There is no requirement to release poll results until 90 days after the government receives the final written report. This in reality can add months to the 90–day period. The information commissioner in his annual report in June called this "a loophole of monumental proportions".

Even then, if the 90–day period is not long enough, the minister can still apply to have it extended indefinitely. In effect a minister can sit on an issue as long as he or she chooses. The government can also use the extended period provision to avoid criticism and legal action. Once the government has decided to release the poll results the poll is no longer open to further scrutiny under provisions of the Access to Information Act. That means any right to complain to the federal court about information quality or delays is no longer an option.

• (1145)

If all this security is still not enough for cabinet ministers, they have even more ways of ensuring the Canadian public does not receive poll results accurately. They can instruct their friends at the polling companies to provide only summaries of the results and leave the real meat and bones of the research in the technical tables.

Another creative method of avoiding the public is that the government can purchase omnibus polling packages from companies that are providing them to other organizations as well. These poll results then remain the property of the polling company and do not have to be made public, even though government money paid for this information.

Bill C–309 responds to all these loopholes by offering a straightforward method of dealing with the publishing of poll results. It requires the ministers to submit polls to the House of Commons no later than 15 days after the poll is completed. If the House is not sitting the report must be submitted to the information commissioner, published in the Canada Gazette, and presented to Parliament upon its return. This is simple logic and is democratic. Bill C–309 eliminates all the vagueness that allows the government to abuse the system.

The information commissioner wrote in his 1995 annual report: "The Liberals promised to do better than the Conservatives, much better. Many Canadians thus anticipated a new government with the self–confidence to be candid". In my opinion, it is quite clear that this government is no more candid than the former government. This is not merely my opinion. The information commissioner, who is an expert in the field, agreed when he added in his report that "expectations for a bright new day with sunshine in all the old dark places were unrealistically high". The information commissioner is clearly not satisfied with this government's commitment to openness. Canadians are not satisfied either.

The information commissioner and the Reform Party are not the only ones that are not content with the government's lack of commitment to open government. The Ottawa Sun criticized the government accurately last fall when it stated: "Who knows, one of these days the government might even poll you for your opinion on whether it should be forced to release the results of all its opinion polls. Tell them what you think, just don't ask them for the results. You might be told it's none of your damn business".

It is the business of Canadians to know what questions and issues are being polled. Canadians deserve the right to know what is the popular opinion of the nation. They deserve to know what the government is doing with the results it receives. They deserve to know if the government departments are polling for legitimate reasons or for the government party's own political gain. Finally, Canadians deserve the right to see how much money is being spent by the government and for what reasons.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Colleagues, I find myself in a situation we all do from time to time. I know the practice is not to recognize people in the gallery. However, I would want the group from St. Timothy Catholic School to know that if I could recognize them I would, but it is not our practice to do so.

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, that was very well done, if I may say.

I will make my remarks brief. I rise to speak in support of Bill C–309. It is a pleasure to do so. I believe reform of the Access to Information Act is very necessary and long overdue. My feeling on Bill C–309 is that while I support it wholeheartedly, it does not go anywhere near far enough. The time has come, in the name of opening up government, in the name of opening up the bureaucracy, to review the provisions of the Access to Information Act.

I have had a lot of experience with the Access to Information Act over the years, particularly in the matter of getting historic records. As the member for Broadview—Greenwood said, the act as originally designed is not the act as it is currently practised. We have a situation where an act that was originally intended to open up government documents is now being used in many instances to withhold government documents.

I want to say to the member for Red Deer that I join him in supporting this bill and putting this bill forward. I hope it is a first step for a complete overhaul of both the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act.

• (1150)

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to recognize the individuals on the other side who are supporting this bill. I would like to ask those members who do not support the bill why they do not support it. Why did we not have unanimous consent to have this bill made a votable bill?

When these people were in opposition to the Conservatives they ripped at the Conservatives all the time. They said we have to change the access to information laws, open government up, and let Canadian taxpayers, who are footing the bill for this information, have access to it. Why the change of heart once the Liberal Party was elected as government? Why the difference?

I think the fundamental reason for that lies at the very heart of what is wrong with our approach to governing in this country. It is because we have among the three old–line parties an elitist, top down approach to governing. Once the political party of the day gets into power it is not much interested in listening to the people in the sense of shaping policy or developing legislation. It is very much a command and control government that we have. It wants to have information so that it knows how to shape its messages and sell its policies but it is not really interested in having policy developed or shaped by the Canadian people. In this milieu, it is not particularly helpful to have information available to the public. It is much more advantageous to keep that information to yourself and use it for your own purposes and not allow the Canadian people to have access to it.

I would use the gun control bill as a perfect example of a bill that is widely hated by Canadians. The government is refusing to acknowledge that fact. It is using polling as a means of trying to determine how it can best sell this odious piece of legislation. It is not really interested in listening to the views of Canadians from coast to coast who take real offence to this legislation.

I would make the argument that the situation we find ourselves in is not likely to change. We will have opposition parties forever decrying the lack of access to information and ridiculing and condemning the government of the day for not changing the access to information rules. However, once these parties get into power they will act the same way unless we have a fundamental change in our whole approach to governing.

That is what the Reform Party of Canada stands for. We believe that not only do we come here with a set of policies and principles we would like to put in front of the Canadian people, but we also suggest there has to be a fundamental change in the way Canada is governed. Ordinary Canadians should have much more say through referenda, through initiatives, and through recall to have their views and wishes incorporated into the policies and legislation of the government.

Until we have these fundamental changes, until we have a break away from this elitist, top down approach to government in which information is always going to be very tightly corralled, where there is no advantage in making that information known to the general public, we are never going to have the changes we would all like to see. I would suggest that while the members opposite talk about opening this up and having better access to information, it is not going to change until we change the system.

• (1155)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Seeing no other members rising, I wonder if the House might be disposed to this. The motion stands in the name of the hon. member for Red Deer. The understanding is that no one else will speak after the hon. member for Red Deer closes the debate. I would seek the member's co–operation, if he would reply under the right of reply for two minutes and no more, to in fact close the debate on Motion No. M–309 which stands in his name.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, what we have heard is a general agreement that the access to information legislation needs to be reformed. I would like to believe there is an honest will to do that and that the justice minister will deliver on the promise to change the legislation.

The problem is there are a lot of issues on the justice minister's plate and I honestly do not believe he will get around to the changes in the legislation or will be able to deal with them in this Parliament. For those of us in the House who believe there should be changes, I believe that the onus is on us to continue to bring forward these ideas and the desire of the Canadian people to have more openness in government. The people are demanding it. They are saying that it must happen. I believe that we as parliamentarians must respond. I would urge all members to get behind the changes and to pressure their parties to make these changes.

I would like to thank the House for this opportunity. I would like to thank the members who spoke in favour of the bill. We should keep up the fight to ensure that the justice minister does find the time to change the access to information legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I thank all members for their co–operation.

The time provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96, the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY ACT

The House resumed from October 6 consideration of the motion that Bill C–64, an act respecting employment equity, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege this morning to rise to speak to Bill C–64. I will be speaking against the bill.

Bill C–64 extends and supersedes the 1986 Employment Equity Act, which covered crown corporations and federally regulated private sector employees. It covers banks, airlines, railways, and telecommunications, which employ about 5 per cent of Canada's workforce.

According to the government, the purpose is to "achieve equality in the workplace so that no person shall be denied employment opportunities or benefits for reasons unrelated to ability and, in the fulfilment of that goal, to correct the conditions of disadvantage in employment experienced by women, aboriginal peoples, persons with disabilities and members of visible minorities by giving effect to the principle that employment equity means more than treating persons in the same way but also requires special measures and accommodation of differences". It is to be reflective of Canada's population as a whole.

While it does not bear directly on the federal scene, it certainly impacts on the bill at hand. I would like to quote from Friday's editorial page of the Globe and Mail. It is entitled "Why merit matters", and reads as follows:

Ontario's new Conservative government has introduced legislation to repeal the one–year–old Employment Equity Act. All Canadians, whatever their status or background, should be glad.

Despite the denials of its supporters, Bill 79 was unquestionably a "quota law". Employers were expected to set targets for creating a workforce that reflected the racial and gender make–up of the community at large. The bill was also clearly discriminatory. By requiring employers to favour members of the designated groups, it effectively required them to discriminate against members of the undesignated group: that is, able–bodied white men.

But these are not the worst aspects of Bill 79. The main evil of the law is its implicit attack on the principle of merit.

Appeals for the importance of merit tend to have an elitist sound to modern ears. In fact, merit has always been cherished most dearly by the disadvantaged, who regard it as a ladder to better things. For generations, even centuries, disadvantaged people have pleaded to be released from the pigeon holes in which others place them and evaluated on their ability as individuals. "See me for who I am, not what I am. Judge me on what I can do, not what I look like".

The supporters of employment equity would throw all this out the window. The merit principle, they will say in their honest moments simply hasn't worked. The disadvantaged are still disadvantaged. The colour blind, gender blind world is an impossible dream. We need to try something else. So instead of disregarding the group identity of people in hiring and promotion, we will fixate on it. Instead of encouraging employers to hire the best person for the job, we will require them to tot up their workers like so many jelly beans. Instead of encouraging new immigrants to become part of the wider society, we will tell them to define themselves by race.

In a diverse society with high levels of immigration, this is a terribly dangerous thing. Designed by well meaning people to encourage integration, employment equity in fact works against it, encouraging Canadians to huddle together in groups and feeding the unhealthy obsession with race and gender that has seized Canadian society in the 1990s. This obsession has already infected universities, museums, writers' organizations and women's groups. Bill 79 would have made it a law. Every Canadian should give it a hearty, "Good riddance".

• (1200)

This does not directly bear on Bill C–64 but I think the same arguments apply against the imposition of Bill C–64. In our case new equity laws will immediately cover approximately 230,000 Treasury Board employees. They will affect all federally regulated businesses and businesses with over 100 employees undertaking federal contracts.

Due to the increased cost this law will cause, it will hold off implementation indefinitely on certain agencies such as CSIS, the RCMP and the armed forces. In practice Bill C–64 means enforcing racial and sex based numerical goals to correct perceived past discrimination. The numerical goals are quotas in disguise. If numerical goals are enforceable they serve exactly the same function as quotas.

For years employment equity has been at work within the public service. It will be difficult or impossible to introduce it at the moment because the government is cutting jobs and has a hiring freeze in place. Public service employees declared surplus have ironclad job security which guarantees them another reasonable job offer within the public service.

Admittedly men still account for more than 50 per cent of public servants and this is also reflected in the executive ranks. Most of the top managers within the bureaucracy were hired 25 years ago when government was growing. The bureaucracy still reflects a nation of a quarter century ago. For those same 25 years women have been entering the workplace with roughly the same educational credentials and the same job aspirations as men.

In the private sector women have successfully moved into every profession: medicine, law, accounting, advertising, banking. Progress has been impressive. Why? The world has changed for women. Gender alone is no longer a very big influence on opportunity and life. Education and ability count for far more. Unquestionably racism and sexism do exist but discrimination alone does not explain the vastly unequal outcomes in life for different groups of people.

Government and Canadians have an obligation to open doors for the disadvantaged but they are not always who we think they are. This matter is more complex than simply passing laws or imposing quotas. Current data and statistics are not enough. With the reduction in the public service the new laws will not radically affect or change the face of the current bureaucracy. Most of the data and conclusions are taken from self–identification surveys which are to identify women, disabled, aboriginal peoples and visible minorities, but the accuracy of these data is at best questionable.

Many individuals do not perceive themselves to be disadvantaged or do not wish to admit it. Employer specific surveys do not reflect information accurately. In many cases people do not view themselves as disadvantaged unless specifically required to address the issue but are protected with anonymity such as in national surveys.

• (1205)

The 1992–93 report on employment equity in the public service states the number of visible minority employees may be underidentified by one and a half times. The number of disabled may be underidentified by two and a half times.

With distorted data, conclusions based on the underidentification of designated groups means there may be already higher numbers of disadvantaged people in the workforce. Alternately there is an incentive to falsify self–identification surveys based on perceived advantages of being considered disadvantaged. For example, a 1994 annual report on the Employment Equity Act noted that as of 1991 nearly 2.3 million Canadians reported having a disability, an increase of 30 per cent over 1986 surveys.

Due to fiscal constraints the government will be using employment equity figures from the 1991 census until the year 2003. How reliable are these figures? Statistics Canada acknowledges that in 1991, 10 per cent of the aboriginal population was not even enumerated. Only 3 per cent of Canadians reported their ethnic/cultural origin as Canadian.

The existing Employment Equity Act calls for a comprehensive review every three years. The last review was in 1992, but the mandatory review for this year has not been undertaken. Basically the government is moving ahead with new legislation without having the benefit of this review.

Since Canada has a shrinking bureaucracy there will be little direct impact on government but there will be an impact on businesses with over 100 employees who wish to conduct business with the federal government. What does that mean for them? No comprehensive study has been done in Canada on that outcome.

To quote the Reform minority report on employment equity, the American magazine Forbes is the only source which has attempted to calculate the costs of affirmative action. It cited that the cost for regulation and compliance alone stood at $17 billion to $209 billion annually. It verified that U.S. affirmative action costs were $113 billion per year since 1980, or 4 per cent of the GDP.

In 1992 the Conference Board of Canada defined small, medium and large businesses and gave the annual average cost of employment equity for each category. Due to the lack of comprehensive studies in Canada, Reform took these figures, with the assistance of the Library of Parliament, to cover businesses across the nation. If all Canadian businesses were subject to equity legislation which was in place in Ontario, where firms with more than 50 employees were asked to have an employment equity plan, the total annual direct costs would be $1,035,223,000.

These direct costs exclude compliance, opportunity and other indirect costs. The Forbes study showed that total costs were six times the direct costs. Based on this, the cost to Canadian business would reach $6.5 billion per annum, nearly 1 per cent of our GDP. The Library of Parliament has confirmed in writing the reasonableness of our figures.

In essence this is another costly tax on business. The government's debt and deficit are already choking our economy. Taxpayers are unable to sustain even more expense, be it direct or indirect. The department of public works is already implementing a strategic procurement initiative which applies to all government departments and grants preference to aboriginal businesses bidding on federal contracts up to $2 million.

By giving preferential treatment to native businesses in government procurement, the government hopes to provide a sustainable economic base for native self–government. However, employment equity carries a stigma and a presumption of racial or gender inferiority. Equity programs do not remove sex and race bias from the workplace; they institutionalize them.

Brian Lee Crowley's article "Does counting bodies add up to fairness?" details findings of a 1987 study. What happens when women are promoted under a program emphasizing gender over ability is that they consistently rated their performance more negatively, took less credit for successful outcomes, were less eager to persist in their leadership roles. They also viewed themselves as more deficient in leadership skills. In other words, it diminished their worth in their own eyes.

• (1210)

In other areas such as education, law school, if doors are opened to individuals who are ill prepared to take on the challenge, the outcome can lead to failure and creates a dependency on government programs rather than fair competition.

This spring the supreme court sent a clear message the charter is meant to protect individual rights rather than group rights. Section 15 of the charter of rights and freedoms claims Canadians are equal before and under law. It adds governments cannot override this basic equality to enhance groups disadvantaged because of their race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

Madam Justice McLachlin in the Miron case stated the larger purpose is simply the protection of individual human dignity and freedom which are violated whenever individuals are denied opportunities based on the stereotypical application or presumed group characteristics rather than on the basis of individual merit, capacity or circumstance.

This hard hitting ruling clearly spells out that every person has the right to be judged on his or her own merits and not on the basis of group characteristics.

Reform's minority report to the standing committee's report "Employment Equity: A Commitment to Merit" has two very clear messages: employment competition based on the merit principle is key to both equality and productivity, and that employment equity legislation is the denial of basic human rights. I encourage all members of the House to read that report. It is not the status quo, but it does contain pertinent facts that tend to be glossed over.

Politically, employment equity gives the appearance of being the expedient means to achieve equity in the workplace; it is politically correct. It is hard for the government to move into new directions, to change the status quo. We grant that.

In the example I quoted earlier, on the Harris government's scrapping the employment equity law we heard screams of "unfair". For some, change becomes uncomfortable and they are unable to envisage innovative directions where there is equality of opportunity.

The government is intent on moving forward with a new law without a proper review. I stated earlier that some government agencies would be exempt, defence being one. The Department of National Defence has conducted a diversity survey which could be and probably will be a step toward affirmative action. During the defence review Liberal members pushed to have hiring quotas official defence policy. The Canadian forces anti–racism policy does exempt affirmative action programs from classification as racism.

In the 1970s promotion of thousands of francophones was distorted by going well down promotion lists to find someone with a suitable background. By this I do not mean 10, 15 or 20 names, I mean 40 or more. The same is going on at the moment for women, although to a lesser extent. Eleven per cent of the Canadian forces are women.

If all Canadians are equal before and under the law, we must not continue to support laws that patronize designated groups, in essence assume their mediocrity. Merit should be the underlying principle. Anything that detracts from the merit principle, civilian or military, is bad policy. Diversity studies clearly signal the government is moving to introduce characteristics other than merit to hiring or promotion programs.

Government's role should be to ensure equality of opportunity rather than the equality of results in the public sector. It is government's responsibility to provide a standard of secondary education which is accessible to all, local responsive post–secondary institutions, affordable student loans based on need, bursaries and scholarships based on need and excellence, sensitivity training in the public sector which supports inherent equality, dignity and worth of all.

We should ensure that laws against discrimination are enforced. Government should lead by example, by laying out objective testing regimes, by broad based advertising of all job postings and by offering facilities to accommodate disabled people wherever they may work. As Madam Justice McLachlin pointed out, the protection of individual human dignity and freedom is important for all.

• (1215)

We are not all equal in ability. Those who wish to pursue education or a vocation should not face discrimination barriers. Those who pursue this course deserve to reap the benefits and rewards of hard work.

Clearly, legislated equity does not achieve its goals. It is costly and it is unfair. Merit should be the sole hiring criterion in an environment free from arbitrary obstructions to hiring or promotion. Merit must be restored as the sole basis for hiring and promotion in the public service.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I often hear hon. members of the Reform Party referring to the Ontario Employment Equity Act. Somehow they try to tell Canadians that we are speaking about the same act.

I would like to take the opportunity to clear up some of the misconceptions that have been stated by the Reform Party. I want to put on the record that our legislation specifically prohibits the imposition of quotas. Another fundamental difference is that Bill C–64 takes a unique human resource planning approach. Ontario's legislation is modelled more on a human rights approach with third party complaints. I would point out that under the Ontario system any person can lay a complaint, including interest groups, job applicants, employees, unions, public or private corporations, or any other individual. There is no such provision in our legislation.

With regard to the rules and regulations that govern the two pieces of legislation, Ontario has set out the obligations of employers in considerable detail and there are extensive provisions for detailed regulations. Bill C–64, on the other hand, is much less prescriptive and minimizes regulatory burden by limiting new regulations to just a few essential areas. A criticism of the Ontario act is the very broad regulation making power it confers on people.

There is a substantial difference in just what is covered by the federal and Ontario legislation. The Ontario act has a much broader scope. For example, the threshold for private sector coverage in Ontario is 50 employees while under Bill C–64 it is 100 employees. Keep in mind as well that the Ontario legislation covers about 17,000 employers while our act targets approximately 350 employers, and many are leaders in the business community.

To enforce its legislation Ontario established two new independent government agencies, the Ontario Employment Equity Commission and the Ontario Employment Equity Tribunal. Hon. members know that Bill C–64 will utilize two existing government agencies, namely Human Resources Development Canada and the Canadian Human Rights Commission.

I trust that I have helped to clarify for the hon. member the key differences that exist between the provincial and federal legislation.

If that is not enough, I would like to remind hon. members of some very interesting survey results. Roughly two thirds of Ontario businesses responding to a poll just after the recent Ontario election reported that they are in fact in favour of reforming or keeping that province's employment equity law as it is. The business position is reform it but do not repeal it. Only 8 per cent said they would cease implementing employment equity initiatives if the law is repealed, with 69 per cent saying it would not have any impact on their company's equity plans.

I appreciate this time to make some comments. I think that in this debate it is important that the Reform Party face the facts and the truth.

• (1220)

Mr. Frazer: Mr. Speaker, that was very instructive. However, when we talk about quotas, whether we take guidelines or equity of employment for various groups, we are specifying they are quotas. If we say that 5, 10, 20 or 30 per cent of the population falls into certain categories, the implication is that 5, 10, 20 or 30 per cent will be given jobs based on those percentages. This demeans people. It tells them it does not matter how good you are or how hard you can work or how capable you are, you will get your job because you belong to this group. I think that is not only divisive but also is totally and absolutely unfair.

As I said in my previous remarks, in the study on women it has been found that the practice now instituted in the federal hiring system of giving a certain quantity of jobs to women actually undermines their self–confidence. They think maybe they got their jobs because they are women, rather than because they deserve it, they are qualified for it and are good at it. They measure themselves as inadequate and they feel inadequate because they were given preferential treatment for hiring.

The Reform Party wants equality of opportunity for all, regardless of their race, their colour, their gender, their language or whatever. Give them a fair chance at the job. If they are up to it, they will do it and they will do it well; otherwise, they should not be in the job.

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, of course I have to say that I support the hon. member in his position on this bill.

The point the Liberals opposite are missing is the principle of this bill. The principle is the social engineers of the Liberal Party are trying to legislate that businesses in this country will have to enter into hiring practices that will be based on things other than merit or abilities.

This country was made strong by Canadian workers who got their education and their training and did everything they could to prepare themselves to be competitive in the marketplace. They did that and achieved individual rewards as a result. As my colleague has pointed out, this bill seeks to destroy that individual initiative by placing special considerations on special groups. What happened to merit? There is no merit mentioned in Bill C–64.

For this member to tell me that businesses in Ontario are supporting this bill, this employment equity idea, over a fundamental principle of hiring people based on their individual merit is absolute nonsense. I would like to meet a businessman who responded to that survey who would tell me in all truthfulness that he does not care about the merit, the qualifications of the employees, but would rather base his hiring practices on this absurd legislation the Liberal Party is attempting to bring in here.

I ask these social engineers across the way to give us a break. That is not the real world any more.

Hon. Ethel Blondin–Andrew (Secretary of State (Training and Youth), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am proud to be associated with this important initiative, Bill C–64.

I believe the hon. member does not know what we mean when we talk about merit. I have worked with the under–represented target groups for many, many years. In 1984 to 1986 I worked with the Public Service Commission where we instituted a number of initiatives because there was such a gross under–representation of those target groups.

For instance, aboriginal people are the lowest paid on a national average. They are paid less than all of the average working population. If you are a disabled person you are grossly under–represented. It is very difficult for a disabled person who has merit to get a job on a meritorious basis.

• (1225)

These hon. members should be looking for ways to integrate the under–represented people rather than keeping them out and marginalized. Those aboriginal people who make it into the system are still mostly located in the technical and clerical areas. That is a fact and it has nothing to do with merit. Those people have merit. The problem is that they are not getting promoted. Even though they have merit, the qualifications, the experience and the skills, they are being paid less than other people. Talk about inequality. Those are the facts.

Let the hon. members know there is nothing wrong with sharing an equal place in the workplace, shoulder to shoulder with a woman, an aboriginal, a disabled person or a member of a visible minority. There is nothing wrong with that. No one said that if you are an aboriginal person, a woman, a disabled person or a member of a visible minority you have to be stupid or unqualified to make the employment equity program. That is not what this bill states.

This bill states that everyone will have an opportunity because of systemic discrimination and because the opportunities have not made themselves available over 125 years to those people to enter with equality into the workplace. This bill states that they will have the opportunity now. There are still fewer people of those four target groups who are paid as much and who have as many promotions. I do not know why the hon. members cannot accept that fact.

The other day the hon. member for Wild Rose put a rather disparaging human face on employment equity by using his son. I have three children, but I am not going to come out here and plead a case for my children. I have worked to get them an education. They can fend for themselves and work for themselves. This is about broad public policy; it is not about one case.

If there ever was a case, listen to this. In my riding there is an aboriginal man who is now severely disabled. He is an elder in the community. In 1959, along with his four partners, he was working in a sawmill. He was in a serious accident while sawing wood for the government employees in a place called Rocher River. His friend was decapitated and this man's arm was amputated. He made a number of attempts to receive some type of compensation for his loss but had no success. This is an employment equity issue, an equality issue, a human rights issue.

Because this man lived in a harsh and inclement environment he had to rely on his skills. He went to residential school in that area but was not an educated man. He was a trapper. He had children. His children could not pursue or finish their education simply because he needed them to stay home and cut wood, haul water, and do all those things necessary to survive. I am not sure where the system failed. This man's wife has worked all of her life and has no regrets, but it was a severely difficult case.

These are the kinds of things we are talking about. We are talking about having a human mind and heart to the toils and the struggles of the average Canadian. We are not talking about creating gross inequality and promoting people so that they are falling off the top.

This is a very disparaging and discouraging kind of discussion we are having with members opposite. Why is it so difficult for them to understand the struggles of that kind of individual rather than bringing in people who are saying they did not get a job because they are not the right colour? That is not what it is about.

There are people who are disabled, women, visible minorities, aboriginals, and a combination thereof who have severe difficulties. On the national average, when these people make it into the system they do not get paid as much as the person who is already there. They are paid less for the same work.

• (1230)

There is another problem. When they get into the system they are at the bottom. Aboriginal people, for instance, are mostly in clerical and technical areas. They are not in senior management areas. That is changing but very slowly.

We need some help and this provides help, but it does not step on anyone to do it. I challenge the Reform Party to come up with facts to prove that it does. The facts will not bear its position out.

As a country we value diversity. We support our many communities as a source of social stability and economic strength. As individuals too many Canadians continue to face enormous barriers to employment which prevent them from achieving their full potential.

I have met with the disability groups. I have seen those people. I have spoken with them. It is all right to stand in the House of Commons and isolate oneself from that constituency, but sometimes one should go to the source. We as elected members have to go to the source, keep open minds and respond to those people rather than criticize them and stomp on any opportunities they might have.

It is ridiculous. We have to help those people. They have less than we do in terms of opportunities. As a disabled person mobility is a problem and the work environment can be a problem. Those are the things we have to work on.

If people live in high unemployment areas or in areas of extreme poverty as do some aboriginals, they are marginalized socially. They do not have a mode of transportation. There are many barriers facing them. Some are institutionalized; some are systemic. That is true. That is a fact. That is something we cannot deny and we have to face reality.

I spoke about an individual who has endured, who has worked many years on the land with one arm. The individual said to me: "My arm must be worth $100,000". Any insurance company would say: "How can we put a value on the loss of one's arm or any extremity?" It would be putting a value on a life. It would be putting a value on the man's capacity to provide for his children so they can pursue and finish their education and his wife can be there to raise their children with him. That was not made available to that family. These are the kinds of situations that arise out of the inequities, the barriers, the obstacles.

In 1994 the Employment Equity Act annual report painted a depressing picture for people with disabilities, members of visible minorities, women and aboriginal people. Since 1991 employment has declined more severely for employees covered under the act than for employees in the Canadian economy.

In spite of an increase in the population of designated groups fewer of them found their way into the labour market. They are not a threat. Believe me, the jobs are safe. They just want an opportunity to do something, to make themselves independent.

Members opposite on a daily basis wail away about how people have become so dependent, are on welfare and are living off the system. Here is an opportunity for them to help those people to integrate into the system, to be independent, to have self–respect, to have a job and to support their own families.

Members of designated groups still find themselves at the lowest end of the social and economic scale. Not only do they not have the opportunity, many of them are also the poorest. It is not correct that the wage gap between visible minority employees and other full time workers has widened for men and remains almost the same for women since 1987. There has not been that much movement.

I do not know why the intimidation. I do not know why the perverse, twisted language that strikes fear into the hearts of the average Canadian. It is so seductive to speak that way. It is so easy to use colourful, provocative gross language that overstates the case and sells it unfairly. That is not right; that should not be done. Let the facts speak for themselves. There is something seriously wrong when talented, educated women continue to be over represented in clerical, sales and service jobs but under–represented in upper management and technical jobs.

• (1235)

How can we call ourselves a caring and passionate society when we deny people with disabilities accessibility and the dignity that comes with a job? It is a source of national shame that our first peoples account for only 1.04 per cent of the workforce, occupy the lowest paying jobs and are on the losing end of the wage gap when compared with other Canadians.

It is unacceptable that university educated aboriginal young people experience an unemployment rate twice that of their white male counterparts, considering the barriers that face them when they enter high school.

In some places I have visited there is a dropout rate in excess of 85 per cent. Those children who make it into the system, who make it through high school and who make it through university are in an alien, foreign environment. It is different. It is difficult. I have done it. I know. It is difficult for them. They need support. They do not need criticism, opposition and confrontation. Leaving employable people on the sidelines does us all a disservice. It damages individuals. It wastes enormous talent. It hinders our economy and diminishes society as a whole.

Employment equity is quite simply fairness in the distribution of jobs. Bill C–64 is designed to ensure that nobody is denied employment opportunities or benefits for reasons unrelated to ability. Inequality by comparison is a drag on our economy. Passive income support costs all Canadians, not the least of whom are the individuals affected. There is a pressing need for the legislation.

By the turn of the century two–thirds of entrants to the workforce will be from the four designated groups: women, aboriginal peoples, members of visible minorities, and people with disabilities. The country needs the wealth of their talents. We cannot afford to overlook any segment of the population any longer.

Will those two–thirds be the unemployed? Will those two–thirds be the ones on welfare? Will those two–thirds be the ones who are not moving anywhere, not promoted, not given any employment, not given any opportunities?

Those are the real questions to be answered. People are our most important natural resource. Strategies that capitalize on the underutilized capabilities of every employable Canadian are clearly in the best interest of the country.

Employment equity improves the workplace environment and promotes productivity by encouraging a more tolerant and integrated workforce. This is the intent of Bill C–64. That is why I ask members opposite what is so reprehensible. What is so wrong with having the four designated groups standing shoulder to shoulder and sharing the workplace with the rest of the population? That is the way it should be. That is what our country is about.

We are a mosiac. We are not a melting pot. Canada is that kind of a country. We do not try as in the United States to make everybody the same. We are all individuals in the House which does not stop us from respecting one another. We do not have to agree ideologically with each other to respect one another as people. That is not the way the country should be proceeding into the future. That is not the way a country as diverse as Canada will work.

Individuals benefit from contributing to their communities. Canada profits from the skills and strengths they have to offer. In short we all benefit not just in better social conditions which are critical but in realizing our national economic potential. It is good business for Canada to have those people integrated into the workforce. It is good business for Canada and for us as elected officials to have those people independent, integrated, promoted, and to have them utilize their skills and their merits as they should.

• (1240)

We can recreate our country in a way that better reflects us by working shoulder to shoulder with designated groups and by acknowledging the contributions of members of the designated groups to the economic wealth and rich cultural diversity of our country. Every one of us has a contribution to make but we can only make it if we are given the opportunity.

Thank God for the opportunities given to those people. I have seen them work. I have seen programs clearly targeted to those groups and they work. They have given disabled people an opportunity, such as some of the programs where disabled people are integrated into banks and into some other areas. Be they clerical or whatever, they are a start. We know that and are working on another part of it such as promoting those people if they have the capability and the merit to do it. Why not? That is the way it should be.

Employment is the great equalizer. Jobs give us satisfaction, self–esteem and mutual respect. They also give us wages which allow us to provide a better standard of living for our families. Work gives us reason to believe in ourselves and for others to believe in us. This is the equality women, persons with disabilities, aboriginal peoples and members of visible minorities are seeking. We can take an important step toward that goal by adopting Bill C–64 and by doing so help our goal of building a more vibrant economy and a stronger country through a more representative workforce. We can make a positive contribution to Canada by helping disadvantaged Canadians build better lives for themselves and their families.

I appeal to my colleagues on the other side to take another look and to have a more tolerant view of what equality and equity are all about. It is not about rising above the rest, being better than anyone else and pushing people out of the way. The numbers are not there to substantiate that. They are stagnant; there is no movement there. Those people are not a threat. They need our help. We can do enormous good for those people. We can make a contribution to the country by helping them lift themselves up.

I appeal to my colleagues and I appeal to all other Canadians to take a tolerant view toward the bill and those people.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the remarks of my colleague. I should like to ask her a question or two.

The minister related the incident about the sawmill accident. I certainly give my regards to that family. I could imagine what a disaster it would be in terms of the family income as well as the personal and tragic loss. I appreciate that the fellow who had his arm amputated was obviously unable to work in the sawmill industry after. The minister said it was a human rights issue. I suspect more specifically it might be a disability issue. Of course he faced that and was unable to work in the same area and provide for his family.

I can be called naive or whatever, but I cannot make the leap somehow logically that employment equity would solve that problem. Could the member enlighten me? I hate to plead ignorance here but it seems incredible to me. If all of a sudden employment equity or Bill C–64 had been an issue, how would it have made life different for him?

Would it not be wiser for that company to say that he had skills in the sawmill business? Maybe he could have been used in a different capacity which perhaps was not so physical that he needed to use his arms. If he had merit, capabilities and competence in the industry, surely they would have been able to work him into that. How in the world would employment equity all of a sudden solve those problems? I cannot see it.

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: I appreciate the hon. member's question. On a professional and personal level I felt the case had to be highlighted and maybe this was the only opportunity I would get as a member of Parliament. It also demonstrates that this person, who is aboriginal and disabled as I emphasized in my speech and members can check Hansard if they want, has struggles which are many. Many programs and services are available but not all of them can overcome the struggles.

• (1245)

Bill C–64 may not address this issue. However, I felt it was a very important issue to be raised on behalf of a person who belonged to one of the four under–represented groups or targeted areas. That person has an opportunity to have a voice through me. That happens with many of us in the House of Commons.

I do not have the opportunity to get up to make statements which is something I would have done as a member of Parliament in the previous session. I felt that because this person was a disabled aboriginal person and his case was so specific that it needed a bit of profile. I have provided the opportunity at this time.

In terms of employment equity, if we look at all of the information I have provided, the hon. member will know that perhaps this was stretching it a bit. However, I felt that because of this individual case, which has had very little success, perhaps it would be an opportunity for it to have a bit of attention.

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make the observation that members opposite, in particular the last member who spoke, are confusing discriminatory hiring practices with the term employment equity.

We have laws in Canada that prohibit discriminatory hiring practices. We have laws that prohibit employers from not hiring qualified people because they happen to be a member of a certain visible minority group or because they may be physically or mentally disabled. There are laws which prohibit businesses from discriminating against people based on who or what they are.

This bill ensures that if two people of equal merit, of equal training, of equal ability, apply for a job and one happens to be a member of a designated group and the other one is not, that favour be bestowed on the person who is in the designated group and disfavour be bestowed on the person who is not. I fail to see the logic of the bill.

The government is trying to tell free enterprise how to hire people. The fact is that the government is already in the face of business too much and it is hurting the economy.

The hon. member related a very tragic case. She brought it down to a personal level. I would like to bring it down to a personal level as well.

My oldest son has a learning disability. He probably would fit into one of the designated groups. I expect that my son will become employable because my wife and I are doing everything we can to ensure that he receives training and obtains the ability to become employable, not because he is handicapped in his learning, but because he has the skills to do a job.

I do not want the government to look after my son's future. I want him to be independent. That is why I want him to be trained and to have the ability to hold a job.

• (1250)

The state should not be determining the future of my son. When it does that, it takes away his independence, his ability to function as an independent Canadian, to acquire the skills and to merit getting a job, not because of his disability but because of his strengths.

That is why I am fundamentally opposed to this bill. It will diminish the qualities, the abilities, the training of individuals and will place them in a category that will get them a job because of who they are and not what they are or what they can do.

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: Mr. Speaker, throughout the course of the constitutional talks I learned a very important lesson from Canadians. Treating all people the same does not necessarily express equality. Needs are different based on the individual needs of a person.

I salute my colleague for the efforts he has made on behalf of his son. However, we are not talking about one individual. We are talking about four designated groups. Those groups have a disadvantage in the system. It is not that blatant.

I know there is an appeal process. If a person feels discriminated against he or she can go to the Canadian Human Rights Commission. However, if a person is systematically ignored, not promoted or marginalized year after year and if the statistics bear out no movement for certain designated groups, systemically there is a problem. It is very subtle because employers can ignore employees they do not favour. They can engage in a very subtle approach and make it difficult for employees by ignoring them, by not promoting them or hiring them for other jobs. It is very hard to prove.

As I indicated before, because these four designated groups get paid less and are under–represented on promotion lists, they need our help. That is something the hon. member should think about. It is not to discriminate, not to make more dependent and not to hire people who do not have the talent or merit. It is to enable those people who have the merit and the talent to integrate into a system that has not allowed them to do so. The doors have been closed and we need movement there. We need to open not only our hearts, but the doors to employment and training opportunities for those designated groups.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to my colleague at the outset that I appreciate the fact that there were serious differences in the comment she made and she was, in fact, stretching it. Employment equity is not going to solve those problems. That is in Hansard forever more. I do appreciate the case of that family in the north.

This is an interesting debate. I find myself amazed as I look at the charter of rights and freedoms, section 15(1), which states: "Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and the equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability".

That seems fairly clear to me and probably clear to everybody else who is listening to this. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms protects us all, regardless of race, gender, language, ethnic background, et cetera.

I want to know how in the world we can get from that, where the charter protects us, to Bill C–64 on employment equity. Frankly, I have not heard an answer from the government side. I have heard stories, passionate story telling and all kinds of situations where people have talked about individuals. I could relate all kinds of them myself. However, when I hear my colleagues saying Bill C–64 is going to be the answer to all this, there is just no way on the earth that I an convinced and I suspect that most Canadians who are listening to the debate are simply not able to make that leap.

• (1255)

With the protections under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms I question why we are even debating this bill. There seems to be no reason. It is not going to resolve any situations. It is not going to make people's lives easier. The very institution that should be protecting the fundamental rights vis–à–vis the charter of rights and freedoms of all Canadians is being used to suppress one of those rights. It says: "We will look after this person but we will not look after that one. We will give one special treatment but not for the other, I am very sorry".

Bill C–64 will deny the right to equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination. Once we start travelling down that fork in the road I see nothing but flag warnings and signals ahead that we had better be careful. As was talked about in the Charlottetown accord, once people start saying to particular groups that they get distinct society status, they get special attention because of this or there should be so many women in the Senate, that takes us down a dangerous path where we do not think we could ever get back to that fork in the road.

When I hear the stories being talked about this morning, the alarm bells go off. I have to ask myself where it leads us. It is exactly as we saw in Charlottetown. What road does that lead us down? Are we ever going to be able to get back to that tributary? I really do not think it will help us a lot.

This bill will officially sanction discrimination against non–designated groups. As soon as somebody is designated, then someone else becomes non–designated. As soon as an individual or a group is committed to something, suddenly other people are left out by the sin of omission. Why do we have this obsession in this Parliament to make sure some people are labelled? I am sure my friend the minister across the way does not think it is good or right to label people. Yet here is legislation that he supports where he is starting to label people, then by omission others are left off the table.

There has to be a hint of discrimination displayed against designated groups. If there is, that is when there are problems. Just let there be a hint against those designated groups and the equity control patrol will suddenly swoop in. They are hot on the trail to right those wrongs and impose stiff penalties on the offenders. It amazes me when I think about it.

For instance, why should we have equity police? Heaven forbid, we sit in a Chamber where there are 53 women, which I will talk about a little later. I have heard colleagues, especially in the last Parliament but certainly in this Parliament as well, saying that 51 per cent of the population are women so 51 per cent of members of Parliament should be female. That is ridiculous. Later I will talk about the fact that I am a female MP but I will do it on ability and competence rather than just on the fact that I am a female.

The equity police are to be people going around checking up to make sure that everybody is doing what they are supposed to be doing. Mr. Speaker, you can see that will lead down a road to trouble as well. Imagine if someone were on you all the time saying: "I do not think he is doing the right thing. I think his hiring practices in his House of Commons' office are questionable".

Mr. Speaker, can you imagine the fear, the nervousness, the sense of being watched that you would feel? I am sure you have read 1984 where George Orwell talks about how the thought police are going to be on us all the time. Although I do not want to sound like an alarmist it seems this legislation provides a possibility for that. It may be setting up these equity police. They will be going around making sure that everybody is hiring the right people and doing all this stuff in their offices.

The human rights commission is to be the overseeing group that looks after this. It will send in the equity police to make sure that everything is going according to Bill C–64. It is interesting to note that absolutely zero funding is to be given for that.

Suddenly this new bureaucracy or group is being set up that says: "We are going to have the equity police to make sure that everybody is hired properly. Maybe there is just the right number of people at the table; maybe the House of Commons staff can be broken down just fine". It is impractical. It is divisive. It is not going to work.

I get to these equity police. Dear knows how they are going to be assembled. I am not sure. I suppose they would have to fit under the right group. Who polices the police in this situation? There is zero funding for this bunch that will work under the human rights commission. How in the world are we ever going to be able to police such a thing?

We want less government. We want people to walk around in freedom, to be able hire who they think will do the best job for them and make sure that everybody is going to do the best he or she possibly can.

• (1300)

Knowing there is always someone trying to run a business, a government department or whatever, there is nothing that would make any of us, whether MPs, senators or whatever say we are really nervous and we want to make sure all the right things are being done. I am not sure the people who will be equity police will have the qualifications to do the cop job the government will be asking them to do.

The most amazing thing I find about this piece of legislation is with regard to the province of Ontario. This is not my home province but I visit here from week to week with my job. What an incredible turnaround when the socialist government, which was in power for several years, was thrown out on its left ear in June because of the Conservatives and Mike Harris and all he stood for. My friends will remember that just last year even a socialist NDP government in Ontario could not get this type of legislation through.

I know my friends over here are in full favour of Bill C–64. I have a question for one of them from Ontario. If the NDP socialist government in Ontario cannot pass employment equity legislation, how in the world will the Liberals do it? I know my friend from Broadview—Greenwood is very concerned about this. Although he is from downtown Toronto, a hair bigger than my hometown of Heinsburg, I would like him to answer the question seriously. Will it solve the problems? Will it make sure people have employment? Will it help the employment situation? I know numbers in employment are important to him.

He says it will and I have a great deal of faith in him, but I am not sure we can make this leap of logic that it will make a whole lot of difference. If an NDP socialist government could not even get it through, how in the world will it fly across the country? It will not.

We have seen what has happened to the NDP and socialism. I can remember in the last Parliament I used to sit back there and the NDP was down here. What is happening worldwide? There is a move away from that government interference in our lives. We now see the NDP as a fourth party in the House. We will see that continue to move away. It has happened in Ontario and right across the country.

Hiring habits are wonderful but as soon as someone tells us we have to do this or they will come after us if we do not, we know even in our human nature that as soon as someone says we have do this they are toast. It is as simple as that. It did not work in Ontario and it simply will not work here. Employment equity legislation flies in the face of the merit principle.

Is the Revenue Canada document "The Employment Equity Action Plan for 1995–96" a start or is it the be all and end all? Will 1995–96 be the big watershed year for employment equity or will it be the start of something that leads us down the path of divisiveness and danger?

A really good example in this document states how hiring quotas would work, quotas being what we are talking about. The government is refusing to acknowledge that. It says it is not talking about quotas or specific numbers. It is numbers, it is quotas and it is tokenism that we are really talking about here.

Under women the document states females are under–represented in certain occupational groups, namely auditors, managers and senior managers. The solution to the problem is the following discriminatory statement from the document: "Consider only female recruitment when external hiring is undertaken as an ongoing policy".

If the men in the Chamber cannot see through that, surely the women can. Can anyone imagine anything so pathetic as somebody saying we should consider only female recruitment when external hiring is undertaken as an ongoing policy? That is absolutely ridiculous.

Let us look at our own situation in the House of Commons. I am a woman involved in politics. I represent one of the 53 women MPs out of 295. We are under–represented in the House of Commons but let us keep working on it. There were 40 women in the last Parliament. We are 53 in this Parliament. My friend over here is a new MP which is great because we have more numbers. Would she not sooner work with a smaller group of really committed, class act, competent women rather than having 51 per cent of the MPs here elected just because they were women?

Let us look at people who have some abilities in this place. I said this before in the Chamber and I am not ashamed to say it again. If I go anywhere in my constituency and say: "Hello, Mr. Mills, my name is Deborah Grey, I am your member of Parliament, I am your Reform candidate, please vote for me, I am a woman", I would expect him to take me into his house, sit me down, give me a cup of coffee and say: "Come on now". It is incredible. That is what this legislation would lead to.

• (1305)

Mr. Speaker, you know as well as I do because you sit with the governing party and you were here in the last Parliament, when people were getting ready for nominations—remember the wrangle before the 1993 election—some women in this party, in the NDP and, bless it, the memory of the Conservative Party anyway, did not even have to go through a nomination process. Certain women said certain ridings were for them. They did not have to go through a nomination process because they were anointed or appointed to that. My friends know this. There is absolutely no way they can deny it.

A few women in the House got the nomination by acclamation. Is that right? Is that employment equity? Absolutely not.

I would like to think that I and the two women sitting in the Chamber right now won the election because we are competent. Is that agreed? Absolutely. They had some skills and they had some ability and they would be effective members of Parliament. It is not just because the leaders of the parties said they think we should have so many women. The NDP gives extra funding for people.

There were nomination meetings held at which some men were told they would not get the chance to run because certain seats, NDP, Liberal or whatever, were designated for women. Let us look at the numbers and see how effective that was. Many people were nominated. I do not know the number of women nominated in ridings who did not actually win their seat, but I do know my numbers of women elected.

For the Liberals, 36 out of 178. That represents 20 per cent of their caucus. We appreciate that and we celebrate it, up from 13 per cent. I suppose that is a great start. It is interesting that it was up from 13 per cent but they did not have employment equity to do it. Of the Bloc Quebecois, eight out of the 53 are women, 15 per cent. For the Reform Party, we are seven women out of 52, 14 per cent. The NDP elected one, 11 per cent of its nine members. As for the Conservatives, their numbers are quite interesting. Fifty per cent of their caucus is female and I certainly respect them for that.

A record was set in 1989 when 100 per cent of the Reform caucus was female, myself of course. Do members see what we can do with numbers? It is absolutely ridiculous.

The sad part was there were so many more women who were candidates in that election. They did not win their seats for the Liberal or the governing caucus. Why? So many of them were told they would be run in such and such a constituency. They knew they did not have a hope.

Somebody said they were spear carriers for that, not even dreaming they would ever get the seat. It is true. I know of a couple of situations in B.C. in which some NDP fellows wanted to run for the nomination and could not. I think they had a pretty good idea they would not win the seat. Reform took most of the seats across B.C. except in the lower mainland.

Nothing would be more pathetic than if my party leader or someone else came to me and said they were going to put me in here. They would like me to run in such and such a riding. They do not think I have a chance of winning but they want a woman in that seat. I would say no, forget it. I do not want any part of that. If I cannot run fair and square regardless of my being a woman, I will not participate in something like that and I hope these people would say the same thing.

One of my heroes of this place is Agnes Macphail. She was cool. I am sure all the women and men in the House would agree she was a wonderful woman. She was the first woman ever elected to this place.

I was nervous in 1989 as the only Reformer and some of the new members of Parliament may have been nervous because this place is inspiring. We were all awe struck when we came.

Agnes Macphail was elected in 1921 for the Progressive Party. She sat with the Progressives from 1921 to 1935 for the constituency of Grey South East. She then moved to the CCF and was the member for Grey—Bruce as it was called then from 1935 to 1940.

• (1310)

If Agnes Macphail were here today, I would love to hear what she would have to say about employment equity and that the government is trying to push through Bill C–64.

They did not have the blessing of microphones in the Chamber then so one had to speak loudly to be heard. The best line I can remember from Agnes Macphail, truly my hero, was when one male member of Parliament said: "Agnes, have you ever been mistaken for a man in the Chamber?" She said: "No, have you?"

That is a class act. I do not think employment equity would have helped her a whole lot. I think she would be absolutely scandalized by Bill C–64. Someone asked her if she had ever been mistaken for a man. What a ridiculous thing to ask. We have come a long way since then.

This morning I was at the Governor General's residence for the presentation of the awards to six women who did a wonderful job in the Persons case with the famous five from Alberta. It was a wonderful ceremony. I am not sure why my friend is laughing across the way. It is a pity she was not there because these are great women who were awarded the Governor General's medal today. It was excellent. They have all done work on the Persons case and they were all being rewarded for the work they are doing.

It was interesting when they gave us the history that Nellie McClung, Emily Murphy and all those wonderful women from Alberta in the 1920s were not even recognized as persons. They took it to the Supreme Court and it was turned down. They did not even get to be called persons. Then in 1929 they took it to the privy council. They went to Lord Chancellor Sankey in England, trying to get overturned the ruling that said: "Women are persons in matters of pains and penalties but are not persons in matters of rights and privileges".

Emily Murphy found that a bit hard and somebody challenged her because she was a magistrate; imagine, a magistrate in Alberta. They challenged her that she was not a person. Five people were allowed to appeal that and away these women went. On October 18, 1929 they were granted by Lord Chancellor Sankey to be persons.

I find it pathetic that somebody has just snorted here and thought this was a real laugh. I want to honour these people for what they did back in 1929. Because of that, she was and I am able to sit in the House of Commons. We are treated as persons. Then of course women got the vote after that.

This is the kind of stuff that is important. I would like to know what those women would think about it. Emily Murphy challenged married women's property rights. If a woman had property with her husband back then and her husband died, she would be tough out of luck. She would lose the title to that land.

Things have come a long way since that day. I really appreciate that. We need to celebrate that. I do think this legislation will take us down a very dangerous, divisive road down and we will be sorry we cannot turn around.

Again I tell my colleagues across the House that as hilarious, scornful, mocking or whatever they think this is, they need to be aware that it will not solve the problems. The NDP could not pass it in Ontario. It will get rammed through the House of Commons but there will be waves and repercussions making it very frightening for people across the country.

Employment equity will breed resentment because it will be assumed that designated groups attained employment not by the merit principle but by legislated coercion. It will label designated groups as being inferior and unable to compete on a level playing field. It is patronizing, hierarchical and elitist. It assumes designated groups need a higher order to run interference for them. It is wrong. It is bad. I am really sorry the government will ram through Bill C–64.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my colleague mentioned Agnes Macphail. I am presently reading the memoirs of Eugene Forsey. For members who do not recall Eugene Forsey, he was a force of the New Democratic Party. He had a strong ethic for fairness in Canadian society when this was an important thing for people to be doing, as it is today.

• (1315)

In the memoirs of Eugene Forsey he recounts a tale of Agnes Macphail. Members will know that Canadians watching this debate on television do not realize that just outside the Chamber of the House of Commons is a bust of Agnes Macphail. Every time we walk into the opposition lobby we can see the bust of Agnes Macphail.

When Agnes Macphail was at the founding convention of the CCF in Regina in the 1920s there was a motion put forward at the convention in the true socialist manner stating that 50 per cent of all people sitting on committees within the CCF would be women. Women would have employment equity within the party. There would be a balance. No matter what committee it was, 50 per cent of the members would be women.

It was reported by Eugene Forsey that the shortest speech ever made by Agnes Macphail was when she spoke to the convention. She said that she had achieved what she had achieved in her own right, not because she was a woman. It did not work for her and it did not work against her. She wanted to be judged as a person who was capable of achieving her own ends in her own right. She felt that was the appropriate way for all people to be treated.

I thought I would share that little anecdote with members.

I do not suggest that the Liberals have evil motives in bringing this forward. I think their hearts are in the right place, but I do not think their minds are necessarily connected.

I would ask my colleague from Beaver River if she would comment on the notion that perhaps we should be putting our energies into the prevention of discrimination and we should be using the facilities of the country to educate rather than to legislate. What we really have to do is talk about how we can have values in our country, values all Canadians can share, which have to do with the prevention of discrimination and the fact that we are all of us equal Canadians, no matter when we arrived here, no matter the colour of our skin, no matter our gender. We should be addressing the values, we should not be writing laws.

Miss Grey: Mr. Speaker, I appreciated the story about Agnes Macphail. She realized that we are not going to get anywhere by somebody saying we are going to give Agnes special treatment or we are going to give babysitting money to someone when they are running as a candidate.

When I ran as a candidate I ran thinking that somebody somewhere might elect me on the basis that they thought maybe I could string two or three sentences together, that I love my country, and that I am committed to being a member of Parliament. I am glad to say that it happened not only once, in 1989, but again with a larger majority in 1993. I appreciate that, but never once would I be able to go around and say I am a woman, so elect me or re–elect me; or that I am getting special funding from my party; or if somebody wanted to challenge me for the nomination in the constituency of Beaver River that my party leader would say: "No, you are not able to challenge Deborah because she is the sitting MP and I want her there". That is ridiculous.

We need to encourage wide open nomination meetings for people who want the job. It makes for a good race and it is democratic. What could be worse for true democracy than a party leader saying no, sorry, you cannot run because I have so–and–so and she is going to run in this riding?

We have to put our energies into educating people. That is far and wide the most beneficial thing we can do. We are not going to legislate all the problems out of Canada. That is simply bizarre. We have seen any number of times that it simply does not work. It does not work when a government says we know best and we are going to do all of these wonderful things, especially when the whole idea of employment equity has just blown up in its face. The Ontario members know that. They just saw in their own province that it did not work.

• (1320)

How do we think we can legislate these things? We have to spend our time educating. That would involve such things as starting here in the House of Commons, where we would not see political hanky–panky going on and party leaders engineering and telling us who we will have as candidates and as MPs. Surely the House of Commons would be a good place for education to start.

Some Wednesday, because almost everyone is here for question period, I would love to see a show of hands from people who did not have anyone challenge them for their nomination. Would that not be a great educational tool to see how many people were anointed or appointed as candidates? I bet members would be too ashamed to put up their hands. I know I would.

If my party leader said: "Deb, we are going to put you in here and no one else can run against you", I would be ashamed. If a news reporter ever asked me how many people challenged me for the nomination, I would have to say there were going to be two or three, but I was anointed as the candidate so they were not allowed to run. Can you imagine how pathetic that would be? Imagine the signal that would send to the rest of the country. My friend knows about it. What kind of signal would that send to the country? It is pretty pathetic. Those are the kinds of educational things we need to get going.

I would like to correct something I said earlier about the fact that there would be employment equity or equity police for those of us who are hiring our staff. I was wrong on that and I admit it. But this bill does not even extend to the House of Commons. I ask some of the experts over there if I am correct on that. Does it extend to the House of Commons staff?

Could anyone, even in the gallery, explain to me how in the world the House of Commons becomes exempt from this? Well, it is good enough for everyone else in the public service, but this group is exempt. By the very fact that the people who are working here are exempt from it, we have the sin of omission again. As soon as there is a sin of commission because we commit names and groups to people, then there is the sin of omission and it does not even extend to the House of Commons. I think people watching us on television today should be well aware of that. It is absolutely incredible that the House of Commons is exempt. All of a sudden we are special again.

If anything takes us down the road of something that is dangerous and divisive, it is that it is good for everybody else across the country but we are exempt from it here. It sort of makes me smell the MP pension issue all over again, as a matter of fact. We are cutting out all the pensions for all these people and we are sorry that we have to lay off 45,000 public servants, but we MPs will keep our pension plan. Instead of $6 to $1 for employer to employee contributions, we are just cutting back, folks. We are just slicing the fat off this. Now our employers are only going to give $4 to $1. So MPs are exempt.

There is another group of people who all of a sudden become special. I am sure my friends are well read and I am sure they remember the novel Animal Farm by George Orwell. I am sure they will remember the phrase in there that all animals are created equal but some are more equal than others. If anything smacks of that, it is Bill C–64. If anything smacks of that, it is the MP pension plan, which no other person in the country is able to get.

My friend the President of the Treasury Board knows it full well. I have spoken at public meetings and I know he has as well. If he had asked for a show of hands from any of those groups he spoke with asking if anyone qualified for this kind of a pension plan, there would not have been a hand up in the place. But it is okay to tell everyone else across the country they have to tighten their belts.

My friend over here just hollered out that I was going to get $100,000 instead of $1.4 million that I am eligible to collect. I do not know where he got that number. Let me put it on the record that I am getting back only the contributions I have made. The President of the Treasury Board told me: "You take all of your pension or you take zero". Those were my options. He would not even grant me a one to one contribution like anyone else would get. We were exempt from the federal civil service pension plan, that act where the employer would have to put in at least 50 per cent of the money. I am not getting that. I am getting back $32,000 of my contributions at 4 per cent. No mutual fund would ever give that little money since 1989. I get $32,000 back that I can roll over into my RRSP, and some $16,000, much like he gets, except he is not rolling it anywhere, except into the trough for a very large pension because we are about the same age. I get $16,000 back, which I will have to pay tax on at 46 per cent, which is my tax bracket.

• (1325)

There it is. If it were a hundred grand I would love it, and I would do what I could with it, but because I have opted out of that pension plan, I will be exempt. I know I will certainly sleep with a clear conscience, knowing that at least I am not ripping the taxpayer off for that much money.

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise as a co–sponsor of this piece of legislation, in so far as it relates to the federal employees, the Public Service of Canada.

Let me first of all express my gratitude to my colleague, the Minister of Human Resources Development, for bringing forward this legislation, bringing the private and public sector together under one piece of legislation, and for members on the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons for their significant contribution to the debate.

[Translation]

The committee's main report reflects the collective wisdom of those who testified.

[English]

Together they described employment equity as a sensible and balanced measure that strengthens our social fabric.

Canadians have an excellent understanding of what equality is all about. They appreciate that for there to be a harmonious and well–balanced society, all of its members must have an opportunity to contribute to it as well as share in its benefits. That is what employment equity and this legislation are all about.

Employment equity has been criticized, we have heard it in just the last few minutes, on the grounds that it introduces discrimination into the workplace. In fact, the opposite is true. Employment equity helps individuals compete for employment on an equal basis. Nobody receives special advantages, nobody receives special privileges under this legislation. To claim that anyone does represents a serious misunderstanding of the principles involved in Bill C–64.

Employment equity simply seeks a diversity in the workplace similar to what can be found in society. Therefore, we must remove barriers to employment opportunities to better reflect the population as it is today. These barriers are frequently buried in systems and longstanding practices.

For example, if for no particular good reason except tradition all police officers must be six feet tall, then most women could not compete. This sort of systemic barrier was once commonplace in this country, yet there would be few today who would argue that it makes much sense now, if in fact it ever did.

Let me give another example, rather less obvious perhaps. If a recruitment or promotion board were composed of three people, all males, all graduates of the same university, and all about the same age, one could be forgiven for wondering if this board would be much open to the perspectives of persons with different values, different experiences, different traditions. Selection boards require greater diversity to ensure that no candidate's talents are overlooked.

We must take measures to encourage equitable access to opportunities for employment and opportunities for advancement in the public service. This may mean, for instance, establishing training positions, so that those who are disadvantaged can develop skills and acquire experience to compete on an equal footing. When we make full use of all available human capital, then our society will truly benefit.

[Translation]

The face of Canadian workers has changed.

[English]

It has changed dramatically. Women, aboriginal peoples, persons with disabilities, and people in a visible minority now represent the largest share of new entrants to the labour market. In just 10 years the representation of women in the labour force has risen from 40 per cent to 45 per cent. This 5 per cent shift represents some 750,000 women. Employment equity helps the labour market adapt to changes of this magnitude.

• (1330)

It might be helpful to speak in more concrete terms about creating an environment that takes advantage of diversity. The Public Service of Canada is a good example. Diversity within the workforce means more than just having people of different backgrounds working together. It is not enough to hire an employee with a disability without helping to build the employee's relationships with his or her colleagues. It is not acceptable to ignore the support and training that women need to advance within an organization. Diversity within an organization calls for the acknowledgement and accommodation of differences.

The Treasury Board has issued a publication called "Alternative Formats Access for All". It provides guidance on how to produce material in alternate formats for persons with disabilities. An alternate format might be large type on a page or a cassette recording of printed material. The alternate format not only helps public servants but at the same time better serves the public.

The Treasury Board has also published a series of best practices as well as guides to assist public service managers to implement employment equity. Two most recent best practices that have been published deal with women and persons with disabilities. Both draw on practices that have proven effective in a range of organizations across the country.

Also we have just printed guides concerning the management of employees with psychiatric and developmental difficulties. We have also produced guides with respect to retention of aboriginal employees.

To ensure that employment equity is implemented effectively, departments and agencies must prepare an employment equity plan with goals and timetables. These are not quotas but goals they will strive to achieve. However the merit principle still prevails.

The plans are public documents as are the reports on what has been achieved under them. The plans will not be effective unless they build on the advice that the diversity of employees can provide. Some of this advice is provided by consultation groups reporting to the Treasury Board but much of it comes from advisory committees set up within departments.

The views of the public service unions are also important. I want to acknowledge the spirit of co–operation that inspires public service unions on employment equity matters. We are mindful of the need for continued collaboration with them. We are confident the provisions of the legislation will bear fruit.

We have established the framework to help the advancement of employment equity in the public service of the nineties. The framework places employment equity firmly within the practice of good human resources management and business planning. The legislation in front of us will continue to provide a solid legal foundation. It is not a radical break from the past; it is indeed a bridge to the future.

It is important to remember that although we tend to speak of diversity in terms of groups the focus is actually on the individual. It is not the group that is recruited as a filing clerk or that is considered for promotion to executive ranks. It is one particular person. Can anyone object to the need to reach out to all members of society based on their individual qualifications and merits? Some people would argue that employment equity encourages candidate selection to be made on the basis of sex or ethnic origin or a disability rather than merit. I beg to differ.

As a matter of fact the essential point is that appointments to the public service are governed by the Public Service Employment Act which enshrines the merit principle. It is far different from the kind of legislation that was talked about earlier by the member for Beaver River with respect to the province of Ontario. Our act enshrines the merit principle. The administration of the act rests with the Public Service Commission, an independent agency that reports directly to Parliament.

Progress in the area of employment equity has been made in full respect of merit. It is the principle on which a non–partisan, highly professional public service has been built. This cornerstone of human resource management will not be eroded.

• (1335)

Employment equity is not about preferences. It is a method of creating a fairness that might not otherwise exist. Several years ago the Conference Board of Canada issued an interesting paper on employment equity. The introduction revealed that women, visible minorities and persons with disabilities make up close to 60 per cent of the new entrants into Canada's labour force. It then went on to say that the full participation of these entrants to Canada's labour force constitutes a vital resource and that their full participation in the workplace will be fundamental to the ability of organizations to understand and respond to the needs of the rapidly changing marketplace. That is what the conference board said.

To achieve this goal organizations need solid policies and fair practices. For example, the same board found that if we want to attract minorities it is a good idea to advertise job openings outside the mainstream media and put them into the ethnic media. The conference board finding related to culture was of significance because organizations which implement interviewer training considered it a particularly effective measure in raising employment levels for designated groups.

I have made it clear that employment equity is not about introducing discrimination. It is not about reverse discrimination in the workplace. Rather, employment equity is about providing opportunities by removing barriers and establishing policies and programs to address the needs of designated member groups.

[Translation]

Employment equity is about including everyone, not excluding certain individuals.

[English]

No one should be excluded from access to employment opportunities for reasons unrelated to competence, for reasons unrelated to ability. That is what Bill C–64 is all about and that is why I stand to support it today.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the comments of my colleague opposite regarding the legislation, in particular his comment in our other official language which I thought was very well done. While I appreciated the language I sure have a problem with the content.

It is interesting the minister opposite just finished talking about how the employment equity legislation has fairness as its cornerstone, has no quotas and has to do with providing opportunity, not providing opportunity to people specifically because of their race, their gender or the colour of their skin.

Let me read into the record from the employment equity guide of the Department of Justice some of the non–quota targets. The heading of the chart is "New Employment Equity Targets". They are not quotas. They are targets. The legislation will make these targets into quotas because it has penalties for companies that do not meet the target requirements. Somehow that seems like it could be a quota. As a matter of fact the legislation repealing the Ontario employment equity act of 1993 which the Government of Ontario is using is the job quotas repeal act. It is strange, is it not?

In any event I will quote from the employment equity targets in a Department of Justice document: "Women by occupational category, promotions 93 per cent; aboriginal people, promotions 1.7 per cent; persons with disabilities, 2.8 per cent; and visible minorities, 2.7 per cent".

• (1340)

I will continue: "Recruitment for aboriginal peoples, 2.2 per cent; persons with disabilities, 2 per cent; visible minorities, 4.4 per cent. Recruitment for women, 43.8 per cent; administrative, 39.9 per cent; technical, 49.3 per cent".

I ask the minister opposite whether these numbers that are targets have the force of law behind them and a penalty for non–compliance through the equity police of up to $50,000 if companies are not in compliance. What are they? Are they quotas or targets? If this is not a quota, what is?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before giving the floor to the hon. minister I advise the House we have now passed five hours of debate at third reading of the bill. From here forward members will have 10 minutes without questions or comments when we resume debate on the bill.

Mr. Eggleton: Mr. Speaker, numerical targets have long been established as part of employment equity programs. They are not quotas. It is not the same as the American system where they are obligated to try to reach certain numbers. They become goals; they become objectives. However for various reasons they may not be able to be met. If an honest try or an honest effort is made and they cannot be met, there are no fines involved in that.

It is expected that an organization will take a look at its composition to see how it relates to the workforce in general and will take some measures to try to have a balanced workforce. That is what we are trying to do here. We do not have that at the moment.

In terms of aboriginal peoples, people with disabilities and visible minorities, they are under–represented in the federal workforce. They are under–represented in the federally regulated companies that are also part of the legislation. We have greater numbers in the workforce. They are having a hard time getting into the system.

The bill is all about giving them the opportunity to get to the door. On their own merit they still have to make it into the job. None of that has changed in terms of the principle that guides the employment service act of the federal public service.

Targets become a goal and objective. I am sorry the member does not understand that. It has long been established. I can remember when I was mayor of Toronto that we established those kinds of goals. Sometimes we made them and sometimes we did not but there were reasons why we did not. People put out the best effort they possibly could.

Over time we make progress. It will not happen overnight, particularly now that we are into downsizing. It takes more time to reach the goals. It helps us to focus without getting into quotas, without in any way abandoning the merit principle. It does not relate to the province of Ontario legislation which it has now decided for whatever reasons to repeal. This is not the same kind of legislation at all. This clearly upholds the principle of merit.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it was rather ironic that the President of the Treasury Board would stand to tell us that this is always about merit. When we think back to his nomination we think of the fight he had. He was picked by the Prime Minister to fight the election in his riding rather than having to go through the competition of a real nomination process so that he could demonstrate to his constituents that he deserved their merit by winning the nomination.

I would like to ask a question of the President of the Treasury Board. If he is to try to achieve these quotas or targets that he speaks about—he can choose his word—basically he can influence only two opportunities in the make–up of the federal civil service: first, when people are hired and second, when people are fired. He has no control over those who go of their own volition.

Does the President of the Treasury Board intend to advance the civil service toward achieving the targets he talks about through the early departure incentive program, through the early retirement incentive program, where he will end up with a different ratio or mix in the civil service as we advance toward the numbers and targets he has set out?

• (1345)

When he and Treasury Board go through this exercise of downsizing, are those who dominate the civil service at this time likely to find a pink slip on their desks because he wants to move toward achieving the targets that he has set out?

Mr. Eggleton: Mr. Speaker, the nomination process in York Centre has nothing to do with employment equity goals. However, I have fought and won a lot more elections than the hon. member has ever even thought about, some 11 of them. In this past election the people of York Centre gave me a plurality of somewhere over 20,000. I won every single poll. The voters of York Centre spoke quite well, as they have in most parts of the country, by electing a very solid Liberal majority government to represent every aspect of the country, not just some portion of it.

With respect to the downsizing, we are not being detracted in terms of the employment equity goals by that. It is obvious that a lot of people in those four target groups are going to be part of the downsizing. Given that we operate on the merit principle would indicate the reverse order of merit as being paramount in that case.

The situation is being monitored very carefully to try to maintain the numbers as best we can. After all, we do not have enough aboriginal people, the disabled, or people who are in the visible minority groups, as well as women in executive groups. Therefore, I do not want to make the situation any worse if we can help it by staying within the principles of merit which the Reform Party keeps telling us we should. We are monitoring the situation carefully.

I am pleased to say that as a result of the report issued last week by Treasury Board, of the over 8,000 positions that had been removed, there has been no change of that balance. In fact in some of the groups a little bit less has been reduced. The one exception to that would be people with disabilities. This would be largely because a number of them are going out under the early retirement incentive, people who are closer to retirement age perhaps, more than disabilities, but those are people who are taking a very conscious, positive decision about leaving.

I am very pleased to say that of the over 8,000 people who are gone and in particular those who were in the indeterminate or permanent positions, none of them went involuntarily. They all went voluntarily. That shows we are trying to treat people who are departing the public service in a fair and humane way, as well as those who continue to stay to operate the programs and services.

After all, we have to bring about that reduction. We do not particularly like it. The hon. member is critical of it but, at the same time, he and his party are critical of the deficit. This is all part of getting our fiscal house in order and reducing the deficit. We are treating people in a very fair and reasonable way. We are keeping a very close eye on our employment equity goals at the same time.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak about Bill C–64 dealing with employment equity.

Equity is one of the most important things that Canadians should, and I believe do, stand for. However, there is a major difference between the equity being proposed by the government and the equity Canadians would like to see.

I think back to the pioneer days and the days the west was developed because I am from St. Albert just outside Edmonton. Equity back in those days was opportunity. If we are going to talk about equity we should always talk about opportunity rather than results. Tens of thousands of people came to this country, and still do, for the opportunity to succeed, the opportunity to prosper and the opportunity to make the mark that would have been denied them in other countries. That is the type of equity I believe Canadians want.

Through the hard work of pioneers, they built a country of which we are proud. They built a country that recognizes the equality of all our citizens. That is one of the great platforms of the Reform Party. It says we are not into hyphenated Canadians. There is only one kind of Canadian and that is the ordinary Canadian who works hard and makes the country work.

• (1350)

A letter on employment equity appeared in the Edmonton Journal a few weeks ago. In some ways one might think it superficially drew the situation out to the extreme. It talked about the hypothetical situation of an Olympics with men and women being equal. Of course 51 per cent of race winners would have to be women and 49 per cent men. How would that be achieved? By putting weights on the legs of the men and so on. While the point is ridiculous there is a moral to this story. To have equality of results, somebody has to be penalized. That is the point I want to drive home. To have equality of results the obvious winners have to be penalized in order to allow others to win their share.

Our position is that rather than penalize the winners, we should do our best to give everybody the opportunity to win through education. It is education that determines whether or not someone is going to succeed. It is not because they are black or white, or male or female, or handicapped or crippled, or whatever. The point is if they are educated they have a chance to succeed.

Last week, a study was released which indicated that of the top 10 per cent of income earners in this country the vast majority attributed education to their success, not who they were, not what they were, not their family background, not whether they came from a rich background. Education was the dominant factor which determined whether they were able to succeed or not. That is why the House should focus on making sure people have the opportunity to succeed through education, not by introducing quotas that will penalize those who have the desire to succeed, those who have the willingness to work hard to succeed, those who go far beyond the others and want to succeed. Why hold them back? Unfortunately that is the nature of the government's way of doing things.

We want to ensure we can get back to the days where hard work is equal to prosperity rather than having it guaranteed by government legislation.

If failure is to be eliminated, as this legislation tries to do in many ways, it comes at a cost. The cost of eliminating failure is equal to the price of success. If we do not let some people succeed because we want no one to fail, then we will bring everyone down to the lowest common denominator. We saw what happened in eastern Europe in Russia. They refused to allow anyone to succeed and the whole country failed.

While this legislation is but one small piece along that road, Reform Party members feel that Canadians will be far better pleased and a lot more confident that this country can dig itself out of the hole if those who have the will to succeed are allowed to move ahead and help the rest of us and to provide education to those who need to get their feet on the ladder.

I have a constituent who has been in to see me several times. He would like to be a Mountie. In the west the Mounties are a revered police institution. Everybody knows the Mounties. They are known throughout the world as that great Canadian police force. They are recognized and revered around the world.

This constituent wants to be a Mountie. Every year he does 600 hours of volunteer police work with the RCMP. He sat the exams and met the minimum standards. He has a university education. The only thing that stops him from being a Mountie is the fact that he is a white male. Other family members are in the force. He would dearly love to be in the force but because he is a white male he cannot be what he dreams to be. That is because this government brings in what it calls targets, which I call quotas, and denies someone who would be a first class policeman. We have denied him his dream.

• (1355)

That is why we have to recognize that this legislation is out to lunch and the fact that we need to build people up, not hold them down.

This past week while we have been away I attended three graduation ceremonies in my riding. At a couple of them I presented the Governor General's award. I had an opportunity to talk to people about education. I cannot encourage them enough because in this complex and technological age we live in we need all the education we can get.

If we tell people that it does not matter how much education you have, how much motivation you have, how much will you have to succeed because you just happen to be in the wrong category, then we are sending the wrong message to young people and we have received the wrong message from the people who built this country. In many ways that is part of the reason we are so far in debt. We have lost our way and that is a great shame.

In an earlier debate the member from Beaver River talked about the fact that this legislation is going to be forced on businesses, forced on the civil service, but the House of Commons is exempt. Why would the House of Commons be exempt? Why would we in typical fashion tell the people to not do as we do but just do as we say?

This is why the Reform Party is totally opposed to this legislation. I would gladly support anything the government would do to ensure that education became the reason for equity.

The Speaker: It being 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

[English]

ROYAL MINT

Mr. Elijah Harper (Churchill, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the member for Churchill, the polar bear capital of Canada, I would like to commend the Royal Mint for choosing the polar bear to appear on the back of our new $2 coin.

In addition to being a distinctly Canadian symbol of strength, the polar bear also represents one of Manitoba's best known tourist attractions. I would like to invite all members of this House and all Canadians to come north to Churchill and see for themselves the inspiration for Canada's newest coin.

* * *

[Translation]

QUEBEC ECONOMY

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, according to this morning's Le Devoir, the American computer industry giant, Ameridata, intends to increase its share of the Quebec market, regardless of the outcome of the referendum. The president of Ameridata Canada, Jan Kaminski, stated that the company was in business, and the results of the referendum were of little importance.

The Toronto firm Falconbridge is not worried about the outcome of the referendum either. It has just announced an investment of $500 million in Quebec. Mr. Pugsley, the president of a subsidiary of Falconbridge, summarized the situation by saying that the company has been doing business in Quebec for 50 years, it was a good place to do business and, as far as the company was concerned, it was business as usual.

Some businesses are responding to the campaign of fear being waged by Mr. Johnson and the no side by deciding to invest.

* * *

[English]

CANADA VOLUNTEER AWARD CERTIFICATE OF MERIT

Mr. Hugh Hanrahan (Edmonton—Strathcona, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, as the member of Parliament for Edmonton—Strathcona, I was very pleased to learn that Mrs. Therese Chicoine, a constituent, has been selected to receive the Canada Volunteer Award Certificate of Merit. This certificate is awarded each year to recognize those who have made valuable voluntary contributions toward improving the health and social well–being of their fellow citizens.

Mrs. Chicoine is a key player in both the administration and the delivery of the emergency services response team of the Canadian Red Cross Society. She was also instrumental in the establishment of the unrelated bone marrow donor clinic. Her list of volunteer achievements seems endless and is a testament to Canada.

I know that my hon. colleagues would like to take this opportunity to congratulate Mrs. Therese Chicoine on her award.

* * *

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY CONVENTION

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I am very proud today to stand in the House on behalf of the NDP caucus to extend warm congratulations to our new leader, Alexa McDonough.

Alexa was elected at the NDP convention held this weekend in Ottawa. Over 1,800 delegates along with 1,000 visitors and guests joined together to boost the NDP on their road to renewal.

We give notice to the Liberals and the Reform Party that New Democrats across the country are rising up in solidarity and unity to fight against their demolition of medicare and other social programs and are renewing our efforts for jobs and fair taxation for Canadians.

With our new leader, Alexa McDonough, Canadians have a reinvigorated voice to hold this government accountable for the destructive measures it is inflicting on Canadians. Canadians do have a choice. It is to join us in recovering a more caring and sharing Canada and reclaiming Canada for Canadians.

* * *

BREAST CANCER

Ms. Jean Augustine (Etobicoke—Lakeshore, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, October is Breast Cancer Awareness Month, a time for all of us to remember that in 1995 an estimated 17,700 Canadian women will be diagnosed with breast cancer and 5,400 will die from this terrible disease.

The leading cause of cancer deaths among women, breast cancer can be eradicated through education, awareness, good health, and with the support of our community. The collaboration of survivors, health professionals, and governments must also continue in order to address breast cancer issues and to ultimately find a cure.

Chances are we have all known someone who has had breast cancer. I therefore invite you to visit the Canadian breast cancer memorial tribute this week in the foyer of the House of Commons. With this memorial we will remember the many Canadian women who have battled courageously but have lost to this disease. In their memory we must continue to provide support to those who are fighting for their lives.

* * *

WOMAN ENTREPRENEUR OF THE YEAR

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to an award that was presented on the weekend to the woman entrepreneur of the year. This award is an initiative of the University of Toronto Faculty of Management and it counts organizations such as the Financial Post among its sponsors.

For the category of international competitiveness, my constituent, friend, and client, Paula Lishman, was the recipient. I have known Paula for many years. Her intuitive designs in reversible furs are respected throughout the world.

Paula exemplifies the fight of small and medium sized businesses, and women in particular in the country to get established and win the confidence of the financial community. Trading internationally and creating meaningful jobs in Durham and in Canada have been the results of her efforts. I know about her struggles because I was her accountant and sat with her on the other side of many bank managers' desks.

Paula's perseverance in the face of adversity is a lesson for all small and medium sized business operators. I am proud and happy that Paula Lishman has earned the recognition she so justly deserves.

• (1405)

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S AWARDS

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that I am joined by all members of the House in paying tribute to the six outstanding women who are the recipients of the 1995 Governor General's awards in commemoration of the Persons case, which were presented this morning at Rideau Hall.

We recognize Marthe Asselin Vaillancourt of Jonquière, Quebec for her continuing efforts to prevent violence against women, children, and the elderly.

We recognize Dr. May Cohen of Burlington, Ontario for her leadership and pioneering work in the field of women's health.

We recognize Dr. Ruth Flowers of Makkovik, Labrador for her community activism and dedication to improving the quality of women's lives.

We recognize Sheila Kingham of Victoria, British Columbia for her belief in the power of collective action and her tireless advocacy on behalf of rural women.

We recognize Carolyn G. Thomas of Dartmouth, Nova Scotia for her courage as a human rights activist.

We recognize Alice E. Tyler of Edmonton, Alberta for her promotion of women's advancement through her art.

Our congratulations from this House go to these remarkable women who have each contributed substantially to the furtherance of women's equality.

The Speaker: Would these outstanding women please rise in the House. We would like to recognize you.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

* * *

[Translation]

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Jean Landry (Lotbinière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada is inundating us with subliminal advertising in the midst of the referendum campaign, which is not a problem for Radio–Canada. The no side's messages state that the sovereignist leaders are claiming to be the only real Quebecers, when in fact they have never said such a thing. And yet, Radio–Canada is airing this message.

However, the message of the yes side showing how the federal government has systematically refused to listen to Quebec's demands is not acceptable. Radio–Canada suddenly remembers its advertising standards and refuses to air this message. This decision is incomprehensible and surprises even the Telecaster Committee, which approves its broadcast.

The truth is that the yes side's message was so effective government officials demanded it be rejected. This is the behaviour of a side in a panic and with nothing to offer Quebec.

* * *

[English]

GRANTS AND CONTRIBUTIONS

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the government has lost control of the public purse. Once again I stand in the House to ask the Liberal government why it does not practise fiscal restraint in these tough economic times.

While the government refuses to allow Parliament to reduce public expenditures, it continues to curry favour by handing out $11 billion in grants and contributions largely without the knowledge of the Canadian public.

I have published the first issue of my waste report which highlights some of these expenditures, many of which cannot be justified. Examples are: United Steel Workers of America, $108,000; Canadian Labour Congress, $10,000; Canadian Chamber of Commerce, $4.5 million.

The Reform Party advocates eliminating all funding to special interest groups and sees no reason why $11 billion in grants and contributions cannot be cut at least in half.

* * *

[Translation]

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Paul DeVillers (Simcoe North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, to compensate for the weakness of his separatist arguments, the leader of the Bloc Quebecois decided yesterday to resort to drastic measures. He stated, and I quote: "There is something magical about a yes vote. With a wave of our magic wand, we will stir up a feeling of solidarity among Quebecers".

The leader of the Bloc Quebecois has just traded his pilgrim's staff for an all–powerful magic wand to convince the people to vote in favour of Quebec's separation. This silly statement by the separatist leader is a good indication of how desperate the yes side is two weeks before the referendum.

The way things are going, it would not be surprising to see the separatist leaders criss–crossing Quebec astride witches' brooms before the campaign is over.

* * *

QUEBEC ECONOMY

Mr. Benoît Serré (Timiskaming—French River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is an article in today's La Presse about a study done by the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington on the economic impact of Quebec's separation and its effect on existing trade agreements.

The author of the study starts out by announcing that an independent Quebec would have none of the rights and obligations resulting from Canada's membership in several trade agreements with the U.S. including NAFTA, the World Trade Organization and the Auto Pact. A Quebec separated from Canada would have to negotiate access to all these treaties.

• (1410)

This study confirms what our Minister of Finance recently said. An independent Quebec will have to renegotiate all international treaties it is already a part of because of its status as a Canadian province.

The price to be paid for the separatist obsession is much too high and, on October 30, the people of Quebec will say no.

* * *

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition has suggested that magic powers would help bring Quebecers together again after the referendum.

He told participants in a meeting at a CEGEP: "There is something magical about a yes vote. With a wave of our magic wand, we will stir up a feeling of solidarity among Quebecers. They will no longer be divided into sovereignists and federalists, and I will be confident of negotiating on behalf of all Quebecers". Abracadabra, says the opposition leader.

We are pleased to see that the separatist leader is now taking an interest in what comes after the referendum, when the magic vanishes. Of course, we would like him, with his magic wand, to have the same attitude and preach the same virtues of reconciliation the day after a no victory.

* * *

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, last week, Senator Jacques Hébert displayed an unspeakable lack of respect for Quebec women, in calling political scientist Josée Legault a "separatist cow".

By heaping such abuse on women with convictions, Mr. Hébert once again shows them that the Liberal Party of Canada and the no side would not be able to meet their expectations in any way after October 30. The number of women in favour of a sovereign Quebec is growing day after day, and rude remarks like these can only strengthen them in their decision.

Mr. Hébert, a member of the Liberal Party of Canada and the government whip in the Senate, must publicly apologize to women in Quebec, and take back his offensive comments.

* * *

[English]

THE SENATE

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Reform Party presented its new confederation proposals, 20 measures to modernize and decentralize Canada.

One of the proposed changes is to the Senate of Canada. All future appointments to the Senate would be made by means of elections based on the model of the 1989 Alberta Senate selection process.

Stan Waters made Canadian history twice on this day, October 16, 1989. He was the first elected senator in Canada and he was the first Reform Party member to sit in the Senate. His passing in September 1991 left that seat vacant and the Prime Minister filled it with a typical patronage appointment.

Canadians are tired of this old Liberal lament that we hear time and time again that because the Charlottetown accord failed Canada can never have an elected Senate. I say bunk. It has already happened in Alberta. It can happen in every province in Canada.

I know traditional parties will not want to see the house of patronage disappear. Where would they put the old boys and girls like the last four Liberals appointed to the Senate? I know where they should go. They should be put out to pasture.

The 21st century is coming. Let us democratize and have an elected Senate.

* * *

[Translation]

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on October 14, the leader of the official opposition said: "Do you think it makes sense that we have so few children in Quebec? We are one of the races of whites with the least children".

What does the colour of the children born in Quebec have to do with the referendum campaign?

First, several members of the yes side suggested that non French speaking Quebec residents would not have the same rights as those of French origin, and now the Bloc leader is raising the issue of race and colour.

Quebecers are not racists. They are well acquainted with the values of tolerance, social harmony and justice, and they will vote no on October 30.

Oral Questions

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette-Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, over the last few days, the Bloc Quebecois leader decided to focus his campaign on women. However, the message that he is sending to Quebec women is dubious to say the least.

The Bloc leader said: "Do you think it makes sense that we have so few children in Quebec? We are one of the races of whites with the least children. It doesn't make sense. This means that we have not solved family issues".

This statement by the official opposition leader is totally unacceptable and is also an insult to the freedom of choice which Quebec women have been exercising for years regarding motherhood.

• (1415)

The opposition leader is sadly mistaken if he thinks that, in a separated Quebec, women will readily comply with the demographic demands of the government. Separation will not be achieved on the back of Quebec women. On October 30, they will vote no.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in desperation, Daniel Johnson mentioned a commitment made in 1992 by the Liberal Party of Canada to recognize the distinct identity of Quebec, in an attempt to convince himself that the political will for constitutional change exists. However, on September 11 this year, the Prime Minister of Canada told him, and I quote: "Distinct society—we are distinct, no need to put it in the Constitution. When you look at me and hear me speak English, you know I am distinct".

My question is directed to the Prime Minister. I want to ask him whether he intends to remind Mr. Johnson that the federal government has no intention of amending the Constitution to recognize the distinct identity of Quebec, as he himself, the Prime Minister of Canada, said on September 11 this year.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, twice Canadians have been asked to vote on this. I remember the distinct society was part of the Charlottetown accord. I voted for the accord, Mr. Speaker. The Leader of the Opposition voted against it. The leader of the Bloc Quebecois voted against it. The members of the Parti Quebecois voted against it. Jacques Parizeau did. We were in favour of the accord.

They voted against it, but today they want it back. I think that is a little ridiculous. As we said before, today the issue is not the Constitution. Today we have to answer a question put by the Leader of the Opposition and his former leader, the Premier of Quebec, about whether we should separate.

When asked the question: "Should we separate?", the people of Quebec will say no. Today we are not talking about the Constitution but about answering the question put by the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, so constitutional change is not important enough to discuss at a time when it happens to be the focus of the debate on the future of Quebec. That is rather strange.

The Prime Minister just referred to Charlottetown. He knows perfectly well that the Canada clause made recognition of Quebec's distinct identity devoid of all substance by subordinating this recognition to the fundamental principle of provincial equality.

I want to ask him: Would he confirm that because of the sacrosanct principle of provincial equality, he refuses to recognize Quebec as a distinct society, as he is being asked to do today, alas in vain, by Mr. Johnson who will not learn the lessons of Meech and Charlottetown?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Johnson voted for the distinct society in the Charlottetown referendum, while the Leader of the Opposition voted against the distinct society when we had a referendum. Mr. Parizeau voted against the distinct society when we had a referendum. Funny how they have changed their minds today. Why did they not consider what they were doing at the time?

They wanted to vote against the accord so they could go on complaining and then have a referendum on separation. We will have one two weeks from today, when people will answer the question on the separation of Quebec from the rest of Canada. The people of Quebec know that their future is about remaining full members of the federation of this great country, Canada.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister voted for Charlottetown, it was because recognition of Quebec's distinct identity did not mean a thing. That is why he voted in favour of the accord and that is why we are going to vote against it.

I want to ask the Prime Minister how he expects Quebecers to trust him after what he did the day after the no in 1980, when he did a job on Quebec by isolating it and imposing a constitution that Quebec still refuses to sign.

• (1420)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition likes to talk about the past. I have nothing to hide. At the time we were, legally speaking, a colony of Great Britain, and we had to patriate the Constitution. We had no Charter of Rights and Freedoms in Canada, something we wanted to have. The Constitution at the time did not include the recognition of French and English as Canada's two official languages, which was done in 1980, fifteen years ago.

The country has continued to progress, while he is still back in 1980 and we are heading for the 21st century, and he says he has the answer, the magic wand. You wave the magic wand and poof, the studies commissioned by Le Hir vanish into thin air; another wave, and all the risks of separation disappear; another, and the concerns of everyone, from the Prime Minister of Canada to the leaders of other countries, are no more. And then suddenly, another wave and Mr. Parizeau, the leader of the no side, has vanished.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Clearly short of arguments to defend the federalist cause, Liberal Senator Jacques Hébert, government whip in the Senate, used coarse, derogatory and unacceptable language in describing political scientist Josée Legault as a separatist cow.

Will the Prime Minister publicly dissociate himself from this inappropriate remark by his old friend Jacques Hébert and will he offer an apology, on behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada, to the women who have been offended by it?

The Speaker: My dear colleague, the government's administrative responsibilities do not extend to the Senate. I would ask my hon. colleague to rephrase the question, which will perhaps be acceptable.

Mrs. Venne: Mr. Speaker, given the unacceptable nature of this remark and the responsibilities of the senator, who was appointed by the Prime Minister to perform official duties, I am asking the Prime Minister whether he will relieve him of his duties.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond.

The Speaker: Just a minute. I will allow the question, and the Prime Minister will be able to answer it.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if this remark was made, I deplore it. That is all I can say. I was not present. I am told it was made in a private conversation. It was not said publicly, but if it was made, I deplore it.

Everyone makes mistakes, perhaps the senator made one here. I have also made mistakes. This senator has faithfully served Parliament and Quebec society. He may have made a mistake—it happens—I regret it.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we are not talking about deploring a remark, we are talking about dissociating oneself from it.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: The hon. member for Saint–Hubert, on a supplementary question.

Mrs. Venne: Thank you Mr. Speaker. This is not a matter of deploring a remark, it is a matter of dissociating oneself from it, and this is what we are asking the Prime Minister to do today. Will he dissociate himself from the remark Senator Hébert made about Ms Legault?

• (1425)

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would much prefer the apology come from Lucien Bouchard for his racist and sexist remarks—

[English]

The Speaker: We do not usually address each other by name in the House in our comments. I find the language is getting a little strong. The hon. member for Macleod.

* * *

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the health minister has failed in her bid to squash semi–private clinics in Canada. Two of the largest provinces just ignore her and four provinces have bluntly said no to decreased medicare funding and no to longer waiting lines.

However, it is never too late to operate co–operatively. We call on the minister to put aside her silly squabbles. We call on her to work with the provinces toward health care reform which puts patients rather than bureaucrats first.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Health is defending something voted on by the House of Commons, the five principles in the Canada Health Act.

We all agree with her that these principles have to be protected. Unlike the Reform Party, we do not want a two tier system. However, at the same time she has agreed to talk about some specific problems with the provinces in order for them to operate in a way that is completely acceptable according to the principles of medicare. She has the support of this whole party.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister wants specifics. Maybe he will listen to the patients on waiting lists throughout the country. The cardiac waiting lists in Canada today are longer than they have ever been in history. Why? They have no choice. The minister offers no choice and no alternative.

Does the minister have anything to say to Canadians on waiting lists other than "just line up and shut up"?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that administration occurs on a daily basis and discussions on how to operate medical services within the provinces are completely provincial responsibilities. We are not running hospitals. They are run by provincial governments.

However, it is very difficult for me to understand that these people are always complaining that we should not spend money and should cut all the time but then they want us to increase payments to the provinces. I would like the member to say so and by how much. I will listen to him.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister continues to say we do not need more money in the system, but how much less do we need?

This rigid centralist solution will not work. This kind of government is why we are in so much trouble with health care and indeed with Quebec.

The provinces know this edict on semi–private clinics will not work. I call on the Prime Minister to abandon this approach. When will the Prime Minister join the provinces in real reform, real health care reform?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have established a forum on that. We have experts operating under my leadership on how to reform medicare. We have a problem with that in Canada. I recognize that. We included in our red book that it was to be reviewed. We have formed a committee of experts listening to the views of Canadians.

However in the meantime, and we said it very clearly, we have to reduce the cost of medicare from what it is today, 10 per cent of GDP, to around 9 per cent. It will be done although it will not be easy.

The provincial governments are also doing their share. They are cutting and we have to benefit a bit from their cuts because the federal government has deficit problems. Some provinces cut $500 million so we must have the right to cut in relative terms if we want a balanced situation in Canada. We are having ongoing discussions with the provinces on this. I am happy to know that the Reform Party does not want us to spend more money on it.

* * *

• (1430)

[Translation]

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the no side shows how desperate it is when it distorts, the way it just did, the comments I made on Saturday, by claiming they were sexist.

I want to ask the Prime Minister whether he would agree, as I said on Saturday, that the government must provide the right socio–economic conditions so that couples who want children and have none because they cannot afford it, would be able to have them?

I want to ask the Prime Minister whether he would agree that we must create the right socio–economic conditions so that couples who want children can afford to have them? I want to ask him whether he would agree that we must give them that option by creating conditions that will help them develop both their own and their children's potential?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think the Leader of the Opposition is trying to do some damage control, considering the terrible blunder he made when he implied that since we are in Quebec, we are white. He then implied that Quebec—

You know, what is disturbing about the comments of the Leader of the Opposition is that to be a good Quebecer, it is better to be white than coloured and it is certainly better to speak French than English. If you are a separatist, you are a good Quebecer; if you are a federalist, you are not. If you happen to be a woman, maybe you should have more children.

This is a matter of personal choice for every woman. We may be in favour of certain policies in this respect but they should not be connected with race and with relationships that deny the equal status of men and women in society.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is simply appalling that a Prime Minister should stoop to distorting comments to such an extraordinary degree. This is intolerable. Everybody knows there is a problem with the birth rate in Quebec and that it concerns all governments. Everyone knows that in Quebec many couples, and we all know people like that, would like to have children but cannot afford to.

So I want to ask him whether he does not realize that we will have to introduce appropriate measures for financial support, measures to make day care available to everyone, and I want to ask him whether he realizes that by threatening to cut social programs as he has started to do and will continue to do more and more after the no, he ignores the needs and interests of women and married couples?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, since I am being accused of misquoting the Leader of the Opposition, I will read to you what he said: "Do you think it makes sense that we have so few children in Quebec? We are one of the white races that has the least children. That does not make sense". Are Quebecers members of the white race? There are Quebecers of every colour and every religion.

Is the decision to have children the responsibility of the government and women themselves? That is where the Leader of the Opposition made a blunder, and he made it clear where he is coming from when he talks about these problems.

* * *

[English]

SOMALIA INQUIRY

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, both the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence have said that they want to get to the bottom of the events in Somalia. They have pledged to act after the commission of inquiry submits its report.

However, section 69 of the National Defence Act requires that a trial for most services offences must begin within three years of the alleged offence. Because the commission is not scheduled to report until June 1996, it seems that discipline and leadership failings of late 1992 and early 1993 will go untried.

Was the minister aware of this limitation when he called the inquiry? How exactly does he plan to get to the bottom of events if charges cannot even be laid?

• (1435)

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the government is fully aware of the provisions of the National Defence Act with respect to the statute of limitations on non–indictable offences. I am sure the commission on Somalia is also well aware of it.

With respect to the question on charges, we do not presume that further charges are to be laid, but we do not preclude it either. I would ask the hon. member and his party to let the commission do its job and we will do our job in government. Then we will have justice served.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this Liberal government took a year to announce a public inquiry. It was almost another full year before the inquiry began to hear witnesses.

Last November I asked the minister to suspend the courts martial and proceed immediately with the inquiry. He refused. How can this minister explain to the Canadian public that because of his delays justice will be denied by a technicality?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, unlike the Reform Party, we have a profound respect for the justice system in this country.

The hon. member is fully aware that we were precluded from calling the inquiry because there were courts martial in progress and then subsequently there were appeals. Until we had the Westray mine decision of the supreme court in May of this year, we could not have started a commission without risking having the charges quashed of people currently on trial.

If I had done what the hon. member advocated we do and people who have subsequently been charged and convicted were then not subject to the justice system, he would be the first one yelling and screaming in the House of Commons that somehow the government was responsible for the denial of justice.

* * *

[Translation]

ELECTIONS CANADA

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, a common thread runs through the Prime Minister's entire political career. Every time Quebec wanted to assert itself, he has stood in its way. We just learned that Elections Canada has initiated the whole process required for holding a Canada–wide referendum. This is probably not a spontaneous initiative by Elections Canada.

Are we to understand that the Prime Minister is refusing to recognize Quebecers' verdict in the referendum and getting ready to hold a Canada–wide referendum in order to overturn the democratic decision of Quebecers?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I did not speak to the Chief Electoral Officer. If he has decided to set the whole machinery in motion, an election will certainly be held within two or three years. For the moment, my only goal is the one we all share: winning the referendum in two weeks.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, since the Prime Minister can see that it is less and less likely that he will win the referendum in Quebec, I ask him again: Does he realize that by staying extremely vague on the Elections Canada manoeuvres, he is raising doubts as to his democratic intentions?

I ask him again: Does the Prime Minister reject the idea of holding a referendum in order to counter the democratic decision Quebecers will make in two weeks?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Chief Electoral Officer reports directly to the House of Commons. All the hon. member has to do is call and ask him why he is getting ready to hold an election. An election can be called any day. I could get up tomorrow morning and call an election.

That is a prime minister's privilege.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): You should at least be here for another two weeks because you would not be coming back.

Call the Chief Electoral Officer and ask him. As far as I am concerned, the referendum is what we are working on at this time. We did not need to get rid of the leader of the no side. Mr. Johnson is doing an excellent job. We did not have to change our strategy because we are clearly telling citizens that all statements by the Leader of the Opposition or the so–called structures he might develop by negotiating with God knows whom— We are simply telling Quebecers that these people are separatists who do not have the courage of their convictions and who are trying to sell them something they do not want to buy.

* * *

• (1440)

[English]

GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last May when the justice minister was attempting to justify the Liberal patronage appointments that his revenue minister wanted for Vancouver Island crown counsel positions, he said that the sole criterion for their appointment was that of competence.

Well, their competence showed up last week when one of the Liberal appointees turned up in a Nanaimo court totally unprepared, incapable of proceeding, and a serious drug case was thrown out. Is this the Liberal justice department's measure of competence?

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what the Minister of Justice said on these appointments still holds true.

The matter to which the hon. member refers is an incident where perhaps more through an administrative mix–up the new agent was unable to get the files for the court. It had nothing to do with the agent's competence. The matter is being looked into by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this particular case has been before the court since September 1993, a full two years.

In addition to this case, in Victoria last week another Liberal appointee turned up in the court unable to even qualify with an ordinary argument for law in the court. That case was thrown out.

In a second case in Victoria the crown prosecution witnesses turned up but surprisingly the crown prosecutor did not. That case was thrown out.

When is the justice department going to wake up?

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if the agent is unable to get the information and unable to get the files then the agent cannot do the job if the agent is not granted a postponement by the court. If this is the case, as I believe it may well be, then certainly there is nothing whatever to discredit the agent.

As I have said, the Minister of Justice is looking into this matter.

* * *

[Translation]

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. His department has speeded up citizenship processing in Quebec since the referendum campaign has begun. Never, in any recent provincial or federal election, had such an extensive operation been undertaken to issue certificates of citizenship. Because of this accelerated process, more than 15,000 new citizens will be able to vote in the upcoming referendum.

How can the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration justify this eagerness to expedite the processing of citizenship applications in Quebec, when his own officials have confirmed that never before had such an extensive operation been conducted just before an election anywhere in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what is being done with respect to citizenship processing in the province of Quebec leading up to the referendum is nothing different from any lead up to any provincial campaign.

My department has done likewise with the provinces of Manitoba, New Brunswick and Ontario. If we compare the number of citizenship processings with the year of the Ontario election, it is up some 45 per cent.

Is the hon. member suggesting that we should somehow slow down the process? Is the hon. member suggesting that it is not proper to have the persons exercise their democratic right to vote? Exactly what is his point?

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in my case it took one year to become a citizen, and the minister did not do that before the elections in Ontario and New Brunswick.

[Translation]

Will the minister admit that the explanation for his sudden concern for democracy can be found in the letter he sends all new citizens, asking them to help build a strong and united Canada.

[English]

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member is wrong on both counts.

The government does not assume how newcomers or immigrants will vote. Perhaps the party on the other side is assuming somehow that new immigrants will vote a different way from the intention of their party. That is not my business as minister of citizenship. My business is to ensure that people have the franchise to vote, whether it is in a referendum, a provincial election or a federal election. We make no apologies for that.

• (1445)

The member of Parliament accuses me of writing wrong letters to all the people who become new citizens. Let me quote from the former secretary of state in the preceding government, who is currently the leader of the Bloc Quebecois. He stated in the letter: "I wish to extend to you my personal congratulations and those of the Prime Minister on the occasion of your becoming a Canadian citizen. Your government is pleased that of all the nations of the world you have chosen Canada as your new home".

* * *

PORCUPINE CARIBOU

Mr. Gordon Kirkby (Prince Albert—Churchill River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the U.S. Congress is considering legislation to allow oil and gas development in the calving grounds of the Porcupine caribou herd in the Arctic national wildlife refuge in Alaska. An all–party report supported protecting the calving grounds of the herd which migrates between Yukon and Alaska.

Could the Minister of Foreign Affairs tell the House what the Canadian government has done to protect the calving grounds of the Porcupine caribou herd?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Canada has expressed its strong opposition to the congressional proposal. Indeed I wrote to Warren Christopher about the question. My colleague, the environment minister, also wrote to her counterpart. The Prime Minister has spoken to President Clinton.

We certainly hope the congressional proposal will be amended. If not, the president will exercise his veto.

* * *

FISHERIES

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

When the Liberals announced the Atlantic groundfish strategy in May 1994 they called it a program to end all programs. Significant funding was allocated to reduce industry capacity and for retraining.

The government has already siphoned money away from retraining. Last week the minister announced funding reductions to the $300 million buy back program, the heart of capacity reduction, because TAGS benefits are running unchecked resulting in a massive deficit.

Will the minister admit to the House and to the fishermen in Atlantic Canada that TAGS is in total chaos and will do nothing more than perpetuate income dependency?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will make no such admission.

The Reform Party really has to sort itself out. Its members spend most of their time calling for a total cancellation of the TAGS program, cancellation of all forms of unemployment insurance assistance and, if we read between the lines, cancellation of Atlantic Canada on most days.

The Liberal Party announced last week in consultation with my colleague, the Minister of Human Resources Development, the beginning of the early retirement component of that program for fishermen between the ages of 55 and 64, the first round of a licence retirement program. The Minister of Human Resources Development will proceed shortly with details on early retirement programs for plant workers.

We are well on our way to achieving our 50 per cent capacity reduction objective and we are on our way to rebuilding the Atlantic fishery for the long term.

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this is not our program; this is their program. They are not meeting their own targets.

Fishermen in Atlantic Canada tell me that TAGS has a $400 million projected deficit because, to be frank, just about anybody could qualify for benefits. One fish plant operator told me that one–third of his workforce left their jobs to go on TAGS. Another fisherman told me: "All you need to do to qualify for benefits is show up at a TAGS office wearing a pair of rubber fishing boots".

• (1450)

Will the minister admit that TAGS is an abject failure because it has been totally mismanaged and will now do almost nothing to reduce industry capacity?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is tragic when a member is on the job for a short period of time as a critic and then perpetuates certain rather destructive myths about a region of the country. "All you have to do to qualify for assistance is show up with a pair of rubber boots" is the kind of cruel and twisted humour that does nothing to solve the problems of Atlantic Canada.

The reality of the TAGS program is that 39,000 people qualified, but only 25,000 have actually taken assistance. The others have been able to find new kinds of work in the fishery or in other sectors. Fourteen thousand people who qualify based on the criteria have gone off to find a new start in their lives. Thousands more have entered training programs and many more thousands are now in the process of moving out of this industry and making a new beginning in their lives.

If the member really cared about Atlantic Canada, really cared about the fishery, he would take more than 60 seconds or a one–day visit to write a new prescription for the problems of the region and he would address the House with some sensitivity and with, frankly, some intelligence.

* * *

[Translation]

IMMIGRATION

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

The accelerated processing of citizenship applications during the Quebec referendum, an operation conducted only in Quebec, leaves very little time to carry out the security check required before Canadian citizenship can be granted.

How can the citizenship minister explain that, all of a sudden, during the Quebec referendum, the security checks required before applicants can become Canadian citizens, and eventually Quebec citizens, are four times faster than before?

[English]

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the deputy premier of Quebec, their soulmate, said:

[Translation]

"We must assume that the federal government is acting in good faith; the right to vote is sacred".

[English]

We are not taking shortcuts on the applications. The applications within the system are being processed. There is a view at the lead up of every provincial and federal election, including the referendum this time as well as in 1980, that if there is an ability to speed up the processing with the viewing of granting the franchise of the vote it will be done.

For instance, in the province of Ontario in the lead up to the provincial election in 1994, instead of the 72,000 people that were processed in 1993 there were 107,000 people processed or a 49 per cent increase.

In Manitoba, in New Brunswick and in the other provinces the same thing has happened. We are not questioning how people are likely to vote as a function of whether or not we process. It is a shame that party is doing just that.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister is misrepresenting what Minister Landry said. The right to vote is indeed sacred. It is precisely because it is sacred that all due diligence must be exercised to make sure that only qualified applicants are granted citizenship.

Can the minister give us any assurances that Immigration Canada is not skipping any crucial steps in granting Canadian citizenship to immigrants?

[English]

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have tried to tell my hon. friend and the critic for citizenship and immigration that everything is being done according to law and according to tradition; that is what we have been saying.

If she checks with her seatmate, the critic for immigration and citizenship, he criticized us in the past for moving too slowly on the applications. Now they are saying we are moving too fast. Which one is it?

* * *

• (1455)

CRIMINAL CODE

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last week in British Columbia two women were killed by their spouses after restraining orders had been issued for their abusive partners. They lived in fear for their lives and turned to the Canadian justice system for help and that system let them down.

Restraining orders are clearly not effective without more teeth to back them up. An electronic bracelet worn by the abusive partner would help alert a victim and police to the approaching danger.

Will the government introduce changes to the Criminal Code which would allow for greater use of electronic monitoring to help enforce restraining orders, peace bonds and protect victims of stalkers?

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, although tragic events such as the ones the hon. member has referred to do not happen in great numbers, any one event like that is one too many.

The Minister of Justice is looking into the particular situation to see how the Department of Justice can perhaps help.

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I remind the government that incidents where women are being killed by their abusive partners are not isolated.

In Calgary where my riding is located, four women in the last eight weeks have been killed by their estranged partners. Something needs to be done.

Does the government have a study in the works directed toward using modern technology to enhance the protection of citizens in these kinds of circumstances?

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is absolutely correct that any one incident of this type is one too many. Women killed by abusive partners are an occurrence that happens too frequently.

As I mentioned in my first answer, the Minister of Justice is looking into the situation and is looking into electronic bracelets. We are working with the solicitor general and other departments to find a meaningful way of drastically reducing these types of tragedies.

* * *

ATLANTIC INVESTMENT FUND

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works and Government Services.

I understand the details of the Atlantic investment fund are near completion and that provinces and banks are showing their support for the fund. Members of the third party may criticize the idea but Atlantic Canadians know the need for small business capital in our region.

Will the minister tell the House that he is going ahead with the Atlantic investment fund?

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member's long interest in the subject matter. He should be aware, as other House members ought to be aware, that Atlantic Canada is the only region of the country that does not have a venture capital fund.

With the co–operation of the four Atlantic premiers and the Government of Canada, the private sector including the chartered banks is in the process of coming together and consummating what will become known as the Atlantic venture capital fund.

For the benefit of the House, the particular fund has as its goal to assist small and medium size business and to increase the human infrastructure in that sector in Atlantic Canada. It will be governed, driven and operated by the private sector which has its roots and resides in Atlantic Canada.

* * *

[Translation]

COUNCIL FOR CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, thanks to a federal grant of at least $4 million, the Council for Canadian Unity is pursuing its massive registration of out of Quebec residents, under false representations. The council encourages these people to say that they intend to move back to Quebec within two years, even if it is not the case. The result is that over 15,000 out of Quebec residents have been registered, which is four times more than for last year's election, and which includes 4,000 duplicate listings.

How can the Prime Minister justify that the Council for Canadian Unity encourages thousands of people living outside Quebec to illegally get their names on the voters' list?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the council is indeed an organization that has received a grant from the government, but it also receives moneys from the private sector and it urges people who have the right to vote to get their names on the list.

• (1500)

It goes without saying that if the no side wins in two weeks, many people who moved out of Quebec will want to go back there. Thanks to its restored political stability, Quebec will become a very interesting place to live, and these people will be very happy to move back to our belle province.

* * *

[English]

JUSTICE

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the justice minister.

In the trial of Royer, the jury decided that Royer could form specific intent, that Royer was not extremely intoxicated and that Royer knew exactly what he was doing when he murdered Sharon Mohamed and attempted to murder Sharon's mother, Shadikan.

The government discussed and decided unanimously that drunkenness is not an excuse. When will it enforce the legislation that makes the final decision of a jury that hears all pertinent evidence final and will not allow an appointed body such as the supreme court to overrule the wishes of the people and the Parliament of Canada?

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the Royer case, the Supreme Court of Canada has now been asked to look at it. As this case is before the supreme court it would be improper to comment on it.

This case is different from the Daviault case in that this is a crime of specific intent whereas the Daviault case was a crime of general intent.

The Minister of Justice is looking at the possibility of acting as an intervener in this case if it goes before the Supreme Court of Canada.

* * *

HEALTH CARE

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

In opposition the Prime Minister opposed the Tory vision of health care. He opposed cuts to the transfer payments to the provinces and territories. He opposed Bill C–91 which has sent the prices of prescription drugs sky–rocketing. He said he would protect Canadian health care with more than just rhetoric.

Unfortunately some Canadians believed him but we have seen no changes to Bill C–91. We have seen reduced transfer payments. The real problems with health policy are Liberal government policies.

Will the Prime Minister stop letting the Minister of Finance set health policy, present a vision to Canadians and ensure stable funding for provinces and territories so we can have a truly national health care system?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly tell the Minister of Finance the member for Yukon is not very happy with him.

As the hon. member for Yukon has resigned as the leader of the NDP, I take this opportunity to congratulate her on behalf of everyone for having served her party and the House of Commons very well. As the leader of her party, her contributions were always of a very high level and extremely useful to the House of Commons. Of course I did not agree with her all the time and I did not expect her to agree with me all the time.

On behalf of everyone, I congratulate the member on a job well done.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

* * *

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

The Speaker: I wish to draw to your attention the presence in the gallery of His Excellency Jozef Skolc, President of the National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1505)

The Speaker: We also have present in the gallery a delegation of South African Provincial Speakers and Deputy Speakers.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Speaker: As a lead in to the tributes to the member for Yukon, I wish to draw to the attention of the House the presence in the gallery of Ms. Alexa McDonough, member of the Legislative Assembly of Nova Scotia and the new leader of the federal New Democratic Party.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

THE HON. AUDREY MCLAUGHLIN

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure today to pay tribute to the Hon. Audrey McLaughlin, an outstanding human being, a wonderful spokesperson in the interests of our society and always very measured but very convinced in her observations and in her remarks.

Audrey McLaughlin is one of the outstanding leaders and role models of Canadian politics and female politics. She has strengthened us all by her presence. She has been symbolic of all we are about and why and what we wish to achieve in terms of equality of opportunity, equality of access, equality by the very right of our competence our skills and our personalities. She is a woman who has all of those attributes.

In every way she symbolizes why we are all here. She has contributed in very significant ways to the changing of the tone and the substance of debate. That has been one of the most significant observations I could make as we shared the other side of this floor for many years. Audrey always had the ability to present her point of view in a very deliberate and measured way. She did not agree most often with the procedures of the House but she was never disagreeable in her approach to her point of view and expressing her firm conviction which she holds from depth of heart which becomes very obvious.

It was a privilege to have the Hon. Audrey McLaughlin on the trip we recently completed for the fourth annual conference in Beijing on women's issues. Her presence was a symbol to the host country as we travelled with four different parties representative of the diversity of this country, not only the diversity of political opinion but the diversity of our geography and the diversity of our people.

She is an eloquent spokesperson for the aboriginals of her region, the people who have elected her to the House; not only the aboriginals but certainly those she represents with such sincerity and depth of commitment to their interests and to their well–being. For this we owe her a very strong vote of thanks.

When Audrey would stand to make a speech or to pose a question she did it in a very holistic way. It was never with the finest of lenses, which I appreciate perhaps more than most. I like that approach because it puts an issue into the context of daily human life, of living. Living is so daily and, Audrey, you bring that to our attention so succinctly and effectively.

As a woman she is a trailblazer. In 1989 she became the first woman to lead a national political party in Canada, in fact in all of North America. Sixty–eight years after Agnes Macphail, the first woman was elected to the House of Commons. As a woman she bears the legacy of womanhood, having many and diverse roles which are rather in competition at many times. She is of course a politician but say she belies the phrase "you are too nice to be a politician".

• (1510)

She is a leader who brings with her and believes in sharing power and leadership and is a model to other women. We have stunning proof of that in the House, which you have just brought to our attention, Mr. Speaker. We all welcome Alexa McDonough as the new leader of the New Democratic Party. We wish her well as she takes on a very difficult and very trying role. I hope she does not find putting together both roles of politician and general citizen too difficult.

Audrey McLaughlin the activist has served on many boards and has brought a lot of interesting perspectives to these boards of directors. Audrey McLaughlin is also a mother with two children and it has taken the support of those children for her to be in the House. She has also been an outstanding daughter to her mother and we have all followed that with great heart.

On behalf of countless women and children across this land, we take our hats off to you, Audrey McLaughlin. We wish you well in your future.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add the voice of the official opposition to that of the government spokesperson in paying all of the honour that is due to Audrey McLaughlin as she moves from the life of an elected representative to the life of a private citizen.

I would like to tell her that we have all loved and admired her and that we will continue to show her all of the esteem she deserves. When I was on the opposition benches from 1990 to 1993, when the Bloc was not a recognized party, I had the opportunity, since I was in the same corner of the House, to work in close conjunction with Ms. McLaughlin as Leader of the Opposition. I must admit that I learned lessons from her which I try to put into practice daily.

I believe that we must acknowledge the work carried out by this great lady who is leaving the House of Commons for another life, a life in which I know she will be equally productive. We must tell her how much she will be missed. The social awareness she has shown in this House is something that has been building throughout her life. She came to politics from social work. She has worked in the health field, she has worked with children. When she spoke of those causes in the House she knew what she was talking about, and we sensed that in the sincerity of her speeches.

I would also like to remind people that she was the first woman leader of a major federal party. She has blazed a trail for others to follow. We must acknowledge that she has done a good job of doing so, for now another woman will be leading her party.

I do not wish to see her leave the House right away, but I know that the decision she has made to leave the leadership of a great party like the NDP was a very big decision. I hope she will remain extremely active in politics, for the party she has led which is now to be led by Ms. McDonough and in fact has been led by her since the weekend, is a party which represents in English Canada the values to which all of us in the Bloc Quebecois adhere, but which are not exclusive to the Bloc.

We know that social values are very important in English Canada, that English Canada fought long for them. There must therefore be a party in this House at all times to defend those values. I hope that party will be the NDP.

Again, allow me to repeat our regrets that Ms. McLaughlin has stepped down from the leadership of the New Democratic Party, and to wish her from all of us a long and active life. At any rate, we know that she will be following the excellent examples set by Stephen Lewis and Ed Broadbent before her.

[English]

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Reform Party I would also like to congratulate the member for Yukon.

We have sat together in the House for several years. Although we have all kinds of different political views, we also share many things and have a lot of things in common. We first came to the House via byelections, a very exciting situation. The member for Yukon was elected in 1987 and I was elected in 1989. We are women and that gives a certain situation and a certain leaning. When you are in here you learn all kinds of things about being a woman in federal politics certainly. We are both far from home as we serve in this place.

• (1515)

When we live in far flung western and northern ridings, Ottawa is a long way from home. There are people who we really cherish and miss dreadfully when we are a long way from home.

We have sat as independents in this House. We have that in common as well. That gives a certain perspective also in the House of Commons. It lets us realize that things are not always just the way we would want them to be but it is a good learning situation for both of us.

What impressed me the very most when I first came here and wandered around as a caucus of one all by myself was seeing Audrey in her good business clothes and her Reeboks walking through the Byward market. That really warmed me to you, Audrey. I realized then that here was a party leader who was practical and when she was going on a long jaunt from Parliament Hill she was free and willing to wear her Reeboks. I have always appreciated that about her. I will continue to think of her as I march through the market in my Reeboks.

When somebody comes to Parliament Hill from so far away, they give up an incredible amount of their personal life. I know, Audrey, it is difficult to be so far away from home as you put many relationships on hold as you come here and serve the Canadian public.

I want to thank you on behalf of my party and on behalf of all Canadians who appreciate so much—maybe they do not say it daily—the fact that you have also given up much. We want to thank you and say that we appreciate all that you have done. Thank you so much for your contribution to Canadian life, to the Canadian political process and the incredible sacrifice that you have made to your country. Good luck in all that you do in the future. God bless you, Audrey.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, this weekend the NDP elected a new leader. My caucus colleagues and I were pleased to have our new leader, Alexa McDonough, recognized in the gallery today.

The NDP caucus looks forward to working with Alexa. It also looks forward to the day when she and many others join us in this House to put forward our vision of the country and the world.

For the last six years, that vision has been put forward on our behalf in this House and across Canada by the member for Yukon, the Hon. Audrey McLaughlin. As chair of the federal NDP caucus I am honoured to be able today to pay tribute to Audrey on behalf of my colleagues and I am sure on behalf of Hill staff, party members and many other Canadians, all of whom I believe came to very much appreciate the member for Yukon and her way of doing politics.

Audrey, like some of her predecessors, had some moments here in Parliament that will be recorded in the minds and hearts of New Democrats forever as richly symbolic of the dissent which we express in this place about what is regarded by the conventional wisdom as unacceptable or unavoidable, whether it is on matters like NAFTA, privatization, deregulation, a whole list of things. Your leadership in our opposition to the gulf war was such a defining moment for many New Democrats.

And if I may say so while I am talking about courage, I remember your support of the Charlottetown accord when you put what you thought was best for your country ahead of what you knew might be politically risky for your party.

As the first woman leader of a federal party, you made history and you made it in such a way that our party was able to elect another woman as leader without gender being an issue. Thanks to your history-making leadership bid, the time when gender is an issue in Canadian political leadership contests may well be history. This is as it should be and for this all Canadians who value the equality of the sexes are indebted to you.

The member for Yukon is no longer our leader, but we are delighted that she continues to be our colleague, having put behind her the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune that sometimes come with the leadership of political parties. We know that the people of Yukon will be the real beneficiaries as Audrey will now be able to give her undivided attention to a part of Canada that she so clearly loves, and whose reality she brought home to us in the NDP caucus and elsewhere.

I venture to say that the phrase coast to coast to coast, which Audrey always insisted on, by way of recognizing northern Canada and the northern coast it represents, has changed the lexicon of Canadian politics in a way that brings recognition to northern Canada and the constituency which you so ably represent.

• (1520)

On a personal note I remember as well the joy which you took in having caucus go to the Yukon for a retreat. I remember even better the experience of mushing on the back of a dog sled, thanks to the care which Audrey took to make sure that we all had a taste of this great northern tradition. The dogs were a little bit tired after pulling me.

Since the election of 1993 and her announcement of her intention to step down as our leader, the member for Yukon has given much of herself and her energies to the renewal process in our party, a process which she gave impetus to originally and which has helped to invigorate the NDP.

In this, as in all things, Audrey has earned the affection of many New Democrats with her warm smile, her kind words and her ability to remember so many of the countless faces and names she encountered as a political party leader.

Finally, there is one word that seems to come to everyone's mouth when we speak of the member for Yukon and that is dignity: dignity in the day to day demands of politics. I remember Audrey patiently putting on my son Daniel's rubber boots in order to personally view the flooded yards and homes of south Transcona in my riding. But most of all dignity in the face of difficult circumstances, dignity in the face of electoral defeat, dignity in the face of criticism and dignity in the passing of the torch to a new leader.

For all these things and more, Audrey, we say thank you.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to pay tribute to the hon. member for Yukon. This distinguished and elegant member of Parliament was the leader of her party and the first woman to head a national party. For this, I offer her both praise and congratulations.

I have had an opportunity to visit the Yukon and been impressed by the work Ms. McLaughlin has accomplished there. The Yukon is no easy place to visit. It is no easy place to serve. It is immense and surely as far away as you can get in Canada from the capital. For this I raise my hat to one who, probably, for many weekends has gone home to visit her constituents and returned to work every week.

I have found Ms. McLaughlin to be affable, friendly, distinguished and elegant. She always had time to chat, regardless of one's political affiliation. She invariably had a smile and a kind word to say. We will miss her. She served her party with enthusiasm. She knew her subject matter. She spoke well in the House, in both official languages.

I have always appreciated the fact that she recognized Canada's two main groups and wanted to represent everybody all the time, always with a view to improving quality of life. I am pleased to have sat in the House with her as a colleague since 1988 and I will remember her as an extraordinary individual. My congratulations, Ms. McLaughlin.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I certainly thank everyone for their very kind comments. I also thank my caucus colleagues for their support and their comments today.

I have been very proud to lead a political party that has consistently stood for working Canadians and those who would be working, for a strong national health care program, for Canadians who really believe we have to have tax fairness and fair trade agreements. It is a party that refuses to abandon the poor, the ill and the vulnerable, when right now that seems all too popular.

• (1525)

[Translation]

Unfortunately, it was a time when political life seemed somewhat suspect. There is less respect for politicians. However, despite all of our country's problems, I am proud to be a member of Parliament, proud to work for my country and for my territory, the Yukon. We are a diverse country with a strong sense of history, a country built by the first nations, the anglophones, the francophones and the allophones.

[English]

We are a diverse country, made up of many peoples. We have many challenges to meet in the 21st century. It will take the contribution of every Canadian to move us forward with pride in this heritage and hope for our future.

Speaker's Ruling

I have sometimes despaired about the political process and wondered if we could really do this, but I have never doubted that in this most imperfect of systems, we are engaged in the noble process of public service. It is for this reason that I feel privileged to continue as the member of Parliament for Yukon and to continue to serve Canada and my constituents. I look forward to working with our new leader, Alexa McDonough.

The Speaker: As always, the last few words go to your Speaker.

Although I do not allow the rules to be broken often, many members addressed the hon. member for Yukon as Audrey.

Audrey, most of us in the House are honoured by this beautiful House of Commons. I say to you, on behalf of our colleagues who have chosen me Speaker, that you, Audrey, have honoured this place and we appreciate having you with us.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

* * *

POINTS OF ORDER

BILL S–9—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Speaker: Colleagues, I am now ready to rule on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls on October 4, 1995 concerning the procedural acceptability of Bill S–9, which is on the Order Paper today, an act to amend the Canada–United States Tax Convention Act, 1984.

At that time the hon. member brought to the attention of the Chair the possibility that a bill from the Senate, which had been read a second time in the House and referred by the House to committee, might impose expenditures on the Government of Canada.

As all members know, Standing Order 79(1) and section 54 of the Constitution Act, 1867, require that the House of Commons shall not adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue or of any tax or impost to any purpose that has not been first recommended to the House by a message from the Governor General. In short, a royal recommendation must be obtained.

In addition, section 53 of the Constitution Act, 1867, states:

> Bills for appropriating any Part of the Public Revenue, or for imposing any Tax or Impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

It is the duty of every member of this House to be vigilant in this regard and to scrutinize bills no matter where they originate.

Bill S–9 has not just arrived in the House. The message from the Senate was received on May 3, 1995. The bill was read a first time on June 14 and was read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance on September 21.

Speaker's Ruling

Although the bill is now coming to the House for report and third reading stages, the Chair does accept the explanation given by the hon. member for having raised this matter so late in the legislative process since his point of order is based on information received during the finance committee's deliberations on the bill.

• (1530)

I wish to remind all hon. members of citation 319 of Beauchesne's sixth edition, which requires that points of order be brought to the attention of the Chair as soon as possible.

I want to thank the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls for raising his concerns. I would also like to thank the hon. members for Willowdale, Regina—Lumsden, and York South—Weston and the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader for taking an interest in this matter and providing the Chair with their views on what is described in Erskine May's 21st edition at page 67 as "the most important power vested in any branch of the legislature, the right of imposing taxes upon the people and of voting money for the public service".

I want to assure the House that I view this matter very seriously and I have thoroughly studied the situation.

[Translation]

In his presentation, the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls argued that the provisions of Bill S–9 would impose expenditures on the government by reducing taxes on profits made by American multinational corporations in Canada. He also stated that the bill would require the government to pay a tax credit to persons subject to estate taxes in the U.S. Therefore, the government would suffer "a loss in tax expenditures for all time to come". The hon. member for York South—Weston also spoke to this point.

In his submission, the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls made reference to two rulings given by my predecessor Speaker Lamoureux on November 12, 1969 and on June 12, 1973. I have examined these rulings very carefully. In both cases, the bills brought down from the Senate very clearly contained provisions requiring expenditures by the government and Speaker Lamoureux quite rightly ruled that these bills infringed the privileges of the House of Commons. Both bills were set aside. However, these two precedents do not, in my opinion, apply to our present circumstances.

[English]

From my research, the substantive changes to the Canada–United States tax convention dealt with in Bill S–9 appear to relate to reductions in the rate of withholding taxes applied to different types of payments, for example, to dividends paid by a company resident in one country to a company in the other country owning more than a certain percentage of voting stock in the first company.

The bill will also have the effect of granting some tax relief retroactively and there may be some reimbursements payable for taxes paid under the law as it now reads, should Bill S–9 be passed by the House and receive royal assent.

The bill does not appropriate tax revenue, but rather exempts or reduces taxes otherwise payable, in some cases retroactively.

[Translation]

As members know, when the House is dealing with tax measures, members may propose amendments to such bills so long as they do not exceed the scope, increase the amount or extend the incidence of any charge upon the public.

[English]

No amendment may be proposed that would increase the rate of tax nor extend its incidence to a new class of payers without the recommendation of the Crown. In their search of such measures committees may also propose such reductions. I would refer hon. members to citations 988 to 991 of Beauchesne's sixth edition on this point.

Citation 992, also dealing with the powers of House committees with regard to tax bills, states:

> So long as an existing tax is not increased, any modification of the proposed reduction may be introduced in the committee on the bill, and is regarded as a question not for increasing the charge upon the people but for determining to what extent such charge shall be reduced.

• (1535)

It must also be borne in mind that members of this House can initiate and have initiated bills to lower taxes. So too can the Senate. And there is a longstanding practice for the government to introduce such bills in the other place at its discretion.

The parliamentary secretary to the government House leader noted in his intervention that Bill S–9 is not a bill for appropriating any part of the public revenue or for any tax or impost and therefore does not require a royal recommendation. There will be no expenditure of public funds, though money already collected from Canadian citizens pursuant to the tax laws of Canada may be refunded.

As the parliamentary secretary pointed out, the repayment of tax revenues already received is not an appropriation of public money. Thus, the bill could be properly introduced in the Senate.

In conclusion, Standing Orders 79 and 80 have not been contravened, as Bill S–9 neither imposes a tax nor appropriates money for any purpose. Since the bill relinquishes funds it might otherwise have gained, it is not appropriating money but forfeiting revenue it would have raised without such changes.

Once again, I thank the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls for his diligence in guarding the privileges of the House by bringing this matter to my attention.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[Translation]

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to three petitions.

* * *

[English]

WOMEN'S HISTORY MONTH

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today we are celebrating Persons day, the highlight of women's history month.

This is a time to celebrate the contributions of women to Canadian society, a time to be proud of the remarkable progress Canada has made toward equality for women and against actions of racism and sexism.

[Translation]

The Fathers of Confederation made the original blueprint of Canada in 1867. However, it took until 1921 for women to earn the right to vote.

Nonetheless, throughout history, the women of Canada—in all their diversity—have prevailed. They have shaped the values of this great country: democracy, tolerance, generosity, fairness, and respect for human and minority rights.

Today we celebrate five intrepid women from Alberta who won a court case in 1929 that changed the lives of all Canadians. The court's decision made women legal "persons" under the constitution. And that made them eligible for appointment to the Senate.

Today we have the largest representation of women ever in the Parliament of Canada, in the Commons as well as in the Senate. With the charter of rights and freedoms, the constitution now guarantees women and men equal rights and freedoms as full partners in our society.

[English]

Women have made great progress toward equality, and that means progress for Canadians and for all of Canada.

• (1540)

Today we recognize women's issues as societal issues. We recognize and realize that women's equality is in the best interests of Canada. All our talent and all our potential in all the socioeconomic and cultural fields of activity must be used as we progress to face the challenges of the 21st century. That is why we must keep up the momentum toward our global goal of the universality of women's human rights, for they are inalienable, integral and indivisible.

The government has approved a plan of action to ensure that women's equality is kept on track. The federal plan for gender equality, equality for men and women, which was tabled prior to our departure for the fourth world conference on the status of women, deals with the real issues of the day. Those issues are action for the economic empowerment of women, action to support women entrepreneurs, action to promote employment equity so women can have a fair chance at the jobs of today. These measures and others, along with social support systems, can help women and their families rise out of poverty.

Make no mistake, the family is the basic unit of society and must be supported in all its forms. We need healthy, vital families and women's economic independence. That can help. It can allow women to escape domestic violence. There is a direct link between economic independence and violence. That is just one reason why we will continue to work on eliminating the violence that limits women's ability to participate in and contribute to society. We have taken measures such as stricter firearms control, a new anti–stalking law, federal subsidies for shelters for battered women.

Economic empowerment means recognizing and valuing the important role of women's unpaid work as homemakers, as caregivers, as volunteers, as those who look after the elderly. This work has value of great worth in our caring and sharing society.

[Translation]

That is why the 1996 census will include a question on unpaid work.

The federal plan also puts women at the heart of government decision making. It requires that every policy, program and law be developed with the impacts on women, as well as men, in mind. Let us not forget that women represent half of Canadian society. We are not a society of special interests but a society built by both men and women over two centuries.

We also have a global plan: the platform for action on women's equality adopted at the recent UN World Conference on Women in Beijing.

I am proud to say Canada played a leadership role in securing a strong agreement on the rights of women and girls in Beijing, which was signed by 189 nations attending the conference.

[English]

I am also proud to say that Canada's leadership on equality was recognized with two awards: a prestigious United Nations prize for advancing literacy, thanks to the initiatives in New Brunswick; and Canada was honoured with the global award for the most improvement in the status of women over the last decade. In making the award the International Federation of Business and Professional Women commended Canada for its steady and remarkable progress in advancing equality for women. This was acknowledged and awarded after 110 countries were carefully examined. Canada was not found wanting. Canada was found head of the pack.

The way to the future is clear. Canadians must continue that progress to a true partnership between women and men. This is imperative as we face an increasingly complex global society.

In closing, I want to extend my heartiest congratulations to the six women who were honoured today. Each of them were pioneers in their own way. Each of them fought against violence and fought for an integrated and accepting society. We owe them a great debt of gratitude. I extend them my best regards.

• (1545)

[Translation]

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Quebec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak about this victory for women which my colleague, the hon. secretary of state, has pointed out was a concrete step toward equality for women. The 1929 legal victory was an important step in this egalitarian undertaking, I agree. It represented a significant milestone in terms of democracy.

Other victories followed, as we know, perhaps less striking ones but equally important: women's influx into the work force; improved education for women; their entry into non traditional employment; the creation of daycare services; their presence on various boards, I could go on and on. yes, Canadian women and Quebec women have made progress, and they must be congratulated and encouraged to continue.

I shall make use of this opportunity to explain to my colleagues why, very soon, Quebec women will be deciding to continue their progress on their own. Although they have made definite progress, as I have said, the women of Quebec will be able to progress a little faster on their own, with the weight of the federalist yoke lifted from their shoulders.

Quebec women will be well protected by the Quebec charter of human rights, which will reaffirm equality and the rights of women. They will continue to be well served by the civil law system, under which they have equal status and equal rights with men.

In a sovereign Quebec, Quebec women will be ensured of the survival and the dynamism of their language and culture. They will no longer have to worry about the survival from generation to generation of things I know are of concern to them: culture, language, education, and employment. Quebec women will continue to progress under a democratic political regime, with an equal say in drafting the constitution of their new country, with their rights to equality reaffirmed.

Quebec women will make even more gains under a democratic Quebec, within a system in which social rights will be the focus of the state's actions. They will benefit from a family policy focused on their needs and those of their children, a policy free of the constraints imposed by the present federal system, which makes policy harmonization impossible.

Mrs. Finestone: Really.

Mrs. Gagnon (Québec): Please, madam secretary of state.

In a sovereign Quebec, free of Ottawa's centralizing goals, women will clearly benefit from a policy of full employment coupled with a social policy that reflects the effect of their participation in the working world. I am talking here of policy on child care, working conditions in keeping with family responsibilities and employment equity. Where are the daycare places so long promised by the federal government? They were promised, and we are still waiting. Yet we are paying the federal government to have these places created.

Quebec women will have the advantage of a unique system of manpower planning and training. They will have the benefit of a system that is decentralized in favour of the regions, the prime sources of human and business activity.

Finally, Quebec women will move far beyond the endless battles and constitutional red tape and will focus their energies on improving the quality of their life, that of their children, their husband and their fellow Quebecers. This was the request of the participants in the women's march on poverty, last June's bread and roses march, which was undertaken on behalf of all Quebec women. This is what the Government of Quebec is proposing and is committed to promoting.

In conclusion, Quebec women will quicken their step toward equality by dropping a level of government, which is preparing to sacrifice them on the altar of economics and which is preparing to impose cuts on their old age pension and unemployment insurance cheques, by tying these benefits to the family salary in the new reform of social programs. They will drop a level of government that is useless, costly and more concerned about the interests of major corporations than about the grocery bill of single parent families.

I am appealing here to Quebec women's common sense and administrative talents to get them to realize that savings are possible by eliminating overlap and duplication.

• (1550)

It is by taking control of their own destiny, by becoming self–sufficient that Quebecers, like Quebec, will grow from now on, in friendship with their Canadian sisters and without forgetting the progress that has already been made. There is, however, much more to be done in this area, and I think that the federal government should first deal with women's economic equality.

Women in the public service still earn only 70 per cent of what men make. Something must be done, and I urge the government to move from rhetoric to action.

It is said that women's economic independence is important and could reduce violence against them. I call on the government to take measures to ensure that women are paid as much as men for doing the same work. I urge the government to think about the action plan for gender equality.

The study the minister referred to earlier, the federal plan, puts women at the heart of government decision making. This plan requires that every policy, program and law be developed with the impacts on women, as well as men, in mind.

I exhort the government to be very vigilant regarding the reforms contemplated by the Minister of Human Resources Development, for example, cutting UI and old age pension benefits and setting women's benefits on the basis of family income. We know full well that benefits are often based on men's higher wages, and we fought against this.

What does this mean for a woman who receives her first old age pension cheque at 65 and whose husband earns a certain salary? It is often the first cheque these women have ever received. This cheque also represents economic independence, a little bit of economic independence for women.

[English]

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure to rise in the House today to recognize and commemorate the Persons case from 1921, especially in the midst of great parliamentary diversity of opinion and focus as we speak today.

I would like to first congratulate all of the women today who received Governor General's awards: Marthe Asselin Vaillancourt, Dr. Mary Cohen, Ruth Flowers, Sheila Kingham, Carolyn Thomas, and Alice Taylor, who are all being recognized for their efforts toward making Canada a place in which all are treated equally. These women stand for everything that has gone right in Canadian history.

Look at the progress that has been made in Canadian society since 1929 when women received the right to vote. Today I refer and indeed also defer to those five Albertans, women all, who challenged successfully the convention of their day to bring the vote to women.

The secretary of state briefly mentioned the importance of family in society. This is a message that is sometimes forgotten or passed over when we are caught up in the singular focus of women's issues. As a party we affirm the value and dignity of the individual person and the importance of strengthening and protecting the family unit as essential to the well–being of individuals and society. Hopefully, this is a principle about which we may all agree, because once we have agreement we will have a fundamental basis from which to move forward.

We constantly hear comments and stories about women doing things differently and having different approaches to communicating. This is true, and perhaps more so for the women we recognize today as they receive the Governor General's award for their contributions to society.

Let us also look to history and in particular to Agnes Macphail and Nellie McClung, extraordinary women indeed. They broke ground for women today and they did it because they were focused, had strong convictions, and they also had a creative edge to bring their point home.

These women of the early suffrage movement had a sense of humour, were thoughtful in their world view, and for the most part could handle themselves well in difficult situations. For example, at a rally held in 1915 a heckler yelled at Nellie McClung: "The Prime Minister would quit politics if a woman were ever elected". Well, Nellie did not wilt. Instead, she replied: "This proves what a purifying effect a woman would have on politics".

• (1555)

McClung was no shrinking violet. She was fair minded, good humoured, and determined. These qualities typify Canadians and also my colleague from Yukon who was honoured by the House today.

We still need to work to guarantee equal opportunity for all. We may disagree on the quality of outcome, but whether we agree or not, when we as women engage in debate we must still struggle to relay our message.

McClung staged demonstrations to make her point in her time. In recent memory, one member of this House is said to have hiked up her skirts and jumped over a desk to make her point. Another member, this member, sat on the hood of a sports car to make hers. John Crosbie and the modern feminist movement are still shaking their heads.

Let us look at Agnes Macphail. When she first entered the House of Commons as Canada's first woman MP in 1921, a Commons employee tried to stop her at the door of the Chamber.

She entered anyway, while he shouted, "You can't go in there, Miss". Once inside, Macphail was touched to find a bouquet of roses waiting on her desk, but was humiliated later to learn that they were the penalty a male MP paid for betting she would lose the election in her Ontario riding.

Since women were given the vote in 1929, tremendous advancements have been made. Some of them have come amazingly late, but still we achieve. We have gone through periods when women and men toiled apart as changes occurred. We are finally coming to a place where we recognize that men and women together and as equals can create the kind of country we all want to live in.

I would like to extend again my congratulations to all the recipients of the Governor General's awards today.

* * *

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE AND HOUSE AFFAIRS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the 90th report of the very hard working Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs regarding membership of committees.

If the House gives its consent, I intend to move concurrence in this report later this day.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, with the leave of the House I move that the 90th report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs, presented to the House earlier this day, be concurred in.

(Motion agreed to.)

* * *

[English]

PETITIONS

EUTHANASIA

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 signed by many people in the Ottawa area and having to do with euthanasia.

SEXUAL ORIENTATION

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present a petition from my riding of Prince George—Bulkley Valley that deals with an opinion and a belief that is shared by a majority of Canadians right across this country. It deals with the fear that the privileges society extends to heterosexual couples could some day be extended to same sex relationships.

The petitioners pray and request that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the charter of rights and freedoms in any way that would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the human rights code to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase of sexual orientation.

This petition originated in the College Heights Baptist Church of Prince George. I am proud to say that I concur 100 per cent with this petition.

• (1600)

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. John O'Reilly (Victoria—Haliburton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my pleasure to present the following petition from the county of Haliburton.

The undersigned residents of the county of Haliburton and visitors draw the attention of the House to the importance of national unity to our country at this time.

They therefore request Parliament to urge the government to impress upon the leader of the Reform Party the need to promote national unity in this very unfortunate situation in which our country finds itself.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition which has been circulating all across Canada. The particular petition has been signed by a number of Canadians from Mississauga, Ontario.

The petitioners would like to draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession which has not been recognized for its value to our society.

They also state that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families who make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call upon Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families who decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

* * *

[Translation]

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the following question will be answered today: No. 193.

[Text]

Question No. 193—Mr. Hanger:

What was, in fiscal year 1994–95, the total cost to the Department of Health of providing health care to claimants of refugee status in Canada; what was the projected amount for this line of spending in the 1994–95 estimates or supplementary estimates; and how does the Department of Health expect to cover any shortfall resulting from refugee health spending overruns?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): It should be first mentioned that as a result of a memorandum of understanding between the former departments of National Health and Welfare and Employment and Immigration Canada signed on March 1, 1993, resources relating to the interim federal health, IFH, program, formerly the non–insured health benefits, NIHB, program were transferred to Citizenship and Immigration Canada, CIC, from Health Canada, HC, effective commencing in 1993–94. It was also agreed at that time that HC would continue to deliver the program on the department's behalf. Subsequently, CIC assumed responsibility for the delivery of the IFH program on April 1, 1995.

In fiscal year 1994–95, under the interim federal health program, Citizenship and Immigration Canada spent $7.1 million in providing health care services, mainly to refugee claimants across Canada. Until January 1, 1995, Ontario was the only province which provided health care coverage to refugee claimants. As a result of the recent decision of the Ontario government no longer to provide health care coverage to refugee claimants and given that, starting April 1, 1995, only emergency/essential services will now be provided under the IFH program, it is estimated that total program costs will increase by $15.0 million for a total of $22.5 million in program spending in 1995–96. This level of spending is expected to continue in future years.

Pending Treasury Board approval, additional program funding will be obtained through the supplementary estimates process as a result of Ontario de–insurance of refugee claimants. Specifically, the department's 1995–96 reference levels will be increased by an amount of $15.0 million as will the future years' reference levels.

The projected amount for this line of spending in the 1994–95 main estimates and supplementary estimates was $7.5 million.

At present, in light of CIC's additional appropriations as a result of Ontario de–insurance, no shortfall exists within program funding. Should costs exceed available funding due to an increased number of program beneficiaries and the health status of these persons or as a result of amendments to provincial fee tariffs upon which IFH payments are based, it is planned that additional resources will be obtained through the estimates process.

[Translation]

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if question No. 146 could be made an order for return, that return would be tabled immediately.

[Text]

Question No. 146—Mr. Axworthy:

With respect to the government's actions to curb contraband trade in cigarettes in Canada, announced on February 8, 1994, (a) what estimates, if any, were made for (i) increased consumption of cigarettes in all populations, (ii) increased smoking prevalence among Canadian youth, (iii) impact on current and future mortality and morbidity; and, if not, why not, (b) what estimates, if any, of future levels of contraband trade in cigarettes were made of the market share of contraband cigarettes in 1994, 1995, 1996 and 1997 and what estimate was made of revenue loss due to contraband sales in 1994, 1995, 1996 and 1997 and, if not, why not?

Return tabled.

[Translation]

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Deputy Speaker: Agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–64, an act respecting employment equity, be read the third time and passed.

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–64, the new employment equity act, was designed to resolve longstanding problems with the existing legislation and meet our government's red book commitments. It is part of the government's work toward achieving an open and inclusive society.

The legislation reflects the values of the government. It reflects the values of respect and understanding. The legislation is about fairness. It is about providing an equal playing field. Above all, the legislation is about making sure that all self–identified, qualified Canadians have a fair chance to compete for federal public sector jobs based on their merit.

The legislation continues to cover a total of 350 private sector employers and crown corporations that operate in federally regulated industries such as banking, communications and transportation. The legislation expands coverage of the employment equity act to the public service immediately. It also includes the Canadian Armed Forces and the RCMP.

There are four designated groups which continue to be designated: aboriginal peoples, members of visible minorities, women and persons with disabilities. The principle of self identification is reaffirmed and definitions of the groups are in the legislation.

The legislation carries enforcement measures. It ensures that the Canadian Human Rights Commission has the mandate to conduct on site compliance reviews. It also confirms the administrative responsibility for the federal contractors program to the Minister of Human Resources Development. It makes use of the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal which when hearing employment equity complaint cases will be called the employment equity review tribunal. This body will hear appeals from employers and referrals from the CHRC and ensure the final enforcement of the act.

With regard to the designated groups under the legislation they continue to be under represented as well as under valued in federal agencies and in federally regulated industries.

A recent study conducted by Krishna Pendakur of Simon Fraser University and Ravi Pendakur entitled "Earning differentials among ethnic groups in Canada" found that similarly qualified Canadian born visible minorities earn about 11 per cent less than Canadian born white people and that immigrant visible minorities earn 15 per cent less than Canadian born whites.

• (1605)

We are also familiar with the term glass ceiling, barriers to upper level management faced by many women and minorities in companies and agencies. This issue is addressed in applying more effective employment equity legislation.

We also found through partnership with the Canadian Advertising Foundation, the Asia–Pacific Foundation and the Conference Board of Canada that being sensitive and responsive to diversity is good for business. It makes economic sense and it is the fair thing to do. Companies that are sensitive to the diversity of the reality of Canada, that is the Canadian population, and companies that have made a commitment from the top down that they will be reflective of the people of this land have the key to the future: economic security. This is real at the local, national and international level.

Fairer access, meritorious advancement and equality of opportunity are key for all corporations that want to compete in the global marketplace. Our Canadian people often reflect and know the cultures of the new global markets. Why not use our diversity as a valued competitive edge to our mutual benefit? Global business is multicultural, multilingual and multiracial. Anyone travelling would know that; anyone in international business knows that.

Applying the rule of self–identified employment equity laws is an important tool to effect real institutional change, which is in the best interest of all Canadians and is an incentive for people to self–identify or to identify themselves.

This is a bill with a heart, one that recognizes the reality of Canadian business life. It clarifies existing obligations and helps to widen the circle of inclusion in our workforce at all levels. It does not force employers to create new positions, require the hiring or promoting of unqualified individuals, or contradict the merit principle in the public sector. It is about fairness and merit. It would be worthwhile if members opposite would keep all these issues in mind when speaking to this matter and tell the truth about what is in the bill.

It is about fairness and merit. It is about quality, not quantity. The bill does not call for nor is it about quotas for non–qualified members of designated groups.

[Translation]

Since the bill on employment equity was tabled for first reading, the members of the Reform Party have had a great deal to say about it.

In fact, it would be more accurate to state that they have had a great deal to say against it. They are rejecting the bill and the reason for their rejection is either that they are against measures in favour of employment equity or that they do not grasp the nature and scope of this bill.

[English]

Hon. members must recognize that this will simply not happen by crossing our fingers and hoping that we will achieve our goals of access, equity, fairness and a starting chance for self–identified minorities who wish to have consideration and to be included in the enlarged circle of the family of Canada.

In order to reach this goal some of the CHRC's responsibilities are education, awareness and sensitization to our multicultural reality. It will enable companies touched by this law to effect institutional change over time. We broadened the circle of representation through encouragement and education rather than through coercion. We do it because it is the right thing to do for Canada's qualified population by addressing whatever systemic barriers may be present that inhibit the representation of our diversity.

Before I close I highlight the Bank of Montreal as an example of a corporation that has demonstrated its commitment to create both an equitable workplace and a workforce that reflects the community it serves and a leadership that believes in fairness and a widened circle of service to the grassroots, the people they want to do business with.

• (1610)

It has published a report of its task force on the advancement of visible minorities. I would recommend close reading of the report. The main purpose was to identify barriers to advancement faced by members of visible minorities who were in business by the way and were earning well, and to develop action plans to eliminate those barriers for further upward mobility.

The task force recommended that the bank refine its workforce planning process to foster a workforce that reflects the diversity of the community at all levels. It recommended increased participation of visible minorities in leadership roles and the removal of barriers to the advancement of these persons and all other employees. It recommended the bank take action to further enable employees to take charge of their own career advancement and to increase competency based on non–subjective candidate selection. Its final recommendation was to enable employees from all backgrounds to develop the knowledge, skills, attitudes and behaviour critical to success in a diverse workforce.

When one wants to look at employment equity and when one wants to examine the fairness of the approach in the bill, the self–identification, the reality of who we are as a people, the greatness of our diversity and the differences from place to place across the land, it makes more and more sense that more and more Canadians will want to report origins other than British or French because that is who we are. Most of us have origins different from British or French.

The legislation will help set a framework within which all Canadians will have a fair and equal chance to participate in the economic prosperity of our country and in which all Canadians have an interest and a purpose to participate.

I wholly support the legislation. I hope all members of the House join me in ensuring a truly just, fair, equitable and prosperous society, one with which Canada can continue to be the world model it is today.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to address the House on a topic that has thus far provoked spirited discussion.

As its preamble states, Bill C–64, an act respecting employment equity, was introduced by the government with the intention of achieving equality in the workplace and amending the disadvantages experienced by certain groups.

Underlying the bill is an approach to equality which suggests we measure success in terms of results or outcomes. Herein lies a difference in definition as we disagree on the bill. There are two opposing ideologies in the debate: one focused on equality as a process and the other on equality as an outcome.

Process people of which I am one direct their energies to the supply side. They encourage people to train and educate, to deal with values and habits, to promote an open environment where specialization is fostered, to reward merit and to reject discrimination on the basis of extraneous factors. Process people accept the results of a world operating in this fashion, one where the outcome is not predetermined but where individuals have the capacity to manufacture their future. Process people believe in remedial action but choose to limit their response to those truly in need.

Outcome people, such as those who support the bill, are not satisfied with creating equal opportunities for this is not enough. They prefer to manipulate a process, to consciously intervene and to create the results they believe are justified. They construct laws to ensure their overt interventions are safeguarded against legal challenges. The government has already done this, providing a constitutional guarantee that the principle of equality can be supplanted for intrusive and sometimes coercive state goals. I am speaking to section 15.2 of the charter which rejects in plain language the brave assertion of its companion clause 15.1 guaranteeing to all Canadians equal treatment before the law.

The question of defining equality lies at the heart of this debate, I believe. Unlike the equality of outcome as described in Bill C–64, the equality of opportunity nurtures an environment where outcomes are predetermined, allowing society to reward enterprise and initiatives. Opportunity is the cornerstone of a prosperous, creative and thriving culture. It provides a foundation for personal fulfilment and self–actualization. Most important, it enables people to believe in themselves in the sense that they alone control their destiny.

• (1615)

Bill C–64 corrupts this conceptualization of opportunity by placing a higher premium on premeditated intervention to fashion outcomes. This wounds all Canadians and cannot be supported.

Let us focus on the goals of employment equity for a moment. The very goals on which this legislation is premised are flawed, confused and contradictory. Notions of equality, numerical targets and diversity are fraught with problems. Bill C–64 offers equality for some at the expense of others. Numerical targets are flawed by their very design. Establishing targets obscures numerical goals with the idea of equality.

There is a substantial difference between recognizing that certain groups have encountered historical barriers and assuming that all social inequalities are attributable to discrimination.

We must ask ourselves whether men and women would fill occupations in equal numbers in a world of perfectly free choice. The answer is probably not. Similarly, would ethnic minorities appear equally in all work environments? Again, most likely no. A numbers game simply circumscribes choice and counters any notion of equity.

Searching for the ideal of diversity is yet another confused goal. Does anybody know what diversity in this context really means? As someone aptly suggested, it merely reflects a language of willed ignorance in which the words mean only that the speaker has good intentions.

How can we even begin to consider seriously such legislation when its foundation is constructed on such faulty principles? There is a serious danger in beginning a task when its objectives are distorted by contradiction and imperfection. If I measure a value and our sense of direction is unclear our efforts will surely be wasted.

Another concern relates to the basic question of whether a need for employment equity exists at all. Evidence has surfaced in recent years which calls into question the reasons on which employment equity is based. By making reference to this evidence it is not my intention to disavow the existence of racism and discrimination. Instead I wish to make clear that discrimination and gender alone are not enough to explain the vastly dissimilar outcomes different groups experience in the course of their lives. Culture, religion and family patterns are other reasons which keep people out of certain occupations.

For example, economist Thomas Sowell found that teen marriages are more prevalent in certain ethnic populations. He maintains that women who marry at very young ages do not pursue post–secondary education and therefore limit the range of jobs for which they might qualify. The answer then is not numerical goals and timetables but one of culture and education.

Recent data from a 1995 Statistics Canada study reinforced these ideas further. While it was found that visible minorities were less likely than any other Canadian to be employed in managerial occupations, most likely explained by the fact that they are on average younger than other adults, members of visible minorities were as likely as other Canadians to be employed in professional occupations. In essence the report is confirming that at all levels of the economy visible minorities enjoy rates of employment comparable to those of other Canadians.

How then do we justify Bill C–64? Like other employment equity legislation it treats members of visible minorities of homogeneous groups having the same character, composition and history. This is fundamentally wrong. For example, data reveal that 13 per cent and 19 per cent of Japanese Canadians are employed in managerial and professional categories respectively, while only 8 per cent and 9 per cent are found in manual and service categories. This type of breakdown will necessarily be different when compared with the experience of Filipinos and East Indians for example. All groups are different with compelling reasons explaining their variable representation in the workplace.

Are there alternatives to employment equity? There is considerable evidence to suggest policy alternatives based on equality of opportunity do exist. Many are already an entrenched feature of the Canadian work world. The systemic discrimination found in many areas of an organization's structure suggest we can approach problems without the use of quotas. For example, we can do more as federal legislators to foster equitable hiring in both public and private sectors through the improvement of education which includes special training programs for target groups, academic upgrading, pre–apprenticeship programs, training of all staff in cross cultural awareness to promote a positive working environment.

• (1620)

We can look at dismantling systemic barriers, which would include policies promoting flexible hours which can be of particular benefit to women with young children, people with disabilities who need special transportation systems and workers whose religious requirements may conflict with typical hours of work, and support measures dealing with employment problems including daycare facilities and revised rules for parental leave.

We can emphasize individual achievement so that an individual's training, performance and knowledge, skills and ability are considered paramount in all workplace decisions.

My remarks have addressed equality of opportunity, the confused goals of Bill C–64 and the question of need, highlighting the inherent problems with employment equity and Bill C–64. Social democrats have historically sought to forge links across race and gender lines in pursuit of a common citizenship with equal rights.

In contrast, the government's policies reinforce the notion that the interests of males and females and diverse ethnic groups are distinctive and competitive. Does Bill C–64 really lead us toward the better society to which we aspire? I think not.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: I wish to inform the House that because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended today by 20 minutes.

[English]

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to address Bill C–64.

While listening in the House today I worry that some of the members opposite have not really understood the vision for Canada or the intent of the bill.

I have followed with great interest the developments in employment equity over the years and it is my contention that employment equity is a fundamental building block for creating a better Canada.

Bill C–64 went before the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons. This committee heard from a very broad section of witnesses and in its report endorsed the new features of Bill C–64 and recommended additional amendments. The act covers all federally regulated companies with 100 or more employees. Bill C–64 will bring the federal public service, its departments, agencies, boards and commissions, into line with standards already set for federally regulated corporations.

The changes Liberals will implement to strengthen the Employment Equity Act include the federal public service and federal agencies and commission under the Employment Equity Act. We will also give the Canadian Human Rights Commission the legislative authority to initiate investigations of employment equity issues.

Efforts to eradicate discrimination in the workplace and in hiring practices have been under way at the federal level since the enactment of the 1970s human rights legislation. In 1993 it became evident to the Liberal government of the day that voluntary measures toward achieving equity in the workplace were failing to bring about significant changes for women, aboriginal peoples, visible minorities and persons with disabilities. That is the key because they tried to achieve it through voluntary measures and it did not work.

On December 12, 1994 the human resources minister tabled in the House Bill C–64. He stated: "This initiative is a significant step toward ensuring equitable employment opportunities for women, aboriginal peoples, persons with disabilities and members of visible minorities".

Most of us come into the House with a prepared speech, but sitting in my office and watching the TV monitor I heard so many nefarious statements from across the floor that I am going away from my prepared notes to address some of the things that were said. One that concerned me was with regard to quotas.

The bill is not about quotas. They kept referring to the charter of rights and freedoms and quoting it. The bill is certainly not in conflict with what is being said in the charter of rights and freedoms.

The merit principle in the bill should be and is the sole basis of hiring. I think anyone who sees anything different within the bill is really not understanding what is being said.

I refer to the member from Beaver River, who went on at great length saying she is a woman in the House and she came here because she is competitive and because of competence. I do not argue that point at all. I would like to think I got here that way as well.

• (1625)

One works hard, does as one has to do, does the same as anybody else running for public office and gets elected. What about all the people who want to run for public office who are just as competent as I am? Maybe this is what the feminist movement is all about, I do not know. Is it not my responsibility to assist if I see someone who would make a wonderful member of the House of Commons? If that person is competent, has the merit and a reason to be here and yet does not have the confidence to project himself or herself on the floor of the House of Commons, does that person not deserve some assistance from someone? I say they do. I am saying this in simplistic language to point out not everybody has the competence to get into the House of Commons.

Getting back to strong women, I want to relate a story in my life before I became an elected official. I was an elected official for 10 years before I came to the House of Commons. Working in an administrative capacity I applied for a position within my organization. I did not get the position. The human resources person said to me: "You are more qualified than the person who is getting the job. You have longer service than the person who is getting the job but we must give it to him because he has a wife and two children".

I had a husband and five children and I could not understand the reason the job was being given to him over me. There was no valid reason why he should get the job. Let us consider a visible minority. In that same organization I was asked by the human resources director to short list the people who were applying for jobs in the department I was in. I gave my list of three people. One was a Jamaican woman. The director's comment to me was: "I am not sure whether our organization is ready for a black woman". That is why we need to offer our assistance and our support for this.

That was not too long ago. I have not been here forever. We have come a long way. We have all had examples in our lives of being held down or held back for the wrong reasons.

Somebody from the other side of the House had said that white young males will rise up in anger. My goodness, white young women or black young women or whomever should have been rising up in anger for years and years and never did until now. It is about time they did.

I sat on the committee on human rights and the status of disabled persons. We heard from people with disabilities about how their rights are constantly being violated. I will tell a little story about a Saskatchewan farmer.

This farmer had lost both his arms in a farming accident. He had prostheses from the elbows down on both arms. He relied on his son and his wife to help with the farming. When he appeared before the committee he said: "When I buy a huge harvesting machine I have to pay about $60,000 more for this machine than what my able bodied neighbour has to pay because I need to have equipment that my two prostheses can handle". Is that fair?

That man was in business and he was being discriminated against through the cost of the machine because he had two artificial arms. That man needs our help. We should offer him our help. I love telling all these little stories but I sure have strayed away from my speech.

Canada today is a very different society than it was 50 or even 20 years ago. Today we as women want and need to look after ourselves financially. At the same time we want to know those who cannot are being treated equally. Our aboriginal peoples are demanding self–determination and persons with disabilities want to be fully integrated throughout society. New Canadians want to fully participate in all aspects of Canadian society.

• (1630)

Canada is a changed society, one where these four groups are expressing specific needs that must be addressed. It is a society that requires the contribution of all our citizens and this piece of legislation addresses this changed society.

It is through employment equity that we will ensure that the skills and abilities of all Canadians will be fully utilized. It is through employment equity that we will one day eliminate the social and economic costs of marginalizing big numbers of Canadians. By ensuring that these four groups take their rightful place in the Canadian labour force, a more vibrant and productive society will emerge.

This bill will lead us toward a fair and just society by making us examine our assumptions of what is the right way to do business. It will make us question hiring procedures that have in the past always found qualified individuals for the job. I will give you an example of where it does not always work.

It will lead us there by teaching us through awareness training to feel what it is like to be excluded from the workplace simply because your disability stops you from getting up the stairs to the work site.

It will lead us there by encouraging us to make accommodations for mothers and fathers who take the needed time from work to look after their youngsters. It will lead us there by teaching us that those people whom we thought would be difficult to manage are many of our most valuable employees.

For this reason I encourage all members of the House to vote with a resounding yes for this legislation, a resounding yes to a better nation.

The Deputy Speaker: Colleagues, I would ask you please to put your remarks to the Chair. The Chair feels very lonely often in some of the debates that go on.

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak to Bill C–64. I want to preface my remarks by making a comment on behalf of all the members of the Reform Party. We do not support in any way, shape or form discriminatory hiring practices. We do not support the premise that a person from one of the four groups mentioned in Bill C–64 be denied a job based on the fact that he or she is within one of these four groups. To have some of the previous speakers of the Liberal Party allude to that is utter nonsense.

At the same time, I do not support and I know many of my colleagues do not support the fact that someone would be hired specifically because he or she is part of one of those four groups. Let us be very clear about what the Reform members are trying to say in the House today.

I was really pleased that I was present today when we saw Ms. Alexa McDonough presented to the Chamber today. She was just elected president of the New Democratic Party, not because she was a woman but because she had the confidence of the delegates of the NDP convention that she was the best person for the job. I congratulate her for that.

We heard today in the House from the hon. member for Edmonton—Strathcona about a Mrs: Chicoine who was awarded a Canada Volunteer Award Certificate of Merit not because she was a woman but because of the efforts that she put into doing the things that she truly believed in.

We heard earlier today from a member opposite about a woman who had just received an entrepreneurship award of merit in an international competition for a process that she created and developed regarding the use of furs. She did not receive this award because she was a woman. She received it because of the creativity, the training and the work she put into her business.

• (1635)

We heard about the women from Alberta who were honoured today in Ottawa for their service to their country. They were honoured, not because they are women but because they believed so passionately in something that they readied themselves for the task and they succeeded. They succeeded not because they were women but because they wanted to succeed.

If the principles of Bill C–64 were applied to the women who were honoured today in the House, they might very easily find it insulting. There could be the allusion that they received these awards or accomplished their tasks simply because they were women and not because of their own individual efforts.

All members in the House, including Liberal members even though they will not admit it, are aware that Bill C–64 will impose employment equity provisions on the public service and on those firms that have over 100 employees and do business with the federal government. I use the word "impose". They use the term "employment equity". The term "employment equity" was coined by Justice Rosalie Abella in 1984. It is a convenient term for our Liberal social engineers since it is much more deceptive and less threatening than the term "affirmative action".

In the United States people call it like it is, affirmative action. That is exactly what employment equity really is but it is called employment equity to make it a less threatening term.

We are all aware that affirmative action or employment equity, whatever one you choose, is not working in the United States. Recently the U.S. Supreme Court dealt affirmative action a severe blow. It ruled in favour of a Colorado company that brought an action against the U.S. government because the government had awarded a contract to an Hispanic controlled company despite the fact that the Colorado company submitted a lower bid and was more qualified to do the work. This was because of affirmative action or employment equity. Naturally the U.S. government's rationale for taking such a course of action was rooted in its affirmative action policy.

While this recent decision in the states does not spell the end of affirmative action in the U.S., I and those who believe employment would be better based on merit would hope that it signals a return some day to common sense and fairness.

The Americans have gone through the process and have experienced the detrimental effects of affirmative action policies. Here we are in Canada, with a Liberal government that is hell bent on pursuing it. Do we not learn from the experiences of other countries?

We cannot even find common sense and fairness in our Constitution. Section 15.2 of the charter of rights and freedoms entrenches employment equity in the Constitution. However, if we read the section we note that it specifically overrides section 15.1, which is intended to promote equality among all Canadians.

The charter of 1982 is drafted in typical Liberal fashion. It promises something but only if the state can have absolute control over it. That is a scary thought. Promise equality but deliver on the promise only when the state decides where and when equality will exist. Is that not a scary thought, that the state will decide where and when equality will exist? This is the effect of section 15.2 of the charter.

Now we are facing Bill C–64, a manifestation of section 15.2, a bill which arbitrarily discriminates against one group in favour of another. However, these Liberals will tell us that discrimination will not result from this bill. Just because some groups are being promoted over other groups is not discrimination. It is equity. That is the Liberal's definition of the word equity. Their social engineer's vocabulary does not end there. It goes much further. The Liberals argue that Bill C–64 will not set quotas but rather numeric goals.

• (1640)

As David Frum wrote recently, speaking of numeric goals and deceptive wording: "It is also true that undertakers say casket instead of coffin and loved one instead of corpse. Does it make Aunt Tilly any less dead by changing the words around so that they sound a little less threatening?"

We must ask if we really need Bill C–64. Where is this systematic discrimination that is constantly referred to by the proponents of employment equity Bill C–64? Where is the proof? Where are the statistics and hard numbers? There are none. In fact the Economic Council of Canada, which I am sure the Liberals recognize as a respectable body, did studies in 1991 and 1992 which found Canada successfully assimilates its newcomers and that there was no evidence of systematic pay discrimination. Furthermore, a Statistics Canada report this summer demonstrated that visible minorities enjoy rates of employment and rates of pay comparable to that of other Canadians.

Therefore, we ask where is the proof. Systematic discrimination is in no way entrenched in the Canadian workplace as these Liberal social engineers would have us believe. Indeed, in pushing Bill C–64 without any hard evidence to back it up, it seems that the Liberal government and its special interest group cohorts that helped it get elected, would declare Canadian firms simply guilty by accusation.

I forget that these Liberal members have proven that they know little about law and order. Therefore, such concepts as innocent until proven guilty would simply mean nothing to them.

Ultimately, employment equity or affirmation action as it is more correctly known, is in fact a lose–lose situation. People who have become victims of employment equity legislation demand that it be scrapped and merit be returned as the sole principle for hiring and promotion.

Typical of the government, it tends to march to the beat of a "we know what is better for you" attitude, in economic, judicial and social matters and therefore it will continue to dictate to us. This Liberal government and Liberal governments for the past 30 years have been intent in getting in the face of free and independent Canadians. I say Bill C–64 is another attempt to do just that. I therefore must oppose it.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake—Endangered species; the hon. member for Mackenzie—Agriculture.

[English]

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to speak today. I have gathered up some comments from the speeches of the members for Beaver River and Calgary Southeast and the member for the Reform Party who just spoke. What they have done is typical of what the Reform Party does in debate, particularly on this legislation. They have refused to either read it or, if they have read it, to acknowledge the actual content of the bill.

• (1645)

If the bill were operating in a vacuum, if we were making no effort in any other area of society or in any other form of legislation to improve the lot of Canadians, I might oppose it as well. The bill is part of a package. It is part of our platform set out in our red book. Beyond that it is part of a package of legislation we intend to use to improve the lot of Canadians. By improving the lot I mean by making our communities healthier, economically healthier and safer.

We have tried to take other steps to assist people who do not have the same advantage as the last speaker. We have improved our student loan programs so that we are offering funds to encourage women into areas where they have not traditionally sought training in the past. We have a student loan program which encourages the participation of persons with disabilities.

We are revamping our social programs in order to take away the systemic barriers that exist for single mothers who are untrained and also unable to go back to work because they have no one to take care of their kids. We are taking a look at child care as a form of social program which will support our effort to get Canadians back to work.

Bill C–64 is a clear example of how the Liberal Party delivers on its promises. In the red book we said we would strengthen the Employment Equity Act and that is exactly what Bill C–64 does. This legislation is deeply rooted in our country's conscience. In our Constitution every individual has "the right to equality before and under the law and equal protection and benefit of the law".

The Reform Party in general and certainly the last speaker do not like the charter very much because they think protection of the individual should be limited, that the application of the charter should be narrow and that only those they say are deserving of its protection should receive that protection.

The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms specifically recognizes the rights of the individual and specifically recognizes that special programs are needed and that they are allowed in order to benefit those who are discriminated against in our society. That is what this bill addresses after all.

At the end of the day the bill is there because there are people who suffer in employment today because of accidents of their birth or accidents of their lives, accidents like colour, race, sex, disability.

We believe employment equity is about building a more caring and a more just society. It holds up a mirror to the fundamental principles that we all hold dear and it seeks to create a level playing field while providing practical and reasonable employment plans for employers.

Employment equity was conceived under a Liberal government initially drawing on the work of Madam Justice Abella and her commission. It reflects our party's long history of commitment to justice and equality for all Canadians, not just for the privileged classes.

Yet many insist on making the false assumption that federal employment equity is a carbon copy of the American affirmative action policy or of the Ontario bill. This was apparent in the comments of the last speaker and also in the comments of the member for Beaver River.

These speakers claim that Americans and Ontarians are now rejecting legislative efforts out of hand in the area of employment equity. That is simply not true. Bill C–64 is not affirmative action U.S. style. It is not the severe imposition of regulations put forward in the NDP Ontario bill.

Bill C–64 is really about fairness in the distribution of jobs. It is not about quotas. It is about levelling the employment playing field. It is not about preferential treatment. It is about fairness in human resources administration. It is not about complex regulations or greater administrative burdens for business.

This is a made in Canada, made in Ottawa bill that has none of the earmarks of the anti–discrimination legislation we might find in other jurisdictions. It certainly does not seek as its goal to attribute blame or to right past wrongs.

• (1650)

Reformers like to draw parallels to the American experience, but our bill differs from American affirmative action bills because our experience and our history differ from America's in significant ways. Our law has none of the excesses of the American program, excesses like inflexible quotas for jobs, quotas on college admissions, quotas on bidding preferences and minority set asides in procurement programs. That is not what is in the bill.

Bill C–64 is not punitive. Instead of penalizing citizens it encourages employers to recognize and use the largely untapped talents of women, persons with disabilities, aboriginal persons and members of visible minorities, members of the so–called special interest groups the prior speaker mentioned. These four designated groups account for 60 per cent of Canadian citizens.

Reformers also cited the Ontario experience but they play fast and furious with the facts. There are no quotas in the bill. Ontario has a third party complaint scheme which is central to the operation of its bill. Ours is more like a planning document for human resources development.

The Ontario bill has very broad regulatory powers which are not present in our bill. The threshold for being caught by the Ontario bill in the private sector is 50 employees. That catches 17,000 employers in Ontario. In our bill the threshold is just over 100 employees and catches only 350 employers. The Ontario bill develops new agencies and tribunals to enforce its act. Ours has no such new agencies.

Just after the Ontario election an omnibus polling of businesses showed they have supported employment equity but not that particular bill. Our bill, which is on a much different model, is much more satisfactory.

Another central feature of our system is our firm belief in flexible targets businesses can reasonably achieve. Under the bill the law is streamlined and clear. There is none of the complex or overlapping regulatory channels found in the United States, nor are there the tremendous regulatory burdens which one would find under the Ontario bill. Enforcement is streamlined, cost effective and relies on negotiated solutions rather than expensive litigation.

One of the main criticisms of the other systems has been their adversarial nature. Bill C–64 takes a consensual approach, an approach of compromise; another great Canadian tradition of helping to bring people together to work in harmony. It is practical. It is well thought out. It addresses inequality in the workplace. It is a uniquely Canadian solution to the challenge of getting the most potential from our highly diverse workforce.

What I am referring to here is the same ethos of fairness which is now driving many private companies to diversify their hirings. Some of those employers have told us how well this can work. Bob Sutherland, executive vice–president of human resources for the Royal Bank of Canada, said: "The Royal Bank has undoubtedly benefited by gaining access to some very talented members of the workforce, many of whom we might not have discovered otherwise".

Dan Branda, CEO of Hewlett–Packard Canada, told a Globe and Mail reporter that diversity "is an absolute business imperative because it gives us the edge in attracting the best and brightest people". Are they afraid of the employment equity bill? No.

Employment equity is about every Canadian having the opportunity to know that dignity and security come with a salary. Most of all we are putting into practise the very values which make each of us proud to be a Canadian: fairness, justice and equality not just for a chosen few but for all Canadians.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on the third reading debate of Bill C–64, an act respecting employment equity.

The hon. Minister of Human Resources Development has described the new employment equity legislation as follows: "This initiative is a significant step toward ensuring equitable employment opportunities for women, aboriginal peoples, persons with disabilities and members of visible minorities".

The President of the Treasury Board has echoed the minister of HRD, suggesting the legislation is necessary to ensure equity and fairness in the workplace.

I suggest this is a snow job by the Liberal government which is masquerading as a beacon of light when it is moving us back toward the dark ages.

• (1655)

I suggest this because governments that have experimented with employment equity have found it does not work and it does not matter how you couch the term. It does not matter whether you say it is not exactly the same as the American employment equity program or not exactly the same as Bob Rae's legislation. The principle is whether it is working. It has not worked in the United States. It was rejected by the voters of Ontario. It was rejected even by the Liberal Party of Ontario.

Meanwhile its elder brothers and sisters in Parliament are pushing ahead Bill C–64, a bill respecting employment equity. It talks about numerical targets or goals. It simply is talking about quotas and it is federal legislation which means it is the law of the land.

It is wrong. It is draconian. It is against the will and wishes of the Canadian people and it is against the prevailing wisdom of those who have experimented with employment equity in its various ways, shapes and forms and who have found it does not work.

The Liberal government has couched employment equity in terms that mask the true intent of the legislation. I heard the hon. member before me saying it is not what we think it is, it is sort of a wishy–washy, mishy–mushy–wushy piece of legislation.

It is employment equity. That is what the bill is called and that is what we are talking about here. I wish hon. members on the other side would have the courage to say they are proposing employment equity rather than saying it is something new that we have never tried that we do not really understand.

The government is going about to ensure equity and fairness in the workplace for all Canadians? I doubt it very much. I believe it is imperative to provide the House with a non–biased, general definition of employment equity. We picked one that members on both sides of the House should agree is fairly accurate.

Employment equity could be defined as results oriented actions that a government department or contractor by virtue of its contracts with the government must take to ensure equal employment opportunity. An employment equity program includes such goals as correcting underutilization and correction of problem areas. In addition, it may also include relief such as payback, retroactive seniority, make–up goals and timetables.

I could speak on a lot of these but I want to briefly talk about the unprogressive manipulation this legislation includes, the goals and timetables the government will surely be following to implement and cement the numerical targets it talks about.

This definition outlines the intent of the legislation. The Liberals undoubtedly have timetables to indicate that certain percentages of employees must be appropriate to women, aboriginal persons, persons with disabilities and members of visible minorities by a certain point. The employment equity policies can be viewed as results oriented, which indicates the results of proportional representation, regardless of qualifications, are the main focus of the legislation.

The Reform Party's position on this legislation is that an employment equity policy is unnecessary. It is ineffective. It is very costly. It is unpopular. Governments lose because they have tried to implement employment equity. It is discriminatory. It is intrusive. It is harmful to designated and to non–designated groups. The equality of all Canadians is recognized by affirming that hiring and promotion should be based solely on merit rather than on gender, race or other distinguishing factors of that nature.

Employment competition based on the merit principle is the key to both equality and productivity. The Reform Party has no qualms with encouraging the recruitment of qualified visible minorities and women through advertising and training programs. Visible minorities and women should then compete on a non–discriminatory, colour blind, gender neutral basis for jobs, promotions or educational positions.

The Reform Party believes discrimination is a heinous offence that needs to be rooted out of our workplace. However, this will not be achieved through employment equity legislation being orchestrated by the federal government. I believe private companies doing contract work with the government and government departments have the proper mechanisms to deal with discriminatory practices. Any problems not addressed by the company or the government department can be appealed to either provincial or federal human rights commissions under the human rights code.

Private companies in particular have a vested interest in maintaining a representative workforce because it makes good business sense. According to Fazil Mihlar of the Fraser Institute:

> The market solution of the problem as it stands is discriminatory employment costs firms money; therefore if an employer refuses to hire the best candidate for a particular job, the productivity of the discriminating employer is bound to fall and consequently produce less profit. The more competitive the industry, the less likely firms are to engage in discrimination.

• (1700)

The bottom line is that companies are capable of achieving employment equity without governments imposing legislation.

I could talk about the American experience. We have already been criticized in the House for doing that, but if time permitted I would.

We did a bit of research on the breakdown of electoral success in the House of Commons by gender as calculated from the 1993 federal election. The numbers are interesting and also a bit revealing.

I will start with the Reform Party. We were successful in electing 29 per cent of the female candidates our party had nominated. This was without any manipulation or any intervention whatsoever. We only elected 25 per cent of our male candidates. In other words, one quarter of the men who won nomination in our party were elected to the House. A higher percentage, 29 per cent, of the women who were nominated at the riding level by the Reform Party of Canada were successful in the 1993 federal election. This is with no manipulation by the leader of the party, no directives from our party office telling the constituencies: "Make sure you nominate women. We want a lot of women nominated from our party."

The members of our party who selected female candidates chose excellent candidates who garnered the support of their constituents. They were more successful than the male candidates.

If we look at the Liberal numbers, they are about even. They were actually a little less successful in electing female candidates than they were in electing male candidates. Now, as we know, the Liberals elected a lot more MPs to the House, so the percentage of successful male candidates was 60 per cent. That is why they have a majority government.

With all the manipulation, with the bypassing of the constituency nomination process and the anointing of star female candidates, they elected 59 per cent of the females, 1 per cent less than the male candidates they elected. So the wisdom of the Liberal Party hierarchy was not the same wisdom as the constituents in the ridings, who voted for who they felt was the best candidate.

This indicates the whole concept of employment equity, the playing around with quotas and jiggering around with results not based on merit but based on numerical targets does not work and is not effective. It even hurt the Liberals in the last election.

I see my time is running out. I want to talk about the party that has made the most noise about employment equity in Canada, the NDP. Its members have suggested very stringent quotas. They suggest that there has to be an equal number of women on their party councils and committees from top to bottom, inside and outside and around the corner.

They had 100 female candidates and they elected one, who happened to be their leader, the highest profile candidate they put forward to the Canadian electorate. So 1 per cent of their females were elected. They did not do so well on the male side either, but they did elect 4 per cent of their male candidates. This is from a party that has indicated that there must be employment equity, that it must be legislated and written in stone.

Instead of having the government on this side and the opposition on that side, they would almost want to have men on one side and women on the other and make sure it was equal. That is the approach they have taken to employment equity, and it just does not work. It has not worked for that party.

Why would the Liberals, who are intelligent people and a party that has been around for over 100 years, want to give us Bill C–64, which would try to impose upon companies and government departments what does not work in practicality, does not even work in their own party, which has been a failure everywhere it has been tried and which is disgusting and discriminatory by its very nature and is demeaning to the very people it is supposed to help?

I like to see visible minorities and female members in the House of Commons and in business, who are there because they are darned good, the best at what they do. I have a lot of respect for those people, whether they be black, white, yellow or red, whether they are male or female or whether they are handicapped in some way. I have a lot of respect for those people who made it on their own. If they are being given numerical quotas by a federal government and are given a position just because they happen to fit a certain category, it is demeaning to them.

• (1705)

I suggest this government should withdraw this legislation. It is wrong, it is immoral, and it does not work.

Government Orders

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for this opportunity to speak to Bill C–64, which would amend the current federal Employment Equity Act principally in the matter of introducing an enforcement regime. It is targeted at private sector enterprises of 100 employees or more that do business with the federal government. That encompasses hundreds and possibly thousands of private sector companies, any in fact who get a government contract.

I want to speak as a government MP because I am unhappy with this bill. I feel it is my duty to do so, even though I am but a single voice perhaps among my government colleagues. I must express my deep, deep reservations about this legislation.

In my view, Bill C–64 is seriously flawed. It is being rushed into law without the benefit of the careful consideration that is due any legislation that comes before this House.

First let me say that I do not doubt the government's nobility of purpose and sincerity of motive in bringing Bill C–64 forward. Strengthening the federal employment equity legislation was a red book commitment made by the Liberal Party prior to the last general election. A government that tries to live up to its promises cannot be faulted for trying to do so. Indeed, being faithful to one's promise is something all Canadians admire and applaud. Moreover, who is to argue against the desire to see that all Canadians have equal opportunity for employment and that no one is discriminated against on the basis of gender, non–relevant disability, or race? The noble purpose is noble indeed.

However, the fact that Bill C–64 springs from a promise is possibly one of the reasons it has come this far without adequate consideration of the huge problems it seems likely to create. It goes absolutely against some of the most basic concepts of justice and fair play, and in seeking to eradicate discrimination sets the stage for encouraging it.

I have to believe—and I do—that it has come this far because the government bureaucrats who framed it clause by clause did so more with a view to satisfying the government's desire to fulfil its promises quickly than to writing competent legislation. I find it hard to believe that professionals could have drafted something so obviously faulty.

I am not a lawyer, but it does not take a lawyer to see what is wrong with Bill C–64. Any Canadian knows the very essence of our democracy and our freedoms is predicated on the concepts that all are equal before the law and that everyone is entitled to a fair trial. When Bill C–64 is tested against these two principles it fails.

Let us consider the fair trial aspect. Bill C–64 requires that the target employers prepare equity employment plans and give an accounting annually of their progress in fulfilling these plans. I will spare the details, but suffice it to say that Bill C–64 describes minutely what it expects of employers when it comes to trying to achieve balance in the hiring of aboriginals, women, visible minorities, and the disabled.

To ensure these employers are fulfilling the requirements of the act, Bill C–64 provides for the creation of compliance officers, a kind of equity police administered by the Canadian Human Rights Commission, who are given the power to enter a company's premises and demand to see its books to ensure the company does have an appropriate equity plan and that it is acting upon it. Right here there is a problem. Mr. Speaker, I would remind you of the outcry that swept the nation when Bill C–68, the gun bill, proposed similar entry and search provisions to ensure compliance. Here we are apparently doing the same thing.

I suppose the argument, which I can hardly say is being debated either through public hearings or in this House, is that these compliance officers are equivalent to inspectors who come on to your premises to inspect elevators or read a gas meter. However, Bill C–64 gives these compliance officers extraordinary powers. If a company tries to deny them, the company can be taken to court, but not to any court as Canadians have come to understand the term. The court, which decides the guilt or innocence of a company and which ultimately decides on fines of up to $50,000, is a sub–tribunal of the existing human rights tribunal panel, whose president can name from one to three people to hear a case. There is no bar exam for these people to pass, no vetting by the elected representatives of the people. The president of the human rights tribunal panel gets to select whomever he pleases.

• (1710)

Tribunal is an appropriate term in this case. The word is very ancient, going back to Roman times, but it was in the Middle Ages and during the French Revolution that it acquired the connotation of drum–head justice, of people being hauled before citizen adjudicators who meted out punishment according to the temper or the distemper of the times.

The only real requirement to be a judge on the equity tribunals that Bill C–64 sets up is that the person so named be familiar with the equity employment theory and practice. Is that not the most eloquent invitation to bias you have ever heard? Will not the temptation to appoint employment equity activists simply be overwhelming? Will these tribunal judges not have more of an eye toward being politically correct rather than fair to the accused, to the company contesting the assessment of a compliance officer?

It gets worse. The equity tribunals that Bill C–64 sets up are courts of no appeal. The legislation specifically states that a company convicted by the tribunal has no recourse to another court unless on a technicality. There is no appeal. Whoever heard of such a thing? Even convicted murderers have the option of trying to appeal, but not an employer who fails to file an equity employment plan to the satisfaction of an equity employment tribunal.

I should note, however, that the action of initiating the levying of a fine against a company is to come from the Minister of Human Resources Development. The tribunal's role is to concur or not concur. Let us be candid here. The Minister of Human Resources Development we are talking about is not the political minister but the bureaucrats under him. If action leading to a fine is taken it will be by the deputy minister or an assistant deputy minister or an assistant to the assistant deputy minister. It will be a decision of the bureaucracy based on the recommendation of the human rights commission.

While I am entirely confident that the current Minister of Human Resources Development will always stay on top of his department and will personally review any proposal for a penalty against a private sector employer, how can we be sure that some future Minister of Human Resources Development will not get preoccupied and leave such decisions to the deputy minister or the assistant deputy minister or so on? This could be even worse than the tribunal. The ultimate decision to penalize a company will rest with the bureaucrats. They will decide. Although I believe that Canada's federal civil service is the best in the world, I question its understanding of and sympathy for the problems of private sector employers.

There is another reality. I hate to sound cynical, but these employment equity amendments may give even low–level bureaucrats a big stick. Companies vying for lucrative government contracts could be stopped in their tracks by the threat of employment equity complaints. They could be held to ransom by the unscrupulous. This may never be, but while 95 per cent of the people are honest, we have to watch out for that 5 per cent who are not.

If a company is trying to land a $100 million contract and a compliance officer suddenly says its employment equity plan is inadequate, what will occur? Bill C–64 makes no provision for policing the equity police.

The other major area of difficulty in Bill C–64 has to do with the fact that it exempts employers who would hire only aboriginals. I could speak at equal length about this problem, as it is equally fundamental and crucial. Suffice it to say that a bill that purports to try to eliminate discrimination actually condones it when it exempts a large group of Canadians solely by virtue of race. This is entirely contrary to the concept that we are all equal before the law. It is better to throw out a law entirely if it requires a clause that treats one Canadian differently than another based on birth rather than merit. This is exactly what Bill C–64 does. This is unfortunate. It sows the seeds of anger and conflict.

This all appears so obvious to me. I have to acknowledge that I am only a layman in legal matters, as was the majority of MPs who considered this bill in committee. Naturally I want to know what Canada's legal community has had to say about this legislation. Does it share my misgivings? There is no way of knowing. Other than the National Association of Women and the Law no lawyers' groups testified before the committee. I suspect they were never invited. Government funded special interest groups however were well represented.

• (1715)

There is my dilemma as a government MP. I see fundamental problems with Bill C–64 of a legalistic nature but little evidence that the legal experts have been consulted. It is wrong to leave it to the courts to decide after a bill has passed. We are supposed to iron out the problems beforehand.

I do not believe this has been done. The trouble is I can do nothing but stand here and speak. The bill went to committee after first reading, enabling it to be flipped through report stage and second reading to a vote in five consecutive sitting days of this House of Commons. Five consecutive days, that is all.

There were no committee hearings following second reading as normally is the practice. There has been no chance for me to see my misgivings put to rest by asking the standing committee to summon expert witnesses who could comment on my concerns.

I would like to have heard the opinion of the Canadian Bar Association on this legislation. No chance now. I would like to have lobbied my fellow MPs to get them to study the bill and express their opinions. No chance now. I would like to have heard from retired judges of long experience. No chance now.

It is curious. I am a first time MP. I never dreamed, ever, that laws were created in this fashion.

Mr. Bill Gilmour (Comox—Alberni, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I must say that it is refreshing to hear a Liberal talk about some of the concerns in a bill rather than just glowing over the top saying there are no problems at all. I applaud the member for putting forward his comments with the moral fortitude of speaking his mind.

I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on Bill C–64, an act to implement employment equity. Bill C–64 aims to legislatively entrench employment equity for the federal public service and businesses of 100 or more employees doing business with the federal government by setting up racial and sex based hiring quotas.

Canadians have several concerns with the proposed bill and so they should. It is contradictory. It is discriminatory. It is patronizing. The underlying principles undermine the values in which Canadians take the most pride, fairness and equality for all.

In my view, public service hiring and promotion should be guided by one principle and one principle alone and that is merit. The government clearly has a role in ensuring equal opportunity and employment competition based on merit. In this bill hiring and promotion based on race or sex is in direct conflict with merit. If the best candidate is to be hired, race or sex should not matter.

The bill patronizes designated groups. It assumes their mediocrity and presupposes that certain groups of individuals will not be hired or promoted in the workforce on their own merit, so the only way they are going to get hired or promoted is to give special favour to their race, gender or disability. This is nonsense.

Employment equity assumes that if people fall within a particular category they need assistance. This is not the case. Whether a person is male or female, a visible minority, disabled, does not define a person's need for assistance and when we jump to such conclusions it is called racism or sexism. Clearly entitlement to government positions should be based on individual merit, not the colour of the applicant's skin or gender.

In addition, race and sex based policies can be detrimental to the workplace. They create tension and bad feelings among co–workers. Equal opportunity means allowing the same opportunity to each individual regardless of race, sex or religion, not rewarding one group over another because of basic characteristics.

• (1720)

Employees should have the right to be free of discrimination in the workplace. This right should be protected by government, not withdrawn as the bill attempts to do. The bill is not about equality, fairness or hiring the most qualified people for the job. It is about giving special status to one group over another based on race or sex.

All Canadians should be equal before and under the law. This bill violates those basic Canadian rights. On that basis alone, the bill should not be allowed to pass.

Rights and privileges should not be based on race or gender. These ideas went out in the 19th century with the growth of universal democracy and individual rights and freedoms. The government talks about equality of opportunity but at the same time is introducing affirmative action legislation that is fundamentally opposed to equality. How can Canada claim to be in the forefront of human rights legislation with such discriminatory legislation?

Governments have mandated preferential policies toward designated groups in the past. Bill C–64 establishes laws and regulations that mandate Canadians treat people differently, to consider race and gender when hiring or promoting. In so doing, the government takes away individual respect and dignity and replaces it with a racist or a sexist hiring policy. This is going the wrong way.

No one should be accepted or rejected for a job based on race or gender. It is simply wrong to classify an applicant on the basis of these characteristics. Employees should be judged on the merit of their individual day to day accomplishments.

Blanket hiring of employees on the basis of race and gender is simply not acceptable to Canadians. More fundamentally, it is not the business of government to influence employment decisions in the private sector. Governments should not be imposing their bill on private business. Canadians do not need or want the influence of a big brother government watching over the private sector. Once again, the Liberals have underestimated the Canadian public. Canadians do not want this big brother approach meddling in their hiring practices.

In addition, I am concerned with the cost of the legislation. The government is proposing a program that could cost taxpayers billions. The total cost both direct and indirect of employment equity could amount to over $6 billion or nearly 1 per cent of the gross domestic product because it is going to affect a lot of businesses and people.

Where are the priorities of the government? It cannot guarantee seniors' pension funds, but it is prepared to throw $6 billion into employment equity. That is fundamentally wrong.

The legislation is misplaced by a government priority. Canadians will be most concerned by the enormous amounts of money that are going to be poured into this program because employment equity is unnecessary. The government claims it is eliminating barriers with this bill. It does not eliminate barriers, it creates them.

Obviously no one should discriminate against women, visible minorities or the disabled in hiring practices. I fail to see why we have this over reaction on the part of the government in an attempt to correct a problem that Canadians agree simply does not exist.

The Ontario election was fought on the issue of employment equity and the Liberals were defeated because they tried to force it down the throats of the electorate. In addition, this legislation is contradictory.

Bill C–64 states that no person should be denied employment opportunities for reasons other than ability. Yet the very essence of this act contradicts this statement. The bill promotes discrimination and legislates race and sex bias in the workplace.

All Canadians must be able to compete equally for jobs irrespective of race, gender or disability. Canadians should not be denied employment opportunities for reasons that have nothing to do with their abilities.

I must also point out that two wrongs do not make a right. Many young people today have enough strikes against them as they search the job market for whatever employment they can find. Employment equity will freeze out more opportunities for young people who do not fit into the preferential hiring practices, not because they lack the skills or ability but because of their personal hereditary characteristics. Any young person who has the misfortune of not falling into those categories is left out in the cold.

• (1725)

Applicants should not have to disclose the colour of their skin, their ethnic background, their gender or their religion. It is illegal to ask a person's age or marital status but to ask a person's race is all right? What is wrong with this picture?

Recently a Gallup poll showed that 74 per cent of Canadians oppose employment equity. If we were to poll Canadians today I am sure we would get the same results. In fact, the Ontario election is the latest and strongest indication that Canadians reject employment equity and are prepared to reject any government that proposes it. When will the government stop listening to special interest groups and start listening to Canadians?

In conclusion, I have to ask why the government insists on pushing legislation which is contrary to the views of most Canadians. This is the same mistake the last government made. We all know the price it paid for not listening. The real question is: Are the Liberals listening or are they going to force unwanted legislation on Canadians and suffer the same fate as the Conservatives? Time will tell.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to rise in the House to participate in the debate on Bill C–64, an act respecting employment equity.

[Translation]

When I listen to hon. members opposite, I sometimes have the impression that to them, employment equity is just a numbers game. That is not the case, The government has taken a holistic approach to employment equity. Contrary to what members of the Reform Party seem to believe, we are not just in the business of adding or subtracting numbers.

[English]

To the contrary, passage of Bill C–64 will enhance implementation of the Employment Equity Act so that we can continue to fight systemic discrimination and build a federally regulated workforce that reflects the diverse composition of Canadian society.

It is important to note it is not just the government which is concerned about diversity in the workforce. We know there are a growing number of employers who are getting behind employment equity. They are not treating it as some kind of statistical exercise, which seems to be the way members of the Reform Party look on it.

Employment equity is helping us to build a harmonious society. Employers are learning how to manage diversity. Being able to manage a diverse labour force will help business to draw on the broad expertise of people from many different social and economic backgrounds.

There are some fine examples, such as the employer's leadership skills course, which are helping managers to understand individual differences and how to lead teams made up of diverse members. Another employer gathers information on his employee's negative experiences to determine the best way to improve their situation.

Some employers are providing video training to upgrade the computer skills of employees with learning and visual disabilities. Some employers are introducing flexible holiday arrangements for employees who wish to participate in their own religious ceremonies on specific days each year.

The point I am making is that employers are working with all of their employees to create a productive and harmonious workplace which represents the diverse nature of the Canadian population.

I submit it is the Reform Party that has a fixation with numbers, not the government. The bill refers not to quotas but to equal treatment. For example, let us look at the amendment on self–identification that the government accepted during the report stage of the bill. The amendment accepts the right of the employer to make the case that under–representation of a group is due to a lack of self–identification and there is a requirement for compliance officers to take such information into account.

I want to tell the House something about self–identification. Self–identification has encouraged individuals in the designated groups to come forward. In the past many of these individuals have tried to hide their minority status from society. We must remember that for years people have felt that they had to keep their disability secret and their racial origins to themselves. That is now changing.

Since 1987 more people in the designated groups are self–identifying because they feel more comfortable about doing so.

• (1730)

[Translation]

We know that representation of women and members of visible minorities in the labour force has increased considerably. In the case of aboriginal peoples and persons with disabilities, the process has been slower but there has been an improvement.

[English]

Employment equity is not about adding a bunch of numbers and throwing them into a statistical report. The Reform Party is misleading Canadians by referring to employment equity in that way.

Bill C–64 accents reality. Its implementation will help us to use scarce resources in a way that will enable all Canadians to contribute their knowledge and skills to making a better Canada.

Many companies are already taking positive steps in that direction. Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has a wide range of measures to reach a representative workforce, including special initiatives for aboriginal people and for persons with intellectual disabilities.

[Translation]

Orth–McNeil, a drug company in Don Mills, Ontario, introduced flexible hours so that its female employees can either work at home or work part time after their maternity leave. York University in North York, Ontario, is always trying to increase representation of designated groups on its campus.

[English]

Even small and medium businesses recognize the importance of employment equity. On my way to the House of Commons from my riding office in Orléans at noon I stopped at a fast food restaurant for a quick lunch. The lady who served me had a speech impediment. I was served with politeness, speed and in a business–like manner. I commend the manager for recognizing employment equity and putting it into practice in the frontline of his business.

Bill C–64 is not about adding up a bunch of numbers and patting ourselves on the back because they look impressive. It is about doing the right thing and allowing all Canadians to feel they belong and can participate actively in a just and caring society. It is about ending systemic discrimination in the workplace and opening the labour force to all who are deserving based on ability. That is the thrust of the legislation and I am pleased to give it my wholehearted support.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I believe Canada is a cultural mosaic made up of citizens with various ethnic and religious backgrounds. Many of these people have overcome tremendous adversities to be able to reside in Canada where all citizens are supposed to be equal in the eyes of the law.

This sentiment has not always been shared or fostered across the land. At various times in our history certain groups have been the target of discrimination and persecution. These have scarred our past and from these times we have grown to be a much more tolerant and a much more civilized society.

I am not in favour of a homogenized Canada. I am in favour of equal access for all Canadians. Bill C–64 is an impediment to such access. By ensuring access to some, Liberals block access to others.

It is important to ensure Canadians from traditionally disadvantaged groups are given access to education and all the other benefits of Canadian citizenship, but this should not mean that special employment provisions are given to any group or individual in lieu of merit.

The opinion of the government is that these disadvantaged groups need special government legislated programs to be represented in the workforce. However legislation is overkill. Liberals will never achieve employment equity through divisive means even if it is imposed by the heavy hand of the law.

As an employer I am looking for a person who will do the job best. There is no race or gender attachment to that criterion; only merit. Under the government's plan I no longer have to find the best person for the job. I now have to find the best candidate from a designated group. This is not equal opportunity under the law. It is an enforced quota system.

The legislation states that employers with a workforce of at least 100 persons who are in the service of the federal government must comprise their workforce proportionately to the make–up of the population. The government has a fixation with numbers, quotas and statistics, which is why the Minister of Industry is going ahead with a census based on race, even on the nation of origin of Canadian citizens.

• (1735)

The Reform Party believes in an immigration policy that is colour blind and says that immigration based on race or country of origin is racism. If that is the case, what is legislation that is based on race or country of origin? I suggest respectfully it too is racism.

The government would lead us to believe that under representation of disadvantaged groups in the workplace is the result of discrimination. This is preposterous. In Canada citizens are free to choose the career of their choice. How could the government impose a plan on Canadians which quantifies access to certain jobs? If discrimination is wrong for one designated group, it is wrong for all Canadians.

To select someone for a job based on race or gender is just as wrong as not selecting the same person for the same reasons. All people must be equal regardless of race, language, creed, religion or gender.

Canada's employment practices have evolved to a level where we recognize the wrongs of the past. I would hope that we have also evolved to a level where we recognize that redemption for the oppression of one group should not be the oppression of another group. There is still considerable room for improvement. However Bill C–64 is clearly not the answer.

I should not expect the government to grasp the concept of equal opportunity. Its party has passed some of the most divisive legislation in Canadian history. According to Liberal dogma we as a country are supposed to find unity and strength by focusing on our differences and making exceptions for those differences.

Unfortunately we live in an intolerant world. We only have to watch the nightly news to see the atrocities that occur daily in the name of difference. Why would we in Canada, a country of incredible opportunity, focus on the differences of the population and legislate employment policies based on race, gender and disability?

To identify a specific group as disadvantaged gives a perception that it is incapable of succeeding on its own. This is clearly untrue and is a disservice to those groups.

I should mention that many women in my constituency have approached me on the issue. Uniformly they see quotas as demeaning their personal value, developed skills and work ethic. They want government meddling in the workforce eliminated, not enhanced.

When will the government realize the ramifications of its actions? The people of Ontario clearly voted against the unwanted employment equity legislation. Does it not see the divisions and animosity created by its policies? I wonder if the government has taken into consideration the long term effects of its quota systems, because they are quota systems. At what point do we reverse the discrimination angle and again promote those who have been kept down? This is a cyclical effect and the only solution is to end it now.

The government should be proactive, advocate equality in the truest sense of the word, treat all Canadians the same, tax them the same and educate them the same. As utopian as that may sound it is a positive step for the future.

As long as the government keeps legislating discriminatory ideology there is no possible means of attaining what is guaranteed under the charter, that we are all equal in the eyes of the law.

Mr. John Murphy (Annapolis Valley—Hants, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak today on Bill C–64, an act respecting employment equity.

I support the bill. I believe it is an important step in ensuring fairness and equity in the workplace. This is especially true for women, aboriginal people, persons of disability and members of visible minorities, all of whom represent segments of our society that have not always been given a fair opportunity. These groups continue to experience higher than average unemployment rates, lower than average salaries, and are concentrated in the lower paying jobs.

In recent weeks we have had a valuable debate about employment equity. It has allowed us to discuss an initiative that will help ensure all Canadians have equal opportunities in the workplace.

• (1740)

However throughout the debate there has been one recurring and unsettling element: the consistent effort of the Reform Party to practise the politics of polarization.

As I have listened to the debate, far too often members of the third party have chosen to misrepresent the intent and practice of employment equity. In so doing they have chosen a dangerous course. Instead of taking an important step forward they have opted for the status quo. Instead of making our society stronger and more inclusive they are spreading misinformation aimed at dividing people.

Before I deal with their politics of polarization, let me begin my remarks by noting other elements of the position of Reformers on the bill. The key element of their position is that infallible market forces are enough to address employment barriers. That was summarized in their minority addendum to the report of the standing committee. They stated quite clearly that the market would punish an employer whose employment practises had systemic discrimination built into them. Yet market forces alone cannot eradicate systemic discrimination. Voluntary measures toward achieving equity in the workplace have not brought about significant changes for many people.

There is another dimension to the Reform position, that is the denial of systemic discrimination in the workplace, discrimination that not only results from a conscious bias but from inadvertent practices and systems. In other words a seemingly neutral policy can have adverse impact on certain groups and individuals based on race, gender and disability.

The term systemic discrimination refers to this type of unintentional barrier to equality. However, when I listened to the arguments made by members of the third party, they believe only one kind of discrimination occurs when an employer says that he will not hire a person because she is a woman, a visible minority, an aboriginal person or has a disability. Systemic discrimination has nothing to do with any intention to discriminate. Canadian employers are fair. Many organizations have already recognized the existence of such discrimination in their workplace and are working hard to eliminate it.

That brings me to my final point, the politics of polarization. Time and time again hon. members in the third party have chosen to debate the issue in terms that can only create confusion and division. They talk about quotas when the bill explicitly rejects them. They claim the bill promotes a new kind of discrimination when it clearly does not. They harp on this as an attack on merit, yet the bill explicitly states that no employer will ever be forced to hire an unqualified person. That bears repeating because the third party is trying to confuse the people of Canada. The bill explicitly states that no employer will ever be forced to hire an unqualified person.

I advise my hon. colleagues across the way to take some time to sit down and read through the bill. They should read section 5 where they will see what employer obligations really are. They should read section 6 where they will see what is not an obligation. They should read section 10 where they will see what an employment equity plan really is.

Bill C–64 is about making all reasonable efforts to build workplaces that respect people. In listening to the arguments of my colleagues across the way it is clear they have chosen to ignore the experience of many employers covered under the existing legislation. They are making employment equity work the right way. They see it as a human resource planning pool. They know that a key element of an effective equity program is communication. People need to know what equity is and conversely they need to know what it is not.

When members of the Reform Party suggest that the legislation is about stealing legitimate opportunities from some to give it to the undeserving, what kind of a response do they expect? It would seem that they want a backlash. Rather than focusing on the issues of real equity in the workplace, they instead focus on misinformation about what the bill really stands for. They are trying to capitalize on genuine concerns many Canadians have about their jobs and their future.

• (1745)

Let us be clear. The Reform Party wants short term political gain based on the politics of fear.

This bill responds to a real problem. It reaffirms our government's commitment to equity for all Canadians. Our government is living up to its responsibility and we are working to make positive changes for Canadians. We realize that denying this problem will not make it go away.

In closing, Bill C–64 is not about giving unfair advantage to certain designated groups; it is about equality and removing barriers to employment. When this bill comes to final vote I will be on the side of building a stronger and more inclusive society in Canada. I will vote in favour of Bill C–64 and I encourage all members of this House to do the same.

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to be back in the House after a week's break. Things have not changed too much. I heard Reform mentioned quite often which is music to my ears. We must be saying something right.

I always say that the proof is in the pudding and to practise what you preach. For example, we have tried to be employed as committee vice–chairmen in this House for a number of years. For some reason it has not held true that we have been equally treated to that extent. We have capable people who should be employed as vice–chairs in the committees but it does not seem to work that way. That is democracy Liberal style, I heard an hon. member say, but let us get down to the basics.

It is a pleasure to address this bill, an act representing employment equity. I would like to add my voice to those of my colleagues in opposition to this offensive piece of legislation.

This bill sets out to achieve numerical equity by occupational groups in the following workplaces that employ 100 or more people: the federal public service; federally regulated private business; and businesses that undertake contracts with the federal government. The bill sets out to do this by correcting conditions of the disadvantaged experienced by certain groups through the use of racial and gender based quotas.

Under this bill all affected businesses would have to comply with extensive reporting obligations, including filing detailed analyses of their hiring practices and racial breakdowns of their staffs. This is a costly imposition.

The Reform Party believes that all Canadians are equal under the law and all Canadians have the right to be free from discrimination in the workplace. No one should be denied an employment opportunity for reasons that have nothing to do with inherent ability. The Reform Party also believes that merit should be the sole hiring criteria in the workplace. To pass over the best qualified candidate in order to fill a racially based quota is a denial of the merit principle and in itself is racist.

We believe in a system that is colour blind and gender neutral. Canadians who wish to pursue a certain vocation should not face barriers of discrimination. Those with ability and discipline deserve the rewards of their hard work.

The key assumption underlining the notion of equality in Bill C–64 is that equality means equality of numerical representation in the workplace. Even in a perfect world it seems unlikely that people from designated groups would enter each segment of the workforce in numbers precisely equal to their representation in the workplace. Yet this government persists in depending on numerical equality as the standard of justice.

• (1750)

A 1993–94 report on employment equity in the public service says that self–identification is the backbone of the employment equity program. This raises a serious concern over the reliability of the self–identification process. Many people may refuse to identify themselves as a member of a designated group because they fear they would be seen differently by co–workers. This avoidance could then skew the statistical base. If enough people refused to self–identify, then the appearance of discrimination would be elevated.

For example, the Clerk of the House of Commons appeared with the result of a self–identification survey before the standing committee studying this bill. This survey was sent to 1,700 House employees. Just 23 per cent returned the survey. Of that number, less than 50 identified themselves as a member of a designated group. Clearly the appearance of non–compliance can be created by inadequate data.

A 1992–93 report on employment equity in the public service stated that the number of visible minority employees may be underidentified by one and one–half times and the number of disabled by two and one–half times. This has serious implications for employers. If some members of designated groups fail to identify themselves as belonging to a designated group, the employer would have to consistently report an unrepresentative workplace. In this case the employer would be forced to report non–compliance when in fact he or she might be complying.

There is also the aspect that employees would be tempted to falsify self–identification surveys. Since no verification is ever attempted, no studies have been conducted on the possibility of abuse in this regard. However, the 1994 report of the Employment Equity Act notes that in 1991, 2.3 million Canadians reported having a disability, an increase of 30 per cent over 1986. Only part of this can be explained by an aging population.

This bill gives Canadians a strong motive to count themselves in as disadvantaged. Even more confusing is the fact there is no uniform definition of disability used in Canada and disabilities are often determined on a case by case basis.

This type of legislation results in reverse discrimination. It attempts to fight racism or sexism by racist and sexist means.

For a while in 1992 the RCMP in Alberta stopped accepting applications from white males. The RCMP now operates several preferential hiring programs. Out of the 426 cadets in training this year, 74 per cent must be selected from three of the four designated groups.

Polls in Canada have consistently shown that Canadians do not want employment equity programs. A 1993 Gallup poll showed that 74 per cent said that qualifications should be the sole criteria for hiring for management positions. The question is: When will this government start listening to Canadians instead of forcing legislation on them that they do not want?

This seems to have been the Liberal agenda for the last couple of years: "Do as we say or you will not do as you should be doing according to your constituents". This is another prime example of the Liberal government trying to force through legislation that will be detrimental not just to this country but to the economy of the country. It is time we recognized that we have to listen to the grassroots people, that we have to listen to the grassroots businesses. They have the answers for this country and that is what the people of Canada want.

• (1755)

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on October 3 in this very House at the start of the debate on the amendment motions to Bill C–64, the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest said: "The private sector by and large is light years ahead of the government in its relationship with minority groups".

That comes from one of the more enlightened members of the Reform Party. Imagine what the rest of them must be thinking when such a glaring error has been made. That is incorrect and false information. It was not intended to be. It just happened to be because that member did not know as his colleagues do not know the truth of the matter. I want to set the record straight.

Our latest annual report was tabled in the House by the Minister of Human Resources Development and the President of the Treasury Board. It shows that for three of the designated groups, that is, women, aboriginal peoples and persons with disabilities, in representation levels the ratios of designated group members to the entire workforce are higher in the federal public service than in the whole federally regulated private sector. Those are the facts.

The lower representation of visible minorities in the public service as a whole is due in part to the fact that the public service does not have an equivalent to the banking sector where representation is 13 per cent.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Duhamel: The Reform Party does not get its facts straight because when we attempt to put the facts on the table, Reformers will not listen. I am going to continue to give them the facts and perhaps some day they will sink in.

Jobs in the public service in contrast to the federally regulated sector are not as concentrated in large Canadian metropolitan areas. These are the urban centres where the vast majority of Canadians of a visible minority are residing. However, visible minorities make up 8.3 per cent of the relatively well paid scientific and professional category of the public service.

It should also be noted that right now, one out of five executives in the public service is a woman. What is it in the private sector? One in ten. I suppose the Reform Party is going to tell me that is better. I suppose Reform members are going to tell me that is because women have been favoured. No, it is not because they have been favoured. It is because there have been open policies which have recognized the systemic discrimination and in part it has been corrected.

Professor Andrew Hede of the University of Southern Queensland in Australia published a comparative analysis of women executives in public services. Drawing from the experience in Britain, the United States and Australia he wrote: "Canada is the clear front runner in the equity stakes". Why will my colleagues from the Reform Party not admit that we are leaders? I know why. It is because they cannot possibly admit whenever the government does something right.

Make no mistake about it. There is still a lot that needs to be done, but we are making progress. These are sound policies. It is unfortunate that some people would want to peg them as discriminatory for political gain.

[Translation]

Now for my comments on Bill C–64. Some people have a poor perception of employment equity and of Bill C–64 in particular. They believe, and in my opinion they are wrong, that these are radical social experiments. One wonders whether there is no awareness or appreciation of the past and present policies of this government which are aimed at helping the most vulnerable members of our society and thus increasing employment equity.

Let me present the facts so that these people will understand the historic background of this bill. I hope this will improve their perspective and give them a better appreciation of employment equity.

I will provide a history of the development of employment equity at the federal level, with some specific examples of the situation, past and present, in the public service.

[English]

What I am about to say will make it abundantly clear, and it may even be understood by those who do not want to see it, that employment equity is not a revolution that would target and punish groups which may have benefited from the employment system in the past. Rather, I want to paint employment equity in Canada as an evolutionary social policy initiative consistent with the tradition of fairness and dignity for all that is so prevalent in the mainstream of Canadian society. That is what it is all about.

• (1800)

Let me give some examples of a few very significant historical milestones.

The Royal Commission on the Status of Women was a stimulus for early efforts by the federal government in the 1970s to deal systematically with issues of representation in the public service.

In the early 1980s the federal government introduced a program to bring about the equitable representation and distribution of women, aboriginal peoples, and persons with disabilities in the public service. In 1985 visible minorities were included in the program.

The government also launched the special measures programs to encourage the recruitment of designated group members. A service–wide self–identification survey was carried out to provide the numerical information for the program.

[Translation]

And in 1986, following the 1984 report of the Royal Commission on Employment Equity, sometimes referred to as the Abella Report, the federal government passed the Employment Equity Act. The government also introduced Treasury Board's policy on employment equity.

In 1988, the government appointed the Task Force on Barriers to Women in the Public Service whose report Beneath the Veneer was published in 1990. The report recommended a broad range of measures to attract, train and maintain women in positions at all levels. It provided the inspiration for a number of important proposals made in the White Paper on Public Service Renewal, Public Service 2000, and in the Public Service Reform Act tabled in the House of Commons.

In 1989, Treasury Board introduced an annual program of employment equity merit awards to celebrate outstanding achievements by departments with respect to various designated groups. That same year the Canadian Centre for Management Development opened its doors. Among other things, the centre encourages the implementation of key employment equity objectives, including diversity management.

Also in 1989, Treasury Board adopted a policy on services available to persons with disabilities.

[English]

In 1990 the secretary of the Treasury Board, with advice from a deputy ministerial committee, set goals for the achievement of equity for the four designated groups, reviewed accountability mechanisms, monitored developments with respect to national strategies and initiatives, and gave advice to departments on communications strategies and efforts.

In May 1992 the government announced its intention to legislate employment equity in the public service through amendments to the Financial Administration Act, thereby confirming by statute obligations on the public service that were comparable to those placed on federally regulated employers under the Employment Equity Act.

On June 18, 1992 royal assent was given to a bill modifying six federal laws pertaining to persons with disabilities, two of which were a Treasury Board responsibility. These were the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act. The acts were modified to facilitate access to government records and to have personal information in an alternative format for persons with a sensory disability.

In December 1992 Parliament passed the Public Service Reform Act which amended various federal acts, including the Financial Administration Act. As a result of these revisions, the President of the Treasury Board is now required to table in Parliament an annual report on the state of employment equity in the public service during the immediately preceding fiscal year.

[Translation]

In 1993, the framework for better employment equity in the public service in the 1990s was published. This framework was the product of reflection by the secretary of Treasury Board with the support of a group of deputy ministers. It described a new approach to employment equity at a time when resources were few and managers and employees were increasingly being asked to be accountable by focussing service on the client and coming up with their own ways to promote a positive corporate culture.

In April 1994, Treasury Board approved the implementation of a new program of special measures replacing previous special measures programs. This new program advocated more innovation and flexibility in increasing representation by members of the designated groups and changing corporate culture within the public service.

[English]

Finally, in December 1994 the government introduced Bill C–64, an act respecting employment equity. It brings private and public sector employers, including the public service, under a single legislated regime. Employers would be subject to identical obligations to implement employment equity and a uniform process. The Canadian Human Rights Commission would be authorized to conduct compliance audits.

• (1805)

[Translation]

This is the reality. I have just described it. I hope my colleagues opposite will stop using this expression and this program in an attempt to claim they hold the key to the truth. I hope that, finally, they will stop and look, open their eyes and their heart, and admit that, without such programs, women, aboriginal peoples, members of visible minorities and other inadequately represented groups would not be given favourable treatment.

I could go on at length, but I feel I have nevertheless set out the facts. If they keep an open mind, something all members should have, these hon. members will approve and support a government bill in the end.

[English]

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is not a pleasure to stand and address this bill. I know it is customary for people to stand and tell the Speaker and the House that it is a real pleasure to be here. However, I can say quite honestly that this is a horrible piece of legislation. I cannot believe that members across the way would stand in support of legislation that started under the Conservative government. I guess we can see that they truly are soulmates.

I listened with interest to the hon. member from Manitoba describe with religious fervour how much he supports the legislation. He listed statute after statute, suggesting that somehow this was great legislation that would bring about equity and we would all be drinking free beer and there would be food and happiness across the land. Unfortunately, that is not the way it works.

The hon. member talked about the need to have all kinds of legislation and the wonderful things the government has done with respect to employment equity. Long before the government got involved in the game, people from different countries came to Canada and somehow over a period of time they got along and worked together and eventually they all worked together in government.

I am certain my hon. friend from Manitoba could tell us stories about the experiences of his family and growing up on the prairies. My family came from the prairies. When the prairies were settled 75 to 100 years ago there were people who came from all around the world. They all spoke different languages and had completely different heritages. After a while, as they got to know each other, which took some time, they started to work together and they became not only co–workers but friends. Eventually, of course, it finds its way up the system and it is now seen in government.

I would like to point out to my friends across the way that society is almost always ahead of the government on these issues. I believe it is truly the case, even in the situation we had where a few years ago the government started legislating through employment equity in those industries that fell under federal jurisdiction. I point to a study that was done a few years ago of the broadcast industry, where it was found that the CBC was actually far behind some of the private sector broadcasters. I refer to CITY–TV in Toronto, where it has always reflected that community in the make–up of the people who went on the air. The CBC was way behind. Of course everyone panicked, because the government was not following the legislation. CITY–TV was well ahead on that issue.

I worked for the same company that CITY–TV actually belonged to. We ran into all kinds of problems with the legislation because, among other things, people had to self–identify. Other members have spoken on that issue.

In the little radio station I ran there was someone who was aboriginal but who refused to identify as an aboriginal. And hair on him. I think that is great. People do not want to be seen as victims. They say "I can make it on my own". In fact, they were already in our employ, so obviously we did not discriminate.

• (1810)

People have the capability of doing these things on their own. They do not need the government standing there at every step, saying: "You are a victim, so we are going to step in; we are going to stand on everybody else's fingers just so we can make sure you get into the workforce".

I would argue that society is always way out ahead of government on these issues. If people want to see rough equalities, give it a few years. People will eventually realize it is in their best interest to hire people on the basis of merit alone. In fact we see that in many successful companies today.

I would argue that it is very hard for the government to micro–manage people's businesses to the point where they can say that it is in the best interests of a company to hire these people from such and such a group. The reason I would make that argument is because people who are coming from a visible minority of some kind perhaps are coming from another country where they have not yet had training in a particular area, and until they have been in the country for a while they perhaps do not have all the necessary skills. But that is a function of education; it is not a function of legislation by the government. Let those people find the education they need and eventually they will find their way into those industries.

We do not need the government to stand there and crack the whip and say that because 40 per cent of the population in your area is made up of blue people you have to have blue people, even if those blue people are not necessarily qualified. That is crazy. I think you will find that most people would regard that as degrading. It is absolutely degrading. I think people will rise on their own merits. We do not need to have some kind of a quota system, such as is being proposed here.

My friends across the way shake their heads and say no, it is not a quota system. If you were told that you have to hire from these particular groups to fulfil this legislation, then of course ultimately it is a quota. The numbers may not be on there, but as my friend from Lisgar—Marquette has pointed out, in 1992 the RCMP in Alberta were hiring all of their people out of employment equity legislation, which means that nobody else had a chance to apply. The numbers may not be written down specifically in the legislation, but if the scope of the legislation is such that it suggests that these are all you have to choose from, then ultimately people do not have a choice. They do not have the ability to hire the people they want to hire based on merit. That is ridiculous. That is absolutely crazy.

I would argue that public debate is always the answer in these things. Not very long ago, and I could not believe it, we had people suggesting we should have a speech code in the House of Commons, that we should have some little kangaroo court passing judgment on whether or not what people say in here is appropriate.

Public discourse and public debate will always be the ultimate arbiter when it comes to these things. For all the improvements we have seen in the country in terms of being tolerant to other groups and that kind of thing over the last 125 years, the credit does not belong to this place. The credit belongs to intelligent men and women over the course of history who have realized that the person next door may not be the same as me, but they are my equal and therefore I accept them. That is an education process. It is part of the public discourse. It is part of the public debate. And in every case I can think of where we have brought legislation in here, including in 1929, when we finally decided that women would be recognized as persons, I would guarantee you that the politicians were behind the public.

Certainly in 1929 men and women who worked side by side on the farm on the prairies respected each other. They recognized each other as people. In this place it took us until 1929 to figure that out. That is ridiculous. Again, I say we are way behind the times in this place on this particular piece of legislation.

Let us talk about sauce for the goose and sauce for the gander. Let us talk about the fact that the House of Commons, while it suggests this is good legislation for federally regulated industries and contractors who do business with the government, would never bind itself by this legislation. I do not see my hon. friends across the way advocating that they should be bound by the legislation and should have to hire people from particular groups. I see them shaking their heads and looking nervously about.

• (1815)

Here we go again. This is just like the MP pension debate. The Canada pension plan for seniors has to be cut but MPs are different. Somehow the legislation should apply to everybody else but us. Now they are shaking their heads. However, they cannot for a moment justify why this legislation does not apply to them. Look at those guys over here. They are reduced to heckling because they cannot justify their position. They cannot justify why this legislation would not apply to themselves. That speaks volumes about where they stand on this issue when it comes right down to their offices. They think it is good in theory. They think it is good for the general public in abstract but when it comes to their offices there is just no way.

Actions speak louder than words. The government by not applying this to the House of Commons has shown that it really is not as committed as it claims to be. It believes it is good in theory for others but not for itself.

I believe Canadians have shown that they will reject this. Seventy-four per cent of the people across Canada, according to Gallup, do not want this type of legislation. We saw it hammered down in Ontario. It is time the government woke up and smelled the coffee and decided that it is going to get in touch with the Canadian agenda, not its own agenda and not the agenda of some special interest group or some bureaucrat who is completely out of touch with what people think. We would not have this crazy kind of legislation in this place any more if it did.

Mr. Peter Thalheimer (Timmins—Chapleau, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am appalled at the way hon. members of the Reform Party are misrepresenting Bill C-64 to the Canadian public. They are consistently using terms that do not apply to this legislation either in fact or in spirit.

In its minority report, the Reform Party makes it look like employment equity and affirmation action are one and the same thing. However, any astute Canadian reading Bill C-64 or the current Employment Equity Act can see quite clearly that employment equity is not affirmative action.

I suppose it is fitting, in keeping with its small r republican status, that the Reform Party tries to equate everything with the way things are done in the United States of America. However, employment equity is a fair and just Canadian manner of addressing the inequality of opportunity experienced by persons with disabilities, aboriginal peoples, visible minorities and women.

Of course we know why the hon. members of the Reform Party use the term affirmative action. For the Reform Party, affirmative action is a code word for preferential treatment and in Reformers' convoluted attempts to obfuscate and derail this legislation they think they can pull the wool over the eyes of Canadians by taking this approach.

Canadians are a lot smarter than the members of the Reform Party realize. They will not be bamboozled by smokescreen language that fails to address the true spirit of Bill C-64.

Reform has a section titled "Are Numerical Goals Really Quotas?" in its minority report. I am delighted to be able to tell the hon. members opposite that the answer is no. Numerical goals are not quotas.

I would like to take a moment to tell members of the Reform Party what the difference is between quotas and goals since it is clear from their arguments that they do not seem to know. I want to say at the outset that Bill C-64 specifically states that quotas cannot be imposed. Under the bill a quota is defined as a requirement to hire or promote a fixed and arbitrary number of persons during a given period. I refer them to section 33.

• (1820)

Most Canadians understand the difference between numerical goals and quotas, even if the Reform Party does not understand. Goals are based on the availability of qualified people to do a given job. Quotas are arbitrarily determined.

The bill clearly states that employers will not be required to hire unqualified people. Goals are percentages of anticipated hirings and promotions that an employer aims to achieve but quotas are usually fixed numbers of positions.

The bill specifically states that employers will not be required to set fixed and arbitrary goals. Employers must make reasonable efforts to achieve goals. Quotas must be attained regardless of the circumstances. The bill clearly states that if employers make reasonable efforts to implement their goals they will be found in compliance.

This is the Canadian way. The government's approach to implementing employment equity can be described as flow based. We are asking well–intentioned men and women to work in collaboration with one another to achieve employment equity goals within a reasonable time frame. That time frame is flexible depending on individual circumstances. We know everyone is not able to move ahead at the same pace and the commission will take that into consideration.

We have a process for those few employers who do not comply with the legislation. We know from experience that the majority of employers bring a very positive attitude toward achieving the goals set out in Bill C–64 and the Employment Equity Act.

Why is the Reform Party misrepresenting the legislation and misleading Canadians regarding its intent? Canadians support equality in the workplace for members of designated groups.

I can assure hon. members opposite that they will not score political points by misconstruing the spirit of the legislation. The goal of Bill C–64 is not to place undue hardship on any employer who is making an honest effort to meet the spirit of the new act. I repeat again, because it seems members of the Reform are having as hard time grasping this, we are only asking for and we only expect that employers make all reasonable effort to comply with the act's provisions.

I ask the hon. members of the Reform Party to consider their bogus argument about the necessity of meeting quotas. The bill specifically rules out quotas. It is that simple.

We know from recent studies that the majority of people entering the labour force will come from members of designated groups. That is simply one more reason that employment equity makes good economic sense. It will help employers focus on accessing the skills of those productive and hard working individuals.

This legislation is a positive step for Canadians. It will help us gain a diverse and highly skilled workforce that will ensure Canada a competitive edge in the rapidly expanding global marketplace. For that reason I am pleased to be able to support Bill C–64.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to this bill on employment equity, a concept with which I have no problem. We still need in our society, however enlightened it might tend to be, some recognition that not all aspects of our society are as accepting of visible minorities, aboriginals, females, people with handicaps in the workplace or in our society as is generally perceived to be most appropriate.

I have no objection in society attempting to use the law as is being proposed in the equity bill to force this sort of compliance to avoid discrimination for any of the reasons this proposal lists.

I am therefore basically in support of the idea of employment equity and the requirement that employers give equal opportunity for all people regardless of the circumstances of their birth or what life may have imposed on them by way of disability after birth.

• (1825)

However, the bill has not done a good job of looking at the global economy of the new world order we are now living in, which has presented a much different form of employment than what this bill and what most of the legislation that governments have put together deal with. These kinds of bills and laws function on an employer–employee relationship. They are virtually toothless when it comes to a new world where more and more people are self–employed, where contracting, subcontracting and subcontracting the subcontracting goes on, so there are three, four and five levels of contract.

As a consequence of that new practice it is virtually impossible to supply the kind of protection this bill proposes to do. If members do not believe me they should walk outside of the doors of this House. There is a program going on, the Peace Tower project, in which we have seen the most blatant treatment of an employee because she was female. The House, on whose territory this injustice took place, appears to be unable or unwilling to do anything about it. It is under the aegis of the Speaker but he seems unable to do anything. The job was contracted by the minister of public works who cannot find 10 minutes of time to even discuss it with me and whose officials actually aided the ejection of this woman and her fellow workers from the site. They had to leave their tools which they cannot recover.

The several times they have attempted to recover the tools employees of Public Works and Government Services Canada have told them that they are disrupting the building site and that they cannot have their tools because the current contractor is using them to complete the job. The contractor forced them to leave the job site because they insisted on using a female engineer.

If we are going to be believable in this Chamber in trying to deal with questions of inequality in the workplace we are going to have to recognize that very often in this new world order the workplace is run by people who have subcontracted and subcontracted those contracts to the point that it is impossible to hold the employer who makes those kinds of decisions, however arbitrary, unfair and normally illegal, responsible. We cannot do anything about it.

As a consequence, the subcontractor has forced the building trades people, the masons who were working on the Peace Tower, off the job because they persisted in using a female engineer. He had no objection to her work. He was only objecting because she was female. He made that quite clear. He forced them off the job. They left their tools and they cannot recover them. They can go to court. They have due process. I have talked to members on the government side who have said: "Use due process, that is what you have to do".

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, you are aware that due process in this case is almost useless because her employer, the mason that hired her to be the engineer for his part of the project, is not the person who is forcing her off the site but the subcontractor above him. The Ontario Human Rights Commission has some trouble dealing with this.

Others have advised me. Others of the legal profession from the government side have said: "Look to the federal human rights commissioner. He is obviously the one who has to do this because it is on a federal site and it is for the federal houses of Parliament for Pete's sake". Again the person that has pushed her off the site is not her employer and there seems to be nothing that the human rights commissioner can do in the case of this injustice.

• (1830)

I raised this briefly at second reading and I remind members on all sides that if this kind of injustice is to be permitted on our own grounds literally and figuratively and we can do nothing about it, what is the point of replicating the same type of legislation using the same requirements only on employers versus employees without taking into account the contractors and the subcontractors and all the other permutations that occur in business?

What are we really accomplishing? We are accomplishing very little except perhaps to make the whole process and the whole political group of us in the House look rather silly.

I keep preaching from my far corner. Very few people are in the House when I do my little rant on these things, but I hope the new ears hearing this each time take this to the rest of their colleagues and see if there is some way we can force compliance if not across the country at least on the acres of yard in front of the House.

This is a great injustice and makes the whole process of attempting to get employment equity to permit females equal access to jobs as engineers or scientists or doctors or lawyers. It makes the whole process of the last 15 or 20 years look absolutely ridiculous.

This woman is apparently considering going back to washing dishes because that is the only employment she can find at the moment. She had a job as an engineer. The subcontractor hiring her firm to work on the Peace Tower forced it off the job because it persisted in employing a woman engineer.

For his efforts that subcontractor was rewarded with a further subcontract to work on the whole House of Commons instead of just the Peace Tower after he engaged in this process.

I cannot let any debate or any discussion of an equity employment bill go by without reminding members of the House, and I hope some of the frontbenchers will take this to heart, that we have allowed a grave injustice just outside our doors. If any of the laws we pass in this place are to be taken seriously by people outside of Ottawa, we should be able to enforce what we have already made law numerous years ago when work gets done on our buildings on the confines of Parliament Hill.

Until that happens I am afraid I will look sceptically at this new effort at achieving employment equity.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, listening to the last presentation, it proves the point that so much of this comes down to enforcement of what we already have.

We have laws to protect against discrimination and obviously if those laws are implemented we need not to go any further or introduce any kind of new laws.

I have not heard very much talk about what the business community is saying. Coming from that area I have to put some emphasis on what it is saying about the job equity program.

I am a little annoyed that we should be dealing with this bill in the House which will basically institutionalize discrimination in the workplace. This is exactly what I feel Bill C–64 does, and the Liberal government should be ashamed of promoting this sort of archaic legislation.

We have heard from many Reform speakers now. It is absolutely clear why we oppose this bill. We are not racist. We are not sexist and those gurus of political correctness who try to pin that label on the opponents of affirmative action should be publicly condemned for their behaviour.

• (1835)

Reformers know that the huge majority of Canadians are utterly opposed to setting up discriminatory quotas for the hiring and promotion of target groups such as visible minorities. Such discrimination is wrong, no matter what disguise we put on it or what name we put on it. Calling it employment equity and calling the quotas numerical targets does not change a thing. Everyone in the House should know that.

For those who argue the wrongs of the past have to be corrected through measures such as these, two wrongs do not make a right. There was discrimination in the past and not everyone got a fair shake in life. That is terrible but we have come a long way and we are moving very quickly to right those wrongs. We have come a long way and now the UN even goes so far as to say we are the best country. I agree with that.

The kind of big government, social engineering contained in the bill is utterly unconscionable. Canadians want less government interference in their lives, not more. This is especially true in the case of affirmative action. The role of government is to provide equality before the law and to prohibit discrimination. However, Bill C–64 does exactly the opposite.

Bill C–64 enshrines inequality before the law. It encourages reverse discrimination. Perhaps worst of all, it propagates a victim mentality among our citizens. Minorities and women should think of themselves as equal partners in building the future of Canada. They should be encouraged to compete, to succeed and to provide for their families.

Bill C–64 is absolutely terrible because it sends the wrong messages. It tells our women and visible minorities they are victims, that they are oppressed and that without special legislation they will be incapable of succeeding in our society. This message is not only false but is extremely counter productive and does nothing to build Canada for the 21st Century.

Bill C–64 will create a tremendous number of problems for the country. They will go on and on and become greater and greater, much as the Americans have found since the introduction of their legislation in the sixties. Now they are having to remove it. There will be social costs and there will be economic costs among many other problems associated with this kind of legislation.

As far as the social costs of affirmative action, there are many. To begin with, the bill promotes an unusual them versus us kind of confrontation in the workplace. This confrontation takes place on two levels. There is a confrontation between workers who have already been hired and there is a confrontation between job candidates.

For job candidates the situation under affirmative action is very clear. If they are not a member of one of the target groups they are penalized. If they are they are entitled to special preference. Not only does this mean the all important merit principle is being overridden, but such discriminatory treatment will foster resentment among the majority against candidates who receive the special treatment. As the resentment builds it could very easily lead to an ugly backlash against people from visible minorities when they are not really the problem at all.

The problem is bad legislation. The problem is the government's ill-conceived social engineering which will have very serious side effects.

The first major social problem is that merit is not the sole reason for hiring under Bill C–64. Once the country slides down that slippery slope there is no telling where we will end up.

Among those who are already working there are other serious problems associated with employment equity. The two most significant problems involve promotions and layoffs. In both these cases giving preference to certain employees over others can have devastating consequences not only for the efficiency of the business but for workplace harmony.

Imagine a company with 100 employees struggling to make ends meet. Under these circumstances it is essential that everyone work as a team. The very future of the company depends on it. Let us assume 10 people have to be laid off. Under market conditions the business would get rid of the 10 people who are the most expendable. Under affirmative action, however, what would the company do? If certain employees were seen as exempt from these layoffs, how would this affect workplace team work and camaraderie? The answer is obvious and everyone in the House knows it.

• (1840)

The exact same situation would occur in the case of promotions. If employees feel their very livelihood and careers are being hindered by affirmative action they will strike back, and this is exactly what we do not want. The workplace should be an opportunity to succeed through skill and hard work. It should not be a place where Canadian citizens are penalized or rewarded for their skin colour or their sex.

Beyond the very obvious social costs, there are also economic costs to this legislation. If we use the Ontario employment equity law as an example, the Chamber of Commerce estimated that a company with more than 500 employees would have to spend $100,000 just to comply with the paperwork. This figure does not even begin to factor in the intangibles caused by hiring, firing and promoting workers on the basis of race, sex or disability.

In the U.S., California particularly, the total cost of affirmative action has been estimated as high as 4 per cent of GDP. That is exactly the same as what is spent on all the education programs in that state. Even if this is double the actual number it still translates into billions of dollars lost. In a time of global competition we must become efficient. We must not tie the hands of our businesses behind their backs.

The U.S. is now abandoning this system of affirmative action because it did not work. It was one of those social experiments of the 1960s. In Ontario the Harris government has decided to scrap the lousy affirmative action law of the previous NDP government. Why? It was too costly and because it would not work. The Ontario Liberal Party agrees completely and would also throw out this program had it been elected.

I wonder why its federal counterparts are so utterly out of touch with the wishes of the Canadian public. Maybe they know what Canadians want but they simply do not care. Is it possible there is so much arrogance on the government side of the House that it thinks it knows better than the Canadian public? Will those paragons of political correctness in the Liberal benches rise up to save the country from its own folly?

There are many flaws in this bill, many things we could explore. Unfortunately my time is soon up. It is late in the day. I ask everyone to think about Bill C–64 and the institutionalizing discrimination it causes. I ask everyone in the House to consider before they vote on this and think about the consequences for this great country.

Mr. McClelland: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. With unanimous consent may we ask the House to consider it 6.51 p.m.?

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Deputy Speaker: At the request of the deputy whip the vote is deferred until five o'clock tomorrow afternoon. Is there now unanimous consent to call it 6.51?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

• (1845)

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

ENDANGERED SPECIES

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, on June 11, 1992 the Canadian government signed the United Nations convention on biological diversity in which it made a commitment that this country would pass legislation to protect endangered species.

More than three years later, eight of the twelve provinces and territories still have neither federal nor provincial legislation. There is no time to waste. Canada currently has 244 known endangered species. The number of species at risk has tripled in the past 10 years and the list continues to grow.

On August 17 of this year the Minister of the Environment took the first step toward meeting Canada's obligation when she announced the legislative proposal for a Canadian endangered species protection act. Unfortunately the minister's proposal fails to live up to either the letter or the spirit of Canada's international commitment to protect endangered species. The proposal only applies to species that live in national parks or on other specified federal lands. It covers only 4 per cent of Canada's total land base and eliminates the north entirely.

On September 28 of this year in the House I asked the minister if she would ensure effective protection of endangered species by strengthening the proposed new act. The minister admitted that the legislation did not cover as many species as the government would like and blamed it on the fact that provincial governments had jurisdiction in certain areas. Canadians concerned about the survival of these species cannot accept this excuse for ineffective legislation. A species threatened with extinction is of national importance.

The federal government has more authority than the minister is willing to admit. Effective protection of endangered species requires federal leadership when the provinces refuse to act. For example, the provisions of the minister's proposal only apply to species found in Canada's oceans and not to freshwater fisheries, even though the Fisheries Act indicates that freshwater species are clearly within the federal government's jurisdiction.

The proposed act could also be applied to all migratory species and not just those that happen to wander on to federal land. A few lucky species will have "response statements" prepared about them but no time limits apply and the government will prepare recovery plans for affected species only if it feels like it.

Truly effective legislation would require recovery plans for all endangered and threatened species and would prohibit the killing or harming of them. Habitat loss is the number one cause of species decline in Canada and is the main threat for approximately 80 per cent of Canada's endangered species. To effectively protect endangered species the legislation must protect the habitat they need to survive.

The government has completely ignored the recommendation of the federal endangered species task force to prohibit any activities that would destroy the critical habitat of an endangered species.

Realizing how important it is to identify and resolve potential conflicts before development begins, the task force also recommended that the legislation require advance review and approval for any proposed activity which could affect an endangered species or its habitat. This recommendation was not followed even though experience in the United States shows that advance review resolves almost all potential conflict between development and endangered species.

I should mention on a related topic that today is the day the endangered spaces campaign is releasing its second book, an interim report or owner's manual. It is most important we remember how integrally spaces and species are tied together. I urge every member of Parliament to read the interim report and support its recommendations.

The government says it is committed to protecting—

The Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately the member's time has expired.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri-food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the federal government is strongly committed to ensuring effective protection of Canada's endangered species, which is part of our rich biological heritage.

Although certain aspects of the proposed legislation directly affect only a little more than 5 per cent of Canada's land base, it would also apply to federally managed species everywhere and federally managed marine areas.

• (1850)

The proposed legislation would establish a national listing process that would give legal recognition to all species in Canada at some risk of extinction regardless of where they occur. It is intended to form the federal component of a comprehensive national safety net for the country's most vulnerable species, a safety net in which the federal government does its part in co-operation with the provinces and the territories to ensure that species like the polar bear will continue to grace not only our coins but also our vast northern landscape.

With the co-operation of federal, provincial and territorial governments the proposed legislation would provide a strong national approach for the conservation of endangered species. This action will not intrude in provincial responsibilities. The federal government recognizes the common but differentiated responsibilities of the federal, provincial and territorial governments with respect to endangered species.

The proposed legislation is intended to complement, not contradict, provincial and territorial actions. The federal government is prepared to do its part and encourages the provincial and territorial governments to do theirs to ensure a truly national approach for endangered species conservation. We are confident of their support.

Canadians have a moral responsibility to ensure that future generations enjoy and benefit from the presence of diverse wildlife species. The federal, provincial and territorial governments must provide the required leadership and legislative tools.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie, NDP): Mr. Speaker, on October 3, I rose to put a question to the minister of agriculture asking him to justify the apparent changes in policy direction that have occurred with regard to the $1.6 billion ex gratia payment to offset the decline in farmland prices that would result from cutting the Crow benefit. It was contained in the budget. It appeared that the $1.6 billion would go to land owners free of current capital gain tax. It would simply accrue to the land and therefore would not be taxable in the year received.

Since that time a number of changes occurred. Some of them were hinted at in the budget speech but others were simply outright decisions that were made, notably changes to permit people who were renting the land to apply for some of the payment. However there was no similar treatment for those people in terms of a share they might negotiate from the land holder. Any share they might negotiate from the owner of the land would be taxable as income in the year received.

They could not apply it to any land or property they might own now and were therefore treated differently. Because about 40 per cent of land in most provinces is rented it seems to some observers like a rather clever and devious way for the government to collect income tax on money it had announced was to be paid out on a non-taxable basis. That is one complaint that I raised.

The other was that there seemed to be a very ill-defined standard for what lands would be eligible. It looked as if all farmland, presumably land that was cultivated at one time or now and used for crops, would under the government's estimation lose value. Therefore this payment was presumably to go to those lands. Yet as the nature of the program became clearer land seeded to permanent crops, forage, alfalfa and so on, were not eligible simply by definition somewhere throughout the system.

Yet crops that were to be used for forage, such as barley or oats for cattle feed or livestock feed either as silage or as grain, are eligible. Even stranger, summer fallow which grows absolutely nothing was eligible on the same basis as land that was growing crops. This seemed to run contrary to everything the Department of Agriculture had been attempting to convey to farmers over the previous 10 or 15 years, namely to get into a diversity of crops, to plant crops that would hold the soil in place and keep down wind erosion. They were encouraging continuous cropping to keep stubble. I would submit that forage crops are also a form of continuous cropping. They hold the stubble and the ground. They are part of the diversification program, not only for use within the country but also for export.

The government and perhaps some of the farm organizations that were negotiating with the government left those farmers off the list. I wanted to raise that in question period and again this evening in the adjournment debate.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri-food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the federal budget of last February did contain certain proposals on the payment to compensate for the ending of the Western Grain Transportation Act.

At the time of the budget, the government made very clear its intentions to consult extensively with farm leaders on these proposals so that the program would be as fair and as workable as possible.

In the budget we proposed that land which would be eligible for the $1.6 billion ex gratia payment was that land producing WGTA eligible crops and summer fallow. These provide reasonable approximation of the land base which benefit from the WGTA subsidy. This proposal was taken to farm leaders for discussion.

Through these consultations, farm leaders accepted the government's proposal on eligible acres and agreed that forage not be included. Adding forage crops to the payment base would have significantly diluted the payment.

In the case of who should receive the payment, again we took the government's proposal to pay landlords to farm leaders for discussion. Through consultations farm leaders told us they agreed with the proposal but felt those who rent farmland should also be somehow recognized in the program.

Based on this advice, the application procedures have been designed to ensure that owners and renters reach an agreement on how part of the benefit may be passed on to renters. It is expected that in many instances this will occur through lower farmland rental rates.

Through extensive meetings with farm leaders, the government was able to reach acceptance of the proposals on eligible acres. It was able to address the concerns of farm groups by adding a provision for renters in the application procedures for the program.

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 38, the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24.

(The House adjourned at 6.57 p.m.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, October 17, 1995

The House met at 10 a.m.

Prayers

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to three petitions.

* * *

[Translation]

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in English and in French, the report of the 6th annual meeting of the Canada–Japan interparliamentary group, held in Tokyo and Osaka from September 9 to 16, 1995.

[English]

Japan is Canada's largest trading partner after the United States. The volume of trade has more than doubled since 1985 and is increasingly diversified in composition.

In 1994 Canada's exports to Japan rose 13 per cent to $9.5 billion, resulting in an increase of over $1 billion for the second year in a row.

Ignoring the impact of liberalized Japanese markets and increased Canadian competitiveness, projected exports from Canada to Japan will climb to $14 billion in the year 2002, which is 80 per cent greater than 1993 levels.

• (1005)

While in Japan, members of the delegation were able to express Canadian concerns and promote Canadian excellence with our Japanese counterparts. This will help ensure a growing Canadian presence in the Japanese market and allow us to work with our business communities in encouraging increased commercial activity with Japan.

* * *

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think you might find unanimous consent for a House order along the following lines:

> That today the first item of business on Government Orders be resumption of debate at third reading of Bill C–64, an act respecting employment equity, and that at the conclusion of two hours of debate, or at such earlier time as no one rises to speak, the question shall be deemed to have been put, a division deemed demanded and the vote deferred until 5 p.m. this day, provided that no amendment to the motion for third reading shall be received by the Chair during such extended debate.

(Motion agreed to.)

* * *

PETITIONS

BOVINE SOMATOTROPIN

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to present this morning. I am pleased to do so on behalf of many constituents of Regina—Lumsden as well as the surrounding area.

The first petition is signed by a number of people who are concerned about the approval of a synthetic bovine growth hormone, known as BGH or BST, a drug injected into cows to increase milk production.

These signators call on Parliament to take steps to keep BGH out of Canada through legislating a moratorium or stoppage on BGH use and sale until the year 2000 and examining the outstanding health and economic questions through an independent and transparent review.

THE SENATE

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have another petition concerning the Senate of Canada. It is signed by many constituents of Regina—Lumsden and other parts of Saskatchewan. The petitioners are quite concerned about taxpayers' money being spent on the Senate, an unelected, unaccountable institution which is costing Canadians over $54 million a year.

They request Parliament urge the government to abolish the Senate, which would save taxpayers this money and eliminate a body which is in essence useless for Canadians.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I present a petition today with 26 names. The petition arises from proposals coming before the Department of National Defence to change the tendering process. Its signators believe the process we have now is fair and equitable and serves all moving vans appropriately.

The petitioners call on Parliament to resolve the situation and to veto any proposed change to the present tendering process of the Department of National Defence and to support the present system of tendering moving processes for all military personnel.

* * *

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY ACT

The House resumed from October 16 consideration of the motion that Bill C–64, an act respecting employment equity, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, millions of Canadian workers experience barriers preventing them from participating as fully as possible in the labour market. For example, many women continue to be ghettoized in low paying and part time work. In spite of that fact, in 1990 women obtained 55 per cent of university bachelor degrees.

Unjust hiring criteria, attitudinal barriers and uneven training and promotion practices still prevent women, as well as persons with disabilities, aboriginal people and members of visible minorities, from achieving equality in the workplace.

• (1010)

In light of these facts there can be no doubt in anyone's mind that employment equity is not only a good thing, it is a necessary thing. Good business practice would require that companies do something to improve access to world markets. Members of ethnocultural communities, with insider cultural linguistic knowledge as well as contacts with their country of origin, can play a key role in penetrating new markets. They are a rich resource in the workplace environment.

It is puzzling to me how the Reform Party can fail to see the desirability of the bill now before the House. My colleagues on the opposite side of the Chamber seem frozen in time. I have news for them, the past cannot be resuscitated. The 1950s are over.

We live in a radically restructured working world, different from anything that has gone before. Rapidly changing technologies and failing trade barriers are globalizing the economy, challenging us to become more competitive.

Canada's export driven economy is heavily dependent on foreign sales. Expansion into emerging markets, most notably in Latin America and Asia, will change even further our economic reality.

This greater interdependence poses new challenges. It means that our business organizations must be able to understand the culture and outlook of our new consumers.

Another fact of Canadian life is Canada's evolution as a technology based society. Knowledge is key to Canada's future prosperity and our human resources are our greatest asset.

Consequently, policies that develop our human capital are pivotal to our ability to compete. As everyone can see, employment equity is nothing to be feared or shunned. It is a policy that permits our society to move forward and to take into account the talents and potential of all our citizens.

It is no surprise that Canadian companies with experience in employment equity are often the strongest supporters of this legislation. They have seen firsthand how employment equity programs bring them numerous benefits. By having a fair and efficient human resources development strategy and a very efficient environment, employers have a chance to access a broader set of skills, a base of skills that makes their companies more productive. By improving the workplace they stabilize their workforce, boost employer's morale and increase productivity. They also enhance their corporate image in the community at large.

Employers cannot afford to exclude a wide segment of qualified individuals if they want to survive and succeed in the global economy. Private sector companies, and among them most progressive business leaders, have long appreciated the added value of employment equity.

Our challenge in the workplace is to accommodate the different needs of our diverse workforce and to demonstrate flexibility. These initiatives are in no way a threat to other Canadians.

Bill C–64 is not about hurting the chances of white males to earn a living and pursue a career. It is about creating real equality of opportunity in the federal government, in the federally regulated private sector and among federal contractors. It recognizes that making overt discrimination illegal and unacceptable in society was a critical step to that goal.

The next step is for employers and society to find and break down the hidden barriers that discourage people from applying for jobs or that keep them in certain occupational ghettos.

Bill C–64 ensures that employers look at their workforce and their employment practices thoroughly in order to identify and remove barriers. They then set targets for hiring and promotion that create greater access for qualified people. With the proper tools and strategy they will achieve these results.

Far from taking anything away from anyone, employment equity offers something of value to everyone. It permits employers to build greater trust and dialogue with all their employees and unions moving forward from awareness to action.

The Reform minority report shows little appreciation of this potential for creating a more level playing field for all Canadians. Instead, it offers a narrow view of discrimination and exotic examples of university admission policies, most of which are not even Canadian.

• (1015)

The existence of systemic discrimination does not seem to trouble the Reform Party. It boldly proclaims that Canadian employers do not discriminate on a systemic basis. Contrary to what the Reform Party members say with their usual confidence, systemic discrimination unfortunately is still very much part of our daily life. It continues to exist because organizations hold on to workplace practices that place barriers in front of certain people.

Many companies and organizations inspired by the act have chosen to eliminate barriers. The Royal Bank worked with aboriginal Canadians to improve the interviewing process. In a report issued by the Royal Bank it shared some of its philosophy with regard to its activities: "With a labour shortage predicted in the future and a more diverse population, it is very important to get off the mark quickly, before the labour crunch hits. Serving a diverse group of clients well means having a representative workforce".

The Royal Bank's example and that of other organizations is precisely the approach taken by the federal government with Bill C–64. Far from dividing people, employment equity helps us to forge a fairer future and build a better country. It is not about guilt and punishment, nor is it about tearing down merit based hiring systems so as to hire the unqualified. The bill actually forbids quotas. It states specifically that employers do not have to hire unqualified workers. The merit principle is only enhanced by this legislation.

When we eliminate irrelevant criteria for hiring, does that not strengthen the merit principle even further? When we ensure that more people have more chances to apply for a job or get suitable training, does that not strengthen the merit principle even further?

Bill C–64 makes merit work. It opens doors to opportunity that have been closed for far too long. The fact that designated groups are under–represented and concentrated in lower paying jobs is a reality the Reform Party just does not understand. These groups have historically had higher unemployment rates and lower average salaries. They have also tended to be concentrated in a few occupational groups.

If Canadians were to accept the Reform Party's stand on this issue, they would also have to accept the fact that somehow women, aboriginal Canadians, visible minorities and disabled Canadians choose lower salaries and higher unemployment rates. We know and Canadians know that aboriginal Canadians, visible minorities and designated groups want good jobs and good salaries like the rest of Canadians. The Reform Party wants us to believe that those individuals love to be ghettoized in low paying jobs, that they love high unemployment. That is not the fact.

The reality is quite simple. We can look at our society in a very simple way or we can try to break down the barriers that have left some people unfortunately in situations Reform Party members certainly would not want to be in themselves. That shows the hypocrisy of the Reform Party.

• (1020)

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on Bill C–64 today.

The government likes to talk about Bill C–64 in terms of employment equity and it shudders when the terms affirmative action or quotas are used. The reality is the bill is exactly about quotas and affirmative action. What else can it be when numerical targets are provided, employers are required by law to attain those targets, and those who fail to do so are subject to significant fines? This legislation is about quotas, pure and simple, and it is wrong, pure and simple.

The entire premise of Bill C–64 is built on the concept of correcting historical wrongs. There was discrimination in Canada's past. I will use women in the RCMP as an example. Women were not allowed to join the RCMP as regular employees until 1974. That was discriminatory. Women who were born prior to the 1940s were discriminated against because they were denied the opportunity to apply to become regular members of the RCMP. However, for the past 21 years women have had the opportunity to apply for positions. There have been successes and failures. Now we are starting to see women cracking the commissioned officer ranks of the force.

If nature were allowed to take its course, over time we would see the numbers in the RCMP change dramatically, as all those males retire who were hired under a men only policy. This is not good enough for the government, as it wants to legislate the ratios immediately. It does not take into consideration the fact that fewer women than men are likely to see police work as a desirable occupation.

The reality of police work is that it is a dangerous job. People shoot at you, punch you in the face and fight you when you try to arrest them. For some strange reason this does not have a lot of appeal for many women. I do not know why that is. The way I look at it, if you are going to spend your Friday nights fighting drunks you might as well get paid for it, but that is another matter.

The reality is that since the pool of male applicants for police work is significantly larger than the pool of female applicants, it is not surprising there are more qualified men than women applying for those jobs. That is not to say there will not be a significant female presence on any police force that hires solely on the merit principle. I have absolutely no doubt that the top female recruits compare favourably with the top male recruits. However, this bill ignores the principle of hiring based on merit. We will have a situation where the RCMP will be hiring some female applicants who are less qualified than some male applicants, who will not be hired because of this legislation.

The government says that this discrimination is justified. When we look carefully, we will have a system whereby females will receive a special advantage because their mothers were discriminated against. At the same time, the government will endorse state sponsored discrimination against males because their fathers had an unfair advantage over 20 years ago. I guess this all makes sense to the government, but it sure does not give me any positive feeling. The convoluted logic behind this argument is surprising, to say the least.

I ask the government, when has one form of discrimination ever righted any wrongs created by a different form of discrimination? People are already being hurt by employment equity programs, and this bill is going to make it worse. I have met a number of young men who want to become police officers. They have degrees in criminology and they meet all the other criteria. However, when they happen to be white males not only can they not get hired, but they have been told they should not even waste their time applying for the position. These men have never received any specific advantages because they are white males, yet this government believes they must be punished because at some point in time white males did receive unfair advantage.

Perhaps these young men should be instructed to turn their career sights to the nursing profession. Here is an occupation that has been traditionally staffed by a disproportionate number of females, so with the new employment equity legislation many more men will be hired for this profession because of their under–representation. Right? Wrong. Since men do not qualify as one of the designated groups, they do not rate protection under Bill C–64. Despite the fact that men have traditionally been under–represented in the nursing profession, just as females have traditionally been under–represented in the policing profession, this bill works only in one direction, and that is in itself discriminatory.

• (1025)

Is that not what Bill C–64 is all about, the creation of state sponsored discrimination? Let us treat people differently because of their gender or their race. Let us punish young white males today because their fathers may have received special and unfair advantages decades ago.

We all know that it is easy to pass legislation due to which other people are expected to make sacrifices but not the lawmakers. That was quite apparent when the government dealt with MP pensions and it is quite apparent here. The government has no problem imposing these quotas on others but is it prepared to live up to the spirit of the legislation itself?

When one looks at the cabinet one sees an extreme over–representation of white males. Of the 23 cabinet ministers in the House, excluding the secretaries of state, only four are female. If we were to make the cabinet demographically correct there would be more females.

Once the government passes Bill C–64, I am very curious to know which eight white males will resign their cabinet positions and give up their spaces for females. Which eight are prepared to sacrifice the additional $46,645 of the cabinet salary? Which eight are prepared to sacrifice their jobs, just as they expect others to do in the name of employment equity?

I am proud to belong to a party that believes that the only criterion in hiring or promoting is that the best qualified person should be given the job. If this principle were followed I am sure we would have a workforce that is truly reflective of the Canadian mosaic.

As a female I find it extremely insulting to suggest that I need special legislation to compete with a man. I believe the things I have accomplished have been because of my abilities, not my gender. I am proud that when I won the Reform Party nomination for my constituency I competed on an equal basis with five males and I won a first ballot victory, not because of my gender but because of my abilities.

During the election campaign the Liberal, Conservative and NDP candidates were all male. While I certainly do not believe I won just because of my gender, it obviously was not a detriment to my campaign.

There are a number of people in this country who are sexist and racist and who engage in other forms of discrimination. They will not disappear just because Bill C–64 is passed. If the government wanted to deal with discrimination in hiring or in promotion practices in the public service all it had to do was make it clear that anyone who engages in such a practice will be immediately fired. If this approach had been taken we would have obtained the same results without instituting the state sponsored discrimination that Bill C–64 brings.

I cannot support any legislation that is discriminatory and racist in content and institutionalizes the concept that individuals in Canada will be treated differently because of their gender or race.

I will not ask government members to vote against Bill C–64 because I look forward to going into the next federal election with them having to defend it, just like Lyn McLeod had to defend her support for employment equity in the recent Ontario election. As the old saying goes, those who forget the past are doomed to repeat it. I take it the Liberals are saying they are intent on following the footsteps of the Ontario Liberals in the next federal election. That is just fine with me.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was intending to ask the member a question. I have immense respect for the member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley. In her opening remarks she said the bill was enshrining quotas and numerical targets and I immediately became concerned and consulted with my colleague, the parliamentary secretary to the minister of human resources.

• (1030)

It is very important that the House and the people of Canada specifically understand clause 6 of Bill C–64 because it basically abolishes the entire premise of the member's speech:

> 6. The obligation to implement employment equity does not require an employer
>
> (a) to take a particular measure to implement employment equity where the taking of that measure would cause undue hardship to the employer;
>
> (b) to hire or promote unqualified persons;
>
> (c) with respect to the public sector, to hire or promote persons without basing the hiring or promotion on selection according to merit in cases where the Public Service Employment Act requires that hiring or promotion be based on selection according to merit; or
>
> (d) to create new positions in its workforce.

With respect to the member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, the premise of her entire speech goes right down the chute when we read the exact wording. It is not a written speech where people want to take partisan, political gimmick shots. They know there is a current in the community right now which thinks that a bill like this is designed to tell the senior management of business that it must hire 15 people from this country or that country, that it must hire 20 per cent of people of this colour or that colour, or this language or that language, or with this disability or that disability.

That is what the Reform Party is trying to spin on this bill. Quite frankly I find it distasteful. I find it distasteful because the very first day the leader of the Reform Party stood in the House of Commons he said they would not come into the House and take cheap, political, partisan shots. If they saw something good coming from the government, they would not get into political gimmickry, they would support the government. What we have today is a beautiful example of Reform Party gimmickry.

Mr. Epp: Strong principles.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): This has nothing to do with principles. I want to repeat clause 6 for Canadians from coast to coast. I will even go to the person who hates me most in my riding, the biggest Reform Party supporter in my riding who will never vote for me. I will look him in the eye and hold up clause 6 of this bill:

> 6. The obligation to implement employment equity does not require an employer
>
> (a) to take a particular measure to implement employment equity where the taking of that measure would cause undue hardship to the employer;

I am a businessman; my background is in business. That is all I need as a business person. If I can prove for my small business that it will cause undue hardship, then I am fine.

• (1035)

I am a passionate believer in the government's policy on multiculturalism. I am also one of the few believers in the vision for the country that Pierre Trudeau put forth. He was so far ahead of his time as a Prime Minister that the Reform Party does not even understand it. In 1971 Pierre Trudeau stood in the House and said: "We will have a policy on multiculturalism in which no culture is less than or greater than another culture". I know the member supports that.

We have spent taxpayers' money to encourage people who came here, whether they were from Germany, Italy or Austria, to keep their language and culture of origin. We have become a globally trading nation. Today the greatest trading advantage this country has is that there are Canadians who have preserved their language and culture of origin. They can go back to their country or that of their parents and talk about doing deals.

I will give a concrete example. Last week during our recess I spent four days in Austria with my former employer, Frank Stronach, chairman of Magna International. In the last 18 months he has returned to spend a lot of time in his country of origin. Part of this was because of our rotten tax system; the government has to get up to speed on changing the tax system.

I will go back to the notion of multiculturalism. Last week I saw Frank Stronach doing deals in Canadian technology in the automotive industry. He was selling that Canadian technology in Austria. We all think the Europeans are far ahead of us but they are not. Canadian automobile manufacturing technology is much further advanced than in many parts of Europe. He was over there with Canadians doing deals. Because he has preserved his language and feels comfortable with his country of origin, he is doing deals left, right and centre. Is he doing this just for the Austrian community? No, he is exporting Canadian jobs and Canadian manufacturing.

That is why I am so passionately committed to the notion of multiculturalism. It is the greatest trading strength our country has. I do not give a darn what anybody says about Pierre Trudeau's being a centralist. I am a centralist. People knock him for building a strong national government. Our government is dismantling too much too fast.

I call this multiculturalism, phase two. With this bill on employment equity we are further sensitizing our communities, especially our business communities which build on the policy of multiculturalism. Wake up people, because if we can have a business organization that is sensitive to all cultures, all communities of the world, then the chances for our survival will be far greater than if we lived in a cocoon.

There may be one or two minor flaws in the bill but I have absolutely no problem supporting the bill. I will have even less problem going door to door selling it. I will take on any Reformer who wants to go with me, street to street. In the end the Liberal policy will win, if it is properly explained by the words in the act and not by spinning little aspects of it that make it look as if we are trying to punish white Anglo Saxon males. This bill is not about that.

• (1040)

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the words of the hon. member. He defended Pierre Trudeau by saying that Mr. Trudeau was far ahead of his time. Not that long ago I was up on the sixth floor of this building looking at a series of photographs which started with Lester Bowles Pearson and went right through to Kim Campbell. I thought that if one wanted to graphically illustrate the trouble with Canada, one could use those five pictures of those Prime Ministers starting with Lester Bowles Pearson, with Mr. Trudeau's picture being the pre-eminent one in the whole lot. That is the problem with Canada.

I come from a business background. The reason I am here in the House of Commons is not that I ever wanted to be a politician. It is not that I wanted to come to Ottawa and be part of this. It is that the policies and the actions of this government over a period of 25 to 30 years annoyed me to the point where I could no longer sit at home and watch what was going on without becoming actively involved.

What we have here is an elitist group of people who believe they know better than anyone else how the country should run. They want to dictate from the top down how we are to organize our lives and run our affairs. That is what the member is talking about.

The whole idea of employment equity is repugnant. Anywhere in the world where this has been tried it has not worked. The employment equity philosophy is that we somehow have to help people because they cannot make it on their own. I cannot think of anything more patronizing. If I were part of one of the minority groups being targeted to be helped by this legislation I would find it extremely offensive. Not only that, this kind of legislation creates divisions in our society that we do not need. It creates an us versus them mentality.

I do not know how many times I have listened to people saying: "I feel like a second class citizen in my own country". That is the kind of feeling this type of legislation generates in people. They feel they can no longer walk around this country and feel they are part of a nation.

I suggest to the hon. member and the members of the government that if they think this legislation would ever be supported by the Canadian people, then put it to a referendum. Find out whether the Canadian people would accept this kind of top down management, this kind of elitist attitude that we somehow can control society and make it better.

These people have the attitude that government has solutions. The attitude of the people on this side, certainly people from the Reform Party, is that government in most instances is the creator of problems not the solver of problems. That is why I am here. The government made so many problems for me in my business that I eventually got tired of being in business and sold it. The government does not create solutions; it creates problems. It is this kind of attitude and this kind of legislation that creates more problems for Canadian businesses and industry.

After this bill is passed the quota police will be going into small and large businesses looking over their shoulders to see who they hire. The whole idea of hiring and elevating people on the basis of merit is going out the window. We will be looking at what kind of disadvantaged group people come from or what kind of multicultural aspect they have to offer to a business rather than whether they have something to contribute in terms of ability, effort and merit.

I find the bill absolutely repugnant. I find the philosophy of the bill absolutely repugnant. I cannot believe that grown men and women would support it. I certainly do not believe that a vast majority of Canadians from coast to coast would support it. Therefore I will be voting against it. I am sure any thinking person in the House will be voting against it.

Mrs. Jane Stewart (Brant, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to join in the debate on Bill C–64 not only as a legislator but as a practitioner who in the private sector has applied this legislation very effectively. I reiterate what my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood has pointed out. This act when utilized to its fullest potential allows Canadian businesses to be more competitive than any other businesses in the world.

• (1045)

Let us look at the act and figure out what it really asks employers to do. First the act says that employers should look at the demographics of the labour force around their businesses. They should look at the percentages of white able bodied men, women, the disabled, visible minorities and aboriginals, and then look inside at the representation of their employee bases. In almost every case companies look inside and find that they are not representative, not even close to being representative.

When they see that displayed in front of them so clearly very often they ask how they can possibly be serving their customers or clients effectively when they do not have members in their employee bases that come from those communities, that have those ethnic backgrounds or that have that gender understanding.

They then say there is something to the legislation, that there is something they have to do. They begin to ask themselves how they have let this happen. How have they allowed their employee bases to become so homogeneous? What is it about the way they do business that has encouraged this?

In the bill the government requests employers to take a look at the numbers, at the representation, and build targets for themselves, targets and not quotas to give themselves a time line so that they can make shifts and their employed population is more representative of the surrounding society, their customers, their clients. The recommendation in the regulations is that they look at the employment systems that exist within companies: how people hire, how people promote, how they recruit, how they fire and how they retire.

When we actually start to look at the internal mechanisms of how these activities occur it is fascinating to find, unfortunately very often, aspects of systemic discrimination. This is not to suggest that we want to be discriminatory. People do not want to discriminate. However over time things have become systemic or part of the way we do things.

The value of the legislation is that it says that we should stop and think about what we are doing. Is this really what we want to be doing? Every time the answer is no.

For purposes of illustration let us look at some examples. When people decide they want to hire a new employee they think about the skills, the abilities and the qualities that need to be filled by the person who is going to take the job. They may take a lot of time. Some companies take no time to do it; other companies take time. When they get into the interviewing process natural human characteristics sometimes take over and we tend to hire people who are most like us.

Even though we may say we need someone with a particular education, with particular life and job experiences to fill the job effectively, sometimes in the course of interviewing we find somebody who looks like us, likes to play golf, perhaps goes to the same church, and we know he or she will fit in. All of a sudden that is the person who is selected for the job.

We need to recognize we want to make employment decisions based on skills, based on qualifications and based quite frankly on merit. We do not want to mix in things that are not bona fide requirements. When companies sit down and think about how this happens, they prepare for the interview and recruitment process more effectively and as such get better results.

We can think about how jobs are advertised. For example, large companies typically advertise in the Globe and Mail. They know a certain kind of person reads that newspaper. Do they think about advertising in the ethnic newspapers, in the Teka in my local community that goes to the Six Nations, to broaden the base and increase the numbers of people who are on the slate for consideration?

There is nothing in the legislation that says companies have to select anyone but the most qualified, but they have to create a situation so that the slate is broad enough to include all members of society.

• (1050)

When people start to see the impact of the decisions they make in terms of the recruiting process they say that they do not mean to be but they are being selective. The system has generated itself to be this way and we need to change it. We can think of how jobs become available through word of mouth: the president says to the vice–president who says to his sister or whomever. That is a very selective source of candidates.

Companies need to use different strategies to broaden the slate, but there is nothing in the legislation which says once a slate is determined they have to pick someone from a particular designated group.

We start by going through the employment systems analysis at the hiring stage and at the recruitment stage. Then we start looking at what happens with the day to day norms in the company, the activities and the way employees interact. One important matter that has come from the legislation is an understanding of the importance of having policies that support a harassment free workplace so that once people come together in a workplace community they can work effectively together. They understand each other's differences. They know they have to treat each other with respect and dignity.

One important learning as a result of the legislation which has not been developed very quickly but with patience, understanding and education over 20 years is that harassment free workplace programs are vitally important.

Another thing which I have seen magically take hold in communities is the value of cultural diversity training where we sit down and understand social, economic and ethnic differences among Canadians. When we sit down, talk about them and understand them suddenly the barriers that stopped people from working together are gone and the value of being able to enjoy differences, celebrate diversity and understand different ways of getting to the same end makes a company a thriving, competitive organization.

First they have to take a look at the demographics. Then they have to take a look at their companies to see if there are processes that are systemically stopping them from engaging all Canadians in the workplace. This is not a bill that revokes the merit principle but quite the opposite. It says to use the merit principle but use it fairly and equitably. Their decisions should be based on skill, bona fide job requirements, qualifications and characteristics; not on a person's social history.

I can tell a personal story about working for a company. After I had been there for a couple of years and had been identified as perhaps being someone who could progress through the system, I was given a test to write. It had nothing to do with whether I could do mathematics or whether I could relate to people. It asked me about the history of my parents. Did my father belong to the Moose Lodge? Did my mother belong to the UCW? How many children were in my family?

This was not very long ago. I sat back and thought these were the measures they used to determine success in the organization. They were building a homogeneous population of white able bodied men at the top, typically from the same university and with the same graduating degree. Thanks to this legislation that company looked inside and discovered it was a detriment to its capability and its competitiveness and it is no longer there.

The bill is not about revoking the merit principle. It is not about reverse discrimination. It is about reversing discrimination and making sure we have a level playing field for all Canadians to participate. It is an important piece of legislation.

As a human resources practitioner I can say that if they follow the model presented through regulations they will effectively create for their companies a very good, strong working human resources plan and process. It is there in the bill. Quite frankly it is about treating individuals with dignity and with respect.

• (1055)

Like my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood I am proud to stand in the House in support of Bill C–64 as we continue very slowly but very effectively with the changes we need to make the country's workplace the engine of our future: competitive, fair and equitable.

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I feel very privileged to be able to stand in the House to enter this important debate.

When I was first elected as a member of Parliament in 1993 I came here with very high ideals. I have grown to like this place. We have here, for the most part, freedom to debate ideas and concepts which profoundly affect society and have a huge impact on our well–being as a country.

I begin my intervention by clearly stating that I do not question or judge the high motives of some hon. members opposite. Those who have spoken favourably with respect to Bill C–64 for the most part are sincere. I accept that. I also invite them to consider that I believe sincerely in the views I will put forward in the next while.

It is important not to reduce ourselves to name calling but rather very honestly and openly question the bills before us. We should have the freedom to amend bills so that the end product is the absolute best for the people of Canada.

I believe very strongly that I am not only fulfilling a role as a member of the opposition by being against these things. Certainly there are elements in all bills which bear reason for support. I say as a member of Parliament—I would do this if I were a government member—that if I identified a flaw in a bill I would as forcefully as possible bring it to the attention of the House and urge the House to amend the bill or defeat it. Unfortunately in the way Parliament works that is not an option. I regret that. It is unfortunate that government members opposed to the bill lack the freedom to effectively influence change.

I agree with the premise that people ought to be treated equally. Members opposite have said quite often that this is a bill about equality. The word equity comes from the same root word meaning equal or equality. We cannot tell a book by its cover. In this instance the bill labelled a bill about employment equity, implying employment equality, just does not deliver. It so happens that while the bill speaks of equality it actually entrenches inequality. I say that with all due respect.

Members opposite are correct when they say that we have a history in which some people have been discriminated against on invalid grounds: grounds of race and grounds of gender. When I was a young man we were discouraged from entering the nursing profession because it was a job largely filled by females. There was a prior bias in the different ways of hiring.

Every time there is a position to be filled certain discriminatory principles will be applied. I was for a long time in charge of hiring in the place where I worked. It is true. Sometimes we had 200 applications for three positions. We had to apply criteria to decide who would get the jobs. I believe I did this with honesty and integrity throughout. I always asked the question who is best able to do the job?

• (1100)

I did not ask the gender of the person. I did not ask what was their racial background. I did not look at the colour of their skin. My records will show, if anyone would like to check, that as a private businessman and a supervisor in a technical institute there was no evidence of discrimination. All I asked was that this person be the best qualified to do the job. That is to me an overriding principle.

The intrusion of these various elements into evaluating a candidate for a position is totally unrelated to the ability to do the job. They are entrenchments of inequity and inequality. I urge members of the government to think very carefully about this. Do not pass it off. Do not get emotional about a bill that you have come to love, but ask yourself whether it really does the job.

At the beginning of this bill it states that the purpose of the act is to correct disadvantages in employment experienced by women, aboriginal peoples, persons with disabilities and members of visible minorities.

I would be the first one to get up and scream if someone were denied a position because she was a woman and for that reason only, or because he or she was native and for that reason only. I would object strenuously. As I said before, my policies in my past and even as a member of the House of Commons are that I do not look at those things, I look past and beyond.

We have heard quite a bit of talk, especially from the member for Greenwood, about the fact that this bill does not require quotas, that there are exemptions for employers. The bill says "where there is undue hardship to the employer". I beg to ask what is the definition of undue? It is so loose it does not mean anything. There is no reason for people to obey this bill if it means that they would have to hire or promote unqualified persons.

This is a good reason to vote against this bill in its entirety. It gives two conflicting messages. One says that you must hire these people based on their numbers in these groups. On the other hand, it says that you do not have to because you should test them based on their abilities. You should not have to hire unqualified persons.

In that case, the bill presents a real conundrum. There is no solution to this problem because you have two conflicting sets of criteria.

I also challenge the member's statement that this is not about quotas. Liberal members talk over and over again about business practice being enhanced by this bill. I beg to differ and I differ strongly because right now, to my knowledge, no legislation in Canada says you cannot hire the best people if they are in one of these groups. The absence of this bill does not present any difficulty to business at all.

We have had examples mentioned of different businesses that are working toward providing more equality in the hiring place and eliminating barriers. They have done it because it is good practice.

If they are doing it because it is good business practice, then the legislation is redundant. The only thing that this legislation is going to do is develop a huge bog of bureaucracy that will once again slow down the efficiency of business and of our economic well–being. What am I talking about? I am talking about what the employer is required to do because of this act. "Every employer shall collect information and conduct analysis of the workforce. With respect to whether or not there is a degree of under–representation of persons in these designated groups, he or she is to conduct a review to identify employment barriers. Only those employees who identify themselves are to be counted".

• (1105)

I digress for a moment but there is a flaw in this bill right there that gives me a reason to vote against it. I beg the members on the government side to consider what they are voting for when they follow their party leadership later today and all dutifully, one after the other, stand up and say, yes, we are in favour of this bill. Listen to what it says: "if employees choose to identify themselves they are to be counted". Otherwise they are not counted.

Let us say one of the groups in the area represents 20 per cent of the population. Let us say a business actually has 20 per cent in this group. Let us say they exercise their constitutional right not to identify themselves. The reason the disclaimer is in the bill is that it is so close to being unconstitutional, it requires identification of oneself.

Let us say that the 20 per cent of people working for this business exercise that right and do not identify themselves. They cannot be counted. Though in truth they occupy one–fifth of the positions in this business, they are not counted. When a position becomes open, they are under–represented according to the books. Therefore there is an obligation to hire another one of them.

They could by simply not identifying themselves keep that ball rolling until that workplace is entirely filled with people in that group, discriminating against everyone who is not in the group. That is a major flaw in this bill.

We tried to amend it. Reformers moved amendments in committee and the Liberals dutifully voted them down. I guess they did not want to think for themselves. The people who were telling them how to vote were not thinking very clearly either. That is what happened.

I urge all Canadians to ask themselves if this is such a wonderful bill and if it reflects what Canadians are truly about and if the members of the government truly believe this—I ask again in this context, why is the bill necessary if that is really true—why these draconian enforcement measures?

Why do we have enforcement that says that every employer shall make all reasonable efforts to implement its employment equity plan and to monitor it? Why is it that the government requires that employers maintain these employment equity records and that they file with the government, annually, a report respecting how they are fulfilling their quota.

Government members do not like to use the word quota because quota unfortunately is a word that means force. It means big government. While they want to do the same thing, they do not like to use the word quota.

They will say that nowhere in the bill is the word quota mentioned. Proportions are mentioned. The numbers are there. If that is the case and each business has to report, it has to report the salary ranges of people in these different groups. It has to report the number of employees hired in each group. After it has reported and only those employees, by the way, who have agreed to identify themselves are counted, in fact the employer could be doing it and it does not even hit the record.

In all instances we find it is just big brother. In the end—

The Deputy Speaker: I am very sorry to interrupt the member but through an error on the Chair's part he has had five minutes more than he should have had.

• (1110)

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak on this bill.

I like to call the bill respecting employment equity an act without respect for the abilities and sensibilities of Canadians. I put forward that the act perpetuates several myths: there is systemic discrimination that will be cured by systemic remedial measures; the myth of righting the historical wrongs of the past by proactive reverse discrimination in the present; the myth of addressing the problem of racism with a far more dangerous version of the same; and the myth that government mandated crutches to groups when those groups only desire to compete in that race from the same starting line.

I speak in opposition to the bill and its policy of affirmative action in all matters related to government operations that is dressed in the guise of the euphemism of employment equity.

I noticed the member for Brant mentioned that in making an application for a job the government is asking about membership in a club or background or whatever. She took offence to that and I agree with her offence to that kind of thing.

This weekend I was looking at an application for a university for my daughter. That application was for a post graduate position in the university and included a page to ask her if perhaps she was disabled, or if she was from the aboriginal community. She was asked to identify herself presumably to gain entry to a program that should be equally available by academic achievement and by ability in one of our public institutions. As she takes offence at the questions asked of her, I take offence that my daughter should be asked certain questions that are outside her academic ability to enter an academic institution in the public realm.

That is very much the case in many of the areas in our society. We have taken one situation and given it another solution which is going to create a larger problem.

I speak not just as a Reformer but for the vast majority of Canadians who I know feel as I do, that people desire to be recognized for their ability—my daughter, myself and members of the House included—for their personal qualities and not for the colour of their skin or for their personal characteristics.

Along with a colleague from this side of the House I served on the committee on human rights and the status of disabled persons. I took part in the examination and hearings on this bill. We submitted over 40 names to be considered as witnesses to come before that committee. Those witnesses' names were submitted to offer balance to the discussion and what we felt was a majority perspective, the public perspective on many of these issues. Of the 40 names we submitted, only four were brought before that committee. From what I see in the report which the government produced, of those four none were heard.

When the Liberals came to power they trumpeted a new and open process of government. They chose to refer this bill to our committee before second reading. In reality what that did, and certainly at the end of our sessions in the spring, was remove that bill from public scrutiny and then allow this orchestrated affirmation of the broad concepts of the bill.

I was interested in many of the witnesses who came from across Canada through the choice of government. When we asked trade union representatives for instance how their experience of employment equity came about, they were very pro this bill. They supported what the government had to say. When questioned concerning their own advancement or achievement of the goals of this bill, their own structures denied that they took it seriously. They were very willing to apply it to companies or to businesses but not to its own administrative structure, where there was an obvious lack of representation from the disabled community and the aboriginal community. Generally speaking, women were not doing too badly in most of these situations.

• (1115)

I get the feeling that some of these programs put forward by the government are simply vehicles for certain groups to put forward their agenda. The groups that perhaps need government consideration for programs the most are denied or shunted aside while the more vocal groups take the stage.

I want to comment on an aspect in this bill that has not yet been addressed. It is in terms of my recent experience at the fourth world conference in Beijing. This applies very much to the concept of employment equity. Our government signed the document to that conference, which was very much in support of affirmative action. It becomes very plain after reading the document that it is an affirmative action program our government signed in the name of the Canadian people on the platform for action.

The platform for action from the Beijing conference commits all signatory nations to implement over 500 actions by the year 2000. In the next five years we are supposed to put in place 500 things that nobody really knows about here. They were signed on to half a world away.

I question our government's accountability in that process. Certainly around the world and across Canada employment equity has been denied by the public—certainly not by this government, because it has not been listening to the public. It has now extended that, again completely unaccountably half a world away.

Let me read one section into the record. This is part of the platform for action: "Implement and monitor positive public and private sector employment equity and positive action programs to address systemic discrimination against women in the labour force, in particular women with disabilities and women belonging to disadvantaged groups, with respect to employment, hiring, retention, promotion and vocational training of women in all sectors".

We are working on a bill here that I believe does not have the support of the Canadian people. Our government has put this not only in the public sector but in a private sector agreement in an international document it has signed on to. I am not even sure if Canadians know that. It has done that without resolution of debate on this issue in this House and certainly no debate on its signing on to the documents from the United Nations.

Will this document from Beijing ever come to the House? Here we have positive public and private sector employment equity agreed to elsewhere, but will we be able to discuss it here? We have signed on to something with no accountability coming through from the status of women people or anybody telling us what they have done, let alone that they should not have done it without accountability. I question whether they will even admit it when they get back here.

We are committed to an aggressive program of affirmative action. It is an umbrella program that covers all federal departments. This is not simply the status of women people who are going to work with special interest groups. The program that has been defined in our signing on to this document encompasses all federal departments in all areas, looking through what is called a gender lens, which would reflect public and private sector employment equity and positive action programs.

I am amazed to hear the government saying it is open and available to Canadian opinion when it goes behind closed doors or behind the globe and signs on to documents that are not only against public sentiment but have no accountability in the House. I object strongly to the denial of open government and of the wishes of the Canadian public.

• (1120)

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to stand and speak to the bill. In the last session this bill was kind of my baby. It was something I was supposed to shepherd through the committee process, through the amendment process, and so on. It is only proper that I spend a few moments talking about the bill and why the Reform Party feels it must oppose the bill in its current form.

I should mention a little about the whole process. This was one of the bills that was referred to committee after first reading. Supposedly at that time it was to encourage debate and amendments and the creation of the bill at first reading stage in committee.

I remind the House that during that session things happened in committee that are almost unprecedented in the history of the House. We had limited debate of only five minutes per clause. We were not allowed to submit amendments because they were not in both official languages, only in English. Certain portions of the bill were passed without a vote. It was a real travesty.

The ironic part is that it was on the human rights committee that this all occurred. It was a very souring experience. I did report it to the House at the time. I re–emphasize that it is a very poor way to draft what is very controversial legislation.

I will speak on a few points about the bill and then I will talk briefly about the Reform Party's alternative. Contrary to some of the bafflegab that has been coming from across the way, the Reform Party does have a solution to what the bill is supposed to be addressing. We have some ideas on hiring practices and how to encourage employers to make sure their workplaces are without discrimination. I will put those on the record as well.

I find it interesting that in the bill the Prime Minister's office is not included as being covered under employment equity. It is interesting that the top office in the land will not be subject to employment equity. Why is that? Why are private enterprises that do business with the federal government, the federal government itself, crown corporations, the armed forces and so on all covered but the Prime Minister's office does not want to be covered under the legislation?

I remember making that proposal in committee and it was rejected by the Liberals. I find it interesting that when it comes to their own significant offices they are not prepared to allow themselves to be covered under this employment equity legislation. It is an interesting thought. I wonder if sometime the Prime Minister could expand on why he and his office should not be covered.

There has been recent controversy about the statistical base this whole thing is predicated on and the problems with the statistical base. In the last census 10 per cent of aboriginals refused to even be enumerated in the census. That is just one example of how the statistical base is often skewed. When supposedly the workforce is to be exactly representational, sometimes it is not possible to know because of the skewing of the statistics.

Another thing that was brought out in question period a little while ago is that in the last census almost a million people refused to designate themselves by ethnicity and background. They said "I want to be called a Canadian, please. Just call me a Canadian. Treat me the same as everybody else and I will be happy". Of course the Liberals will not allow that. The next census will make sure all people have to indicate which category they fit into. They will not be allowed to call themselves just Canadian; they will have to indicate they have some form of ethnicity. That is a shame. We should be working toward commonality but instead we are driving in a wedge, trying to drive people apart.

• (1125)

I have heard a lot of talk today that this legislation is not about quotas, that this does not force people to hire a certain percentage of people of certain gender, minority status, and so on. That is simply not true. For example, say we had witnesses from the RCMP who said that in the RCMP in the coming year there will be the following people hired: 238 females, 238 people of visible minority status, so many people from aboriginal groups. In other words, they would be providing exact numbers. When we start quoting numbers like that, what is the difference between that and a quota? There is no difference. We are talking about exact numbers to meet numerical goals arbitrarily set by the government. That is a shame. The government can say that it does not include quotas, but the numbers and the proof are there, which again is why we oppose this legislation.

This legislation is opposed by the Canadian people. In British Columbia, the area I am most familiar with, only 11 per cent of people say they are supportive of this legislation. This includes almost exactly the same proportion of people from any of the so–called designated groups, who do not want to be patronized, do not want to be told the only way they can get a job is because the government is going to somehow pave the way for them. Most people from all groups say: "Just give me a chance, just let me have an opportunity. I will get a job and I will be able to hang on to it because of my abilities, not because the government has said so".

Self–designation is supposed to be a voluntary process. In other words, you do not have to self–designate yourself into any group if you do not want to. At least that is what the government would have you believe. The problem is the lines are already being blurred on that. The Department of National Defence put forward a questionnaire for employment equity purposes. The top part of the form is compulsory, including your name, your rank, your serial number, your whatever from the military. In the fine print it says that you do not have to fill out the second part if you do not want to.

Already there is a record of everyone in the military who is willing to co–operate with the government and those who are not. They already have that information. If you have been a good boy or a good girl and you have done what you have been asked to do, then you get that in your file. If you did not fill out the form, that is also there. In other words, you are not co–operative if you did not fill out the form. You did not help them do what they think is their job.

The lines are very blurry between this voluntary self–identification and the compulsory self–identification that characterized stricter forms of apartheid such as happened in South Africa. It becomes a very blurry line when we force people or even ask people to indicate on an application form whether or not they are a visible minority. To think that this is possible in Canada.

Taking this same attitude to an extreme, during the committee hearings we heard about what happened at the University of Guelph, for example. They put a line down the middle of the student lounge and one side of the lounge was for visible minorities and the other side of the lounge was for whoever was not a visible minority. This is the attitude this sort of legislation promotes: think of yourself not as Canadian; think not as an employer or an employee; think not as a person with equal rights and worth in the world; think of yourself first and foremost as members of groups, divide yourselves up, divide the workforce. If you are working beside someone, do they have the job because they are the most qualified? That is to be hoped, but is it the case? Is it like the student lounge at the University of Guelph where it was said: "Let us separate the people. We will put all the coloured people on this side and all the white people on that side"? Is that where we are heading? This type of legislation promotes that.

• (1130)

This legislation was designed in Ottawa. I wonder if these people have ever been to the west coast of Canada. I wonder if they have ever been to the greater Vancouver area. Have they been to Richmond? Have they been to Abbotsford? When Mr. Spicer appeared before the committee I put it to him that if he were to say he would not hire visible minorities he would go broke. He would have to hire visible minorities in order to hire the most qualified people or he would go broke. The marketplace would determine that. In British Columbia that is a fact.

I told Mr. Spicer there is a Hindi language radio station in the lower mainland. Under CRTC rules, compounded with these rules, more hoops and more bureaucracy, the radio station will have to show in its designated groups how many people are visible minority status, their gender and all the rest of it. This is a radio station which is addressing the needs of the Hindi speaking people of the lower mainland of which there are quite a few, over 100,000. To say to that station we would encourage it to have so many aboriginal people in its workforce is ridiculous.

The employment opportunities will come and will be determined by the marketplace. We have said that the Canadian Human Rights Commission is there to protect individuals from discrimination. That is its job and I encourage it to do that. The Canadian government could serve a role by advertising jobs properly and extensively; by implementing a comprehensive system of student loans; by making post–secondary education responsive and accessible to local people, in other words not denying people educational opportunities; by performing objective job testing; and also by being a model employer in the area of access and reasonable accommodation for the disabled.

We can deal with the problems in Canada without this legislation. This legislation is bad for Canada. It is unnecessary, it is coercive and I believe it should be dropped.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on Bill C–64. I had prepared a speech for this bill some time ago but a lot of what I had intended to say has been said. However, there are some things about the legislation which I must present to the House today.

The stated purpose of the legislation is to put equality in the workplace and to correct some conditions which are in the workplace or had been in the workplace in the past and are unfair. That is the stated purpose of the legislation. Who could speak out against that as a goal? All of us in the House would like to correct the unfair situations in our society, particularly those concerning employment. None of us wants discrimination and none of us is willing to tolerate in any way discrimination in the workplace based on race, gender, or any other factor. The stated intent of the legislation in terms of the problem which it is meant to fix I do not believe is a problem for any of us.

Bill C–64 is oppressive legislation which is not only unnecessary in today's society but is very damaging. What is in the legislation disturbs me and many of my constituents and others across the country to whom I have spoken about the legislation. It bothers a lot of people. Polls have shown of course that people across the country do not support the concept of employment equity or affirmative action, call it what you like.

• (1135)

There are two schools of thought when it comes to employment equity. The first is that legislated programs are necessary to fix a wrong, especially wrongs that were in the workforce in the past. The second is that employment equity is flawed because it advocates the hiring of individuals based on personal characteristics, not on merit. Those are two opposing schools of thought.

A third view I have heard expressed is that possibly sometime in the past there was the need for some type of affirmative action or employment equity legislation. It was necessary sometime in the past because of discrimination in the workplace. That position is tolerated by a lot more people than the position of bringing this piece of legislation forward today, where conditions are not nearly as they were in the past. Empirical evidence and good information has shown that there is much less discrimination in the workplace now than there was in the past.

I repeat that there should be no tolerance of discrimination in the workplace, period. I do not and will not tolerate it and I do not believe any member of the House will tolerate it.

I will read five points to lay out the Reform position briefly. First, all Canadians are equal before and under the law and all workers have the right to be free of discrimination in the workplace. Again, I do not think anyone in the House and hopefully no one across the country would argue with that point.

Second, the market will provide solutions to a representative workplace in the private sector. The hon. member from Fraser Valley West who spoke before me and others of my colleagues have spoken to this issue. Business which is practising good business will hire people who can best relate to the customers. That in itself should mean there will be people from all visible minorities hired in the workplace in a way that makes sense, not because of quotas.

Third, the role of government is to ensure equality of opportunity rather than to determine equality of employment outcomes in the public sector or beyond the public sector. Equality of opportunity, that is a role of government, but a government cannot ensure equality of outcome, nor should it try.

The fourth point Reform puts forth with regard to employment equity is that the workplace should be free from arbitrary obstructions to hiring and promotion. Merit must be the sole hiring criteria. I believe this and evidence has shown that a majority of Canadians believe in this. That would mean that Canadians do not support Bill C–64, the employment equity bill.

The fifth point is that employment equity legislation is coercive, discriminatory in itself, unnecessary and costly and it should be discontinued. Bill C–64 should be thrown out. The vote this afternoon should throw this legislation out because it is bad legislation. Not only that, employment equity legislation from the past should also be thrown out.

I congratulate the Mike Harris government in Ontario for promising to do exactly that. I sincerely hope the Ontario government will carry through on that promise. I believe it will.

• (1140)

What do various groups involved in the workplace have to say about employment equity? First, when it is known that employment equity is involved in the hiring practice, employees going about and working in the workplace look across the room. They see another employee from one of the groups designated in the employment equity legislation and they have to wonder was that person hired because they were the best and most qualified for the job, or was that person hired to fill a quota under an employment equity program?

What kind of work environment is that? It is not a healthy work environment at all. Fellow employees would always have that doubt in their minds that members of visible minorities and so on were hired based on quotas rather than merit. It is not fair to them and it does not make for a healthy environment.

What about the very groups that are targeted to fill these quotas in this employment equity legislation? What about the visible minorities, women and others who are targeted in these quotas? How do they feel about legislation like this? Although I cannot say how many, I can say that many people from these designated groups this legislation is intended to help have said to me they want no part of it for two reasons.

The first reason is that they have doubts as to whether they were hired because they were the best qualified or whether they were hired to fill a quota. Imagine what it would do to a person in the workplace, feeling that they were well qualified for a job but always having that doubt, wondering whether they were hired to fill a quota rather than because they were the best qualified. That is not a healthy work environment for those people either.

What about that other group, the people excluded from jobs because they do not fill one of those categories set out to be filled by quota? For example, I have had several people say to me that they do not like not even being eligible to apply to the RCMP. Employment equity has been in the RCMP for some time. White males simply are wasting their time if they apply to the RCMP and this is one example.

How do those people feel? They feel resentment against not only the body that has put these rules in place but against the groups targeted through quotas. That is sad and unacceptable. This kind of thing must end. It is not a healthy environment for that type of person. They can never find their way into that working environment.

There are a couple of people I have come to know well since I have been involved in politics. It is only because they talk to me about being part of the excluded group. They are indeed upset. Both of these people whom I have talked with many times on this issue have been excluded from what they want to do with their lives. They are young males, 25 years old. They want to join the RCMP but have been excluded because of these quotas. It is sad. It is wrong and it is unacceptable.

Another group in the workplace affected in a negative way by these quotas is the employers. Other members from my party have made it clear these are quotas we are talking about. The companies will be affected by this legislation. They have been affected in the past by previous employment equity legislation. How do they feel about this?

• (1145)

I have talked with a couple of companies in my constituency that depend to some extent on government contracts. They have been excluded in the past, before the new legislation, because they simply could not get the proper mix required under the quota system to qualify for jobs from the federal government. They could not fill the quotas.

These companies are upset not only about the fact that they could not get the contracts but because it costs them money. These are not extremely large corporations but they are large for the area. It cost them money to hire someone to see how they were doing with regard to quotas, to keep track and to hire people to fill the quotas. It is damaging to the employers as well.

I have gone through the list. Everyone in the workplace falls into these four groups. I ask members of the governing party in the House and members of the not so loyal opposition why they would support this piece of legislation when none of the groups think it is good legislation. There is not therefore good answer.

It is sad that we will pass the legislation. Because of the dictatorial style government across the Chamber I know it will pass. Those members will not dare vote against the government position therefore legislation will pass that very few people want.

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, when I read Bill C–64 for the first time I could not help but wonder if George Orwell might have had something to do with its drafting. Most people have read the book Animal Farm and would remember the pig who made the famous statement so often quoted: "All animals are equal but some are more equal than others".

That is the sort of thing the bill will create in Canada. The bill is not about equality. It is not about putting people on an equal footing. It is quite the contrary. It is about creating divisions among us. It is about creating different classifications of Canadians. That is wrong.

We have long had a public policy of hiring and promoting by merit. It is also generally the policy in private industry. A speaker earlier said if we do not hire by merit we will very quickly go broke. When we hire by merit and if the meritorious person happens to be within one of the designated groups in the legislation, obviously the person should and would get the job.

Rather than being about the equality of persons the legislation is about the Liberal propensity for regulating, controlling, creating bureaucracy and in general getting in people's faces. Why do we not leave people alone? Canada is working very well. Canadians are basically good people, people of goodwill. We are friends. We have a multiracial society. It is working. Why do we have to poke our finger in a wound that the government will create by itself? It is nonsense.

I worked overseas both in a private capacity and for several years with the United Nations on a large number of highly motivated, highly skilled technical teams. They were multiracial. They were not multiracial because somebody wanted them to be. They were multiracial because applicants had been selected from all over the world for these jobs and they took the best. We were the best and we were proud of it. If they had been created by affirmative action programs I would not have had anything to do with those groups. I would have slunk away and hid.

• (1150)

This will happen in Canadian society if affirmative action is enforced. We will see very good, capable people belonging to minority groups that have jobs either in private industry or in government but feel self–conscious, demeaned and patronized. There will always be a question hanging over their heads about whether they got their jobs because of qualifications and ability or a bit of tokenism. Were they hired because of colour, race, language, gender, or whatever? Government has no place getting involved in telling people who they can or should not hire. It is offensive. It is wrong.

I was probably campaigning for equality of races before most members of the House were born. I recall when I was a young teenager collecting the occasional lump because of my curious attitude on the matter. I find it terribly offensive that some members opposite who spoke earlier had a self–righteous and smug attitude toward me and my fellow party members. They inferred that because we opposed their racist legislation we were racists. They are turning sociology on its head.

Mr. Benoit: Liberal logic.

Mr. Morrison: This is Liberal logic. When I came to the House today I did not intend to speak to the bill. However I had to get up because I was so incensed by the remarks of some people opposite. I do not have a long, prepared speech and therefore having made my case I will return to my seat.

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add something to the debate. I had not intended to do so but I cannot believe the government is rushing through the legislation in a self–serving and smug manner. It is pretending that it is only concerned about fairness and giving everyone a fair chance when the legislation is so incredibly flawed that no intelligent, sensible person could possibly support it.

Anyone who does not support the bill, however, is branded racist, sexist or lacking in compassion and fairness. It is a sad commentary of the debates of the House of Commons when people cannot attack bad, flawed, unworkable legislation. Instead of being met with logic, reason and persuasion, they are met with labels, brands, sneers and distortions of their motives.

I appeal to members of the House to serve Canadians better by looking at the issues, at logic and at what is good for the country instead of hurling epithets and questioning motives. We know that is not the way to get good legislation for the country.

There are seven reasons why the legislation should not be supported. I will go through them quickly because I think Canadians watching the debate need to know about this piece of legislation. Not only their elected members should not be supporting it, but the public should not be supporting it and should be extremely concerned that the legislation will be foisted upon them by a Liberal government looking at doctrinaire and running ahead to say that it has done something rather than doing what is right and best and proper for the country.

• (1155)

The first reason, which should be enough of a reason in itself, is that it institutionalizes discrimination. How can anyone possibly support a piece of legislation that discriminates against people in the marketplace on the basis of race, sex or skin colour?

We have built Canada by being open and fair minded to everyone. Why on earth would we institutionalize a terrible process whereby we would not be Canadians or people with skills, abilities, knowledge and services to offer other people? We would be hired because of the pigment of our skin. Surely we can do better than that.

We should not encourage or institutionalize discrimination in any way, shape or form, and that is exactly what we are being asked to vote for. I cannot believe members opposite would do such a thing to our country.

The second reason out of the seven is that the legislation demeans designated groups as not having equal ability. Why would we put into place legislation that says since certain people cannot cut it on their own employers will be forced to give them extra breaks? It is an insult to tell people in certain groups that they do not have the guts, the brains, the ability, the competence and the merit to make a life on their own without other people being forced to give them special and extra consideration. That is not what we should be doing. It will not be any kind of help to people in the designated groups.

The third reason is this kind of legislation divides rather than unifies the country. A number of other speakers have mentioned this point with great eloquence, but Canadians need to think about it. Instead of being a Canadian, being someone who has skills, being a good employee, being someone with initiative, drive and ability, we will now be in little groups. We will be women in the workplace. We will be persons of colour in the workplace. We will be aboriginals in the workplace instead of employees who are damn good. This is not the way to build strong businesses and it is not the way to build a strong country.

The fourth reason is the legislation places unfair and unwise restrictions on job creation. What does it say to employees who know they do not have to show a lot of merit in the job because the employer needs them to fulfil the quotas under the legislation? The businesses cannot do without them; they need them. They need these token people in the workplace so it does not matter if they do not strive to do the best job possible. They have to be there anyway.

It will mean all kinds of bureaucracy, legislation and regulations on businesses already completely overburdened by the economic tinkering of governments that think they know better than anybody else how to run an economy. Instead they are just burdening them with the weight of unreasonable demands and economic and social tinkering.

It is time to stop that. It is time to let businesses create jobs for our young people. It is time to let businesses get on with running efficient and effective service oriented businesses. It is time to quit letting governments that pretend they are helping everybody do it on the backs of business. That is one of the reasons we are in trouble.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mrs. Ablonczy: The member opposite is making a lot of noise. He knows that very well. He has been talking about how to get businesses economically viable again. He might give some thought to how we can do that. It certainly is not by another big, fat, thick layer of red tape for businesses.

The fifth reason is the legislation places undesirable coercion on businesses to be good co–operators with bureaucrats. Surely we have seen enough in other countries where bureaucrats make life miserable for people who are working and running businesses.

• (1200)

Here we have another instance in which if you are not a good little business person you will be punished, harassed, hassled. You will be given all kinds of requirements and restrictions and will have to fill out more forms and have some pointy headed bureaucrat breathing down your neck before you can even do your job of running your business. Why would we have this kind of coercion and interference to the people of our country?

The sixth reason is it violates the principles of natural justice. To me this is a huge area. It says we are not all equal before the law, that some of us are more equal than others. It contravenes the basic democratic principle that everyone is entitled to a fair trial. Instead we have an employment equity tribunal, which is like a kangaroo court from which there is no appeal at all and which does not even have fixed rules of law under which to operate. Incredibly enough, it also entitles search and seizure of business records and business premises in order to ensure compliance.

Last, I point to the undue haste with which this legislation has been put in place. Other speakers have mentioned this but even in committee it was not properly looked at. It was not properly debated. This is not the way to put good legislation in place for our country.

I am afraid it is a futile effort because we know the top echelons of the Liberal Party have told their backbenchers that everyone has to vote for this legislation. I urge us to look at what is best for the country for a change instead of having a knee–jerk vote, putting in bad legislation and having all the problems I have just mentioned down on the heads of a country that is already struggling.

The Deputy Speaker: There being no further members rising on this bill, pursuant to the order made earlier today the question is deemed put, the division deemed demanded and the recorded division deferred until 5 p.m. today.

* * *

CANADA–UNITED STATES TAX CONVENTION ACT, 1984

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill S–9, an act to amend the Canada–United States Tax Convention Act, 1984, as reported (with amendments) from the committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Deputy Speaker: Colleagues, a ruling with respect to this bill.

[Translation]

There are two motions in amendment in the Notice Paper at the report stage of Bill S–9, an act to amend the Canada–United States Tax Convention Act, 1984.

[English]

Motions Nos. 1 and 2 will be grouped for debate and voted on separately. I pose Motions Nos. 1 and 2 to the House.

MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls, Lib.) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill S–9, in Clause 3, be amended:

(a) by replacing line 21, on page 1, with the following

"3.(1) The Act is amended by adding, after"; and

(b) by adding after line 23, on page 1, the following:

"(2) The amendment to the Convention in paragraph 1 of Article 5 of Schedule IV, as set out in the schedule to this Act, shall not apply after 2000."

Motion No. 2

That Bill S–9, in Clause 3, be amended:

(a) by replacing line 21, on page 1, with the following:

"3.(1) The Act is amended by adding, after"; and

(b) by adding after line 23, on page 1, the following:

"(2) Benefits otherwise payable under paragraph 4 of Article 21 of Schedule IV, as set out in the schedule to this Act, are not payable where no tax is payable in Canada in respect of the property or income that is taxed in the United States."

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Does this mean each member gets only 10 minutes on both amendments before the House?

The Deputy Speaker: That is the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I will have to cram into 10 minutes the substance of two things, an enormous tax break of 50 per cent for American companies operating in Canada on their profits, a 50 per cent tax cut—

The Deputy Speaker: In light of what the member has just said, is there unanimous consent to give the member 20 minutes to speak to this?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Baker: I thank the hon. members of the House. That relieves me somewhat. I will calm down and try to explain to members and the Canadian people and members of the Liberal caucus why I make such strong objection.

• (1205)

This Senate bill is supported by the Reform Party and it is supported by the Bloc in the House. They are the official opposition and they are the back–up for the official opposition.

Mr. Silye: It is supported by the government.

Mr. Baker: The hon. member from the Reform Party says it is supported by the government.

The Bloc as well stood up in the chamber on second reading and in the committee of the House when this bill was being dealt with and said "We love this bill. Give us more bills like this that give huge tax breaks to American companies operating in Canada".

However, that is not all the bill does. The bill gives a tax credit to anybody who has property is the United States valued at over $600,000 and who happens to die and is subjected to the estate tax in the United States. Now the Canadian public will have to make the payment on behalf of that person to the U.S. government.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, if you die in the United States, in come the people from the Internal Revenue Service and they assess the value of the paintings on the wall, the value of your car, your garage, your backyard, your orange trees and your grapefruit trees—they look at everything. If it comes to over $600,000, they sock it to you with what is called the estate tax. We had it in Canada prior to 1971, but not on the scale it is in the United States. The normal grab is about 54 per cent of everything you have over $600,000, which includes stocks and bonds, even if they have been obtained through a Canadian broker, if you have that property in the United States.

In Canada we have unrealized gains upon death, capital gains, but that is a different story from the estate tax. Nobody comes in and looks at your home. If it is valued at $20 million it is not taken into account because that is your residence. Nobody looks to see if you have a $100,000 Rolls Royce in the driveway. That is not counted in Canada because that is your personal property for personal use. It is a different form of taxation. This Senate bill gives you a tax credit, which is paid for not just by the Canadian treasury; this is out of the pockets of Canadian citizens. That is a tax expenditure. That is what is wrong today.

People wonder where the money has gone over the years. Why could we afford health care and education transfers to the provinces and a big public service 20 years ago and we cannot today? Auditors general since 1985 have identified the main culprit as being tax expenditures. This tax expenditure will mean the Canadian people will pay for your estate tax in the United States of America. The Canadian people will pay for a 50 per cent reduction on the tax on profits to American multinationals operating in this country, on dividends. The Canadian people will pay for the 33.33 per cent tax decrease on interest that travels over the border into the United States. The Canadian people will pay for the elimination of royalties on practically everything, down to trademarks, which have been bifurcated. It will be divided. They will be examined each part separately.

Let me give the House some idea of how much this will cost the federal treasury.

• (1210)

The person in charge, the chief of corporate and international tax in the Department of Finance, testified before the Senate committee. He was asked: "Why do you need to have a 5 per cent tax? Under this bill we are reducing it by 50 per cent. Why not reduce it by 100 per cent on the withholding tax? Why not give the American corporations their entire profit tax free?" The person in charge of corporate taxes in Canada stated: "The principal reason is money. I have not looked recently, but I believe that our annual withholding tax take is approximately $1.5 billion. Certainly it would be difficult to sustain completely walking away from that".

What are we doing? We are cutting by 50 per cent the withholding tax on dividends from American corporations operating in Canada and sending their profits back across the border to the United States. What does that do to a Canadian business that is trying to compete? It is fine to give Wal–Mart a 50 per cent tax break, but what about the Canadian company that is competing against the American company?

It is interesting to look at the flow. I have the evidence given before the committee on foreign relations in the United States Senate. It is the Jesse Helms committee. It talked about the treaty with Canada. It did not like it last year. After the Minister of Finance signed it in Washington the American Senate changed it. The Minister of Finance had to return in March of this year to re–sign the amended protocol.

I will read a couple of things into the record. Here is the Secretary of the Treasury for tax policy for the Government of the United States: "The protocol reduces the rate of withholding on cross–border flows of interest from 15 per cent to 10 per cent. This reduction will provide a substantial benefit to many U.S. recipients of Canadian source interest payments. It will have a lesser effect on U.S. outflows of interest to Canada because much of this flow is already exempt from U.S. tax under the portfolio interest provisions of the code". In other words, we are giving the Americans a 33.3 per cent tax cut when Canadians will not benefit from that interest provision because the Secretary of the Treasury in the United States says that it is already exempt under the code.

The other provision is on royalties. Here is the assistant treasurer for tax policy, the Hon. Cynthia Beerbower: "Being freed of tax on royalties is cash in hand. Now we pay royalties to Canada. With a zero rate in effect in this protocol, I cannot imagine that anyone would sit on this".

Then we go to the big one, the $1.5 billion the treasury is getting today in this Senate bill, which is supported by the Reform Party and by the Bloc.

The vice–president of tax policy, Robert Green, for the National Foreign Trade Council Inc., 1914, which represents 500 American multinationals doing business in Canada, said in his evidence: "The investment flow between the two countries is substantial and favours the United States. We have substantially more investment there than they do here. The dividend withholding rate reductions, which are phased into five per cent over three years, are a tremendous benefit to the United States, to U.S. multinational companies doing business there. Because of the reduced withholding rates the amount of net repatriated earnings to the United States for investment will be substantially increased".

Then he goes on to talk about the reductions in the withholding rates on royalties: "The additional amount of repatriated earnings will substantially benefit the United States".

Let there be no guessing about this. The United States business community says it will take that from Canada and repatriate it right back to the United States of America.

• (1215)

It is funny, Mr. Speaker, you stand here in the House and hear some Liberal backbenchers objecting to this, and you have the Reform Party and the Bloc in total agreement. How did it start? In 1988 the U.S. made a tax change. It was a change to the estate tax rules for foreigners. It stated that any foreigner with property in the United States would have to pay estate tax on everything above $60,000, not $600,000. That was in 1988.

The record shows that the Canadian government in 1988 took a week to respond. It sent people down to Washington. It said:

"We want to relieve Canadians of this tax that is being imposed on them in the United States". That is where it started.

The United States said: "In order for us to give you a break for wealthy Canadians, you will have to give us something in return". It went back and forth. The negotiations started in 1988. It has gone on since then. It has gone on to include huge tax expenditures that nobody has an estimate on. Revenue Canada and the Department of Finance say they do not know—

Mr. Silye: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. We have now been listening to the hon. member for the last 10 minutes and so far I do not see the relevance to the two motions he has before him. We gave him 20 minutes to speak on them. I do not see where there is a tie–in to either one of the motions and why he represents and recommends these motions be adopted.

The Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member will bring it around to those motions very quickly.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, this is what I was building up to. Under our laws in the Chamber we are not allowed to amend a tax treaty. It states that clearly in our standing orders. We can amend the legislation that brings in the tax treaty. However in introducing an amendment to that legislation we cannot negate the principle of a clause in the tax treaty.

Just imagine the power of the U.S. committees. They actual change treaties. The Minister of Finance had to go back to Washington twice. He signed one, they changed it and he had to go back again.

According to our standing orders our House of Commons is not allowed to change anything in a treaty. The amendments I put forward are amendments that do not negate a clause. The first amendment is that all of these huge tax decreases to American multinationals operating in Canada come to an end in the year 2000. That is amendment number one. We cannot afford giveaways any more.

We are cutting public servants. We have got to. We are cutting back on UI. We are cutting back on this and cutting back on that and at the same time we are introducing this whole new set of tax expenditures, gifts.

That leads me to the second amendment, the gift part. Motion No. 2 relates to the dating back of the tax credit on the estate tax to people who had died since November 10, 1988. Do you get the significance of the date, Mr. Speaker? Perhaps somebody of great wealth did die on November 11, 1988, I do not know. The very date is the date the protocol came into effect in the United States that decreased the maximum from $600,000 to $60,000.

Under this bill there are estates today in Canada verified by Revenue Canada to me and to the committee that are just waiting to put in their bill. Now the Canadian government has to pay for the amount of estate tax that they pay in the United States that was taxed as U.S. source revenue.

• (1220)

The Canadian people have to cough up the money now out of the treasury. I am told that one chap who died had $20 million in the United States. He really got hit with the estate tax, almost $8 million of it had to be paid to the U.S. treasury. He has a nice rebate coming to him from the U.S. government but he has a much bigger rebate coming to him from the Government of Canada. Only $12 million went to the family. Now the people concerned who received the benefits from the estate will be able to bill the Canadian government for an additional $5 million or $6 million in that one year.

The second amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, is that since the Canadian delegation and the U.S. delegation said this is reciprocity, this is to eliminate double taxation, that if there is not double taxation then there will be no money granted. That does not negate the clause at all. It just says if no taxes were paid no rebate will be given as far as the Canadian government is concerned.

The auditor general in 1985 said the Canadian Parliament reminded him of a group of automobile engineers trying to build an automobile that was more efficient, that burned less gas but had the same energy. He said that Parliament is like that because we are trying to find ways of cutting while still maintaining our services to the Canadian people. He said the problem is this.

When the engineers changed the engine of the automobile from eight cylinders to six cylinders to four cylinders and brought in all those modifications to save energy, at the end of the day they discovered they were burning just as much gas as they were before. They did not know what the problem was until they looked under the car and saw all these little holes in the gas tank. Those, the auditor general said, are the tax expenditures of the Government of Canada.

The government cuts and slices and chucks. It lays people off who have children going to school and to university who do not know where their next dollar is going to come from. It changes the system of unemployment insurance. When a primary producer working in this country has as a part of his income unemployment insurance, it says: "Oh no, we are going to take that away because that was not intended for that". That person is worried to death today.

While we do all that, we turn around and take a Senate bill that will give enormous returns to very wealthy people, very rich people, and we say to the multinationals we are going to cut your taxes by 50 per cent.

We are not going to do anything for the very poor. We are not going to do anything for Canadian corporations operating in Canada. That is why I think, after looking at the bills we are discussing, what is really happening in real terms of tax expenditure is that we take from the poor and give to the rich.

It is Robin Hood in reverse. He is now working for the great companies that represent those very multinationals in the United States that are working so well in this country, a country that according to the World Bank is the second wealthiest country in the world because we have resources.

The House of Commons today, with the Bloc and the Reform Party supporting this legislation wholeheartedly, is not working. The Canadian people are saying that we need a change in the rules of procedure or we need to get rid of the two opposition parties.

• (1225)

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I found the Liberal member's grandstanding amusing. His closing reasoning was obviously somewhat illogical. He was more critical of the opposition parties than of the government. I would gently remind him that, if he does not agree, he need only settle his differences with his own colleagues. This bill comes from the government, which is made up of people from his own party. So they will have to talk among themselves and try to reach an agreement. It was even a bit sad to see them in such disagreement this morning. However, I agree with my colleague on some points; on others, I do not, but I will get to that.

Obviously, we share his concern for society's disadvantaged. We agree on this, and I hope, when the time comes to adopt the unemployment insurance reform and similar things, he will again rise, as he did today. It seems to me that only one member was opposed last time. I am not sure I heard him. I am not sure he was present. Next time, we will watch to see where he stands in the upcoming debate on cuts to the transfer payments, in particular, and on social programs. We will see where he stands and whether his concern is real or whether he is just giving a political performance here, once in awhile, to please his constituents and ensure his re-election.

I want to point out that we have have to consider both the substance and the form of this bill. We agree with what the auditor general said about tax conventions, which is that there is going to have to be a code of conduct for signing such conventions with other countries. There can be major differences in taxation levels between Canada and the other country signing the convention. In such cases, there is clearly a problem, and we must ensure that we are not threatening economic transactions and running the risk of losing revenues here in signing such agreements.

Before us we have a tax convention with the United States. Obviously, a person can oppose it if they like, but they have to say so directly. They cannot, in our view anyway, oppose something that aims to maximize economic exchange between Canada and the United States.

For a long time it was believed that our markets in Canada were east-west and now increasingly we see that they are north-south. There is a great deal of potential for development there. I can understand that there are still some pockets of resistance among those who are opposed to free trade and everything that goes with it, but we must think of where we are headed in the next century. And this is where we are headed. Consistency and logic is required. When one agrees to get involved in something like free trade, one has to live with what that implies. One has to live with reciprocity as well. Now, I want to get on to the content of these amendments, which strike me as suffering either from bad drafting, technically speaking, or from a fundamental problem.

Of course, there is the first amendment. I have heard what the Liberal member has had to say, waxing so eloquent in his attack on the tax rate cut from 10 per cent down to 5 per cent. Yet his amendment is aimed at ensuring that this will not apply after the year 2000. Why before that date? Why not after that date? Why 2000? Why not 2001? Why not 2002? It is very hard to grasp the reasoning behind his first amendment and I have not found anyone able to explain the real meaning and scope of his first amendment to me.

Obviously, one cannot agree with something that is poorly written. You have to be for something or against it. You cannot be against something for a few years and then in favour of it after that. There comes a time for logic.

The second amendment reminds me of those who are in favour of free trade but only one way free trade, with others opening up their borders to us, but our borders being closed to them. But this is in the area of taxation. We are told that we must not allow this retroactive refund, as one might call it, not allow it if there has been income taxable in Canada during that period. There is another side to that coin also. What reasoning applies to the reverse situation, American residents whose assets were in Canada or Quebec?

But the amendment does not address the opposite situation. Accepting the second amendment means asking the Americans to follow suit and to reopen the tax convention. This is, I suppose, what they had in mind, because consistency is required with what is proposed. I shall be surprised if they do so, because these are the same people who tell us sovereignists in the speeches they make here: "It will be just dreadful if you vote yes. Perhaps NAFTA would have to be reopened". Yet they want to reopen tax conventions. And they spoke of their desire to reopen NAFTA during the election campaign.

• (1230)

I sense a strong desire on their part to reopen the whole discussion about relations between Canada and the United States. Of course, that is their right, but I do not think this desire is shared by the majority of the House or by the majority of the public.

Of course we are concerned about the most vulnerable in our society. And as far as the future of our social programs is concerned, I think we can all agree that some serious debate is in order regarding the approach suggested by this government.

However, we must not exaggerate, and the figures quoted by the hon. member to indicate the economic impact of these amendments or these motions are clearly exaggerated. There was a reference to hundreds of millions of dollars. I read what happened in committee, I followed the proceedings, and no one could extrapolate the same figures as the hon. member and say that hundreds of millions of dollars were involved in this particular case.

It is easy to quote figures out of the blue, but you have to support those figures, justify them and provide documentation. We cannot afford to keep throwing figures at the public and say: Yes, that is the way it is, without further ado. We have to be more serious, more credible than that.

And that is why we cannot support these amendments, and this applies both to Motion No. 1 and Motion No. 2. Motion No. 1 is poorly drafted, complicated and not consistent with what the hon. member said, in my opinion. The second amendment makes no provision for compensation or reciprocity. After all, this is a two–way street. When we sign tax treaties, there must be reciprocity. We cannot get away from that. However, there is nothing in the second motion that refers to this.

If they want to renegotiate the whole tax treaty, that is their problem. What we would prefer and what we always suggested is to go along with what was said by the auditor general. We now have a certain number of tax treaties that cause problems because of the differences in tax rates. In such cases we will need certain guidelines for adopting tax treaties, because this is going to escalate in the next few years, considering current economic trends.

So we will have to give much stricter guidelines when we send people to sign this kind of tax treaty, to avoid being faced with a situation that will be difficult to change subsequently.

In concluding, and I do not intend to speak at greater length on this matter, we agree with the tax convention. I must admit, however, that the retroactive aspect bothers us too. It bothers us that compensation is given retroactively.

That being said, these two amendments will not correct that, neither the first nor the second motion—they will not correct that because, as I said earlier, the amendments make no provision for compensation or reciprocity. When the time comes to vote on the tax convention on third reading, we will have to evaluate Bill S–9 as such. On the whole, we think it is important to pursue this approach.

I repeat, the retroactive aspect bothers us. But in any case, what the hon. member suggested does nothing to correct this particular aspect. We will vote against both amendments and we will vote in favour of Bill S–9 on third reading. I am sure the hon. member will listen to his colleague, the parliamentary secretary, who will explain what amounts are involved with this bill and tell him they are nowhere near what he suggested.

I find it amusing to hear him attack the Bloc Quebecois in this debate. He should be more concerned about ensuring that his party, the government party, has certain guidelines for adopting tax conventions. He should get that message across to his supporters and perhaps even to the government, and then we will get somewhere. We cannot backtrack and change things that have been signed and that arise from the whole North American free trade context. Any action that is taken should be logical and consistent, and that is why the Bloc Quebecois will support this bill and will reject, as the government and also the Reform Party have done on many occasions, the two motions proposed by the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to speak on the amendments being presented by the member for Gander—Grand Falls. I would like to make a few comments on the specifics of the amendments. These questions were addressed not only in the Senate but also in the House of Commons finance committee by witnesses who appeared from the department, including myself, to go through each of these points.

• (1235)

For people trying to follow the logic of the bill, the protocol was required as a result of changes in American tax law in 1988. Once those were put into place it became incumbent upon the Canadian government to revise the tax arrangements between the two countries.

The member for Gander—Grand Falls was quite keen to point out there were witnesses in the American Senate and the House of Representatives who found this bill to be very helpful. It does not surprise me that a bill should come out to be win–win and that there should be supporters in the United States who think this is of benefit to them. That is why the country adopted it. Also on the public record, our department has been very strong and this is also of benefit to Canadians.

It does not only help the wealthy Canadians who certainly are helped by this, but it also helps a number of ordinary Canadians who have second properties in the United States under relatively moderate circumstances. It also helps a number of corporations operating in the United States.

The United States is the largest trading partner we have, not only in the corporate sense but in the personal sense. It is the largest travelling relationship we have. It is the largest second investment for a lot of families. We have to be very careful not to develop a tax regime in isolation while totally not thinking of what happens to people in other regimes. What happens to many Canadians in the United States is a major tax consideration. It is incumbent upon this government to make sure those conditions are matched and that we do the best for Canadians.

As with any treaty and protocol, there are conditions that are more satisfactory to the opposite side. Either we do things to accommodate them or we have no agreement. To think that none of the American interests were reached in this protocol would be a silly assumption. It would also be equally silly to think that none of the objectives of the Canadian government were reached in this bill.

Dealing with the first motion, the 5 per cent withholding rate on direct dividends has been adopted by many of our major trading partners. Zero withholding is the standard among EEC countries. We are perfectly within our legal rights to insist upon higher rates as is suggested in the amendment, but we must recognize in doing so that our ability to attract additional investment and to retain existing investment would weaken with adverse revenue effects.

If we are concerned about the cash flow of the federal government, we must be cognizant of what we do in tax policy which aggravates taxpayers and causes them to engage in tax avoidance. Canadian firms attempting to enter or expand in foreign markets would be at a competitive disadvantage.

A temporary reduction in the withholding tax rate, as proposed in this amendment by the member for Gander—Grand Falls, would be the least favourable option. First, it would allow corporations to withdraw past earnings from Canadian operations at the reduced rate. The guarantee of higher future rates would create a positive incentive to do so. Second, it would eliminate the value of the rate reduction encouraging U.S. corporations to make any long term investments in their Canadian operations. In other words, it would be better not to go to 5 per cent at all rather than apply the reduced rate for only a few years.

On the first motion and concerning a point already made by the mover, any change to the protocol will necessarily endanger if not scuttle it inasmuch as it represents an agreement between two parties that can only be changed with the agreement of both parties. If we make changes on our side we have to understand that part of our obligation is to allow parties on the other side who may be dissatisfied with one part or another to make additional changes they would like. We cannot pick and choose among the pieces.

The second motion presented by the member is also opposed by the government. By way of background, most of the benefits of the article dealing with taxes on debt are required to be provided by the United States. Specifically, the U.S. must grant to Canadian residents an estate tax exemption based on the same $600,000 exemption that U.S. citizens receive, rather than the $60,000 exemption currently provided. The U.S. must credit capital gains tax paid by U.S. citizens on properties situated in Canada against the U.S. tax payable by those citizens in respect of that Canadian property.

The only real obligation imposed on Canada by this article is to provide a reciprocal credit for its own residence. That is, Canadians who die owning U.S. property will be entitled to credit any U.S. estate tax owing on that property against their Canadian income tax payable on U.S. properties and income from U.S. sources.

• (1240)

Accordingly, if there is no Canadian tax payable at the outset, there does not seem to be any sort of benefit that Canada would be required to provide under this article. If that reasoning holds, and I do allow for the possibility that what the motion literally provides may not be what the member was looking to accomplish, then the motion makes no substantive change and should be voted down on that basis. If on the other hand members believe the motion does have substantive effect, I would refer to the argument set out in the third point concerning this first motion.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address the amendments put forward by the member for Gander—Grand Falls. Before I comment on them, he took a heck of a long time during his 20–minute oration to point out in a very partisan and grandstanding fashion how the Reform Party and the Bloc Quebecois support this bill. However, he conveniently ignored the fact that his very own government supports this bill. In every comment the member made about the opposition parties supporting this bill, he conveniently and purposely left out mentioning that his government is in favour of this bill.

I respect the member's right to disagree with his own party. We believe in that on this side of the House. We believe it is an advantage to allow members of a party to speak out on the negatives of a bill, especially if members so passionately feel there is something wrong with it. However, to carry the game to the degree the hon. member has in terms of giving the general impression that his party was not a part of it disappoints me. I respect the hon. member, but I must put on the record that in this case the way he presented his comments is taking political partisanship one dramatic step too far.

Let us get to the crux of the matter which are two amendments to the bill. I agree with the member for Témiscamingue. He is right. These two amendments are poorly written and poorly thought out. They have been served up to circumvent the bill itself so that this gentleman could have one more opportunity, one more platform to give his speech and to hear himself talk.

What the member accomplished in the process was to show us the typical Liberal attitude that where there are tax breaks available for Canadians, where there are advantages for Canadian citizens in the form of reduced taxes or where it eliminates double taxation to help solve a problem in our tax system, the Liberal government is against it. The Liberal government and this member are against it.

The hon. member wants to generate as much revenue for the government as possible on the backs of what he calls the so–called rich. The mythology that the rich somehow or other get a disproportionate share of the advantages and benefits of infrastructure is crap. That kind of philosophy and attitude has to stop, which is why Liberalism is slowly coming to an end as well.

For the member to give a speech one way and to ignore the benefits of the bill, never once addressing the advantages and the good aspects of the bill, is terribly one sided. It is the Liberal way of arguing. I believe the only way government members can defend themselves is by presenting a biased and prejudicial point of view without looking at it from both sides.

The reality and the weaknesses of these two amendments to Bill S–9 are that by trying to strike the bill down, the member is not accepting the realities of today's economic climate. The global economy requires that everybody, as closely and as much as possible, deals under the same rules and rates of taxation so that there is no unfair competition and the flow of capital is not more advantageous in one country or another. If Canada does not keep in step with globalization and with the same rates of taxation by convention with all other countries, we are at a great and serious disadvantage.

• (1245)

In light of the personal crusade of the member for Gander—Grand Falls to strike down Bill S–9 on technical grounds, that it did not originate in the House, he is ignoring the wonderful advantages and benefits of the bill.

I was being taunted by the other side to say what those advantages were. It offers relief for Canadian residents from the application of U.S. estate taxes. It has tremendous advantages for all people in eastern Canada who have residences in Florida. If they happened to sell them they would have to pay estate taxes on anything over $60,000. It raises the limit to $600,000. Is that not an advantage to Canadian residents?

Yet when we listened to this member's speech he made it sound like it is a tax expenditure we are giving up that will cost Canadian taxpayers. It is not costing Canadian taxpayers. It is costing U.S. taxpayers. That is the other side of the story the member failed to point out.

That is what I mean by balanced and representative argument and presentation when we are discussing bills. We will be discussing complete fundamental tax reform in the country very shortly. It is a burning issue; it is an issue that will come up. It includes issues like taxation and rates across borders nation to nation. We will have debate on various forms of flat tax. The member for Broadview—Greenwood has a proposal for a flat tax that his party members conveniently choose to ignore, which is typically Liberal. It offers a wonderful solution to our complicated system but they ignore the member. I do not know why but they do.

When the debate takes place we will have people speaking for it and against it. No tax reform and no taxation system, no matter how much it is simplified, has all the answers and has all the solutions. It requires debate; it requires looking at both sides of the story. That is what I would like to see happen when we discuss taxation bills especially and bills that affect our pocketbooks as this bill does.

As critic of this topic and this bill on behalf of our party I will be making a recommendation to our caucus. We on this side of the House have the right to accept my recommendation or not. We will see what happens on that side of the House when the amendments are voted on. I will recommend to our party that we oppose the two amendments because they are strictly for grandstanding purpose. They are very poorly written. They are extremely hard to understand except for Motion No. 1 which I can understand.

As the Bloc member said, how can they be for it for a few years and then against it after? As the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance pointed out very well, the member probably does not understand the implications of his motion. As soon as I heard that, it verified the fact even the Liberal government felt it was very poorly written.

Therefore on those two grounds I will be recommending that we oppose them. However, when it comes to Bill S–9 itself, I will be recommending to our party that we support the bill. That is where my comments end on the matter.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my responsibility to speak on these amendments because for seven years in the House I have been trying to generate debate on behalf of my constituents and others across Canada who believe the current tax system is not fair, not efficient and complex.

For years we have been amending the tax act of Canada. We have made amendments to amendments that have generated a complexity. Most tax lawyers and most tax accountants when speaking privately say that the current tax act is an unmitigated disaster.

• (1250)

After the last election when the Reform Party came to the House I was hopeful we could generate real solid debate on comprehensive tax reform. Granted it takes a couple of years to get our feet wet in this place. Most Reform Party members would admit that governance of a country like ours is complex. We cannot come here on day one and expect our ideas to be totally understood. There are all kinds of variables and difficulties that make implementing legislation difficult in comparison with the view we had in the private sector. I have certainly learned the hard way that it is difficult. I respect the fact that the Reform Party took a couple of years before it began the debate on total tax reform.

I will support my government on the bill. I would never vote against a money bill because it is a confidence bill. The hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls and I are not saying that we want an election over the bill. However we are trying to illustrate what I have been saying in the House for seven years. The bill is another example of how amendments to amendments of the tax act can be brought forward.

I do not mean to be disrespectful but probably 85 per cent to 90 per cent of the members of the House do not know the full ramifications of the bill. We expect the opposition to challenge bills like this one. If I were in opposition right now, quite frankly as I forced debate on the bill, I probably would have put a lot more heat on the government and asked when we would move the debate forward on total tax reform. But no, they wanted to let it go through.

The difficulty I have with the bill is that we are giving tax reform. We are harmonizing with the United States. The bill harmonizes Canada with certain aspects of U.S. tax law. The one great feature about the bill is that when the United States of America wants to amend its tax act we move quickly to be in harmony with it.

We can reflect on the ongoing debate in the United States in terms of single tax, flat tax and all the various democrats, republicans and independents who are talking about total tax reform. If it gets to the front burner of their agenda hopefully Canada will not be far behind. Obviously we will move in a micro second. Part of the reason we are moving in the bill is that the Americans want it to be done quickly.

One positive feature is that we move quickly to harmonize, but the difficulty is that it only gives tax reform to the elite in Canada. I have immense respect for my colleague from Winnipeg, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, and I will support him in the bill. However I would not call people who have residences in Florida ordinary Canadians. They are wealthy. I consider someone who has $600,000 worth of property in Florida or in some other place in the United States to be fairly wealthy.

I also have great concerns about article XI. Essentially once the bill is passed, and it will be passed, it will affect Canadians who want to send their children to an ivy league school such as Harvard, Yale, Cornell or Rice. I have nothing against ivy league schools in the United States. I am proud of Canadian universities but I would have liked to have gone to UCLA or one of those big ivy league universities. It costs $25,000 or $30,000 a year for four or five years. Under the bill Canadians who can afford to send their children to the ivy league schools will get a tax credit. I have great difficulty when essentially the bill will create a market for wealthy Canadians.

• (1255)

If I were the president of Notre Dame or one of those places I would take out an ad in all Canadian universities. I would go to Upper Canada College in my community in Toronto, go to Bishop Strachan or take out a flyer telling parents about the tax credit they would get for all the money they spend sending their son or daughter there.

We listened to the member for Yukon last night give her closing remarks. I have had immense respect for the member for Yukon since I came here seven years ago. She said that we were here for people who cannot always speak for themselves. It is obvious the people who can afford to speak for themselves certainly have the ability to get the bill through the agenda in the first two years of our mandate. Quite frankly it is a question of priorities, but in this bill we are forgetting a bit of our Liberal tradition.

Mr. Morrison: So stand up and be counted.

Mr. Silye: You are voting for it.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): I will not vote against the government on a bill that could bring the government down.

Mr. Silye: It won't bring it down.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Yes, it will. It is a principle. It is a money bill and on anything to do with confidence in the government I would resign from the party. That is what the opposition does not understand.

I suspect, and this is not partisan, members of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition are feeling a bit guilty as part of their responsibility is to challenge us from time to time and they were totally asleep at the switch and could not generate a debate in the House on a bill which essentially in my judgment caters to the elite.

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy today to rise in support of the motions of the member for Gander—Grand Falls. I have always been impressed by him. He is one of those rare individuals who inevitably speaks his mind. He does his homework, analyses legislation and makes up his own mind about whether it is good or bad. For some members that seems to be a rare piece of behaviour.

What is the bill all about? What are the motions all about? I have to go back to Kamloops at the end of this week. Whenever I do that I go to Main Street and have coffee with a few of the folks who ask what has been going on in Ottawa. What has the government been up to? What legislation is before the House? What is the government dealing with? What are the priorities of Parliament and so on and so forth? Part of my responsibility is to reflect as accurately as I can what the priority is. They will be perplexed when I tell them about all the challenges that confront us as a great nation.

• (1300)

Here we are almost on the eve of a major referendum about the future of the country and there are horrendous economic, social, cultural and environmental problems confronting us from coast to coast. I have to tell my constituents the government's priority at this time is to bring forth a piece of legislation that will benefit only the very wealthiest families in the country in terms of their tax returns.

The other day a major report in newspapers across Canada indicated that 75 per cent of Canadians willfully carry out their business transactions in cash to avoid paying income tax or sales tax or whatever. In other words, 75 per cent of Canadians are participating knowingly and up front in the underground economy. Are they doing that because they are tax cheats and because they participate in illegal and unethical activities? No. They have lost faith in the integrity of the tax system of the country. They see all kinds of people who do not pay their fair share.

There are small business investors and small business entrepreneurs who are struggling and who see all kinds of tax breaks going to large corporations but none to them. They are working 60 and 70 hours a week and are struggling to get by, and they see tax breaks going to certain firms, not to small firms, and to certain Canadians but not to the ordinary Canadian.

What does this tax provision do? Let anybody in the House stand up and argue after I sit down, but this is designed for the wealthiest families in the country.

I wish my friend for Broadview—Greenwood were going to vote differently, but at least he is speaking up for what he believes in, which is more than most people in the House are doing on this occasion. Why are Canadian taxpayers being now asked to subsidize those families that want to educate their sons and daughters and family members in the United States? That is what this does. That is what the member for Gander—Grand Falls is saying. That is what the provision is.

Those people who are sending their sons, daughters and other family members to American universities will not even have to be on the short list any more. For any college or any university in the United States, tax credits are available for any donations made to the foreign university or college.

Why should struggling Canadian taxpayers and small business operators in the country be subsidizing American colleges and universities? Why should hard working men and women be subsidizing American colleges and universities? It does not even matter what their credentials are. They could be colleges that simply hand out PhDs or masters degrees for the price of a few dollars. Any American college or university is eligible to receive donations from Canadians and they will receive a tax credit for that.

How can my friends in the Reform Party support this kind of provision, which is so unbalanced in terms of fairness? This will cost us money. It will cost the taxpayers of Canada hundreds of millions of dollars every year from now on. If we were a wealthy nation and had all kinds of extra coinage, perhaps we could consider this. I ask my friends in the Reform Party, who remind us regularly about their concern for the deficit and debt of the country, why they are supporting a piece of legislation that will drain hundreds of millions of dollars out of the treasury every single year.

I have been listening carefully to the debate. I could not listen too carefully when the bill was in the Senate because it went so quickly. Quite frankly, it is going awfully fast in the House. It is a tax provision, tax reform for the wealthiest people in the country, for the elite of Canada. Is this our priority? Yes, it is. Is comprehensive tax reform taking place at this time? No, it is not. Is it called for by every single Canadian man, woman, and child in the country? Yes, it is. What are we doing? What is the government doing? The government brings forward a piece of tax reform via the Senate that will harmonize certain corporate tax structures with the United States and bring in provisions that are absolutely astounding.

I would like to hear from my friends opposite before the debate ends why we are subsidizing American colleges. Why are Canadian taxpayers subsidizing American universities? Why do we consider it a priority at this time to give tax breaks of hundreds of millions of dollars to the wealthiest families in Canada?

• (1305)

My friend from Broadview—Greenwood, an individual for whom I have much respect, asks whether it is really a priority at this time to be passing tax legislation that will benefit people who have investments in the United States in excess of $600,000. I suppose we could feel sorry for these folks. If you have investments over $600,000, the tax system could be more to your advantage. How many Canadians do we know with investments in the United States in excess of $600,000? A lot of people might have a cottage, an apartment in Florida or in California or someplace. How many people are worried today in terms of their financial realities who own $600,000 worth of real estate in the United States or have $600,000 worth of investments in the United States?

I say to my friends opposite in the Liberal Party, is this your priority? Are these the Canadians you want to go to bat for today? What about the people at the food banks who are lining up this afternoon? What about the single parents who are struggling simply to make ends meet? What about the small business operators in this country struggling daily to simply put food on the table for their families? Why are you not bringing in legislation for them?

I am referring to the second amendment which tries to bring at least a shred of credibility to this debate. As my hon. friend from Newfoundland has indicated, it is not perfect; it is sort of half a loaf because it says we are to limit this tax break to the year 2000. I see this as a bit odd, but I think it is at least going to end this tax buffoonery that is going to benefit a handful of very wealthy Canadians, at least to the year 2000.

When I go back to Kamloops later this week and I have to explain to the people on Main Street in Kamloops, struggling business people, people who are struggling simply to put food on the table and unfortunately an increasing number who find themselves out of work, jobless, that this somehow is a priority of this Parliament and this government, they will shake their heads in disbelief and say that this place has lost touch with reality, that this place somehow deals in some Walt Disney version of the real world.

I look forward to hearing other participants in the debate explain why on earth this is a priority.

I say in conclusion to my hon. friend from Gander—Grand Falls, thank you for standing up and putting forward two amendments today that will bring at least some sanity to this legislation and indicate on your behalf and a handful of your colleagues your disgust with this legislation as well.

The Deputy Speaker: I would ask members again to please put their remarks to the Chair. The Chair gets lonely and feels not a part of the debate and so on.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to take a few moments and clarify what I believe to be some misconceptions or possibly attempts by particularly the person who just spoke to put things that are not in the bill before Canadians. I feel that is extremely unfair.

What we are talking about here is a bill whose purpose is to put into place a protocol to amend the 1980 income tax treaty between Canada and the United States that was signed on March 17, 1995. The purpose of this is to put these measures into force. It has nothing to do with the member for Kamloops' statement of us wanting to give rich people more money or some such nonsense.

One of the provisions of this bill will be, for instance, the elimination of withholdings that are there now. For instance, some people have estates in the United States. The example was given of a Florida winter home. I have a case a constituent brought to my attention of a mobile home in Florida owned by senior citizens and one of them died. I would not exactly call those rich people. Rich people do not own $10,000 mobile homes when they are 70 years old.

• (1310)

I know the amounts. I know very well the amounts that are in the bill. The limits that are there now in terms of estates would barely cover a mobile home, its furniture, and a car.

An hon. member: That is not true.

Mr. Boudria: The member across says that is not true. That could be his opinion. I am looking forward to his speech, which he seems to be wanting to make simultaneously with other hon. members. Perhaps he is in a hurry and cannot wait the extra 10 minutes to speak. Perhaps then he had nothing substantial to say to start with. Either way, we will find out in 10 minutes what the hon. member wants to say.

The point I am making here is that we are trying to amend the tax treaty between two countries. Under the terms of this treaty, gifts by Canadians to American colleges and universities will qualify for charitable donation tax credits, as has been said. However, half of the sentence was not said. That is the fact that gifts made by Americans to Canadian post-secondary education institutions will also qualify as charitable donations for the purpose of computing the donor's U.S. tax liability. In other words, it will permit people to donate money to a university—which we all recognize, I would hope, as being something legitimate and worth doing. It will enable us to continue doing that, and for a Canadian to donate to a U.S. institution should there be such people, and I am sure there are. Given that the U.S. population is at least 10 times the size of ours, I would say there is at least a fair chance that the reverse will also be true.

That was not said by the hon. member for Kamloops. Why? Because the member for Kamloops did not feel it injected part of the partisan debate he was trying to portray in the House. We should remember what the bill does. Perhaps we should go beyond the rhetoric of the hon. member for Kamloops.

I ask the hon. member from the New Democratic Party, who a minute ago could not wait for 10 minutes to make his contribution, to speak to us about that and to admit to this House that in fact Americans will be able to donate to Canadian universities. Inject that into the debate so that all of us can understand. Maybe he can tell us if he is against that, particularly at a time when we are seeking assistance for our post-secondary education institutions.

I believe these tax protocols are for the benefit of residents of both countries. The protocol has to be ratified by both countries before it takes effect. Some people have withholdings right now that have been there for years, and they cannot get their money back because this ratification process is not yet complete.

Let us get on with it and pass this bill. Let these people have their funds and allow for the kind of investment that I brought to the attention of the House a moment ago.

Let us look at other changes that are included in this treaty: bilateral reduction of withholding taxes on dividends, interest, royalties, reflecting the rates now accepted in force between most industrialized countries—is that so terrible; complete withholding tax exemptions for payment for the use of technology—I hope we are not against that; relief for Canadian residents from the application of U.S. estate taxes—that is the issue I raised earlier; and expansion of the exemption from U.S. tax for income earned by RRSPs, RRIFs, and Canadian pension plan—are we against that too? I would hope not. That is in the bill. Should we not be supporting that? I suspect we should.

The bill also provides for authority to impose withholding on CPP and OAS payments made to American residents. Is the NDP against that too? I am still awaiting the speech from the hon. member across the way, the speech he could not wait to give us 10 minutes ago.

• (1315)

In addition, the bill provides for mutual assistance in the collection of taxes owed. Are we not in favour of collecting taxes that have not been paid? That is part of the protocol as well. That is what we are trying to do today. Are the NDP members against that too? Presumably they are, otherwise they would be supporting this bill. I cannot wait to see how they vote on the final outcome. I cannot wait for the third reading debate.

Finally, the bill provides for authority to enter into arbitration to resolve disputes where the two countries' revenue authorities cannot agree. In other words, there is even a mechanism in here for dispute resolution in the whole process. In my book that makes this a good bill, notwithstanding the rhetoric. It makes it a bill that we should be supporting and passing. I cannot wait to see what the NDP will do particularly after the remarks of the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to Bill S-9 and in support of the amendments put forward by the hon. member opposite, the member for Gander—Grand Falls.

Since 1988 the Americans have required all non-residents to pay a 55 per cent estate tax on all U.S. property worth more than $60,000. However, the agreement before our House which is not yet ratified means that Canadians with less than $600,000 in U.S. assets will now be exempt from American estate taxes. That also means that Canadians with more than $600,000 in assets will pay the American tax and then will be allowed to claim a portion of it in foreign tax credits here in Canada. This means a $600,000 U.S. exemption which is a $900,000 Canadian exemption in real dollars. This is a tax bill which is helping the very rich.

I want to say a couple of things about this bill. Members of the Liberal Party opposite, including the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, talk about how important this bill is to education. It is very peculiar that medicare, the health care system and the education system in Canada are being squeezed by these very Liberals through the drastic cuts in this time bomb budget which is before our country now.

We are hurting the education system in Canada as a result of it, yet we are going to give the very wealthy an opportunity to make contributions to the education system in the United States and we are going to subsidize it through our tax dollars. My colleague, the member for Kamloops, clearly delineated and outlined the outrage of Canadians with respect to the approach of this government cutting back on education in Canada but providing an opportunity for wealthy Canadians to get tax credits for making contributions to the American education system.

Now we see whose interests this government is working on behalf of in this House of Commons. It is not for ordinary Canadians, not for unemployed Canadians who require unemployment insurance or who require some assistance with respect to health care and education. They are not the interests of the Liberal federal government. The interests are those who feed the Liberal government, those who make substantial financial contributions to the Liberal Party. The very wealthy in this country, the large corporations, the wealthy families are getting their interests high on the agenda of the House of Commons because they own the Liberal Party, they contribute millions of dollars to it every year.

As a result, their agenda is what is on the agenda of Canada. Their agenda is to accumulate more wealth. That is the agenda of the wealthy, the individuals, families and corporations in this country who bought and paid for the Liberal Party. This is a bill the Liberal Party is putting forward in the House of Commons which will thank them in spades for their generosity over the last couple of years. The Canadian population is going to be paying for this generosity by the Liberal Party to their wealthy friends.

Bill S–9 is an absolute disgrace for the Liberal Party. The Liberals should be embarrassed out of their shorts with respect to this bill. I hope they are feeling as bad as some of the members opposite look like they are feeling because this bill is a wrong priority for Canada. It is a wrong priority for the House of Commons.

• (1320)

What about the farmers? This bill gives the wealthy families a break with retroactive tax breaks back to 1988, but what about the farmers in the prairies? What has the government done for the farmers? It eliminated the Crow benefit, which is a transportation subsidy. In effect 25 per cent of Canada's farming population will be eliminated from earning a living using their farming skills, yet the government is going to give the very wealthy additional hundreds of millions of dollars. This is tax reform of the very worst kind.

What about a fair taxation system where Canadians who are earning a living feel confident that their load is being shared by the very wealthy? The Liberal government is not providing that sense of confidence to the ordinary Canadians, to those who are working and to those who are looking for jobs.

This is an issue on which typically, Liberal members have mastered speaking out of both sides of their mouths. The hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls did an exceptional job of articulating the pitfalls of the legislation and the lack of priority it has with the Liberal government. That is common practice in the Liberal Party. Whenever it has a bill which is embarrassing, which will hurt the majority of Canadians at the expense of the very few wealthy, it always tries to have a few members of Parliament say: "What we are doing is not the right thing, but we are not going to vote against it. We are not going to make any public contention that it is a bad bill. However, we are going to put it on the record that we are not happy with what is going on".

It is time for Canadians to recognize that members of the Liberal Party of Canada speak out of both sides of their mouths. They do it effectively. I want them to understand that Canadians will not accept that very much longer.

This is not the first piece of legislation to help wealthy Canadians. In the budget last February the government dealt with family trusts. Family trusts are costing Canadian taxpayers millions and millions of dollars each year in terms of lost revenue, hundreds of millions of dollars over the course of the last four or five years. A family trust allows very wealthy families to shelter their income and their assets from Revenue Canada. Therefore, they do not contribute in a fair way to the revenues of our country.

In the last budget the Liberals said they would do away with the family trust situation to obtain more money for the population of Canada. When? In 1995? No. 1996? No. 1997? Well no, it takes a bit of time to unwind these things. Maybe in 1999, a year or two after the next federal election is when the Liberal Party will address the issue. It is helping the very wealthiest families and corporations in Canada.

The New Democrats are four square against this sort of priority when there are a large number of people who are unemployed, when the unemployment insurance program is under attack, when education is being cut back and when there is a vicious, unrelenting attack on medicare. The New Democrats will continue to stand up for ordinary Canadians on these issues, including fair taxation. We are asking the government to reconsider the bill, to make amends and to return it to the Senate, telling the Senate that we will not pass the bill.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to rise today to say that I consider this entire debate to be pathetically irrelevant. I reflect on the words of the hon. member for Kamloops that it is a frosty Friday when we have a member of the Reform Party agreeing with a member of the New Democrats.

We should be bringing forward issues like true tax reform, such as the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood and our member for Calgary Centre have suggested. We should be bringing forward legislation for proper protection, particularly under the CPP and protection for seniors. We should be bringing forward realistic reform to health care and returning room to tax and powers to the provinces. I look at the Order Paper and see that in addition to this totally irrelevant and pathetic Bill S–9, the next orders of government are: Bill C–90, the Minister of Finance, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act; Bill C–106, the Minister of Justice, an act respecting the Law Commission of Canada; and Bill C–105, the Minister of Finance, Income Tax Conventions Implementation Act. We should be doing some real legislation in this House.

• (1325)

It is a very unusual day but I underscore the fact that I stand very strongly behind the member for Kamloops when I say that this bill along with the rest of the legislation that is being brought forward by this government is pathetically irrelevant. Why not bring something to this House that has some meaning to the people of Canada?

Mr. Wayne Easter (Malpeque, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill S–9 to draw out some of the points that are in the bill. First I want to congratulate my colleague, the member for Gander—Grand Falls, for bringing this important issue forward in a number of ways.

There are a number of good points in this bill and there are a couple of points I have very grave and serious concerns about. It is important to try to put on the record what some of those changes are so that we can distinguish between the areas of concern and the areas that may be positive.

The agreement makes a number of important changes to the earlier treaty, including bilateral reductions in withholding tax rates and dividends, interest and royalties reflecting the rates now accepted and enforced between most industrialized countries. That is an area I have some concern with.

A complete withholding tax exemption for payments for the use of technology, I think is a good point.

There is significant relief for Canadian residents from the application of United States estate taxes, increasing the maximum estate tax exemption from $60,000 to between $600,000 and $1.2 million U.S.

The expansion to the exemption from United States tax for income earned by RRSPs, RRIFs and Canadian pension plans is a good point.

There is the authority to impose withholding on CPP and old age security payments made to American residents. The 1980 treaty by contrast allowed only the state of residence to tax such payments.

There are two other points I should mention. There is the provision for mutual assistance in the collection of taxes owed by a citizen of one country who resides in the other, thus assisting in the prevention of tax fraud and evasion. Finally, there is authority to enter into arbitration to resolve disputes where the two countries' revenue authorities cannot agree.

My point is that there are good points in the bill but also some areas that we should be concerned about. I want to draw attention to my major area of concern. I agree fully with the member for Gander—Grand Falls on this point. The member raised it in his point of order with the Speaker. He referred to a letter dated July 17 from the Minister of Finance. That letter makes these points. I quote from that letter:

> I am not aware of the basis for your suggestion that the cost associated with the reductions in withholding tax rates and certain dividends will total $250 million annually. The only estimates that have been made post that figure at $125 million for 1995–96 and $145 million for 1996–97. It is important to note that these figures do not attempt to account for the effects of increased investment and the consequential growth of income tax revenues that may be anticipated because of the steps we are taking to bring our withholding tax rates in line with our major trading partners.

That is the nub of the issue. To me the statements indicate there is certainly a benefit to the wealthy in that part of the bill which I have to be concerned about. To be up front about it, one of the concerns I have about this Parliament is that I firmly believe for a Parliament to operate effectively, one has to have good government and good opposition.

• (1330)

I am amazed. I am extremely angry at what I hear from the opposition parties in terms of the issues sometimes. They have failed in previous debates to draw out these points so that they can be looked at early enough to try to address them.

The Reform Party is always willing and able to criticize some of the social programs in Atlantic Canada, to criticize the unemployment insurance program. Here is a case where there are benefits to the wealthy and its members have kept mum and been highly supportive. As members of a good opposition party, they did not even draw out these points in debate.

I am confident as a member of the government that there will be a counterbalance found in future legislation to reinstate some of the money back into the tax system, either by looking at RRSPs, corporate taxes or other taxation. As the government whip said in his speech, there are certainly some areas where we will gain finances as a result of this bill in terms of what is happening to the American residents.

In the future we have to find a counterbalance to the mesh, to the finances, that have been lost as a result of the tax dividends being forgiven here.

I would hope and encourage the government to look at that in the future.

The Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 1. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred. The next question is on Motion No. 2.

[Translation]

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76, a recorded division on the motion now before the House stands deferred.

[English]

The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions at the report stage of the bill now before the House. The first vote will be on Motion No. 1.

Call in the members.

• (1335)

And the bells having rung:

The Deputy Speaker: It has been proposed that the matter be deferred until 5 p.m. this day.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

* * *

EXCISE TAX ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–90, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, as reported (without amendment) from the committee.

Hon. Jon Gerrard (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be concurred in.

The Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

(Motion agreed to.)

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time? With the permission of the House, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Gerrard (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C–90 be read for the third time and passed.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–90 contains legislative provisions permitting the implementation of a number of amendments to the excise tax announced earlier this year.

Most of these proposals are linked to amendments announced in the February 27, 1995 budget, including amendments to the air transportation tax, the excise tax on gasoline, the marking requirements on tobacco products for sale in Prince Edward Island and the seizure and notification provisions relating to violations of the Excise Act.

Other proposals concern amendments to rates of excise tax on tobacco products for sale in Quebec, Ontario and Prince Edward Island. These amendments were announced in February and March along with provincial tax increases on tobacco.

[English]

Let me begin by addressing the key budget measures contained in Bill C–90. First, proposed changes to the air transportation tax will enable the government to recover a greater proportion of the costs of the air transportation services and facilities that are used by air travellers.

The proposed amendments to the Excise Tax Act will increase the maximum air transportation tax on higher priced domestic and trans–border air travel and the tax on international air travel purchased in Canada from $50 to $55.

In addition, the maximum tax on trans–border air travel subject to the United States' 10 per cent air transportation tax and the tax on international air travel purchased outside Canada will increase from $25 to $27.50.

These changes to the air transportation tax, effective May 1, 1995, will generate additional revenues of $27 million in the 1995–96 fiscal year and $33 million in the 1996–97 fiscal year.

Second, Bill C–90 proposes an increase in the rates of excise tax on gasoline equal to 1.5 cents per litre effective February 28, 1995.

In a budget that focused almost entirely on reducing the spending of government and delivered expenditure cuts by a margin of seven to one over tax increases, a move that I know was applauded by members of the Reform Party, this measure is necessary to raise an additional $500 million per fiscal year to ensure that the government meets the deficit reduction targets that are integral to a strong and growing economy. The Minister of Finance has reaffirmed repeatedly the government's commitment to meet the deficit reduction targets outlined in the budget in 1995 and will undoubtedly reaffirm those in the next budget.

• (1340)

Third, in addition to these rate changes affecting the air transportation tax and gasoline, Bill C–90 also enacts amendments to the marking requirements for tobacco products for sale in Prince Edward Island. These amendments will phase out the sale of black stock or unmarked tobacco products in Prince Edward Island and allow for the sale of Nova Scotia marked tobacco products in the province.

This change in the tobacco marking scheme is being undertaken at the request of the two provinces and will allow for greater efficiency in serving the Prince Edward Island market.

The final budget measure contained in Bill C–90 concerns the seizure and notification provisions in respect of offences under the Excise Act.

The proposed amendments will rectify certain enforcement difficulties by allowing officers discretion in their ability to seize vehicles while stipulating that reasonable efforts must be undertaken to provide notice of seizure to known third party interests.

The bill also implements important changes in respect of excise tax rates for tobacco products for sale in Quebec, Ontario and Prince Edward Island.

As all hon. members are aware, modest federal excise tax increases were announced earlier this year in conjunction with provincial tobacco tax increases in these three provinces.

These tax increases follow the success to date of the national action plan to combat smuggling in significantly reducing contraband tobacco activity and restoring the domestic tobacco market to legitimate Canadian wholesalers and retailers.

In Quebec and Ontario, federal excise tax rates are being increased by 60 cents per carton of 200 cigarettes, while in Prince Edward Island excise taxes are being increased by $1 per carton of 200 cigarettes and 32 cents per 200 tobacco sticks.

The excise tax increases in respect of cigarettes for sale in Quebec and Ontario are effective February 18, 1995 while the increases in respect of cigarettes and tobacco sticks for sale in Prince Edward Island are effective April 1, 1995. These changes will generate an additional $65 million in federal revenues on a fiscal year basis.

Emphasize the importance of the provisions contained in Bill C–90, notwithstanding the flippant remarks made by the hon. member of the Reform Party while speaking earlier and saying that the legislation on the government's agenda was unimportant.

The proposed changes to the air transportation tax and the excise tax rates for gasoline are an important part of the government's commitment to increased cost recovery and deficit reduction.

Amendments to the tobacco marking scheme will allow for greater efficiency in serving the Prince Edward Island market, while amendments to the seizure and notification provisions of the Excise Act will improve the delivery of enforcement activities.

Finally, the changes to the excise tax rates for tobacco products for sale in Quebec, Ontario and Prince Edward Island represent important first steps toward the long term restoration of uniform federal excise tax rates for tobacco products across Canada.

[Translation]

I encourage my colleagues to pass this bill without delay.

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–90 is now at the third reading stage. We have already had an opportunity, as the official opposition, to state our position on this bill at the second reading stage and in committee, the Standing Committee on Finance.

Although some of these measures may be positive, there is one that bothers us particularly, so much so that we would vote against this bill. I am referring to the proposal to increase the excise tax on gas by 1.5 cents per litre.

I will be brief. I want to make a connection between this debate and the one we had when we were discussing the excise tax on cigarettes.

• (1345)

In fact, this bill contains measures that would bring about a gradual upward adjustment of the tax on tobacco products. Of course we all realized at the time that the purpose of the drastic reduction in taxes on tobacco products was to destabilize smuggling networks. However, everyone agrees that now the price is so affordable it could have a disastrous impact on the demand for these products in the long term. The lower the price, the better a product sells.

No one objects to an adjustment. However, we should be careful not to do this too quickly and in the process give the smuggling networks a chance to regroup and take control again.

That being said, the government still has a duty to monitor the situation, because there are other ways besides taxation to ensure that people engaged in smuggling various products are arrested. This still goes on. It is still the case for various kinds of products. Enforcement is not as strict at that level. Much remains to be done to improve the way we deal with various smuggling networks.

As far as the excise tax on gas is concerned, everybody knows it can be very irritating, and it is so easy for the government, when it needs money quickly, to use the excise tax on gas, because this is instant revenue. We are talking about $500 million which the finance minister quickly took out of taxpayers' pockets.

It is hard for the consumer to see this happening, because when the price of gas goes up at the pump, the consumer is not sure whether the price of oil has gone up or the retailer, the manufacturer or someone else has raised his profit margin or whether the government has just increased the excise tax.

Unlike other types of products, when we buy gas, it does not say what proportion of the price we pay for a litre of gas is actually taxes. It is just as well, because taxpayers would be even more furious with the various governments. They would be constantly reminded of all the taxes levied on gasoline products.

In this case as in the case of tobacco products, when the government goes to the other extreme and tax levels rise beyond the acceptance threshold, taxpayers feel they have every right to buy contraband goods. We may deplore it, but the taxpayers' feeling is that this is a legitimate action they are taking.

We must not do anything to bolster this trend, because we know all the problems there are with the underground economy, the black market economy. At some point, the tax on gasoline reached the limit people would bear. We feel that any increase will only contribute to pushing consumers toward the underground economy, which is extremely counterproductive for everyone. It is counterproductive not only for the taxpayers who make use of it, since those using the black market economy are penalizing themselves without knowing it, but also for everyone in the long run. At some point we have to learn our lesson.

It does not seem that we have learned any lesson from what happened with tobacco products. Certain products in a number of different areas are still being heavily taxed.

However, it is not abnormal for there to be higher taxes on gasoline than on other products, because of the environmental effects everyone is aware of. Steps must be taken to ensure that when what the economists call externalities result from the consumption of a product, there are provisions to make the users bear the cost of those externalities. At some point, however, there is some uncertainty as to whether we have gone too far in this.

Essentially, we strongly disagree with this measure and feel that raising the tax again by 1.5 cents a litre in his last budget was not the route the Minister of Finance ought to have taken. We do not feel this is a measure that will contribute to any great extent to economic recovery. Everyone knows that there is a lot of work to be done on the expenditure side. If the Minister of Finance has no ideas of his own, we might suggest that he hasten before the finance committee to discuss it, something he has refused to do because of his fear of presenting his financial statements before the referendum. That is understandable.

If he wants to discuss it in more detail, we invite him to do so. This will provide us with the opportunity to debate the matter with him and to point out that there may be other avenues he ought to explore when he needs to balance his books, instead of constantly digging into the taxpayers' pockets for more revenue.

• (1350)

Therefore, essentially, it is our intention to oppose adoption of Bill C–90 on third reading and, as I have said, it is because of this measure. There are others on which I have not spoken but which we were able to bring up during second reading or in committee on which we do agree. We have a major disagreement with this one.

[English]

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak in opposition to Bill C–90. This is a Liberal taxation bill. I want to comment on how easily the words "Liberals" and "increased taxation" flow together; they seem to be a naturally united phrase.

This bill amends the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act in order for the Liberals to bring in the increased taxes they proposed in their budget last February. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that you and probably every other working Canadian will agree that this country simply does not need any more new taxes. Canadians are probably one of the most overtaxed people in the entire world, and we have a government in power that is intent on continuing to make sure we do not lose that mantle of taxation.

Taxation ultimately drains the lifeblood out of our economy. This is something Canadians are very aware of and very concerned about, how the high taxation levels in our country have such a devastating effect on the economy. We will talk about two areas of harmful effects of taxation, which probably account for 90 per cent of how we build and keep our economy buoyant, and that is investor confidence and consumer confidence.

High taxation levels have delivered a tremendous level of uncertainty to the investors, the people who would build and expand businesses in our country, who would hire Canadians to run their factories and operations, creating jobs in the country. Because of the rising taxation levels there simply is no certainty of the future for these investors, who have no incentive to increase their investments.

The average working person in Canada probably has less disposable income than ever before. There is no certainty that disposable income will not continue to shrink. Therefore consumer spending has been drawn back, thus creating a harmful effect on our economy.

The Liberals respond not with a plan to decrease their spending, to decrease their deficit spending, not with a plan to offer some tax relief to Canadians, the two things that would probably serve in more ways than any other measures to restore some buoyancy to our economy. No. The Liberal Party does not respond with these two natural solutions. Instead, they implement more taxation in their February budget. Now they are seeking the authorization to put that into force.

Prior to the election in 1993, the Reform Party said that if the Liberal government were elected, using its own red book predictions on the financial aspect, over the term of this 35th Parliament the Liberal government would add $100 billion to our national debt and would increase the annual interest payments on that debt by some $10 billion. That is $100,000 billion and $10 billion. The Liberal Party is right on target.

• (1355)

By the end of the 35th Parliament our national debt will have increased by $100 billion, our interest payments on that debt will be up somewhere in the neighbourhood of $50 billion to $52 billion, and all because the Liberal Party has not taken what could be considered a common sense solution to the financial crisis in this country, which is to reduce taxes and reduce its deficit spending. Instead the Liberals chose to increase taxes. Bill C–90 gives them authorization to implement, for example, the 1.5 cent a litre tax on gasoline, which is going to add $500 million more taxes on the middle class alone.

While the government talks about tax fairness, in its last budget it in fact raised taxes by over $1 billion. In fact if we look at tax increases in the last two government budgets, the Liberals have increased taxes by about $2.5 billion, with another $500 million in user fees or hidden taxes.

Canadians should be pleased that these increased taxes have been put to good use. I will give some examples of Liberal good use. The U.S. Department of Energy—this is small potatoes, but there are about 5,000 of these, I understand—received a $35,000 grant from the Canadian government. The United Steel Workers of America received $116,000 from the taxpayers of Canada via the Liberal government. Here is a good one: the Prison Art Foundation received $51,000 from the Canadian taxpayers, compliments of the Liberal Party. The Feminist Literacy Workers Network received another $57,000 from the taxpayers of Canada, thanks to the Liberal government. This is only part of about 5,000 or 6,000 of these grants that have gone out.

This type of money does not fall down from the sky in some miraculous manner. We do not pick it off a tree, as some Liberals would like to believe. This kind of money comes from the pockets of hard working Canadians, who are among the most highly taxed people in the world.

It is said that the average middle class Canadian worker in this country in all forms of taxes pays about 63 per cent of their gross income in taxation. In a country as rich as Canada is, with the potential and the opportunity Canada has, the fact that Canadian workers are paying this much taxation out of their gross income is absolutely obscene.

The Speaker: My colleague, of course you will have the floor, should you so desire it, after the question period.

It being 2 p.m., we will now proceed to Statements by Members. The hon. member for Dartmouth.

STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

[English]

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S AWARD

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a real pleasure for me to rise in this House today to acknowledge the contribution to Canadian life by Carolyn Thomas, who is an outstanding Canadian and who is a constituent of mine.

Mrs. Thomas, from the community of East Preston, yesterday was the recipient of the 1995 Governor General's award in commemoration of the persons case. This is a particular honour for me because I have known Mrs. Thomas and worked with her and her husband since I was elected to this House in 1988. In that time I found her to have dedication and determination practically unrivalled in my community, not only pertaining to the betterment of women, but for the betterment of her community of East Preston, the oldest indigenous black community in Canada, and for Canadian society as a whole.

In addition to her work in the struggle for equality for women, over her lifetime Carolyn has been a visionary in her struggle for human rights and better race relations. She was a founder of the Human Rights Commission in the province of Nova Scotia and continued her good work with them for 23 years.

I ask that my colleagues here in the House and the people of the great city of Dartmouth and—

* * *

[Translation]

POVERTY

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the international day for the elimination of poverty provides an opportunity for all Quebecers to take a moment to reflect on the dramatic living conditions of some of our fellow citizens.

Nearly a million and a half Quebecers live below the poverty line. We live in a province that suffers from the highest rate of poverty in Canada, by far. Despite all the efforts of the Government of Quebec, one child in five in Quebec comes from a poor family. Quebec seniors continue to be much poorer than seniors anywhere else in Canada. We are struggling with a huge problem that is tearing us apart.

Quebec must become sovereign so its government will have the means to combat poverty effectively. This is why Quebecers will vote yes.

* * *

[English]

SPORTS ILLUSTRATED

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this week, for the first time ever, Canadian MBA teams took to the courts to the great delight of their fans across the country. How ironic that at the same time as we are welcoming the MBA to Canada we are closing the door on North America's largest sports magazine, Sports Illustrated.

Essentially the government has said that Sports Illustrated cannot be allowed split runs in Canada because SI is too efficient in its production and too effective in attracting readers and therefore advertisers. By all means let us not encourage that; we do not want people to go around thinking it is all right to be efficient and successful.

By shutting Sports Illustrated out of Canada the government is taking a 200–year leap back in time. While other Canadian communications technologies compete head to head with companies from around the world, the magazine publishing industry in Canada has adopted the views of communist Bulgaria.

Sadly Canadian magazines will be the big losers in this policy. If advertisers cannot reach their market in magazines they will do so in other media that do not respect laws issued by sentimental Canadian regulators who pine for the good old days before the telegraph.

* * *

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, as NDP health critic on April 2, 1994 in third reading debate on the Canada Health Act, I welcomed the move to eliminate extra billing and user fees. I also asked the Liberal government of the day, which was the first federal government to unilaterally cut back on federal transfers, "to sit down with the provinces and renegotiate that funding relationship so we can have a full fledged financial partnership with respect to medicare".

The Liberal government's new Canada health and social transfer with its $7 billion cut is just another Liberal unilateral cut and a further erosion of the partnership that was medicare.

Dealing with private clinics is one thing, but it is a form of straining out gnats while swallowing camels if the federal government continues to set up medicare for destruction by starving it to death.

When it comes to medicare the Liberals are into a form of passive euthanasia that plays into the hands of those who would like to actively destroy it by what I would call right wing assisted suicide.

* * *

MAY COHEN

Ms. Paddy Torsney (Burlington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in recognition of Dr. May Cohen of Burlington, Ontario, a keen promoter of women's health issues and a powerful advocate of gender equality in the medical profession. She was a recipient yesterday of the 1995 Governor General's award in commemoration of the Persons case.

A physician, researcher, educator and activist, Dr. May Cohen has repeatedly challenged the medical profession on the way it deals with the health concerns of women patients. As a volunteer and in her capacity as Associate Dean of Health Services at McMaster University's faculty of health sciences, she has taken a lead on an impressive array of issues, including gender equality, sexual harassment, sexual abuse of patients by physicians, the role of women in the medical profession and women's health in the context of women's lives.

I ask colleagues to join with me in celebrating Dr. May Cohen's achievements and extraordinary commitment to women's health. Her family and friends are justifiably proud, and so am I.

* * *

ALICE E. TYLER

Mr. John Loney (Edmonton North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as we approach the anniversary of the Persons case I am honoured to pay tribute to Alice E. Tyler of Edmonton, Alberta, the province where the Persons case got its start.

Alice Tyler has made the portrayal of the famous five champions of the Persons case and the promotion of their accomplishments a major focus of her life's work. In recognition of her efforts Alice Tyler was recognized as a recipient of the 1995 Governor General's award in commemoration of the Persons case.

Alice Tyler's portraits of the famous five in the Persons case have been hung in the Alberta legislature, the Edmonton Law Courts Building and the Edmonton City Public Library. They have been displayed elsewhere in Canada and abroad.

• (1405)

On a personal level, she has always been an ardent believer in the abilities of women. During her 24–year career as a high school art director she consistently encouraged young women to live up to their potential, helping many to set their sights on meaningful careers.

For her unique efforts to preserve the legacy of the Persons case, Alice E. Tyler is a most deserving recipient of the 1995 Governor General's award in commemoration of the Persons case.

* * *

RUTH FLOWERS

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to acknowledge the singular contribution made by Ruth Flowers of Makkovik, Labrador, a recipient of the 1995 Governor General's award in commemoration of the Persons case.

The voice of the women in her community, she has sought to protect women victimized by violence, to involve women in community economic development and to preserve and promote the traditional culture of Inuit women.

A committed advocate of women's rights, Ruth Flowers was the catalyst behind the creation of Inuit Women of the Torngats and its first president. Under her leadership the organization established the first safe house for abused women on Labrador's north shore.

For her dedication and selfless efforts on behalf of the women of the north shore of Labrador, the Government of Canada has today honoured Ruth Flowers with the 1995 Governor General's award in commemoration of the Persons case. I ask all colleagues to join me in conveying our congratulations.

* * *

[Translation]

FRANCOPHONES OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, by causing the Centre francophone de santé et de services communautaires in southern Ontario to close, the Harris government has just revealed its true intentions with regard to Ontario francophones.

For Franco–Ontarians, the message is clear: if you really want services in French, move to Quebec. This action, which speaks volumes, unfortunately confirms that Quebec's presence in Canada does nothing to prevent decisions that flout the fundamental rights of francophones outside Quebec.

Where is the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, the self–styled defender of francophone rights? Why is he hiding when it is time to act? There is no longer any doubt, the future of the French speaking community in North America lies in a sovereign Quebec.

[English]

CLAUDE BENNETT

Mr. Bill Gilmour (Comox—Alberni, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, recently the Prime Minister stated in the House:

> Any citizen can request information from government departments. It is in keeping with our government's policy of openness to provide as much information as possible.

Why then is the government denying access to information requests regarding the severance package for Claude Bennett, the former chair of CMHC. Mr. Bennett agreed to step down last August after a back room cabinet deal sweetened his severance package.

It is time the government came clean with its backroom deals. Either we have a policy of openness as the Prime Minister states or we do not, or perhaps the policy is opaque as recently stated by the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Bennett's severance package was paid for with taxpayer's dollars, yet now the government is blocking requests to divulge the details of the deal. So much for open government.

* * *

SHEILA KINGHAM

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Government of Canada I am proud to salute Sheila Kingham of Victoria, British Columbia, for her many years of service on behalf of rural women. Today Ms. Kingham received the Governor General's award in commemoration of the Persons case.

Ms. Kingham's accomplishments have been many. An articulate and persuasive public speaker, she has given countless presentations and briefs on topics ranging from the rape shield law to women's health. She has encouraged others. As a firm believer in the power of collective action, she has helped other women to organize and lobby for advances in all areas of women's political, social and economic equality.

[Translation]

Mrs. Kingham created the position of rural co–ordinator for the Manitoba Action Committee on the Status of Women and helped establish the Western Manitoba Coalition for equality rights in the Canadian Constitution, an organization formed to give voice to the concerns of rural women about constitutional change.

I am sure all members of this House will agree that Sheila Kingham is most worthy recipient of the 1995 Governor General's award.

S. O. 31

MARTHE ASSELIN VAILLANCOURT

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette–Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I pay tribute to Marthe Asselin Vaillancourt of Jonquière, Quebec, one of the recipients of the 1995 Governor General's award in commemoration of the Persons case.

A long–time educator, researcher and grassroots activist, Marthe Asselin Vaillancourt has never missed an opportunity to improve the status of women.

• (1410)

Over the years, she has spoken out regularly on sexual assault, pornography, employment equity and family violence.

Within her community, she was the initiator of and the driving force behind the establishment of a shelter for women and the development, in co–operation with the Quebec provincial police, of a pilot project to oppose violence against women. This project resulted in the establishment of the Centre d'aide aux victimes d'actes criminels de Chicoutimi, which she currently heads.

She has served as national co–chair of the Canadian panel on violence against women, which conducted the first national study in the world on this serious social problem.

* * *

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Mauril Bélanger (Ottawa—Vanier, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the people of Quebec will be deprived of the opportunity to view a television debate between the presidents of the committee for the yes side and the committee for the no side during the present referendum campaign.

A consortium of television broadcasters has announced that the deadlines for organizing such an event cannot be met and consequently it will not take place.

Despite repeated appeals from the no side for such a debate to be held, and despite all of the concessions made, the yes side continues to refuse a public debate on the basic issues.

After successfully blocking the television debate, now the yes side is pulling the leader of the Bloc Quebecois out of the House so that he will not have to defend his statements concerning the plan for separation.

Following the example of the separatists' saying "no" to debate and to the disclosure of information, on October 30 the people of Quebec will vote "no" to separation.

* * *

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this morning the Leader of the Opposition, accompanied by Françoise David, President of la Fédération des femmes du Québec, had the opportunity to explain what he said this past weekend.

Those of us who are in favour of change feel it is imperative for parents to be given assistance in reconciling jobs and family responsibilities. It is not a matter of making people have more children than they want.

In a sovereign Quebec what we are aiming at is better paid parental leave, increased services for young children, more daycare spaces, more flexible working arrangements.

The women of Quebec do not wish to be used as a red herring. Quebecers, both men and women, want the focus to be on true debate, not on blackening the character of a man of integrity, a man without a racist or sexist bone in his body.

* * *

[English]

JUSTICE

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, over and over again Reformers in the House have tried to tell the Liberal government that Canadians want their safety and the safety of their families to be the top priority of our justice system.

In two days time, on Thursday night in Oshawa, the Reform message that the rights of law–abiding citizens must come before the rights of criminals will be reinforced by hundreds of Ontarians in a rally at the civic auditorium.

The Reform Party leader joined by the justice critics, the hon. members for Calgary Northeast, Crowfoot and Wild Rose, will deliver Reform's clear common sense plan for strong and effective changes to Canada's justice system.

Canadians are tired of having to look back over their shoulders in fear rather than ahead in security and confidence as they build their lives and their futures.

Reform is committed to solid measures to safeguard the future of Canada. I invite Canadians everywhere to look at what we are proposing and to give us their support.

* * *

[Translation]

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Robert Bertrand (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the PQ premier made a great effort to minimize and make a mockery of the significance the public attaches to what the leader of the Bloc had to say about the low birth rate of the white race in Quebec.

When questioned as to the meaning of what his separatist colleague had said, the leader of the Parti Quebecois found nothing better to reply than "So what would you have me say? The pale-faced race?"

Whether white or coloured, Quebec women are, just like Quebec men, persons who will be called upon shortly to decide the future of Quebec.

The tendency of the yes side to pigeonhole people according to sex, language or race does not correspond in the least to the values of our society.

This coming October 30, the women and men of Quebec will be saying no to a project that seeks to divide them.

* * *

• (1415)

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the imagination of the people who design the ads for the separatists has no bounds. Yesterday, the yes committee placed an ad in several Quebec newspapers, showing a page of help wanted ads, under the heading: "This is how we see the future".

The jobs offered in the ad for the yes side included the following: "Sexy waitress required for new bar on South Shore"; "Barmaid required, experienced, nice appearance". Another ad: "Sell pantyhose from your home". Listen to this: "Sexy restaurant-bar requires pretty waitress and sexy barmaid, nice personality. Duties: lunch, dinner and manager". Yes, those were the duties.

Since yesterday, the yes side has been trying to provide an explanation for what its leader said, but they have their work cut out for them. On October 30, the women of Quebec will say no to those who would determine their future for them.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

THE CRTC

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to say I am appalled at the statements made by the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs who said this morning that Quebec sovereignists were racist. I think that is entirely unacceptable.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Increasingly, francophones see their language and culture threatened in Canada. The CRTC, whose mission includes preserving the cultural identity of francophones in the broadcasting sector, is being forced to shift its decisions as we saw recently when an exemption was granted to Power DirecTv for the use of an American satellite for television transmissions.

Now that Power DirecTv has applied to the CRTC for a broadcasting licence for pay per view television, what guarantees do francophones in Quebec and the rest of Canada have that the regulations now in effect at the CRTC will be enforced this time, unlike what happened in this recent case before the CRTC?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what is important is what it says in the act, and I am referring to the Broadcasting Act which established the CRTC. I am very pleased that the CRTC will consider representations on the subject raised by the hon. member. That is how the legislation works, and it is there to protect Canadian content on our airwaves.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, since the minister has decided to come out of his shell, we will ask him about the CRTC.

Would he agree that Power DirecTv's application for permission to broadcast 63 English channels, 60 of which are American, and only one French channel on pay per view will leave the door open for Canada and Quebec to become a mere extension of the American market, which would be extremely harmful to the French fact in America?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, obviously, in Canada the interests involved can apply for whatever they want, but it is up to the CRTC to decide. It makes its decisions on the basis of the legislation, the Broadcasting Act to which I referred earlier.

When the CRTC has made a decision with respect to a licence, that decision can be appealed to cabinet. That is how the legislation works, and its purpose is to protect Canadian content.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the House will recall that in a recent case, when the minister was gagged by the leader of the government, CRTC regulations were circumvented to ensure that Power DirecTv obtained a special authorization.

• (1420)

My question to the minister raises the same concerns. How can the minister expect francophones in Quebec and Canada to feel secure in the belief that the federal government will protect the French fact and their cultural identity in the broadcasting sector, when we know perfectly well that recently, the federal government bent the rules of the CRTC to give Power DirecTv an advantage and that now the same company proposes a pay per view service including 63 English channels, 60 of which are American, and one French channel? How can francophones say they are being well defended by this government?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question would be valid if it were based on fact, which it is not. The federal government never violated the act and never instructed the CRTC to contravene the act, on the contrary.

We wanted to ensure there was no penetration of Canada's airwaves via American satellites. We acted for the purpose of protecting Canadian content.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, cultural groups in Quebec rallied together yesterday to ask the CRTC to not compromise the present linguistic balance in broadcasting, specifically by granting a licence to Power DirecTv. For its part, the federal government claims to be acting, again in the case of Power DirecTv, in the name of free competition. This new episode demonstrates that Quebec has no control over its broadcasting environment.

Will the Prime Minister acknowledge that the Power DirecTv project would seriously compromise the linguistic balance of the Quebec broadcasting system and consequently risk weakening Quebecers' cultural identity? Is this what awaits Quebecers following a no vote in the referendum?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the CRTC has received a number of applications for licences. Next comes the perfectly natural process whereby they are heard, everyone's comments are heard, those in favour and those opposed—this is the point of the process.

The government will not intervene in the debate, because the law prevents it. We will, however, see at the end of the process whether the CRTC's decision is wise and, if it is not, interested parties will certainly be appealing to the government. At that point, we can decide. Let us allow the process to take its course, and then we will have some answers.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the minister acknowledge that, in the present federal context, Quebec has no power over broadcasting enabling it to protect its cultural identity against the massive influx of new English language television channels into Quebec? Is this not another good reason to vote yes in the referendum?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like our colleague to respond to questions I have often put to my friends in both the Bloc and the Parti Quebecois.

As a country separated from Canada, how is Quebec going to block the American programs that spill over its borders via satellite? They will need the mechanism that we already have—the CRTC and the Broadcasting Act.

They should be delighted to have such a mechanism and vote no.

* * *

[English]

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Canada Health Act will not allow private clinics to provide services that are insured by medicare. Most Canadians feel they should have a choice if medicare does not meet their needs.

• (1425)

Will the health minister finally agree to amend the Canada Health Act to allow fully opted out private clinics in Canada?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, unlike the opposition Reform Party, we have stood by our red book promises. We have said that we would continue to support the five principles of medicare. The medicare we have in Canada is one of the great reasons why it is wonderful to be Canadian.

We have a system where it matters not how wealthy you are. What matters is how sick you are. That is the way it should continue to be. We should use our resources the best way possible to have the best technologies, the best pharmaceuticals in order to treat our sick Canadians and make them healthy.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have trouble figuring out why waiting lists do not seem to bother the Liberals.

An American firm is now selling waiting list insurance for Canadians. If you have to wait more than 45 days you can ship off to the states. Not only do the Liberals say line up and shut up but they also say ship out.

What is the minister doing to reduce waiting lists or is she content to have Canadians travel to the U.S. for medical attention?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, if the Reform Party really wants to know about waiting lists they should speak to the 38 million Americans who have absolutely no insurance at all.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Marleau: Mr. Speaker, a survey conducted last year by the Alberta Consumers' Association found that ophthalmologists who only operated in hospitals had waiting lists for surgery of two to five weeks while those who worked in both private clinics and hospitals could perform surgery on a private patient in two to four weeks but a hospital patient could wait up to 20 weeks.

Private clinics are not necessarily the answer to long waiting lists.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, these are facts. The wait for elective heart surgery in Manitoba is over two years; for a hip replacement in P.E.I. it is over one year.

This minister clings to her bureaucrats and her beloved legislation—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: The hon. member for Macleod.

Mr. Hill (Macleod): The minister clings to her beloved bureaucrats and her old–fashioned legislation. In the nineties that means medicare is literally bad for everyone.

Will the minister put health before petty politics and arbitrary deadlines, sit down with the provinces and reform the Canada Health Act so we will not have to choose between death on a waiting list or travelling to a foreign country?

• (1430)

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will work and I am working with the provincial governments to shape the future of medicare. The National Forum on Health is also working and will be consulting with Canadians.

When it comes to waiting lists in this country, allowing the wealthy to get to the head of the line does not shorten the line; it only pushes others to the back.

* * *

[Translation]

FRANCOPHONES OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

After two years of Liberal government and 25 years of the Official Languages Act, the situation of francophones outside Quebec continues to worsen. One third of them now speak English at home. In British Columbia, the assimilation rate is even 75 per cent. So now we are not speaking of more than a million francophones outside Quebec but rather of 640,000 who are still using French.

Will the Prime Minister admit that the poor results obtained from the Official Languages Act shows the failure of his vision of Canada, since it has not been successful in blocking the increasing assimilation of francophones outside Quebec?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, recently the magazine L'Actualité reported that Canada has made more progress in recent years than any other country in the world with respect to the use of French.

I cannot understand the hon. member. She is prepared to abandon francophones outside Quebec. She is prepared to abandon the million francophones living outside Quebec.

They show no consideration for these people because they want to separate from Canada. We on the other hand want to remain within Canada because we want to offer real protection to those who really have the merit of speaking French, the francophones outside Quebec.

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the Prime Minister that it is he who has separated us from Canada, it is not Quebec which wishes to separate from Canada.

Secondly, may I remind him also to consult the figures from Statistics Canada. There are one million francophones, yes, but just 640,000 of them use French at home and are therefore considered French speaking.

An hon. member: They are becoming assimilated.

Mrs. Tremblay: They have been assimilated.

Mr. Godin: Poof.

Mrs. Tremblay: The francophones—poof.

An hon. member: The francophones—poof.

Mrs. Tremblay: Does the Prime Minister then not acknowledge the very opposite, that the future of francophone culture in America rests with a sovereign Quebec, for only a sovereign Quebec will constitute the anchor point for all francophones. In it they will find a true and tenacious ally in solidarity with them, one that will defend their most legitimate demands everywhere.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this very day the newspaper representing francophones outside Quebec has asked Quebecers to vote no in the referendum, because the future of francophones outside Quebec depends on the federal Official Languages Act, and on the fact that there is a government here in Canada, in Ottawa, which has always defended francophones outside Quebec.

Certainly some people have more difficulty than others in retaining their French, but they do want to retain it. Not only that. Every year 350,000 English speaking Canadians learn French because they live in Canada, a country where there are francophones, and this raises the number of people speaking French in Canada and in the world. The reason French is alive and well in America is that the French have remained in Canada since Confederation.

* * *

[English]

SOMALIA INQUIRY

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday Canadians were stunned by the admission of the defence minister that the National Defence Act will prevent certain charges from being laid at the conclusion of the Somalia inquiry.

• (1435)

Yesterday, the Minister of National Defence told the Globe and Mail that charges could be laid under the Criminal Code of Canada. The chairman of the Somalia inquiry stated: "Most of the matters we will be dealing with might end up in some findings that could perhaps call for disciplinary action as opposed to criminal charges". As opposed to criminal charges.

Will the minister admit that there will be no judicial remedy for certain charges when the Somalia inquiry is finally concluded?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I answered this question rather clearly yesterday.

There is sufficient flexibility in the National Defence Act to ensure that justice will be done. The government well knew the statute of limitations on certain disciplinary matters under the National Defence Act when the inquiry was called. Indeed the justice who chairs the commission, Justice Létourneau, knows it well because he was a former judge of the court martial appeals court.

There are other ways in which justice may be done administratively. If the hon. member is afraid that those people if identified cannot be brought to justice or are somehow not going to be dealt with fairly, I assure him to the contrary.

This will be a matter that will be done in a very deliberate way after all the evidence is brought forward. I would like him to let the commission get down to work so that justice can be done.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows full well that I am afraid of nothing, but the minister should be very afraid of his mismanagement of this entire affair.

I will read from the National Defence Act. It sets out a three-year limitation period for everything except mutiny, desertion, absence without leave, and death penalty offences. That is it.

Canadians know there is a separate code of law which applies to our military to enforce discipline and leadership which expires in March 1996. Canadians want to know why the minister has so mismanaged the affair that now discipline and leadership cannot be enforced in our Canadian Armed Forces.

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member quite frankly does not know what he is talking about. He has cited rather selectively sections of the National Defence Act. I want to assure him that there are ways of dealing with culpability other than with criminal charges. He should go back and look at the National Defence Act and perhaps get some advice on how to interpret it and then come back with some decent questions tomorrow.

* * *

[Translation]

FRANCOPHONE COMMUNITIES

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Premier Roy Romanow of Saskatchewan, that great Canadian who was a party to excluding Quebec from the Canadian Constitution during the night of the long knives in 1982, said recently that if Quebec voted yes, that was the end of French school boards in Saskatchewan.

Does the Prime Minister intend to protest against this kind of blackmail at the expense of francophone communities, or does he agree with his 1982 accomplice?

[English]

The Speaker: My colleagues, this question is not the administrative responsibility of the Prime Minister. This question would be out of order but if the Prime Minister wants to answer it, I will let him answer it. If not, I will go on to the next question.

[Translation]

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the best way to protect the education rights of francophones outside Quebec—which we put in the Canadian Constitution in 1982, it was not there before—the best way to ensure that French schools outside Quebec are protected by the Constitution adopted by this Parliament in 1982, when I was Minister of Justice, is to stay in Canada. The best guarantee francophones have is to stay in Canada.

When I see francophone members abandoning francophones outside Quebec, I find that shameful, Mr. Speaker.

• (1440)

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am asking the Prime Minister whether he dissociates himself from what was said by Premier Roy Romanow of Saskatchewan. That is what I am asking, and he is evading the question.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Premier of Saskatchewan, like the other premiers today in Canada, has an obligation under the Canadian Constitution to protect French schools outside Quebec. If Quebec separates from Canada—

An hon. member: That is blackmail.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): It is not blackmail. There will be only one million francophones outside Quebec who will no longer have the support of francophone members from Quebec, like me and others who have spent their careers defending francophones outside Quebec here in the House of Commons. I have been doing that for 32 years. It produced results. But they want to abandon them because they want ambassadors from Quebec driving around abroad in their limos.

* * *

[English]

CFB CHILLIWACK

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in the February budget the defence minister announced the closure of CFB Chilliwack, the only land force base in British Columbia. Yet in a memo marked secret and prepared for DND just prior to that announcement, land forces command made the following observations: "Land forces command requires an army base to support the domestic operations in B.C. LFC feels Chilliwack is ideally suited to fulfil those operations. The closure of CFB Chilliwack should be opposed and CFB Chilliwack should be retained".

Why did the minister ignore the advice of his own officials and choose to close B.C.'s only land forces base, CFB Chilliwack?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on the contrary, I accepted the advice of my officials. It was the department that recommended the consolidation of the army base in Edmonton with the closures of Chilliwack and Calgary.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in another memo obtained under the Access to Information Act, Brigadier General Stephenson, director general of land forces development, questions whether there will be any savings by closing the base. Colonel Daigle of land forces command says that the cost of moving the engineering school for example will negate the savings achieved by closing CFB Chilliwack.

If land forces command argued it needed the base open for military reasons and the experts said that closing the base was not going to save any money, did the minister close the base because of mismanagement or did he merely choose to move it to Edmonton because his Liberal seatmates live there?

The Speaker: Colleagues, I would ask you to please consider not to impute motive in any sense. The first part of the question I would say is in order. The second part is not in order. If the hon. minister would like to answer the first part, I would give him that option.

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, again the hon. members opposite read selectively from documentation. They did not look at the full range of advice that was provided to the deputy minister and to the chief of defence staff. The fact is the savings generated by the closing of Chilliwack will be $46 million a year.

I find it rather odd that the Reform Party, a party that comes into this House everyday and tells the government to cut spending, objects when that spending is cut close to home. "Not in my backyard" is the way Reformers play politics.

* * *

[Translation]

FRANCOPHONES OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In causing the closure of the Centre francophone de santé et des services communautaires in southern Ontario, the Harris government has revealed its true colours. For Franco–Ontarians, the message is clear: If you want services in French, move to Quebec.

How does the Prime Minister explain his silent complicity with Mike Harris, as he cuts services to francophones in Ontario?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of this matter. I will certainly look into it, because I intervened successfully in the matter of the French school in Kingston, not very long ago. I want to see if there is a valid reason. I find it absolutely incredible, however, that suddenly, two weeks before they want to leave Canada, they are worrying about the francophones outside Quebec, who will be left to their own devices if Quebec separates.

• (1445)

But I can reassure francophones outside Quebec: do not worry. Quebecers—not the Parti Quebecois and the Bloc Quebecois—but Quebecers themselves will never drop francophones outside Quebec.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is nevertheless unbelievable. The Prime Minister, who claims to be the defender of francophones outside Quebec, is closing his eyes to the treatment being given francophones in southern Ontario. Is he confirming he is totally incapable of ensuring equality for francophones throughout Canada?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member patted herself on the back. This is most uncommon. I like this last minute conversion. I like it because it gives me the opportunity to say once again that there may be problems, there have always been problems, things have always been difficult, but one thing is clear: francophones outside Quebec—

An hon. member: There are none left.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): Would the members who are francophones from outside Quebec please rise so that we can see there are still francophones outside Quebec?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

The Speaker: My colleagues, I would remind you that I am not in this game. I am the referee.

* * *

[Translation]

QUEBEC ECONOMY

Mrs. Georgette Sheridan (Saskatoon—Humboldt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs.

According to a recent analysis by the Centre for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, an independent Quebec could acceed to the various international treaties.

Can the minister explain to us the stages and steps a country must pass through to acceed to NAFTA and to the World Trade Organization?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can quote some of the conclusions and even produce the report. Mr. Roh's main conclusion is as follows: An independent Quebec would have no automatic entitlement to existing trade agreements such as NAFTA, the World Trade Organization agreement and the Auto Pact. Accession to these agreements would have to be negotiated.

Second conclusion: American law does not allow the President of the United States to grant an independent Quebec access to the trade advantages it enjoys at the present time as part of Canada, until such time as Congress approves and implements such accession.

In addition, it would be a long and difficult process to negotiate accession by an independent Quebec to the WTO, NAFTA and the Auto Pact. Bowing to congressional and private sector pressures, American negotiators would try to obtain changes in key sectors such as agriculture.

[English]

* * *

BILL C–72

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this entire House declared its opposition to drunkenness as a defence with the swift passage of Bill C–72.

• (1450)

The decision of the Supreme Court to hear the case of convicted child murderer Alton Royer shows clearly that the unelected Supreme Court has ignored the views of the elected members of Parliament and millions of Canadians.

We were told yesterday that the justice minister is seeking intervenor status in this case. Could the justice minister tell the House what his objective is in doing so?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the government appreciated the support of all parties in respect of Bill C–72, which changed the criminal law in this country, as all hon. members know, to make it impossible for someone to rely upon their own self–induced intoxication as an excuse when they commit crimes of violence against another involving general intent.

The case to which the hon. member refers included acts that occurred at a trial that was held prior to the enactment of Bill C–72. Therefore, when the Supreme Court of Canada grants leave to appeal in that case it will consider the case in reference to the law as it stood at the time of the alleged acts. Bill C–72 will not have any application.

Carriage of that prosecution rests, of course, with the provincial attorney general. However, as the parliamentary secretary told the House yesterday, we are considering asking the Supreme Court of Canada to allow us to intervene. If we did so, it would be to provide whatever assistance we can to the court in deciding the issue presented by that particular case.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, as it seems there is some question as to whether Bill C–72 has been effective in preventing the use of extreme intoxication as a defence, what will the justice minister do to ensure that extreme drunkenness is not used as a defence in these cases?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I should emphasize for the hon. member that Bill C–72, which has now been approved by Parliament and proclaimed in force, is the law of the land.

I would simply point out that no such criminal law amendment is retroactive, so it would not affect a case that arose in the courts prior to its enactment. The case to which the hon. member referred is proceeding on the law as it stood before Bill C–72.

I can assure the hon. member that the enactment of Bill C–72 did in fact change the criminal law in this country. It made it impossible from that date onward for anybody to rely upon their own act of intoxicating themselves to escape the consequence of criminal conduct when it involved violence against another and general intent.

* * *

[Translation]

FEDERAL PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board.

According to the Official Languages Act, public servants in Ottawa–Hull have the right to work in their own language. However, in his latest report, the Commissioner of Official Languages confirmed that only 11 per cent of francophone public servants regularly write in French and that for three–quarters of francophones, English is still the only language of communication with their boss and at meetings at work.

Will the President of the Treasury Board acknowledge that the federal policy on language of work has failed pitifully in the Ottawa–Hull region and that once again, francophone employees are paying the price?

[English]

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it was a Liberal government that brought in the Official Languages Act. It is a Liberal government that has in fact advanced the cause of speaking in the official language of a person's choice in the federal public service right across the country.

There is more work to be done. We have recently put out a brochure, together with the Commissioner of Official Languages, to help encourage people to use the official language of their choice at their place of work in the federal public service. We will continue to try to improve the means of using the language of choice because that is part of this government's policy.

[Translation]

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the choice is there, but the result is always the same.

Would the President of the Treasury Board agree that federal public servants in Quebec working in the Ottawa–Hull region are treated by the federal government as second–class citizens and that only the sovereignty of Quebec would be able to make French a language of work in government offices located in the Outaouais?

[English]

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Certainly not, Mr. Speaker. I hear French and English used frequently, constantly, every day in my work. I am sure others in this government do as well.

• (1455)

We will continue to encourage people to use the official language of their choice. That is a commitment this government has made. It is made to the people of Quebec, it is made to the people of every part of this country, all francophones in Canada.

* * *

ATLANTIC GROUNDFISH STRATEGY

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Spending on the Atlantic groundfish strategy is spinning out of control. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans has now admitted that this year's deficit alone is $105 million.

Last week the minister announced his so–called brilliant solution was to siphon money away from the $300 million capacity reduction portion of the plan to cover the shortfall. Will the minister tell this House exactly how much of the $300 million allotted for capacity reduction will be diverted and confirm what many fishermen already suspect, that there will be no further licence buybacks?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the only thing spinning out of control, after only his second question as the new fisheries critic, is this member's credibility.

This government is consulting with fishermen's organizations, including the Canadian Council of Fish Harvesters, representing all the major fishing unions and associations right across Canada. The adjustment that has thus far been made by the Minister of Human Resources Development and by the Department of Fisheries and the Minister of Fisheries to the TAGS program has been made after consultation, a foreign concept to the Reform Party, with the fishermen's unions representatives. Any adjustments that may occur in the future will be made after the same kind of consultation.

If the member is interested in reflecting properly the reality of Atlantic Canada and the tough challenges Atlantic Canadians face, he ought to do at least a minimum of homework.

Mr. Scott (Skeena): The minister has managed to blow the hopes of Atlantic Canadians right out of the water. Capacity reductions were supposed to fix the problems of Atlantic fishermen, but this government's failure has left Atlantic Canadians with no hope for a viable future in the fishery. All they can hope for is that the cheques from Ottawa do not run out. That is not hope, it is dependency. Atlantic Canadians deserve better.

Will the minister now admit that his attempts at capacity reduction have been an abject failure and that he has quashed the last hope of Atlantic fishermen for a livelihood in the future?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member's question is will we admit that Atlantic Canadians are defeated. Will we buy the policy of the Reform Party to buy everyone a one–way ticket to Toronto? Will we give up on the region and see it cut and cast adrift? Will we assume that all Atlantic Canadians are losers? Will we assume there is no future for our people? Absolutely not. We are going to work to rebuild the region.

* * *

[Translation]

FEDERAL PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. The Public Service Alliance of Canada recently conducted several talks, unsuccessful so far, aimed at reaching an agreement with the Government of Quebec on hiring 26,000 federal public servants now residing in the Outaouais, in the event Quebec separates from Canada.

Mr. Speaker, are these promises not rather unrealistic and liable to create false hopes, considering the obvious fact that this cannot be done, administratively speaking?

[English]

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Quebec is talking about a public service of the size of 110,000 people to serve a population of some 7 million, whereas after the current downsizing is completed at the federal level we will have 190,000 public servants serving a population of 28 million.

Those numbers do not add up. Federal public servants in Quebec should be very concerned about the ability for the separatists to meet those kinds of numbers. They are simply out of proportion. They are simply unbelievable. Federal public servants should beware of the false promises coming from the separatists.

* * *

• (1500)

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry.

Prescription drug costs comprise 17 per cent of the cost of health care. These prices have increased 13 per cent each year over the past eight years due to Bill C–91 which the Liberals opposed in opposition.

The government can save hundreds of millions of dollars yearly by doing one thing, by repealing Bill C–91 or at the very least abolishing the automatic injunction clause of the patented medicines regulation.

Why will the government not do this? Is it because pharmaceutical drug manufacturers contribute too much money to the Liberal Party?

The Speaker: The question is out of order and this concludes question period.

* * *

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

The Speaker: I wish to draw the attention of hon. members to the presence in the gallery of His Excellency Nawab Mahammad Talpu, Minister of Agriculture of Pakistan.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

The Speaker: I also wish to draw the attention of the House to the presence in our gallery of Marie–Noëlle Ande Koyara, Minister of the Status of Women and National Solidarity of the Central African Republic.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

* * *

[English]

POINTS OF ORDER

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY ACT

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I draw to the attention of the House the fact that Bill C–64, an act respecting employment equity, on which we are to vote tonight has passed through the House from report stage to the conclusion of third reading in five consecutive sitting days. This is as a result of a new procedure whereby the bill went to a committee after first reading.

However I also draw to the attention of the House that the new procedure, which was instituted for the very best reasons, has made it impossible for some MPs like myself who have serious reservations about the bill at report stage to have our reservations answered by bringing witnesses to committee, because the committee no longer sits after report stage reading.

Consequently the speed with which the bill has gone through the House presents a problem for MPs who would like to see all legislation going through the House given full and due consideration so that they know how to vote in the most informed way possible.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I guess the comments of the hon. member deserve some reply. I am not sure he has raised a valid point of order, but I submit in respect of the procedure on this bill and others that are dealt with in this way that hon. members are able to go to the committee to which the bill stands referred. Hon. members are also in a position to move amendments to the bill in the House at report stage.

There was an extensive debate at report stage. There was extensive debate at third reading. Indeed third reading debate was extended today by unanimous consent because some members apparently missed an opportunity to speak last evening. The government has been most solicitous in its efforts to ensure fair and reasonable debate on all aspects of the bill.

I submit the procedure followed was correct and in accordance with the rules. If the hon. member is suggesting—although I do not think I heard it in his comments—that there was in any way a problem with the procedure, I think if he looks at it and sees what happened in the committee he will agree there was not really a point of order.

• (1505)

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Hamilton—Wentworth. We previously brought to the attention of the House the fact that legislation submitted to committee prior to second reading has not had proper analysis at the committee level and has been denied adequate debate in the House.

Once the legislation goes to committee it does not come here for second reading, one of the most extensive reviews of legislation available to members of the House. That is gone. We are limited to a 180-minute debate just to review sending the legislation to committee, not to review the contents of the legislation.

When we agreed to this change in the rules we thought the potential was there to make committee work much more meaningful. However we have experienced in committee clause by clause study of legislation that is restricted to a few seconds per clause or a minute or so per clause. Things are rammed through. Then without second reading we came to third reading where the bill is approved in principle and no further amendments could be brought forth by members.

The Speaker: This is a new procedure that the House has adopted. If there are flaws in the procedure I suggest these can probably be looked at in committee again.

The hon. member has made his point. I appreciate the interventions of both the parliamentary secretary and the member for Kindersley—Lloydminster, but this is not a point of order.

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on what I think is a very grave matter regarding the behaviour of the member for Burnaby—Kingsway during question period earlier today.

His heckling was excessive, was obnoxious and was extremely—

The Speaker: From time to time I have asked all members of the House to be very considerate of other members when they are either asking questions or giving answers.

The hon. member raises a case in point. I am well aware of the point he is raising. That we do not like how one member or another acts is not necessarily a point of order. In my view it is a point of debate.

I think I know where the member was going with his point. It was that all hon. members should respect one another. We should be listening to one another either when we ask questions and when we give answers. I encourage all hon. members in the House to do just that.

I think the point was well taken. It is on the table and I am aware of what it says in the book.

Mr. Epp: I want the whole world to know, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: I would like to let this point of order rest now.

[Translation]

Mr. Mauril Bélanger (Ottawa—Vanier, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, during Question Period the President of the Privy Council and Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs quoted a study. Does the minister intend to table this document for the benefit of all members?

The Speaker: Is the minister—? Well, could someone go and get him?

[English]

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to something that happened in question period. I referred primarily to the fact that prescription drugs represent 17 per cent of the cost of health care.

• (1510)

The question put to the government was why the would government not repeal Bill C-91. I perhaps elaborated more than I should have but I was attempting to give the minister a multiple choice with respect to his answer.

The Speaker: The Chair has ruled on the admissibility of the question. In the course of the question period I turn up my hearing gismos as high as I can. I try to listen to what all hon. members are saying.

It seemed to me that I did not know where the member was going in his question. It seemed to me from what I could hear and from what I could understand that the question was out of order.

The hon. member does not have a point of order now but if he would like to discuss the matter further with me, I would be happy to do so in my chambers if that is agreeable.

TABLING OF DOCUMENTS

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I ask for clarification on the last tabling of a document. If documents are to be tabled a minister is allowed to do that during Routine Proceedings.

A government backbencher from Ottawa—Vanier asked for a document to be tabled. When I tried to table something last week Your Honour asked for unanimous consent. What is the problem here?

The Speaker: There is no problem really. What has happened is that when a minister quotes from a document in the House the minister can be asked to table the document.

When an ordinary member like you or me, again forgive my words, quotes from a document in the House, we need unanimous consent of the House. The rules are quite clear on that.

Do you want another clarification?

Miss Grey: Mr. Speaker, if any minister is quoting from a document we may ask for it and demand that it be tabled. Does he have the option of yes or no, that he might or might not?

The Speaker: Citation 495(1) at page 151 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Sixth Edition, entitled "Documents Cited" reads:

> A Minister is not at liberty to read or quote from a dispatch or other state paper not before the House without being prepared to lay it on the table.

Therefore the minister quoted directly from a document. He was asked to lay it on the table. The House has accepted it. That is the rule.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EXCISE TAX ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–90, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, be read the third time and passed.

The Speaker: Before our interesting question period the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley had the floor. He has approximately 30 minutes remaining.

Some hon. members: Thirty minutes?

The Speaker: That is what I was talking about, the heckling.

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, thank you for the extra time. I am sure my colleagues will be pleased to hear that.

Before question period I was talking about some of the free spending habits of the Liberals. I pointed to the U.S. department of energy receiving $35,000 from the Liberal government. It really needed the money. The United Steelworkers of America received $116,000 from the Liberal government; Prison Art Foundation, $51,000 from the federal government; and Feminist Literacy Workers Network, $57,000 from the government.

• (1515)

This is where the taxpayer's money is going. This is what is contributing to overspending by $30 billion every year. Why are the Liberals continuing to do this, continuing in the same habits as the prior Tory government? Because all of these special interest groups that are receiving these funds year after year are constantly in Ottawa lobbying the government, talking to the government, yapping away at the government for more money, being obnoxious almost to the point the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway was earlier in question period. All these special interest groups are standing in line for this free wheeling, free spending handout from the Liberal government.

In order to continue these free wheeling, free spending ways, what does the Liberal government do? It simply raises taxes, as it did in the February budget. It seeks approval in Bill C–90 to increase the taxation on gasoline by a cent and a half per litre to raise another billion or two billion dollars or so. This goes on and on and on. Canadians are tired of the deficit spending of this Liberal government and they want it to stop.

Study after study after study has shown that deficit spending will not create a buoyant economy. Study after study by economist after economist has said that we cannot spend our way out of a recession. The only way we can get out of a recession is to get the economy going again, and we are not going to get the economy going if we keep increasing the taxation levels on the Canadian workers and Canadian companies. This is not rocket scientist stuff. Why can they not understand this?

One of the reasons most of the economists around the world agree with the Reform Party's method of getting this economy back in shape and getting Canada out of its fiscal crisis is that when the Reform Party stands up to talk about fiscal responsibility and curing the fiscal ills we are prepared to put it on paper, in writing, very clearly and very distinctly showing exactly how we would get the economy going again, how we would reduce taxation and reduce overspending without seriously harming the Canadian people.

The Liberal government stands up every day and calls us hackers and slashers, saying we want to cut off all these programs for the Canadian people, the programs that we never could afford in the first place but which they used year after year—and the Tories before them—to get elected.

I suggest something that is not only my own opinion but also the opinion of many economists. The biggest threat to the social programs in the country is the out of control spending by the Liberal government. The biggest threat to the social programs, to medicare, to education, and to things Canadians have come to depend on is not the fiscally responsible Reform Party on this side of the House but the out of control Liberal spenders on the other side of the House, and the Tories before them.

It is time the government got serious about getting the economy going again. It is time the government got serious about addressing the concerns the Canadian people have about the high taxation levels in this country. It is time the government got serious about what it takes to create real and long lasting jobs in this country. It is time the government got serious about its out of control deficit spending.

I cannot believe for a minute that government members ever will get serious. If they are not prepared to get serious about addressing the concerns the Canadian people have about the economy, jobs and taxation, maybe they should move over and let someone else move in who will get serious about it, the Reform Party of Canada.

• (1520)

Unfortunately the Canadian people are going to have to bear the pain for another couple of years. I wish it were over sooner, but it looks like another couple of years of out of control deficit spending.

The hon. member for Beaver River reminded me that I should never talk about out of control spending by the Liberal government without talking about the pensions. I thank the hon. member for Beaver River for walking by at the right time.

The Reform Party did the responsible thing when 98 per cent opted out of the pension, giving our personal commitment to the Canadian people that we are serious about cutting spending. We intend to save the Canadian taxpayers some $35 million by our simple act of opting out of the MP pension plan.

It is interesting to note that while 98 per cent of Reform MPs chose to opt out, chose to do the right thing, unfortunately 98 per cent of the Liberal MPs chose to stay in, chose to do the wrong thing. What kind of a message does that send to the Canadian taxpayers who are watching their disposable income shrink more and more on a daily basis? What kind of message does that send to the Canadian middle income taxpayer who is suffering under a 63 per cent tax burden on their gross income? Does that send the message to them that this government is prepared to get serious about the financial crisis we are in?

I hope that before this Parliament ends we will see the Liberal government make some distinctive, specific plan to reduce the spending habits it has, which it acquired from the Tories and which it taught to the Tories.

We have heard the Minister of Finance talk about targets, but he will never let a target stand still. He uses the phrase rolling targets. Rolling targets are a good way to set them, because if you miss them you can always blame the fact that they were not standing still.

The IMF, the C.D. Howe Institute and almost every economic think tank in Canada and many in the U.S. have sent a clear message to the Canadian government: "Get your spending in control and get your level of taxation down or you guys are going to be in a whole bunch of trouble". I hope it got the message.

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to enter the debate on Bill C–90.

Some members have suggested that Bill C–90 is part of the other side of our budgetary commitments. Our budget in 1995 stated it would reduce spending by $7 for every $1 of revenue increase. Unfortunately this bill deals with the revenue increase side of that. Needless to say, most people do not like the idea of tax increases. I do not think anybody does.

One aspect of the bill reports a 1.5 cent per litre tax on the cost of gasoline. I think we are mature enough to admit that it will hurt people, small and medium size businesses that use gasoline in their business, commissioned salesmen and so on. We also realize that Canada has one of the lowest retail prices for fuel in the world. We are still very much the recipients of a very cheap fuel program in Canada.

I would like to address other aspects and areas that some of my Reform colleagues talked about today when they asked when we are going to get our spending under control. I do not know where the Reform Party has been for the last two years, but I have seen some tremendous changes in cost reductions of the federal government in the area of the civil service in particular, with 45,000 civil servants being cut from expenditure programs. I have watched the Department of Natural Resources be cut in half. There have been the bills to privatize CN Railway. There have been bills that deal with the government's commitment to its shareholding of Petro–Canada. It goes on and on. There has been all kinds of evidence of cutting.

• (1525)

The trick about cutting, of course, is that it has to be done equitably and fairly. The whole object of program review has been to go to each department of government to try to find those areas where it is possible to cut while at the same time maintaining the very important aspect of our social fabric, the underpinning of our social network in Canada.

I am very proud to be a part of a government that took that kind of approach to deficit and debt reduction. I look at some of my colleagues, especially those in the province of Ontario, and often wonder whether they have gone through that kind of thought process and whether we have properly dealt with some of the people who can least protect themselves in society.

It is interesting to note that the Auditor General of Canada two weeks ago tabled his report, in which he questioned whether Canada's level of debt was sustainable. What does that mean? Quite frankly, if one is running a corporation, there is a level at which the debt structure compared with the income structure is so onerous that they can no longer continue and become insolvent. Indeed, some people have suggested that if we apply that test to the country we may well discover that Canada may be an insolvent nation, unable to pay off our debt. Our debt is increasing due to interest rates. As long as interest rates exceed the level of growth in the economy, we will continue to have an accumulation of debt and we will have to cut even deeper into the expenditure side of government.

Some people think we are in an endless situation. However, the government, particularly the Minister of Finance, has taken a specific course of action to reduce the debt to three per cent of the gross domestic product. That is not an end in itself. I have heard the minister say over and over again that with the concept of two–year rolling targets in fact we will continue to focus on reducing the debt on a year by year basis and go beyond the three per cent of GDP target.

There are a number of tax bills before the House. There was some interesting debate on Bill S–9, which is the Canada–U.S. tax treaty. I do not want to speak on that bill, as we are debating Bill C–90, but some of the aspects that came out of that debate were interesting. The hon. member for Kamloops was surprised that the Reform Party had accepted some of the negative aspects of the Canada–U.S. tax treaty, those things that specifically appear to assist people in the higher income groups. I wondered why the hon. member felt that way, because he also seems to be interested in the concept of tax reform and some of the Reform Party's discussions about a flat tax. I notice that the hon. member is taking part in a conference to be held later this month that deals with that area.

I would like to talk generally about the concept of a flat tax. In my mind, it also represents a form of tax change and a shift of the tax burden within the Canadian taxation system.

A lot of things the Reform Party has come out with sound simple. Why do we not have a simple system? The income tax system to many people in Canada is complex. There is no question about that. I do know, however, that less than half of the population actually requires professional help in filing their tax returns. The average person can still file a tax return without the need of an accountant or a tax lawyer. The people who require tax assistance are usually those who are in the higher income brackets. They usually are trying to take advantage of certain tax credits and tax advantages which exist in the system.

• (1530)

The whole concept of taxation is also an element in fiscal policy. The government attempts to get aspects of the economy energized by using certain tax legislation which gives advantages to certain sectors as opposed to others. I would think members of the Reform Party would be quite aware of the oil and gas sector out west. It has been greatly assisted by a number of concepts, flow through shares and other kinds of tax driven investments which have encouraged exploration.

If we look at the history of a flat tax aspect, it is interesting to note that its actual birth occurred in England. At the time it was originally brought in, it was thought of as more of an income redistribution process. It actually entertained the concept of moneys flowing from the government back into the taxpayers' hands. It was used as a method of negative income tax. It was used as a method of doing away with the multitude of social programs that existed. It used the tax system to allocate these resources to people. People in the lower income bracket would actually be net receivers from the government, looking at a guaranteed annual income or whatever that means is. Of course people over a certain means would be the net payers.

Surprisingly enough that has changed appreciably. In presentations I have heard it is especially becoming very popular in the United States. It does not talk about redistribution at all. As a matter of fact it talks about flattening the existing tax rates.

In Canada we have three basic classifications of tax rates. A flat tax essentially would eliminate that and would create one rate of tax. At the same time, as I understand the proposal, it would also eliminate certain members from the lower income stream. In a sense it is like a two rate system. Some people would not pay tax and everybody else would pay a flat tax. It does not take a lot of arithmetic if we actually sit down and start figuring it out to know who is going to pay this tax.

Some people like to say that if we took away all the benefits, all the bells and whistles from the existing system there would be so much efficiency that we would not have to change the quantum of tax. The quantum of tax would be reduced and when the smoke cleared nobody would be paying any more taxes than they were before. Some people would be paying a little less and everyone would understand the system better. Therefore it would be an efficient system.

These are all great ways to sell something but the reality is it is not true. Right now, 63 per cent of all income taxes paid in this country are being paid by the top 30 per cent of income earners. That tells us right away that the system is progressive. That is to say, as one makes more money one pays more tax.

People in the House will say they can point to somebody who is a millionaire and did not pay any tax last year. There are situations like that but the reality is they are very rare. I will repeat, because it bears witness and deserves to be repeated, the reality is that on an ongoing basis 63 per cent of all income taxes in this country are paid by the top 30 per cent of the income earners.

What happens if we do tax flattening? There is only one assumption which is that we are going to allocate tax liability away from that top 30 per cent, not to the bottom 20 per cent who do not pay any taxes at all, but we are going to shift it to the middle class. I do not have to tell anyone that the middle class is fed up with the taxes it is already paying. It thinks it is paying too much. It is those people, the two income earner families, who are going to be paying the expense of a flat tax situation.

The hon. member for Kamloops was amazed that the Reform Party would be supportive of the Canada–U.S. tax convention and some of the good things it was doing for the very wealthy in that treaty. At the same time I suggest it is the same element and the same people this party is representing who also want the flat tax.

• (1535)

The benefactors of this tax will be the very wealthy. It is not just me saying that. The U.S. Business News states that those people who earn in excess of $200,000 in the United States will be substantially better off with a 19 per cent flat tax. David Bond, an economist with the Hongkong Bank of Canada, says there will be significant income allocations of taxes with a flat tax. Most economists all over the world who have studied this will say that the flat tax is not viable mainly because it creates increased taxes for the people who can least afford them.

What is wrong with the tax system? Quite often people come along giving us solutions for the wrong problems. Yes, the existing taxation system in Canada is very complex. Does it need to be as complex as it is? No, it does not. We can get simplification in the system. Some of the simplifications are to stop fiddling and changing it every week. Every week we change some aspect of the income tax system. This constant change creates a situation where nobody understands it. If we just had a moratorium on tax changes perhaps we would understand it.

What is the main frustration people have with the taxation system? It is not so much the filling out of the forms as it is the rate of tax. People in this country are constantly referring to the fact that we have an underground economy. People will take their money to the Turks and Caicos Islands or wherever their favourite tax haven is to avoid taxes. That has nothing to do with the taxation system but it has to do with the rate and quantity of taxes we pay.

There have been countless international studies of every regime which has increased its taxes. There constantly was a correlation between an underground economy and tax evasion. The GST is another symptom of people avoiding taxes. The problem is the rate of tax. Canada's rate of taxation is the second highest in the OECD, just slightly less than that of France. When tax rates are as high as they are today we are also going to have tax evasion and tax avoidance.

Changing the system is not going to change the fact that we are bringing in about $123 billion in taxation. Our deficit and debt relationship do not allow us to change those numbers today. What we want to do of course is get on to a program of deficit and debt reduction so that somewhere after the year 2000 we can actually see a rationing down of tax rates. With that rationing down of tax rates it will create a greater confidence in our taxation system and hopefully domicile some of our lost tax revenues.

I have often been a great supporter of asking the Turks and Caicos Islands to become one of our provinces. This was the subject of a debate in this House some years ago. I have been to the Turks and Caicos and have talked to some of those people. I think it would be a great thing. We could redomicile all of those tax revenues that are now hiding down there.

The whole area of fiscal and monetary policy is very complex but the taxation system is still very much an important aspect of our fiscal tools to stimulate various aspects of the economy. The flat tax of course would eliminate that kind of manipulative approach to the economy and force the government to treat everybody much the same.

Is the forestry sector the same as the car manufacturer? Is the Saskatchewan wheat farmer the same as the Ontario beef farmer? I suspect they are not. I suspect the industries in this country, for example the oil and gas industry or the mining sector which rely heavily on capital intensive aspects of their businesses look at rapid depreciation within their businesses which are all different and all unique.

• (1540)

We can say we do not want the mining sector and indeed that is what is happening in this country. The mining sector is going south. The mining sector says there are too many inhibitions to set up here in Canada and that it is cheaper to set up in Chile. That is because of the tax regime. We have to remember how they got going. There were also tremendous tax incentives to get those businesses started. There is not any country in the world that does not use the concept of some kind of form of favouritism of various sectors it wants to promote.

Today we want to promote our science and technology sector. Our government is now giving something like $1 billion away in scientific tax credits. These scientific tax credits are to provide an underpinning that Canada will get into the science and technology revolution which we see creating jobs in the small and medium size business sector in Canada I feel that those science and technology tax credits are misguided. They are not going to the small and medium size companies that really need them. A lot of that expenditure is being focused at the multinational level and larger corporations. It is not actually doing what we want it to do.

That is the kind of debate we need in the House. That is the kind of change to our tax system we need in order to fine tune it, so that it is working in the best interests of all Canadians and creating jobs. Simple solutions for complex problems are not going to do that.

This bill, of course which I support, is a money bill of the government and it is one necessary aspect of the 1995 budget. I am happy to be part of a government that continues on its commitment to meet its objectives which were laid out in that budget.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I will address some of the comments made by the member for Durham, specifically his attack on a flat tax. Based on the way he was making his comments I do not believe he understands what the flat tax is. The flat tax is a simple equitable system for all taxpayers. It will greatly increase the incentives to work, invest and save.

He talks about the problem in this country. The problem is the debt and the high taxation levels. It is not the deficit. We can change the deficit: just raise taxes, lower spending and it is gone any time we want to. This government is saying that the deficit is the problem and it is going to reduce the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP. The government is adding to the problem. It is digging the hole deeper by adding to the debt.

We need to look at our spending. We need to look at a way of stimulating the economy, developing a taxation system that is pro growth, something that will get the government off our backs, out of our pockets and leave us alone with more disposable income.

In the name of deficit reduction, I am getting sick and tired of government after government not addressing change in the taxation system. We need fundamental tax reform. Every other country is looking at their high rates of taxation. Every other country is doing something about it and this gentleman from Durham on the government side says it is a simplistic solution.

In the months and the year ahead, he will see that it is not a simplistic solution; it is a very complicated solution. The simple flat tax is harder than it looks. The simple flat tax is not as easy to implement as he claims the Reform Party suggests. There are a lot of items in this area that need discussion and debate. We cannot argue with the fact that if there is a broad tax base and the tax base is redistributed we could have a lower rate. A flat tax would get rid of all the tax loopholes, incentives and shelters the hon. member was talking about.

It is not income from the forestry business or the oil and gas business or wealthy people, middle income people, lower income people. A dollar is a dollar. We want to tax that dollar as little as possible. We want to broaden the base as wide as possible, so we can have the lowest maximum rate. That is what equity is. That is what fairness is.

A flat tax, whatever form it is, whether it is a pure flat tax, a proportional flat tax, a Mills flat tax, a Hall–Rabushka flat tax, whatever kind of flat tax it is, the key is that we want to protect the lower income people, people who are making minimum wage or close to minimum wage. We do not want them paying taxes. That will reduce the pressure and the strain on the social programs. Middle income earners will not be affected. They will remain relatively the same. However they are going to be happy knowing that when the tax loopholes and incentives and shelters are taken away from the wealthier people they will pay more in tax dollars even though their rate is low. That is what makes it interesting to look at a flat tax and why we should be doing so. It may sound like a simple solution but it is not.

• (1545)

A flat tax is not as simple as it looks. It is very complicated. In fact, it is harder to bring in something simple than it is to bring in something complicated.

The Minister of Justice brought in the gun control bill. It was a very complicated bill. It was a very elaborate bill, but he got it through, no problem. Is that not right?

The flat tax is going to be a very difficult tax reform to get people to look into and to look at. I would like, in my section of comments, to point out that it is not simple. I am not saying on behalf of the Reform Party that a flat tax is simple. It is just simplifying the system. That is where the merit lies. Simplification of the taxation system will save us billions of dollars in compliance costs.

Does the member want to know what else it does, Mr. Speaker? It would also get the government out of the business of trying to micromanage the economy. It would reward initiative by leaving 75 to 80 per cent of every dollar earned in the pockets of the earner which is a better place than in the pockets of the government.

The Speaker: I would imagine the hon. member for Durham would like a counter commentary.

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, I noticed the member reading from a piece of paper. I guess it is the hymn book of the Reform Party. I suggest that Reform members start going back and actually looking at the whole structure of taxation in Canada.

I could not believe my ears when he said it is a difficult tax, it is not simple. Then he turned around and made the statement that is so simple it is hard to get in here. I cannot quite understand his philosophy.

I am going to repeat one more key statistic. It comes from their favourite Fraser Institute. Sixty–three per cent of all income taxes in Canada are paid by the top 30 per cent of taxpayers.

It does not matter what the Reform Party members want to argue, they are not going to change that statistic. Realistically, when one starts saying that they are going to let the lower bottom people off, fine, I understand that.

There are some problems with that because you create a wall of taxation. It keeps poor people in debt. It keeps people down because they have no the way to make progress. As soon as they earn an extra dollar, they are hitting the 23 per cent tax rates. That is the philosophy of the Reform Party. Keep the poor people poor and while we are at it, let us shift the tax burden from the very wealthy, which that party represents, to middle income earners.

That is not going to fly. It is not going to fly out west and it is not going to fly down here either.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I know the member for Durham was telling you through me.

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join in the debate on Bill C–90 which specifically enables the government to increase the already high levels of taxation imposed on Canadians.

It never ceases to amaze me the disregard the government seems to have for the intelligence of Canadians. This bill is an outright betrayal of the commitment in the red book or the election platform of the Liberal Party. In addition to the betrayal, the Liberals promised not to increase taxes to Canadians. There is the dishonesty, the deceit and the rhetoric surrounding the cuts that have to come and inevitably will come whoever is the government some day if we are to reach a balanced budget.

We just heard the best example of this rhetoric that we hear all the time. The member for Durham rises to join the debate on Bill C–90, a bill to increase tax levels. In his speech he says there is nothing wrong with the tax system. All that is wrong is the rates are too high, the second highest in the OECD. Yet he is speaking in support of a bill that raises the level of taxes higher. That is rhetoric and double talk and we hear so much of it.

• (1550)

I would like to discuss a couple of other examples of the betrayal of red book promises. The Liberals said during the election campaign they could solve the problems of the country simply by economic stimulation and job creation. They did not need to cut programs. They did not need to raise taxes. They could solve the problems of the nation by job creation and economic stimulation.

It is now two years into the mandate. We have seen lots of cuts in programs and services but we have not seen problems solved through economic stimulation and job creation. We consistently remind the government day after day of the GST fraud which it has imposed on people. The Deputy Prime Minister told us she would resign within a year if the GST was not gone. She is still here. I saw her in the House today.

The government tells Canadians these things during an election campaign because it knows those topics are popular and that it will get votes. The Liberals tell Canadians what they want to hear. After they get elected they abandon their promises and hope Canadians will forget them before the next election.

Another bit of dishonesty is the story the government told the federal civil service that it would not be cut, that it would protect their jobs and honour the job security clauses in their contract. We are only two years into the government's mandate and it is talking about cutting 50,000 civil servants. What happened to the commitment to the civil service? It seems to have been abandoned.

There was the promise to maintain funding for social programs. The government said that it would never slash and burn like the Reform Party proposals would do. It would protect the precious social programs, the fabric of the social safety net system. Only two years into its mandate, the government has cut and cut far worse than what would have happened under what it called our slash and burn policies. The government's measures have been even more draconian than the Reform Party ever suggested they should be. If the $7 billion cut to provincial transfers in support of social spending is not slash and burn I do not know what we could refer to it as.

I do not think Canadians are so naive or so easily deceived that they are prepared to forgive all this before the next election. The Reform Party is here to do everything it can to see the government is not forgiven. I am sure that come next election time it will have some real answering to do to the Canadian taxpayers.

I hear all the time from the other side of the House about how caring the members are, that they are not hard hearted and without compassion like the Reform Party, that they care about the human deficit. I have never heard such arrogant hypocrisy in all my life. They do not have the market cornered on compassion or caring. The very reason I became involved in the profession with the lowest regard in this country—at least outside of this place—was simply because I care and I am compassionate. I care very deeply about the things the Liberal and Conservative governments have done to the future of my children and my grandchildren in the last 30 years. That is not caring and compassion. It is selfishness. It is the me generation saying that not only will the next generation, my kids and my grandkids, have to look after themselves but the next three or four generations will be paying for the greed of this generation. That is not caring and compassion. It is the me generation.

• (1555)

Today we are debating Bill C–90 which is about tax increases. The area I wanted to talk about specifically is the 1.5 cent a litre increase in tax on gasoline. For the last 30 years every time there is a cash crunch, a squeeze, governments have turned to the cash cow, the sin taxes on alcohol, cigarettes and gasoline. It turned in a big way to gasoline in the last budget to make up the shortfall.

The finance minister made a commitment to have a ratio of tax increases to expenditure cuts that was not in the red book. As I mentioned earlier, the red book said no increase in taxation. Now we have moved to a commitment to keep it in balance, so many dollars of cuts to so many dollars of tax increase. That is a serious betrayal of an election promise.

We still have the GST that applies on top of the 1.5 cent per litre tax increase. That is the GST that was supposed to be gone. Therefore, we have a double tax increase on gasoline.

It is important for members of the House to remember where the excise tax on gasoline started. It was back in 1975 when a Liberal government placed the excise tax on gasoline. It was a special tax. It was the first time an excise tax was applied to gasoline and was to be a one–time tax. How many times have we heard that before?

This one–time tax was to cover the gap between oil import compensation payments and the oil export charge revenues. In turn, this compensation system was as a result of the 1974 decision to maintain domestic oil prices at levels below world prices.

In essence, the federal government of the day had adopted a made in Canada oil pricing policy which saw the proceeds from an export tax used to protect consumers of imported oil from the full impact of the international price. A noble intent I am sure. As we so often experience with taxation, we are shown that taxes which are meant to be one time or special or temporary, quickly have a habit of becoming permanent.

One must only refer to the imposition in 1917 of a temporary income tax and see where that has gone, how temporary it was and how complex and expensive it has become.

The same is true in every sense about the excise tax on transportation fuels. The excise tax has remained in place and its revenue objectives certainly have changed. The tax is no longer used for what it was originally intended but the tax remains and continues to be increased by 2 cents, 1 cent, 1.5 cents every budget that is presented in the last number of years. Obviously it has changed from a special tax for a specific purpose to a general tax for a source of general revenue.

In the last session of Parliament, in the natural resources committee of which I am a member, the members of the NDP introduced a proposal for the committee to study gasoline pricing in Canada. They thought there was some bogeyman causing the price of gasoline to be so high when we were facing a surplus of oil on the international market and low prices for crude oil.

It does not take a genius to look at this. There have been numerous studies over the last number of years that the bogeyman in this scenario is the government. If we look at the price of gasoline in Vancouver at 59.6 cents per litre, 28.9 cents goes directly to provincial and federal taxes. That is not oil royalties or corporate income tax, that is simply gasoline taxes hidden at the pump. The 28.9 cents leaves the remaining cost of that litre of gasoline to cover the cost of exploration, production, marketing and refining and only another 3 cents to the dealer for his costs and overhead.

• (1600)

We can give example after example of a gasoline price. The figures provided by the government's statistics for Calgary shows the price of gasoline is 52.3 per litre; 22.4 cents of that goes directly to governments in taxes, leaving only 3.5 cents for the dealer to cover his costs, with the remaining going for exploration, refining and marketing. I have example after example of almost 50 per cent of the cost of a litre of gasoline everywhere across the country being the tax on gasoline by government.

We continue to have these kinds of tax increases rammed down our throats with no choice. Because they are hidden they are often put in and the consumer does not realize the taxes have risen. The cost increases which we have seen so dramatically in the last number of years are not the result of the oil companies' getting together to fix the price of gasoline. It is the result of governments starved for cash continually coming back to that cash cow.

Members can ask their constituents if they realize what percentage of the cost of a litre of gasoline is government taxation. I will wager very few consumers realize the level of taxation. If we are to continue to tax Canadians in this way it is time we were up front and open and let Canadians see where their dollars are going.

When we look at these increases in taxation levels and what they are doing to us internationally there is an important implication of these tax increases as well. Gasoline is one of the things that gives our natural advantage which allows us to be competitive in the global marketplace to compensate for the huge distances and the expensive transportation costs we face in getting our products to market.

It is very important that we are able to take advantage of that natural advantage to compensate for other disadvantages. Our natural advantage is being seriously eroded when the Americans can come to Canada with a $1.30 dollar, buy our crude oil, take it home, refine it and sell it at almost half the price we have to pay. I do not think that is what Canadians want. I do not think that is what the government wants, to simply become and exporter of raw natural resources.

This is not the way to create jobs, to create wealth, to stimulate the economy. It is time we support Canadians industries and manufacturers and allow them to take advantage of the natural advantage we have in our abundance of natural resources.

Instead, the government seems to stick to its historical way of raising revenue, that cash cow. I suggest this poor cash cow is milking at capacity and is in danger of dying from mastitis from forced overproduction.

• (1605)

I can go on about the unfairness of this endless taxation. The government should seriously look at what it is doing to the economy through high taxation and what the debt and deficit are doing to the country.

I ask the Prime Minister and the finance minister to heed the words of F.J. Clarke that a politician thinks only of the next election; a statesman thinks of the next generation.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few comments on Bill C–90 as it emanates from the Department of Finance and the finance minister. I will review for a few minutes what he said when he was in opposition during the last budget he criticized.

I have direct quotes from Hansard dated April 27, 1993: "Canadians are demanding an end to the volleys of taxation that issue from the nation's capital every spring. They are demanding that governments cease their political fiddling while our prosperity burns".

Bill C–90 is nothing more than a tax grab. It raises taxes through excise taxes. It raises taxes on gasoline. It raises taxes on air transportation from $50 to $55. It raises taxes on cigarettes. Pure and simple, it is hitting Canadians in their pockets, at the pumps and in the air.

This flies in the face of what he said. As critic to the finance department he said Canadians are demanding an end to the volleys of taxation that issue every spring. He has been in charge for the last two springs and we have sprung taxes higher, albeit he never touched our personal pocketbooks which is why we can thank him a little, but he is taxing everywhere else. Revenue Canada is even squeezing businesses and individuals on audits in every way, shape and form it can.

I have a second quote: "Canadians are demanding nothing less than an end to the political economy of governments that can neither follow the wishes of their citizens today nor bring before them the questions that must be decided tomorrow". Does the minister think Canadians want gasoline taxes to increase at the pumps? Does he think Canadians want to pay more taxes on products and goods and services? Does he think Canadians want to pay more taxes at the airport? They do not want to do that.

Does the minister think the people of Canada want the government to add to the problem of the debt? He has committed the country to bankruptcy by committing it to a 3 per cent of GDP. That is all he will reduce the deficit to? He will keep digging the hole deeper, slower than the Conservatives, but he will keep digging the hole. Is that the kind of Canada he thought Canadians were demanding, to keep adding to the problem?

Here is his chance as the finance minister to correct and follow his points of view to the letter. He has an opportunity to be in control and do the things that are required to stimulate and help the economy. He says it is through jobs. Governments do not create jobs. The private sector creates the majority of jobs, 85 per cent. Nobody disputes that. It takes consumer and investor confidence to create those jobs.

When the government keeps increasing taxes through excise taxes, personal taxes, corporation taxes, payroll taxes or property taxes, it is hurting and impeding confidence. By just talking about it, like the finance minister does, he is using smoke and mirrors to fool the Canadian public. He is doing a great disservice by making Canadians believe he is solving the problem when in fact he is adding to the problem.

I have already shown two examples of where the finance minister can do something about the very things he criticized, but he has done nothing. He keeps doing it the same way. He is defending the status quo. It is as if the Department of Finance regardless of who becomes finance minister will do it its way or no way and it is the only way. That should change.

• (1610)

I have a third quote from the finance minister: "Irregular taxation among jurisdictions has produced economic distortions, inefficient and wasteful collection costs and a perverse sense that the tax system is irrational and unfair. Canadians are prepared to pay their fair share of taxes. What they object to is when they see discrimination against them in favour of others. What they object to is when they see that the services that they have come to expect cut back and their taxes going up. There is a deep feeling that the system is warped against Canadians".

If that opinion was really believed then by the finance minister, I would like to refresh his memory. If he still believes it today what that really means is that we need to review the entire taxation system, the way we collect taxes, why we collect taxes, what those taxes are for, what the program costs are in the government.

We need to diffuse and separate tax expenditures from direct spending. Very few MPs know the total we spend on child care through the four or five various programs that exist. We do not know because we use the Income Tax Act to do it.

If we would simply use income tax as a method of raising taxes other than a personal exemption and nothing else, then decided we wanted to subsidize or support various groups, people who cannot work, who cannot help themselves, whether we want to help education or health care, all the programs we want to fund, that would be fine. We should put that under direct spending.

Then we can set the rate to raise the money we need to pay for those programs. Simplification will lower compliance costs. Simplification will satisfy the concerns he had in opposition about the tax system, the very one he is defending now, to which in his two years of tenure as finance minister he has added over 1,000 pages of clarifications, rulings and justifications so that people can understand it better.

He said it was irrational and unfair. In two years he has done nothing about it except tinker around by raising an excise tax here, trying to do that over there. He has not addressed the problem the way he could and should.

I would like to see him match his rhetoric, his belief, his ideas and deep felt conviction that the current system is unfair and allow the Standing Committee on Finance to explore fundamental tax reform for Canadians.

The time has come for that. If he really believed in what he said I challenge him to allow that kind of debate, to allow that kind of exploration to begin so that it is outside the realm of bureaucracy, so that it is outside the realm of deputy ministers who want to have it their way and only their way.

Put it back into the purview of members of Parliament who can come to the finance committee and represent their constituents' wishes and their constituents' point of view.

I am sure if he lets that happen he will find there are a lot of Canadians who would like to see tax reform. They would like to see some form of system they can understand, a system in which everybody can do their own return, in which fairness is reintroduced whereby everybody pays their proportionate share of taxes after a certain level of exemption. If I make 10 times more money than another, I pay 10 times more taxes.

Eliminate all those tax shelters and incentives that distort the economy and allow the government to manipulate and direct our social and economic lives. We have to separate the income tax system away from social and economic engineering.

I look at the comments the finance minister made in opposition because I am on the finance committee and a critic of finance. Therefore I have to go back to find out what this gentleman believed in, what he fought for, his values, where his goals and objectives lie. Now that he is finance minister he is not following his own beliefs. I do not understand that.

• (1615)

Year after year MPs say one thing to get elected and when they get elected they do another thing. I am very disappointed the Liberals have already broken about 15 promises in their read book. They said one thing to get elected and did exactly the opposite.

We commend and compliment them for some of the promises they have broken, because we know they are heading in the right direction. We know spending has to be cut and social programs have to be looked at because they represents 67 per cent of the budget. We understand that. We were hoping the government would listen to us and make those kinds of tough decisions.

However, there is room for more spending cuts. The spending cuts that could really help are those direct subsidies for business and individuals, the billions we do not need to spend.

The compliance cost of the taxation system is $12 billion in a country of 27 million people. This includes accountants hired, the audits that must be done and the cost of departments such as National Revenue and taxation: customs is at $2.2 billion; the GST group, $500 million; all the tax lawyers and services. Twelve billion dollars changing hands just to collect this money, to interpret our tax rules.

Members of the House should spend three months on tax simplification, trying to improve the system to make it more simple, more equitable and fulfil the concerns the finance minister had when he was in opposition that the tax system is irrational and unfair.

If we want to bring reason and fairness back into the system, why does he not empower the Standing Committee on Finance to do something about it? Why does he not empower all the members of the House to do something about it? It could be fixed so fast to the benefit of all Canadians. It would make so much more sense than some of the weak–kneed insignificant bills we are debating and issues we are discussing in the House right now.

I know why that is being done and why the government feels it has to do that, so I will not dwell on it. Instead of debating employment equity and legislating in the board rooms of businesses, in the offices of the private sector who must be hired and policing them to ensure it happens, a waste of time, why not introduce a system in which more people would gain confidence? More people would have a hope for the future of the country and feel the leaders, the politicians, are looking after their interests for the long term, not the short term.

We have a deficit and a debt problem but the solution is not just spending cuts and cuts and cuts. If all we ever look at is the solution we will never solve the problem.

In the name of deficit reduction too many governments are afraid to look at other means of helping businesses and creating jobs. The government cannot keep spending and stimulating the economy through direct subsidies. That has to stop. We must look at a system and a method whereby the government will get out of the business of looking after a lot of people, companies and the creation of job stimulations and helping the development of hockey rinks. Leave more money in the hands of business. I know that is a sensitive spot, Mr. Speaker. I did not mean that as a personal remark. I believe in hockey players. I enjoy watching the game.

Let us look at a way of empowering the people who know how to create jobs. Let those people and those institutions do what they do best. I think the private sector can create jobs better than the government.

It has taken about 15 years for everybody to learn this. I believe everybody in the House is beginning to recognize there is some merit in that. I am asking the finance minister to look at what he said when he was in opposition two years ago and the last budget he criticized. I am criticizing his budget and Bill C–90. I know almost everything has already been implemented. I am criticizing his role as finance minister the same way he criticized Mr. Wilson and Mr. Mazankowski.

The finance minister has an opportunity to do something about it but he is not doing anything about it. He is letting the status quo live. He is letting the Income Tax Act survive. The Income Tax Act should be explored and reviewed. We need fundamental tax reforms with the idea of lowering those marginal rates. I do not care how we make it fair, I do not care whether it is a flat tax or not. We need tax reform in a way that we can then give instant tax relief to Canadian individuals and Canadian businesses.

• (1620)

This is where we get stimulative effect on the economy. This is where we create optimism. This is where people get security. When they go to work in the morning they now know they will have a job at the end of next month. Right now that is what is lacking.

I do not care how much money the government throws at job creation, it will not work. It drives up the spending. It will actually put more pressure on increasing taxes. It works in the exact opposite way the government and the finance minister believe.

Bill C–90 is a tax grab. It is the very thing the finance minister in opposition spoke against. He wants fairness. Fairness is lowering taxes. Fairness is lowering spending. Fairness is smaller government and less intrusion. Fairness is making it more equitable for all walks and classes of life and giving hope to people, not false hope saying "come hell or high water", as he said, "we will reach our goals and objectives of 3 per cent of GDP". That is like highjumping six inches. That is not a very difficult target to reach from the high levels of spending the government has.

Another disadvantage of high taxation and spending is we are not competitive globally. We are already worse off than the States. Look at the hockey players there compared with what the hockey players get here. They all want to get paid in U.S. dollars. Why? Their tax rates are lower than ours and they even want to lower them to 17 per cent. The Americans are competitive and their free market system has worked better than ours. We have too much government involvement in our economy and we need less government intrusion, less direct government involvement and that way we would eliminate this high tax burden. The uncompetitive tax systems lead to choices by consumers which adversely affect government revenues.

I challenge the finance minister to fulfil those three promises, the concerns he had when he was opposition critic to the Department of Finance. There are three items he said he would fight for and that he believed. He felt they should be looked at. I wish the finance minister would practice what he preached.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest and sympathy to the comments by the member from Calgary Centre. I believe the tax system is so broken that it cannot probably be fixed and that a new and innovative approach to the whole area of taxation has to be undertaken.

The member mentioned two very interesting points. One, a partial conversion I hope on behalf of the member of the Reform Party, was with respect to cuts. Throughout the election campaign and shortly after this Parliament was convened all we heard from the other side was to cut, cut, cut. What the member has said today, however, and it probably comes from having been in this place, understanding the complexity of some issues that we do not quite get to understand on the campaign trail, is that cutting is not the answer.

Governments must do everything to ensure that each dollar spent is spent in a manner that is prudent, focused and that maximizes our wish to attain certain goals as a government and as a Parliament and as a people.

On the revenue side I agree with him. I am one of those individuals on this side of the House who believes the taxation system, albeit attempting to be fair, is inherently unfair to many. Each time we try to fix this monster created by dozens of amendments in this place by this and previous governments, it makes it even harder to attain our goal.

He mentioned single taxes and flat taxes. I agree that is a direction we have to go in. My colleague from Broadview—Greenwood in the last Parliament and this Parliament continues, and sometimes I know he must feel he is alone, to promote a different system of taxation. It is a system I supported in opposition. It is a system I supported during my campaign and it is a system I will continue to support on this side of the House.

• (1625)

The member wishes the Standing Committee on Finance would be specifically asked to review this. I do not usually wait for somebody to tell me what I can do. If there is an opportunity for me to work with other members to build a consensus across party lines, across this aisle which is only a few feet but many times feels like miles, I will rise to the challenge.

I ask the member not to wait for the mandarins at finance or for the government or for officials of his own party to say the time has come for parliamentarians to work together in a non-partisan fashion to come up with solutions. We all know what the problems are. We all try in our respective roles in opposition or government to put the best solutions forward we think can be implemented.

I throw a challenge out to him to work with me and other members on this side. I will work with him and other members on that side to look at what can be done, real tax reform, single tax, flat tax, to work together to put a challenge not just to the government but to all parliamentarians. I am prepared to put the time in. I ask the member if he would be prepared to put the time in. Canadians are looking for those types of solutions from Parliament and I think they are looking for them now.

Mr. Silye: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member opposite for his remarks. I accept his offer. I openly say in the House I will work with any member toward a simplification of the tax system, to share any of the points of view I have and to also get input from any other member as to what direction they think we should go in. The current system is not good and needs some fixing.

I know the biggest concern of Department of Finance is that in the name of simplicity we will give up fairness. The test is any new system has to be as fair as the current system.

I had discussed a single tax, a flat tax, quite a bit with the member for Broadview—Greenwood. It was reading his book four years ago that got me interested in this subject. I believe many of the problems he pointed out were true. They were true then and they are more true now.

I am not waiting for the Standing Committee on Finance. I use my opportunity to speak in the House freely to challenge the finance minister to get every committee we can on board. Even the Department of Industry should be looking at this. It controls business. The minister knows what businesses are concerned about. What can we do to attract more businesses? It is not higher taxation levels but lower taxation levels.

We are presenting various alternatives to tax proposals. The member for Capilano—Howe Sound is presenting one on October 31 at the Fraser Institute symposium in Toronto. The member for Broadview—Greenwood will be there presenting his as well. I believe there will be officials from the government there although they will be listening and not presenting anything. I believe the Conservative Party is also looking at a proposal for a flat tax. It is important that we get this movement and momentum going. In the end, in the final analysis, if we can simplify the taxation system all Canadians will benefit, which is the important target here.

In terms of my conversion, I ask the hon. member not to hold out too much hope because I am not being converted. I am just getting tired of hearing everything about cuts, cuts, cuts. If the member does not believe cuts are important why has his government made $7 billion in cuts already?

When we campaigned on cuts our point was that when we make them we should make them wisely, judiciously and quickly because they will hurt. Whether we cut $1 billion, $7 billion or $10 billion, we will end up with a lot of special interest groups riled up and upset and we will hear all the barrage just like what is happening in Ontario now in response to the 22 per cent cutback in welfare payments. All it sufficed to do was reduce the welfare payments in Ontario to the same level as everywhere else in the country. Look at some of the extremists voicing their concerns.

Cutting is important. We feel the Liberal government has not cut enough. There is still too much fat in areas where there is subsidizing failure. Those are the areas the government is not looking at. The other program cuts it has done are excellent.

The government is cutting and then spending money on infrastructure programs, building hockey rinks on direct subsidies to regional development grants to businesses. Not all but many are wasted. That money does not need to be spent by government. Cut that out. Give the equivalent tax cut to the businesses and individuals and I will guarantee that they will do more with those billions of dollars than the government will. That is the point which I am trying to make. Therefore, we need both spending cuts and a review of the taxation system. We can have tax relief at the same time. That is my argument.

• (1630)

If we really want to solve the deficit, we can. Just lower spending, raise the tax rate and the deficit is gone. However, we cannot do that. We have to ignore the deficit. It is not the 3 per cent of GDP that matters. We have to look at a way to stimulate the economy and have a pro–growth taxation system so we can apply those extra revenues to the debt. That is what is important.

I thank the member for his kind intervention.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed listening to the hon. member. However, I am not too certain that the solution is as simple as he purports.

The corporate tax rate in Canada is 38 per cent. When provincial corporate taxes are added the average is 43.4 per cent. In the United States the tax rate is 35 per cent nationally. When state taxes are added the average is 40.3 per cent. In Japan the corporate tax rate has never been below 50 per cent. In fact, the corporate tax rate today in Japan is 52.5 per cent. The corporate tax rates in France and Germany, which are major trading partners of the largest nations in the world, in Germany range from 56 to 44 per cent, with France at 33 per cent.

The hon. member is suggesting a substantial decrease in corporate taxes, with a single rate of tax. In fact he has expanded that to personal income taxes. He suggests that there should be a simple direct rate which would be the same for everybody regardless of income. I would ask him what deductions, if any, he would allow for corporations if that were the case.

Mr. Silye: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite right that the corporate tax is complicated in Canada with all the provincial and federal taxes. However, I believe that in a reform of the taxation system, businesses and individuals should be taxed at the same rate, that the income generated by individuals or businesses should only be taxed once and that the rate would be based on federal expenditures. However, we have to move expenditures under direct spending, not under tax expenditures, so we will know exactly what these programs are costing us.

When it comes to business directly, there are deductions which we can explore when looking at tax reform. Decisions have to be made. Currently we treat active and investment income the same way. The Hall–Rabushka model for a flat tax makes interest payments that are received by individuals non–taxable and non–deductible and all of the capital gains and dividends are paid at the corporate level. The corporations actually end up paying more taxes in that model.

When we explored that we found that the pure flat tax system for corporations would allow wages, benefits and salaries to be deducted, as well as input costs and the cost of sales. If they were allowed a 100 per cent write off in the year of acquisition for taxation purposes, for balance sheets purposes, they could still amortize it out or depreciate it. However, no interest deductibility on the cost of borrowing money would lower interest rates. Effectively there could be a rate of 20 per cent which would be revenue neutral.

We could probably get rid of the GST with another 4.5 per cent on that. With a rate of 24 per cent or 25 per cent it would be gone. There is a whole department gone and a half billion dollars in collection costs gone. There would then be $5 billion to $6 billion more in revenue from the corporate sector than there is now.

The trade off is that there will be CFIBs, but all businesses will be treated the same, whether they are manufacturing or high tech. Manufacturing could be 21 per cent, instead of the 38 he is talking about.

The small tax on business is a concern. The member for Broadview—Greenwood found a lot of lobby groups came to him and complained that we would lose that 12 per cent tax on the first $200,000. If we had this kind of a tax reform, where we put it out there to everyone and said: "We are looking for equity and everybody has to share in this equity", we could then have a system that is simple enough so more people could understand it. The rate could be low enough that people would work in the surface economy instead of the underground economy. It could high enough that it would generate close to the revenues that we want and need now. I do not accept the conclusions of economists who say that we have to be revenue neutral right now. I argue that if I am a little bit short the money will come through the effect of the growth in the economy. If it is combined with more spending cuts, if we spend the money on behalf of businesses, if we give people the money to start a business, we are—

• (1635)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. It is with great hesitation that I interrupt the question and comment period. The full time has elapsed. I must ask for a resumption of debate.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 45, a division on the question now before the House stands deferred until five o'clock today, at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

* * *

LAW COMMISSION OF CANADA ACT

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.) moved that Bill C–106, an act respecting the Law Commission of Canada, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in connection with Bill C–106. May I say at the outset that by tabling this bill the government fulfils a commitment which it made during the campaign of 1993, a commitment that was expressed clearly in the red book to restore the important machinery for law reform that had been abolished by the previous government.

This bill fulfils that commitment by creating a new body to be known as the Law Commission of Canada, a commission whose objective would be continuously to monitor the evolution of Canadian law, to advise the government, and Parliament, on its improvement and modernization, and to do so in a manner that would reflect our unique bijuridical system of law: the common law and the civil code.

[Translation]

In short, this Commission will play a major role in fulfilling the responsibility—common to every generation—of keeping Canadian law relevant to the needs and conditions of our time. The task is a much more difficult and complex one than it was in the early 1970s, when the former Law Reform Commission was formed.

[English]

Now in the mid–1990s we are swept along on a tide of social change, change involving technology, change involving social life itself. In some areas, these transformations have rendered existing law either obsolete or inadequate. In others, we confront issues that have not yet been addressed by law or by precedent.

• (1640)

It is the view of the government that we need a commission with respect to law, a commission that is independent and objective to provide informed commentary to government on the directions it should take.

Let me provide some examples to hon. members about the kinds of challenges to which I refer. One is the increased risk and incidence of economic crime flowing from the application of computer technology in financial markets, the way funds are transferred from person to person and, indeed, from continent to continent. Another is the steady parade of new questions that accompany the commercialization of biotechnology. A third is the emergence of issues raised by the mass application of new information technology, such as the use of the Internet for hate messages or pornography.

In addition, there are issues that concern the functioning of the criminal justice system itself, including the effectiveness of that system or the effectiveness of incarceration for certain offences as compared with other sanctions.

[Translation]

To compound the challenge, these issues are emerging at a time of profound social and political change. In many respects, Canadians are not the same people they were a quarter of a century ago.

The charter of rights and freedoms has changed the way we look at the law and at each other. People are no longer content to leave government to politicians and bureaucrats, and law to lawyers. They insist on having a hand in decisions which affect their lives.

[English]

Something else that is different in the 1990s is the fiscal environment. We must cope with these challenges with drastically reduced budgets. The quality of every option and of every decision must be tested not only for theoretical effectiveness but also for financial feasibility.

For all these reasons, the government is not proposing in Bill C–106 a restoration of the last Law Reform Commission brick by brick. We propose the creation of an entirely new institution, a new kind of institution, to deal with new issues in new ways.

The law commission visualized in Bill C–106 will first of all be an independent and accountable body working at arm's length from government and operating in a mode that matches the challenges and the constraints of our time, that is to say, it will work with the windows open. It will make law reform a visible, understandable process in which not just legal professionals but Canadians in every walk of life can play their part.

Furthermore, because of its structure, the commission will not be remote or isolated. Last but not least, it will approach its task with a vigilant attention to cost.

The principles that will govern the make-up of a commission and guide it in its work are set out in the preamble of Bill C-106. The House should know that these principles were not developed in a theoretical test tube. They emerged in a rigorous nationwide consultation that preceded the drafting of the bill. They reflect the synthesized thinking of many disciplines, sectors and groups. These are the characteristics that Canadians tell us the process must embody if it is to work effectively.

The first principle is related to the unwritten goal of every aspect of this work, the building and the maintenance of confidence in our system of justice. To that end, this principle points to the need to democratize and demystify the making and remaking of the law.

It provides that the commission must be transparent, must involve disparate interests in its work. The door to the workshop of law reform must be open to all who want to watch or join in the process. The results of that work must be available for inspection by all in a form understandable by all.

• (1645)

The second principle is that the commission must not only have keen foresight, it must also have wide peripheral vision. It must see the challenges of law reform in their full social and economic context. To achieve this end, the commission will have to be multi-disciplinary in its approach. It will focus not just legal expertise on the issues, although that will be needed, but the talent and training of all the relevant disciplines—for example, in economics, in technology, in the social and natural sciences, in the field of law enforcement.

The third principle is that the commission should be responsive and accountable. Specifically, it should forge partnerships with a wide range of interested groups and in particular with the academic community. The law is never static. Only in this way can the commission keep ahead of endless change to avoid gaps or duplication in agendas and to make the most of limited resources.

[Translation]

The fourth principle is one that would have seemed odd in legislation drafted 25 years ago, but seems perfectly natural today.

It is a requirement that the Commission, as it tackles today's tasks, employ today's technologies, wherever it is appropriate to do so. The Commission must take advantage of the capabilities of new tools and new methods, particularly in information technology. This is essential to success in every aspect of the Commission's operations—to its ability to share work with other groups and institutions—and to operate effectively within its modest budget.

[English]

The fifth principle relates to the overriding requirement that we arrive at solutions we can pay for. This principle requires that the commission in its deliberations must never fail to consider the elements of cost and economic impact. This too is a matter of relevance in the 1990s.

These then are the five principles as set forth in the preamble. There is a sixth, which may not be spelled out expressly but which hon. members will find implicit throughout the statute. That is to say, the requirement for balance, the need for the commission to be both independent of government in its decisions and accountable to the public for its actions. This principle and indeed all the others find expression in the structure of the commission as set forth in clause 7 of the bill. Let me touch briefly on that structure.

The executive branch of the Law Commission would be appointed by order in council. It would comprise five members, a full-time president and four part-time commissioners, who may all be drawn from different disciplines. In terms of size, it seems to me this is the balance we need: large enough to be diverse, but small enough to be decisive.

The fact that four of the five commissioners will serve part time has many important advantages. First of all, it means that these individuals will not run the risk of becoming isolated from the world beyond the national capital region. They will retain their roots in their home communities and in the sectors they represent and their careers will not be interrupted. There is another benefit. It will make it easier for government to attract the calibre of person we want on such a commission to join in the work of law reform.

The second element is an advisory council made up of 25 members representing a variety of viewpoints and disciplines and backgrounds. All of these people will serve as unpaid volunteers, except for reimbursement of expenses. This arrangement supports the independence of the process. The council will be appointed by the commission, not by the government, and the commission, not the government, will be the client of the council.

The third component also fosters independence of the whole. It comprises the study panels that the commission will set up as required to focus on specific issues. Each panel would be headed by one of the commissioners and the other panel members would be drawn from the relevant disciplines or interested groups. For instance, a study panel on biotechnology might include representatives of the industry, the health sciences, consumer groups, and the legal profession.

• (1650)

The use of these panels will also contribute to the cost–effectiveness of the process. These bodies will be transient rather than permanent. They will come into being as the issues emerge. They will then do their work and they will disband. Panel members will perform this public service on a voluntary, unpaid basis.

These then are the components of the Law Commission of Canada as proposed in Bill C–106. The structure is simple. It is also economical. The commission will be served by a small secretariat of no more than eight people. Instead of retaining an in–house staff to conduct studies, the commission will contract for research from outside sources. In this way we will avoid duplicating the effort of provincial reform bodies or work being done in the academic communities. As a result, the commission will be highly cost–effective.

Although the last law reform commission, abolished by the previous government, cost $5 million a year to run, the law commission proposed in Bill C–106 will have a budget of $3 million, all of which will be found through a redeployment of existing funds. It seems to me that we can be confident of getting the job done within these constraints because of the new commission's composition and because of the way it is approaching its work: the use of new technology, a commitment to partnership endeavours, and the reliance on voluntary advisers and panel members.

That brings me to my final observation. The legislation would give the new commission a mandate to explore and to innovate. That requirement is explicit in the purpose section of the bill, which provides that the commission's tasks will include the development of new approaches to law and new concepts of law.

What does that mean? Among other things, it means that the commission will not feel compelled to recommend as the solution for every problem a new law or even an amended law. Its mandate requires the commission to look at the full range of options. It is vitally important that it do so. One of the most urgent challenges of law reform is to cope with change without creating an impassable morass of litigation, administration, and enforcement.

The system is close to being overburdened now. A primary goal of the commission will be not only to avoid increasing that load but indeed to lighten it. As the purpose section of the bill provides, the commission's task will include, "the development of measures to make the legal system more efficient, economical and accessible".

As to the balance in that architecture of independence and accountability, obviously both elements are indispensable: independence because the value of the commission will depend in large part on its ability to provide expert impartial advice to the government on legislative programs and policies; accountability because the commission will be a public body serving the people of Canada, and as such it must answer to the people and their elected representatives for the conduct of its affairs and the quality of its work.

I believe these principles are reflected in the arrangements the bill describes. The commission will submit its reports and recommendations to Parliament through the Minister of Justice of the day. That minister must forward these products of the commission to Parliament untouched, unaltered, and must respond to them in a specific period. On the other hand, the responsibility for the final decision about their disposition remains, as of course it must, with the government.

[Translation]

Hon. members will find balance built into not just the general design but the details of this legislation. One example is to be found in the sections under the heading "Purpose, Powers and Duties of Commission". The Commission will draw up its own agenda—but will consult with the Minister of Justice before finalizing it.

[English]

The legislation would also require the minister to consult with the commission before referring other matters to it for consideration.

• (1655)

As I have said, the essential purpose of the bill is to bring a wide–ranging integrated approach to the reform of Canadian law. The law is more than a book of statutes. It is a living thing, a presence in our individual lives. The law is also the infrastructure of our social and economic life. Seen in that context, the task of law reform is part of the wider work of nation building, of advancing our collective and individual well–being, of building social harmony, improving our competitiveness, our standard of living, our quality of life, and our relations with each other.

It was in the 18th century that the British jurist Lord Mansfield said that as the usages of society alter the law must adapt itself to the changing needs of all. At the end of the 20th century that is still the task. I suggest that the instrument proposed in Bill C–106 will help us meet that continuing challenge.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before yielding the floor to the hon. member for Saint–Hubert, may I suggest to the House that we call it 5 p.m.?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY ACT

The House resumed from October 17 consideration of the motion that Bill C–64, an act respecting employment equity, be now read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 5 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 45(5), the House will now proceed to a deferred division at the third reading stage of Bill C–64, an act respecting employment equity.

Call in the members.

(The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:)

(Division No. 349)

YEAS

Members

Adams
Althouse
Augustine
Baker
Bélanger
Bellemare
Bertrand
Bevilacqua
Blaikie
Bodnar
Boudria
Caccia
Campbell
Caron
Clancy
Collenette
Comuzzi
Cowling
Culbert
DeVillers
Dromisky
Duhamel
Dupuy
Eggleton
Fewchuk
Fontana
Gaffney
Gallaway
Gerrard
Grose
Harb
Harvard
Hopkins
Ianno
Irwin
Jordan
Knutson
Landry
Laurin
LeBlanc (Cape/Cap–Breton Highlands—Canso)
Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe)
Loney
MacLellan (Cape/Cap–Breton—The Sydneys)
Maloney
Marchi
Massé
McGuire
McLaughlin
McTeague
Mifflin
Mills (Broadview—Greenwood)
Mitchell
Murray
Nunez
O'Brien
Pagtakhan
Peric
Peterson
Picard (Drummond)
Pillitteri
Regan
Rideout
Alcock
Assadourian
Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre/Sud–Centre)
Bélair
Bellehumeur
Bernier (Beauce)
Bethel
Bhaduria
Blondin–Andrew
Bonin
Brushett
Calder
Cannis
Catterall
Cohen
Collins
Copps
Crawford
de Savoye
Dhaliwal
Dubé
Dumas
Easter
English
Finlay
Fry
Gagliano
Gauthier
Gray (Windsor West/Ouest)
Guarnieri
Harper (Churchill)
Hickey
Hubbard
Iftody
Jackson
Kirkby
Kraft Sloan
Lastewka
Lavigne (Beauharnois—Salaberry)
Lee
Leroux (Shefford)
MacDonald
Malhi
Manley
Marleau
McCormick
McKinnon
McLellan (Edmonton Northwest/Nord–Ouest)
McWhinney
Milliken
Minna
Murphy
Nault
Nunziata
O'Reilly
Parrish
Peters
Phinney
Pickard (Essex—Kent)
Proud
Richardson
Riis
Ringuette–Maltais
Rock
Serré
Simmons
Solomon
St–Laurent
Stewart (Northumberland)
Taylor
Thalheimer
Torsney
Ur
Vanclief
Verran
Walker
Whelan
Young
Robinson
Sauvageau
Sheridan
Skoke
Speller
Stewart (Brant)
Szabo
Terrana
Tobin
Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata)
Valeri
Venne
Volpe
Wells
Wood
Zed —156

NAYS

Members

Abbott
Benoit
Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville)
Brown (Calgary Southeast/Sud–Est)
Chatters
Epp
Gilmour
Grey (Beaver River)
Hanrahan
Harris
Hayes
Hill (Macleod)
Jennings
Kerpan
Meredith
Morrison
Ramsay
Schmidt
Silye
Strahl
Williams—41
Ablonczy
Breitkreuz (Yellowhead)
Bridgman
Bryden
Duncan
Frazer
Gouk
Grubel
Harper (Simcoe Centre)
Hart
Hermanson
Hoeppner
Johnston
Mayfield
Mills (Red Deer)
Penson
Ringma
Scott (Skeena)
Solberg
Wayne

PAIRED MEMBERS

Anawak
Bachand
Barnes
Bergeron
Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead)
Bouchard
Brown (Oakville—Milton)
Cauchon
Chan
Crête
Daviault
Dingwall
Duceppe
Gagnon (Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine)
Godin
Guay
Jacob
Lalonde
Lavigne (Verdun—Saint–Paul)
Leblanc (Longueuil)
Lincoln
MacAulay
Maheu
Martin (Lasalle—Émard)
Mercier
Pagtakhan
Paré
Payne
Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury)
Asselin
Bakopanos
Bélisle
Bernier (Gaspé)
Bertrand
Brien
Canuel
Chamberlain
Chrétien (Frontenac)
Dalphond–Guiral
Debien
Discepola
Finestone
Godfrey
Graham
Guimond
Keyes
Langlois
Lebel
Lefebvre
Loubier
Maclaren
Marchand
Ménard
Ouellet
Paradis
Patry
Robillard
St. Denis

• (1725)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I declare the motion carried.

(Bill read the third time and passed.)

* * *

CANADA–UNITED STATES TAX CONVENTION ACT, 1984

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill S–9, an act to amend the Canada–United States Tax Convention Act, 1984, as reported (with amendment) from the committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 45, the House will now proceed to the deferred divisions at report stage of Bill S–9, an act to amend the Canada—United States Tax Convention Act, 1984.

The first question is on Motion No. 1.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, if you were to seek it you might find unanimous consent. One or two members may wish to vote otherwise, but you might find consent for the members who voted on the previous motion to be recorded as having voted on the motion now before the House, with Liberal members voting nay on this motion.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I certainly would not give unanimous consent to vote the same way as other Liberal members on the bill, in fact not the same way as the Reform or the Bloc will vote on the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I wonder if I might ask for clarification from the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls. Is he stating his own intention of voting or is he also declining the unanimous consent?

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I moved the motion so obviously I would support Motion No. 1.

On Motion No. 2 perhaps there are other members who may feel the same way as I do about the amendments I have put forward so I would suggest that the vote proceed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): There is not unanimous consent.

(The House divided on Motion No. 1, which was negatived on the following division:)

(Division No. 350)

YEAS

Members

Althouse
Blaikie
Easter
Nunziata
Robinson
Solomon
Baker
Caccia
McLaughlin
Riis
Simmons
Taylor—12

NAYS

Members

Abbott
Alcock
Augustine
Bélair
Bellehumeur
Benoit
Bertrand
Bevilacqua
Blondin–Andrew
Bonin
Breitkreuz (Yellowhead)
Bridgman
Brushett
Calder
Cannis
Catterall
Cohen
Collins
Copps
Crawford
de Savoye
Dhaliwal
Duhamel
Duncan
Eggleton
Epp
Finlay
Frazer
Gaffney
Gallaway
Gerrard
Gouk
Grey (Beaver River)
Grubel
Hanrahan
Harper (Churchill)
Harris
Harvard
Hermanson
Hill (Macleod)
Hopkins
Irwin
Jennings
Jordan
Kirkby
Kraft Sloan
Lastewka
Lavigne (Beauharnois—Salaberry)
Lee
Leroux (Shefford)
MacDonald
Malhi
Manley
Marleau
Mayfield
McKinnon
McTeague
Meredith
Mills (Broadview—Greenwood)
Mitchell
Murphy
Nault
O'Brien
Pagtakhan
Penson
Peters
Phinney
Pickard (Essex—Kent)
Proud
Regan
Ringma
Sauvageau
Scott (Skeena)
Sheridan
Skoke
Speller
Stewart (Brant)
Strahl
Terrana
Tobin
Ablonczy
Assadourian
Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre/Sud–Centre)
Bélanger
Bellemare
Bernier (Beauce)
Bethel
Bhaduria
Bodnar
Boudria
Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville)
Brown (Calgary Southeast/Sud–Est)
Bryden
Campbell
Caron
Chatters
Collenette
Comuzzi
Cowling
Culbert
DeVillers
Dubé
Dumas
Dupuy
English
Fewchuk
Fontana
Fry
Gagliano
Gauthier
Gilmour
Gray (Windsor West/Ouest)
Grose
Guarnieri
Harb
Harper (Simcoe Centre)
Hart
Hayes
Hickey
Hoeppner
Iftody
Jackson
Johnston
Kerpan
Knutson
Landry
Laurin
LeBlanc (Cape/Cap–Breton Highlands—Canso)
Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe)
Loney
MacLellan (Cape/Cap–Breton—The Sydneys)
Maloney
Marchi
Massé
McCormick
McLellan (Edmonton Northwest/Nord–Ouest)
McWhinney
Milliken
Mills (Red Deer)
Morrison
Murray
Nunez
O'Reilly
Parrish
Peric
Peterson
Picard (Drummond)
Pillitteri
Ramsay
Rideout
Rock
Schmidt
Serré
Silye
Solberg
St–Laurent
Stewart (Northumberland)
Szabo
Thalheimer
Torsney

Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata)	Ur
Valeri	Vanclief
Venne	Volpe
Walker	Wayne
Whelan	Williams
Wood	Young—172

PAIRED MEMBERS

Anawak	Asselin
Bachand	Bakopanos
Barnes	Bélisle
Bergeron	Bernier (Gaspé)
Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead)	Bertrand
Bouchard	Brien
Brown (Oakville—Milton)	Canuel
Cauchon	Chamberlain
Chan	Chrétien (Frontenac)
Crête	Dalphond-Guiral
Daviault	Debien
Dingwall	Discepola
Duceppe	Finestone
Gagnon (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine)	Godfrey
Godin	Graham
Guay	Guimond
Jacob	Keyes
Lalonde	Langlois
Lavigne (Verdun—Saint-Paul)	Lebel
Leblanc (Longueuil)	Lefebvre
Lincoln	Loubier
MacAulay	Maclaren
Maheu	Marchand
Martin (Lasalle—Émard)	Ménard
Mercier	Ouellet
Pagtakhan	Paradis
Paré	Patry
Payne	Robillard
Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury)	St. Denis

• (1735)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I declare Motion No. 1 lost.

[Translation]

The next question is on Motion No. 2.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, if you were to seek it, I believe that you would find unanimous consent in the House to apply the vote just completed on Motion No. 1 to Motion No. 2.

Mr. Laurin: Mr. Speaker, the Bloc members will vote nay.

[English]

Mr. Ringma: All right thinking Reformers will also vote no.

Mr. Solomon: Mr. Speaker, all New Democrats present in the House this afternoon will be voting yea on this motion.

Mrs. Wayne: Mr. Speaker, all the PCers will be voting nay.

Mr. Bhaduria: Mr. Speaker, I will be voting against this motion.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I presume you will have me down as voting in favour of the motion. That is exactly what I want, and in case any other members want to do the same thing they are free to do so.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In response to the intervention by the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls, the vote just taken on Motion No. 1 will be applied to Motion No. 2. Is that agreed?

Mr. Ianno: Mr. Speaker, on this motion I would like to vote contrary to what I did on the last vote.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The Chair will need some clarification from the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina. Could he could be more specific? Is he voting yea or nay?

Mr. Ianno: I am voting for the amendment. I am voting yea.

• (1740)

Miss Grey: Mr. Speaker, I have a question. I know we are applying votes in the interest of saving time and that is great. However I am wondering about the members who leave.

There were members who voted on the first one. Will there names automatically appear? Who knows who has left? Can they leave after one vote and then just have their names on the list for the rest of the night?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In response to the hon. member for Beaver River, unless we have a very definite way of doing things such as through a roll call, the Chair assumes that members would be staying for the subsequent vote that would be applied.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is a fundamental principle of the House, and you are the guardian of the principles of the House, that in order to be recorded as voting on a matter the member's presence is required in the House.

Is the hon. member opposite indicating that certain members left the House?

An hon. member: That is right.

Mr. Nunziata: Then I do not see, Mr. Speaker, how you can apply a previously held vote to this vote when certain members have left.

If you take that position, I would suggest that you are setting an unfortunate precedent and that in future when this type of approach is taken to multiple votes in the House it would be open for any member to leave the House once the first vote is taken and to have his or her vote applied to each and every other vote taken in the House.

I would ask that you reconsider that position.

Mr. Solomon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I wish to inform the Speaker and the House that when this arrangement was made for the sake of speeding up the vote it was assumed that all members would remain in the House during the course of the speeding up of the vote.

I support the contention of the hon. member opposite that if this precedent is set it would be unfavourable and unacceptable to the NDP caucus.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I respectfully suggest that you take the vote row by row, as usual, on report stage Motion No. 2. Hopefully that will get the process started again.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I just want to set the record straight if I misled any member of the House. I have no dispute whatsoever with the hon. member for York South—Weston, the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden or any other member with respect to the tradition of the House. I was simply trying to clear the air by saying that yes, the Chair assumes members are staying.

Unless we can actually verify the absence of someone clearly and definitely, obviously the best measure is to take the advice of the chief government whip and take the vote on Motion No. 2.

(The House divided on Motion No. 2, which was negatived on the following division:)

(Division No. 351)

YEAS

Members

Althouse
Blaikie
Easter
McLaughlin
Nunziata
Robinson
Solomon
Wells —15

Baker
Caccia
Ianno
Minna
Riis
Simmons
Taylor

NAYS

Members

Abbott
Adams
Assadourian
Bélair
Bellehumeur
Benoit
Bertrand
Bhaduria
Bodnar
Boudria
Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville)
Brown (Calgary Southeast/Sud-Est)
Bryden
Campbell
Caron
Chatters
Collenette
Comuzzi
Cowling
Culbert
DeVillers
Dromisky
Duhamel
Duncan

Ablonczy
Alcock
Augustine
Bélanger
Bellemare
Bernier (Beauce)
Bethel
Blondin-Andrew
Bonin
Breitkreuz (Yellowhead)
Bridgman
Brushett
Calder
Cannis
Catterall
Cohen
Collins
Copps
Crawford
de Savoye
Dhaliwal
Dubé
Dumas
Dupuy

Eggleton
Epp
Finlay
Frazer
Gaffney
Gallaway
Gerrard
Gouk
Grey (Beaver River)
Grubel
Hanrahan
Harper (Churchill)
Harris
Harvard
Hermanson
Hill (Macleod)
Hopkins
Irwin
Jennings
Jordan
Kirkby
Kraft Sloan
Lastewka
Lavigne (Beauharnois—Salaberry)
Lee
Leroux (Shefford)
MacDonald
Malhi
Manley
Marleau
McCormick
McLellan (Edmonton Northwest/Nord-Ouest)
McWhinney
Milliken
Mills (Red Deer)
Morrison
Murray
Nunez
O'Reilly
Parrish
Peric
Peterson
Picard (Drummond)
Pillitteri
Ramsay
Rideout
Rock
Schmidt
Serré
Silye
Solberg
St-Laurent
Stewart (Northumberland)
Szabo
Tobin
Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata)
Valeri
Venne
Walker
Whelan
Wood

English
Fewchuk
Fontana
Fry
Gagliano
Gauthier
Gilmour
Gray (Windsor West/Ouest)
Grose
Guarnieri
Harb
Harper (Simcoe Centre)
Hart
Hayes
Hickey
Hoeppner
Iftody
Jackson
Johnston
Kerpan
Knutson
Landry
Laurin
LeBlanc (Cape/Cap-Breton Highlands—Canso)
Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe)
Loney
MacLellan (Cape/Cap-Breton—The Sydneys)
Maloney
Marchi
Mayfield
McKinnon
McTeague
Meredith
Mills (Broadview—Greenwood)
Mitchell
Murphy
Nault
O'Brien
Pagtakhan
Penson
Peters
Phinney
Pickard (Essex—Kent)
Proud
Regan
Ringma
Sauvageau
Scott (Skeena)
Sheridan
Skoke
Speller
Stewart (Brant)
Strahl
Thalheimer
Torsney
Ur
Vanclief
Volpe
Wayne
Williams
Young—170

PAIRED MEMBERS

Anawak
Bachand
Barnes
Bergeron
Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead)
Bouchard
Brown (Oakville—Milton)
Cauchon
Chan
Crête

Asselin
Bakopanos
Bélisle
Bernier (Gaspé)
Bertrand
Brien
Canuel
Chamberlain
Chrétien (Frontenac)
Dalphond-Guiral

Daviault
Dingwall
Duceppe
Gagnon (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine)
Godin
Guay
Jacob
Lalonde
Lavigne (Verdun—Saint-Paul)
Leblanc (Longueuil)
Lincoln
MacAulay
Maheu
Martin (Lasalle—Émard)
Mercier
Pagtakhan
Paré
Payne
Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury)
Debien
Discepola
Finestone
Godfrey
Graham
Guimond
Keyes
Langlois
Lebel
Lefebvre
Loubier
Maclaren
Marchand
Ménard
Ouellet
Paradis
Patry
Robillard
St. Denis

• (1750)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I declare Motion No. 2 negatived.

Hon. Douglas Peters (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

(The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:)

(Division No. 352)

YEAS

Members

Abbott
Adams
Assadourian
Bélair
Bellehumeur
Benoit
Bertrand
Bhaduria
Bodnar
Boudria
Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville)
Brown (Calgary Southeast/Sud-Est)
Bryden
Calder
Cannis
Catterall
Cohen
Collins
Copps
Crawford
de Savoye
Dhaliwal
Dubé
Dumas
Ablonczy
Alcock
Augustine
Bélanger
Bellemare
Bernier (Beauce)
Bethel
Blondin-Andrew
Bonin
Breitkreuz (Yellowhead)
Bridgman
Brushett
Caccia
Campbell
Caron
Chatters
Collenette
Comuzzi
Cowling
Culbert
DeVillers
Dromisky
Duhamel
Duncan
Dupuy
Eggleton
Epp
Finlay
Frazer
Gaffney
Gallaway
Gerrard
Gouk
Grey (Beaver River)
Grubel
Hanrahan
Harper (Churchill)
Harris
Harvard
Hermanson
Hill (Macleod)
Hopkins
Ianno
Irwin
Jennings
Jordan
Kirkby
Kraft Sloan
Lastewka
Lavigne (Beauharnois—Salaberry)
Lee
Leroux (Shefford)
MacDonald
Malhi
Manley
Marleau
McCormick
McKinnon
McTeague
Meredith
Mills (Broadview—Greenwood)
Minna
Morrison
Murray
Nunez
O'Reilly
Parrish
Peric
Peterson
Picard (Drummond)
Pillitteri
Ramsay
Rideout
Rock
Schmidt
Serré
Silye
Solberg
St-Laurent
Stewart (Northumberland)
Szabo
Thalheimer
Torsney
Ur
Vanclief
Verran
Walker
Wells
Williams
Young—179
Easter
English
Fewchuk
Fontana
Fry
Gagliano
Gauthier
Gilmour
Gray (Windsor West/Ouest)
Grose
Guarnieri
Harb
Harper (Simcoe Centre)
Hart
Hayes
Hickey
Hoeppner
Hubbard
Iftody
Jackson
Johnston
Kerpan
Knutson
Landry
Laurin
LeBlanc (Cape/Cap-Breton Highlands—Canso)
Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe)
Loney
MacLellan (Cape/Cap-Breton—The Sydneys)
Maloney
Marchi
Mayfield
McGuire
McLellan (Edmonton Northwest/Nord-Ouest)
McWhinney
Milliken
Mills (Red Deer)
Mitchell
Murphy
Nault
O'Brien
Pagtakhan
Penson
Peters
Phinney
Pickard (Essex—Kent)
Proud
Regan
Ringma
Sauvageau
Scott (Skeena)
Sheridan
Skoke
Speller
Stewart (Brant)
Strahl
Terrana
Tobin
Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata)
Valeri
Venne
Volpe
Wayne
Whelan
Wood

NAYS

Members

Althouse
McLaughlin
Robinson
Taylor—7
Blaikie
Riis
Solomon

PAIRED MEMBERS

Anawak	Asselin
Bachand	Bakopanos
Barnes	Bélisle
Bergeron	Bernier (Gaspé)
Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead)	Bertrand
Bouchard	Brien
Brown (Oakville—Milton)	Canuel
Cauchon	Chamberlain
Chan	Chrétien (Frontenac)
Crête	Dalphond-Guiral
Daviault	Debien
Dingwall	Discepola
Duceppe	Finestone
Gagnon (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine)	Godfrey
Godin	Graham
Guay	Guimond
Jacob	Keyes
Lalonde	Langlois
Lavigne (Verdun—Saint-Paul)	Lebel
Leblanc (Longueuil)	Lefebvre
Lincoln	Loubier
MacAulay	Maclaren
Maheu	Marchand
Martin (Lasalle—Émard)	Ménard
Mercier	Ouellet
Pagtakhan	Paradis
Paré	Patry
Payne	Robillard
Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury)	St. Denis

• (1800)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I declare the motion carried.

* * *

EXCISE TAX ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C-90, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 45, the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division at the third reading stage of Bill C-90, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act.

(The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:)

(Division No. 353)

YEAS

Members

Adams	Alcock
Assadourian	Augustine
Baker	Bélair
Bélanger	Bellemare
Bertrand	Bethel
Blondin-Andrew	Bodnar
Bonin	Boudria
Brushett	Bryden
Caccia	Calder
Campbell	Cannis
Catterall	Clancy
Cohen	Collenette
Collins	Comuzzi
Copps	Cowling
Crawford	Culbert
DeVillers	Dhaliwal
Dromisky	Duhamel
Dupuy	Easter
Eggleton	English
Fewchuk	Finlay
Fontana	Fry
Gaffney	Gagliano
Gallaway	Gerrard
Gray (Windsor West/Ouest)	Grose
Guarnieri	Harb
Harper (Churchill)	Harvard
Hickey	Hopkins
Hubbard	Ianno
Iftody	Irwin
Jackson	Jordan
Kirkby	Knutson
Kraft Sloan	Lastewka
LeBlanc (Cape/Cap-Breton Highlands—Canso)	Lee
Loney	MacDonald
MacLellan (Cape/Cap-Breton—The Sydneys)	Malhi
Maloney	Manley
Marchi	Marleau
McCormick	McGuire
McKinnon	McLellan (Edmonton Northwest/Nord-Ouest)
McTeague	McWhinney
Milliken	Mills (Broadview—Greenwood)
Minna	Mitchell
Murphy	Murray
Nault	Nunziata
O'Brien	O'Reilly
Pagtakhan	Parrish
Peric	Peters
Peterson	Phinney
Pickard (Essex—Kent)	Pillitteri
Proud	Regan
Richardson	Rideout
Ringuette-Maltais	Rock
Serré	Sheridan
Skoke	Speller
Stewart (Brant)	Stewart (Northumberland)
Szabo	Terrana
Thalheimer	Tobin
Torsney	Ur
Valeri	Vanclief
Verran	Volpe
Walker	Wells
Whelan	Wood
Young—125

NAYS

Members

Abbott	Ablonczy
Althouse	Bellehumeur
Benoit	Blaikie
Breitkreuz (Yellowhead)	Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville)
Bridgman	Brown (Calgary Southeast/Sud-Est)
Caron	Chatters
de Savoye	Dubé
Dumas	Duncan
Epp	Frazer
Gauthier	Gilmour
Gouk	Grey (Beaver River)
Grubel	Hanrahan
Harper (Simcoe Centre)	Harris
Hart	Hayes
Hermanson	Hill (Macleod)
Hoeppner	Jennings
Johnston	Kerpan
Landry	Laurin
Lavigne (Beauharnois—Salaberry)	Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe)
Leroux (Shefford)	Mayfield
McLaughlin	Meredith
Mills (Red Deer)	Morrison
Nunez	Penson
Picard (Drummond)	Ramsay
Riis	Ringma
Robinson	Sauvageau
Schmidt	Scott (Skeena)
Silye	Solberg
Solomon	St-Laurent
Strahl	Taylor
Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata)	Venne
Wayne	Williams—64

PAIRED MEMBERS

Anawak	Asselin
Bachand	Bakopanos
Barnes	Bélisle
Bergeron	Bernier (Gaspé)
Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead)	Bertrand
Bouchard	Brien
Brown (Oakville—Milton)	Canuel
Cauchon	Chamberlain
Chan	Chrétien (Frontenac)
Crête	Dalphond-Guiral
Daviault	Debien
Dingwall	Discepola
Duceppe	Finestone
Gagnon (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine)	Godfrey
Godin	Graham
Guay	Guimond
Jacob	Keyes
Lalonde	Langlois
Lavigne (Verdun—Saint-Paul)	Lebel
Leblanc (Longueuil)	Lefebvre
Lincoln	Loubier
MacAulay	Maclaren
Maheu	Marchand
Martin (Lasalle—Émard)	Ménard
Mercier	Ouellet
Pagtakhan	Paradis
Paré	Patry
Payne	Robillard
Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury)	St. Denis

• (1805)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I declare the motion carried.

(Bill read the third time and passed.)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): This concludes the votes for this evening.

It being 6.10 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[Translation]

CANADA LABOUR CODE

The House resumed from June 15, 1995, consideration of the motion that Bill C-317, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code and the Public Service Staff Relations Act (scabs and essential services), be read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development.

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to Bill C-317 standing in the name of my colleague and friend from Manicouagan. The purpose of this bill is to amend the Canada Labour Code and the Public Service Staff Relations Act so as to deal with the issue of scabs and essential services in the case of labour disputes.

I am somewhat surprised to be in this position in 1995, because it seems to me this kind of legislation should have been passed long ago at the federal level.

The history of labour relations has more often than not been one of struggle and sometimes, unfortunately, one of violence.

When we study the history of the labour movement, we realize that when violence occurred, either on picket lines or as a result of a strike, it was in situations where the employer had hired strike breakers. In other words, he had replaced his employees who were legally on strike with people who were supposed to do the same work.

An hon. member: Scabs.

Mr. Caron: As my colleague says, scabs, to use a colloquialism.

I think it only makes sense that in 1995, the Canada Labour Code should contain a provision of this kind that would harmonize labour relations in situations where a strike may turn violent and ensure that employees who have temporarily lost their jobs are not replaced, since otherwise violence tends to develop on the picket lines and we get situations that are truly appalling.

I actually thought the Canada Labour Code contained a provision to that effect, because the Government of Quebec passed similar legislation in 1978, if I am not mistaken. At the time, representatives for the employers protested that it was not appropriate for the government to get involved in labour relations in a conflict situation of this kind, the excuse being that employers should be free to take any action necessary to continue their operations.

I think that at the time Quebec society made a wise decision when it told employers: Gentlemen, in our society, the government has a responsibility to provide leadership, to identify potentially violent situations and remove the cause of violence on the picket lines. In Quebec, if I remember correctly, we had two major disputes in which strike breakers were hired by companies and there was violence on the picket lines.

I remember the infamous strike in the sixties at United Aircraft in Longueuil and seeing on the news that armoured buses were bringing in people who were supposed to replace the workers who were legally walking the picket lines. This was a violent situation, and I think it is not in the interest of society to allow such situations to continue.

There was another case referred to at the time as the strike at Lapalme. This was a company connected with the Post Office Department. Its employees were on strike and, again, had been replaced with strike breakers or scabs. This dispute poisoned labour relations in Quebec for months and months. There were demonstrations supporting the workers, and petitions were signed. When the PQ government came to power in 1976, there had been considerable debate on the issue, so that legislation was adopted to regulate the whole issue of hiring strike breakers.

In fact, since that time, Quebec has had no violent conflicts comparable to those we saw in the sixties and seventies. Employers finally understood, although for a long time they were against this legislation. They were supposed to go to the Supreme Court but, if I remember correctly, the case was withdrawn in the eighties when the employers realized that the situation had improved since the passage of this bill.

I am very surprised that the Canada Labour Code did not take its cue from the Government of Quebec, especially since this concerns a large number of employees in Quebec. There are more than 200,000 employees in crown corporations, corporations regulated by the Canada Labour Code, out the public service. In Canada, there are more than one million. I think that the House of Commons should act responsibly and realize there is a major problem which should be dealt with as soon as possible.

• (1815)

Why is this still a problem? I think there are two reasons. The first, obviously, is negligence. The official opposition has put a number of questions to the Minister of Labour since her arrival in the House. We asked her if the Canadian government was going to introduce legislation. Her replies have always been evasive. The questions put to her by the official opposition concerned a labour dispute which still today, in 1995, poisons labour relations at a flour mill in Montreal. The employees came and demonstrated outside Parliament; they came to hear us in the House galleries. The dispute has lasted a very long time.

What is odd is that this dispute involved the same company and the same people who were on the management side in a dispute that, a few years or months before the Parti Quebecois enacted the legislation in Quebec, forced the government to take immediate action because one man had been killed. Somebody was shot at on the picket lines, and a worker died. The government assumed its responsibilities at that point.

Today we realize that the Government of Canada, with a minister whose arrival was a bit strange and whose role was rather vague—

Mr. Boudria: She was elected.

Mr. Caron: She was elected and a department was found for her. It could have been the department of the Canadian near north, it could have been the department of Canadian rain, or the department of the Rocky Mountains. It was simply a matter of finding her a department so she would have some credibility when she toured Quebec defending the option she is currently defending.

I am not saying this to criticize her work, but simply to point out that she did not do what she had to do as Minister of Labour. We do not feel there is a Minister of Labour in Canada in this case.

The second reason the Government of Canada is putting off passing legislation like this is one of ideology. You know that there was a law like this in Ontario. If I am not mistaken, it was passed by the NDP government. The new Harris government—I might say the harass government, but it is the Harris government—has announced that this law will be repealed.

I have not heard that the legislation in question had caused any more trouble in Ontario than in Quebec. It is being challenged for only one reason, an ideological one, which is to allow employers the freedom to do what they want with their property.

I thought that way of thinking was out of fashion in Canada today. I thought that the Canadian state had taken certain steps to oversee the action of employers in order to ensure a certain balance between the law of the market place, the law of might makes right, the law of the jungle, whatever you want to call it, and basic public interest. I believe that the attitude adopted by the Government of Ontario in this instance is a purely ideological one.

Nothing in Ontario labour relations in recent years has proven that the legislation was not working. In Quebec, on the contrary, it can be said that since 1978, in other words for 17 years now, there has been unanimous agreement that the act is working well. Even the Conseil de patronat du Québec gave up its Supreme Court challenge by the late 1980s.

I hope that this House will examine the bill of our colleague from Manicouagan with care, and will once and for all settle this pressing problem of justice in labour relations for all Canadian workers, and no doubt for a few months more for Quebec workers as well.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would have liked to be able to say that I was pleased to rise today on Bill C–317. Unfortunately, earlier incidents prevent me from doing so.

• (1820)

However, today, I will take a few moments to deal with it, and then I will talk about related issues. They are indeed related because, to a large extent, they have to do with remarks we heard today and I want to spend some more time dealing with those.

The bill sponsored by the member for Manicouagan is aimed at amending the Canada Labour Code with respect to public service staff relations. As it stands, this piece of legislation respecting the Canada Labour Code is relevant; unfortunately, I cannot support it. I believe that the proposals cannot be examined independently from the federal government's general approach to industrial relations.

[English]

Prohibiting the use of replacement workers and maintenance of essential services must be considered in the context of a comprehensive review of the Canada Labour Code.

[Translation]

Indeed, amending only one aspect of the Canada Labour Code is the wrong way to proceed; a certain balance must be struck when considering changes to labour laws. I am sure that this is what the government will be seeking when it eventually chooses to amend the Canada Labour Code.

Mr. Nunez: When? When?

Mr. Boudria: The member opposite wants to know when. The Canadian Parliament will undoubtedly have the opportunity in the future, as it did in the past, to improve all the laws for the good of the Canadian people. I commend the member who asked me when for his concern for Canada's future. I know that when the constitutional issue will have been settled, when we will have voted no in a few days, he and I will continue to strive to improve the legislation in the long term. So when he worries about the exact date, I can tell the member for Bourassa that he will have ample time to examine these issues because in two weeks he will vote no and refuse separation and Quebec will still be part of Canada.

The member who spoke just before me mentioned that the Minister of Labour came to the House in a way that was a bit strange. I respectfully protested without disrupting the decorum of the House—

Mr. Nunez: As you often do.

Mr. Boudria: —as I do once in a while, and I specified that "a bit strange" in that case referred to her election.

We heard that many times in this House. We even heard a Bloc member say, a few weeks ago, that the labour minister was not as legitimate as other Quebec members because her constituents were mostly anglophones since she represents Westmount. We all remember those comments made in the House last week. The member for Bourassa heard them just as I did. He knows who uttered those words and he knows these comments were made.

We also heard a member say in this House—no, it was rather outside the House and the media reported it—that, in this referendum debate, maybe only the so–called old stock Quebecers should get involved in this issue. Surely the member for Bourassa does not support that theory. Indeed, I would be surprised if he did.

Mr. St–Laurent: Could we get back to the bill?

Mr. Boudria: The member opposite asks me to get back to the bill. It is not I who alluded to the supposedly strange way the labour minister—and we are talking about amending the labour code—was elected.

A few weeks ago, or should I say a few months ago, we heard derogatory remarks made against the member for Saint–Léonard, the secretary of state for parliamentary affairs, just because he also represented a riding composed mainly of an ethnic group that is different from that of other Canadians.

• (1825)

An hon. member: How is this relevant?

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I did not raise the issue of relevance. It is simply because, a few minutes ago, another member of this House referred to what he called a rather curious situation. I want to say a few more words about this curious situation because today a member of the media was the target of what I would call virulent attacks.

Joyce Napier, a well–known CBC reporter, was also insulted because her accent—I do not even know if this is true—is supposedly not quite the same as that of other Quebecers. This journalist was insulted in this way because another parliamentarian, this time the hon. member for Rimouski—Témiscouata, has decided that such attacks should be aimed not only at members of other parties and of some cultural communities but also at members of the media.

Is this because the lady in question has a name that is—I do not know if it is English, Irish or Scottish—but the fact is that it is not—

Mr. Dubé: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have been listening to the hon. member for a while and his remarks are not at all relevant to Bill C–317, which deals with antiscale legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I have been in the chair since the beginning of private members' business and I clearly recall another member making a speech on the bill, in which he addressed other issues as well.

On the other hand, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell was certainly on the right track at the beginning of his speech.

An hon. member: Yes, at the beginning.

An hon. member: More or less.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): More or less, but still I feel that in the little time he has left, he will certainly get back on topic.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I simply want to use another quote to make a point and then go back to the main issue.

Here is the quote. It reads: "Canada has always protected French speaking people. It always let them be assimilated. If you know a bit of history—given your accent and your language, you may not have been a Quebecer at the beginning—did you study Quebec's history"?

I now go back to the main issue, but I want the House to know that, at least as far as I am concerned, those who applaud when the member for Rimouski—Témiscouata makes such comments should also be condemned, just like she was when she lashed out at another person, thus showing once again the separatists' intolerance. We saw that. We also saw that intolerance when the Leader of the Opposition made his statement about little white babies. We saw it in other statements too. We saw it today and we see it again with the applause of another member.

[English]

I will conclude my remarks by saying that we do not intend to support the legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. St–Laurent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

We go to the trouble of introducing bills because we sincerely believe that the House serves some purpose, and I still believe it does. However, when I see the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell do what he just did for ten minutes, I begin to seriously question the true role of this House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): This is not a point of order, although we should always take great care to make our remarks relevant. The rule of relevancy is interpreted with a great deal of flexibility on both sides of the House.

I will now ask the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell to conclude his remarks.

Mr. Boudria: I have finished, Mr. Speaker.

• (1830)

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I will try to make my remarks strictly relevant to Bill C–317, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code. On page 1a of this bill, it says, and I will read very slowly so that everybody can understand:

> The purpose of this bill is to prohibit the hiring of persons to replace employees of an employer under the Canada Labour Code or of the Public Service who are on strike or locked out.

This is what the bill is all about. This bill was carefully prepared by my colleague from Manicouagan, who carried out a study and who is sort of making a new attempt to remind the House that we must do something in this area. Another purpose of this bill is to ensure that essential services are maintained in the event of a strike or lockout in a crown corporation and in the public service.

Bill C–317 was introduced by the hon. member for Manicouagan, whom I want to congratulate again for his insight. He was able to come up with this piece of legislation by relying on his work experience. The purpose of this bill is to expand on what we already have in Quebec. It tries to influence this Parliament, even though we are in the middle of a referendum, because a lot of the federal provisions included in the Canada Labour Code affect workers in Quebec. This is why my hon. colleague introduced this bill.

May I remind you that it is not the first time that such an initiative is undertaken and that such a bill is introduced in the House. Without going into details, I want to mention as an example that, in November 1992, the Conservative member for Abitibi had brought forward Bill C–376 that had essentially the same intent as the introductory paragraph of the bill introduced by the member for Manicouagan.

Before that, during the postal strike, the present member for Richelieu, who was then a Conservative, tried twice to get the House to adopt legislation to prohibit the hiring of scabs by crown corporations. The first time was in February 1988 with Bill C–282 and the second time was in April 1989 with Bill C–201. That last bill was defeated by 18 votes only, which means that the member for Manicouagan has a good reason for trying again today, having seen that a good number of members from different parties in the House supported such a bill at that time.

The Liberal Party, then in opposition, expressed its support for the bill. Many Liberal members were in favour of the bill at that time. If we go back a little further, in 1980, Ed Broadbent, then leader of the NDP, introduced an antiscab bill. Since that time, several unions have asked various federal governments to pass a similar act. So, this is nothing new.

In October 1994, the present Minister of Human Resources Development promised that an anti–scab bill would be introduced in the spring of 1995. We all know what happened. A part of the responsibilities of the Minister of Human Resources Development were transferred to the present Minister of Labour, who seems to be too busy with the referendum because she has not yet introduced such a bill. Yet, the minister had made a priority of that issue after her appointment in February 1995. We are in October and nothing has been done.

I would like to remind the House that in Quebec, provincial anti–scab legislation was passed in 1977 and became part of the Labour Code. Since then, Ontario and British Columbia have passed similar legislation.

• (1835)

The preventive, dissuasive and indicative role of the Quebec act has resulted in a 35 per cent decrease in the average number of labour conflicts since 1979. And 35 per cent is not a figure to be sneezed at.

There is agreement between the partners in the Quebec labour market on the beneficial effects of the Quebec legislation on scab labour. Even the strongly federalist and strongly pro–business Conseil du patronat du Québec has abandoned its challenge against these acts before the Supreme Court, saying that there have been improvements in labour relations in Quebec over the years since its passage.

And yet, as you know, there is a new government in Ontario and the new Mike Harris government, which is chummier with business than with workers, has promised to do away with Ontario's Bill 40 by the end of this year. It is noteworthy that Chrysler Canada has publicly advised the Harris government not to move too hastily on this change and to weigh the consequences. The auto maker fears that precipitous action might upset labour relations in Ontario. This is a very recent happening and right in Ontario. Chrysler Corporation is not just any company, it is a huge company, an important one, and it is warning the Government of Ontario not to take away the legislation.

In Quebec, 10 per cent of workers are governed by the Canada Labour Code, or about 217,000 people.

Now I will speak to you about one example of a labour conflict in Quebec which dragged on because Quebec's scab legislation was not enforced. That example is Ogilvie Mills Limited. Ogilvie processes grain, and somewhere in the Constitution, in Canadian constitutional law, it says that grain comes under federal jurisdiction. So what happened at Ogilvie? Because it was federally regulated, Quebec's anti–scab legislation did not apply.

This dispute, which was settled only recently, went on and on, despite all attempts to reach a settlement. I remember raising the matter as the member for Lévis. Although Ogilvie is mainly in Montreal, there was an impact across Quebec. During the notorious dispute at CN, we told the Minister of Labour: You do not seem as anxious to appoint a mediator to settle the grain dispute at Ogilvie in the Port of Montreal.

The dispute dragged on and on and on, until it was settled quite recently, but it went on for many months, and in fact it lasted about 18 months, if I am not mistaken.

So what did the workers at Ogilvie want? What caused the dispute? It seems they just wanted to maintain their working conditions, not improve them, only maintain them. The company wanted to backtrack on conditions that had already been agreed to.

In the circumstances, it was perfectly normal for the employees to act as they did. Not many people, and I would even include members opposite and, in fact, all members of the House of Commons, would be prepared to go back to what conditions were in the past. And that was the problem.

I could mention another case in Quebec to illustrate my point. I come from the riding of Lévis. MIL Davie, a marine construction firm, comes under the Quebec Labour Code because the sector is regulated by the province. The company does not have the right to hire strike breakers. However, a small shipyard like the one at Les Méchins, which does ship repairs and is thus in a related sector, would be subject to the Canada Labour Code because of the federal government's jurisdiction over marine traffic, and so the anti–scab legislation would not apply.

Today, these shipyards are being invited to bid for the same jobs but they are not subject to the same conditions, the same bargaining rules.

• (1840)

In the minute I have left I would like to say that—and it might look odd for a Bloc member involved in the current referendum campaign to encourage the federal government to pass anti–scab legislation—if the yes vote wins, Quebec will do what it likes once it is sovereign. We can envisage that.

However, at the same time, as the areas of labour relations are often interrelated and we want an open economy, we feel that our future neighbour, Canada, should be subject to the same conditions so that the rules for business—we are talking here of free trade—are consistent.

This is to be expected, and we want the members opposite to vote in favour of this legislation so that workers in all fields, particularly industry, enjoy the same conditions in this part of the North American continent.

[English]

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to be here tonight in my first duties as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour and to speak briefly on Bill C–317.

I thank the member for Manicouagan for bringing this important bill forward. The member proposes to amend the Canada Labour Code and the Public Service Staff Relations Act. As I read it, there are two very important objectives here.

The first objective is to ban replacement workers when there is a strike or lockout in the public service or at an employer covered under the Canada Labour Code. The second objective is to ensure that essential public services are maintained in the event of a strike or lockout in the public service or at a crown corporation.

The issues raised in the bill are difficult and complicated. It deals with peoples' pocketbooks, their livelihoods and their rights. To those involved in labour relations, it will also influence Canada's economic and social progress.

Thus the bill merits our time and consideration. Any decisions taken on these issues have to be carefully thought through. Bill C–317 proposes to change part I of the Canada Labour Code. This part of the code is meant to achieve a balance of power between labour and management.

As a former union executive I know a careful balance is needed to keep the collective bargaining process running. Therefore I do not think it is wise to isolate or grab on to certain issues without considering the effect on the big picture. That is the point I want to emphasize.

As I am sure the hon. member is aware, there has not been a comprehensive review of the industrial relations provisions of the labour code in over 20 years. The last amendments were made in 1972 and before that we have to go back to 1948.

In 1972 amendments were made involving the certification process, new provisions to require good faith bargaining, the extension of the unfair labour practices section and increasing the authority of the Canada Labour Relations Board. Most important in my mind, especially in light of today's economy, was the inclusion of a section on technological change. This meant that unless a collective agreement dealt with the issue, an employer was required to give 90 days notice of any new technology likely to impact on working conditions or job security of a significant number of employees. That notice was lengthened in 1984 to 120 days.

After such notice the union can apply to the CLRB for leave to notify the employer of its desire to reopen negotiations to discuss provisions for those workers affected by technology. Once notice is received the employer cannot make technological changes until the board denies the union application or an agreement is reached or the parties negotiate and reach a strike provision.

These changes were made only after extensive consultations with unions and employers and after two thorough studies. The Freedman study in the 1960s looked at the impact of technology at CN Rail and recommended a formula for labour and management to resolve disagreements over the consequences of new technology. As well, the Woods task force in 1968 examined just about every aspect of labour–management relations under federal jurisdiction. It commissioned a number of studies and submitted several important recommendations to the government.

• (1845)

I have touched on history just to show that in Canada we do not fool around when it comes to labour–management relations. Hastily ill–conceived actions however well meaning can have serious consequences in this area.

Our tradition is to only change collective bargaining laws after thorough deliberation and consultation with all the stakeholders. This tradition has served us very well. It has allowed us to develop at the federal level at least. I will refrain from commenting on the radical and polarizing swings in my home province of Ontario over the last five years. We had the NDP way over here at one end for a little while and now we have the Conservatives, some would suggest very right wing indeed, going the other way. That kind of polarization and swinging back and forth does nothing for labour–management relations. In fact, it does a disservice to the people who have to make a living by collective bargaining.

Since the last amendments were made in 1972, the environment surrounding industrial relations has undergone a revolution. Free trade, deregulation, rapid technological advances and workplace restructuring place new demands on both labour and management. In light of this, we need a comprehensive review of the Canada Labour Code, not piecemeal action as suggested tonight.

In fact, the Minister of Labour launched such a review just a little while ago. This review is looking at the big picture. We want to improve the labour code to encourage co–operation between labour and management, to reduce unhealthy and counterproductive levels of conflict and to ensure that administrative bodies are responsive to the new and always changing labour relations environment.

Since last winter, extensive consultations have been carried out with labour, management and interested and knowledgeable third parties. Many issues are being studied, including those that the member proposes to deal with in Bill C–317. It is a difficult task, as labour and management hold diametrically opposed viewpoints on these issues. For example, there is the issue of replacement workers. Let me quote Tom d'Aquino, whom we all know, and what he thinks on this ban.

Tom d'Aquino writes: "We would dramatically alter the delicate equilibrium which has been established over the course of many years between management and labour and firms which are subject to federal jurisdiction. The obvious result would be to strengthen the position of organized labour while simultaneously weakening management's position, with clear implications for the outcome of their private contractual negotiations. Government interference of this sort would violate the most basic principles of equity and fair play. It would be highly disruptive and entirely inconsistent with our open market economy. It also would override the fundamental rights of individuals to decide where and when they choose to work".

On the other side we have Bob White, whom we also know quite well. He is on record expressing the CLC's strong support for restrictions and even a total ban on replacement workers, including management staff.

Our job is to try to reconcile these deeply held, apparently incompatible positions. It will not be easy, but it is something we simply have to do.

Last June the Minister of Labour established a task force to conduct an independent review of part I of the labour code and to recommend changes. I want to mention tonight the issues and areas this task force will be looking at and to mention to the members opposite who have suggested that the Minister of Labour has done virtually nothing on this issue and that she has been somewhat reluctant to get involved in these major changes that are necessary for the economy and for the labour relations we have to deal with. The review will be completed by December 15. I am confident the people on the task force will do a thorough and professional job.

• (1850)

The task force is dealing with very critical and important issues which include the conciliation and mediation process with a view to reducing delays and encouraging settlements and the possible role of alternative dispute settlements; fact finding and special mediation; the procedures for acquiring the right to strike or lockout; and the rights of employees, employers and bargaining agents once a strike or a lockout occurs. The general purpose of the code will be looked at as will the need for labour management committees, preventive mediation programs, grievance mediation and expedited arbitration. Bargaining unit structures including recommendations of industrial inquiry commissions into labour relations at west coast ports will be made regarding geographic certification provisions. Finally the need for alternative procedures or bargaining structures for the non–traditional work relationships like telework, contract work and casual employees will be looked at.

As members can see, although I did not lay them all out tonight, the task force has a large task ahead of it. There is a lot to do and not much time to do it. Then we will be able to make informed decisions on the issues raised by the separatist party opposite and on other issues as well taking into account the big picture.

In order to make sense of the whole process we will have to wait until the ongoing studies are complete. Then we will all be able to make an informed decision and a position will be reached by the government on what we will put in front of the House as far as new legislation is concerned.

That is what the federal government believes is the true way. We have put comprehensive labour relations management proposals to the House instead of the piecemeal approach suggested by the member opposite.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to participate in the debate on Bill C–317, sponsored by the member from the Bloc that deals with the ban on replacement workers.

The Bloc member favours a ban on replacement workers. This stems from the Bloc being very upset with the use of replacement workers by the American owners of the Montreal company known as Ogilvie flour mills. Because flour mills fall under federal jurisdiction and Quebec's provincial anti–replacement worker legislation had no effect on the company, I understand Bloc members feel it is important to bring the legislation forward to the House of Commons for us to review in private members' hour.

The proposal comes from a member of a separatist party that wants to take the province of Quebec out of Canada. We feel they do not realize the consequences of their actions. I do not think they realize the consequences of the bill as well. It is a bit like sandbox diplomacy where a youngster is playing in the sandbox and if he does not get along with his companion he says: "I am going to take my toys and go play in another sandbox. No one else can play with these toys; I will take them with me".

Hopefully when we are dealing with legislation and labour disputes we can get beyond sandbox diplomacy in politics. The sandbox approach to labour disputes and to labour legislation, particularly legislation such as the bill that would ban replacement workers, is not the solution to the problem. It would exacerbate the problem considerably.

I will not go on at great length debating the clauses of the bill proposed by my colleague. However I want to take a brief look at the consequences of labour disputes and perhaps a more constructive and positive way of resolving them other than banning replacement workers and getting into a frustrating battle between labour and management where people take sides. I would also advise my colleague from the Bloc that perhaps this approach to labour legislation and a relationship with labour is not in their political best interests.

• (1855)

All we have to do is look at our political cousins, the New Democratic caucus, and see what has happened to them over the years and what happened to them over this past weekend. They have always catered to the elite in the labour movement, the leaders, and felt that was the key to their political success. Even in their leadership convention over the weekend we saw where labour played a significant role in determining who the leader of the party would be. That has led to their political demise and even to an erosion of support among rank and file union workers because of their position on issues dealing with labour and management.

A word of advice to my colleagues in the Bloc Quebecois is that perhaps for their political well–being they might not be advised to pursue this type of legislation.

I want to discuss labour relations on the west coast, which impact on my part of the world. Western Canada is important. I know we debate Quebec and its relationship within Canada quite a bit these days. However, I just want to deal with the labour situation and replacement labour and perhaps a better approach to solving labour disputes from my perspective in Saskatchewan.

Since 1972, six labour disputes relating to the west coast ports were settled by federal back to work legislation. Two other labour disputes were settled by federal back to work legislation in 1988 and 1991. They were also directly related to grain handling disputes in British Columbia, although they were somewhat different.

Within the current term of this 35th Parliament, two labour disputes have occurred at the west coast ports and there had to be back to work legislation. Specifically, these are the West Coast Ports Operation Act, Bill C–10, and the West Coast Ports Operation Act 1995, Bill C–74. These relate to disputes occurring in February 1994 and March 1995.

That brings me to the principle of the right to strike, the right to lock out workers, and the right to replace workers with so–called scab labour, or the opposite of that, the right to implement legislation that would ban the hiring of replacement workers.

The strike and the lockout are effective tools in the labour and management arsenal. They have been using these for a long time to bring about a resolution. Usually the side with the deepest pockets and the strongest resolve to win will force resolution in their favour. We respect this mechanism. If that is the approach that labour and management want to take, we respect it. It is not a mature approach, but we live in a free country and that should certainly be considered.

In the case of the west coast ports, however, labour disputes are unique for a couple of reasons. One is that the federal government does not allow labour and management to actually carry the resolution process to the point where there is a disruption and it gets into a replacement labour situation or the banning of it. It passes back to work legislation as part of that. That has taught us that there is an innocent third party that is damaged economically. For that reason, there has been great pressure to find a better way to resolve management and labour disputes than through strike or lockout actions and subsequently through the use of scab labour or the banning of that same labour.

We have suggested that what has been working and has even been legislated by the House is the use of final offer selection arbitration. I would be more encouraged if my colleague had brought forward legislation that would take us from sandbox diplomacy with regard to labour relations and move it to a more mature ground, such as that of the final offer selection arbitration process.

The cost of the west coast ports disruption is in the hundreds of millions of dollars. The direct cost of the 1994 dispute was over $125 million. The indirect cost in the loss of future contracts was over $250 million. According to the Minister of Human Resources Development, the threatened grain sales could amount to $500 million.

Having outlined these problems, we did not leave the people in the lurch. We decided we had to do something constructive about this. We suggested the final offer selection process. It is a tried and true process. It is not a brand new idea. In fact, the process has been legislated in this House.

• (1900)

Perhaps it could have an expanded role beyond some of the essential services, such as west coast ports and national railways. It could be accepted by labour and management more readily, rather than going the route of replacement workers or a ban on replacement workers.

This is how final offer selection arbitration works. If, and only if, the union and the employer cannot make an agreement by the conclusion of the previous contract, the following measures are immediately put into place without work disruption. If there is no work disruption that means there are no replacement workers and that step has been precluded altogether.

The union and the employer are requested to provide the name of a person they would jointly recommend as a arbiter. The union and the employer are required to submit to the arbiter a list of matters agreed on and a list of matters still under dispute. For the disputed issues, each party is required to submit final offer for settlement and the arbitrator then selects either the final offer submitted by the trade union or the final offer submitted by the employer. In the event that one party does not submit a final offer, then the other side's offer is automatically accepted and the arbitrator's decision is binding on both parties.

This is the direction in which we believe labour and management relations should be going. It is the way to more maturely settle management–labour disputes. It precludes having to use replacement labour or banning replacement labour altogether. It prevents work disruptions. It prevents loss of pay for the workers. The collective bargaining process is still in place. It is still allowed to take its full course. The parties are brought together to resolve their disputes more quickly, more fairly, more equitably and more harmoniously.

I would ask the hon. member to consider when he brings future legislation to the House this as a third option which might be superior to others that have been considered.

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Serré (Timiskaming—French River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on Bill C–317 introduced by the hon. member for Manicouagan.

This bill proposes to amend the Canada Labour Code and the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

The purpose of this bill is, first, to prohibit the hiring of persons to replace employees of an employer under the Canada Labour Code or of the public service who are on strike or locked out and, second, to ensure that essential services are maintained in the event of a strike or lockout in a crown corporation or in the public service.

Although this bill proposes to amend the Canada Labour Code as well as the Public Service Staff Relations Act, I will deal only with the amendments to the Canada Labour Code.

Furthermore, I want to examine two aspects of staff relations I find significant: the use of replacement workers and the maintenance of essential services in the event of a strike or lockout.

It is not the first time that such issues have been raised in the House. Politicians must have raised them often. The spokesmen for employers and unions expressed their views quite forcefully. And industrial relations experts from our universities have tried to explain to us the consequences of our decisions in this area.

The problems concerning the use of replacement workers and essential services are not easy to solve because what is involved is people's livelihoods and rights, as well as society's legitimate expectations. We are asked, as membres of Parliament, to decide if restricting the rights of one group is in the public interest. We are also asked to strike a balance between the rights of employers and those of employees. Whatever legislative action we take, one group will feel that it is being wronged, that its rights are being denied.

Therefore, it is essential not to make hasty decisions on these issues. As I said, members have raised them often. It is all to their credit that they did not act impulsively and incoherently. I believe, however, that this bill's time has not yet come.

• (1905)

As the hon. member probably knows, the government has undertaken a complete review of part I of the Canada Labour Code. That part defines the framework for industrial relations and sets the rules for collective bargaining in federally regulated industries.

It applies to areas like rail and road transportation, pipelines, air and sea transportation, longshoring, grain handling, banking and broadcasting, as far as they concern interprovincial or international activities. Some crown corporations, like Canada Post, are also subject to the code.

For more than 20 years, the Canada Labour Code provisions on labour relations have not been reviewed. However, the collective bargaining process has changed tremendously during that time. Due to globalization, deregulation, technological change, and work environment restructuring, many requirements must now be met.

The government is holding major consultations with management and labour organizations, as well as with academics. Many concerned citizens have written to give their opinion on labour relations.

The task force examining part I of the Code must report to the minister by December 15, 1995. Certain complex and difficult aspects have been looked at already, particularly the use of replacement workers in legal work stoppages and the question of essential services. These are highly volatile issues, particularly the issue of replacement workers.

At the present time, the Canada Labour Code does not forbid the use of replacement workers but it does offer some measure of protection to workers on strike. The employer may not take disciplinary measures against an employee who takes part in a legal work stoppage or who refuses to perform the duties of another employee who is taking part in a legal work stoppage.

As well, according to Canada Labour Relations Board regulations, employees are entitled to resume their positions after the strike is over and to have priority over any other person who has been hired to replace them. In the United States, there is no measure of protection against hiring replacement workers. Employers are in fact even permitted to hire permanent replacement workers, although President Clinton is working to put a stop to this practice.

Here in Canada, several provinces have passed legislation to limit the use of replacement workers in legal strikes. Those who favour a measure to prohibit the use of replacement workers feel that, when collective bargaining breaks down, the parties will be motivated to reach compromises by the economic difficulties they face.

However, when an employer continues to operate his business during a strike through the use of replacement workers, he loses the motivation to bargain. Work stoppages last longer, and tension on the picket lines increases.

Some claim that, in Quebec, where the use of replacement workers has been banned since 1978, violence on the picket line has dropped. Others say that using replacement workers poisons labour relations and discourages employees from joining the union; they know they can be easily replaced during a strike, and consequently they doubt that belonging to a union would be of any use. This is especially true of companies using untrained low paid workers.

To those who say that banning the use of replacement workers would tip the scale in favour of workers, unionists and the like reply that globalization is already tipping the scale in favour of employers. Those who do not support banning the use of replacement workers say that it could discourage new investments and drive some companies to the United States where there is no law to this effect.

Those who oppose such legislation also maintain that most businesses under federal jurisdiction are infrastructure industries. Therefore, if these businesses have to stop all operations because they cannot hire replacement workers, the whole economy will suffer and we will have to use back to work legislation more often.

To those who say that the banning of replacement workers would reduce tension and violence on picket lines, those who oppose the banning reply that labour legislation is not the appropriate tool for solving this problem. They think that the government should turn its attention to those who commit these acts of violence.

This is obviously a very difficult problem, and it will not be easy to reconcile the two sides. It is therefore absolutely essential to continue to talk, to consult each other, to do research, to discuss and to think.

The comprehensive review of the code undertaken by the government should be allowed to continue before amendments can be submitted to the House for approval.

The issue of essential services is also very complex. Coming up with an exact definition of essential services is no small task. In his bill, our colleague seems to establish a direct link between essential services and services provided by crown corporations. Consequently, crown corporations would be covered by provisions governing essential services, while private companies offering the same services would not.

To conclude, I would just like to remind the House that a thorough review of the code has been undertaken by the federal government and that the two points raised by our colleague will be considered as part of this review. It would therefore be premature to adopt such a bill while the code is under review.

Given the complexity and importance of the points raised, it would be wise to wait until this review has been completed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 93, the order is dropped to the bottom of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

[English]

It being 7.13 p.m., the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24.

(The House adjourned at 7.13 p.m.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, October 18, 1995

The House met at 2 p.m.

Prayers

STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

[English]

MINING

Mr. Gordon Kirkby (Prince Albert—Churchill River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the member of Parliament for Prince Albert—Churchill River and the chair of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Natural Resources, I extend my congratulations to the citizens and town council of Creighton, Saskatchewan today. They have passed an important resolution supporting the Keep Mining in Canada campaign and the industry's 10–point plan to create a healthy investment climate for mining in Canada.

Creighton is the 132nd community across Canada to adopt such a resolution to demonstrate its support for a continued, thriving mining industry in Canada. The health of these 132 local economies depends significantly on the health of the mining sector.

The 132 resolutions show that these towns care deeply about the future of the mining industry and I for one applaud the town of Creighton and all Canadians who care about working together to ensure a healthy mining sector.

* * *

[Translation]

MINING INDUSTRY

Mr. Bernard Deshaies (Abitibi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Keep Mining in Canada campaign is moving today to Ottawa. I would like to salute the presence among us of mining industry representatives who have come to see the government in action. Or rather, I should say, in inaction.

The Liberal government had promised to streamline the regulatory maze facing the mining industry. Nothing has been done. The Liberals were committed to improving the flow through share system, but nothing has been done in that area either.

Despite the federal government's inaction, Toronto–based Falconbridge recently announced that $500 million would be invested in Northern Quebec, which will create hundreds of jobs.

The proposed investment shows that the prospect of a yes vote does not scare investors from the rest of Canada. Better yet, it demonstrates the potential and vitality of the mining sector in Quebec.

Just imagine how this sector will grow once Quebec becomes sovereign.

* * *

[English]

THE LATE ERIC REILLY

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this past Monday I was saddened to learn of the death of a great Canadian and a constituent of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt.

Eric Reilly knew this country well. He was politically wise and his efforts are well known in my riding as a Reform pioneer, an organizer, a man who introduced scores of new members to the Reform Party of Canada. He did this for the love of his country and for the future of his children, his grandchildren and their children.

Eric was a fourth generation Canadian born in Dauphin, Manitoba 82 years ago. He passed away peacefully on October 16, 1995. Eric Reilly is survived by his loving wife of over 50 years, Nora, four children and eight grandchildren.

During the last months of Eric's life he wrote his autobiography The Life of Reilly, tracing his early years. But his greatest memories were of his family. He wrote:

> The only thing you have left, regardless of how much money you have accumulated, is your family. I will be leaving a fortune.

To Nora Reilly and the family the House offers our sincerest condolences.

* * *

LIBRARIES

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker, local libraries across the country will suffer if the proposed privatization of the Canada Communication Group is put in place by the government. Libraries are concerned that the depository program operated by the Canada Communication Group may be in danger.

S. O. 31

Relaying government information to the general public has always been a part of the public library's mandate. The partnership between government information services and the public library system has been successfully in place for over 100 years. It would be most unfortunate if communications between the government and the people of Canada should be endangered.

With the privatization of CCG, government documents will become expensive and difficult to obtain.

For the sake of providing information to Canadians, I ask the government to consider retaining the publishing function of CCG while giving up the responsibility for printing.

* * *

MINING

Mr. Stan Dromisky (Thunder Bay—Atikokan, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today I rise to pay tribute to the Canadian mining industry. Canada is the third largest mining nation in the world and the world's largest producer of uranium, zinc and potash. Almost 80 per cent of Canada's mineral production is exported.

Mining is the mainstay of employment in over 115 communities in Canada. For every 10 jobs created in the mining industry, 8 more jobs are indirectly created. For every dollar spent on mining research and development, there is a $3 benefit to the Canadian economy.

Over the past two years the demand for nickel has jumped 20 per cent. Fortunately Canadians have the resource, the workforce and the expertise to meet this anticipated demand.

It is for these reasons that we must work together in a co–operative spirit to foster an environment in which the mining industry may continue to flourish in this great country of ours.

* * *

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Canada is consistently rated as one of the best nations in the world in which to live. The United Nations ranked us number one twice in the last three years. A recent private sector ranking of cities around the world ranked four Canadian cities in the top twelve.

All around the globe are people who yearn for the rights and freedoms, not to mention the peace and personal security, we enjoy as Canadians. We are incredibly fortunate to live in a country founded on the principles of freedom and democracy.

As an immigrant to this great country I find it hard to believe anyone, let alone descendants of the first Fathers of Confederation, would ever consider leaving it.

Quebecers should take a good hard look at the state of other countries around the world before they decide to separate from this one.

* * *

[Translation]

FRANCO–ONTARIANS

Mr. Brent St. Denis (Algoma, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity to attend the annual convention of the Association canadienne–française de l'Ontario (Rive–nord) and the 20th anniversary of "L'étoile d'or" seniors' club in Elliott Lake.

• (1405)

As always, the members, volunteers and directors did a good job of representing the Franco–Ontarians in our region. As always, they have shown that the French fact is still very strong throughout Northern Ontario because the francophones in our region have great love and esteem for the distinctive features and wealth of their culture and heritage.

There is no need for Quebec to leave Canada in order to preserve the French culture. To the contrary, we believe that the French culture will have a better chance of surviving in a united Canada, as my friends from the ACFO and the seniors' club have demonstrated.

* * *

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance contends that all the evils in the world will befall a sovereign Quebec and one million jobs will be lost.

We will recall that the minister himself, along with his present government colleagues, opposed the free trade agreement with the United States because, as reported in the June 21, 1988 Hansard, it would have "—a negative impact on many industries and communities and because it will jeopardize the Canadian economic and social structure as well as Canada's political independence".

In fact, as we know, the FTA created thousands of jobs in Canada and gave a tremendous boost to our exports.

The no side, and the Liberal Party of Canada in particular, have always used fear as an argument against progress. On October 30, Quebecers will oppose them by saying yes to sovereignty.

* * *

[English]

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this morning's headline reads: "Probe into contracts given to bureaucrat's relatives miffs Dingwall". Apparently the minister is unhappy with the lack of action taken against bureaucrats who were caught giving government work to friends and relatives.

The minister should know how internal probes feel by now. This summer he asked his employees to clear him of charges of steering lucrative contracts to a campaign contributor who just happened to be the golfing buddy of the Prime Minister.

The internal whitewash declared the minister clean even though a letter from the minister's office blatantly directed a government agency to do business with this sole bidder and then asked the agency to confirm progress.

We know how internal probes feel. Take two aspirins and call the ethics counsellor in the morning. We know how that feels too. It is not very satisfying over here.

* * *

BILL S–9

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, do we as members of Parliament and does the public generally have any idea what Bill S–9 is all about?

At a time when funding for Canadian colleges, universities and institutes is being reduced through cuts in transfer payments, the House is about to pass legislation today that will see Canadian taxpayers funding United States universities and colleges.

Yes, Canadian taxpayers will be able to support American colleges and universities. Bill S–9 will enable Canadians to donate funds to any college or university in the United States and then be able to deduct these contributions on their tax returns. Canadians will now be able to donate money to Harvard, Stanford, UCLA or Eastern Arkansas State College and then deduct these contributions on their Canadian tax returns.

Why are Canadians being asked to subsidize U.S. colleges and universities at the same time when support for Canadian post–secondary institutions are being seriously underfunded?

* * *

[Translation]

FRANCOPHONE COMMUNITIES

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was very impressed by an ad placed by the francophone community of Alberta in the Wednesday edition of Le Soleil two weeks ago.

What it said reflected the concerns of French speaking communities across Canada. Canada is recognized around the world as a bilingual country where both English and French are spoken. The future of the French language in Canada would be seriously threatened in a divided country. It is obvious.

Francophones were among the founders of cities like Moncton, Winnipeg, Regina and Edmonton. The voyageurs who discovered new territories and the settlers who farmed this new land are but a few examples of this. We must not break the ties between Quebec and francophone communities in the other Canadian provinces. Together, we are stronger, much stronger.

I will conclude by quoting the French Canadian Association of Alberta and saying, on behalf of all francophone communities in Canada, that the French language has a place in Canada, and so does Quebec.

* * *

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the yes side has a real problem refraining from excluding various groups when it discusses who is a true Quebecer and who is not.

• (1410)

The recent controversial comments made by the Bloc Quebecois leader concerning the low birth rate among whites were echoed once again in the separatist camp.

Mr. Emmanuel Marcotte, president of the yes committee for the Outaouais region, said: "It is a fact, it is a white race. I mean it is a fact. Let us call a spade a spade. We are white people. We are not yellow and we are not green. We are white. You do not like the word race, but that is the truth".

These comments follow a long series of discriminatory and racist statements made by the yes side. On October 30, Quebec will say no to intolerance and to exclusion.

* * *

FRANCOPHONES OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Mr. Paul DeVillers (Simcoe North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, according to the Bloc Quebecois, French speaking people outside Quebec are all condemned to assimilation unless Quebec separates.

That reasoning is all the more insulting because it is unsound. Today, there are seven million French speaking people in Canada, out of a total population of 27 million, which means about 25 per cent of all Canadians. Should the yes side win, there would be one million French speaking people in Canada out of a total population of 20 million, or five per cent of Canadians.

Separatists are prepared to jeopardize the remarkable progress that we have made over the last 30 years to protect and promote French in Canada. Separation would result in the worst geopolitical setback for French in North America since 1759.

French speaking people from all regions of the country, including Quebec, know very well that there is strength in numbers and that a French speaking community which comprises Quebec is the best guarantee that French will blossom in this country.

QUEBEC ECONOMY

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in his speech to Quebec industrial commissioners the Minister of Finance for Canada predicted apocalyptically that sovereignty would jeopardize a million Quebec jobs. Finding the estimates of the leader of the no committee not catastrophic enough for his taste, the finance minister padded them by multiplying Daniel Johnson's estimates by ten.

It is worrisome and unacceptable to see such irresponsible statements made by the person who manages the enormous federal debt. We hope that the minister does not use equally farfetched estimates for his economic and budget forecasts, something one might well wonder about since the Minister of Finance has deferred his economic and budget statement until after the referendum.

What is he afraid of? Is he afraid to report to Quebecers now on his administration?

* * *

[English]

MINING

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, representatives of the mining industry and mining communities are in Ottawa as part of their Keep Mining in Canada campaign. I bid them welcome.

Although mining contributes greatly to the economy, the sad fact is that today the Canadian mining industry is in serious trouble. Domestic mining exploration expenditures for 1992 valued at $385 million were at their lowest levels since 1967. Even with the improvements in the past two years they are still only expected to reach $675 million this year, well below the $800 million level generally regarded as the threshold required to maintain reserves.

As a prospector and mining consultant, I want to assure the House that it is not easy to drive prospectors out of the bush. It has taken many years of wrong headed federal government policies to do that. Major changes must be made.

I ask my hon. colleagues to give a sympathetic ear to Keep Mining in Canada representatives, not just this week but all year round.

* * *

[Translation]

FRANCOPHONES OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette-Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it was paradoxical, to say the least, to see the separatist member for Rimouski—Témiscouata trying to make political gains at the expense of francophones outside Quebec, when she has missed no opportunity to run them down and attack their credibility.

March 14, on the program Ontario 30, she had the following to say about the Association des communautés francophones et acadienne: "To my mind, it is very clear that the federation has been bought off". The next day she told Le Devoir: "Our message to francophones outside Quebec is clear. Leave us alone to make our decision and mind your own business".

Quebecers have the survival of French in Canada at heart and they will not allow the separatist agenda to threaten the existence of francophone communities outside Quebec. This coming October 30, Quebec will say no to the abandonment of francophones elsewhere in Canada.

* * *

• (1415)

FRANCOPHONES OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Mr. Raymond Bonin (Nickel Belt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday certain Bloc members spoke in this House in an attempt to have us believe that francophones outside Quebec would be better protected by a sovereign Quebec. The hon. member for Rimouski—Témiscouata stated: "The status quo is untenable for the survival and development of the French fact in North America; only a sovereign Quebec can enable us to work toward this".

I feel it is appropriate to remind the official opposition, along with the hundreds of thousands of francophones outside Quebec, that one of the first decisions taken by the Parti Quebecois after its election was to close Quebec's office in Edmonton. According to the PQ minister the reason for this decision was financial. On October 30, Quebecers will not abandon francophones outside Quebec, and that is why they will vote no.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, in an apocalyptic speech to Quebec's industrial commissioners, the finance minister predicted one million jobs would be lost the day after a win by the yes side, thus upsetting a number of people in the audience, who obviously felt uncomfortable with these outlandish claims. The minister added that according to him, it was a conservative estimate and that it might even be more than one million.

My question is directed to the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. Would such farfetched statements not seriously compromise the credibility of the finance minister and are they not a definite indication that panic has struck the federal side?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the finance minister was right. He said there are one million jobs in Quebec that are affected by export industries, including those that export to the rest of Canada, and that Quebec's separation would create considerable problems in this area.

What he said was perfectly true and is supported by the statistics. It is an indication of the extremely negative economic consequences of Quebec's separation.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs not agree that his colleague in the Finance Department has gone too far by taking such an irresponsible approach, since his responsibility and first duty as finance minister is to avoid any statements that might cause a negative reaction on the financial markets?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the finance minister also has a duty to point out what would really happen if Quebec separated.

In his role as finance minister, he has an obligation to point out that separation will not only cost us hundreds of thousands of jobs, as the leader of the no committee said, but also that many jobs would be affected by changes occurring subsequent to separation, and particularly by the fact that, as the finance minister pointed out, Quebec would have to renegotiate its entry in NAFTA and the successor organization to GATT.

These are aspects that will create substantial economic problems in Quebec and, once again, the finance minister has a duty to point this out to Quebecers.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs not realize that the finance minister's apocalyptic speech, which was actually received with some scepticism by industrial development advisers, gets us nowhere and is in fact oddly similar to the speeches they made on free trade a few years ago, and which subsequently turned out to be all wrong?

• (1420)

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the supporters of the yes committee, which includes the Bloc Quebecois, would have Quebecers believe that separation will take place without a hitch, without any negative economic consequences, without any impact on Quebec's relations with the rest of Canada, the United States and Mexico.

That is not true, and it is not enough to wave a magic wand and say "Poof! Let the problems vanish!" for them to vanish.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Massé: The truth is that separation will create tremendous problems, it will affect investment in Quebec, jobs and exports. Whatever the Bloc and the PQ say, it is important to get the truth out and that Quebecers know on October 30 what the real consequences will be of separation.

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs.

In an effort to add weight to his apocalyptic speech, the Minister of Finance claimed that business in Quebec would no longer be able to export to the United States, as if a veritable great wall of China was going to be built around Quebec.

Will the minister not acknowledge that, the day after a yes vote, American and Canadian businesses will not want to lose their privileged access to Quebec markets and that this unavoidable reality makes the apocalyptic scenario of the Minister of Finance completely ridiculous?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that there is no guarantee at all of this in the event a yes vote.

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister should know that the Americans will be looking for stability in their trading with Canada and Quebec the day after a yes vote.

Does the minister not agree that nothing will better ensure the stability that the United States, and Canada as well, will be looking for than Quebec's early entry into NAFTA, as a number of American experts have already pointed out.

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, only a no vote will ensure Canada's economic and commercial stability.

Today, the figures are coming out. In the month of August, Canada had an all time record volume of foreign trade.

[English]

In the month of August there was the highest ever increase in real exports from Canada to countries around the world. The best way to protect the interests of Quebecers and Canadians in selling our goods around the world is to keep Canada together.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the unavoidable reality of health care financing is that federal financial support of health care is declining in absolute terms. Under this government, federal funding has fallen to 22 per cent of the overall health care bill, with $7 billion in cuts in health care transfers projected.

The provinces are wondering, the Canadian people are wondering, how the minister expects the provinces to replace the health care transfers she is withdrawing. She says they cannot charge the patients. She is against facility fees and she does not want private capital involved.

Is the minister therefore proposing that the provinces impose additional health care taxes to replace the federal medicare funding she is withdrawing?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can explain to the hon. member what was contained in last February's budget. We will have a combined transfer called the Canada health and social transfer which, yes, will be cut. It includes not only health care, but many other services.

Let us look at this in the proper context. For instance, in education, social programs and health, expenditures amount to about $100 billion in one year. Next year the cut will be in the neighbourhood of 3 per cent or slightly less. While it will be a challenge to manage this, we do believe that a less than 3 per cent cut is manageable.

• (1425)

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I know when the minister took this job they told her there would be no math, but there is.

There are only four sources of health care financing: federal transfers, patient contributions, private capital and provincial tax dollars. The minister is reducing the federal transfers. She is against the patient contributions. She is against the private capital. Therefore the only other source to replace the federal transfers is provincial tax increases.

If the minister is against all these things in reducing the transfers, will she not admit that she is in effect telling the provinces to get the additional revenue through provincial tax increases? Yes or no?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat again what has been stated by all health economists across the country: It is not more money that is needed in the system; it is a different way of spending.

What the hon. member is suggesting is the easy way out: a U.S. two–tier style system, one where the rich get the best treatment and for the rest of Canadians thank you, it is too bad.

We are challenging all Canadians to work together to embrace those values which mean that we all get the same kind of access based on need. It is first class service that we want for everyone.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Constitution assigns responsibility for health care to the provinces. The federal government only gets involved through the exercise of its spending power which is now declining. The minister is the first federal Minister of Health to preside over annual reductions in federal transfers to the provinces for health care which is resulting in closing beds, waiting lines and friction with the provinces.

Will the minister acknowledge that there are now distinct limits to the federal power over health care policy? Will she tell the House how those limits will affect her dealings with the provinces of Canada?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we continue to transfer considerable dollars to the provinces. As long as we transfer dollars to the provinces, we can ask that they respect certain principles. We say to them, yes, manage the system. We are giving them as much leeway as possible. We are very flexible but flexibility does not mean tearing up the Canada Health Act.

This government stands for something which is valuable and which all Canadians stand for. Reform Party members are the only ones who believe in tearing up the Canada Health Act.

* * *

[Translation]

STABILIZATION PROGRAM

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs.

After trying in vain for a reimbursement of $127 million for fiscal year 1991–92 under the stabilization program, Quebec is forced to appeal to the Federal Court in order to win its claim. Unperturbed, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs responded cynically and arrogantly that it was perfectly normal for Quebec to apply to the courts. Are we to understand that the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs considers it normal for Quebec to have to apply to the courts to obtain what Ottawa has owed it for the past four years? Is this what they call flexible federalism?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, flexible federalism in recent years has worked very well through negotiations with the various provinces. Specifically, for example, thanks to our action plans with nine provinces in Canada, I have signed—and I will leave it to them to guess which province has not signed—we have reached 64 agreements with the provinces, including a dozen with Quebec, before the election of the Parti Quebecois, but afterwards, zip.

• (1430)

So, in terms of negotiations, clearly we resolve most of our problems through negotiation. As for this particular problem, Ms. Beaudoin has already come and presented her problem. In our opinion, there is nothing owing, nothing to pay. The regulations are clear: the Province of Quebec, in this case, is not entitled to payment, and we have told Quebec that we were prepared to let it go to court, that we would provide whatever assistance it needed to go to court and that it should get a decision from a court of law. This is the normal process.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the fact there were a number of agreements before the arrival of the Parti Quebecois not mean that the principal supporters of a no vote, with Mr. Johnson as a fine representative in Quebec, accepted any old thing from the federal government? This is why there were agreements. We, however, stand firm—that is the difference.

How does the minister explain Quebec's receiving only 8 per cent to date of the funds from this federal stabilization program, when Ontario has received six times as much, that is, 44 per cent?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I should point out that the Province of Quebec has done fairly well in dealings with the federal government, because, for example, according to the study by George Mathews, one of the Le Hir studies, Quebec pays only 21 per cent of federal and other taxes, but receives 26 per cent of spending.

So, when we look at the whole picture, we see clearly that Quebec receives a much larger share for valid reasons. Stabilization payments are made when there is a shortfall. The shortfall depends on all sorts of things that have to do with economic conditions and that are therefore subject to them and not to a system of sharing or of percentages between provinces.

* * *

[English]

HEALTH CARE

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the health minister is fond of saying health care should not depend on the size of one's wallet. What about the size of the waiting list? For a hip replacement in Manitoba it is 61 weeks; 1,200 Ontarians waiting for heart bypasses; a 44–day delay in radiation for breast cancer treatment, three times longer than the medical college says is acceptable. People are dying on these waiting lists.

When will the minister even admit there is a serious problem with the health care system and that she is causing the violation of the principle of accessibility in the Canada Health Act?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I suggest the hon. member deal directly with the provinces when it comes to waiting lists. She used two examples in her question, one respecting heart bypass surgery.

There has been an announcement I believe from Ontario that it will be shortening that list. It will be transferring more money into that area. Recently there was another announcement in Ontario of a new centre for cancer treatment which will shorten the line for breast cancer treatment.

That is what happens in a system that has everyone in it. Public pressure asks governments to transfer funds to where they are most needed. We think that is the way it has to be. That is how we have been well served in the past and that is how we should continue to be served.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, so yes, she is admitting accessibility is being violated and that these lines are getting shorter because people are going to the States, not because the health care system is getting any better.

The health minister should open her eyes and take a good look at the health care system. If she did she would see these massive reductions in hospital closures and Canadians buying American waiting list insurance to stay alive. This is ridiculous.

• (1435)

What specific action does she plan to take to reduce the waiting lists to ensure Canadians are getting the most advanced, the most effective and the most timely medical attention available?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I answered that question in my previous answer. I remind the hon. member our medicare system has received applause from around the world because it is first class.

The idea that we should move to a U.S. style two–tier system is unacceptable to every member of my caucus. All the premiers say they support the Canada Health Act. Ministers of health from across the provinces support the Canada Health Act. Medical associations, nurses associations, hospital associations and the people of Canada support the Canada Health Act. The only exception is the Reform Party.

[Translation]

CHILD CARE SERVICES

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

It seems that it is the minister's intention to release a national child care strategy within a few weeks. Here again, this is a reform that is ready but will not be made public until after the referendum.

Are we to understand that the reason for the minister's refusal to make his strategy on child care services known before the referendum is to avoid having to confirm his intention of imposing national standards on Quebec in an area of provincial jurisdiction?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, once again the hon. member for Mercier is in a bit of a time warp in a number of respects. We have already indicated to the provinces and to other partners that we are prepared to cost share child care. We had a major meeting of deputies almost a year ago at which we offered to pay 50 per cent of the cost of new spaces.

Fortunately a very important initiative was taken up by the First Nations people. We are almost ready to conclude an agreement with the First Nations Assembly for 6,000 new child care spaces sponsored by our First Nations people. We hope to have that concluded in a couple of weeks.

Because certain provinces are now engaging in restricting child care, I simply wrote to the Ontario minister to remind him the federal government is willing to be a partner in sharing the cost of child care so these spaces do not have to be closed.

I hope the hon. member will help carry that message because child care is very important to many Canadians.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister is quick with his irony, but he has not answered the question.

Is he committed to not making Quebec's compliance with federal standards a condition for funding of child care services?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we made it very clear that we are prepared to provide cost sharing over a five-year period and that it is the jurisdiction of the provinces to decide how that money would be allocated. I am simply waiting for a response. I am not trying to be quick witted but it takes effort when dealing with Bloc questions.

The provinces make these decisions. I want to ensure we can provide, as we do in many other areas, a national response so we can share and pool our resources to ensure areas with fewer resources are considered. That is why I took some interest today in the minister of employment in Quebec when she talked about totally fragmenting the national unemployment insurance service for Quebecers. It would put at risk thousands upon thousands of Quebec workers who would no longer have access to a national unemployment insurance program.

* * *

• (1440)

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the health minister does not want U.S. style health care and that is good; neither do we. However, we want what Canadians want, choice in health care as in Sweden, Denmark, England and many other countries. Those countries all respect choice.

Why will the health minister not offer Canadians choice beyond medicare?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have the best choice of any country in the world. They get the best services no matter who they are, no matter where they live, whether or not they have money.

It is determined by the degree or the severity of their needs. That is the way it should be. That is the way Canadians want it.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, there are only three countries in the world that do not offer choice beyond medicare: North Korea, Cuba and now Canada, thanks to the health minister.

Will the minister listen to the appeal of Canadians for choices beyond cutbacks, for choices beyond waiting lists, for choices beyond line up, shut up and check out?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member exaggerates when he tries to compare us with Cuba and such countries when we have the best medicare system in the world.

The hon. member would like us to give people a choice. Is it something like the choice to buy a box seat at the SkyDome? Having an illness is not like going to a baseball game.

We believe we need the best for people as they need it, and the very best is what we have had in Canada. We will continue to support that.

[Translation]

MILK INDUSTRY

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of Agriculture.

According to an unsigned study referred to by the chairman of the no committee Daniel Johnson, Quebec would lose no less than a third of its 11,000 dairy farms by voting yes. This doomsday scenario was immediately denied by Claude Lafleur, director of the Union des producteurs agricoles and labelled by him as "catastrophist, extremist and improbable".

Will the minister admit that it is in the interest of producers and the milk processing industry to reach an agreement with Quebec in order to preserve the system of supply management, particularly as protection against American competition, as all those involved in this sector are aware?

[English]

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri-Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the remarks made yesterday by Mr. Johnson and Mr. Vallières in Quebec with respect to the earlier studies issued by Minister Le Hir were very solid and very credible criticism of Mr. Le Hir's reports which were a total distortion of the true picture.

This criticism has come not only from Mr. Johnson and Mr. Vallières. It has come from several prominent Quebec university professors. It has come from U.S. trade policy experts like Mr. Chip Roh and it has come most recently, quoted in today's La Presse, from Mr. Yvon Proulx, the chief economist of the UPA.

• (1445)

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister should read the magazine L'Actualité because that information comes from an unsigned Quebec Liberal party document. The authors are even ashamed to acknowledge that they wrote it—that is Liberals for you.

An hon. member: Get some information.

Mr. Bellehumeur: This is disinformation.

Does the minister acknowledge that Canada will negotiate to preserve the supply management system, for if the laws of the marketplace were to apply we Quebecers would come out on top because we in Quebec have the production and the most profitable producers—that is the truth.

[English]

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri-Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today Quebec enjoys great strength and stability in its dairy sector, with some 12,000 commercial dairy farms, $1.3 billion in cash receipts from milk production, milk quota values in excess of $2 billion, 20,000 jobs in rural Quebec, 83 dairy processing plants, 7,400 processing jobs in those plants, and 47 per cent of the Canadian national industrial milk quota. All that is to the advantage of Quebec because of Quebec's participation in the Canadian supply management system.

* * *

MINING

Mr. Benoît Serré (Timiskaming—French River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Natural Resources.

The Canadian mining industry is one of the key sectors of our economy, creating over 300,000 direct jobs on which 150 communities depend.

An hon. member: Do you speak French?

[Translation]

Mr. Serré: Certainly, we are bilingual in Ontario. We speak both languages.

Could the minister indicate to the House the principal measures initiated by our government to support and promote the development of a dynamic mining industry in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let me reassure the hon. member that the government understands the importance of mining to the nation and to our economy. We are committed to ensuring its ongoing prosperity and sustainability.

Mr. Stinson: Then quit giving them the shaft.

Ms. McLellan: One of the interesting things, for anybody down there who would like to listen, is the fact that when we talk to the mining industry its major concern is regulatory reform.

Our government is committed to reforming regulations applicable to the mining industry. That is why my colleague, the Minister of Industry, has included the mining sector as one of only six to go through substantive accelerated regulatory reform. We are doing that so there is a prosperous mining industry all over the country, including Quebec.

* * *

HEALTH CARE

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health.

Seventy per cent of B.C. residents are already enrolled in private insurance plans to pay for certain services, including long term and extended care. The desire of B.C. residents is choice in medicare.

Why will the minister not acknowledge the desire of B.C. residents and other Canadians in allowing for genuine medicare innovations and reforms through choice?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have the best choice of all. Without having to worry whether or not they can afford it, they can choose which doctor and which hospital. They can choose without undue pressures and financial hardships.

• (1450)

The hon. member speaks of British Columbia. That province agreed with the federal government and was the province that moved most quickly and banned all extra billing, user charges, and facility fees by October 1 of this year.

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

The minister is selective in what she will tolerate. Private insurance plans are tolerated, yet the minister intends to stomp out private clinics. In B.C., private cataract eye clinics have been shut down, forcing seniors to be added to unacceptably long public waiting lists.

Why is the minister discriminating against seniors while permitting other private options to continue? Why the inconsistency?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Canada Health Act says that the provincial plans must cover medically necessary services for the residents in their provinces. That is what is happening. That is what we will ensure continues to happen.

* * *

[Translation]

QUEBEC AGRI–FOOD INDUSTRY

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

Information provided by the federal Department of Agriculture confirms that this department has been particularly remiss in its treatment of Quebec. In 1994–95, the agri–food industry in Quebec received only 10 per cent of Agriculture Canada's budget, although Quebec has more than 21 per cent of Canada's agri–food industry.

Does the minister agree, as confirmed by information provided by the federal department of agriculture, that the way his department's expenditures are budgeted is unfair to Quebec's agri–food industry?

[English]

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): No, Mr. Speaker, I would not make that admission. One has to take into account the entire range of federal policies that apply to agriculture. In some cases those policies provide for grants and contributions, either to producers directly or to producer organizations, marketing systems, institutions and so forth.

Another very valuable form of contribution by the Government of Canada comes in the form of our regulatory system that creates Canadian supply management, and 45 per cent of Quebec agriculture falls within the jurisdiction of the Canadian supply management system, which results in billions of dollars worth of benefits to Quebec and Canadian consumers and producers.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister talks about sectors. My point is that the federal government gives us 10 per cent, although the agri–food industry in Quebec represents 21 per cent of the entire sector.

Since the Liberals came to power, the minister has done nothing about this unfair treatment of the agri–food industry in Quebec.

Would the minister agree that closing the federal agricultural research centre in La Pocatière will merely exacerbate the current situation?

[English]

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. gentleman makes reference to agricultural research. If we were to apply the hard and fast formulae he just suggested to the field of agricultural research, it would result in a cutback with respect to the province of Quebec.

In fact we have 18 national centres of excellence in agricultural research and development in the country. Four of them are located in the province of Quebec, at Ste–Foy, at Saint–Jean–sur–Richelieu, at Lennoxville and at St–Hyacinthe, which is the highest number in the country.

* * *

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, as the discussion goes back and forth with the Minister of Health, I hear her saying that Canadians get the very best choice.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): And we hear the nonsense that goes on over there along with it. That is not very comforting to the families who have lost people waiting in line for health care.

• (1455)

I would like a straightforward answer for a change from the minister. Is the Minister of Health intent on banning all private clinics in Canada? Just a yes or no, nice and simple. Can she answer?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are intent on protecting the principles of the Canada Health Act.

The answer is yes. The answer is yes, we are going to continue to protect the Canada Health Act. Yes, yes, yes, yes.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yes, they are banning all clinics. It is good to have an answer. It is like the answers we get from the minister of public works and the minister of culture.

Why is the minister not demanding that Quebec stop charging facility fees on privately run abortion clinics?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let me come back again to what the letter of January 6 was all about. It concerns all provinces. We are now going into every province and we are determining what is happening in each province. That is what is happening.

If there are facility fees being charged and they are not right in any province then we will move in that direction. Many provinces have indicated that they are now negotiating or are addressing the problem as British Columbia did. That is what it is all about. It is about ensuring equitable access for everyone.

* * *

[Translation]

DAIRY INDUSTRY

Mr. Robert Bertrand (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the separatists seem more interested in winning the referendum at any cost than in dealing with the real problems of Quebec farmers.

My question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Could he explain how being part of Canada benefits dairy farmers in Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity in an earlier answer to outline some very impressive statistics about how the Canadian supply management system benefits the dairy industry in the province of Quebec.

By the very fundamental definition of supply management, the domestic market of a producing country is preserved primarily for the benefit of that country's domestic producers. A separate Quebec would obviously no longer be part of the Canadian domestic market. As a result the dairy industry in Quebec could be placed in very substantial jeopardy.

The clearest, best, strongest answer for preserving all these benefits for the dairy industry in Quebec and for the dairy industry in Canada is a clear and decisive no on October 30.

* * *

[Translation]

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. Last spring, the Bloc Quebecois condemned the blatantly unfair treatment of Quebec by the Department of Justice when professional and special contracts are awarded. In his reply, the minister confirmed our statements, in other words, Quebec is losing out on contracts awarded by the Department of Justice.

Today, could the Minister of Justice explain why Ontario, his own province, gets 80 per cent of the total value of his department's professional and special contracts, while businesses and individuals working under contract in Quebec get only 6 per cent?

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, indeed it was last spring the hon. member put those questions. It was on that occasion that I provided the response and the response remains the same. The Department of Justice, like all departments of government, pursues a policy of open and competitive bidding for all work awarded by contract.

I can tell the hon. member that no matter how the statistics might be used for present partisan purposes, the results and the advantages of the research and the work done at the Department of Justice are shared equally by all Canadians.

* * *

• (1500)

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to come back once again to the question of waiting lists.

It was a cold Friday in January 1980 when my wife was diagnosed with breast cancer. I am very grateful that her life was spared because of the speedy surgery which a very competent surgeon recommended and performed three days after the diagnosis.

Point of Order

My wife now counsels and consoles women in the same situation. They are waiting in line while the government is funding boxes in domes with its infrastructure program. What is the government going to do about that? What should my wife tell these women who are waiting in line while their lives are being threatened?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's wife was well treated when she became ill, thanks to Canada's good medicare system.

Yes, there are challenges and they are not always easy to meet. However, we do not meet them by ripping up something that is very good. They are met by working at protecting the very values which have served Canadians so well.

It is very important that all Canadians continue to have access to the services they need, not just because they can afford to pay extra for them, but because they need them. We have to work very closely with provincial governments, which we are doing. We are going to continue to do that.

It is a question of equity and good access, not of having some get ahead in the line because they can pay more. That is not what is fair. Think of the 38 million Americans who have no insurance at all. What kind of lines are they in?

* * *

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry.

Prescription drugs represent 17 per cent of the total cost of health care in the country. These prices have increased 13 per cent each year over the past eight years due to Bill C–91, which the Liberals opposed in opposition but seem to support in government.

The government can save Canadians nearly $1 billion yearly, simply by doing one thing: repealing Bill C–91 or, at the very least, abolishing the automatic injunction clause of the patented medicines regulations.

Why will the government not stop the pharmaceutical drug manufacturers from ripping off Canadians with usury pricing of prescription drugs?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first let me help the hon. member with some of his statistics because I think he would want to get them right.

First, 15.1 per cent of national health expenditures in the last year for which we have full statistics were for pharmaceuticals. Patented drugs only account for 40 per cent of the pharmaceuticals purchased in those expenditures. In addition, with respect to patented medicines, and this is determined by an independent board, the price increase from 1987 to 1994 was 2.1 per cent per year.

If the hon. member begins to take those statistics into account he might phrase his question a little differently. As he knows, and I have assured the House several times, we are reviewing Canada's drug patent policy. In addition, under Bill C–91 there is a parliamentary review process that will be invoked in 1997.

* * *

[Translation]

POINT OF ORDER

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am happy to note that the hon. member for Roberval is here while I raise this issue.

During question period, my colleague, the hon. member for Timiskaming—French River decided to put a question to a government minister. He chose to do so in English, which is obviously his second language. While he was on his feet, a heckler on the other side of the House asked the hon. member: "Can't you speak French?"

• (1505)

[English]

The Speaker: All the more reason that we have to be ever vigilant in the words we use in the House of Commons. I did not hear the statement. Of course this is not a point of order but I am sure the point made by the government whip has been taken.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order concerning the auditor general's report tabled on October 5, 1995 and referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

I contend that the tabling and referral to the committee of this report is out of order because the report in question contravenes the Auditor General Act and the conventions and prerogatives of the House.

I draw attention to section 5 of the Auditor General Act which defines the position as the "auditor of the accounts of Canada" and section 7(2) which sets out the parameters of the auditor general's reports. This paragraph empowers the auditor general to report that the records of the public accounts were faithfully kept, that expenditures have been made only as authorized by Parliament and with due regard for efficiency, and that due measures are taken to measure the effectiveness of programs.

In his latest report the auditor general has clearly overstepped the legal and customary boundaries of his duties as a servant of the House and in my judgment has interfered with the rights of the House by making politically biased statements. Let me illustrate this claim with some direct quotations from the auditor general's report in question.

In paragraph 9.84 the report states: "We think that Parliament and the public need to focus on debt issues, particularly the amount of debt we carry". The auditor general exists to help Parliament hold the government to account and not to hold Parliament to account for failing to adopt a particular policy. No company of shareholders in the private sector would accept an auditor's report that expressed an opinion about how the shareholders conducted themselves at meetings, rather than help the shareholders assess the management of the company. I contend that neither can we in the House.

The auditor general further infringes on the rights of the House when he writes in paragraph 9.107 concerning the level of public debt:

> Determining a strategy to achieve that vision is something the government and Parliament need to debate and develop a consensus on.

I do not need to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the House does not necessarily exist to create a consensus around a particular economic theory. There are different and differing political theories and different political stances in the House. Therefore I contend that the House exists to hold the government of the day accountable in a way that reflects the diversity of political opinion in the country and that this is not recognized in the auditor general's report.

The duty of the auditor general as set out in law is to aid Parliament in that task by providing technical information about the state of the public accounts to assist members of the House in their debates. It is not to preach to Parliament about what the conclusion of that debate should be.

The same criticism can be applied to paragraph 9.52 of the report which states:

> The reality is that (interest rates) are not lower, and had it been a simple matter of making them lower in the 1980s and 1990s as they were in the previous 20 years, governments would have undoubtedly done so.

I would happily debate this point with anybody in the House, for it is common knowledge that the Bank of Canada under John Crow deliberately chose to dramatically increase interest rates in quest of a zero inflation rate.

My procedural point is that I cannot argue this point with the auditor general because this statement comes in the form of an ex cathedra pronouncement of an auditor who is presumed to provide objective assessments of the public accounts. Yet I can think of no principle of accounting that would allow an auditor to offer such a tendentious historical verdict on the motives of past governments, a verdict which supports a particular political position on what caused our fiscal problems and what should be done about them.

Point of Order

Because the auditor general like yourself, Mr. Speaker, is a servant of Parliament, he should not use the authority of his position to advance political arguments as if they were uncontested accounting principles. His reports must demonstrate the highest degree of political neutrality. He cannot perform the role of auditor as set out clearly in the Auditor General Act if he uses his position to take sides in debates that properly take place in the House. The auditor general has therefore overstepped his legal and customary duties in his latest report.

• (1510)

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to consider two measures to defend the rights of the House to have access to an objective auditing of the public accounts. First, I ask you to rule the tabling of the October 5 report to be out of order and to have you ask that the auditor general submit an amended report that conforms to his duties as set out in the Auditor General Act. Second, I ask you to refer the matter of the terms of reference for auditor general's reports to the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I was not given prior notice of this point of order.

It strikes me as a rather serious challenge by the hon. member that the auditor general should not be independent of government, not be independent of the opinions of the House when he studies the efficiency of the government and the spending of government. Certainly if the auditor general does not have the independence to make suggestions on whether or not governments have acted prudently, we have stripped him of his power and we have stripped him of his reason for being. Therefore I disagree with the hon. member. I think his argument is very weak and should not even be considered in the House.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona has argued with his usual erudition but I submit that even in his wildest dreams he could not have imagined that the point he has raised is really a question of privilege.

I refer Your Honour to—

Mr. Blaikie: A point of order, I said.

Mr. Milliken: A point of order. I thought he said it breached the privileges of the House, Mr. Speaker, and that he wanted it ruled out of order because it breached the privileges of the House, because it interfered with our privilege to manage our financial affairs, the financial affairs of the country.

I turn to citation 24 of Beauchesne's sixth edition where it states:

Parliamentary privilege is the sum of the peculiar rights enjoyed by each House collectively as a constituent part of the High Court of Parliament, and by Members of each House individually, without which they could not discharge their functions.

I submit that in the tabling of this report there has been no impedance with members' functions or their ability to discharge their functions. We have here a situation where the hon. member disagrees with some of the contents of the report. I have no doubt the government disagrees with some of the contents of the report as well. I suspect if I read it all as thoroughly as the hon. member obviously has I would probably disagree with parts of the report.

However the place for him to take his complaints is not to the House to have the report ruled out of order. The auditor general has a right to submit his opinions to the House. He is an officer of the House and that is his duty. Surely the hon. member should go to the public accounts committee and complain about the report if he disagrees with it. Then the public accounts committee would report to the House saying it disagrees with the auditor general's report if the committee agrees. Surely that is where this complaint ought to go.

The hon. member has not raised a point of order or a question of privilege in my submission. He has raised what I can only suggest is a complaint. He disagrees with the report, fine. He should go to the committee and express his disagreement. That is what the committee is for. That is why it has been referred there.

The Speaker: I think a very important point has been raised today. I take under advisement the opinions of the member for Kindersley—Lloydminster and the member for Kingston and the Islands.

I would like to look at this a bit more closely in view of what has been said today and I would like to more inform myself of the particulars. I will reserve a decision on this point and get back to the House when and if it is needed.

Is this on the same point of order? I do not want to get into a debate going back and forth.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to apologize to my colleagues for not having given more notice and for that matter any notice. I would hope that some of the comments that have been made might change when people have an opportunity to think about it.

The very fact the member gets up and says that I disagree with something in the report is the point I am trying to make. The report should be of such a factual nature that there is nothing in it to disagree with. It should be a report on various facts of a technical nature. The fact that I can find something to agree with or somebody else can find something to disagree with is the point I am trying to make about the report.

Nobody elects the auditor general to make these kinds of judgments. I think we have a situation here that—

• (1515)

The Speaker: I appreciate the member's intervention. I am sure he will agree with other members of the House and with me when I say that I would like to reserve my decision on this matter. I would like to inform myself a little more and get back to the House.

I have a point of privilege from the hon. member for Madawaska—Victoria. Does this point of privilege arise from the question period today?

Mrs. Ringuette-Maltais: Yes.

* * *

[Translation]

PRIVILEGE

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette-Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege is in regard to comments that were made during today's oral question period.

When my colleague from Timiskaming—French River asked his question, part of it was in English and part of it in French. As he was starting to formulate his question, we heard the Bloc member for Roberval's comments. This is a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, and I want to thank you for hearing me out. We heard the hon. member for Roberval shout in this House to the hon. member for Timiskaming—French River: "In French, please. In French".

My question of privilege is as follows: Canada has the charter of rights and freedoms and the Official Languages Act.

The Speaker: One moment, please.

A point of order was raised today but I ruled that it was not a point of order.

[English]

I have ruled on that. I was waiting for the hon. member to get to the point of privilege. It would seem to me at least at this point that we are engaging in debate on a decision I have already taken about a point of order.

To this point at least I have not heard any argument that would deem this to be a point of privilege.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: Exchanges take place in the House throughout question period, indeed throughout debate.

I did not hear the statement that was alleged to have been made. Surely we have to be able to tolerate a certain amount of give and take in the House. This is the point I would like to impress on the House. There are going to be times when words may or may not have been used that hon. members say they heard. In my view this is not a point of privilege.

Privilege is about what would impede a person from speaking, from voting, from coming to the House. It was raised as a point of order and I ruled on this as a point of order.

In my view this is the same point and I would like the matter to rest there.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker—

The Speaker: You have the floor.

Mr. Gauthier: We will check up on what was said—

The Speaker: Order, please.

Dear colleague, this is neither a point of order nor a question of privilege, and I would like to leave it at this.

Mr. Gauthier: May I ask a question, please?

The Speaker: I am prepared to hear you on another point of order, but not on this one. I recognize the hon. member for Roberval.

Mr. Gauthier: I rise on a point of order to ask you, Mr. Speaker, since you are here to provide guidance, how, according to standard procedure, I should go about setting the record straight when a member puts words in my mouth that I never said.

I would like to know what to do, so that I can then raise my point of order, Mr. Speaker.

• (1520)

The Speaker: Dear colleague, normally, what would happen is that you would simply rise on a point of order and state that you did not say any such thing. At any rate, I do not want to embark on a long discussion on this matter. So, if you wish to go on record in Hansard, I will allow that, but nothing more.

Mr. Gauthier: Very well, Mr. Speaker, because I respect your decision, and it is truly for that reason that I will comply. For the record, I would just like to say that the words the hon. member for Madawaska—Victoria ascribed to me are incorrect. I never said that, plain and simple.

[English]

The Speaker: We are entering debate and we do not want to go down that road. I have made a ruling. The hon. member wanted clarification. I told him how he could do this. I permitted him to make the one statement which he made. It is on the record and it is clear. I ruled on a point of order earlier and, colleagues, I wish you would accept that point of order.

I have ruled on the point of privilege by saying that it was not a point of privilege. I wish you would accept that. I would like to let this matter rest now where it is.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[Translation]

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to three petitions.

* * *

[English]

NATIONAL CO–OPERATIVE WEEK

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in my capacity as federal minister responsible for co–operatives, I wish to take the opportunity today to recognize and salute National Co–Operative Week and International Credit Union Day in Canada.

Since pioneer times Canadians have found it beneficial to work together toward common goals. The co–operative movement springs from that community effort and involvement.

An important part of our economy, co–ops provide over 133,000 jobs and represent more than $140 billion in assets. Non–financial co–operatives have a volume of business of $20.7 billion. Together, caisses populaires and credit unions represent the fifth largest financial network in Canada.

[Translation]

This year is important for the international co–operative movement, as it marks the 100th anniversary of the International Co–operative Alliance. The ICA represents more than 753 million members from 90 countries. The conference held in Manchester in September was a major event for the international co–operative movement. Revised co–operation principles were adopted that will propel co–ops into the 21st century. In this respect, I think that it would be proper to pay special tribute to Ian MacPherson, from British Columbia, who spearheaded the process.

• (1525)

[English]

Co–operatives are an effective way of providing a wide range of goods and services to their members and to consumers. While many co–operatives operate in urban centres, they have been especially effective in developing businesses and creating employment in rural areas and small communities.

Through co–operation, many Canadians have established new businesses and expanded into new or unique ventures. For example, the Seaway Valley Farmers Energy Co–operative in eastern Ontario will produce ethanol from locally grown grains.

Involvement in co–operatives has helped many thousands of individuals learn new business and management skills. This not only helps them to manage their co–operatives but also gives them the skills to better manage their own enterprises and allows them to grow and expand.

[Translation]

I want to mention how committed our young people are to the co–operative approach. Students have started co–ops in their schools to provide services in areas such as savings, housing, school supplies and computing science and, in some instances, to create summer jobs for themselves.

[English]

I urge all members, in our deliberations today and on every other occasion, to consider the potential of co–operation as a tool to help the country to continue to be a nation that is innovative, dynamic and proud of its accomplishments.

From my home province of Saskatchewan in the west where our people demonstrate a high level of participation in co–operative organizations to Quebec, which also enjoys a high level of co–operative activity, the co–op movement is one very important bond of strength and unity.

I congratulate the Canadian co–operative movement on its achievements and wish it much success in the years to come.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean Landry (Lotbinière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is with great respect for all those who have contributed to the development of co–operatives that I want to emphasize the importance of National Co–Operative Week and of International Credit Union Day.

The co–op movement reflects the values of mutual help and solidarity which are dear to Quebecers and Canadians. In many regions, the co–op movement provided the solution to ensure an harmonious development geared to the needs of the local community. Agricultural co–operatives were among the first to support the economic development of our regions. They provided an efficient and economical tool to ensure that the required services were available for agricultural production. Co–operatives have played, and continue to play, an important role in job creation. They provide over 133,000 jobs to Canadians and Quebecers.

The co–op system has fully shown its usefulness. It is an important component of Quebec's economy. Just think of the strength of the Caisses populaires Desjardins and of the dairy co–operatives. The co–op movement is based on a local community taking charge; by pooling its resources and working as a team, it can be very successful.

This year marks the one hundredth anniversary of the International Co–operative Alliance. It is an opportunity to reflect on the fact that, for decades now, people all over the world have believed in the virtues of the co–op movement and have worked hard to make these known to others.

I congratulate these people, I encourage them to keep up the good work, and I wish them the best of success in their future endeavours.

[English]

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on behalf of my Reform colleagues with regard to National Co–Operative Week and International Credit Union Day.

The co–op movement has a long and proud tradition in my province of Saskatchewan. It has played a significant role in the development of the province, in our nation and lands beyond our borders.

I pause to reminisce for a minute. My father was involved in some of the early co–operative movements. In fact his membership number in the Western Credit and Savings Union in Swift Current, Saskatchewan was 152 which indicates some of the history and grassroots nature of the movement.

• (1530)

Like most people in the prairies and perhaps across Canada, I belong to several co–operatives. Interestingly enough, one of the first meetings I had as a member of Parliament was with the credit union management, members and boards of directors in west central Saskatchewan. It was a very profitable meeting, indeed. They were concerned about federal issues that are dealt with by the Parliament of Canada and they were happy to meet with their MP.

The concept is simple and sensible. A group of consumers or producers band together to strengthen their bargaining position in the buying and selling of products. When members are buying they increase their competitive edge and when they sell they lower their marketing costs.

Co–ops have had their ups and downs, their triumphs and failures, as do most business enterprises, but they have been most successful when they have stayed out of the world of politics and focused on doing business and doing it well. Co–ops are businesses, and their job is to do business effectively for their owners, who are the co–op members, ordinary people who buy and sell.

Today I extend my best wishes to the co–ops and credit unions of Canada and the world. This includes their members, their boards of directors, their employees and their millions of customers.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I seek unanimous consent of the House to speak on behalf of the NDP on this matter.

The Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join with other colleagues in the House who spoke on behalf of their parties in congratulating the credit union movement and the co–op movement on the occasion of National Co–Operative Week and International Credit Union Day.

Needless to say, the New Democratic Party has political roots in the co–op movement, of which all members of the House will be aware. We are very pleased to be able to join in marking this week and this day.

It is important at a time when the language of competition is prevalent to remind ourselves that there is another way of looking at the world. It is a way of looking at the world that is rooted in a very Canadian way of doing things in the co–op movement.

Co–operation is also a good word. Whatever benefits may come from competition, and I would be the first to debate some of them, we ought to realize that co–operation is another way of doing things and one that has been represented very well in the country over the decades by the credit union movement and the co–op movement.

I call upon members of the House and the government to protect this tradition in everything they do. Various things are under attack from various places, whether it is the budget for co–op housing, the attack on the wheat board or various other things, all of which represent manifestations of this co–operative spirit in our political, social and economic history.

I am pleased to join with other colleagues on behalf of the NDP in marking this occasion. I hope we will keep in mind at all times the value of this tradition and the value of advancing it in every way we can.

The Speaker: I received a note during question period about a point of order to be raised by the hon. member for Elk Island. With your permission, I would like to finish the routine business and before we get into the orders of the day I will hear the hon. member's point of order immediately thereafter.

* * *

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATIONS

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34(1) I have the honour to present to the House, in both official languages, the report of the Canada–Europe Parliamentary Association on the fourth annual meeting of the parliamentary assembly of the Organization for Security and Co–operation in Europe, OSCE, held in Ottawa from July 4 to July 8, 1995.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

CANADIAN HERITAGE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Canadian Heritage in relation to its consideration of Bill C–93, an act to amend the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act.

• (1535)

[Translation]

PROCEDURE AND HOUSE AFFAIRS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the 91st report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs regarding the list of members of the Joint Standing Committee of the Library of Parliament and associate members of standing committees. If the House gives its consent, I intend to move that the report be concurred in later today.

[English]

I also have the honour to present the 91st report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs regarding the selection of votable items, in accordance with Standing Order 92.

This report is deemed adopted on presentation.

* * *

BRITISH COLUMBIA TREATY COMMISSION ACT

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–107, an act respecting the establishment of the British Columbia Treaty Commission.

(Motions deemed adopted, bill read the first time and printed.)

* * *

WITNESS PROTECTION ACT

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw my private member's Bill C–206, an act to provide for the protection and relocation of witnesses.

The Speaker: Is it agreed?

Mr. Wappel: Mr. Speaker, I do so for the following brief reasons.

Members will recall that my private member's bill was debated and passed unanimously at second reading in the House of Commons and referred to the justice committee. Since that time my government has brought forward Bill C–78 on exactly the same subject.

In my judgment the bill contains virtually the same items that are in my private member's bill. It is designed to protect and relocate witnesses to crimes in Canada. As such, it seems a waste of time to proceed with two bills with identical material. Accordingly I am quite prepared, with the consent of the House, to have my private member's bill withdrawn.

I ask for unanimous consent of the House that the order of reference to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for the consideration of Bill C–206, an act to provide for the relocation and protection of witnesses, be discharged and the bill withdrawn.

(Order discharged and bill withdrawn.)

* * *

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE AND HOUSE AFFAIRS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think you will find unanimous consent for the following motion.

I move that the 91st report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs, presented to the House earlier this day, be concurred in.

Mrs. Ablonczy: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of information. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could tell the House what the contents of the report are.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, there are name changes for various committees, as I announced when I presented the report. There were changes naming associate members to certain committees and a change in the membership of the Library of Parliament committee. All was approved by the whips of the three parties in the House in accordance with normal practice.

• (1540)

(Motion agreed to.)

* * *

PETITIONS

MINING

Mr. Peter Thalheimer (Timmins—Chapleau, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition signed by 175 people asking Parliament to support the people of 150 communities dependent on mining for their livelihood.

The Government of Canada has a responsibility to encourage investment in mineral exploration and the petitioners are asking that Parliament take action to keep mining in Canada.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by about 50 of my constituents who are in the teaching profession. It has been duly certified pursuant to Standing Order 36 to be in order.

My constituents in the province of Saskatchewan object strongly to the present status of Canada's Young Offenders Act. They feel that the Young Offenders Act has failed to address the issue of youth crime and has negative results in our schools, communities, and society in general.

Therefore they petition the House to enact legislation to significantly toughen the Young Offenders Act as quickly as possible, with a view to making young offenders responsible for their actions, making the names of young offenders public and increasing the severity of consequences for repeat offences.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition that has been circulating all across Canada. This portion of the petition has been signed by a number of Canadians from my riding of Mississauga South.

The petitioners draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession, which has not been recognized for its value to our society. They also state that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families who make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill and the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call upon Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families who decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, the chronically ill, the disabled or the aged.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and present a petition of 28 names on behalf of Nola Newitt, who, along with residents of Rockyford, Strathmore, and Chilliwack, call upon the government to amend the Income Tax Act to provide a child care expense deduction that is available to all families, regardless of the income level of the parents, the amount of the child care expenses incurred or the form of child care chosen.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions today. The first petition contains some 450 signatures from across Canada.

It prays that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law that would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition contains the signatures of approximately 150 people, primarily from the province of Ontario, praying that Parliament act immediately to extend to the unborn child the same protection that is extended to born human beings.

CRTC

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the third petition is in connection with the CRTC and is signed primarily by people from the province of Ontario. They pray and call upon Parliament to ensure that the CRTC recognizes that Canadians do not need to be shocked to be entertained. Foul language, excessive violence and explicit sex are not necessary to provide quality entertainment.

CANADA POST

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions today. Two of the petitions call on Parliament to request the federal minister responsible for Canada Post to consider bringing in legislation requiring all unsolicited mail and flyers to use recyclable materials and post–consumer fibre, and amending the Canada Postal Act so that Canada Post would have to comply with no flyers signs at personal residences, with the exception of material from political parties and charities. The two petitions contain many names.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the third petition calls upon Parliament to act quickly to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and to adopt all necessary measures to recognize the full equality of same sex relationships in federal law.

• (1545)

WITNESS PROTECTION

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure today to present three different petitions from my constituency.

The first is signed by 33 of my constituents who pray that Parliament enact Bill C–206 at the earliest opportunity so as to provide a statutory foundation for a national witness relocation and protection program.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is signed by 40 of my constituents who pray and request that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the charter of rights and freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the human rights code to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the third petition is signed by 41 constituents who pray that Parliament ensure the current provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

* * *

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

* * *

[Translation]

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

The Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

* * *

[English]

POINTS OF ORDER

DECORUM IN THE HOUSE

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to assist in the maintenance of proper decorum in the House. I refer to a review on September 18 in which the Acting Speaker referring back to a ruling in June said: "We would hope and call upon members of both sides of the House to be mindful of the ruling of the Speaker in June regarding exhibits, lapel pins, et cetera".

Mr. Speaker, I draw this to your attention and ask you to remind members to refrain from wearing pins today. Perhaps we could all agree to do this. The members for Winnipeg South, Kent, Algoma, Verchères, St. John's West, and Kingston and the Islands are wearing exhibits.

The Speaker: I take the hon. member's advice à coeur. I noticed some members today are wearing a flower or a pink pin. I remind members that whatever pins or parliamentary buttons we wear, my general rule is I am guided by the House in virtually everything I do.

As long as it does not cause a disorder and is in keeping with the dignity of the House, I use these as general criteria for what we do. I encourage all hon. members to look at what they are wearing in the House. For the most part much of it is accepted and we take that for granted.

I will keep vigilant and I hope all hon. members will keep that in mind when in the House.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I remind you the Chair has the right to request that certain pins or items not be worn. On the night we voted on MP pensions certain members of the Reform Party were asked to remove them.

The Speaker: I thank my hon. colleague for reminding me of my decision. I always keep those decisions in mind.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): I want to come to Your Honour's assistance in this regard. I think your decision in June was quite correct, as I am sure all hon. members do.

• (1550)

Wearing pins and ribbons in the House is a longstanding tradition as far as I can understand, certainly since I have been here. I do not consider that a long time ago by standards of others. With great respect, there is a difference between pins and large buttons with highly visible insignia constituting a demonstration.

Difficulties occur when members hold up papers, documents or things that constitute a demonstration in the House or when they wear substantial buttons, placards or other symbols that carry with them words or letters transmitted by television as a message.

Your Honour's ruling last June indicated that buttons which carry a message and were visible to the public were contrary to the standards of dress in the House. With great respect, I think Your Honour drew a distinction between those items and small buttons or pins that members wear not readily visible on television and which may convey a message but are very small and discreet.

The trick to me in dressing for the Chamber is to dress in a decorous way that may involve wearing small pins, possibly unusual ties from time time. I consider myself guilty sometimes on that score. Those are the things members are allowed to do. As long as it is tasteful I submit it is right. I think that was Your Honour's intention. I know members opposite, in making their points, are really supporting Your Honour's view in that regard.

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the intervention by the hon. deputy House leader for the government. It seems to me he is really saying buttons are okay but if something embarrasses the government it is okay for the Speaker to jump on it with both feet.

The Speaker: I thank all members for supporting my decision last June and for their comments which I will forever keep at the forefront of my mind when making my decisions.

Pursuant to Standing Order 33(2), because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended by 10 minutes.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[Translation]

CANADA–UNITED STATES TAX CONVENTION ACT, 1984

Hon. Marcel Massé (for the Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec) moved that Bill S–9, an act to amend the Canada–United States Tax Convention Act, 1984, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to begin the third reading debate on Bill S–9.

Hon. members will recall that this legislation ratifies the recently signed revised protocol to the Canada–United States Tax Convention.

Tax conventions are routinely modified, and this is essentially routine legislation. It has emerged from committee without amendments, and with good reason. By improving the operation of the Canadian and U.S. tax systems as they apply in tandem, it will result in fairer taxation and a better environment for cross–border investment and trade.

A number of the amendments provided for in the bill are of a technical or procedural nature, an arbitration mechanism, improved exchange of tax information, and provisions for assistance in collecting the taxes of the other country.

But there are also some substantive changes that will benefit Canadians and enhance the fairness of the two systems for non residents.

• (1555)

[English]

Let me begin with a provision that has been the subject of some misunderstanding, the application of U.S. estate taxes to Canadians with property there. Our achievement with respect to estate taxes is twofold. First, we are ensuring Canadians with property in the United States do not get a harsher deal at the hands of the American government than do Americans. Second, we are doing what tax conventions are all about, eliminating double taxation.

With respect to the first point it should be borne in mind that U.S. estate taxes do not kick in for American citizens until the value of their estate exceeds $600,000. Under our law enacted in 1988 the threshold for Canadians with property in the United States is only $60,000. In our opinion that is simply not fair. This protocol changes that, ensuring that Canadians are entitled to the same treatment as our American neighbours.

There is the matter of double taxation. For half a century tax treaties have been combating the unfairness and financial disincentives of double taxation. Typically each jurisdiction provides a credit against its own taxes on revenue from the other jurisdiction that has already been taxed in that jurisdiction. The complicating factor in this case is that while both Canada and the United States impose taxes upon death, these taxes take two different forms. The U.S. applies an estate tax whereas in Canada the levy takes the form of an income tax on any appreciation of a deceased's property over his or her lifetime.

Bill S–9 simply recognizes the situation and addresses the anomaly that would otherwise result. Without the proposed change, combined Canada and U.S. tax on the estate of a Canadian with U.S. property could actually exceed the property value. I do not think anyone in the House would deny that would be patently unfair to the taxpayers.

In other words, any suggestion this provision represents a tax break for the wealthy rests on the confusion about tax treaties in general and this protocol in particular. Wealthy Canadians will continue to pay substantial taxes on property owned at death.

Another important change is the reduction or elimination of the rate of withholding tax that each country will apply to certain types of revenue. The rate on interest payments will be reduced to 10 per cent from 15 per cent. The rate on direct dividends will go down to 5 per cent from 10 per cent and the rate on royalties on computer software and on patent and technological information will be eliminated entirely.

These changes bring the rates under the Canada–U.S. convention into line with those provided in the OECD model tax convention accepted by most of the OECD's 25 countries. More to the point, the reduced rates will facilitate trade and investments between our two countries.

For example, the elimination of the withholding tax on certain types of information technology will make it cheaper for Canadian companies to access technology from the United States and easier for our high tech firms to sell to the United States.

I will mention one further beneficial change provided for in this protocol. It concerns the treatment of social security payments such as old age security and the Canada pension plan. Under the existing convention these payments are not taxable in the source country and only half the benefit is taxable in the other country. Once the protocol is ratified, however, benefits paid from one country will be taxable exclusively in that country.

To sum up, double taxation conventions are a vital part of the legal infrastructure underpinning trade and investment relationships between modern economies. The protocol the bill will ratify will result in fair taxation while enhancing the international environment for trade and investment.

Once again I remind hon. members the bill came out of committee unchanged. I suggest we pass it without further delay.

• (1600)

[Translation]

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we have seen that the purpose of Bill S–9 is to ratify a protocol to the Canada–United States Tax Convention.

This convention regulates most tax provisions, as the hon. member explained earlier. This means it regulates most tax provisions between Canada and the United States. Canada has similar conventions with many other countries throughout the world. The purpose of these conventions is primarily to avoid double taxation. It would be unfair for a Canadian or a Quebecer who works a few months in the United States to be taxed first in the United States and again in Canada or Quebec when he files his income tax return at the end of the year.

So considering the extent of our trade relations and the proximity of the United States, the Canada–United States Tax Convention should be as harmonized as possible, although it is still detailed and very complex.

The bill before the House today will make it possible for both governments to help each other collect taxes from their taxpayers. It is often said that one good deed deserves another. The United States will help Canada collect taxes owed by Canadian taxpayers abroad and in turn, Canada will help the United States collect taxes from Americans when they are on foreign soil.

Following the free trade agreement with the United States, both countries decided to operate even more closely to simplify fiscal exchanges between the two countries. This enhanced co–operation and harmonization are all part of the trend towards free trade that is now sweeping the international community and is forcing governments to become more efficient in the way they tax companies and citizens of the two countries that are signatories to this convention.

The Bloc Quebecois fully supports the trend towards free trade, as we have done since the negotiations began and as Quebec did as soon as the issue of international free trade was broached, since the Province of Quebec, unlike the federal Liberal government at the time, had come out in favour of free trade. Since we support the free exchange of goods in the greatest possible harmony and on the most equitable terms for Canadians and Americans, we have not changed the position we took at the time and, today, we want the government to know that we will support this bill.

We know that without the firm support of Quebec and all major players in the province, the free trade agreement with the United States would probably never have materialized.

As I said earlier, Jean Chrétien's Liberals and even the Province of Ontario were strongly opposed to the agreement. Quebec was not only in favour of this agreement between the United States and Canada but also supported expanding the agreement to include Mexico and still supports this grand design for a free trade zone. With President Clinton of the United States, we would like to see this free trade zone extend from Alaska to Tierra del Fuego.

We could draw a parallel between this situation and the situation we see now in the political context involving Canada and Quebec. I must say that our support for the bill before the House today is entirely consistent with the position we would take on agreements with the rest of Canada.

• (1605)

Millions of dollars are at stake in Bill S–9. Millions and even billions of dollars will be at stake tomorrow morning before a partnership between Quebec and Canada.

For instance, some businesspeople told me that they could not decide on the matter because they needed both supporters and opponents of the bill to earn a living.

Both before and after October 30, we will need clients from both sides in order to ensure a climate of harmony, of beneficial exchanges between the two parties. If we have no need for both, as we are doing in this bill, why would businesspeople want to stop dealing with those clients who voted with the other side after October 30?

Businesspeople and companies who need both yes and no clients before October 30 will continue to need them after October 30. That is why we say that they can only hope for a partnership between both countries, just as the Bloc Quebecois is now supporting the partnership advocated by Bill S–9 to harmonize taxes and estate tax rates.

Yet, with this bill, if Canada refused to sign a protocol with the U.S., it would not claim to be weakened, that this would be an obvious way to avoid co–operating with the U.S., or that the U.S. would be the only one at a disadvantage. Canada understands that it is in both parties' interest.

In the same way, when people from the no side tell us that tomorrow morning, we will have Canada and a separated Quebec, I think that what we have here is a new definition of separation. Where I come from, when a couple separates, it is not just one party who is separated; both the woman and the man say they are separated.

After October 30, once Quebec has proclaimed its sovereignty, we will not have a separated Quebec and a complete Canada. We will have a separated Quebec and a separated Canada. Both parties will likely be weakened in their positions if people in Quebec and the rest of Canada refuse to conclude harmonious free trade agreements between them so that their economic and trade positions would be strengthened by new links. There can be accommodations. An economic and trade partnership could therefore be arranged not only for taxation but also for international trade and the free flow of goods and services in general, in the interest of this country's two founding nations.

The bill does not specify how many millions and billions of dollars are at stake in this protocol. We do not know which country—Canada or the U.S.—will benefit the most from this tax liberalization protocol. We do not know, and the bill does not say. Perhaps the party in power has done studies on this? We simply do not know.

But we nonetheless agree because this is a principle of justice that can only benefit Canadians and Quebecers. It would not be normal for a Quebecer working in Florida for three or four months a year, for example, to pay more taxes for these three or four months than he would pay in Quebec if he had worked only in Quebec.

• (1610)

Bill S–9 will ensure that Quebec or Canada, as the case may be, will be able to claim from the U.S. the share of withholding tax on this person's compensation, under conditions that will be similar or identical in both countries. Hence the advisability of supporting this agreement.

Especially if trade and trade opportunities between two countries are involved, considering that $1.3 billion is invested every year in manufacturing in Ontario cars, trucks and automotive parts for sale in Quebec, it would be sheer folly for the Ontario automotive industry to miss out on this market. Is Ontario going to refuse to come to an agreement with Quebec, claiming that it can no longer sell cars and trucks in Quebec because we have decided to achieve autonomy? That would be silly.

Also, Alberta sells us oil and natural gas worth more than $850 million. Would our Albertan suppliers decide overnight to stop selling us oil and natural gas worth $850 million because we have chosen to make our own decisions from now on?

For Bay Street, the heart of Toronto's financial district, Quebec represents a $2.8 billion market for financial and insurance services. How can one believe that these people would not find it in their best interest to maintain harmonious business relations with us?

Integration of businesses in Quebec and Canada as well as the need to integrate businesses in Quebec and Canada with American businesses make it imperative that we maintain harmonious relations among ourselves. In turn, maintaining harmonious relations forces us to maintain the existing economic union, but under new terms, whereby each partner has a say in problem solving.

Where the shoe pinches right now is that one country is divided, with one partner claiming to have all the answers and be in a better position to manage the other one's taxes and imposes its will by force of numbers. That is why we were never able to find a solution: we realize that we are so terribly different.

When I was in college, we had a professor who used to say: "My friends, always remember that, when confronted with a problem, unless you hold the solution or are part of the solution, you are part of the problem".

That is the kind of situation we are in at present in Canada and Quebec. Over the past few decades, we have come to realize that we were facing certain problems. We told Canada: "Here is a possible solution: If you agree to a redistribution of powers between our two peoples, so as to allow greater fairness, greater autonomy and greater respect for our two peoples, we could find a solution for this great united Canada".

Unfortunately, Quebec, particularly over the last 30 years, has constantly clashed with the federal government and the rest of Canada, which want to keep control over the province's tax system, over its decisions and, in fact, over any major decision that a nation has to make regarding its future.

We feel that Canada was more part of the problem than part of the solution. This is why we initiated a referendum process, a democratic process which will allow Quebecers to freely express themselves and tell Canadians: "Ladies and gentlemen, tomorrow morning we wish to offer you a new sharing of responsibilities; we wish to offer you a new partnership whereby we will decide together, on an equal footing, what should be done to ensure the best possible future for us".

• (1615)

Let us not forget that soon, when Quebec becomes sovereign, the rest of Canada will no longer be in as strong a position, relative to other foreign countries. It is wrong and it is misleading to suggest that the rest of Canada will still be a strong country, while Quebec will have become a weak nation. A Canada without Quebec is a weaker Canada and a Quebec without Canada also takes on a different dimension. This is why we will have to find a way to pool our skills and strengths to maintain as best as we can our trade relations with other countries.

Should this not happen, Canada will not immediately go bankrupt, nor will Quebec: our two new countries will have to face international conditions different from those which currently prevail, something which might be harder to do. Clearly, it is easier to enter into a partnership to solve issues, rather than try to find solutions to the same problems separately. This is obvious. But we cannot do it right now. We are told: you are already in a partnership, why do you want to leave? This is an illusion. We want out because we feel that we are not in a true partnership arrangement. We are in a minority position in a country where our province accounts for about 25 per cent of the population, and where half of the taxes paid by Quebecers are controlled by the majority.

We want more than that for Quebecers. We mentioned commercial reasons regarding free trade agreements. We could also provide reasons related to the number of jobs. We are not talking about the loss of one million jobs. We are not even talking about a loss, because we know that our partners of tomorrow will not let 250,000 jobs in Ontario disappear. Indeed, there are 250,000 jobs in that province that are directly related to goods sold in Quebec, particularly in the automotive industry.

In western Canada, 75,000 jobs are directly related to trade between those provinces and Quebec. We buy 50 per cent of the beef produced in the west. Tomorrow, Quebecers will not want to stop eating western beef, nor will western producers want to stop selling us their beef, because 75,000 jobs are at stake. In Atlantic Canada, we are talking about 26,000 jobs. Maritime provinces will not risk losing 26,000 jobs by eliminating economic and trade activity with Quebec.

In Canada, a total of 352,000 jobs depend directly on the trade between the rest of Canada and Quebec. I imagine that on October 31, businessmen will start calling their Premiers and ministers to tell them: "Gentlemen, let us be serious. Let us get down to business. Let us get back to basics and sound business practices. Keep protecting our markets and our jobs. Sit down and talk to each other and stop being so obsessed with your own policies".

I did not make up these examples. They exist today. This is the reality of trade, whether we like it or not.

The same goes for NAFTA. They want to scare us. They say that the next day we could no longer enter into an agreement, be part of NAFTA. However, tomorrow morning, for instance, we can enter into an agreement with the United States on estate taxes.

Americans who own securities, property or factories in Quebec or who come and work here a few months every year, tomorrow morning, these Americans will want to adopt the same bill, either with Quebec or a united Canada. Why is this bill before the House today? Because we realize that some Americans are penalized by differences in legislation, just as some Canadians and Quebecers are penalized by the law as we know it today.

• (1620)

If Canada is prepared to acknowledge that harmonization of the legislation of our two countries is mutually beneficial, why should we be more reasonable with the Americans than with a sovereign Quebec, if it benefits our citizens? Personally, I think that the day after a declaration of sovereignty, the United States and the rest of Canada will sit down at the same table and will want to negotiate.

Quebec's production figures are four times those of Chile, which is expected to be the next country to sign NAFTA. Four times. Quebec's trade with the United States is eight times what it is with Brazil, Argentina and Chile combined. Canada tells us: "We are willing to let Chile become a member tomorrow morning", but they are not prepared to do the same for Quebec. Yet Quebec has eight times the trade exchanges with these three countries combined.

The American president has already stated, as I have already said, that he wanted to create a free trade zone from Alaska to Tierra del Fuego, which I imagine includes Quebec. He did not say "a free trade zone from Alaska to Tierra del Fuego excluding Quebec". That is not what he said. What he did say is that it is to everyone's advantage in this great economic space in which we live to liberalize trade. Some governors of northeastern states have already announced their firm intention to continue trade relations with a sovereign Quebec. Laurent Beaudoin is not the only one who has made a statement.

The government of Canada strongly supports Chile's application, as I have already said, and yet Chile has 148 times less trade with English Canada than Quebec has with English Canada. This is a key point. Another country like Chile would be accepted, yet Quebec, with 148 times more trade links than Chile, would be rejected. That makes absolutely no sense. Nothing but bogey man scare tactics. We will not stand for such a thing.

During a trade visit to South America, the Prime Minister of Canada made a strong and convincing plea in favour of broadening NAFTA to include all of the Americas. There is, however, a lack of logic in the no side which they are not prepared to acknowledge. Again this week, Mr. Martin has made himself the spokesman for the no side with respect to NAFTA. Yesterday in a speech to the Association professionnelle en développement économique du Québec, he raised three key points preventing Quebec from joining NAFTA quickly.

First, membership in the World Trade Association. With respect to this point, I must tell Mr. Martin that he is wrong, although I cannot tell whether or not his error is deliberate. I do not believe so, I think he might be acting in good faith, but it is obvious that he is in error. True, it could take several years for a country to conform to the World Trade Organization's rules before being accepted for membership. But he must acknowledge at the same time that Quebec already meets all of the World Trade Organization's membership requirements. WTO rules contain provisions for accelerating the process for countries that are already in compliance with the rules.

Quebec would certainly have access to this fast track, which takes about two to three months. In the past five years, the latest countries to declare sovereignty or independence were all recognized immediately by the WTO. Perhaps one or two countries have still not yet been accepted, because they do not meet the basic requirements, because they were not part of a free market economy. That is why the delay. However, a sovereign Quebec, which already satisfies all the conditions, could join the organization quickly—within two or three months, and not two or three years, as Mr. Martin suggests. Even the Czechs and the Slovaks have had the advantage—

• (1625)

The Deputy Speaker: I would ask the member to use the minister's title and not his surname.

Mr. Laurin: You are right, Mr. Speaker. I should have said "the Minister of Finance".

Even the Czech and the Slovak republics, which have just achieved sovereignty, have had the advantage of this accelerated process, the process of joining the World Trade Organization, despite the fact that their economies were far less developed that Quebec's.

The Minister of Finance also contended that Quebec will not be able to sign NAFTA before achieving sovereignty, which, according to him, would take time. However, Quebec retains its legal status, so long as it remains a province of Canada, in my opinion and according to all the experts. As a province and so long as it has not declared its sovereignty, Quebec remains a party to NAFTA.

When we come to declare our sovereignty, we will have had time to talk with people. We will continue to be a party to NAFTA as a Canadian province, and the day after sovereignty, negotiations will be complete, and we will become another member of NAFTA, this time, not as a province, but as a sovereign country. His reasoning falls short here again.

The Minister of Finance raised a third point. He ignored an aspect of the international reality and existing practice, in stating that the American Congress was not keen at the prospect of new negotiations. The Americans have never behaved this way, because state successions promote the continuity and stability of international treaties.

If the United States ever did ignore this rule, it would be to Canada's full advantage to sign a partnership with Quebec, without altering the economic reality of Canada and Quebec, but permitting continued membership by Canada and Quebec in NAFTA, as provided in article 22.04 of the treaty.

It would be advantageous to both Canada and Quebec, because we must not forget that, if the United States wants to renegotiate with Quebec, it will surely want to renegotiate with Canada, which will have seven million consumers fewer than when it signed the treaty.

A Canada with seven million fewer inhabitants is not the same Canada. It is not the same NAFTA partner. And if Canada wants to maintain its economic weight in NAFTA, it should sign a partnership agreement with Quebec, because it would be to its advantage and to Quebec's to do so.

According to another of Mr. Martin's arguments, the United States will no longer want to allow new members to have a dispute settlement board. This is a half baked argument and should be quickly rejected because it is based solely on a letter written by a candidate for the Republican Party nomination. Just a letter from a candidate making this claim.

Furthermore, Mr. Martin has conceded that the negotiations with Chile include the dispute settlement board. They are currently negotiating, they have recognized the existence, the possibility of extending the jurisdiction of a dispute settlement board, yet they are telling us that the Americans are no longer interested. How can the Americans want this mechanism for Chile but not for Canada? They are consistent.

This makes it difficult to take seriously the finance minister's statement that Quebec will lose a million jobs and endanger 90 per cent of its exports. Just imagine. This is no laughing matter.

• (1630)

This just goes to show once again that ridicule never killed anyone, because the Minister of Finance would have died a long time ago. We can see how exaggeration often leads to absurdities.

We are proud and happy to participate in Canada's development by supporting Bill S–9, because it goes in the direction that we have always advocated. We do not want to destroy Canada, we want to build a country in Quebec, and we want Canada to remain prosperous as well. We want to live in renewed harmony, no longer from coast to coast but side by side. And the only way to live side by side is to support legislation that will make for more harmonious relations between the two countries.

Witch hunts must be stopped. They must stop telling Quebecers that Quebec is too small, that they cannot administer themselves without help, that they will not succeed in their endeavour. Quite the contrary.

Quebec's history has shown that every time Quebecers have really taken their destiny into their own hands, their endeavours were successful. They succeeded. And when Quebecers will decide, as they will on October 30, to become autonomous and to make their own decisions, they will be able to collect their own taxes and to sign their own treaties. It will enable them to make decisions on their own and to invest, in projects that better serve the interests of Quebecers, the $30 billion in tax money they will no longer have to pay the federal government.

The Laurent Beaudoins who come and tell us that Quebec would be too small to meet the needs of large businesses like their should be reminded that countries smaller than Quebec have about 20 and sometimes as many as 30 companies that are twice, three times and even four times as large as Bombardier. Businesses larger than the one run by Mr. Beaudoin manage to prosper in countries like Switzerland, Norway and Denmark. The strength and vitality of a nation is not dependent on its size, but rather on the resourcefulness of its people, their commitment and their self–respect.

Naturally, Quebecers will want to invest mainly in research and development because this creates jobs. The Chinese have known this for a long time. An old Chinese proverb says: "Instead of handing out fish that will feed the hungry only for one day, teach them to fish". Teach people to fish and they will be able to feed themselves for the rest of their lives.

That is what Canada did with Quebec. Only with respect to unemployment insurance were we favoured. Quebecers did get more in UI benefits than they paid into the plan. That is the fish we were fed. Meanwhile, Ontarians were taught to fish, and teaching fishing requires research and development grants, which we did not get. And they thought we would go for that.

[English]

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I have been listening patiently to the member for the last 33 minutes. We are all very sensitive when the separatists speak in the House these days. We do not want to upset them in any way, shape or form. However, Mr. Speaker, at what point in time do you think the member will speak about the bill that is on the floor of the House?

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: I am sure that the hon. member will not be long in coming to the point of his speech.

Mr.Laurin: Mr. Speaker, I thought that what I was saying was very relevant to Bill S–9, since it addresses partnership with another country, the United States. I was therefore attempting to demonstrate that the proposals made concerning other bills before the House deal with exactly the same problem. There was a problem between the United States and Canada. Tax collection was not harmonized, estate taxes were not harmonized.

• (1635)

A way has been found by two sovereign countries to discuss and to reach agreement on changing our laws in order to harmonize them and ensure that Bill C–9 benefits the citizens of both countries equally.

What I have attempted to demonstrate to this hon. house, with examples, is that this would be equally possible in other areas. I am well aware that my colleagues opposite do not like to hear anyone telling them that it is possible for the partnership to be a success. They cannot be hearing that word much these days. They only wish to hear it used in connection with other countries, but when Quebec becomes a country they will hear it more often. We think that at that point they will be prepared to come to the table.

At any rate, whether they like to hear us talk about it or not, this is a decision for Quebecers alone. And just as Quebecers, via their elected representatives here in the House today, agree to support Bill S–9, tomorrow morning Quebecers will also agree to support their representatives in the Quebec government and ask them to offer a partnership that is respectful of our neighbours in the rest of Canada, a partnership that will be advantageous to both parties, a partnership that will become the sole solution to our common problems.

[English]

The Deputy Speaker: It is my duty to inform the House that the question to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment is as follows: the hon. member for Davenport—Climate change.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in two years in the House I have never seen a bill that all three parties support take so long to get through. Here we are debating the bill when all parties agree to it.

There are a couple of things I would like to say at third reading which I believe are worth clearing up. As everyone in the House has been informed, and for those taxpayers who have been watching the debate and seeing how a Senate bill gets through the House of Commons, there are some items in here that have caused some confusion.

The NDP member for Kamloops and the Liberal member for Gander—Grand Falls have raised some issues on specific items in the bill that have now confused the Canadian public. Now we have to participate in explaining why we support the bill or why some members are against it. There are only one or two people who are against it and it seems a shame that we have to talk about it.

The bill was done through negotiators on behalf of both countries. It was signed on August 31, 1994, so it is already a done deal. What we are doing is giving birth to it, endorsing it or whatever through the House of Commons.

As the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance indicated, it eliminates double taxation, creates a level playing field, reduces the withholding taxes on interest and dividends, royalties and technologies, et cetera. It keeps up with the global need to remain and to become competitive. It is for those sound fiscal and economic reasons that the Reform Party supports the bill.

The bill has a lot of upside to it and will generate a lot of investment opportunities for Canadians in the United States and vice versa with the amount of investment Americans make in Canada. It is a reciprocity agreement. Whatever we have negotiated is a two–way street; what happens in the United States can also happen up here. I remind everyone that in a reciprocity agreement sometimes we have to give to get and sometimes we get to give. It works both ways.

I would like to try to clear up some of the confusion on behalf of the member for Kamloops. My office received a lot of phone calls about the bill based on the tirade over the treatment of universities in the United States and Canadians being allowed to make charitable donations to American universities. If they send their children to those schools, it is an allowable deduction. In typical NDP fashion it is a tax for the so–called rich and the rich should not be able to do anything except look after those people who the NDP deem need to be looked after, rather than having a system that is fair for all at both ends of the scale.

• (1640)

Based on the fact that the member for Kamloops has raised the issue and is getting a bit of play out of it in B.C., I would like to answer some of the questions people have been calling our offices about. I will also address the specifics of the bill. Maybe some of the confusion can be cleared up.

I must admit I am a bit frustrated personally that we in the House of Commons have to enter into a debate over something we were not a part of. It was in the Senate where all the specifics, details and all the justifications—

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Do you like taking your direction from the Senate?

Mr. Silye: No, it is just that the details were brought out in the Senate. The negotiations were done by representatives of both countries. They were not done by senators from both countries, but that is where it was approved.

My point is that it is frustrating that we now have to dig in and get all the details of a done deal. Nevertheless, I will make my best stab at it and if there are some areas where I am a bit off the mark hopefully I will not be too far off. I will say so if I am not clear.

One question we are getting from B.C. constituents is: Why do we favour reductions in the rate of withholding tax on interest and dividends? I covered that in my opening remarks. This works both ways and will attract investment in Canada as well as investment in the United States. It is seen as another step in the reduction of barriers as we shift to a global marketplace. All OECD member countries, including Canada, the 25 member states have agreed to try to get their tax rates in line with one another to facilitate this.

It may so happen at this time because of the immediate nature of the deal being put into effect that the flow of capital into Canada may be reduced. That could be a temporary measure. In the years to come we could get it back on bigger and better deals we make with the United States.

The second question was: How can we endorse a bill that gives individuals with children in U.S. schools the ability to write off a portion of their expenses? While there are those who argue that we should not be subsidizing those who are well enough off to go to schools in the U.S., this benefit works both ways. Americans are allowed to make donations to Canadian universities as well. It is not only the privileged Americans or Canadians who are crossing the borders in pursuit of an education.

As members know, with legislation like this the good must be weighed with the bad. The potential benefits from freer flowing commerce between Canada and the U.S. far exceed the potential cost of a few individuals who send their children to American schools.

This is a reciprocity treaty and you win some and you lose some. If the principle of encouraging donations both ways was brought up in the House today as a separate measure from the principle of making a deal with the United States and encouraging a two-way deal, I would suggest that the principle of encouraging donations both ways would probably be supported in the House by the majority of members.

The third question which arose thanks to the member for Kamloops was: Are American contributions to Canadian charities given the same treatment? Yes, this is a treaty that ensures that Canadians and Americans are treated the same. It is a reciprocity treaty.

The fourth question was: What about the estate tax provision? Is that not just a tax break for the rich? No, it is not a tax break just for the rich. It tries to rectify an inequity in the current system.

In Canada we do not have an estate tax. The United States did and Americans did not have to pay any estate taxes unless there was an amount over $600,000. Canadians had to pay on amounts over $60,000. This reintroduces some equity into the system and now if a Canadian with property in the United States died and left an estate, it would only be taxed if the value is in excess of $600,000. The bill levels the playing field on this issue. It signifies the intent of the bill as trying to make sure Canadians are treated the same in Canada as they are in the United States.

• (1645)

If owning property in the United States is only the purview of the rich, then so be it. However, I do not believe that everyone who owns property in the States all along the eastern seaboard happens to be rich. I happen to know the NDP made a lot of mileage on taxing the rich until suddenly everybody in Canada realized that rich meant anybody making over $40,000 and they were hit as well. That took care of the NDP philosophy of taxing the rich, because they are not rich.

Regarding this attack on the rich by the NDP, even Abraham Lincoln addressed that in his day. He said that we cannot make the poor wealthy by making the wealthy poor. If we want to protect the disadvantaged—we need to protect the disadvantaged—if we care about those people who truly need the help then we make our laws and our polices and go about doing that. At the same time there are people throughout the economic scale who make $50,000 or more who also deserve to have any inequities in the system addressed. They deserve to be looked after as well.

For instance, 62 per cent of those who made up to $25,000 generated 27 per cent of total income, while their share of the total tax paid in 1991 was 11 per cent. My source for this is the Department of Finance. There were 19 million tax filers in 1991 and 13.7 million paid income tax and 5.3 million were not taxable.

I want to discuss the breakdown of how much tax was paid by the various groups. People who earned $25,000 to $50,000 represented 28 per cent of the tax filers and their share of both total income and total tax was 40 per cent. Ninety per cent of the tax filers in 1991 made $50,000 or less and they paid 51 per cent of the income taxes that year. People in the $50,000 to $100,000 category represented 9 per cent of the tax filers, with a share of 23 per cent of the income. They paid 31 per cent of the total tax. People who made over $100,000 were 1 per cent of tax filers, with 10 per cent of income and paying 18 per cent of the total tax. This means that 10 per cent of the tax filers in 1991 paid a total of 49 per cent of the taxes.

I point this out to the member for Kamloops so he can realize that the wealthy people in this country, the top 10 per cent, pay their darn share of the taxes. They pay darn well, they pay high, and they pay a lot, like 49 per cent of the total tax take. This business about going after the rich all the time is not going to work and it does not hold water with me, because they contribute a lot to the economy and keep the economy going. Every now and then someone should speak out on their behalf as well. They are suddenly becoming a small and select group as well in this country.

This brings me to another issue I would like to talk about from this Bill S–9, which is directly related to the concerns of the Liberal member for Gander—Grand Falls, who very eloquently raised his objections to this bill at the Standing Committee on Finance. As I understand, having done a little more homework, this member has been watching this issue and this bill for a very long time. I found out that when in opposition he basically criticized the Conservative government for moving in this direction and moving toward this kind of a deal. In fact he questioned the government of the day on this quite a bit.

The history of Bill S–9 goes back prior to our getting it on our desks and saying we should pass the bill. The bill goes back to the Mulroney government. The member for Gander—Grand Falls had the job and unique duty to critique this item, as he did. Based on that and based on being in opposition to it at that time, he feels obligated to continue that opposition to it at this time.

I bring this point out to show there is at least one Liberal who sticks to his Liberal convictions. There is one Liberal who keeps his promise. There is one Liberal who does not break the promises in the red book.

• (1650)

Mr. Benoit: He did not vote against this though.

Mr. Silye: I believe when it comes to the vote he will have to be very careful how he handles himself. Perhaps he might have a cold or something. We certainly would not want the member to be in trouble with his party, since that whip is cracking pretty hard over there, as evidenced by the last sitting.

Some of the issues the member for Gander—Grand Falls pointed out are based on his personal crusade against the bill. He has taken a lot of effort and looked into it. He does believe that because it means less revenue for Canada it is wrong. He does believe it is a tax system for the rich. He does point out that the Reform Party and the Bloc Quebecois support it, as we do. Yet he never says openly, aggressively, that the Liberal government now supports it as well.

Perhaps when he has his intervention on the bill, because I am sure he wants to speak to it and address it as well, he would maybe tell us on this side of the House why it is that when they were in opposition and the Prime Minister and his group were over here this member was attacking the bill at the time, with their blessing obviously, with the finance minister's encouragement, with the leader of the party's encouragement. Why when they are on the other side of the House all of a sudden did they flip? Do they become puppets of the bureaucracy? Do they become puppets of the bureaucrats? Do they have to say yes to what those people tell them to do? When they were over here they criticized it. They are over there and now they are endorsing it.

It now takes one lone voice, one lonely voice in that huge pack of 177 members over there to remind them that when they were over here they were not for this thing, they were not for the bill. They did not want to do reciprocity with the States like this. They were against stuff like that. They were against NAFTA. They were against all these things. Now they are for all this.

I do not understand. I do not mean to be taking the member for Gander—Grand Falls to task. In a way I am giving him a compliment, but in another way—

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood) You are dangerous. You are not fooling anybody.

Mr. Silye I also point out that there are inconsistencies here. I will compliment the member for being consistent. However I will criticize his party for being inconsistent.

The rest of the items on the bill I have covered. We do support it. I did have some time to talk about it, and I did feel it was important that as the representative for our party on the bill and as a supporter of the bill for our party I should set some of the record straight. I have to sort of pre–empt the member for Gander—Grand Falls, because I am sure he is going to say a few other words.

The intent of the bill and what it does accomplish is what the future of the country holds. We have to negotiate with other countries. We have to be creating a level playing field. We have to have taxation levels that are similar. We have to have reciprocity agreements that make the deals both ways. As the flow of capital and human resources goes back and forth, all around the world, as we push buttons on a computer and transfer large sums of money, just as an entry item on a ledger sheet, we have to be able to be competitive. First and foremost, that is what Bill S–9 does, it keeps us competitive. It is only the small minded, the narrow minded people in the House who want to protect themselves who would argue that this is not a fair and good reciprocity agreement.

There is nothing for me to add to this. I know there was a lot of confusion. I hope I have cleared up some of that confusion, why our party supports it. I hope I have addressed those constituents of the member for Kamloops. Also I hope I have put to rest this business about picking on the rich all the time, because the rich do pay their fair share. I do not believe this is a bill that satisfies the rich, because I believe people who make between $50,000 and $100,000 and own property down in the States are not really wealthy in this day and age, to make $60,000 or $70,000. In that case, with $64,000, plus the perks we get, everybody in this place would be rich. I would say that a lot of people in the House would not say they are rich.

• (1655)

That is another debate. That is another issue. I bring it up only because of the confusion introduced into the bill by the member for Kamloops and by the member for Gander—Grand Falls. It is worthy of support. The sooner we get it over with, the sooner we can get back to real issues and real bills and get on with our economic lives.

Mr. Barry Campbell (St. Paul's, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is an unusual day in the House when all parties support a bill. The member for Calgary Centre pointed that out at the beginning and then spoke for almost 16 minutes even though he felt it was a waste of time to talk about the bill, since we all agreed. What is more interesting is that he spent most of that time complimenting a member for the governing party, the member for Gander—Grand Falls. It is indeed an unusual day in the House.

I also want to speak to Bill S–9 and some of the concerns raised with respect to the bill, an act to amend the Canada–U.S. Tax Convention Act.

First I want to say to my colleagues that there is nothing sinister in the bill and no surprises for those who follow these issues. This was pointed out earlier. This matter was the subject of publicity earlier. There was a press release in April 1994 that announced that the protocol had been signed. A copy of the protocol was available. The fact that negotiations were taking place has been known for several years. It has certainly been known among people who practise taxation law and those who are concerned about cross–border investment. There are no surprises and nothing particularly sinister. The bill follows the OECD model tax convention treaty. Provisions of that tax convention model have been followed by as many as 25 countries.

There has been some suggestion that the bill amounts to a huge tax cut for corporations. I want to speak to that misconception. What the bill really does is facilitate cross–border investment. As has been said by others, tax conventions are all about reciprocity. What we are gaining through this tax convention and other tax conventions is enhanced investment in our country. We have to reciprocate for countries that are interested in that kind of relationship with us.

What we have here in the changes in withholding tax is a great incentive for Canadians to invest in the United States and likewise for Americans to invest in this country. Certainly at a time when we are concerned about jobs and growth, that is a very good outcome and a worthwhile goal.

There has been talk, again another confusion, about impact on the treasury, cost to Canadians. We should also focus on offsetting investment in tax revenues that come to Canada from that investment. That is what this treaty will accomplish.

There has also been comment about estate taxes and some sort of opportunity that is being provided to the rich of this country. What is being addressed in the estate tax provisions of the convention is the matter of fair treatment. Canadians will be out from under the burden of double taxation and unfair treatment that has existed to date in the United States for those who have owned property there. That will be cleared up.

There has also been much discussion about the provisions of the convention dealing with the tax treatment of contributions to universities outside Canada. Some have been so confused as to think that this is something that has appeared in our law and is a function of this convention suddenly. It has been a matter of legislation in this country since the 1960s and has been in this convention since the 1980s. What is the result? Certainly the result is that Canadians may make contributions to U.S. universities, but I want to come back to the reciprocity issue and make the following point.

Looking into my own former university, McGill, we discover that over the years countless Americans have attended McGill University. Approximately 1,000 are there right now if we add full time and part time students together.

• (1700)

Here is what is most interesting of all. Let us look at the amount of contributions from McGill graduates in the U.S. and Americans to McGill University over the last five years. In 1990, $2,452,000. In 1991, over $3.7 million. In 1992, almost $2 million. These are U.S. figures. In 1993, $3 million Canadian. In 1994, the astronomical amount of $7 million Canadian. In 1995 it is $3,440,000 to date from American contributors to a great Canadian university. Those who question the wisdom of encouraging Canadians to make contributions to U.S. schools should ask themselves what the impact might be on contributions to Canadian schools.

I am pleased to support the bill and pleased that it has the support of all parties of the House. It is a sensible convention. It is updated from time to time, as it has been most recently by these changes. I look forward to having it passed by the House.

[Translation]

I would like to add a word on another point. The hon. member for Joliette used the debate on Bill S–9 to discuss the effects of separation. In response, I would like to say something very clearly.

First, if Quebec needs such a convention, it already has one as a province of Canada. Second, it seems to me that the hon. member does not have a strong grasp of international law, but this is always the way with the separatists. When they get up in the morning, they say: "I want something, therefore I shall have it". But the world does not work this way, and he knows it.

International law is well written and very clear: if Quebec separates from Canada, Canada will remain the contracting state, not Quebec.

[English]

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in response to the questions raised by the Reform Party and by the Bloc yesterday, the accountability of the Government of Canada to the people of Canada is made here in the House of Commons by the official opposition.

There are only two functions which Parliament serves: One is a legislative function and the other is an accountability function. The actions of the executive of government are held accountable to the people through Parliament. If the official opposition party does not do its job, then Parliament is not doing its job.

We have before us today a bill which came in through the back door. It was not the servant's entrance because the back door was the Senate. It came in through the Senate, but it involves an incredibly large expenditure of money in the final analysis. It is a large expenditure not in direct allocation, but in what the auditors general call tax expenditures.

The bill also includes provisions which Bloc members keep repeating as being wonderful. It cuts dividends by 50 per cent to American corporations which have subsidiaries in Canada. It cuts by one–third the taxation on interest on the money that flows back across to the United States. It eliminates every single royalty tax in this country which is held by Americans, except for trademarks. Trademarks are being bifurcated. It is a very difficult accounting procedure, but that is what is happening under the bill. There are those three big tax cuts.

• (1705)

I just cannot understand it. I do not believe there is one constituent of the official opposition—I keep referring to it as the official opposition because it is supposed to be the group that controls question period and debate in this Chamber. That is why we have a group of MPs like myself and others on the government side who are wondering where the accountability and debate is here.

What I am referring to is this philosophy of the official opposition that working Canadians should compensate people who have property worth over $600,000 in the United States of America. With the passage of the bill, the estate tax in the United States only applies to property worth over $600,000.

The Bloc is saying it is going to end double taxation. It is demanding this on behalf of Quebec. How? It says that the Canadian government taxes in a different way. Yes, it does tax differently on property over $600,000 because there is no double taxation below $600,000. The estate tax in the United States will not kick in until there is property over $600,000 in the United States. The Bloc tells us it wants to end double taxation for people who pay a tax on things that are valued at over $600,000 in the United States of America.

The estate tax in the United States of America has been in existence since the turn of the century. It was brought in at the same time it was brought into Canada when income tax came in. Income tax was demanded by the people of western Canada in 1916 when they marched with their signs. They demanded that income tax be brought in. Their cry was the same cry as that of the people in the United States of America when they wanted income tax brought in at the turn of the century, about 1897, because they said the rich were not paying their fair share of taxes.

The governments of the day responded by bringing in taxes on wealth of varying amounts. Estate taxes came in. All of a sudden, here we are in 1995 and we are going to try to end double taxation which has been there since 1904. Worse than that, we are going to try to end double taxation for people who have property in the United States worth over $600,000. I just do not understand the Bloc's position on this as the official opposition in the Canadian Parliament because that is where the objection should come from.

Let me repeat this again. There is no double taxation after the passage of this bill unless one has property of over $600,000 in the United States. The double taxation is not really double taxation because we do not have an estate tax. Our death tax is on income. The estate tax is on property. Everybody in this Chamber knows that.

In the United States they take the value of one's automobile, house and everything else, the paintings on the wall and the dishes, the stocks and bonds, everything. In Canada we exempt the primary residence and the things one uses. Canada does not tax the car in the driveway; we only tax what the estate of the dead person says was actually an increase in value of the property that is not exempt. It is two completely different things, so how can we have reciprocity when we do not have the same thing in effect in both the nations?

• (1710)

When the bill was introduced into the United States Senate the Government of the United States said: "Each country agrees to allow an appropriate credit for the death taxes imposed in the other country". It is convenient for the United States because it takes about three years to settle an estate owned by a Canadian in the United States. A long time. You normally do not want to pay estate taxes in the United States. This will sort of hurry it up, will it not?

If we are now going to give a tax credit, where does that tax credit come from? It comes from the pockets of working Canadians. It comes from the person working on a construction job. It comes from the person who works in a store. It comes from the person making the beds in the hotels. It comes from every working Canadian. Until the official opposition in Parliament understands that the government must be held accountable on tax expenditures we will never get the finances of this country under control.

Apart from that, the other major thing in this bill is that it reduces by 50 per cent the taxes paid by American multinationals operating in Canada on their profits. Every single member of this House knows that we have a special division in Revenue Canada called the transfer pricing division. Every member in this Chamber knows there are nine or 10 people there and there are another 17 or 18 in the field looking at all these multinationals. Everyone knows that over 70 per cent of them do not pay any tax at all. Transfer pricing is the major problem but there are other problems as well.

You charge $50 for a clothespin when you pass it from your parent company to your subsidiary. The trick is that if you have a company working in Canada at rates which are higher than in the United States, you want to make sure there is no profit showing on the books, so you bring down the profits by transfer pricing.

The only place we know they can pay taxes on their profits and operations in Canada is at the border. What is the Senate doing in this bill? The Senate is reducing that to half. How much money is that? Let me quote the chief of corporate and international tax of the finance department before the Senate standing committee on April 25, 1995. He was asked the question: Why not reduce it to zero? Instead of 10 per cent why not bring it down to zero? His answer is on page 19 of the transcript: "The principal reason is money". Do not forget we are reducing it by half down to five. He said: "I have not looked recently but I believe that our annual withholding tax take is approximately $1.5 billion. Currently it would be difficult to sustain completely walking away from that". I repeat, 1.5 billion bucks.

Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that the agreement we are passing here today not only reduces the withholding tax by 50 per cent but it also commits us in writing that in three years time we will go back to Washington and negotiate it down?

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Baker: Yes, in this agreement, down to zero. That is only one of the tax cuts in this agreement.

Let me get to the whole purpose. What is behind this? What is behind this kind of rush? The International Business and Finance Daily is printing news stories. I will read a portion. I can table it for hon. members to see. It is marked: "Washington, September 12, 1995".

• (1715)

They are interested in getting the bill passed before the end of the month. Why? This is why. "The protocol to the tax treaty between the United States and Canada is expected to be ratified by the Canadian Parliament before the end of October". It then goes on to talk about the other protocols that were signed and quoted a Canadian official: "We will try as quickly as we can for the second reading, and the third reading will take place in the Canadian House of Commons". That is nice to know.

He then goes on to say that although the leading party, the Bloc, has the power to hold up the vote, he does not expect that it will. Then he goes on to say that one of the key features of the protocol is this: "The proposed treaty will be effective with respect to amounts paid or credited on or after the first day of the second month after the protocol enters into force". Just imagine. Let me repeat that: "the first day of the second month that the protocol" is finished in this Chamber. This is October. The next sentence is key. "Companies in the United States are looking to apply the rate to their 1995 income tax. However, if the third reading vote is delayed in the House of Commons they may have to pay the higher rate on dividends".

The largest multinationals in the world will be getting an enormous tax decrease. However, if this bill does not pass third reading before the end of October, they will not be able to claim their reduction of 3 per cent because the protocol lowers the existing treaty's 10 per cent tax rate to 7 per cent in 1995, 6 per cent in 1996 and 5 per cent in 1997. Does anyone want to save the Government of Canada a few hundred million dollars? Pass this bill the first week in November.

Those are just a few of the reasons why I am opposed to the bill. The big one is this. Every single business organization in the United States that appeared before the Congress of the United States made one point clear. Of the seven treaties that were being passed in the U.S. Senate, only the Canadian treaty was truly a one–sided affair with the majority of the benefits going to the United States.

Let me quote from probably the biggest business organization, the National Foreign Trade Council, Inc., 1914 representing 500 U.S. multinationals, Mr. Robert H. Green, vice–president, tax policy: "Turning to the treaties before you"—this is the testimony—"the one that clearly is of the greatest interest to the largest number of companies in my membership is the U.S.–Canada protocol. The investment that flows between the two countries is substantial and favours the United States. We have substantially more investment there than they do here. The dividend withholding rates which are phased into 5 per cent over three years are of tremendous benefit to the United States because of the reduced"—this, that and the other thing. He goes on to say: "Here are all the cuts".

This is from the administration of the United States. Mr. Samuels, who appeared before the committee, stated at page 42: "If you look at the treaties that are before the committee, with the exception of Canada, we think that it is probably about a zero, that it is probably a wash as far as benefits are concerned. With respect to Canada, when you look at the relative flows, there is a greater flow of income into the United States from Canada than there is going from the United States to Canada and we will benefit".

Then comes an interesting quote. This is from the assistant secretary for tax policy of the United States. He says that in one of these cuts it is only a one–way street because according to him and the U.S. treasury: "It will have a lesser effect on U.S. outgoing flows of interest to Canada because much of the flow is already exempt from U.S. tax under the portfolio interest provisions of the code".

• (1720)

What do we have here? We have an agreement that was negotiated in 1988 by the Mulroney administration. The Reform Party is absolutely correct. Agreements are signed between governments sometimes and they must be honoured. However, that is no reason to stand up in this Chamber and support them when you are taking money out of the pockets of ordinary Canadians who are being laid off by the government. We are cutting back programs and here we are giving what is in effect a tax break to the very rich in this country.

Much more could be said about this agreement. It is very complex but it all boils down to three enormous tax cuts. It boils down to giving a tax credit to somebody who has property worth over $600,000 in the United States. Those poor people, my heart goes out to them. If you have property in the United States worth more than $600,000 you are subjected to the estate tax. If you are under that you are not subjected to it. These political parties in the opposition, the Bloc that is supposed to be doing its job, are saying: "Atta boy, this is the best thing that ever happened".

We all respect the function of the House of Commons. In order for it to function properly that accountability must be there in the opposition parties. That is why I take such strong exception to the procedure and the content of the legislation.

This is the House of Commons. This is the house of commoners. That is where that phrase comes from. This is not the house of millionaires or the house of multimillionaires. This is the House of Commons. In these difficult times we should not be increasing tax cuts, tax expenditures for wealthy people and big American corporations. If we keep doing this, Canadian corporations will not be able to compete. Where is the cut for the Canadian corporations here? Where is it? It is absent.

An hon. member: It is a reciprocal agreement.

Mr. Baker: He says that it is a reciprocal agreement. Reciprocal? This is a one–way agreement. Did he not listen to what I just read? Does he not know what the estate tax is compared with the capital gains in Canada? You cannot have a reciprocal agreement if it is not equal on both sides. You can have it, but why would you want to do it?

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the member opposite to expand on one aspect that is very important and of which Canadians should be much more aware. By and large Canada is a branch plant operation of the United States. The vast majority of the industries in Canada are branch plant operations of the United States. The real profit is derived by American corporations in transfer pricing where the American parent charges the American marketing arm a price and the Canadian marketing arm a substantially higher price. Therefore, there are very few profits relative to the amount of business activity generated in Canada, thus very limited corporate profit taxes paid in Canada.

Given the fact we know this to be the case, why are there just 12 auditors involved in this, as evidenced by his speaking notes? The member opposite thinks we should be doing something. We are stuck with this legislation as it is a treaty that we have already signed. It is going through. Should we not put more emphasis into that part of the audit?

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I was not actually speaking from notes, I was speaking from my head on those subjects. Let me tell the hon. member this. In the United States of America a term called formulary apportionment is used rather than the arm's length procedures of transfer pricing.

• (1725)

The present system is this. The Canadian government discovered in the auditing branch one case where a company was selling paper clips for $200 to a Canadian subsidiary to bring down the Canadian subsidiary's profits and then from the Canadian subsidiary was buying tires back for 6 cents each that were made in Canada to bring down the Canadian profits.

The Canadian government looked at that and at all the different systems in effect throughout the world. In the United States there is a system called formulary apportionment promoted by the state of California. Most states in the United States have this. They did it with foreign multinationals but they even did it with domestic tax. They made a judgment on the portion of the company's operations in each state.

In other words California said: "We are going to make a judgment here. We are going to decide after looking at the entire operations—the company would have to open its books—how much the operations are paying in each one of the states". That led to double taxation.

The international multinational companies will not go to California because of that. California had to drop it but it is still a principle that is being promoted.

We should have more investigators in Canada. The hon. member and I agree on that. A lot of money is tied up here. There is $10 billion, $20 billion at stake. However, what has been done in Canada, which is probably the best system, is an agreement has been signed.

The investigators go after each one of the multinationals and sign a pre-agreement, an agreement in advance. It is a secret agreement, because one cannot go around telling everybody what one's operations are.

An agreement is made in advance. That has cut down on a lot of the violations in Canada. That is the reason why the office is so small. It is a very effective and well run office.

[Translation]

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member for Gander—Grands Falls has decided to turn himself into a member of the opposition, I would be delighted to invite him to cross the floor and join us. We have several other causes to defend against his party. We would be delighted to welcome you, Sir.

[English]

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. No thanks.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the debating skills of the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls are legendary in the House. They go back to his days in opposition.

We really had not experienced them until the debate on Bill S-9. Now we see his passion and his fervour. I wonder if the member would assure the House that he will back up this passion and fervour with deeds. Does he intend to vote against the government and against Bill S-9 when it comes forward for a third reading vote?

In other words, will he be in the House and will he vote against Bill S-9?

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member puts forward an interesting proposition. I think my friend behind me and to my left answered quite appropriately one day when he said: "If you vote against the government on a finance bill, it is a vote of no confidence in the government".

The assumption is made under our rules, that if one has no confidence in the government then that person must have confidence in one of the opposition parties. Unfortunately with the positions taken by the opposition parties, I have less confidence in them than I have in the present Government of Canada.

• (1730)

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to congratulate the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls on the eloquence of his speech. He is truly a fantastic speaker. He is interesting and fun to listen to.

The hon. member has spoken against the bill presented by his party. I congratulate him for that, for coming out and expressing his thoughts on the bill even though they are different from what his party endorses.

Will he be in the House to vote against the bill at third reading? Why did the hon. member not vote against the bill at second reading? The hon. member was here before the vote and chose not to be here during the vote.

How can he tolerate being a member of a party which is so anti-democratic that it will not let its own members vote the wishes of their constituents? The hon. member obviously believes he is representing the wishes of his constituents on this issue.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I respect the hon. member's question. It is very interesting.

The hon. member will notice that in the last couple of days I have had a rather bad back. It is difficult sometimes to stand and to be seated. Hopefully my back will improve as the days go on.

However, I can tell the hon. member what I intend to do tomorrow. The only flight I can get to Newfoundland is early tomorrow morning and so I may have to miss the vote.

The Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Some hon. members: On division.

(Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.)

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the House would consent to calling it 5.40 p.m. so we could proceed to private members' hour.

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to call it 5.40 p.m.?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: Since, as we decided, it is now 5.40 p.m., the House will now proceed to consideration of Private Members' Business as indicated on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

ENDANGERED AND THREATENED SPECIES ACT

The House resumed from June 20 consideration of the motion that Bill C–275, an act respecting the protection and rehabilitation of endangered and threatened species, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to speak on Bill C–275.

The fundamental goal of any endangered species legislation must be to ensure—

Mrs. Ringuette–Maltais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As a member of the government I should have the privilege of speaking first on this motion.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member will appreciate that there is no automatic order to the government side's speaking on a private member's bill. I understand that a government member spoke last and therefore it is now the Reform Party's turn.

Mr. Hermanson: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, the fundamental goal of any endangered species legislation must be to ensure that no further native species go extinct and that already endangered species recover to healthy and self–sustaining levels. To do this we need to use the most effective, efficient and fair methods possible.

The federal government has jurisdiction over the management and preservation of wildlife on federal lands. Likewise, the provincial governments have jurisdiction over the management and preservation on all non–federal lands.

I understand that currently only four provinces have endangered species legislation: Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick.

Farmers and ranchers in Saskatchewan are concerned this type of legislation will prevent them from doing what they want with their own land. They are afraid governments will annex part of their land if an endangered species makes its habitat on their property. Farmers and ranchers are not against the protection of endangered species and populations. Farm owners, landowners and land leasers are respectful of our duty to protect all species with which we share this planet.

Any legislation must first consider the rights of the private landowner. By considering their rights we will then be able to find a co–operative solution to the preservation of endangered species.

My constituents who are farmers and ranchers certainly do not want to have any legislation thrown at them telling them how they ought to regulate their land. They must not be ignored. Farmers and ranchers are the closest to the land and are familiar with the animals that are endangered species and what needs to be done to ensure their survival. It is the duty of responsible government to sit down with those most affected by such legislation and find a common solution.

Recently United States officials under the U.S. Endangered Species Act shut down a portion of a west coast logging operation in order to save the spotted owl. This was economically disastrous for several communities. We are aware of the extreme measures taken by the U.S. Not only were they irrational but they do not in any way take the private citizen's concerns and rights into account.

The U.S. Endangered Species Act compliance process for single family residential lots states that only a recent issuance of a proclamation by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Services has changed this regulation. The United States has spent approximately $825 million and has not recovered one species.

Some member from across the floor might say the U.S. measures are draconian and that this government would never follow such a lead. Let me remind Liberal members that the Minister of the Environment is a follower of U.S. practices. The U.S. banned the additive MMT in unleaded gasoline and the Minister of the Environment followed suit. The U.S. is considering a ban on sulphur and so watch for the minister to be trapped and only a step behind on this one as well.

Bill C–275 is not similar to legislation currently practised in the United States. The bill's scope is to protect only species on federal lands. Like most legislation that comes from the government side, it flirts with that slippery slope concept.

We are concerned, as I know landowners in my part of the country are, that the Minister of the Environment may be using this as a test case to bring forward some severe legislation not balanced and not fair to landowners but protecting endangered species, which we all share a concern about.

Clause 9(1)(a) states in part that the minister "may make regulations forbidding or restricting any use of, access to, activity on, or the release of any substance on, federal lands that are public lands". Clause 9(1)(b) states in part "federal lands that are private lands".

If crown land is leased to a private rancher, which I assume occurs in some parts of Canada, does that mean the control of the land is under the jurisdiction of the crown or the lessee? When I mentioned the slippery slope, this is exactly what I was referring to.

Perhaps the sponsor of the bill, the member for Davenport, might provide me with further clarification of this section and I would appreciate it.

Clause 3(2) of the bill states:

> For greater certainty, nothing in this act shall be construed so as to abrogate or derogate from any existing aboriginal or treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada under section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

Endangered species legislation should apply equally to all Canadian citizens. There can be only one set of laws applied equally to everyone in Canada. If the government is serious about the protection of species it cannot predetermine which federal land will be part of this jurisdiction and which will not; it is either all or nothing.

Furthermore the Minister of the Environment has stated all Canadians share responsibility for ensuring that species are not lost to extinction as a result of human activities. I hope the minister when drafting her legislation will make certain that all Canadians will really mean all Canadians.

On August 17, 1995 the Minister of the Environment introduced a legislative proposal dealing with endangered species. It was called the Canadian Endangered Species Protection Act. Its intent was for consultation purposes with a hope that legislation would be introduced in the late fall. As of now Canada does not have any legislation dealing with endangered species. I was recently told that even the minister did not know that such legislation was absent in Canada.

This causes me and some of my constituents great concern, not the minister's lack of knowledge of her own portfolio but rather that she will now try to bring in legislation as quickly as possible in order to make a mark for herself. A responsible government would not do such a thing and therefore I ask the environment minister to make sure she not only has the environmental activists on her side but the industrial and agricultural communities as well.

It is extremely important to find common ground between all interested parties. Decisions on endangered species legislation should not be made hastily.

The Western Stock Growers Association has outlined five goals that go a long way in protecting endangered species without unnecessary intrusive government legislation. I bring these to the attention of the House.

First, land goals: They should be to maintain productive capacity for producing food and feed through sustainable development; management of habitat for both domestic livestock and wildlife; control access to such lands to limit disturbance to all species; empower the land holder to make appropriate management decisions.

Second, people goals: Allow local stakeholders a voice in the process; maintain the necessities of life and maintain the quality of life, particularly life in rural Canada.

Third, financial goals: Determine all of the direct and indirect costs of protection; determine all of the economic impacts and all benefits; preparation of a comprehensive budget to show how and by whom the action plan will be paid.

Fourth, government goals: Create a regulatory environment that facilitates flexible responses to endangered species management and avoids coercion of land holders; provide integration of funding of the foregoing processes; facilitate management by land holders.

I commend the member for Davenport on his bill. He has been a member in the House for some time and has been a champion for environmental causes. For this he should be applauded.

Should the bill make it to the Standing Committee on the Environment and Sustainable Development I hope the member for Davenport, the chair of the committee, will seek witnesses from all interested parties. I hope he will allow individual ranchers and farmers to appear so that the committee will hear from those who would be directly affected by his legislation.

I could spend a bit of time talking about some of the hoops American landowners have been put through by the endangered species legislation in the United States but I do not have time. I hope the member for Davenport and, more important, the Minister of the Environment become familiar with these issues.

Saskatchewan on two occasions, first under a New Democratic government and second under a Conservative government, attempted to introduce endangered species legislation without properly consulting all the stakeholders involved, particularly the landowners.

Landowners are certainly conservationists. They are environmentalists. They have the best interests of the land they are stewards of and the species that live on that land at heart. Coming from an area on the South Saskatchewan River, the river valley, it has been a joy to watch species flourish and live in harmony with nature and with the people who are the stewards of the land both for cultivation and for grazing of livestock.

There can be a co–operative approach to protecting endangered species and not limiting the rights of landowners and the lessees of crown land.

• (1745)

I implore the government and the Minister of the Environment to pursue that approach. I also encourage the member for Davenport in his legislation, should it go farther than this point in the House, to be willing to look at amendments to his bill that might respect the rights and interests of land owners in this whole situation.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette–Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity today to speak to Bill C–275, an act respecting the protection and rehabilitation of endangered and threatened species, standing in the name of the hon. member for Davenport.

[English]

The paddlefish, the swift fox and the black–footed ferret have one thing in common: They no longer exist in the wild in Canada.

[Translation]

As for the Labrador duck, the sea mink and the blue walleye, all three have ceased to exist.

The Eastern cougar, the Salish sucker, the right whale, the white Prairie gentian and the spotted owl are endangered in Canada.

[English]

The white–headed woodpecker, the blue ash, the western Atlantic harbour porpoise and the spiny softshell turtle are threatened. The polar bear, the eastern bluebird, the orange–spotted sunfish, the pug–nose minnow, the prairie rose, the blue whale and the trumpeter swan are vulnerable.

[Translation]

Canada now has 244 animal and plant species on the endangered list. These species are affected by the loss of essential habitat, excessive harvesting, introduction of exotic species, climatic change and contamination by toxic products.

[English]

The time has clearly come for the federal government to release a legislative proposal for a Canadian endangered species protection act. The government has decided to ask for public comment on this proposal before introducing a bill in Parliament because it wants as much input as possible from as many Canadians as possible.

The document is short and straightforward. We have eliminated as much of the legalese as we could in order to allow Canadians to participate in constructive discussions before the final drafting of the bill.

[Translation]

Protection of endangered species is the responsibility of all groups in our society and each and every citizen in this country. We need legislation that will make the Canadian public feel directly involved.

The bill before the House today seeks to regulate the following activities: the killing, wounding, capture, collecting or disturbing of endangered species, including plants, birds, fish, mammals and their embryos. The bill also seeks to establish Canadian controls over the purchase, sale and international trade in endangered species. To me it is quite clear that Canadians want the maximum penalty imposed on anyone who tries to make money by unlawfully importing or exporting endangered species.

[English]

The committee on the status of endangered wildlife in Canada, an arm's length scientific body, would assess the species at risk on an annual basis. The Minister of the Environment would be required to establish a list of species at risk in areas of federal jurisdiction.

Response statements outlining a plan of action would be mandatory. Recovery plans, if required, would be prepared within two years for endangered species and within three years for threatened species.

The proposal would also permit emergency measures to be taken to conserve and protect species requiring the equivalent of emergency ward treatment.

[Translation]

The proposed legislation would authorize the Minister of the Environment to enter into financing or conservation agreements in partnership with other governments, agencies and property owners for the purpose of preserving endangered species.

The bill would also provide for strict enforcement and severe penalties.

[English]

The federal government has a responsibility to set a benchmark for effective endangered species legislation in all of Canada's jurisdictions, but that is not enough. We also have a responsibility to work with the provinces and the territories to ensure a comprehensive national approach to the protection of endangered species in all parts of Canada. The federal government is committed to doing its part in this shared enterprise. Acting alone however, the federal government cannot come close to solving all of the problems.

• (1750)

[Translation]

I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick for previously adopting legislation to protect endangered species. I am convinced that in the coming months we will be able to sign a document setting forth a formal, national approach. And I am fully supported in this conviction by the fact that Canadians expect us to pool our resources for this common cause.

[English]

Over the last year of consultations leading up to this legislative proposal, the Minister of the Environment has especially benefited from the wisdom of the Endangered Species Conservation Task Force, a group with representation from wildlife experts, environmentalists, farmers, fishermen, foresters, and the mining, pulp and paper, and petroleum industries. They are the people on the front lines. They have acted in good faith despite their often divergent interests.

She has asked the task force to reconvene to provide advice on some outstanding issues, including a strategy for education programs and the application of the legislative proposals to crown corporations. She would also like further advice on issues of cost and compensation. She is particularly concerned that farmers and aboriginal peoples, the stewards of the land, are treated fairly by a new law.

The minister asked the task force to give thought to how we can ensure the active participation of the maximum number of Canadians in protecting endangered species. In effect, how do we ensure that there is a national safety net for species at risk?

[Translation]

As we prepare for new legislation on the protection of endangered species in Canada, we should feel particularly grateful to the young people in this country. Students across the country have kept up the pressure on the minister. They have circulated petitions and sent thousands of individual letters into which they put a great deal of thought.

The minister means what she says when she wants Canada's young people to continue to help her write this legislation. The bill will be available on Environment Canada's green line on Internet, and the minister urges everyone to send their comments. We want to have the best possible legislation that will support economic growth while protecting genetic diversity and the species and ecosystems that constitute the biological basis of our world. We owe it to endangered species and to future generations of Canadians.

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on Bill C–275, an act respecting the protection and rehabilitation of endangered and threatened species, tabled in the House on September 28, 1994 by the member for Davenport.

This bill provides for the identification, protection and rehabilitation of flora and fauna in Canada threatened or endangered by human activity and for the protection of habitat and the restoration of population. It gives the Minister of the Environment a mandate to develop and implement programs to restore and maintain these species.

I congratulate the member for Davenport for tabling this bill and for his devotion to the cause of ecology. The goal is a very plausible one.

• (1755)

It must be said that, despite international conventions and the very important United Nations conference on development and the environment held in Rio de Janeiro in 1992, I note that, generally, countries and governments do not do enough in this area.

As you know, I come from Chile, which, like other countries in Latin America, has rich flora and fauna. However, there as well, certain species are threatened and endangered. There is the condor, for example, a huge and majestic bird that lives in the Andes, or the llamas or the guanacos. These are species that inhabit the countries of the Andes, Peru, in particular, and Chile. Fortunately, for the first time, the Chilean government has enacted legislation on the environment. Another example is Costa Rica, which has very special and wonderful flora and fauna and is also doing a lot to preserve its natural wealth.

Efforts in species preservation must be concerted. National and international co–operation must be established. Fish, marine mammals and migratory birds must be protected first and foremost. This bill provides for the creation of two organizations: the Committee on the Status of Endangered Wildlife in Canada and the Committee on the Recovery of Nationally Endangered Wildlife.

It also authorizes any citizen to submit an application to the Minister of the Environment to have species added to or removed from the list of threatened or endangered species. The minister will have six months to respond to such applications and will have to table a full report on June 1 each year on the matter.

Canada still has a lot of work to do, despite its fine international reputation in environmental matters. In November 1994, the Minister of the Environment published a working document advocating the strengthening of laws to protect species threatened with extinction in Canada. In addition she announced new federal legislation in this area. At the moment in Canada, 236 species of flora and fauna are endangered, threatened or at risk.

Since the 17th century, Canada has lost at least 14 species of bird, mammal and fish. The situation worsens each year. These species are lost due to human activity. Over hunting is the most serious threat. There are fewer and fewer old forests. Wildlife is threatened by chemical pollution in the environment. Acid rain, air pollution and global warming add to the pressures on these species.

Canada should apply more firmly the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species of Wild Flora and Fauna. It must put a stop to the over harvesting of endangered species in the world as a whole. Illegal trade in certain wild animals has almost led to their extinction.

I would like to take a moment to voice my criticism at the decision by the Nova Corporation of Calgary, which was awarded the contract to build a pipeline between Argentina and Chile, and, to save money, will cross right through the city of Pirque and has already started cutting through extremely rare and ancient trees in Chile along the way. The Chilean parliament recently adopted a resolution supporting the demands of the population of Pirque, a city located at the foot of the Andean Cordillera, who wants the gas pipeline to be kept at a distance from their city.

• (1800)

That resolution also calls for a complete study on the environmental impact to be carried out before the pipeline is constructed. In my opinion, Canadian companies in other countries ought to respect the same environmental standards as those in effect in Canada. I have taken the liberty of writing to the Minister of the Environment deploring this situation and asking that she intervene with the management of the Nova Corporation of Calgary to ensure that it will comply in Chile with the standards already in force in Canada. I would ask the same of all Canadian corporations who invest in other countries. There is a moral duty to respect the minimum legislation already in place in Canada.

Although this is typically a provincial responsibility, much to our dismay only four provinces have passed legislation to protect these species, and I am referring to Quebec, Ontario, New Brunswick and Manitoba.

I am delighted to say that for years Quebec has had its own legislation and its own Department of the Environment and Wildlife, one of whose objectives is to protect threatened species.

The federal government has limited jurisdiction in this area. It is responsible for the preservation of fauna and flora on federal lands, for instance, parks managed by Ottawa. It is also responsible for regulating international and interprovincial trade and for preventing illegal trafficking in endangered species. However, it should not encroach on provincial jurisdictions, and especially Quebec's.

This legislation has raised many questions in this regard. The Quebec Minister of the Environment and Wildlife, Jacques Brassard, has already announced his own strategy for the preservation of Quebec's biological diversity. He has asked the federal government to remain within the sectors that are its exclusive responsibility.

My Bloc Quebecois colleagues, the hon. members for Laurentides and Anjou—Rivières–des–Prairies, previously commented in considerable detail on the subject during the debate last June.

Although the bill's objectives are indeed praiseworthy, I cannot support this legislation because it encroaches on provincial jurisdictions, and more particularly that of Quebec.

Once again I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Davenport on his dedication to environmental issues, which I fully support, but I also wish to inform him that the Bloc Quebecois will vote against this bill.

[English]

Mr. Glen McKinnon (Brandon—Souris, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise today to speak on this bill. Previous speakers today have enunciated the fact that there has been or still is a patchwork of legislation across the country.

There appears to be some consistency lacking. Concerns about a lack of endangered species legislation in greater Canada has been expressed for well over a decade.

It is my view that all Canadians have a moral responsibility to ensure that future generations enjoy and benefit from the presence of diverse wildlife species. The federal, provincial and territorial governments together must provide the required leadership and legislative tools thereto. That strategy will set the stage for action in a number of areas, including the identification and protection of endangered species.

The biodiversity convention calls for the development or maintenance of necessary legislation to protect wildlife and their habitats at risk.

• (1805)

The responsibility for protecting endangered species is shared among the federal, provincial and territorial governments. Options for federal endangered species legislation have been explored with the preferred course of action being a co–operative national approach. The federal government continues to work co–operatively with the provinces and the territories to develop and ensure this national approach. Because there is currently no federal endangered species legislation in Canada and only a patchwork of provincial legislation, we need a strengthened national effort to ensure endangered species conservation.

In November 1994 the Minister of the Environment was presented with a 75,000 signature petition calling for a law to protect endangered species. This petition, the more than 5,000 subsequent letters and the comments made during public consultations clearly indicate that Canadians, children and adults alike, expect federal leadership on this issue.

An Angus Reid poll conducted in May showed that an overwhelming majority of Canadians, 94 per cent, support the idea of federal legislation to protect species at risk. The support for legislation is firm. Seventy–five per cent of Canadians strongly support such legislation and 20 per cent somewhat support it.

Last November the Minister of the Environment released a discussion paper on endangered species legislation in Canada, another one on a proposed national approach to endangered species conservation in April and a series of public workshops were held in May.

In August 1995, with full cabinet approval, the Minister of the Environment released for public comment a legislative proposal to protect endangered species entitled "The Canadian Endangered Species Protection Act: A Legislative Proposal". The legislative proposal was released to ensure that the federal government is doing its part and working co–operatively with other jurisdictions to protect endangered species throughout the country.

The minister encouraged the public to provide comments on the legislative proposal prior to introducing legislation in the House of Commons in the spring. The comments received will help the federal government finalize its plans for protecting endangered species.

The proposed legislation would help prevent wild Canadian species from becoming extinct as a consequence of human activities and mandate the recovery of species where technically and economically feasible. It would apply to species on federal lands and waters or under federal authority.

The proposal arises from discussions with the provinces and territories on a national approach to Canadian endangered species protection. It also responds to the comments, suggestions and briefings made by Canadians at the public consultation workshops held across the country, as well as to the recommendations of a federal endangered species conservation task force. There were also many useful aspects of Bill C–275, which stands in the name of the hon. member for Davenport and was introduced in September 1994, which were also considered in drafting the proposed legislation.

The proposal under consideration by the Minister of the Environment is consistent with the commitment enunciated in the red book which puts forward a vision of society that "protects the long term health and diversity of all species on the planet". The proposed legislation would also clearly demonstrate this government's commitment to the Convention on Biological Diversity.

The federal endangered species conservation task force, made up of representatives from environmental groups, industry and industry associations, academia and small business was established by the Minister of the Environment to advise her on the contents of the federal endangered species legislation. The task force reconvened early in October to provide additional advice on a number of key issues, including the best way to achieve the desired safety net that will ensure that all endangered species in Canada receive the protection they deserve. The task force is expected to provide its report to the Minister of the Environment by mid–November.

The legislative proposal is intended to form the federal component of a comprehensive national safety net for the country's most vulnerable species.

With the co–operation of federal, provincial and territorial governments, the proposed legislation will succeed in providing a strong national approach for the conservation of endangered species.

• (1810)

The proposed legislation will apply to the full extent of federal authority to federally managed species everywhere and federally managed marine areas. The proposed legislation would establish a national listing process for all species in Canada regardless of where they occur.

Federal government actions will not intrude into provincial and territorial responsibilities. The common but differentiated responsibilities of the federal, provincial and territorial governments with respect to endangered species are recognized. The proposed legislation is intended to complement, not contradict, provincial and territorial actions.

The release of the legislative proposal prior to the tabling of a formal bill demonstrates our commitment to protecting Canada's endangered species and our commitment to open and transparent government. The federal government remains committed to working co–operatively with the provinces and territories to develop an effective national approach to endangered species conservation. By taking action at the federal level and getting our own house in order we are demonstrating our commitment to making the national approach work.

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today in support of Bill C–275, an act respecting the protection and rehabilitation of endangered and threatened species proposed by my hon. colleague, the member for Davenport.

The protection of endangered flora and fauna must be a matter which concerns us all. Extinction is forever. When a species becomes extinct, it is a loss for both the world and for Canada. Anyone who cares about maintaining healthy ecosystems for future generations must by extension care about endangered species.

In Canada, known throughout the world for the richness of our wilderness areas, the preservation of our animals, birds and plant life is akin to the preservation of our national identity. We have a tendency to think that species extinction is someone else's problem. However, the truth is that since the arrival of Europeans, at least eight of our distinct animal species and at least one population of caribou have become extinct.

More than 105 species, subspecies or populations of plants and animals are listed as threatened or endangered and more than 111 are considered vulnerable. It is our problem too. We can count ourselves very fortunate to have not only the hon. member for Davenport working on the problem but also the Minister of the Environment.

In the modern world, species extinction is alarming not because it happens but because of why it happens and the rate at which it happens. In the days of the dinosaurs species disappeared at the rate of roughly one every thousand years. By the Middle Ages extinction rates began to accelerate rapidly because of increasing human intervention in the environment. Between 1600 and 1900, as human beings learned to kill more and more efficiently, species were lost at a rate of one every four years. In the years between 1900 and 1975 the disappearance rate climbed to about one species per year. Today biologists estimate human beings destroy from one to three species per day. Some predict that by the end of the century the rate will have accelerated to one per hour and that up to 15 per cent of all species now on earth will be gone.

Protecting the species that are threatened today entails far more than merely restricting hunting and trapping. In our modern, industrialized world habitat destruction and environmental contamination are the most hazardous perils to our endangered species.

• (1815)

Each of them is far more deadly and more subtle than the gun or trap and far more difficult to control. Canada's wildlife habitats are vanishing very quickly.

Millions of hectares of marshes, swamps and other wetlands which are extremely important for waterfowl and as breeding grounds for fish have already been destroyed.

In the interests of what we thought was progress they have been drained or filled in for highways, airports, housing and industrial complexes. They have been absorbed by expanding farmlands and flooded behind large power dams. Forests have been cleared and grasslands have been fenced off, ploughed under or paved over.

Too many of Canada's wetlands have already been lost. Up to 71 per cent of prairie wetlands have been degraded by agricultural practices. In southern Ontario over 70 per cent of wetlands have been lost. The problem of wetlands is particularly serious. A dramatic decline in the waterfowl population is taking place.

Canada's modern lifestyle with its heavy dependence on industrial, household and agricultural chemicals also poses a serious risk to endangered species. Modern society puts species in jeopardy in many ways. Acid rain can kill pond and other aquatic life and has a negative effect on soils and forest growth. Unless it is stopped it is quite possible acid precipitation will begin to take a toll on endangered species.

Some wildlife biologists already believe that acid rain is at least a partial culprit in the population declines of some species of waterfowl and amphibians.

Although the environment minister has proposed draft legislation in this field, it is important to note Canada does not yet have a national endangered species act. Legislation is in force in only four provinces.

Unfortunately endangered animals, birds and plants do not recognize provincial or even international boundaries. For this reason it is imperative that Canada have a federal presence in this area.

In terms of our international commitments Canada must have clear, strong legislation protecting and rehabilitating our endangered and threatened species.

As my hon. friend said before, Canada's responsibility goes back to the UN Conference on Sustainable Development and the Environment in Rio in 1992. Canada was among if not the first nation to sign the convention on biodiversity when delegates of some 150 nations arrived at a consensus on what needs to be done. We can be proud of this but we can be even more proud once we have adopted strong legislation backing up our commitment.

I thank the hon. member for Davenport for his unflagging devotion to the cause of protecting our vulnerable wildlife. I also commend both the member and the Minister of the Environment for joining forces to ensure that strong law protecting threatened species and their habitats becomes a reality.

Mrs. Jane Stewart (Brant, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to join in the debate on this bill.

Our colleague from Davenport has worked his whole career in the area of environmental sustainability and environmental support. I am pleased to support him in the efforts he brings to the House to help us understand and continue with his striving to support the environment and in this case endangered species in Canada.

• (1820)

One of my favourite things to do in my riding of Brant is to go into the schools, public schools or high schools. Without a doubt in every circumstance the issue of the environment is always raised.

When I think back to my days as a young student it was never a top of the mind subject. We truly have come a long way in terms of appreciating and understanding the importance of our environment and the role it plays in the lives of our young people. I am so glad to see the changing attitudes of Canadians toward our environment, toward the importance of sustainability.

In my riding I have the great fortune to live on a farm. My family has been there for five generations. One of the things we enjoy doing every Sunday if possible is walking through the fields along the railway tracks, through the wooded areas and looking at the wildlife. We see red foxes, racoons, deer. We look at the flora and every spring we wait to see the blooming trilliums and the may–apples. It has become a tradition in our family that we pass along from generation to generation. It is one of my favourite things to do with my two sons on a Sunday afternoon.

At the schools the children always ask me what the government is doing about the environment. I am always very pleased to explain to them that our Deputy Prime Minister also has the responsibility for the environment and that she is taking very assertive and definite approaches to making sure the things that have become very much a part of our country remain in our country.

I was shocked to find out as I was preparing for this discussion that there are 244 endangered species in Canada alone, 244 endangered, threatened or vulnerable species. Knowing that, we can understand why the hon. member for Davenport feels so strongly about the importance of this legislation.

I am not sure this is true but as I look at information I see nine extinct species, things in my lifetime I will never see. A further 11 species used to exist in Canada but are now extinct. The importance of preparing to maintain and protect our fragile environment is something that has to be critical to all of us.

I am very proud of a project undertaken by a number of groups in my riding, the Brant Waterways Foundation, the Grand River Conservation Authority and the Grand River Trails Association. They came together in partnership with the federal government through the environmental partners program to develop the Brantford environmental education project. Along the Grand River, now a heritage river, we have created walkways, bike paths and trails that all can enjoy.

The thing that is so important in this regard is along the shores of the Grand River are Carolinian forests, themselves an endangered and rare set of flora and fauna. We are very lucky in our community to have them as part of our surrounding environment, something we can enjoy with ease. We are also lucky to have organizations in Brant that are conscious of how fragile this great resource is.

Coming together and with the support of the federal government we have protected that in a way that people can enjoy it. It is not for the people of Brant only. I encourage members of the House and Canadians from across the country to come and join with us.

At our local level we have a consciousness, an awareness of the importance of the environment. I am glad that will continue. However, when we look at the rest of the country it is interesting to note that only in Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick is there legislation to protect our flora and fauna. Again, this is another reason why I would congratulate the member for Davenport for bringing this legislation forward.

• (1825)

The federal government can play a real role in ensuring that our natural heritage remains with us. It will not be a role that is interventionist or that gets in the way of what the provinces want to do. Rather it is one that will co–ordinate activities, that will add to that which we already have, that will make sure the Canadian citizenry understands the importance and has access to our environment.

We know from looking at things that have taken place in the past, and I have to reference the Canada Health Act, that very often it is promises that start with good pieces of legislation. However, it may be very slow to evolve across the country. That is where a strong federal government can play a role.

I make that relationship with this particular piece of legislation and say there is a role for us to play at the federal level to ensure that Canada from coast to coast to coast maintains what has become world renowned in natural beauty, natural strength, natural resources and natural heritage.

I am pleased to be part of the debate. I know people back in my riding who are so sensitive and appreciative of the issues of the environment will also be glad to know that the government is sponsoring this kind of legislation.

Mr. Larry McCormick (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to speak to Bill C–275.

I congratulate the hon. member for Davenport on this bill and also the Minister of the Environment and her parliamentary secretary for the work they are doing on this very important topic. It is very important to take the initiatives of these people and work with them. We owe our children and our children's children our prompt attention to this very important endangered species Act.

This past year I attended two open houses at the Body Shop, one in Kingston, Ontario and one in Belleville, Ontario. This respectable company had a great display set up with everything from colouring contests to T–shirts and it encourages children to take part. It has done a great job of making people aware of endangered species around the world.

I am sure if we looked at the bottom line of the Body Shop stores across Canada and talked to the individual owners, we would find that their number one customers are the teenagers and the youth of today. Our daughter is one of those customers. I commend our youth. They understand the importance of our environment.

We are very fortunate that our children, including my daughter, Kayla Rebecca, have developed this great love for country, love for the environment and for our wildlife. I realize that we do not have to go to the Body Shop to be reminded of their interest.

My colleague previously mentioned visiting schools. I also want to mention this. I was on a local school board a few years ago when we started up a community school and we now have a day care situated across the road from our home. I visit schools and day cares. Posters are plastered on the walls. It does not matter what topic is displayed, sports or the environment, we see birds and other species depicted on the posters for any topic. Our youth are very aware.

We all agree that the greatest asset of our country is our youth. We are very fortunate. They are very wise in their respect of the planet, our country, our lands and our waterways. Therefore, we owe our children attention to this now.

My riding of Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington extends from the Thousand Islands, which we are glad to share with my colleague for Kingston and the Islands. Then it circles around and goes to the Bay of Quinte, the walleye capital of the world. That is where we had the live release tournament this year, the largest walleye tournament in North America with 7,000 to 8,000 fisherpeople, but they released all the fish and it made our children very happy.

• (1830)

I drive from my office in Napanee to Bancroft and on up to Algonquin Park. My riding touches quite a bit of Algonquin Park. Quite often I see wildlife. It is a real thrill.

The other day I was in Algonquin Park for the Art in the Park show. My wife and daughter were with me. We were driving along and a tour bus and cars were stopped. People were having the thrill of a lifetime because there was a bear in the bush. The bear was playing up for the public. The bear was standing there scratching on the trees and foraging a bit. It certainly reminds us of what we would lose and what we do lose any time we lose one species.

Someone else mentioned that when I went to school we did not pay all this attention to the environment. No, we did not but perhaps it was being introduced into our subconscious minds. One of the highlights in public school was arbour day, when we went out and planted trees. Over a few years we did plant a few thousand trees and made a small contribution. I am sure I have driven by some of those areas. The trees are tall now because that was a while ago. Trees are very important; they provide a natural habitat for birds.

When I went to school we did not have respect for the wetlands, I admit. Today our children are more curious and more in love with all of these endangered species.

What do we do? Where do we go from here? We have all heard that there is no national law to protect them. Some of the provinces have laws. I am glad to see that the federal government and Environment Canada are going to work with the provinces on this. They are going to work with different stakeholders, groups, provinces, territories, aboriginal groups and wildlife management boards.

We can learn a lot from the aboriginal groups, from the natives in our communities. Someone listening to me is going to say: "Yes, I heard about some natives that went out during the fish spawning season and speared a whole lot of fish". Yes, there are bad apples in every barrel, but I will tell you our native populations live in harmony with this country. There is much we can learn from them. They have always practised conservation.

When you tap any natural resource you leave some for seed. My uncle was a trapper many years ago, a colourful character. He made a lot of money some years trapping beaver. One day I was with him and I used an axe to cut through two and a half feet of ice on the river behind our home. He set the trap and took out a very nice beaver, but he said that was it. I went with him the next day and he said: "We will not set any more traps here. We have to leave some for the future".

I will conclude by saying I really appreciate the opportunity for me and other people to speak on this. I want to acknowledge that our youth will lead the way. They remind us every day and every weekend at home.

[Translation]

The Speaker: My colleagues, the hour provided for consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

[English]

Pursuant to Standing Order 93, the order is dropped to the bottom of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

CLIMATE CHANGE

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on September 21 I asked the Minister of the Environment what measures the government was taking to counter the human causes of climate change. In the meantime, a draft report by the United Nations panel on climate change has been published citing human activity as the contributing factor to climate change. In addition, there has been an Environment Canada report citing increasing summer temperatures in the last 10 years.

• (1835)

What is the cause of climate change? Briefly, it is caused by an envelope in the atmosphere which is created by the burning of fossil fuels on our part as a society, beginning with the industrial revolution 150 years ago.

What are the effects of this envelope? This envelope does not allow solar rays deflected once they touch the earth's surface to re–enter the atmosphere. Thus, the greenhouse effect is gradually formed. In other words, the effect of solar rays as deflected by the earth's surface is no longer the same as in the past. They are contained by the greenhouse gases envelope.

What is the main problem at the base of this? In essence, it is our dependence on fossil fuels, coal and gasoline, but also the emission of methane gases in our dump sites and the production of other gases that are mostly correlated to human activities or the necessities of agriculture and the like.

Next month the international panel on climate change will meet and likely approve a draft report which will mark a major turning point in the climate change debate.

Until now some members of the scientific community believe that the rising temperatures since the beginning of the industrial revolution could be attributed to at least in good part a variability in climate rather than the result of human activity. With this draft, the scientific panel will likely state and confirm that climate change is taking place as a result of human activity. Hence the adoption of this report by the international panel on climate change would result in an authoritative confirmation that global warming is posing a threat.

Some have suggested that the effects of climate change may actually be advantageous to Canada. These assumptions are now being refuted.

The report I am referring to predicts the changes associated with climate change are likely to have a negative impact not only on human health but on other human activities such as agriculture, forestry and the like.

The consequences are far reaching in economic and social terms. These are again explored in the panel's draft report as discussed last week in Montreal. The first attempt to assess the social and economic impact of climate change is the one that took place in Montreal.

I would appreciate very much a reply by the parliamentary secretary to this issue which, although stretched into the long term, is going to be of significant importance for the human family the globe over.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Davenport raised an important issue when he asked this question of the Minister of the Environment a month ago. He of course based it on an editorial in the Globe and Mail. I want to refer to that which was on the subject of the need to take action on climate change. It was published shortly before the hon. member asked his question.

The editorial makes some good points about voluntary approaches and the need to adapt to a rapidly changing climate. These clearly are not enough to deal with the problem. After all, the evidence that our climate may be changing at an unprecedented rate is rolling in on a daily basis as the hon. member has indicated.

In Canada, the summer of 1995 was the third warmest in a century. The year 1995 was the second worst year in history for forest fires. Record rains have hit Alberta and five early season tropical storms hit parts of the Atlantic provinces.

This year is shaping up as the earth's warmest year on record. It is also a preview of what we can expect in the future. Scientists are concluding that recent data constitute growing statistical evidence that their previous predictions of climate change are being borne out.

Therefore, in calling for voluntary reductions of emissions of greenhouse gases the Globe and Mail is heading in the right direction. After all, the Globe and Mail would have us recognize that the costs of climate change are also rapidly rising. Damages from the Alberta floods in June exceeded $50 million. Heat and humidity helped fuel one of Ontario's most destructive storms, causing $20 million in property losses and firefighting costs associated with the loss of nearly seven million hectares of forest across Canada.

By reducing our emissions of greenhouse gases we will reduce the threat and costs of climate change and at the same time create jobs and become more competitive economically. I am quite sure that as Canada's business leaders continue to respond to the economic opportunity associated with reducing energy consumption, thereby reducing emissions of greenhouse gases, the Globe and Mail will take another step in the right direction and agree that the goals contained in Canada's national action program on climate change must be met. We must stabilize our emissions of greenhouse gases at 1990 levels by the year 2000 and address further reductions over the longer term. Meeting such a goal will require that we take a mix of approaches, voluntary measures wherever possible and market based or regulatory measures where appropriate.

As my time has run out, I conclude my remarks.

The Speaker: Colleagues, pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

(The House adjourned at 6.41 p.m.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, October 19, 1995

The House met at 10 a.m.

Prayers

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table in both official languages the government's response to 24 petitions.

* * *

[Translation]

B.C. TREATY COMMISSION

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, two copies of the 1994–95 annual report of the B.C. Treaty Commission.

* * *

[English]

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT RETIRING ALLOWANCES ACT

Mr. Dan McTeague (Ontario, Lib.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–352, an act to amend the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act (members who cease to be citizens of Canada).

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill would disqualify a former member or the former member's estate or family from any allowance or benefit under the act if the member ceases to be a Canadian citizen.

This is in essence a bit of housework on my behalf. It would not apply to the withdrawal allowance payable to a member who ceases to participate in the plan which consists of the return of the member's earlier contributions plus interest.

(Motions deemed adopted, bill read the first time and printed.)

* * *

NATIONAL ORGAN DONOR DAY ACT

Mr. Dan McTeague (Ontario, Lib.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–353, an act respecting a national organ donor day in Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill recognizes the efforts of a constituent of mine, Mrs. Linda Rumble of Whitby, Ontario, and the ultimate gift her nephew, two–year old Stuart Alan Herriott, gave to others whom he had never met.

The bill will assist in providing more public education and awareness on organ donation by making every April 21 known as national organ donor day right across this great nation.

April 21 marks the anniversary of the death of Stuart, affectionately known by his family as Stu Buddy. It is hoped that by establishing a national organ donor day more Canadians will be encouraged to make a pledge to organ donation. In doing so, Stuart's supreme gift will be remembered and his act of kindness can be repeated by other Canadians throughout Canada.

(Motions deemed adopted, bill read the first time and printed.)

* * *

PETITIONS

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my great privilege to present a petition from my constituents reaffirming the importance of a united Canada.

This petition is signed and supported by French as well as English speaking Canadians, by aboriginal Canadians and by those Canadians who have come from other countries.

It is an honour for me to represent these cultures as they come together to voice their desire to keep Canada united and to keep Quebec in Canada.

[Translation]

Clearly, a vast majority of Canadians want a strong, united Canada, as do a large number of French Canadians and other francophones in Canada.

[English]

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Dale Johnston (Wetaskiwin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my pleasure to present a petition signed by some 120 constituents of Wetaskiwin.

The petitioners pray and request that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the charter of rights and freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the human rights code to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase of sexual orientation.

• (1010)

TAXATION

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition which has been circulating all across Canada. The petition has been signed by a number of Canadians from Delta and Vancouver, B.C.

The petitioners would like to draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession which has not been recognized for its value to our society. They also state that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families who make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill, or the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call upon Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families who decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill, or the aged.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am certainly pleased to present a petition signed by well over 100 residents, mostly in the Campobello area of my riding of Carleton—Charlotte.

The petitioners draw the attention of the House to the fact that GST for short term rentals from the United States is applied to the full value of the item being rented instead of on the rental value itself. They request that Parliament assess the GST to be only on the market rental value of the item in question in the future. I am pleased to table this petition.

TAXATION

Mrs. Rose-Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition. The petitioners call upon Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families that decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, as well as for the disabled, the chronically ill and the aged.

PESTICIDES

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a number of petitions.

The first is signed by many hundreds of people in the province of British Columbia. It relates to the Pest Control Products Act and is particularly directed toward the poisons that were introduced for pesticidal use after World War II and which created a serious environmental hazard.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition relates to the Young Offenders Act. It calls attention to the increase in sexual predatory acts and asks for tougher legislation.

The third petition relates again to the Young Offenders Act and specifically refers to acts of violence committed by young people. The petitioners ask for changes to the Young Offenders Act.

TAXATION

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the fourth petition is also from residents of British Columbia. It relates to the conscientious objection act, in particular to the payment of taxes for the maintenance of Canadian military forces.

* * *

[Translation]

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[Translation]

LAW COMMISSION OF CANADA

The House resumed from October 17, consideration of the motion that Bill C-106, an act respecting the Law Commission of Canada, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we are now at the second reading stage of Bill C-106, an act to create, or rather to exhume, the Law Commission of Canada. The Minister of Justice now wants to revive this useless creature, which cost taxpayers $105 million over its 20 years of existence and which made only a few recommendations that were adopted by Parliament.

The Law Reform Commission created in 1971 was responsible for reviewing Canada's laws on an on–going and systematic basis. The research work done by the former commission was divided into three main areas: substantive criminal law, criminal procedure, and administrative law. In its last year of existence, the commission had a budget of $5 million.

• (1015)

In addition to its members and employees, the commission hired a number of outside consultants.

The commission spent over 82 per cent of its budget on salaries and on special and professional services. This small organization was very costly. Most of its staff consisted of university researchers and lawyers hired as consultants for short periods. The emphasis was on research and not on efficient management. Research programs that were out of touch with reality and astronomical costs were the two main reasons why the government of the day pulled the plug on the old commission.

With Bill C–106, the Minister of Justice is about to make a monumental mistake. The minister is showing the federal government's inability to manage responsibly. Therefore, he is giving us another good reason to vote Yes on October 30.

The Minister of Justice intends to sink millions of dollars into a revived law reform commission. This shameful waste must be vigorously denounced.

I am appalled to see that the Minister of Justice has still not recovered from acute consultitis. Not only has he been consulting left and right since receiving his mandate but he now wants to create an organization dedicated to consulting. As silly as this may sound, the Minister of Justice is nonetheless taking himself seriously.

Let me read you the first paragraph of the bill's preamble. It reads: "whereas, after extensive national consultations, the Government of Canada has determined that it is desirable to establish a commission to provide independent advice on improvements, modernization and reform of the law of Canada, which advice would be based on the knowledge and experience of a wide range of groups and individuals".

The government of Canada has determined that it is desirable to waste $3 million per year on this consulting commission. It has determined that it is desirable to appoint 29 of its federalist friends to this commission.

It seems obvious to me that the Minister of Justice and his government are taking us for fools. Let me tell you that, whatever the consultation minister's views on the matter, Bloc Quebecois members will not let him table something as half baked as this without denouncing it.

Did he expect that we would be too busy during the referendum to notice he was pulling a fast one on us? Perhaps he assumed that the miller could not look after the mill and the oven at the same time.

As I said a moment ago, the minister's condition is going from bad to worse. His bill provides that all those involved are to consult one another. I consult you, you consult me, we consult each other. At a cost of $3 million per year, this makes for a very expensive consultation process.

Clause 5 of Bill C–106 states, and I quote:

> (1) The Commission shall
>
> (a) consult with the Minister of Justice with respect to the annual program of studies that it proposes to undertake;
>
> (b) prepare such reports as the Minister, after consultation with the Commission and taking into consideration the workload and resources of the Commission, may require;

And that is not all. Clause 18 provides for the establishment of the Law Commission of Canada Advisory Council, and clause 19 states, and I quote:

> The Council shall—advise the Commission on any matter relating to the purpose of the Commission, including the Commission's strategic directions and long–term program of studies and the review of the Commission's performance.

This silliness goes on in clause 20, which reads, and I quote:

> For the purpose of advising and assisting the Commission in any particular project, the Commission may establish a study panel presided over by a Commissioner and consisting of persons having specialized knowledge in, or particularly affected by, the matter to be studied.

Between obtaining advice, consulting and acting on this advice and the results of consultations, I wonder when the commissioners will find the time to do their job, to justify an annual budget of $3 million. This is outrageous.

• (1020)

This bill does not even have the merit of being an original piece of legislation. It is almost a carbon copy of the Law Reform Commission Act, which was repealed three years ago. The two texts are so similar that you might think they are one and the same. For example, the provisions dealing with the goals and objectives of the commissions, both the former one and the one being proposed, are substantially identical. I hope that the minister is not serious when he claims that the future commission will be different from the old one, because their goals and objectives are identical. The only difference is the purported independence of the new commission. I will get back to this.

If you read the two legal texts side by side, you come to the following conclusion. The former commission's mandate was to study and review Canada's acts and legal rules, while the proposed commission will study and review Canada's law.

The former commission was set up to eliminate anachronisms and flaws in the law, while the proposed commission will provide advice to eliminate the rules of law which have become obsolete, as well as the flaws in the law.

The former commission was to develop new methods and concepts related to the law, while the proposed commission will provide advice to develop new legal perspectives and concepts.

It is six of one and half a dozen of the other. We were told that justice department officials worked on this legislation for two years. It is unthinkable that they would have spent so much time to come up with this result. The only new element proposed by the minister is the commission's advisory body, which will include 24 members. The minister wants to bring back to life an organization which should not be revived.

The reasons the previous government disbanded the former commission are essentially the ones for which the Bloc Quebecois cannot now support such a waste of public money. The previous government had come to the conclusion that the services provided by the former commission could be adequately obtained by transferring to the justice department the responsibility of commissioning research work from non governmental organizations, under specific mandates. The Minister of Justice and his department were to seek the opinion of researchers and professionals on a factual basis. Consequently, the Law Reform Commission was disbanded and the resources to be kept were transferred to the justice department.

Interestingly, that department currently has a division called the Law Reform Division. This division was formed after the old commission disappeared. The financial resources of the former commission were therefore added to the budget of Justice. The division had an budget of $1.5 million the first year and $2 million the next. At the present time it has three full time employees and one part time.

The minister wishes to create a new commission when there are already competent staff in place capable of meeting the government's requirements. The law reform division does a good job of carrying out the task for which it is intended. The minister can very readily mandate this law reform division to carry out all projects focussing on orienting or reforming Canadian law or to seek innovative solutions to endemic problems. Ironically, in May 1994 it was this division which assumed responsibility for distribution of a questionnaire to 884 individuals or organizations concerning the creation of a new law reform commission.

The department got back 126 responses to its mailing of 884 questionnaires. So much for the extensive consultations referred to in the preamble to the bill.

The minister would have us believe that his commission will be independent in nature. This is clearly indicated in clause 3, which states as follows:

> The purpose of the Commission is to study—the concepts—of the common law and civil law systems—with a view to providing independent advice on improvements, modernization and reform—

This is total nonsense. The partisan character of the process to appoint the five commissioners is obvious. These positions are clearly rewards for good and faithful service. The five commissioners will in fact be appointed by the Prime Minister on the recommendation of the Minister of Justice. It goes without saying that these commissioners will be paid royally. Certainly, the annual commission budget is evaluated at $3 million. As well, the commissioners' appointments will be during pleasure, in other words they can be dismissed if they are found unsuitable and do not toe the party line.

• (1025)

After appointment, the commissioners will in turn appoint the members of the advisory council. There will be 24 of them, and they also will hold office during pleasure.

These 29 persons will therefore make up the Law Commission of Canada. With 29 partisan appointments, the Minister of Justice is setting up his own fan club. To be a member, all you have to do is be in the good graces of the Minister of Justice and be willing to go through three million dollars a year. This will be a fan club of intellectuals philosophizing on legal niceties. They will be so disconnected from reality that the Minister of Justice will not take long to realize his error and will put an end to this nonsense.

In looking at the reasons the old commission was dissolved we can understand why there ought not to be another. The old one was strongly criticized by the office of the Auditor General of Canada in the House. In 1985, it carried out an in depth analysis of the operations and administration of the defunct commission. In his report, the auditor general was critical of the commission's project management.

The following is very illuminating: "Since 1972, the commission has not revised its original research program or submitted a supplementary or a second program, despite extensive changes in its work. Also significant delays have occurred in carrying out its research program and significantly more resources have been committed to it than were envisaged in 1972. For example, none of the estimated completion dates was met, and many of the original projects are still in progress 10 years after their originally stated completion dates".

The auditor general went on to say that the program's effectiveness was not measured, there was a lack of guidelines concerning project management and a lack of control and supervision.

Clearly, the Minister of Justice never bothered to read the auditor general's report. He should have. The former commission, however, was rather proud of its record. In 1991, in the commission's twentieth annual report, the president at the time, Gilles Létourneau, eager to justify the commission's existence, wrote that on the occasion of its twentieth anniversary, the commission could be proud of the impressive number of its achievements, especially in the legislative field, that the commission was far more than an agency that made recommendations to Parliament on how to improve Canadian laws, and that, in fact, it had initiated extensive research in various areas of the law, producing 33 reports, 63 working papers, 78 published studies and more than 300 supporting documents.

I would be curious to know where all those documents are gathering dust. It is all very well to say that the commission produced reams of documents, but to what purpose? In 20 years only three proposals for legislation were accepted by Parliament. The explanation is simple. A commission that operates in tandem with governments cannot hope to amend or improve the law if its amendments or reforms are not part of the legislative agenda of the government of the day.

• (1030)

The auditor general's report is very informative about this aspect as well, and I quote: "The commission, however, is not satisfied with its impact on legislative changes and readily acknowledges its modest record in comparison with that of other law reform commissions. Because of its statutory independence, it establishes its own programs and has not been asked by the Minister of Justice to carry out specific research activities. Therefore, the commission's areas of research and study often have not been high priority areas for government legislative agendas".

The dissatisfaction of the commissioners at the time seems to indicate that the former commission was more in need of direction and controls than independence and broad, poorly defined mandates. The Department of Justice never played its role as a supervisory body. The situation was allowed to deteriorate to the point that the government no longer had a choice. It had to get rid of the commission and merge some of its resources with the Department of Justice, leading to the creation of the law reform division.

I must say the approach taken by the Minister of Justice is not very sound. He calls the future commission a new and improved law reform commission of Canada. If he really wanted improvements, he would leave things as they are. He already has a new and improved commission within his own department. I fail to understand the justification provided by the Minister of Justice, because, aside from handing out goodies to friends, the future commission has no reason to exist.

Upon tabling the bill, the minister stated that Canada's legal system faced complex problems that deserved more than a legal solution. Effective and long–term solutions required an approach that considered legal, social, economic and other aspects. The federal government was of the opinion that an independent and multidisciplinary law reform body was essential to this process.

The future commission will never be independent, since it will be a fan club of the Minister of Justice. Even assuming that appointments to the commission would not be partisan, the Minister of Justice is heading straight for disaster. A more or less independent commission would operate exactly like the former commission, in other words, without controls and without supervision.

The Minister of Justice has not learned from the mistakes of the former commission. He preferred to ignore the auditor general's report which was very critical of the commission. He still does not realize that his department already has a division that is concerned specifically with law reform.

Those who ignore the mistakes of the past are doomed to repeat them. And that is exactly what the Minister of Justice is doing today. His ignorance will cost us three millions dollars annually. Another good reason to say yes on October 30.

[English]

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that in these days, when we find so little to agree on with our friends from the Bloc, I would recommend to Canadians the extremely well researched and cogent arguments put forward in the paper by my hon. colleague who preceded me. Many of the points that were made should be persuasive to this government.

Unfortunately, one gets the impression in this House, and it is more than just an impression, that what we say and do here in debate is simply smoke and mirrors and window dressing and hot air, because the course of the government is set and the government members, who are in the majority, stand up and support it invariably. The excellent, well reasoned considerations that should be taken into account before these pieces of legislation are foisted on Canadians simply go by the by.

However, it is my duty to represent the people of Canada, particularly the people of Calgary North who elected me, by putting forward my concerns and my objections to this piece of legislation.

• (1035)

When our country is in real difficulty with respect to public safety and the workings of our criminal justice system, I find it passing strange that the thing on the top of the justice minister's mind is allowing the politically appointed parole board to investigate itself if it decides to do that. He is setting up a bunch of political appointments to make recommendations to the minister about what he should do about the law. I do not think there is any question in the minds of Canadians what should be done about the law. However, apparently the justice minister is so unsure that he is going to need some extra advice, for which we have to pay millions of dollars.

Just so the Canadian public who are watching this debate are clear on what we are talking about today, we are debating Bill C–106. This reinstates a body that was formerly called the law reform commission and is now being resurrected and reincarnated under the name of the Law Commission of Canada.

The Law Commission of Canada will have five members, a full time president and four appointed commissioners to assist the president. In addition, unless these five people find themselves bereft of ideas, they are going to be ably assisted by a further government appointed body called the Law Commission of Canada Advisory Council, with 24 additional patronage appointments.

Bill C–106 reinstates a failed body, this law commission of five people and an additional 24 people to advise them. Apparently the idea of this is to provide "independent" advice on needed improvements, "modernization", and reform of Canadian law. Again, we need to make it abundantly clear that the people of Canada are not leaving the government in the dark about the improvements and reforms that are needed in Canadian law. Why they have to work hard to shell out another $3 million a year to have the obvious stated, if in fact it is stated, is beyond the comprehension of any hard working and overtaxed Canadian I can think of.

This additional spending of $3 million a year is touted as a great improvement because the old disbanded law reform commission cost a whole $4.8 million a year, so we are actually saving $1.8 million with this new, streamlined version of the Canadian law commission. I do not think it takes a cynical Canadian to figure out that $3 million in budget almost invariably creeps up. If $3 million is the bottom line, Canadians have to wonder what the top line is going to be.

The old law reform commission grew into a very significant bureaucracy. It is the nature of government to suspect and be concerned that the same thing is going to happen again, because these five commissioners and 24 advisers to the commissioners are going to need some administrative assistance, which is going to be another consideration.

In the justice minister's introduction of this bill he said something that to me was extremely curious. He said "This will be an independent and accountable body working at arm's length from government". That is a direct quote. Canadians should know that these five commissioners are being appointed by the cabinet of this government on the recommendations of the justice minister. Tell me and any other logical Canadian who might happen to be listening to this debate how a body directly appointed by the justice minister has even the feeblest chance of being independent. Give Canadians some credit for intelligence here.

The minister then said, in the same twinning of words, "independent and accountable". I know that logic is not taught much these days, but it begs the question of how a body can be both independent of government and accountable to government at the same time. It is just not possible. In fact the whole way this is set up, independent is about the last thing this body is.

• (1040)

The Minister of Justice has a history of encouraging politicized bodies to endorse his predetermined positions. We saw that in the debate on Bill C–68 and we have seen it in other debates. He will get up and say that a certain group really supports this legislation. Well yes, the group is funded by the government. One wonders what group would not know what side its bread was buttered on. Of course it will not bite the hand that feeds it. It will be a cheering section for the very body that gives it dollars to keep going.

If we are going to talk about independence, let us at least be honest. Let us at least be reasonable. Let us at least be logical. Let us have something that will carry an ordinary judgment. This is not, in any way, shape, or form, an independent body.

In a news release before Bill C–106 was introduced in the House, the headline read: "Minister of Justice Announces Creation of a New Law Commission". Since this thing has already been created, why are we wasting our time debating it? We all know it is a done deal. This debate is just a formality. The thing has been created. It has been announced publicly. The public knows. Canadians have been told. The objections we are going to be bringing forward in the debate will mean nothing. It is nice that the opposition has a chance to fire at this thing, but it is done.

I find that repugnant in a democratic system. I would like to think that the work and the research I do in examining bills and issues counts for something. It is very clear to all Canadians that it does not.

How independent is the commission? Clause 5 of the bill requires that the Law Commission of Canada consult with the minister before setting its agenda. That does not seem to me to be independent. I suppose that good Liberals will say that the commission does not have to listen to him. He is only the guy who appointed them and gave them this wonderful patronage position in the first place. He is only the guy who pays their salaries. He is only the guy who will request reports from them. This consultation in setting the agenda really means that the commission is told by the justice minister: "This is what we want you to do".

The commission is required by clause 5 to submit to the minister reports that are required by the minister. It is a creature of the minister. There is nothing independent about it. It is in the legislation, to be seen clearly by anybody who looks at it. This is nothing more than an extension of the minister and his department doing work the justice department has already been contracting out. It is an unnecessary, far from independent body.

How independent is it? The complete commission is under the control of the minister. In the legislation it states clearly that these appointments to the commission and to the advisory body to the commission are held at the pleasure of the cabinet. Independent, when the cabinet can fire them out the door at its pleasure? Give me a break.

The commission is appointed by the justice minister. The advisory council, in clause 18, which is made up of 24 members, is appointed by the deputy minister and by the commission itself. The commission is appointed by the justice minister and its advisers are appointed by the commission and by the deputy minister, who is the right hand man to the justice minister. This is hardly independence.

• (1045)

There is already legislation coming forward from the justice department. One wonders how it has managed so far without the commission. The whole point of having a justice ministry is to make sure that we have proper legislation to protect the rights and property of citizens.

Legislation is supposed to be developed within the Department of Justice. It does the research and drafts legislation. Why does the minister have to appoint a select group of advisers to know what the country needs to protect the lives and property of Canadian citizens? Is he not listening to Canadians?

The minister talks a lot about consultation. We have heard him use this term in a glowing endorsement when he was talking about other legislation he brought forward previously in the House. Now the minister has another stick to beat us up with. He can say that the Law Commission of Canada which he appointed, can tell what to do and controls, although this will never be said, says that we should do this.

Canadians who have not listened to the debate, who have not examined the legislation, who do not know that the commission is anything but independent will be fooled by it. Canadians think it is another expert body they can be impressed with, the Law Commission of Canada, not the minister's commission with people who are manipulated and give him the answers and endorsements he wants.

Laws should be developed by elected legislators who are closely reflecting the wishes and the interests of the people they represent, period. They should not be developed by appointed flunkeys of the justice minister. This back door elite group of hand picked Liberal policy makers have no business developing law for Canada.

The people of Canada elect representatives to do that. That is why we get the big money. Why are we also getting millions of dollars to have other people tell us what laws we need? What are we doing here? Elected representatives are well able and should be seeking all the time the views of researchers and knowledgeable citizens throughout Canada. We do not need to appoint these people and pay them to tell us what they think.

Law professors spend almost half their time in research; that is part of their mandate. They are quite happy to pass on to elected representatives the wisdom, the knowledge and the recommendations they have come up with. We do not need to pay for them.

We already have far too many boards and commissions in Canada. The money that pays these people does not grow on trees. People work darn hard for the tax money that the government gobbles up. They do not want to pay a bunch of people to do a job they have already elected people to do. It is ridiculous.

It is an insult to Canadians who are already hard pressed. They are worried about their jobs. They are worried about their futures. They are worried about having to pay their mortgages. Now they have to pay a law reform commission $3 million a year.

The government does not have this money. It gets it from the rest of us who are working. It is a shame that in these hard economic times we would even think of asking Canadians for a few more million dollars so we can have a nice little group of appointees for the justice minister.

The parliamentary role should not be given to outsiders. Private members' bills, for example, have been developed in the House. The justice minister might consider that a very accurate law commission. I sat in the House last evening when a member asked for permission from other members of the House to withdraw a private member's bill because he said that the government had introduced legislation which essentially covered—and he was satisfied that it fully covered—the concerns and the recommendations he made in his private member's legislation. Here is a law reform commission at work that is already being paid properly within the system. This is the parliamentary role and it should not be given to anybody else.

• (1050)

One wonders if the justice minister is saying that he cannot always control and influence what his colleagues in Parliament do, so that is not good enough, and if he would rather have recommendations from people whom he can control.

It is just another chance for political activists to be rewarded by government appointments and get on the government payroll. It is another haven for Liberal political appointees. The justice minister insults the intelligence of Canadians to claim that this is anywhere close to being an independent commission. The justice minister's fingerprints are all over the whole thing. He picks the appointees. His top assistant and his appointees appoint the group that advises the appointees.

Ms. Clancy: Oh, oh.

Mrs. Ablonczy: It may be funny to the hon. member for Halifax but it is not funny to Canadians. They are paying for this nonsense.

The justice minister has a say in setting the agenda of his appointees. He will have in subclause 5(2) flexibility in how he deals with the commission's recommendations. In other words he has the flexibility to totally ignore them, which is exactly what happened in the past.

The legislation does not say how he has to respond. They are just gathering dust, more reports to gather dust while the money rolls in for the people who have been appointed to do a bit of work.

I close my presentation by making the minister an offer that I feel he should not refuse. The Reform caucus will willingly take on the onerous task of providing the minister with advice on needed improvements and reforms to the laws of Canada. I speak in favour of this generous offer.

First, it is the perfect solution for the justice minister. It will save hard pressed and tax weary Canadians the $3 million a year the justice minister would have to pay his hand picked advisers. We will do it at no extra charge. We cannot get more generous than that.

Second, it would allow the justice minister to help the Liberals keep another red book promise, which so far has been sadly broken, to base appointments on merit rather than on patronage. Who would have more merit in advising the justice minister than Reformers?

Third, the justice minister can be sure that Canadians are really setting the agenda, not his appointed dependants.

Fourth, the proposals will be brought forward in the House of the people for open scrutiny and debate from day one, not hatched behind closed doors and pushed through by forced votes from Liberal backbenchers. It will be truly independent of government and fully accountable to the people of Canada, which is exactly what it should be.

Last but not least, the minister can be absolutely certain that he is receiving truly independent advice.

Voters elect at great consideration and cost their own representatives to legislate to ensure peace, order and good government in our country. If we could be allowed to do our job responsibly and take into account the concerns and advice we receive from Canadians every day, the justice system would make a lot more sense and do a lot better job for Canadians.

As members might have guessed, we strongly oppose the Liberals' appointing people from their approved list of friends to do our job as members of Parliament and we oppose Bill C–106.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The first three interventions had 40–minute maximums without questions or comments.

We will now go to the next stage of debate at second reading of Bill C–106, an act respecting the Law Commission of Canada, where members for the next five hours will have 20–minute maximums for their speeches and be subject to 10–minute question and comment periods.

• (1055)

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is passing strange to hear some of the comments I have heard this morning. It is nearly 90 years since Benjamin Cardozo wrote his famous essay "Ministries of Justice".

For those who do not know better, it was said that Mr. Justice Cardozo was the greatest jurist never appointed to the Supreme Court of the United States. Then Herbert Hoover, in what some have said was his greatest act as president, appointed Mr. Justice Cardozo in his twilight years to the Supreme Court of the United States.

When he wrote 90 years ago he was making the case for an independent law commission. Its members would neither be civil servants because they were too close to the minister, too much under ministerial supervision, nor legislators because they were too much concerned with the exigent here and now of reading the flow of papers and attending to the details of legislation. He wanted people with a long vision and a detachment from politics. This is why he made the case.

His ministry of justice was not a ministry in our sense. It was an independent body of law commissioners to take a long view to try and establish the necessary relationship between positive law as written and the society it was supposed to serve.

When he wrote he was undoubtedly reminded of the words of his great friend, we understand from different legal tradition because Cardozo was the son of immigrants who had come from different legal tradition, Mr. Oliver Wendell Holmes who said: "The life of the law has not been logic; it has been experience".

At the time Cardozo wrote the legal system in the United States, Great Britain and parts of the then British Empire, now the Commonwealth that received the common law tradition, the law was essentially known as black letter law. From the vibrancy and creativeness of the early days of the common law it had degenerated into Lord Eldon's, it was said, juridical conservatism: the pursuit of precedents divorced from social reality, the pursuit of logical interpretations divorced from what happens in the daily lives of citizens.

In its creative period the common law was a law in full evolution. By the 19th century it had decayed into a rigid formalism. This is from what Cardozo had wanted to break away, and this is what those countries that followed him, in a very belated way the United States, have tried to achieve.

The law is more than the study of precedents. Precedents can be studied by law students cramming for examinations. However our society is evolving. In fact at the turn of the century, we lived in a revolutionary period in the world community as dramatic as the Thirty Years War and the late 17th century western European society, a world in revolutionary change with laws that are increasingly out of date.

I think one of the ironies that I encountered in my pre–parliamentary career, visiting many countries that sought my advice, was the knowledge that with the help of visitors from other countries and experts provided by the Canadian International Development Association, CIDA, their laws would probably end up more up to date and more relevant than Canadian laws.

We advise countries abroad because we believe in the free market economy and we believe the free market economy to be properly achieved with liberalization and rationalization of the legal system. We advise many other countries on how to update their laws. The curious thing is that dynamic element sometimes produces commercial law, laws on transactions involving foreigners, that are better and more up to date than our own, than American laws or the laws of other countries exporting their economic ideas. That is a sort of contradiction that frankly is unacceptable in our society.

I spoke of the period of legal positivism, the pursuit of the black letter law, the pursuit of precedents at the cost of reason, which is fortunately behind us as a legal theory taught in law schools.

• (1100)

The legal realist movement focused on the gap between the law in books and the law in action; the law as written in some bygone age and the law in action and how it was actually applied. It is a movement that is peculiarly North American although there are continental European counterparts.

It leads directly into the school of sociological jurisprudence whose founder was the great Dean Roscoe Pound of the Harvard law school followed by the Commonwealth writer Julius Stone and by the man who had the distinction of teaching two American presidents, Gerald Ford and Bill Clinton, and Bill Clinton's wife, Myres McDougal. The notion is that law exists to do other things than to give a pre–defined answer to new problems, that it is in constant evolution, that law exists to solve social problems, that there is a necessary policy element inherent in law and that the only way to get good legal decisions and good laws is to study society.

The intellectual framework of a good jurist today includes much more than logic and much more than the study of precedents. It includes a necessary acquaintance with economics, a necessary acquaintance with the driving forces in commerce, in business in our society, a knowledge of the sociology of the state, of human relations. This is the necessary intellectual equipment of a good lawyer today and it is basically what Cardozo spoke of when he referred to the need for creating ministries of justice.

Legal research would have to be carried on anyway. I asked the Minister of Justice two days ago what had happened when the Conservative government made the decision to cancel the law reform commission, whether he had buried research. He said no, they had to carry it on within the department.

In terms of cost saving we are dealing with essentially the same thing, civil servants. However, civil servants do not have that freedom from the exigent here and now of daily departmental practice that Cardozo said was a necessary element in the process of law reform.

In looking to the formation of the law reform commission again we are responding to the challenge today of a law responsive to society, Canadian society and the society of the world community, in continuing almost revolutionary change in terms of the social forces moving within us. It requires a group of people independent from the government and of high intellectual distinction.

I said to the minister when he introduced this bill: "Your big problem is cherchez l'homme or cherchez la femme, look to the right people. Whom are you going to get?" He said: "Whom can you think of?" He recognizes the need for creative appointments. This is where opposition party members can help. Give the minister names. I said I could give him a couple of names from the past including Mr. Justice Rand, our greatest liberal judge on the Supreme Court of Canada. He gave us a bill of rights before we had the 1982 charter; somebody like that in his creative periods.

I also took the opportunity to cite somebody well known to many members of the House, the late Jean–Luc Pepin who died only a couple of weeks ago in the prime of his life. He was a non–lawyer. This is one of the valuable things in this bill. We do not limit the choice of members of this commission to lawyers. We recognize, as the French have done and the Germans have done, that even on supreme courts, constitutional courts, non–lawyers have a role to play and should be included, and they are.

I had the honour of being chief advisor to Jean–Luc Pepin in the preparation of his report on the Constitution along with John Robarts, Léon Dion and John Meisel. If his report had been adopted many of our problems of federalism today would have been resolved before.

• (1105)

The quest goes on for the right people. Please, the invitation goes to members of the government and members of the opposition to put forward the names. This is intended to be independent. It will only be independent and courageous if we get the right people. The minister is on the right track. They do not have to be lawyers. It is a challenge. We have given so much time to Quebec issues that very much of our creative energy in other areas has been pre–empted. If we do not modernize our own laws the problem of economic recovery will be very much accentuated.

I see no point in my telling Chinese audiences, as I did from 1980 onwards, or audiences in other countries that if you want a free market economy, you need streamlined, up to date laws that respond to the exigencies of the society you are living in. There is no point telling these people that if we do not do it at home. This is the message in the law reform bill. Please see the large issue, see the necessity for this and take the steps to ensure the choices will be excellent ones.

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Bill C–106 today. I listened to my hon. friend from Vancouver Quadra make his presentation. I have the utmost respect for him. He is a man of much accomplishment in his career. He is certainly an academic and has contributed a lot to his profession and has many accomplishments.

I have one fear, though, as I listen to the hon. member, that the average Canadian is not getting a grasp or is not able to understand exactly what the member is saying. I want to bring this debate away from the level used by hon. member from Vancouver Quadra, a level which, no disrespect intended, was far above the average Canadian.

The hon. member talked about the people who should be involved in this commission. I will use some of his words and reflect on what he said. He said the law commission should be comprised of people in the law profession and people of high intellectual distinction.

Nowhere in his presentation has he indicated in any way that the opinions reflected by the minds of average Canadians should be represented in the commission. That has been the problem with the Minister of Justice's decisions and the government's bills in the two years I have been in the House. Nowhere in the bills introduced has there been any sense of realism between what is in the bill and what is on the mind of the average Canadian.

As parliamentarians we have a profound responsibility first and foremost to represent the concerns and the opinions of average Canadians. This recreation of the law commission is certainly far from that.

The predecessor to the law commission was abolished by the Tories in 1992. The Tory government was never known to be frugal but for some reason it found the commission a luxury it could not afford, which was a surprise considering its record of spending. It had grown as a quite natural progression into a large bureaucracy.

• (1110)

The Tory government in its wisdom decided it could get the same advice from outside sources at a better price. No doubt those outside sources were Tory advisers because the old line parties have a habit of rewarding their friends after they get into government. I have no doubt that this recreation of the law commission is another form of thanking Liberal friends for their participation in helping them get to government. We have seen this over and over again.

The law commission was established in 1971 to review Canadian federal laws and to make recommendations for the improvement or modernization of reforms within the justice system and develop new approaches that would be responsive to the changing needs of Canadian society.

In all honesty we have not seen a lot of evidence that the former law commission responded to the concerns of average Canadians. Its recommendations and work seemed to come out of some academic legal nirvana in which the recommendations were made on behalf of the people of Canada because, in all honesty, as the people formerly of the law commission would probably rightly determine, the Canadian people do not really have the wherewithal to make up their own minds and make reasonable choices about how the justice system in Canada should operate.

At its elimination in 1992, the commission had a budget of about $5 million and a staff of about 30. That was a lot of money. Now the Liberal government wants to revive this law commission. It has set a budget with a benchmark of about $3 million a year. It says the money will come from existing government resources. Anyone who believes that tale I honestly think believes in the tooth fairy; a wilder belief is maybe the Liberal government will some day get its spending under control.

The Liberal government is simply adding another level of bureaucracy to government operations. We have seen over and over again commissions with budget overruns like it is the natural thing to do.

The Canadian people have no reason to believe this commission will not be independent. It will not be accountable to the government except to the wishes of the Minister of Justice.

My hon. friend from Calgary North spoke earlier about this so–called independence. She pointed out very clearly how this commission would operate. There is no doubt the terms of reference for setting up this commission will be at the absolute direction of the Minister of Justice. Despite what the Liberals have said there is no substantive evidence to back up the claim that this will be a truly independent body. We have no reason to believe that. The Canadian people have no reason to believe that.

We have seen how the Minister of Justice operates. We have seen what he does when he wants to give some sort of credence to some of the ludicrous bills he has introduced. He goes out in the field and gathers together some of his political friends who happen to form associations and he gets them to back him up on his decisions.

The Canadian public is not buying that any more. The Minister of Justice now wants to give some extra support to some of the decisions by setting up the law commission. He will then stand in the House and present a bill without any reality of what the Canadian people believe. He is going to present the bill. He will stand up and say: "I would like to inform the House that the law commission has recommended that this reform be made to the criminal justice system". Recommended. I have every reason to believe that the law commission will simply be a rubber stamp for the Minister of Justice. It is a very dangerous situation for this House of Commons and for the criminal justice system in Canada.

• (1115)

The bill will permit the governor in council to appoint—and how many times have we heard that word—a president and four other commissioners and an advisory council consisting of 24 members. I have every reason to believe that every single member of the law commission will be a card carrying member of the Liberal Party of Canada. There is no possible way that a law commission set up by this government, by appointment of the Minister of Justice, can be independent.

There is no doubt that more Liberal appointees will be feathering their nests at the expense of taxpayers. The Liberal government knows that it will have to fight an election in two years. The Liberals want to keep their friends; it is only natural.

The justice system in Canada cannot afford to have a rubber stamp law commission which is held up as an advisory board to help the Minister of Justice put through the law reforms his cappuccino friends in Toronto want. We cannot afford that.

I doubt that when the commission is set up the justice department's budget will be reduced by an appropriate amount. I would like to be able to look into the future to see whether the justice department's budget will be reduced by $3 million. I do not believe the figure of $3 million, but I would like to see the reduction. I do not think it can happen.

If the Liberals have proved anything, it is the ability to mismanage taxpayers' money. Whenever I start talking about Liberals and budgets, I have to remind Canadians that using the Liberals' numbers of 1993, in their term of office the national debt will increase by $100 billion to some $650 billion. The interest payments will rise by some $10 billion to around $55 billion. This is ample evidence that Liberals do not know how to manage money. This gives more credence to the fact that I doubt very much the budget of the Department of Justice will be reduced by the amount which will be spent to finance the law commission.

There is no compelling reason to re–establish the law commission. Law reform is possible without the creation of another government agency which will be supported by Canadian taxpayers. As I stated earlier, the commission will be nothing more than a mouthpiece for the Minister of Justice. No doubt he is desperately seeking some official body to back up his autocratic decisions on gun control and the death penalty. What better way to save his image than to spend $3 million a year to establish a panel of yes people beholden to the Minister of Justice, prepared to put forward or support his personal decisions?

• (1120)

We should be getting our spending under control some day, but most definitely it will not be within the term of office of this government. Consider that the commissioners, the president, the board of advisers are going to be appointed by this government, by the Minister of Justice himself no doubt—

Mr. Stinson: That is the only job creation they know.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, could this possibly be part of the new Liberal job creation program? I thank my hon. colleague for bringing that to mind.

The commissioners' work can be done in the private sector. I suggest that more average Canadians be involved when it comes to making reforms in the justice system. The hon. member for Calgary North offered the services of the Reform Party of Canada free of charge to the government. We would not charge $3 million; we would work for nothing on this.

If the Reform Party were part of this commission for nothing, at no charge, it would be possible to have a truly independent body at no cost to the government and no cost to the taxpayers. We would pick 24 Reformers out of here and we would form the commission at no charge. We would give input to the Minister of Justice which truly represented the views of the Canadian people, not the views which come from his friends in Toronto. They would be views that were representative of the Canadian people all across the country.

There have certainly been enough questions raised lately about just how Canada's criminal justice system is supposed to work. There have been many instances. There are cases out in B.C. recently where a band of militant natives held the RCMP at bay for a number of days. The people in B.C. were saying: "My God, what is going on when people can draw arms against our country and hold a whole province and the national police force at ransom with seeming impugnity?" We saw the same thing at Ipperwash.

We see serious criminals who have committed violent acts being let out on parole and day passes and for what reason? For reasons that just boggle the mind of the average Canadian, only to have criminals go out and kill, rape and maim again.

These are the concerns on the minds of the Canadian people, not some airy-fairy ideas that come from the minister's friends in Toronto. These concerns come from average Canadians. These concerns are not going to be addressed by the people he appoints to the law commission. They will be there only to do his bidding and not the bidding of the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, you can probably imagine that I do not support this bill either. In confusion, in conclusion—

An hon. member: It is a confusing bill.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, it is no wonder that I stumble on my words. The word confusion comes up right now because I am so confused about the motives of this bill. The minister is not telling the people what he is planning on doing.

I am confused about how this bill has come into the House to be debated and will come to a vote when we found an announcement that the minister is going to create this law commission. What does this debate count for? Anything? Is this a waste of time? Surely the government must have some other business to put forward.

We are going to waste time debating something that is already a done deal. If this deal is already a done deal as we saw by the announcement the other day, that means I have wasted my time in the House. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra has wasted his time in this House. The member for Calgary North has wasted her time in this House. The Bloc member who spoke on this has wasted her time. Could we not be doing something more constructive than debating a bill that apparently already is a done deal?

• (1125)

I join with my Reform colleagues and the hon. members from the Bloc in opposing this bill in the strongest possible terms. It is inconsequential. It will not achieve any realistic reform to the criminal justice system. It cannot in the form it is proposed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The Chair never engages in debate but certainly if I can be of any assistance to any member of any party at any time, let there be no confusion that on the government's Bill C-106, the member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley does not support the government's bill.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order I want to make it clear that I do not support Bill C-106.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member in his remarks questions why we would be debating this bill today when as he suggests it is some kind of a done deal. He knows full well that the bill is not passed until it is passed.

I am sure the hon. member would not for the world miss an opportunity nor would his colleagues have missed the opportunity to take the time of the House and tell Canadians how undeserving and unworthy this bill was of support. Having taken all his time to do this, something he figures was not worth his time in the first place nor worth the time of this House, maybe he will not find it worth his time to reply to my question. We will see.

This bill which sets up this renewed law commission states very clearly in clause 6 that the commission is accountable through the minister to Parliament for the conduct of its affairs. That is a fairly clear statement, that this commission is accountable to Parliament. It is Parliament that will make decisions about changes in law.

I am wondering what his comment is, what he thinks about the very clear statement that this commission is accountable to Parliament and not anybody else. It is accountable to Parliament. Does he believe what is written in the law on which he will have a chance to vote?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question. Clause 6 does say that, but let us examine what accountable through the minister to Parliament really means. In other words, Parliament will have no opportunity to question members of the law commission, only the minister. That is sort of a misleading explanation of accountability.

We all know that unfortunately the Liberal Party has a majority in this House. Quite frankly, on very few occasions do I see the Liberal Party or any of the ministers really paying any attention to what the opposition members say. Every amendment that we ever put through to the Minister of Justice has been defeated by the government. This indicates that the Liberals have a clear agenda that they are going to follow regardless of what arguments the opposition members bring up in the House.

The idea of the law commission being accountable to Parliament through the minister really is just a smoke and mirrors thing. The only way that could work would be if we had a minority government, where the government did not have an absolute majority in the House.

If our party put amendments or recommendations for the criminal justice system to the law commission, if the minister did not want it to happen it simply would not happen because of the majority in this House. Although I appreciate the structure of the words in clause 6, I believe they are totally unworkable as far as accountability is concerned.

• (1130)

Ms. Jean Augustine (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of Bill C–106, an act respecting the Law Commission of Canada. In doing so, I want to focus on one particular aspect of the approach to law reform embodied in the legislation: the emphasis on consultation in the bill.

Consultation is a word that over the years has been sucked into the chilly abstract vocabulary of social and organizational planning and also has become a part of the technical jargon of experts and specialists. Sometimes in the House the word consultation seems to take on a negative connotation.

In talking about consultation in the bill, I am talking about consultation as a living, social process, the antithesis of arbitrary rule, and what is in a positive sense the soul of the democratic system of government; that is, asking what one thinks and getting a response and acting on the response.

When parties bring their policies before the public at election time or other times, that is consultation on the most basic scale. The building of democracy consists in large part in consulting ever more broadly and thoroughly, involving all who have a stake in the process. By consulting one looks at all the players, all those the end result of consultation would affect.

All members of both Houses at this moment are working in a mode of consultation. We are doing the nation's business in a consultation mode. That is, when we are considering something that is before us we see the importance of consultation, the importance of sharing with the stakeholders and getting the views of all stakeholders and bringing this to the discussion.

The agenda of law reform is set by the challenges of the times. It is a continuing task of renovation, identifying existing problems and new trends, and of dealing with the areas of the law in which time and change have revealed gaps and insufficiencies. That task was once handled for the most part by lawyers and legal professionals, toiling in the framework of the royal commission or other temporary bodies. It was shouldered by a permanent law reform commission, which operated from 1972 until 1992, when it was abolished by the previous government to the general dismay of the legal profession.

In the election platform of 1993 we said we would reverse that action. At the same time, we recognized that we should do more than restore the previous commission in a form identical to that prescribed in the early 1970s. We wanted to give that reform life and energy.

The agenda of law reform is shaped in direction and detail by the social and economic environment of the time. That agenda has been utterly transformed since the structure and approach of the previous commission was laid down by Parliament nearly a quarter of a century ago. Times have changed. It is different. We are in different times because Canada is different. First of all, there has been a far reaching social transformation. In 1971 we were a country of 21 million. In 1995 we are approaching 30 million in population. The demographic and cultural composition of our population is different, 1971 to now. We are also 25 years further down the road in terms of our democratic evolution.

• (1135)

Consultation has now been incorporated by custom and institution into our way of life and our way of doing things. Canadians of our time, including the generation that grew up with the charter of rights and freedoms, take it for granted that they will have a part in the making of policies that affect their lives. Meanwhile, transformations in technology, trade, and industrial structure have made the Canadian economy more complex.

As a result of change at all these levels, the inadequacies that make law reform necessary reveal themselves not only in the courtroom but in other settings. They emerge in the marketplace, the workplace, the home, the scientific laboratory, the social welfare centre, and at the centres of learning of about a dozen disciplines. These trends have made it more important that law reform become a co–operative enterprise informed by expertise in many fields.

The process that has brought this bill before us today has been open and consultative from the start. The Minister of Justice knows the benefit of consultation. This process began with two original consultations. They brought together representatives of the academic community, the judiciary, provincial governments, and also non–governmental organizations with an interest in law reform.

The process continued in 1994 with the distribution of a consultation paper on the structure and modus operandi of the new commission. That document went to over 800 groups and individuals and to all members of the two chambers of Parliament.

To illustrate the breadth of the consultation, the organizations involved included, to name a few, the Canadian Medical Association, the Elizabeth Fry Society, the John Howard Society, women's groups, multicultural groups, aboriginal associations, et cetera. Of course the process also allowed the full and active participation of experts in law. The Canadian Institute for the Administration of Justice held a nation–wide consultation with judges on the proposed law commission. The federal Department of Justice conducted a consultation with legal academics from all provinces. In addition, the subject has been discussed at meetings of the ministers responsible for justice in the federal, provincial, and territorial governments and at other meetings involving both the legal and non–legal communities. That is consultation.

The legislation now before us has been shaped by many hands and moulded by experience in many fields. It is the product of consultation. It proposes an instrument for doing the work of law reform in the same mode. That commitment is reflected on every page of this bill. It starts with the first paragraph of the legislation, which says the advice the commission will provide will be based "on the knowledge and experience of a wide range of groups and individuals".

The first of the five guiding principles in the preamble is that the commission's work should be open and inclusive of all Canadians. This approach is also expressed in the organizational design of the new law commission. Clause 7, which deals with organization, says, in effect, that the five commissioners need not be lawyers or judges or other legal professionals. Indeed, it specifically states that the membership should be representative of the socio–economic and cultural diversity of Canadian society.

As an aside, I heard from the other side that we should have a number of parliamentarians sitting on that commission. Of course there are opportunities here for the full participation of the diversity of Canadian society.

• (1140)

The four part time commissioners would live wherever their homes are, where their full time jobs and occupations require them to be. This means that at the executive level the commission would be linked personally and directly with the concerns of main street Canada.

Clause 18 describes the advisory council of the commission, which will comprise 25 people serving on a voluntary basis appointed by the commission. Like the commission members, the members of the council itself would be generally representative of the diversity of Canadian society. Its members will advise the commission on such things as strategic issues, review of its annual report, agenda setting and performance review. A varied blend of training and experience will be applied to the basic shaping of the process as it responds to the issues of the day.

Clause 20 allows for an even further extension of the commission's connections with other disciplines and backgrounds. Under this clause the commission can bring in voluntary experts and specialists in any aspect of law reform to serve as members of temporary study panels. I am stressing the words temporary and voluntary because the Reformers who spoke earlier seemed to miss that in the bill.

Clause 23 is important in this regard. It ensures the products of work done in this mode will not disappear into a vault but will emerge without delay into the public domain for inspection and discussion. The minister must table any commission report to the two chambers of Parliament in session within 15 days of receiving it.

In short, the commission created by this bill will be itself part of a wider network of collaboration in the work of law reform. It will allow us to renew and extend the architecture of law on the basis of an expert understanding of the complex issues involved. It will permit us to do so efficiently, effectively, and at a manageable cost.

This bill is a blueprint for a law commission that will meet the needs of our time, a body that will be known not only for the legal soundness of its products but also for the relevance of its work on the issues of our time. This bill will meet an urgent need. It deserves our support. It deserves the support of all the members of this House.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to join in the debate in this area. The area of law reform is one of special interest and special concern to those of us who have in the past been involved in the legal profession. It should be of interest to all of us as legislators.

Having been here all morning, I have listened, sometimes in shock, to some of the comments that have come particularly from the members of the third party with regard to a need for this bill. It may be a good time to talk about why this bill is being brought forward.

One of the hon. members for Calgary noted this bill has the justice minister's fingerprints all over it. It is his bill. I would hope it has his fingerprints all over it. I wonder whose fingerprints should be on it if not those of the Minister of Justice. The Minister of Justice, in his usual well thought out way, has indeed brought this bill forward. We would not mind the solicitor general's fingerprints on it either, but as it happens this bill is brought forward by the Minister of Justice.

• (1145)

I want to talk about the law commission because tremendous things have come from bodies of this nature both at the national level and in various provinces where these bodies exist.

I listened, more in sorrow than in anger, to members opposite talk about Liberal flunkeys. I think of the people who have served on law reform commissions. Those comments ill serve anybody who wishes to be a public servant. In particular, I think of members of the former law reform commission, Mr. Justice Linden, for example. I recall Mr. Justice Linden's coming to a parliamentary committee where he and I crossed swords in an admirable debate on a bill which his commission had brought forward.

Mr. Justice Linden was then of the Ontario high court, as it was known. He is now with the appeal division of the Federal Court of Canada. He is the author of a torts textbook which all of us in the House who went through law school had the pleasure to read. We were taught very well by Mr. Justice Linden through his publications, textbooks and articles. To refer to him as a Liberal flunkey does a great disservice to the bench, the bar and Canadians who serve their country.

In my province of Nova Scotia one of the many lawyers and lay persons who have served so well on law reform commissions is the former dean of Dalhousie Law School, Professor William Charles. He was known across Canada as a law teacher. He was one of the founders of the University of Victoria law school when the University of Victoria asked Dalhousie law school to send professors to help it start a law school. He is unparalleled in his respect across the country in legal circles as someone learned in the law, a law reformer, a law teacher and a legal administrator.

I think of the current president of the University of Calgary, Murray Fraser, another former acting dean and associate dean at Dalhousie Law School. He was the first dean of the University of Victoria law school. He served on the Law Reform Commission of Canada back in the middle seventies before he went on to Victoria.

In Nova Scotia, where politics are taken with pabulum, the Fraser family would be taken aback to hear President Fraser referred to as a Liberal flunkey or a flunkey of any kind. That kind of pejorative talk is unfortunate.

It is perhaps because certain political parties are new to the legislative process that it behoves those of us who have been around a little longer to talk about—

Mr. Stinson: Far too long.

Ms. Clancy: Not according to the people of Nova Scotia.

The people on the Law Reform Commission of Canada and the various provincial law commissions have a job quite different from that of legislators. I have served for seven years in the House. Mr. Speaker, you and I served together on a legislative committee, which I am sure will go down in your memory, when we were in opposition.

Legislative committees are one of the areas along with the Chamber where parliamentarians from both sides of the House can make their wishes, their policy concerns and their concerns generally for the development of legislation heard. That is what we are here for, no question.

• (1150)

A law commission is instituted for those areas that parliamentarians, busy with their daily jobs, do not have time to delve into. The vast majority of members are not lawyers, which is a good thing. The vast majority of members are certainly not academics and, heaven knows, the vast majority of members are not what one could call intellectuals. Consequently we are not in the business of doing the kind of legal research, exploration and prognostication—look it up—that leads to legislation in good government and prods governments to move in ways in the best interests of the country.

That is why people of the calibre of Mr. Justice Linden, Professor William Charles and President Murray Fraser have served at the provincial and federal levels along with hundreds of other Canadians. They have served with one desire and one desire only, to do good for their country.

For members of the opposition to use this bill, which fulfils a red book promise, as some sort of partisan stick with which they think they are beating the government not only cheapens the process when we consider the source but it says to Canadians we do not want their participation in the public process.

We on this side of the House do not say that. Three million dollars for this law commission is a low price to pay for the tremendous contribution of the people who will serve on this commission. What a low price to pay for the tremendous work they will do, for the hours of research, for the incredible gift of their thoughts, hard work and dedication to Canada.

It reminds me of a bit of a cliché about optimists and pessimists, certainly something that has been repeated often; the idea that an optimist sees a glass half full and a pessimist sees a glass half empty. When it comes to the boards and commissions that help us run the country, that advise the government, prod the government, in many cases boards and commissions at arm's length from the government with quasi–judicial functions on behalf of the people of Canada, the glass from my point of view is more than merely half full, it is full.

How very lucky we are in Canada that there are legions of citizens delighted to fulfil this role when many of them could be making more money and certainly taking a whole lot less abuse in other endeavours.

Having dealt summarily with the unusual and perhaps ill–informed comments from the other side, I will talk a bit about the bill. What is the commission created for? It is to fulfil the needs of the government and Parliament for independent, broadly based, strategic advice on legal policy and law reform issues.

That seems to me a fairly straightforward and clear statement of intent.

Independence means not connected to the party in government or the party in opposition. I realize there are many times when the third party does not really behave like a political party. If a party has not been in existence very long and does not have much history, it really does not understand how political parties behave. However, according to the office of the Chief Electoral Officer, it is a political party. It may be tragic. It may be unfortunate but it is a political party. It appears to be a political party with more than its share of empty barrels. As a political party it is not considered independent.

• (1155)

The hon. member for Calgary suggested her party could do this independently. It may well be its neophyte status in Parliament that under the rules of Parliament, even being the third party, it does not qualify as independent. There are other adjectives such as strategic, legal, et cetera, which it may not qualify for as well. I would not comment on those, heaven forbid.

I remind members of the third party as well as my trusting and beloved colleagues on this side of the House that keeping red book promises is very important.

Mr. Stinson: It is called patronage with a capital P.

Ms. Clancy: A three syllable word, well done. When I sat on the other side of the House and saw the law reform commission disbanded, I along with many of my colleagues was very unhappy. I knew how important it was to the development of legislation.

One of the things the law commission does is provide a critical eye and a distinctive perspective on modernizing the law. The word modernizing is very important. Words like modernize, progressive and forward looking along with independent and strategic may not be words familiar to some of our colleagues.

The commission will have five guiding principles. It will approach the law from a multi–disciplinary perspective, and this is very important. As I said before, one cannot leave the making of the law and the creativity of law reform merely to lawyers or legislators. One needs to bring in people from all walks of life, to listen to them, to hear what they need.

When I taught law I used to tell my students the law is a reactive social science. In general law will come into existence to react to a specific need, to specific a situation.

Sometimes, as in the case of human rights law, the law is proactive. For many of us, especially those enamoured of human rights law and who see this as one of the brightest lights in our parliamentary careers, the law then becomes proactive.

In general it is reactive and it is the job of a law commission to delve into the hearts and minds of the people in a way that legislators and lawyers in the legislatures do not have the time to do. They have a specific job which they will be doing all the time whereas legislators, contrary to the rather superficial responses of the third party, have other things to do.

We as legislators and as members of Parliament have casework, committee work, political work, travelling back and forth to our ridings. It is a massive job, which I do not have to tell anyone here, including members of the third party.

Consequently if one is to serve the people as one should with the law reform commission one needs people who will dedicate all their time to the particular necessities and exigencies of law reform.

This seems a fairly simple statement and a fairly simple concept to grasp. Obviously it is not in some cases, but I can do only what I have been asked by the people controlling the debate. The chips will have to fall where they may, in empty barrels or elsewhere.

There are five guiding principles. I have talked about the first one, a multi–disciplinary perspective being open and inclusive by making its work more accessible and understandable to all Canadians. This is something that is very dear to my heart.

• (1200)

I taught undergraduates in several universities in Nova Scotia in areas of law, family law, legal status of women, law and aging, and environmental law. I always found it terribly important to demystify the legal process for the majority of Canadians.

A legitimate complaint that comes to us both as legislators and lawyers is that the law is mumbo–jumbo. There are legal documents and pieces of legislation that the average Canadian does not understand what we are on about. Part of the work of the law reform commission is to make the law more accessible and understandable for Canadians and to utilize innovative research, consultation and management practices through new technologies.

As we approach the millennium we have exploding technology in the country. We are one of the leading countries on earth, if not the leading in certain high tech areas. Except for the people trained in those particular disciplines, to the vast majority of Canadians a lot of this is very mystifying.

How much more mystifying is the regulatory and legislative process that surrounds us? Ergo, how much more necessary is it to have the law reform commission take on the job of making sure that as the legislation is brought forward to the government it will be less mystifying to Canadians?

Another important point is being responsible and accountable to key groups affected by law reform through partnerships that build on existing knowledge and expertise. Since it came into power two years ago the government has talked about the question of partnerships. We talked about partnerships between business and government. We talked about partnerships between interest groups and government. It is one reason we have seen massive consultations in all sorts of areas between the government and the people. The people of Canada appreciate that consultation because the previous government of not so blessed memory had no history of consulting with Canadians except in a very few cases.

A law commission gives an opportunity for Canadians to come forward with their concerns about developing areas and the things they would like to see. They can come forward to help develop law in areas that provide for good government. In effect it is a tool of democracy. It is one when we were in opposition we were very distressed to see removed. It is one that we promised in the red book we would reinstate. I could not be happier that we are fulfilling this promise, fingerprints of the Minister of Justice or not.

Next is the achieving of cost effectiveness in operation and the recommendations and advice it provides. This goes back to the well meant but misguided comments of my colleague on the other side who talked about the cost. The cost for Parliament to do the work of the law reform commission in time, in person hours—

Mr. Harris: Reform Party members will do it for nothing.

Ms. Clancy: They will do it for nothing. It is probably like throwing in 10 per cent of their salaries and all that stuff. I notice some of them are not talking about the pensions over there.

That is not what Parliament was elected to do. If my hon. colleagues do not understand that perhaps they need job descriptions. Parliament was elected to represent the people, to debate in the Chamber, to review legislation in legislative committees, to deal with various and sundry public policies in standing committees, et cetera, to do constituency work, and to deal with our political duties.

• (1205)

I can only say that if members of the third party feel they have the time—and I am not even going to get into the questions of expertise—to be a law reform commission, thank the powers that be we are in government and there is little or no danger of that ever taking place under the current government.

I am delighted to support the legislation. I am delighted we are fulfilling a red book promise. I am delighted there will once again be a law commission to serve the needs of Canadians.

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member for Halifax who mentioned quite truthfully that there was not a vast number of lawyers in the House and that there was not a vast number of intellectuals. I agree with her. The problem is that we have a vast number of Liberals in the House. That is where the problems come from.

The hon. member spoke about the benefits of establishing the law commission. Let us go back and look at the history of the law reform commission holding hands with the Liberal government. For example, the law commission came into being in 1971. Lo and behold in 1976, and I assume at the suggestion, advice and direction of the law commission which is there to represent the will and the opinions of the people, we find section 745 of the Criminal Code was amended in the House to eliminate capital punishment in Canada, to provide for the eligibility of first degree murderers given a life sentence of 25 years to apply for early parole after 15 years. These provisions were brought forward by the member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce who was a Liberal and still is a Liberal, working hand in hand with the Liberal appointed law commission.

Poll after poll has shown when polls are taken in an honest fashion of average Canadians, something that the Liberal government does not relate to, that they would support capital punishment and always have. Poll after poll has shown that Canadians are disgusted with the fact that violent murderers given life sentences can apply for early parole and in most cases get it after 15 years. Poll after poll has shown that the people of Canada do not appreciate these parts of the law.

How can the member for Halifax stand and say that the law reform commission, holding hands with the Liberal government, is reflecting the will of the Canadian people? I should like to ask her some specific questions.

These are some of the things Canadians have told us are wrong with the justice system, some of the things that would have been fixed if the law reform commission had been an effective body that listened to the will of the people.

First is the delay in implementing the use of DNA testing, which at the insistence of our party the government finally got around to. Had the law commission prior to being disbanded in 1992, and maybe it did, recommended to the government of the day that DNA testing be brought in, perhaps we would not have had to wait so long and perhaps some of the murderers who have gone free because we did not have access to this way of gathering evidence would be behind bars right now.

If the law commission was so effective, how come it took us until 1995 to deal with the drunken defence used in the courts? Why did it take us that long if the law commission was so good?

I talked about parole eligibility. If the law reform commission was so good, why has it not closed the loopholes in parole eligibility? What about violent criminals being let out of prison early? If the law reform commission was so good, why do we have violent criminals walking the streets because some parole board has screwed up its decisions? Who is charged with fixing those mistakes?

• (1210)

Let us talk about what upsets Canadians most of all, the grand idea of condoning plea bargaining in our justice system. Canadians are fed up with seeing people accused of crimes plea bargaining away the more violent sections of the crime in order for the courts to give a lesser sentence and get a sure conviction.

If the law reform commission is so good, why do we have so many things wrong with the criminal justice system? The fact remains that the laws of the country are made by lawyers for lawyers with little regard for the opinions, concerns and wishes of Canadians. If it were not that way we would not have so many problems with the justice system.

Canadians have had enough with law commissions and a Liberal government that treat criminals as if they have special rights. In 1982 the Liberal government brought in a Constitution and in the section on rights granted more rights to people who break the law than to people who keep the law. That is an absolute disgrace and the legislation will not change a thing.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments of the hon. member because what I hear in them is a real cri du coeur. I understand his being upset about certain situations that he perceives to be developing in the country. There are several things to consider but let me deal with a number of comments he made.

With regard to the problem of there being a Liberal government, I would only say to the hon. member that the government was duly elected in a very democratic process. A majority of Canadians elected a majority of Liberals. We are here to represent the wishes of our constituents, just as the hon. member is here to represent the wishes of his. It so happens that a majority of Canadians picked this Liberal government. I understand he does not like it. I understand he does not agree with it, but there it is. It is a fait accompli and unfortunately he will have to deal with it. I suspect he will have to deal with it after the next election as well, but we will wait and see.

There is a real misconception in the land with regard to criminal activity. This is not to minimize the criminal activity that takes place but unfortunately some of our hon. colleagues in the third party are overly influenced by American television and American newspapers. The crime rate is not rising in this country over all. It is rising in the United States; it is not rising here. As a matter of fact in certain sectors it is dropping, but good news unfortunately is not something the third party deals in.

I will certainly not deal with the member's meanderings on the issue of capital punishment. As my constituents well know I have been against capital punishment from the first time I ever heard of it. I will continue to be against capital punishment for the rest of my life. The people of Halifax know well what my feelings are on this and other issues, never having been one to hide my opinions.

I go back to what the hon. member said about the law commission. With the greatest of respect it shows he does not understand it. The law reform commission is not the House of Commons and the House of Commons is not the law reform commission. They are two separate entities with two separate jobs. The law reform commission is there to research and recommend. Then the government and the House of Commons can accept or reject its recommendations. In many cases those recommendations are accepted; in other cases they are rejected.

They talk about it being hand and glove with the Liberal government. I merely ask the member to take any list of the previous members of the Law Reform Commission of Canada, or of those provinces that have law reform commissions, and he will see people who have served their country, served their province and served their community in ways the third party would like very much to be able to emulate.

• (1215)

We are talking about people who are eminent members of their communities, holders of the Order of Canada, people who have been honoured by non–partisan members of their community. I for one find this disappointing, tragic, and I would go so far as to say despicable, that they would cast aspersions on the characters of such a large group of public servants, of people who serve Canada.

Why would these people cast aspersions on people who wish to serve their country? Why is membership on a federal board or committee, a provincial board or committee, or a municipal board or committee something that should taint you? I am appalled that anyone would suggest this. I am appalled that there is such a narrow and angry and sad view of public service in this country by the hon. members of the third party, that they do not rejoice in the opportunity to serve Canada, in the opportunity to stand up and say how lucky we are to be in the House of Commons or how lucky our constituents are to be able to serve their country.

If they do not feel that way, I can only say we feel on this side of the House a great sorrow for them at the loss in their public participation.

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to follow the member for Halifax, if only because very often there is nothing left to say so I can speak much more briefly.

I want to comment on how this bill fits in with the overall Liberal vision and the overall Liberal plan for Canada. I think the Reform Party is shortsighted when they criticize this bill only on the limited grounds they have set out. In reality, justice issues in many respects are economic issues. I say this because I come from a community, Windsor and Essex county, that has prospered as it leaves the recession. We are probably on the leading edge of recovery from the last recession.

I have noticed at home, and our city leaders and our citizens have noticed as well, that as our community becomes more prosperous, as we have more jobs, as we have a healthier community economically, we have a healthier community in other ways. When we look at the health of the community and we look at how we have been affected by this recovery from the recession, or partial recovery from the recession, what we see is that violent crime has gone down, other forms of crime have decreased, and the pressure of social problems has lessened. This is because the community is in better shape economically.

In the early 1980s, when the last great recession hit, I was practising law in Windsor, not as a young lawyer but as a new lawyer. I did a bit of matrimonial law in addition to my regular criminal practice. It was devastating, because as there were layoffs at the auto plants and at the feeder plants it seemed there were more marriage breakdowns. As there were more marriage breakdowns, it seemed that my practice in what were then called juvenile delinquents, young offenders, increased in terms of criminal law. It seemed to me also that I had to deal with more domestic violence in my practice.

Subsequently, when I began to prosecute I found the same thing. With economic waves and downturns and the economic roller–coaster we have experienced in the recent past in Windsor, domestic violence and other forms of violence increased. There were more robberies, more property offences, more break–ins. You could see and palpably feel the link between economic health and social health in our community.

• (1220)

When Reform talks about the justice system they should do so within the greater framework of economic development in our communities. A community with a healthy economic base and with active ongoing economic development is a community that is going to be healthy in other areas. This is part of the Liberal program for healthy communities.

The law commission is a very small part of this. I would like to point out that this is not something we have just recently pulled out of the air; this is something for which we set aside money in our February 1995 budget. In their joint wisdoms, the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Finance agreed that setting aside a relatively small amount of money out of the overall budget for the work of the law commission was an important part of moving Canada forward, moving forward into communities like Windsor, Tecumseh, and St. Clair Beach to make them healthier.

The law commission allows us to reach into individual communities and into the broader Canadian community for advice and help as to how we can improve our justice system. As we are increasing the number of jobs in the country, over 400,000 since we were elected, as we are making the country economically more viable and as we are making it more prosperous, we are also looking at and dealing with aspects of our criminal justice system and our justice system in general that can be improved.

The Reform Party complains about the way the commission is set up. In reality, the commission is doing what the Reform Party has asked us to do. It is allowing us to go to what they call the grass roots. In reality, of course, the Reform Party's grass roots are people who think like them, who are not a majority of the country. They have a fundamental problem with democracy, which allows the majority of a country to rule.

We are not satisfied with that either. We know that not everyone who voted for us agreed with every single thing we wanted to do in the red book. We know that the people of Canada who voted for us did so because of the overall thrust of our policies, and they may have some disagreements. We are not satisfied with that. We are setting up structures that allow us to reach out to find out what is going on, what people are thinking and where we can go.

The Reform Party derides the efforts of the former law reform commission, which was summarily executed by the Conservative government. Deride that as it will, this is not the old law reform commission; this is a new law commission, and it is a commission with a difference. This commission has a special mandate, which is very different from that of the old law reform commission.

When the law reform commission was eliminated there was a cry from many parts of the country, from groups that had benefited, who had been able to persuade the law reform commission that new advances were required and changes were required in the law and who saw that come to fruition in legislation. However, this law commission, with its special guiding principles—which are not just stuff we are talking about, they are actual principles we have put into the legislation—has a very real difference, which will allow us to tap into what all Canadians are thinking about our justice system.

This law commission is mandated to take a multi–disciplinary approach to law reform and to the legal system. Like the Liberal government, it sees the justice system as part of a broader social and economic environment. It is mandated to look at what people have to say from a social work perspective and at what people have to say from labour. It is mandated to look at what people have to say who are concerned about violent crime in our communities. It is mandated to take a look at what probation officers have to say, at what parole officers have to say, and at what the people on the street have to say. It is mandated to be open and inclusive by making its work more accessible and more understandable to all Canadians.

• (1225)

The member for Halifax indicated that she has always believed there is a need to demystify the law. Any of us who have worked in the law know that is the case. We can work in an ivory tower, prepare our mumbo–jumbo and talk to each other with our special language and never communicate that to Canadians or to our clients. If it is a mystery, it is somehow something only a specialist can deal with.

We are not content to have that carry on. The Reform Party talks about that all the time. Yet it criticizes us for making a law commission that is open, inclusive, and makes its work accessible and understandable to all Canadians.

This law commission will utilize innovative research, consultation and management practices by utilizing new technologies, something that, as good as it was, the old law reform commission was not very good at doing. It will be responsive and accountable to key groups that are affected by law reform through partnerships that build on existing knowledge and expertise.

This is an interesting one, because this again contrasts with what the Reform Party says and what it does. The Reform Party loves to talk to us about special interest groups. It loves to accuse the government of being captive to the special interest groups. What it means is that we listen to groups it does not listen to. Its special interest groups, like the American National Rifle Association or certain alleged wildlife organizations or the people who I like to call the gunners, are of course not special interest groups. That is not what Reform members mean; they can listen to those special interest groups.

There are lots of special interest groups out there. There are groups that are interested in the welfare of human beings. There are groups that are interested in benefiting mankind and their fellow Canadians. The law commission will give them a place to go, so they do not have to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars lobbying parliamentarians who are busy with other aspects of their work. It gives them a place to go and be heard. It also gives the individual a place to go and be heard as well. I cannot see how the Reform Party could object to that.

The law commission is mandated to be cost effective in its operations and in the recommendations and advice it provides. The last law commission, indeed many of the vehicles that governments have used in the past to advise them, did not have to worry about budgets or about making recommendations the government could implement in a cost effective manner. We are mandating this group to do so. We are telling them to come to us with a project or a piece of legislation and think of the economic impact that will have as well.

I suggest this bill is part of good Liberal government in Canada. It is part of what the majority of Canadians elected us to do.

I will never forget what the little person from the Reform Party who ran against me said. When Reform became the government—quite a leap of fancy—it would listen to Canadians. Here we are providing the vehicle to not just listen to Canadians but to go out and shake them and ask them what they think about this, so that we can incorporate their views into our overall scheme. When we try to do that, where is the Reform Party? Politics as usual. It is here heckling and arguing but it has not bothered to take a look at what this bill really does.

On that point I would like to comment on something else I heard today, which is the use of what I would call fear tactics and fearmongering to try to scuttle a bill of the importance of this one.

When Reform members talk about violent crime, when they feed the myth that violent crime is on the upswing in Canada, they do their own constituents a disservice. It is not for them to create a false environment and then try to force the government to operate within it. It is not for them to set up a straw dog in order to knock it down. It is up to them, as a responsible third party, to focus on problems that actually exist in society.

There is no question that violent crime exists in Canada. There is no question that violent crime that exists at any level is unacceptable. However, it is wrong to suggest that it is growing and this government is doing nothing about it. It is also wrong to suggest that a law commission made up of people from every aspect of our greater Canadian community will do nothing about it.

• (1230)

This bill responds to Canadians. I compliment the Minister of Justice for what he said when he announced this bill. It sets out a real Liberal and a real Canadian attitude to law reform: "Canada's legal system faces complex legal issues that require more than a legal solution. Effective long term remedies lie in an approach that includes not only legal but social, economic and other disciplines as well. The Government of Canada believes that an independent, multi–disciplinary law reform body is essential to this process".

I would suggest that is good common sense. I would suggest that the Minister of Justice is right on. That is the Liberal vision. That is the Canadian vision.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have this opportunity to express my support for Bill C–106.

The legislation we are considering responds to the urgent need for a permanent body to advise the government on the improvement, modernization and reform of the laws of Canada. As this bill makes clear, there are many requirements to be met if this work is to succeed. We must have openness of process and the focusing of a multi–disciplined expertise on these issues.

Something else that is required is a close attention to the matter of costs by the commission both in its methods and in its goals. This was a concern expressed by the Reform Party. It is this aspect of the legislation I want to concentrate on today.

In the context of this bill, there are two aspects to the challenge of efficiency. One is the need for the commission itself to meet the test of cost effectiveness, both in its organizational architecture and in its approach. The other is the requirement that the commission's work contribute to the cost effectiveness of the Canadian legal system in general.

The structure of the commission supports these goals. Four of the five commissioners will serve on a part time basis. The members of the advisory council will serve without pay. So will the members of the temporary study panels that the commission will create to provide expert assistance on the specific issues of the day. Hon. members will also find that the administrative and the operational arrangements visualized in the bill reflect the concerns for costs.

The legislation steers the commission away from the pitfall of trying to do everything itself. As the preamble makes clear, it will promote partnerships with a wide range of interested groups and individuals, including the academic community.

The commission will save money by sharing services wherever practical. For instance, the previous commission maintained an in–house library. The new commission will make use of existing facilities. This approach is implicit in the administrative apparatus. The commission will be served by a secretariat of no more than eight people.

Unlike its predecessor body, the commission will not retain a significant body of full time researchers but will make greater use of contract help. There are several advantages to this arrangement. The most obvious is that one avoids having to hire an in–house expert specialist for every issue or alternatively, to expend time in bringing in–house staff up to speed on new agenda items.

• (1235)

Hon. members will also note that the bill designates the commission as a departmental corporation. This too impinges on cost effectiveness. It allows the commission to receive gifts, bequests and other donations from outside sources and to reimburse some costs through the sales of its publications.

The important question is what it will all cost. The government said as early as in the red book and has kept saying since that the commission will operate on a budget of $3 million a year, all of which will come from funds already voted. This is Spartan fare indeed considering that the previous law commission operated on approximately $5 million a year in its last operating year. Ten years ago it would not have been possible to tackle a task of this magnitude within these limits. What makes it possible today is the structure and the modus operandi outlined in the bill. What in turn makes that possible is new technology.

The bill before us recognizes the importance of that factor. The preamble incorporates as a guiding principle the requirement that the commission use new technology wherever appropriate in order to achieve "efficiency in its operations and effectiveness in its results". The commission will do so in every phase of its operation.

For example, a large part of law reform is research, the painstaking gathering, sharing and storing of information. The use of modern information technology will make it easier and cheaper to do all of these things. The same technology will cut other costs down to size.

For example, law reform is envisaged in this legislation as a consultative process in which people from many fields and regions will present their viewpoints and reason together. In the days when that required a convergence of experts from all over Canada to one location, that activity alone would bite large holes into the operating budget. Today fortunately we can achieve that meeting of minds at a much lower cost by making intelligent use of information technologies, for example through on–line networking, teleconferencing and video conferencing.

These new tools can also lighten the administrative load. The birth of a new organization no longer has to mean the making of a new multi–layered mini bureaucracy. On–line networking for example makes it possible for organizations to share personnel, pay and other services. The commission will take full advantage of these opportunities.

This bill is a mandate for the pursuit of efficiency, both in the internal workings of the commission and the interpretation of its mandate.

As the bill says, one function of the commission will be to recommend measures to make the legal system itself more efficient and economical. As the commission considers which of various options for reform to recommend, it will give full weight to the element of costs, both the immediate ones and those associated with downstream economic and social impacts.

The importance of this part of the commission's role has influenced every aspect of its design. It is reflected, for example, in the emphasis in this bill on the multi–disciplinary approach to law reform, one that involves not only lawyers but also economists, scientists and other experts. Efficient solutions can only come when we see the problem in the whole context. This applies with full force to law reform.

• (1240)

The failure to take costs into effect leads to system overload. It weakens the administration and enforcement of the law. It undermines the confidence and credibility that sustains the law. Because the law touches on every aspect of our national life, it is detrimental to our national well–being if we do not take these cost factors into account.

Cost effectiveness, the quality of achieving a high ratio of output to input has achieved something of the status of a common cause. It is the recognized prerequisite to Canada's competitiveness on world markets. It is the key to the sustainability of the social programs which are this country's pride and its strength. It is vital to the efficiency of the legal system which has the infrastructure for everything else.

The cost effectiveness component will also allow us to bring together legal and other experts, scientists and scholars, through these technological advances to allow them to be part of improving the law in Canada. This is going to open up the whole process of law reform and the appreciation of the law in this country.

By spending less we are really going to be able to do more. Most of all, it is going to put us back in the lead of all western nations as a country that has a law reform commission or a law commission as it is in this case. In our modern society we have to have laws which are going to evolve with society. No law can be looked on as a law that will rest in its exact form for an indefinite period of time. We constantly must be looking at our laws and appraising the needs of society for changes in the laws.

If, as some members have said, this can be done through the Department of Justice, then of course we are blind to the context at which we must look at our law. We must look at our laws separate and apart from the Department of Justice so that recommendations can come to the department from outside. That is by far the healthiest way of approaching this.

Today in our society and in the world we must be conscious of the strength of the rule of law. People look to our laws and they look to our society. Part of our society is the fabric of our laws. When investment takes place it not only looks at the economic climate but it also looks at the stability of our system and the forthrightness of our laws.

This bill is going to do a great deal to enhance an already tremendous respect for the Canadian justice system throughout the world. I am very pleased we are dealing with this bill today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Call in the members.

• (1245)

And the bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The chief government whip has asked us to defer the vote until Monday of next week at 5.30 p.m.

* * *

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS IMPLEMENTATION ACT, 1995

Hon. Ron Irwin (for the Minister of Finance, Lib.) moved that Bill C–105, an act to implement a convention between Canada and the republic of Latvia, a convention between Canada and the republic of Estonia, a convention between Canada and the republic of Trinidad and Tobago and a protocol between Canada and the republic of Hungary, for the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of fiscal evasion with respect to taxes on income, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak today at second reading of Bill C–105.

Bill C–105 implements reciprocal income tax conventions between Canada and Latvia, Canada and Estonia, Canada and Trinidad and Tobago and a protocol to the current income tax treaty between Canada and Hungary.

[Translation]

These tax conventions or treaties, as they are also sometimes called, and their amending protocols, are similar to other conventions already approved by this House.

Tax conventions have two main purposes: firstly, to avoid double taxation of income and, secondly, to prevent tax evasion. However, not all tax conventions require Parliament approval. Certain tax agreements require no legislative measure when the Income Tax Act already contains equivalent provisions.

For example, an agreement respecting the profits of airline and shipping companies and confirming the exemption they are entitled to under the Income Tax Act would not require legislative authorization.

On the other hand, double taxation conventions all require parliamentary approval, because they change the effect of national legislation, specifically the Income Tax Act. The same criteria apply to amending protocols.

This is why we are considering Bill C–105.

A few minutes ago, I mentioned conventions that have already been approved. Those in Bill C–105 are no different. They are part of a series of tax conventions dating back to 1971, when reform of our tax system necessitated Canada's developing a network of double taxation treaties with other countries.

[English]

Bill C–105 continues along this path. Canada now has double taxation treaties in place with 55 other countries. This point brings me to a related topic, the selection of countries for reciprocal tax treaties. How does the government decide with which countries to negotiate tax treaties? Are there benefits to having tax treaties with other countries? Let me take a moment and review this process. Canada does not need any legislative authority to negotiate and sign a tax treaty relationship with a country. Legislation comes later, such as with this bill, when measures in the ensuing convention differ from those affected by our Income Tax Act, as I have explained.

• (1250)

A tax treaty with a specific country is usually pursued because the government wants to encourage foreign investment in Canada and investment by Canadians abroad or as a result of budget measures.

The 1992 budget announced Canada's willingness to reduce its withholding tax on direct dividends to meet with the national norms. The 1993 budget subsequently announced Canada's willingness to eliminate the withholding tax on specific royalties to ensure the competitiveness of our technological industries.

There are three primary factors to be considered when negotiating a tax treaty with a country: how much Canadian investment is planned for that country, Canada's desire to encourage economic reforms there, and that country's interest in expanding its trade and economic relations with Canada. The tax treaties in Bill C–105 meet each of these three criteria.

Bill C–105 is neither earth shattering nor housekeeping legislation. Rather, it is the workaday legislation that addresses the dual issue of fair taxation and good international relations.

In this era of governments reappraising their roles, particularly their economic roles, and an increasingly interdependent open, global economy, reciprocal trade tax treaties make sense. They certainly do not hinder economic competition, which for Canada is an important factor of life.

Canada is above all a trading nation and we must keep expanding our trading boundaries and therefore our relationships with other countries.

A few items apply to all four treaties in this bill. First, while tax treaties vary from one country to another, these proposed conventions are similar to other treaties already concluded by Canada. They are patterned on the model double taxation convention prepared by the Organization for Economic Co–operation and Development.

Second, each treaty has been negotiated individually and has taken into account the relevant policies in each country.

Third, Bill C–105 provides an equitable solution to the double taxation problems that exist between Canada and these countries. Double taxation occurs when international transactions result in the same income being taxable in the hands of the same person by more than one nation.

In addition, the protocol brings the convention with Hungary in line with current Canadian tax policy, particularly with regard to the rates of withholding tax.

Here are some of the technical aspects of Bill C–105 that apply to the treaties with Estonia, Latvia and Trinidad and Tobago. There will be a withholding tax rate of 5 per cent on dividends paid to a parent company and on branch profits and 10 per cent on interest and royalties and management fees in the case of Trinidad and Tobago. A 15 per cent rate of withholding tax will apply on other dividends.

The conventions also provide for a number of exemptions in the case of interest. For Estonia and Latvia a zero rate will apply to interest paid to the governments, the central banks, the Export Development Corporation and from sales made on credit.

For Trinidad and Tobago a zero rate will apply to interest paid for government indebtedness and on loans or credit from the Export Development Corporation or its equivalent there and to interest paid to pension funds.

Canadians will benefit from any future changes extended by Estonia and Latvia to other OECD member countries with respect to the withholding tax on copyright and patent royalties. Trinidad and Tobago will maintain the exemption on copyright royalties. Pension payments and annuity payments in the case of Trinidad and Tobago will be taxed at a maximum rate of 15 per cent in the source country. However, war pensions in Trinidad and Tobago will be exempt.

• (1255)

In addition, social security pensions will be taxed in the originating country and the withholding tax rate on annuity payments will be dropped to 10 per cent.

Also with respect to Trinidad and Tobago, the two–year exemption for visiting teachers will no longer exist and seasonal workers will not have to pay Canadian tax if they earn under $8,500.

I turn now to the protocol negotiated with Hungary. For historical purposes I should mention that Income Tax Act amendments in 1976 increased the rate of withholding tax paid to non–residents from 15 per cent to 25 per cent unless reduced by a tax treaty.

The existing treaty between Canada and Hungary reduced the withholding tax rate to 10 per cent on dividends paid to a parent company and 15 per cent in all other cases. However, that convention was negotiated before the 1992 budget announced Canada's willingness to reduce its withholding tax on direct dividends to 5 per cent. The revised protocol before us today reduces that rate and the rate of branch tax to 5 per cent by 1997. There are no changes in the rates of withholding tax on other dividends.

Tax treaties such as this are important tools for countries. The benefits they provide in helping to stabilize tax systems foster international trade and investment which are very important in today's global environment.

Canada will not lose any revenue from the concessions in these conventions. Not only will Canada gain from increased trade and investment, we will gain from the reduced withholding tax rates and other concessions.

There is nothing in the view of the government contentious in the bill. By passing this legislation the number of countries with which Canada has tax arrangements will increase to 57.

I urge my colleagues to give Bill C–105 speedy consideration so that we may get on with more pressing issues.

[Translation]

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to express the Bloc Quebecois' assessment of Bill C–105.

As the government spokesperson said before me, this bill is not controversial, it is a matter of course in trade relations between countries.

The bill concerns the implementation of conventions between Canada and various countries, including Latvia, Estonia, Trinidad and Tobago, and Hungary to avoid double taxation and prevent fiscal evasion with respect to taxes on income.

It is a very technical bill that was first negotiated by officials in Canada's diplomatic corps and public service, and we are ratifying the treaties they concluded, with this bill.

As the government spokesperson put it so well, this sort of thing is standard between sovereign countries, countries that want to promote trade. The bill is based on the standards defined by the OECD, the Organization for Economic Co–operation and Development.

You might be wondering why I wanted to speak on behalf of the official opposition. Because this bill, which has been described as arising as a matter of course, could serve as an example, a point of comparison, for the events that could occur the day after a yes vote in the referendum in trade and economic relations between Canada, the United States, Quebec and other countries in the world.

• (1300)

In their trade, diplomatic and political relations, countries look after their own interests, as the opposition member clearly pointed out. In a proposal like the one before us, before concluding a treaty or an agreement—and there are now such treaties and agreements with 55 countries in the world—, we look after Canada's interests. We look at these countries' investments in the Canadian economy and at Canada's investments in the countries with which we have treaties.

At some point, after assessing our trade and economic interests, we sign a treaty. So there is nothing contentious in all of this. Negotiations take place, the various countries check their laws, and it is quite normal to sign an agreement so that Canada and its partners can maintain and improve their regular trade and economic relations.

In the debate currently taking place in Quebec and Canada on the prospect of a sovereign Quebec, economic and trade arguments are often on the agenda. Just the day before yesterday, the Minister of Finance claimed that Quebec's sovereignty would threaten 1 million jobs in that province. When we examine the finance minister's speech, we see that these million jobs would be threatened if trade between Canada and Quebec and between the U.S. and Quebec was reduced to zero.

Can trade between Canada, Quebec and the U.S. be reduced to zero? Will Quebecers and people in Jonquière stop buying Ford cars if these cars meet their requirements? Will people in the U.S. stop—

[English]

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, I thought we were debating Bill C–105, an act to implement tax conventions between Canada and Latvia, Estonia, Trinidad and Tobago, and a protocol for the tax treaty with Hungary. I find it very difficult to see how what the hon. member is saying is relevant to the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The hon. parliamentary secretary of course is a very experienced parliamentarian. The question of relevance does come up from time to time in the House. In the past few days it has come up and possibly in the days to come it will come up more often. It is good that we are reminded of it and we should be mindful of it.

[Translation]

The question of relevance is raised from time to time. It was probably raised a bit more often this past little while and it is likely to come up more often yet in the weeks to come. While I wish to remain sympathetic to both sides I just want to say that the hon. parliamentary secretary reminded us of the need for relevance and I hope we will be mindful of this requirement in all our remarks. I will be monitoring the debate very closely.

The hon. member for Jonquière still has the floor.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, I am very happy that the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Foreign Affairs called me on relevance because I thought it was rather obvious. Here is a country, Canada, with 28 million people. This country may well rank sixth in the world in terms of per capita gross domestic product, given purchasing power parity. This is based on 1991 figures.

• (1305)

This country, this great country which is a member of the G–7 and the international jet set, sees fit to enter into trade relations with countries that I would not describe as small—I will not use this qualifier often used by our friends opposite, because it evokes little people and conveys the somewhat pejorative idea of being of minor importance—but rather as countries with not as large a population as Canada.

Latvia, for example, has a population of 2.6 million; Estonia, 1.5 million; Trinidad and Tobago, 1.3 million; and Hungary, 10 million. While these countries do not have the economic prestige and stature of Canada, as it stands and as our friends opposite see it, Canada has negotiated tax treaties with them based on the OECD model. This is normal. Earlier, the spokesperson for the opposition said that this is normal; this is the way things are done between civilized countries of the world, that is those countries which look after their best interest.

We did not see or hear anything from Latvia, Hungary, Trinidad and Tobago to the effect that Canada is too big, that its economy is too strong, or that it will impose unacceptable conditions to those countries.

I do not know for sure, since we do not have newspaper articles from Latvia, Hungary, Trinidad and Tobago, and all the other countries, but we do not feel that Canada acted improperly with sovereign nations.

The point which I am making is that, right now, English language newspapers in Canada are constantly saying: "If Quebec becomes a sovereign nation, Canada will not deal with it because Canada is twice as big as Quebec. You will not count at all on the North American market. You will probably not be able to trade any more. Americans will probably stop buying your aluminum or your paper, and you will stop buying their cars, their refrigerators and IBM computers. You will have to go down on your knees and pay twice the price, because the United States is too big. Americans will not comply with international standards; they will try to crush you".

When I look at the bill before us this morning, I realize that this will not be the case. We are talking about Latvia, Estonia, Hungary, Trinidad and Tobago. We are talking about countries which do not have close relations with Canada, which have not been part of Canada for 130 years; there is no problem with these countries. Canada does some trading and has good diplomatic relations with these countries, and there is no problem when the time comes to sign conventions.

However, when they are talking about Quebec, which has been part of Canada for 130 years, they kowtow to the U.S. They seek a statement from the U.S. secretary of state, in the hope that he will say: "Should Quebec become sovereign, we may decide to renegotiate NAFTA, we may impose additional conditions; your cultural industry may be crushed; American movies will flood the Saguenay—Lac–Saint–Jean market, which is 98 per cent French. Movie theatres showing French language movies will close; French language newspapers will have to be highly subsidized and may even have to stop publishing. It will be the end of the world".

When you see bills such as this one, which is described by the government's spokesperson as being the normal thing to do, without any problem, you tell yourself: "Indeed, there is no problem signing commercial treaties with Latvia, Hungary or any other country. Why then should there be problems if Quebec becomes a sovereign nation"?

I think it might be worthwhile to use some examples. If they had said "We will make an exception for Latvia and Estonia, because they were part of the Soviet block for a long time, because they lived through difficulties, because they are small countries which valiantly defended their sovereignty, which survived the Soviet empire's steamroller, which maintained their language, which maintained their cultural identity, which defended themselves, and which succeeded against all odds in becoming sovereign as soon as the Soviet empire loosened its hold slightly. If they have succeeded in doing so, it might then have been said that we, Canadians, rightfully considered the boy scouts of the world, are prepared to defend widows and orphans everywhere in the world."

• (1310)

As soon as Estonia and Latvia were free of the Soviet Union, the first thing they did was to demand sovereignty and seek recognition. We could have said "We will give Estonia and Latvia special treatment, we will help them, we will support them because this is an acknowledgment of their contribution to the world balance of democracy." But no. We echo what the spokesman for the opposition said just now: "It is a matter of interest. We have investments over there; they probably have some here. We sign. No problem. A matter of interest. Not a matter of politics. Not a matter of feelings. Not a matter of anything at all. Not of acknowledging countries which have succeeded in gaining sovereignty, which have lived through 50 years of communism and the Russian steamroller. Which have survived all that. No, just a matter of interest. Well, all right then.

Take the example of Hungary. We know what happened in Hungary in the 1950s, an attempted revolt against the Soviet empire. The Hungarians were crushed. Canada took many of them in, to its credit. Although I was very young at the time, I remember it because it made a strong impression upon me. But the bill does not say "We are entering into a protocol with Hungary because it did great things during the 1950s and because there are many Hungarians in Canada and so we will help them now". No. They say: "No, we signed a protocol with Hungary because it is in our interest to do so. Hungarians have investments in Canada, and we have investments in Hungary. We want to continue to trade with them, so we sign agreements. That is how things work at the international level". The same for Trinidad and Tobago. In fact, the opposition critic explained that some harmonization was necessary in our trade with Trinidad and Tobago. No problem at all.

So I read this bill and, speaking on behalf of the official opposition, I say: "We have agreements with Latvia, Estonia, Trinidad and Tobago, Hungary and 55 other countries in the world. Wonderful". So I start off by saying: "There are certain things that are done involving large countries and small countries. Small countries which Canada does not seem to look down on, which it respects because they are sovereign". That is the beauty of sovereignty: you get respect. Whether you are big or small, when you are sovereign, you are respected because there are international conventions and practices, and the rules of the game are clearly established. And that is why certain countries want to become sovereign. Today, Quebec is one of those countries. I say country, because to me, Quebec is a country.

Look at Quebec. When you see Quebecers and hear them talk and look at their history, you realize that, like it or not, Quebec is different from other parts of Canada. This is not to denigrate the people of Newfoundland, Franco–Ontarians, Westerners and British Columbians, but Quebecers are a bit different, and today, some of them are saying: "At the international level, we are going to make this country a sovereign state. And now, one of the arguments being made in this debate is that Quebec will be in for hard times".

Daniel Johnson said: "Oops, if you become sovereign, there go 92,000 jobs". The very next day or three or four days or a week later, when they had a chance to think about it, they realized that 92,000 jobs was perhaps not impressive enough. So a respected federal finance minister told Quebec: "92,000? Probably more like one million". Not 900,000, not 900,100 or 909,150 but one million. That is impressive. We are "millionaires" in terms of job losses. He is not saying: "Oh, you will not lose one million jobs", but: "You might lose one million jobs", because if you ever do, since you are not big guys but little guys, with a small economy, you will definitely not be in the big league. If you are little, maybe Canada, which is bigger than you, or the United States, which is bigger than you, will say, we do not trade with the little guys, we only trade with the big guys.

• (1315)

So then there would be no more trade with Canada, no more trade between Quebec and Canada, no more trade between Quebec and the United States—this means a million jobs. Obviously it is a million jobs, if nobody buys what we produce and we do not buy what others want to sell us. Obviously, in trade and in production, there are going to be losses, but that is the way it works.

How does it work internationally? It works the way it does in this bill. Countries, states, make treaties and agreements based on their interests. That is how it works. For sure, some people are touchy because of certain events, they are unhappy, they say that things are going to work differently, and we hope this is not the way it is going to be.

The Leader of the Official Opposition, Lucien Bouchard, will come and start negotiations. Maybe people will say they do not want to negotiate with us, they do not like us, we are demagogues, we are ethnic, we are out to do a number on ourselves and we are shrinking our economy. We will say to them: well, we had a vote, we want to reach an agreement with you, and we will reach it even if we do not reach it on the basis of the friendship that still developed over the years and centuries.

Quebec and Canada, and Quebec and the United States are not the same as Quebec and Latvia. With all due respect to Latvia, it is not the same. I see a member opposite listening intently and rolling his eyes skyward saying: "Oh, what clever remarks". The hon. member was born in Hull, and I congratulate him on it. There are members like us; the hon. member for Québec–Est was born in Penetanguishene, Ontario. There are still ties. Perhaps there are ties between my hon. colleague opposite and people in Quebec. Perhaps he has ties with people living in Latvia and Estonia.

But it is not on that basis that we want to negotiate. We do not want you to negotiate with us because you like us, because we were with you for 130 years. It is not on that basis that we want to negotiate. We want to negotiate on the same basis as that in Bill C–105, which is not contentious and poses no problems. This basis is the interests of nations negotiating as equals because they are sovereign. This is the way things are done at the international level.

We in Quebec think we can do as well as Latvia, as Estonia, as Trinidad and Tobago. Why? For two good reasons. The first reason is that, if you look at what is currently happening in the world, according to some theories, the most populous countries, the countries with the largest domestic markets, are those that do best.

Then look at the most populous countries in the world and see how they are doing. Let us look at the U.S., which has the highest GDP. I will not talk about the other countries for fear of being accused of discrimination: "You said that France was No. 4 or 5. You are discriminating against the U.S. You like France a little less than the U.S. What is the matter?" "Would a Bloc member say that he liked France less? He is more of a Franco–American; he is not a francophile". In a campaign like the one under way, one must be prudent.

However, if we look at the world's countries on the basis of their GDP per capita and their population, we see Switzerland, with 6 million people, in second place, the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg in third place, Denmark, Austria, Belgium, Sweden, Iceland, Norway, the Netherlands, Finland— Did I mention any poor countries? These countries are among the top 20, and the top 10 include four or five countries with populations of five, six or seven million. Population is no longer as important a factor as it used to be.

• (1320)

Empires expanded. The British Empire, that my hon. colleague opposite is so fond of, expanded to increase business opportunities for British merchants who wanted to gain access to the market in India, Africa and so on. In those days, this was important, but it is no longer the case today. The size of any given country is not relevant. I am not theorizing. This is a fact confirmed in the economic accounts of respected countries such as Switzerland, Luxembourg, Denmark, Austria, Belgium, Sweden, and Iceland, which are not as large as some others.

The Austrian population is certainly not as large as the Chinese population, yet Austria does very well for itself. Back in 1991, Austria ranked 10th in terms of per capita gross domestic product. That is not bad at all. This country, a former empire, has had its problems and suffered greatly during the second world war. Today, Austria is a player.

What I mean by that is that globalization is giving smaller countries the chance to enter the global markets. It is not up to their neighbours to decide whether or not they can enter these markets. There are international regulations for that as the OECD has regulations governing treaties between various countries or tax conventions. There are rules.

The size of the country is no longer the determining factor. The main thing is to gain access to international markets. Second, and this is a major factor, there must be a demand for what you produce, your products must be well made and you must have what the economists call a niche of your own, an area in which you excel. You need not be great at everything, just in certain areas and develop markets from there. That is why I think that, in terms of size, Quebec, as a country, would compare favourably with Austria, Denmark, Switzerland, Sweden and the like, and do quite well.

Quebec is not a poor nation. Some people seem to want to put up a fence around Quebec, including the Minister of Finance who says: "Listen, when that fence is up, you will lose one million jobs". I am sorry but there will be no such fence, because this is not the way things work. Why did the minister say one million jobs? One million, as in the word millionaire. The Minister of Finance knows about millionaires, but he would be better off talking about the billions of dollars worth of freight transported on his ships, or the millions in goods produced in his plants. It is inappropriate on the part of a finance minister to tell Quebecers that one million of them will become unemployed if sovereignty is achieved, and that a fence will be built around Quebec.

The issue of Quebec's population in relation to the prosperity which it can develop is not a factor here, because it is not for other countries either. As I said, Quebec is not without assets. Its GDP stands at 160 billion dollars. Quebec is a modern state with major institutions, including a deposit and investment fund, Hydro–Quebec and a pension board, and with large corporations which developed over the years, even though, at one point, some of these big entrepreneurs invested in Northern Ireland and in Belgium, and said: "In Quebec, we started off in a small village". I could mention the community of Valcourt, where a major Canadian and Quebec multinational is based. One would think that it is a Quebec company, but we were told: "It is not a Quebec corporation, it is a Canadian one. And if Quebec becomes sovereign, do not expect us to stay here: we will move back to Canada".

Over the last 30 or 35 years, Quebec developed industrial structures and trade policies which will enable it to join the countries which I mentioned earlier. We rank 16th in terms of the GDP. This is quite something. Quebec is part of Canada. Our friends across the floor say: "Quebec is part of Canada. If you leave Canada, you will become poor, while Canada will keep on being rich".

• (1325)

That is all very fine, but the wealth of Quebec and the wealth of Canada are similar in terms of domestic product. Quebec sovereignty does not take our engineers from us. Quebec sovereignty does not take our capital from us. Quebec sovereignty does not take our administrators, our poets; it takes nothing from us.

Quebec sovereignty gives us additional powers in terms of laws, gives us additional powers in terms of treaties we can negotiate. Treaties like those Canada has with 55 countries, we will have too. We will have them because we have something to offer. There are people in those countries who may come to invest in Quebec and people in Quebec who may go and invest there. We will be able to have as many treaties as you have managed to have.

That is why it is most appropriate to bring up the case of Quebec in my intervention concerning Bill C–105, for it shows us that it is completely normal for the Government of Canada to have treaties with Latvia, with Estonia, with Trinidad and Tobago, with Hungary, as it will be completely normal for there to be one between Canada and Quebec, once its citizens have decided on sovereignty. And we will have such a treaty.

We keep hearing "But you are not telling Quebecers what you will do afterward. What will the partnership be like? We do not have much of an idea". Just do a bit of reading. I imagine that the hon. members have most definitely familiarized themselves with Quebec's bill on sovereignty, that they are also aware of the agreement signed this past June between Messrs. Bouchard, Parizeau and Dumont on the matter of the partnership treaty between Quebec and Canada.

And what will that partnership treaty cover? A customs union, free circulation of goods, free circulation of individuals, free circulation of services, free circulation of capital, monetary policy, manpower mobility, citizenship. It is a treaty between sovereign states. By the very fact that we shall be a sovereign state, we shall have the possibility of signing treaties. If Canada wants to sign treaties with Quebec in other areas, we are open to any and all discussion.

My point is that once we are sovereign, even if our economy is not as big as Canada's, we will be able to sign treaties just like Estonia, Hungary, Trinidad and Tobago and Latvia.

And they will be signed for the same reason they were signed with the countries I just referred to, because it is in our interest to do so. We claim, and I am sure that the people of Quebec will trust us to do the right thing, that this is in the interest of Quebec and of Canada.

Of course Canada will maintain up to the last minute that there will be no negotiations and no agreement ever. Our Canadian friends are so anxious to make this point that yesterday, when the Prime Minister of Canada was in Quebec, he said: "There will be nothing, because Canada will disappear if Quebec leaves. We do not know what will happen. There will be nothing left, because once Quebec has gone, there will be no more Canada". That is how we understood Mr. Chrétien's speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I realize one tends to forget this from time to time, but I may remind the House that members are to be referred to by their ridings or departments.

Mr. Caron: This was of course an oversight, Mr. Speaker. We always refer to him in conversation as Mr. Chrétien, but it is the hon. Prime Minister.

The hon. Prime Minister—Mr. Speaker, do you not think this is extraordinary? —the hon. Prime Minister of Canada said last night in a speech in Quebec, and I should have brought the quote with me, the hon. Prime Minister of Canada said there would be no more Canada if Quebec were to leave. This is really incredible.

If the province of Newfoundland ever decided to withdraw from Canada, would there still be a Canada? The people of Newfoundland—I have met a number of members from that province—are people of great warmth who was very attached to their province.

• (1330)

However, if Newfoundland were no longer a part of Canada, we can assume there would still be a Canada, as there was in 1948 and 1945, when Newfoundland was not part of Canada.

Similarly, if British Columbia withdrew from Canada, saying: "Listen, we are on the west coast, that is where the markets are", because it is always a matter of markets. Today, countries are markets, and their purpose is to engage in trade, not to protect the well–being of their citizens or ensure the continuity of nations. Let us suppose that the people of British Columbia decide that they face west, towards Japan, the Rockies are too big, there will probably be no more train service through the Rockies, with privatization and all that, the train costs too much. If they decide to become a sovereign country and then, to improve trading with Asia, they form a sort of North American Singapore, will Canada still exist?

I do not think the Prime Minister of Canada would go to Vancouver and say: "Do not leave Canada; if you leave Canada, the country will no longer exist." But this is what happened yesterday. The Prime Minister of Canada said that Canada would cease to exist if Quebec left. Is Canada only Ontario and Quebec? This is what we will end up thinking. It is as if this were 1840 and Canada were Lower and Upper Canada—joined later by other provinces and territories—but they remained the heart of the country. Ontario and Quebec form the heart of Canada, why, because they are the two biggest markets?

Certainly, with today's mentality, that is what those opposite will have us believe. Is it not, rather, that Canada at the outset was Ontario and Quebec, because Ontario was English Canadian and Quebec was French Canadian, and each country had minorities, official language minorities different from the majority. That was Canada.

Canada did what it could for minorities. Look at Quebec, there is a very strong English Canadian minority that has its universities, its school boards, its hospitals, its representatives in major institutions. I would like to be able to say the same of our Franco–Ontarian and Franco–Manitoban friends who had to fight for their schools, and who still have to fight for their schools, and for control over them. They are not fighting for control over universities, they are fighting for control over elementary schools and high schools, because that it where assimilation occurs.

We challenged, two days ago, statistics stating that there were a million francophones outside Quebec in Canada. We said that, out of the one million Canadians outside Quebec who claim French as their mother tongue, 650 speak French at home. We did not mean any disrespect to our Franco–Ontarian and Franco–Manitoban friends or our friends in the Yukon or the Northwest Territories. We just wanted to say how sad we were to see the French language die out outside Quebec. What we intend to achieve among other things through sovereignty, besides allowing Quebec to develop with its best interests in mind, is to ensure, through our own institutions, that French will still be spoken in America in a hundred years and that a French or Quebec culture will still be alive in Quebec at that time.

That is what we want to do. We want to live on without constantly having to protest, like our friends opposite do, just to survive. It is important to be able to survive. But we think that there are enough of us, and that we have enough education, enough capital, enough stamina, and enough willpower to do better than survive.

When I was in grade school, money was collected throughout the Quebec school system, a dime at a time, for the survival of the French language in Canada. Grade school children gave money for use in Manitoba and Ontario. This was fine. But look at where they now stand. It is sad in a sense to think that there are only 640 of them across Canada, including Acadians.

• (1335)

It is most unfortunate, but as a francophone and a Quebecer or a French Canadian living in Quebec who calls himself a Quebecer, I do not want anything to do with a system that will lead, fifty years from now, to a situation where we have a nice official languages act and many officially bilingual institutions, but where French will no longer be a living language in Quebec.

People can say we are spiteful, I say that we are just stating the facts. The fact is that Canada started off as a bicultural country, a bilingual country, where you had French and English Canadians. The very reason there is panic in some political back rooms is that, yes indeed, this is what Canada was initially.

The Prime Minister said so: "If Quebec goes, that is it for Canada". Look, this is a basic issue. What is Quebec? It is not an economy; it is a culture, and a language. With this culture and language gone, Canada as we know it will no longer exist. This means that we have reached the bottom line.

Canada is more than a checkerboard with ten squares representing each of the ten provinces and that we call Canada. Try as we may, and Reformers will insist that that is Canada and that each little square should be assigned the same number of senators and the same responsibilities, we have to admit that this view of Canada does not agree with reality.

Initially, the real Canada was made up of French Canadians and English Canadians. French Canadians did not benefit from this agreement. And French Canadians in Quebec who are now called Quebecers decided to withdraw from the agreement, to declare themselves sovereign, that is to say, in control of their laws, taxes and treaties, and then to propose a partnership treaty with English Canada.

English Canada likes us so much that it is threatening to cut us off. It is so pleasant to stay in a country like this one. They like us so much that instead of telling us, "Stay with us and everything will be fine", they say, "If you vote Yes, we will cut you off; if you vote No, nothing will happen and you will stay the way you are now".

It is over for French Canadians in Quebec who are now called Quebecers, and I hope that, on October 30, these Quebecers will be able to sign treaties such as this one, agreements with other countries, so that they can benefit from international trade and eventually have access to the economic instruments they need to remain what they are, a French speaking people with their own culture in North America. This is my dearest wish and I think that the people of Quebec will listen to our proposal and vote Yes on October 30.

[English]

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I hope to stick to Bill C–105 and keep it kind of short.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Silye: That is the second time in two years I have been applauded by members opposite; I appreciate it.

The purpose of Bill C–105 is to implement the tax conventions between Canada and the republics of Latvia, Estonia, Trinidad and Tobago and a protocol between Canada and the republic of Hungary for the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of income tax evasion.

It is just like Bill S–9. We are here debating bills and for all intents and purposes they are already done deals. The agreements have already been signed by the bureaucrats and diplomats and now we have to give them a formal blessing. We have spent two days doing that. It is important to do it, so let us get on with the business of getting it done.

Tax treaties like this one along with their amending protocols have two main purposes: the elimination of double taxation on goods, services and people that flow back and forth across borders and the prevention of fiscal evasion by the same people. The treaties and protocols being signed are patterned on the model of the double taxation convention prepared by the OECD. That is supposed to be our guarantee that everything in here is wonderful, good for everybody, and we do not even have to look into the details. The Reform Party supports these and any initiatives that help eliminate barriers to the globalization of our economy.

• (1340)

However, in the debate on Bill C–105 I noticed when the parliamentary secretary to the finance minister made his presentation on the bill today that he said there was nothing contentious in the bill. That almost made me want to look into it and reread it, as if he were trying to hide some of the sneaky little deals found in Bill S–9 that the member for Gander—Grand Falls pointed out. That Liberal member pointed out how bad Bill S–9 was, that it was not really a Liberal bill, and that he was disappointed the Liberal Party could support it.

That brings me to another point on the Liberal government. It struck me interesting in reviewing and researching protocol bills and tax concession bills between countries how the Liberal government had flip–flopped on its anti–free trade policies of the past. It is actually approving bills that lower taxes. It is actually approving bills that eliminate the barriers to trade. It is actually doing something they were against when in opposition and we are for.

It makes me wonder whether the finance minister is in charge or the deputy minister is in charge who worked for the Conservative government? Which set of people, which grouping, the politicians or the bureaucrats, is in charge of the government?

In 1991 when the finance minister was in opposition he gave his opinion on trade conventions, treaties and tax concession conventions. What did he ask the government to do? What did he say to ensure the deals were in the best interests of all Canadians? To put it in context, when in opposition the finance minister in referring to the Conservative government said, as indicated in Hansard:

> In the free trade agreement this government, so desperate for a success even if it was only paper thin, and so afraid of failure, sat down cowardly with the Americans and gave up the ghost before negotiations started.

An hon. member: Shame.

Mr. Martin: It made every single concession. Every point it thought the Americans would raise at the table, it gave up before it got there, because this indeed is a craven government.

He was referring to Bill S–9, what we approved yesterday. He was criticizing the very bill that was passed in substantially the same form. He did not agree that the Conservative government was headed in the right direction.

That borders on the hypocritical. If a member who criticizes something vehemently and strongly in opposition has the chance to change it, to improve it, to fix it or to make it better when in power, he or she should do so. But the government goes along and in the course of the last two years has basically passed about 10 Conservative bills substantially in the form that were on the shelf gathering dust. Its members just took them off the shelf, blew off the dust, presented them in the House, put Liberal on them, and now they are being passed.

I am sure some members of the Liberal government are deeply hurt because their party said in the past that it would never cut the deficit on the backs of the sick or the poor and this is exactly what it is now doing.

The Liberals are cutting and transferring the debt from the federal government to the provincial governments. They are cutting health care and welfare services by $7 billion and are calling it the social transfer bill or whatever. This is what they said they would not do.

There have to be some Liberals over there who are hurting, who are bleeding internally, because they are losing their roots. They are losing what they are supposed to be doing in terms of protecting the people who elected them. They are not protecting them. They are going against their wishes. They are breaking a lot of the promises they made in the red book.

During the election they said on free trade that they did not like NAFTA and that they would renegotiate.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): This is not free trade.

Mr. Assadourian: Stick to the subject.

Mr. Silye: I am sticking to the subject a lot more than the previous speaker. I am straying a bit here when I am talking about an agreement with another country.

• (1345)

Once again, when they got elected did the Prime Minister renegotiate as he promised he would? He did not. He passed it in substantially the same form it was in when the Conservatives negotiated it. I find it ironic this government says one thing in opposition and does another thing when in power which means it is still the status quo. It means nothing has changed although we now have a Liberal government instead of a Conservative one.

While we support Bill C–105, there are still a few questions I would like to address. I would like to know why our diplomats abroad can initiate legislation that makes our taxes lower and our tax rules simpler when our politicians will not do the same.

The politicians approach the department heads and say: "We would like to make the Income Tax Act less confusing, less complicated and less convoluted. We would like to make it more simple. We understand it is fair but we would like to make it fair in a way that everybody understands it, and could we not lower spending a bit? Since they are making spending cuts they could pass the benefit to taxpayers". The bureaucrats say no because any time we give up a tax point or two we never get it back, so the answer is no and that is it. That is as far as the politicians go.

Except for the member for Broadview—Greenwood who since 1989 has consistently pushed for a simplification of the taxation system, nobody else over there has as openly, vocally and energetically pursued this topic. I would like to be another one of those people who pushes the government into doing it. To the politicians, do not let the bureaucrats say it will not work. To the finance minister, demand a review of the taxation system to see if it can be changed.

We all know high taxes are an impediment to growth in the economy. Why do we not remove the impediment? Why do we not lower taxes with some spending cuts that the Liberal government is now finally making? It is finally listening to us; it is finally doing something to the benefit of many Canadians. Combine that with a genuine review of the entire taxation system which will then help to create jobs.

The opportunities for gains in the economy by implementing tax reform are tremendous. By not doing it, by not exploring it, those doors remain closed and the opportunity to restore faith, hope and savings for taxpayers are eliminated. That debt will never, ever be addressed by adding to it. We have to get to a zero deficit, not a 3 per cent of GDP and dig the hole slower. They are still digging the hole and are just adding to the problem.

If we want to get rid of the problem, lower spending, raise taxes to a zero point and the deficit is gone, if that is what the Liberal government thinks is the problem. However, that is not the problem. The problem is the debt and our high levels of taxation.

Diplomats recognize globally that we must have equality, that we need to have the lowest rates of taxation possible to attract investment and capital while reciprocating with other countries by offering them the same deals in our country. They do that. Look through those agreements with the incentives and the opportunities between countries. It is great. It works well for exports and imports. What is saving our economy today? NAFTA. Trade with other nations.

We need to treat each of our provinces, including that wonderful province of Quebec which belongs in Canada and will stay in Canada, the same way we treat other nations. Let us make deals among ourselves, province to province, that eliminate the barriers to trade and introduce treaties. Let us have only one level of government looking after a service. Let us define specifically which level of government should look after which program. Let us get some savings and some gains into our system so we can lower spending thus lowering taxes, so we can remove the impediments to our sluggish economy.

I am trying to make an analogy between the good aspects of trade treaties we are making with other countries. Why do we not use those diplomats instead of the politicians sitting over there in the front row to make our negotiations with the deputy ministers in order to implement the kind of reforms we need in this country? These diplomats do a much better job than the elected politicians because the elected politicians are afraid to stand up to the bureaucracy. I encourage similar actions here at home in the form of tax reform as we find in deals like this.

• (1350)

I hope this is the last fluffy type bill we have before the House and that we can get on with more important bills. As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, you could put the question, put the bill through committee of the whole and then we could debate the health act.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to participate in the debate on Bill C–105, an act to implement a convention between Canada and the republic of Latvia, a convention between Canada and the republic of Estonia, a convention between Canada and the republic of Trinidad and Tobago, and a protocol between Canada and the republic of Hungary, for the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of fiscal evasion with respect to taxes on income.

As the bill states, the purpose of this enactment is to implement income tax conventions that have been signed with Latvia, Estonia, Trinidad and Tobago, and a protocol to the income tax convention with Hungary. As the bill says, these treaties have been signed. The treaty with Latvia was signed in Ottawa on April 26, 1995. The agreement with Estonia was signed in Tallinn on June 2, 1995. The agreement with Trinidad and Tobago was signed in Toronto on September 11 of this year. The protocol with Hungary was signed back on May 3, 1994 in Budapest.

Tax treaties are designed to alleviate double taxation of income earned in one country by a person resident in another country. While the present position of Latvia, Estonia, Trinidad and Tobago, and Hungary limits the potential for additional investment by residents of these countries in Canada, the tax treaties in question will certainly be helpful to Canadian corporations and individuals with operations and investments in those countries.

As the parliamentary secretary has already alerted the House, these agreements contain provisions on withholding tax, on capital gains, on non–discrimination—discrimination is prohibited but only on the basis of the nationality of the taxpayers—pensions and annuities, and double taxation relief.

These are important agreements. They now must be approved by Parliament to make them official.

I have been in these countries, except for Trinidad and Tobago. I have visited Latvia, Estonia and Hungary. I was in these countries before they were sovereign countries, when they were forced to be under the Soviet Union. I have visited them after they obtained their independence. Canada was one of the first countries to recognize the independence of the three Baltic states and Hungary, et cetera.

I would like to differ with my colleague from Jonquière very strongly. He tries to compare Quebec to these countries. I hope he will read his history. Latvia and Estonia, which are mentioned in this bill, were sovereign countries at one time but they had their sovereignty taken away from them by the Molotov–Ribbentrop agreement. That was not the people's choice; it was forced on them. Now through democratic elections they are choosing their own governments. That is why these countries are now ready to do business with the western world and the entire globe.

I was in those two countries just last summer and in Hungary two years ago. All of those countries are open for business. So is Trinidad and Tobago, but I have never been there so I cannot speak for it, but the other three countries are open for business. They do not want handouts, although we have helped them a lot with our technical assistance program.

• (1355)

The technical co–operation program has been placed under CIDA. We have helped those countries in language training for example. Many people living in Estonia speak nothing but Russian. In order to obtain their citizenship they must learn Estonian. There is a big demand for learning Estonian very quickly. We are helping Estonians with the technology for teaching languages.

I wish the hon. member would read his history and not compare la belle province with sovereign countries like the three Baltic states, Hungary, et cetera.

I was very shocked to hear the hon. member say that Canadians want to see French disappear. Where has the hon. member been for the last 10 years? I was in education for 27 years. The big trend was to have children attend total immersion French programs. Children from British Columbia to Newfoundland are graduating having spoken the two official languages from as early as grade 3.

The hon. member was concerned that there is no preservation of the French language. The Constitution of Canada preserves the French language. If Quebec separates, that guarantee is gone. That is why Quebecers have to be shown very clearly what they are going to vote for on October 30. Do you want to separate from Canada, period? If you do, along with everything else Quebec may lose is the protection of the French language and French culture.

I am very emotional about that because my wife happens to come from Quebec. Most of her family lives in la belle province. I am so pleased when my nieces and nephews write to me. I have a card in my office which I invite the hon. member to come and see. It reads: "Mon oncle, je t'aime. My uncle, I love you". When my niece sees me she tells me the same thing: "Wujek, ja Cie kocham". She will also tell me: "Uncle, I love you". It is great that in a province, le beau Québec, Canadians can grow up with three languages. What more can we ask for? Not only protecting the French language, but also allow young Canadians to grow up in these other—

The Speaker: I hate to interrupt any member, but you will have the floor after question period. It being 2 p.m. we will now proceed to statements by members.

STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

[Translation]

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as a former special constitutional adviser to several Quebec premiers, I can understand the wish for a flexible federalism that would readily and efficectively meet the particular needs of every region of Canada.

My constituents in British Columbia make the same constitutional claims. Consequently, let us build together a new pluralistic and co–operative federalism for the 21st century. Vote no in the referendum.

* * *

[English]

JUSTICE

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on Thanksgiving Sunday in Coquitlam a grandfather, grandmother and their daughter were brutally murdered at the hands of the common law husband. This heinous crime once again illustrates the impotence of court orders in the justice system and the tragedy of marital and family breakdown.

Three white coffins stood in the very church that was the centre of this family's life and the tragic place of their death. I joined the community of Maillardville there last week and shared their pain.

It is for the sake of such communities that we in this place must find those measures that will strengthen and safeguard crucial family bonds in our society. We must work together to promote and implement measures in our justice and legal systems that make peace, not war, in the difficult separation of family structures. We must recognize that government policy does influence choice, attitude, and action, and seek out the root causes of the distemper of our times.

I take this opportunity to express my sincere condolences to the grieving family and to the community. My thoughts and my prayers are with them.

* * *

AIRPORTS

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the federal Liberal government is proceeding with the former Conservative government's plan to privatize the operations of local airports.

This week the president of the Saskatchewan Aviation Council reminded us of the continued importance of these airports and said that the key to the financial survival of small airports in these new circumstances is the ability to attract business to the affected communities. He accurately points out that there is little communities can do about the costs of running the airports, so they must find ways to raise new operating money. That generally means that the airports need to bring in more users.

The irony of the situation is that if new money cannot be found the increased costs of operating the airports will have to be passed on to the current airport users, resulting in less, not more, use of the airports.

With this in mind, I urge the government to provide the resources and support systems necessary to ensure that municipal governments can successfully make it through this critical transition period.

* * *

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Rey D. Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have always formed a united front to face common challenges. Once more we are challenged to work together to confront the issues of our time: jobs, economic growth, safety, good government and unity. Together we shall prevail.

Together we tilled the countryside and built cities, went to war to win peace and kept peace to prevent war. We made breakthroughs in science and pioneered technologies for all citizens. We created medicare so that all Canadians, rich or poor, have equal access to top notch health care.

I know that Quebecers and their fellow Canadians take pride in the work we have done together to make Canada what it is today: the number one nation in the world in which to live. May this pride bring victory on October 30 to a Canada united in purpose and committed to a renewed federalism that ensures we reach our full potential in the 21st century.

Long live Canada!

* * *

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Gary Pillitteri (Niagara Falls, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in recent weeks many concerned Canadians in my riding of Niagara Falls and Niagara–on–the–Lake have been talking about the forthcoming referendum in Quebec and what it may mean for the future of our nation. Emotions are high and opinions have ranged from indignation to disbelief and even ambivalence. Many letters written from the heart call for Quebec to remain in Canada as a fundamental part of the Canadian family.

Yesterday a group of students from Niagara College wrote to the citizens of Quebec expressing their deeply held belief that it is the uniqueness of the people of Quebec that has helped Canada to become the greatest country in the world.

Let our greatness continue and our family remain united in harmony to work towards a better future for everyone.

Vive le Canada uni!

* * *

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Andrew Telegdi (Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on Thanksgiving weekend Waterloo, Ontario, hosted a Waterloo, Quebec, delegation during Oktoberfest. On Sunday evening, October 8, the two mayors signed a declaration officially twinning the two Waterloos.

Mayor Bernard Provencher told the delegates of the two Waterloos:

> We are now living in the most critical period in the history of our country, with a possibility of a break up. It is quite ironic that it is in the midst of this crisis we are gathered here tonight to tell each other that if we could find a magical way of bringing all English–speaking Canadians through the Quebec province and do it in reverse the other way then we would not have to vote for what we already own on the 30th. Long live the twinning of our two cities, may they both remain forever in a united Canada.

The mayors of the two Waterloos, Bernard Provencher and Brian Turnbull, are in the House today. Their actions have helped to develop better understanding, mutual respect, and friendship among Canadians.

Vive les deux Waterloos! Vive le Canada uni!

* * *

• (1405)

[Translation]

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Bernard St–Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the comments made yesterday by the Prime Minister in his speech before the greater Quebec City Chamber of Commerce are unequivocal and they clear up any misunderstanding. The federal system will not be changed in light of Quebec's legitimate aspirations.

The Prime Minister just abandoned all Quebec federalists who still believed that it would be possible to reform federalism and guarantee the respect and development of Quebec's distinctiveness. Indeed, the Prime Minister just slammed the door on those who still thought that federalism would take into account Quebec's distinct and specific character.

It is now clear that the Prime Minister has nothing to offer to Quebecers. The side which is promoting change is the only one providing a vision that will allow Quebec to develop to its full potential. Vote yes, it is the only logical choice.

[English]

MISSING CHILDREN

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last May I wrote to fellow members of the House to encourage them to include a picture of missing children in their householders. The idea was to make these pictures of missing children more visible to many more people, thereby increasing the probability of their being found.

I am pleased to inform the House that this project has already been successful. I was recently informed by Child Find Canada's office in Edmonton that a missing teenager was safely located as a direct result of tips arising from the people who had seen her picture in a fellow member's householder.

Hats off to every member who is participating in Child Find and other missing children's organizations. I encourage every member to participate, because this program works.

* * *

[Translation]

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the separatist dream merchants received a cold shower from the United States. The U.S. Secretary of State, Warren Christopher, dispelled the separatist dream concerning the special relationship that an independent Quebec would continue to have with the United States.

Mr. Christopher said: "The fact that Canada is a united nation is an important aspect which explains our ability to get along with that country, to do business with it, and to have a successful relation".

Separatist leaders can continue to generate confusion and sell dreams wherever they go, but they will never succeed in fooling Quebecers. On October 30, Quebecers will say no to a project which would only isolate Quebec.

* * *

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in a meeting with the editorial team of La Presse, the leader of the Bloc Quebecois described the sovereignty of Quebec as "inevitable" and "a required step".

This statement by the separatist leader confirms what we have long been saying: a yes in the referendum will guarantee only one thing, that Quebec will become a separate country.

The Bloc leader was not in a position to describe the partnership in such categorical terms, since he knows very well that the separatist blueprint is not realistic and he will find no one to negotiate with.

Quebecers do not wish to see Quebec separate from Canada, they do not wish to see Canada broken apart, and that is why they will vote no on October 30.

* * *

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Mauril Bélanger (Ottawa—Vanier, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, all Quebecers are becoming increasingly aware that the separatist leaders refuse to talk about the costs of separation. The separatist leaders are attempting to cloak their plans for separation in suppositions, hoping that they can thus slip them by Quebecers.

The leader of the Bloc has even gone so far in that arrogant attitude as to state in an interview with La Presse yesterday: "I did not say that there were no risks, I said that there were no costs".

Members of the yes team have even refused to acknowledge the costs associated with separation. They have even refused to talk about them throughout the entire campaign.

On October 30, the people of Quebec will show them that they have not been taken in by this deception, when they vote no to separation.

* * *

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs said that Canadians in the rest of Canada had paid for 80 per cent of federal assets in Quebec. The minister finds it exceedingly complicated for Quebec to retain ownership of federal assets located on Quebec territory after sovereignty.

• (1410)

Naturally the minister neglected to add that, in fact, Quebec has paid for 23 per cent of federal assets located elsewhere in Canada or abroad. And custom and international law stipulate that federal assets located within Quebec will become the property of Quebecers ipso facto. Canada loses nothing in the transaction, as only 17.5 per cent of all federal assets are located in Quebec.

Obviously, Quebec will want to deduct this shortfall from the portion of the federal debt it will assume the day after a yes vote. Once again, the minister has attempted to bend the truth about what would happen in a sovereign Quebec the day after October 30.

* * *

[English]

JUSTICE SYSTEM

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are telling us in no uncertain terms that they want something done about our justice system.

The justice minister talks a good game and keeps throwing out feeble changes to the laws of the land, but where is the enforcement? Strangers move in and occupy land they do not own and nobody touches them. Bikers blow up property, each other, and innocent citizens. Policemen work hard to bring criminals to justice, only to see those same criminals walk out of court with a slap on their wrists and a smirk on their faces.

Law–abiding citizens are fed up. Hundreds will rally tonight with the Reform Party leader at the Civic Auditorium in Oshawa. Reform has a strong, common sense plan to deal with this situation and make public safety the number one priority of our justice system.

The justice minister can either get the message now or voters will talk to him at the ballot box.

I urge the government to listen to what Canadians will be saying tonight in Oshawa.

* * *

[Translation]

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette–Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, since the beginning of the referendum campaign, Canadian citizenship and the Canadian passport are issues that have been raised repeatedly by the yes side. And almost every time, the separatists try to make us believe that all Quebecers who so wished would be able to keep their Canadian citizenship and their Canadian passport after Quebec's separation.

However, when the PQ's chief negotiator realized that his arguments were no longer convincing anyone, he started to back down, and now he says he will not negotiate the issue of citizenship for Quebecers. Furthermore, the leader of the Bloc is starting to praise the advantages of a Quebec passport. The only passport the separatist leader can guarantee is a passport to the unknown, a one way ticket to separation. On October 30, Quebecers will again confirm their ties with Canada and say no.

* * *

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Prime Minister of Canada was in Quebec, in his own province, to deliver a very important message to Quebecers. The Prime Minister is intent on refuting the myth dreamt up by the separatists that the rest of Canada would form a monolithic block. Not so.

No one can predict how the other Canadian provinces will react the day after a vote in favour of Quebec separation, let alone claim that they will form a single block and ask the federal government to negotiate with a separated Quebec. The Prime Minister has clearly shown that the partnership plan of the separatists is just a scam to camouflage their plans for separation. The people of Quebec know that, and on October 30, they will vote no.

* * *

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, did anyone forget to tell Daniel Johnson about the political events of the past 15 years? Daniel Johnson says in the brochure of the director general of elections in Quebec that governments should continue to reduce duplication, but does he remember his own inability to negotiate a withdrawal by the federal government from manpower training as demanded by everyone in Quebec?

Daniel Johnson says that he believes no constitutional change should take place without Quebec's consent, but does he remember that he has with him on the no side the man who orchestrated the strong arm strategy of 1982? Mr. Johnson has a very poor memory indeed. Fortunately, Quebecers do remember and will vote yes on October 30.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

• (1415)

[Translation]

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in what should have been his most important speech in the referendum campaign, yesterday the Prime Minister simply gave Quebecers a warning by refusing to promise any sort of constitutional change to the present federal system. Once again, the Prime Minister has been the passionate defender of the status quo.

Are we to understand from the Prime Minister that he is asking Quebecers to vote no while refusing to commit to any constitutional change, even though his Quebec allies on the no side are rejecting the status quo?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I said very clearly yesterday to the people of Quebec that the referendum vote is a very serious one and what the Bloc Quebecois and the Parti Quebecois are proposing is separation, pure and simple. The leader of the Bloc Quebecois said clearly yesterday that he had no interest in any sort of union with Canada, that he only wanted sovereignty. Perhaps he is in fact no longer the chief negotiator, but he certainly is the chief separator.

I have always said that Canada is evolving all the time and that there will certainly be changes—we make them everyday. But what do they want, the people of Quebec and, like them, all the people in Canada? They want an end to talk of constitutional problems. They want us to work together with the governments of Quebec and the other provinces, with business people and with all of society to create jobs and to give workers back their dignity in Quebec and elsewhere. This is why, after the voting on the referendum in ten or twelve days, we can get down to the real problems.

As far as constitutional changes are concerned, the debate today is not about that. We are answering the ambiguous question posed by the PQ and the separatists. The question is separation. If Quebecers understand well, they will understand that the issue is separation and Quebecers do not want to separate from Canada.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is always a surprise to hear the Prime Minister say in all seriousness that he wants to solve Canada's real problems when, during the past four weeks we have been sitting, the government has not tabled a single major piece of legislation on real issues. There are limits. We know he is keeping things until after the referendum.

The director general of election is distributing a brochure in Quebec, under the Referendum Act, which sets out the yes and the no positions. I would ask the Prime Minister whether the no side position in the brochure distributed by the director general of election accurately reflects his government's constitutional position?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have always said that, as the federal government, we wanted to make the Canadian federation work well, and it is vital administrative arrangements be found to achieve the goals we are seeking. The brochure states clearly that we are prepared to clarify existing duplications. In fact, we have signed nine agreements with the nine other provincial governments to end much of the duplication. The only government refusing to sign an agreement to discuss the elimination of duplication is the Government of Quebec. It refused, because it had no interest in making the federation work. It wants to make use of everything to delude Quebecers into thinking they will remain in Canada when it wants to get them out of Canada.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would have appreciated an answer to my question, but, you will permit me to remind the Prime Minister that it was Daniel Johnson and the Minister of Labour, who at the time was a minister in the Johnson government, who refused to sign the cut–rate agreement he was proposing. He has a short memory. He has a very short memory, Mr. Speaker. Since I did not get any answer from the Prime Minister, I will try for a more specific one.

• (1420)

In the document tabled, we read that "the Government of Quebec must—be a willing party to any change in its relationship with the federal government. This is the spirit of the federalism we believe in". This is the no position.

Does the Prime Minister agree with this statement of the no side's position, a statement which calls for a veto for Quebec? Does he agree?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my party supported a veto for Quebec. When René Lévesque was Premier of Quebec and he met with the seven other premiers, he was the one who opted for an amending formula that gave all the provinces equal status. He rejected the Victoria formula, which provided for a veto and which was proposed by this government to combine with the others and create equality among the provinces.

It was at this point that the veto we were proposing for Quebec was dropped by the PQ, which the member belonged to at the time. Instead of criticizing us for the situation, he should do a mea culpa. For strictly partisan and short term reasons, Mr. Lévesque dropped the veto for Quebec.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, René Lévesque made a single mistake: going to Ottawa without a mandate and trusting the premiers of the other provinces and the current Prime Minister, all of whom betrayed him. Never again will we make the same mistake.

In a brochure sent to all Quebecers by the director general of elections in Quebec, the no committee clearly demands a right of veto for Quebec, and since members asked the question, I will quote from the brochure once again to give them another chance of hearing it: "The government of Quebec must be a willing party to any change in its relationship with the federal government". This is what the no side and the Prime Minister are currently selling Quebecers.

As an eminent member of the no committee, can the Prime Minister tell us if he was consulted on the demand for a right of veto as expressed, printed and conveyed by the no side? Is this what he is saying or is he telling us stories once again?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the constitutional position of the Liberal Party of Quebec is well–known. It was developed by the Liberal Party of Quebec. For us, the question at this time is about the right of veto. We offered Quebec a right of veto before, but René Lévesque turned it down in favour of another amending formula.

When Mr. Johnson forms the new government after the next election, he will be able to make the same demand if he wants to and it will be submitted to the provinces. If the provinces agree, the amending formula will be changed.

As for myself, if I was in favour of this amending formula in 1970, I will have no difficulty in approving it again. The Parti Quebecois, however, has created a situation that will make it very difficult to find a solution because they were the ones who rejected the right of veto. It was rejected not by us but by them so they could join forces with the other provinces in opposing the proposals made by the government of which I was then a member. I have nothing to learn from them.
If a mistake was made, it is the Parti Quebecois that must pay the price. They were the ones who rejected Quebec's right of veto.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I say again to the Prime Minister that Lévesque's mistake was to trust the premiers of the other provinces, who betrayed him with the assistance of the current Prime Minister, an expert manipulator. We know that he has nothing to learn in the area of manipulation. He is Canada's number one manipulator.

I ask the Prime Minister to give us a straightforward answer. There is a clear statement from the no committee, of which he is a member. Until he tells us that he is no longer on the committee, he is still on it. His Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and his Minister of Labour, who is responsible for the referendum, are also on this committee. Do they agree with what is in this brochure? This is a simple question. It is not hard to answer. Could he make an effort, Mr. Speaker?

• (1425)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the truth hurts when we tell them that they were the ones who rejected Quebec's right of veto. They have no right to blame us at this time.

The truth is that they want to talk about something else. They do not want to talk about their plans. For five weeks and even five months they have tried telling Quebecers: "We do not want to separate, we want a partnership". They are now changing their tune at the last minute.

Their document clearly states that they want to keep their Canadian citizenship and passports. And then yesterday, with a wave of their magic wand, the Canadian passport became something else for Quebecers. They have changed their tune. We, however, are not changing our position. We want Quebec to stay in Canada and we are not flip–flopping as the Bloc members are doing because the PQ is suddenly changing its tune while still trying to hide the truth from Quebecers. These separatists do not have the courage to frankly tell Quebecers that they are indeed separatists.

[English]

BOSNIA

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in Washington the foreign affairs minister announced we will be sending troops to Bosnia as part of the new NATO combat force. Prior to the announcement there was no consultation with Parliament or with Canadians.

It is outrageous. It is just like the Mulroney Tories, whom the Liberals often condemn.

In opposition the now Minister of Human Resources Development said about the deployment of troops to the Persian Gulf: "To deny the opportunity of this Parliament to be heard or to represent the Canadian people is a dereliction of duty by the government".

I ask the Prime Minister, why has the government abandoned its principles and adopted the same style of government as the hated Mulroney?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member should know that as of this moment we have had three debates. The minister said "if necessary".

The Americans, our partners in the Bosnian situation, are trying to achieve peace. If peace is achieved they would like it to be maintained. The Americans, who have not yet put one soldier there, are apparently willing to send in up to 25,000 soldiers. They have asked us if we would participate. The minister said we would look into it and if it is absolutely necessary troops would be sent. However, before we make a decision we will come to cabinet and the House of Commons.

The member should congratulate the ministers and all those involved for the peace we are about to have in Bosnia. One of the reasons we will have peace in Bosnia is because of our Canadian soldiers and others who have been there for the last three years developing a situation that is leading to that peace today.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, if we are going to have peace in the former Yugoslavia, which we all hope for, we certainly would not be sending troops that are the biggest and baddest junkyard dogs to take care of themselves over there; we would be sending peacekeepers. That is what was promised in this House.

This is a totally new role. The Canadian people demand to know how many troops we are sending. What is the duration of their stay there? What will be the cost? What will be the exact mandate of these troops?

Will the Prime Minister agree that Parliament must be allowed to establish the criteria for a dangerous mission like this?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): I do not know if you remember, Mr. Speaker, but I remember that they voted twice in the House for having troops there. They got up from their seats and approved the actions of the government.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): Fine, no. I am sorry, they just made speeches in favour of that but they did not vote. When I say something, I also vote that way.

• (1430)

It is a very useful situation at the moment. We said that everybody wants to be involved and there will be even more troops if a peace treaty is ratified to make sure the situation evolves peacefully in Bosnia. We all want that to happen.

If Canadian soldiers are needed, Mr. Christopher was informed by the Minister of Foreign Affairs that we will look into the possibility. However, before we make a decision we will consult the cabinet and the House of Commons where you can express your views. Again I can expect that what you say is not necessarily what you will vote for.

The Speaker: I ask my colleagues to please address the Chair.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we should remember we are not voting during these discussions and that the decision has been made before the discussions.

The defence minister said yesterday the force we are sending to Bosnia will not have a peacekeeping role. That means the government is sending Canadian troops into a combat role without consulting Parliament, which is outrageous.

With the lives of young Canadians at stake will the Prime Minister at the very minimum allow Parliament to have a free vote on whether our men and women should be sent into a combat role in Bosnia?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the hon. member took this quotation from but I assure him what we are expecting is peace at last in the former Yugoslavia.

We are not getting ready to send combat troops. We feel it is the profound sentiment of Canadians all across the country to support UN peacekeeping missions. We have in the past and we will in the future because that is where Canadians have been singled out as among the best, a duty Canadian troops expect to continue in the future.

* * *

[Translation]

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Speaking before the greater Quebec City Chamber of Commerce yesterday, the Prime Minister stated that Quebec constitutes a distinct society because it has its own language, culture and institutions, but refused to give this fact formal recognition in the Canadian Constitution.

If he is serious in making his own the notion of distinct society as defined in the Meech Lake accord, can the Prime Minister tell us why he has so far refused to make a commitment to amend the constitution to include this definition of distinct society?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it takes some nerve on the part of an hon. member who voted against a distinct society in the Quebec referendum on the Charlottetown accord to rise in this House and ask me if I support the notion of distinct society.

I have always said, and we voted accordingly, that these matters were discussed in the collective document issued by the no side. But the Bloc Quebecois and its members across the way all voted against the distinct society clause when it was introduced. It was included in the Charlottetown accord, yet they all voted against it. It takes some nerve to come and blame us for that today. In rejecting it, for all kinds of reasons, they actually sided with the Reform Party against the Charlottetown accord. We, on the other hand, voted for and believe in it.

As for the constitution, it will be amended if and when discussions are held on the matter. The existing amending formula, as proposed by Mr. Lévesque, requires the consent of at least seven provinces. The federal government really cannot speak for the provinces because, as Mr. Lévesque put it at the time, all the provinces are equal and must take part in the constitutional amendment process.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we support the concept of distinct society when it really means something.

Must we gather from the Prime Minister's refusal to make a commitment to recognize Quebec as a distinct society in the constitution that he not only does not believe in it himself but that he is also unable to get a sufficient number of provinces to agree on this issue?

• (1435)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is beyond me how the hon. member, who voted against the distinct society clause, can ask me to make all kinds of promises in this respect. She was against this concept and voted accordingly. Now she claims that it was not really the concept of distinct society, that it was not the right term. The question that was just put to me was: Do you support the concept of distinct society? My answer is yes and I might add that the hon. member voted against the distinct society clause.

[English]

BOSNIA

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. I hope he knows his cabinet colleague announced the government's intention to send our troops back to Bosnia without consultation despite a number of serious shortcomings in the Canadian Armed Forces, including inadequate equipment, low morale and the current troop rotation. Some of our troops have been there for the third time.

How can the minister even consider sending our troops back to Bosnia without addressing these concerns?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am not really sure what the hon. member's question is pertaining to.

I am perplexed by his question. As a previous member of the Canadian forces he knows the resiliency of the Canadian forces and their capacity to do what is asked of them despite adverse conditions and despite tasking.

I do not think anybody would disagree that our troops have had more than their fair share of work. The Prime Minister has indicated the work they have done has saved millions of lives and we should be very proud of that.

The hon. member is suggesting the Canadian forces do not have the capacity to participate in whatever decision is being made. Inasmuch as that decision is being made, I would prefer not to comment on it right now.

However, I assure him that if the government decides to participate in the NATO peace implementation plan, in the reconstruction of Bosnia or in the help for refugees it will be able to do what it plans to because the Canadian forces will have the capacity.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, evidence is increasing that our troops in Somalia were let down by their leadership.

Canadians have confidence in our troops in the field but they have serious reservations about the senior chain of command. It is the privates and the corporals who must bear the burden of this lack of leadership.

Canadians are asking is it wise for the government to volunteer our troops before the Somalia commission has reached its final conclusion?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has already indicated that before decisions are made, whether there is a vote or not, we will have a discussion in the House.

I repeat, the Canadian forces will be capable of doing what the government asks them to do. If the member is suggesting morale is not good in the Canadian forces, he is not doing anything to help the morale by suggesting that Canadian forces are not capable of doing what their government asks of them.

* * *

[Translation]

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

In the brochure distributed to every Quebec household by the director general of elections, the no committee says that the Quebec government must have full power in the fields which fall under its jurisdiction.

Will the Prime Minister admit that, far from putting an end to the federal spending power in fields of provincial jurisdiction, Bill C–96, which deals with manpower training and education, is an even greater interference in these sectors?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as everyone knows, I want to make sure that the Canadian constitution is complied with. Sometimes, there are sectors in which our respective jurisdictions have a bearing on one another. The spending power has been in our constitution since 1867 and, at this point in time, we cannot really abuse it, since we have little money.

• (1440)

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how does the Prime Minister intend to convince Quebecers of the virtues of administrative arrangements when even his federalist ally, Daniel Johnson, and his labour minister have rejected the administrative agreement on labour, calling it a cheap arrangement?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has it wrong. It was the present minister of employment, Madam Harel. When I wrote to the ministry offering specifically to transfer institutional training to the province of Quebec, as with other provinces, we received absolutely no response. It would be very useful for the hon. member to check her facts.

* * *

THE ENVIRONMENT

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, a landmark agreement on harmonizing environmental issues is floundering.

The minister has blamed the provinces, especially Alberta. According to a recent CCME publication, she knows the federal government walked out, not the provinces, contrary to what she said.

Will the minister now admit she stalled this process and apologize to the provinces?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the difference between the member for Beaver River and me is I was at the meeting.

I did not pinch a transcript and then claim it was something else. In front of at least 10 witnesses I offered to publish 10 of the 11 indexes to the public the day after that meeting. The offer was turned down by Mr. Ty Lund.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, regardless of who did what, we need to get on with this.

This needs to move forward, not backward. Let us not cast aspersions and blame. Let us move forward. This process is being totally held up. On August 25 all the premiers with the exception of the Quebec premier urged the Prime Minister to tell the Minister of the Environment to meet with her counterparts and get on with this draft agreement.

Next Monday the minister will meet with these counterparts again in Whitehorse. Will she stay at the meeting and will she commit to producing a draft agreement and get on with it?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly prepared to restate the commitment I made in Haines Junction. I hope the minister of the environment for Alberta will be open enough to begin the public discussion. The federal government asked very early in this process for public participation. That was turned down by the province of Alberta.

It is also interesting that the member for Beaver River said all the provinces with the exception of Quebec. She will know very well there was a formal letter written by the province of Quebec asking the CCME not to take action on that initiative at that meeting, a letter which conveniently her minister, Mr. Lund, chooses to ignore.

* * *

[Translation]

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Laurent Lavigne (Beauharnois—Salaberry, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in the same document distributed by the director general of elections, the no side says that we must continue to reduce duplication.

Does the Prime Minister recognize that his government's decision to establish the human resources investment fund totally contradicts that statement by the no side, since, with this fund, Ottawa will interfere even more in the manpower sector?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we continue to see the facts being turned on their head.

The hon. member knows, as I have already stated in the House, that several months ago I wrote to a minister of the Government of Quebec, Madam Harel, suggesting we get together to study the issue of overlap and duplication so that we could clarify roles and responsibilities. Again, no response, rien à faire. I guess Madam Harel started "poofing" before the Leader of the Opposition did.

[Translation]

Mr. Laurent Lavigne (Beauharnois—Salaberry, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, the best way to avoid distortions is to give back to Quebec full authority over manpower training, along with the related funding, and thus create a single–window service.

Will the Prime Minister recognize that his government's measure, namely Bill C–96, contradicts the position held by the no committee in the brochure distributed by the director general of elections, since Ottawa is increasing duplication in the manpower sector by eliminating the UI fund?

• (1445)

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that the members of the opposition are now recycling their questions from last week.

I will simply give them the answer we gave last week, which is no, Bill C–96 simply consolidates the authorities that were under the existing acts of the four departments that were brought in as part of the human resource development ministry. That is all that took place, nothing more than that. We were simply doing what was done before but consolidating into the new ministry.

Seeing as the hon. member raises this wonderful publication, I am very glad to see that the members of the Bloc Quebecois have it in their possession. Maybe they will read it and find out what a co–operative federation strategy really looks like.

* * *

[Translation]

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Paul DeVillers (Simcoe North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, just like larger corporations, now a majority of small and medium size businesses in Quebec are making a stand against the separation of Quebec. Can the industry minister explain to this House the main economic reasons why those who really create jobs in Quebec want to stay within a united Canada?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is not at all surprising that small and medium size businesses are against the separation of Quebec.

Some hon. members: Oh, Oh.

Mr. Manley: They do not want to say so, but it is true. An uncertain climate creates problems for businesses and in this case the uncertainty stems from the fact that separatists cannot answer questions on the interprovincial trade agreement and on NAFTA, they cannot give answers to the thousands of Quebecers who depend on foreign trade.

They also understand this when business people go outside Canada. I saw this when I was in Geneva two weeks ago: there were several small and medium size telecommunication businesses from Quebec there. All those people were proud to be Canadians. They all support the maple leaf. They understand that it is a very valuable trademark on world markets. That is what they understand.

* * *

[English]

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it appears that the same social policy wizards who brought us training programs for jobs that do not exist and who totally mismanaged the TAGS program have now undertaken a $44,000 airlift of Cape Bretoners to a big Ontario city to try to find work.

I ask the Minister of Human Resources Development if mass evacuation is his solution to the problems facing Atlantic Canadians.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know her history well, coming from the distinguished province of Alberta. Much of the investment and building of that province took place because workers came from all parts of Canada to help build the oil fields in those areas.

It seems to me that one of the great strengths of this country, one of the great strengths of our federation, is that we have no fences or walls between provinces and that people can move freely between these provinces so they can go to work. The most important thing is to find good ways to get people back to work.

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I remind the minister that Ontarians have their own unemployment problems.

This is just an admission that the programs the Liberals have been spending millions on do not work. Now all they can do is say to Atlantic Canadians: "We've cut your benefits and your programs, give up and move to Ontario".

Is the government now asking taxpayers to buy airline tickets for every unemployed Atlantic Canadian?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, oftentimes the problem with the questions we receive from members of the Reform Party is they are based purely on a meanspirited exaggeration.

We provide a wide variety of opportunities for Canadians by offering training to get jobs, by working with local business to get jobs, and oftentimes by moving to other parts of Canada to get jobs.

I was in Fort McMurray and saw some great work being done by residents of Manitoba, of Newfoundland, of British Columbia in helping to build the oilsands project in that area.

• (1450)

I find it really incredible that the Reform Party, which says it is trying to solve the problem of unemployment, would deny the opportunity for people to be able to get jobs throughout the country. That is what Canada is all about.

* * *

[Translation]

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister will not make a commitment to recognize Quebec as a distinct society as defined in the Meech Lake accord, to give it veto rights or to remove federal spending powers from jurisdictions exclusive to Quebec, and he even refuses to reduce duplication. His position is a direct contradiction of the position defended by the no committee in the brochure distributed to Quebec households by the director general of election.

How can the Prime Minister allow the no committee to circulate a brochure describing a position taken by the no side that directly contradicts the position taken by the Prime Minister, the real leader of the no side?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are on the no side, and we have a very clear policy on what has to be done now, and it is to vote in the referendum and stop the political and economic uncertainty hovering over Quebec and Canada because of the determination of members opposite to separate Quebec from Canada. They do not even have the courage to say they are separatists. In this brochure, the no side has presented a text that reflects the consensus reached by all members of the no committee. Spending powers and so forth are all proposals that were accepted and which the members of the Bloc Quebecois turned down. They voted against the Charlottetown accord which included all that. We supported the Charlottetown accord, and this particular text reflects the Charlottetown accord. You were against it. You might as well stop talking because you keep contradicting yourselves.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister obviously refuses to correct the information contained in the brochure of the director general of election to make it conform to his position.

Are we to understand the Prime Minister feels very comfortable with the illusory position taken by the no side, since it gives him another chance to cheat Quebecers, as he did in 1980?

The Speaker: My dear colleagues, we are starting to use language that is pretty strong, even for the House of Commons. I would ask all members to please tone down their comments. Be very careful with your choice of words.

I will let the Prime Minister answer the question, if he is willing.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am not very impressed by the hon. member's exaggerations, because at a time when we are facing a very serious situation in Quebec, members of the Bloc Quebecois and the Parti Quebecois refuse to tell Quebecers that they want to separate. In the public opinion polls, 30 or 40 per cent of the people who say they will vote yes believe they will keep their Canadian passports and Canadian citizenship and are convinced they will stay in Canada and that there will still be federal members in Canada. They are not telling them otherwise. They will tell them after the referendum instead of telling them the truth before.

That is why in my speech yesterday I told Quebecers that reality is not a magic wand that will deal with the problems, not a leader who appears and disappears, like the one we have now. He was supposed to come to the House to crush us, and now he has disappeared. Poof, we do not see him any more.

The important thing is to realize that when Quebecers have to pay their bills at the end of the month, they do not need a magic wand but jobs and prosperity. Everyone in Quebec knows perfectly well that the Canadian alternative is the only one that will provide prosperity, security and progress for Quebecers.

[English]

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this morning the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that Kwong Hung Chan's fear of forced sterilization in his native China was not sufficient grounds for a refugee claim in Canada.

• (1455)

In light of the supreme court's decision, does the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration consider this decision to be a general precedent, that China's one–child policy is not a basis for refugee claim in Canada?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for the question. I too was informed that the decision of the supreme court was handed down.

If we want to do the issue justice, because it was a very important issue and the court deliberated for an extended period of time, I think we should do it the proper way and at least look at the decision, read the judgment, and then craft policy accordingly, before making speculative statements before one has had a chance to not only read the decision but also evaluate it and analyse it in the greater context.

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am a little concerned that the minister does not take the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada with the seriousness with which it deliberated over it.

I would like to ask the minister if it is his intention to proceed with the deportation process against Mr. Chan and other refugee claimants who are using the one–child policy in China as their claim of refugee status in Canada.

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I take any decision of any court very seriously. That is why I have tried to tell the hon. member that I think we should be cautious before speculating before a minister of the crown has had a chance to read the decision in its entirety.

With respect to the individual claim, if the individual's appeal has been turned down and the individual has gone through the complete system and there is no H and C claim, of course that individual will be subject to removal. As she knows, refugee determination is done on an individual case basis.

[Translation]

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

The American Secretary of State has made a statement on the significance the U.S. attaches to its special relationship with Canada. What are we to understand from Mr. Christopher's words when he says that we "should not take it for granted that a different kind of organization would just obviously have exactly the same kind of ties"?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the words of the American Secretary of State are clear evidence of how important the very close and very profitable ties between our two countries are to the United States. The arrival of a third player in the game might complicate things considerably. An eternal triangle is certainly not something the U.S. would wish for, if I read the American Secretary of State correctly.

* * *

[English]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

There is a proposal before the minister's department to change the tendering system for moving companies that move employees of national defence. Will the minister assure the House that his department will not move toward a one bidder take all system, which would create a monopoly in the moving business and destroy an industry of over 800 companies across this nation and put many thousands of people out of work?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question. She is aware that this has been the subject of debate in the House for the last two years. It is still being debated and the discussion continues to go on.

The department has met with the Bureau of Competition Policy and with all the main players involved. I will have to tell her that a decision will be coming in the very near future on this matter.

* * *

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of public works. During this summer's renovations to the Peace Tower, the general contractor, Fuller, subcontracted to Karmash, who contracted Ray Wolfe to do masonry work. Wolfe's female engineer, Anne Raney, was subsequent harassed off the job by Karmash.

• (1500)

Given the government's commitment to equity in the workplace and given this workplace is within the jurisdiction of Parliament Hill, literally outside our doors, why did the minister of public works subsequently reward such unacceptable behaviour by granting Fuller and Karmash contracts for the rest of Centre Block even after the Raney incident?

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

The hon. member will know that our contract is with the main contractor and not with the subcontractors. There is no what they call in law privity of contract between the Government of Canada and the subcontractor. However I instructed my deputy minister to apprise the main contractor to try to resolve the issue as expeditiously as possible. We have sent communications to him and we are hoping the matter which occurred will not occur again.

With regard to subsequent contracts I assure the hon. member as well as other members of the House that notwithstanding it is beyond the legal ramifications of the Government of Canada in terms of the privity of contract we will ensure this kind of behaviour is not tolerated. Therefore we will have to look at all contracts awarded in that manner.

* * *

PRIVILEGE

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. John Richardson (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege. The member for Red Deer referred to the Canadian soldiers that we send abroad as "big, bad junk yard dogs". What a terrible and unfair characterization of the members of the Canadian forces who have served our country and the UN for decades.

There seems to be an attempt by the members of the third party to smear the Canadian forces.

The Speaker: That is not a point of privilege. The hon. member for Red Deer has been named and I saw him getting to his feet. Does the hon. member have something to add to the point before the House?

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I quote the minister of defence when he said: "Our force would have to be robust and tough".

In my question I said we were not sending peacekeepers, which is what the defence minister went on to say. The U.S. defence minister said that the force has to be the biggest, baddest junk yard dog.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: Once again I urge members to be very judicious in the choice of words we use in the House of Commons as they can be interpreted in various ways.

I believe the House of Commons is a place where we have very strong feelings and from time to time we use very strong words. I would hope this is not an indication of things to come and I would like the matter to rest where it is. It is not a point of privilege.

* * *

POINTS OF ORDER

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on what I think is a genuine point of order. It is on the same subject with a slightly different twist.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Stinson: You are twisted.

Mr. Mifflin: I beg your pardon?

An hon. member: I heard that.

Mr. Mifflin: The hon. member for Red Deer in his question to the Prime Minister in the context of another country used the term "meanest junk yard dogs" in reference to members of the Canadian forces.

• (1505)

My concern is not just that he used that term; but in reference to the tenor of the questions from the third party that morale in the Canadian forces was so bad that perhaps we may not want to send the troops, this was totally out of context. In that context I ask the member to withdraw that statement.

The Speaker: We had a point of privilege which I ruled was not a point of privilege. The hon. member for Red Deer rose to his feet to give some explanation. I said I wanted to let the matter rest there.

The hon. parliamentary secretary raised the same point on a point of order. I would rule at this point at least—I do not want to get into a debate—that members of Parliament should not be curtailed by the Chair any more than is absolutely necessary when they are giving some opinions.

There are some words that are offensive to the House in total. There are some words that are inflammatory to some members. Once again I would appeal to members that the more they push their Speaker to making decisions on the comments they make by bringing it right up to the end, the more difficult it is to conduct a civilized question period, if I might use that word.

I urge all hon. members to be very judicious in their choice of words and I would rule it is not a point of order.

* * *

[Translation]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in keeping with tradition, might I ask the government leader to tell the House what will be on the program in the coming days.

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we will continue this afternoon with Bill C–105 which ratifies a number of international tax conventions.

I understand there have been discussions and as a result all parties have agreed to complete debate on this bill at all stages in the House of Commons. I thank the other parties for their co–operation in this regard.

When that is completed we will then proceed with second reading of Bill C–107, the British Columbia Treaties Commission bill. I expect that will carry us into tomorrow or even Monday of next week. When second reading of Bill C–107 is completed, we will then call report stage of Bill C–93 respecting cultural properties.

I will want to examine what further legislation is reported from committee before I set the program for after Bill C–93 is completed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS IMPLEMENTATION ACT, 1995

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–105, an act to implement a convention between Canada and the republic of Latvia, a convention between Canada and the republic of Estonia, a convention between Canada and the republic of Trinidad and Tobago and a protocol between Canada and the republic of Hungary, for the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of fiscal evasion with respect to taxes on income, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the conventions we were talking about this morning under Bill C–105 are actually patterned to a large extent on the model double taxation convention prepared by the Organization for Economic Co–Operation and Development.

Under the convention a general rate of withholding tax of 5 per cent will apply to dividends paid to a parent company and on branch profits and 10 per cent on interest and royalties. The rate of withholding tax on other dividends is set at 15 per cent. The convention also provides for a number of exemptions in the case of interest.

The Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs and International Trade is holding many meetings with small and medium size Canadian companies. These companies are already exporting Canadian goods to other countries or are interested in penetrating the export market.

• (1510)

I compliment the committee for taking on the task to stimulate exports where $1 million in trade can create over 30 or 35 jobs. If we want to create more jobs in the country, which is the mandate of the government, there are two ways of doing it: first, by increasing our exports for companies that have never been in the export market and, second, by encouraging those who are exporting to increase their exports by 5 per cent, 10 per cent or 15 per cent.

We were very pleased that some of the witnesses who appeared this morning talked about trading with companies such as the ones mentioned in the bill.

The fact that we have Canadians who came here from countries around the world makes Canada a great country. We have to capitalize on our strengths. Some Canadians understand not only the languages of Hungary, Latvia and Estonia, Trinidad and Tobago but the cultures. It is very important when trading with a country to know its culture. This is why it is important to preserve our policy of bilingualism and multiculturalism.

Before question period I debated with the hon. member for Jonquiére who tried to compare the province of Quebec with small countries such as Estonia, Latvia, Hungary, Lithuania, et cetera. He was really comparing apples and oranges because la belle province is a beautiful province within Canada. When I think of Canada I include the territories and all the provinces.

I reminded the hon. member that better protection there would not be to preserve the French language than having it entrenched in the Canadian Constitution and in our overall policy. That language will never die in Canada if we stay united and keep our country strong. However, if we start splitting up the country and if Quebec separates, that guarantee of the French language and French culture will no longer be there. When the people of Quebec vote on October 30 I hope they will take that into consideration.

The referendum is glossed over with fancy language. The referendum question should read: Do you want to separate from Canada? Yes or no. If it were worded that way I think we would find that the majority of Canadians living in Quebec, regardless of origin, would vote no. Canada has been twice declared by the United Nations the number one country in the world in which to live. Canada has been identified as the second richest country on the planet, next to Australia.

Why would any Canadian or any province want to separate? It is nonsense. That is why we need bills like Bill C–105 so that all Canadians interested in exporting, be it to Estonia, Latvia or Trinidad and Tobago, have the freedom to do so and at the same time have the protection of not being double taxed, of not losing their profits and of not being taxed unfairly.

These are agreements we have already signed with 55 other countries. It is nothing new. I am pleased that the official opposition and the third party, if I heard correctly, will be supporting the bill.

I appreciate the opportunity to take part in the debate. I remind all Canadians, especially people living in la belle province, that we have something no other country in the world has. Let us keep it that way.

• (1515)

Mr. Harbance Singh Dhaliwal (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I stand before the House to speak on Bill C–105, an act to implement tax conventions between Canada and Latvia, Estonia, Trinidad and Tobago, and a protocol with Hungary.

Canada has such agreements with more than 55 countries. This type of agreement is very normal in today's business environment because the global economy is becoming smaller. The barriers for trade are coming down. The fences that were built between countries are no longer in existence. The trend is that there will be more and more trade. There will be more investment among different countries.

When Canadian companies invest in other countries they have to look at the tax implications that exist. Obviously those companies are making a profit there and when they do we have to have certain rules on withholding taxes. The same is true when investments are made here by companies outside of Canada. We have to have rules and regulations to govern how those moneys can be taken out of the country.

Bill C–105 provides the legislative authority for the implementation of the tax agreements which Canada has signed. The tax treaties are designed to alleviate double taxation of income earned in one country by a person resident in another country. Obviously it would not be beneficial for someone to invest in another country only to have to pay the full taxes of that country and then once again pay taxes in their resident country. That would not be an incentive to invest.

This is very good for Canada. We are a trading nation. One out of every five jobs in this country is related to trade. Trade will be increasing.

In the criteria used as to which countries we should and should not have these types of agreements with, three primary factors are to be considered when negotiating a tax treaty with a particular country.

One is how much Canadian investment is planned for that country. Obviously if we have a much larger amount of capital and investment going into another country, there is a greater urgency. If we have very little, then it is not that apparent to have a tax treaty. The second requirement is Canada's desire to encourage economic reforms. If we want to encourage economic reforms, that is an additional reason to ensure there is a tax treaty. Another requirement is a country's interest in expanding its trade and economic relations with Canada.

We are building new relationships all the time with other countries. For example, there are companies investing in the tourism business and mining in Cuba. To ensure that those investments are encouraged and that we have an understanding with Cuba, we need to look at tax treatments, to ensure there is a fair tax treatment for both countries, for the other country and for Canada.

There is also the capital gains situation. There has to be a way to ensure that when a foreign company or an individual in another country comes to Canada that the tax is paid on their profits here but that they are also treated so that there is equity in the tax being paid. In other words, a company paying taxes back home does not have to pay twice. This is an advantage for both countries.

• (1520)

Bill C–105 is neither earth shattering nor housekeeping legislation. Rather, it is workaday legislation which addresses the dual issue of fair taxation and good international relations.

In this era of governments reappraising their roles, particularly their economic roles in an increasingly interdependent open global economy, reciprocal tax treaties make good common sense. They certainly do not hinder economic competition, which for Canada is an important fact of life. Canada is above all a trading nation. We must keep expanding our trading boundaries and our relationships with other countries.

A few items in the bill apply to all four treaties. First, while tax treaties vary from one country to another, because there are special circumstances, each treaty must be negotiated individually. These proposed conventions are similar to other treaties already concluded by Canada. They are patterned on the model of the double taxation convention prepared by the Organization for Economic Co–operation and Development.

Second, each treaty has been negotiated individually and has taken into account the relevant policies in each country.

Third, Bill C–105 provides an equitable solution to the double taxation problems which exist between Canada and these countries. Double taxation occurs when international transactions result in the same income being taxable in the hands of the same person by more than one nation.

In addition, the protocol brings the convention with Hungary in line with the current Canadian tax policy, particularly with regard to the rates of withholding taxes.

Here are some of the technical aspects of Bill C–105 which apply to the treaties with Estonia, Latvia, and Trinidad and Tobago.

There will be a withholding tax rate of 5 per cent on dividends paid to parent companies and on branch profits, 10 per cent on interest and royalties, and management fees in the case of Trinidad and Tobago. A 15 per cent rate of withholding tax will apply on other dividends. The conventions also provide for a number of exemptions in the case of interest. For Estonia and Latvia, a zero rate will apply to interest paid to the governments, the central banks, the Export Development Corporation, and from sales made on credit. I could go on with more of the technical details of this bill, but I would like to talk about taxation in general.

Because there is more and more trade happening around the world, and for very good reason, we as a country want to ensure that our energies are put into doing the type of economic activities in which we have a trade advantage, where we are more competitive and have the resources, the skills and the technology which will enable us to be more competitive than other countries. We would be able to produce that product at a lower price than other countries that may not have the same advantages. As we see more and more trade developing around the world, some of the costs will decrease.

One of the most important things is taxation in general. As Canadians we have to ensure that we do not burden our companies and our business people with high taxes which would make it more difficult for them to compete in the international community.

Canadians are overtaxed and our tax system is too complicated. We have to work on both of those areas to ensure that we simplify our tax system and that we reduce the tax burden. If we do not do that, we will find it more and more difficult to compete around the world. If our neighbours or our trading partners have a much lower tax rate, obviously our companies and our business people will not have the same advantages.

• (1525)

As trade develops and the barriers come down, as we saw with the world trade agreement, we will need to focus more on taxation, on our rate of taxes and on the complexity of our taxation system. We will also need to ensure that our duties and excise taxes are also very competitive and consistent so that we can compete efficiently with the rest of the world.

Our finance minister will ensure that some of those areas get attention so that we can continue to be a strong trading nation. In doing that, we will continue to create employment and opportunities for all Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to rise this afternoon to say a few words about Bill C–105, at second reading.

This piece of legislation implements tax conventions between Canada and Latvia, Estonia, Trinidad and Tobago and a protocol to the tax convention signed with Hungary.

Canada has signed tax conventions with 55 countries; Bill C–105 allows for the implementation of conventions with four of these countries. The purpose of these conventions is simply to avoid double taxation of income. This means that an individual would not be required to pay taxes both in Canada and Trinidad and Tobago, for instance, or in Canada and Hungary.

Indeed, some engineering companies in my riding do business in such countries, where they plan and build bridges and other things. I refer to civil engineering, of course. The purpose of this bill is to avoid things of this kind.

I must say that I was rather taken aback by the remarks made by the Bloc member this morning in the House. The member for Jonquière, I believe, used the time he had been given to speak on Bill C–105 to extol the virtues of separation.

The member opposite had a great time explaining that Bill C–105 meant that Quebec would automatically have access to all the international agreements signed by Canada. This is stretching the truth, to say the least. Indeed, it is true that Canada has agreements with several countries in order to avoid double taxation. But to say, as the member is claiming and as he mentioned in some of his statements, that Quebec, if it were to separate, and I hope that never happens, would automatically have all the rights or most of the rights that it now has within Canada in terms of international agreements, that is not only an exaggeration, but as we would say in Hawkesbury, "that is stretching it quite a bit".

I say to the member opposite that, what he would want Quebecers to believe is that, in fact, Quebec would automatically have the right to join NAFTA, for instance, or other trade agreements such as the Canada–U.S. free trade agreement.

That is simply not true. Yesterday, Mr. Christopher said clearly that, if Quebec were to separate, things would not be necessarily the same at all.

• (1530)

Of course, the Deputy Premier of Quebec has attempted to give a different twist to all of this. Last night, on the news, we saw him try his best to put other words in Mr. Christopher's mouth. But it did not work, of course. Mr. Christopher's words are clear. Besides, a few days ago, we saw the Roh report, which was even tabled in this House and which indicated, once again, that agreements signed exclusively between Canada and the United States or Mexico are not automatically offered to other countries, including Quebec if it became a country. And I repeat that I hope that this will not happen. I hope we will remain a united country, the great country we live in.

However, that would not be automatic, and the Minister of Finance made it clear. The minister mentioned that one million jobs in Quebec depend on trade. He clearly said that those jobs are at risk. He did not say that they would all disappear. He did not say that. The member opposite knows that and so do his colleagues. But it is true that these jobs are threatened. Does that mean that some would have to take salary cuts, while others would lose their jobs, their benefits, or whatever else? I do not know, but there is no doubt that jobs are at stake. There is a potential loss for one million workers. This is not to say that they will all lose their jobs. Absolutely not. The member knows that too.

However, it also does not mean that everything will remain the same as it is, and the member is also aware of that. There are potential losses and there are great risks. As we saw, the referendum campaign went through various stages. For example, at the beginning, these separatist members told us about sovereignty, without elaborating. Then we saw one separatist leader give way to another and, at the same time, we started hearing about a new union, a unifying separation, if you can imagine.

According to the Leader of the Opposition, this unifying separation would lead to all sorts of agreements, imaginary or otherwise with the rest of Canada, in addition to ensuring that Quebecers would enjoy all the benefits resulting from Canada's international agreements and prestige, including the Canadian passport, if you can imagine that for one second.

Yesterday, the Leader of the Opposition went so far as to admit it may not be quite that way. Trying another tack, he said that, maybe, the passport will not be a Canadian passport. It may turn out to be something else. We can see that he is starting to sing another tune, once again. Separatists are shifting like that all the time. It is a case of moving targets.

What takes the cake, concerning agreements and privileges that some separatists envision, is that they used the Canadian dollar, the loonie with the word Canada on it, to replace the "o" of "oui". It is very hard for me, and probably for you too, to imagine they had the gall to do that, but it goes to show how low the separatists across the way have stooped during the referendum campaign.

Last weekend, I campaigned in the Saint–Janvier area, near Mirabel. Senior citizens told me and some of my colleagues that separatists had told them that voting yes meant voting for Canada. That is what they were told by separatists.

• (1535)

How awful. This shows how little conviction they have on the other side if they go around telling people the opposite of what they think in order to get their vote.

That is what I witnessed last week. This is the sort of thing going on. They tell senior citizens that voting yes means voting for Canada. That is what I have seen in that area. Members opposite must not be too sure of their arguments if they are willing to tell the opposite of the truth to win votes. It is even worse than the unifying separation the Leader of the Opposition was talking about last week. That is the kind of thing we have heard.

This morning, the hon. member tried to rewrite history when he said that the province of Ontario and Quebec have been together only since 1867, only for 130 years is what he said, when he knows full well that the Union Act of 1840 was signed—guess when, ladies and gentlemen—in 1840. That is why it is called what it is called. Being a teacher yourself, Mr. Speaker, you know that is so.

The pages here in the House of Commons are all students who have learned that the Union Act of 1840 was signed in 1840. It does not come as a great surprise to them, but it seems that the Bloc members have to revisit the past, because the rest of their arguments does not hold so good either.

Let me tell the hon. member opposite who spoke this morning that the agreements referred to in Bill C–105 are not side agreements nor are they similar to agreements made under the Canada–U.S. free trade agreement and NAFTA signed by Canada, the United States and Mexico.

U.S. trade representatives, whether it is Senator Dole, Mr. Roh, and even Mr. Christopher no later than yesterday, have all clearly stated that there will have to be concessions for a sovereign Quebec to keep the prerogatives it now enjoys within a unified Canada. That is why Canada must remain unified, if for no other reason than to serve the commercial interests of the country and the interests of all the workers in Quebec and the rest of Canada.

That is what the prime minister said, that is what the Minister of Finance said, and that is what other ministers said. All of my colleagues as well as Mr. Johnson and the chambers of commerce have said it. A united Canada will bring us prosperity, but a divided Canada will bring us adversity.

This must not be. We have all been elected to this House to help build this great country, to make it better and more prosperous. Those are the commitments we made in the red book and that is what we will do as a government. This is why we urge Quebecers to vote no in the referendum, so that we can continue to build this country, to build an economy for each and everyone of us.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, before you put the question, I believe you will find the unanimous consent of the House that the bill be referred to committee of the whole to be dealt with immediately. I understand one of the chairs of the committee of the whole is preparing to enter the Chamber shortly in order to take over that measure should the House give its consent.

• (1540)

The Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

(Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Kilger in the chair.)

(Clauses 2 to 5 inclusive agreed to.)

[Translation]

On clause 6

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Chairman, would it not be appropriate, since it is a regulatory power being granted the minister, to see to it that the minister consults the House or the appropriate standing committee before issuing the regulation?

[English]

Mr. Walker: Could we have the question again, please?

[Translation]

Mr. Caron: Even so, Mr. Speaker, clause 6 makes provision for a regulatory power. I believe that departments often go too far in the definition of what constitutes a regulation. I believe that it would be worthwhile and even appropriate for the Standing Committee on Finance to be consulted when a regulation pertaining to this bill is issued.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: We have had technical problems and I appreciate the member for Jonquière's cooperation in kindly repeating his question.

Mr. Walker: Thank you. Now we understand the question.

[English]

The reason this piece of legislation and the tax treaty would come to the House in this form is to ensure that the House is clear as to what is being delegated to officials in terms of regulatory authority. However, the House of Commons has, through other committees, regular review of regulation. Any time a member feels this is not within the normal course of activities they can bring it to the attention of the House through that committee, but there is no particular regulatory reference back to the House of Commons finance committee.

[Translation]

(Clauses 6 to 22 inclusive agreed to.)

(Schedules I to IV agreed to.)

[English]

(Clause 1 agreed to.)

(Title agreed to.)

(Bill reported.)

• (1550)

[Translation]

Hon. Allan Rock (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be concurred in at report stage.

(Motion agreed to.)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (for Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak today at third reading of Bill C–105, the Income Tax Conventions Implementation Act, 1995.

Hon. members will recall that Bill C–105 implements reciprocal income tax conventions between Canada and Latvia, Canada and Estonia, Canada and Trinidad and Tobago, and a protocol to the current income tax treaty between Canada and Hungary. The tax conventions and the amending protocol this bill will ratify are patterned after conventions previously approved by this chamber. They break no new ground.

Tax treaties have two main specific objectives: the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of tax evasion. More broadly, tax treaties facilitate investment and trade between the treaty countries and can help encourage reforms.

The treaties in the legislation before us are part of an ongoing series of tax treaties that began in 1971, when the reform of Canada's income tax legislation required Canada to expand its network of double taxation conventions with other countries. They also reflect Canada's willingness to reduce or eliminate certain forms of withholding to meet international norms and to advance our economic interests, including the competitiveness of our technological industries.

The treaties are patterned on the model double taxation convention prepared by the Organization for Economic Co–operation and Development. Each treaty has been negotiated carefully and individually. Each takes into account the relevant policies of the country with which we are undertaking this treaty. The treaties will provide an equitable solution to the double taxation problems that currently exist between Canada and these countries. In addition, the protocol to our treaty with Hungary brings the existing convention with that country into line with current Canadian tax policy, particularly in the area of withholding taxes.

Let me briefly restate during this third reading debate some of the technical provisions of Bill C–105 that apply to the treaties with Estonia, Latvia, and Trinidad and Tobago. First, there will be a withholding tax rate of 5 per cent on dividends paid to a parent company and on branch profits and 10 per cent on interest and royalties, which in the case of Trinidad and Tobago includes management fees, and also a 15 per cent rate of withholding tax that will apply on other dividends.

The conventions also provide for a number of exemptions in the case of interest. For Estonia and Latvia a zero rate will apply to interest paid to the governments, the central banks, the Export Development Corporation, and from sales made on credit. For Trinidad and Tobago, a zero rate will apply to interest paid for government indebtedness and on loans or credit from the Export Development Corporation or its equivalent there and for interest paid to pension plans.

• (1555)

Canadians will benefit from any future changes extended by Estonia and Latvia to other OECD member countries with respect to withholding tax on copyright and patent royalties. Trinidad and Tobago will maintain the exemption on copyright royalties.

Pension payments and annuity payments in the case of Trinidad and Tobacco will be taxed at a maximum rate of 15 per cent in the source country. However, war pensions in Trinidad and Tobago will be exempted. In addition, social security pensions will be taxed in the originating country and the withholding tax rate on annuity payments will be dropped to 10 per cent.

Also with respect to Trinidad and Tobago, the two–year exemption for visiting teachers will no longer exist and seasonal workers will not have to pay Canadian tax if they earn under $8,500.

I return briefly now to the protocol negotiated with Hungary, which is also part of Bill C–105. As background, the Income Tax Act amendments in 1976 increased the rate of the withholding tax paid to non–residents from 15 per cent to 25 per cent unless reduced by a tax treaty.

The existing treaty between Canada and Hungary reduced the withholding tax rate to 10 per cent on dividends paid to a parent company and 15 per cent in all other cases. However, that convention was negotiated before the 1992 budget announced Canada's willingness to reduce its withholding tax on direct dividends to 5 per cent. The revised protocol before us today reduces that rate and the rate of branch tax to 5 per cent by 1997. There are no changes in the rates of withholding tax on other dividends.

The Government of Canada will lose no revenue as a result of the provisions in these treaties. Not only will Canada gain from increased trade and investment, but we will gain too from the reduced withholding tax rates and other concessions we have gained from these negotiations.

There is nothing contentious in this bill. I would like to take a moment to thank the House for its co–operation today, for providing for second reading in committee of the whole and now third reading. It is very much appreciated that the opposition parties that are participating in this debate today understand that this is a good step forward for the government.

This is a workaday legislation that will expand trade and investment opportunities between Canada and the countries with whom we have made this deal. Canada already has tax agreements with 54 nations. This bill will increase the number to 57.

I call on the House to give its support and bring a conclusion to this debate on third reading.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Mr. Jordan: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, it is my understanding that one of our members wishes to speak to third reading of this bill. Perhaps that could be accommodated.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Certainly. We are still at the debate stage.

Mr. Harbance Singh Dhaliwal (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a great privilege to speak once again on Bill C–105.

This bill shows that you need to build an infrastructure whenever you deal with trade with other countries. That infrastructure takes a substantial amount of effort to create so that there is trade and investment taking place among different countries.

• (1600)

Looking at the legislation, as I said earlier in the debate, there is an agreement with 55 countries. I know members of the Bloc think it is very simple and easy to build a relationship with other countries. They think it is very easy to set up treaties, make agreements and develop trade with other countries. It takes a very long time to build the infrastructure and the treaties. It takes a long time to make agreements and create the organizations to develop trade and exchanges, rules, regulations and understandings among different countries.

It does not take a genius to know that if the infrastructure is broken, if those agreements are broken sometimes they cannot be renegotiated. For example, some people in the Bloc think it would be very easy to negotiate a new NAFTA. That simply is not the case. Look at the world trade agreement. It took years and years to negotiate that, to develop a consensus among so many countries.

This bill shows that as a country, Canada needs the tremendous infrastructures we have built in trade, transportation and organizations. These were not created overnight. They took years and years to develop. It also takes expertise.

I sometimes wonder what the people in the Bloc are thinking when they say that they can do the same thing overnight and that they will be able to set up all the agreements the next day and do all the things it took Canada so long to do. It makes no sense.

Everyone knows that when political uncertainty is created, business people are not willing to invest where there is uncertainty. One way to judge that is what has happened in real estate, the business I was involved in. It is a very good indicator of the investment climate and of the uncertainty that exists. If we drive across the bridge over to Hull we will see that real estate prices are lower because of the uncertainty in Quebec. They are substantially lower because of the political uncertainty created by members of the Bloc.

The jobs that are created, whether they are in Canada or other countries, the investment and the foundations that are laid are because of stability. We need political stability to ensure that we create a climate for investment and for business.

This bill is an indication of another infrastructure, another agreement we are developing as a nation. All Canadians will be able to take advantage of this. It will become easier to invest in other countries and easier for other countries to invest in Canada.

If that infrastructure is broken, it creates problems. We will not have the built in systems. Those systems take a long time to develop. As a country we have to recognize that. I think the people in Quebec recognize that they cannot duplicate overnight what took so many years to build. That is going to be a disadvantage. When we have those types of disadvantages we cannot compete. If we cannot compete, the reality is that jobs will be lost. Anybody who says that if Quebec is no longer part of Canada no jobs will be lost does not have a clue about the reality that exists out there. Thousands of jobs are going to be lost because it is taking away the system, the infrastructure, the communications, all the things that have been built up.

• (1605)

There are many examples around the world where countries have been torn apart. What happens is that the prosperity is not there. Racial harmony is a key to prosperity. At this time, the stronger the unit we have, the greater our ability is to negotiate and fulfil agreements, to have financial strength and to have a critical mass where we can talk to other countries because of our fiscal strength. We can talk to other countries because of our technologies and they will want to talk to us about the economy, trade and making exchanges.

The Deputy Speaker: Is the member finished his address?

Mr. Dhaliwal: Let me just conclude, Mr. Speaker. I see the hon. Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is here so I will conclude my remarks by saying that as a country we have to recognize, as do all the people of Quebec, that we will be stronger if we are united as Canadians. We will be able to create jobs and have a future for our children if we stay together. We will not be strong if we are divided. We will be strong if we are united and we will be able to build a strong future for the generations to come.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

(Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.)

* * *

[English]

BRITISH COLUMBIA TREATY COMMISSION ACT

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.) moved that Bill C–107, an act respecting the establishment of the British Columbia Treaty Commission, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in my place today to begin debate on second reading of Bill C–107, an act respecting the establishment of the British Columbia Treaty Commission.

The legislation confirms Canada's obligations under the B.C. Treaty Commission agreement signed in September 1992 by the Government of Canada, the Government of British Columbia and the First Nations Summit. It is an obligation we have inherited from the previous government, but its aims and objectives lie close to the heart of this government.

Our government is committed to building new partnerships with aboriginal people based on trust and mutual respect. In the 1993 election we addressed aboriginal issues in the red book. We stated what a Liberal government would do.

In the red book we stated that our goal was: a Canada where aboriginal people would enjoy a standard of living and quality of life and opportunity equal to those other Canadians; a Canada where First Nations, Inuit and Metis people would live self–reliantly, secure in the knowledge of who they are as unique peoples; a Canada where all Canadians would be enriched by aboriginal cultures and would be committed to the fair sharing of the potential of our nation; and a Canada where aboriginal people would have the positive option to live and work wherever they chose. Perhaps most important, the red book set out our goal for Canada where aboriginal children would grow up in secure families and healthy communities with the opportunity to take their full place in Canada.

• (1610)

As a result, we also said that the resolution of land claims would be a priority. That is our vision and we have been moving step by step to bring it alive. In two years we have already made considerable progress. On August 10, I and my colleague, the federal interlocutor for Metis and non–status Indians, announced the government's approach to the implementation of the inherent right of aboriginal self–government.

We have fostered greater economic development opportunities for aboriginal communities through co–management agreements and support for business ventures. We have committed an additional $20 million annually to the Indian and Inuit post–secondary student support program. We have settled some 44 specific claims and have seen five comprehensive claims come into effect. By any measure we have achieved a great deal in living up to the commitments we made to the people of Canada in the red book.

Perhaps the most complex challenge is the one that the legislation before us addresses: treaty making in British Columbia. I would like to remind the House that British Columbia is unique in Canada in that the process of signing treaties has never been completed. Only a handful of treaties were signed in the pre–Confederation period. They cover parts of Vancouver Island. In 1899 Treaty No. 8 was signed with the First Nations in the Peace River area in northeastern B.C. However, in the rest of the province the issue of aboriginal rights remains largely unresolved.

The First Nations have wanted to resolve these issues. Repeatedly they have pressed for treaties, but only until this decade did the provincial government have the willingness to negotiate. It maintained previously that there was no need to negotiate. It said that whatever rights to land and resources the aboriginal people may have once had were extinguished long ago. The result was decades of legal acrimony. The First Nations sought settlement through the courts of what they had been unable to achieve through the negotiation process.

In 1973 the Supreme Court of Canada was asked whether aboriginal title to the Nisga'a traditional territory had been extinguished. It was the Calder case. The six judges were evenly split on the question. The Government of Canada then adopted a policy to enter into negotiations to resolve comprehensive claims.

The courts for their part have expressed repeatedly and in the strongest terms that the issues brought before them ought to be settled at the negotiation table, not before the bar. They should be settled through negotiation, not litigation.

In the case of Delgamuukw v. Her Majesty for example, Judge Macfarlane wrote:

> Treaty making is the best way to respect Indian rights—.The questions of what aboriginal rights exist—cannot be decided in this case, and are ripe for negotiation.

The learned judge went on to observe:

> During the course of these proceedings, it became apparent that there are two schools of thought.
>
> The first is an all or nothing approach, which says that the Indian nations were here first, that they have exclusive ownership and control of all the land and resources and may deal with them as they see fit.
>
> The second is a co–existence approach, which says that the Indian interest and other interests can co–exist to a large extent, and that consultation and reconciliation is the process by which the Indian culture can be preserved and by which other Canadians may be assured that their interests, developed over 125 years of nationhood, can also be respected—. I favour the second approach.

I agree with the learned judge. I too favour the second approach. I am certain that members of the House would agree that the co–existence approach, based upon consultation and reconciliation, is the appropriate course. It is this government's course. It is the course preferred by the vast majority of Canadians and the vast majority of aboriginal people.

We have undergone a turbulent summer of protest and pain. Issues which have been left unresolved for decades have erupted into violence. Negotiation, not confrontation, resolves issues. This legislation provides the framework for these negotiations in B.C. If we do not negotiate, we leave the field to those who believe in the all or nothing approach. We leave the resolution to those who have little regard for the law.

• (1615)

The B.C. Treaty Commission establishes a solid foundation for consultation and reconciliation. It lies at the heart of the co–existence approach. This legislation confirms the creation of the B.C. Treaty Commission as an arm's length body with a mandate to ensure the three parties are adequately prepared for the negotiations.

Some members across the floor criticize the BCTC because they maintain it will concede too much to First Nations. They monger fear and misunderstanding by removing facts from the context. How many times on radio shows and at town hall meetings have they used the process of negotiations to instil suspicion and resentment in the hearts of British Columbians? How many times over the past few months have we heard that the First Nations of British Columbia claim 110 per cent of the province?

The hon. members who raise these issues ought to know better. They know the claims overlap. They know they are simply opening positions that take into account the history of the various First Nations. They know the final solutions of these settlements will be very different from the opening positions. Yet they persist in stirring up fear and misunderstanding by repeating the 110 per cent figure as though it were an outrageous demand upon the common sense of the people of British Columbia. They claim the Government of Canada is ignoring other interests affecting negotiations. They spread misinformation.

These hon. members are the kinds of people who themselves favour an all or nothing approach. They do not espouse the same cause as those described by Judge Macfarlane, the view that aboriginal people have exclusive ownership, but their philosophy is the same, all or nothing. They have no patience for reconciliation or consultation. Their approach will lead us inevitably to the confrontation and lawlessness that we witnessed in British Columbia over the past few months.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Irwin: Mr. Speaker, I see I have their attention now.

The role of the commission is to facilitate, not negotiate modern day treaties. Its main functions are to assess the readiness of the parties to begin negotiations, allocate and negotiate funding to aboriginal groups, assist parties to obtain dispute resolution services at the request of all parties, and monitor and report on the status of negotiations.

This House will be pleased to hear that 47 First Nations groups are involved with the BCTC process. They represent over 70 per cent of the B.C. First Nations. Two First Nations, the Teslin and the Gitanyow, are about to complete the third stage of the negotiation process. Their framework agreements have been initialled by negotiators and I hope to be in a position to sign these agreements soon. Soon they will begin negotiating an agreement in principle.

I have also had occasion to sign the Sechelt, the Gitxsan, the Wet'suwet'en, and the Champagne Aishihik transboundary claim framework agreements. This is significant progress and I would like to thank the negotiators for all parties for making it possible.

We are well down the road of consultation and reconciliation that provides the foundation for a coexistence approach to settlement of land claims. I want to make one issue very clear, particularly to those members across the floor who would stir up misinformation and distrust. Our approach of consultation, reconciliation, and coexistence applies to all interested groups in British Columbia, not just the three parties at the negotiating table. Many different groups, organizations, and individuals have a major stake in how the land claim settlements are resolved. We are dealing after all with land and resources that provide the livelihood of British Columbians from many walks of life in all regions of the province.

All British Columbians will benefit from seeing these long-standing issues resolved. The negotiations will remove the uncertainty that has held back development. Resolution opens the doors to new investment and jobs in the province.

• (1620)

To ensure the negotiating process remains accessible to the public the openness protocol is negotiated for each treaty negotiation. A typical protocol will list specific measures the federal and provincial governments or the First Nations must take to an open and productive treaty process. These protocols keep the community and the media informed about what is happening at the negotiating table.

As of June 15, 11 negotiations have completed the openness protocols. For the negotiations to be fair the voices of all interested British Columbians must be heard. We have launched a province–wide consultation process to advise both the federal and provincial governments on the views of those who cannot be at the negotiating table but whose interests must be represented there.

The process functions at two levels. A 31–member treaty negotiation advisory committee, TNAC, brings the perspective of municipal governments, business, labour, fishing, wildlife, and environmental groups to the treaty making process. Each committee member sits on one of four sectoral groups representing lands and forests, fisheries, governance, and wildlife. The members ensure that the interests and expertise of their organizations are understood and are taken into consideration in treaty negotiations.

I have met with these advisory committee members. So has our colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver East. The BCTC commissioners and the federal and provincial negotiating teams provide updates to the members on the process of negotiations.

The second level of consultations brings the diverse interests of the various regions of the province to bear in the land claims process. Regional advisory committees are being struck in each treaty negotiation area to represent local interests. As part of the land claims process the BCTC requires a regional advisory committee be struck before Canada and B.C. are declared "ready to negotiate" a treaty with First Nations. These committees work directly with federal and provincial negotiating teams by providing input on the formulation of interest and comments on the options for discussions at the negotiating table. For example, we have formed committees in Bulkley–Skeena, West Coast Vancouver Island, Westbank Kelowna, and the lower mainland.

In the months ahead British Columbians will have an opportunity to participate in an historical process. They have the opportunity to correct an imbalance. For generations the people of British Columbia, aboriginal and non–aboriginal, have lived in a legal no–man's land of claims, conflicting claims, and refusal to acknowledge deep seated historical wrongs.

We are setting up a process whereby hundreds of years after the first interaction of two civilizations we can find a just and equitable resolution on how land and resources are to be shared. The all or nothing approach is not a solution for the 1990s. All parties, with good conscience, openness to new ideas, but with a new tough resolve to protect what is most important to each of us, must now sit at the negotiating table. We must talk. If we do not talk and if we do not resolve these issues through consultation and reconciliation we leave the field open to those who believe that the only resolution is all or nothing.

I have maintained all along that self–government agreements work best when designed from the ground up with the input of the people they affect. Now is not the time for land claim settlements by government decree or constitutional amendment. Now is the time for creativity and flexibility for modern treaty making. It will be a slow, painstaking process. It will require a great reservoir of goodwill among all parties in the negotiating process. The process is harmed immeasurably by the kind of fearmongering and controversy we have seen stirred up by those who want to score short term political points.

I am confident that the negotiation process will succeed in British Columbia. I am confident because I have been working with my provincial colleagues, with the leaders of the First Nations, and the members of the treaty negotiating advisory committee. I know that these are people of goodwill who are dedicated to reaching an equitable solution.

Canadians and British Columbians must settle this unfinished business. I urge this House to support this legislation and give the federal commissioner the power to get on with the job.

• (1625)

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, considering that the government only presented the Reform members with this bill after 3 p.m. yesterday, which is in typical fashion, I would like to seek consent of the House if we may have the opportunity to question the minister about the bill.

The Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order. I think the correct thing for the member to do is wait until he speaks on behalf of his party. Then he might ask the minister, if the minister will permit with unanimous consent, some questions and answers. It is entirely a matter for unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Irwin: Mr. Speaker, we ended treaty at the Alberta border, and for 100 years we said we would come back and deal with these people who have lived there for 10,000 years.

Succeeding governments have tried to and made movement to start a process. But when I walk through these doors, as we all must at some point in our lives, the one thing I will be proud of is that in October 1993 this government was elected and in December 1993 the B.C. Treaty Commission doors were opened for negotiations.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, of course Bloc Quebecois members will support Bill C–107.

However there are a few concerns that should be addressed in the debate. Having always made a point of seeing for myself how aboriginal people live, I feel I am better able to speak, perhaps with a bit more assurance, about aboriginal issues, including the bill before us.

As recently as last summer, I had the great privilege of visiting British Columbia and meeting with some aboriginal nations, some communities which were deeply concerned about the negotiation and the British Columbia Treaty Commission.

Among others, I met with the Nisga'a nation, the main party to the negotiations in British Colombia. I had the extreme privilege of visiting, with Mr. Adams, five Nisga'a communities settled in an a marvelous area. A few hundred years ago, two Nisga'a communities were wiped off the map when a volcano erupted in that part of the country. Today the Nisga'a people revere the ruins of these ancient villages and are really anxious to reach an agreement.

This is no exception to the usual attitude among the communities I met in British Columbia. Up to now, they always chose the path of negotiation in good faith rather than confrontation. Why do I mention the Nisga'a? Because, as I said in my opening remarks, I think they are at the centre of these negotiations. As you know the Nisga'a band is probably—in fact, it is—the only nation that is not under the umbrella of the British Columbia Treaty Commission because they had started their negotiations even before the commission was created, and the federal government recognized it.

I will give a short overview of the commission's progress in a few moments. As a matter of fact, having begun to negotiate before any other band, the Nisga'a are necessarily a length ahead the others now.

However, they feel it is important for the negotiations to progress as fast as possible. Unfortunately, they are now blocked, both at the commission and with the Nisga'a.

Speaking of concerns in this regard, both the Chilcotin band and the Carrier–Sekanni band I visited told me that, if the negotiations with the Nisga'a did not progress, the commission's efforts to negotiate agreements with nations and communities of British Columbia could grind to a halt. This is why I feel we should take an interest in what is happening to the Nisga'a, who right now are having a really bad time.

• (1630)

Personally, I witnessed the terrible devastation of the forest environment. A certain territory has been recognized as belonging to the Nisga'a as part of their ancestral land or aboriginal territory. We know what the terms "aboriginal territory" mean. The Nisga'a are asking for only 8 per cent of this territory recognized by the court.

However, despite the fact that their claim is rather modest and reasonable, the Nisga'a are witnessing today the plundering of their forests. Between 100 and 200 trucks a day are taking away freshly cut logs. They are asking themselves: "My God, are we ever going to come to an agreement to put an end to this plundering, and manage to protect our hunting and fishing rights recognized by the Canadian constitution?" I have, in my office, videos which show the dreadful consequences of the clear cuts in British Columbia where, once the loggers have gone through, there is nothing left, neither trees nor beasts. Very often, the damage is irreparable. Such forests will take hundreds of years to recover.

In their opinion, had such forest been burned to the ground it would recover faster than it will in the present situation.

It is a race to clear cut as much of the forest as possible, and the Chilcotin, the Carrier–Sekkani and the Nisga'a, have a feeling that governments are allowing this wanton destruction, this mad race for profit, this rush to clear cut everything. When it is all over, when all the resources are gone, they believe they will be told: "Now, we are ready to resume negotiations and we are willing to give you the territory", a territory which will have been emptied, as I just said, of all its natural resources.

The Nisga'a are extremely concerned. I even wrote to the premier of British Columbia, asking him to put an end to this plundering. As you know, British Columbia is a big province, as big as Quebec, if not bigger. You have to travel by plane to reach these native communities. One can see the damage done by logging companies through clear cutting.

I take this opportunity to say that I, for one, find shocking this complete waste of a province's natural resources on what will probably be considered native lands, and recognized as such. We remain silent before the devastation, and the natives must wait for the negotiations to continue. In the meantime, they see that their lands keep deteriorating. It was worth mentioning, I think.

I also noticed a general shortage of housing in the communities; several generations live under one roof. There are health problems.

Finally, there is a pressing need to conclude treaties in British Columbia. I will talk about Quebec native communities later. In this regard, Quebec is a model. British Columbia would benefit from imitating the Quebec government, which has great respect for natives, in spite of what is reported in the media. I can assure you of the contrary, as I will demonstrate. I wish good luck to the people of British Columbia, hoping they will follow in Quebec's footsteps with regard to native peoples.

Let me talk a little about the Chilcotin people from British Columbia, because they are very outspoken. Something funny happened. When I told them that the official opposition critic wished to meet them, it apparently created quite a commotion in the community. The fact that a nasty separatist from Quebec, even though a critic for Indian affairs and as such in a position to put questions regularly to the minister, wanted to come to talk with them about their problems made them rather uneasy. They were a little concerned. However I found them to be great people, and warriors. I call them "warriors" because the Chilcotin pride themselves in having been the only native nation in Canada to have fought a war against white people and won.

• (1635)

As you know, all the natives in Canada say they might have fought wars, one side against the other, but in the case of the Chilcotin, it was definitely the case and they are proud of it. They even mentioned the names of warriors who took part in the battle. It was clear to them that the Chilcotin had defeated the white people who wanted to invade their territory, but of course they were unable to hold out for long after that first victory. From then on, there was a gradual invasion of their territory.

Promises had been made to them at that time. It is worth noting that these were not necessarily agreements signed between the Prime Minister, Her Majesty the Queen and some representative of the natives. Even the courts are now beginning to recognize that the verbal agreements and commitments made at the time were legally binding, because natives were absolutely not able to understand—they needed translators to have white people's words translated into their language and white people needed translators to understand what the natives were saying. Thus verbal agreements were binding. Courts are beginning to recognize it.

At that time, those natives were told: "Listen, we recognize the Chilcotin nation, we recognize the Chilcotin Valley as your hunting and fishing grounds". What happened to the Chilcotin has happened to many native communities in Canada.

Over the years, over the decades, over the centuries, there has been a gradual invasion. Today this proud Chilcotin nation is reduced to six small communities on small reserves.

To look at the population figures, I believe that since 1987 the population of these communities has doubled. Now the people are living in cramped reserves, threatened with prosecution by the pulp and paper and forest companies if they go off their reserve to hunt.

There are huge problems, therefore, and the Chilcotin are impatiently waiting for the British Columbia Treaty Commission to get moving to ensure them of the few natural resources remaining to them.

The same situation exists with housing. Sometimes there are three generations living under one roof. The Chilcotin would therefore like to see the negotiating process get not just started up but speeded up.

Another example they spoke to me about, and one in which I have had to intervene, was that the military base in the Chilcotin valley is testing artillery on Chilcotin land. They have been trying without success for years to get this testing stopped.

The situation is therefore this: overpopulated reserves, an inability to have any say about such vital issues as housing and the free disposal of property that ought to be theirs, since they were the original inhabitants, an inability to have any effective impact on a military base which continues to pillage their natural resources. Needless to say, the Chilcotin are anxious to see the whole thing settled.

They too have agreements, and this is where we see the sense of responsibility among the aboriginal nations. The Chilcotin have an agreement with Fisheries. Some twenty people are involved with fisheries, the salmon fisheries among others. Conservation is primary among the priorities set. The concept of conservation is assured.

Then there is the concept of subsistence fishing, and thirdly there is commercial fishing. The Chilcotin have demonstrated that when they are given these responsibilities not only are they excellent conservationists but they can also obtain their food from subsistence fishing or hunting.

There are many such examples, and there is great anticipation of the day when everything can all be translated into agreements. At the moment, unfortunately, everything is at a standstill.

• (1640)

I will tell you a little later on where I think negotiations have stalled. I believe the federal government has a responsibility, but the Government of British Columbia also has a responsibility. I think both sides have to agree if there is to be any progress, because these aboriginal communities are ready to start negotiations, but we are now seeing obstruction on the part of the Government of British Columbia, and the federal government, instead of putting the pressure on to get things moving again, just sits there and says: "Well, I am going to wait until the Government of British Columbia pulls the switch and starts negotiating in good faith".

The trouble with the Premier of British Columbia is that when he came to power, with the NDP, he was very, very receptive to aboriginal issues. But recently, probably under pressure from the Reform Party, he is starting to say: "Listen—". They started by setting a deadline for the Nisga'a, and they said: "If no agreement is reached by that date, the deal is off". Of course the deadline passed and now all negotiations have been on hold since last summer.

Because of growing support for the Reform Party in western Canada, the Harcourt government is backing down and unfortunately, it is not only backing down but, as I said earlier, it allows this wholesale destruction of natural resources to continue. Meanwhile, the aboriginal peoples have to watch this exodus of natural resources from their communities without being able to intervene.

I also met the Carrier–Sekkani in Prince George. We had a very frank discussion about sovereignty. These aboriginal peoples, although they happen to be in British Columbia, 5,000 kilometres from Quebec, are concerned about the economic and political status of their brothers and sisters in eastern Canada, and I am referring particularly to Quebec. We had a very good free ranging discussion about the sovereignty of Quebec, and I think the Carrier–Sekkani understood that the quality of life of aboriginal peoples in Quebec was clearly to be envied, compared with the quality of life of aboriginal peoples elsewhere.

I think we agreed on that. We also agreed that Quebec was certainly not going to build the Berlin wall the day after sovereignty is proclaimed to prevent aboriginal peoples or the Inuit from maintaining their contacts with their brothers and sisters in Canada and elsewhere, including Antarctica and the United States. Those contacts already exist and will continue to do so.

So, therefore, we each assured the other. They asked me as well, naturally, for support. They were very concerned about the British Columbia Treaty Commission. They said: "You know, Mr. Bachand, the commission will never get off the ground so long as there is no progress in the negotiations with the Nisga'a". If these negotiations blocked at the point they had reached, the others' negotiations at the first stage could almost certainly not be expected to catch up with the Nisga'a. The Nisga'a are 20 years ahead of the other communities in their negotiations. Therefore the bill before us today is of major concern in British Columbia.

I want to say in passing—I was talking about the Carrier–Sekani earlier—I would like, while we are before the cameras here, to salute Camille Joseph, elder of the Carrier–Sekani nation, who is well into his 90s. I simply sent him a congratulatory note, but I will take a moment during my speech to note it in passing, because I think it should be mentioned.

The three communities I have just talked to you about are on the mainland. I went to the island as well. The same concerns are to be found on Vancouver Island. Members of the Mid–Island Tribal Council expressed their concerns to me about the progress in the Nisga'a negotiations and the systematic blocking they are currently facing.

I thought it important to situate the context of this bill's passage, a bit. There is nothing like speaking when one has been there personally and has met them and discussed all these questions with them, often over a number of hours. So I think it appropriate to mention it here. British Columbia is very rich in native culture.

• (1645)

You know, as everywhere else, there are 200 reserves, 200 communities there and whether the people are Chilcotin, Nisga'a, Haida or others, all these nations are different and even communities within the same nation differ from one another.

Therefore, it is important to know. I went to the museum in Victoria, and the whole place, the complete two story museum, is dedicated to relations between the white people and the aboriginal peoples. There we can see that the aboriginal peoples of British Columbia really had an impact on cultural values in that province.

I will not hide the fact that there is some hostility now. It is true, but maybe it is because some people provoke that hostility. I can tell you that the natives feel no hostility whatsoever towards the white people. But they have been waiting for 150 years for issues to be settled, and it has not happened yet.

It is important to realize, to see, and it is important that I can attest to the cultural impact of the native people and to their contribution to the life of the white people in British Columbia. You can see it in all the stores, the museums and the schools. The native culture is omnipresent, it has a direct impact on white and non aboriginal values and I think that, with the creation of this commission, time has come to make sure we reach an amicable agreement with the native people of that area, just as we are trying to do in Quebec where I think we are well on our way.

According to my notes, Europeans have been present in British Columbia for 140 years now, and during that time, 14 treaties covering approximately 358 square miles on Vancouver Island were signed, involving the Hudson's Bay Company. Since Confederation, there has been only one treaty, in 1899; it is one of the numbered ones. In total, there are ten numbered treaties in Canada and that one is number eight; it covers the Peace River region and the northern part of Alberta.

It is important to note that treaty negotiations have been essential for native peoples in British Columbia for the last 140 years. Their chiefs went to London to see the king. They regularly came to Ottawa, and went to the Court in London, to try to solve their problem, but to no avail. Worse yet, we, the non–natives, made serious mistakes concerning them, and British Columbia is no exception.

Moreover, I have here some notes indicating that in 1927 and 1951 they were prohibited from going to court. That meant that these people, who were trying to negotiate their land claims in good faith, could not even go to court when the negotiations appeared to be deadlocked. In spite of it all, native peoples have persevered, sometimes breaking the law, and today the situation is such that we have to find a solution. Of course, now they are allowed to go to court and, in British Columbia, things are following their course.

I have a few examples here. In 1973, the six judges of the Supreme Court were split on whether to recognize native land titles; consequently, the federal government said: "Listen, we have to settle this whole thing. We have to start negotiating".

In 1982, there was another turning point with the patriation of the constitution which, by the way, Quebec did not sign, and never will after all, I believe. This constitution contained provisions dealing with native peoples; aboriginal rights and treaty rights were recognized; the last remnants of British colonialism crumbled, imperialist policies started to fall apart, and then, the injunctions preventing aboriginal peoples from going to court naturally became null and void.

For the past 15 years, we have been trying again to find solutions through negotiations or through the courts, if negotiations are not possible.

I believe that the decision we will make today when we pass C–107, will be a vindication of this long struggle and will enable us to finally put an end to a history of confrontation which has plagued British Columbia for the past 150 years.

• (1650)

There is also an history to the commission. There was a report from a task force on claims in British Columbia and the creation of the commission was discussed at that time. The creators of that commission had really identified the need to enter into treaties with the first nations. I quote from that report: "that a new partnership be developed to recognize the importance of natives and first nations in Canada, based on voluntary negotiations well carried out, where natives, the provincial government and the federal government would be on an equal footing".

In September 1992, an agreement in principle was signed between the three authorities. This agreement implemented 19 recommendations made by the task force I mentioned earlier, including recommendation No. 3 which, at the time, called for the creation of the British Columbia Treaty Commission that was set up a little later and that we will confirm, because the federal government had not yet confirmed its participation, although that was happening in practice.

Today, or in the next few days, with the passing of Bill C–107, we will have confirmed the participation of the federal government in this issue.

In the history of the commission, it is also important to mention that at the provincial level, it is only in 1993 that British Columbia got its indian affairs department. That was long overdue, considering all the problems that exist in British Columbia. It was not long ago that the department was established. So, it is important today that we have a recognized department, a recognized minister in British Columbia, a counterpart of the federal minister to be able to thoroughly discuss the issues.

The First Nations Summit would also be a principal to the commission. The first nations have given themselves a negotiation tool called the Summit, which is part of the agreements leading to the commission. This Summit is very active and several of the groups that I was mentioning earlier are participants in the Summit and defend the interests of natives, which will lead, they hope, to treaties.

How does this work? There are six different steps in the process. I think that it is important to follow the course of these steps. The first stage consists in submitting a declaration of intent to negotiate. I will get back to this later on. Forty or so first nations have already done so.

The second stage is the one at which negotiation arrangements are made, first meetings held and evaluations conducted to determine if the first nations are prepared to negotiate. A first meeting takes place, where one group asks the other: "Are you ready to negotiate? How soon can we start?", and so on. A number of first nations, of whom I wanted to give you the list, are already at stage 2.

Stage 3 is the negotiation of a master agreement. The further along I get into this process, the less progress is made on these issues in terms of first nations's participation.

Stage 4 is the negotiation of an agreement in principle; stage 5, the negotiation of a definitive treaty; and stage 6, the implementation of the definitive treaty.

I told you that 43 first nations were taking part in the process. To date, 14 claims have passed stage 1. No individual group has gone further than stage 3 at this point in time. It should be noted however that the Nisga'as have taken an approach to negotiations that is different from the normal approach used by the commission. The Nisga'as negotiated for 27 years just to get to the equivalent of stage 3. Unfortunately, and I must digress here to say this, negotiations have stopped since.

As I indicated earlier, when the BC Premier was elected, he said that the issue had to be settled. Finally, they agreed to set up the commission. Now, we can see that, with a provincial election impending in British Columbia, the Premier is backtracking on his promises. The result is stalled negotiations with the Nisga'a, which in turn stalls the entire negotiation process with the other first nations of British Columbia.

• (1655)

Let us now turn to Quebec. We should wish to the BC first nations that their negotiations can eventually reach as advanced a stage as was reached in negotiations with their Quebec counterparts. Unlike British Columbia, Quebec has been signing modern treaties for the past 20 years, including the famous James Bay Agreement.

Twenty years ago, the Crees, the federal government and the Quebec government signed this historical agreement, which has become a standard agreement for the rest of Canada. More accurately, any time first nations seemed to be on the verge of achieving self–government or asked the federal government and their respective provincial government: "Could you spare a piece of jurisdiction that we could take over?", the James Bay Agreement was quoted as a reference.

As far as I am concerned, it is still a reference, and just to show you how open–minded Quebecers are, they are now saying: "Even if we are always leading the way, under the present circumstances, we agree with the Crees on the need to update the James Bay Agreement model". This goes to show how open–minded Quebecers are concerning first nations and how far they are ready to go to meet native claims in Quebec.

I have some statistics before me that I should share with you because they come from the assistant to the Minister of Indian Affairs, Professor Bradford Morse, who, in a study he submitted to the task force, gives examples of a new constitutional partnership. As recently as 1992, Professor Morse wrote on the subject of land claims that Quebec was the first Canadian province to accept the continuity of aboriginal titles and to recognize them by trying to negotiate land claim settlements. Professor Morse concluded that, compared with the other provinces, Quebec has adopted a comprehensive position that can be seen as much more favourable to aboriginal people and their rights over their traditional lands.

I think that Professor Morse thus recognizes that the people of Quebec are ahead on land claims. They are so much ahead that, when this study was done, we had already concluded the model agreement I referred to earlier, the James Bay Agreement. However, the proposal that has just been made to the Attikamek–Montagnais was not yet on the table. This proposal would recognize what we call native areas, over which native people will have full jurisdiction. We will negotiate an agreement with them on how to divide the territory, over which they will have complete freedom with regard to, among other things, joint management of natural, non–renewable and other resources.

As far as these native areas are concerned, our proposal to the Attikamek–Montagnais even provides for a 40,000 square kilometre buffer zone, which we have agreed to share with the Attikamek–Montagnais. This shows once again that Quebec is in the vanguard of the drive to improve living conditions for Canada's native people.

On the question of self–government, Professor Morse goes on to say that, of all provincial governments, Quebec is the one that did the most to accommodate the desire of native people to exert more control over their lives and their community affairs.

The James Bay Agreement recognizes whole areas of jurisdiction that now come under the exclusive control of the Cree. These areas include culture, education and health. Instead of telling native people that they must go to all–white hospitals, follow the department's educational programs and comply with the directives from Environment Canada, the James Bay Agreement has put whole areas of jurisdiction under Cree control, and I think it is important to point this out.

• (1700)

The same goes for the language component. I just talked about culture, which is often closely related to language. Indeed, we Quebecers have known for a long time that our culture and our language are closely intertwined. We recognized that was also the case for aboriginal peoples. In that regard, it is rather interesting to see that, for several years now, the Supreme Court has been targeting Quebec's charter of the French language, Bill 101. Yet, that legislation must stay, and I want to tell you about some of its more interesting provisions. Quebec's charter expressly recognizes the right of aboriginals, Indians and Inuit to protect and develop their own language and culture.

The fact that Bill 101 even includes provisions which protect aboriginal languages in our province is an indication of how open minded Quebecers are.

This explains why, as professor wrote, aboriginal people in Quebec are much more successful in terms of preserving their language than those who live elsewhere in Canada. This is a perfectly normal and accepted way of doing things in Quebec where, for a long time now, young Crees have been taking Cree language classes with their own school board, while young Montagnais do the same in Pointe–Bleue or elsewhere.

It must be emphasized that Quebecers have always attached a great deal of importance to aboriginal cultures. We recognize the fact that aboriginals were here before us. We also recognize the fact that they have given us enormous wealth. In order to keep whole segments of these societies from disappearing, Quebecers strongly encourage the protection of aboriginal languages and cultures.

Incidentally, a while ago, Mrs. Beaudoin, the Quebec minister of intergovernmental affairs, submitted a claim to the federal government, which has not yet acted on it. As you know, the James Bay agreement deals with the sharing of costs relating to Crees and Naskapis. There is the James Bay agreement, but there is also the Northeastern Quebec agreement, which primarily concerns Naskapis.

Under that agreement, Quebec pays 25 per cent of the costs related to Crees and Naskapis, while the federal government pays for the rest. In the case of the Inuit, the proportions are reversed. However, some changes have occurred since 1987 regarding the sharing of these costs. Since that year, the birth rate among Crees has increased tremendously. Consequently, there are many more children attending school.

A special effort was made to develop education programs for adults. There is an increased demand for specialized education, including for young Cree children with special needs. The Quebec government pays for that component in the case of non aboriginal children, but there is an increased demand up there, and we must provide the additional services required.

For some time, there was no problem with the federal government concerning the payment of these costs each year. Since 1987, however, the government has changed its way of doing things. It wants to index its contribution to the annual inflation rate and sticks to this rate instead of abiding by the provisions of the James Bay agreement which were negotiated in good faith by the federal government, Quebec as well as the Crees, the Naskapi and the Inuit.

Unfortunately, for the Quebec government, this meant a loss of $199 million in income. What did it do? It could easily have said to the young Crees, as some provinces did to other native groups: "Look, since the federal government, which has the fiduciary responsibility for the fees incurred on the reserves, is not paying its share, we are no longer able to financially support education for the young Crees, under the James Bay agreement. Tell them that some children will not be able to go to school this year".

I said earlier that the same thing goes on elsewhere in the United States. The people covered by the Treaty No. 7 in central Canada are being told that they can forget about post–secondary education. "We cannot send your children to school this year, because we ran out of money".

• (1705)

We could have done the same thing in Quebec, but the Quebec government met its responsibilities and took upon itself to foot the bill. Now, it is asking the federal government, the current Liberal government, to pay its share. I must say that I think it is unfortunate that the claim made by the government of Quebec has not been settled. We are talking about $199 million. It cannot just be shrugged off.

Professor Morse, an assistant to the Indian affairs minister, also says that Quebec has shown great leadership in promoting economic development. There are some economic development provisions in the James Bay agreement where it is recognized that significant compensation must be paid to the native communities following the construction of hydro–electric dams, and that was done. Their hunting, trapping and fruit–picking rights were also recognized. We are also leaders in economic development.

Furthermore, there is a happy combination of traditional activities, like hunting and fishing, and marketing. It is also worth mentioning that there are local outfitting operations managed by natives.

In health care, we see the same thing. The Quebec government is the leader. Natives in Quebec are in much better health than their counterparts in the rest of Canada.

Finally, I hope for the benefit of British Columbia natives that the federal government will adopt Bill C–107 and will go further and use its influence and its fiduciary role to force the Harcourt government to go back to the negotiating table. I also hope that the negotiations concerning the Nisga'as will be resumed and that the participation of the federal government as a party in the British Columbia Treaty Commission will be accepted so that natives in that province can one day benefit from as much generosity as natives in Quebec.

[English]

Ms. Bridgman: Mr. Speaker, a request has been made by the hon. member for Vancouver East that she be able to use my time as she has commitments tomorrow. I have no problem with that.

The Deputy Speaker: Everything is possible with unanimous consent.

[Translation]

We could proceed this way with unanimous consent.

[English]

It would be understood, presumably, that the hon. member for Vancouver East would speak today for 20 minutes with a 10–minute question and answer period and that the Reform Party representative would have 40 minutes without a question and answer period the next time the matter comes up for debate.

Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Surrey North for allowing me to speak.

[Translation]

I would also like to thank the Bloc Quebecois for letting me speak now.

[English]

The bill before us marks the culmination of a long and at times difficult struggle. It is born of British Columbia's unique history. It is the product of many years of hard work and goodwill. Fairness, clarity and justice are not issues of party politics. They are elements of principles which we all share as Canadians.

Over the decades many people have played a part: people from various parties and political ideologies, people who shared little in common except a desire to see justice done and to get on with building a brighter future for British Columbia.

To understand why in 1995 we are still talking about negotiating treaties we need to look to our history. Unlike most other provinces where treaties were signed to clarify jurisdiction over land and resources and forge new relationships between First Nations and the newcomers to this great land few were ever concluded in British Columbia. As a result some 124 years after becoming a province, the key question of unextinguished aboriginal rights remains unresolved and the majority of the province remains subject to outstanding aboriginal land claims.

Few treaties were signed because of the position historically taken by the Government of British Columbia. From the late 1800s the position was that aboriginal rights had been extinguished prior to B.C.'s entry into Confederation in 1871 or, if these rights did exist, they were the exclusive responsibility of the federal government.

• (1710)

In 1990 under the leadership of Premier Vander Zalm, a Socred, B.C. reversed its longstanding position and the way was opened to resolving these issues.

I think it only fair to point out that one of the key players in convincing the provincial government to reverse its historic opposition to negotiating treaties was the then B.C. minister of native affairs, Mr. Jack Weisgerber. I know that many of my Reform Party friends would recognize Mr. Weisgerber's name. One of the early and enthusiastic architects of this process, Mr. Weisgerber now leads the provincial Reform Party in British Columbia.

Following on the heels of the B.C. government's decision, the Government of Canada and the B.C. government acted quickly to advance the process. Later the same year the federal Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the hon. Tom Siddon, along with Mr. Weisgerber and Bill Wilson, chairman of the First Nations Congress, agreed to establish a task force to make recommendations on the mandate and process for treaty negotiations.

By June 1991 the B.C. claims task force had released its report. One of its key recommendations was the creation of an arm's length B.C. treaty commission.

In the 10 months that followed, representatives of Canada, B.C. and the First Nations summit negotiated the B.C. treaty commission agreement which was the blueprint for the commission. On September 21, 1992, Prime Minister Brian Mulroney, Indian Affairs Minister Tom Siddon, both Conservatives, B.C. Premier Mike Harcourt and native affairs minister Andrew Petter, both New Democrats, joined with the First Nations summit leadership in signing the B.C. treaty commission agreement. We had all the parties on board.

In the three years since, the commission has made great progress. If there was ever any doubt that the commission was necessary, one need only look at the response it has had for the aboriginal population of British Columbia.

To date, 49 first nation groups representing 79 per cent of B.C.'s aboriginal peoples have submitted a statement of intent to negotiate. One of the terms of the agreement creating the treaty commission was a commitment to establish it in the legislation. In May 1993 both the aboriginal summit and the province fulfilled their part of that commitment.

Now the time has come for the federal government to honour its part of the bargain. These then are the events which have led us to this legislation and to this debate. I welcome all members to this great partnership.

Across the years and across party lines people have joined hands in a common cause. It is their vision and determination that we celebrate and formalize today. Their cause was simple: the desire to bring justice to aboriginal people and certainty to their province.

The costs of that uncertainty has been high. In a Price Waterhouse study prepared in 1990 it was estimated that $1 billion in investment had not occurred because of unresolved land claims. Three hundred badly needed jobs had not been created and $125 million in capital investments had not been made. Yesterday we had the mining industry in town and they were talking to me about the same problem.

Since the time of that study the price has continued to be paid year in and year out. That has been the price of denying the problem or pretending it would go away. That is the price of the status quo for the people of British Columbia. It is a price we can no longer afford. With the passage of this legislation we will be on the way to no longer having to pay.

If the price has been high for the general population of B.C., for aboriginal people it has been far higher. For aboriginal people it has meant great hardships and shattering poverty. It has meant the denial of historic rights and future hopes. It has meant generations of dreams deferred and promises unkept. It has meant a quality of life few of us can imagine and none of us should tolerate.

Conditions are appalling. Almost a third of aboriginal homes on reserves lack running water. Diseases such as hepatitis and tuberculosis virtually eradicated in the non–native population persist in aboriginal communities. Death from fires are three and a half times the non–aboriginal level because of unsafe housing and lack of proper sanitation.

• (1715)

Aboriginal people are more than three times as likely to die a violent death and about twice as likely to die before age 65. The suicide rate among aboriginal people is 50 per cent higher than among non–aboriginal people. That difference is even more pronounced in the age group of 15 to 25.

This country can simply not afford to lose another generation of aboriginal people able and willing to make a contribution to this country. The young aboriginal people of today can be our professionals, our trades people, our inventors of tomorrow. They represent our past and our future. If we lose them it will be an incredible waste.

We cannot afford to continue to condemn aboriginal peoples to lesser lives in lesser lands. We cannot afford to judge any longer. We must start facilitating a process that is indispensable.

In my riding of Vancouver East I have one of the largest aboriginal urban communities in the country. It is an active community. Its members are engaged in bettering their situation by making everybody aware of their past and their plight. In Vancouver East there is the Aboriginal Friendship Centre and the Native Education Centre which help us understand them.

The people of B.C. have told their government to get on with it, to negotiate fair and just agreements which protect the rights of both aboriginal and non–aboriginal people alike, and the sooner the better.

We must do it in an organized manner and this is what the B.C. Treaty Commission has been doing and will continue to do. It wants to establish a stable economic climate which in turn will help to bring in investments, dollars and opportunities for all British Columbians and bring peace to our forests, our waters, our lands.

[Translation]

My colleague from the Bloc has explained very well how important aboriginal peoples are in British Columbia and I thank him. I also want to say that native peoples are very important to our culture, our past and our future in B.C. In fact, they are an extremely important part of the history of British Columbia, which, as you know, Mr. Speaker, is a wonderful part of Canada, where aboriginal peoples, anglophones, francophones and other communities from around the world all live in harmony.

[English]

In 1993, speaking in favour of the legislation creating the treaty commission, Jack Weisgerber recounted his experience in 1989 as a member of the premier's advisory council on native affairs: "It became clear to us as we travelled and met with groups around the province that if we were going to address the root of the social and economic problems we had to deal with the land claim question".

Those are wise words from a man who now leads the Reform Party in British Columbia, words echoed by members of all parties in the British Columbia legislature when that great body passed its own enabling legislation; words I commend to my friends across the floor today, words which we now have the opportunity to honour through our actions.

The history of this legislation is a story of partnerships between cultures, between political parties, between generations. Let us continue in that same spirit of partnership now as we open the way for a brighter future for all British Columbians and a prouder day for all Canadians.

We have already waited too long. We should have settled this problem long ago. We now must ensure peace and harmony with our aboriginal brothers and sisters by working with them on the settlement of their land claims and on their needs.

In the last two years we have done a lot of work and with everybody's co–operation we will be able to solve a long and overdue problem and ensure peace and certainty in British Columbia.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to rise in support of Bill C–107 and in support of the comments made by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Bill C–107 creates the legal framework for the British Columbia Treaty Commission to act as an arm's length body and facilitate treaty negotiations with British Columbia's First Nations.

• (1720)

I support the creation of the commission and its mandate. As hon. members are aware, very few of the First Nations in B.C. have ever signed treaties with the crown. In lower Vancouver Island several First Nations signed treaties with Governor Douglas in the mid–1800s. By the end of the 19th century the Peace River district was included in treaty number 8 signed with the federal government. Obviously it is well known to people from B.C., although it may not be known by other people in Canada, that was the last one. There have been no treaties signed in this century.

In recent years the Nisga'a Tribal Council has been actively negotiating with the federal and provincial governments. When those negotiations are complete and an agreement is signed it will be the first treaty with a B.C. First Nation signed this century, and we are almost in the next century.

The people of B.C. want to enter the 21st century knowing we have completed the unfinished business of the 19th century. The land claims of B.C. First Nations have to be resolved. Some people would ask why. Resolving these issues creates an environment of certainty which means economic growth and job creation. Settling land and resource issues creates the environment needed for increased investment and local economic activity.

In recent years real progress has been made toward resolving 100–year old unfinished business. In 1990 Ottawa, B.C. and the leaders of B.C.'s First Nations established a task force to recommend a negotiation process that could accommodate the numerous First Nations in B.C. that want to negotiate settlements.

The task force presented 19 recommendations in June, 1991, all of which were all accepted by the First Nations summit and the federal and provincial governments, a major achievement in itself. One of the key recommendations was to establish the British Columbia Treaty Commission as an arm's length minder of the process. The agreement committed the three partners to establish the BCTC through federal an provincial legislation and a resolution of the First Nations summit. In the meantime commissioners have been appointed by order in council and summit resolutions. They began their work in December, 1993 and have made considerable progress.

As a member of Parliament who represents 46 First Nations communities I can tell from firsthand experience of the importance of having a process to deal with longstanding grievances and issues of specific land claims and, more important, in B.C.'s case of treaties that have never been signed. It is a major undertaking of tremendous importance, probably more important than anything the B.C. government will have done in the term of its involvement over the past number of years.

There are 47 First Nations involved in the BCTC process to date. They represent over 70 per cent of the First Nations of the province and more are likely to become involved soon. The BCTC has five commissioners. Two are nominated by the First Nations summit, one by the B.C. government and one by Ottawa. The chief commissioner is selected and appointed by consensus of all three partners.

The First Nations summit includes all B.C. First Nations that have agreed to participate in the BCTC process. It provides a forum for those First Nations to meet and discuss treaty negotiations. It worked closely with Ottawa and the provinces to develop the treaty negotiation process and to establish the BCTC. As one of the partners in the process it continues to provide direction.

In Kenora—Rainy River, no different than in B.C., we have our treaties: treaty 3, treaty 9 and treaty 5. The minister responsible for Indian and northern affairs has also undertaken some significant changes to the lives of First Nations people and has tried to improve the affairs of individual communities by getting involved and trying to deal with First Nations and specific land claims.

• (1725)

From firsthand experience, in order for us to get involved in what is most important, the next generation, the economics and the social well–being of First Nations for the years to come, these land claims and these processes must work.

To get into the next century with some hope and aspiration for the young First Nation people not only in my riding but across the country and in B.C. we will have to assure them the grievances of the past will be rectified in order to get on with the future.

I, like many others who represent First Nations, have had roadblocks. I have had First Nations people tell me they are frustrated and fed up. They are not willing to wait much longer. They no longer want the federal or provincial governments to sit on their hands while they wait for a miracle. They would like that process to start.

I take this opportunity to tell the House, the people of Kenora—Rainy River and the people of B.C. that they can thank the government and the minister responsible for moving an agenda which from the last term was basically stalled or going in reverse. We are now starting to see some significant improvement for all the hard work and efforts of not only the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development but the chiefs and councils of the First Nations.

B.C. will be dealing with a six stage treaty. In this negotiation process the stages something like this: a statement of intent; preparation for negotiations; negotiation of a framework agreement; negotiation of agreement in principle; treaty finalization; treaty implementation.

The commission will assess the readiness of parties to negotiate. This involves ensuring the First Nations have the resources needed to make their case and ensuring the federal and provincial governments have struck regional advisory committees so that the local non–aboriginal residents have a voice.

This brings me to a very important point and the obvious wisdom of the positions of the government and the First Nations of the involvement and the voice of non–aboriginal residents. I will use an example of a community in my riding which is over 50 per cent aboriginal. Sioux Lookout is thought by a lot of people to be a non–aboriginal community but it does have a lot of aboriginal people. It would like to participate when we get involved in specific land claim policies and negotiations with First Nations so that when the agreements are made there is a recognition that all of us, native and non–native, will be able to live with the results.

Therefore it is very important that advisory committees are set up with local non–aboriginal residents to give them a voice so we can be assured that in the end the agreements we get will be a win–win situation and not win–lose or lose–win.

I commend again the individuals who put in this process in B.C. because with it I think the results will be much longer lasting than if this process did not have non–aboriginal people in it.

These regional committees in B.C. are part of an extensive commitment to keep the public and all other affected parties informed of developments and to make sure that advice from all sectors of B.C. society are considered. Other efforts include news letters, public meetings, an 800 number, speaking engagements, information brochures, other publications and participation in trade shows.

The BCTC also allocates loans to enable First Nations to fully participate in the process. In other words, it works in partnership with all parties to ensure that the job gets done properly.

The Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour, but he will have 10 minutes remaining the next time the matter is called.

It now being 5.30 p.m., the House will proceed to consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[Translation]

TREATMENT OF MUNICIPAL SEWAGE

The House resumed from June 20, 1995, consideration of the motion that, in the opinion of this House, the government should support the undertaking of a country–wide program of improving the treatment of municipal sewage to a minimum standard of at least that of primary treatment facilities, and of the amendment of Mrs. Guay.

Mr. Bernard St–Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is with great interest that I rise today to debate Motion M–425 brought forward by the member for Comox—Alberni. In this motion, my colleague proposes that the water we use be treated at the primary level instead of being discharged directly into the environment, as is the case today.

In developed and industrialized regions, pollution has altered the natural quality of this valuable resource. Because of growing urbanization and because of the obvious inadequacy of our sewage treatment facilities, we have to worry about the quality of the large quantity of water we consume daily.

Not only is water a necessity of life, but it also contributes to our quality of life. I am very aware of this fact when I look at my riding, the riding of Manicouagan, that borders the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Water is the principal driving force in my region. This natural resource has attracted several industries employing a large number of workers to this area.

Unlike many other vital resources, water has no substitute in most of the activities and processes where it is required, both in industry and in nature. Yet, despite its increasing scarcity and despite the fact that, over the last few years, we have become aware of the seriousness of the water pollution problem, we have not taken the necessary measures to deal with it.

Everyone agrees that our current sewage treatment systems will have to be modernized. I support the motion brought forward by the member for Comox—Alberni because it is clear that our waste water needs a minimum amount of treatment. We cannot go on thinking that we can discharge sewage directly into our lakes and rivers without harming the environment.

Sewage treatment systems are essential to the social and economic functioning of modern communities. The major part of polluted waste found in water comes from sewage and municipal sewage treatment installations and from numerous industries which use those installations to dispose of their waste.

In the last ten years or so, the growing awareness of environmental issues has sparked considerable interest for the protection of waterways. Provinces and municipalities have therefore been spending tremendous amounts of money to develop protection programs for those resources. Motion M–425 proposes a national program. Yet, it has always been clear that municipalities are responsible for providing drinking water, sewage treatment and waste disposal services.

The motion proposes federal interference in a provincial jurisdiction, which is of course totally unacceptable for the Bloc Quebecois. I wonder if the author of this motion is aware of the danger of allowing the federal government to impose its own standards on municipalities.

Motion M–425 proposes that the federal government establish a nationwide program of improving the treatment of municipal sewage to the point of meeting a minimum national standard. In the area of environment, the federal government has always had a tendency to centralize power in Ottawa, supposedly because of the national interest and the need to modernize environmental programs.

Yet, under the constitution, environment is not explicitly the jurisdiction of one level of government more than another.

• (1735)

The courts have declared it what is termed an ancillary power, derived from the areas of jurisdiction allocated to each government. Even before the mid–eighties the government of Quebec, which has exclusive jurisdiction over matters of a local or territorial nature, played a lead role in environmental matters, an area over which it was for the most part responsible.

The federal government was satisfied at that time, as set out in the constitution, with intervening in complementary areas. It was only in later years that it began to interfere in environmental matters. As soon as that happened, duplication and overlap began to crop up increasingly, moreover. This has been perpetuated and aggravated since the election of the present Liberal government, which is attempting to centralize decision making in Ottawa, with all due deference to my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. The truth is not always easy to hear, but there you are.

It is becoming increasingly obvious that the present government, regardless of what it says, is seeking to centralize and concentrate power in Ottawa still further. Under a federal regime, there must of necessity be a division of areas of jurisdiction. In Canada, however, such a division often leads to inefficiency. At this very moment, there is a need for the federal government to enter into administrative agreements with the provinces. The current situation simply clouds the issue and makes it extremely difficult to identify who is really responsible if a policy does not bring results. Are we to blame the federal government, the author of the standards, or the provincial government, which may have been remiss in implementing those standards?

Since Canada maintains that it has jurisdiction over some areas of the environment because of the so–called national interest, this means it is in a position to enter into international agreements and to find global solutions along with its partners. Why then could the provinces not do the same with each other and with a sovereign Quebec?

The inefficiency of a system in which responsibility is not clearly identified lies in wasted energy due to duplication and is certainly not any guarantee of sustainable development. In fact, under the current federal system it would be unthinkable to guarantee any kind of sustainable development, since the government in Ottawa seems to have an abiding tendency to centralize powers and to interfere with matters that are the sole responsibility of the provinces.

Although Quebec recognizes the very real concern we should have for the environment, it is not prepared to let the federal government once again intrude in an area over which it has no jurisdiction. Responsibility for municipal sewage lies clearly with the provinces and the municipalities.

The Bloc Quebecois will vote against this motion, not because it is against protecting the environment, and I would like to say that we appreciate the good intentions of the hon. member for Comox—Alberni. As I said, the Bloc would vote against the motion, and it will do so not because it is against protecting the environment but rather because it believes that the environment is better protected when each government deals with the problems for which it is responsible, so that it can set priorities that make sense and as a result be truly effective.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased to participate this afternoon in this debate on Motion M–425.

Notwithstanding what we just heard—and I am not sure that the motion has this much importance in a sense—I must say that the remarks that were just made do not reflect what I would call the truth.

[English]

First, the motion before the House says that the government should support the undertaking—it says support, it does not say establish it themselves—support the undertaking of a country–wide program of improving the treatment of municipal sewage to a minimum standard of at least that of primary treatment facilities. The motion does not even talk about establishing one national standard, as was alleged by the hon. member from the Bloc Quebecois. Second, it is totally false to allege that it does anything else, which the member has also indicated.

• (1740)

[Translation]

Second, there is an amendment, and I wonder whether it is really in order. It must be in order if the Chair accepted it. I must tell you that this amendment has no connection with the main issue, since it deals with a right for all provinces to financial compensation. One has nothing to do with the other.

The motion simply calls upon the federal government to support certain initiatives to guarantee a minimum level of waste water treatment. That is all this motion is about.

Once again, today, the Bloc Quebecois was caught in this House making things up and stretching the truth to an incredible extent.

[English]

Sir Winston Churchill once said that the opposite to the truth had never been stated with greater accuracy. I guess one could apply that to the speech the House just heard with respect to what the intention of the motion really is.

I want to speak a bit about the infrastructure program. We get mixed messages from Reform MPs on infrastructure. The motion by the hon. member for Comox—Alberni invites the federal government to support infrastructure programs concerning sewers and the like. I have to admit that we have been getting mixed messages from Reform Party MPs on that subject. Come to think of it, we have been getting mixed messages from the Reform Party on just about every issue.

I have an editorial from the Ottawa Citizen, the valley edition, of August 14, 1994, which speaks of the Reform Party position on infrastructure. It is entitled "Reform Sings the Blues" and states that "The Reform Party seems to have changed its tune after advocating the nurturing of infrastructure before the election".

It works something like this. Before the election the Reform Party was in favour of ameliorating the infrastructure and of the federal government supporting it. After the election Reformers started criticizing this. You might ask what is wrong with that, after all, they are Reformers and it should be expected that they will contradict themselves every now and then. That might be true, but there is a certain limit beyond which it becomes odd, even for Reformers.

We have the spectacle of the hon. member for Simcoe Centre. That is a spectacle if I ever saw one. He wrote a letter regarding an infrastructure program in his riding. I want all my colleagues to know it was a coincidence that it was in his riding. The letter, which was to the President of the Treasury Board, stated: "I am writing to further offer my strong support for the project because of the significant job creation this project will provide. One of the main objectives of the infrastructure program is to promote public and private sector partnerships that will not only improve the local and regional economic climate, but also will help Canada as a whole to attract corporations by providing prime business opportunity" and so on.

That was the hon. member for Simcoe Centre, who was at that time writing in praise of an infrastructure program that just happened to be located in his riding. After that was over the same member—

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We are supposed to be discussing the amendment that was put forward by the hon. member for Laurentides. What the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell is talking about now has no relevance to the amendment. Mr. Speaker, that he speak to the amendment.

• (1745)

The Deputy Speaker: The member is referring to the standing order regarding relevance. I am sure the hon. member will make his remarks relevant, if that was not the case, very soon.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, the motion is with regard to supporting infrastructure programs. The amendment refers only to how one should fund these infrastructure programs. Of course the member for Simcoe Centre was writing in support of funding an infrastructure program which is exactly what the amendment is about.

Let us get back to the member for Simcoe Centre because I like him a lot. The member for Simcoe Centre in commenting to a reporter said "of other infrastructure programs". By coincidence, these other projects were not in his riding, but here is what he said about them. Remember, let us not be cynical. These other projects to which I am going to refer were in someone else's riding. He said about those: "It is not infrastructure; it is a make work project. They talk about the short term jobs this is creating but those jobs can be anywhere from one day to one month". He was explaining how these things were wrong, among them renovating the coliseum in Edmonton and building facilities and arenas elsewhere.

All those other arenas were wrong but the arena in Barrie was right. It just happens to be in the riding of the member for Simcoe Centre. It was worthy of support and all the praise I brought to the attention of the House a moment ago. It constituted all those virtuous things I described to the House, such as promoting public and private sector partnerships, and so on.

How could that be? How could it be that infrastructure projects are worthy when they are in the hon. member's riding but virtually identical projects in someone else's riding are not worthy of similar praise? I am sure there is a reasonable explanation for this and we will hear it soon.

Let us talk about the infrastructure works program. The city of Calgary has put out a publication on the Canada–Alberta infrastructure works program. It is called "Calgary at Work". Calgary of course is where the ridings of the leader of the Reform Party and other Reform members are located. I wonder if they will pay attention to this because we might ask them questions later. The publication "Calgary at Work" lauds all the virtues of the infrastructure program and all the things that have been done in Calgary. Here are some of the things—

Mr. Johnston: A point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if you could confirm quorum.

The Deputy Speaker: There is not a quorum.

Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 29(4), I would ask those members present to approach the table and have their names recorded in the journal.

[Translation]

Pursuant to Standing Order 29(3), as we do not have a quorum, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m.

(There being only 13 members present, including the Deputy Speaker, the names were written down, and the House adjourned at 6.03 p.m.)