We will have to manage in an ecosystem and in broader terms. We have the longest shoreline in the world and we have to look at it differently. We have to look at our oceans in terms of an asset we have to treat with respect. When we exploit that asset we have to look at what the interdependence is. The bill finally brings together a strategy on how to deal with our oceans.

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the words of my friend across the way. I am a little surprised at some of the conclusions he is drawing with respect to Bill C–98.

Bill C–98 at first blush looks like a pretty innocuous bill. It is a good bill in some respects. It recognizes Canada's jurisdiction over an exclusive economic zone and a contiguous zone in accordance with the United Nations convention on the law of the sea. That is a positive move.

It is also supposed to allow the management of all oceans and coastal activities to be co–ordinated under the oceans management strategy and it tries to clarify federal responsibilities in the management of our oceans. I say it is supposed to and tries because the bill is an attempt to address the concerns of the oceans and the fisheries, but it is a failure.

The bill manages to impose a new tax on fishermen. It manages to retain the duplication in the bureaucracy which exists now. It also manages to introduce new levels of bureaucracy.

This is not what fishermen want. It is not what Canadians want or deserve. Canadians want less government, not more. The minister and members of the Liberal government seem to be the only people who do not understand that.

The bill represents the Liberal government's complete lack of understanding of what life is like in Canada as a taxpayer. What will it take for the government to understand it is impossible for Canadians to shoulder any more of an already unbearable tax burden?

What will it take to make the government understand the fishermen of Canada, already victims of a fisheries crisis on both coasts, can barely make ends meet right now? It is either a complete and utter misunderstanding on the part of the minister, although not surprising since he just awarded himself a generous pension out of all proportion to what most Canadians could ever expect, or it is a complete disdain for the plight of the fishermen. As long as his pockets are full and he does not have to make serious cuts in his department, he simply does not care. Look at the attitude he had toward the Canadian taxpayers when he refurbished his office last year at the cost of a couple hundred thousand dollars.

As I said, times are tough for most people involved in the fishery in Canada, but the fisheries minister proposes a new tax on them anyway. Clause 49, page 21 of the bill, explains that the fees are for the service provided by DFO. Would that be the privilege to fish? This is not a service. It also states that fees may not exceed the cost of providing the service. Would that be the cost of DFO, TAGS, unemployment insurance, and other social programs or what? Where does it end?

A tax would only serve to hurt an industry that is already in trouble. DFO already collects $13 million in fees from fishermen, and it wants to increase that to $50 million. That is a 400 per cent increase paid in one lump sum. The fees are based on the landed value of the catch but are paid in one lump sum at the beginning of the season. They will be incremental, not fixed.

The parliamentary secretary said last week in response to questions that were asked in the House that there had not been an increase since 1985 and therefore he was condoning the decision. A 400 per cent increase paid in one lump sum is not reasonable. Imagine if you will, your hydro bill going up 400 per cent in one lump sum, or your phone bill or your mortgage payment. If this were happening to me I would push my MP to oppose such attempts. But alas, Atlantic fishermen have no one to turn to. Reform is the only party here to hear their voice.

This tax is a way for the Liberals to get the fishermen out of the industry. The minister wants to tax them out of the water. The minister calls this a user fee, but he is wrong. User fees are in return for services rendered. There are no services rendered here.

There are 31 Atlantic Canadian Liberal MPs and one from an extinct party. Where do the fishermen have to go? Reform is their only voice. We were in Atlantic Canada a couple of weeks ago and this is what we heard consistently. I feel rather bad for the Liberal MPs who come from Atlantic Canada who are going to be required to support the bill, because the people in Atlantic Canada are going to remember them for it.

The minister enjoys trying to impress the international community, but what about Canadians? Is the tax supposed to impress them?

Let us talk about another aspect of the bill; it is called partnership. This means that the minister under the bill will have the discretion to enter into partnership agreements on the management of the fishery resource in Canada—at his discretion.

I would like to read an excerpt from a letter I received from people in Atlantic Canada who are concerned about where this is going to lead. I quote:

> In general, our concerns arise out of a potential that the Bill will permit delegation of actual resource management authority to anyone whom the Minister may see fit to nominate for this purpose. This regime has potential to be even more unpredictable and unchallengeable than the present "absolute discretion" of the Minister for which Section 7 of the Fisheries Act provides. "Management" of fisheries resources (including such decisions as access to and allocation of the resource) are critically important to individual fishermen. The delegation of such decisions to committees, who are not subject to even the dubious control of political accountability, would create opportunities for management by special–interest groups.
> Fisheries management in Atlantic Canada has had a dismal history of inability to ensure that the greatest good accrues to the greatest number of participants in the industry. See, for example, the third report of the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries, dated June 23, 1993. Strong leadership, a fair and reviewable decision–making process, and clear legislative mandates as to exactly whom benefits from the fishery are to principally accrue to, are required to address and to correct the fundamental problems in the industry.

• (1535)

The special provision in Bill C–98 which raises the concern expressed above is in Section 32(c):

32. For the purpose of the implementation of integrated management plans, the Minister may

(c) on his own or her own or jointly with another person or body or with another minister, board or agency of the Government of Canada,

(i) establish advisory or management bodies and appoint or designate, as appropriate, members of those bodies, and (ii) recognize established advisory or management bodies;

The scope to which this provision would permit delegation of unfettered and unreviewable authority to unidentified and unaccountable persons is of great concern to the independent fishermen whom it is my privilege to represent.

Mr. Speaker, you can see there is a great deal of concern in Atlantic Canada over these partnership provisions in Bill C–98.

Let us talk for a minute about the bureaucracy. Will the size of the bureaucracy be affected in any way by Bill C–98? Is this consolidation of legislation under one umbrella called the Canada oceans act going to in any way affect the bureaucracy? On paper the shuffle looks good, but the reality is it is not going to affect the bureaucracy in any tangible way.

The DFO is already a bloated department and is extremely top heavy. With the cutbacks we see the minister is talking about destaffing lighthouses while the offices in Ottawa on Kent Street remain fully staffed. Nobody has made any concerted effort to rationalize DFO's bureaucracy from the top down. They are starting from the bottom up. We see conservation officers being taken off the beat, we see enforcement officers being taken off the beat, but we do not see the bureaucracy addressed in any tangible way.

This bill was obviously drafted by bureaucrats, not parliamentarians. I guess we cannot expect them to address the need for cuts by cutting their own department, can we? It is really unfortunate that with this opportunity the minister and the government did not seize it and seriously address the size of DFO's bureaucracy.

Let us talk about ocean protection. Yes, this will be a step toward ratifying the United Nations convention on the law of the sea, but what else? What about the extension of the 200–mile limit? The minister crusaded so proudly against the Spanish fleet off our Grand Banks, and he was supported by a great number of Canadians for doing so, but what of the protection he so strongly hinted was on its way? This bill does absolutely nothing to address the extension of the 200–mile limit to cover the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. I understand the minister made such indications here in the House earlier today. I am here to say that it does nothing to extend Canada's jurisdiction in those areas. This bill does not give the governing body any real authority. It has no teeth. Governing is only possible with authority.

As with gun control, cabinet will iron out the details of this bill later. We are talking about order in council decisions. Understandably, the fishermen in the industry do not trust it. After all, it was the government's mismanagement that got us into this whole mess in the first place. Why trust them? They have only shown that their own interests are at heart and not those of their constituents.

This bill does not invoke thoughts of government accountability in the minds of Canadians and in particular in the minds of fishermen. Instead it promotes fears of trickery and backroom dealings. The Liberal cabinet needs to make the decisions by order in council because even some of their own members are upset about this bill. We all know what the Prime Minister does with members who represent their constituents.

Cabinet could hike fees again next year without parliamentary scrutiny and without public debate. It is no holds barred for the Liberals. These are legitimate concerns. If the Liberals were implementing legislation they knew would better the fishery, why hide behind cabinet? Why would they be afraid of a public debate on the matter?

I am concerned that this will mean the special interest groups will be allowed to control the agenda. The conservation of the fishery should be in the interest of all Canadians, not just a select few.

• (1540)

The Reform Party cannot support a bill that would increase taxes and increase the size of government. Do the minister and this government not understand that Canadians want less government and taxes, not more? This bill is nothing more than a cowardly tax grab to ensure the job security of bloated DFO offices in Ottawa. The minister could not really have thought that fishermen and Parliament would ever condone such an act.

Mr. Harbance Singh Dhaliwal (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened very closely to my colleague from the Reform Party.

I know my colleague from the Reform Party has just been to Atlantic Canada, but there is an old saying that a little bit of knowledge can be very dangerous. I know they feel they know Atlantic Canada, but I can assure this House that we have members who know it very well, are well informed and can advise us on the issue.

Let me first make a few statements. The member should go back to the budget, which outlined the cost initiatives. Obviously his party did not look at the budget very closely, because some of the issues in terms of cost recovery were already indicated in the 1995 budget. They should go back to that. Obviously they did not read that part.

In the second part, in terms of the headquarters, that is where the biggest cuts are coming. Once again they should go back to the budget, because the headquarters are going to be cut by 26 per cent when the average cuts in the department are only 16 per cent.

Let me also ask the member a question in terms of his position on the licensing fee. Our main resources are a public resource. As a public resource, certain people have beneficial privileges to that resource. Should the fisherperson who catches or lands $10,000 worth of fish and pays $30 for a licence pay the same fee as those individuals who have a landing value of $1 million? Should they pay the same licence fee of $30 when they are taking out of a public resource that belongs to all Canadians? This government has said that those who take the most out of the public resource should pay a little more. This is only common sense.

The Reform Party always talks about user pay. They want to have user pay for all those people who go to the doctor. All this is saying is that if one is taking a huge amount of a public resource then they should pay based on how much they benefit from that public resource. I think all Canadians and all members from Atlantic Canada would support that view.

Mr. Scott (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I hear the hon. member for Halifax saying she invites me there. She may be aware that I just came back from there. I talked to a number of fishermen in the Halifax area, the Dartmouth area and Central Nova. I went down to the wharfs and talked to the small guys with the small boats, not the big guys. I heard what they had to say about this fee increase.

It is interesting to see the parliamentary secretary over there defending what the government is doing when it flies in the face of what I heard back in Atlantic Canada. I would suggest to the hon. member for Halifax that maybe she wants to go and spend a little time talking to some of the fishermen in her riding, because she might get a different point of view from what she is getting from the parliamentary secretary.

I ran into one old fellow and asked him how he was making out in the fishery this year. He said: "Well, it is pretty tough. My fingernails are all wore out trying to hang on." This is the kind of attitude the parliamentary secretary displays to these fishermen who are having a very difficult time surviving from year to year.

The parliamentary secretary defends the increased fees and says it is a public resource and the fishermen ought to be paying a suitable fee for access to that resource. I do not think anybody in Canada would disagree with that, but is a 400 per cent increase in one lump sum reasonable? Regardless of one's income for the year, the person pays it up front in one lump sum. Is that reasonable? I do not think most Canadians would find that reasonable.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to what the hon. colleague from the Reform Party had to say. This prompted me to take another look at my history of Quebec fisheries, and I would like to share with you these facts that bear a direct relation to the bill.

Between 1922 and 1980, in Quebec, fisheries were managed under an administrative delegation agreement whereby the federal government had transferred fisheries management to the Government of Quebec.

Therefore, during this time frame, we were able to develop a network now referred to as a sustainable development network, because small processing plants and refrigerating plants that pretty well met the needs of shore fishermen sprung up along the coast.

About 1980, following a fight—another one—between the federal minister, who has now become a senator, and his Quebec counterpart, this delegation of power was cancelled. After that—a coincidence perhaps—fish grew scarce and can no longer be found in our oceans.

I would draw a parallel between this and the remarks made by the hon. member because we are often told that big is beautiful. The larger the structure created, the larger the number of people involved and the better the chances it will work and be successful.

I tend to say that maybe the word is "small is beautiful" in this instance. Perhaps, if we had structures better suited to the people's needs, we would have a better chance of getting by. Take for example the fishermen of Rivière-au-Renard, Newport or the Lower North Shore. They keep running into problems with respect to fisheries management in Canada.

While fishing is a major economic activity in the Gaspé Peninsula, the Lower North Shore and the Magdalen Islands, Quebec fisheries are a very small part of the whole Canadian picture and we have always sought ways for our fishermen to have a greater weight in the balance by providing expertise, supporting them through the work of biologists, so that they can adequately argue their points.

The cod stocks were depleted in part because the politicians in charge had frequently given in to pressure. We now find ourselves with many endangered species because the policies did not reflect the reality in terms of the market and the fishing of the species. Some fishermen are forced to stay home because they cannot get the required service.

I will conclude by asking the Reform member if there is a way to ensure that fisheries management stays close to the people, in a concrete and daily fashion, while also taking into account the opinion of fishermen, instead of having huge structures where the power ultimately rests with whoever has the largest number of biologists or provides the biggest report. Such a structure is of no help to users, namely the fishermen, who do not have enough of a say in the process.

Does the Reform member feel that this bill is headed the wrong way since it promotes a "Big is beautiful" instead of considering also a "Small is beautiful" approach?

[English]

Mr. Scott (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his intervention. He made a couple of observations and I think he is right on.

I was not aware that there was a withdrawal of delegated authority in his province in 1980, but it does not surprise me because that is the way the federal government has acted over the last 25 or 30 years. It has tried to consolidate more power for itself all the time: Ottawa is always bigger, better and more beautiful. Obviously that is not what Canadians think. Canadians would like to see decentralization of power such as the member is alluding to. It certainly is a philosophy and a vision of the party I am representing in the House today. Our leader was trying to make that point with the Prime Minister during question period.

We believe the federal government ought to look at devolving powers to provinces, municipalities and communities wherever possible and get away from the notion that only Ottawa has the brains and the ability to run the country.

Mrs. Jean Payne (St. John's West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as vice–chairperson of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Oceans I am pleased today to have the opportunity to take part in the debate on the oceans act.

Further, I make note that contrary to statements made earlier today by the member for Fraser Valley West this vice–chairperson is not a separatist. He neglected to mention that there were two vice–chairs of the committee, myself and the member for Gaspé.

Parliament is called upon today to formalize Canadian jurisdiction over vast new areas of ocean waters and numerous resources off our coasts. The bill before us challenges all Canadians to unite in the development of a strategy which will incorporate the harnessing of the oceans' economic potential and command respect for the oceans' environmental necessities.

In the red book we stated that Canadians increasingly understand that the national environmental agenda can no longer be separated from the national economic agenda. It is long past the time for the federal government to act on this understanding by adapting economic and environmental agendas that converge. As a government we will stand behind our agenda and devote attention to this important piece of legislation.

The oceans act encompasses the fundamentals that ensure Canada's economic and environmental agendas for our oceans are a priority. It is a pivotal turning point in providing a foundation which will ensure ocean resource management is properly administered. Painfully we have come to discover that the ocean resources are finite and that human activity can and has jeopardized fragile ocean ecosystems.

Just as everything that lives exhibits interdependency, we have seen the environmental health of our oceans connected to the economic health of our country. As children we were told not to kill the goose that lays the golden egg. As teenagers we learned the basic laws of physics which state that for every action there is an equal and opposite reaction. These laws and proverbs are represented in the oceans act. It is based on implementing a few simple lessons. If we destroy the oceans they will not provide us with the sustenance we enjoy on a daily basis. If we abuse them we will pay a grave price.

The oceans act provides direction for the Canadian jurisdiction of over nearly five million square kilometres of ocean. Through the act we create a 200 nautical mile exclusive economic zone for Canada in the Atlantic, Pacific and Arctic oceans. We will have the right to explore and exploit resources within the 200–mile exclusive economic zone and at the same time be given the right and responsibility to conserve and protect the same resources.

It is our duty as Canadians to preserve and to protect the marine environment not only for ourselves but for generations to come. We cannot continue to shortchange generations of the future. That is why the bill before Parliament today goes beyond the simplistics of one statement of jurisdiction. The bill is a cornerstone, a building block and a framework for a new ocean management strategy which consolidates and clarifies federal responsibilities for implementation of the new strategy.

The key to the future is sustainable development of Canada's oceans and an integrated approach to management of ocean resources. Only through this approach will Canadians be able to make our economic and environmental agenda complete.

It has been 12 years since the United Nations General Assembly established the World Commission on Environment and Development, more commonly recognized as the Brundtland commission. The commission urged the world to embrace the concept of sustainable development. The Brundtland report was the cornerstone of all forthcoming legislation. It embraced the concept of sustainable development where the environment is fully incorporated into the economic decision making process as an aforethought and not as an afterthought.

• (1555)

The oceans act is based on that wisdom. The philosophy of the bill is strengthened in its foundations of sustainable development. Unfortunately a philosophy is not a plan of action.

The new bill breathes light into the principle of sustainable development by putting in place the framework necessary for a Canadian action plan for our oceans. In developing an oceans management strategy the federal government must show leadership, and the bill exemplifies leadership.

The oceans act will extend Canadian environmental legislation to include the new exclusive economic zone. The act will make the Department of Fisheries and Oceans the focal point for the co–ordination of federal oceans activities. It will authorize the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to develop marine environmental quality guidelines and establish marine protected areas.

The act will also give the minister responsibility for conducting marine research, preparing scientific reports, and operating and maintaining the necessary federal research facilities. Most important, the minister will have the authority to lead in the co–ordination of activities to promote the development of a shared Canada oceans strategy, in turn uniting all Canadians and promoting international unity.

The minister will be able to enter into new partnership agreements, to share ocean information, to share ocean research, to share ocean planning and to share ocean management. Through the basic principles of sharing we can reduce duplication and conflict. Only by working together can we adopt a comprehensive ecosystem based approach to comprehensive ecosystem problems.

This unified approach to ocean management provides the criteria necessary for the creation of a legal framework which will enable provinces and territories, businesses and environmentalists, fisher people and ocean industries to pull together and to strive toward a common goal.

We have a common goal. We all want Canada's oceans to be productive, safe and healthy for all generations. We can only achieve that goal by making Canada a world leader in oceans and marine resource management.

On Canada's coasts there are hundreds of fishing communities. My riding is made up of many such communities, one of which I was raised in.

The minister has already mentioned that when John Cabot reached the shores of Newfoundland in 1497 he found the sea: "swarming with fish which can be taken not only with a net but with baskets let down with a stone". This illustration of the former abundance of fish is now in contrast with the shortage of northern cod off Canada's east coast.

The oceans act is our management strategy to ensure that the devastation which has occurred on the coasts off Newfoundland never happens again. Many fish stocks on the coast of Newfoundland were severely depleted prior to Canada's declaration of a 200–mile fishing zone in 1977. Although some Atlantic codfish stocks have begun to recover somewhat since that time, many stocks continue to be subject to high fishing pressure, particularly the stocks that straddle the 200–mile limit where foreign fleets have ignored internationally negotiated catch limits.

Our fishers on the Atlantic coast and throughout Canada have suffered. They have lost their livelihood, their pride and their sustenance. It is not too late to provide legislation countenance. We must amend the marine conservation policies in the country and prevent future tragedies from occurring. The oceans act will do just that.

Canada's fisheries will continue to face a variety of pressures imposed by an increasing world population. This will produce more wastes which will impair the natural productivity of oceans and inland waters. Managing the fisheries in the face of these pressures will require co–operation on national and international levels.

The oceans act will ensure that proper management of the ocean resources both living and non–living will be sustained. Each one of these communities houses a wealth of accumulated knowledge about currents, salinity, water depth, temperatures, tides and navigational routes. We must link this knowledge to a shared ocean management strategy. We must understand how each of these regions is unique and independent.

The bill before us today confirms the merger of the Canadian Coast Guard and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. It ensures boating safety is placed in the highest priority.

• (1600)

The legislation makes it possible to form new domestic agreements to increase prosperity in trade and commerce. Through basic principles of sustainable development, the transfer of technology from government and academic researchers to the private sector will be facilitated. Together we must work to improve resource assessment and inspection. Harmonized regulations will guarantee services provided by different levels of government effectively meet the needs of our sea coast communities and ports.

The oceans act makes it possible for Canadians to work together to shape the best national answers and the best local answers for ocean sustainable development. Better understanding of oceans, better resource management, better environmental management, increased safety and increased trade and commerce are all components of an integrated ocean strategy.

By providing the legislative tools to enable Canadians to get our act together on these issues the oceans act will help to ensure Canada is a forceful and effective voice on global ocean issues. By demonstrating our own responsible attitude to ocean sustainable development we will be in a strong position to push forward for greater global responsibility. In effect, Canadians must seek the same force for good on all ocean issues that we have for our fisheries conservation.

The Brundtland commission called its report "Our Common Future". That is what this bill is about and that is what we are really debating. Canada has a special responsibility as a country which borders the Arctic, the Pacific and the Atlantic oceans. Our common future depends on whether we use those oceans wisely, whether we actively seek to promote sustainable development and whether we actively seek to pursue both our environmental responsibilities and our economic opportunities.

I am happy and proud to support the bill and urge all members to join me in allowing this legislation to move forward quickly for study by the standing committee. The oceans act charts a wise course for the future of ocean policy. It is a course which would bind our country with a common future, a course we must all sail together.

Mr. Allan Kerpan (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, for two years now the Liberal government has presented legislation it says will make government more streamlined, more responsive and more responsible to Canadians. Its comments have been merely smoke and mirrors. I am sad to say Bill C–98, an act respecting the oceans of Canada, is another example of the government's saying one thing and doing another.

The government told Canadians its changes to the Young Offenders Act would raise ultra–violent youth to adult court and that this action would give 16 and 17–year old cold blooded murderers sentences equal to their heinous crimes. The government's statements were not equal to the realities of the bill.

The government has made numerous statements that Bill C–98 will end duplication, bring control of Canada's traditional fishing grounds on the open sea into Parliament and ensure the success of fisheries. Again we have statements which do not match the realities of the legislation.

How can the fisheries be successful when the government intends to tax them to death? The government tells Canadians we on this side of the House do not understand the problems of the east coast. We understand all problems facing Canadians better than the government.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans bored himself a place at the trough by accepting his gold plated, self–imposed pension. Now the minister wants to pay for his pension on the backs of the fisheries, an area where it is impossible for those Canadians to bear the brunt of an already unbearable tax burden.

The Liberal government claims the bill will end duplication and provide efficient operation through the oceans management strategy. Again we have a catch phrase for media consumption which has no bearing on the realities of the bill.

Bill C–98 suggests all government bodies co–ordinate their activities relating to the oceans surrounding Canada. Nowhere in the bill does it state that all government bodies dealing with oceans must co–ordinate their functions. There are no penalties, consequences or even government scrutiny for any departments which refuse to end duplication.

• (1605)

In effect, the bill will create even more bureaucracy. How does the government intend to pay for this new bureaucratic nightmare? The government will raise licensing fees for fishermen. That is the tax I have been talking about. Not only that, it will increase the fees to such an extent that family oriented fishing boats or small fishing groups will be put out of business.

It is either absolute and utter ignorance of the reality on the east coast that the minister does not understand or it is total disregard for the east coast fishery, large and small.

To the minister it seems as long as his pockets are full and his future is assured he does not care about those he is supposed to be helping. The government gives itself all the power to set fees through orders in council.

Parliament is bypassed once more as the body that decides issues for Canadians. This proposed new tax will punish those who have finally achieved a harvest worthy of their effects.

Just as a previous Liberal government crippled the western Canadian economy by placing punitive taxes in place for the oil industry, this government now intends to place punitive taxes on fishermen who do not manage to get a decent catch.

If fishermen obtain a catch large enough to cover their bills, large enough to give them a decent living once again from the ocean, those members opposite intend to raise their fees to the point at which fishermen will be simply taxed out of business.

The east coast fishery has had enough hard luck and has had enough businesses driven to extinction through failed government management of the fisheries without having government finally drive the last nail in the coffin by higher and higher taxes. Of some of these smaller and medium fishermen the government will demand tax increases as high as 400 per cent over current levels.

We from the west understand the social disintegration and punitive taxation imposed by an uncaring federal government and what that can create. We from the west know how punitive taxation can cause breakdowns of marriages, losses of homes and an increase in alcoholism, suicide, bankruptcies and affect many other social programs. If the bill is passed the east coast will experience the same.

U–Hauls behind cars driven by grim faced drivers will proceed like caravans down east coast highways as those forced from their homes seek employment in other areas of the country.

As Canadians trying desperately to keep their families and homes together on the east coast know, times are hard enough without the government making it worse.

I oppose the bill not because of what the government says it does but because it does not do what it says it will. The bill will give cabinet dictatorial powers and remove the elected representatives chosen by the people of Canada from that decision making process. The bill will continue a policy adopted by the Prime Minister that elected representatives must not be responsible for their constituents.

The Prime Minister stated that members of his party who support their constituents and not decrees from the top will not get their nomination papers signed or will be punished in other ways.

We have already seen these threats in practice when some members who followed constituent wishes were removed from their committee posts. The bill will give the cabinet even more power to punish the east coast representatives of its party who vote the wishes of their constituents and not the wishes of the ministers' inner circle.

The bill will not consolidate the operations of various government departments related to the fisheries or oceans but instead will allow another level of bureaucracy to be formed.

It is very clear the government has no desire to reduce the taxation load on all Canadians by bringing in efficiencies in any department. The minister is probably the worst offender.

Canadians are tired of larger and larger government taking more and more money from their pockets. The justice minister recently appointed 11 supporters, failed candidates and fundraisers to taxpayer funded posts within his department.

Liberals love larger bureaucracy because that gives them places to appoint people at taxpayers' expense, while this bill will create another bureaucracy for the government to fill patronage appointment positions.

We agree fisheries and oceans should have jurisdiction over the coast guard and marine science but only if it will save money by ending duplication. The bill simply will not do that.

• (1610)

We agree that small and medium size fisheries are the lifeblood of many east coast families. The bill will create punitive taxation that will destroy their very livelihood which the government states it will defend.

Under those circumstances the members opposite elected to represent constituents dependant on the fishery to survive absolutely must vote no. All decisions on future actions, be they fee increases or regulation, will be enacted by special interest participation with cabinet and not Parliament.

Special interests will dominate environment discussions relating to fisheries or oceans and paralyse realistic growth or use of fishery or development of ocean related industry. Just as they have with issues relating to realistic and safe development within Canada's borders, special interests will again have the ear of the minister.

Here is an example of how special interests have held up needed expansion in the country. I am thinking of the TransCanada highway through Banff that had been planned and put off for years even though study after study said the twinning of the highway could be done with more than adequate concern for large animals ranging throughout Banff. Thankfully this type of process has come to an end and that twinning will commence. However, many serious injuries and possibly needless deaths of motorists have occurred because government would not listen to the voice of reason and preferred to hear the voices of special interest groups.

Even a study by Parks Canada officials said the improvements could be done on this stretch of road without harm to the environment. However, it was not until the government lost two frivolous court cases that were only instituted to appeal the special interests having the government's ear did the harassment stop.

How long will needed projects, realistic economic development and opportunities to enhance the lives of those living near the oceans be delayed? The bill would impose a duty on the minister to collaborate with all interested persons.

I cannot support the bill. With all honesty I do not see how any member whose constituents depend on the ocean for their livelihood can support the bill. I am certain those members opposite will be told they must vote according to the decree of the few and not according to the wishes of many. That is the saddest point of all.

Mr. Harbance Singh Dhaliwal (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his speech. I listened very closely.

His speech is very similar to the speech made by the member for Skeena. I do not want to repeat some of the remarks I have already made. I once again remind him he should read the budget. He has put forward concerns about the licensing fees which were budget items in February 1995. For every $5 in cuts there is only $1 in cost recovery. This is part of the cost recovery. The hon. member should also keep in mind there was public consultation right across the province.

More to the point, hon. members often mention special interest groups. When special interest groups represent the ideology of these people they work hand in hand. They are holding hands with special interest groups. Look at the gun lobby. They are joining hands with the gun lobby so they should not tell us about special interest groups. When they represent their view, they are happy to work with them.

The licence fee was $30. For those who use the resource, it does not matter if they have a landing value $12,000 or a landing value of $1 million. The fee was an insignificant amount of $30. Now those people who take the most from the resource will pay a higher amount. It is a public resource. They have a beneficial access to that resource that not everybody has only because they have to pay that licensing fee. Should we charge the same amount?

Should we not charge those people who take more out of the resource? The figure of 400 per cent was used. Some fisherpersons make $1 million in a six to eight-week fishing season. Their fee is only going to be 1.6 per cent of their landed value. Do you think that is a huge burden on those people? Obviously, this amount is going to be rated depending on how much the landing value is. If there is a higher landing value then more will be paid. I do not think 1.6 per cent is very much. I am wondering if the member thinks that is too high.

Mr. Kerpan: Madam Speaker, this government always amazes me. I remember very well right after the 1993 election one of the highlights mentioned throughout the media was that this government would be more open to consulting people involved in any industry when it was building policy.

There is case after case. For example when agriculture policy is made no farmers are consulted. When justice policy is made no policemen are consulted. The Minister of Justice talks well and long about how he consulted with the chiefs of police. That is a very small group. I am wondering why this government which talked a good game at the beginning of 1994 has suddenly gone back on those initial words.

I see the very same thing in this department. The parliamentary secretary talks about consulting the people. I have just come back from a trip to St. John's, Newfoundland. I had the opportunity to speak to some fisher people, as the politically correct term would be. I asked them exactly those questions. I found during my visit that the two biggest concerns the fish industry has are that there is far too much government, far too much bureaucracy, far too much red tape and that the ordinary common every day fisherperson is not consulted on policy making.

Mr. Dhaliwal: Madam Speaker, the hon. member talks about not consulting. In fact, if we look at every one of our policies whether it is human resources or the gun control bill, there has been more consultation done by this government than by any other government. There has been more consultation done by this government on this issue itself.

First, the government consulted the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology. Should we ignore its advice? Should we say it does not know what it is talking about? Then the members across would say we are not listening to these advisory boards. They are the ones who started it.

The minister continued with a vision for oceans management. In November 1994, 600 people and 200 responses were received. Consultation was done. In April 1995 the coastal provinces, the Northwest Territories and Ottawa were consulted. There were meetings in November and December 1994. The list goes on. The people consulted were academics, scientists and others in the fishery, people in the oceans industry, environmentalists, First Nations people and people involved in community development. How much more consultation do Reformers want?

We have heard one of the Reform members say many times that we were consulting too much. He has told the Minister of Justice to stop consulting and get to it. Members of the Reform Party should make up their minds.

One thing is for sure: this government takes its responsibilities seriously. We do the consulting and then we make the decisions. The problem is that Reform members do not always like the decisions and then they complain and say we did not consult. There has been ample consultation on this bill. The Reform Party member who is a member of the standing committee will have an opportunity to work further and put forward recommendations as they come before the committee before this bill goes to third reading.

Mr. Kerpan: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the remarks of the member opposite. The question I would have for him if I were allowed to give one would be: What about the issue of MPs pensions? Were the people consulted on that?

• (1620)

When I look at things such as this bill we are talking about today and the gun registration bill which was mentioned earlier today, I would ask the member opposite if he really, truly and sincerely believes that full consultation went on throughout all departments with this government. Perhaps he should go out on the street—I would be happy to accompany him—and ask the people if they have been consulted on Bill C–98, on Bill C–68 and on Bill C–85. I rest my case.

Mr. Derek Wells (South Shore, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I will begin by commenting on some of the statements made earlier by the opposition parties, particularly the third party.

We on this side of the House are concerned with the issue of access fees and the future of the inshore fishery. We are concerned with coastal communities and the effect that changes in the fishery will have on our coastal communities.

My province is the largest fishing province in the country in terms of landed value in tonnes. My riding of South Shore is the largest individual fishing riding in Canada. Therefore, we are concerned about these issues and I am particularly concerned.

The third party talks about the concerns of Atlantic fishermen and fisherwomen. This is the same party whose policy it is to relocate Atlantic Canadians out of the area. This is the party that would cancel the TAGS program which so many Atlantic fishers rely on. This is the party whose leader told Atlantic Canadians, particularly Atlantic fishers, last weekend to take 15 seconds and tell themselves the fisheries are dead. This is the party that purports to speak for Atlantic fishermen. Reform members go to Atlantic Canada for a weekend and become instant experts.

I want to tell members opposite that I have been meeting with these fishers all my life. I have lived in coastal communities in different parts of Atlantic Canada all my life.

I also ask the members opposite to read the bill because what they are speaking of is not what this bill is about. This bill is not about access fees. This bill is not needed to increase, if that is the government's wish, access fees. Some of the information being circulated is incorrect because those decisions have not been completely made. They are issues to be debated at another time.

I invite members opposite to come to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Oceans when it takes this bill after second reading and begins reviewing it. At that point, after they get an understanding of what the legislation is about, then they can raise some of these issues.

I am pleased to take the opportunity to express my support for Bill C–98, the oceans act. This legislation takes an important first step toward the creation of a comprehensive, integrated oceans management strategy based on the principles of sustainable development. It provides the legal framework by which the various players in the ocean sector will be able to work together under the leadership of the federal government to protect the marine environment.

For the first time the bill gives statutory recognition to the tremendous importance of Canada's ocean territories. For this reason the oceans act is pioneering legislation. It is a bold step toward a new era in oceans management. It turns good intentions into concrete deeds and actions. It places Canada at the forefront of nations striving to implement the commitments of agenda 21 made at the United Nations Conference on the Environment and Development in 1992.

Canada's ocean regions are vast. The richness and variety of the resources almost defy the imagination. Imagine them and comprehend them we must. The future of many of our coastal communities and indeed of humanity itself depends on all of us building a deeper understanding of the incredible magnitude and fragility of this great ecosystem. It is for this reason that I want to take the time today to remind my colleagues of just how important the oceans are to the lives of Canadians and why the passage of the oceans act will be of such benefit to all.

I said that Canada's ocean territories are vast. This hardly does justice to the facts. Canada's coastline stretches from the Pacific through the icy waters of the Arctic to the Atlantic Ocean. At almost 250,000 kilometres it is the longest coastline in the world. This is just the beginning. Our continental shelf spans more than 6.5 million square kilometres making it the second largest in the world.

Together these great bodies of water have been pivotal to our country's evolution. Rich in biodiversity, the oceans have helped forge our sense of identity and have provided the means for transport, trading, communications and sustenance for many generations.

On our east coast especially, an entire culture has been built around shipping and the fishery. For 400 years or more the daily rhythms of communities up and down this rugged coast have centred on the ways of the sea. Nowhere is this more obvious than in my riding of South Shore where communities such as Shelburne, Lunenburg, Clark's Harbour and many others line the coast.

Today Canada's ocean industries no longer dominate our economic profile like they once did. However their importance to our national accounts and to the economies of our coastal areas should not be underestimated. Together the ocean sectors of fishing, shipping, oil and ocean manufacturing and services account for almost 3 per cent of Canada's gross national product.

Last year despite troubles in the groundfish industry, Canadian seafood exports totalled $2.8 billion. Of this total, more than half came from Atlantic Canada with the crab, shrimp and lobster fisheries putting in an outstanding performance. Canada's aquaculture industry continues to grow despite stiff international competition. This is happening on both the east and west coasts.

Canada's oceans manufacturing and service sector is also growing, now comprising more than 300 high technology firms. This sector generates millions of dollars in revenue each year.

In addition Atlantic offshore oil and gas have finally come on stream. The Cohasset field off Nova Scotia began production in 1992. The giant Hibernia development off the east coast of Newfoundland is promising to employ some 20,000 workers once it begins production in 1997.

With growth like this it is easy to see why the oceans sector plays such an important role in the economies of our coastal regions. Together these industries have the potential to generate considerable wealth and prosperity.

The oceans also have a more indirect impact on the lives of Canadians. The world's oceans are a key part of the ecosphere, acting as a major environmental sink of carbon dioxide. In particular the world's oceans play a critical role in determining the rate of climate change and its regional variations. Globally this has many implications as it does here at home.

Scientists working with global climate models forecast that with global warming the oceans will change. According to these predictions there will be less upswelling which in turn will affect productivity. Already we have seen some evidence of this with the frequent reoccurrence of the El Nino effect in the Pacific in recent years. In fact some scientists believe that the El Nino may be a common factor contributing to changes in the fish population in both the Atlantic and the Pacific.

What does all this mean for Canadians? Disruption in the fishery? Drought on the prairies? Melting sea and land ice in the Arctic? We do not really know. Our understanding of both the ocean and the earth's atmosphere is not yet well enough developed. We can only assume that widespread climate change is likely to have a dramatic impact on ocean ecosystems around the world as well as to alter the entire range of human activity.

Clearly the oceans are of tremendous importance to Canada as a nation. They impact on our environment, our economy, our social structures and culture as well as on our sovereignty and defence. Even from this very brief sketch it is obvious that managing our oceans and their resources is a complex and challenging task. At no time has this been more true than at the moment. Each region and each activity within the ocean sector presents its own pressing challenges to policymakers at all levels of government and industry.

Let me give a few examples. On the east coast several issues stand out. First, there is an urgent need for scientists and fishermen to work side by side to improve methods of resource assessment and to achieve a better understanding of the dynamics which caused the collapse of the groundfish stocks.

Second, industry and government must continue to work together to revitalize the fishing industry.

Third, we must continue to build on the potential of the ocean manufacturing and service sector to act as a catalyst for the innovative diversified economy in the region.

In the Arctic, as in other parts of Canada, environmental issues take priority. Northern communities are deeply concerned with issues of climate change and the contamination of Arctic waters and resources. These are the issues the bill speaks to.

On the west coast international relations, climate studies and resource assessment are key. Strong measures are needed to assure the future of the Pacific salmon fishery. What is more, with the region's increasing population density, environmental issues are of growing importance. Issues related to the coastal zone management, marine environmental quality, ship standards and pollution prevention demand attention. That is what the bill is about.

These are not isolated issues. Rather they are interlocking pieces of one large puzzle. It is time to respond to them in a coherent and integrated fashion. That is what the legislation does.

The oceans act sets the stage for the development of a long range comprehensive vision for the management of Canada's ocean territories and marine resources. Our approach has two phases.

First is the introduction of enabling legislation. This is the oceans act that we are now considering. With the oceans act we are extending economic and environmental jurisdiction out to the 200 nautical mile limit permitted by the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea. We are consolidating legislation and clarifying the federal government's responsibilities for oceans. We are creating the legal framework for an oceans management strategy based on both the sustainable development and integrated management of our oceans and coastal waters. Contrary to what a Bloc member stated earlier, there is zero impact on powers between the federal and provincial governments.

The second phase is the development of the ocean management strategy. The oceans management strategy is currently at the developmental stage. We are consulting extensively with stakeholders about what should go into the strategy and we will continue to do so. So far our proposals have received strong support from almost everyone involved: fishermen, aboriginal groups, businesses, provincial and territorial leaders, academics and non–governmental organizations. Everyone sees the necessity for a new approach to decision making.

Canada can no longer afford to manage its oceans with partial ad hoc, short term measures. We can no longer afford to divide our decision making like so many pieces of the pie, with decisions on resource management made in isolation from decisions about shipping or environmental protection. We can no longer afford to have our experts, whether they be in government labs, universities, industries or on fishing boats, working in isolation of each other. It is time to bring all the elements together so that we can make the best decisions possible.

We must start to look at oceans issues through a wide angle lens so we can make choices based on the best interests of the entire ecosystem. Sustainable development is all about integrating economic, environmental and social considerations together into one policy framework.

What do we need to make it work? To start with, we need decision making that is open, transparent and based on sound science. We need a commitment to change from all parties involved and we need a new relationship among ocean stakeholders. I will elaborate.

First, we need a more open and more integrated approach to policy making. The oceans management strategy would see our approach to marine resource management change. Traditionally the federal government has carried out its responsibilities for oceans management on the basis of narrow sectoral approaches, in consultation with stakeholders but not in partnership with them. We recognize this must change, so we have begun a new relationship with other ocean stakeholders.

Second, ecological sustainability and economic viability depend on good science. To support these goals science needs to be multi–disciplinary, not limited by organizational structure, and responsive to changing needs and priorities. The oceans management strategy will foster partnerships involving government, academia, the private sector and environmental groups, ensuring that Canada's oceans science is once again at the leading edge of world knowledge.

Third, effective management requires a functioning ecosystems approach. Because ecosystems involve many interdependent physical and biological elements which cross lines of jurisdiction, scientific discipline and economic interest, an effectively functioning management system will have to take these factors into account.

These suggestions give an idea of the scope of the oceans management strategy. They also indicate how fundamentally an integrated management strategy would change oceans management in Canada.

Work on the oceans management strategy is just beginning. All the details have yet to be worked out. However I can assure all members that as the action plan for the oceans management strategy is put in place it will be developed in full collaboration among the federal government and ocean stakeholders. The government is committed to forging a new relationship with our partners in the ocean sector.

Stewardship of our ocean and coastal resources is a shared responsibility. Unless all those with an interest in the oceans agree to collaborate, to share information and to manage these resources in a careful and conservative manner, we will do irreparable harm to the environment. Canadians must work together if we are to protect the integrity and quality of the oceans environment and its resources for future generations.

The world's oceans have been described as the world's great heart, beating eternally. Canadians with their long relationship with the sea recognize this to be true. They understand also that it is time to make a commitment to their oceans. The oceans act is that commitment. It is the beginning of a new era of environmental stewardship and prosperity.

I look forward to reviewing the bill in committee. I invite other members to join with us in committee when we review the bill. Let us look at possible amendments that might improve the bill and bring it back for third reading. At that point it is my hope that we will have all–party consent. Once a thorough understanding is achieved by all members of what the bill is meant to do, we will have all–party consent, and I look forward to that time.

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Madam Speaker, by tabling Bill C–98, the oceans act, the government has taken a step toward the recognition of offshore areas of the sea and protection of the resources in those areas. I feel this is a very good initiative.

As I see it the bill has three objectives: to recognize in domestic law Canada's jurisdiction over its maritime zones, to establish the legislation framework to support Canada's new oceans management regime, and to consolidate federal responsibilities for managing Canada's oceans. However there appears to be a great deal of overlap and duplication.

Can the government member explain to me where the duplication overlap is being eliminated in the bill? What measures in the bill reduce the level of bureaucracy? Why are the departments of environment and natural resources still in charge of oceans environmental and geological research? Why does the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans still have to receive authority from the foreign affairs minister for regulations under clause

25? Why does the minister have to seek authority from the Minister of Justice to make regulations under section 26(1)?

I feel very strongly that having 14 different ministers overseeing this matter makes it difficult. We should have one department and one minister, that is the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Could the hon. member tell us exactly how we could make these changes and eliminate all the duplication?

Mr. Wells: Madam Speaker, I thank the member for her question. I would note that the member for Saint John who asked the question is an associate member of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Oceans. These are issues that have been raised at the committee level, and they are good questions.

Concerns have been expressed by various members—she being one and others on this side of the House—that perhaps there should be more power consolidated in the hands of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

When I invite the member—I know she will be there—and other members to talk about the consolidation of power, we will have to look at the various areas about which she speaks including the environmental area. We will have to see if some of the areas should perhaps be moved to the minister of fisheries. We can find out the rationale from the officials. Why is certain power still being left with the minister of heritage as far as marine parks, for example, are concerned? Why is the Ministry of the Environment retaining certain authority in certain areas? They are very valid questions.

As we get into a study of the matter at committee level we will ask those questions of various officials. It is my hope that at the end of the day there could perhaps be more consolidation of some of these powers. The committee process has to work. We have to seek answers and reasons from the various departments on why some of the consolidation has not taken place.

Without prejudging the process I personally feel that the minister of fisheries who is given certain authority under the bill should have more. The hon. member should agree that as a committee we need to look at that as a possibility.

I thank her for her question. I look forward to working with her in committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvan Bernier (Gaspé, BQ): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to put a question to the hon. member, who also sits on the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Oceans.

Allow me to disagree with the hon. member. Since I believe he is a lawyer by training, he is used to reading laws. I also know that he was rather nit–picking on that issue during the last few meetings of our committee. As regards Part II of Bill C–98, why do we have to put in law a plan that will be developed for management purposes?

I would appreciate it if the member, who seems to have a lot of experience in that field, would tell us why we must pass an act merely to introduce or announce a strategy. That could have been done in a press release. The issue would have been well presented. People would have understood. Instead, the government is sending invitations all over the place. It wants to consult just about everybody.

I also ask the member to recognize the fact that there is no hierarchy in terms of the consultation process. Indeed, the provinces are put on the same footing as any other group when it comes to consultations. We, in Quebec, do not think that this is the way to manage. How does the member, who is from Nova Scotia, think that this strategy should be managed in his province, which borders the ocean? Will the provincial minister want to have a say, at some point in time, regarding this process? This is the sort of thing we have to look at.

Right now, the government is merely presenting a strategy and saying that it is willing to consult everyone. I would appreciate it if the member could tell us which new real powers are included in this bill.

• (1645)

[English]

Mr. Wells: I think it is fair to say that the hon. member and I see the legislation differently. As he made clear in his previous presentation to the House, he sees this as taking away authority from the provinces and giving it to the federal government. That is simply not the case. I have seen nothing and he has pointed out nothing in this legislation which would indicate this is what is happening.

This is a consolidation. It is not something that just happened over the last number of weeks or months. This discussion has been going on for years. As the minister indicated this morning, there has been an evolution here. We are going back to the 1970s or maybe before that when various powers and various consolidations were being discussed. A lot of things have happened internationally that we have to establish in our own legislation. There is a recognition in the act of the merger of the coast guard and DFO which is relatively new.

To suggest there is something in this legislation that is affecting the powers of the provinces could not be further from the truth. This legislation does not state that. The hon. member has not been able to point out to me either here in the House or during any discussion that this is what the legislation does. That is clearly not what is in the legislation and it is not the intent of the legislation. I would suggest his motive is something other than trying to create a good piece of oceans legislation.

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. member's intervention.

The member talked about the TAGS program and how wonderful it was for Atlantic Canada. When Reform Party members were there talking to people in the constituencies in Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick we did not hear people giving large accolades for the TAGS program. As a matter of fact, what we heard was talk about corruption and talk about the way the TAGS program had distorted the marketplace, particularly the job market. No one I encountered had anything good to say about it.

The member is defending the government's move on licence fees. I wonder if he would tell the House whether he is going to poll his constituents because the story we heard in Atlantic Canada is that Atlantic Canadians are opposed to this. Will he poll his constituents and if they are found to be in opposition to Bill C–98 will he vote against the bill when it comes up for third reading in the House?

Mr. Wells: Madam Speaker, my only comment is that I would suggest the member shows a total lack of understanding of Bill C–98. Bill C–98 does not deal with access fees. He should read it and determine what it states. Talking about fishermen, I convene my own round tables in my riding to speak to fishermen's organizations on a regular basis. I know what the fishermen's position is on access fees. This bill is not about access fees.

I invite the member to read and understand the legislation before he asks questions that are totally irrelevant because that is not the issue. The question of access fees is certainly relevant but not as part of this legislation. There is going to be a new fisheries act and other things that we are going to discuss on this issue. It is a very real, important and serious issue which I have dealt with not just as of last weekend, like the hon. member, but is one I have been dealing with for years.

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Madam Speaker, for Canadians watching this debate I would like to preface my remarks by saying that what we are debating is Bill C–98, an act respecting the oceans of Canada.

The bill essentially deals with two issues relating to oceans. First, it deals with part of the oceans we designate as the oceans of Canada. Second, it deals with something called an oceans management strategy. I would like to direct my remarks on the oceans management strategy and some of the aspects that are of concern particularly to fishermen.

I listened with great interest to my hon. colleague opposite who just spoke. It was very interesting to hear the poetry and the talk about ocean ecology and all those good things. I would like to be more practical in this debate and talk about how we make sure that we have fish resources to harvest.

Other speakers have mentioned the enormous value to the Canadian economy of fisheries both on the east and west coasts and our inland fisheries. This is not a resource to toy with. It is not a part of our Canadian workforce that should be treated lightly because this has really a lot of impact for a great many Canadians.

I would suggest that there has been a bit of a misnomer about our oceans management strategy to date; it has been more oceans mismanagement. We see an oceans resource in complete disaster. So far there has been an unprecedented groundfish crisis on the east coast and we are minutes from disaster on the west coast particularly in the Fraser River fisheries.

We also have a population dependent on a resource that can no longer sustain a very large number of Canadian workers. There is a real pressure of numbers in the fisheries that is not going to go away and cannot be supported artificially forever.

We also have a minister who I suggest is not really dealing with these domestic issues. He is busy playing Captain Canada, talking about building his media image internationally. Even when his parliamentary secretary enters this debate it is to talk about the wonderful international image of the minister. That does not put food on the table of the fishermen of this country.

I think everyone would welcome a positive change in the way we are managing the fish resources and our oceans resources because we have a track record in this area that is not very inspiring to say the least. We look at the management strategy that is being put into place as a result of Bill C–98. We are looking for positive change. We are looking for changes to address some of the mismanagement of the past.

What do we see in this bill? We see two things that have not brought any relief, any hope or any positive response from the fishermen of this country. First, we have a government department that will become even more bloated but there are no precise lines of authority or management plan to help this increased government department do a better job of the mandate it has been given to manage the fisheries.

Second, the doors are being opened in this bill for increased fees on fishermen which the fishermen can hardly bear to shoulder. I quote from clause 50 of this Bill C–98 which states: "The minister may, subject to any regulations that the Treasury Board may make for the purposes of this section, fix fees in respect of products, rights and privileges provided under this act". That is the section which has a lot of fishermen quaking in their boots.

The nice name of the oceans management strategy really hides an increased bureaucracy. The stated purpose of this increased bureaucracy is to get all government bodies to co–ordinate the related activities with respect to management and harvesting of the oceans. That is a good objective. It is an objective I think everyone in Canada would support. We certainly have a lot of cases in this country—my friends from the Bloc often like to talk about this—of where the right hand does not know what the left hand is doing. There is duplication and interference between different levels of government and different government bodies. That of course leads to a great deal of inefficiency and an enormous unnecessary cost. Pruning that back, streamlining and making it more efficient, downsizing, is what needs to be done. It is of course also what is being done across the board in the private sector. Organizations are flattening, downsizing, becoming more efficient and we have been calling for a long time for government to do the same.

We fail to see how this is going to happen by adding more layers of bureaucracy and more complexity to the workings of the department. There is no process identified in this bill to ensure more effective co–ordination. It is simply stated as a nice goal. A lot of roads are paved with good intentions but we need to see some real specifics in the way we set out our legislation if we hope to accomplish the stated aims.

In fact, there are no penalties or even any other consequences to any of these bodies that are supposedly being co–ordinated for failing to work in concert. We have more bureaucrats, more activity, more process being added, but no power to initiate activities that would get the objectives met or to ensure compliance by all the bodies that are to be co–ordinated. There is no concrete planned agenda at all.

If this government is serious about the management of oceans, we believe it would give real power to the managing body. Management is only possible when there is some real authority and that is simply not happening. In fact, if government would stop thinking of ways to tinker with the system creating bloated government departments and instead get on with the job of protecting a valuable resource, everyone would be a lot better off.

The Department of Fisheries and Oceans is already a top heavy organization. Fishermen on both coasts will tell of their frustration in dealing with a department based in Ottawa which does not understand what their needs really are. Passing this bill would not send a positive message to these people who are already very frustrated.

It is now abundantly clear that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is not committed to downsizing his bloated department. He would rather try to slip a new level of bureaucracy into his department under the guise of broad consultation rather than deal with the harsh realities of downsizing.

Canadians want less government and that is a message which must be sent over and over. Government members must get that message: Canadians want less government. They are tired of supporting and wrestling with and trying to deal with a huge and inefficient bureaucracy when they are trying to make a living and trying to live their lives and build their futures.

In Canada there are over 6,000 fisheries officials and they manage 65,000 licences. We have 6,000 officials and 65,000 licences. The department operates with a budget that exceeds three–quarters of a billion dollars and that is just for administrative costs. Clearly, there is room here for a little cost cutting to be taken at the top of this department, a department with over 6,000 officials and a budget of three–quarters of a billion dollars.

Madam Speaker, I am sure everyone will be waiting with bated breath to hear the end of this story after the vote.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I advise the hon. member that private members' hour is after the vote and that the next time the bill comes before the House she will have 10 minutes remaining.

MANGANESE BASED FUEL ADDITIVES ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–94, an act to regulate interprovincial trade in and the importation for commercial purposes of certain manganese based substances, be read the second time and referred to a committee; and of the amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): It being five o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a) the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the amendment of the hon. member for Kootenay West—Revelstoke at second reading stage of Bill C–94, an act to regulate interprovincial trade in and the importation for commercial purposes of certain manganese based substances.

Call in the members.

(The House divided on the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:)

ENERGY REGULATIONS

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should move to streamline administrative and regulatory processes in the energy sector with the objective to minimize unnecessary regulatory burden.

He said: Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise to speak in favour of Motion No. 434 which states:

That, in the opinion of the House, the government should move to streamline administrative and regulatory processes in the energy sector with the objective to minimize unnecessary regulatory burden.

For an entrepreneur in the energy industry, negotiating the maze of government regulations is almost as great a challenge as overcoming the technical and physical problems of a program. Satisfying the demands of a multiplicity of regulatory boards and agencies, often at three levels of government, is like walking on fly paper; no sooner is one bureaucratic condition satisfied than the applicant's feet become glued to another sticky spot.

This is not unique to the energy sector. All phases of Canadian activity are mired in regulations and each successive government seems determined to pass more laws and make more rules. The old adage that the best government is the one that governs least has been all but forgotten. We are well on our way to terminal social and economic constipation.

The passion for filling out forms requiring the approval of platoons of bureaucrats is not new. This destructive waste of time and resources contributed mightily to the downfall of the Hapsburg, Ottoman and Soviet empires and was the leading cause of the collapse of the Manchu dynasty in which generations of China's brightest and best wasted away in an atmosphere of useless paper shuffling; thus the French word chinoiserie.

The curious aspect of energy sector over regulation is that almost everyone, including senior politicians, recognizes the problem. In April 1993 the Conservative government commissioned a review of federal regulations to "identify those that significantly reduce the competitiveness of Canadian industry" or impose needless costs on the consumers.

A report was released in October 1993 just in time for the election and some of the panel's recommendations have actually been acted on. Several sets of redundant regulations have been or are in the process of being revoked. These, however, were purely Natural Resources Canada regulations. It does not address the problem of the overlap of federal and provincial regulations, and regulatory conflict between various government departments is a much more serious matter.

Only the federal Minister of the Environment seems to be oblivious to the problem; witness her unseemly remarks and confrontational attitude during question period earlier this afternoon. This overlap, believe it or not, is most pervasive in her bailiwick in situations in which environmental protection is at stake. There is also overlap in matters affecting worker health and safety and the transportation of dangerous goods.

The multi–tiered environmental permit problem has been recognized by the Minister of Natural Resources. She has stated in an open letter to the Northern Miner that the government is committed to addressing this issue: "The goal is a single window approach".

Those words are music to every Canadian petroleum and natural gas producer and marketer and also to people in the mining, forestry, agricultural and transportation industries.

The Liberals, through their minister, have expressed a policy. Now I would truly like to see them act on it. Then we could stand back and watch the revitalization of our resource based industries.

For a classic example of regulatory overkill, I suggest we look at the Atomic Energy Control Board. Actually, I would rather not look at it since it is one of the few federal entities that continue to grow like a giant fungus in spite that its workload has been decreasing for a decade. Be that as it may, it is the major player in the regulation of the nuclear industry, all the way from mining to waste disposal.

• (1735)

Unfortunately the AECB is overlapped both provincially and federally. At the extractive level the provincial mining departments make regulations. The provincial environment departments make regulations. The federal environment department makes regulations and throughout the entire nuclear cycle various provincial occupational health and safety divisions make regulations.

When all other hurdles have been cleared there are still municipal zoning laws to contend with. I am aware of one instance in which a proposed uranium refinery facility in Saskatchewan was killed by the local government not on technical grounds but for purely political reasons.

Then we have review panels. They have no authority, no legal standing but they can delay projects for months simply by being in session.

In 1993 a joint federal–provincial environment assessment review board spent several months studying proposals for three uranium mining developments in Saskatchewan. It made three recommendations and the Saskatchewan government cheerfully ignored one of them with the blessing of the federal government. Why did it spend all that time doing the studies? Who knows.

It is time for the various provincial and federal departments to sit down together and develop a single window permitting system for uranium mines. Developers are entitled to know before the first shovel full of dirt is dug if in terms of economic benefits versus the social and environmental costs it makes sense to proceed with a project.

The second major national player in the regulation of the energy industry is the National Energy Board which controls all interprovincial movement of oil, gas and electricity. It also controls international trade in those commodities. Conflict exists to the extent that provincial interests are often contrary to what the National Energy Board considers to be the national interest. Who can ever forget the national energy program?

On the other hand, there is a good example of federal provincial co–operation in the offshore boards which regulate what goes on under the sea. These boards could serve as a pattern and a model for eliminating the problems caused by competing federal and provincial environmental agencies.

To get back to the environmental agencies, they are not energy regulators per se but they have a tremendous impact on the industry. There are instances of projects being environmentally approved at the provincial level only to have further studies and interminable delays demanded by a federal department. I am sure other hon. members will have something to say about that.

The energy industry needs relief, not so much from taxes as from the ocean of paper it is required to swim through. An industry that accounts for 7 per cent of our gross domestic product and which directly or indirectly provides employment for 620,000 people is entitled to reasonable consideration and rational treatment.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I rise to address the motion put forward by the hon. member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia.

My colleague has informed the House about steps the government is taking to reduce regulatory overlap and duplication in the Canadian nuclear sector.

I would like to take this opportunity to give the House an overview of the initiative undertaken by the government in other sectors of the energy industry in order to meet these objectives.

[English]

Before I do, however, I remind hon. members that the very basis for these efforts is the government's commitment to a market oriented energy policy. We believe the energy industry must have the flexibility to adapt to changing market circumstances if it is to continue to contribute to Canada's economic prosperity. That means keeping government intervention in the marketplace to a minimum.

Nevertheless, there is a need for regulation in the energy industry just as there is a need for regulation in other sectors of the economy. As my colleague noted, the challenge is to achieve a regulatory framework which protects the public good but does not unnecessarily inhibit the industry. Achieving this balance requires the government to be constantly mindful of the impact of its regulatory activities on the industry.

The agency primarily responsible for regulating Canada's oil, gas and electricity sectors in the areas of federal jurisdiction is the National Energy Board, the NEB. The board was established in 1959 under the authority of the National Energy Board Act, and for the past three and half decades it has done an excellent job in meeting the needs of both government and industry in administering a reasonable and balanced regulatory regime.

Under the act the NEB sets tolls and tariffs for oil and gas pipelines and also approves the construction of pipelines and designated power lines under federal jurisdiction. The board also authorizes the export of oil, gas and electricity and the import of gas.

The National Energy Board is an independent quasi–judicial body which reports to Parliament through the Minister of Natural Resources. It is comprised of nine members, all of whom are appointed by governor in council.

Matters relating to tolls and tariffs, minor construction and short term import/export orders are the exclusive jurisdiction of the board. However, decisions requiring certificates of public convenience and necessity and export and import licences must be approved by the governor in council.

The NEB has proven to be an extremely effective regulatory body. In my view the board will be even better positioned to meet industry needs in the future as the result of recent initiatives it has taken to modernize, streamline and simplify its regulatory processes and requirements. These initiatives are in direct response to 13 recommendations the board received in October 1993 from the Minister of Natural Resources advisory panel on regulatory review.

I am pleased to inform the House the board has moved swiftly and effectively to address each of these recommendations. For example, the NEB has revised many of the processes and requirements for filing information with the board with the overall objective of easing the administrative burden on industry. Among other things, the board is implementing an electronic regulatory filing system for all regulatory filings. As well, it has taken industry views into account in revising its guidelines for the filing of information by companies applying for certificates of public convenience and necessity.

The board's guidelines for preparing a social economic impact assessment for pipeline projects have also been revised to reflect new legislative requirements and to avoid overlap and duplication with other statutory requirements.

The National Energy Board has also demonstrated its ability to adapt to change in the natural gas market by revising its rules on how gas can be moved on pipelines. Earlier this year the board decided to end its ban on selling pipeline transportation rights at prices above the regulated toll, which will help ensure the available capacity is allocated in the most efficient manner.

The board also decided against requiring that available pipeline capacity be posted on electronic bulletin boards since this secondary transportation market has been working well without any such regulation.

In August 1994 the National Energy Board issued revised guidelines which will make it easier for pipeline companies, producers, shippers, consumers and governments to resolve tolls and tariff issues through negotiation rather than formal NEB hearings which are costly to all parties.

In another cost saving measure for the industry, the board decided to set the cost of capital for group 1 pipeline companies for multi–year periods rather than on an annual basis. This will reduce the expense associated with annual hearings for each pipeline by reducing the length of the hearings.

The National Energy Board is also endeavouring to reduce overlap and duplication by working more closely with provincial regulatory bodies.

For example, the NEB and the Alberta Energy and Utilities Board have signed two memoranda of understanding, the first to implement a mutual aid agreement for pipeline incidents in Alberta and the second to establish a common reserve data base.

Under the first MOU, when an incident occurs on an NEB regulated facility the Alberta Energy and Utilities Board will, at the request of the National Energy Board, provide emergency response assistance. If the incident involves a provincially regulated pipeline the NEB will be available to provide emergency response investigation assistance. The end result will be a faster, more effective response by both boards to pipeline incidents in Alberta.

Under the second MOU the NEB and the AEUB will share geological and reservoir information for natural gas and crude oil pools. The sharing of information will result in a common reserve data base for Alberta. The beneficiaries of this most efficient method of maintaining estimates of reserves will be the oil and gas industry and the taxpaying public.

[Translation]

I could go on and on about the efforts made by the National Energy Board to reduce the overlap and duplication and to streamline the administrative requirements. However, my goal here is only to give the hon. members an overview of the recent measures taken by the Board to improve the regulatory framework for the oil, gas and electricity sector.

[English]

I would urge the hon. member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia to seek a full accounting of the NEB's regulatory reform initiatives directly from the board. I believe he will be impressed with the progress that has been made to date. The record will clearly indicate that this government not only endorses the objective of reducing the regulatory burden on the energy industry, but it is actively pursuing that objective on a day–to–day basis.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Deshaies (Abitibi, BQ): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia: "That, in the opinion of this House, the government should move to streamline administrative and regulatory processes in the energy sector with the objective to minimize unnecessary regulatory burden".

I think the hon. member's motion is particularly relevant at a time when one of the items on the government's parliamentary agenda is Bill C–62, the Regulatory Efficiency Act, and in fact I hope members of all parties will work together to find an effective way to make regulations flexible and refrain from policies that are counterproductive.

The motion of the hon. member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia deals indirectly with a set of regulations that are so rigid they often cause more harm than otherwise in the energy sector. The hon. member's motion could also apply to other areas as well and in fact to practically any area of human activity, since almost everything we do is regulated.

This motion also leads us to question the advisability of having so many levels of government, each with their own regulations, federal, provincial and even municipal. All these levels of government have their various departments, each with the authority to veto the other's initiatives, which means that obtaining a single permit may be a very lengthy process. In this respect, the director of a new mining development, the Troilus project north of Chibougamau in Quebec, pointed out in an interview with Radio–Canada that he needed no less than 37 certified permits before he could start his project.

On the basis of his own experience with the Troilus project, he also said in the interview that he realized why Canada now ranked only fifth in the world as a country that was attractive for mining exploration. It was mainly because of its undue regulatory burden. Although he made it clear that he was not in favour of more flexible environmental regulations, he did point out that competition between various levels of government and various departments made the work of developers unnecessarily complex and was not conducive to economic development.

At the federal level, the number of regulations is impressive. It is enough just to flip through the 14,420 pages of the Consolidated Regulations of Canada of 1978 and the 4,277 pages of the Canada Gazette, part II, for 1994 alone.

The regulatory process, which is intended among other things to lighten the legislative process of which it is a part, has had the opposite effect over the years, adding to the number of standards without necessarily improving quality.

There are therefore a growing number of increasingly complex and technical regulations, and this has resulted in a considerably more complicated administrative burden for Canadian taxpayers. It would be appropriate to assess the impact of this situation upon the competitiveness of Canadian businesses and even upon the Canadian economy as a whole.

I would like to cite one example of a situation in which two legitimate objectives are at cross–purposes in responding to two different safety requirements, the example of an infant crib with a drop side to make it easier for disabled parents to use. Such a crib cannot meet crib safety standards, which require the sides to be fixed, when the side needs to be lowered to ensure safe access for disabled parents. This regulation runs counter to the needs of disabled parents and presents an enormous obstacle for them.

One could readily imagine some mechanism to reconcile these two objectives, if a worthwhile instrument for doing so were created, instead of stupidly allowing the regulations to control the situation.

As the member for the Abitibi region I have often had to intervene in order to help speed up the administrative process for projects held up by the application of outmoded regulations. For example, the Grevet mining project near Quévillon in the Abitibi region had to wait 15 months to obtain environmental approval.

In order to get these approvals, authorizations from the Departments of Environment and Indian Affairs, among others, also had to be obtained, because the area is close to the James Bay reserve and the Cree territory. Here again, we can see that the federal government, by interfering in provincial jurisdictions, is creating overlap that only makes regulations more cumbersome, so that processes needed to administer them are more complex and more confusing.

This is not new, at least for the official opposition, that has spent a lot of its energy trying to make the federal government understand that its policy of centralizing everything too often causes more harm than good.

The oft–requested creation of a single window for permits or any other activity requiring the cooperation of several governments or departments has become more than essential and our economy's viability depends on it.

In the energy sector, the situation is no different. At the national level, a number of major players are involved in the regulatory process and somehow competing with each other. The federal government, through the National Energy Board or Natural Resources Canada, also adopts regulations, thus adding to the competition between federal and provincial environmental agencies.

This undue regulatory burden has a disastrous impact on the energy sector. My colleague from the Reform Party who showed an interest in the vitality of Canada's energy sector and the well–being of his fellow citizens is seeking with his motion to express his concern that regulations are strangling industry and, in turn, all Canadians.

As I too am concerned about the mining industry, I can say that the decline of investments in mining exploration clearly illustrates the disastrous effects of a double, and even triple layer of administration, because the excessive number of regulations is only one of the important factors in the decline of mining investments.

The mining industry is linked to the energy sector because it accounts for close to 13 per cent of the total energy demand of industry in Canada and Quebec, and it is suffering needlessly as a result of this situation. Why does the federal government let this situation, that impacts so negatively on our economy, go on?

Any businessman will tell you that a bad organization makes you lose time and, as you know, time is money, which means that in the end it could have dire consequences for the company. We are not talking about a small business here, but about an industry that accounts for 7 per cent of Canada's and Quebec's GDP or $45 billion each year.

This is far from the single window concept which I talked about earlier and which would allow for the simplification of the administrative process. We know of projects that were approved by the provincial government but rejected by the federal government. Conflicts arise because each level considers itself to be the only one that has the power to regulate.

To conclude on this motion, I would say that we obviously have to rationalize without delay the administrative process and its regulations in the energy sector. Too many agencies, companies and individuals are paying the price of this duplication and these useless conflicts.

The federal government should, in the interest of everyone, simplify its regulations, leave to each level of government its own regulation–making, even if it has to resort to single windows to deliver permits when an act applies to a provincial area of responsibility.

It is a good thing that the rest of Canada has begun to talk about rationalizing the role of each government. In Quebec, we have been asking for that for a long time.

[English]

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise today and speak to my colleague's motion.

The streamlining of regulations has certainly for many years been a popular political topic in Canada. Governments have been talking for years and in spite of that relatively little has happened in streamlining and reducing overlap in regulations between federal and provincial governments.

As far back as 1978, Prime Minister Trudeau entrusted the Economic Council of Canada with the task of reviewing government regulations in certain sectors. Among other things, the study was to focus on the relevance and impact of regulations. The council proceeded to look at a number of sectors, notably telecommunications and occupational health and safety. This seems to show, as my colleague mentioned, that over–regulation is certainly a problem in many sectors other than the energy sector.

The council generally recommended that routine regulations and agreements be codified and made public at all levels of government. The aim of this recommendation was to ensure a clearer grasp and understanding of the scope of regulations.

In the second recommendation, pertaining to products and development projects, the council recommended that in instances when responsibility for a particular sector was shared between the federal government and the provinces, a single department should be assigned responsibility for co–ordinating the activities of participating departments. Of course that is the single–window approach that the previous speaker mentioned. Businesses would thus waste less time than they do when they have to deal with all the departments of government.

In September 1984 Prime Minister Mulroney announced that he was setting up a ministerial task force to review all federal government programs with a view to making them simpler and more accessible. Nineteen study teams composed of public and private sector individuals were formed and mandated to review 989 programs accounting for expenditures of $92 billion. One of the study teams focused on regulatory programs.

Not specifically mentioned in the program review appended to the report is a list of federal programs considered problematic in terms of provincial relations. Problems identified had to do either with jurisdiction or overlap or with matters of information, policy, et cetera. Of the 134 registered programs identified, 86, or 66 per cent, were categorized as problematic in at least one province or territory, while 27, or 20 per cent, were found to overlap with provinces or territories. The task force observed the highest incidence of overlap in the case of environmental programs.

The study team reviewing regulatory programs concluded among other things that there was evidence of ongoing significant overlap and duplication between the two levels of government. It recommended that initiatives be adopted to improve the regulatory process. Specifically, it recommended that a study of overlap in the environmental sector be conducted. Moreover, the task force called for an immediate review of the overall burden imposed by the various levels of government. It concluded that Canadians were over–regulated and that it was important to cut down the number of regulatory levels.

So members can see that this is certainly not a new subject in Canada for political debate. It has been ongoing for years and years. It is the general consensus, I think, with all parties in Canada that all sectors are over–regulated. As we mentioned, today the energy sector is certainly one sector that is over–regulated.

In the spring of 1986 the government adopted a federal regulatory reform strategy. It called for all new regulations to be subjected to economic and social cost analysis. The public would henceforth be informed and involved in the regulatory process. For one thing, the process would not take so long. Furthermore, the current regulatory process would be streamlined to improve efficiency. These are very familiar terms, which we have heard many times.

One of the 10 guidelines for reform deals directly with the issue that interests us here. In the view of existing regulatory burden and the need to eliminate needless duplication, co–operation with the provinces was deemed to be a government priority.

To prove how serious it was, the government moved in the summer of 1986 to create the ministry of state for privatization and regulatory affairs. Although each department continued to be responsible for its own regulations, the office of privatization and regulatory affairs was put in charge of promoting the government's regulatory objectives.

With respect to program efficiency, considerable progress has been made since the strategy's adoption. For example, the average timeframe for regulatory approval has dropped substantially since the development of this office. According to the office, better inspection and enforcement mechanisms have been developed and overlapping regulations have been eliminated, at least to some degree.

Since 1987 the government has also released an annual federal regulatory plan. This publication gives an overview of forthcoming regulations. In each instance the purpose of the regulation is mentioned, along with the impact it will have.

The federal regulatory plan also includes a regulatory evaluation plan. In 1988 the office published a paper listing all the regulatory reviews and reforms undertaken by different departments. In all, 77 initiatives were identified. In 1991 the office was disbanded and responsibility for regulatory affairs was assigned to the Treasury Board.

After this general history and overview, we are still left with the same problem in the energy sector as well as in many other sectors. The reality of the 1990s is that we do not want complex and bureaucratic solutions to the problem of over–regulation. We need to adopt a different philosophy. Our primary focus has to be to simplify and eliminate regulations wherever possible. For those that remain we need to share the administrative responsibility with other partners. While quality and service have to remain a primary objective, we expect there will have to be a significant shift in the degree and type of interaction between the federal and provincial governments that create these regulations, regulatory boards that oversee them, and the industry that must comply with them and in some instances be burdened by them.

The best way to examine the effects regulations have on a company is to look at a specific example of what I have been talking about up to this point. The National Energy Board was faced this year with an application by Foothills Pipe Lines Limited to construct the Wild Horse pipeline, which is an interconnecting link within Alberta from the Nova System to the proposed Altamont pipeline at Wild Horse on the Montana border.

The nature of the application and Foothills' approach to the National Energy Board raises fundamental questions with respect to the approval process for future pipeline facility expansion. Foothills' application stretched the limits of conventional National Energy Board facilities approval requirements in several important areas.

Under established approval procedures, a pipeline applicant must demonstrate that the facilities are needed, that there is a reasonable expectation they will be used for a significant portion of their useful life, and that tolls will be paid. The requirements are manifested in the demonstration of five aspects of supporting evidence: adequate supply in Canada to maintain incremental deliveries over time; a market assessment of sustainable demand for incremental gas volume; firm shipper contractual commitments for the new capacity for an extended term; specific contract market commitments to purchase the incremental gas; and specific dedicated supply to service these market commitments. The last two have been subject to some relaxation in other recent applications as long as a binding, firm shipper contract for the new capacity was in place. Where the application represents an expansion to existing facilities, rolled in tolling treatment has almost universally applied.

That is what Foothills was facing in the regulatory process in getting approval for this rather insignificant pipeline extension. What Foothills was seeking was pre–approval and certification to build facilities without demonstrable market support. As an alternative to outright approval, Foothills indicated that it would accept a conditional certificate that would require some further demonstration of shipper contractual commitments prior to construction.

As time is short, I will not go into more detail on the specific proposal. The point is that when the gas market was hot and Foothills wanted to build the extension on the pipeline to service that market the regulatory procedure was so complex and cumbersome that the market in reality was dried up before the regulatory approval system could be put into effect.

Therefore, in effect what we are talking about today is the streamlining of this regulatory process.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): There being no further members rising for debate and the motion not being designated as a votable item, the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired and the order is dropped from the Order Paper pursuant to Standing Order 96(1).

It being 6.06 p.m., the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

IMPAIRED DRIVING

Mr. Paul Steckle (Huron—Bruce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, since 1980 the Canadian Centre for Justice Statistics has reported more than 100,000 charges for impaired driving in Canada every year. In 1993 alcohol accounted for one death or injury every five minutes.

Drinking and driving is the largest single criminal cause of death and injury in Canada. It is not just car related. Seventy–three per cent of all victims killed in snowmobile and all–terrain vehicle crashes had been drinking. Seventy–seven per cent of boating accidents were alcohol related.

Today I want to acknowledge the contribution made by Mothers Against Drunk Driving, MADD Canada, which has been actively working since 1981 to reduce deaths and injuries due to impaired driving and to help the victims and survivors of such tragic senselessness.

In this regard I would like to mention Lynne and David Magee and Barbara Rintoul of Wingham, Ontario, whose sons were victims of an impaired driver. These people have taken their tragedy and in dedication of young lives so needlessly lost, channelled their energy into positive action by forming the Huron—Bruce chapter of MADD Canada.

I would like to commend them for their strength at a time of such—

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Michel Daviault (Ahuntsic, BQ): Mr. Speaker, even though there are no partisan signs on it, last night vandals spray painted the No slogan on my home. Unfortunately, it seems that I am not the only victim of this type of rather excessive argument from frenzied partisans. There is no question that acts like the one committed on my property are a direct result of the excessive and intolerant comments we have heard in the past few days from spokespersons for the federalist side.

The comments by Garcia, Maciocia and others, who talk of treason and of crushing their opponents, have no place in a civilized and democratic debate. It is high time, before the referendum campaign turns sour, for Daniel Johnson to show courage by calling his spokespersons to order and clearly dissociating himself from their comments and provocative gestures. Since the Prime Minister allowed himself to say: "They will get clobbered", it is obvious that some of his supporters are taking him literally.

VIOLENT CRIME

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Jesse Cadman, Sean Simmonds, Laurie Wood, Linda Williams, Chris Lussier, Paul McDaniel, Graham Niven, Sukhjit Sangha, Pam Cameron, Mindy Tran, Melissa Deley, Melanie Carpenter and the list goes on. These are not just names. They were people with family and friends who loved and cared about them, people whose hopes and dreams and possibilities were cut short because our criminal justice system and the government's lack of corrective action failed them.

The government allows a justice system to exist which is too lenient in sentencing convicted offenders and too generous in doling out parole. It consistently fails the victim.

Steven Carpenter, his family and supporters are calling for justice system changes. It is time the government listened to the people and did something meaningful and positive.

TAXATION

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce, Ind.): Mr. Speaker, as the country faces a deficit and a spiralling debt, a study by the University of Quebec in Montreal reveals that we are losing billions of dollars in tax revenue because our tax laws are so generous toward large Canadian corporations. This study, in which Professor Léo–Paul Lauzon participated, looked at 767 large corporations established in Canada and showed that our tax laws allow many businesses to pay no taxes at all despite substantial profits.

As we are about to carry out a reform of social security, we should make fewer cuts to essential services and a few more cuts to tax loopholes of all kinds, including deferred taxes. It is high time to institute a minimum corporate tax. I hope that all levels of government will have the strength and courage to make the right decisions.

FORESTS

Ms. Colleen Beaumier (Brampton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, October 12 I will be attending a ceremony in my riding of Brampton where In–Touch Graphics will announce its active partnership in the fight against deforestation in Canada.

In–Touch Graphics will commit itself to plant three trees for every single tree it uses for its printing requirements. This translates into 3,100 newly planted trees over the next 12 months.

Residents of Brampton can be proud that a local business is taking this environmentally responsible initiative. All Canadian companies that use large volumes of paper products should take notice and follow this example of good corporate citizenship.

Henry David Thoreau once wrote: "What is the use of a house if you haven't got a tolerable planet to put it on?" It is through responsible environmental initiatives like this one that Canadian companies can do their part to ensure that we live on a tolerable planet.

GUN CONTROL

Mrs. Bonnie Hickey (St. John's East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last night St. John's City Council gave unanimous support for the government's gun control initiative, Bill C–68. City council's resolution was in response to a letter from the Canada Safety Council.

The city agreed with the safety council that the failure to pass this bill would undermine the efforts of people working in the criminal justice, safety and mental health fields.

City councillors know what the Reform Party refuses to acknowledge: the majority of Newfoundlanders support stricter gun control. As a member of the St. John's Women's Council said: "Placing restraints on weapons can only help public safety".

A number of headlines from the St. John's Evening Telegram also show support: "Gun control in Canada, the tougher the better", "Gun lobby scare tactics ineffective" and "A national gun registry? Of course, the sooner the better".

If the Reform Party and members of the other place truly want to represent the will of Atlantic Canadians they must support Bill C–68.

Mr. Harbance Singh Dhaliwal (Vancouver South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am proud to rise in the House today to speak in favour of Bill C–45, an act to amend the Corrections and Conditional Release Act.

Today many Canadians who have been victimized by crime appeared on Parliament Hill to voice their feelings and frustrations.

Bill C–45 is proof that the Liberal government has not forgotten them. The bill's intention is to make our streets and homes safer.

• (1405)

In our continuing efforts to strengthen penalties faced by offenders, the government has passed Bill C–37, Bill C–41 and has introduced Bill C–45.

While a strong justice system is vital in holding offenders accountable for their actions, tougher sentences and penalties are only half the solution. Prevention is the other half.

Each year Canadians spend approximately $9 billion on policing, private security, courts, corrections and insurance.

Studies such as the one conducted by High/Scope Perry reveal that high quality active learning—

BOMBARDIER

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, workers at the Bombardier plant in La Pocatière gave their president, Laurent Beaudoin, a lesson in democracy. They will not let their boss tell them how to vote in the referendum.

This was not Mr. Beaudoin's first attempt at manipulating his employees to make them vote according to his political convictions. Back in 1992, he wrote his employees a letter stating his support for the Charlottetown Accord. This action was denounced by the chief electoral officer at the time and Mr. Beaudoin was later convicted of violating the Quebec Elections Act.

This week, Mr. Beaudoin commented that Quebec would be too small a country for his business. Yet his business was born and raised in Quebec and has been quite successful there. The Bloc Quebecois salutes the workers who have contributed to the success of Bombardier in La Pocatière and encourages them to remain steadfast in their beliefs. As a plant worker said, votes and work do not mix.

VIOLENT CRIME

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, for the third time in less than a year I rise in the House to comment on the murder of a young Surrey girl. In the early hours of September 6, 10–year old Melissa Deley was asleep in her bed, that is until Bret Neff decided to break into Melissa's house.

Neff left the house with the TV, the VCR, the family car and Melissa. Some time over the next few hours, Neff sexually assaulted and murdered Melissa.

Like Fernand Auger before him, Neff spared the Canadian taxpayers a great deal of money by taking his own life.

However we are still left with the legacy of three young Surrey girls, abducted at random by strangers from the street, the workplace and the home, sexually assaulted and murdered.

On this National Victims Day we remember those who fell prey to brutal and cowardly attacks. We must also commit ourselves in this House to ensure that Pamela, Melanie and Melissa did not die in vain.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, it has been said that the only things certain in life are death and taxes. True for most of us, but not for Canadians wealthy enough to hire lawyers to concoct a tax free non–residency under the Income Tax Act, aided and abetted by the way Canadian tax law mollycoddles such tax avoidance.

By taking up residence in tax havens, wealthy tax refugees are not legally required to file tax returns or pay Canadian income tax on the wealth they have taken out of the country, and pay a much lower rate of tax on any remaining Canadian investment income. Meanwhile, they can and do spend a lot of time in Canada with family and friends and attending to business. After years of such behaviour, they can easily decide to take up residence again and benefit from things like medicare for which they have not paid.

Canadian tax refugees, like Americans, should be obliged to continue to file tax returns and pay Canadian tax while residing abroad. We should say to tax avoiders: Hasta la vista baby, but pay your taxes first. Republicans in the U.S. call such tax avoiders traitors. Let the record show that the NDP can agree with the Republicans on at least one thing.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian finance minister described as a separatist dream the proposed political and economic union between an independent Quebec and Canada.

On December 3, 1993, the PQ leader himself raised serious doubts about the feasibility of such a partnership with Canada soon after Quebec's separation. He said that believing that, upon Quebec's declaration of sovereignty, we will be able to negotiate a multitude of economical and political changes with Canada is like asking for the moon.

The Minister of Finance is right: economic and political union will not be possible after the referendum because Quebec separatists want Quebec to separate, and our answer to that is No.

SOCIÉTÉ SAINT–JEAN–BAPTISTE

Mr. Denis Paradis (Brome—Missisquoi, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we learned that the following Saint–Jean–Baptiste societies have joined the Société Saint–Jean–Baptiste of the Sherbrooke diocese and expressed their pride in being part of Canada.

• (1410)

They are the Société Saint–Jean–Baptiste of the diocese of Valleyfield and the Société Saint–Jean–Baptiste of the diocese of Quebec City, which met last weekend with the Société Saint–Jean–Baptiste of Sherbrooke, in the eastern townships, and sang the "O Canada".

To all these men and women who are not afraid to show that they are proud to be Quebecers and Canadians; to all our French Canadian ancestors who built this country; to Wilfrid Laurier who, almost one hundred years ago, became the first of many Canadian prime ministers from Quebec; to my friends from the Bloc Quebecois who have dreams of sitting again in this House after the next election; I want to say that, like all of you, I am very proud to be a Quebecer and a Canadian.

However, it is important that we all say no to separation.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the word "confusion" perfectly describes the precautions taken by separatist leaders to package their project so as to make it as vague as possible.

As evidence of that, let us look at the findings of a poll conducted by Créatec and made public this week. Fifty per cent of those who intend to vote yes think that separation will only occur after the conclusion of an agreement with Canada. As for the famous June 12 agreement, only 19 per cent of the public knows more or less what it is all about.

The poll also shows, and this is nothing short of tragic, that 28 per cent of those who would vote yes believe that a sovereign Quebec would remain a Canadian province.

The whole separatist strategy is nothing but a smoke screen used to hide the real objective, which is to separate Quebec from Canada. However, Quebecers do not want that and they will vote no on October 30.

MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Foreign Affairs committed an outrageous blunder in referring to the situation in the former Yugoslavia.

What did he mean by saying that "We have not yet started killing, killing one another, and I hope that the situation of the former Yugoslavia will never apply to Canada". This statement, fraught with hidden meanings as it is, requires clarification.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs and the Canadian government ought to be ashamed of making such insinuations.

For this reason the Bloc Quebecois most strongly condemns these absolutely thoughtless words spoken by the minister during his visit to the UN. The irresponsibility of the minister speaks volumes about the no side, the intolerance, insult and abuse the no side has to offer to the people of Quebec.

VICTIMS OF CRIME

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, today the voices of victims of crime are being heard on Parliament Hill.

They are calling for more than platitudes from the government. They are demanding real change to our criminal justice system. Across the country people are outraged because they believe our courts are too lenient and that parole and statutory release have become a licence for criminals to reoffend.

In Calgary where my riding of Calgary North is located, four women have been killed in the last eight weeks. As an added insult, one of the accused killers was granted bail within one week of being charged and is back out in the community.

Canadians have a right to ask why they are not being protected from thugs and criminals.

Today, citizens from across Canada have come to Ottawa to send a message to their elected representatives. Victims of crime must come first in a system where public safety is the number one priority. Reformers say Canadians expect and deserve no less.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Robert Bertrand (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, would it be as easy for an independent Quebec to become a signatory to the North American Free trade Agreement, also known as NAFTA, as the separatists claim?

The federal finance minister said yesterday it would not. He even warned that reopening negotiations with our American and Mexican partners would put a number of sectors of the Quebec economy in a vulnerable position.

I would also like to quote James Blanchard, the U.S. ambassador to Canada, and Sandra Fuentes–Berain, the Mexican ambassador to Canada, each of whom indicated that there were no guarantees an independent Quebec would automatically become a member of NAFTA.

They expected to keep Professor Ivan Bernier quiet by keeping his study on NAFTA under wraps, but they will not be able to do the same with everyone. As the finance minister said yesterday, it is time to get rid of this myth cultivated by the separatists.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the PQ Premier said in a radio interview that the National Capital Commission of Canada had sent all its employees in Hull a letter telling them not to come in on October 31 if the Yes side wins, which we know perfectly well will not happen.

Mr. Parizeau said that based on that kind of statement, they would know what to expect. After the facts were checked, the reference made by Mr. Parizeau was shown to be completely untrue, and his office even had to apologize. After the constitutional document which the PQ Premier tried to link to the Quebec Liberal Party, the Premier is back with an alleged letter that in fact never existed.

Mr. Parizeau should concentrate on explaining his separation plans to the public instead of getting involved in these exercises in scaremongering.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

CANADA–QUEBEC ECONOMIC UNION

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in an apocalyptic speech delivered yesterday in Montreal, the Minister of Finance claimed that Canada could not guarantee its present economic union with Quebec would continue because the Americans would use it as an excuse to renegotiate NAFTA. He also contended that a sovereign Quebec would have to wait a very long time before becoming a member of the World Trade Organization, which recently replaced the GATT.

My question is for the Minister of Finance. Will he acknowledge that the proposal a sovereign Quebec will make to Canada for a new economic and political partnership is entirely within the spirit of the World Trade Organization treaty and of NAFTA and would guarantee American business the same conditions of access to Canadian and Quebec markets they now enjoy?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if there is to be an economic and political union between Canada and Quebec, that is, if Canada were to give a separate Quebec special favours it does not give other countries, the Americans and the Mexicans would insist on being at the negotiating table, just as Canada did when Mexico and the United States wanted bilateral negotiations. We said no, we had to be at the table.

Here is what Canada would run the risk of losing if it were to accord Quebec this special agreement: its agricultural policy, its cultural exemption, the Canadian Wheat Board, the financial services sector, the rules of origin for the automotive industry and, even more importantly, the binational panels protecting us against American reprisals.

As the Leader of the Opposition said yesterday, Canada's exports to Quebec represent $33 billion; its exports to the United States, however, represent $165 billion, and Canada cannot risk losing this. It is not because it would not want to, but because it would have too much to lose.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I think we can all see that the minister is in the same apocalyptic state as he was yesterday. The minister is grossly twisting the reality of freer trade between countries by wrongly ascribing to NAFTA the power to prevent greater integration between Quebec and Canada, as the partnership in fact proposes.

Will the minister acknowledge that his gratuitous remarks are contradicted by established rules of international trade and by the prevailing custom whereby sovereign states can conclude more complex regional agreements in parallel with other agreements such as NAFTA? Will he not acknowledge that this doctrine has even been enshrined in paragraph 4 of article XXIV of the GATT?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as in everything else, unfortunately, the separatist movement has been overtaken by events. The GATT has been replaced by the WTO, and in article 12 of the WTO, on accession, there are no rights of succession and no principle of status quo ante.

The problem is that Quebec would be like any other country seeking membership, because there is no precedent. And Quebec would be put in the position of having to make huge concessions, first to become a member of the WTO and particularly to become a member of NAFTA. This is very clear.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, paragraph 4 of article XXIV, which I just cited, was negotiated only last year and is currently in effect. This article provides, even in the case of a national treatment clause, for automatic exception when a parallel agreement is to be concluded between two countries, provided its intent is to free trade. The whole point was to free trade, not stop it. It is a bit odd to hear a government, which vehemently opposed free trade and us in order to prevent its passing, now citing it.

The Minister of Finance also intimated that the Americans could oppose a partnership agreement between Quebec and Canada the day after a yes vote. Will he not admit that the Americans, as reasonable and experienced individuals, will rather want to avoid any upset in the existing economic flow between Quebec and Canada, particularly because they will continue to enjoy the same conditions of trade and access to the Quebec and Canadian markets as they do now? Does he not see that any steps the Americans take will only be to calm the nervous and the emotional who want to refuse to negotiate and who prefer to see everything in terms of gloom and doom?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, rather than asking inflammatory questions and making speeches of this sort, he should put his cards on the table. We are talking here about the future of Quebecers. It is his duty, as one of the leaders of the separatist movement, to tell Quebecers the truth about the real consequences of independence.

If you—yes, Mr. Speaker, I am looking at you and I would much rather look at you—if you want to identify the things the Americans will attack today, and this is no figment of the imagination, they will attack agricultural policy; the dairy industry in Quebec; the cultural exemption Quebec enjoys today with regard to films, television, broadcasting, books and magazines; textiles; preferential access to American markets; the purchasing policies of the Government of Quebec and Hydro–Quebec; the binational panels. There is a whole list.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in his speech yesterday in Montreal, the Minister of Finance asserted that a sovereign Quebec would have difficulty joining the World Trade Organization or WTO, which recently replaced GATT. The Minister of Finance stated that Quebec would have to stand in line behind the 32 countries that have applied to become members of the WTO.

Does the Minister of Finance admit that, under the WTO accession clause, Quebec's admission will be all the faster and easier because Quebec already meets membership requirements?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): That is the problem, Mr. Speaker. I have just read a list of Quebec practices that will not be accepted by other WTO members. That is exactly my point.

• (1425)

These practices will be challenged by the U.S., the European Community and other countries. That is why the cost of joining the WTO and NAFTA will be so high.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Finance does not know what he is talking about.

My question to him is this: How can the Minister of Finance claim that Quebec will have to take a number to join the WTO, when he knows—and I hope he knows it—that the reason these 32 countries are waiting for admission is because they do not have a market economy; that Quebec already meets WTO requirements; that Quebec is not too small, and that we are not incompetents either since Quebec is the Americans' eighth largest trading partner? Does he at least know this, Mr. Speaker?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Saudi Arabia and Taiwan have market economies and they are on the waiting list. Yesterday, Mr. Landry said that only countries from Eastern Europe were on the waiting list.

Let me tell you something: Taiwan is in Asia, and Saudi Arabia is in Arabia. I know full well that separatists need lessons in economics, but we now see that they also need geography lessons.

JUSTICE

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, hundreds of Canadians have gathered on the lawns of Parliament Hill today and it is not over a concern with respect to the Quebec referendum or trade treaties that has brought them together.

It is a more fundamental concern about the safety of their children and their loved ones. These are ordinary folks and their demand is very simple. They want the government to do more to protect the lives and property of Canadians from criminals. They want the rights of victims to be placed above the rights of criminals.

What does the justice minister propose not to say but to do for Melanie Carpenter's father and all of the victims of violence who feel that in Canada the state, the law, the government, the parole board and the justice system have failed them in a tragic and fundamental way?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it was my high privilege to address that rally on the lawn of Parliament Hill an hour or two ago. It was my honour to meet yesterday morning with Steve Carpenter, the father of Melanie, and with Maurice Rose whose son was murdered in Montreal.

As I told those gathered on Parliament Hill today, since I have been Minister of Justice I have made it a point to meet with victims and the families of victims of crime, not because it is easy—it is often terribly difficult—but because I believe that through the tragedy they have suffered they have something to offer. They have a perspective to offer on criminal justice reform which has helped me in my work.

When I spoke to that group today I recounted some of the things the government has done over the last 15 months. We have introduced more meaningful reform to the criminal justice system than any federal government in memory.

The leader of the third party and his colleagues want to know what has been done. Let me remind the leader of the third party what has been done often over the objection and with the opposition of the third party: meaningful amendments to the Young Offenders Act, introducing DNA provisions under the Criminal Code, meaningful gun control, improvements to the parole system, strengthening the criminal justice sentencing process, and ruling out self–induced intoxication.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, if the minister had done all these wonderful things for the victims of violence there would not be hundreds of people on the lawns of Parliament today.

• (1430)

Victims of violence listen politely to these recitations from the minister of all the things he is supposedly doing, but their greater concern is with the things the government is not doing: the failure to repeal section 745 of the code; the failure to create a registry of sexual offenders by September, as the solicitor general promised; the refusal to include real victim compensation in Bill C–45; and the absence of a victims rights package in anything the minister has presented to the House.

Besides the cosmetic changes the minister has referred to, what more does he plan to do to change the justice system so that Canada's streets are safer from violent criminals, sex offenders and murderers?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my list was not of things we are talking about. My list was of measures that have already been achieved.

Instead of just speaking about a list of victims rights, which is something the third party is fond of doing, instead of just proclaiming a bill of rights for victims which is politically attractive, we prefer to enact those rights as we have done.

If the leader of the third party does not know, let me tell him that what has been done has been to amend the Criminal Code to provide for victim impact statements wherever they are prepared; to allow for the return of stolen property; to protect the identity of victims and witnesses of sexual offences and extortion; to levy victims fine surcharges; to amend the code to permit the courts to order restitution to victims; and to amend the Corrections and Conditional Release Act to recognize the role of victims in relation to federal corrections. This is the list of action taken in the name of victims.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister refers to enacting rights. There is a growing conflict in the country between the rights of victims of crime and potential victims of crime and the rights of persons accused or convicted of crimes. In more and more cases the scales of justice are tipped on the side of violent criminals, sex offenders and murderers. This cannot be allowed to continue. When rights clash it is the rights of the victims that ought to prevail over the rights of the criminals.

My question to the minister is on rights since he raised the subject. When the rights of victims conflict with the rights of persons accused or convicted of crimes, what is he doing to ensure that it is the rights of the victims that prevail in Canadian law?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the first and most fundamental right of any victim is the same as the first and most fundamental right of any Canadian, to a fair, responsive and strong system of criminal justice. Since our first day in office that has been our focus.

Before concluding, I am constrained to observe that for a party so consumed with the rights of victims it is passing strange that it turns a deaf ear when the victims rights groups, including CAVEAT and its principal, Priscilla de Villiers, speak passionately and call for the Reform Party to support our proposals on gun control.

DIVISION OF THE FEDERAL DEBT

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the federal debt is close to $600 billion. The Quebec government has made it clear that a sovereign Quebec would take its share of the responsibility for the federal debt. Yesterday in his speech, the finance minister, who excluded any negotiations with a sovereign Quebec, remained strangely silent on the division of the federal debt.

• (1435)

Would the finance minister agree that the federal government's enormous debt will make it incumbent on the government, in its own interest and in view of its responsibilities, to start negotiations with Quebec the day after the referendum, starting with the division of the debt?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the day after the referendum we will all continue to build Canada together, because it is quite clear the No side will win.

Am I to understand that the hon. member is repeating the unfortunate statement made by Mr. Campeau three or four months ago and this morning by Mrs. Dionne–Marsolais, that an independent Quebec will not accept its fair share of the federal debt? Is that what the hon. member is saying?

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what I am not saying. I just explained to the minister, and I will repeat my explanation, to make sure he understands, unless he has no answer and that is why. I will explain.

The Quebec government has very clearly announced its intention to assume its responsibility in connection with the tremendous federal debt. Yesterday the minister avoided any questions on the subject by saying he would not negotiate with Quebec in any area whatsoever. He did not broach the subject of the debt.

Will the Minister of Finance admit that, faced with pressures from the financial community, he has no choice but to negotiate with Quebec after a win for the Yes side, because Canada is incapable—

The Speaker: My dear colleagues, during Question Period I allow as much time as I can for the questions that are put, but we go somewhat beyond the limit, even ask questions that are hypothetical—

An hon. member: The minister's speech is hypothetical.

The Speaker: We get either hypothetical speeches or hypothetical questions.

An hon. member: Ha, ha.

The Speaker: I would ask hon. members when they rise to please ask questions that are relevant to the government's administration. Now if the finance minister wishes to answer this question, he may.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will answer, since they have so much trouble asking questions.

If the hon. member wishes to ask hypothetical questions, we can do that too. If the debt of a separate Quebec were to triple or worse, how high would the resulting interest rates be for us Quebecers? How much would our income tax go up? What kind of cuts would we see in social services? They would be draconian.

CAMP IPPERWASH

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian agenda has more to it than the referendum. Law and order are still on the decline in the country.

Not only do we have violent offenders roaming our neighbourhoods and streets, there are areas where policing has almost ceased to exist. Ipperwash is one example. Sexual assaults, firearms discharged at persons, arson, break and enter go uninvestigated. In fact Ipperwash—

• (1440)

The Speaker: I know the hon. member is having a tough time with his voice. Perhaps I can help him by asking him to put the question.

Mr. Hanger: Mr. Speaker, the list of victims is growing in Ipperwash. When will the solicitor general take action to ensure that the law is applied equally to everyone, which includes militant natives?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the approach of the federal government is that the law applies equally to everyone.

We should praise the professionalism and expertise of the RCMP when, working as the provincial police on behalf of the attorney general of British Columbia, it diffused without violence and loss of life the Gustafsen Lake situation, with the people involved being brought before the courts and facing criminal charges.

When it comes to the Ipperwash situation, that involves the application of the Criminal Code by police of local jurisdiction who, I am sure the hon. member should know, are the Ontario Provincial Police.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister should tell that to the people who live there. They have lost faith in the police, especially with the do–nothing Liberal government that refuses to act.

People are now arming themselves for protection because they have been abandoned by the federal government and fear for their lives. The minister is neglecting his responsibility to Canadians because he is catering to special interest groups.

Why is the solicitor general allowing a group of organized armed thugs to bully the federal government, the police and the people of Ipperwash?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the federal government is not allowing any such conduct. It is certainly ready, at the request of the solicitor general of Ontario, Mr. Runciman, to provide support along the lines of the standing arrangements we have.

In the meantime this is strictly a matter for the Ontario Provincial Police. If the member does not think his Conservative friends in Ontario are doing their job, he should tell them directly.

CANADA–QUEBEC ECONOMIC UNION

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday, the Minister of Finance indicated that chances of an economic union between a sovereign Quebec and Canada were non–existent. He went so far as to say that, even if he wanted to, it would not be possible.

My question is quite down to earth. Will the Minister of Finance come back to his senses and admit that Quebec is the second largest market in Canada, with 400,000 Canadian jobs depending on trade with Quebec, and that Ontario alone enjoys a net surplus of $4 billion per year in its trade with Quebec?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, all the more reason for Quebec to remain in Canada. What I said yesterday was very clear. I did not say that there would be no trade between Quebec and Canada. What I said is that there would be no economic union between Quebec and Canada as described in the referendum question. And the reason for this is very obvious: while $33 billion in goods are sold to Quebec by the rest of Canada, $165 billion in exports go to the U.S., and Canada can never put this at risk.

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in light of what I said and what the minister himself just said, will the minister finally admit that an economic union is not only desirable but inevitable in the interests of both partners, Canada and Quebec, especially since he knows full well that the U.S. stands to benefit from this continued union because they will have access to the Canadian and Quebec markets under the very same terms they now enjoy?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. members are having a hard time understanding. At present, Canada is part of NAFTA. This agreement was signed and ratified. So, cultural exemptions, the agricultural policy, binational panels, all those things are already in place and Canada will continue to enjoy them.

The only problem would be if Canada wanted or agreed to negotiate an economic union. All this would then be at risk.

• (1445)

The difference between Quebec and Canada is that, if Quebec wishes to join NAFTA, this will mean no more agricultural policy, no more cultural exemptions, no more binational panels and no more procurement policy.

At present, Quebec is part of NAFTA and things are working well. If Quebec separates and then wants to join NAFTA, it will be undermining the basis of the Quebec economy. That is what I call putting your cards on the table.

MANITOBA ENTERTAINMENT COMPLEX INC.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it appears that the Minister of Human Resources Development has used the unfortunate financial situation of the Winnipeg Jets to line the pockets of his campaign contributors.

The minister gave $533,000 to Manitoba Entertainment Complex Inc. Is the money the minister gave to Manitoba Entertainment Complex Inc. in any way related to the campaign contributions its president gave the minister for the 1993 election?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: I would ask that in the phrasing of the question we not try to give reasons why one thing or another happens. I will permit the hon. minister to answer that question.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, once you subtract the hyperbole, exaggeration and the overtone of character assassination the hon. member introduced into her question, I certainly welcome it. It gives me the opportunity to clarify a misleading story that appeared.

The best way to do that is to cite the response made by the regional director general of HRD in Winnipeg, who pointed out that this project had at stake close to 1,400 jobs potentially lost to the city, involved all three levels of government, municipal, provincial and federal, involved hundreds of representatives from the private sector, virtually all the major businesses in Winnipeg, plus tens of thousands of residents of the city, all of whom were interested in trying to preserve the jobs and the economic development. The program was simply designed to ensure that the proper diligence and feasibility was done to make sure that was a good public investment to make.

It has nothing to do with campaign contributions. The hon. member should know better than that. She should deny and retract that allegation.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, even the perception of abuse of taxpayers' dollars is unacceptable. I would like to continue with my question.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

• (1450)

The Speaker: My dear colleagues, may I caution you about imputing motives in the question. I will permit the hon. member to put her question now.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: Order. My colleagues, as we all know, points of order that arise in the question period will of course be heard by me at the end of Question Period.

I would invite the hon. member for Calgary Northeast to put her question.

I am sorry, I thought the hon. member had said she would pass. You will forgive me if I misunderstood. I thank God we only have one Wednesday every week. The hon. member for Calgary Northeast.

Mrs. Brown (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, it is Calgary Southeast, not Northeast.

The Speaker: And I apologize. Calgary Southeast.

Mrs. Brown (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, my question is put with sincerity and focused on the issue at hand.

Can the minister explain to the House why he appears to be taking advantage of the financial plight of a hockey team in his riding to line the pockets of his election contributors?

The Speaker: The hon. member for Rimouski—Témiscouata.

CANADA–QUEBEC ECONOMIC UNION

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The minister ruled out the possibility of a customs union between Canada and Quebec when he said: If Quebec separates, what interest would Canada have in meeting the needs of the foreign country it would have become?

The minister knows full well that it would be in the best interests of Canada to maintain the current customs union. Are we to understand from the comments he made yesterday that the minister intends to personally set up barriers to impede the free movement of Canadian goods sold in Quebec, including controls at the border?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is not me but the NAFTA provisions which would require that the United States and Mexico get the same benefits and privileges. Our country would be opposed, because it would stand to lose too much.

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of Finance telling us that he personally wants to make life difficult for Ontario companies which, every year, sell vehicles and automotive accessories to the tune of $1.3 billion in Quebec, for Albertans who sell us 51 per cent of their cattle production, and for his Bay Street friends who, year in year out, provide financial services worth close to $3 billion in Quebec?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what I am saying is that the Canadian government will not be prepared to do what the separatist movement is willing to do, that is to jeopardize the protection afforded to the agricultural sector, and to also jeopardize the automotive industry, the bilateral panels and the cultural exemptions.

Mr. Speaker, is the hon. member prepared to jeopardize the safeguards that we have put in place to protect French language and culture?

INFRASTRUCTURE

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, indeed it is wonderful Wednesday. My question is for the minister responsible for the infrastructure program.

I continue to receive enthusiastic reports on the infrastructure program from the mayors of municipalities throughout Carleton—Charlotte. They praise the program for its assistance in completing the many projects that have benefited their communities and citizens.

Can the minister tell the House what the second year of the infrastructure program has accomplished for Canadian municipalities and their citizens?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it has been almost two years since the program on infrastructure was launched with the municipalities and with the provincial governments. The program has been a great success in implementing a promise made by this party in the last election campaign.

To this point in time, of the $6 billion originally allocated by the different orders of government, 93 per cent of it has been allocated to some 11,000 projects right across the country. Those projects are helping to strengthen the infrastructure of our local communities, attracting additional investment dollars and are putting over 100,000 Canadians to work, creating the kinds of jobs we need in this country. That is the kind of agenda Canadians want from this government.

SOMALIA INQUIRY

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Canadians from coast to coast to coast want to know that justice was done in the Somalia inquiry.

On Monday, former sergeant, now private, Mark Boland was denied standing before the Somalia commission. Apparently senior ranks are allowed standing because the commission may "make pronouncements that reveal their misconduct or give voice to allegations that bring discredit upon them. Lower ranks such as Boland have no need for official standing".

Does the Minister of National Defence agree that rank should automatically grant standing, or will he accept that involvement and knowledge of the situation should be the deciding factors?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know by now that the commission is the master of its own procedure.

The commission has extensive terms of reference. I do not believe there has been any argument made by anyone as to the degree to which the commission can investigate the deployment to Somalia. It is for the commission to decide who has standing and who has not.

If an individual feels aggrieved by the procedural decisions of the commission, they have the right to recourse through legal means.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the commission said: "Our terms of reference are very clear that it is the chain of command system and leadership within the chain of command that is to be our concern".

Mark Boland was given orders and he gave orders. He is in the chain of command. He has knowledge that can provide connective tissue to shape the body of evidence in this case. He must be able to pose questions. The right question to the right person at the right time will reveal the whole truth of the Somalia inquiry.

• (1500)

Will the minister now intervene to ensure that Mark Boland is granted standing before the Somalia commission?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is not the role of the Minister of National Defence to intervene in an inquiry constituted under the Inquiries Act.

CANADA–QUEBEC MONETARY UNION

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. He appears to reject the idea of a monetary union between a sovereign Quebec and Canada. In addition, the leaders of the No side are questioning the ability of a sovereign Quebec to continue to use the Canadian dollar.

Does the Minister of Finance confirm that it is in Canada's very best interest to not only acknowledge that a sovereign Quebec may continue to use the Canadian dollar, but also to wish for this, specifically for the purpose of maintaining its value?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): No, Mr. Speaker, not in the least, but that is not the question. The question is this: How can it be that a Quebec desiring independence not only wishes to use the currency of another country but also is prepared to turn all of the control and influence a country must have over its monetary policy over to that other country?

This is the touchy situation in which Quebec will find itself, this is the fundamental tool it will have forgone.

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the Minister of Finance acknowledge that the worst thing that could happen to the Canadian dollar would be for Quebecers, who have ownership of it, who have earned it with the sweat of their brows, to decide to collectively unload the one quarter of the money supply that is in their hands, some 100 billion dollars, whereas mutual interest and common sense militate strongly in favour of a monetary union?

Hon. Paul Martin Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what would it accomplish to put Quebec in the same position as, say, France is with respect to the Bundesbank or the bank of some other country?

When Canada is in a period of full growth, if there is a downturn in Quebec, monetary policy will be set in Canada to the detriment of Quebecers.

Tell me, what point is there in becoming independent if the tools of independence are handed over to another? It is totally pointless.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, despite all the rhetoric from the government about the need to cut spending at CBC, the auditor general's report in July revealed it is very fat and that there is all kinds of waste going on.

On Monday when a document was circulated around, the CBC annual report indicated discretionary spending had gone up $50 million last year. We can imagine how ripped off taxpayers must feel.

What is the minister doing about this matter?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let me congratulate our colleague for putting his first question as critic for the heritage portfolio.

The management of the CBC is now engaged in a very serious review of the financial dimensions of the corporation, as we have seen in the press. What it has in mind is to cut down on any possible waste, increase the effectiveness of the CBC and make it one of the most modern and efficient broadcasters in the world.

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, every day CBC's ratings drop. It spends more money. The CBC president is pleading with the minister to bring in a mandate now so that he has the latitude to make the cuts he needs to make.

When will the minister show some leadership and bring in that new mandate?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, our colleague should know that is precisely what we asked for, a panel of three people to make recommendations on the mandate. His wish will be granted. In the meantime the management of the CBC is managing at arm's length, as we all know.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. John Finlay (Oxford, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, under the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, as amended by the House last year, the Minister of the Environment is charged with the duty of creating a participant funding program.

Can the minister tell us what she has done so that Canadians with a serious interest in an environmental assessment can have access to funding in order to participate?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to follow up on the previous Minister of the Environment, now the hon. Leader of the Opposition, who stated in the House on April 5, 1990: "The federal government has very clear jurisdiction in the area of environmental impact assessment".

This jurisdiction is not challenged and it cannot be challenged. We have gone even further in the government. We have entrenched in law the principle of participant funding. In the last fiscal year there was about $860,000 available for the public to participate in the environmental assessment process enshrined by the previous Minister of the Environment.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the minister of Indian affairs has an opportunity to ease anxiety among those who believe the Indian land claims process is too slow, too complex and too uncertain.

Has the minister of Indian affairs considered the 1994–95 report of the Indian claims commission and will he respond positively to its first recommendation, the establishment of a new independent land claims policy and process?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the highest respect for the work of the Indian claims commission. Part of our red book commitment is to make the system more efficient and more just.

The problem I have, which the member knows, is whether it should be a justice system with binding judgments or a mediation system similar to what it is now, going through the convoluted process of having first to be turned down by the Indian claims commission.

That has not been settled by the chiefs. When I have some direction from the chiefs we could certainly move ahead on the desires of the Indian claims commission.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

The Speaker: I have a point of privilege which I will hear before the points of order. The point of privilege is coming from the Minister of Human Resources Development. We usually need notice before, but is it arising from question period?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, during question period the member for Calgary Southeast made some statements alleging behaviour on my part and which imputed motive, neither of which is acceptable under the rules of the House.

There can be many differences of opinion in the House and we can certainly have questions about one's actions in terms of whether they are right or wrong in a political sense.

I have been a member of the House in public life for 24 years and I never at any time had my behaviour imputed the way the hon. member suggests. I ask her to withdraw and apologize because nothing wrong was done, as she imputed, and it really requires her to clear the record.

The Speaker: Before I go to the House leader of the Reform Party, because another hon. member has been mentioned in the House I wonder if the hon. member for Calgary Southeast would like to intervene before the House leader of the Reform Party.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the Minister of Human Resources Development, I am putting questions to the House similar to those asked of the Minister of Canadian Heritage regarding the same kinds of improprieties. The perception needs to be clarified. Therefore I will not withdraw and I will not apologize.

The Speaker: On the same point of privilege, the hon. government whip and then I will go to the House leader of the Reform Party.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I turn to section 409(7) of Beauchesne's in relation to casting aspersions on persons within the House in addition to the fact that some of the allegations made by the hon. member alleged criminal activity on the part of another person regarding the relationship between that person and a minister of the House. The combination of those two things leads me to believe the language in question was unparliamentary and must be withdrawn.

I urge Mr. Speaker to request that any such expressions, including the language used in the question referred to, be withdrawn forthwith.

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to this matter of privilege I bring your attention to the question, the operative part of my hon. colleague's presentation to the House.

It was very clear in the question that the member for Calgary Southeast asked a deliberate question of whether there was a relationship between two actions. That was not inferred nor did it reflect on the minister. Before making a final decision on this, Mr. Speaker, I ask that you take this into consideration.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I put on the record of the House what the whip for the government was referring to in section 409 of Beauchesne's, which reads in part:

> In 1975, the Speaker expressed some general principles in order to clarify the regulations and restrict the negative qualifications which traditionally have guided the question period.

Subsection 7:

> A question must adhere to the proprieties of the House in terms of inferences, imputing motives or casting aspersions upon persons within the House or out of it.

The hon. member for Calgary Southeast did exactly what is not supposed to be done according to these guidelines put on the record by one of your distinguished predecessors, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member cannot get away with an improper statement by putting it in an interrogatory fashion, and therefore she should withdraw.

The Speaker: Colleagues, during question period, as you have seen in the last little while, we tend to be using stronger and stronger words in putting questions but also in giving answers.

Here is what we have, I believe. We have an hon. member who, when she stood in her place, was cautioned about the language she was using in her question. I permitted the question to stand with that caution and the hon. minister answered the first question.

In my view, the second question was clearly out of order and I ruled it as such by moving ahead and not letting the minister answer.

Now this is being raised as a point of privilege. One member has asked another member to withdraw the statement. The other member has replied that she does not feel this particular statement was imputing motives.

As the Speaker, it would seem to me that the more we permit ourselves to go down this road and not frame the questions in such a way that they can be related to the administrative responsibilities of individuals, we are getting ourselves into a quagmire.

I wish there were an easy way out of this. I do not believe and I ruled that this is not a question of privilege. However, in the name of civility and in the name of good conduct in this House, may I appeal to the member for Calgary Southeast to reconsider. Although I do not believe there was any intention but even if the words carried the impugning of motives, I wonder if the hon. member might reconsider and withdraw the statements as they were made.

The hon. member for Calgary Southeast.

Mrs. Brown (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of you for clarification?

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: Withdraw.

The Speaker: I have clearly ruled that there is not a point of privilege. That is my decision. However, again I appeal to the hon. member, although this question may or may not be allowed, I of course heard what the member said. Once again, in order that this House might carry out its responsibilities in a civilized manner on all sides, I would urge and ask the hon. member if she would consider withdrawing her statements or any impugning of motive. Would the hon. member consider that?

• (1520)

Mrs. Brown (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to you, because this is not a point of privilege I will not withdraw nor will I retract any of my statements.

The Speaker: My colleagues, I have made a ruling on a point of privilege and that ruling will stand. I very much regret that the hon. member has not withdrawn but I am going to let the matter rest there.

I will go on to another point. If there is another point of order exclusive of this, I will hear it. For now, I would like this point to rest.

POINTS OF ORDER

UNPARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order under sections 485 and 486 of Beauchesne's with regard to unparliamentary language and also language that reflects on members in this assembly.

I heard very clearly comments of the member for Willowdale that called the member for Calgary Southeast a slimeball not only once but twice and I think even a third time across the floor of the House.

There was a lot of concern in this House by the hon. member for Burlington concerning reflections on whether a person is a male or female. This type of comment to a male would have one type of inference but to a female, it certainly has another kind of inference which I will not accept. I ask that it be withdrawn and that that member be dealt with.

The Speaker: I must say that your Speaker did not hear these words and I do not know if they are in Hansard. We can have a look.

Because an hon. member was named in this House and was named directly I would ask the hon. member for Willowdale if he has something to add to this point of order.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am guilty and I withdraw. I ask your advice as to what other word might express better my utter repugnance for this type of question in our House of Commons.

The Speaker: May I ask the hon. member for Willowdale this. I did not hear all of the end of it and I do not really want to hear it. Would the hon. member please just stand and withdraw? He said he was guilty. Would he withdraw the statement, just the statement.

• (1525)

Mr. Peterson: Absolutely, Mr. Speaker. Thank you.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in light of the ruling you just made with regard to the words of the hon. member for Willowdale, I would like to draw your attention to citation 484 of Beauchesne's which reads in part as follows:

> (3) In the House of Commons a Member will not be permitted by the Speaker to indulge in any reflections of the House itself as a political institution; or to impute to any Member or Members unworthy motives for their actions in a particular case—

Mr. Speaker, in light of this citation and in light of the ruling you just made with regard to the language used by the hon. member for Willowdale, I respectfully raise as a point of order a request that you apply the same principle to the question asked by the hon. member for Calgary Southeast which in effect involves an unworthy aspersion on a member of this House.

If it is fair for the hon. member to be requested to withdraw and for the hon. member to comply, as he did with the request to withdraw the word he used, and I am referring to the hon. member for Willowdale, I respectfully submit it is equally fair for a request to be made and for the hon. member for Calgary Southeast in the same spirit of conciliation and goodwill to withdraw her remarks.

The Speaker: I had asked earlier, with all respect to the hon. leader of the government and the House, that it was an unfortunate situation that occurred in the House.

I have made a ruling on it and I will stay by the ruling. Your Speaker tries as much as possible in the course of question period to hear from all sides. Although I have ruled, I permitted the House leader to go on.

If in some way the House could draw itself away from the type of strong language that we have been using I think the House would be better served on all sides.

For now I would like to close this matter of the member for Calgary Southeast.

I have another point of order, the hon. whip of the Reform Party.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON PROCEDURE AND HOUSE AFFAIRS

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, you may be relieved to know this is a point of order on a different subject. You may not be too relieved.

The point of order is under Beauchesne's citation 317(2) which calls for an interpretation of the rules of procedures to be decided on by the Speaker.

The rule in question is Beauchesne's citation 765(3) which specifies that membership in committees is in the same proportion to membership of political parties in this House. Under this the Bloc Quebecois and Reform should each have three members on the public affairs committee.

I hasten to add that I am not seeking the Speaker's intercession on a matter rising in committee which would be contrary to Beauchesne's citation 168(7). What I am seeking is for the Speaker to uphold the rules of this House, specifically Beauchesne's citation 765(3). If others are allowed to ignore the rules or put an erroneous interpretation on them, which is the case here, then it makes a mockery of Beauchesne's and a mockery of this House.

I tried without success to get the two other whips and the committee on procedure and House affairs to act on Beauchesne's citation 765(3). The stand taken by both is that the chair of the public accounts committee constitutes a separate committee position. Therefore the Bloc Quebecois should have four positions including the chair as opposed to the Reform's three.

We contend that this is an erroneous assumption as Beauchesne's 781 calls only for the chair to go to the opposition, not the official opposition. We would also cite Standing Order 106(2) which is silent on who fills the chair.

Since I have been unable to redress this grievance in committee or with the whips, I ask for the Speaker to uphold the rules of the House, specifically Beauchesne's 765(3), perhaps by using Beauchesne's 764 to communicate with the committee.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of my colleague's remarks he referred to citation 317 of Beauchesne's to plead for the Speaker's intervention in the case. I should remind the Speaker that the reference to citation 317 was perhaps selective and should remind the Speaker of what it says. Citation 317(2) states:

> A question of order concerns the interpretation to be put upon the rules of procedure and is a matter for the Speaker or, in a committee, for the Chairman to determine.

In other words, a reading of the complete citation tells the Speaker that this is an issue to be raised at the committee and not in the House.

In reference to the issue at hand, the membership of the committees in question, the issue was brought to the attention of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs with the hon. member pleading the case that there should be an additional member of his particular political party on the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

The Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs in its wisdom decided that it had been customary and agreed at the beginning of this Parliament that the party which holds the chairmanship of the particular committee loses a member able to participate in the debate because the chairman customarily, as the Speaker knows more than anyone else in the House, does not participate too frequently in the debates. That was agreed to at the beginning of this Parliament, at the beginning of the previous Parliament and the one before it.

In each one of those prior Parliaments and in the present one the official opposition, which traditionally chairs the public accounts committee, has an additional member to compensate for the fact that it loses one member in the debate.

Finally the argument was made by myself at the procedure and House affairs committee that if we add another member from another party to the public accounts committee, we disturb the whole balance within the committee. We then have to add two Liberal members to the committee to achieve the balance we must start off with under the rule invoked by the hon. member in question.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I will not quote Beauchesne because one can use different citations to make different points. One thing is for sure, when we conducted negotiations at the start of this Parliament two years ago and two whips ago for the Reform Party, which is now on its third whip—the government whip was not there at the time but you were—the three whips of the day, including myself, submitted various proposals on the right to speak, on question period, on members' statements and on committee membership. At that time, the Bloc Quebecois even offered five vice-chairmanships to the third party, which refused them because they were not to their liking.

They have now changed their minds. Fine by me but there were nonetheless recorded divisions in each committee. Under British parliamentary tradition, a specific role is reserved for the official opposition. We are aware of that. I would point out to the hon. member from the third party that the Quebec legislature, one of the oldest in the world, was operating as early as 1791. It is one of the oldest parliaments in the world, also under British parliamentary rules.

We understood that we were the second party because we had the second highest number of members in this House.

• (1535)

If the hon. member for Beaver River could stop talking, I could conclude my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, that is what we understood at the time. Had we been the third party, we would have settled the matter very quickly by following the practices of the previous Parliament. I think this goes without saying. It was often said at the beginning that the Bloc Quebecois was here to hinder proceedings. On the contrary, it is the third party, the Reform Party, that hinders the proceedings of this House with points of order, by calling into question the way committees operate. I thought that everything was clear. That party is the third party. If the situation ever changes, things will be different. It may become the fourth party but until then it is still the third party.

In the meantime, let us apply existing rules and debate the real issues—because there are important problems in both Canada and Quebec—instead of fighting on matters that were rejected by that party two years and two whips ago.

[English]

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to clarify something in this debate since I was the whip for the Reform Party at the time mentioned by the whip for the Bloc.

I had understood that negotiations and exploration of issues between whips were confidential. Now we have the whip for the Bloc accusing and misrepresenting what those negotiations actually did. I object to that. That is not the kind of behaviour one would expect from someone of goodwill.

Mr. Speaker, as you are aware because you were part of the discussions, the talk about chairmanships and vice–chairmanships of committees hinged around our contention that the Bloc was getting a disproportionate share of air time on question period. In order to quiet down those objections the Bloc made this offer of the vice–chairmanships of some of the minor committees.

In our view the air time on question period and the proportion of questions asked should not be mixed up with vice–chairmanships of committees. That was our objection at the time. It remains our objection. It certainly should not be used to suggest that we are not interested in vice–chairmanships of committees. We just do not think those kinds of tradeoffs are appropriate.

We have a situation in the House where there are two opposition parties, one of which is wanting to break up the country and one of which wants to get on with the national agenda. We think there should be fairness and parity at the very least in this situation, and that is what we are asking for in this point of order.

The Speaker: We are getting into a rather long debate. Permit me to make these comments.

The membership, as we all know, is struck by the House affairs committee pursuant to Standing Order 104(1) and it becomes a decision of the House. Citation 781 of Beauchesne's is a reference to a custom or a practice which has developed over time. It is the House that ultimately decides and that order should stand until the House decides otherwise.

Members are asking the Speaker to make a decision which would virtually override the decision made by the House. I do not believe that the Speaker is empowered to do that. The Speaker is a servant of the House.

Therefore, with all due respect, I believe that this should be left to the House affairs committee because it has been empowered to appoint the membership pursuant to Standing Order 104(1). That is where I would like the particular matter to be solved.

VIOLENT OFFENDERS

The petitioners allude to the tragic murders of Pamela Cameron, Jessie Cadman, and Melanie Carpenter, whose father Steve is organizing the public rally outside today for National Victims Day.

The petitioners ask Parliament to call upon the government to bring forward legislation to protect Canadians from dangerous and high risk offenders.

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 it is my pleasure to present a petition from 32 petitioners of the riding of Halifax West who call upon the government not to change the present tendering process for moving in the Department of National Defence.

SEX OFFENDERS

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by 138 people from the four provinces of Atlantic Canada.

Whereas the Government of Canada has enacted legislation, the charter of rights, and whereas the rights of repeat sex offenders are given precedence over the rights of innocent children as in the case of Sarah Kelly of The Pas, the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to enact legislation which would make the safety of our children a priority.

They request changes to be made to the charter of rights which would enable residents to be notified when repeat sex offenders are released into the community.

Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.) moved that Bill C–45, an act to amend the Corrections and Conditional Release Act, the Criminal Code, the Criminal Records Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act and the Transfer of Offenders Act, be read the third time and passed.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to move third reading of Bill C–45. This is a bill to update our corrections and parole system.

[Translation]

When I last spoke on this bill to open second reading debate, I noted that it was part of a strategic framework of initiatives that work together in order to carry out our red book agenda and demonstrated our commitment to safe homes and safe streets for all Canadians.

[English]

This is a goal this government takes very seriously. Over the past year this government has been working hard and has consistently delivered on this commitment.

We have brought forward amendments to the Young Offenders Act to respond to a number of concerns about it. Through Bill C–41 we have reformed the sentencing process by placing a new focus on better addressing public safety, ensuring more consistency in sentencing and being more responsive to the needs of victims.

We have also made a lot of headway on preparing and presenting legislation on gun control, on a new witness protection program and on DNA analysis. Also, legislation is being prepared within the government to take steps to deal with high risk violent offenders, which I will discuss further in my remarks.

There is a widespread desire to ensure that we have an effective federal corrections and parole system. This makes it all the more important for us to look closely at problems that are identified and seek concrete and meaningful solutions to these problems.

There may be some violent offenders who are unlikely to ever be able to lead law–abiding lives in the community. However, simply locking up more and more of the other kinds of offenders for longer periods of time will not achieve the long term safety of our communities that we all care about. Surely the United States experience proves this every day.

Where a sentence of imprisonment is considered necessary by the court, we must be mindful that the vast majority of offenders are given definite sentences with fixed terms. Therefore, they will eventually be released into the community. A conditional release of most offenders at a point in their sentence that is consistent with public safety, along with support and surveillance in the community during the balance of the sentence and programming while incarcerated, would appear to provide the best chance for the offender to be a stable, law–abiding member of the community. I submit that this offers the best prospects for the safety of our communities in the long term.

Bill C–45 is one building block in this government's response to the complex issues involved in having a criminal justice system that contributes to the overall protection of the public and the safety of our communities. Bill C–45 by itself is not the sole answer, but I believe it makes important reforms that demonstrate forward movement.

As I outlined to the House during second reading debate, the bill makes improvements in a number of substantive areas. There are situations where the protection of the public means the usual conditional release process should not apply. Therefore, the bill strengthens the detention process by responding to concerns about the early release of sex offenders who victimize children, which in the bill includes persons under the age of 18. The law will make it much easier for the parole board, at the request of the correctional service, to keep such persons in prison for their entire sentence. Where a further offence against the child is likely, such an offender can expect to serve the full sentence in custody without any period of conditional release in the community.

I would like to reiterate that this measure is not needed because we believe sex offences against children are considered more serious than those against adult victims but because the current legislation has proven less effective in cases involving children.

The second main area of change in the bill relates to the accountability and credibility of the National Parole Board. There have been many changes in the board's operation in the past year. This government has placed an emphasis on recruiting experienced, knowledgeable individuals. I believe the government's record of appointments in the past year bears this out.

The members of the board have an extremely difficult job to do, one that few of us in this Chamber would willingly take on. I think we should recognize the challenges involved and the dedication of the members. The board makes thousands of decisions a year and sometimes, despite everyone's best efforts, unforeseen tragedies in the community do occur. These are sad moments and are clearly very painful for those who are directly affected by them.

Every effort possible is being made and will continue to be made to improve the quality of the board's decision making. To support this, the board has recently adopted a code of conduct as well as performance standards. Renewed emphasis has been placed on training and evaluation.

Where problems arise and no other resolution has been successful, Bill C–45 provides for a review of the board member's performance and a process for remedial action to be taken. This amendment in Bill C–45 is there to be used where a board member's performance has clearly fallen below acceptable standards.

Frankly, I think the provision will prove to be a success if it does not have to be used. This may seem paradoxical, but I say this because if it does not have to be used it will mean that we are appointing top–notch individuals, we are providing the necessary training and support, and that corrective action is being taken before serious problems arise in the performance of board members that would necessitate use of the new procedure. At the same time, if the House adopts this measure and it is adopted by the other place and given royal assent, which I hope and expect it will, then the procedure is in the act and of course it is there to be used if circumstances require it.

The third area of reform in the bill is the provision relating to calculating the sentences of offenders who commit multiple crimes or who reoffend while on conditional release during the sentence period. Clearly, tougher provisions are needed to deal with these repeat offenders. Bill C–45 will help eliminate the situation whereby many such offenders may be immediately eligible for parole, notwithstanding the imposition of a severe consecutive new sentence, something that is possible under the current law.

Bill C–45 will cure in large measure the problem of the merger of sentences which has been raised with a great deal of concern by many organizations of the community, including police organizations. I hope this will help bring about the support of the House for this measure.

A fourth area of reform will give the National Parole Board the authority to impose residency conditions on offenders being released on statutory release who pose some risk of committing a violent offence but who do not meet the detention criteria that would, if met, allow the National Parole Board at the request of the Correctional Service of Canada to detain a person until the end of that person's sentence. This amendment was brought by the government during clause by clause study of the bill in committee in response to recommendations by the Canadian Police Association, the Stephenson inquest, and the standing committee itself.

Bill C–45 was one of the first bills to follow one of the new routes for legislation I proposed to the House as House leader and which was agreed to early in 1994. I am talking about referral of a bill to committee prior to second reading.

The Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs devoted a great deal of time and energy to reviewing this bill. In a little over three months the committee heard from over 60 witnesses on both this bill and Bill C–41, the bill on sentencing. Those individuals who testified represented 32 different organizations, including victims' groups, police organizations, professional groups, women's groups, aboriginal organizations, as well as a range of organizations from the voluntary sector.

During both the committee's clause by clause review and the debate during report stage in the House last week, a much broader range of motions was debated than would have been likely under the system of review of a bill in committee only after second reading.

While I know that some members may have been disappointed that not all the motions they put forward were adopted, this new process allowed members to consider and discuss issues that otherwise would have simply been ruled out of order. I want to thank the members of the justice committee for their work and I want to point out that at least some of the suggestions from members, including opposition members, have been accepted by the government.

I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks several other important legislative initiatives taken by this government to help provide safer homes and safer streets for Canadians. As my parliamentary secretary reminded the House last week, significant advances have been made by this government over the past two years to protect the basic rights of Canadians to live in peaceful and safe communities.

I want to conclude my remarks by mentioning some of the initiatives that were taken that did not need legislation to be adopted by this House.

In November of last year I announced a national information system based on enhancements to the Canadian Police Information Centre, or CPIC. This will make more and better information available to organizations across the country to help them screen out convicted sex abusers applying for work with children. These improvements to CPIC have allowed organizations to more thoroughly screen the backgrounds of individuals applying for paid or voluntary work with children or other vulnerable persons.

This government made a commitment in the red book to help prevent the sexual abuse of children by people in positions of trust and the government has acted on this commitment. While the CPIC system is now in place, as I have said, these measures will only be truly effective if organizations working with children are aware of the changes and the need for screening in general and make use of the new system. We have a role to play in providing leadership, education and awareness to make sure this happens.

Along with partners involving the Department of Justice, the Department of Health and the Canadian Association of Volunteer Bureaus and Centres, work is under way to create educational materials and to deliver training to voluntary organizations across the country on screening volunteers and paid staff in positions of trust with children and other vulnerable individuals. These measures will help us to communicate the importance of screening to help prevent child abuse. I am sure this is a goal we all share.

Another positive example of this kind of co–operative effort is recent work in the area of high risk offenders. In January of this year the Minister of Justice and I met with federal, provincial and territorial colleagues in Victoria to discuss the report of our task force on high risk offenders.

Not only did we achieve consensus around the criminal justice recommendations put forward in that report, we also had the opportunity to meet jointly with representatives from federal, provincial and territorial health ministers.

[English]

This allowed us to have a frank and useful discussion of those issues which crossed traditional criminal justice and mental health boundaries.

I believe we must take a comprehensive view in developing meaningful solutions to the issue of high risk violent offenders. This involves seeking effective answers which draw on the facilities of federal, provincial and territorial systems.

I think it was helpful that the task force looked at the system as a whole. It examined strategies at its front end as well as situations in which offenders are approaching release into the community. The report stressed and ministers endorsed a focus on improved measures at the front end of the system so we would hopefully have fewer problems arising at the eleventh hour when an offender is nearing the point of release.

Implementation of the report is under way and we will continue to fully involve our provincial partners.

Some of the matters in the report require further development before they can be put into operation, while we have been able to move more immediately on others. For example, I announced the implementation of a flagging system which will assist prosecutors in identifying cases which would be appropriate for a dangerous offender application.

The House will recall that if the court at the time of conviction and sentencing rules the accused to be a dangerous offender, that person can be imprisoned indefinitely. In a large country such as Canada where there is a high degree of mobility it is not always easy for a provincial crown prosecutor in one corner of the country to have all the information available which would have a bearing on how a case may be prosecuted. The flagging system which also makes use of the Canadian police information centre will help make that information link.

Similarly, a research project, the crown files project, is nearing completion. This project will provide concrete information about the factors which are significant predictors of dangerousness and which are central to successful dangerous offender applications.

The Minister of Justice and I are also working on legislative changes to make it easier for provincial crown attorneys to make more frequent and more effective use than is the case at present of the existing dangerous offender provisions in the Criminal Code. One key element involves making an indefinite sentence of imprisonment the only sentencing option for those found by the courts to be dangerous offenders. Another would provide for new expanded presentence risk assessments in place of the current requirement for the evidence of two psychiatrists, one for the prosecution and one for the defence.

Another important amendment we are working on in line with the task force report is to change the Criminal Code to create a new category of long term offender which would give the courts a new sentencing option. This would require long term supervision of the offender for up to 10 years following the end of the offender's penitentiary term.

In May the Minister of Justice and I convened a forum involving constitutional and legal experts, including those working with police and with victims groups, to tackle the matter of those offenders who remain dangerous at the end of their court imposed sentence. The forum was a productive session that is assisting us in addressing some very fundamental issues such as constitutional questions and how we identify those offenders with the greatest risk of reoffending in a violent manner.

We are working to develop further legislative action to deal with this important and troubling aspect of the matter of high risk dangerous offenders.

• (1605)

We must recognize the criminal justice system is a system. Activities and events in one part of it have a ripple effect through all the other parts.

[Translation]

More vigourous law enforcement places increased demand on courts and corrections, prosecutorial policies can direct more or fewer offenders to community or prison, the availability of community programs may determine what sentences courts view as realistic.

[English]

Actions seen as positive from one perspective may have unintended negative side effects. Clearly the criminal justice system is very complex. Moreover, the various segments which make it up come under the authority of different levels of government.

Nevertheless, it is truly one which can work best only if it is well integrated and co–ordinated. It is clear all levels of government, all sectors of the system, social policy groups, police and victims groups must work together. That is one reason last year the government created a national crime prevention council.

I believe we have made an extremely good beginning on improving the criminal justice system in the interests of all Canadians over the past few years. I thank members of the House for all their efforts on the criminal justice front and I look forward to our continuing good co–operation.

I ask that the House give full and speedy approval to the bill in this third reading debate so its useful aspects, every part of the bill, can go into effect very soon to help ensure all Canadians have safer homes, safer streets and the best possible communities for themselves and for their children.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, last spring in this House we debated Bill C–41 on sentencing. That bill was given royal assent on July 13. Bill C–45 is the legislative cousin of Bill C–41; it is a logical continuation to the bill on sentencing. One cannot function without the other, without placing the cohesion of our penal justice system in jeopardy.

Bill C–41 has now become a sort of road map for judges in determining sentences. Bill C–45 attempts to do likewise for the members of parole boards. It lays out the path to take, the modus operandi to be followed.

Today, we begin third reading of Bill C–45, a new step toward its passage by this House. This bill is wide–reaching in that it amends the Corrections and Conditional Release Act, the Criminal Code, the Criminal Records Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act, and the Transfer of Offenders Act.

Bill C–45 does not reform the key principles underlying the detention of offenders, and that is a great pity. Despite its obvious shortcomings, however, Bill C–45 represents at least a baby step in the right direction. The Bloc Quebecois has always had protection of the public at heart, particularly the protection of child victims of sexual offenders.

That protection requires a more rigid approach to parole, to the calculation of eligibility in consecutive or concurrent sentences, and to the conditions for release. A totally new tack is needed, but Bill C–45 veers only slightly off in a new direction, far too little.

Public safety must no longer be jeopardized by efforts to rehabilitate offenders. The solicitor general has caught the germ of compromise from his colleague at justice.

In its red book, the Liberal government promised to enhance public safety. Bill C–45, however, remains silent on protecting a specific category of victims.

Let me explain. The bill will change the criteria used to determine whether the perpetrator of a sexual offence involving a child should serve his full sentence. At the present time, the Corrections and Conditional Release Act permits the National Parole Board to detain, until the end of their sentence, sex offenders and other high–risk offenders who are likely to commit an offence causing death or serious harm after their release.

When the victims are children, the serious harm may not become apparent for a number of years. The victim may be too young to express the impact of what was done. It is therefore difficult for the Parole Board to prove that a child has suffered serious harm, to justify keeping an offender in detention.

Clause 42 of Bill C–45 would, in the case of a sexual offence involving a child, relieve the National Parole Board of the need to establish the presence or likelihood of serious harm. It would be enough for the Board to be convinced of the likelihood of a further sexual offence involving a child before the expiration of the sentence according to law.

In other words, if the Board is convinced that the risk is too great, the offender is kept behind bars. The burden of proof is substantially reduced.

As I said earlier, this is a small step in the right direction. However, this measure only affects sexual offenders whose victims are children.

What about adult women who are sexually assaulted? Are they not entitled to the same protection? When we talk about harm assessment, could the real harm possibly not become apparent until many years later in the case of women as well? If the individual assaulted a woman, it will be easier for him to get parole than if he assaulted a child.

The entire public needs protection, children of course, but also women, the other victims of sexual abuse. The solicitor general should reread the preamble to Bill C–72 which is about the problem created by the use of self–induced intoxication as a defence in cases of sexual assault, for instance. The victim in the Daviault case was 67 at the time of the assault.

For the benefit of the minister and those who have again overlooked women as victims of sexual assault, this is what it says in the preamble of what is now Chapter 32 of the Statutes of Canada, 1995, and I quote: "Whereas the Parliament of Canada is gravely concerned about the incidence of violence in Canadian society; whereas the Parliament of Canada recognizes that violence has a particularly disadvantaging impact on the equal participation of women and children in society and on the rights of women and children to security of the person and to the equal protection and benefit of the law as guaranteed by sections 7, 15 and 28 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms; . . . whereas the Parliament of Canada desires to promote and help to ensure the full protection of the rights guaranteed under sections 7, 11, 15 and 28 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms for all Canadians, including those who are or may be victims of violence".

That is what this government has to offer the public. Hollow sounding words that mean nothing except to Liberals suffering from acute navel–gazing.

The Liberal government says it wants to protect victims and potential victims, but when we look at the means it proposes to achieve this, we see the government still does not take this seriously.

• (1615)

I ask the solicitor general to go and recite this magnificent preamble to women who are victims of sexual aggression. I think he would have very attentive listeners.

What victims of sexual aggression should be getting from the solicitor general is the assurance that their aggressors will remain behind bars as long as possible and not return to haunt them through premature release.

What the solicitor general is telling them today is that they will not enjoy the protection the law should be giving them, because they were adults at the time the sexual aggression took place.

In 1994, 31,690 cases of sexual aggression were reported in this country. The victims may be divided as follows: approximately one third of them were under 12 years of age; another third were between the ages of 12 and 17. This leaves us with more than 10,000 adult victims. Are they not entitled to the same protection? Will the solicitor general finally have the courage to say that his promise of safer homes and safer streets applies to only one category of victim and not to others?

The solicitor general confided to this House on September 20, 1994, and I quote: "Turning to the bill itself, I believe it is important because it addresses significant issues of public protection in the area of corrections and parole. These are issues on which this government promised action in that same red book as part of its agenda to bring about safe homes and safe streets for Canadians. With this bill we are delivering on these promises".

When the solicitor general said his government was delivering on its promises, I wonder what promises he is referring to. Certainly not the one about everyone being entitled to the same protection at home and in the street. The government did not deliver on this promise. Bill C–45 is merely the beginnings of a solution.

I will give the solicitor general only a passing grade, because this is not the only failing of the bill.

The solicitor general promised on September 20, 1994 as well, and I quote: "We will also be making other improvements in the availability of treatment for sex offenders in the community and in prison".

In theory, gradual supervised reintegration into the community and the provision of help and support services constitute, according to some, the safest way for criminals to be released. I say in theory because, unless he agrees to undergo treatment, the offender may be a time–bomb just waiting for an early release to explode.

Another major flaw of Bill C–45 is that it says absolutely nothing about the kind of treatment individuals found guilty of a sexual offence involving not only a child but any adult victim should be given. It is wrong to say that the mere fact of making treatment more easily available will automatically reduce the risk of repeat offences.

Let me explain. At present, section 88 of the Corrections and Conditional Release Act states that treatment shall be conditional and dependent upon the inmate voluntarily giving an informed consent thereto and "an inmate has the right to refuse treatment or withdraw from treatment at any time".

The treatment referred to includes the care of a disorder of thought, mood, perception, orientation or memory that significantly impairs judgment, behaviour, the capacity to recognize reality or the ability to meet the ordinary demands of life.

In most cases, this treatment is for the very behaviour disorders that have landed the offender in prison.

If treatment remains elective and dependent upon the good will of inmates, those who refuse treatment are in fact refusing to change their behaviour and will not have changed a single bit by the time they are released.

The fact that Bill C–45 remains silent on this subject is disquieting to say the least. Remaining silent when it comes to tackling the real problem and boasting about keeping promises is the kind of attitude that is the trademark of this government. With respect to public safety, the solicitor general certainly did not deliver.

We have every right to wonder why Bill C–45, whose provisions affect thousands of inmates who are released into our communities, remains silent in this respect.

For example, in 1993, 10,317 inmates were granted full parole by national and provincial parole boards. Full parole is a form of conditional release, granted at the discretion of parole authorities that allows an offender to serve part of his sentence in the community.

Parole boards are administrative tribunals with powers to grant, refuse, amend, end or revoke parole for inmates.

Bill C–45 corrects a shortcoming that I have denounced several times in this House. The Federal Court has a general power of supervision over the National Parole Board. This is not enough. There was a need to develop some safeguard mechanisms within the framework of the Corrections and Conditional Release Act.

Bill C–45 provides for disciplinary or remedial measures against commissioners who do not follow good practices with competence and diligence.

Under new clause 155.2, the chairperson may recommend that a member of the board be investigated. The investigator reports to the solicitor general and may recommend removal or suspension without pay if he thinks that the member in question is unable to do the job properly, for example, because he or she is guilty of misconduct or has failed in the performance of his or her duties.

The National Parole Board is an administrative tribunal with significant discretionary powers; the solicitor general had a duty to act on our repeated demands. For once, we got our message across to the other side of this House.

As for the Reform members, it does not augur well. They continue to swagger about and think of themselves as gladiators in the parliamentary arena.

It is easy to behave like a cowboy when discussing parole and conditional release. Our western cowboys do so every day with their thundering comments on sad cases which, I agree, still affect too many victims and their families. But it is easy to make political mileage at the expense of these people.

We realize that our criminal justice system is not perfect and that there will always be room for improvement. Bill C–45 is flawed in certain respects, but it is nevertheless a step in the direction which the Bloc has always advocated.

However, our reform cowboys would rather get rid of the whole system to bring justice to the victims. The wild west has a way of its own. The member for Wild Rose best exemplifies that way of doing things. During the debate at report stage, he invited the solicitor general's parliamentary secretary to visit his riding and to explain the government's ideas regarding Bill C–45. The member for Wild Rose said, and I quote: "You want to sell my people in Wild Rose all your wonderful solutions to crime? You are welcome and good luck. If you think I am loud, wait until you get out there".

As you can see, Reform members have innate knowledge and they know what is good for Canada. This is yet another reason for Quebecers to distance themselves. Quebec uses a different approach because it does not deal with the same type of criminals. The results conclusively show that we are on the right track and that our system should serve as an example.

In 1994, Quebec had the lowest rate in Canada for violent crimes of any category, including sexual assault, assault and kidnapping. Quebec also has the best record for other types of offence to the Criminal Code, including the violation of conditions for release on bail, crimes against public order, arson, prostitution and use of offensive weapons.

Western solutions are not adequate for Quebec. Quebecers are peaceful people. They advocate civic–mindedness, tolerance and balanced solutions to their legitimate concerns regarding public safety. Although not perfect, Bill C–45 deserves the support of the Bloc Quebecois.

[English]

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure where the member who just spoke gets her information about the west. Perhaps she might want to visit out there. I live out west and I do not in any way meet the description which she has given the House. I am a little bemused by that kind of simplistic labelling. Perhaps she will have an opportunity to see other parts of the country one day.

Today we are debating Bill C–45. It has been introduced in the House, examined by a committee and is now at third reading which means that if it passes third reading it will become law very shortly. Therefore, I would like to give a bit of an analysis of this bill and whether it could be improved.

As the House is aware, the Reform Party introduced quite a number of motions to this bill, none of which were accepted by the government. Those motions in our view would have gone a long way toward achieving the stated aim of the bill which is to make our justice and corrections system more effective, particularly in protecting the public. As most members know, there have been 78 re–offences by people who were out on parole in the last year. These people have killed, terrorized and invaded the homes and lives of innocent people.

Canadians have been asking for many months that something concrete and decisive be done about this situation. Therefore, we looked anxiously at Bill C–45 to see whether that had in fact been the result of this bill. Unfortunately we find that it is not.

Bill C–45 is very technical. It has a lot of administrative details about the transfer of prisoners, the calculation of sentences and the figuring out of when people are eligible for parole and when they are not. However, there are some real flaws in the bill. It is interesting to note that the bill was floating around the Department of the Solicitor General in the last Parliament when the Tories were governing. It has now been introduced by the Liberals in a watered down version. It is not even as effective, as strong or as decisive as the original bill. We find that extremely unfortunate.

We feel a number of the provisions in this bill should have been and could have been made much stronger and given a lot more teeth. We wish the government had listened to those proposals. Unfortunately it did not.

For example, we talk about the detention of people who commit offences while on parole. When people are on parole, given a chance to go back out into society and be upright citizens, they have been told: "You do not have to serve the whole sentence you have been given. Now you can go back out into society". We do not have in the bill a requirement that when people abuse that privilege they have to serve the rest of the sentence they should have served when they were out on parole and the entire sentence for the new offence. Again they are eligible for parole on the second offence they committed when they have already abused the privileges and the opportunity they were given as parolees. We really object to that.

When offenders have shown once that they have no respect for the privilege of parole, an early opportunity not to have to serve their full sentence, why should they be given the same consideration the next time out? How many times do they have to be sentenced and not have to serve their full sentences before we start sending the message that we really mean business about people who violate the rights of others?

That was not done in the bill. It should also have demanded full term detention for all dangerous offenders deemed capable of repeating their offences.

As justice critics we visited prisons over the last few weeks to familiarize ourselves with aspects of the justice system. One of the questions I like to ask when we talk with prison administrators, representatives of guards and prisoners is: "If there were one thing you could change about our justice system, what would it be?" Quite often the answer includes some demand or plea.

Officials and frontline workers in prisons know the offenders who are likely to reoffend. They know these people. They work with them every day. They know their attitudes. They know the way they think. They know the way they operate. They know how they respond to opportunities they have been given. They say: "When we know good and well that these people will reoffend, please let us keep them off the streets and out of our communities".

The bill was a golden opportunity for the government to allow that to happen. It did not do it and it did not support a Reform amendment that would have allowed it.

There are administrators and guards in our prisons who say: "Please do not make us put these people who are a danger to society back out on the streets". Our government says that it is all right and out they go. There has to be something wrong with our justice system. It is no wonder the people who work in the system are as frustrated as the citizens and the victims of repeat offenders.

Other people have mentioned the concern in society that sexual assault is not deemed in and of itself to be a danger or to cause harm to adults. Clause 129(3) of the bill states that the parole board may order an offender not to be released from imprisonment before the expiration of his term if the board is satisfied that the offender is likely, if released, to commit an offence causing serious harm to another person or a sexual offence involving a child before the expiration of what otherwise would have been the offender's sentence.

We are very unhappy with the distinction made in this clause between serious harm to another person and sexual offence involving a child. We would have thought that offenders who were deemed to be likely to commit a sexual offence against anybody should be made, at the very least, to serve their full term. Never mind going on, as we have suggested, and being incarcerated indefinitely if they are deemed to be likely to commit a sexual offence.

Sexual offences against children are the only crimes that would make a person serve his full term. We just wonder about that. The government makes very loud noises about caring and compassion, particularly for women, and then it says that a sexual offence against an adult woman may not be deemed to be causing serious harm. It has to be shown that a sexual offence against an adult woman involves serious harm.

Sexual offence against any female whether she is eight or eighty is by definition a serious harm to the individual. I am very surprised the government would make a distinction and say that sexual offences against children will keep somebody incarcerated and not be too concerned about sexual offences against any other woman of an older age. I object to that and I think all Canadians should object to that. I find it a very unacceptable distinction in the legislation.

Much is made by the government side about holding the parole board more accountable. All the bill does is allow the chairman of the parole board to call an inquiry when an offender released on parole by the board reoffends. Can we imagine a chairman of the board who let an offender out who reoffended being the best person to decide when the actions and the decisions made by the parole board should be investigated? Is that not a bit like asking the fox to guard the hen house?

If we have a parole board that has screwed up, that has let somebody out who has hurt other people, should the chairman of that body decide whether the particular decision should be investigated?

One of our amendments was to mandate an investigation of the parole board decision in any case where an offender was let out into the public on parole and reoffended. Here we have a situation where only the chairman of the parole board can mandate that kind of investigation.

When Liberal members applaud the bill as putting restrictions on the operations of the parole board, the public should be aware of how toothless those restrictions really are in that the power to hold the board accountable can only be exercised by the chairman of the board. Certainly that is not what the public has in mind when it talks about holding the parole board more accountable and having its foul–ups reviewed.

There was an opportunity in the bill to do a number of things that the public has been asking for. Yet we see that the bill has fallen far short. We in the Reform Party are in a real dilemma about the bill. The weak, almost ineffectual steps taken in the bill will not necessarily hurt anything. The government should have done much to help straighten out the system and get it more decisively and solidly on the side of making sure that our justice, corrections and parole systems really do the job for Canadians. The bill just does not do it.

What do we do? There is nothing here we could not support because there is really nothing in there at all, except a bunch of administrative add–ons that may or may not make very much difference. How can we support a bill that should have done something substantive for Canadians, for the criminal justice system and for the reforms that the Liberals are so fond of talking about, promising and saying are a piece of the action, when it just does not deliver?

On balance, when the government introduces a bill that should have done the job decisively, strongly and effectively and fails miserably, how can we support that? How can we say this is something worthy of support? We cannot do that.

• (1640)

For some of the reasons I have mentioned and some of the reasons my colleagues will be mentioning, we say to the government that the bill is not good enough for Canadians. It is not something the House should support. It is not something we can in any way suggest does the job that should be done.

We ask the government to take back the bill and give us something that does the job. Then we will support it 100 per cent.

Mrs. Sue Barnes (London West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to speak today on the motion for third reading of Bill C–45, an act to amend the Corrections and Conditional Release Act and related statutes.

Recent polls and letters received from constituents indicate that crime is a major concern among Canadians today. Among other vital issues such as national unity and the health care system, individuals are greatly concerned with crime. Only matters relating to the economy and the deficit seem more important to our fellow citizens. It is clear that the government must assume leadership in this area.

We have already made a commitment to address the issue. The red book stipulated our commitment to fight crime and violence by more effective measures and social reform. Last fall the solicitor general introduced the bill as part of a strategic framework of initiatives for safe homes and safe streets for all Canadians.

I will address the second main area of change resulting from Bill C–45, the accountability of National Parole Board members. However first let me briefly explain the concept of parole.

Canada's discretionary conditional release system is based on the principle that a gradual, controlled re–entry to the community better serves the interests of public safety than does direct release. It is a way of managing with supervision and conditions the transition from incarceration to life in the community. The numbers support the principle.

Clearly the performance of the National Parole Board is only as good as the decision it makes. Consequently the credibility and accountability of the board are directly linked to the qualifications and judgment exercised by its own members and to the quality, completeness and accuracy of the information provided to the board for review. The requirement for board members to have the relevant skills and knowledge to make sound decisions is essential in order to perform their responsibilities professionally.

Board members face the difficult task of making decisions about the timing and conditions of an offender's release in a manner that contributes to the long term protection of society. It is therefore only logical that the individuals who make those decisions are chosen from the best qualified candidates.

As mentioned by my hon. colleagues, there has already been considerable progress in this area and in others. Over the last several months a number of important events and activities have taken place which have helped to shape a renewed course for the National Parole Board.

This was largely brought about with the appointment of a new chairperson, Mr. Willie Gibbs, who brought to the board impressive knowledge and experience in the criminal justice system. Mr. Gibbs was chosen after a comprehensive selection process, and a similar system is now in place for all member appointments. Already new board members have been recruited under these provisions. It should be noted also that the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs has the ability, which it has been using, to call new appointees before the committee for questioning.

Let me explain these measures in more detail. These appointment provisions include a set of revised criteria which all applicants must meet, emphasizing experience and knowledge of the criminal justice system and in particular corrections and conditional release systems in Canada.

National Parole Board vacancies are now advertised in the Canada Gazette and include the qualifications and abilities required. After a screening process those who ranked highest in meeting the criteria are interviewed by a committee chaired by either the chairperson or the executive vice–chair of the National Parole Board. A list of successful candidates is then submitted to the Solicitor General of Canada. That list is then reviewed and sent to the Privy Council Office for the final appointment.

In all regions of Canada applicants have gone through the process and new part time and full time board members have been selected.

• (1645)

The revised appointment process does not preclude the fact that current board members are competent, but it does underscore that the Government of Canada recognizes the difficulties of being a board member and ensuring the challenges are met with the kind of knowledge and competence these positions demand.

In addition to the improvements I have already mentioned, the National Parole Board adopted a code of professional conduct and performance standards to guide all board members in their duties. The specific provisions of the code of professional conduct cover such areas as promotion of integrity and independence, general conduct, conflict of interest, decision making, conduct during proceedings, continuing professional development and disqualification and reporting, to name just a few.

These standards and the code of conduct were created to better articulate board members' individual accountability as decision makers and to preserve the integrity of the board itself. They represent the members' acceptance of the highest ideals of professional conduct and the responsibility of board members for decisions that directly affect the interests and safety of entire communities as well as individual victims, offenders and their families. Most important, these high standards promote respect for the law and will help to improve public confidence.

The proposed amendments for the adoption of a disciplinary system for board members were made in order to correct a board member's performance if it has fallen below acceptable standards. The enactment authorizes the chairperson of the National Parole Board to recommend to the minister that an inquiry be conducted by a federal court judge to determine whether a board member should be suspended without pay, be removed from his or her office or be subject to other disciplinary or remedial measures. This measure is not intended to second guess board members or to respond punitively where a case has gone wrong despite everyone's best efforts. Rather, this would be a review mechanism available where a member is clearly not performing up to acceptable standards.

The solicitor general has stated that he hopes this provision will never be used. I am confident this is a hope all of us share on all sides of the House, as it will mean that the renewed appointment process and proper training are working well.

The solicitor general also mentioned the need to improve the quality of decision making at the National Parole Board. This is another area in which the board continues to adapt to changing needs to ensure the best possible decisions are made. These measures have already been implemented and I name here just a few.

First, the board has created a national training framework. Board members require comprehensive orientation and continuous and continual training and development to keep abreast of changes in law, policies and procedures, risk assessment and management and generally to improve their performance.

Second, thorough reviews of specific case audits in national investigations are used as training tools to ensure procedures are followed and duties are performed in accordance with the law. Investigation findings and recommendations may also be used in performance appraisal systems.

Third, all board members are currently subject to annual reviews of their performance. The first round of appraisals is now completed and has provided the board with an opportunity to address any weaknesses identified, provide the needed training and take appropriate corrective action in certain cases.

Fourth, a new training package is provided to board members which addresses the area of risk assessment alone. This cohesive training package focuses on how current research, theory and opinion in the human and social sciences can assist National Parole Board members in their decision making relating to risk management and risk reduction.

It is obvious that despite the most recent and precise risk assessment tools available, tragedies can and do occur. These tragedies affect all of us deeply and we must react by seeking solutions to prevent further tragedies. However, we have all come to recognize that each case represents different and often complex challenges and that even the best research can yield less than perfect predictions of reoffending. Our corrections and conditional release system is based on human assessments of fellow human beings. Even with all of the available information, predicting human behaviour has never been and will never be an exact science.

I think it is important for Canadians to have a clear understanding about the success of parole as measured by recidivism rates. A successful parole is measured by completion of sentence time without revocation of parole. Follow–up studies done for the parole board over the last few years have shown a success rate of approximately 70 per cent for full parole releases granted by the board. Studies showed that some 15 per cent of full parolees were returned to prison because of breach of a parole condition, while 13 per cent committed a new crime.

Primary consideration of any parole board decision revolves on the concern always for public protection. We should also note that the average annual cost to incarcerate an adult in Canada is $46,000, while supervision of an adult in the community costs on average $8,500 per year.

There are other areas in which we can work together to minimize the risk posed by offenders. Bill C–45, including its changes to the National Parole Board, clearly represents a step toward the government's commitment to public safety and security. The changes dealing with the National Parole Board have not been created and will not be carried out in a vacuum. They are only as good as the criminal justice system in which they operate. Every effort must be made to work in partnership with other agencies and with the communities we represent so that use of the limited government resources is maximized to ensure public safety at every stage in the offender's contact with the criminal justice system.

As the MP for London West, I have spent time in my city visiting the facilities and the people involved with our parole system. As the solicitor general has stated, the system will work best if it is well integrated and co–ordinated.

I am sure we all seek an efficient, professional corrections and conditional release system. To this end, I join with my other colleagues in the House in urging all members of the Chamber to support the amendments reflected in Bill C–45.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I do have one question relating to the statistics and the demographics the hon. member has put before the House.

I constantly hear from the government, in particular in the last speech, about success rate, how successful the parole board has been and how successful the management of crime has been as far as the government is concerned. I would like to ask what the member or the government would do with the unsuccessful circumstances. For instance, I got a telephone call in my riding from a parole board member who went on and on about the 87 per cent success rate. I reminded that individual that this means there is a 13 per cent failure rate and that it is the failures that are affecting family after family.

When will the government look at the failure problem and not rely on statistics from the government department that has the problems? Those statistics are typically about success rates. Could the member please respond?

Mrs. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

The parole system is very difficult to understand one has not been involved with it personally or if it has not been thoroughly explained.

Failures will always occur in any system invented and dealt with by humans. Unfortunately, we are not clones of one perfect being on this planet and there will be error. We have to strive to create the best system we are capable of.

The law will change and will continue to change. I do not think any of these ministers who are trying to accommodate the concern of the public and the reality of our system of justice in the country will stop providing better and better legislation as time goes on. We move forward one step at a time.

What I want to point out to the member is that what this act talks about are sections dealing with the parole decisions. It is a fact that we do have more successful interventions by our justice system with the parole system where people get conditional releases than if they just hit the wall where they are released into the public, where there is no parole given.

• (1655)

In actual fact, our success rate is much higher than if somebody comes to the end of the time they have to serve by law and walks onto the street, because there has been no management in the community with the assistance and the tools that we can provide, and this act provides, if we just say the time is up and let them go. Our success rate is better with this parole system. Fortunately for Canadians, these are the statistics and they are correct.

[Translation]

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I read with great attention the speech by the hon. member. I found it interesting, especially when it comes to improving the parole board. I think there is a need to improve the way the board operates as well as the appointment process. I hope that the government will keep its word because we were also promised that there would be no partisan appointments to the IRB, the Immigration and Refugee Board, that appointments would be based on competence, but we are not quite there yet.

My question has to do with the application of this bill. Why does it not apply to sexual offenders whose victims are adult women? As the hon. member for Saint–Hubert said, last year, over 10,000 cases involved adults and not only sexually abused children.

[English]

Mrs. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member across the way. I do want to address that because there is a misapprehension that we somehow care less about adult sexual assault victims. That is not the case.

The case is that we really want an equalized treatment. Most adult women who are sexually assaulted do realize and recognize very rapidly the impact of that assault and are usually in some manner able to articulate that well. The parole board can be given information by the victim of that assault and that will be in the case preparation material. They can file materials that will help build that case. However, that is not true and has not worked for young sexual assault victims. There are many instances where young children who are sexually assaulted have great difficulty in articulating this and sometimes keep secret what happened.

In that instance, we have taken corrective action in this act. It is not to minimize assault to any person, but there is a mechanism there to prevent something that was not allowing us to realize the impact of the serious harm done to somebody.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for the fifth time to speak on Bill C–45.

Before addressing some of the specific things that are not in this bill and were in fact refused by this government to be put in this bill, I want to talk about a couple of semi–quotes that were spoken here today.

First, my colleague across the way says we must move forward one step at a time. This is once again the Liberal way of managing, one step at a time. It astounds me that this government cannot take a bigger step rather than one little step at a time. What is the problem with this government which insists we take just a little bit at a time? A good example is the Young Offenders Act that the justice minister spoke about at noon today in front of the Parliament buildings. He expounded on how good a job the Liberals have done on the Young Offenders Act. It is a poor job. It is an abysmal failure. One only has to ask the victims of violence groups who are involved with the Young Offenders Act what they think. They will tell us it is an abysmal failure. One step at a time is not good enough today.

I have a couple of other comments. The solicitor general in talking to this bill said: "Sex offences are considered more serious against children than adults". Just where does a Liberal government get that idea from?

I could refer the government time and time again to cases I have been involved with relating to adults who were viciously and sexually attacked who would disagree with that comment. I know a lady by the name of Joan who is watching now. We went to court together to deal with the creep who got her. Joan is 63 years old. I do not think for a minute that Joan, who was sexually attacked, would agree that sex offences are considered more serious against children than adults. What kind of statement is that coming from any government much less a Liberal government?

The previous speaker said: "Most adults realize the effects of a sexual assault". That is some kind of convoluted reasoning to provide more impetus, something for the victims of child assault than for adults. What kind of reasoning is that? Most adults realize the effects of a sexual assault. That is a reason to downplay the effects of a sexual assault on an adult? What kind of logic do we have in this House of Commons?

They can shake their heads but we are right.

An hon. member: You're far right.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Far right, thank you.

The solicitor general talked about bringing forward the Young Offenders Act and how the government did a good job on it. He then talked about gun control, another abysmal failure of dealing with crime. We now have to realize that the largest percentage of this bill was in the House before. You may recognize it. It was brought in by that party from Jurassic Park. That goes to show us where those two parties come from, the same bent. There is no change and there is no plan.

There is going to be some accountability in the National Parole Board. When I asked my question of the previous speaker I asked it for a clear reason. It was because of the numerous discussions I have had with parole board members and my attendance at numerous parole board hearings. The difficulty I have with some of the reasoning of the government comes from the fact that it leans on success rates. Success rates, while nice, do not give any accommodation to the failure rates, the victims.

When a parole board member phones me and says they have an 87 per cent success rate, I tell them to give some thought about the 13 per cent failure rate. Those are the people coming through our doors.

Let us have a little look to see what things were put forward to the government by the Reform Party which the government said: "No, we reject that in Bill C–45". Let us see if the Canadian people would agree with this Liberal government. We said: "Why not provide for compensation to victims of crime and for medical treatment for victims of sexual assault to be paid for by the perpetrator?" Was that accepted by the government? No, indeed. Why? Ask a Liberal. If Canadians were to ask the people on this side of the House we would say there is more to the problems of a victim than just room and board payback.

• (1705)

This is the government that still gives old age security, CPP, guaranteed income supplement and GST rebates to inmates. The government is still intent on saying it can now introduce a 30 per cent charge for room and board. Come on.

We talked about no statutory release for violent offenders. Would the government go along with that? No, it would not. What is wrong with no statutory release for violent offenders? The government knows darn well that the greater percentage of inmates will reoffend when they get out. If it does not believe that through statistical data it should ask the wardens, talk to the inmates. They will confirm it.

We said: "Why not ensure that criminals serve their full sentences if conditional release is revoked or suspended?" What is wrong with that? The Liberals do not agree. In other words, if an inmate gets out on unescorted temporary absence and reoffends he is hauled back in. His parole is revoked but he is entitled to apply and gets back out on parole. If these people are getting out on parole, perpetrating the same or similar crimes, do you think they have been rehabilitated? Do you really think it is a wise idea to allow them to apply for parole again? My goodness.

The Deputy Speaker: I would ask that the hon. member please direct his remarks to the chair. I would be most obliged if he would do that.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, there is something wrong with this kind of thinking. In one particular parole board hearing I was at, an individual was before it for a revocation of his parole. He was a fraud artist. What was he doing? He was setting up his next scam while on parole. What happened? His parole was revoked. Is he entitled to get back out? Yes, indeed. He can apply again for parole.

Something has to be wrong somewhere if the government cannot acknowledge the fact that there has not been rehabilitation, that this individual will reoffend and that it is not healthy for the victims to allow him out. That does not seem like such a difficult problem to resolve.

We said we would ensure that criminals served their full sentences if conditional release is revoked or suspended. The government said no, it cannot agree with that.

Let us talk about a child sex offender registry. We suggested that a complete registry be established. The government says: "No. Do not do that. CPIC will look after it". CPIC is the system run by the police.

• (1710)

Why can the Liberals not acknowledge the fact that everybody is concerned about sex offenders and everybody wants and should have the right to know? They should have that right.

If I am living in any community in this country, before my children go out on the street I want to know if there is a sex offender living next door. It is not appropriate simply to leave it to the police. The police are not going to sit outside this guy's door all day long.

An hon. member: They are too busy registering guns.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): It only stands to reason that the police get involved with the next sex offence of that sex offender after he perpetrates the crime. The best defence for victims is to know who is living next door or down the street.

That is why people like Sandra Cunningham are leaders in this country. She was out in front listening to the wonderful words of the justice minister today. She prints the tri–cities child care guide. She prints the pictures, the MOs, the dossiers of pedophiles. That is necessary in this country.

I know there is not much agreement across the way because probably that pedophile's rights have been infringed upon.

Alan Winter came from my riding. The Liberals call these isolated incidents. I have more isolated incidents in my riding than most. At last count Alan Winter had victimized 31 children. He was incarcerated as a dangerous offender. He got 16 years. Unbeknownst to every single one of those victims he was allowed out in just over five years. Nobody knew he was out. There was no registry. I am not even sure the police knew about him. The only reason they found out is because more victims were going to lay charges against him and they said: "He is not in here any more". It does not make sense. This is not partisan politics, this is the real world. These are real, sincere problems.

Another amendment we asked for was a mandatory review of parole board decisions where a violent offender is released early and commits another violent offence during release time. That was rejected by the government.

I have spoken about Wayne Perkin in the House more than once. Motion No. 19 was very appropriate for Wayne Perkin. Good old Wayne knocked on a door in Aldergrove in my riding and encouraged the lady to go out in her garden shed to get a lawnmower. When she went in with him what did good old Wayne do? He beat her over the head with a hammer, taped her hands behind her back, injected her with cocaine and raped her. That was not sexual assault as the lawyers would call it, it was rape.

What did Wayne get courtesy of our judiciary in Canada? Six years. Her life will never be the same.

• (1715)

The parole board let him out early, the good old parole board. What did Wayne do? One would think maybe a miracle had happened and after two or three years and maybe good old Wayne turned into a good fellow. Maybe he took an anger management course. They let him out early.

Mr. Dhaliwal: Do not get too angry.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Do not get too angry? What do these people think we are talking about here? Good old Wayne went into an apartment and injected Angela Richards with cocaine. Is this familiar? He stabbed her 20 times, killing her.

When I was sitting in court during the sentencing I thought there was something missing in the courtroom besides the 50 of us who were allowed in crying. Where was the parole board that let him out early? Angela Richards would be alive today. The board should have been sitting there listening to the rest of us cry. Then there should have been a mandatory review. Those responsible should have been fired and taken out the door as fast as Wayne Perkin was when he was let out of prison.

What do we ask for in the bill? We would have required a mandatory review of parole board decisions when a violent offender is released early and commits another violent offence during release time. Is that too much to ask? The answer over there is no, we do not need that.

Perhaps the Wayne Perkin case was an isolated incident. The members across know it was not. For the life of me I do not understand why these backbenchers do not get on the cabinet to get its members to change their minds on some of these things.

It is like digging holes on a beach; the water keeps coming and the sand keeps filling the hole. How do we make this government listen? How many people does it take out in front of the House of Commons to put some sense into a Liberal government? Is it that it just wants a really good fight in the next election? We will see who comes out on top on this issue.

What I talked about the other night bears repeating, the mentality we are dealing with in corrections today. If I can recall all 23 reasons why it pays to be a criminal in this country I will riddle them off. We are talking about charging an inmate 30 per cent for room and board. It is not 70 per cent, not 100 per cent, but 30 per cent. They cannot have very much behind closed doors in prison.

Let us see what an inmate gets in prison and what our senior citizens or those with little or no income get on the outside. We know they get room and board. We know they get counselling, which is good. Anger management courses always work, they say. They have the right to refuse to work. They get free condoms, let us not forget that. They have the right to call their legal aid lawyer when they want. It is ironic that we have a government today that had to serve an injunction to Clifford Olson to stop him from filing lawsuits against the crown. At last count he had 30.

They have bleach for their needles; project bleach, as it is called in my riding. They get a one ounce bottle of bleach to prevent the spread of HIV. They sterilize their needles for cocaine intake.

Wait a minute, something tells me this is the same kind of logic we are dealing with for the parole board. There is a better way. Stop the drugs from coming into the prison. They are not allowed alcohol in prisons so perhaps they would allow the prisoners to have Diet Coke and ice cubes in the event they bring in booze. This is the convoluted logic we see.

Let us not forget any additional income an inmate may have. They get old age security. I found one individual, a double murderer, getting old age security. My grandmother would be less than pleased about that. They get the Canada pension plan, the guaranteed income supplement and GST rebates.

It is so frustrating to drive by Ferndale penitentiary, a couple of miles from my house, and see a nine hole golf course. It is frustrating when the law–abiding citizen has to go up the road and pay $30 or $40. I asked the warden why there was a nine hold golf course. The answer was for rehabilitation. They have to learn to get along on the outside. There is a difference. Many of us do not golf today. It is expensive. All of us have to pay for it.

If the government is trying to rehabilitate them I suggest it is going about it the wrong way. If members think this is Reform rhetoric, ask the employees of corrections. They will say some of this is a waste of time. It is not right.

When we compare people on the outside to people on the inside we wonder who is getting punished. They offer lots of taxes. They offer frustration. When we checked to see how much smokes are inside a prison compared with outside, they run anywhere from 42 cents to $1.62 cheaper per pack.

With Bill C–45 the government is out to lunch.

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, from the comments I have heard from the Reform member, one would think we were opening up the prison gates and letting the prisoners go free all over the country to commit murder and mayhem. What we are doing is tightening up the system, toughening up the system, having more concern for the protection of Canadians.

• (1725)

I suppose if the Reform Party members were writing this bill it would be perfect and another crime would never be committed in Canada. If Reform Party members are planning to vote against this piece of legislation perhaps they would like to explain why they want to vote against holding parole board members more accountable for decisions they make and why they want to vote against retaining people who are a danger to society, particularly a danger to children.

I do consider a crime against a child as the most serious, most heinous crime that can be committed. That is not one bit to undermine the horrendous damage done by any crime against any person, particularly a crime of violence or crimes that violate the sanctity of the person, as sexual assault or rape does.

When added to that is the abuse of the innocence of a child, I regard that as the most horrible thing anyone can do. As a woman I well understand—

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Fraser Valley West will have the right to reply.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, it is not right to assume the Liberals would be opening up the gates and letting these prisoners go free. In many cases I am not sure why they would want to go free. That was precisely my point.

It is difficult to oppose at times some bills in the House. This is where I get to the problem with the Liberal government legislation. Those members come half way to doing the job and we are saying the government has to take it all the way.

What do we do? We are in a conundrum of either supporting it or saying the government has not gone far enough. The government makes it difficult in those situations to get agreement from this side. That is truly unfortunate because the amendments to the bill I mentioned were not unreasonable.

The example the member gave about a crime against a child being a more severe crime is not the point. The point is if there is a sexual crime against a child or an adult, make them both tough. Do not isolate the child. Make it child and adult. Why could the government not have done that? That is the point.

The government is taking these issues half way. If it would take them all the way and incorporate some of these things and toughen up on this crime like the people of the country are asking for, there would be support from this side of the House.

The Deputy Speaker: It being 5:30 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

THE UNDERGROUND ECONOMY

The House resumed, from May 18, 1995, consideration of the motion that, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the following initiatives for addressing the underground economy: (a) an enhanced information campaign to educate the public and to encourage their participation in addressing the problem; (b) a limited amnesty on interest and penalties otherwise payable when a taxpayer voluntarily declares income previously undeclared; (c) a tax credit to taxpayers on home improvements and renovations to provide an inducement to create the essential paper trail and to serve as one of the primary vehicles for the information campaign.

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on the motion put forward by the hon. member for Mississauga South regarding the underground economy. I would like to begin by addressing the thrust of his proposal and comment on its three elements, because this proposal is really threefold.

Let me say right away that we agree with the thrust of the proposal, because I think everyone agrees that action must be taken to tackle the problem of underground economy. There are all kinds of numbers being put forward and debates taking place, some excessive, some not, but the fact remains that a lot of money is slipping through the government's fingers.

Naturally, taxpayers are not the only ones at fault here. It is because the tax system is becoming more and more complex and less and less acceptable to taxpayers, to the point that they feel justified in turning to the underground economy.

Let us look at the three components of the member's motion. First, he proposes an enhanced information campaign to educate the public. I think everyone will agree with that suggestion. However, we must be careful not to end up with some complex bureaucratic structure merely to explain the harmful consequences of an underground economy.

I think the public is quite well aware of the issue. However, such a measure would certainly be useful, and it would also be consistent with the concept of the people's responsibility as citizens. As elected representatives, we all have an obligation to promote individual responsibility, and we must also serve as an example. It might be necessary to make some members and ministers aware of the impact of the measures which they take and which lead people to reject our tax system.

The second proposed initiative is a limited amnesty on interest and penalties otherwise payable when a taxpayer voluntarily declares previously undeclared income.

Our system already provides for an amnesty on penalties for voluntary disclosures. As for the interest payable, we have to be cautious. Such a measure should be of a temporary nature, should have a time limit set. Otherwise, some people might be tempted to not declare income in a given year, since they would not have to pay any interest, even if they got caught. Such a scheme would enable these people to use the money for a year or two, before the department tracked them down.

If we are to have an amnesty, it should be defined and limited in time. It would be a way to go back to square one and do things properly from then on.

The third part of the motion is an interesting approach that should be explored. When we talk about the underground economy, what comes to mind most of the time is the construction industry. The underground economy flourishes there because regulations are so complicated. There are other consequences, but that industry is very much affected by underground activity, and sooner or later we will have to regain control over that industry because we are losing a lot of revenue. Entrepreneurs who want to operate within the law have a hard time fending off fierce competition. Just about everywhere, things are done under the table.

A tax credit for taxpayers seems like a good approach, but we should determine how far we are willing to go, how much the credit should be compared to the savings to be made by turning to the underground economy, because that is what the population will try to figure out, and how much it will cost the government compared to the revenues the tax credit will generate. If the credit is not high enough, it will not work. It will cost us more than before, and only some people will use it. But this is a good start, an approach to consider.

However, it must be done in close co–operation with the provinces, especially where Quebec is concerned. Each province may have its own set of rules for the construction industry, and the approach used must be consistent with the way tax revenues are generated in this sector.

The hon. member for Mississauga South has moved a motion which makes a lot of sense and which we will support. I would like however to address other concerns I have about the underground economy.

There was a lot of discussion in this House, in Canada and in Quebec when the GST was introduced. Many people link the increasing popularity of the underground economy with the implementation of the GST. I would like to remind everyone that the GST was not a new tax. It replaced another tax which the population did not see, because it was hidden, but the GST did replace another tax. What is new is that the GST applies to services.

When we talk about the underground economy and the taxation of services, we have a problem, because nothing is easier to avoid than a service tax. When a carpenter, a plumber or an electrician comes to your house and does not charge for his labour by the hour, it is very hard to find out whether he did or did not work or how long he worked. Ever since the government decided to get into taxing services, there is one element that is almost impossible to control because it all depends on the good faith of the public, a public that felt governments were taxing them enough already. This new tax has increased public dissatisfaction.

Oddly enough, I saw a poll when we were considering the GST—which has yet to be amended, but I will get to that—and it seems people work harder to avoid the GST than they do to avoid paying income tax. This despite the fact that income tax rates are often 30, 35, 40 or 45 per cent, which means 30, 35, 40 or 45 cents on a dollar earned, while in Quebec, the combined QST and GST is 14 per cent. Nevertheless, people will work harder to avoid the GST because they are upset by this tax and find it very hard to accept it.

Much of this can be blamed on the Liberal members opposite. When the GST was adopted, they were up in arms and even made a major commitment during the last election campaign to abolish the tax. After that they said very discreetly that they wanted to replace it with something else. Once in power, they said they could not afford to forgo 15, 16 or 17 billion dollars worth of revenue, depending on the year. Something else had to be found. But how, meanwhile trying to convince people that they got rid of the tax? Voters are not easily fooled and talk about it to their members, I am sure, because these are subjects that often come up in caucus meetings, apparently. Their commitment was not met because they were forced to collect this revenue, contrary to their campaign promises.

The Prime Minister has repeated this in the House. I quote him from memory but correctly I think: "We hate that tax and we are going to abolish it". That was two years ago. In my opinion discussing a tax, replacing it or abolishing it, can take a certain amount of time from the point the decision is taken. In reality, application can take a minimum of six months, generally at least a year, due to the time needed to explain it, to have people understand it, to try to gain its acceptance.

So two years of the mandate are down now, and after three years, for it will take at least a year, there will still have been no change, because agreement with the provinces on taxation reform is not possible.

There is a problem when the government creates expectations, when it wants to make this type of changes and does not make them. That does not do anything to increase people's confidence in the taxation system, much less in those who design it and those who have to administer it. The government will have to act at some point. It is nice to have these motions, I have nothing against the member who is moving it, but he will have to exert some pressure on his colleagues at Revenue and at Finance, and on the cabinet, so that they live up to their commitment and come forward with proposals, because we have not seen anything yet.

While they are talking about taxation, I would also like to talk about something else. In Quebec, at one point there were different views of the economy, and the government of Canada was perhaps more active on the economic front in the post–war era. During the war, it had taken over a lot of taxation power from the provinces, particularly Quebec. It never gave it back.

As a result, in Quebec, we have two income tax collection systems. Revenue Quebec and Revenue Canada both collect taxes, they each have their own income tax return; every year, we must fill out two income tax returns, because taxation can be a powerful economic development tool. Through taxation, each government imposes its own vision of things, and taxpayers have a hard time sorting things out. Very few of them are able to fill out their income tax returns on their own, not because they are lacking in skills or ability, but because the returns are just too complicated. I am convinced that there are not many members in this House who fill out their returns on their own. And yet, we are the lawmakers and the ones who pass legislation and establish policies.

So there is indeed a serious problem which, over the years, has led to confrontation between Quebec and Canada because Quebec would have liked to have full control over its tax system and use it as an economic development tool. But this is not the case. I would also like to remind people who are watching us today that, not only do we have two systems, not only do we pay taxes to both Quebec and Ottawa, but there are transfer payment mechanisms to transfer money from one government to another. We send our tax money to the federal government, which gives it back to the province through transfer payments, not always in the proportions that we would like. This system is cumbersome and complicated, and requires a lot of manpower.

To conclude my remarks, since I only have thirty seconds left, I want to say that the hon. member's motion makes a lot of sense, but I would like him to remind his colleagues that they have made a major commitment and that they will have to put forward concrete proposals, hopefully before Quebecers make a decision on October 30, on what they intend to do with regard to our tax system, particularly with regard to the GST.

[English]

Mr. John Maloney (Erie, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to address the House this afternoon on Motion No. 382 sponsored by the member for Mississauga South. I would also like to take the opportunity to commend my hon. colleague for his work in this area.

The underground economy that is the focus of this motion is of major importance and has implications for Canadians right across the country. There has been a great deal written about the size, extent, nature and causes of the underground economy.

As members are probably aware, estimates on the size of the underground economy vary widely, depending on the methodology that is used, from 2.5 per cent to 3 per cent of GDP to over 20 per cent. That translates into $20 billion to $140 billion a year.

The greater the activity in the underground economy the less revenue is available to governments. Underground economic activity creates unfair competition for honest businesses. Jobs are lost. Therefore, honest taxpayers are forced to pay more than their fair share of taxes.

We all know that deficit elimination and the eventual repayment of the federal debt will depend primarily on long term economic growth and job creation. While spending cuts may contribute to deficit reduction, why should we continue to cut programs when the collection of legitimate tax revenue could be substituted?

We need to seek out options and solutions. It is imperative that an attack on the underground economy be part of the overall solution.

For many individuals and businesses the underground economy has become a convenient way to avoid paying taxes. When these people take their financial transactions underground they are failing to make their contribution in support of Canada's social and economic programs. These people do not pay for the services they use. Instead, other Canadians are forced to pay more.

People who deal in the underground economy may feel that their financial situation justifies their actions. It may be because it has been several years since their last raise. It may be because they feel the tax system is too complex or unfair. Or it may be just basic greed. They see cheating the tax department as a victimless crime. Let me say that, whatever the reason, underground economic activity makes victims of us all. Indeed, all Canadians are victims and this does not sit well with me.

I ask members as well as all Canadians to consider the real cost of underground economic activity. The cost is large. It shows up in reduced essential services, taxes higher than they would otherwise be, unfair competition and a reduced standard of living for the honest taxpayer.

How does the underground economy affect a legitimate business which is trying to be competitive? The Canadian Homebuilders Association is concerned. Indeed, home renovators who evade taxes have an unfair advantage over honest contractors. Honest businesses are at a competitive disadvantage because they cannot offer a customer the same deal as that offered by someone who will do the work but not collect the taxes. The end result is that the legitimate business faces unfair competition and job loss.

I ask the members to put themselves in the place of an entrepreneur who plays by the rules and who diligently collects and remits tax to the government. How would they react if they lost work because someone dealing under the table outbid them for a contract? I would certainly be upset and I would insist that the government do something to restore fairness to my situation.

We must not forget the dishonest consumer. The dishonest consumer who takes the lower price and pays cash is cheating the system and becoming a party to the evasion of taxes. These consumers benefit from the full range of government services but do not pay their fair share. All they have done is take part in a transaction which jeopardizes our health, education and other essential economic and social services. This is simply short-sighted and unfair. It is illegal and criminal.

The underground economy results in lost revenues for the government which, as I have said, jeopardizes essential social and economic programs and forces honest Canadians to pay more taxes.

The motion before the House is a three–pronged motion. It suggests that the government educate the public and encourage their participation in addressing the problem. I agree that Canadians need to know the facts about the seriousness of the underground economy, how it affects each and every one of us and what can be done to reduce it. I also agree that governments cannot solve the problem alone. We, the citizens of Canada, all must do our part and fulfil our responsibilities.

We must tell Canadians the facts about the seriousness of the existence of the underground economy and how they can help to eliminate it. We must address the myth that everyone is doing it. We must emphasize that tax evasion is a crime and that it is not a victimless crime, as it is often argued. All Canadians are victims. Tax evasion leads to job losses, an increase in the deficit, honest taxpayers carrying more of a burden and legitimate businesses operating in an environment of unfair competition which often leads to bankruptcy. We must stress that people who evade taxes are cheating honest taxpayers and those in need. We must publicize the fact that 14,000 calls are received by Revenue Canada each year from Canadians who know tax evaders. Many more would call if they only knew that the follow–up would take place.

To ensure that everyone is aware that the government is serious about prosecuting those who deliberately defraud the tax system, the Minister of National Revenue publicizes convictions for tax evasion. The increased publicity and resulting embarrassment of a fine or imprisonment coupled with the payment of taxes, interest and penalties, has had a deterrent effect.

During the past year, officials of Revenue Canada have been actively consulting with individuals and associations across Canada on the issue of tax evasion, the underground economy and smuggling. Revenue Canada has sought and received the support of these groups. With the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, for example, the department established a working committee to investigate the causes of the underground economy, examine audit techniques and identify training that would assist in tracking down unreported or under–reported income, and identify opportunities for reducing the cost and administrative burden of compliance for businesses and individuals.

These groups are taking the message of the risks of dealing in the underground economy back to their membership. Every citizen and every business has a role to play in eliminating the underground economy. Individuals can start by refusing to deal with businesses and tradespeople who ask for cash payments. Businesses can do their part by turning down demands to do work off the books. Yes, all Canadians must do their part, individuals and businesses. Simply put, they must say no.

The second prong of the hon. member's motion calls for a limited amnesty on interest and penalties otherwise payable when a taxpayer voluntarily declares income previously undeclared. My colleague has stressed that the amnesty pertains only to interest and penalties, not to the taxes owing. The preferred approach is to encourage voluntary compliance. It does work, as 95 per cent of all revenues are collected without the need for enforcement action. Revenue Canada currently has a program in place for voluntary disclosure which would waive penalties if an official audit had not yet been initiated. However, interest would still be payable.

We must encourage an amnesty because it is very important to give underground economy operators the opportunity to come clean. We must be clear that underground economy is not normal business and that Canadians will not continue to tolerate dishonest business practices at their expense. Here is a chance for the business person to come out.

The third prong of my hon. colleague's motion is a tax credit for taxpayers on home improvements and renovations in order to provide an inducement to create the essential paper trail and to serve as one of the primary vehicles for the information campaign. By offering an input tax credit for the GST paid on home improvements or renovations, the taxpayer would be required to submit the original invoice as part of their income tax return. The objective would be to create a real paper trail in an area of abuse with which most people are familiar. It is a good vehicle through which we could educate the public on the crime and discourage action under the table. It would also help to support the honest businesses that are prepared to provide an invoice.

I have spoken to the people of my constituencies about the underground economy. Those who follow the law and pay their taxes do not like having to pay higher taxes because others are trying to cheat the system. Entrepreneurs who are trying to make an honest living say they do not like being at a competitive disadvantage from businesses and tradespeople who ask for cash payments to avoid paying tax. My constituents are also worried about how lost revenue is affecting the government's ability to maintain the social and economic programs so important to our well–being.

I will support my colleague's motion. I want to see that all legitimate taxes are collected so that the honest taxpayer does not have to bear the burden of both higher taxes and lessening of programs. The underground economy is not the norm and it is not acceptable to Canadians.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, as I start to make a few comments about this bill, I would first like to recognize the hon. member for Mississauga South, who proposed this motion. I would like to acknowledge the fact that it is aimed at correcting a serious problem we have in our country, which is the evasion of taxes, specifically the GST.

As the GST is such a magnet for all of the discomfort and discontent with the tax system in the country, it is not seen by the ordinary citizen as theft. It is not seen as stealing from each other by evading the GST.

I think the hon. member opposite has brought to the House a very important consideration. The social contract we all have is based on the premise of fairness, that we are all going to pay our fair share and that we will do so more or less willingly, provided everybody else is paying a fair share.

When we combine the fact that the GST is such a horribly unpopular tax with the fact that the average Canadian is just barely getting by and does not like to pay the tax in the first place, there is very fertile ground for tax avoidance. When people avoid paying taxes that are legitimately owed it means that somebody else is carrying their load, and that is just not right.

I want to commend the member opposite for bringing this motion before the House. Members know, but for the sake of Canadians who are watching I should point out that a motion brought to the House will not bind the government in any way to act on it. It is really just a means of trying to get the attention of cabinet and say that this is something we should do. Although it is votable, it is not binding. I am sure the hon. member would like to see it binding, but it just plain is not.

There are many things that happen in politics in the House and outside the House that are not binding, such as promises that are made during election campaigns. During the last campaign, members will recall members of the Liberal Party made a lot of hay out of the fact that they were going to get rid of the hated GST. As a matter of fact, I recall specifically being ridiculed on a campaign platform by my Liberal opponent because I said we could not possibly get rid of the GST without replacing it with another tax. The GST generates $18 billion in revenue. We just cannot say poof and it is gone. We have to deal with reality.

Here we are a couple of years later and the GST is still in place, still being corrected. That brings me to the problem we have in supporting this bill. We have to do more than just cure the symptom; we have to cure the cold.

We are in complete agreement that the GST has led to a burgeoning underground economy. Simply offering a limited amnesty is not of its own accord going to bring people back to the market. Advertising or letting people know that avoiding the GST or working underground is in fact stealing and is not something that should be condoned in our country would be a very worthwhile thing to do, with or without any of the other items in this bill. It would not hurt to use some of these Dr. Feelgood ads that are running across the country right now to say that if you are working in the underground economy you are stealing from your neighbour.

As earlier speakers have pointed out, how would you like to be in the renovation or construction business competing with and losing jobs to somebody who is constantly being paid under the table?

I had some extensive renovations done in my home a year ago. Just try to get them done and pay the GST. It is not an easy chore. There are quite a number of people in the construction and renovation business who will not do any work if it requires receipts. This is not to mention all the service industries that work under the table. We all know it exists.

The problem is that it is like a speed limit on a highway. You are tooling down a highway at 110 kilometres an hour and for no apparent reason the speed limit is 80 kilometres an hour and there is a radar trap there. Well, citizens will go wherever it makes sense. The reaction to the GST was a visceral reaction to the taxation levels in the country. That more than anything else is the reason people are not paying the GST. It is not seen by the ordinary Canadian to be a crime.

Rather than tinkering with this, rather than treating the symptom and not curing the cold, I would ask the hon. member opposite to give thought to joining with other colleagues in the House in a bipartisan approach to see if we cannot do something about the underlying problem in the tax system, which is a disincentive for reinvestment. My hon. colleague for Mississauga South well knows—far better than I because of his experience as a chartered accountant—what a disincentive it is for people in our country to reinvest profits. That is a much bigger problem than the GST problem.

My specific objection to this bill is not the thrust of the bill, which I think is honourable and in the right direction in saying that people have to get out of the underground economy. My objection is not to the limited amnesty, which would give people the opportunity to get out if they have become involved in the underground economy. While we would offer them a carrot, we should also offer a fairly substantial stick.

I do have a problem with the notion of offering a tax credit to people for renovations. We might be able to square that circle and address that problem if for instance we were to allow people to use an RRSP to do a renovation, just as they can for buying new homes, depending on the equity level in the home, but only if they bring in a qualified receipt showing the GST. That would then ensure the public purse does not get hit twice, once for the RRSP and again for the tax credit. What about the people who might do it themselves, or whatever?

I do not think we should be giving tax credits to induce people to obey the law. People should obey the law because it is the right thing to do. The advertising should be there, amnesty as the carrot, and a substantial stick for breaking the law. This is not to induce people to do the right thing because we are going to pay them to do it. They are going to do the right thing because it is the right thing to do and because the underground economy is no longer seen in the community as tolerable.

I would reiterate that the Liberal government promised to get rid of the hated GST. When I go out to buy my next article at the store I am pretty sure I am going to be paying the hated GST, which is two years after the fact. I would be very surprised if in the life of this Parliament the GST is gone.

Mr. McCormick: You will be surprised.

Mr. McClelland: I would be very surprised and delighted. Members opposite say that I will be surprised. I take that as a reaffirmation of the promise made during the election to get rid of the GST. We heard it here first. Once again the Liberals opposite are affirming their promise to get rid of the GST.

We should hope that perhaps the way they will do it is to get behind the notion of a flat tax and work with us and other parties, with members opposite like the member for Broadview—Greenwood, who has been working at developing a notion of the single tax for years. Finally it seems like this might be the opportunity. Let us put all of our energies together to cure the cold and not the symptom.

Mr. Larry McCormick (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I address the House today on Motion No. 382 introduced by the member for Mississauga South. My hon. colleague has done a great deal of study on the underground economy and I acknowledge all the work he has put into this.

I have given this matter considerable thought because many of my constituents have been directly affected by the underground economy. They are people who operate legitimate businesses. They have told me how their businesses are being hurt by the so–called under the table entrepreneurs. They want the government to do something about the problem before it is too late. These so–called under the table entrepreneurs are not the entrepreneurs I grew up with and started businesses with.

The greater the activity in the underground economy the less revenue there is available to governments. Underground economic activity creates unfair competition for honest businesses. Jobs are lost and honest taxpayers are forced to pay more than their fair share of taxes. For many individuals and businesses the underground economy has become a convenient way to avoid paying taxes, to not pay their fair share.

When these people take their financial transactions underground they are failing to meet their contribution in support of Canada's social and economic programs. These people do not pay for the services they use. Instead other Canadians are forced to pay more.

I ask all members, as well as all other Canadians, to consider the real cost of underground economic activity. The cost is large. I believe it is phenomenally large. It shows up in reduced essential services, taxes being higher than they should be, unfair competition and a reduced standard of living for the honest taxpayer. If every Canadian paid their fair share everyone would pay less. We have heard this before and we have to think about it to realize how we can all gain in this situation.

How does the underground economy affect the competitiveness of legitimate businesses? Many groups have talked to us. A major group is the Canadian Home Builders' Association. It is very concerned. Home renovators who evade taxes have an unfair advantage over honest contractors. Many small, legitimate businesses in my riding of Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington are being threatened by others operating underground.

Right from the start honest businesses are at a competitive disadvantage because they cannot offer a customer the same deal as offered by someone who will do the work but not collect the taxes. The end result is that the legitimate businesses face unfair competition and many jobs are lost.

My hon. colleague for Mississauga South has put forward new specific approaches in the motion to address the underground economy. He is offering a limited amnesty on interest and penalties when a taxpayer voluntarily comes forward in an effort to crack down by engaging more investigators on a contract or commission basis. People will hear that this message is for real and people will come forward.

This phase will continue as long as there is a favourable payback. We have to let the public know that when they patronize the supplier with a cash price without an invoice they are actually condoning fraud, and that by refusing to do business with those who do not give invoices they also help the business of honest taxpayers.

Turning to an input tax credit, this offer for GST to be paid on home renovations would be required in a very simple process. The taxpayer would submit the original invoice either as part of his or her tax return or by separate filing. The objective is to create a real paper trail. We all know about this area of abuse and it is time we recognized it.

A tax credit would be a good vehicle through which to educate the public on the crime and to discourage under the table action. A taxpayer would help to support honest businesses that are prepared to provide invoices.

Revenue Canada's voluntary disclosure policy allows individuals, partnerships, corporations, trusts and non–profit, charitable or other organizations to come forward to correct any deficiencies in any reporting to the department. The policy operates on a simple premise: When a disclosure is made voluntarily before the department has started an audit or other enforcement action, no penalties or other sanctions such as a prosecution for tax evasion will be imposed.

The taxpayer will only have to pay the amount, either taxes or duties owing, plus interest. This is fair since the interest reflects the true value of the money and the fact that those who have not paid their taxes on time have had the use of these funds.

Revenue Canada under its voluntary disclosure policy generally takes a responsible approach to collections. Arrangements can be worked out so that taxes owing to government are paid in a manner which does not cause undue hardship for the taxpayer.

Persons can make a voluntary disclosure by contacting any Revenue Canada office directly or by having their accountants or lawyers do it for them. A disclosure will be considered voluntary as long as it is made before Revenue Canada has started an audit or other enforcement action.

In my experience we get what we pay for. When we go underground to provide services or when customers accept underground services, we can expect lower quality work and lower quality materials because those businesses do not have to comply and will not comply with industry regulations.

As well and most important, consumers do not get the protection and the guarantees they would otherwise have if they had an authorized purchase order and/or an invoice. When the customer goes underground as well he or she has no recourse and no protection.

A little over a year ago an elderly woman in a village near my home was visited one day by three gentlemen in a pickup truck. They knocked on her door and said they knew that the winter had been severe. They wanted to check out her home in case they could do any little touch–up jobs for her and save her a lot of money. They spent half an hour wandering around her home in a village originally called Rogues Hollow, no pun intended.

They knocked on the door after they inspected the home and said: "The winter was very severe. There are a lot of problems with your back wall. Bricks are coming loose. Your chimney is ready to fall down. We have an estimate here for you; it is $6,200. If you pay us in cash, I have these professional men available who will do the work now. We can do the job for you today for $3,100". It is a true story. They did $300, $400, $500 or $600 worth of work that morning and she paid them the $3,100.

She was sick the next day. She phoned me at home. What can I do? It was in cash. Do we have to get hurt time after time, especially seniors, to see that these are not business people but crooks?

Hon. members opposite spoke about the most hated tax in Canadian history and how it has added greatly to the underground economy. I agree that when the GST arrived on the scene the underground economy exploded. Small businesses such as the retail business my wife Rita and I operated face the burden of more paper jungles. Our ministers have told us that when they change the GST there will be less involvement, less paper and less work for small businesses. I eagerly await that and will gladly remind my ministers.

My colleagues opposite have spoken of the GST. Small businesses are finally being recognized by the government. The Liberal government recognizes that jobs will come from small businesses. Recently the Minister of Industry announced micro–loans of less than $5,000 for small businesses. They will make a great difference. We can encourage businesses to come out of the closet and become legal or legitimate businesses.

The motion before the House suggests the government educate the public and encourage its participation in addressing the problem. I agree that Canadians need to know the facts about the seriousness of the underground economy and what can be done to reduce it. I applaud the member for Mississauga South for his efforts to stimulate decision on the issue. I urge members of the House to carry the message back to their constituents and I will to mine. I urge members to talk with their constituents about the underground economy, its seriousness and how it can be reduced.

I also agree that governments cannot solve the problem alone. We must all do our part and fulfil our responsibilities. I urge all members to support Motion No. 382.

Mrs. Karen Kraft Sloan (York—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I commend the member for Mississauga South for bringing an important issue before the House which demands the attention of members on both sides. The seriousness of the underground economy cannot be understated.

I am sure other members have talked to constituents about how difficult it can be to compete with those who deal in the underground economy and who insist on being paid cash. The greater the activity in the underground economy, the less revenue there is for government.

Underground economy activities create unfair competition for honest businesses. Jobs are lost and honest taxpayers are forced to pay more than their fair share. The government is committed to ensuring fairness in the tax system and has a strategy in place for ensuring compliance with the law. In November 1993 the Minister of National Revenue announced a series of measures to address non–compliance underground economic activity and tax evasion. The department has strengthened its ties with the private sector and the provinces.

During the past year Revenue Canada has consulted with more than 240 groups, which has helped the department to define its strategies, identify areas of non–compliance and explore measures for improving compliance.

Co–operation arrangements are in place with all the provinces. This has led to joint audits with the provinces, the sharing of audit strategies, training material and expertise. The department has strengthened its ability to identify non–filers and non–registrants and has increased and targeted its audits to focus on areas of high non–compliance.

The construction and home renovation sectors are being paid special attention. Revenue Canada officials in their consultations with industry and trade representatives have been told how revenues and jobs are being lost. Consumers lose out. They forfeit any guarantees of a quality product backed by a reputable firm. Workers seeking steady, secure employment are also cheated.

The government has taken steps to respond to the needs of an industry battling under the table entrepreneurs. The reason is straightforward. No business that plays by the rules should have to face unfair competition from those that do not. The honest taxpayer should not be disadvantaged by those who are cheating.

Revenue Canada has put special audit teams in place to look into transactions. The department examines the classified ads and visits construction sites in search of information that will help identify non–filers and non–registrants. With information from the financial records of lumber yards and building supply companies Revenue Canada can verify that the people who purchase construction materials are paying the tax they should on the work they perform.

There is also follow–up on leads from private citizens which often include individuals who are unhappy with the work they paid for and who could not get their cash contractor to respond to their complaint.

Revenue Canada has been working with the Ontario Association of Lumber and Building Supply Dealers. The association has agreed to display in its member stores a flyer which emphasizes the pitfalls for consumers when dealing under the table.

The department is involved in ongoing consultations with the Canadian Home Builders Association. Specifically Revenue Canada and the CHBA have established a working group to co–ordinate efforts to address the underground economy in the home renovation business. The working group considers how the CHBA and its local associations can assist Revenue Canada to identify those businesses involved in under the table activity. The CHBA and Revenue Canada can work together to ensure Canadians are aware of the risks associated with dealing in the underground economy. Consultations between the department and CHBA are taking place at the local and national levels.

The February budget measure for a reporting system for payments to subcontractors in the construction industry is a direct result of consultations with representatives of the construction industry. The measure and others in the budget reinforce the government's commitment to a fair tax system and a level playing field for businesses.

Revenue Canada is now discussing with representatives of the industry and trade associations as well as professional accounting and legal associations how the reporting system should operate and what other measures might be taken. The government wants to improve compliance in a way that does not increase the burden and cost of compliance for business.

The motion of the member for Mississauga South contains a proposal for a tax credit for home improvements and renovations as a way to create a paper trail. I support the intent of this proposal. It is something the government might wish to look at but it must be recognized that there would be a cost associated with its implementation.

Revenue Canada already reviews records of GST rebates paid out for substantial renovations along with provincial sales tax credits to ensure that proper deductions and claims have been made by taxpayers. This paper trail is very helpful.

I thank the member for putting forward the motion allowing us to debate an issue of key concern to Canadians.

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have the opportunity to make a few comments on Motion No. 382 as sponsored by the member for Mississauga South. I congratulate my hon. colleague on this initiative first and foremost.

The issue that is the focus of this motion is of major importance to all Canadians right across the country. For many individuals and businesses the underground economy has become a convenient way to avoid paying taxes, not paying their fair share.

People who deal in the underground economy may feel their financial situation justifies their actions. It may be because it has been several years since their last pay raise. It may be because they feel the tax system is much too complex or unfair. It also may be basic greed. They see it as cheating the tax department, a victimless crime.

When these people take their financial transactions underground they are failing to make their contributions in support of Canada's social and economic programs. These people do not pay for the services they use. Instead, other Canadians are forced to pay more.

Each time someone participates in the underground economy, money to help pay for programs such as health care and education is lost. It is revenue that may never be recovered.

Whatever the reason, underground economic activity makes victims of all of us. The cost shows up in reduced essential services, higher taxes than would otherwise be the case, unfair competition and a reduced standard of living for the honest taxpayers. This is simply unfair and shortsighted.

The motion before the House suggests the government educate the public and encourage their participation in addressing the problem. I agree Canadians need to know the facts about the seriousness of the underground economy and what can be done to reduce it. I also agree governments cannot solve the problem alone. We must all do our part to fulfil these responsibilities.

The government has recognized that solutions to this problem and others now facing Canadians cannot be found in isolation. We must understand the problem and its consequences. It is for this very reason that in November 1993 the Minister of National Revenue made education a fundamental element of his action plan to address the underground economy.

Officials of Revenue Canada have been actively consulting with individuals and associations right across Canada. These groups are taking the message of the risk of dealing in the underground economy back to their membership. Every citizen and every business has a role to play in eliminating the underground economy.

Individuals can start by refusing to deal with business and trades people who ask for cash payments. Businesses can do their part by turning down demands to work off the books.

To ensure everyone is aware the government is serious about prosecuting those who deliberately defraud the tax system, the Minister of National Revenue is publicizing convictions for tax evasion. The increased publicity has been a deterrent and has had an effect.

The number of voluntary disclosures received by the department where people come forward to voluntarily correct their tax affairs has doubled in the past year. In addition, the number of referrals received from people each year providing the department with leads on potential tax fraud has risen by some 19,000.

As members of the House are aware, Canada's tax system is based on taxpayers voluntarily filing and paying their taxes. A voluntary self–assessing system is the most effective way for a government to collect taxes owing.

A cornerstone of a sound tax system is the reality and perception that everyone pays his or her fair share. It does not ask for any more or any less, just everyone's fair share. The underground economy undermines the fairness of the tax system.

Regardless of its size there is no disputing the underground economy exists and that it exacts a toll on Canadian society from unfair competition for honest business to taxes higher than they would otherwise be for honest taxpayers, to business closures, to unemployment and to lost revenues which government uses to support Canada's social and economic agenda. It is a problem we cannot afford to ignore.

I am confident, however, that we are making progress in dealing with the underground economy and other forms of tax evasion. I applaud the hon. member for Mississauga South for his efforts to stimulate discussion on this issue. I certainly solicit the support of all members of the House to support the motion.

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I too compliment my colleague from Mississauga South for bringing forward this initiative on an issue which is important to all Canadians.

One principle Canadians want in their tax system above all is fairness. Everybody should pay their fair share.

The underground economy has increased the burden on those law–abiding taxpayers who voluntarily report their income honestly every year. The underground economy has a certain segment of our society saying it will carry on business and benefit from the economy of the country but it will not contribute to it.

It hits us in a number of ways. People who do not report income from jobs they have performed obviously avoid paying income tax on that revenue. They avoid paying the GST and provincial sales tax on the work they have performed. All governments lose when that happens and all Canadians lose.

We have only to sit in the House every day to hear the tremendous financial pressures on the government and on all Canadians. We know we are in a period of finding any way we can to save on expenditures. It is leading to some very difficult decisions which will not necessarily help the economy or our standard of living. However, we know they are necessary because for a number of years now there has been a serious imbalance between what we have to spend and how much we are taking in.

This motion goes to the heart of how much we are taking in. While there may be disagreements about the extent of the underground economy and the amount of money being lost by unreported income, nobody can deny it is substantial and that it has grown dramatically in recent years.

What is it costing us when people are not paying their fair share? We have all heard from constituents who are worried about the future of our health care system. We hear about waiting lists at hospitals. We hear about pressures to close hospitals. Certainly that is very much an issue in Ontario today and in the national capital region.

We hear about reducing the benefits to people who are unemployed and need the assistance of the unemployment insurance system. We hear about a reduction in the money available to those in need to survive through difficult times. We hear about less services being available to support children in our community. We hear about less resources being available to fulfil a major role that Canada has always played in the world in terms of international development. It goes on and on.

This motion gives a committee of Parliament the opportunity to examine how we can bring this under control. There are people who are making money in the economy and cheating their fellow Canadians by not paying taxes on that income. How can we get those people back into the mainstream of society, contributing what they should be contributing so that others do not have to pay more than their fair share? This would make it possible to carry on doing for Canadians those things that are important to the building of a prosperous and sane society.

We all know people who have had work done around their homes. I recently had some work done and as a member of Parliament I insisted on an invoice and that the GST was documented. However I can understand someone who has had their income frozen for the last five years, or perhaps had their income drop because they have moved to another job which pays less, or perhaps is unemployed and has to get some necessary work done, would look for the best possible bargain to get the cheapest possible price, even if they suspect that the person doing the work is not paying the taxes and, therefore, is not paying their fair share of being a member of Canadian society. This motion offers an opportunity.

I want to pay tribute to a constituent of mine who brought a suggestion to my attention a couple of years ago which I have been promoting with the Ministers of Finance and National Revenue. The idea is to give homeowners an incentive to ensure that anybody doing work around their home is part of the economy, is contributing, is paying the taxes on that work. It could come from a number of ways.

This motion gives an opportunity to a committee of Parliament to look at a variety of means by which we can start to ensure that the vast majority of Canadians who are honest—and our tax system is really based on honour—and abide by that system are not penalized to the benefit of the very few who choose not to pay their fair share.

FIREARMS LAW SUNSET ACT

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): moved for leave to introduce Bill C-351, an act to provide for the expiry of gun control legislation that is not proven effective within five years of coming into force.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to introduce my firearms law sunset act today. My bill is seconded by the hon. member for Beaver River and co-sponsored by a number of members of Parliament. I thank my colleagues for their support.

If the bill is passed by Parliament it would provide a five-year sunset provision on all gun control legislation unless the auditor general has reported that the gun control law has been a successful and cost effective measure which has increased public safety and reduced violent crime involving the use of firearms.

The auditor general's report would have to be considered by a 12-member committee comprised of six MPs and six experts on firearms law. The committee report would also have to be presented to and concurred in by the House of Commons or a sunset provision would take effect immediately.

To argue against this type of sunset provision people would have to argue that they support gun control even if it does not work and no matter how much the gun control costs.

No one is arguing that gun control is unnecessary, only that the police time and resources should be spent on measures that get the best bang for the buck. That is exactly what the bill does.

PETITIONS

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions to present this morning.

The first petition contains 495 signatures from the North York area in the federal riding of York Centre. It deals with the protection of human beings, in particular, the protection of the unborn child. It prays that Parliament immediately extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings.

It is my understanding that these signatures were collected within a matter of a few hours in one day.

EUTHANASIA

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my second petition concerns the subject of euthanasia. Quite a number of people from all across Canada have signed the petition. It prays that Parliament ensure present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

WITNESS PROTECTION PROGRAM

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the third petition is signed by a number of people from across Canada, primarily from southern British Columbia and the Surrey, B.C. area. It deals with the subject of witness protection, in particular, my Bill C–206.

The petitioners call on Parliament to pass Bill C–206 to give statutory foundation for a national witness relocation and protection program.

I am pleased to note for these petitioners that the government has brought in just such a bill which hopefully will be debated very shortly in the House.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the pleasure and the honour to introduce a petition signed by Canadians from New Brunswick, British Columbia, Ontario and elsewhere.

The petitioners call on Parliament to institute complete recycling, waste reduction, energy and resource conservation and clean–up and air pollution programs.

• (1010)

PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition signed by Canadians from Quebec, Ontario and elsewhere. These petitioners call on Parliament to allow people to use the grounds of Parliament Hill for the purpose of public interest.

This petition is signed by people from all over the place. I really do not understand the motives behind it but nevertheless I would like to table it.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition which has been circulating all across Canada. This petition has been signed by a number of Canadians from the Vancouver, Surrey and Delta areas of British Columbia.

The petitioners would like to draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession which has not been recognized for its value to our society. They also state that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families that make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call on Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families that decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill and the aged.

BOVINE SOMATOTROPIN

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present two petitions. The first is from 35 concerned citizens from my riding of Yorkton—Melville who are opposed to the approval of synthetic bovine growth hormone, known as BGH or BST. The drug is injected into cows to increase milk production.

The petitioners are concerned not only about health risks to the dairy cows, but also the serious risks to humans, including breast and colon cancer. They urge Parliament to keep BGH out of Canada until the year 2000 by legislating a moratorium on sales and use and until the outstanding health and economic questions are reviewed through an independent and transparent review.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is signed by my constituents who are concerned about high government spending. Given that Canadians are already overburdened with taxation, these petitioners urge Parliament to reduce government spending and implement a taxpayer protection act to limit federal spending.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer, I am pleased to table a number of petitions. The first petition asks that Parliament not enact legislation which indicates societal approval of same sex relationships.

EUTHANASIA

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a second petition asks Parliament to make no changes in the law which would sanction the aiding and abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the third petition asks for the same protection for unborn human beings as those who are born.

I am pleased to table these petitions on behalf of the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer.

CRIMINAL CODE

Ms. Roseanne Skoke (Central Nova, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the privilege to present to the House today a petition on behalf of 459 constituents in my riding.

Child Safe of Pictou county believes that all sex offenders who are being released from incarceration should have to inform the media that they are being released. This will allow the media to inform the communities of Nova Scotia of the names and addresses of the offenders being released.

Child Safe feels that this is of vital importance to protect the safety and well–being of our children.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this petition from almost 1,000 Canadians asks the CRTC to regulate all forms of violence and abuse on television.

The citizens believe that one needs not to be shocked to be educated, to be informed, to be entertained. These petitioners applaud the CRTC hearings on this subject, violence on television, which are being held right now and to which I might add I had the honour of presenting a brief last Monday in Winnipeg, Manitoba.

CORRECTIONS AND CONDITIONAL RELEASE ACT

The House resumed from September 27 consideration of the motion that Bill C–45, an act to amend the Corrections and Conditional Release Act, the Criminal Code, the Criminal Records Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act and the Transfer of Offenders Act, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to speak to Bill C–45 and related initiatives. It has been said many times in this House that our penal justice system lacks the means required to control high–risk offenders, including sex offenders.

The public has become increasingly fearful and intolerant of crimes committed by these offenders, especially when the victims are children. This is a very legitimate concern which Bill C–45 should help to alleviate by providing better protection for the most vulnerable members of our society. In many cases, sexual offences not only harm a person physically but also cause psychological damage that unfortunately may leave lasting scars.

If we want to improve public safety, we must act quickly and use the most effective means at our disposal. That is why we have opted for a comprehensive approach consisting of legislation and other measures that will help us deal with the problem on all fronts. As you know, Bill C–45 contains major amendments to the Corrections and Conditional Release Act that will increase public safety.

The principal changes include amending the provisions on the detention of sex offenders who attack children. To provide better protection for our young people, Bill C–45 gives the word "child" the broadest possible legal sense, in other words, any individual under 18 years of age. Thanks to the proposed amendments, it will no longer be necessary to prove that serious harm was or will be caused to the child by a sexual offence.

This change was necessary because in many cases, the impact of sexual abuse is not easy to detect in a child. The problem is further compounded by the fact that child abusers often tell their victims that the sex acts they are forced to commit are acceptable and not to be discussed with others. Research has also shown that the harm suffered by a child who is a victim of sexual abuse may not become apparent until years later.

For all these reasons, it is difficult and almost impossible to find out whether there was serious harm. Bill C–45 will fill this gap by giving the National Parole Board the authority to keep in custody any offender it deems likely to commit a sexual offence involving a child before the expiration of his sentence.

I would like to point out that we have before us a piece of legislation that is intelligent and sound and based on the latest scientific research. It was well received by many of the witnesses who appeared before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs during its study of the bill. I may refer more specifically to the clinicians representing the Canadian Psychological Association. They found the bill perfectly reasonable in clinical terms, because, as they said, people sexually drawn to children, known clinically as pedophiles, have a much higher risk of recividism than those suffering from some other form of deviant sexual behaviour.

At times, treatment appears to have no effect on pedophiles. Accordingly, since the bill concerns offenders representing the greatest threat to the security and welfare of children, we believe it should go a long way to calming Canadians' concerns.

Before I talk about other legislative changes, I would like to return to the comments by the solicitor general on the point amending the provisions on detention. The fact that the change applies only to young victims does not mean that sexual offences against adults are of less concern to us.

All sexual crimes are serious, and the vulnerability of the victim, whoever that may be, is a vital consideration in each decision on parole or detention.

We must give ourselves the means to accurately assess the risk involved in a sexual offence, whoever the victim may be. In recent years, some people have wondered whether we can really assess the damage victims suffer when there has been no bodily harm. This is particularly important in the case of victims of sexual crimes.

As many of you know, the definition of serious harm in the present legislation covers both physical injury and psychological damage. As psychological damage is not apparent most times, it is often difficult to detect. In an effort to overcome this difficulty, the Department of the Solicitor General formulated guidelines on this last fall.

Accordingly, the people responsible for identifying cases of potential detention and commissioners responsible for deciding on them are better equipped to assess the psychological wrong a victim has suffered. They can therefore better recognize offenders who are more likely to cause serious harm in the future.

The department developed these guidelines according to the most recent research available on the psychological effects of crime for victims and on clinical diagnostic criteria. This major undertaking results from the department's commitment to clarify the concept of serious harm and to better protect the public against high risk offenders. Whether they are violent criminals or sexual offenders.

The bill contains other changes along these lines, as I mentioned earlier. Some of them have to do with Schedules I and II of the act, which list the offences for which an offender can be referred for detention.

These lists will now include several violent crimes against persons and serious drug offences such as conspiring to commit serious drug offences, impaired driving, criminal negligence causing death or bodily harm, criminal harassment, and breaking and entering when the planned offence is listed in Schedule I.

The addition of this last crime means that an offender who breaks and enters a home with intent to commit a serious offence such as a sexual assault will no longer be eligible for the speedy review procedure and will automatically be subject to review for detention.

In addition, a number of sexual offences that have been repealed will be included in Schedule I so that any offender serving a sentence for one of these offences will be covered. The purpose of these amendments is to correct any shortcoming in the detention provisions that may compromise public safety.

Another important set of amendments provide for the house arrest of some high risk offenders who do not meet detention criteria. These amendments had been demanded by the members of Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, the former Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General, the Ontario commission responsible for investigating the Stephenson case, and the Canadian Police Association.

In response to their recommendations, the government recently made legislative amendments to Bill C–45, which were approved by the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs last March.

These amendments will enable the National Parole Board to require that offenders who must be released because they do not meet detention criteria but who need additional community support live in a community based residential facility.

This will allow the board to better monitor and manage these offenders and the risk they present, in order to strengthen the released offenders monitoring system and facilitate their reintegration into society.

While the legislative or policy changes I mentioned represent a sound reform, we must bear in mind that these changes alone cannot ensure greater public protection. We must not settle for longer prison terms for offenders. Most sexual offenders are sentenced to a definite term of imprisonment and, sooner or later, they are back in the community.

To properly deal with the problem of sexual offenders, sustainable solutions must be developed. In this regard, many of the witnesses who testified at the justice committee hearings on Bill C–45 were of the opinion that the best way to protect society against sexual offenders in the long term was through formal phased release programs combined with treatment and support.

This has prompted the government to undertake a number of initiatives with regard to programs, including enhancing treatment programs for this category of offenders.

[English]

I will briefly comment on what we know to date about treating sex offenders. Research evidence shows sex offenders are not all the same. Their offences are influenced by a host of motivating and situational factors which vary from one individual to the next. Consequently, there is no single cause for sexual abuse and no single approach to treatment. However, there is general agreement among clinical practitioners that for many offenders the risk of reoffending can be reduced through continuity of treatment programs and relapse prevention.

In keeping with this view, a key component of our public safety strategy focuses on the expansion and enhancement of treatment programs for sex offenders. Research and pilot projects in support of rehabilitation and safe reintegration of sex offenders are an integral part of this endeavour.

To ensure the federal correctional system uses the most effective management and treatment methods for sex offenders, Correctional Service Canada created a national committee earlier this year. This committee has developed standards to deal with the important issue regarding the assessment and treatment of sex offenders. The committee is undertaking consultations with provincial mental health and correctional agencies with a view to developing a national consensus on these and other issues of mutual concern.

To facilitate this effort I had the pleasure of opening the first conference on the national sex offender strategy in Toronto last March. This conference brought together sex offender experts from across Canada as well as from other countries to share their knowledge, refine our assessment and treatment methods, and find innovative ways of restoring public confidence in corrections and criminal justice. This is an important milestone, and I am confident good progress in this area will continue.

We are also active on the local front to help community organizations protect children against sexual abuse. Over the years, the RCMP has played a major role in this respect with its Canadian Police Information Center, or CPIC, a data base made available to police across Canada. This center provides computerized information on the criminal records of individuals who have been fingerprinted. Thus, local police can now check, on behalf of community organizations, the background of those who want to do volunteer work or work for pay involving children. It is one of many ways of helping to prevent direct contact between child molesters or sexual offenders and children in our communities.

Last November, the government announced that the CPIC had been upgraded so that checks run through this national data base can be even more efficient.

As a result, the CPIC now provides information on restraining orders issued in cases of family violence, orders prohibiting holding positions of trust around children and peace bond orders issued to child sex offenders. It also provides more detailed information on the criminal background of offenders, including a list of all sexual offences, whether summary or indictable, committed against children.

These improvements will provide a better profile of those people who could be a threat to the safety and well–being of our children. However, are these improvements sufficient? Some victim advocates have said that better information will be of little use if community organizations do not know it exists, or if they do not systematically check the track record of applicants with the local police force.

In response to that legitimate concern, the solicitor general, justice and health departments are working to set up a national awareness program, in co–operation with the Canadian Association of Volunteer Bureaux and Centres. Starting this fall, and for the next few years, public information and education documents will be prepared, and training sessions will be provided to police officers as well as to volunteer and sports organizations in more than 200 communities across the country, in an effort to ensure better screening of volunteers and staff.

As for high risk offenders who remain a danger to society at the end of their prison term, we are pursuing our efforts to find an adequate solution to the problem. We work in close co–operation with our provincial and territorial counterparts, and quick progress is being made. Every province and territory has agreed to make the best possible use of the Criminal Code provisions which relate to dangerous offenders.

These provisions authorize judges to impose an indeterminate jail term to offenders who, in their opinion, remain a danger to society.

[English]

The solicitor general also announced last March a national flagging system to identify at an early date those offenders who may later be considered for a dangerous offender application. Should any offender who is flagged be prosecuted in the future, all relevant background information held by other jurisdictions will be available to assist prosecutors in deciding whether to bring in an applicant.

The solicitor general and the justice minister in conjunction with their federal, provincial and territorial counterparts have agreed to an examination of legislative changes with regard to creating a new category of long term offender. This could lead to special preventive measures for a broader range of violent offenders, especially sexual predators such as pedophiles, including up to 10 years of supervision following the usual penitentiary sentence.

The ministers have agreed that other criminal justice options will be explored for offenders who are at the end of their sentences and who are still believed to be too dangerous to be released into the community. In this regard the solicitor general and the justice minister convened a meeting of leading constitutional lawyers and other experts this past spring to review the limits and possibilities related to the detention of offenders beyond the end of their sentence. This will allow for a full examination of possible strategies under the criminal law which might be viable to achieve greater public safety.

All these measures seek to increase protection of the public against high risk offenders and to restore the confidence of Canadians in our criminal justice system. They are based on a progressive policy dealing with practical issues related to therapeutic programs for offenders, and with the development of the most effective program strategies to treat sexual and other high risk offenders.

Our criminal justice system must be balanced, so that we can truly make our country a place where Canadians and their children can live without fear of being victims of violence or sexual abuse.

I believe that Bill C–45, along with related initiatives and the work that will continue to be done in the months to come, clearly shows that the government intends to do its utmost to make our communities safer. I am sure that members from both sides of this House will help us achieve that goal through this bill.

• (1035)

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would dearly love to stand here today and say I will support Bill C–45 but if I did I know exactly what would happen. If our party did that I know exactly what would happen. People across the way would turn around and say: "If the Reform Party supports it, I guess we have gone far enough. We have done our job".

Therefore we will not support this. We will continue to hound government members over issues of criminal justice to let them know they have not gone far enough and that the public right to protection is much greater than the rights of criminals. We will continue to pound that message home. The member for Wild Rose, the member for Crowfoot, the member for Calgary Northeast, the member for Yorkton—Melville will be on the government like a pack of hounds until we get some real tough justice in this country.

One of the concerns I have about Bill C–45 is that it is extremely narrow. It does not go nearly far enough in addressing the concerns of other people. We had a big to do in the House not very long ago when an hon. member was accused of mimicking another hon. member. There were screams and yells of sexism in the House. People were running around saying: "You people are bad. You are sexist". That was a bunch of baloney.

The real measure of how prepared people are to stand up for women is in their actions, not in their words. We are not seeing the action in this legislation that really defends women to the degree they should be defended. Why in this legislation do we not have measures to hand down the same types of penalties that are being proposed here and even tougher penalties when women are sexually assaulted?

Why can women not enjoy the same protection in the law? To me that makes sense and that is why we cannot support this legislation. I know if we supported this people over there would say: "Good, we have them on side. We do not have to do any more". My goodness, all it takes is a stroke of the pen. All they have to do is spend a couple of more minutes writing that type of amendment. Then we would have protection for women as well. Why not go the full way? Why not do it all?

Another concern I have with this legislation is that it does not address the huge problem of young offenders who are sexual predators. I will read a letter in a moment from a constituent of mine who talks about this problem. Before I do I remind hon. members across the way about an incident that happened not too many years ago on the west coast.

A sexual predator, a young offender, and his family moved into a new community. Because he was a young offender no one knew about his past. Not even the police knew about his past. The people next door definitely did not know about his past when they invited him to come over and babysit. I think everyone can imagine what happened. That young man subsequently raped and murdered the little girl next door and nobody was the wiser to his past because the Young Offenders Act protected him. That is insane and ridiculous. There is no reason in the world why this government cannot address those types of problems.

Yesterday in the House our leader asked the justice minister what he will do to ensure that when there was a conflict between the rights of criminals and the rights of victims the scales of justice were tilted to the side of the victims. He gave us a lot of rhetoric.

We would like to see some action. It is too late for that little girl in British Columbia but it does not have to be too late for the rest of the country. All it requires is a stroke of the pen, a little initiative. Why is the government holding back? What is the possible motive for not addressing this issue?

To me it can only be a misguided sense of responsibility or charity to the criminals. Yes, these people sometimes come from bad backgrounds and bad environments. I feel bad about that. I am sorry they turn out to be criminals in many cases and sexual predators in some cases.

At the end of the day, as sorry as I am for that, the responsibility of government, the justice system and the House is to ensure that the rights of the public are raised above the rights of the criminals. There is no excuse for not dealing with that in this legislation. It should be in there.

We have to keep plugging away until we get some changes not only to bills like Bill C–45 but also to the Young Offenders Act. It has to happen.

I will read a letter from a constituent of mine whom I talked to on the phone a few days ago:

I am writing to you because of something that happened to my family this past summer. In late July of this year I had my nephew come and stay with us. He is 13 years old and I had no reason to believe my worst nightmares would come true. During the four days of his stay he sexually abused my oldest sons, ages four and five. My two year old son does not talk yet, so if there was any abuse perpetrated against him I will never know.

I reported the crime to the local RCMP and to social services in the community where he comes from. It was during a talk with another family member that I was informed of the sexual abuse committed against her children, one girl and one boy, by my nephew some seven months prior.

It has been a long summer for my family, not only in dealing with the devastation of having our young children become victims of a sexual crime at such a young age, not that any age is acceptable, but in waiting for justice to be served. By justice I specifically mean waiting for the police and the courts to hold the 13-year old criminal accountable.

This past Monday, September 19, I found out that according to the Criminal Code, Michael, my nephew, is immune from prosecution, not because he did not commit a crime but because he is 13. The first sexual crime was not reported to police. The family of the children and the family of the abuser and social services decided it was an act of an immature boy experimenting with his developing sexuality. It was because of this cover-up that I was unable to protect my children. Therefore my children became the young, innocent victims of his second attack that we are aware of.

I am disgusted and helplessly frustrated with the whole situation. The RCMP officer was quick to assure me that they would get him the next time. Am I supposed to feel proud to be part of a society that surrounds young criminals in a blanket of protection while ignoring the pleas of the whole families that are victimized? By not holding these young criminals accountable based on their age, are we not inviting them to victimize again and again, stealing innocence, forever changing lives?

There is so much more I want to say but more importantly now I know I must take action. I believe if I do not take some action to see the laws changed to protect the young potential victims, then I have not done my job as a parent. If the police and courts cannot help my children get justice, then I must go above them.

Monte, I cry at night because of what this 13-year old did to my children and it torments me to know he will never be punished for this crime. It is just unacceptable at any age to abuse our young future in any way. If we do accept it we have failed them and ourselves. I write this letter in faith that you will be my voice, Monte. Somehow it does not seem enough, words on paper, but it is a start.

This letter says more eloquently than anybody in the House could ever say just how devastating and unnecessary these crimes are. That is what is so frustrating.

I do not really understand why the police did not intervene. They say the boy was 13. My understanding is he should be culpable when he is that age. I certainly put a phone call in to the police to talk to them about that.

However, the whole point is that if this young man were accused, brought to justice and convicted, it would not necessarily mean he could not do it again, because the public would never know what he had done. That is crazy. What are we doing here? Why are we allowing this to happen? It is ridiculous.

I look around here and I see people who are of high intelligence and mature individuals who must understand exactly what this does to people. Why are we not doing something about it? Why is the government not moving legislation today to fix this? I do not understand it. The people at home do not understand it. If it were just a case of not understanding that would be one thing, but it is the terrible damage it does that is so frustrating.

My friends over here have pounded away at the government, asking it to bring in some changes that address these types of things, and it has not. It has not addressed them. It would be so easy. We frittered around with tiny little pieces of legislation over the last few days when we could have been dealing with things of real consequence, things that would really help people.

Maybe I was idealistic when I took on this job, but I thought we could bring some of these obvious problems to light and perhaps something would happen, perhaps there would be changes. It has not happened. It does not happen, and that drives me and everyone here crazy. I know it drives members across the way crazy. There are people who sit on the back benches who ask why we cannot change this. I do not know the answer to that. I guess the only people who know the answer to that are the people who reside in cabinet, where all the decisions are made.

I encourage them to open up their ears and realize that by not acting to bring down some fundamental changes in the justice system they are allowing people to get hurt. If they are not consciously and not maliciously doing it, they are unconsciously doing it. However, the effect is the same.

I encourage government members to start thinking about some of these victims out there, to start supporting some of the amendments like my friend from Wild Rose brought forward the other day, which would compensate victims, and to start opening their eyes to what is happening out there in the real world. When that day comes there will be 52 Reformers standing up and giving the government 100 per cent support.

As I said at the beginning of my speech, I would love to support this bill but I know what would happen if we did. This government would take that as an excuse to quit. Therefore, it is with reluctance that I say it is a step in the right direction but it does not go nearly far enough. We will not give the government an excuse to quit. Over the next several months my friends will be on the heels of the government every day.

Mr. Andrew Telegdi (Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to enter into this discussion.

The member from the Reform Party said the actions of the government drive every member of the Reform Party crazy. He inferred that the same is applicable to this side of the House. Let me agree with the first part of his statement and very strongly disagree with the second part.

The member, in his convoluted statement, said he supports what we are doing but that it does not go far enough as far as he is concerned, so he and his party will vote against this bill. I have sat in the House for the past two years and I have never ceased to be amazed as to how simplistic the Reform Party attitude has been to this whole issue. It seems to me that during many of their interjections and their discussions they are promoting a very simplistic justice system, very simplistic solutions to a very complex problem.

They are forever talking about victims and victims' rights. I am amazed that a party that purports to be for law and order would not support the victim groups that want stronger gun control and support the government's legislation. Maybe the member can tell me how and why he does not support gun control as asked for by victims groups as well as the police in the country.

Mr. Solberg: Mr. Speaker, I assure the hon. member from across the way that he does not speak for all his backbenchers. I have talked to many of them and I know where they stand on the issues.

With respect to the whole issue of victims' rights, many members of our caucus have been in regular contact with victims groups, have been supporting them, have been proposing legislation through private members' bills that would help them. We moved a motion in the House the other day which the government did not support. That motion would have provided some kind of compensation to victims. I want to make it very clear that we come down four square on the side of victims.

On the issue of gun control, I think it is an improper characterization to say that all victims groups to a person believe that gun control will somehow staunch crime in the country. That is obviously wrong. I also point out, as my friend from Yorkton—Melville has claimed in the House, that many police, I would argue the great majority of rank and file policemen, do not support gun control as it has been proposed in the House.

If there is anything simplistic in the House it is the comments of the hon. member across the way. I argue there is not a person in the country who has watched this channel for any amount of time who would ever doubt for a moment the sincerity of members on this side of the House when it comes to standing up for victims and hounding the government to bring about some changes which, to the government's credit, it is starting to bring about in some of this legislation.

We will continue to nip at the heels of the government until we start to see some real substantial changes in all areas of criminal justice.

Mr. Morris Bodnar (Saskatoon—Dundurn, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has made reference to a particular case and read a letter. I take it the hon. member is well aware that laws are made by the federal government but the enforcement of these laws is strictly in the hands of the provincial governments. Barking in the Chamber is the wrong place. Comments have to be made to the provincial attorneys general to make sure matters are taken care of.

The John Howard Society has put out statistics showing that a substantial number of young people are convicted of offences, and 31 per cent of the young offenders are incarcerated but only approximately 20 per cent of adults are incarcerated. Proportionally there are more young offenders being incarcerated than adults. Yet we can see the Reform Party is clamouring for stronger sentences. As well, it appears that more young offenders are being charged but the crime rate of young offenders is not going up.

With the position the Reform Party is taking, is it indicating there should be more incarceration facilities built in this country for young offenders and perhaps resort to a system similar to what is developing in California?

Mr. Solberg: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has addressed several issues. He mentioned this was more of a provincial matter when he referred to the letter I read from. I am sorry the member missed the point I was making. If that young man had been convicted, and since federal laws say his name cannot be released, then he could go on to do this again and again and we would not be protected from him because we would not know his identity. To me that is a federal matter. Anybody who knows anything about the law should know that it is this way. I am surprised that as a lawyer the hon. member did not realize that.

With respect to the stronger sentences, I remind the hon. member that it was his government that felt stronger sentences were necessary in Bill C–41. I remind the hon. member that in this very legislation there are stronger sentences being proposed. Now he is arguing against them. That is a little ironic. I encourage the hon. member to read the legislation.

With respect to the fall in the crime rate among young offenders, there is a demographic issue that needs to be addressed here. It is not at all clear. If we go back a generation and look at the rise in violent crime between the sixties and today, it has gone up fourfold, I believe. Let us not spew out statistics without all of the background that goes with them.

The hon. member should take the time to sit down and read this legislation. If he does he will not be so quick to jump up and start criticizing the Reform Party.

Hon. Raymond Chan (Secretary of State (Asia–Pacific), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to address the House about a critically important public safety issue and to outline some of the measures the Government of Canada has initiated in response to our commitment in the red book to ensure safe homes and safe streets.

All of us are painfully aware that the issues related to the management and treatment of sex offenders in federal correctional institutions are very much of public concern. Media attention and public outrage over violent crimes committed by sex offenders on conditional release have heightened fears about public safety.

During the summer I had extensive consultations with my constituents in Richmond. I went to the bus stops and the shopping malls to speak with my constituents. Sure enough, the number one concern of my constituents was with crime issues. Last year I did the same thing, I reached out to the constituencies, and their concern was with the debt and deficit. I suppose this year, because of the works of our government, the debt and deficit are under control. Now their concentration is on crime issues.

It is imperative that the Government of Canada take action to restore the public's confidence concerning the management and treatment of this group of offenders. I am confident the provisions contained in Bill C–45 as well as a number of criminal justice rights initiatives taken by the government would go a long way to restoring the public's confidence in Canada's criminal justice and correctional system.

The issue of high risk sex offenders is a complex problem, which has many facets. It would be unrealistic to expect a simple solution. The problem requires a comprehensive approach involving all jurisdictions and agencies, both governmental and non–governmental, in criminal justice and corrections. The Canadian government recognizes this and has taken leadership to gain the support of all parties concerned toward achieving a mutual solution.

At the federal and provincial levels there has been much discussion about this issue among ministers responsible for justice and corrections and a number of actions have already been announced. Among these was the announcement by the solicitor general last March of the establishment of a national flagging system using the Canadian Police Information Centre to help crown attorneys better identify high risk violent offenders at the time of prosecution. This system, along with the project now under way called the crown file research project, will assist prosecutors with decisions regarding prosecutions and charging strategies, including whether to bring a dangerous offender application against an individual. If a person is ruled by the courts to be a dangerous offender, an indefinite sentence of incarceration can be imposed.

Both these actions were recommended by the federal, provincial and territorial task force on high risk violent offenders which released its report earlier this year. The government is also addressing other important recommendations outlined in the report. For example, legislative changes are being examined which would make it easier for crown attorneys to make use of the existing dangerous offender provisions in the Criminal Code.

The provisions would be strengthened by making an indefinite sentence of incarceration the only sentencing option for those found by the court to be dangerous offenders, providing for new expanded presentence risk assessments in place of the current requirement for the evidence of two psychiatrists and the creation of a new category of long term offender, which would give the courts a new sentencing option for this group. This would require the long term supervision of the offender for up to 10 years following the end of the penitentiary term.

In addition to the work of the task force, the amendments to the Corrections and Conditional Release Act contained in Bill C–45 include other important changes which would tighten the legislation to ensure greater public protection. Principal among these are changes to detention provisions as they relate to sex offenders who victimize children. The amendments will eliminate the current serious harm criterion for this group of offenders.

Research has shown that the harm caused to children by sex offenders may not manifest itself until later in life. Therefore, because it is so difficult to draw a direct relationship between the offence and the consequent harm done, sex offenders often fall through the cracks when it comes to deciding whether they should be detained until the expiry of their sentence. The changes in Bill C–45 will close that gap by removing the requirement to determine whether serious harm occurred in sex offences involving children.

In the area of federal corrections much has been done to make the system more responsive to the demands for increased attention to public safety. Correctional Service Canada has experienced rapid and unprecedented growth in the number of sex offenders in its custody. The rate has been quite disproportionate compared to the overall increase in the federal inmate population.

In the past 10 years the number of sex offenders in federal penitentiaries has grown at a faster rate than any other group. From December 1990 to December 1994 the number of sex offenders under the jurisdiction of Correctional Service Canada increased by almost 50 per cent, while the total population increased by 10 per cent. In 1984 they represented little more than 7 per cent of the total federal inmate population. Today, however, nearly one–quarter of the incarcerated population and 17 per cent of the supervised population are sex offenders. As of January 1995 there were an estimated 4,900 with sexual related offences in their sentences.

This increase is the net result of a number of factors. Ten years ago about 14,000 reports on sex offences came to the attention of police each year. Today police receive more than 30,000 such reports annually. The police have become better trained in investigative procedures determining the profiles of sex offenders and in their sensitivity to victims.

As well, attitudes have changed. Victims are much more willing to come forward. We have seen cases being prosecuted that occurred almost 30 years ago. There have been legislative changes resulting in new offences that were not investigated or prosecuted 10, 20 or 30 years ago.

Our society has seen decreased tolerance. The length of sentences being imposed by the courts has also increased. In 1991 the average length of sentence for sex offenders was 4.2 years. Today it is well over five years on average.

The trend therefore is that more sex offenders are entering the federal correctional system. They are staying longer and many are quite likely to be detained until the expiry of their sentence.

Of the 555 offenders detained today, 60 per cent are sex offenders. Correctional Service Canada, therefore, has had to respond to this dramatic increase by quickly expanding its treatment capacity from less than 100 offenders 10 years ago to more than 1,800 today.

This year it will increase to over 2,200. The correctional service has also increased the amount of money devoted to this area of treatment during the past five years. Expenditures in the coming years will increase by another $1.3 million in addition to last year's estimated $11 million.

Recognizing that treatment does not stop at the front gate of a prison, the correctional service has also expanded its capacity for follow–up treatment and relaxed prevention in the community for offenders under conditional release.

Seven hundred of the eighteen hundred treatment placements currently available are being provided in the community. To its credit the correctional service with the help of many experts has developed and implemented among the best programs and risk assessment tools of any other correctional jurisdiction in the world.

In late March the correctional service sponsored a national conference on sex offender treatment in Toronto. More than 400 experts and practitioners from across Canada, as well as the United States, Belgium, New Zealand and Norway, met to share knowledge and expertise in this important area.

To ensure that the service maintains its high standard of performance, a national strategy on sex offenders has been developed which is being shared with provincial mental health and correctional agencies to achieve a national consensus on standards for the assessment and treatment of sex offenders.

It must be said, however, that experts and practitioners the world over do not claim there is a cure for sex offenders. There is no single cause for this form of deviant behaviour and there is no single approach to treatment.

Instead there is a need for a continuum of treatment from intensive to intermediate to low intensity and a strong emphasis on managing risk through relaxed prevention. The latter involves teaching these inmates to recognize the factors that led to the commission of their crimes as well as avoidance and coping techniques for dealing with high risk situations. Even though the treatment programs and assessment tools are acknowledged to be among the best in the world, the state of knowledge unfortunately is not 100 per cent perfect, and it is unlikely it will ever be.

Sex offenders are not a homogeneous group. The nature of their offences vary. Their treatment needs vary. Their security levels vary. Not all sex offenders pose the same risk to the community when they are released. The majority of them will be released eventually whether under some form of conditional release or on expiration of their sentences.

The correctional service has conducted a number of follow–up research studies to acquire a better understanding of the rates of reoffending for treated and untreated sex offenders. It is too early to draw any firm conclusions, but by and large sex offenders who have participated in treatment programs have a greater probability of success than those who are untreated.

A three–year follow–up of nearly 1,200 sex offenders released from prison between 1985 and 1987 revealed that 6 per cent were readmitted for another sex offence. Almost 14 per cent were returned to prison for a variety of non–sexual offences and 11 per cent were readmitted for some form of technical violation of release conditions.

We know full well that statistics are of little comfort to the families of victims of these offenders in the aftermath of a tragedy. However I assure members of the House, indeed all Canadians, that tragic incidents also have a profound impact on correctional staff. It strengthens its resolve to improve the assessment procedures and the quality of treatment programs.

Real progress is being made to ensure greater protection for Canadians, especially from violent sex offenders who pose a high risk to women and children. The government has taken a very balanced approach and will continue to launch new initiatives in coming months to demonstrate its commitment to doing everything it can to make our homes and our communities safer.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have a quick question for the hon. member. Earlier we heard the parliamentary secretary to the solicitor general speak. I heard some of the same things a few minutes ago about treatment for our criminals that is going to be delivered, what we are going to do.

We are forever spending lots of money on treatment of these types of individuals. The victims need treatment as well for the trauma they go through, but we do not spend a nickel on treatment for victims. Nor do we provide them with any psychological help or any number of things. We do not do anything in that regard.

Now we are to spend more money because our treatment programs are to be better than they have ever been. The prisons will tell us that they have a tough time delivering treatment programs now, and they have had a tough time doing it over the last 10 years. All of a sudden we have a piece of legislation that is to make it happen and it is to be really good.

I have two questions. Why not spend some time helping victims in the same regard? If this is to be done in the prisons, where in the devil are you to get the money?

The Deputy Speaker: I ask all hon. members to put their questions through the Chair.

Mr. Chan: Mr. Speaker, it is not true the government has not done anything for victims. Legislation is in place or in process dealing with restitution for victims of crime and helping them in different areas. It is incorrect for him to make that kind of statement. Treatment is so important in the prevention of crime. Sex offenders vary in the degree of their sickness and they need different types of treatment. A blanket coverage of just putting them all in jail forever or not give them conditional release, so they could be treated before they are released into the public is pure irresponsibility.

• (1115)

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, what a wonderful thing I just heard, all the great things that are being done for victims across the country. That is just not true.

All we need to do is visit any victim, as I did yesterday, the family of Louis Ambas in Scarborough. Tell me one thing that has been done by the government for the family of that individual, the orphans and the widow. Nothing has been done.

I get tired of the same old rhetoric about the wonderful things being done for victims. Wonderful things are being done for the criminals. Their rights are looked after so much. Boy, are we going to treat them and help those poor guys and ladies. We are going to really do our best to make sure they are well looked after.

I will say it again, nothing is being done for victims, nothing. If I knew how to say it in French, I would make sure I said it once more.

For the last two years the government has brought forward legislation such as Bills C–37, C–41, C–68 and now C–45. All this legislation reminds me of an old motto of my mother, and probably your mother too, Mr. Speaker: "Put a little spoonful of sugar with the medicine and it will go down". That is what the government has done with every one of these pieces of legislation. It has sprinkled in a little sugar in Bill C–37, very little mind you, but some would say that is not a bad idea. After looking at the whole bill there are so many rotten things in it that we just cannot support it.

Bill C–41 is a really good example. There are some things in it that are not bad. Then we get petitions tabled here, letters from all across Canada about Bill C–41 saying: "Do not include sexual orientation in section 18.2. If the government includes that section, don't vote for it".

I know these people across the way table many of those petitions. I know that many of those people across the way have tried to amend that section. Some of them really made a big effort. Some of them voted against the bill and got punished because they did what Canadians wanted. Is that not a shame? I think you know what I am talking about in that regard, Mr. Speaker. What a shame.

However, we are the bad guys. We did not support Bill C–41 because of all the fine things it is going to do. We tried to amend them. Members from the Liberal Party tried to amend the bill and make it better. It did not happen. If they voted against it, look out.

Along comes Bill C–68. That sucker is that thick, about 167 to 180 pages. The government sprinkled some sugar on about 17 pages that addressed the criminal. The rest of the bill addressed the duck hunters, deer hunters, rabbit shooters, gopher shooters, target shooters, gun collectors; the legal, the law–abiding citizens, the taxpayers, the hard working people that pay those wonderful pensions Liberal members all took, with the exception of a few who I am glad did not. That is what that bill attacks. Seventeen pages of the bill have a little sugar and we are supposed to support it because of those 17 pages. Why can we not pull those out and give us an opportunity to do that?

The government really makes it tough when it creates legislation like that. Is it a game being played in the justice system? If we took Bill C–37 and piled it on top of Bill C–41 and piled Bill C–68 on there and piled Bill C–45 on that we would have a stack quite high. They took millions of dollars to create. They are written in a bunch of gobbledegook that a guy like me who has 16 years of education does not have the vaguest idea of what one–tenth of it means. Therefore, we rely on the help we can get. We get researchers to help us out. We even go to the justice committee and ask some of our colleagues from the other party who are really good at doing that. I really appreciate their efforts. They are able to tear into that legislation. I really appreciate when some of the members of the Liberal Party come forward with amendments that will make the legislation better. Add more sugar in there, I like that. Let us do that.

However, if a Liberal member is effective on a committee like that and dares to vote against the front line on any issue that he or she might disagree with, then he or she is out of that committee. They are bad boys or bad girls because they did not vote with the government. Democracy? Democracy in a pig's eye.

That is what makes it so hard. That is why when we look at some parts of Bill C–45 we say: "Darn, that is a good idea. I would really like to support that". However, the government makes it impossible with all of the other gobbledegook that is put in there.

I listened to the justice minister, who challenged me to join with him in helping to make the country safer. However when I stand here and move a motion that asks why we want to limit dangerous sexual offenders to only those who offend children, why not everyone, what happens? Who can argue with the fact that we should keep dangerous child sexual offenders in jail? Who can argue against that? I cannot. However, should it make any difference that the one they are keeping in has offended 13, 14, 15 or 16–year olds and the one they are not going to keep in has offended against 19, 20 and 21–year olds, grown woman or 85–year olds? That is what does not make any sense.

Therefore, we stand and move a motion. I defy anyone to tell me there is a big difference between raping a 17–year old and raping an 18 or 19–year old. Tell me there is a big difference. We moved a motion to amend that. Did we get support? No, not one bit. The little boys on the front line probably passed the word that the backbenchers were not allowed to vote for it. When their strings are pulled the puppets jump up and the arms vote the way they are told because they do not want any more punishment. If they get any more punishment they lose the ear of the government. I have news for them, the government is going to lose the ear of the public. It is sick and tired of it.

There was a rally last night in Scarborough of nearly 500 people. They are fed up to here. Simplistic is a guy who jumps up like a puppet and does not vote for his constituents. Simplistic is when you do not think for yourself, stand on your own feet and represent Canadians. Instead, you represent the front row, that is simplistic. What an easy way to earn $64,000 a year. It is real easy.

Let us look at Bill C–45, the bill dealing with dangerous offenders. What about the parole boards? We have a serious problem in this country. We are going broke. However, we are going to put in more things to help these criminals. We are going to give them more treatments. We are going to keep the parole boards active. The parole boards cost quite a bit of dollars.

I hear over and over again from the people who work closest with the criminals that it really should be handled at their level. Maybe now would be the time to consider there not even be a parole board, that releases should be determined by the case workers, the guards, the psychologists and the people who work in the prisons closest to the inmates. Why not consider that?

Wait a minute. If we got rid of the parole board, guess what? A whole lot of positions would disappear. Some people would not be appointed to it so they could stick their snouts in the trough. We cannot have that. It is the traditional way. We have been doing it for 30 years. Let us not do anything different.

I asked the government to make it mandatory that bad decisions by parole boards be totally reviewed. In Bill C–45 it may be done. We wanted it to be mandatory. It makes sense. The ordinary Joe on the street anywhere would say: "Sure, why not?" What is wrong with a little accountability?

I do not think there is a person in this place who did not come from some job somewhere where they had to be accountable in that job. Why should it be any less now in government or in an appointed position? That is all we were asking for. The answer was no. The Liberals would not vote for it.

I asked for mandatory restitution. There is a clause in Bill C–45 that says 30 per cent of the wages earned in prison are to be paid back to the government to pay room and board. Nobody can argue with that. It is not a bad idea. I realize that is not a great amount of money but even a little bit helps. I simply wanted a motion that said: "How about taking that 30 per cent and giving it to the victims, to the widows, helping them out?" After all, the government is looking after the victims. No. No. That could not be considered. I really do not understand.

Then all of a sudden I do understand. There are probably quite a few people on the backbench who would like to support it but the boys in the front row pull the strings and up jump the puppets and away we go again.

When I look at the legislation that has been written, that stack, I wonder why it cannot be in a little better language, something that an ordinary guy could sit down, read and maybe understand what we are doing. Or does it have to be produced that way so we can keep all those ants running around the justice building over there, all those senior bureaucrats making a lot more money than we are, so they can continue to put this stuff together and make sure not to get to the meat of the problem. Just make sure to sprinkle a little sugar throughout the whole thing so that we would look like fools if we did not support it. That way we can keep those fellows employed all the time.

It is wonderful, just wonderful. A bunch of bureaucrats running around, do nothing bureaucrats creating a bunch of stuff the ordinary Canadian, including the member across, cannot understand. It cannot be read or understood. I am just trying to make sense out of it.

Instead of spending millions of dollars putting stuff like that together, how about taking that money and putting some guards down at Port Erie where the trucks drive through. Customs cannot even stop them because they do not have enough help.

The attorney general for Ontario says that trucks are coming through driven by criminals. What do we do? I am sure they are over there working on it right now. There will be another Bill C–926 or whatever it will be called. It will be thick and full of gobbledegook. It will not be as simple as saying: "Look, there is a problem. Let us fix it". That is not the way it is done. The game is not being played right.

I am tired of playing the game. I have been here two years and I have been listening to nothing but games. We ought to be able to accomplish something in the House. Instead, the best thing that has yet happened is the legislation on DNA testing. The only reason that happened is this party put the Liberals in a corner and they had to do it. They refused it for a year. Then all of a sudden out of the blue they decided it was a good idea, after I had asked for about the tenth time.

I do not know how members of that party can sit opposite to us and laugh, thinking this is all a big joke. I wish they had spent an afternoon with me talking to a few widows and orphans. I would bet they probably do not know what a victim of crime looks like.

I wish they had been with me when I spoke with the mother of the five–year old girl who was found in a garbage dumpster in Calgary with her throat cut. She is a single mother with no income, barely making ends meet. She has not received one penny's worth of help and has two other people living with her. The best they come up with over there are giggles and laughs.

Somebody is going to wake the government up. I am trying to. I am sure I will not accomplish it but I will guarantee there are Canadians all across the country. Your day is coming. You guys at the pig trough talk about 1.5 million kids starving in this country. I have news: Let us all give up our pensions and steer that money toward those starving children. What is wrong with that? You are too greedy.

Mr. Bodnar: You are on pension already.

Mr. Thompson: The hon. member does not even know what he is talking about. If he wants to talk to me about my teacher's pension I will be more than glad to do it. Once he understands it I am sure he will say: "Well, I didn't realize that".

Let us solve the problems. There are hungry children in this world and people living in poverty. Do something. Join the rest of us, including six of your own members. Give up those pensions and let us do something. Let us steer that money that way. You do not want to? You like what you have? You live with it and wait until the next election. You explain it to people in your community who may have these starving kids. You explain to them why we continually bring up legislation—

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has used the word you referring to other members at least four times in the last three minutes. I ask him please if he is using the word you to refer to whoever happens to be sitting in the Chair.

Mr. Thompson: There I go again. Mr. Speaker, you realize what I am saying. If these people are starving and hungry and there is poverty in Canada, why do we not do something? We have had more and more opportunities. I am fed up to here. This justice system is not a justice system; it is a legal system. It is an industry. My goodness we spend a lot of money in this industry. We take forever to get the Bernardos convicted. We spend millions. We plea bargain with the Homolkas. We pay Clifford Olson $10,000 for every body he leads us to. Does that make any sense at all?

My hon. colleague will sit over there and say: "Ah, that simplistic old fool". Another will say: "Just because that guy taught for 30 years in a school, he is not entitled to $900 a month pension", even though it is all my money to begin with.

An hon. member: Not taxpayers' money.

Mr. Thompson: It was not taxpayers' money.

I am more than pleased to give up my pension in the House. I am not an opportunist. I do not plan to make a career out of politics. I plan on trying the very best I can to get some laws changed so that my grandchildren—I have three of them who are about this big—and your grandchildren and a few more young children and women will be more than pleased to go downtown by themselves and feel safe. What is wrong with that?

• (1135)

I know what is going to happen though. The cabinet will decide and the puppets will vote and support its wishes. It is not the justice system that will grow; the Liberal system will grow. That is a real danger to Canadians.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member in his usual folksy and entertaining way has made a speech in which, of course, he has managed for the most part to stay away from the subject matter before the House today, Bill C–45. He has ranged over the Young Offenders Act, MPs pensions, his travels throughout the country, but what has he really talked about? Has he really addressed the issues of Bill C–45?

The reason I am up is that yesterday the hon. member visited the very nice community of Scarborough of which I am privileged to be one of the five members of Parliament. Five hundred and fifty thousand people live in the city of Scarborough. I hope we made the hon. member feel welcome as a member of Parliament and that he had the opportunity to express his point of view which in a democracy everybody is entitled to do.

I want to talk about Bill C–45 and ask the hon. member a question. He talked about gobbledegook. He talked about how laws are written in gobbledegook. That may be if one is not a lawyer.

What we do in the House is write and pass laws. If we do not understand them, somebody has to understand them. We hope that they are the lawyers in the justice department. If they do not understand them, then as has been done in the past, the courts will tell us what they mean. I will be referring to that very topic in my speech in a few moments. We do not want to be told by the courts what we meant. Therefore we had all better make an effort to understand this gobbledegook because if we do not understand it, then we are at the mercy of the lawyers.

The previous speaker from the hon. member's party gave the nub of the problem of the Reform Party which is that there is really nothing wrong with Bill C–45. It is actually kind of good. It actually does some good amending to former Bill C–36. However the Reform members dare not support it because, in the words of the hon. member for Medicine Hat, that might be enough and we will not go any further.

I recall the Reform Party members, when they came here, saying they would do things differently. They were not going to oppose for the sake of opposing. If something was good, they would support it. What is really wrong with Bill C–45 that the member cannot support it while still making the points he makes about the various other topics he spoke about?

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I guess it is more of what is not there than what is there which bothers me. I talked about dangerous offenders. I hope the message went out that I feel it should not apply to the offenders of children only. It should go beyond that to a great extent. Because my time ran out I did not get a chance to talk about a couple of other things that should be in the bill.

For example, drugs are a very serious problem in our prisons. I am sure hon. members including the member for Scarborough West would agree that they are a serious problem. I am trying to figure out why we have not brought in legislation which says there will be no more drugs in the prisons that they will be out of there. Does it make any sense when 70 per cent of the people going in there have a drug problem? Yet they are sending them to a place where drugs are more accessible than they are on any street. We are going to rehabilitate them while they are in there. Think about that.

Here is a guy who is going to prison. He represents about 70 per cent of the prison population in that he has a drug problem. That is why he got into trouble to begin with. We are sending him to a prison where drugs are more accessible than they are on the streets. To help him we will give him the bleach program or sterilized needles. Then in four years we will let him out and he will be rehabilitated. We might as well take an alcoholic and sentence him to a wine cellar for six months and see how well he is fixed when he gets out.

It is not so much what is in the bill, but it is a lot of what is not there that should be. There are some things in there we would like to support, but why do we always have to make the tough decision about supporting something we do not want to in other parts?

I know the hon. member struggled with Bill C–41. There are some good things in Bill C–41. Should we support it? That is the decision which is always tough. They could do better when it comes to the gobbledegook. Why do we not stick to what Canadians want? Why do we not listen as parliamentarians to what Canadians say? My people are saying: "We want this; we want that. Now write the laws". Is it so difficult that these guys over there are so smart that they cannot write in common English, French or a language we can understand?

The hon. member is right. We had better understand it. I am trying to make every effort I can to understand it. It is too bad we cannot pick up a lot more by ourselves without having to get a bunch of help to do it. I do not know if it is possible, but if it is not impossible let us fix it. Let us give a direction to the authors of our laws that from now on when they write income tax laws or criminal justice laws they are written so that the farmer in Alberta or the bushman in British Columbia can sit down, look at them and understand them. That is simplistic according to some members but to me it is common sense.

Why do we not take the good things that the people want? Let us listen to them and talk about them as parliamentarians. We should put our differences aside and say: "Here are some things we have really got to fix". Why do we not go into committees together, work together and get this done? Because it is not the Liberal way. It is not the Conservative way. It is not the way we do it in Canada. Maybe it is time to change.

Mr. Mac Harb (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine made a very eloquent presentation. I was surprised that my colleague on the other side did not listen to the parliamentary secretary. All that Bill C-45 does is close some of the loopholes which exist in the present system.

Does the hon. member have a problem with the government making it easier for the parole board to keep people in the penitentiaries until the end of their offences if they are sex offenders or repeat offenders? Does he have a problem with the parole board being able to keep people who have committed violent crimes until the end of their sentence? Does he have a problem with those two recommendations? If he does not, does that mean he will support the bill when it comes before the House for the vote on third reading?

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, there again he is talking about a bill which is this thick and he talked about a very small portion of the bill. That is what he talked about.

Certainly I can support that idea. Can I support the entire package? If I want to support that idea I have to vote for the whole ball of wax. It reminds me of the Charlottetown accord. How many times has the Prime Minister said: "You do not want a triple-E Senate; if you had wanted a triple-E Senate you would have voted for the Charlottetown accord". Hogwash. That is maybe one thing in there we did like, but there was a whole pile of stuff in there that people did not like, obviously, or it would not have gone the way it did. Sometimes you do not buy the whole package because of some good stuff.

• (1145)

That is why it is really difficult when we sit over here. When the government does produce something that has the sugar in it that we like, the things that ought to be in there, why does it colour it black with some other stuff when it knows people do not want it? Why do we have to buy the whole package?

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening attentively to the debate. I have listened attentively to the Reform Party and its position.

It is difficult to be in opposition. The Reform Party sometimes forgets that our party was in opposition for nine years. It is not as if we do not know what it is like to be in opposition and how difficult it is sometimes.

I gather basically that what the Reform Party is saying is there is nothing wrong with Bill C-45 per se; what is wrong is there is not more in it. I take some solace in that. There is nothing wrong with Bill C-45 specifically. Everything can be improved. We can always do better. There can always be suggestions coming forward based on what happens in certain cases. That is no reason not to support a bill in which there is nothing really wrong, other than that it is not thick enough, I guess would be the way we would put it.

In my brief time I will concentrate on two aspects of Bill C-45 in the context of how individual members of Parliament can make a difference to the legislative process. This is reasonably relevant in view of the member's comments about puppets. There is an unfortunate belief pervading Canada that the individual member of Parliament cannot do anything, cannot contribute, does not make a difference.

I will talk about the history of this bill and what happens when individual members of Parliament take an interest. What piqued my interest in this topic was what one of the Reform Party justice critics said last Wednesday, September 20, 1995, the hon. member for Crowfoot, with whom I have worked on the justice committee. On page 14658 of Hansard:

> Canadians can no longer tolerate the likes of Wray Budreo, who psychiatrists diagnosed as a sadistic pedophile having a 30-year history of molesting children, being released unsupervised from a maximum security prison because correctional services did not have the power to detain him even though the parole board ruled him likely to reoffend. They cannot tolerate it because the cost is far too high.

I have had an intimate relationship and knowledge of that particular section of the previous act and of the Wray Budreo case, which I am about to relate. I thought my friends in the Reform Party might be interested in the facts of that matter. They do not quite gibe with the quoted comments of the hon. member for Crowfoot.

While we were in opposition I was the official opposition critic for the solicitor general. As such, I was charged by my party with watching over Bill C-36, the Corrections and Conditional Release Act. I struggled with my party with the very points my friends in the Reform Party have brought up today. Ultimately, we voted against the bill.

I put in something like 20 or 30 amendments, which were accepted and which in my view strengthened the bill. In the end, in our view there were sufficient problems with it to vote against it. In a parliamentary democracy we lost the vote and the bill proceeded. It is now the law of the land. It has been implemented. Correctional services asked us to give the bill a chance to work and if we found any errors we would plug them, thus Bill C-45.

Before Bill C-45 we came up with the problem of Wray Budreo, and that is specifically section 130 of the act. My friend will know how things go in these deliberations. We go over it with a fine tooth comb, line by line, word by word, comma by comma. Fifteen or nine or however many members of the justice committee who were there at that time missed something. We did not purposely overlook it; we simply missed it. That was the serious harm clause which states that by statute every prisoner must be released after serving two–thirds of his or her term.

I am not talking about a life sentence here. Generally, if there is a fixed term then after two–thirds of that term you must be released unless certain things happen. One of those is a reference to the board. If the board finds that an offender, if released, is likely to commit an offence causing the death of or serious harm to another person before the expiration of the offender's sentence, according to law the board can order that he or she be kept in for the balance of their sentence.

We read that, agreed with it and passed it. I did not offer any amendments. What happened was that the Wray Budreo case pointed out to us that we had missed something. What happened? Wray Budreo is not, I suppose, depending on how you use the words, a sadistic pedophile, which implies what we might call actual physical assault on children. Wray Budreo is a pedophile, there is no doubt about it; but as far as we knew from the profile he did not sodomize young boys. What he liked to do was in effect pet them on the abdomen. This caused him sexual pleasure.

The board took the interpretation that petting a child in that manner, not even touching the sexual area, just the abdomen, was not serious harm as defined in that section. Serious harm was deemed to be, for example, sodomizing a young child. Of course, a petting would not be an offence likely to cause death.

The board felt its hands were tied and it would have to let Wray Budreo out after he had served two–thirds of his sentence. It agreed he was likely to reoffend. It agreed he was likely to find other children and touch them on the abdomen and various other places. It also agreed he was not likely to cause death and he was not likely to cause serious harm as that section had been interpreted.

When that hit the papers, perhaps to use some of the rhetoric of my friend, I went ballistic. I brought this matter before the justice committee, which at that time was chaired by Mr. Bob Horner, a Conservative. The committee was controlled by Conservatives. I asked the committee to review this section and see if we could come up with a suggested approach for the government. All of the parties agreed, and the New Democrats were represented on that committee as well. We undertook a study of section 130 in specific reference to the Wray Budreo case and we came up with a unanimous report, which we tabled in the House of Commons.

Sadly or perhaps happily, depending on whether we are looking at it politically or in terms of solving this problem, we were approaching the end of the Conservative mandate. There was not enough time for the Conservative government to react to this unanimous report.

The current solicitor general reacted to it immediately. As soon as he was appointed solicitor general one of the first bills he brought in was Bill C–45, the government's response to what I have just laid out as what happened in the Budreo case.

I will now quote from the amendment to section 130, contained in section 43: "The board may order that the offender not be released from imprisonment before the expiration of the offender's sentence according to law, where the board is satisfied", among other things, "that the offender is likely if released to commit a sexual offence involving a child before the expiration of the offender's sentence according to law".

That is a direct response to a private member's initiative, which plugs the Wray Budreo loophole. That is a response brought forward by the government in direct response to the entreaties initially by me and ultimately the justice committee. It addresses a wrong and a loophole we did not notice in our initial examination of the bill.

That is the history behind that amendment. That is why the amendment has been brought forward. It still leaves in place the requirement of death or serious harm for other circumstances, but it protects children.

Often the very damaging serious psychological harm takes 20 or 30 years to manifest itself. While touching the abdomen of a young child might not be considered serious harm in a physical sense, it might be serious harm in a psychological sense 20 years later. That is the whole purpose behind this particular section.

This is an example of what individual members of Parliament on a committee can do in terms of strenghthening legislation.

Clearly this is an amendment that needs to be supported. If it is in a bill that has all kinds of other terrible things in it, obviously we cannot support it. If it is in a bill that for all intents and purposes is not criticized except for what is not in it, it can be supported and still go after what is not in the bill in amendments by members at committee and in private members' bills. Sometimes the germ of the idea of a private member's bill gets accepted by the government of the day.

The second aspect I wish to talk about in Bill C–45 pertains to section 743.6 of the Criminal Code. I relate it to private members and what I talked about in my question to my hon. friend about the courts, whether we tell the courts what we mean or whether they tell us what we mean.

According to law you must be released after serving two–thirds of a fixed sentence unless certain things occur, which I just talked about. In the same way, you are automatically by law eligible to be considered for parole after serving one–third of your sentence.

In some circumstances, and I am sure my friends in the Reform Party will agree, there are egregious cases in which people say no, there should not be automatic eligibility for parole after one–third of your sentence.

A section was passed in the Criminal Code which in part says: "Where an offender receives a sentence of imprisonment of two years or more for an offence set out in schedule I or II to that act", that is very serious offences, prosecuted by way of indictment, "the court may, if satisfied, having regard to the circumstances of the commission of the offence and the character and circumstances of the offender, that the expression of society's denunciation of the offence or the objective of specific or general deterrence so requires, order that the portion of the sentence that must be served before the offender may be released on full parole is one–half of the sentence or 10 years, whichever is less".

What does all that mean? It means that if a judge sees a case that he thinks requires that the offender serve at least one half of his time before being eligible for parole then he can so order under this section. In my view, it is pretty clear what the House of Commons meant by "the objective of specific or general deterrence so requires". What do I know about what is clear?

On February 20 of this year there was an article in the Toronto Star about a drug trafficker. The trial judge, quite rightly I think, thought it was a pretty bad crime, that we did not want drug traffickers, particularly in heroin. The gentleman was sentenced to only three years, but the court ordered that he serve one–half of his sentence before he be considered eligible for parole.

Because I do not rely on what is in the newspapers I did some research by pulling the court of appeal decision in the case and finding the trial judge's reasons which stated:

> The most important factors of sentencing that ought to be brought to bear in my mind on this case are the factors of individual and general deterrence. General deterrence means that the sentence should send a message to other persons in like situations, or who are considering becoming involved in like situations, that this is likely what you will receive.

The trial judge got it right. That is exactly what the House meant when we passed the legislation. It was as clear as a bell to me and I thought it was clear in the words of the section.

Along comes the court of appeal of the province of Ontario to state the following:

> Unfortunately the wording of section 741.2 provides the judge with very little guidance to determine when this exceptional authority over parole eligibility should be exercised.

It also states:

> The presumption is that Parliament intended section 741.2 to have some additional purpose.

I thank the court of appeal. Of course it did. It then states:

> It then falls to the courts to give the section meaning and function.

When I read that I said that it was wrong. It is up to us to tell the courts what we mean when we pass a statute. Therefore I brought the matter to the attention of the justice committee. My friend from Wild Rose was on the justice committee at that time. I pointed out that was not the intention.

The court of appeal overruled the trial judge and stated that the section could only be used in the rarest of circumstances and that in all cases rehabilitation of the offender must be paramount. That was not the intention of Parliament. I was here and I know what the intention of Parliament was. We heard the debates, which were obviously not read by the court of appeal.

The court of appeal states:

> In my view section 741.2 should only be invoked as an exceptional measure where the crown has satisfied the court on clear evidence that an increase in the period of parole ineligibility is required.

There is no onus in this section for the crown to show anything. There is no requirement on the crown to prove anything.

Therefore I asked the justice committee if it would consider an amendment for the sole purpose of overturning the court of appeal's interpretation of what Parliament meant when it passed that section. The result of my request to the justice committee is subparagraph (2) of that section, an amendment in Bill C–45 which states:

> For greater certainty, the paramount principles which are to guide the court under this section, are denunciation and specific or general deterrence with rehabilitation of the offender, in all cases, being subordinate to these paramount principles in this section.

If that is not clear to the court of appeal, we had better send it back to school.

There was unanimous recommendation of the justice committee. The government accepted the recommendation and the amendment. It has already been passed in Bill C–41. It will pass if we vote for this bill. It is another example of how individual members of Parliament on their own initiative, working with others in committees, can make bills better.

I support the bill. We know from the other party there is nothing wrong with what is in it. We can understand there should be more things in it. They can work for those, but they should not throw the baby out with the bath water. I urge members to support the bill.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I had a great time in Scarborough. The hospitality was wonderful.

I would like to know about the consecutive sentencing in Bill C–45. I believe, and memory is getting about as old as the rest of my body, if people commit another crime when on parole that sentence is added to what they did not serve on the other crime. Then they get two–thirds knocked off and are eligible for parole again after one–third of the time, if I am not mistaken. That is wrong.

Consecutive sentencing is something the government avoids talking about. I know it does not happen in the court. It is deplorable to see people like Bernardo commit nine serious crimes and only serve the amount of time one of the crimes would call for.

Mr. Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Sixty–two rapes, plus, plus, plus.

Mr. Thompson: "Sixty–two rapes, plus, plus, plus". Clifford Olson committed 12 murders but is only serving time on one.

Could the member tell me if he has any knowledge about why we cannot change that and make it retroactive for those who were sentenced previous to Bill C–45?

Mr. Wappel: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Wild Rose for his question. I believe the hon. member was not referring to consecutive sentences but rather to multiple sentences contained in section 139 of the Corrections and Conditional Release Act. If there is a section of the Corrections and Conditional Release Act which might qualify as the word my friend used in his previous speech, gobbledegook, it is that section.

We struggled with the section when we initially went through the Corrections and Conditional Release Act. We had flow charts. We had chiefs of police showing us what would happen if someone sentenced to 20 years for armed robbery committed another robbery while on parole. He would get out even before he ended up serving any time on the first offence.

The solicitor general at the time, Mr. Lewis, acknowledged there was a serious problem, that there was a lot of difficulty, and that he would set up a commission or a group of people to examine the matter and come back with some recommendations.

My understanding is that it has been dealt with to some extent in Bill C–45. However I think there is a lot of room for improvement with respect to the multiple sentence calculation. As I said, we missed the Wray Budreo situation but when that situation arose we dealt with it. Tragically it may very well be that the amendments to multiple sentencing, the changes to the calculations, have not dealt with all the problems. It is a very complicated section and a very complicated area of the law.

However if a case comes down that slips through the cracks or exposes an egregious error in the calculations that Canadians simply cannot abide, we will have to come up with an amendment. I am certain the government of the day will do so. No government is in the business of permitting loopholes to legislation. No government is in the business of wanting wild animals to walk the streets to threaten ordinary law–abiding citizens.

We have made an effort to change section 139. I do not know that it is perfect. If it is not perfect we will soon know about it. Whatever government is in power at whatever time will make whatever changes are necessary to tighten the multiple sentence calculations.

I cannot sit down without a word about the Bernardo case, which my friend has raised a number of times. Canadians may not like the reality of the law, but it is that Paul Bernardo has been sentenced to life in prison. I am not talking about when and if he will ever be paroled. He is under a sentence of life and as long as he lives he will be under a sentence of life imprisonment. As the law currently stands—and never mind the 15–year faint hope clause for the time being—he cannot even be considered eligible to apply for parole until he serves 25 years of his sentence. When he applies for parole, assuming he does, after that 25 years there is no guarantee he will get parole. The parole board can refuse him parole for the rest of his natural life and he can spend the rest of his natural life in prison.

Even if he gets parole 25 or 30 years from now, he is still under a sentence of life imprisonment. If he breaches any of the conditions of his parole at that time, 25 or 30 years from now, he can be brought back into the prison system to serve the rest of his sentence.

I want to make it clear that it is incorrect to say that persons who commit first degree murder is sentenced to 25 years. That is false. They are sentenced to life in prison and they have the opportunity to apply for parole after 25 years.

It is up to the parole board to decide on a case by case basis whether or not a particular murderer should be granted parole. For my part I certainly hope that neither Bernardo, Clifford Olson nor the people who murdered Emanuel Jacques, the shoe shine boy, ever get out of prison. I hope they rot in their cells, daily remembering the tragedies they have wrought.

Let us talk facts. These people are under sentences of imprisonment for life.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I noticed the member for Scarborough West passed very quickly over the faint hope clause. I would rather he did not do that.

How does the member feel about clause 745?

Mr. Wappel: Mr. Speaker, I only passed over it because there is really not much in it. It is merely a regurgitation.

There will be circumstances where persons change so dramatically in life—and they will be few and far between—that they should be given the opportunity to put their situation before a jury of their peers, not a judge but ordinary citizens like us.

My problem with the current section is that the persons only have to convince two–thirds of a jury. When they were convicted the jury had to be unanimous that they were guilty. However under the current provisions of section 745 they have to show two–thirds of the jurors that they should be allowed to apply for parole before they serve 25 years.

It should be a unanimous requirement. If they cannot convince a jury unanimously that they are entitled to early parole eligibility, they should not get it.

In the absence of an amendment saying that, I do not support section 745 as it is currently drawn. The hon. member for York South—Weston has moved a private member's bill in that regard which I supported at second reading and which I support now.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, nothing strikes a chord more deeply in the heart and soul of Canadians than the issues we are discussing today. Crime, punishment and safety are essential to their feelings of security.

Bill C–45, an act to amend the Corrections and Conditional Release Act, deals with many very important issues such as detaining sex offenders of children, a system to remove parole board members, a system to deal with reoffenders while on parole, and a system to deal with restitution to the state. All these are integrally important changes that must be made to our justice system.

However, tragically we see again a lost opportunity. Another opportunity we have had to deal with these very important issues and make a significant impact upon our justice system has now passed us by because the government has done what it usually does, that is nibble around the edges.

I will make some constructive suggestions which my colleagues in my party have been working very hard on, issues that we have tried to convince the government to enact for the betterment of all Canadians. Once again it has failed to do so.

The first deals with sex offenders and it only deals with sex offenders of children. Sex offences involving anyone is a crime. Whether it is done to adults or children, by men or women, it is a crime and it needs to be dealt with very severely.

We should be imposing sentences which have as their primary purpose the protection of society and innocent civilians. What we have seen in the criminal courts for decades is that the rights and protection of innocent civilians have not been held in as high a regard as they could have been. In many cases we have seen the rights of the criminals being held in higher regard than the rights of innocent civilians. The innocent civilians have paid the price, tragically at times with their lives, because the justice department has not done its job.

There is the case in my riding of Robert Owens. He is a pedophile. He used to be a principal in a school. He had committed over 1,000 sexual offences. The reason they know that is he used to make a record on a Garfield calendar every time he committed a sexual offence on a child. His sentence was for 13 years. He served eight and a half years and is now living among his victims in my riding near a school. When we brought this to the attention of the authorities they said: "We are sorry. Our hands are tied. That is the law". If that is the law, the law is not doing a good enough job of protecting those victims living in that community.

I ask any member of the House to put themselves in the shoes of those victims. They have to completely change their lifestyle. The system does not address it but my colleagues have been putting forward constructive suggestions to address it.

We also need a better system to deal with parole board members. There have been numerous tragic situations brought up by my colleagues. There are some constructive things which we can do.

First, do not make them appointments, make them public service jobs.

Second, I was appalled that the parole board members, who are in effect acting like judges, go into the job often having no knowledge of justice issues. I find that absolutely incredible. How can we have parole board members who are appointed to positions making decisions with respect to people who could pose a significant threat to Canadian society when they have very little or no knowledge of the justice system? Make those people public servants and ensure they get the job based on merit.

An hon. member: It's not the Liberal way.

Mr. Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Third, as my colleague from Wild Rose said, if a person is on parole and commits an offence they must serve the remainder of their sentence before they are sentenced again, and the sentencing must run consecutively, not concurrently.

Fourth, the bill supposedly deals with restitution. It proposes that up to 30 per cent of what an incarcerated individual makes should go to the state. What about the victims? Who gives money to them? There is no ample compensation for victims, particularly for those who are victims of violent crime. It would be far more productive if the individual who has committed the offence knows full well that he will have to pay directly to the victim moneys to compensate for the harm he has done.

The bill deals with sentencing. We have spoken about criminals being eligible for parole after serving one–third of their sentence. Karla Homolka will be eligible for parole after serving three years of her sentence. The public may not be aware that individuals are eligible for day parole after serving one–sixth of their sentence.

Mr. Milliken: Presuming they get it.

Mr. Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Oftentimes they do get it.

They are eligible for full parole after serving two–thirds of their sentence. They only serve a maximum of two–thirds of their sentence because automatically they are awarded with good behaviour. A better idea is to ensure that every convicted criminal will automatically serve the full sentence and that sentence would be pulled down based on the behaviour of the individual in jail. Let us not assume that there has been good behaviour, let us make sure it is earned. There are many ways that can be done.

Furthermore all moneys an individual earns in prison should go to the state to help offset the $60,000 to $100,000 that it costs to have someone incarcerated and also moneys to the individuals themselves.

Work and training should be obligatory for individuals who are incarcerated. The training would go a long way to decrease the recidivism rate of those in our jails. It would enable people to get the skills necessary while they are incarcerated so they can become active and productive members of society. Not enough of that is done now. Furthermore it is not obligatory which it ought to be, if someone were to have the wherewithal to do that.

Number six is sentencing. We spoke about section 745 which should be repealed now. It shows the lame inability of the government to deal with significant issues of justice by not addressing section 745.

My colleague from Scarborough mentioned that when people are sentenced to life they serve life. That is absolute nonsense. I have a list that is pages long of individuals who were convicted of first degree murder and because of section 745 their sentence has been commuted to 15 to 17 years. That includes people who have killed police officers in cold blood. I am happy to share that list with anyone in the House.

Is that justice? I hardly think so. That is not the case at all. Section 745 should be repealed now. The government would be showing that it is truly committed to justice if it would take heed of what my colleagues have been saying for so long.

Number seven is young offenders. The government has promised to deal with the Young Offenders Act and has done virtually nothing. I implore members of the government to speak to police officers who are working on the street. Their hands are tied. They are frustrated with the inability of the justice system to back them up when dealing with young offenders.

Having worked with young offenders in jail I can say they receive very little penalty, very little deterrence to committing offences. That is why we see the terrible rate of recidivism among young offenders.

Here are a few concrete suggestions. Publish the names of young offenders. It would send a very clear message that they cannot engage in these activities with anonymity. Have the stiffer penalties that my party has been putting forward for a long time. Make work and school obligatory in their incarceration.

Part of the sentencing problems that we see are because the justice department and all departments are hamstrung because of a lack of funds. That is why we see people being released very early on, earlier than they should be. The trade–off is that the justice department due to a lack of funding is releasing people to save money at the expense of the safety of Canadians from coast to coast. That is not justice.

We have a couple of concrete solutions. We cannot take individuals who are young offenders, who often grow up in tragic and terrible home situations, put them into closed custody for a period of a few months, then put them back in the environment that they were in and expect things to change. It will not happen.

They are usually in an environment in which there are terrible cases of substance abuse, physical and sexual abuse and violence. If they are in this kind of milieu, it is impossible, no matter how much counselling is given to these kids to actually move forward—

An hon. member: Put them in the military.

An hon. member: Military training.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Colleagues, I am quite aware there are some strong views on both sides of this issue. However I remind you that when members are sitting close to the person who has the floor time the microphones are open. I am having a difficult time hearing the intervention of the hon. member. I ask you to keep that in mind.

• (1225)

Mr. Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that.

As I said before, we simply cannot deal with young offenders and make sure they do not reoffend if they go back to the environment they were in before, regardless of how much money is poured into counselling and counselling services.

A better idea is to incarcerate them for a longer time in an area away from their former environment where they can focus on work and education in a disciplined environment. It is essential to remove them from their former environment if we are to ensure these kids do not become adult offenders in the future. A ounce of prevention is a pound of cure. It is a worthwhile investment in our time. It need not cost us more money but it is something we desperately need to look at now.

We have to look at a new approach for dealing with crime and punishment. Oftentimes we see the precursors to criminal behaviour very early on. They are often rooted in cases in which there is a terrible environment of violent sexual abuse and neglect. These children need to be identified and picked up very early on.

Furthermore, it would serve many departments well if they were to work in collaboration with the educational department, particularly grade school, in trying to identify families at risk, by bringing the parents into the educational system so that they can also learn the fundamental aspects of being a good parent and what is considered to be reasonable behaviour. They in turn can help when the kids go home and the children will have an environment that will be conducive to building the pillars of a normal psyche.

There has been some interesting work done on this in a number of areas. The early data show that this is a very worthwhile investment of our time. If we can focus more on children when they are three, four and five and early on to identify families that are in crisis when a lady is pregnant, if we can have early intervention into these areas it will pay off in spades later on.

Therefore I strongly implore the government to show a leadership role in working with its provincial counterparts to try to address these problems which will decrease the cost to our justice system, our social programs and make a healthier and safer society for all Canadians.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member made a good speech in the sense that he set out, apparently very clearly, six or seven alternatives to the current bill.

I am surprised he is not supporting the bill because all his colleagues know the bill goes some way to meeting the complaints they have raised regarding Canada's justice system. Yet because it does not go far enough, they say they are going to vote against it, which has to be the silliest logic I have ever heard. I will set that aside for a moment.

I want to talk about the six or seven points that he raised. Frankly, they were sugar coated. I think he will admit that because although he said he wanted to look at sentencing again, he wanted to revise sentencing here and he wanted to change the rules there to make things a little different, the underlying message in almost every one of his points was that he wanted people locked up more often and for longer.

At the very end of his speech, having said nothing whatsoever about the cost of incarceration of inmates or persons in prison, he said: "Of course if we did these other things we would reduce the cost of the system". However, if he does all of the things he listed at the beginning he will increase the costs enormously. To incarcerate an inmate in maximum security costs something like $60,000 a year. It is an extremely expensive process.

What will he do to reduce the cost of the justice system? He says the government is spending too much money. The Reform Party has as its policy drastic cuts. Where will it cut in our justice system if it is to keep throwing people in jail or keeping them there for much longer?

I urge the hon. member to come to Kingston and tour the prisons. I will be glad to show him around. I think he would benefit from learning the way our justice system works and that part of the purpose of the justice system is to rehabilitate offenders so when they are released they do not reoffend. We have had remarkable success, quite frankly, in that. The hon. member should be pointing out those successes and giving figures.

If the member looked at the day parole statistics, for example, and he talked about the evils of letting people out early in their sentence on day parole, he would find that over 95 per cent of them—possibly 98 per cent but I do not have my little book here to recite the figures for him—or more are successful. It is a very successful program. It works and it helps reintegrate inmates into the community which is important for the long term development of our communities. We just cannot spring somebody at the end of a 20–year sentence and expect them to readjust to life outside. People lead a different life in there.

I am not saying that incarceration is not necessary. It is in certain cases. However it is not necessary to lock everybody up for life which is what the Reform Party seems to be urging.

Will the hon. member take a tour of prisons in Kingston and learn something about our prison system before his next speech on the subject? I know the hon. member for Wild Rose has done that. I congratulate him for it but obviously it did not work.

Finally, with respect to his own points, will he admit that what he was proposing would drastically increase costs for our prison system and greatly increase sentences for offenders in Canada?

Mr. Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring the hon. member back for a reality check.

I used to be a correctional officer and I also worked for seven years in both adult and young offender jails. I have a little experience on these issues.

If the hon. member wants to cut costs, I will give him a concrete way to cut hundreds of millions of dollars from the budget every year. One–third of all individuals incarcerated today are there for non–payment of fines. Those are the facts.

Mr. Milliken: Nonsense. Not in federal prisons.

Mr. Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, these individuals should not be in jail. The people who should be incarcerated are those who have proven to be a threat to society, who have victimized innocent civilians, usually in a violent fashion.

There is a trade–off here. Should we save money by discharging people into the community who would pose a threat to society, or should we tell the Canadian public that its rights and safety are the most important things? I believe everyone in the House would think the latter. The member's point with respect to saving money is perfectly valid and I have given him a very concrete reason for doing this.

He mentioned that I did not know anything about the costs. It is $60,000 a year for an inmate in a federal penitentiary and $90,000 for a youth in a young offender institution. That is too much money.

We have been presenting solutions on how to get inmates to work for their keep which in turn would cut costs. Again we must get those individuals who are violent offenders and who might be a threat to society and those who are incarcerated for non–payment of fines to work for their keep.

Another thing the hon. member mentioned was recidivism rates. The recidivism rate is 33 per cent for adults on parole. What is the recidivism rate for adults once they are off parole? No one can give me those figures. One thing is for sure, it has to be higher than 33 per cent.

With regard to young offenders, the recidivism rate is 40 per cent to 50 per cent. Those are the facts. That number is far too great. Obviously a 40 per cent or 50 per cent recidivism rate does not serve society and it certainly does not serve the kids who are young offenders very well.

We have to find a better way. I hope the hon. member will look at some of the concrete suggestions I have made which do not necessarily need to cost more if they are organized properly. I know members in this party would be happy to help anyone on the other side to make our justice system better for all Canadians.

Mr. Andrew Telegdi (Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to follow up on the question raised and the answer given by the hon. member.

First, people are not in federal penitentiaries for non–payment of fines. It is important for people to fundamentally understand that and not to allow the red herring being thrown out by the Reform Party to confuse the issue.

Second, the member mentioned that he worked in the justice system with young offenders and adults for seven years. I have worked in that system and I also worked with young offenders, adults, victims and victims' groups for 20 years. The hon. member's example of not incarcerating people for their inability to pay fines was addressed in Bill C–41.

• (1235)

That is something the hon. member with his colleagues voted against. We on this side and the government supported it. It is important for people to understand that there is the option now where somebody does not get incarcerated because they are unable to pay a fine. If they refuse to do the alternative, then they get incarcerated. That is a correction which was made to the sentencing process and which was long overdue.

The member for Wild Rose, a member of the party who promised to do things differently, calls that socialism. I am amazed at the shallowness of the member's understanding on this very complicated issue.

There is a very important point to be made. I wish my colleague from the islands would put his mind to it that prisons are very expensive, federal penitentiaries being even more expensive.

Surely the people in prison should be relegated there because they are a danger to the community and are not able to follow the conditions of their probation or parole for other crimes. Surely the member would agree that prisons should be reserved first and foremost for the small numbers who are a threat to public safety and second for those people who are given alternative options, say, for a property offence and not making restitution, not following the probation order then of course one cannot do much else but enforce the law that way.

Mr. Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy the hon. member agrees with us. I hope he crosses the floor on this bill.

We believe individuals in a federal penitentiary should be those who pose a threat to society. There are many ways one can argue a threat. There are threats in terms of violence and also threats in terms of those individuals who wilfully cause damage in other fashions to individuals. It is not only individuals who have been incarcerated for violent offences.

I hope the hon. member will work with us in devising new and innovative ways in which we can actually decrease the costs by not necessarily having individuals incarcerated in expensive, closed custody, federal penitentiaries. We want new ways in which we can send a clear message of deterrence to criminals, make sure that there is a penalty for individuals who are committing an offence, to deal with the issue we have been trying to deal with in trying to garner some restitution for the victims and the state, and ensure that individuals will not continue to reoffend.

We can identify the reasons why they reoffend, address those reasons and provide individuals with the ability and wherewithal to become a productive employed member of society. If we work together on these issues, we will make Canada a safer place.

Ms. Roseanne Skoke (Central Nova, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today at third reading of Bill C–45 to address the principles, objectives and effects of the legislative changes proposed by Bill C–45.

From the outset, let the record show that the people of my riding of Central Nova support the principles and objectives of Bill C–45. My constituents appreciate the government's response to the legitimate concerns of all Canadians who are demanding a higher standard of public protection from high risk, violent offenders.

The proposed government reforms as set forth in Bill C–45 will restore public confidence, close gaps in the corrections system and respond directly to identified shortcomings in our present system to give further protection to our children.

The legislative changes introduced in Bill C–45 require amendments to the Corrections and Conditional Release Act, the Criminal Code of Canada, the Criminal Records Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act and the Transfer of Offenders Act. The legislative changes in Bill C–45 are clearly in the best interests of all Canadians.

In my riding of Central Nova, many constituents, the police, parents, the public at large and organizations, including the newly formed organization of Child Safe of Pictou County, have raised time and time again legitimate concerns regarding sex offences against children. The purpose of Child Safe of Pictou County is to educate the public, to promote a sexual abuse free environment for children and to enhance the services for sexually abused children. These services are provided by an organization that certainly has the best interests of our children at heart. Therefore they applaud this legislation.

For the information of my constituents, Bill C–45 introduces legislative provisions that will make it easier to detain sex offenders who victimize children in penitentiary until the end of their sentences by removing the requirement that serious harm must be established as a criterion for detention in these cases.

Let me emphasize the government recognizes that all sexual offences are serious. The current Corrections and Conditional Release Act already authorizes the National Parole Board to detain offenders beyond the normal statutory release point if they are considered likely to commit an offence causing death or serious harm before the end of their sentence.

The vulnerability of individual victims is an important consideration in any release or detention decision. However the effectiveness of current legislation is limited because the serious harm criterion is difficult to establish in cases involving children.

Experience has shown that unlike cases involving adult victims, it is often difficult to establish serious harm where the child victim must provide the evidence because often the child cannot articulate the personal impact of the experience. Further, research has shown that the impact of such a crime on a child may not always become evident until many years later.

The legislative changes in Bill C–45 are in keeping with the government's desire to improve the protection of our children from high risk violent offenders and sex offenders. Bill C–45, in its treatment of the definition of serious harm for sex offences against children, will require the National Parole Board only to establish that a sex offence was committed which victimized a child and that a further sexual offence against a child is likely to be committed after release. This legislative change is long overdue and is welcomed by our Canadian families which hold sacred the security and protection of the person of all children in our country of Canada.

In addition to the prolonged detention of sex offenders and high risk violent offenders the government has introduced a legislative change to enhance and expand treatment programs for child sex offenders while in penitentiary. Correctional Service Canada presently carries out institutional treatment for sex offenders but resources are limited. The introduction of additional resources would strengthen treatment programs and are intended to improve public safety.

Speaking of public safety, in my capacity as member of Parliament I had the opportunity in May to visit the maximum security penitentiary in Renous, New Brunswick. For those who are familiar with this institution, it was here in May 1989 that Allan Legere escaped custody, committed four murders in the community and was then recaptured in November 1989. This was certainly a tragedy for that community.

Since 1989 considerable improvements have been made to this maximum security facility. The present warden, Mr. Jon Klaus, provided me with an opportunity to meet the correctional services staff, to visit with inmates and to see firsthand the maximum security institution. I was impressed with the high level of security and the latest surveillance technology being utilized at that facility.

The penitentiary concentrated on rehabilitation, upgrading, training, counselling, and there was segregation of high risk violent offenders from the other inmates. There is no question about it, Renous is a maximum security penitentiary that is state of the art. It provides the inmates with comfort, security, and every opportunity to rehabilitate their criminal behaviour. At the same time, it exists to protect the public from high risk offenders.

The criminal justice system and the penal correction system are interrelated. The general public must come to understand that it is the judiciary that has judicial discretion to impose sentences upon high risk and dangerous offenders, while Correctional Service Canada and its officials and staff are charged with the custody and rehabilitation of the high risk violent offenders while incarcerated. Then it is the National Parole Board that has the authority to release these offenders from detention.

The success of our criminal justice system and our penal correction system does not primarily rely on legislation. The fundamental success of our criminal justice system relies on the ability of man to administer justice without abuse of authority and power and the ability of man to administer justice coupled with equity and mercy.

Justice, law and morality are inseparable. If a moral society existed there would be no need for criminal sanction. It is a requirement of this criminal sanction in our society that necessitates this government to deter, to punish, to rehabilitate its members of society.

It is the human element that determines the success or failure of our criminal justice system and our penal correction system. The human element includes ourselves as individuals who are expected to be law–abiding citizens; the community at large, which develops public opinion; the role of our law enforcers, which is to enforce law; the role of our prosecutors administering justice within the system; the role of defence counsel defending and protecting the rights of the accused; the role of the judiciary rendering a decision; the role of our probation officers, psychologists, social workers, health care professionals, penal institution employees, our clergymen regarding the rehabilitation of the accused; and the role of us here today, the legislators enacting the law.

In my 18 years of practice as a litigation lawyer I have experienced firsthand the oppression, manipulation, and abuse of many people arising from the abuse of power, abuse of authority, and abuse of the process within the systems of government. These abuses I am referring to not only are in relation to the victims of crimes, but also in many cases the accused defendant as well.

It can be legitimately argued that the system of government is not working as it should. The legislative, the executive, and the judicial branches of government require reform from time to time to ensure justice and equity are meted out to all Canadians.

With respect to the legislative branch of government, it is time we as legislators put responsibility and morality back into the law. Justice, law and morality go hand in hand. They are inseparable.

With respect to the executive branch of government, which administers the law, it is time to diminish the authority, power, and discretion of the bureaucracy and make it more accountable for decisions and attitudes that affect individual Canadians.

With respect to the judicial branch of government, which interprets and enforces the law, it is time that consideration be given to electing our judiciary. The people must live with the decisions of courts. Therefore, it is time we give consideration to electing those who make these decisions.

Constituents of Central Nova have also raised the issue concerning the jurisdiction, power, and authority of the National Parole Board, an administrative tribunal with immense power and authority in relation to our high risk offenders. It is submitted that the government should seriously give consideration to ensuring maximum public input in the selection process of the National Parole Board members and that this selection process should be opened to public scrutiny. This legislation is not intended to address this issue.

Bill C–45 does establish a mechanism for the discipline of the National Parole Board members. The Corrections and Conditional Release Act is to be amended to allow the chairperson of the National Parole Board to report situations to the solicitor general that cause concern about the appropriateness of a board member's conduct or performance. Then if the minister agrees, a judge will conduct an inquiry focusing on whether the board member had met the responsibilities of the position. Grounds for the inquiry include incapacitation, misconduct, failure to execute duties, and being placed in a position incompatible with the execution of the member's duties. A judge could recommend that a member be suspended without pay, be removed from office, or he could recommend other remedial measures. This recommendation would be put before the governor in council.

The proposed mechanism will be modelled on a process found in the Immigration Act for the Immigration and Refugee Board. This enhanced accountability will be supported by increased training for the National Parole Board members in risk assessment and management of high risk sex and violent offenders.

Presently it should be noted that there is no formal mechanism for the discipline or removal from office of any National Parole Board member in specified circumstances. Therefore, Bill C–45 is implementing legislation that is necessary in Canada today.

It is respectfully submitted that this discipline mechanism is imperative. However, it is further submitted that until a procedure for appointments to the National Parole Board is subject to maximum input from the general public at large in the selection process of appointees, there will be continued problems and a continual public outcry for the decisions that are being made by the National Parole Board. Likewise, it is submitted that it is time we give consideration that our judiciary—the decision makers, the interpreters of law, the imposers of sentences after conviction—should be elected to their positions by the public at large.

I further support the additional legislative proposals in Bill C–45 and in particular the legislative change that will modify the system of sentence calculation to ensure that all offenders on conditional release who receive new custodial sentences are returned to custody and that all offenders serve at least one–third of a new consecutive sentence before being eligible to be considered for release.

In addition, I support Bill C–45's expansion of the list of offences for which an offender could be referred for detention until the end of sentence. These offences would include serious drinking and driving and criminal negligence offences that result in bodily harm or death, criminal harassment, also known as stalking, and conspiracy to commit serious drug offences.

A further legislative proposal in Bill C–45 I support is to broaden the authority of Correctional Service Canada to make deductions from an offender's income to help offset a portion of an offender's room and board costs.

It is without question that the positive changes proposed to be implemented in Bill C–45 have my support and the support of my constituents. I am urging all hon. colleagues to lend their support at third reading to Bill C–45.

• (1255)

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to hear that speech. I was pleased especially because the hon. member kept referring to the fact that her constituents were in support of the bill. We do not hear that very often from that side of the House, so I appreciate hearing it. That is what it is all about.

The hon. member suggested that we ought to consider electing judges. I wonder if she might expound on that a bit more. Should it possibly go further and apply to other positions in the government that are traditionally appointed positions?

Ms. Skoke: Mr. Speaker, it is certainly not the first time I have raised the issue in the House of giving serious consideration to the election of our judiciary.

I realize that appointment of our judiciary from our barrister societies and from our law profession across the country has been the tradition. However, I am calling on the government to give serious consideration to the fact that the responsibility the judiciary has is very important. Over the last two years that I have been in the House of Commons we have seen the effect judicial decisions have on what we enact in law and how we respond to the precedents they set.

Also, we understand that the role of the judiciary is not only to enforce the law as it comes before them, but to interpret the law. Those judges are in positions of trust and their decisions affect the daily lives of individuals. In my mind, I feel it is imperative that we move forward and take the necessary steps to ensure that our judiciary is elected by the public at large.

With respect to administrative tribunals and appointments to boards, I have some reservations with respect to board appointments and the selection process and also the functions of those boards. That is due to the fact that administrative tribunals do have a judicial function and a role to play in the country, and an appeal of the decisions administrative tribunals make is very difficult. Appeals can only be made in the event there is an error in law on the face of the record. Therefore, they are primarily predicated on ensuring that natural justice takes place at the board level. It goes without saying that the appointments to the boards are of crucial importance to our country.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, when I came to the House I had strong hopes that I could support legislation that was moving in the right direction. Bill C–45, I admit, does just that.

I would like to be able to vote for the bill. I would like to be able to stand in the House and say the government is doing an excellent job with Bill C–45. However, like my colleague from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, I look at the bill from a slightly different perspective.

I do not want to talk about myself, so let me talk about the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca. As was mentioned in his answer, he is an individual who has had experience in the prison system. He served for some seven years as an officer and dealt directly with criminals. He also has had occasion in his life to be on the receiving end of the results of violence. He has dealt with raped kids. He has dealt with lacerations. He has dealt with gunshot wounds. He has dealt with body bags. He has served in an emergency department of a very busy community hospital. He has consequently dealt more with victims than I think most individuals have. I am afraid he approaches this bill with that perspective: Does it go far enough for victims?

I do not think it does and I am going to reflect on a couple of very specific parts of the bill. The first part is how sexual offenders are treated under the bill. It attempts to improve the sentencing for sexual offenders. It takes a child who has been sexually assaulted and gives the offender, because when it is a child harm does not have to be proven but presumed, the full sentence. I say great. How could a physician argue with a full sentence for a sexual assault on a child? Great.

However, it goes on to state that an adult who is sexually assaulted and has serious harm must prove the harm. That is wrong. There is no serious sexual assault committed on a man or a woman that does not have serious harm.

In my own practice I had a 47–year old woman who originally came from South Africa. She had problems in her life: depression, anxieties, suicidal impulses, a host of serious problems. She had unhappiness in her marriage and had actually attempted suicide at one point in her life. Over a fairly long period of counselling with this lovely, sweet woman, her story was told. It came out in a way that is difficult to describe publicly, but she told how how she had been sexually assaulted in her youth by a member of her family. She had been unable throughout her life to ever divulge that to anyone. With tears streaming down her cheeks, with anguish in her heart, shaking and miserable, she divulged that to me.

What had that done to her, that one single episode of sexual assault in her life? She had frigidity in her marriage. She was unable to respond properly to affection. She was distant to her male children. She could not get close to her boys. She was fine with her little girl who she gave love and affection, but she could never ever respond properly to her boys, the children she bore.

I mentioned the depression and the anxiety. The end result was a broken marriage. She never got over that assault. That proves to me that a sexual assault on a child is devastating.

I have also had the opportunity, over and over again, to deal with sexual assault on young women and young men. It is not commonly known that sexual assault takes place against young men as well. There is not one single instance in any of those assaults that the assaults were harmless.

To have to prove harm when sexually assaulted is wrong. There is no excuse and no reason to have to prove physical harm, none.

The second issue in this bill is the way drunken driving is handled. I am a teetotaller. I do not drink. I am a fellow who believes alcohol can have harmful effects. Many of my chums have a beer or two and do not have a problem. However, drunken driving is considered to be a very serious problem in our society. Damage to someone when drunk is treated with vigour.

• (1305)

This bill says that serious injury due to drunken driving demands the full sentence. It will come down hard on those individuals that drive when they are drunk and hurt someone. However, an adult woman hurt seriously by a pervert once again has to prove harm with no necessity of a full sentence. There is an inconsistency in this law in this regard.

On one hand we have a premeditated perverted act. On the other hand we have a disease. Surely we understand that alcohol and the problems with alcohol are treatable and can be righted. On the other hand, we have perversion that generally cannot be treated.

There is a medical treatment for sexual perverts which is very specific. However, in our society we do not contemplate castration for a sexual pervert. I also want to bring to the attention of members and those who are watching that even if an individual who has a sexual perversion decides he wants to be surgically or medically castrated, he cannot.

There was a recent case of a sexual criminal in Quebec. He said: "I know that I am going to reoffend". He requested of his physician to have those impulses taken away. He said: "I want to have my hormones changed so this will no longer be the case". Not a chance; it cannot be done. Human rights activists come along and say he cannot even make such a decision on his own.

I believe in our society. We have constantly talked about not having solutions for problems. I raise this specifically as a solution for certain sexual crimes for certain sexual criminals. It is quite possible to make a little incision and inject a tiny amount of medication repetitively in the arm of an individual who has these sexual problems and stop the perversion. Give protection to our children. Give protection to our mothers and yes, protection to our sons.

I have another specific solution. I have heard from a number of members opposite that Reformers would like to throw everybody in the clink and toss away the key. There are a number of young offenders that do not need incarceration of any kind.

In my own community I asked practical, solid citizens: "What would you do to prevent a youngster from recreating their criminal behaviour". I am going to propose an idea that has come to me from these sensible common folk. They do not want to give these young people a job that will take work out of the workforce. They want to give them a job that is hard physically but does not take work and money from somebody that has done nothing wrong. What sort of a job is there like that? The job they came up with is rock picking.

I live in an area where there has been a little glacial activity. Every time the farmers in my community plough up their fields they turn up a new bed of rocks. Young men and women that have done wrong should be rock pickers. They should go through the fields, pick the rocks, pile them on the side. Nice rocks might be usable by a mason for fireplaces. The next year the farmer ploughs the fields up again and guess what? More rocks appear. There are not too many people who want to pick rock. There are not too many people who need to pick rock. This is a project for youngsters to teach them—a bit of the boot camp idea—hard work, discipline and a useful job.

In my part of the community we freeze in the winter and rock picking does not work well then. I have other ideas about what they could do in the winter but I will stop there.

There is one more solution for victims. Remember that I come down harsh on the criminal and really easy on the victim. This bill does not do that. Thirty per cent of a prisoner's income going to treatment of victims would do a lot for a women such as I described. She could not afford a psychologist. She could not afford to do anything but go to her family physician for counselling. Time and space are very limited for that. She could well have been helped by restitution from the person who harmed her. These solutions would improve the bill.

I have listened to members opposite say: "You do not like everything in the bill. It is going on the right direction. Support it". I ask members opposite, how did they vote when this exact same bill came before the last Parliament? The record shows they voted against the law and order bill that was presented by the Tories. Reformers are saying this is a bill moving in the right direction, some parts of it flawed, some parts fair.

We are saying to the Canadian public as plainly as we can, until the rights of the victims are placed well above the rights of the perverts and the criminals there will never be satisfaction with our justice system.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is the House ready for the question?

An hon. member: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the yeas have it.

An hon. member: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Motion carried on division.

MANGANESE BASED FUEL ADDITIVES ACT

The House resumed from September 26 consideration of the motion that Bill C–94, an act to regulate interprovincial trade in and the importation for commercial purposes of certain manganese based substances, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I remind the House as we resume debate on Bill C–94 that we are at the stage of debate during which members have a maximum of 10 minutes without questions and comments.

Mr. John Murphy (Annapolis Valley—Hants, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am proud today to speak on Bill C–94, the manganese based fuel additives act. This bill is intended to prohibit the importation and interprovincial trade of MMT, a manganese based additive to unleaded gasoline. The law will take effect 60 days after royal assent.

Canada is the only country in the world using MMT. The United States banned MMT in 1978. Only Bulgaria and Argentina are considering using MMT.

Environment Canada has received and reviewed study after study of the effects of MMT on this equipment. I agree with our Deputy Prime Minister and with Ford, Chrysler, General Motors, Toyota, Honda, Nissan, BMW, Volkswagen, Volvo, the list goes on, that MMT adversely affects the sophisticated onboard diagnostic systems where the pollution control equipment is found.

These systems are extremely important for the environment. They are responsible for monitoring the vehicle's emission controls and for alerting the driver to malfunctions. They ensure the cleaner burning engines of today and tomorrow operate as designed. They ensure automobiles are properly maintained resulting in decreased tailpipe emissions and improved fuel economy. Therefore this is a very important technology. It is even more important that it works and that it does its job. We will make sure it does.

To ensure this technology works it must be free from MMT. OBD systems are designed to monitor the performance of pollution control systems, in particular the catalysts, and alert the driver to malfunctions. If the OBD system is not functioning because of MMT and if the catalyst is not working at all, tailpipe emissions could be increased up to 40 times.

The third party has suggested that MMT reduces NOx emissions by 20 per cent. However this reduction is based on data collected by Ethyl from test cars. When examined in the context of the current Canadian fleet, Environment Canada analysis indicates that NOx reduction would only be 5 per cent.

The third party has asked why the minister did not try to negotiate an agreement between the two parties. I can assure the House the government has been working since 1985 to broker a solution. Senior departmental officials from environment, transport, industry and natural resources have worked with senior representatives from the petroleum and automotive industries for several years in an effort to resolve this issue.

More recently the Deputy Prime Minister attempted to negotiate an agreement between these industries. She met with representatives of the petroleum industry on two separate occasions. The Deputy Prime Minister was prepared to support the introduction of a green pump containing MMT free fuel in an effort to resolve this issue. The petroleum industry rejected this approach.

It is now time to act. If we do not act now then the federal government's vehicle emission reduction programs will be in jeopardy. We risk missing out on major reductions in smog, carbon monoxide and hydrocarbons. If we do not act now, Canadian consumers will be prevented from taking advantage of state of the art emissions reduction technologies simply because they do not have access to MMT free gasoline.

If we do not act now, we could face a situation where automakers will be forced to turn off the diagnostic systems scheduled for 1996 models because of the damage MMT causes. General Motors is already bringing models off the assembly line with some of the onboard diagnostic functions disconnected. GM, like others, is no longer prepared to assume the increased warranty risks for damage caused to pollution control equipment.

In the end Canadian motorists will have to pay more to have their cars maintained because of this kind of industry action. We as a government will not let this happen. We will not allow the buck to be passed to the Canadian consumers. We will not allow anti–pollution equipment in Canada to be less effective than anti–pollution equipment in the United States. We will not allow the competitiveness of our auto industry to be threatened. We will not allow investment and the thousands of Canadian jobs which depend on this investment to be put in jeopardy.

Let us be clear. The job of reducing motor vehicle pollution can no longer be addressed just by the auto industry, the petroleum industry or the government. Progress at reducing vehicle pollution demands action by all.

The petroleum industry needs to keep making improvements in the composition and properties of the fuels the engines burn. The auto industry needs to keep making improvements in vehicle emissions control technologies such as those offered through onboard diagnostic systems.

Preventive action means producing goods more cleanly. It means using less energy and conserving our natural resources. It means developing and using the latest green technologies, like the emissions reduction technologies in today's cars and trucks.

This bill before the House is one measure of prevention. This bill is pro environment, pro consumer, pro business. Eighteen of Canada's automaking companies think we are doing the right thing. Canadians think we are doing the right thing.

MMT can no longer stand in the way of the progress we continue to make on vehicle emissions reduction and environmental protection. Let us protect jobs, protect investment, protect consumers and protect the environment. Let us make Canada the last country in the world to use MMT.

CULTURAL PROPERTY EXPORT AND IMPORT ACT

The House resumed from September 25 consideration of the motion that Bill C–93, an act to amend the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee; and of the amendment.

Mr. Mac Harb (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to speak on Bill C–93. As a background to this legislation, the purpose of the bill is to amend the Cultural Property Export and Import Act with consequential amendments to the Income Tax Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, to establish an appeal of determination by the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board of the fair market value of certified cultural properties.

Going back a little, in December 1991 the responsibility for determining the fair market value of cultural property donated to designated Canadian museums, art galleries and libraries was transferred from Revenue Canada Taxation to the review board. The review board assumed this new responsibility at a meeting which was held sometime in January 1992.

There was no provision for appeal of review board decisions included in the legislative amendment despite the fact that the right of appeal existed when this responsibility was with Revenue Canada.

Donors and custodial institutions expressed serious concern about the lack of an appeal mechanism. As a result the Department of Canadian Heritage, in co–operation with the review board, undertook a series of consultations with the community about the need for an appeal process. As a result of these consultations it was agreed that a legislative amendment should be prepared to establish the right of appeal to the Tax Court of Canada.

The bill gives a donor or a custodial institution the right to request that the review board reconsider its initial determination of fair market value. If after receiving a redetermination from the board the donor is still not satisfied, he or she may take the second step of appealing the board decision to the Tax Court of Canada.

There are a number of items in the legislation I would like to share with my colleagues. The Cultural Property Export and Import Act provides tax benefits to encourage donations to public institutions of objects and collections of outstanding significance and national importance.

It is the only program of the Government of Canada that provides financial support through tax credits for donations to museums, art galleries, archives and libraries. Museums, art galleries, archives and libraries in every province and territory of Canada will benefit through the receipt of donations of cultural property as a result of the tax credits.

Cultural property valued at approximately $60 million is donated to Canadian institutions each year. The fair market value of cultural property certified by the review board as a result of the legislation will become eligible for a tax credit of 17 per cent on the first $200 and 29 per cent on the balance if it is over $200.

The donor can claim the fair market value of the gift up to the total amount of his or her net income, and there is no tax payable on any capital gain resulting from the gift. There is a cap and the cap is the total income of the individual on an annual basis.

Because a donor receives a tax credit the amount of money realized as a result of the donation is approximately 50 per cent of the fair market value. The donor does not therefore receive a tax refund equivalent to the fair market value of the gift.

Donors, museums, art galleries and professional associations have been lobbying for the right to appeal review board decisions as it was perceived that the lack of an appeal was a denial of natural justice. To that end the government has taken action.

The establishment of an appeal should be viewed as a reinstatement of the right of appeal that was lost when the responsibility for determining fair market value was transferred to the review board back in 1991. The amendments will ensure that donors who disagree with determinations of the review board will have the right of appeal to the court and will not be denied natural justice.

The announcement of the establishment of an appeal process was received positively by donors, museums, art dealers and the media. These amendments therefore enjoy a high level of public support.

• (1335)

The amendments are technical in nature and respond to strong concerns expressed by the heritage community. Their passage into law should be seen as part of the ongoing commitment of the Government of Canada to ensure the preservation of Canadian heritage.

Bill C–93 has dealt with all the concerns in communities and all wishes of different art galleries, museums, libraries and similar institutions. All those concerns have been studied and legislation that responds to them in a positive way has been brought forward.

It is a perfect example that the government is willing to listen to the concerns of the people, that the government is willing to take action, and that the government has taken action on an issue of national importance and of great concern to the art community of Canada.

I congratulate all those who have made representations to the Department of Canadian Heritage, my colleagues in the House of Commons, the committees and the administration through direct communication. I also thank all those who worked tirelessly to ensure the legislation would come before the House in a timely fashion.

I am sure my colleagues on both sides of the House will stand to speak in support of the great initiative taken by the department of heritage. We truly believe that if somebody is willing to do good and give to a national institution such as a gallery, a library or a museum, the individual deserves the right to be recognized and to be given an incentive.

This is why we made provision in the legislation to give a tax credit for any Canadian citizen, or for that matter a landed immigrant in Canada, who might have something of national significance to give as a gift to the crown. The individual will be given a tax credit of up to 17 per cent if the gift is worth less than $200 and up to 29 per cent of his or her annual income. I think that is fair. I call on people from coast to coast to coast who might have valuable items to consider giving them to museums and so forth.

Some of my colleagues might have some points to make. This would be a most opportune time to put their points on the table so that we can deal with the legislation in a timely manner.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to support the bill, an act to amend the Cultural Property Export and Import Act.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Milliken: Hon. members opposite find this act a bit of a joke. I am sorry they think so. It is sad that they have moved amendments to delay adoption of the bill in the House. This surprises me because it shows they really do not care about Canada's cultural community with which the bill deals. If hon. members opposite gave two hoots about Canada's cultural community, they would not have moved all the amendments.

I will read the amendment moved by the hon. member for Medicine Hat. I believe it is the second or third one; I have lost count. The amendment reads:

> That this House declines to give second reading to Bill C-93, an act to amend the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, since it fails to address the issue of the burden the tax credit system places on middle class taxpayers who are asked to pay for a potentially endless stream of donations of questionable cultural and artistic value claimed by wealthy Canadians.

The amendments shows a complete disregard for Canada's cultural community because it says that the work of Canadian artists is worthless, that the acquisitions of art by Canadians are worthless, and that these are "donations of questionable cultural and artistic value". That is what Reform Party members are saying. Those are the very words of their motion. That is what they are saying to Canadian artists and philanthropists involved in supporting Canada's artistic community. It is a disgrace.

My hon. friend for Ottawa Centre will appreciate that I had occasion to go to Alberta in July of this year. One place I visited was the Tyrrell museum in Drumheller. There are a lot of dinosaurs in that museum and I can say that the resemblance between some of the dinosaurs there and members of the Reform Party was absolutely striking. I could tell where their ancestors came from.

I was very impressed with the Tyrrell museum. It is one of Canada's cultural centres. It has an excellent collection. I enjoyed my visit immensely. I took a tour of the entire museum and I saw the workings of the very specialized people involved in the digs.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Milliken: Hon. members opposite seem to be regarding this as bit of a joke. I do not find anything particularly funny about a tour of Canada's cultural industries. Hon. members opposite talk about deficit reduction and they forget that Canada's culture contributes mightily to our economy. They do not pay any attention to the fact that people spend billions of dollars a year attending artistic events, concerts of all kinds.

These are the artists the bill is designed to assist. The bill promotes artistry and culture in Canada, and hon. members opposite are opposed to it. They keep moving amendments to delay its passage. Why are they opposed to it?

Surely the member who represents Drumheller and sits on that side of the House is aware of the museum and its value in his community. It is a big drawing card for Drumheller. I have no doubt the bill will assist the museum in some of its work. Yet hon. members opposite attack the bill.

What about the famous museums in Calgary? The city of Calgary is burdened with Reform representation in the House. These people cannot represent. Unfortunately, with no adequate representation in the House, members from Calgary are failing their very famous museum in Calgary, the Glenbow museum. I have been to it.

Hon. members opposite laugh and treat it as a cavalier matter when that museum is a major drawing card for the city of Calgary. The museum attracts tourists to Calgary to see the art and the other exhibits. Hon. members opposite should be ashamed of their mocking of Canada's cultural industries.

What are the objectives of this very important piece of legislation? The bill amends the Cultural Property Export and Import Act and related legislation to establish a process to appeal decisions by the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board on the fair market value of certified cultural property. That is a significant change and it is not all for the benefit of the wealthy.

Deals work both ways. The minister can also appeal if he thinks the valuation is wrong. Hon. members opposite fail to mention that in their amendments and in their speeches. Their only reason for doing so is that they are out to kill Canada's cultural industries.

In the 1990 federal budget responsibility for determining the fair market value of cultural property donated to designated Canadian museums, art galleries and libraries was transferred from Revenue Canada to the review board. No provision for appeal of review board decisions was included in those amendments, despite the fact the right of appeal existed when the responsibility was with Revenue Canada. In other words, we are trying to get some fairness back in the system, fairness not just for the donor but also for the Government of Canada, which has a right of appeal in these cases.

Donors and custodial institutions have expressed serious concern about this lack of appeal process. It led the Department of Canadian Heritage, ably led by the hon. Minister of Canadian Heritage, in co-operation with the review board, to undertake a series of consultations with the community, which has resulted in this bill.

Hon. members opposite think this bill was an idea conceived by the government acting on its own. Nothing can be further from the truth. As usual, the government consulted extensively with Canadians and came up with a process that is fair and reasonable. Accordingly, these amendments were prepared. There is a right of appeal established by this bill to the Tax Court of Canada. The creation of the appeal process is a reinstatement of a right of appeal lost in 1991 and a means of ensuring that there is no denial of natural justice.

I know the words "natural justice" must be something difficult for members opposite to understand. We have been listening to them this morning talk about Bill C-45 and sentencing. Their notion of justice is wildly different from the notion of most other people in this country. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra may have missed that part of the speech. I expect he was in committee this morning. All they want to do is lock people up and throw away the key. We heard about that.

Unfortunately I missed the hon. member for Wild Rose's speech too. I understand it was a real blockbuster. As usual, it was the kind of speech that involves locking people up and throwing away the key. It is not a useful contribution, in my view, to the administration of justice or to the rehabilitation of offenders that we are all seeking.

I want to return, as return I must, to Bill C-93, which after all is the subject of my remarks this afternoon.

The government is committed to improving the collections of all Canadian cultural institutions through a combination of import controls to retain cultural property in Canada and tax incentives to encourage donations to designated institutions. This approach to cultural property preservation is acknowledged internationally as a model for other countries to follow. Canada is a world leader in that regard.

When I was at the Tyrrell museum in Drumheller—and hon. members opposite ought to be supporting these institutions instead of tearing them down—I discovered there was a rule in Alberta prohibiting the export of fossils from Alberta. They could not be removed from the province. Hon. members opposite should be aware that kind of cultural legislation exists, not just at the federal level but also at the provincial level.

In making it easier for individuals to appeal rulings and valuations to the tax court, the government is demonstrating its commitment to allow Canadians efficient access to the judicial system to challenge the decisions of government boards. This has been the policy of the government for many years. The policy of this party has been to favour fairness in treatment for all.

We have striven for fairness in many ways. That has been evident in most of the legislation that has been introduced in this House, including the legislation that was debated so vigorously this morning, which hon. members dumped on because they wanted to lock people up and throw away the key.

The Bloc Quebecois, on the other hand, has been relatively silent today. I congratulate the hon. member for Longueuil—

[Translation]

The hon. member has indicated he does not want me to refer to what was said by members of his party about this bill. But I must, because they always argue that the province of Quebec does not receive enough funding for culture in this country. They are wrong. The hon. member knows perfectly well that the province of Quebec receives more—

Mr. Gagnon: More than its share.

Mr. Milliken: —more than its share. Exactly. I thank the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine for his assistance.

[English]

In any event, although Quebec makes up only 25 per cent of the Canadian population—it is a significant percentage and I should not say only—an average of 36 per cent of federal funds for cultural organizations were distributed in Quebec.

Mr. Gagnon: Could we hear that in French?

[Translation]

Mr. Milliken: Perhaps I could repeat it in French.

Mr. Gagnon: Yes, they would appreciate that.

• (1350)

[English]

Mr. Milliken: Thirty–six per cent of federal funds for cultural institutions were distributed in Quebec, including 37 per cent of the funds for Telefilm Canada, 40 per cent of the National Film Board funds, and 37 per cent of the funds for CBC. Let me perhaps repeat that.

My translation is not perfect. Although the province of Quebec represents only 25 per cent of the population, 36 per cent of federal funding for cultural organizations was distributed in this province, including 37 per cent for Telefilm Canada, 40 per cent for the National Film Board and 37 per cent for Radio–Canada. Imagine!

If these figures are accurate, the hon. member has no reason to argue in this House that there is a problem with what the federal government does about culture in the province of Quebec.

I realize that the hon. member for Témiscamingue, who chairs one of the organizing committees for the referendum in the province of Quebec and probably has quite a few problems on his plate right now, has his own views on the subject. If there are any museums in his riding, he should talk to his friends in the Reform Party who want to kill these museums. He probably wants to support them. If there is a museum, it will certainly get a lot of money from the federal government, because of the huge amounts the government is spending in his province.

[English]

I urge the hon. member to recant his heresy, abandon the idea of separation, and jump on the bandwagon so that he can keep receiving all these benefits the museums in his constituency receive from the Government of Canada.

The Leader of the Opposition, and I thank the member for Ottawa West for reminding me of this statement, declared before the Bélanger–Campeau commission:

[Translation]

"One of the splendid achievements of the Canadian dream was the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. We all know that our cultural roots developed largely thanks to and under the aegis of those cultural titans who worked at the CBC".

[English]

The Leader of the Oppostion and the premier of Quebec are henchmen in leading the parade for the yes vote in Quebec. If he acknowledges that Canada has contributed so greatly, surely he ought to acknowledge that a little more often during the referendum debate. I have not heard him speaking on that subject. I do not understand it.

Since the hon. member for Témiscamingue is here and hearing this, perhaps when he next speaks with his leader he could remind him of this statement and of the tremendous support Canada gives to cultural industries in Quebec and indeed elsewhere in the country.

We in this party are proud to support Canada's cultural industries.

Mr. Strahl: Let me wipe my tears.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member says he is about to break into tears. I can understand that because his party seems hell bent on the destruction of Canada's cultural industries.

I am delighted that so many of my colleagues are here to show their support for Canada's cultural industries. I know the hon. member for Halifax attends cultural events in her community on a regular basis. She goes to concerts, to museums, to art galleries, and all these great things in Halifax. The hon. member for Ottawa West visits cultural events in this community. The hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair visits cultural events in her community. The hon. member for Saskatoon visits all kinds of cultural events and sites in his beautiful city of Saskatoon.

This country is covered with excellent cultural facilities and has a tremendous number of very gifted artists. Hon. members in the Reform Party should be ashamed that they are trying to destroy that cultural heritage.

Hon. members opposite may have received recently a diskette of the Juno award winners in Canada. Hon. members should realize that this kind of bill can assist organizations that are distributing this kind of material in our country and promoting Canadian artists here and abroad. These are all part of the policies of the government that are supported by this Bill C–93.

• (1355)

I urge hon. members opposite to abandon their position, support this bill, and let us get it passed.

The Speaker: We have time for a very brief question and comment. The hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair.

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if in two years or so some Liberals, perhaps under the leadership of the Prime Minister, were to travel to Wild Rose country, where there have been some sightings of dinosaurs, and sneak up behind a couple of them and knock them off and then try to donate them to a museum, how would this act work to allow us to have a tax credit for knocking off dinosaurs in Wild Rose country?

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to attempt to answer the hon. member's question.

I do not claim to be an expert on the bill. Whether the bill would assist in knocking off dinosaurs, I do not know. One thing that will help will be the vote on this bill. If hon. members opposite vote against it, I am sure the electors in their constituencies will want to do their best to knock them off in the next election. We will look forward to that.

The Speaker: It being almost 2 p.m., we will proceed to Statements by Members and hope the topics will be more up to date than the dinosaurs.

AIDS

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, AIDS is a problem we must all address. It has significant implications for public health, human rights, and impacts on our economy and our health and social service systems.

Our government recognizes the tragic nature of the disease and has allocated $203.5 million over the next five years for education and prevention initiatives, for research and monitoring, and to help people living with this disease. The people directly involved know that even this generous support will not be enough.

On October 1, for the first time the residents of the region of Peel will join others all across the country in walking to raise money for HIV and AIDS support, education, and awareness. I am sure all the members of Parliament will join me in wishing the participants the greatest possible success.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint-Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, former Senator Arthur Tremblay has made it very clear he will vote yes in the upcoming referendum. From the very start, this senior civil servant of the modern Quebec state helped develop and put in place the vital tools Quebecers gave themselves in the early 1960s under Jean Lesage's vision of "Maîtres chez nous".

Hardened by his many years of experience and his knowledge of the workings of federal political machinery, Mr. Tremblay said it was no longer possible, within federalism as it exists, to recover the powers that Ottawa had taken on over the years and that the time has now come for Quebec to take charge of its destiny.

In Mr. Tremblay's words, if Quebec is to escape from trusteeship federalism and domination by a central government continually reinforced by the dynamics of the general powers it has given itself, sovereignty is the only option.

NEW BRUNSWICK GOVERNMENT

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last week we were subjected to the gloating of government members over the re-election of Frank McKenna's Liberal government.

Of course those members forgot to mention that the way Mr. McKenna is running his province proves that he is no longer pursuing a Liberal agenda. In Halifax two weeks ago the upper management of two major corporations told me that doing business with Frank McKenna's government is like doing business with a private enterprise corporation. They also confirmed that Mr. McKenna seems to have abandoned the old style tax and spend dependency programs of the Liberals.

• (1400)

Clearly Mr. McKenna has joined the Reform wave that is washing Liberalism right out of provincial politics in every part of the country. Mr. McKenna is now running a Reform style government.

Government members rarely credit their constituents with any intelligence, but our side of the House can see that the Reform message has been clearly received and understood by the voters of New Brunswick. If only Liberal members at the federal level had the same degree of understanding.

PAGES

Mr. Peter Thalheimer (Timmins—Chapleau, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to welcome the pages to the House of Commons for this 1995-96 session. In particular, I extend a warm welcome to Nadine Nickner, a constituent of mine from the beautiful city of Timmins in the riding of Timmins—Chapleau.

These young men and women from all parts of our united and strong Canada will assist us while we debate the laws of Canada.

BOOK AND MAGAZINE FAIR

Mr. Tony Ianno (Trinity—Spadina, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, September 24, the sixth annual Word on the Street book and magazine fair was held on Queen Street West in my riding of Trinity—Spadina.

It is not only a celebration of the very best in Canadian writing, but it also draws our attention to the importance of literacy by promoting reading, writing and learning.

Last year a crowd in excess of 100,000 people jammed Queen Street West to view the many exhibits and to discover the large sampling of new Canadian writing. This year the crowds in Toronto grew and were joined by large parallel festivals at either end of the country.

Thanks to the grants from the Literacy Secretariat and the Department of Canadian Heritage, Word on the Street has grown to include festivals in Vancouver and in Halifax, making it a truly national event.

I take this opportunity to salute the organizers for their hard work and for their efforts to promote literacy.

CANADA POST

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, in late August the minister responsible for the Canada Post Corporation ordered a top to bottom review of the mandate of Canada Post.

It is my understanding that in the very near future the minister will announce the details of the review: who the chairperson will be, how long the review will take and whether it will be held in public or in private.

In the past I have called for the minister to establish an independent commission that would evaluate the performance and mandate of Canada Post on an ongoing basis. Rural and urban communities have been greatly affected by post office closures, privatization, community mailboxes, slow delivery and stamp and service price increases.

Therefore, I urge the minister to ensure that the review recognize that service is important to the public and not use the results of the review only to justify further privatization and service reductions. The review should be held in public with cross–country public hearings and adequate time given for groups and individuals to make presentations.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to reflect on the Reform Party's record in regional development.

When Reformers visit Atlantic Canada they say they will eliminate subsidies to stimulate business. However, what does the Liberal Party record say? The Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency invests in business. The government has eliminated grants and every $1 we invest in the economy has a $4 effect.

When Reformers visit Atlantic Canada they say they want to get away from Ottawa–directed approaches. However, regional development in Atlantic Canada is just that, regional and local. ACOA's 94 per cent success rate proves it is working.

If the member for Fraser Valley West is an example, maybe Reformers do not really mean what they say when they visit Atlantic Canada, but Canadians cannot take that chance.

Reform has proven that it does not understand Atlantic Canada, but the government is proving that regional development works.

HYDRO–QUEBEC

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Hydro–Quebec has decided to withdraw from the Conseil du patronat du Québec because of this organization's militancy for the No side. The chairman of the board of Hydro–Quebec, Yvon Martineau, severely condemns the statements made by several business leaders who have come out in favour of the No side.

He said that some business leaders, who claimed to speak for business people, made public comments that were unworthy of their responsibilities.

• (1405)

Responding to Laurent Beaudoin's remarks, Mr. Martineau said that speaking of Quebec as a shrunken state denotes a lack of respect for its people. He rightly ascribed our prosperity to the work done by successive generations and not to the country's size.

Despite the wishes of Mr. Garcia of Standard Life, Quebec will not be crushed.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Andrew Telegdi (Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the constituents of the federal riding of Waterloo, a part of English speaking Canada, overwhelmingly recognize that Quebec is a vital, integral and essential part of our country. They recognize that Canada is greater than the sum of its parts.

They are concerned and apprehensive about the upcoming referendum in Quebec. They want a Canada that includes Quebec.

They know there are two sides to the referendum campaign: the separation side led by Jacques Parizeau and the unity side led by Daniel Johnson.

It is their expectation that political parties that say they favour a united Canada work together and not engage in self–serving political opportunism.

The questions raised by the Reform Party to the Prime Minister during question period on the upcoming referendum have aided and abetted the Parti Quebecois and the Bloc Quebecois. It is time members of the Reform Party matched their rhetoric with action and got onside with the group that is working together for a united Canada.

THE MEMBER FOR LAURENTIDES

Ms. Paddy Torsney (Burlington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Bloc member for Laurentides, who is also the official opposition's critic on the environment, recently stated: "Fortunately, on October 30, Quebecers will decide to give themselves a country. Our environment will then cease to be a federal issue, and we will be able to breathe easier".

It would be in the Bloc member's interest to read again some statements made by her leader when he was Canada's minister of the environment. She would surely learn some very valuable lessons. At the 44th annual general assembly of the United Nations held on October 23, 1989, her leader said this: "At a time when environmental problems transcend borders, our idea of sovereignty must continue to evolve and adapt".

The separatist obsession must not shrink our horizons to the point where we are going against the tide of major global trends. The separatist vision is easy to see through, as the hon. member for Laurentides has just shown us once again.

Mr. Robert Bertrand (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have just heard for the first time a separatist spokesperson speak in favour of tabling the partnership deal Quebec would offer Canada should it achieve independence.

Victor Lévy–Beaulieu, the author and co–chairman of the Yes campaign in the Lower St. Lawrence region, told Radiomédia Rimouski listeners: "Of course, for the purpose of the referendum and perhaps also to make people feel secure, it might not be a bad idea after all to finally define this new society referred to in the proposed agreement".

In his statement, Victor Lévy–Beaulieu concurs with 75 per cent of the people of Quebec who demand that the partnership offer be made public before the referendum. The people are entitled to know what is this partnership offer that an independent Quebec would extend to the rest of Canada, and it is the separatist leaders' duty to disclose its content. That is how democracy works.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM

Mr. René Canuel (Matapédia—Matane, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Human Resources Development is once again trying to hide from seasonal workers the impact of his UI reform. Not only will many workers no longer qualify, but the minister intends to take nearly 20 percent off their UI cheques.

We must realize that Quebec regions will be hard hit by this reform. The federal government is setting out to treat seasonal workers like second–class workers, beer drinkers, as the Prime Minister once said.

• (1410)

Is this Ottawa's answer to forestry workers' cry for help? The minister cannot keep hiding his reform. If he thinks it is a good reform, he should table it before the referendum is held.

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Canadians want gun laws that are cost effective, reduce violent crime and save lives.

This morning as part of the Canadian agenda, the people's agenda, I introduced the firearms law sunset act. If passed, this bill would guarantee that only those gun laws that were successful and cost effective at improving public safety and reducing violent crime involving firearms would remain on the books.

The justice minister, following in the steps of his defeated predecessor, has been unable to produce a shred of evidence to show that a national firearms registry is necessary or will improve public safety. If the Liberals think it will they should support my bill. For anyone to argue against this type of sunset provision, they would have to argue that they support gun controls even if they do not work and no matter how much the controls cost.

No one is saying that gun control is unnecessary, only that police time and resources should be spent on measures that get the best bang for the buck. This bill does exactly that.

DIVISION OF THE FEDERAL DEBT

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Leader of the Official Opposition displayed true political demagoguery in this House. The Bloc Quebecois leader clearly suggested that an independent Quebec might not fulfill its commitment to assume part of the national debt if the purported negotiations on an economic union are not to his liking.

That totally irresponsible statement made by the separatist leader can only generate more fear on financial markets, and it could have a devastating effect on the credit ratings and interest rates that we will be faced with, both in Quebec and in Canada. Are we to understand from the opposition leader's comments that an independent Quebec will not fulfill its financial commitments toward foreign countries and investors? Is that the foolish adventure that you are proposing to Quebecers, Mr. Bouchard?

The Speaker: My colleagues, you must always address the Chair and avoid using names. I ask the hon. member to be careful.

Mr. Gagnon: Mr. Speaker, I was referring to Mr. Parizeau.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. Bernard Patry (Pierrefonds—Dollard, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Quebec separatist spokespersons no longer know what stories to make up to scare people. Since they are incapable of showing the benefits of their separation project, they now try to make a fuss over non-existent issues. The most recent such attempt was made by the PQ environment minister, who said yesterday that, following a no vote, old age pensions would take a beating.

Such blackmail and scaremongering tactics have no place, given the importance of the decision that Quebecers have to make. Separatists must demonstrate the advantages, if any, of their option and stop raising the spectre of cuts in old age pensions. Quebec seniors are not stupid; they can very well decide for themselves which structure will afford them better protection: an independent Quebec or a united Canada.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in January 1993 the Liberals wrote a document while in opposition entitled "Reviving Parliamentary Democracy: The Liberal plan for House of Commons reform". Two of the authors were the minister of public works and the present whip.

Liberals should listen. Mr. Speaker, this is what they said about your position: "In order to enhance the independence of the Chair and in an effort to reduce the level of partisanship, when the Speaker is from the government party, two of the junior chair officers should be from the opposition so that the four presiding officer positions are shared equally between the government and the opposition".

The current deputy and assistant Speakers are Liberals. The partisan nature of their appointments is in contradiction to Liberal promises. It makes me wonder: Is the government really interested in the broad Canadian agenda of parliamentary reform? I do not think so. The proof is in the pudding. They are intent on mouthing promises they have no intention of keeping.

SOCIAL PROGRAM REFORM

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, when pressed with questions yesterday about the dreaded federal reforms in unemployment insurance and old age pensions, the leader of the No side, Daniel Johnson, did not answer, saying this was up to the federal government. Since Mr. Johnson has refused to take any responsibility for the future of social programs, including those that apply to Quebec, I will direct my questions to the Prime Minister.

Will the Prime Minister admit that the best way to respond to the concerns of the unemployed and the elderly would be to table his social program reform now, so that Quebecers will know what to expect after a No to the referendum question?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I said early this week, and the Minister of Human Resources Development fielded questions on the subject several times, that we are working on the unemployment insurance reform. The process started some time ago. A green paper was tabled, and there were consultations with members. As soon as the bill is ready, we will table it in the House of Commons, there will be a debate and amendments will be proposed by all parties, including the opposition's party.

There is a debate going on now, and I want to repeat that the reform will apply to all Canadians. It will apply not only to Quebecers but to all Canadians. We want to make sure that the unemployment insurance program and social reform will focus on job creation and on giving Canadian and Quebec workers the dignity of work, the dignity they desire.

As for old age pensions, this is our responsibility. As everyone knows, the federal government has an obligation to meet with the provincial governments every five years to review what is referred to in English as the CPP with the nine other provinces. Although the Government of Quebec is fully autonomous in this area because the Quebec pension plan is strictly under its jurisdiction, it is party to the discussions because it does not want to undo the harmonization that exists in Canada.

This meeting will take place in a few weeks, and the finance minister will be there. In any case, we have absolutely no intention of compromising the security of senior citizens who depend on government pensions. That is not our purpose. The point is that we must act responsibly and face up to our responsibilities. The point is not to have one policy before the referendum and another one afterwards, as seems to be the case with the Parti Quebecois in Quebec City.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the federal social program reform is reminiscent of Penelope and her weaving. Every night Penelope, who was playing for time, would unravel what she had woven during the day. In the case of the federal government, every night it ushers its officials into the office of the Minister of Human Resources Development to undo what was written the day before, to make sure the reform is not ready before the referendum.

According to various leaks and to information reported just this morning in the Globe and Mail, the social program reform is ready but the government has decided to postpone its release.

My question to the Prime Minister is: When will he put an end to the uncertainty and apprehension of the unemployed and immediately release this reform which is locked away in the vaults of the Minister of Human Resources Development, so that Quebecers can make an informed decision on the kind of society they want on October 30?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are acting very responsibly, and the legislation is not ready yet because the appropriate decisions have not been made. As soon as these decisions have been made by cabinet, the legislation will be drafted and tabled in this House. If the legislation is ready before the referendum, it will be tabled before the referendum.

We have discussed these matters and obtained the input of a great many people on this reform. We want to do a good job, and we will ensure that Quebecers are treated exactly the same as everybody else. This has no connection with the referendum. It is because we want to act responsibly.

I want to take this opportunity to ask the Leader of the Opposition if he would care to clear the air about what he said yesterday. He probably said more than he intended, because at this stage, the Leader of the Opposition cannot afford to give foreign markets the impression that some provinces or governments in Canada would not do what any country would have to do, which is pay its debts as agreed in contracts with investors.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister wants to reassure foreign markets, he should tell them he will behave reasonably, will respect Quebec's democratic Yes vote and will negotiate. Investors tend to shy away from lending money to undemocratic governments.

This does not fool anyone. The Prime Minister wants to postpone the tabling of this reform, because he has every reason to fear the devastating scope of the cuts he is about to make. Does he not realize that by taking his cue from the simplistic and heartless solutions proposed by Mike Harris, he is preparing the ground for a fractured and divided society in Canada and Quebec, of which we saw a sample last night at Queen's Park, unfortunately?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first of all, speaking of a democratic society, when we have a leader of the opposition in a democracy, sitting in Parliament and proposing the division and break up of the country in which he lives, this has to be a record for democracy anywhere in the world.

In a democracy, people who propose separation should have the courage to say they are separatists, not just to the Americans but to the people in that province, so they will understand. In a democracy, they should have the honesty to say clearly what they want to achieve with their objective, which is separation, but the Leader of the Opposition is afraid to tell Quebecers the truth as he should, in a democracy: that he is a separatist and wants to leave Canada.

But Quebecers will understand, and on October 30 they will vote to stay in Canada. I am sure they will, because they know the opposition does not have the courage to do as it says.

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, is the Prime Minister announcing that he would not be prepared to respect Quebec's electoral democracy? The leader of the official opposition has been duly elected, and a goodly number of the members here have been elected by more than half of their fellow citizens, unlike many other people.

It can be seen from this morning's Globe and Mail that the minister prefers to hand out scoops on his unemployment insurance reform to the major dailies rather than to table the reform so it can be judged in its entirety by the population of Quebec.

Will the Minister of Human Resources Development admit that the leak referred to by the Globe and Mail proves beyond a doubt that his plan is not only to come down hard on the unemployed but also to go over the heads of the provinces, thumbing his nose at the Quebec consensus?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I find it quite strange that the hon. member would comment on the fact that we are divulging things.

It was only a day or so ago that her leader and other members were waving leaked documents in brown envelopes. All of a sudden they are totally discounting those and asking: "What is the real truth?" Two days ago the Leader of the Opposition was saying: "I have the truth here". Now the hon. member for Mercier is saying: "No, that was not the truth".

The fact of the matter is Bloc Quebecois members do not know what the truth is any more because everything they do is geared to the agenda of separatism. If they want to have a serious debate about social reform they should be putting their positions and suggestions forward.

• (1425)

The problem is they are distracting Parliament from the real work of helping people to get jobs, of helping people to get security, and of helping people to see their future. As a result Parliament cannot do the work it should be doing because the hon. member is totally distracting and knocking people off their feet.

That is why I keep saying to the hon. member "simply say you are going to vote no" so we can get down to the business of the House.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is precisely because there have been trial runs of Canadian federalism, over and over again, that Quebec premiers from Jean Lesage up to Bourassa have been trying over and over again to gain control over occupational training. Just that. And the reason we are sovereignists is that we have seen federalism's inability to reform. For the good of the common people.

Does the minister acknowledge that, in this plan which we have all read, he is not only cutting social transfers but also dumping onto the provinces the burden of the long term unemployed, without any financial compensation for that burden, while at the same time retaining control over the unemployment insurance fund and its surplus in order to finance new federal initiatives?

The Speaker: I would ask my colleagues to shorten the questions a bit. They are quite long.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let me first comment on the remarks of the hon. member about the need to work with the provinces.

On October 5, I wrote to the new employment minister in Quebec, Madam Harel, offering to sit down and negotiate a devolution or decentralization of labour market programs. The answer was no.

I was still interested so I tried again. I wrote on October 27, 1994 to the same minister and said: "Let's get together and study the problem of duplication and overlap. We will sort of join to do the program". The answer again was no. The question of co–operation was not a problem on our side. It was from that minister of employment.

In all good faith I kept trying and as a result last summer we had some success. We negotiated an agreement to help jointly fund a major income supplement program in Quebec. We were able to arrive at an agreement to do a joint program for apprenticeship training in auto mechanics for young people. We have also arrived at a preretirement program.

It shows that I will keep trying as long as they will too.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, some dissatisfied Quebecers are saying that they are tempted to vote yes in the Quebec referendum, not just because they want to separate from Canada but because they want to separate from an overcentralized federal government. They fear and resent the centralizing tendencies of the federal government—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Manning: They fear and resent the centralizing tendencies of a federal administration and of key ministers in that administration, and one of the worst offenders is the Minister of the Environment.

Recently she walked away from a groundbreaking agreement with the provinces on environmental management because somehow it conflicted with her view of centralized environmental management.

Will the environment minister get back to the negotiating table, conclude the environmental management agreement with the provinces, and demonstrate that decentralized federalism works better than centralized federalism?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a very sad day in the House of Commons when the leader of the third party gets his best applause from the separatists with whom he is working.

Also I welcome the member's newfound interest in the environment. We have been sitting here now for almost two years and I got my first question from him on the issue this week.

When it comes to agreements, in the last 23 months we have signed 12 major agreements which I would like to read into the record. They are administrative agreements with the province of Alberta. These are equivalency agreements which the province of Alberta signed on June 1, 1994. There is the Canadian intergovernmental agreement on the NAFTA signed on August 15, 1995. There is the administrative agreement on pulp and paper with British Columbia—

• (1430)

The Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary Southwest.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister's contempt for this line of questioning is the same contempt she shows for the provinces.

The minister has unilaterally banned the use of lead shot. She is unilaterally banning the use of MMT and benzene as fuel additives. The minister is setting standards for greenhouse gas emissions without real consultation. The minister stopped all the harmonization talks and scuttled progress on transferring control of the inland fisheries to the provinces. The concerns of the provinces are met not with understanding but with the minister's reverse charm and recycled rat pack tactics.

Why does the minister stubbornly cling to the centralizing prejudices and policies of the seventies when decentralization is the watchword of the 1990s?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table for the record the 12 agreements we have signed. I would also like to inform the hon. member there are 12 other agreements we are working on presently.

I was elected to the House of Commons to speak for Canada. There are many environmental issues which touch all Canadians in the same way. If I drop something in Hamilton harbour it ends up in the water of la fleuve St–Laurent.

If there is any area where there are national needs for a national vision, it is in the area of the environment. Surely the leader of the third party should recognize that.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the government's unwillingness to recognize public and provincial demand for decentralization in social services, in health care financing and in natural resources management is bad for federal–provincial relations and bad for national unity.

Why does the Prime Minister not remove the centralizers from his cabinet and send a strong signal to Quebec and indeed to all Canadians that federalism can work better by accepting and practising the principle of decentralization?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I remind the hon. member who may have forgotten that in his own response to the prebudget speech in the House of Commons on February 1, 1994 he took the position that we should maintain and increase federal support for the environment.

I also underline that even the leader of the Bloc Quebecois has stated in the House that the federal government has very clear jurisdiction in the area of environmental impact assessment. That jurisdiction is not challenged.

Our job here is to develop environmental standards which can work for the whole country. That is what I was elected to do. I would hope that the member would stop being a mouthpiece for one province and would start working for all Canadians.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. Maurice Dumas (Argenteuil—Papineau, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

While the Minister of Foreign Affairs is visiting seniors' centres saying that his government will never touch old age pensions, the Minister of Labour said yesterday that the federal government was going to reform the Canada Pension Plan. What is more, the latest budget also announced a reform of the old age pension, a different program from the Canada Pension Plan.

Since his ministers are all mixed up, would the Prime Minister confirm once and for all that old age pensions will indeed be reformed, as the budget provided, and that this reform has nothing to do with the five–year review of the Canada Pension Plan?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in the budget, the Minister of Finance said that a periodic review of the CPP, as I said earlier, was necessary at least every five years in cooperation with the Government of Quebec, which has its own pension plan, but which works with the federal government to harmonize both systems.

I have said it and I will repeat it, we will never compromise the security of seniors who depend on the government pension. However, there are problems with this system as with all the others, and we want to ensure the system is adjusted, but not simply for this year and next, because good management requires us to be able to predict what the situation will be for people reaching retirement age in 2005 and 2010. We are doing studies right now, because, if we are not careful, people reaching retirement at that point might perhaps not enjoy the same services as people today do.

Those who have reached that point today, those who are receiving pensions from the Canadian government and need them in order to survive, may rest assured that we do not intend to change them, because we know it is vital to allow them to keep their current standard of living.

Mr. Maurice Dumas (Argenteuil—Papineau, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in describing old age pension reform, the latest budget talked about affordability, controlling financially sustainable costs and staying within our means.

Does the Prime Minister have the courage to say to us seniors today that the aim of his reform is to cut costs in the old age pension program and thus reduce the size of seniors' cheques?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have just said that we do not intend to cut the old age pensions of people who are currently retired. This is very clear; we have said this. We said so. The only thing is that some work has to be done to make sure that, in 2005 or 2010, we still have an old age pension system in Canada.

I can understand the hon. member and the Bloc members. They see no further than October 30. We are thinking about the future of all Canadians and about the pensions of Quebecers and Canadians not only for 1996, but for 2005 and for 2010 as well.

IRVING WHALE

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

In 1992 a study of the Irving Whale said that PCBs were on board the barge at the time of sinking. The minister claims she had no knowledge of this until July 6 of this year. She has stated in this House that it was the transport ministry that overlooked this report and not her ministry, Environment Canada.

Will the minister put Canada first and tell the House in just a word who is responsible for the mistakes that led to a prohibitive court injunction, transport or environment?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I informed the House last week that the investigation into the PCB presence is continuing. In fact, the Irving company is being interviewed this week on the issue. As I said a couple of weeks ago, when we determine who is responsible for not formally informing the government about PCBs, there will be action taken.

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Environment has been politically grandstanding on this from the very beginning. It was her call to raise the Whale and now Canada is further in debt by $12 million and everything is still at the bottom of the sea with no hope to rise again as the Mary Ellen Carter.

Will the minister get a grip on her ministerial accountability and will she admit that it was the fault of her department for ignoring the 1992 Marex study?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to take responsibility for a lot of things but as Minister of the Environment even I cannot dictate the weather.

The member will know the reason the Irving Whale was not able to be lifted this year was specifically because of the small window of opportunity for raising the Whale. We needed two very calm days and those days were not forthcoming because of the delays occasioned by the court case.

Everything is in place for the Irving Whale to be lifted next year. It seems to me that the presence of PCBs which if laid out would cover a football field three feet deep makes it even that much more urgent to lift the Irving Whale. We intend to do that as soon as the weather and the courts permit.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the leader of the No side, Daniel Johnson, who was clearly uncomfortable and unable to answer seniors properly, invited people to direct their questions at the Prime Minister of Canada.

On behalf of these people, therefore, I will question him myself in order to reassure seniors. Mr. Johnson said: "Since I am not the Prime Minister of Canada, a member of Parliament, a federal minister or Lloyd Axworthy, I cannot make promises as to what is going to happen". But the Prime Minister can do so. We will therefore ask him to make some promises.

Instead of trying to confuse all seniors by talking sometimes about the Canada pension plan and sometimes about the old age security system, can the Prime Minister promise today, in order to reassure seniors, that he will reject out of hand, right away and clearly, any reform of old age pensions for seniors, as they now fear?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, at the rate of one scare a day and with 32 days left, they still have to come up with 32 new scares. I think that the opposition is starting to feel scared that they will run out of scare stories. As I clearly stated earlier in response to his colleague who is already receiving his old age pension, we will never compromise the security of seniors who depend on government pensions.

That is clear. I cannot be any clearer than this. I am not saying that there will be no reforms because there will be reforms. I know that opposition members will not be here at that time, but we on this side hope to be here for a few more years. We must now ensure that there will still be an old age pension plan for those who will retire in the coming millennium.

These are our responsibilities, and we are not about to say that we are not looking at these problems when we are. But to those who are afraid today because PQ members are trying to scare them, I say: "Do not be afraid". There will be no statements on cutting their old age pensions either in November or in the February budget. I cannot be any clearer than this.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we finally heard the admission that the Prime Minister will reform the old age security system. Given the direction in which the Minister of Finance is heading, this reform will certainly involve cuts. I would be surprised if old age pensions were increased, in the light of what they have done in the past two years. I imagine that he may well not think that representing seniors in this place is trying to scare people; we are simply trying to protect their security.

Given the extremely disturbing information for seniors that come from government back rooms, could the Prime Minister assure us beyond any doubt that his government is not planning to defer beyond 65 the age of eligibility to the old age pension? Can he deny today this piece of bad news for seniors?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in our concept of society, people aged 65 and over already receive pensions. They therefore have no reason to worry. I am saying that we will have to look at the problems in the years to come. We will see; studies will be done.

Some hon. members: Ah, ah.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Yes, we will see.

But if we really want to reassure retired people in Quebec, the best way to do so is to tell them that they will continue to receive their old age pensions from the government of Canada after October 30, while the Parti Quebecois is creating extreme uncertainty with its separation plans. The best way to reassure Quebec seniors is to tell them: "The government of Canada will still be there after October 30 to pay your old age pensions". There will be no doubt about that.

BOSNIA

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, there is confusion in the government about when our troop commitment in Bosnia expires. Officials from foreign affairs told me that our mandate in Bosnia is up at the end of November. The Department of National Defence tells me that troops will be deployed November 9 through 17. The Minister of Foreign Affairs says that our commitment is up on October 30.

Will the Prime Minister end the confusion and tell us when our mandate in Bosnia is over?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we should all rejoice because the peace process taking place at this moment in Bosnia is making a lot of progress. I am very proud of our Canadian soldiers who have proudly represented Canada during very tough times in order to save thousands and thousands of lives.

While the Reform Party changed its mind during the process, the government kept faith in the process of peace. Progress is being made at this moment. We will decide if we are still needed there. Even if there is a peace agreement signed in the weeks to come, there will still be a need for Canadian soldiers.

This morning I discussed the situation with the President of France and the Prime Minister of England. We keep in touch with them because we want to participate. We have participated and contributed to a situation where everybody thinks there will soon be peace. It is not the time to quit when we can still make a contribution.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has been sidetracked from the Canadian agenda for so long he has forgotten his own words. On March 30, 1995 the Prime Minister said: "Canada's presence in the former Yugoslavia will be maintained for the next six months". That means midnight September 30, 1995.

I will ask my question again to the Prime Minister. When will our troops be pulled out of Bosnia?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, not before Sunday.

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

The document on the human resources investment fund recently submitted by the minister to the program review committee mentions a federal strategy for selling the UI reform in Quebec. It states in part that a tenable position should be identified with regard to Quebec in the referendum context, however unacceptable this position may be to the current government.

Does the minister recognize that this excerpt confirms that he was prepared to table his UI reform during the referendum campaign or even earlier, but that the Prime Minister decided to postpone its tabling till after the referendum in order to hide his intentions from the people of Quebec?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have never presented any such document to the program review committee of cabinet.

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Yet, Mr. Speaker, that is what this document says, which was leaked to the press and brought up by the NDP this week.

Does the minister realize that his UI reform, which introduces five new federal manpower training programs, flies in the face of the repeatedly expressed Quebec consensus on the need to transfer to Quebec all responsibilities in that area?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member rightly knows, we have been developing a series of projects in co–operation with the provinces over the past year to test out new methods and new measures by which we can help people get back to work most actively. One of the most interesting projects is in co–operation with the Government of Quebec in dealing with young people and helping them to get back in the job market.

• (1450)

If the hon. member is telling me he rejects any of those measures that are more effectively designed to get people in the job market, there is something substantially wrong with the hon. member. I have a letter he wrote to me asking for my support in a youth project sponsored by the federal government in his riding. I am very pleased to say I would certainly like to give him the assurance of supporting that project if he can give me the assurance of supporting the no vote on October 30.

AIDS

Mr. Bill Graham (Rosedale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health. On Sunday, October 1, over 40 communities across Canada will be walking to raise AIDS awareness and much needed dollars. Would the Minister of Health tell the members of the House what the government is doing to help the 45,000 Canadians living with HIV and AIDS and what measures it is taking to prevent others from becoming infected?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, HIV/AIDS is a serious concern for all Canadians and it is a priority for this government. This year we are spending $40.7 million against this deadly disease. Half of these funds go toward research; the balance goes toward education, prevention, care, treatment and support.

For example, recently I announced the government's support for a 1–800 information line. This information line will be accessible coast to coast in both official languages and will give information on care and treatment to people concerned with HIV and AIDS.

This Sunday I will be joining the AIDS community in Sudbury to march and raise funds for this worthy cause. I invite each and every one of you to participate in your communities as best you can in whatever way you can. It is a very worthwhile cause.

GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak about our province of Ontario, the forgotten province.

In June, Mike Harris and his common sense revolution were endorsed by the voters in Ontario. Mike Harris listened to the people of Ontario. He had the same message Reform did: Stop the madness of deficit financing, introduce a victims' rights bill and put an end to employment equity.

Can the Prime Minister tell the House when his government is going to start listening to the people of Ontario and stop this deficit financing, introduce a victims' rights bill and end employment equity?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, perhaps it is timely for us to observe that yesterday when the kissing cousins of the third party, the Conservative Party of Ontario, opened the session of Parliament there was a riot involving 5,000 people outside the legislature.

I very much hope the hon. member is not advocating that approach to public relations in government.

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting we should talk about the riot at Queen's Park. It was evident that many of those protesters were members of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers. Can the government explain why federal employees were rampaging at Queen's Park when they should have been earning their federally subsidized paycheques?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, apparently we have touched a nerve.

The reason the government continues to enjoy the widespread support of Canadians is that we are performing as we said we would. We are fulfilling our red book commitments and we have every intention of continuing to do exactly that.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development, to whom I say that we will never trade our votes for training programs.

• (1455)

Thanks to his UI reform, the minister will get, from the cheques to the unemployed, the money to finance his human resources investment fund, thus creating more duplication in manpower training due to the development of new federal training programs.

Given the consensus in Quebec on the need to transfer the whole manpower training sector to the province, and considering the significant savings which could result from such a transfer, does the minister agree that it is improper to reduce payments to the unemployed in order to finance new federal manpower training programs?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first let me point out to the hon. member that the unemployment insurance system is very clearly a federal national responsibility. It goes back to 1940 when all the provinces agreed it would be the responsibility of the federal government to give people a sense of security against unemployment, and like any good insurance policy, to make sure that we reduce the risk.

The best way of reducing the risk in unemployment insurance is to get people back to work. That is one reason that over the years we have very carefully invested in a variety of programs to enable people to develop their employment prospects.

We are saying in the modernization of it that we have to get better. We have to use the money more effectively. We have to get better value for the money. Therefore, we have to begin to look at how we can streamline and consolidate many of the 40 some programs into several programs and do those where we can work in close co-operation with the provinces. That is very clearly part of what we want to do. We want to develop a series of co-operative relationships with the provinces to help people get back to work.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the only way to have an effective employment policy in Quebec is to have a sovereign Quebec that will control the UI system.

Will the minister recognize that his flat refusal to transfer the whole manpower training sector to Quebec, as the province is asking, is a blatant example of the hard-nosed attitude of the federal government and its lack of understanding of Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, with the indulgence of the member I remind him of my comment to his colleague earlier. I wrote to the Quebec employment minister offering to sit down and talk about issues of decentralization and devolution and the hon. minister of employment for Quebec said no.

I have had similar very productive, very constructive discussions in the province of the leader of the third party. We now have a series of locations dealing with youth services. The federal and provincial governments are now working together in five different centres developing joint projects in that area.

We are even working in the province of Quebec in a co-operative way. In the southwest corner of Montreal we have the RESO program in the area the hon. Minister of Finance represents thanks to his leadership.

My point is there are many ways in which we can help people. The most important thing is to get rid of the disputes between jurisdictions and get down to budget—

The Speaker: The hon. member for Wetaskiwin.

MANITOBA ENTERTAINMENT COMPLEX INC.

Mr. Dale Johnston (Wetaskiwin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the House the Minister of Human Resources Development gave a very ambiguous response to a question asked by my colleague in regard to the $533,000 grant that was given to a group in Winnipeg known as Manitoba Entertainment Complex Inc.

Would he clarify today what process the group followed to obtain these funds and what was the criteria for qualification?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I think it is properly put and one which deserves clarification in comparison to what I heard yesterday.

The answer is very clear. The industrial adjustment service is a program that works nationally throughout Canada to help a broad range of communities which are facing adjustment problems, either the loss of major industries or the prospect of developing new industries. In each of these cases the IAS program is set up through an independent committee.

In the case of the new arena in Winnipeg the MEC worked out with the regional director of human resources to establish an independent committee. It is made up of people who are not involved in the program designed to bring the stakeholders together. There is no involvement by the minister. There is no direct involvement.

They work with all those involved in the project to find a way of making an adjustment. In this case the primary objective was to develop alternate plans to save 1,400 jobs at risk as a result of the decisions being taken in relation to the arena.

That was the process which was taking place, an independent committee making decisions and working with major stakeholders to ensure we could find the best means of saving jobs in Winnipeg.

Mr. Dale Johnston (Wetaskiwin, Ref.): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, for the same minister.

Was the minister aware at a time prior to the awarding of the $533,000 grant that some of the people in Entertainment Inc. were contributors to his campaign?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, after representing the city of Winnipeg for close to 24 years I must say with some modesty that a large number of people contributed to my campaign.

I say with some regret that of the fifty–five business partners in the MEC only five have made contributions to my campaign. All the rest went somewhere else, which is something I had better look into.

I did not have any connection whatsoever. I had no assessment of who was making applications to MEC or who was getting contracts. It was the responsibility of the independent committee to determine what kind of contracts were to be let and where the money should go. I had no involvement whatsoever, and I hope that clarifies the matter for the hon. member.

ENDANGERED SPECIES

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment and concerns the need to strengthen the current proposal for the endangered species protection act.

As presented, the minister proposes to apply the terms of the new act to only 4 per cent of Canada's total land base and eliminates the northern jurisdiction entirely.

Is it the minister's intention therefore to ensure effective protection of endangered species by broadening the premise of the proposed new act and at the same time by providing us with a guarantee that the new $2 coin in not the last place on earth where we will ever see a polar bear?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question of the hon. member.

The hon. member has underlined one of the things that we have been trying to do in national government, and that is to respect jurisdictions.

We have come out with an endangered species framework, the first of its kind in Canada. We have also been very careful to respect the fact that provincial governments have jurisdiction in certain areas. That is why at first blush the legislation does not cover as many species as we would like.

In launching the process of the national endangered species act, not only have we seen the leadership that was already shown in the province of Quebec which had the first endangered species legislation but we have seen a number of other provinces come on board. We expect by the time the federal act is proclaimed that we will have at least seven other provinces contributing in a constructive way to a goal that I believe we should all share, and that is protecting endangered species.

Endangered species do not respect provincial boundaries. They travel nationally and that is why I think we need a national framework, which I know even the Reform Party would support.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, could the government House leader give us an idea of what is in store for next week?

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we will continue today, and if necessary tomorrow, with the debate on second reading of Bill C–93, the cultural property legislation, and seconding reading of Bill C–98 regarding oceans.

If these items are disposed of before the end of the day tomorrow, I propose to call second reading of Bill C–78, the witness protection bill, and Bill C–64, the employment equity bill. This will be for debate at report stage and second reading since the bill was referred to committee before second reading.

• (1505)

Next week we will commence with a motion for reference before second reading of Bill C–101, the transportation bill, followed by another motion for reference before second reading of Bill C–84, amendments to the Regulations Act.

We will then return, if necessary, to the legislation listed for today and tomorrow at the place where we left off. That concludes the weekly business statement.

Mr. Speaker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My question is also with regard to procedure.

The Speaker: I take it that it has to do with the Thursday question on upcoming House business.

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last week I asked the hon. member, the House leader for the government, what kinds of bills were in the works and what would be proposed in less than 10 days now.

I have not had a response to that or on whether there will be any legislation that will perhaps be delayed until the end of November or December when we would go into a format of closure. I would appreciate a response from the House leader, if possible.

The other question I have is with regard to procedure, how the government is handling procedure in the committees and the direction that is being given by the House leader and the whip of government.

Yesterday in the public accounts committee, while debate was going on with regard to the chairmanship, the government whip commanded the Liberal members and the Bloc members to vacate the committee after 25 minutes so that there was not a quorum for a discussion to proceed with regard to the chairmanship.

It looks like a very unacceptable precedent has been set. I would like to ask the House leader whether that is the kind of procedure that will continue in the House on other occasions as well.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I think our whip is ready to respond to the second point raised by the hon. House leader for the Reform Party.

With respect to his first point, I was not able to be present at the House leader's meeting this week. I will endeavour to see what further information I can provide him in response to his question.

We have a number of bills listed on the Order Paper. These will be the measures on which we will be drawing for the legislative program of next week and ensuing weeks.

As I said to him last week, there may well be other measures in preparation that the government will be putting on the Order Paper within the next 10 days. I am sorry I cannot give him a precise list of additional measures at this point, but we will endeavour to assist the House in presenting the government's program in an orderly and meaningful way.

The Speaker: It would seem that we are stretching out the points of order, one on top of the other. I will permit it today, if the government House whip is prepared to answer, but I would prefer we deal with one area at a time when dealing with this type of information.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday afternoon shortly after question period and pursuant to an all–party agreement duly signed by all whips of the House, a meeting was held to proceed with the election of officers of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. As I said, there was an agreement signed by all whips to the effect that the committee along with other committees would meet at previously agreed to hours and days.

Contrary to the agreement, one group of individuals chose not to allow the votes to proceed on the election of the chair and decided to filibuster the committee for whatever reason.

That was confirmed in an informal conversation I had with members of that party, at which point we were forced to adjourn the meeting by causing it to lose its quorum.

At 3.30 this afternoon we will once again attempt to elect officers pursuant to the agreement made. If that fails, we will attempt to do it again until we succeed in having not only the order made by the House some time ago on the repartition of members by party but also the all–party agreement made by the whips.

We intend to do our part as a government to ensure the standing orders are adhered to. Hopefully members of the third party will co–operate today, unlike what happened yesterday.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order regarding House business. In support of your statement a few moments ago that it is not good to split up these matters, I noticed that in the course of the whip responding to the second question the government House leader vacated his seat.

I still have a question relating to House business for him. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary could answer my question. However in the future, Mr. Speaker, I want you to know that I support your contention that these points should be made separately and individually so that we can deal with matters in specific order.

With respect to House business for the coming week, the government House leader is aware that the recent supreme court ruling in respect of tobacco products marketing has been thrown back to the government for a response. The government has said that it is looking at options in response to this ruling but for the most part is relying on staff in the Department of Health for ideas.

In light of the fact that it would be better for members of Parliament to be examining the options, would the government House leader be willing to support a request from the House that the government offer this week the study of these options to the Standing Committee on Health so that a more public examination of the options and the issues could be undertaken?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I will draw the hon. member's suggestion to the attention of the chair of the committee. If I am not mistaken, under our current rules the standing committees have wide powers to undertake studies at their own initiative rather than only at the request of the government. The committee may see fit to begin looking at this matter in a general sense.

I also assure the hon. member that this issue is being actively examined within the government. The judgment which I received just yesterday is very lengthy and very bulky. It is understandable that the government's response would not be forthcoming within days of the judgment.

The member's point about a vehicle for some public examination of the issue is one that, as I have said, the health committee might well want to take a look at under its ongoing and existing authorities.

CULTURAL PROPERTY EXPORT AND IMPORT ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–93, an act to amend the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee; and of the amendment.

Mr. Milliken: Unless there are more questions following my speech, I am finished.

The Speaker: I thank the member. I was hoping he would regale us with more dinosaur tales.

Mrs. Jane Stewart (Brant, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to rise to debate Bill C–93, particularly because over the course of the last few days as we have been discussing the bill I have been interested in the misinformation and in some ways nonsense that have been lobbed at this side of the House, especially by members of the third party.

I should like to clarify certain aspects of the bill to ensure the people of Canada understand and fully appreciate its importance to them and to us as a country. As I was listening to the debate, particularly the day before yesterday, there were indications from members that the bill would cost the government $60 million. That is wrong.

As a result of the bill and the notion that Canadians can donate artefacts of importance to our cultural heritage to museums, libraries and art institutions, we have had 1,100 donors give to our country the value of $60 million. The cost to our country, from a tax incentive point of view, has been just about half of that, $25 million to $30 million. In fact, what we have are priceless donations of our country's history, culture and art from other nations which is remaining in Canada for all of us to enjoy, value and appreciate. We have received $60 million worth of priceless art and goods for the value of $25 million.

That makes good sense to me, yet the members of the third party are misconstruing the information and having it printed in Hansard that it is costing us $60 million because they have not taken the time to understand the bill. In fact, I understand that they refused briefings from the parliamentary secretary and bureaucrats from the ministry. As a result we get misinformation in the House and that is not acceptable. It is good to have this opportunity to clarify that particular point.

There were challenges from the third party saying: "Did you know that this does not only apply to Canadian artefacts and art, but to art from around the world? Is that not terrible?" I do not think it is terrible at all. Are we to assume that Canadians are not interested in works of art done by people from other parts of the world? We are a melting pot. We are a multicultural society. We can all learn from and appreciate art from other cultures. Those are the kinds of donations which are accepted under the bill. They are of value to us. I want to clarify that for the House. It makes sense and I appreciate it as a Canadian.

The particular argument that the third party makes of the bill is that it only benefits rich people, in fact it is the Canadian government again servicing the rich, giving them an opportunity to receive a tax incentive for making a donation to a museum, an art gallery or a library.

Mr. Milliken: If that were true, then you would think they would support it.

Mrs. Stewart (Brant): The parliamentary secretary makes a good point. He says: "If that were true, then you would think they would support it". I tend to agree with him. What they are saying is that the government is not being fair, that it is all one sided and that it is only going to the rich. No, it is not. Donations are made to our art galleries, our libraries and our museums and we all benefit.

Members of the Reform Party are suggesting, I believe, that people who are not rich are not interested in art, do not value our history and our culture and do not like to go to museums. I can tell them that is not true. By virtue of this kind of legislation we have a very unique and important way of ensuring that our heritage remains in Canada, that it is here for us to enjoy and value, and that it is here for our children.

If we go to the National Art Gallery, just behind Parliament Hill, we can go for free. Anybody can go for free and see incredible works of art, whether they be from the Group of Seven or from the Renaissance period. That is of value to all Canadians. Perhaps Reformers want us to charge for that. I do not know.

The results of the bill do not just service the rich, they service us all. They enrich our culture, our society and our heritage. These are important points which have to be put on the record as we discuss Bill C–93.

I was interested in some of the comments from the third party, in particular those that suggest the members of that party are credible art critics. If we go back through Hansard we can read of those members talking about particular pieces of art in the National Art Gallery and chastising that gallery for the purchase of those works of art or for even presenting them. It makes me wonder if the members from that party can spell art, let alone understand what art is all about. Quite frankly, art is a very personal thing. Art speaks to people in different ways, given the experiences, the culture, the point of view or gender of an individual. It is something that is very important as we discuss this bill. We are clarifying, crystallizing the differences between the party in government and the party on the other side of the House by showing an appreciation and value for our history and culture. Quite frankly, the attacks that have fallen on us are all focused by the third party on the dollar figure. Nothing else is important.

I agree that when times are tough, and we are finding it that way now, it is very easy to say stop, do not spend. Stop everything and focus on one issue. That is not good for our history, not good for our future. We have to remember that culture is continuing. Do we want a void in our history, in our collections, in our programs just because at this time we have a tough fiscal circumstance? I do not think we do.

Fortunately the government in place is a balanced government which understands the importance of all aspects of culture and of the fiscal realities of society. As my colleague pointed out, we are a national government that knows the importance of differences. Art comes from the Atlantic provinces or from Vancouver, British Columbia or from the prairies. Those are things we should be thankful for and they should continue.

The most important and telling point in this debate for me comes from my understanding of my own riding where we have a wonderful museum, the Brant County Museum, which has recently benefited from the philanthropy of one individual, Mr. Scheak, who over the course of his lifetime has collected a fabulous and very eclectic grouping of art, artefacts and historical documents. As a philanthropist he donated that collection to us in the riding of Brant. We now have an opportunity to look at historical pieces from around the world, whether it be from the Middle East, Asia and Europe, right in our own hometown. We do not have to travel to see it. There was nothing like that in my community before. Through legislation such as this, that is allowed to happen.

No one in my community would chastise Mr. Scheak for getting a 50 per cent return on that collection. Let us be clear. That is what he gets; 50 per cent of the value of the collection. He does not get it all, just 50 per cent. We as a community benefit greatly not only because our children get a firsthand attachment to that history, but because others come to our community to see it as well. From a point of economic development and tourism the riding of Brant is going to win.

As we listen to the strategies of the third party and their attack on this bill, we realize that a one–track, myopic approach to legislation is just not good enough. There are so many other aspects. There are no simple questions and there are no simple answers. Governing is very difficult. It takes a broad perspective, a complete understanding of a country, its people, its history and its values. Fortunately, I believe the government shows that.

In this bill we are tangibly indicating that commitment. It is a proactive approach. As I mentioned, it is a unique strategy. There is one other country, interestingly enough, that provides tax incentives for donations to cultural institutions. That country is our neighbour to the south, the United States.

I continue to find it interesting that the third party touts the United States as the be all and the end all. They want us to have a political system like the United States. They want us to be like Newt Gingrich. They want us to be far, far on the right and forget about those in our community who have not got the same resources, capabilities and skills as others.

Now they find their heroes to the south doing something not so different from what we are doing here in Canada and they do not like it. I wonder. It is very rare that it happens, but we in fact have with this legislation implemented a program where Canadians can make donations to our very important cultural institutions. By and large they are doing it philanthropically because as I mentioned they are not getting the full return for the value.

They could sell them. They could insist that their collections go out of the country where we do not have the value for them and sell them beyond our borders, lost to us forever. But no, many people are philanthropic. They give to our institutions. It is very appropriate for us to in return give them at least a 50 per cent return. As I say, the people of the country do not object to that.

I know each of us as members of Parliament find as we talk to our local cultural institutions that they do not have the money to go out and buy artefacts and pieces of art. It is through donations that they create their significance, their contents and their importance. We do not want to ever lose that.

This bill is a good bill, bringing together pieces of several acts that have been historically part of the mix, clarifying them, improving them and making our country, as a result, much better.

I thank the House for its indulgence. I appreciate the opportunity to clarify some of the points that have been floating around over the course of the last few days of debate and at this point recommend the bill to the good graces of our House.

Mr. John Richardson (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise and speak in support of the act to amend the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act.

The opposition to the bill and the thrust of the amendment to the bill would undermine cultural institutions from coast to coast. Culture is the one legacy that the past leaves to the present and the present prepares to leave to the future.

By establishing the incentives that are inherent in this bill it will encourage people in this country who have items of great significance nationally, of great significance regionally or great significance locally to donate those items to art galleries, museums and heritage buildings that may be in any town, city or county.

The purpose of this bill is to amend the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, with consequential amendments to the Income Tax Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, to establish an appeal determinations by the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board of the fair market value of certified cultural property.

In December 1991 the responsibility for determining the fair market value of cultural property donated to the designated Canadian museums, art galleries and libraries and significant heritage buildings transferred from Revenue Canada Taxation to the review board and the review board assumed this responsibility at its meeting held in January 1992. No provision for appeal of the review board decisions was included in the legislative amendments despite the fact that the right of appeal had existed when this responsibility was withdrawn from Revenue Canada. Donors and custodial institutions expressed serious concerns about the lack of an appeal process that is inherent to have built into any program like this where value is to be judged.

The Department of Canadian Heritage in co–operation with the review board then undertook a series of consultations with the community about the need for an appeal process. As a result of these consultations, it was agreed that the legislative amendments should be prepared to establish the right of appeal to the Tax Court of Canada.

This bill establishes two processes. The first gives the donor or recipient institution the right to request that the review board consider its initial determination of fair market value. If after receiving a determination from the board the donor is not satisfied, he or she may take the second step of appealing the board's decision to the Tax Court of Canada.

There are key messages inherent in this bill. I will review some of them at this time. The cultural property export and import tax provides tax benefits to encourage donations to public institutions of objects and collections that are of outstanding significance and national importance. This support is the only program of the Government of Canada that provides financial support through tax credits for donations to museums, art galleries, archives and libraries.

Museums, art galleries, archives and libraries in every province and territory in Canada benefit through the receipt of donations of cultural property as a result of these tax credits. Cultural property valued at approximately $60 million is donated to Canadian institutions each year. A significant amount of real property is donated to public institutions.

The fair market value of cultural property certified by the review board is eligible as a tax credit at 17 per cent for the first $200 and 29 per cent on the balance over $200. The donor can claim the fair market value of the gift up to the total amount of his or her net income. There is no tax payable on any capital gain resulting from this gift.

Because a donor receives a tax credit, the amount of money realized as a result of the donation is approximately 50 per cent of the fair market value. The donor does not therefore receive a tax refund equivalent to the fair market value of the gift.

Donors, museums, art galleries and professional associations have been lobbying for the right to appeal review board decisions as it was perceived that the lack of an appeal was a denial of natural justice. In most cases where there is arbitration the laws of natural justice in this country must be seen to be in action. Due process must be seen to be in action.

The establishment of appeal should be viewed as a reinstatement of the right of appeal that was lost when the responsibility for determining the fair market value was returned to the review board in 1991.

These amendments will ensure that donors who disagree with determinations of the review board will have the right of appeal to the courts and that they will not be denied natural justice. The announcement of the establishment of an appeal process was received positively by donors, museums, art dealers and the media. These legislative amendments therefore enjoy a high level of public support.

The amendments are technical in nature and respond to strong concerns expressed by the heritage community. Their passage into law should be seen as part of the ongoing commitment of the Government of Canada to ensure the preservation of Canada's cultural heritage.

As I said before and would like to stress again, the era of a country is known by the culture it passes on to another. We must bring those significant items that demonstrated the culture of that era into a place of safekeeping so that they can be studied, viewed and appreciated by people in future eras.

Throughout history works of art have been prized by civilizations as expressed by the cultures that created them. They are regularly protected, conserved and displayed as both symbols and concrete examples of the history of a particular society or cultural group. We see this now as our natives in this country seek to preserve items of their cultural heritage which have great meaning to them. Other groups in our society are seeking now to preserve items of cultural heritage that will have great meaning to future generations.

All nations define themselves in the present by events of the past. It is therefore vitally important to preserve our nation's history and heritage.

Canada passed the Cultural Property Export and Import Act to provide cultural patrimony and preserve in Canada significant examples of the nation's cultural, historic and scientific heritage in movable cultural property. As a means to protect its cultural property, Canada adopted unique combinations of export controls and tax incentives for making gifts to the designated public institutions and incorporated these in legislation by establishing the articles that flowed from that act.

Last Sunday I attended a cultural heritage event. I stood in for the minister of culture at a ceremony for a plaque commemorating a historic building of significant architectural importance. Its interior was significant; it was the most outstanding example of fresco painting in three dimension in Canada. I was pleased to be there as were all the people of that community. It is not a sophisticated metropolitan community but the town of Baden of approximately 2,000 people.

People gathered in great numbers to celebrate the historic recognition of Castle Kilbride. Significant artefacts that belonged to that castle from the early 19th century were donated. People brought them back and these items were of significant value because they were owned by a man of considerable wealth. They returned them to this heritage building and museum so that the people of that community would see the architecture and painting of significance to Canadian history and how life was lived in that building.

I live in a town where there are a number of buildings of architectural significance that will be declared heritage buildings. There is not just the culture of significant and exciting designs but there is also the finest English speaking repertoire theatre in North America, the Stratford Festival Theatre and its three stages. We go down the trail and recognize great writing, great playwriting and performances in Stratford, which by the way is playing to its best year in history.

Canadians will look back on those significant events which developed their culture, developed their appreciation for fine architecture, developed their appreciation for fine art, which were developed in Canada by Canadians, for Canadians today and for Canadians tomorrow.

Mr. Bill Graham (Rosedale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to speak in support of this bill today.

As the hon. member for Perth—Wellington—Waterloo so ably said, there is a technical reason for this bill, which is to enable an appeal procedure to be put into place so that the proper amount of taxation deductions will be calculated and applied in the course of allowing citizens to make donations to institutions in Canada. That in itself is an extremely important public policy consideration.

In some respects the bill seems very narrow in scope because it is reinstituting an appeal procedure which existed some time ago under previous legislation. In that sense it is rectifying a situation which needed to be dealt with.

Some of the objections which were raised by members of the third party when we were debating this bill the other day attacked not only the thrust of the bill and the whole purpose of what we are trying to do here, but also the need for an appeal procedure. If members of the third party are sincere about having genuine intellectual problems with this whole idea, they certainly should support the thrust of the bill, which is to ensure that there will not be an arbitrary decision by just one authority as to how these matters will be dealt with, but rather they will be subject to an appeal. They will go to the tax appeal court and from there they can go to the federal court. We will be able to ensure that these matters will be handled by strict, appropriate, legal methods.

This bill deals with an extremely important aspect of public policy concern in Canada, that is, that we should have proper procedures in place to ensure the good administration of all aspects of our justice system. In that sense the bill fits within the whole purpose of what the government is trying to do, which is to ensure that the people in Canada have a judicial system which is fair and open and which ensures proper judicial procedures for all. We should look at that aspect of the bill when we are considering it.

I sat in the House the other day and heard the attacks on the bill by members of the third party, who used, as one so often does in the course of debate, rather outrageous examples. One member stood up and said they had seen a painting that was scurrilous or unattractive. Imagine that. Someone had donated it and received a tax deduction for it. We could all probably go to an art gallery and find some paintings which are unacceptable to us.

In the course of my travels I have been to the Louvre. I was told that some of the finest paintings in the Louvre were, at the time they were painted, offensive, despicable and unacceptable. The whole thrust of the impressionist school when it first came out was quite unacceptable to the public. The paintings which today fetch $50 million were totally and utterly unacceptable to certain people at that time who said: "This is a class of art with which we do not wish to be associated. It does not conform to our traditions. It does not conform to exactly the way we think. Nothing except the way we think is acceptable in this world. We will not accept artistic values or views that are different from what we represent".

That is not the view of the government. It is not the view of average Canadians. Average Canadians know that art, literature and culture must represent a vast gamut of society. There must be tolerance. There must be a willingness to accept that we need an expression of culture in our country that is broad, embracing, and global in nature if we are going to take our children into the next century with a sense of what the world is about.

This bill fits into that. It enables small communities to take artifacts, libraries and things of real value to those communities and give them to local museums and allow them to stay in place so that people can be a part of their own culture. There is nothing lamentable about that. There is nothing to criticize in that. It seems to me to be an extraordinarily valuable contribution we are making.

When we turn to what the third party was complaining about in the House the other day, the fact that this bill enables wealthy people to make contributions to Canada, I think we have to take this into proportion. We have to look around our country and look at some of the contributions that have been made.

In my own riding of Rosedale there is a museum called the George R. Gardiner Museum, of which I was privileged to be a trustee some years ago when I was teaching at the University of Toronto. Mr. Gardiner donated a collection of extremely valuable porcelain to the city of Toronto. That collection is contained in a part of the museum that the University of Toronto helped to build. That is, to use that much overtaxed phrase, a world class collection. It receives world class attention. It receives visitors from around the world. It contributes to the economy of Toronto. People stay in the hotels nearby. They use taxis to get to it. They eat in the restaurants around it.

It is calculated that during the course of the Barnes collection exhibition in Toronto the spin–off effect for the economy of Toronto was some tens of millions of dollars. We cannot forget that not only are we enriching our cultural heritage when we allow, enable and encourage, as this government does, this type of activity, we also enable our economy to be strong. We enable a real contribution to be made to our economy in the form of tourism or in the form of people coming here.

I myself have had the privilege of going to Calgary. Many members of the third party must have visited the Glenbow Museum. The Glenbow Museum would not exist if it were not for measures like this. Where would we be if we did not have that wonderful repository of our First Nations' art and artifacts that are found in that fabulous institution that is the Glenbow Museum, which is a pride for all Canadians, not just Calgarians.

It is measures such as this that make the existence of the Glenbow Museum possible. The Glenbow Museum, the George R. Gardiner Museum, the Royal Ontario Museum and over 300 small and local institutions in this country all have requested this measure to enable them to survive and continue to do the job they are doing so well for Canadians. That is why I support it.

If I go to Montreal, I have the opportunity to see the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts. I can visit the architecture museum created through a gift from Mrs. Lambert, an extraordinary museum which has made Montreal famous. People come to Montreal from all over the world to visit these museums which enjoy a worldwide reputation, not merely a local one.

All of these contribute not only to Montreal and Quebec culture but to Canadian culture as well and I dare say contribute to the economy of Montreal and of Canada also.

If we acknowledge that donors, museums, art galleries and professional associations are all lobbying for the right to challenge the decisions of the review board, we must as a government acknowledge that they are justified in making such demands and put into place in the legislation a reliable and valid system for handling this situation.

[English]

I would like to conclude along the lines of my colleague from Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, who pointed out that we should keep this in proportion. This is 50 cents on the dollar these people are getting. This is not some huge tax give–away. It is 50 cents on the dollar.

• (1550)

At some point a government, if it is to be faithful to its mandate, must provide cultural objects for its citizens. Do the members of the third party suggest that we should go out, collect the taxes and then buy objects with that tax money? That is a much more expensive way of doing it. This way we get the benefit of the generosity of Canadians who have collected wonderful things during their lives. At the same time, we enrich our communities and we do it in the most tax efficient way possible.

That is why I support what this bill is about and why I support what the government is doing when it tries to ensure that we have a better country that is enriched by the activities of our citizens. We enable them to put their life's work and their life's collections to the benefit of our society and that of our children.

Mr. Glen McKinnon (Brandon—Souris, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member.

I come from an area where there is an endeavour under way to establish a new resource of heritage. I am wondering whether or not he sees any mechanism through this bill that would enable in a general way a new facility, a new collection of artifacts to be set up to encourage the general community to bring forward its artifacts in a particular manner.

I will give a little background. We are the oil capital of Manitoba. We have a problem encouraging the oil industry to bring some of those artifacts back into a setting whereby they will be on display. I would ask if the hon. member sees any mechanism that would be available.

Mr. Graham: Mr. Speaker, I am certainly not in a position as someone in the ministry would be to answer a technical question of the nature the hon. member poses.

I think the question has some general value that I would like to address. First, this bill is not directed to the problem or the issue of just collections of art, porcelain or other items of that nature. Anything that is of value to society would be perfectly acceptable, as I understand it, to be the subject matter of a museum or another form of institution.

As a result, I would suggest to the member that what this bill does by putting in place this appeals procedure is it ensures that when the institution of which he spoke is set up and when donations are made to it, which they will be, those donations then will be properly accounted for. There is a procedure whereby if there is any debate about their true value it may be appealed to the courts and we can ensure that for the benefit of Canadians and Canadian society and other Canadian taxpayers that will be done in an orderly way. In that sense, the bill does contribute to enabling what the member would like to see done in his riding.

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, one would think we were debating today whether to establish or not establish a tax benefit for the donation of cultural property to the institutions of this country that have the mission of securing for future generations examples of art and literature in its many forms. We are not. What we are doing is debating a fairly minor amendment to the process by which that is done. That is in fact a situation that has been in place for some time.

The Reform Party has been critical of this. I guess I have to ask why. I have also heard the Reform Party say that there are things the government should get out of, that the government should be spending less money, that in any way possible government should be allowing the private sector to do what the private sector can do.

This policy, which has been in effect for many years now, of allowing the private sector to contribute to the preservation of Canadian heritage and culture and to receive a tax credit for their contribution is one way of ensuring that government does not have to do everything in this country—unless one believes of course that a nation should not seek to collect the best heritage examples of art, of literature, of sculpture. I do not believe the Reform Party is of that opinion, but one would almost think so.

There is a bit of a contradiction here between saying allow the private sector to do more and let government do less and then speaking against a provision that encourages that very kind of private sector contribution to building the nation.

For many years I have had the privilege of living in the nation's capital. Part of that privilege is to share as part of my community the very fine national institutions our country has built over the decades: the National Gallery, the Museum of Nature, the Museum of Civilization, the Museum of Science and Technology. Over the years I have applauded the efforts of those institutions to take their collections and their knowledge to different parts of Canada and share with all Canadians the wealth of the collections and exhibits we have built in this country.

I do not think we can over–emphasize how important it is to the heart and soul of a nation to have a sense of its past. We cannot over–emphasize how important it is for young people to have an opportunity to be exposed to those things that express different points of view, through art of one kind or another, about the world, about ourselves and about our nation.

My colleague from Rosedale just spoke about the attitude toward the impressionists when they first began painting. Our own Group of Seven, who are virtually universally revered, suffered the same lack of acceptance among their fellow citizens when they tried to express in a new way what the country meant and how it appeared.

I said it was important for children to have the opportunity to experience many different expressions, visually and verbally, in music, views of their country and of the world. I go back to my own experience when our own National Gallery was housed in half of what is now the Museum of Nature. It was a very small collection. As a 10–year–old I had the wonderful opportunity of going there on a Saturday morning with dozens of other children, spreading a newspaper on the floor and using bottles of bright–coloured paint and being able to express myself. Then we would spend time looking at the masterpieces. We would have a world–renowned painter like Henri Masson spend his Saturday mornings with young children like me, commenting on our paintings and encouraging and discussing with us the other wonderful works that were in that very tiny gallery. These are the experiences that influence one's perception of the world and of oneself and that change one's future in many ways.

I hope nobody in this Parliament needs to be convinced of the value of a nation building up a reservoir for the generations to come of those things which have been an important expression of our culture and our history and our way of viewing the world.

We are not talking about whether we should or should not have provisions in the Income Tax Act to allow people to gain some credit, and it is only a partial credit, through the income tax system when they choose to donate something which is their own to their country and to their fellow citizens. That has been well established.

All we are talking about is making sure that the interests of the donor, the interests of the institution receiving the gift and the public interest are protected. We are here today to establish a process where the review board that determines the value of such a gift is subject to appeal, so that if a donor is not satisfied that the value that has been put on his or her gift by the review board is adequate, there is an opportunity to appeal.

Why is that important? It is important because a donor may choose to give or not give a gift to the nation, depending on whether it is valued as it should be. If I were to offer a gift to the National Gallery, which the gallery would first have to determine is of national and historical importance, and a review board were to say to me it is worth this much, when I know very well it is worth two or three times that much, I would choose not to give that gift under those circumstances.

If I have an impartial appeal process to go to, to say what is the real value of this and to have it established, then those gifts are far more likely to be made to the institutions of our country.

On the other hand, a donor may have an over–inflated view of the value of an artefact or a painting or a book which the donor wants to give to an institution, in which case the institution has an impartial process to go through to demonstrate to the donor that this is the value of that property and whether he or she still wishes to donate it or not, that is the value which the museum or art gallery is prepared to accept as its value.

I said it also protects the taxpayers and it does. While we want to give tax credits that encourage people to donate in that way, we also want to be sure that those tax credits are based on fair value. We want to make sure there is a process with an appeal built into it in case there is disagreement about those values.

We encourage charitable giving in many ways. We encourage charitable giving toward various causes: health research, programs for children, programs for young mothers, preservation of the environment. In all those cases we give exactly the kind of tax benefit that is being slightly modified in this bill. I cannot help but feel that giving something of great value to the mind and soul of a nation is equally important as contributing to research in a variety of ways. I am surprised that there are those in the House today who would question it.

In fact, I would take this opportunity to encourage the government to look further at how in times of tight financial situations we might achieve other national objectives through the same means.

For instance, there is no reason why someone should not be able to contribute an environmentally sensitive area to the nation for preservation and receive the same encouragement through the tax system to do that as they would do with the donation of an extremely valuable and historically important book.

Perhaps we should be considering a tax treatment that encourages people to preserve and to donate to the nation important historical buildings. Now the tax system seems more designed, according to the National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy, to encourage the demolition of heritage buildings and the construction of new buildings than to preserve existing ones.

I consider this legislation a safeguard of the public interest, the donor's interest and the receiving institution's interest. When a Canadian chooses generously to give something which he or she owns of great cultural value to all of us, I consider this act introduces a safeguard to ensure it is done based only on the proper value of that property.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(6), the division on the question now before the House stands deferred until Monday at 6 p.m., at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

OCEANS ACT

The House resumed from September 26 consideration of the motion that Bill C–98, an act respecting the oceans of Canada, be read the second time and referred to a committee; and on the amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The House will recall the member for Calgary North had not finished her speech. She is not prepared to go ahead at this time so I will recognize the member for Vancouver Quadra.

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to resume the debate on Bill C–98, the oceans act.

I had the opportunity to hear the closing minutes of the debate the other day on this bill. It was late in the evening; one was scattering twilight ashes so perhaps there were some misconceptions that might not have been formed at an earlier time of day.

• (1610)

Allow me to correct them by saying what this bill is not. It is certainly not an attempt to rewrite the Constitution Act, to rewrite the Constitution or to change the balance of federal–provincial powers as established under the Constitution Act and under the extensive jurisprudence developed on that act over the last 128 years.

It is a bill with a more modest purpose, although one of great value to the Canadian public and great value certainly to those who have grown up since the last war. It is a compendium, a collection in convenient form of Canada's position on the law of the sea.

International law is made in various ways. The great bulk of it has been made much as the common law of Canada has been made: by custom, practice which by its reasonableness and its acceptance becomes concretized as a rule of custom.

Other parts of the international law of the sea have been made by jurisprudence, by the decisions of the courts of which the International Court of Justice has been a leader, although sometimes national courts spill over. Still further change has been made by legislation, by treaties.

What is not perhaps generally understood is that until 1945 virtually all of the projections of Canada's power in international law of the sea and of the world community's position on the international law of the sea did not exist.

Until 1945 the law of the sea was a law of movement as my good friend, the great French scholar, René–Jean Dupuy of the Collège de France has described it, a law of movement which was concerned essentially in establishing the rights of all parties that passed freely to and fro on the seas, the concept of the high seas and the concept of a very limited national, territorial sea abridging those limits.

That was the regime which lasted for more than 300 years. It was developed originally as a debate between two great scholars, and the modern law of the sea, as the 300–year old law was then called. It was established by the brilliant Dutch jurist, Grotius, who in essence said the high seas belong to everybody. Everybody has the right of passage to and fro. The national, territorial sea is limited and it is a three–mile sea, no more.

This was itself an heretical doctrine because it overthrew an earlier doctrine established by Spanish and Portuguese jurists and ratified by a pope with a decree in 1494 that appropriated the oceans and divided them between Spain and Portugal. Grotius overthrew this. He was resisted by some sceptical people, including the great English jurist, Selden, but his views prevail largely because they made sense in the world community as it was developing, particularly in the aftermath of the Thirty Years War. But even before the signs were apparent. When he was writing, it was quite clear that the modern state founded on the rules of commerce must have freedom of access to and fro on the seas.

Those were the theories that he presented. Since they corresponded to the needs of the world community they were widely accepted and became the general rules, subject only to very minor exceptions for some special Scandinavian rules and the like and some exceptions that were made by special bilateral treaties very recently. In fact the changes are largely in response to illegal Canadian activities, treaties governing rum running and detention of vessels outside the three–mile territorial sea of the United States. These were directed against Canadian smugglers in the 1920s and were basically British–U.S. treaties.

What this act does, and I think it is its primary purpose, is to give a compendium, give a résumé of the elements in the modern Canadian position of the law of the sea. Our law reflects international law. It is a rule of international law that the general customary rules of international law are part of the common law of Canada. To be operative, treaties as such must be incorporated into our law by legislation. The conventions in the law of the sea to date, until the most recent one, are directly parts of Canadian law.

This particular act is not directed to the 1982 convention, the so–called third United Nations law of the sea convention, but it achieves essentially the same thing because it recites all those additions to the international law that have become part of Canadian law by various Canadian actions.

I should add here that a treaty, even though unratified by a country, may, according to the best jurisprudence of the International Court of Justice, become binding upon a non–signatory, non–ratifying country simply because it is evidence of a general rule of international law binding on all states. This flows from a celebrated dictum of the late president of the world court, Judge Lachs, and it is now generally accepted.

If we look at this legislation we do get for the first time a complete and comprehensive recitation of the segments of the Canadian law of the sea: the territorial sea of course, but the extension of the territorial sea from three marine miles to twelve; a ruling on the contiguous zone, which is itself an extension into general treaty law and then into general customary law of those special American treaties that were designed to cover the rum runners, the smugglers, and not much more. The contiguous zone goes well beyond that today.

Something that was a revolutionary doctrine when it was proclaimed by President Truman for the first time in 1945 is the international law of the continental shelf. President Truman asserted that claim on behalf of the United States defence policy. It was designed, as he said, and there was some evidence for that, to establish a legal basis for early warning systems and the like outside the three–mile territorial sea. But there was also very clearly an economic motive: the development of submarine oil deposits and other mineral resources outside the three–mile limit. So that is the continental shelf.

Then we join forces with another interesting segment to which Canada has very specifically contributed, the establishment of fishing zones. These were originally unilateral assertions by several Latin American states with a poor economy but rich seas in terms of marine fish resources: the unilateral extension to 200 miles of their jurisdiction and enforced against ships owned by Greek shipowners but registered under flags of convenience. It was a heretical doctrine when first asserted, but its reasonableness in a world of diminishing resources was fully recognized and other states adopted this. Canada was one of the leaders in that, first by unilateral act and then by a series of bilateral treaties with other countries.

A further and more interesting doctrine is this doctrine of the exclusive economic zone, which now goes 200 miles from our coast. It has been said by the international court that with a slightly different development the exclusive economic zone might have become unnecessary, that the doctrine of the continental shelf could have been capable of further generic extension. But we face the reality today that the international law has developed in separate steps, not necessarily overlapping.

What we have in this bill for the first time is a comprehensive presentation of the Canadian law, the Canadian recognition and application of the international law of the sea in the different ways in which we have done it. It is a bit more comprehensive than the 1982 international treaty. It covers more matters. These are matters that I would say Canada has pioneered.

I go back here to the great dean of the University of British Columbia law school, George Curtis, who was very active in the two great international conferences in 1958 and 1960 that gave rise to the first great international conventions post–war on this subject. I would also add the distinguished Vancouver and Victoria scholar and long–time legal adviser to the Canadian foreign ministry, Alan Beesley, Ambassador Tommy Koh of Singapore and Judge Aguilar Mawdsley of Venezuela who is now a judge of the world court. It can be said that they developed the modern law of the sea.

Here we discover something that is distinctively Canadian and of which we can be very proud, because it draws together certain imperatives of Canadian society that are widely recognized, perhaps more than ever in western Canada and on the west coast. That is to say that we view the resources of the sea as something to be protected, and it is not a rule of international law and it should not be the case that people can do anything they like as long it is not specifically prohibited in some act that someone can cite. What is being said here, which was the Canadian position in the extended meetings leading up to the 1982 convention, is that there is today an imperative of conservation, that in a world of diminishing natural resources the common heritage of humankind consists of these natural resources and every state has a duty to investigate, to monitor their utilization and to protect them.

In its basic conception this is a modest law, but it does comprehensively state what is the Canadian position on the international law of the sea as applied in Canada. It also goes beyond that and carries forward the thrust of the Canadian interest in conservation, which we have pioneered and successfully demonstrated to other countries.

I have a certain interest in this. In recent months I attended, at the invitation of the UN Secretary–General, his conference on the future of international law. It was at the height of the so–called turbot war which involved our country in a dispute with two other countries. It was a matter of great interest to be greeted by the ambassadors of a number of European countries and to be requested to pass on congratulations to our government for taking a position in terms of conservation of the world's diminishing resources. These people said very frankly: "We cannot be quoted on this. Our government, for reasons of regional solidarity, may take a different position, but something had to be done."

I suppose this really directs attention to the international law–making process. Most of the international law of the sea has been made by unilateral acts of countries. Somebody asserted the principle. Sir Francis Drake and others were the first to challenge, on behalf of Queen Elizabeth I, the Portuguese and Spanish claims to hegemony over the oceans and the appendant lands at the end of the 16th century. However, in terms of the contemporary law of the sea, it is worth reflecting that almost all the customary law results from unilateral acts, which by their reasonableness and the perception that they accord with the trends of history have been considered to be right and proper for the world community.

I think in that respect our actions in the turbot war were right and in conformity with international law. In the House I made that suggestion at the time.

This particular legislation does carry forward the imperative, which has always been part of Canadian post–war thinking and is to be found in the great diplomatic conferences in which we played such a leading part and which were carried on by governments of different political complexions at times but with the same general outlook. While it is true that the international law of the sea has moved from this law of movement, open to everybody, no rulings on property, to a narrower concept of national appropriation of economic resources, those new imperatives resulted from the clear fact that many countries were poor and had no resources and reached out to the fishery and mining resources and the like. Notwithstanding this change, a new drive or a new imperative has been received in international law thinking, and that is the obligation of conservation of scarce natural resources.

If we look at this legislation we will see that it is a modest law. It is perhaps too long. It is true that civil servants in Canada and elsewhere draft laws that are longer and more complex than they need be, but the great truths are there. It is a compendium of the law. We have caught up in our national law with the emerging international law of the sea. In our presentation of that law we are more comprehensive than the most recent 1982 treaty that is at the point of being ratified by Canada.

Also in our law we are providing this obligation of setting up the duty to monitor, supervise and essentially act like a good citizen. In that we fulfil what civil law countries know in their law as the "droit du bon voisinage", the law of good neighbourliness. The common law is less developed than the civil law, and international law has borrowed largely from the civil law principles. It is in that respect that the law is a very good law and is worth commending to the House.

Do not worry about questions of effects on federal–provincial constitutional powers. This law could not change them. They are sufficiently regulated by the Constitution and by the jurisprudence on it. On careful re–reading after hearing some members' questions on that, it is not my conclusion that the law in any way attempts to change that. Look to its larger purpose and accept the fact also that it carries forward the case we successfully made a year ago in the so–called turbot war.

Incidentally, there has never been any doubt in international law that a country's jurisdiction, including its criminal jurisdiction, extends beyond national territory, including national territorial waters. It is a clear principle that acts outside one's territory that impinge on or have effects within the territory are subject to national criminal jurisdiction. In fact, such jurisdiction has been asserted by English courts successfully since the 17th century and is part of the jurisprudence of most countries today.

Therefore, it is my pleasure to commend Bill C–98 to this House as a codification and a progressive development of international law in the best traditions of those Canadian civil servants, politically neutral as they were, who did so much to establish the great international acts I have referred to in my discourse.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak today on Bill C–98 and in particular the amendment we have called for. The amendment is to put down this bill and refer the contents of it back to the committee. The reason is this bill once again shows that this government is just doing window dressing on a number of serious issues.

I am going to speak to Bill C–98, an act respecting the oceans. It would be a very welcome bill to help ratify the UN Convention on the Law of the Sea if it were something more than just window dressing.

I will explain what we agree and disagree with in the bill and provide some constructive solutions that we humbly submit the government should pay heed to.

We agree and commend the government in its effort to cost cut by streamlining the coast guard and by enacting the partnership programs which will save the taxpayer money, something we would all welcome. We agree with the intent of the oceans management strategy to co–ordinate the oceans strategy across provincial and federal governments.

However do we need to create another level of bureaucracy to fulfil the oceans management strategy? Should this not be the responsibility of DFO? Why not convene representatives from the provinces and the federal government to develop a concerted strategy that DFO would monitor? Why do we need to create another level of bureaucracy to do it? Why do we need to create another group of people to watch people who watch other people, who watch people watching people do some work? This is "Yes, Minister" at its worst.

An hon. member: It is a make work project.

Mr. Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): That is right. The minister truly believes that he is as interested in sustainable development as we all are, but from what I have heard in the House on the issue the facts bear that this is nonsense.

I will tell the House what has been happening on both coasts, in particular the west coast where we are trying to avert the disaster that occurred on the east coast. I have repeatedly warned the minister of the devastating poaching that is taking place on the west coast. We have seen very little being done about it. The proof is in the pudding. All we need to do is look at the catchments that have come back this year in so many different fish species to see the devastation that has been wracked on our west coast fish species. There is a lot of poaching going on. I will give some examples.

In Mill Bay in my riding there was a three–day salmon derby which 300 fishermen attended and caught seven salmon. On Hornby Island just a couple of months ago there was another salmon derby. The third prize winning fish was a dogfish because nobody caught any salmon. That is what is happening in the west coast salmon fishery.

It is affecting groundfish and other species. One could not catch a ling cod if one's life depended on it. Shellfish are being decimated. The abalone fishery was closed in 1989 on the west coast. Yet there is widespread poaching of abalone all over the west coast. Just recently the ex–head of the Vancouver aquarium said that a large population of Asian individuals are pillaging the shellfish off Stanley Park.

I invite the minister and the parliamentary secretary to come to Vancouver Island to see the decimation of the shellfish stocks. A number of Vietnamese individuals on Vancouver Island have been pillaging shellfish all over the island. DFO has been unable to deal with the problem. It is a huge problem as our shellfish stocks are being significantly affected. Furthermore the poachers are taking shellfish out of polluted areas.

Seiners are vacuuming the ocean off Vancouver Island. Since 1957 when the seiners first started catching salmon there has been a reproduceable inverse relationship between the intensity of seine fishing, the numbers of spawners that are coming back and the catchment by sports fishermen.

Just a couple of years ago there was a revenge seine fishery to penalize the Americans, yet we decimated our own fish stocks. That is not sustainable management, but that was the decision made by the ministry.

All salmon species are being decimated. All one has to do is go up the Fraser River to see what is happening. There are nets strung from one end to the other. Aboriginal people are stringing nets across the river and are pillaging and raping the fish stocks. The ministry knows that. It should be coming down on individuals who are hiding behind the aboriginal fish strategy to poach fish. They have been unwilling to do that because it is politically incorrect. I strongly advise the ministry that for all people, aboriginal and non–aboriginal people, it should have one commercial fishing strategy. It should enforce the laws for all people regardless of who they are.

• (1635)

Fish know no bounds. They do not care who is pillaging them, but there are individuals hiding behind their ethnic origins who are doing it, and because it is not politically expedient the DFO is unable and unwilling to deal with it.

I do not blame the officers because they are hamstrung by mid–level bureaucrats that are hamstringing the minister. Part of the problem is in the bureaucracy. When DFO was reorganized it transferred decision making from hardworking DFO officers in the field to mid–level bureaucrats in Ottawa and Vancouver. The number of DFO officers went down.

The result is that decisions are made a distance away from where the actual poaching is taking place. What we see are decisions that do not actually affect the problems in the fisheries. It has also contributed to the decimation of fish stocks on the west coast.

I actually commend the ministry for increasing the numbers of fisheries officers somewhat, but I bring to its attention that it has also increased the bureaucracy. I give the example of what happened in my riding in Sooke where they closed the only fisheries office and increased the bureaucracy in Victoria.

The result has been greatly increased pressure from poachers within Vancouver Island and poachers coming across the Strait of Juan de Fuca from America. They know full well they cannot fish in their own waters because of the decimation of the stocks. Therefore they come to good old Canada and decimate our stocks. They know they will not be penalized because fisheries officers are unprepared to deal with them.

I bring to the attention of the ministry that the morale of DFO officers is at an all time low because mid–level bureaucrats have hamstrung them. They have made it unable for them to do their job or to acquire the means to do their job. The ministry needs to investigate the loss of morale. It is losing a lot of good people who have historically done a great job in fisheries.

Another aspect is that groundfish are being decimated. We find that trollers are decimating the reefs all over the west coast in an effort to extract whatever fish are there. These delicate reefs are being smashed to pieces.

We need one commercial fishing strategy. We also need to decrease the number of nets in the water. There are simply too many nets right now to make the extraction of species sustainable. We also need to decrease seiner activity and have a release program for adult Chinook salmon, which is possible if the weather is co–operative.

We should try to preserve sports fishing capability, the reason being that sports fishing injects on a per fish basis much more than the commercial fishery, about $37 per fish.

We should enforce the law we have right now. I implore the ministry to enforce the laws we have. It has not been doing it. The poachers are aware of it and taking full advantage of the situation.

There should be commercial fishing strategy for all people. We should not allow poachers to hide behind the aboriginal fishing strategy for their own personal financial gain, at the expense of all honest fishermen from all walks of life.

We need to push for an extension of our jurisdiction beyond our 200–mile zone. There is a doughnut in the Pacific Ocean where immature salmon go to fatten up. International poachers are pillaging that doughnut of fish which normally come back to us. The issue was investigated years ago. For a number of reasons the investigation was quashed internally. We need to try to enforce through international agreement the preservation of that area so we can ensure that a reasonable number of fish will come back to us.

We also have to deal with the dumping of toxins that is occurring not only in our country but in others because they wind up in our ecosystem. I remind everyone of who is at the pinnacle of that ecosystem. The number one predator is man. This is what happens. Toxins are accumulated in an individual. The higher up one is in the predatory system, the more the toxins become concentrated and the greater chance they have of becoming carcinogenic and teratogenic.

I strongly advise the minister to work with science research and development in the Department of the Environment rather than have the department work in isolation. There are many very talented and skilled scientists in the Ministry of the Environment who are doing a lot of incredible work on the issue of sustainable development with respect to the oceans. I suggest they tap into that resource for the benefit of the fishery.

I also suggest co–operative effort between other ministries and a leadership role for DFO. I know it can play this role because it has many very talented people. We are looking for somebody to take a leadership role among the ministries and we have it within our capabilities.

The minister claims, as I have said before, that he is very much in favour of sustainable management of our resources. Yet in British Columbia he is closing down hatcheries left, right and centre. They closed the hatchery down in Sooke. If we did not have those hatcheries we would not have a fishery. That is the cold hard reality. If we do not have them the number of spawners coming back are negligible.

I propose the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans should start up a sustainable hatchery in my riding near Sooke. The start–up costs are $1 million with a quarter million dollars per year. It could be self–financing in four years. I ask him to look at the proposal. It could inject over $90 million into Vancouver Island. Furthermore it would be self–financing. We just need some co–operation from the ministry to do it.

I would also like to look at the area of aquaculture. We were a leader in aquaculture a few years ago. However, because of mismanagement and a lack of support from governments, Chile has now taken over from us in the aquaculture industry. We as a country can play a leadership role internationally in aquaculture.

Some very good work is being done in a vet college on Prince Edward Island and at the University of Prince Edward Island on research in aquaculture that could enable Canada to garner a niche in aquaculture and become a leader in the area. The economic spinoff benefits for the west coast would be huge.

I hope the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans will look into the matter and work in co–operation with the University of Prince Edward Island, and other universities that are similarly doing other exciting work, for the benefit of the people of the area and for the benefit of the resource.

The minister also claimed that he was interested in looking at protecting spawning sites. I completely agree. Yet we do not have adequate data on the spawning sites as they exist. We need to acquire them.

There is another aspect. There are other fisheries involving sea cucumbers, sea urchins and geoducks for which there is an open fishery. That would be absolutely fine except for the fact that we have absolutely no idea what stocks there are in these areas. We need to establish what the stocks are before we move ahead and cull a sustainable number of these species, to maintain a sustainable resource in these other shellfish species for the future.

Bill C–98 has a lot of good intentions. Unfortunately it falls far short of what it was meant to be. I hope the ministry can ask for the opinions of people in the areas that are being affected by the fishery. I hope and pray we will not have an east coast disaster on the west coast. As we stand here now, poaching is widespread through virtually every species we can imagine. The only people who are going to be hurt are future Canadians.

I implore the minister once again to enforce the law for all people regardless of who they happen to be. It is not politically incorrect to enforce the law because the people who are poaching are of an immigrant population or are aboriginal people. It does not serve those people within those groups or any other group who are honest individuals within the industry and are working within the legal framework of that industry to have any group of people within their population poaching the fish and other fish species.

We need a sustainable fishery in this country. We can have a sustainable fishery in this country but we can only have it if the Department of Fisheries and Oceans shows the leadership it is obligated to show. I and my colleagues in the Reform Party would be more than happy to help the government to work toward that end. It just takes the political will, strength and courage to do that.

Mr. Harbance Singh Dhaliwal (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I listened to the hon. member and I would like to commend him on some interesting ideas he has put forward. I took notes on many of his concerns.

He spent some time on ensuring that enforcement and law and order is very important. The Reform Party often puts forward that if there are people illegally fishing or poaching we should take action. He would know that the Reform member for Delta was charged with illegally fishing and that whenever anyone does not abide by the law they will be charged as the member was under the DFO act.

The member also talked about enforcement. He knows that one of the things we have accomplished this year is we were able to get an increase in the budget for enforcement. This is not an easy thing to do these days when there are tremendous budget cuts. As the Reform Party often brings forward we should be cutting the deficit and cutting our costs but this is one area where people such as the hon. member and others have told us that we need more enforcement. Therefore more enforcement has been added on the west coast. It is the one area where there has been a budget increase.

The hon. member talked about the sports fishery. He knows that the sports fishery is very important from a tourism point of view in developing that whole industry. Would he and his party designate the chinook and coho as an exclusive sports fishery? I am interested to know his view on that topic and what his position would be.

I also would like to hear his view on our new aquaculture strategy. I wonder whether he feels that is the right direction and whether he agrees with our new aquaculture strategy which was just brought in by the minister. We think aquaculture is very important. I would appreciate it if the hon. member could respond to those questions.

Mr. Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, my colleague did indeed put his nets into the water. Quite bluntly, the reason he put his nets into the water was to show that the law was not being enforced equally between aboriginals and non–aboriginals. I cannot comment on a situation that is going to be before the courts but the motivation was frustration. The facts are that the laws are not and were not being applied equally to both aboriginals and non–aboriginals.

I just draw from a safety point of view the poaching I mentioned earlier along the Fraser River where aboriginal people were extending their nets right across the river and taking as much as they could possibly take. This was done in front of DFO officers. The DFO officers would not go in there because they were afraid of being shot and killed. I do not blame them but that is the reality under which we live.

• (1650)

I would like to also ask if the taxes that are going to be applied to catchment also apply to aboriginal and non–aboriginal commercial fishermen. Do they also apply to commercial fishermen under the AFS? At some time in the future I would like to know the answer to that.

The hon. member asked me about the chinook and coho fisheries. We know the numbers of both are declining quite dramatically and I would put the ball back in his court. Our first concern is to ensure we have adequate chinook and coho coming back into our waters as spawners. That is not happening right now. If we enable the hatcheries to occur, such as the one I mentioned which can be sustainable, then in time when we get a sufficient number of chinook and coho back, yes we could have a commercial fishery in that.

The overriding concern we must have is to ensure that our chinook and coho and every other species are going to have sufficient sustainable numbers in our waters so that this resource can be increased over time. When it gets to a level that is considered to be sustainable, I am sure the ministry will have enough data to show how many fish can be taken off in a sustainable fashion in a commercial way.

The aquaculture suggestions I mentioned to the hon. member are suggestions I have not seen put forth in any area by the ministry. If it is there, I would certainly like to be made aware of it. To my knowledge and from what I have seen, there is no record of the other constructive ideas I have put forth to the hon. member with respect to maximizing our aquaculture capabilities within Canada.

As I said before, I have no doubt that Canada can be a world leader in aquaculture because we have superb research taking place now. There is no reason that not only can we do this domestically but there are also enormous international trade possibilities in aquaculture existing around the world. In the future with our resources being decimated, we are going to need new sources of protein to feed the burgeoning populations in this world. Aquaculture could provide a large part of that protein.

There are great opportunities for Canada. I am sure the hon. member will pass that information back to the minister so he can act on it forthwith.

Ms. Roseanne Skoke (Central Nova, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak to Bill C–98, an act respecting the oceans of Canada, at second reading and to address the amendment before this honourable House.

It is a privilege to support Bill C–98 in principle and to support its objectives and its implementation. The people of Central Nova applaud the due diligence and leadership role the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has played in our country since assuming his responsibilities as Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Thanks to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, our Canadian people have a renewed hope, a new vision for our coastal communities: protection for our fisheries and oceans. Finally, we have a human face of compassion amidst our fisheries crisis in Canada.

On Tuesday the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans addressed this House on the oceans act and its importance to the maritime nation which is Canada. The vision of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is to make Canada a world leader in oceans and marine resource management through this legislation. He enunciated for us the mission which this government has set for itself, to manage Canada's oceans in close co–operation with others so that our oceans are clean, safe, productive and accessible.

In my riding of Central Nova there exists the north shore and the eastern shore of the Atlantic Ocean. My constituents applaud the vision of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans which he boldly pronounced on November 15, 1994 in the document "A Vision for Oceans Management". This document is based on the recommendations of the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology Report on Oceans and Coasts. At that time the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans said: "It has been long recognized for a long time that there is a need for one act to clearly assert Canada's sovereign rights and responsibilities over its oceans and territories".

Our minister of fisheries pointed to the proprietary pride which Canadians have in their oceans: the Atlantic, the Pacific and the Arctic. These are fundamental to much of our existence, individually and as a nation. They have provided the means of transportation, trading, communications and subsistence from time immemorial. Generations have depended on our oceans for food, clothing and even medicine.

Canada with its three coasts has the longest coastline in the world and the second largest continental shelf spanning more than six and a half million kilometres. As the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans pointed out in his vision document, Canada's oceans are equal to half of our territorial land mass and have been a key to our evolution culturally and economically. Fisheries, transportation and shipping, tourism and recreation, offshore oil and gas have all been beacons of hope and economic stability for numerous coastal communities along all three oceans.

In his 1994 vision paper the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans related as well the need to diversify our reliance on the maritime resources in light of the collapse of groundfish stocks along the east coast and in light of ever increasing stress being placed on the maritime habitat by our society. Critical habitat destruction, foreign and domestic overfishing, as well as marine and atmospheric pollution were all cause for concern.

This government recognized that a new oceans management regime was needed, one based on an ecological approach and on the development of an integrated management system for all activities affecting oceans and coastal waters. The time had come. The wake–up alarm had sounded for all Canadians to turn away from the band–aid measures of short term need to a policy which would result in the sustainable use of resources and environmental protection.

Through the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans the Government of Canada identified several key objectives of any new legal instrument:

First, to preserve and protect the oceans' environment, the ecosystems and resources they contain. Second, to establish a framework and guidelines to manage the oceans' resources, both renewable and non–renewable, on an economically sustainable and environmentally acceptable basis. Third, to enhance, focus, co–ordinate and disseminate Canada's scientific, environmental and management information relating to oceans and their resources. Fourth, to assert and enforce Canada's sovereign rights and responsibilities over its ocean resources and areas. Fifth, to establish the legal framework to support the implementation of this oceans management strategy. Sixth, to establish a clearly identifiable lead federal agency accountable for oceans management.

As the minister suggested, this should best be initiated by the development and passage of Canada's oceans act. As the minister pointed out to the House, Canada's oceans policy at present is like a big jigsaw puzzle, the pieces all scattered in front of us waiting for us to fit them all together. It is not easy to visualize the entire picture without seeing the box which the puzzle came in and its cover illustration. However, a great deal of work has gone into visualizing what the whole picture must be and determining a logical pattern for the pieces to be placed together, pieces as diverse as deep ocean research and cold ocean rescues, inspection and protection, emergency responses and sustainability, conservation and commercialization, navigational safety and national security, national goals and regional initiatives, restoration of our marine resources, and job creation.

We all know that it will take many minds to finish the puzzle in time for all Canadians to enjoy the results of the effort. From the outset this has not been the vision of one person or one group of persons imposed upon the rest of us. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has signalled clearly his openness toward full participation in the process so that all sides of the House, all stakeholders, all organizations, disciplines and sectors of society having an interest in our oceans can contribute.

Consultation has been a hallmark of the government in the carrying out of its responsibilities but the minister has sought more; namely, a partnership for a successful conclusion to this challenge; this beckoning to us from the future generations of Canada.

Through this legislation, Canada will be bringing into its own domestic law provisions for 200 nautical miles from its low water line to which it is already entitled as part of the modern international community.

Canada is taking on its rights and responsibilities as a member of the global community, a community with a growing realization that our actions are all interdependent, whether at the most local community level or at the level of global interaction and co–operation for survival.

The oceans act makes it possible for the federal government to solicit and expand partnerships in the many enterprises involved in scientific research, maritime communications and safety, fisheries conservation, management enforcement, underwater exploration and seabed mining, the understanding and sustainable exploitation of marine plants, the maintenance of trading routes through block ice.

It makes us all working shareholders in the development of a flexible, workable and ecologically sound ocean strategy for today and for the future, one well in keeping with Canada's motto, from sea to sea to sea.

This is a vision of Canada as being much more than the Rockies, the Laurentian Shield and great plains between them, of great cities lining up at our southern borders; it is also a view of myriad port cities and coastal communities, of diverse marine activities extending economic and social benefit to future generations brought to us by the rolling swells and rippled waves of blue beginnings at the edges of our land maps.

The oceans act is a vision of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and of the Government of Canada. However, it is more than that: in its ink and paper, in the millions of electronic impulses and images which have gone into its preparation and discussion and communication from this very Chamber, it represents the aspirations of millions of Canadians.

It is a declaration by a maritime nation that it will continue to shoulder the challenges of the present but that it welcomes the support of all concerned as it navigates into the future.

A special thank you to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans from all Canadians for Bill C–98 and for recognizing the importance of the maritime nation which is Canada.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise in support of the oceans act and, in so doing, to pay tribute to its author, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. In the short time he has occupied that post he has shown exemplary leadership by leading our country through one of the worst crisis in the Atlantic fishery and turning that difficult situation on the Atlantic coast, and as well in other respects on the Pacific coast, into an opportunity for Canada to assert its pride as a nation internationally and its sense of leadership on behalf of the world's oceans.

The oceans act which was tabled on Tuesday and which the minister addressed on Tuesday is, as he has pointed out, legislation that constitutes one element, but a major element, in the overall strategy of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to intensify its effort toward the oceans and will be complemented by a number of other policies and activities in the months ahead.

The objectives of the oceans act are to recognize in domestic law Canada's jurisdiction over its ocean areas and their resources, to provide the legislative framework for a new oceans management regime and to regroup key federal ocean related statutes under the oceans act.

The legislation consists of three parts, each of which contains the regulatory enforcement and operational authorities required for its implementation.

• (1705)

Part I is Canada's maritime zones. This part defines Canada's maritime zones by incorporating provisions of the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act. It declares Canada's rights and jurisdiction over the contiguous zone and the exclusive economic zone and it defines the minimum limits of Canada's continental shelf as provided for by the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea.

Let me point out that the declaration of the contiguous zone and of an exclusive economic zone is in full agreement with international practice. The limitation of Canada's maritime zones also outlines the area over which Canada will now apply its new oceans management strategy.

In accordance with the government's efforts to consolidate key ocean legislation under the umbrella of the oceans act, provisions of the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act and the Canadian Laws Offshore Applications Act are incorporated into the this bill. This legislation further emphasizes Canada's rights with respect to the continental shelf. Canada has rights to living organisms belonging to sedentary species on or in the shelf and jurisdiction over the exploration and the exploitation of minerals and non–living resources of the seabed and of the subsoil.

The declaration of Canadian jurisdiction over the territorial sea and the contiguous zone and the exclusive zone is crucial. Most Canadians may not know these technical terms, but many Canadians will have heard the phrases 12–mile zone and 200–mile zone. Canada's territorial sea extends from the coastline out 12 nautical miles. In the territorial sea Canada has full jurisdiction to ocean waters, to the seabed beneath these waters and the space above.

The contiguous zone will extend an additional 12 nautical miles from the outer edge of the territorial sea. In this zone Canada will have the power to enforce our criminal, fiscal, immigration, sanitary and customs laws.

The exclusive economic zones will encompass all of the ocean area out to 200 nautical miles from the coastal baseline. In this zone Canada will have jurisdiction for exploring and exploiting, conserving and managing the living and non–living resources of the waters, seabed and subsoil. Canada's jurisdiction in this zone will cover marine scientific research, protection and preservation of the marine environment and artificial islands, installations and structures.

Through this legislation Canada will establish major new rights over the ocean. In the councils of the world Canadians pushed hard to establish these rights. These new zones grant Canada powers that go well beyond the powers our country asserted in the past. The bill will put in place a clear definition of jurisdiction that is fully supported by global agreement.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans expressed this clearly on Tuesday in the House when he stated: "The world backs Canada's jurisdiction over Canadian waters".

This brings me to part II, oceans management strategy. This part commits us to the development of a new method by which we shall manage the oceans and their resources. It identifies the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans as the federal authority responsible for the co–ordination and facilitation of the development and implementation with stakeholders of an oceans management strategy. It provides the minister with the necessary statutory authority to do so. This part also authorizes the minister to create marine protected areas for the protection of the fishery resource.

Let me review the goals of the strategy outlined in the legislation. One goal is to integrate planning and management of activities within and among jurisdictions. Another is to reduce regulatory duplication and conflict. Still another is to increase the effectiveness of environmental protection measures and to replace the existing sectoral approach to resource management in favour of a more comprehensive ecosystem–based approach.

The act thus provides the building blocks for integrated management and sustainable development of Canada's ocean resources. It outlines a new ecosystems approach to marine resource management. It provides a common focus for federal responsibilities and consolidates federal programs. It gives Canadians legislative tools with which to begin working on ocean management holistically, rather than sectorally.

We have long known the need for sustainable development of resources. This need was clearly put forward in the report of the 1987 World Commission on Environment and Development, better known as the Bruntland report after its chairman, Gro Harlem Bruntland, now Prime Minister of Norway.

Here is how the commission defined sustainable development: "Activity in which the environment is fully incorporated into the economic decision–making process as a forethought, not an afterthought". The report called for: "Development that meets the needs of the present, without compromising the ability of the future generations to meet their own needs". The government is acting on the commission's call.

Last year the National Advisory Board of Science and Technology called for an oceans act to address the needs of ocean frontier development for the present and the future. The advisory board called for Canada to develop a proactive oceans policy that plans for the future, rather than just responds to crisis.

In November 1994, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans released a document setting out the potential elements of an ocean management vision for Canada. The government sought the advice of Canadians across the country. Certain themes recurred in that advice. The federal government has a leadership role to play in oceans policy. There should be one federal department taking the lead in developing a new strategy. People want to be involved locally in developing solutions to regional priorities. There is a need to sustain resources and to diversify.

Such was the advice we received. It came from provinces, municipalities, coastal residents, fishermen, business, labour, environmentalists and scientists. The bill before us sets out the elements of an oceans policy. But all Canadians must be involved in developing specific mechanisms, planning and management structures, as well as the guidelines and standards needed to bring about sustainable use of oceans and their resources.

The oceans management strategy envisaged by this legislation is broad in scope and flexible in implementation. It recognizes the consensus building that is needed for a cohesive and coherent oceans policy for our country.

Again, let me quote the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans from his address to the House on Tuesday: "The bill identifies federal leadership and commitment to a comprehensive approach to oceans management. The bill seeks to address regulatory duplication, conflict and inadequacies that result in inefficiencies, failure to protect the environment and impediments to development and this bill is founded on the principle that long term solutions require long term co–operation".

The oceans act will give the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, on behalf of the Government of Canada, legal authority to draw together all of Canada's ocean stakeholders, to develop a strategy based on the sustainable development and integrated management of activities and resources in estuarine, coastal and marine waters.

The act provides the authority to develop the actual mechanisms to implement the new strategy. It gives the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans the ability to enter into new partnership agreements in order to ensure that the ocean management strategy meets regional needs and fulfils regional aspirations.

Part III deals with the powers, duties and functions of the minister. This part provides for consolidation and clarification of federal responsibilities for managing Canada's oceans. It reflects the enhanced mandate of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and it provides statutory authority for Canadian Coast Guard functions transferred to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Those functions include provision of services for the safe, economical and efficient movement of ships in Canadian waters; the marine component of the federal search and rescue program; pleasure craft safety and marine pollution prevention and response, as well as ships, aircraft and other marine services in support of other federal programs, boards and agencies.

Oceans related provisions previously contained in other legislation have been incorporated into this section of the act. Most notable is the authority of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to conduct hydrographic, oceanographic and marine scientific surveys, to conduct research and to publish various products.

As the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans observed at the last debate on the oceans act, with this legislation we are coming to the successful conclusion of a long and dramatic chapter in Canada's maritime history. With this legislation we are coming to the beginning of a new and even more vital chapter in that history.

The Canada oceans act will give our country and exclusive economic zone covering almost 5 million square kilometres of the Atlantic, Pacific and Arctic Oceans. With the passage of this act Canada will effectively increase by one–half as our jurisdiction will encompass both the land mass and the oceans.

As the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans said, the Canada oceans act does expand our notion of Canada as a country. The oceans management strategy increases the priority we place as a society on wise development of our waters. It signals that Canada and Canadians are prepared to act in making the most of our ocean assets, opportunities and obligations.

The fisheries and oceans minister has aptly described the Canada oceans act as the last step forward toward formal jurisdiction over Canada's ocean territory. However, the act is also the first step toward recognizing the extraordinary importance and potential of this vast territory.

In legislative terms the bill establishes jurisdiction over Canada's ocean area and ocean resources. It establishes the primary rules and provides the tools to help support Canada's new oceans management regime. It consolidates and clarifies federal responsibilities for managing Canada's oceans.

In real life terms the bill marks a transition in Canadians' relationship with our oceans. It marks an acceptance of reciprocal obligation; as the oceans benefit us, so we are agreeing to act to benefit the oceans.

The oceans act signals a renewal of Canada's leadership in oceans management. With this act we are asserting Canada's role as a world leader. Sustainable development is a goal to which all nations must be committed, not only of the fisheries resource but of all ocean resources.

There may be seven seas but there is only one ocean. The oceans make up one single global organism connected by great currents flowing from hemisphere to hemisphere. Oceans play a vital role in regulating our climate. Oceans also play a key role in the water cycle, the chemistry of the atmosphere and the making of climate and weather. Oceans also supply us not only with food but also energy, minerals and medicines.

With the oceans act Canada will be in an even stronger position to show the world the way of conserving ocean resources. As the member for the Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, a constituency which depends greatly on the oceans near its coasts, be it for fishing or as a vital link in eastern Canada for ocean protection, for conservation and for environmental response through the Strait of Canso, I am very pleased to greet this Canada oceans act and the co–ordination and consolidation that it represents in Canada's oceans policy.

I am pleased also to support the government in bringing this legislation forward as well as the initiatives which will flow from this initiative in expanding Canada's sense of responsibility over the oceans and also in continuing the leadership which our Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has demonstrated to the great pride of all Canadians in taking the lead in the world in managing our ocean environment.

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest for the last several hours to the debate with regard to this bill.

I find something very disturbing as I look through it. I have been very involved in Bill C–68, the gun control bill. Now I look at Bill C–98 and at many other bills before the House and there is a trend that disturbs me very much, a trend toward centralizing power in Ottawa, the big bubble, the place that seems to lose touch with the concerns of grassroots Canadians, the concerns that people have out there trying to make a living, trying to find a livelihood they can depend on. This bill does not address that. In some instances it makes it even more difficult. Let me explain.

A bloated bureaucracy is being developed. There is the minister centralizing power within his office. It is a very top heavy administration, just like in agriculture, an area I am very familiar with. A study was done. In agriculture we have approximately 1 bureaucrat for every 5.8 farmers.

If we look at the fishing industry, how many bureaucrats does it take for the fishermen to fish, to do their work? We have through this bill even more of this type of bureaucracy developing.

I listened to what was said, things like we need to co–ordinate, we need to do all these wonderful things. Are they just euphemisms? Are those code words for more bloated bureaucracy?

I look at other things in the bill. The governments says it will need fees to cut back on the deficits in this area. This is just another word for taxes these fishermen will have to pay.

It was an eye opener for me to go to New Brunswick a couple of weeks ago, to the southwestern part of the province, and talk with the fishermen who are being squeezed out of the fishery by the regulations the government is putting in place, by the taxes in the form of fees which are driving these fishermen out of work. I find that unacceptable. The bill makes that even more possible. We have to start addressing the real concerns of real people out there.

Is it the intention of the government to give big corporations more power to fish? If we talk to the people out there they will tell us about the draggers, the big chains destroying the environment. I hear the member speaking about how the government will protect the environment and protect all of these things. That is not happening. That is not the reality of what is happening.

These people are allowed to fish and the handliners are being restricted. They are not being allowed to fish. It does not make sense that we allow these huge boats that carry these big chains or drag these big nets to fish every day of the week but the handliners are being restricted to one or two days and sometimes not even that.

We have a real problem and the bill does not address that problem. The government is out of touch with reality. It is becoming obvious to Atlantic Canadians that big central government, just like it has become obvious to the Bloc and the people of Quebec and the people of western Canada, is attempting to centralize power and this big central government grabbing this power is not the answer to the needs of people out there. That is a big problem.

What about allowing more fishermen a say in their industry? Is there anything built into the bill, any structure, whereby they can have elected boards or make their bureaucrats and politicians more accountable? I do not see it. It is not there.

It sounds so good to have Ottawa co–ordinate all this stuff. I think it is just another euphemism, another excuse for more big government.

The bill also makes it possible for special interest groups to influence the minister and the bureaucrats to get their way. That is probably happening already at this time.

• (1725)

The government could have done things like extend the 200–mile limit to solve some of these problems, but they are not in here. The teeth for this I do not find in the bill.

In Canada there are over 6,000 department of fisheries officials managing 65,000 licences. It sounds just like the department of agriculture, a huge number of bureaucrats. The fishermen do not warrant such numbers.

The department operates with a budget that exceeds $750 million to administer it. Clearly there is room for a little cost cutting at the very top, and not simply increasing the fees of the fishermen. Perhaps the minister could lead by example and save a little money on his office furniture. That was a concern; maybe one less oak table could have helped one more fisherman in Atlantic Canada. It would say the minister and the department are not treating the fishermen with absolute disdain if there were some cutbacks made by him and by the department.

It is adamantly clear the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is not committed to downsizing his bloated department. He would rather try to slip a new level of bureaucracy into his department under the guise of broad consultation rather than deal with the harsh realities of downsizing.

Has the minister not got the message? Canadians want less government. Everywhere I go they repeat government members should be listening but they are not. Canadians want less government.

What the Atlantic fishermen tell us in no uncertain terms is their distress over the licensing fees for Atlantic Canadian fishermen is a very serious matter. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans wants to collect $50 million in access fees from the fishermen who ply their trade in the waters off the coast of Atlantic Canada.

These fees are just taxes, as I have already explained. No matter how the Liberals dress them up they are simply more taxes. Fees are nothing new to the industry but it is irresponsible for the government and the minister to subject the fishermen of a region already devastated by mismanagement to further hardship.

These people are having a rough time. They cannot afford this. Talk to them when they have to increase their fees from less than $100 to four times that amount. Some of them will have to pay up to $16,000 if they want to fish in certain parts of the industry.

It is ridiculous that a government would expect them to come up with that kind of money. That is more than their net income in an entire year. This tax will only make things worse for the fishermen. It will be an unbearable burden on all fishermen from coast to coast, not just the people of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland or P.E.I.

The tax increase will be enormous. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans collects about $13 million in licence fees and its goal is to increase this to $50 million, three to four times the present amount. That is totally unacceptable.

Any Atlantic Canadian MP who speaks up for the fishermen in his or her own riding knows well they may end up in political oblivion. The bureaucracy that has developed within the Liberal Party, within this Ottawa bubble, has made it so that the common people cannot even have their voice heard.

Another problem is that in the future any decisions made on the new fees will be through governor in council decrees without parliamentary scrutiny. We saw the same thing on gun control, Bill C–68.

The minister gives himself absolute power to make these regulations, to do these things behind closed doors. That is not acceptable in this day and age. We need to open things up. We need to give the fishermen a voice in what is happening in their own affairs.

What message does this send to Canadians on the accountability of government? Governments need to be more accountable and I do not see it happening in the bill. I wish I could go on. I appreciate the time I have had to represent the people of New Brunswick. I hope the government will listen.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): It being 5.30 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

IMMIGRATION ACT

The House resumed from May 29 consideration of the motion that Bill C–316, an act to amend the Immigration Act and the Transfer of Offenders Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak on Bill C–316 today. I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for Cambridge for his efforts in this regard.

The intent of the bill is simple: non–citizens convicted of serious criminal offences in Canada should be deported. There is nothing earth–shattering in this idea. In fact, it is currently the law of the land.

Bill C–316 attempts to bring some certainty to the process by having the deportation incorporated into the offender's sentence. I can see why the hon. member for Cambridge found it necessary to try to bring some certainty to the process. It is not there now.

Many who have spoken in opposition to the bill, including the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, have stated that what we have in place now is more than sufficient. The reality is that there are major deficiencies in our present legislation, even with Bill C–44. On occasion these deficiencies have outrageous and tragic consequences.

I would like to advise the House about a current case taking place in British Columbia. On September 23, 1993, Hector Lopez–Tello, a Guatemalan refugee claimant, was convicted of drug trafficking and ordered deported. He was allowed to remain in Canada while he appealed the deportation order. On April 28 of this year Francisco Castro, a refugee claimant from El Salvador, was also ordered deported after being convicted of drug trafficking. He was also allowed to remain in Canada while he appealed. On May 7 Lopez–Tello, Castro, and a third refugee claimant were arrested and charged with the second degree murder of 24–year–old Matthew McKay. The three murder suspects appear in court on October 16 of this year.

Meanwhile, McKay left behind a wife, a 16–month–old daughter, and a mother who wonders about Canada's justice system and immigration system. She should wonder. How does a man like Francisco Castro get to continue to walk the streets of Canada when, according to an IRB spokesperson, he had an extensive criminal record for trafficking in a narcotic?

We provide the man with refuge and instead of thanking us he involves himself in the drug trade. When he is ordered deported he takes advantage of the numerous appeals available to refugee claimants and walks the street a free man. Meanwhile, a young man is murdered and leaves behind a wife and child.

If ever the hon. member for Cambridge needed an example as to why his bill should succeed, this is it. If Lopez–Tello and Castro had been deported immediately after their drug trafficking convictions, maybe Matthew McKay would still be alive today.

Most Canadians think that we should be deporting these individuals. Less than a year ago I included the following question in one of my householders: Should immigrants or refugees convicted of serious offences be automatically deported? I received 2,829 responses to the survey, of which 2,744 people, or 97 per cent, said yes. Only 61 people, or 3 per cent, disagreed. That shows us the support that is out there for such legislation.

The Canadian people have traditionally been generous in welcoming new immigrants to this country. We welcome people from countries all over the world to come to Canada to start new lives. We welcome legitimate refugees fleeing war and oppression in their homelands. However, Canadians' hospitality does not extend to criminals. Those who enter Canada illegally, with criminal records, or those who commit serious criminal offences once they arrive in Canada should not expect an equally generous reception. Those with criminal records prior to their entry to Canada are inadmissible; thus, they should not even be in this country. However, those who commit serious criminal offences in Canada have violated the basic agreement of their welcome to Canada. In exchange for a safe haven or the opportunity to start a new life that Canada offers refugees or immigrants, we have every reason to expect these individuals to obey the laws of our land. If they do not, they have sent us a clear message that they are not prepared to live up to their end of the bargain. Why should we feel compelled to allow these individuals to remain in Canada when they are telling us that they are not going to play by our rules? The deportation of these individuals should be automatic—end of the argument.

This brings us back to Bill C–316. Many of those who have spoken before me have pointed out some of the technical flaws of the bill. Yes, there are problems, but nothing that cannot be corrected by amendments made at committee or report stage.

The intent of this bill is sound. It deserves the opportunity for further hearing.

It is important that this House send two important messages. The first message should be sent to immigrants or refugees intent on committing serious criminal offences: If you commit a serious crime, on top of the other penalty that you may receive, you will be deported. The second message needs to go to the Canadian people, and that is that this Parliament is intent on ridding Canada of foreign criminals. This is most important.

Although those immigrants and refugees who commit serious crimes are a very small minority, they receive all the headlines. Canadians become outraged when they see the difficulty we have in deporting these criminals. It ends up bringing the entire immigration and refugee program into disrepute. Thus, we have to show Canadians that we are prepared to get rid of these few individuals who adversely affect the reputations of all immigrants and refugees.

Passing Bill C–316 will demonstrate that we are prepared to deal with the issue and deal with it quickly. It deserves a full and comprehensive hearing. Those in favour of the bill and those opposed should have the opportunity to appear before the committee and present their views. From there the committee can make whatever amendments necessary to make this a workable piece of legislation. After all, if the government made over 80 amendments to Bill C–68 at report stage, and that was its own legislation, we should have no problem in amending this bill. Those who are convinced that the final product is not acceptable can still vote against it at third reading. However, it deserves the opportunity to pass second reading and go to the committee.

I urge all members of this House to consider the bill carefully and to give it their support at second reading.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Madam Speaker, before I get into the specifics of the bill I would like to take a minute to talk about my colleague, the member for Cambridge.

Many of you who sat in the previous Parliament or two Parliaments ago would remember that the member for Cambridge, Mr. Chris Speyer, Conservative member of Parliament, devoted most of his time to issues related to securing safety in the streets and law and order in this country. In fact he distinguished himself in this House working on such issues and later he was appointed to the Federal Court of Canada.

Our colleague, when he was elected in the last election, had a tremendous challenge in front of him, quite frankly, to fill those shoes. It is obvious that in less than two years he has already, on behalf of the community of Cambridge, filled those shoes and gone beyond. I think that today's bill is not only representative of the feelings and views a lot of his own community has, but it is also a representation of what I know most of the people in my community in downtown Toronto feel. It is a bill that my community would want supported.

I salute my colleague from Cambridge for a tremendous effort in bringing this private member's bill before the House.

It is great to see that the Reform Party members are getting behind this bill. It is very rare that a member can bring to the House of Commons a bill and achieve such all–party consensus. That is a great achievement for a member of Parliament in his first term.

• (1740)

Bill C–316 has a personal appeal to me because the parents and a lot of the relatives of Georgina Leimonis lived in my riding. In my downtown Toronto riding there are more members of the Greek community than any other community outside of Athens. Our community was deeply disturbed by the tragic death of Georgina. This is a very specific example of why this bill must be passed, must go to committee, must be properly amended and made the law of the land.

Bill C–316 enables the court, in addition to any other sentence, to order the removal of a non–citizen convicted of an offence punishable by 10 or more years. It accelerates the deportation process and would save Canadian taxpayers money, because two separate hearings, immigration and sentencing, would not be needed. This bill does not apply to anyone who arrived in Canada prior to 16 years of age.

Today in our correctional service system, our prisons, there are non–citizens who are using this defect in our current law, and it is costing the taxpayers of Canada close to $50 million a year. Conceivably, for the same group who are in our prisons today, that same group, without any increase, over the term of a government we would be talking $250 million.

When the fiscal framework of this country is in such tough condition and we are all trying to the best of our ability to be frugal and to cut and eliminate waste and duplication, it seems to me that alongside the basic justice in the bill there is also an economic factor that has to be looked at.

If we did not support this bill it is not inconceivable that within two or three years it could cost the taxpayers of Canada $150 million a year to look after non–Canadians who have criminal offences as part of their record and who are abusing our laws. I believe this is another factor in the equation.

Another thing I believe we must understand is that the member for Cambridge did not just listen to his own community and members here; he went to other organizations. I want to quote specifically from a letter he received from Victims of Violence, the Canadian Centre for Missing Children: "Mr. Peric's bill focuses on those immigrants who have committed serious criminal offences, sometimes violent. His bill distinguishes the criminals from the overwhelming majority of law–abiding immigrants. Those convicted of offences punishable by 10 years or more should be deported from Canada as quickly as possible. Victims of Violence would like to congratulate Mr. Peric on his efforts. On behalf of the Canadian public and the many crime victims we serve throughout Canada, we would like to thank him."

CAVEAT has written a similar endorsement. The Canadian Police Association has written to support the bill of the member for Cambridge.

• (1745)

I urge all members to look into the bill. We have a unique opportunity to get behind it in committee. As the member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, the immigration critic for the Reform Party, stated earlier, the bill has some flaws that can be amended in committee. However the overall thrust or the overall approach is right. I urge all members of the House to get behind the member's bill.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak this evening on Bill C–316. As has been pointed out by many hon. colleagues who have already spoken to the bill, there are a number of problems with it. However the private member bringing it forward did not have access to a battery of lawyers or experts in the departments of justice or immigration to point them out.

The role of private members is to bring good ideas for legislation forward. It is the role of the House and the committee to which it is assigned to improve it and make it workable. In this case I believe the member for Cambridge has focused the attention of the House on a problem Canadians want to see solved. It is now our job to ensure the bill makes it to committee where we will have the benefit of the expertise of departmental officials who have been studying the issue. I am sure the hon. member would agree to changes that maintain the spirit and intent of the bill while making it legally defensible.

Canadians want non–citizens who commit abhorrent crimes deported. It is our duty as their elected representatives to ensure the bill does not get buried in committee. We must send a clear message to other criminals who believe they are living in a land where there are relatively light consequences for breaking the law.

If we have the political will we can overcome any road blocks. By failing to act in an expeditious manner to treat the deportation of non–citizen criminals as a high priority, the government is not acting in the best interest of the safety of Canadians.

Canadians want to see criminals dealt with decisively. They will be much more willing to accept the fact that the vast majority of immigrants respect our laws if they see a government commitment to immediate deportation of those who break them.

I have heard Liberal colleagues across the way say that sentencing foreign criminals to deportation would be cruel and unusual punishment under the charter. Frankly, if they do not respect any of our other laws, they can exercise their charter rights somewhere else in the world.

The charter of rights has an implied charter of responsibilities. We already treat non–citizens differently by denying them the right to vote. We already deny convicted criminals the freedom of mobility. I do not think it is beyond the spirit or intent of the charter to deny non–citizens convicted of violent crimes or drug trafficking the right to remain in Canada.

In the meantime too many criminals are tying up our legal system and slipping out the side door while we bend over backward to apply the charter to protect their rights. The charter seems to be the only piece of legislation some criminals are aware of. Our charter is supposed to be a shield to protect the rights and freedoms of Canadians, not a sword to be used against us by criminals who do not respect any of our other laws.

In the time remaining I should like to focus on a couple of matters I believe should be looked at when the bill goes to committee. One problem is the section that allows for the deportation of dependants. This clause must be looked at. For example, what if the non–citizen was convicted of first degree murder of his or her spouse. We would hardly want to deport the children with the convicted parent. We would want to consult with family and friends to determine the safest home for them, be that in Canada or in the country of origin.

It has also been argued that by having the sentencing judge issue the removal order it makes deportation a punishment rather than merely an administrative option available to the government.

The objection is then made that we are not treating non–citizens the same as citizens and therefore they are being doubly punished for the same crime. That objection can be dealt with. The sentencing judge could be responsible for delivering the crown's administrative decision that deportation proceed. Then we could eliminate the inquiry stage.

The bill also prevents appeals through the immigration appeals division. It is trying to make sure non–citizens do not disappear between the end of their prison sentence and the immigration appeal hearing.

For example, in August, Montreal papers reported the story of Patrick Baptiste who was under deportation orders for drug dealing but not surprisingly failed to show up at the hearing when his appeal was rejected. The police caught up with him a few months later. Only this time he was implicated in planning a murder. Now that his deportation appeal has been rejected, I hope when he finishes his current jail term he will not be given a chance to escape again.

His is not an isolated case. According to a Gazette article a special task force made up of RCMP and immigration officers has identified 1,888 convicted criminals ordered deported who remained here. Twelve hundred were serious criminals, liable to more than 10 years imprisonment. Those are ones the bill is trying to deal with. As of August one–third had either left the country or had been deported. Another third, 671 of the 1,888, had appealed their deportation orders or claimed refugee status and a further 300 are still missing.

Despite eliminating a right to appeal through the immigration appeals division under clause 3 of section 32.1 unfortunately the bill adds an automatic appeals process under the Criminal Code. This would certainly have to be amended should the bill go further.

By allowing an automatic appeal hearing it would actually be a small step back from the Bill C–44 changes and I do not believe Bill C–44 went far enough. In addition to violent offenders, non–citizens who are habitual criminals should also be denied the right of appeal.

I view the three years before a landed immigrant takes out citizenship as a probationary period. Canadians have welcomed them into our house and have given them the opportunity to become part of our family. If they do not respect our laws they have broken their contract with us.

Why do we wait a minimum of three years before granting citizenship? Is it just so new immigrants have time to learn the name of our Prime Minister or how many provinces there are? Surely we place greater value on Canadian citizenship than that.

Habitual criminals, drug traffickers and violent criminals are not welcome. How many times should someone be allowed to break our law before we show them the door? When we show them door because they have committed a serious criminal offence in Canada, they should not be allowed to come back in.

Just today the paper reported on a criminal who has been deported from Canada five times at an average cost of $50,000. That is $250,000 taxpayers have had to pay for this one case. He was first granted landed immigrant status in 1975 and by 1976 had been convicted of theft. He was deported in 1984, 1985, 1986, 1987 and 1988. Then he came back in 1990 and claimed refugee status. Now he is an arsonist, setting fires in public malls.

I am encouraged to see that immigration officials have taken the unusual step of trying to appeal his refugee status. The problem is that other criminals we deport also come back claiming refugee status. This is a loophole Bill C–316 does not plug.

Even the UN High Commission for Refugees does not support asylum shopping. That is exactly what it is when people who have already been deported return to Canada claiming they are refugees.

During 1993–94 according to Correctional Service Canada there were over 1,000 foreign nationals serving time in our prisons. At an average cost of almost $46,000 this amounts to almost $50 million. The auditor general estimated the real cost of maintaining someone in prison was closer to $80,000. This means it costs taxpayers around $80 million to keep foreign nationals in prison every year.

To put this in another context, the entire immigration department including enforcement, settlement, language training for new immigrants and so on has been ordered to cut $54 million from its budget over the next couple of years.

Despite the problems the member has made a valiant attempt to address a serious issue. Let us take the bill to committee where we will have the advice and expertise of departmental officials and counsel to improve it so that we can bring it back to the House.

Immigration officials are studying ways of streamlining deportation of criminals, but it could be another year or two before the minister brings a comprehensive plan forward. Let us work on the problem now using the bill before us as the vehicle.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I too want to congratulate the member for Cambridge for bringing forward Bill C–316 and to compliment him on his efforts to try to deal with what I consider to be a justice issue and a law and order issue.

I probably should not say it this way, but I approach support of the bill with some trepidation because I see Reformers are also supporting it, which means that if they are I must be wrong. At the same time the bill is a positive effort. I am hopeful once it gets to committee and has the chance to have the shared view of many that the improvements necessary to make the bill function properly will be put forward.

I believe all of us are in accord that the direction, the aim or intent of the bill is a proper one, one all of us in Canada would like to see happen.

If I may I would like to read the summary of the intent of the bill. It captures where the member for Cambridge wants us to go and reflects the intent of most Canadians.

It says:

> If a person is convicted of an offence punishable by 10 or more years imprisonment and is or is seeking permission to remain in Canada, but is not yet a citizen, a court may, on application by the prosecution, order in addition to any other sentence, that the person and anyone dependent on that person be removed from Canada. Such an order discontinues any other process, procedure or appeal under the Immigration Act and any other right to parole or any other early or temporary release.

We are not talking about trying to take away anybody's rights. We are not trying to do anything different except streamline the process. Rather than dealing with the criminal justice aspect and then turning around and going through the procedures under the Immigration Act, the legislation empowers the judge to deal with the issues together, as he has heard the evidence of the case, and to decide whether or not deportation should be part of the decision.

That approach is a proper one. There are some constitutional or charter of rights issues that will have to be dealt with. I am sure some other fine tunings are necessary.

At the same time the object of the bill warrants that it goes to committee and that it has the necessary input from all concerned so that in the end result we will have a stronger situation that provides necessary protection for Canadian society.

We have heard recounted in the debate over the last number of hours some of the horror stories that have occurred. Those are horror stories for sure, but perhaps they also point to some of the flaws that presently exist in our law. The bill is aimed at trying to resolve some of them.

The bill has received support from a number of agencies and organizations in Canada. To name a few, the Canadian Police Association, CAVEAT and Victims of Violence are organizations that watch what is happening in the criminal justice system and for the flaws that may be present. When we achieve their support I believe we are moving in the proper direction. Therefore, a committee study of this legislation should go a long way to helping protect Canadians.

Others have talked about the actual cost associated with this process. In the years 1993–94 there were over 1,000 foreign national offenders serving time which cost the taxpayers of Canada roughly $46,000 per prisoner.

Obviously with this bill we are going to save a little money. I do not think that should be the motivation for the legislation. The protection of society and the proper administration of justice should be the foundations, but we also can look at the financial aspect of this particular bill and see the merits associated with it.

It is a proper bill for committee study. It is a bill aimed at solving a problem which is of concern to Canadians. I again congratulate the member for Cambridge. He has done a tremendous job in his efforts to correct a situation he saw in his riding and from what he heard from his constituents, but also to represent the views of many Canadians across the country.

Ms. Roseanne Skoke (Central Nova, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I rise today to debate at second reading Bill C–316, an act to amend the Immigration Act and the Transfer of Offenders Act.

Congratulations to my hon. colleague from Cambridge for bringing forth a bill to amend the Immigration Act that will take steps to ensure that those who came to this great country Canada and refuse to abide by the laws are not permitted to stay. This bill if adopted will make Canadian streets safer.

Canada has a proud tradition and reputation not as a country that merely tolerates immigrants, but rather as one that welcomes them with open arms. It is no secret that this great country was built by immigrants and that the vast majority of people that come to this country today continue to make an honest and meaningful contribution to our ever evolving Canadian society.

The law has always recognized that serious criminality is grounds for deportation and the Immigration Act provides the mechanism to facilitate this. Bill C–316 in no way attempts to undermine or contradict the current Immigration Act but rather to improve, streamline and broaden some of the regulations that exist in the current act.

It is important to recognize that this government is concerned about addressing serious crime by non–citizens and has taken steps to ensure removal of these types of offenders. This past spring the House passed Bill C–44 which limited the rights of serious criminals to appeals under the immigration system. These offenders will also no longer be eligible for any form of early release or parole.

Bill C–316 if adopted will complement the accomplishments of Bill C–44. The bill will fill in many of the cracks and loopholes that still exist between sentencing and the deportation hearing. Bill C–316 will permit a court at the time of sentencing of an offender convicted of a serious offence with a penalty of 10 years or more to make a deportation order at the same time. Offenders may appeal within the criminal process but will no longer have access to the appeals process under the Immigration Act.

There have been concerns that this process may be an infringement on the rights of the offenders, but this bill does not create any new or special offence or any new distinction between citizens and non–citizens. The distinctions already exist under the Immigration Act. The offender is already subject to criminal sanctions and deportation. Bill C–316 merely puts both matters in the hands of the courts. There are also two important additional measures contained in this bill worth noting.

First, the bill addresses how to proceed with offenders who came to Canada at an early age. It is recognized that many people immigrate at an early age and for one reason or another have not become a citizen. For this reason there is a provision in the bill that would exempt a person who has immigrated to Canada prior to their sixteenth birthday and who has had no criminal convictions in five years previous to the offence in question.

Second, the bill provides for the transfer of offender by court order to their country of origin to serve their sentence if the reciprocal conditional release provisions exist. Under the Transfer of Offenders Act, a transfer can currently happen only upon the request of the offender. This bill removes the decision from the offender and places it in the hands of the judge.

In this bill, as in many private members' bills intended to amend existing legislation, there are procedural and substantive issues which arise. Several of my colleagues raised some of these concerns today during debate. Issues to be addressed relate to the procedure of deporting dependents of convicted offenders, the training that will be necessary for judges in these cases and the possible constitutional challenges.

We must keep in mind that what we are debating here is the principle of this bill. No one can argue that the intent and principle of the bill is not valid and that we as legislators have a responsibility to develop and enact legislation that will make Canadians safer. Bill C–316 will achieve this principle.

The hon. member for Cambridge has expressed his willingness to work in co–operation with the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and the standing committee to address any procedural or substantive concerns that may arise.

I restate my support for Bill C–316 in principle and call upon my fellow parliamentarians to do the same. The member for Cambridge is attempting to make the streets safer. The people of Canada deserve no less.

Mr. Julian Reed (Halton—Peel, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I rise with pride to endorse Bill C–316 and to offer congratulations to my colleague the member for Cambridge who recognized a problem that exists in the system as we have it today. He has dealt with it in such a way that it looks as though with the endorsement of the House it will go on to become law.

We would be remiss if we did not reflect a little on why a debate on a private members' bill can become as important as it has in this session. Those who are new here will not see any difference, but those who have been involved in political life and parliamentary procedure in the past years realize that historically private members' bills hardly ever, if ever, have seen the light of day. They have been a medium for debate and probably have established some tone of opinion among parliamentarians, but they had no chance of becoming law.

To the credit of this government, now private members' bills do have a chance to become law and they are subjected to a free vote so that everyone in the House can deliver their opinion. We now have private members' bills, some applying to law and order issues, which have been introduced by thoughtful members of the House and are moving on to become part of our justice system.

It is interesting to note an article which appeared in the Toronto Sun on September 17, written by Sean Durkan of the Ottawa bureau. He talks about the quiet war on crime that is being waged by the present government. It is not big headline grabbing stuff, but little by little the Minister of Justice is clawing away at the loopholes and flaws that are present in the judicial system. He said: "The Liberal government has actually done more to toughen up the system in two years than the previous Tory government did in nine". That should go on record to show that the government has taken the issue of law and order very, very seriously.

Laws of this nature do not get introduced and are not made without some reaction to an incident or occurrence. Of course that is the evolution of virtually all law over, above and beyond our Constitution. When bills are passed in the House they are passed because some situation has arisen. This is an evolutionary process. It goes on. We who serve here for our brief time have an opportunity to contribute.

It is only in this 35th Parliament of Canada that we have had the opportunity as private members, or backbenchers as we are called, to be able to make a solid contribution to the way these laws unfold and the way the legislative system progresses. It makes these bills very important to the life of Canada. I know that members as a result assume far more personal responsibility when they introduce bills of this nature.

I congratulate all of the people who participated in the debate. I believe everything that could have been said on this subject has been said. Now is the time for us to take it to the next stage, shepherd it through and ensure that our efforts are not wasted, so we will see in due course in the slowness of the democratic process, this becoming part of our legal system and making a great contribution to it.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I wanted to take a few minutes to speak on this bill and perhaps in a peripheral way to raise an issue which should be of import to members of the House. I want to bring the following to the attention of members.

I see in the bill a provision whereby the effect of the proposed legislation would not apply to people who were less than 16 years of age when they came to Canada. That is an important issue and I want to talk about it a bit, particularly because I have a constituency case where such an incident occurred. It is roughly the following. I will change the ages ever so slightly to ensure that I respect the privacy of the constituent in question.

I was approached by the family of a constituent who came to Canada when he was two years old. He lived in this country and when he was an adult he committed a crime. The incident was something like a brawl in a bar and he was charged with assault causing bodily harm. It was very serious. The victim nearly died.

My constituent was incarcerated, served his time and was eventually released from jail. He was reintegrated into society and led a normal life. He found a job and so on. Three or four years later when everything was behind him, the authorities came knocking on his door to inform him that they were commencing procedures to deport him.

The difficulty is the individual had never seen another country in his life. I am dealing with this case right now and I have brought it to the attention of the minister.

When we come across the easy cases, particularly in the popular press when some person has come to Canada, has abused the laws of this country and therefore, we should kick him or her out, it is of course generally a proposition I agree with. But it is not always that easy. The case I am bringing to the House today is to illustrate that sometimes it is a lot more complicated.

[Translation]

To take the example of someone who came to this country when very young, aged two, then that person is actually a product of Canada, if we can use that term. If that person has developed criminal tendencies, he or she certainly did not have them on arrival in Canada when less than two years old. That is the first proposition.

• (1815)

The second is, if that person is deported, deported to where? Any country is like any other, because the person has never been anywhere except Canada.

Third, if we as a society do not want other countries shipping their criminals here, why should we take ours and ship them elsewhere? I say ours because I consider someone who was only two when he came here to indeed be one of us.

I am taking up the House's time to explain this because the problem lies not in this bill but in the present statute.

I trust that when the parliamentary committee studies this initiative—and I congratulate my colleague from Cambridge for having presented it to the House—it will look at the entire problem at the same time.

I have just been speaking with a colleague who tells me that someone he knows very well has in fact defended cases similar to the one I have just described here in the House.

[English]

As a Canadian, as a parent and as a member of the House, my gut feeling is always that when someone commits a crime and is not a Canadian we should do our best to send them back. That is still generally true in what I believe.

I caution the House and invite colleagues, particularly those who sit on the committee, to think of the peripheral issues I have just raised because they are very real and they do affect many people.

I thank hon. members in advance for their study of the bill. I congratulate the member for having brought this issue to the attention of Parliament.

Mr. Janko Peric (Cambridge, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I take this opportunity to briefly thank all the members who have spoken on my private member's Bill C–316.

I understand certain members have some concerns with particular elements of the bill. I assure them their concerns can be addressed through amendments at the committee stage.

I urge my colleagues to support Bill C–316 at this stage in the process. I look forward to working with them in making this an even better piece of legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

(Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a committee.)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): It being 6.20 p.m., the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

OCEANS ACT

The House resumed from September 28 consideration of the motion that Bill C–98, an act respecting the oceans of Canada, be read the second time and referred to a committee; and on the amendment.

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I join with those in support of Canada's oceans act this morning.

Last November the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans released a document setting out the potential elements of an oceans management vision for Canada. The government sought the advice of all Canadians and the message was loud and clear: the federal government has a leadership role to play in oceans policy. Federally, ocean related responsibility has been fragmented and there is a need for focus in order to meet the needs of all Canadians.

Several key oceans programs are being brought together under one department to promote synergy in operational policy development, to eliminate duplication and overlap and to provide a more efficient and effective service to Canadians.

In recognition of these principles, the Canadian Coast Guard was merged with the Department of Fisheries and Oceans last April. This merger has already improved the government's ability to manage and protect Canada's oceans and marine resources and has strengthened its commitment to marine safety.

This merger decision was not taken lightly. The decision to seriously consider a merger was made in mid–October of 1994. A study of the proposal was conducted by a joint program review initiative by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and the Canadian Coast Guard, with input from the Department of the Environment, the machinery of government, the Privy Council Office, the Treasury Board Secretariat and Natural Resources Canada.

The purpose of the study was to propose measures to strengthen the policy and program framework and policy delivery capacity for the administration of Canada's oceans.

The goal was, first, to ensure the environmental protection and sustainable development of Canada's oceans resource; second, to provide essential marine safety services; third, to foster efficient and competitive commercial and other marine activities in Canada.

The feasibility study was completed in November 1994 and it confirmed that a merger of the two organizations could result in a number of benefits at the policy and program level.

One of those benefits was improved policy development and direction of the environment and response to the United Nation's Convention on the Law of the Sea. Another was increased effectiveness with respect to fisheries management, enforcement, marine safety, environmental response and one focal point for industry.

With the merger, DFO has assumed responsibility for coast guard marine operations, including search and rescue, marine communications, vessel traffic services, aids to navigation, icebreaking and pollution response.

The Canadian Coast Guard and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans have many things in common. They have similar backgrounds and traditions. They have similar operations and marine policies and they both share similar views on improving ocean management.

While becoming the principal marine of the new Department of Fisheries and Oceans, the coast guard brings to the organization a reputation for distinguished service from coast to coast.

Collaboration is not new to the government. The coast guard and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans pull together as a strong team in responding to the Grand Banks fishing dispute on turbot. The coast guard played a valuable role in helping solve this dispute and one for which all Canadians are most grateful. Together the coast guard and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans demonstrated their commitment to preserve and protect our fisheries resources when others wanted to continue their destructive practices.

This merger can serve only to enhance Canada's efforts in conserving and protecting fishermen, fish and our marine environment. Together they now have a combined fleet size of 148 vessels, including 42 offshore vessels that will improve coverage in the area of search and rescue, as well as the ability to move more aggressively toward a tougher conservation regime through increased enforcement activities.

This will allow the maintenance of the frontline enforcement presence while strengthening surveillance, fishing enforcement and environmental protection activities. The coast guard has a well earned reputation reflected in its motto: Safety First—Service Always.

Both DFO and the coast guard are strong organizations with a common history of working in the marine environment and with shared goals and interests in ocean safety and environmental protection. Together they are building a stronger and more effective department.

With the merger, Canada has the opportunity to become a world leader in oceans and marine resource management.

To make our oceans vision a reality, we need to manage Canada's oceans and major waterways so that they are clean, safe, productive and accessible to ensure sustainable use of our fisheries resources and to facilitate marine trade and commerce. We need to build on our understanding of the oceans so that we can be more responsive to the changes and priorities.

With this merger we will be better able to deliver marine safety services effectively and efficiently while maintaining high national standards. Issues such as boating safety and licensing, marine navigation infrastructure, safety systems and emerging technologies, levels of service as well as user fees and other cost recovery mechanisms must be addressed.

As I pointed out, Canada's ability to manage and protect its oceans has improved with this merger. Amalgamation of the two fleets has increased offshore enforcement capabilities on both the east and west coasts. I am convinced this merger forms a very strong partnership that will streamline oceans management in Canada. I am delighted to speak in support of Bill C–98.

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by pointing out that Bill C–98 before the House today on second reading is a typical example of the kind of bill I like to discuss.

Indeed, it will give me another chance to show Quebecers it would be both useless and dangerous to leave Quebec's development under federal control.

Consider the endless jurisdictional squabbles that would be generated by the passage of this bill. My colleagues from Laurentides and the Gaspé have already discussed this but I feel I must say more on the subject, at a time when Quebecers are about to make an important decision on their collective destiny.

The bill starts by identifying, in Canadian domestic law, Canada's jurisdiction over its ocean areas. To do so, however, the text merely incorporates provisions of the Canadian Laws Offshore Application Act and the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act. Since the legislation I just mentioned has not been amended in any way, this part of Bill C–98 is redundant. Especially since Canada's sovereignty over its ocean areas is recognized by the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, of which Canada is a signatory.

Part II of this enactment is supposed to provide for the development and implementation of a national oceans management strategy based on the sustainable development and integrated management of oceans and coastal activities and resources. This is, in fact, one of the most ambitious attempts by the federal government to invade jurisdictions over which it has no authority and which it would be folly to cede to the federal government.

According to officials from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, Part II of the bill could have been dropped, since it does not give the Department of Fisheries any new powers to manage a national oceans strategy. According to the preamble, the purpose of the bill is merely to encourage the minister to collaborate with his colleagues on identifying a strategy. Obviously, the minister cannot assume the authority to manage a strategy that has yet to be defined.

In the light of the foregoing, I wondered why the government bothered to table a bill that apparently is no more than a series of good intentions.

A closer look at the bill gave me the answer. First of all, the bill identifies two classes of intervenors in the process of implementing a national oceans strategy: the federal government and interested persons and bodies. In other words, provincial governments are considered on a par with any lobby group. This is one way of telling Canadian voters that "if you voted for the right side, we will consider what your provincial government wants".

• (1015)

In the case of lobbyists, particularly major ones, this government tells them "If you contribute to our slush fund—the slush fund of the right party—our government will lend a much more attentive ear to your concerns". For examples of this we need only think of the role of the Liberal government in the case of Power DirecTv or the purchase of MCA by Seagram, the sale of Pearson airport, and most recently the privatization of Petro–Canada. We have learned just this week that the sale of federal shares in the latter will be handled by Gordon Capital of Toronto, the Prime Minister's former employer. It will be remembered very clearly that, when it came time to vote on a private member's bill on public funding of political parties, the government opposed it in order to be good and sure to go on playing the little game of "he who pays the piper picks the tune".

The parallel to be drawn between businesses contributing to the right party fund and voters supporting the right party is obvious, particularly since there is no obligation for the minister to follow any recommendations by the governments of Quebec and the other provinces.

Similarly, sections 31, 32 and 33 of Bill C–98 empower the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to develop and implement a national management strategy for estuarial, coastal and marine ecosystems. Such a strategy will require a number of elements to be created. First, activity management plans; second, administrative or consultative bodies; third, a number of programs; fourth, environmental standards; fifth, scientific data gathering and analysis on the ecosystems concerned.

These are already functions of either Environment Canada or the provinces. We have seen that the minister is seeking through this act to encroach on the provinces' influence over the environment. Thus, the only useful purpose that we can see in this bill is to invade areas of provincial jurisdiction.

It is also worthy of note that the bill before us, as I have already pointed out, will enable the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to encroach upon areas over which the Minister of the Environment has jurisdiction. Like my colleagues, I wondered why cabinet failed to see that and I concluded it was doubtless because, when the Minister of the Environment tries to invade Quebec's area of jurisdiction, she can be seen coming so far off in the distance that the job had to be given to someone else.

The fact that the minister is not obliged to come to an agreement with the provinces, which have a keen interest in the management of the marine environment, is both incomprehensible and unacceptable.

I would also like to point out that the environment is not one of the areas of jurisdiction the constitution attributes explicitly to one level of government in particular. It is what they call an ancillary jurisdiction and is subordinate to those jurisdictions the constitution explicitly mentions.

In theory, the Department of the Environment is responsible for the administration of this ancillary jurisdiction in co–operation with each of the departments concerned.

Until the mid 1980s, the Government of Quebec, which has jurisdiction over local and territorial matters, played a leading role in environmental matters, occupying the largest part of the field of jurisdiction. The federal government limited its involvement to areas relating to its jurisdiction, as the constitution provides.

After 1985, the federal government began to meddle in environmental matters. It did so primarily by virtue of its spending power and the new powers the courts had accorded it. That was the beginning of many instances of duplication and overlap. They continue to exist and have grown more numerous since the election of the present Liberal government, which is trying to centralize decision–making in Ottawa. The Government of Quebec considers Bill C–98 another step toward centralization.

In 1988, the Supreme Court of Canada, which Mr. Lévesque likened to the tower of Pisa, always leaning the same way, took management of the marine environment and surrounding territory away from the provinces and gave it to the federal government in a decision of four justices to three.

With Bill C–98, the federal government is trying to get the most out of this decision. Quebec fears that this centralizing tendency means the federal government will sooner or later claim management of the waters and the use of the tributaries to the coastal estuary and ultimately all fresh water rivers on the pretext that the contaminants in these waters are a source of degradation of the marine environment.

There is currently a great deal of overlap and duplication in federal and provincial environmental regulations. As a result, private businesses very often have to spend time, money and energy on many things such as collecting information on the many government programs, providing the two levels of government with the required data, participating in the various advisory committees and subcommittees in charge of regulating the industry, preparing for the inspections carried out alternately by the federal government and the province, and complying with the requirements of both governments.

In this regard, the toxic waste regulations are a convincing example. At this time, eight federal regulations overlap similar regulations that already exist in Quebec. Let us take, for example, the storage of PCB material regulations and the pulp and paper effluent regulations. Quebec sovereignty would effectively end this duplication.

Although it must recognize that it can no longer afford to take environmental action, since cuts of 32 per cent over three years were announced in its last budget, the federal government continues to usurp the role of the provinces in setting national standards and priorities. The new Environmental Assessment Act that came into effect in January 1995, which encroaches directly on provincial jurisdiction, and the eco–government policy in which the federal government favours relations with citizens and the private sector rather than with the provinces are striking examples of this kind of attitude.

On the face of it, the federal government has noble objectives and respects these areas of jurisdiction but, in practice, it bypasses the provinces, forcing its agenda on them and effectively taking over provincial responsibilities.

Bill C–98 adds fuel to the fire as the federal government, despite its financial situation, allows itself to create new structures to protect a particular ecosystem.

Bill C–98 sends an ambiguous message. It seems to reflect a concern for marine ecosystems while at the same time taking away from the Department of the Environment part of its responsibilities and treating provincial environment ministries on the same basis as the industry or municipalities. Will Fisheries and Oceans withdraw just like Environment Canada? It is obvious that Environment Canada is becoming a policy generating department instead of taking real actions—the Irving Whale is a case in point—mainly for budget reasons.

This leads to a number of problems. Here are the main ones. First, environmental concerns must clearly be identified by the grassroots. Policy coming from Ottawa is less likely to be suited to local circumstances, let alone be endorsed by the community. In fact, it has become increasingly clear that efficiency in terms of the environment is dependent upon a sense of ownership at the local level. For real progress to be made the people must be concerned about their rivers and marshes, their environment.

Second, one of the federalists' arguments for centralizing environmental management is that pollution knows no boundaries, travelling from one province or state to another. Acid rain and river pollution are good examples of that.

The federal government is apparently the only one who is able to legislate with efficiency and make international agreements, and to take a holistic approach in order to provide global solutions to global problems. Also, it is unthinkable that the minister not be required to work together with EC officials, as my hon. colleagues from Laurentides and Gaspé said earlier. Unsatisfied with creating jurisdiction conflicts with the provinces, the federal government has now set out to create jurisdiction conflicts between its own departments, all this in a context of fiscal restraint.

Once again, we have before us a bill which, like many others before, is designed to centralize it all in Ottawa.

[English]

I have much respect for my friends from the Reform Party because they say what they think and they think what they say. They are the only ones actually to speak about decentralization. They are pretending to offer decentralization for the good of all the provinces, including Quebec. I think that would be a good thing and I think they are really serious about it.

• (1025)

However, in that offer somewhere is a catch 22 because my friends in the Reform Party will never form any government in Canada as long as Quebec is a province. Quebec holds the balance of power in the country as far as the vote is concerned and Quebec will never vote Reform. It is not because we hate Reformers; we love them very much. It is because our philosophies are too far apart. We just have to look at our positions on gun control, gay rights, bilingualism and on all of the bills which have been presented to the House. Most of the time we and the Reform Party have voted differently.

My friends all know the country will soon hit the wall. They all know we are going bankrupt, as it was said in the Wall Street Journal not so long ago.

An hon. member: The second richest country in the world.

Mr. Pomerleau: We need a change and a fast one. My friends in the Reform Party should realize they should support the sovereignty of Quebec. I hope sincerely that somewhere down the road my Reform Party friends will finally see the light on their way to Damascus and find within themselves the courage to follow the logical path of their reasoning and bring it down to the right conclusion.

Most Canadians have actually come to three assumptions about Quebec: first, we are a bunch of troublemakers, never happy with what we get; second, we receive much more money from Canada than what we give to Canada; third, the economic disaster in Canada is partly due to the political instability in Quebec. If those three assumptions are right, then the sovereignty of Quebec should normally be seen by all Canadians as a good way to solve the problem once and for all and make money out of it, providing of course that we assume our fair share of the Canadian debt.

That is exactly what we intend to do through the negotiations which will start after the yes vote, although by all international rules and regulations Quebec has no legal obligation to take any part of the debt. Four studies were produced for the Bélanger–Campeau commission. Two were done in Canada, one in England and one in France. Those studies all came to that conclusion.

In 1994 David Crane in the Toronto Star stated: "Canada's foreign creditors would not want to transfer part of Canada's debt to Quebec. This is money they loaned to Canada, not Quebec".

That helps Quebec in a way. It means that Canada would have to reach an accommodation with Quebec since Canada cannot force Quebec to take its share of the debt. The article continued: "Technically Quebec could walk away from its share of the debt".

In the Gazette on December 13 William Johnson said: "Ottawa would suddenly lose one–quarter of all its taxpayers, but would be responsible for the entire national debt, some $600 billion, nearly half of which is held by foreigners. Ottawa signed for the loans so only Ottawa is responsible before the creditors. Legally, Quebec would have no obligation to pay anything".

In spite of all this, we are offering to all Canadians that we will assume our fair share through negotiations. It is a shame the Prime Minister of Canada is refusing to negotiate. It jeopardizes Canada and Quebec at the same time.

Canadians should have the right to run their country the way they want without having to please Quebec at each moment. The referendum which will be held quite soon in Quebec will have an answer: yes or no. If it is a yes vote, and I think it will be—

Because every Quebecer remembers full well what Mr. Bourassa himself said, that status quo would be the worse solution for Quebec, and what we are being offered is exactly that, the status quo.

[English]

If it is a no vote what will happen? If it is a no vote we are back to square one. Fifteen years of constitutional debate to the next referendum. Nobody wants that.

• (1030)

I quote perhaps the greatest political analyst ever produced, Mr. Yogi Berra: "It ain't over till it's over". It will never be over with Quebec until we win because the Parti Quebecois and the Bloc Quebecois do not exist to support an idea. They exist because there is an idea to be supported.

Bill C–98, and I will conclude on this, demonstrates Ottawa's will to centralize, which permeates every bill. I would like to point out to my hon. colleagues that, in almost every committee we sit on, the Bloc Quebecois has had to produce minority reports each time Quebec's jurisdictions were at risk of being encroached on.

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, before moving to questions and comments, let me say that I find it very regrettable for my constituents, many of whom are fishermen who work hard, to hear the opposition, and in particular a member representing an urban riding, say with such arrogance that the federal government is responsible for the problems in the fisheries sector.

What I find even more regrettable is that the member probably never set foot on a fishing boat, does not know that sector, and did not bother to meet fishermen and see for himself that these people are honest, hardworking people.

I find that regrettable and I think it is an insult to the intelligence of fishermen and plant workers from the Gaspe Peninsula and the Magdalen Islands to say that the only way to solve the problems related to fisheries, including dwindling stocks, is to become sovereign. The opposition is exceedingly arrogant when it makes such comments.

The fisheries sector must, to a large extent, rely on close co–operation with the provinces: New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and, of course, Quebec. But I can tell you that the federal government is also involved. It is there to look after the real interests of fishermen by protecting the integrity of Canada's 200–mile zone. What the Parti Quebecois and the Bloc are actually proposing is to close these 200 miles, this natural access, to Quebec fishermen, if that province becomes an independent country.

I find it regrettable to hear opposition members tell us that we will reduce the fishing rights of Quebec fishermen by 60 per cent in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the Atlantic Ocean. The opposition did not even consider the ocean perch industry, for example, which will resume its activity some day, but our fishermen must fish that stock along the Nova Scotia and Atlantic shores. Unfortunately, the opposition does not take that into account.

It is only concerned with sovereignty, with independence at any cost, and that is what I find regrettable. The opposition could not care less about the plight of my constituents. I invite opposition members, and particularly their leader, to come to the Magdalen Islands and to tell us that they are prepared to protect the real interests of Quebecers—

Mr. Pomerleau: Mr. Speaker, before replying to the hon. member, I want to tell him that I was born in Val–d'Espoir, in the Gaspe Peninsula, about two minutes away from his riding. I spent all of—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dubé: Mr. Speaker, he used the word "traitor".

An hon. member: He must apologize.

Mr. Dubé: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I heard the word clearly. You may not have heard it, but everyone on this side heard the member use the word "traitor".

Mr. Gagnon: Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the comment. However, I invite the member to go back to the Gaspe Peninsula and withdraw his own comments.

The Deputy Speaker: It seems that the hon. member has withdrawn his comment.

Mr. Pomerleau: I am glad the hon. member opposite, who seems to think he is the only person from the Gaspé in this House, withdrew what he said.

• (1035)

I was indeed born in the Gaspé, in Val-d'Espoir, and my family still lives there. I know all about the problems of the fishermen down there. I also spent my holidays in the Gaspé, on Chaleur Bay in the hon. member's riding, and I have seen for myself what the problems are.

The hon. member mentioned the economic future of this country, Mr. Speaker. We want the sovereignty of Quebec for economic reasons. I remember when in 1980, at the time of the first referendum, Mr. Bourassa told us, and this will conclude my speech: "If you say yes to the sovereignty of Quebec in 1980, you can expect a lot of debt, taxes and unemployment". So people decided they should vote no. They did, and we remained a Canadian province. The federal debt rose from $80 billion to $600 billion; the unemployment rate practically doubled; the number of welfare recipients doubled; our young people no longer have a future, and we are still in Canada.

I think the hon. member should do his homework, visit his riding again and check with the people there, because in the Gaspé we are going to win.

[English]

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, there appears to be a warm wind blowing from this side of the House.

I was interested in hearing the remarks of the member from the Bloc. He made some statements with which I do not agree and I have some questions for him.

He suggested the Reform Party was honest in its approach. I agree with him that we are being direct and honest in our approach. He also suggested it is unfortunate that we are in a catch 22 situation. While the people in Quebec can identify with the aspirations of the Reform Party because we represent the aspirations of people in other regions of Canada, the Bloc feels that we will never have the opportunity to form a government because philosophically we are miles apart.

When the gun control legislation passed through the House we were approached by organizations in Quebec representing 1.2 million law-abiding gun owners in Quebec who could not get representation in the House or at the committee meetings.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: I would ask hon. members, especially those who were here during the previous Parliament—the people of Canada must think we are pretty silly. I would ask members to show some courtesy to their colleagues who have the floor, and the hon. member for Skeena has the floor at this time.

The hon. member for Berthier—Montcalm, on a point of order.

Mr. Bellehumeur: Mr. Speaker, I realize his microphone was not turned on, but since a few minutes ago, the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine has been uttering threats at me. I would like him to withdraw what he said, as well as his invitations to step outside the House. After all, this is not a kindergarten. I would like him to withdraw what he said.

Mr. Gagnon: Excuse me, Mr. Speaker, I never threatened a single member in this House, and I would invite the member to withdraw, because today I have heard nothing but personal insults from the opposition.

I only invited the junior member of the opposition, who is my age, to talk about this in a civilized way outside the House, and I invite him to do so now.

Mr. Speaker, I never uttered threats at anyone in this House.

Mr. Crête: Mr. Speaker, this may be a matter of interpretation, but the gestures he made earlier along with his invitation to step outside, anywhere, anytime, were self-explanatory. In other words, the hon. member wanted to settle a matter in a way that is unacceptable in this House.

The Deputy Speaker: In the circumstances, I will again recognize the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General of Canada.

Mr. Gagnon: Mr. Speaker, this is not a school yard. This is the House of Commons. And as I said, if the hon. member has anything to tell me personally, I would invite him to do so outside, that is all, to settle this matter once and for all.

However, to say that we are threatening members of the opposition—I think it is unfortunate the level of debate should sink so low.

Mr. Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I also witnessed this incident, and I can confirm to the House that the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine actually invited my colleague to step outside and fight.

Mr. Speaker, I think we have had enough of these denials of what happened and these attempts to convince others that this was not the case. It was. He invited my colleague to step outside of the House and fight.

• (1040)

The Deputy Speaker: My colleagues, I did not hear the words we are discussing now. I will review the blues, the minutes of the proceedings, and if I see anything, I will get back to it later in the House, if necessary. For the time being, we must take the hon. member at his word. The member for Skeena has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Scott (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, to finish my remarks before we get into school yard tactics here, the hon. member from the Bloc was suggesting the Reform Party would never form the government. I beg to differ with him. I feel genuinely sorry for those members because they earnestly believe they will achieve their goal. However we all know they will not.

When the people of Quebec vote no in the referendum on October 30, they will then be looking for alternatives and the Reform Party is the only political party on the national landscape right now that offers serious alternatives.

Members of the governing party have a vested interest in keeping the debate ongoing for the rest of their lives because there is a political gain in it for them.

The Reform Party has a completely different vision of that, a completely different point of view. If the Reform Party gets the opportunity to form the government, which we believe we will in the next federal election, there will be an opportunity to discuss a new federal arrangement with all the provinces, not just with Quebec.

Mr. Pomerleau: Mr. Speaker, I fully understand the trouble in the minds of my friends in the Reform Party, but it is a reality, it is a fact, that within the country there are three major voices. The first one goes to Ontario, the second one to Quebec due to the demographic compilation, and the third one goes to westerners. In my own opinion it is a shame. Even the Liberal government is always calling the Reform Party the third party because that is the way it is.

I sincerely think westerners should have a real say in Parliament. They should be entitled to run for power, which is not the case actually.

My friend suggests that if the no wins, the Reform will probably form the next government. However, if the no wins, for a short period of time the Prime Minister of Canada will be seen as the saviour, Captain Canada, and he will be elected again. We will be here too. To have the potential to take power the Reform Party must assume that it should support the sovereignty of Quebec.

Hon. Raymond Chan (Secretary of State (Asia–Pacific), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have been sitting here listening to the complaints of the hon. member of the Bloc, the official opposition.

There are two points I would like to clear up before I deliver my speech. It is sad for me to see in the House that both the Bloc and the third party are seeking an alliance and to see the Reform Party trying to ask for friendship from the separatists. I could not take that.

An hon. member: That is not true. Tell the truth.

Mr. Chan: You were not here to hear the praise that was offered by that party.

As an immigrant I came to this country at the age of 17. My family went to Hong Kong and I came from Hong Kong to Canada. I came to Canada as it is. To hear the separatists day in and day out in the House trying to destroy the country that I came for is very sad.

There is also another point. The hon. member from the Bloc was talking about the provincial rights the bill infringed upon. This is not true. There is no change with respect to provincial rights. Where a province has rights today it will continue to have rights after the bill is law.

What all provinces and territories along our coast will gain is the federal government's commitment to work together with them to ensure an integrated approach to providing greater protection of our marine environment, improve the management of our ocean resources, and ultimately better economic opportunities for our coastal communities. The Bloc's accusations are not true.

I am pleased to join my colleagues and members of the House in the second reading of the oceans act. I rise today in support of this legislation, which will establish major new rights over the oceans that surround our country. Canadians pushed hard in the councils of the world for the opportunity to establish these rights. The new zones grant Canada powers that go well beyond the powers our country asserted in the past.

As the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans said, Canadians are not naive. We know that the oceans act will not forever end maritime disagreement with other countries. There are undoubtedly bound to be some problems in the future with our circumpolar and Pacific and Atlantic friends and neighbours.

What the act will do is put in place a clear definition of jurisdiction that is fully supported by global agreement. The world recognizes Canada's jurisdiction over Canadian waters and now we must continue to work hard. With ownership comes both opportunity and responsibility. With jurisdiction comes stewardship. With respect for the efforts of the past comes respect for the needs of the future.

For all of the excellent co–operation that went into establishing oceans jurisdiction, the truth is that Canada's policies for actual management of oceans were fragmented. The same spirit of partnership, co–ordination, co–operation, and innovation that enabled Canada to gain authority over ocean resources must now be used to manage those resources.

We have before us the task of making sure that the pieces all fit together: conservation and commercialization, deep ocean research and cold ocean rescues, emergency responses and sustainability, navigational safety and national security, national goals and regional initiatives, resource restoration and job creation, inspection and protection.

There are pieces of the puzzle that seem to grow larger and larger in size and importance: climate change, ecotourism, aquaculture, Arctic pollution, interrelationship of species, expanding human population, new technologies.

The oceans themselves are constantly fluctuating. They are independent, living ecosystems. Yet they are interconnected and linked with one another and with the entire global environment. Just as in the tropical rain forests, there are yet unknown medicines to be found in the oceans and yet unknown dangers to be faced.

The oceans act defines a new vision for Canada's oceans. It allows for the development of a new management regime to protect its oceans. This is a regime based on co–operation, collaboration and partnership. It allows the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to enter into collaborative agreements and partnerships with all stakeholders to implement this ocean management regime.

The oceans act does not attempt to create a fully developed ocean management strategy. It recognizes that we must work collectively. The bill before members of the House of Commons creates the jurisdictional foundation and some of the policy framework so that all Canadians can build the strategy together.

We must have a better understanding and knowledge of the oceans. Science must be multi–disciplinary. Partnership across organizations and disciplines and sectors of society is essential. Precisely because our ocean jurisdiction is so huge, our ocean sciences must be on the leading edge. Better information is essential for better decision making. Better science is essential for economic viability and ecological sustainability. Canada's credibility in future ocean negotiations and future ocean trade will depend on the quality of our science.

The oceans act is tailored to increase, co–ordinate, and disperse scientific, environmental, and management information relating to our oceans and their resources. Marine resource management will be an important policy element in the building of a successful oceans strategy. Traditionally governments have carried out their responsibilities in consultation with stakeholders but not in partnership with them. The distinction is critical.

The old way must change and it is changing. The Atlantic Fisheries Resource Conservation Council now brings together industry, academia, and government to make recommendations on fishery conservation and the federal government now follows through on those recommendations. The time has come to expand such partnerships beyond fishery conservation. The oceans act makes it possible to expand partnerships even further to encompass marine plants, underwater exploration, seabed mining and a vast range of development activities that could impact in a marine environment.

A key element of an effective oceans strategy must be the consideration of environmental consequences in management decisions. It will take time, effort and compromise to accomplish this, but Canada needs a functional ecosystems approach to oceans policy. Such an approach must converge across lines of jurisdiction and economic sectors. The issues of environmental concern must be addressed through a range of tools, including coastal zone management, pollution prevention, marine environmental quality indicators and guidelines.

Another key element of a successful oceans strategy is the facilitation of marine trade, commerce and development. It goes without saying that icebreaking, fish inspection, marine navigation services and ocean mapping have priorities in ocean trade and commerce. So do new ocean laboratory partnerships, technology development, regulatory harmonization and resource assessment. This synergy of collective interests and integrated capabilities is recognized in the act and is exemplified in the new Department of Fisheries and Oceans.

The increase in Canada's oceans jurisdiction marries well with the merger of the Canadian Coast Guard and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. The new organization will be comprised of the principal civilian marine operational component of the Government of Canada. We will be able to realize efficiencies, streamline operations, integrate the operation of the coast guard and fisheries fleets and promote multi–tasking. All of this will help us to work more effectively to provide high national standards and effective services.

For years we have supported commercial enterprises in the Arctic. We have ensured and will continue to ensure the safe movement of millions of dollars of cargo through ice filled waters. We have provided sophisticated analysis in the operation of the St. Lawrence.

Commercial enterprises must have easy access to government data. We have to ensure that new ideas and technologies are transferred from government researchers to the private sector.

The expertise that Canadians have developed in forging oceans policy can be and should be the backbone of extraordinary new global market opportunities. That leads directly to a key element of an oceans management strategy, international relations. From the days when others denied John Cabots's discovery of the new world to the days when others denied Canada's right to protect the turbot, international relations have been centre stage in Canada's maritime saga. Canadians have shown that fisheries conservation will never be sacrificed on the altar of economic trade or political relations. We have shown that conservation is not a bargaining chip in a larger game. Our responsibility now is to make this legislation the turning point in our approach to all international ocean issues.

Canadians need to establish a strong and credible international strategy to carry our messages on marine pollution from ships, on the control of ocean dumping and coastal zone management with our neighbours. Circumpolar oceans management, spill response assistance, international shipping, offshore energy, precise territorial boundary delineation and emerging high seas issues will all require thoughtful leadership by Canadians globally and thoughtful examples by Canadians domestically.

Support from all Canadians for Canada's international actions is of enormous importance. I look forward to the active involvement of Canadians in forging Canada's position on emerging global ocean issues.

As the minister stated on Tuesday, the oceans act signals renewed federal leadership for oceans management. It signals the federal government's commitment to a comprehensive and co–operative approach to oceans policy. It signals that shared information, shared planning and shared oceans stewardship are the wave of the future. It signals that Canada and Canadians are prepared to act in making the most of our ocean assets, opportunities and obligations.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have to respond to the initial comments of the parliamentary secretary as he described his reaction to this whole Bloc–Liberal fight that is going on this morning.

Somehow he is trying to tie in some association between the Bloc Quebecois and the Reform Party. When he is making that kind of an analogy, how does the minister reconcile the fact that when it comes to acquiescing to the Bloc and it comes to electing vice–chairs, when it comes to making sure that the water is never rippled it is always the Liberals making a deal with the Bloc?

The idea that the Reform Party somehow has any similar vision to the Bloc is crazy. We have repeatedly said the Bloc Quebecois will be defeated, hopefully at the end of the month, that it will hopefully lose its reason for being here, which would be another sweet treat. It surely has the wrong vision about how to fix Canada.

I agree with the minister when he says Canada is a great place. It does need some changes though, and the way to change it is not to leave but to work within the system to make a better decentralized Canadian federation that can be better for all Canadians.

The goal of the Reform Party—

The Speaker: My colleague, I noticed you were getting wound up. I thought I would give you a chance to catch your breath and come back at it right after question period, when the minister will also have a chance to get wound up.

It being 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5) the House will now proceed to Statements by Members.

ELLEN FOUNDATION

Mr. Wayne Easter (Malpeque, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. John Willoughby, who has been working diligently for several years on a project called the Ellen Foundation.

In the late 1800s and early 1900s, a farm emigration policy on juveniles was established between England and Canada. This agreement brought 100,000 English children to Canada to work as farm labourers. These children came to be known as "home children".

Mr. Willoughby has just launched his book entitled Ellen –The Story of a Home Child who was sent to P.E.I. Ellen, as it turns out, was the inspiration for Anne of Green Gables by Lucy Maude Montgomery.

The Ellen Foundation is dedicated to assist home children and their descendants to establish and locate their roots in the United Kingdom, to preserve the history and heritage of the home children, and to provide the information here and abroad on their story and their strong contribution to the building of Canada.

I congratulate John and wish him much success.

DIVISION OF NATIONAL DEBT

Mr. Maurice Godin (Châteauguay, BQ): Mr. Speaker, according to Robert Fairholm, an economist from a prestigious American firm, the financial markets will force Canada to quickly negotiate division of the debt and to maintain the existing economic ties between the two partners. He says that they will be seeking each other out to sign such an agreement.

Since Canada has the worse external debt among the G–7, foreign investors will obviously want to protect their investments by forcing Canada to negotiate with Quebec. The financial markets will be there to cool down the emotions of those involved.

It is hard to believe that the Minister of Finance for Canada is incapable of grasping this and keeps saying that Canada could not negotiate a new partnership with Quebec even if it wanted to.

If the Minister of Finance forgets his duty as the manager of the Canadian debt, and if he forgets where the interests of Canadians and Quebecers lie, the financial markets and one of the worst debts in the western world will be there to remind him of that duty.

MAJOR BRUCE HENWOOD

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday one of our Canadian peacekeepers, Major Bruce Henwood, was injured when the jeep he was riding in hit a mine in Croatia. As a result Major Henwood had both legs amputated below the knee.

It is this unfortunate and horrid type of incident which underscores the dangerous and perilous duties performed by our peacekeepers working abroad. Major Henwood is one of many Canadian peacekeepers serving abroad who comes face to face with this kind of reality every day.

On behalf of my colleagues from both sides of the House I extend to Major Henwood, as well as his family, friends and comrades in the field, our heartfelt regret over this tragic incident and our sincerest best wishes for his recovery.

DAY CARE

Mrs. Jane Stewart (Brant, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I draw to the attention of the House a concrete example of our government's commitment to day care.

In my riding of Brant we have day care centres attached to two of our local high schools. They provide care to the children of single adolescent parents who are continuing their education and to the children of mature students who are also parents.

Our thinking here is that if we provide appropriate day care to the children, their parents will continue with their education, which is so important to their future in terms of getting a job and in some cases to breaking the welfare trap.

Unfortunately because of significant provincial government cuts these facilities faced closure on October 1. Thanks to the quick action of my colleague, the Minister of Human Resources Development, we found funding through the human resources investment fund to keep the facilities open.

I congratulate him on recognizing the direct and important link between day care, jobs and education, and thank him for allowing us to continue this unique and effective day care strategy.

WAR MEMORIALS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, within the past two weeks I have had the honour of attending the official unveiling of two important plaques commemorating Canadians who served overseas during the first and second world wars.

On Thursday, September 21 a plaque was unveiled at the National War Memorial, a gift from the British people as a symbol of their abiding gratitude for Canada's support during both World War I and World War II.

On Tuesday, September 26 Lech Walesa, President of the Republic of Poland, approved the posthumous award of the Polish Home Army Cross to 26 Canadian airmen for their support in the liberation of Poland.

That ceremony took place at the Canadian Airmen Memorial in Ottawa at Confederation Park. Both actions and plaques serve as a permanent reminder of Canadian bravery and sacrifice in the protection of freedom, democracy and peace.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

Mrs. Karen Kraft Sloan (York—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am standing here to support the member for Churchill in his initiative to organize a sacred assembly. The assembly would bring together aboriginal and non–aboriginal spiritual leaders to begin a process of healing and reconciliation.

Spirituality, as the member says, has been the missing element in the political process to reclaim native land and the right to self–government. Spirituality has sustained native people for generations. The importance of spirituality was demonstrated during the recent standoff at Gustafsen Lake where a peaceful settlement resulted through the interventions of a native spiritual leader.

• (1105)

The member for Churchill has urged all his colleagues in the House to support his initiatives. I urge my colleagues to do the same.

QUEBEC TERRITORY

Mr. Bernard Deshaies (Abitibi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Bloc Quebecois is very pleased with something said yesterday by the provincial member for Vaudreuil and the leader of the No side, Daniel Johnson. Commenting on the Cree referendum, he again indicated his total agreement with the basic principles of international law and therefore with the position of the sovereignists concerning territorial integrity. He clearly affirmed that Quebec is indivisible.

It is to be hoped that the eminent good sense in his words will reach the ears of his federal counterpart, the hon. member for Vaudreuil, who suggests that the people of West Island and those in West Quebec could hold their own referendum, like the Cree, with a view to breaking up Quebec. Let us be a little more serious here. The Republic of Baie d'Urfé does not seem to us to possess all of the characteristics required of a state, particularly in international law. Would the Liberal members for Vaudreuil on the two different levels please take the time to get their act together?

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the publication Agriweek sums up the opinions of thousands of prairie producers affected by the Crow buyout. I quote:

> The buyout exercise—is turning out to be distressingly like other government clerical undertakings: disorganized, confused, rigid, user unfriendly. Whoever designed this could not have had even a passing acquaintance with the workings of prairie agriculture and no one with experience in such things could have been consulted.
> Except for the agriminister's admonition a fair arrangement should be made, there has been no guidance of any sort as to what would be fair and the payments office has scrupulously avoided giving any advice. Neither owners nor tenants could know what others were doing.
> The landlord–tenant split of the payment will go down in history as among the most bizarre rules of any government farm program ever invented, as well as a source of owner–renter friction for years to come.

Prairie farmers know Liberal agricultural policies and programs usually end up a wreck.

INFORMATION HIGHWAY

Mr. Rey D. Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I commend the Information Highway Advisory Council for its excellent report published Wednesday by the industry minister.

The council's vision for the Infobahn of the future is distinctly Canadian. It will be a powerful engine to promote Canadian culture and identity, make government more accessible and accountable, create new wealth and new jobs for the benefit of all Canadians and make Canada's health and educational sectors models for the rest of the world.

I am also pleased to see that the council's recommendation for dealing with illegal content such as hate propaganda mirror the intent of the motion I introduced in the House last January, which was adopted without dissent.

No doubt when these recommendations are fully adopted by the government we will have a guarantee that the information highway will be a highway of harmony, not of hate. No doubt we will have an effective tool to forge a renewed partnership among all levels of government as we face the social, political and economic challenges of the 21st century. I ask all colleges in the House—

COMMUNITY OF RUSSELL

Mrs. Marlene Cowling (Dauphin—Swan River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the government is creating a climate of opportunity for rural Canadians and the people of Dauphin—Swan River are seizing these opportunities to diversify their economies and create jobs at home.

In particular I commend the people of Russell who are forging ahead with an ethanol plant that includes a gluten extracting component and a feedlot operation. Within the same community another group is working to develop a ski hill. The belief the community has in itself and in its future is clear.

I am pleased to be working with both these groups to help them achieve their goals.

I commend the people of Russell and area for the leadership role they are playing in diversifying their local economy and their enduring commitment to their community. It is this community spirit, this commitment to the future, that will ensure Canada remains one of the best countries in the world in which to live.

DIVISION OF NATIONAL DEBT

Mr. Paul DeVillers (Simcoe North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in his inaugural speech delivered to Quebec's National Assembly on November 29, 1994, the PQ premier said: "Today, I would like to conclude a pact of joint responsibility and solidarity with every Quebecer. Our government will collect from everyone what is owed to the public purse—but in return, we ask each Quebecer to help us put an end to the mad race toward illegality".

This righteous pronouncement by the PQ leader was not reflected in the comments made yesterday by his finance minister, who suggested that an independent Quebec might not pay his share of the national debt.

The time has come for the PQ leader to set the record straight and to tell us clearly and unconditionally whether he intends to assume his share of the debt if Quebec separates.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it seems that the group of business people supporting the No side has finally seen the light. Indeed, at a one–day conference of the Association du centre mondial de commerce, the chairman of the Canam Manac group, Mr. Marcel Dutil, made the following statement: "If it is yes, we will turn the page and carry on. We are all Quebecers, we are all nationalists, we all have different opinions, and the day after the referendum we will remain in Quebec".

Mr. Dutil's speech is in sharp contrast with the downright inexcusable and despicable comments made with regard to Quebecers by Messrs. Beaudoin and Garcia.

This common sense approach by the Quebec business leaders supporting the No side does not seem to be shared by Mr. Dufour, chairman of the Conseil du patronat du Quebec. While commenting Hydro–Quebec's withdrawal from his organization, he Dufour made veiled threats to Mr. Martineau when he said: "From now on, he will have to look for friends". End of quote. This type of insinuation must stop, and Mr. Dufour could learn a thing or two from Mr. Dutil about respect for Quebecers and for democracy.

ALLIANCE QUEBEC

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, before the quiet revolution, there were people in Quebec saying: "Keep quiet, stay there, and speak English". We do not hear that line in Quebec any more, but thanks to Alliance Quebec, it can now be heard in Alberta. Yesterday, in Calgary, Alliance Quebec warned the Reform Party to keep quiet during the referendum campaign.

The people of Alberta are aware that Alliance Quebec is an organization without public support, a front funded by the federal government to fuel misunderstandings between francophones and anglophones in Quebec and elsewhere, for partisan purposes.

The message from the Reform Party that Alliance Quebec does not want people to hear is that a No vote is a vote against separation while saying No to the status quo means no more subsidies for groups like Alliance Quebec.

If Alliance Quebec really wants the No side to win the referendum, they should keep quiet and remain in Alberta, where they could speak English all day long, like in the days before the quiet revolution.

DIVISION OF THE FEDERAL DEBT

Mr. Robert Bertrand (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the PQ Minister of Finance has just sent a troubling message to the people of Quebec regarding the debt load an independent Quebec would have to carry.

Instead of coming across as and acting like a serious and responsible administrator, the PQ government's finance minister has decided to add to the uncertainty surrounding statements made by the Bloc leader by asking: "When Mr. Martin says that negotiations will be impossible, does it mean that he will shoulder full responsibility for the debt?"

Are we to understand from what the minister said that a PQ government might decide to stop paying its debts, while at the same time expecting its taxpayers to continue paying all their taxes? Is that the new concept of tax fairness that would be applied in an independent Quebec?

DIVISION OF THE FEDERAL DEBT

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in his budget speech, the PQ Minister of Finance announced that he was declaring war on "tax offenders". He said: "Before thinking about increasing the taxpayers' burden, we must make sure that everyone pays the government what they owe".

This is the same minister who, on February 8, made the following comment about the division of Canada's debt should Quebec become independent: "This is not our debt. It is Canada's debt". Yesterday, speaking before a student audience, he suggested that a separate Quebec may not assume its share of the debt.

How much confidence can the people of Quebec put in a finance minister who publicly tells taxpayers: "Do as I say, not as I do". On October 30, the people will say No to this kind of double talk.

WORLD SUMMIT FOR CHILDREN

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today marks the fifth anniversary of the World Summit for Children. Under the leadership of Canada, 70 nations pledged that by the year 2000 they would eliminate illiteracy, reduce malnutrition by half and provide universal access to clean water around the world.

This year UNICEF reports that as a result of the summit four million children in the third world will not only survive but will become full productive members of society. However more needs to be done since 13 million children are still likely to die each year for lack of basic health care and safe water.

I rise today to salute the excellent work of Results Canada which continues to promote the summit ideals. As a government we must continue to step up our efforts to ensure that the basic needs of all children worldwide are met by the year 2000.

THE GRUMMAN GOOSE

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in March 1994 I rose in the House to call on the government to delay the sale of the Grumman Goose while a dedicated group of Canadians in Prince George raised money to keep it in Canada.

This RCMP plane was built in 1944 and can land on water, snow or ground and has logged over 24,000 flying hours. It has seen service on both coasts, in Ottawa and the high Arctic. It has been used for drug busts, surveillance, rescues and air shows in addition to ferrying people and equipment.

I am pleased to report the federal and B.C. governments listened to the Save the Goose committee. Through the committee's efforts this piece of Canadian heritage has been saved for the enjoyment of future generations.

Today at 3 p.m. a retired RCMP pilot will formally hand over the log books of the Grumman Goose to the National Aviation Museum. I invite all members and the public to attend the ceremony.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Quebecers will decide their political future on October 30. In order to make an enlightened choice, they are entitled to know the whys and wherefores of the two options before them: sovereignty–partnership, on the one hand, and the status quo, on the other.

I am therefore asking the Prime Minister if he and his ally, Daniel Johnson, will agree to take part in a real four-way televised debate with Jacques Parizeau and myself. Does he recognize that it is all the more vital he take part in such a debate because he alone is in a position to tell Quebecers what exactly awaits them if they vote no?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very surprised, having known Mr. Parizeau for so many years, that he is suddenly losing his self-confidence and is afraid to face the leader of the No side, Mr. Johnson.

As for me, when the Leader of the Opposition suggested last spring that Parliament be adjourned in the fall, I decided to come to Parliament to have the privilege of meeting the Leader of the Opposition every day, at every question period. We have been here for hours, and I do not refuse to answer. The leader of the No side is Mr. Johnson, I believe; he made an agreement with Mr. Parizeau. Mr. Johnson will keep his word; he will face Mr.

Parizeau. What is new is Mr. Parizeau's fear of facing Mr. Johnson.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we never asked that the House be adjourned. We were immediately delighted to learn that we could talk with the Prime Minister every day and converse about the future of our respective options and we will be here every day until the end.

We wanted to add to what we already have, because we only have a few seconds, which go by too quickly for my liking. I think that Canadians know full well that a question period, however practical it may be, does not provide the depth that a debate, a real intellectual confrontation on the things opposing us can give.

I think we would learn a lot more, because, had we not had the opportunity to see the Prime Minister for a number of weeks, we would not have known, for example, that he is refusing to recognize a democratic yes vote and we would not have known that he is preparing to slash the old age pensions of those approaching 65 years of age. We are learning things. The more we talk to him, the more we learn.

So we ask him, one last time, to agree to come, as the Prime Minister of Canada, and face those who do not think the way he does on television, live, for an hour and a half.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am answering all the questions here throughout the entire referendum debate. There is a leader of the Yes side, his name is Mr. Parizeau; there is a leader of the No side, his name is Mr. Johnson. The two of them reached an agreement on a debate. Mr. Johnson wants to have a debate with Mr. Parizeau. I have a debate with the Leader of the Opposition, here, every day. They try to frighten people every day, but if people want to live in Quebec and want to keep the security they currently enjoy in Quebec, the best solution, which involves no fear at all, is to vote no and stay in Canada.

The old age pensions will go on being paid out and Quebecers will be treated exactly like all other Canadians in unemployment insurance and old age pension matters. We have nothing to hide, but the Leader of the Opposition, instead of telling Quebecers why he wants to separate, used a new term today—sovereignty–partnership—to try once again to hide the truth. They will invent another one soon, more change, more illusion. Let them say the truth: "We want to separate from Canada". Quebecers want to stay in Canada and they will say so. This is what they will say in the vote on October 30.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we live in a democracy, and democracy needs enlightened opinion. One of the most crucial moments in any electoral or referendum campaign is when the protagonists with the highest profile meet face to face before the public and debate the merits of their options for an hour and a half or two hours.

Could it be, as Canada and Quebec face their destiny and as the people of Quebec make a fundamental decision, that the Prime Minister of Canada, the defender of Canadian unity, is afraid of his option to the point of refusing to take part in a televised debate of an hour and a half?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in 32 years, this is the first time I have been accused of being afraid. Really! I have had debates with the Leader of the Opposition, I have a debate with him every day. Had I been afraid, I would simply have asked you, Mr. Speaker, not to recall us in September. I was the one who insisted we be here, to give the Leader of the Opposition the opportunity, on television, every day, to tell Quebecers why he wants to separate Quebec from Canada.

And again today, he used another little term. What was it again?

An hon. member: Sovereignty–partnership.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): Ah yes, sovereignty–partnership. Another word, another change, another pirouette. Why not have the courage to say that you are separatists and we shall see clear results on October 30.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, we learned that we had to thank the Prime Minister for our right to sit in this House and, today, that we should thank him for summoning Parliament.

Mr. Bouchard: He thinks he showed courage by summoning Parliament. But that is his job.

Mr. Gauthier: Since the Prime Minister used all kinds of tricks to avoid answering the question directly, I will go back to the same issue.

I will go back to the same issue and ask him, quite sincerely and honestly, on behalf of the people of Quebec, on behalf of those who want to know what he has to offer the people of Quebec when he is asking them to vote No, would the Prime Minister be willing to take part in a debate with his boss, the leader of the No forces, and the leader of the Yes side, the Premier of Quebec, as the Leader of the Opposition offered him? Will he agree to explain his own proposal to the people of Quebec?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise every day in this House. I am not the one who passed the referendum bill.

The Quebec government's referendum bill names Mr. Parizeau as the leader of the Yes side. He is the one who challenged the leader of the No side, Mr. Johnson, to a debate. This challenge was accepted by Mr. Johnson, the legitimate leader of the Yes side, who is doing a terrific job. He agreed to a debate with Mr. Parizeau. Mr. Parizeau is now trying to get out of it. I myself face the Leader of the Opposition every day, and I am very seldom here on Fridays. But I am here today. I am still the Prime Minister of Canada with all the problems of a prime minister, but I take whatever time is needed to be in the House of Commons every day. Mr. Johnson is eager to meet with the leader of the Yes side, Mr. Parizeau, but clearly Mr. Parizeau is not eager to meet with Mr. Johnson.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the Prime Minister not agree that Mr. Parizeau, the Premier of Quebec, wants to speak with the real boss, the one who can provide answers on cuts in social programs, on the proposal that he is now hiding but that we know he has in mind? Does the Prime Minister not agree that he should participate in this debate because he will be the one shaping tomorrow's country if Quebecers dare to vote No?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do so every day in this House, and I am not trying to avoid my responsibilities in any way. We are answering the questions. The Minister of Finance gave an important speech this week. Other ministers are criss–crossing Quebec to answer questions. I myself will be in Quebec on several occasions until the referendum. However, under the referendum bill, the leader of the No side is not me but Mr. Johnson, who, as I said earlier, is doing a terrific job. I think it is obvious that, for the first time in his life, Mr. Parizeau has lost his self–confidence. This surprises me, however, because it is unlike him. He should nonetheless have the courage to face Mr. Johnson. In the meantime, the Leader of the Opposition may find the courage to tell Quebecers that he is a separatist. I myself am here and I—

Mr. Bouchard: You are afraid of Parizeau.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): It is obvious that Mr. Parizeau needs Mr. Bouchard, because he has lost his confidence. Mr. Johnson is quite capable of defending himself.

I face the Leader of the Opposition every day in this House, and he has not yet given us a single good reason why Quebec should separate from Canada.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in the last election campaign the government ran on a policy of creating jobs and growth. This year there have been absolutely no new jobs and today's GDP figures confirm there has been no economic growth this year.

Since the Minister of Finance has failed to deliver on his promised financial and economic statement what is it exactly that he intends to do?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as is so often the case, the basis for the question is without foundation.

Within the first year of our taking office this country created over 430,000 jobs. Since November of last year there have been over 230,000 new jobs created in the private sector.

Yes it is true there have been job losses in the public sector at the federal, provincial and municipal levels. I find it surprising the Reform Party would not point out that this is because governments are cutting their spending. There is a lot less job loss in the public sector than there would have been if the slash and burn policies of the Reform Party had been brought in.

We came into office intending to reverse the terrible destructive policies of the previous government, a government this member worked for. We have done it and the Canadian economy is now well poised for long term sustainable growth.

• (1130)

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I left the Conservative Party in 1986 because of economic policies such as this minister's. It is surprising that it has taken him 10 years to figure it out.

Yesterday investment dealer Wood Gundy released a scathing indictment of the government's policies on jobs and growth. According to the report, we have "experienced the weakest recovery in domestic spending in the post–war period because of high taxes and tax increases".

Would the Minister of Finance agree the country needs fiscal policies that allow for tax relief in the next budget?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when reading these studies the hon. member should read them all.

It is very clear that as a major exporting country we are affected by the declines in the economies of Japan and the United States. That is obviously going to affect us.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I have to say they sound like a cow herd in heat.

Mr. Stinson: Only you would know.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, that is parliamentary.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister should not display to us his lack of knowledge of the beef industry.

It is domestic spending that has not recovered since 1991 because federal and provincial government tax increases have pulled more than $12 billion out of the pockets of consumers, an additional $155 for every Canadian every single year.

Will the government admit that it has increased taxes because it has only rolling deficit targets instead of a firm date for deficit elimination?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, to refer back to the study, the tax increases that led to that $12 billion the member referred to occurred under the previous government, of which he was a very ardent worker until he decided to skip town.

This government, in its first budget and in its second budget, did not increase personal taxes one iota. The tax increases, of which there were 39, occurred under the previous government.

I am quite proud to say I do have a beef herd, so when I hear the Reform Party I sure as heck know what a cow herd in heat sounds like.

GOVERNMENT SUBSIDIES

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday, in response to one of my questions, the Minister of Human Resources Development stated that he would agree to support a youth project in his riding if I would vote no in the October 30 referendum. He said and I quote "I am very pleased to say that I would certainly like to give him the assurance of supporting that project if he can give me the assurance of supporting the no vote on October 30".

Does the Prime Minister not find it indecent that his minister of human resources development is formally tying funding to organizations in my area to my political opinion?

[English]

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I think what we should be focusing on from his question is what the government is doing for the young people of the country.

I had the pleasure during the summer months to introduce the summer job action plan, which created over 44,500 new jobs for young people.

The hon. member should be a bit more consistent with what he is saying. On the one hand, when we introduced the program he said that we were intervening into provincial jurisdiction. On the other hand, in a letter written to the minister he asked us to support a project that deals with Youth Service Canada, a project that he said was intervening in provincial jurisdiction. It is clear that we have a confused bunch on the other side.

[Translation]

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would say that the parliamentary secretary is the one who is confused because I put my question to the Prime Minister but he did not reply.

• (1135)

By refusing to denounce the Minister of Human Resources Development who linked funding with my political opinions, does the Prime Minister not realize that once again he is demonstrating his lack of respect for democracy?

[English]

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member cannot have it both ways. On the one hand he is saying that Youth Service Canada is intervening in provincial jurisdiction. On the other hand, for young people in his riding he wants this program. He should make up his mind.

I have an idea for him. Support federalism, support a united Canada, and those kids can prosper just like every other young Canadian.

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt asked the Prime Minister to explain glaring inconsistencies in the government's pronouncements about Canada's mandate in the former Yugoslavia. The Prime Minister's response was flippant and I would like to ask for clarification.

In March the Prime Minister expressly declared that following a debate in the House the government was renewing our mandate for another six months. That time expires this weekend, but officials of both the Department of National Defence and the Department of Foreign Affairs claim that the mandate does not expire for another month or even two months.

I seek clarification from the Prime Minister. When does Canada's formal commitment to the mission in the former Yugoslavia expire? Has the government undertaken to extend the mandate that was debated in the House?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member refers to a debate in the House, and I remember the position of the Reform Party. It was actively encouraging the government not to keep our troops in ex–Yugoslavia for the reason that progress was not being made.

I think the hon. member, with his experience, would very much appreciate that in Croatia our troops were withdrawn when the job was done, with no further ado.

Right now I think the House is entirely aware of the progress that has been made in Bosnia and how close we are to the peace process. To suggest that progress has not been made I think was wrong in the spring and it is wrong now.

Specifically, the United Nations mandate will expire on November 30. The Canadian rotation for the troops is due in mid–November. In view of the progress that has been made, the government will decide by the end of October on the future of Canadian participation.

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the issue here is not progress in the former Yugoslavia. The issue here is the mandate of our troops and the discussion in the House.

Last September and again last March the government pretended that Parliament and the people of Canada had a voice in determining our peacekeeping commitments. We remember that in March the debate was held only two days before our mandate expired. Now we find that the government is acting unilaterally, without any consultation.

Canada's peacekeepers have always been faithful in their duty and they are right now. Along with other Canadians, they deserve a clear indication of the mandate and deserve a better answer from the government than the Prime Minister gave yesterday or what I heard just now.

When does our mandate expire, and why has the government not consulted Parliament about its extension?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I remind the hon. member his colleague, then the defence critic, as a member of the standing committee, agreed to a report that in essence said that with respect to the committal of peacekeeping troops in mandates such as the one under discussion, under normal circumstances the House would have a debate. He agreed, somewhat reluctantly, that there were occasions when a debate could not take place. This may be one of them.

IMMIGRATION

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In August we learned that the government had decided to increase the rate with which it was issuing citizenship certificates in Quebec so as to allow the greatest possible number of new citizens to exercise their right to vote in the coming referendum, close to 10 000 people.

• (1140)

The Prime Minister says he would never use new Canadians for political purposes. Would he indicate to us whether this is standard practice when an election or referendum is in the offing?

[English]

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the question asked by the hon. member relates to the voting process in the province of Quebec. The province of Quebec obviously handles these matters on their own. The Canada–Quebec accord is such that it is an example of federalism at its most flexible and at its best. If the hon. member does not understand that, she does not understand the accord.

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I fear that the hon. member has not understood my question, because speeding up this process does not depend on Quebec but on the federal government.

How can the Prime Minister explain, for instance, that the processing of citizenship applications is being accelerated in Quebec at this time, but that was not the case when elections were held recently in New Brunswick and Ontario?

[English]

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member looks at the citizenship process through jaundiced eyes. The citizenship process in Canada goes on the same for those who wish to become citizens, whether they are from Quebec, New Brunswick or British Columbia. We have one system. It works well and it will continue to work well.

CENSUS

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, next year Canadians will be asked in the Statistics Canada census to identify themselves by race. Citizens will be required by law to answer this question. The question is there so that the government can calculate its racial targets for its employment equity program.

Will the Minister of Industry confirm that the government intends to prosecute Canadians who refuse to participate in the exercise of racial identification?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will know that the purpose of conducting a periodic census is to determine the composition of Canadian society. This is useful for a wide range of purposes.

On the issue of race, in the past people have made calculations based on language rather than a specific question on racial origin. This time we think the provision of fuller information will give us a much better understanding of the make–up of Canadian society. That should be beneficial for a wide range of purposes.

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Canadians answering this question will have the option of stating whether they are Chinese, Japanese, Korean, South Asian, West Asian, or Southeast Asian. However, those who want to identify themselves as Canadians will have to select the category "other". In our own country we will have to be considered "other".

Can the minister explain why the government is so adverse to having respondents identify themselves as Canadians?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the Reform Party has repeatedly both in the House and elsewhere failed to recognize that the face of Canada is one of many colours and many languages. In looking at Canada it sees it only through its own eyes and is not able to understand how varied and diverse a mosaic we have created here. This is one of the strengths of Canada. It is unfortunate it has taken this approach to what is a very simple gathering of information for very useful purposes.

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Canadian Heritage.

Recently, the president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation recognized the existence of two separate networks within the corporation, the English network and the French network. Predictably, Mr. Beatty refused to admit there were inequities in the financing of the two networks.

Does the minister agree that these inequities exist and does he intend to make up for this flagrant injustice to the French network by exempting it from the cuts announced last February?

• (1145)

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we know that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is examining and is, in fact, engaged in a thorough analysis of its budgetary requirements. On behalf of the government we have initiated a process to examine the mandate of the CBC. We will also consider the finances of the CBC in the next budget, and that is our position at this time.

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Canadian Heritage knows perfectly well that the inequities in financing between the English and French networks are obvious proof that francophones are discriminated against within the CBC, especially since the French network is far more successful than the English network in reaching its target audience and does so at a lesser cost. Would the minister at least have the courage to admit this?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I most certainly agree that the CBC's French network plays a magnificent role in developing the "francophonie" in Canada and throughout the world. I certainly agree with that, and I will do everything in my power to ensure it continues to do so.

AQUACULTURE INDUSTRY

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health.

Over the past few years the New Brunswick Bay of Fundy aquaculture industry has grown to be a $100 million industry in the Carleton—Charlotte constituency. An infestation of sea lice is threatening the industry.

What is the minister doing to fast track the approval of new drugs to control the sea lice problem in this region and save this important industry in Carleton—Charlotte?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Health Canada has received an application for registration of a pest control product called salmosan.

This application is being given priority attention. Every effort is being made to assess the product as quickly as possible. Health Canada remains in contact with officials in the New Brunswick government.

Over and above that, the pest management regulatory agency recognizes the aquaculture industry's needs and has already responded to requests by giving emergency registrations for two other products which have not proved as successful as we would have liked them to be, namely hydrogen peroxide and pyrethrum.

SOMALIA INQUIRY

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, because the Somalia commission is of pressing national concern, I address the Prime Minister regarding Mark Boland.

The commission admits that its refusal to grant standing to Private Boland violates strict logic. Further, doing so undermines the commission's terms of reference which stress that attitudes, discipline and decisions at all rank levels of the chain of command are to be investigated.

Boland's rejection sends a signal throughout the non–commissioned member community that this inquiry is by officers, for officers and discourages them from coming forward.

Will the Prime Minister uphold the perception of justice by ensuring that Mark Boland is given standing?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I believe he is aware that the commission has taken this decision not to grant standing before the inquiry for Private Mark Boland. He is also aware that the authority to grant standing rests with the commission of inquiry which is constituted under the rules of Canada and their ruling on this is publicly available for all to know.

He is also aware that because the commission is an independent, properly constituted inquiry, it would be totally inappropriate for me to comment on it and for the minister to interfere.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the reason I went to the Prime Minister was that the inquiry, as I understand it, comes under the Privy Council which answers to the Prime Minister. My question was to him.

• (1150)

The Reform Party compelled a reluctant government to undertake this inquiry. I am now gravely concerned that the commission is being unduly influenced.

Numerous generals and senior officials with only a tangential relationship to the main point of the inquiry are given standing or called to testify immediately. A lieutenant–general has been quietly appointed to head DND's liaison office to the inquiry while another is doing research for the inquiry. Yet soldiers like Mark Boland are being squeezed out.

Can the Prime Minister assure the House that the Department of National Defence is in no way attempting to suppress this inquiry behind the scenes?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we want to have a completely independent inquiry. We have appointed a board that is very competent and it will make sure that it has all the facts.

The Department of National Defence is obligated under the instruction of the government to give all the facts to the commission that are needed to get to the bottom of the problem.

CANADA COUNCIL

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage. The Canada Council has decided to go ahead with the implementation of its new development plan, despite the opposition expressed by the Quebec cultural community. As a result, there are no longer two linguistic sectors and francophones are left with no contact.

Does the minister recognize that, since Quebec's distinct culture will no longer be a factor, this decision means that requests for financial support made by francophone organizations will be like drops in the ocean?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Canada Council has undertaken an in–depth review of its structures and business plan, the main objective of which is to increase the council's efficiency and effectiveness, not to hit one group or another with punitive action. I think it can be said that the Canada Council has been and will continue to be a driving force for the development of the French culture in Canada.

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the minister at least recognize that once again francophones are the ones bearing the brunt of federal cuts? Is this not another way for the federal government to minimize and trivialize our identity as Quebecers?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will not use the argument that this is an organization operating completely at arm's length from the minister. What I want to say, however, is that there are no signs indicating that the Canada Council is discriminating against francophones. Far from it, the Canada Council is one of the strongest supporters of francophones across Canada and in Quebec in particular.

MEDICARE

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the government has no more cash for medicare, yet the demands go up. The inevitable result is thousands of people in waiting lines while the minister has one simple response: line up or shut up.

Will the minister change that response for Canadians in waiting lines?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada is this year transferring to the provinces just under $16 billion for health alone.

In return for those dollars, we ask they adhere to five principles: universality, portability, comprehensiveness, accessibility and public administration.

The Government of Canada will not compromise those principles. We remain the guardians of medicare in this country.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, medicare is splintering under this minister.

There is a Reform solution, a solution called medicare plus, medicare that Canadians love, plus choice. Will the minister consider innovation? Will the minister review medicare plus? Will the minister stop saying to Canadians to just line up and shut up?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we know the Reform agenda. It is a U.S. style, two tier system of health care. Canadian taxpayers do not and should not be expected to support a system which would use their tax dollars to subsidize queue jumping by those who can afford to pay more, that is the rich. Quite simply, it is wrong.

INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. At the International Conference of Appeal Judges which took place in Ottawa this week there was a serious discussion to establish a permanent international criminal court. Such a court would try individual cases of war crimes, international terrorism and crimes against humanity that are not now handled adequately by domestic courts or ad hoc tribunals.

Would the minister say whether the government supports such a proposal for an international criminal court?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the government does support that proposal enthusiastically. The Minister of Foreign Affairs, the Minister of National Defence and the Department of Justice have been active participants in an ad hoc committee of the United Nations which has been working since last year on this proposal. That committee will report this fall to the United Nations Security Council.

I can tell the hon. member because I know of his particular interest in this subject that the international community is making real progress toward a permanent international criminal court to deal with genocide, war crimes and crimes against humanity.

If I may add one word, at the moment there is temporarily such a tribunal headquartered in The Hague. Its purpose is to deal with those crimes against humanity allegedly arising from the conflict in the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda.

I can report to the House about something of which we should all be very proud. Two days ago I met with the chief prosecutor, Mr. Justice Richard Goldstone of the South African Constitutional Court, who reported that Canada is contributing enormously in legal talent, especially in the Rwandan cases. We should be very proud of the contribution we are making in that international effort.

BELL CANADA

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, after being forced by the CRTC to abandon its monopoly, Bell Canada is closing several test centres, business offices and telephone offices, while increasingly centralizing its operations. The company is also setting up several specialized subsidiaries to which it subcontracts work, thus changing working conditions for certain categories of employees.

My question is for the Minister of Labour. Does the minister recognize that Bell Canada's relocated workers would lose neither their union nor their vested rights if they were governed by only one labour code, that is the Quebec labour code?

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Bell Canada employees come under the Canada labour code and we are doing our utmost to ensure that their rights are protected in compliance with that code.

PORCUPINE CARIBOU HERD

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in 1987 the Government of Canada signed an international agreement with the U.S. to protect the herd and the habitat of the Porcupine caribou which migrate between Yukon and Alaska.

Now the U.S. Congress is blatantly ignoring the agreement and passing legislation to open the sensitive calving grounds in Alaska to oil and gas exploration.

My question is for the Minister of the Environment. The government initiated gunboat diplomacy against the Spanish to protect the turbot. What specific actions is she prepared to take to hold the United States to its commitment to protect this vital northern resource?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are hoping in a very few weeks to be able to sign an agreement with the U.S. Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Bruce Babbitt, to set aside the particular calving grounds in question so there will be no exploration.

PUBLIC SERVICE OF CANADA

Mr. Mauril Bélanger (Ottawa—Vanier, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian awards of excellence will kick off Quality Month on Monday, October 2. The awards celebrate outstanding achievements in the private sector.

During the last few years the federal public service has gone through tough and sometimes demoralizing challenges. Will the President of the Treasury Board tell us what the government is doing to improve morale and promote excellence in the Public Service of Canada?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to say that for the first time the quality awards that will be given out next week will not only recognize people who have done innovative and excellent things in the private sector but will also recognize those in the public sector.

The federal public service has a fine and well deserved reputation of providing quality services to the people of Canada. We need to applaud that kind of effort on the part of our employees. We need to share the success stories. We need to recognize the innovations that have been carried out by federal public servants.

In this Quality Month as the government focuses more and more on client focused quality services for the people of Canada, I believe we are in a situation where we can make a better work environment for our employees and provide better service to Canadians. That is what Quality Month will help us focus on.

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have a strong commitment and a strong attachment to the environment. I was pleased only a few moments ago to entertain a question from the Reform Party on calving grounds for the Porcupine caribou herd. It is certainly an indication that environmental issues are not exclusive to party lines and every Canadian believes that our environment is a part of our heritage and a part of who we are.

Since becoming environment minister I have met some incredible people from across the country, people who spend most of their waking hours working on environmental issues such as climate change, biodiversity and reducing toxins.

[Translation]

Yesterday evening, I was in Montreal to attend the Second International Hydrogen Summit, where I met people who really take seriously the technological opportunities which will be the major challenges of the 21st century.

[English]

I have also seen communities like my own that have fought back against environmental degradation to achieve great things. There are communities that have restored waterways, reduced waste, protected wildlife habitat, created jobs and at the same time have sparked innovative, fledgling incubator industries, communities like my own hometown of Hamilton.

In Hamilton people from all walks of life came together to transform our community from a city that was polluted and full of economic, environmental problems to a community that is cleaner and full of environmental and economic promise. The efforts of Hamiltonians have even been recognized by the United Nations. Hamilton was named Canada's only model sustainable city.

Hamilton was a city which only a few short years ago at the wake of tremendous transition in the steel industry had an unemployment rate of around 16 per cent. Today Hamilton has the lowest unemployment rate in the country and the fastest growing industries are the environmental industries.

Based on what I have seen in my home town and elsewhere, I know that the real power to make changes does not rest with politicians but, rather, with Canadians and their communities.

It goes without saying that governments and businesses have an important role to play to better protect the environment. However, without a degree of awareness and understanding, and without some initiatives by the various regions of the country, we will never reach our goal of ensuring sustainable development.

This is why I am pleased to announce a new program called Action 21. We are keeping the red book promise where we said we would give Canadians the necessary tools to protect the environment in their daily lives.

Action 21 will help regional groups carry out their environmental projects. We will match any community financing initiative by giving an amount equal to the community's participation for all admissible projects pertaining to the improvement, the depollution or the protection of the environment.

Action 21 will have to emphasize the measurable advantages of any initiative and favour activities dealing with air pollution, climate changes, biodiversity, toxic substances, and the preservation of ecosystems.

Action 21 includes a public awareness program which will encourage Canadians to make the environmentally friendly choices. We must all learn to care about the environment in our daily lives because we are all responsible for creating a healthy environment in our community.

Action 21 will help only non–governmental and nonprofit organizations. We want to support service clubs, senior citizens associations, youth groups and environment protection groups.

[English]

We want to support car pooling and transit initiatives because we think it is critical to reduce vehicle emissions and the effects of climate change. We want to support initiatives which reduce the use of pesticides in fertilizers in non–farm settings because it is important to improve the health of Canadians.

My hope is that we can particularly give a boost to young Canadians in their efforts to improve the environment in their own communities. They will have to do the work. We will match them dollar for dollar, but they will have to raise half of the money. I know they will do that because it is obvious that young Canadians understand that the environment is the key to our future.

We have a lot to do. A recent study by Dr. Sverre Vedal of the University of British Columbia estimates that in that province alone 82 Canadians die prematurely every year as a result of air pollution in the form of inhalable particles. The Government of Canada has the responsibility to take whatever action is necessary to prevent those premature deaths.

Through action 21 we are empowering Canadians to join us in that battle. We are giving Canadians the means to make their own decisions, to build on community based environmental protection and to make sure that Canadians are not only part of the problem, but that every single Canadian is part of the solution.

Action 21 will have an annual budget of $10 million. I will repeat it for the benefit of the taxpayers of Canada: Every dollar we give to any project must be matched by a dollar raised in the community.

Canadians want to find a role in being a part of the solution to the environmental challenges of the 20th century. With action 21 we will be able to achieve that into the 21st century. I know there is not a member of Parliament in the House, whatever his or her political stripe, who does not understand that the future of our children depends not only on the role of government, not only on the important role of business to clean up its own act, but also on the chance for Canadians to change the way we live and to build sustainable development as a cornerstone in all of the actions in every day of our lives.

Action 21 is a small step to get Canadians involved in choosing the right solutions for a better environment into the 21st century. Action 21 will provide them with a small vehicle to get government help to achieve that.

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, as you know, Quebecers care a great deal about the environment. It is part of their culture and of what they are.

Some of them have dedicated their lives to protecting the environment, raising their fellow citizens' awareness, as well as studying nature and its interaction with man. Some even called on the courts to prevent the federal government from going ahead with projects which were potentially harmful for human health and the marine ecosystem.

Local initiatives to clean up riverbanks, reforest urban spaces or even organize carpools are often taken on by individuals convinced they can and must preserve a safe environment for their children. They deserve our grateful thanks.

Clearly, I share the minister's vision regarding the appropriateness of helping initiatives aimed at reducing man's impact on nature.

However, there is a major flaw in the minister's argument. The program she announced today is obviously the kind of measure which upsets programs and priorities established by provincial governments, creates new expectations, and constitutes dubious management practice.

Action 21 is a perfect example of what Quebecers, sovereignists as well as federalists, have been fighting against for decades. The environment minister seems to have trouble understanding that. And yet, it is rather clear: Quebec no longer wants to see the federal government clumsily step in and negate its efforts. Many provinces share the same feeling.

The only purpose of Action 21 is for the federal government to use its spending power in areas of provincial jurisdiction.

The Quebecers have heard this song before. Its intent is laudable, and just about everybody recognizes how important it is. The federal government is setting itself up as a saviour generously handing out mana.

What the minister does not realize is that Quebecers know that government funding will be reduced, even stopped, within a few months or a few years. Budget constraints will then be blamed, as is already the case now.

Groups who have initiated projects will then turn to Quebec for the kind of assistance they really need, at which time the province will be faced with the following choice: either completing ongoing projects or putting an end to them. In one case, the federal government will have shifted to the province responsibility for part of its expenditures and, in the other, responsibility for quashing the projects.

This is something Quebecers have experienced over and over in many areas. Take for example the contaminated sites rehabilitation program and the greater Montreal greening program.

By being very careful not to mention in her speech the amounts earmarked for and actual duration of Agenda 21, the minister confirmed the misgivings we had.

Action taken under Agenda 21 is based on a fifteen year old philosophy aimed at giving the federal government the sole initiative on environmental issues. Relying on the authority of the Supreme Court and on its own spending power, the federal government is gradually taking over this area of responsibility, establishing new national standards which, in many cases, add to existing provincial standards.

In closing, I wish to thank the hon. minister for just proving to us that her government never intended to change the federal system in any way and that all it has to offer Quebecers is the good old Trudeau-style centralization. As long as it is able to get away with it, the federal government will use its spending power in areas of provincial responsibility, disregard priorities set by Quebec ministers and attempt to gain legitimacy by going over the heads of the provinces. The only way to stop this is to opt for sovereignty for Quebec, even for the fishermen of the Gaspe Peninsula.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak today on action 21.

Across our beautiful country from our lush forests in British Columbia, the beautiful Rocky Mountains, the great beautiful forests in northern Ontario and Quebec, to the rugged coastline in the maritimes, we indeed have been given an Eden. Unfortunately that Eden is being decimated and desecrated. Unsustainable resource utilization and widespread pollution are occurring in so many areas and it is imperative that we address these problems.

• (1215)

We applaud the intent and intention of action 21. It will help Canadians to deal with environmental considerations in their lives, to deal with sustainable development, recycling, and to increase environmental awareness.

However we have some concerns. Where is the $10 million that is put forth annually coming from? Is it being used for more bureaucrats? Will the money actually go where it was intended to go? We also have some concerns in that the November 1994 environmental partners fund, a program which is virtually identical to action 21, was shut down. Here we are creating another system to do exactly what the environmental partners fund was supposed to do.

Could the Deputy Prime Minister provide us with some information? Why are we creating a new program to fulfil one that we just closed down?

We also have concerns about the assessment process, accountability, monitoring and follow up. I am sure the Deputy Prime Minister would agree that it is critically important to ensure that the moneys actually go to where they are intended to go, which I am sure is her intent.

I hope the program does not become like the Tory green plan, a $2.5 billion boondoggle that went nowhere. The hon. minister knows that. I am sure she will look into ensuring that the same mistakes are not made.

I ask the minister to look at her own back yard in Hamilton. Hamiltonians have worked very hard to address significant environmental concerns on their doorstep, but yet the two largest dumpers of benzene, Dofasco and Stelco, are in Hamilton. I ask the hon. minister to provide us with information so that we know what is being done in those areas.

I also ask that we ensure the program has an identifiable framework, that we have adequate monitoring and follow up, and that the groups receiving it are accountable. We agree with the matching concept in action 21. It is something the Reform Party has continually put forth in other areas. It is a good idea because it shows ownership for those who are receiving the moneys.

We should also focus on school programs. The minister mentioned that she was very interested in youth. If we focused on youth and school programs we might be able to supplement the moneys in the program from existing programs. It might be a cost effective way of expenditure.

As an aside, we speak about the environment and yet 40,000 people die in the country of smoking related illnesses every year. Tragically the government's smoking platform that it has put forth since inception has caused the greatest increase in tobacco consumption we have seen in the last 20 years.

The hon. member mentioned that 82 people tragically die of diseases related to the inhalation of toxic substances. That is a very big tragedy. However let us put it into context with respect to the 40,000 people who die of smoking related illnesses and an indeterminate number who die of second hand smoke. Also one–ninth of all women get breast cancer which might have a genetic toxic component. Let us also look at some of these larger issues.

Our intent is the same as the government's in trying to increase awareness in environmental degradation, sustainable development and environmental awareness. We hope the program will do what it was intended to do, that is increase awareness among Canadians. Let us make sure the moneys go to where they are supposed to go and not to developing more bureaucracy.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition that has been circulating all across Canada. The petition has been signed by a number of Canadians from B.C. and Alberta.

The petitioners draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession which has not been recognized for its value to society.

They also state that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families who make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call on Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families who decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to table a petition signed by a constituent who is looking for some money to table a report on the environment, economic and social problems.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mrs. Rose-Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table a petition signed by the constituents of Lambton—Middlesex and duly certified by the clerk of petitions, pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The petitioners call on Parliament to ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes to the law that would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition on behalf of members of the agricultural community in my riding of Kent.

They humbly pray and call on Parliament to maintain funding for agricultural employment services so that they may maintain their assistance to the many underprivileged who rely on these personal services to find employment.

(b) & (c)

The following is the Health Canada tobacco demande reduction strategy, TDRS, summary of strategy initiatives in dollars

1 Budget before reductions

2 Budget after reductions

(d) The tobacco demand reduction strategy remains the largest, most comprehensive tobacco control initiative ever undertaken in Canada. While the scope and pace of some activities will be reduced, none of the components of the TDRS has been eliminated as a result of the cuts. The essential balance and integrity of the overall strategy have been maintained.

(e) No attempt has been made by Health Canada to assess the impact of these cuts on the incidence of tobacco use in Canada. As previously stated, although the scope and pace of some activities have been reduced, none of the components of the TDRS has been eliminated. For instance, many community action initiatives funded under the community action initiatives program, part of the TDRS, will build a base of programming, expertise and co–operation in the voluntary sector that will make an on–going contribution to achieving the goal of tobacco use reduction in Canada.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

OCEANS ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–98, an act respecting the oceans of Canada, be read the second time and referred to a committee; and of the amendment.

The Deputy Speaker: The Secretary of State for Asia–Pacific was to reply to the question of the hon. member for Fraser Valley East. I believe the member for Fraser Valley East had completed his question or comment.

The member is indicating that he had not. I ask him to do so briefly.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister.

• (1225)

In what way does he see the government moving to decentralize the Canadian federation to provide services at a cheaper rate with less taxation, and at a cheaper expense to Canadians, to promote businesses and promote a better delivery of services in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans?

Mr. Chan: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I will respond to his concern that I was pointing to the alliance between the separatists and the Reform Party. When the separatists propose to separate the country, the onus is on the separatists to demonstrate why they want to separate. What we have to offer is Canada which has been regarded by the UN as the number one country to live in and so on.

During debate today a Bloc member tried to praise the Reform Party because of its tactics and so on, and there was applause from the member's benches. That is what triggered my comment. I hope I have answered that part of the question.

On the decentralization process, during the process of refining government actions the government has been negotiating with provincial governments on all sectors, trying to reduce redundancies and trying to make things more efficient.

The same is true with the oceans act. We are proposing a partnership to bring people together, the provincial side, the private sector and the federal government, to find ways to simplify and to promote harmony in our policies.

I would be glad to support the bill and I hope we will get the support of the Reform Party too.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: I wish to inform the House that, because of the ministerial statement and answers, Government Orders will be extended by 16 minutes today.

[English]

There have been five hours of debate on Bill C–98 and we are now into 10–minute speeches without questions or comments.

Mrs. Marlene Cowling (Dauphin—Swan River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be given an opportunity to address the House on second reading of the oceans act.

As we consider the legislation before us, we must also take into account the vastness of Canada's ocean area on all three coasts. We must also recognize the increasing stresses on our oceans environment, especially in our coastal areas.

These stresses have resulted in resource depletion, habitat degradation and marine pollution. If we do not act decisively and now, the problems will only worsen. We are becoming increasingly aware that oceans are subject to impacts and influences of both natural and human origins.

We now recognize that we must manage oceans to achieve economic opportunities while sustaining the environment, including the living resources of our oceans. That is true of the Atlantic Ocean, the Pacific coast and the Arctic. Whether it be improving the safety of Atlantic shipping, restoring fish habitat in a Pacific estuary or protecting the fragile Arctic environment from marine pollution, all these require leadership by the Government of Canada.

The time has come for leadership in integrated management of Canada's oceans, a leadership that will be provided by the government through the oceans act. We know that this cannot be done by the federal government alone. Jurisdiction is divided among federal, provincial, local and aboriginal authorities. That will not change. We embrace this reality and will address it through co–operation and partnership.

What will change, however, is regulatory duplication, conflict and inadequacy that result in inefficiencies, failure to protect the environment and impediments to development. Private sector, public interest groups, non–governmental organizations, academics and federal advisory bodies have all called repeatedly for a comprehensive approach to oceans management, an approach that will foster innovative internationally competitive ocean industries and preserve and sustain our oceans.

First Nations have special concerns. Comprehensive land claims can involve important implications for protecting and developing both renewable and non–renewable ocean resources.

These challenges are obvious in the Arctic. Use of the Arctic ocean and sea ice must take account of the fragility of the Arctic ecosystems and ensure that traditional patterns of hunting and fishing can be sustained.

The recognition of the need for an oceans act is not new. The previous federal government said it would do all of this. In 1987 the government of the day announced an oceans policy and that policy was not acted on by it. It said it would submit to Parliament a Canada oceans act but it did not bring forward a proposal.

The legislation for this long awaited act is now before us and because this government is acting. Not only is it acting on a promise from the red book but acting out of the recognition of the need for a more cohesive approach to oceans management.

The National Advisory Board on Science and Technology's report on Canada's oceans policy released last year condemned the federal government for neglect of its oceans responsibilities. It recommended an oceans management strategy and an oceans act to provide a firm legal basis for this strategy. These recommendations were supported by provinces, municipalities, businesses, unions, academics and others.

The government realizes we must turn away from partial, ad hoc, short term measures based on expediency. We must manage our oceans on an ecosystems basis, not on the basis of single sector resource considerations separate from, say, the regulation of shipping or separate from environmental protection. Integrated resource management requires decision making that is open, transparent and based on sound science. It must apply multi–disciplinary approaches and it must integrate economic, environmental and social considerations and the involvement of all affected stakeholders.

Stewardship of ocean and coastal resources is a responsibility that we must all share: federal, provincial, territorial, municipal and aboriginal governments in partnership with business, unions, non–governmental organizations and academics.

As all members are aware, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans took an important step toward integration of oceans management when it merged with the Canadian Coast Guard last April. This merger provided the department with the tools to more effectively provide cohesive oceans management. The merger brought together the key elements of oceans management: shipping, fisheries, ocean sciences and environmental protection. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans and the coast guard fleets became one and in the turbot dispute last winter the red vessels of the coast guard fleet and the grey vessels of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans performed admirably as a team in the service of their country.

While Canada has taken many steps in the past year to protect and conserve all of our oceans resources, environmental organizations like the World Wildlife Fund, the Canadian Arctic Resources Committee and the Canadian Nature Federation have long called for the creation of marine protected areas under the oceans act. The government has listened to their concerns.

The oceans act will provide for the creation of marine protected areas to protect biodiversity and endangered species. There will be two types of areas. One will be developed in consultation with the stakeholders, the other will be designated by the Ministry of Fisheries and Oceans on an urgent temporary basis in response to the resource crisis.

The ocean act signals a renewal of Canada's leadership in oceans management, a renewal that is long overdue. From the mid–1960s until the early 1980s Canada led the world. In the intervening years our initiative faltered. The federal government in the late 1980s and the early 1990s no longer led Canada in the forefront of global oceans policy. Now this government is reclaiming Canada's role as a world leader.

While Canada has a major domestic interest in its oceans, it has the responsibility to manage them as a shared global resource and we must lead by example. The government is well aware that if Canada is to once again be a world leader in the oceans it will require that the oceans act establish a clear federal lead for the implementation of the oceans management strategy. That is the goal of the government and the legislation. It is to ensure there is a place under the federal leadership of the Ministry of Fisheries and Oceans in close co–operation with other federal and provincial ministers and stakeholders, mechanisms to manage all of Canada's ocean resources. The goal is for our oceans to be clean, safe, productive and accessible.

The oceans act is a key part of the government's commitment to a new oceans management strategy. Developing and implementing that strategy will take the work of many people across Canada. It will be an ongoing process. The government is committed and ready to act on then development of an oceans management strategy. The oceans act signifies a commitment to all Canadians, a commitment to the world.

I ask that other members in the House join with me in voting in favour of this very important legislation.

Mrs. Karen Kraft Sloan (York—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the previous member for Dauphin—Swan River has stated, our oceans represent a shared global resource. Canadians watching this debate today may not be aware that 80 per cent of the world's population lives in coastal areas attached to oceans. Not only are oceans an important and integral part of Canada's key to survival, they certainly are for the world. The bill before us today calls for Parliament to formalize Canadian jurisdiction over vast new areas of ocean waters and resources off our coasts.

This August in New York the United Nations Conference on Straddling and Highly Migratory Fish Stocks reached agreement by consensus on a new UN convention on high seas fisheries. When this new UN convention is properly implemented it will provide permanent protection for straddling stocks on the Grand Banks of Newfoundland. This is an enormous step forward. It is fully consistent with the oceans act. It completes the protection of some of Canada's most important ocean resources, the once great cod and flounder stocks on the Grand Banks.

While the oceans act is an important element in protecting these resources inside 200 miles, the new UN convention is key to providing permanent protection for them outside 200 miles.

There is massive fishing power deployed on the high seas. The nations of the world have often been unable to control it. The result has been destructive overfishing, depleted resources, human misery and conflict among states.

Before this new UN convention it was unclear whether the escalation of fishing power could devastate resources before the international community had crafted the legal tools needed to prevent that from happening. However, Canada had taken the lead by approving Bill C–29 to protect threatened straddling stocks until effective international means to do so were implemented.

To fill the gaps in international law and control high seas fisheries before it was too late required that coastal states as well as distant water fishing states do their part. All countries at the UN conference had to view matters in the global context.

There have been serious failures in conservation of straddling stocks in all of the oceans of the world. There will continue to be such failures as long as the international legal framework is incomplete. The foundation in the law of the sea convention is sound but by itself it is not adequate. That was recognized at the UN Conference on Environment and Development by the UN General Assembly when the UN conference on straddling stocks was convened. It is significant that the UN conference on straddling stocks arose out of the UNCED conference on the environment.

Over the past 20 years international environmental law has developed and found wider and wider application.

• (1240)

Environmental law and the law of the sea are becoming more integrated. Environmental concepts such as sustainable development, the precautionary approach and the ecosystems approach must be applied to achieve effective fisheries conservation. The new UN convention will greatly advance that integration.

The new UN convention contains the five principle elements needed for an effective international system for conservation. First, the international framework of rules must be legally binding. The new UN convention will be legally binding. Second, there must be proper conservation and management measures. The new UN convention provides for this, notably in the precautionary approach.

Third, there must be compatibility of conservation and management measures both inside and outside 200 miles. The new UN convention provides for this. Fourth, there must be binding and compulsory dispute settlement. Again the new UN convention provides for this. Finally, there must be some means to deal with the situation where the flag state is unable or unwilling to control its vessel fishing on the high seas. The new UN convention does this as well.

Let me explain why high seas enforcement is necessary for an effective conservation system. There are serious and chronic control problems in high sea fisheries. The FAO in its March 1995 report on the state of world fisheries highlighted problems of control and pointed toward pollution.

Renewed international attention is focusing on unauthorized fishing and the role of monitoring, control and surveillance. Fisheries conservation and management are being undermined by such fishing and, together with the lack of effective monitoring, control and surveillance systems is threatening the sustainability of fisheries.

The international community also acknowledges that the accurate collection and reporting of fisheries by catch and discards data are important aspects of monitoring, control and surveillance, issues that will attract increasing attention.

The most realistic and effective means of collecting, verifying and reporting these data are through the use of increased at–sea monitoring of fishing activities.

The FAO report has it right. At–sea monitoring of fishing activities is needed for an effective conservation system. It is a necessary element of the new UN convention.

The new UN convention will make the high seas fisheries provisions of the UN Convention on the Law of the Sea work as they should but have not until now. Together, the UN Convention on the Law of the Sea and the new UN convention will constitute an effective international legal framework for sustainable development in high seas fisheries.

Under such a regime we can rebuild straddling stocks and harvest them on a sustainable basis. This is a great advance over the situation Canada has faced in the past: foreign overfishing, depleted resources, economic decline and conflict with distant water fishing states.

For responsible distant water fishing states like Japan, creating an effective international conservation regime is strongly in their interest. With us they should ratify and implement the new UN convention as soon as possible. Implementation of the new UN convention will be an important advance for humankind. It will be a giant step toward sustainability. In Canada it will be of great benefit to the tens of thousands of fishers and fish plant workers in Atlantic Canada whose livelihood and future depend on the straddling stocks of cod, flounder and turbot.

With the oceans act and the new UN convention in time those resources will be bountiful once more. I am happy to support the bill and I urge all members to join me in allowing the legislation to move forward quickly. The oceans act charts a wise course for the future of ocean policy.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is with considerable pleasure that I rise to offer my support to the oceans act.

The legislation deals effectively with jurisdictional issues which have been under study for a long time. It also deals effectively with ocean management issues in a manner which will serve Canadians for many years to come.

• (1245)

For a long time Canada has worked to focus the world's attention on ocean issues. For a long time Canada has worked to establish formal jurisdiction over the ocean waters and ocean resources that border our country.

In the 1950s Canada played a leading role at the first UN conference on oceans. In the 1960s Canada played a leading role in calling for a UN convention on the law of the sea. In the same decade Canadians asserted their jurisdiction over the northwest passage by adopting the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act and declaring new fishing zones off both coasts. In the 1970s we took unilateral steps to declare a 200–mile fishing zone and a 12–mile territorial sea.

Canadians are all well aware of the recent successful efforts of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to protect the fishstocks within our 200–mile limit from overfishing outside and to lead the world in reaching agreement on the conservation of straddling fishstocks.

The oceans act when passed will formalize Canada's jurisdiction over all our oceans. The bill before Parliament is backed by international agreement. The bill declares that Canada not only has jurisdiction over our internal waters, territorial sea, fishing zones and continental shelf, but we also have jurisdiction over a new 12 nautical mile contiguous zone and 200 nautical mile exclusive economic zone.

In the contiguous zone Canada will have formal jurisdiction to apply our fiscal, immigration, sanitary and customs laws. In the exclusive economic zone Canada will have formal jurisdiction for exploring and exploiting all economic resources, not only fish and for conserving and managing those resources.

In this zone covering nearly five million square kilometres of ocean, Canadians will also have jurisdiction over marine research and protection and preservation of the marine environment. If that was all this legislation accomplished it would be an important achievement. We have fought long and hard to establish Canadian ocean rights.

The bill does not stop there. It goes on to streamline and strengthen federal responsibilities for responsible ocean stewardship. It goes even further by establishing the legislative base for a new comprehensive and co–operative oceans management strategy.

The bill sets in motion a new approach to oceans policy, an approach based on the federal government working in partnership with all those who have a stake in the future of our oceans, from the provinces and territories, to the local communities, to fishermen and businesses and environmentalists. Our oceans are a wonderful shared Canadian blessing. They require a shared sense of responsibility and a shared plan for both development and environmental protection.

The bill sets out the objective of achieving sustainable development of our oceans and their resources through an integrated management strategy. The bill aims to achieve integrated planning of ocean activities, harmonized regulations and improved environmental protection based on a comprehensive ecosystems approach.

To reach those ends the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans will be authorized to enter into partnership agreements with other Canadian jurisdictions and organizations and to co–ordinate a cohesive Canadian approach to sustainable ocean development.

The oceans act includes provisions for the establishment of marine protected areas, the development of ocean environmental quality guidelines and the application of Canada's current environmental legislation to the new exclusive economic zone.

When Parliament resumed this month, the Deputy Prime Minister introduced legislation to establish a commissioner of the environment and sustainable development responsible for auditing the environmental performance of all federal government departments. In doing so the Deputy Prime Minister called on all ministers to become ministers for sustainable development and all departments to develop action plans for environmental stewardship.

The oceans act takes the same message forward. It empowers the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to push ahead with an oceans strategy based on the primary principle that the economic opportunities offered by our oceans are completely and absolutely linked to the environmental well–being of those oceans.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has indicated that he will act quickly, act seriously and act effectively, as he always does. He will not however act alone. He is seeking the advice and the input of all Canadians in developing an oceans management strategy that merges national objectives with regional decision making and sets national goals based upon local wisdom, local needs and local desires.

Once the oceans act is passed, the minister will be in a position to work with all Canadians in meeting the major challenges ahead as we seek to make Canada the global leader in oceans policy for the 21st century.

Through the establishment of the Atlantic Fisheries Resource Conservation Council, the minister has already proven the new willingness of the federal government to take the advice of industry, academic and government experts on fisheries issues. We all know that several heads are better than one and the new partnership approach to fisheries conservation proves it.

The even greater opportunity now is to expand that sense of partnership into the multi–faceted spheres of ocean policy, from resource management to marine safety, from trade development to environmental management, from better knowledge of ocean sciences to stronger international action on global ocean issues.

I sincerely hope that all members of Parliament will come together to allow this legislation to move forward rapidly and become law in the near future. The bill provides parliamentarians the opportunity to come together to act in the interests of all Canadians and in the interests of our oceans environment.

The bill gives Canada important new ocean jurisdictions. The bill provides for solid and sensible federal leadership on ocean issues. The bill creates the legislative framework for the development of a modern and much needed oceans management strategy. Through those measures, the bill creates the conditions in which all Canadians can share in developing a future for our oceans of which we all can be proud.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for Hillsborough for his speech on Bill C–98, the oceans act.

It was interesting that just a few weeks ago I had the privilege of visiting Atlantic Canada, his part of the great country we live in. I had the opportunity to visit and dialogue with many inshore fishermen. I discovered somewhat to my surprise that while our current minister of fisheries seems to enjoy a lot of popularity among Canadians who have the impression that the minister is standing up for the Canadian fishing industry, the inshore fishermen I was speaking with in Atlantic Canada were appalled by the actions of the DFO and of course the minister of fisheries who is responsible for the DFO.

These hard working, entrepreneurial people who make their living from the sea feel there is a conspiracy to put them out of business in the way the quotas are structured. They are given quotas to catch fish when the fish are not catchable and there is no quota for the species that is available. They have a quota for a species that is not even in the waters they are allowed to fish. When the other species come in the quotas are reversed. It is so bad that they cannot even pay for the fuel to take the boat out into the water to go after these fish.

These fishermen are also very concerned about the implementation of access fees which I understand would be made possible if Bill C–98 is passed. That will be the trigger which allows the DFO to impose access fees on the fishermen. It will make barely profitable enterprises unprofitable.

I ask the member for Hillsborough if he would stand up and vote for his constituents rather than voting the party line in supporting this bill. Perhaps he needs an opportunity—

Ms. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe we are into 10–minute speeches with no time for questions or comments. I presumed the member was entering into the debate.

The Deputy Speaker: That is the assumption the Chair made as well. We will assume the questions are rhetorical ones, that the member is making an intervention and any questions he asks are rhetorical.

Mr. Hermanson: Mr. Speaker, I would be happy if the member could respond to me perhaps even in his own time when we are not in the Chamber. These concerns were expressed to me by the people who make their living from fishing in Atlantic Canada.

The fisherman said the minister is not standing up for his industry, that he is throwing roadblocks in their way and none of the Liberal MPs from Atlantic Canada are standing up and speaking for them. They are very concerned and appalled. They have 31 Liberal MPs in Atlantic Canada and one Progressive Conservative MP and quite frankly they do not see much difference between the two parties. They were asking if no one in Ottawa was going to speak up on their behalf about these access fees. They see these fees as a tax imposed on them to put them out of business.

I implore the member for Hillsborough and his colleagues, the other 30 Liberal MPs from Atlantic Canada, and the Progressive Conservative member for Saint John to vote against Bill C–98 unless there is a commitment from the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to not impose these access fees, this horrible tax on the fishing industry. These entrepreneurial fishermen keep the rural and coastal communities of Atlantic Canada alive.

If those members refuse to listen to their constituents, if they insist on voting with their party, voting with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, voting with the Minister of the Environment on this issue, I emphasize they will not be voting for their constituents. In the future why should these hard working people vote for members of Parliament who come to the House and refuse to vote for them? These are rhetorical questions but I would appreciate answers from the Atlantic members of Parliament in the House.

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I suppose all of us as supporters of a united Canada should rejoice that the Reform Party has finally discovered Atlantic Canada. Nonetheless, it is a bit of overweening pride to assume that a very short visit to Atlantic Canada can possibly generate an awareness of the issues of the people of that region similar to the awareness the member for Hillsborough has after his many, many years of service to the people of his riding in Prince Edward Island and of Atlantic Canada.

I certainly hope members of the Reform Party will manage a return visit to Prince Edward Island. They might learn some humility and attain some understanding that it takes more than a flying visit with a political purpose to appreciate the views of Atlantic Canadians.

It is my pleasure to speak on the oceans act. Canada is a front runner in the area of oceans technology. This legislation will help ensure that Canadian companies involved in this field continue to grow.

The current work in this area is benefiting not only all Canadians but also the world. Canadian oceans related industries continue to bring new and exciting products and opportunities to Canadians and particularly those who live and work in our coastal regions.

One of the identifying factors of Canada is that we are a maritime nation. With our shores bordered by three oceans, our coastline is the longest in the world. We also have the world's largest archipelago and part of the world's longest inland waterway opening up to the sea.

It is important that we continue to build our understanding of our oceans, waterways and aquatic resources. Marine navigation is essential to the safe movement of goods on which our trade is so dependent. Commercial ships carry more than 350 million tonnes of cargo to and from Canadian ports each year. More shipping passes through the St. Lawrence seaway than through the Panama and Suez canals combined.

This bill deals with the concerns of the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology and other stakeholders, by allowing the development of an oceans management strategy which includes the planning and management of marine activities while also involving all the partners, including provincial governments.

In addition to promoting investment, the bill will increase the efficiency of environmental protection measures by establishing marine protected areas, by using a more global approach for the management of oceans, and by introducing the management of coastal zones.

[English]

I want to return for a moment to the importance of this bill to the growing marine industry which is so important to Canada's economy. We are already recognized internationally as having one of the world's most advanced hydrographic organizations. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans is leading the way in the development of new tools and techniques in partnership with industry.

This will continue as the development serves two purposes. The first is to improve the efficiency with which the department does its work which is in line with government program review initiatives. The second purpose, through the transfer of technology to the private sector, is to help to foster the growth of Canadian industries specializing in this field.

I will mention some of those industries. One of the most exciting new contributions, and this is within fisheries and oceans, is the development of the electronic chart display information system which allows mariners to navigate from a video screen array combining a digital chart with a radar display of shipping, navigational aids, coastline and other features. Canadian ocean industries continue to lead the way in areas of oceans technology and in many other areas.

In the area of remote sensing Canadian industry has developed the compact airborne spectrometer imaging sensor for cost effective aircraft based monitoring of capelin spawning, coastal habitat and algal blooms. This technology was developed under contract to Canadian industry based on technology from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans fluorescence line imager projects.

Three Canadian companies have been exploiting the technology. Itres Ltd. in Calgary is producing, selling and servicing it worldwide. Borstad and Associates Ltd. have developed algorithms for interpreting CASI data into quantitative coastal zone information products and provide a monitoring and information service. AGI Ariel Geomatics of British Columbia collects, processes and interprets airborne imagery for environmental uses.

All of these companies are developing collaborative arrangements with international partners to penetrate the coastal zone market niche in global environmental information services.

The Gable Group is another successful Canadian firm developing products for markets in oceanographic and freshwater monitoring and conservation and industrial applications such as moisture and heat measurement systems for irrigation, forestry and ground water pollution.

There are concerns for instance that salmon stocks are threatened by overfishing or poorly managed restocking and by the adverse effects of environmental pollution. For salmon the better management of the fish resources requires the availability of data on the origin of the fish, their migration patterns, the nutrients and pollutants they encounter during their life. An innovative new method to supply precise, reliable data for salmon migration studies has been developed by Elemental Research Inc. This company's product can measure the inorganic elemental content of fish tissue, bones and scales to the highest possible levels of sensitivity.

The need to make Canada's coastal waters safer and more accessible has been recognized by Mr. Bruce Seligman who has developed the tracked amphibious vehicle, ARKTOS. The Beta prototype has been used by Transport Canada, the Canadian Coast Guard, and more recently the Atlantic Geoscience Centre in Nova Scotia. Watercraft Offshore has successfully achieved over $6 million worth of contracts over the past few years with China.

The list can go on. The future of these new industries is indeed bright. With the oceans act and the oceans management strategy it will be even brighter.

Countries ratifying the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea will have to map their 200 mile offshore exclusive economic zone. With Canada's demonstrated leadership in this field many of these nations will turn to Canadian companies to assist in meeting those requirements.

As the world's population grows and society becomes more industrialized, demands on the aquatic environment increase the stakes, are more costly and guesswork becomes more dangerous.

The oceans act furthers Canada's commitment to Canadian ocean industries and ensures the technology continues to flow between governments and industries as partnerships are further developed.

• (1305)

I encourage all my colleagues to join me in supporting this legislation for the benefit of all Canadians.

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise and speak on this very important bill in Parliament today. I am very privileged to have the opportunity to do so.

I will very quickly cover the purposes of the bill as I see it. I will make a few comments with respect to the concern this party has for the people of the region who are most closely identified on the east coast with the ocean itself.

To begin, the bill is an excellent piece of work. It does what experts on the sea have been talking about. It should have been done a long time ago. Even before I get into the main objectives of the bill, it has to be looked at against the backdrop of the kind of country Canada is.

There is no question Canada is a maritime nation. We have three seas as our main borders. We have the longest navigable coastline in the world. We have the longest non–navigable coastline in the world.

If one adds up the water space not including the Great Lakes which themselves comprise a large percentage of the fresh water in the world, it is a pretty large piece of territory if one extends out to the 200–mile economic zone and follows the coast all along and includes the Arctic waters.

The responsibility for the management of that piece of property, sea property and the resources beneath, is tremendous. It involves close co–ordination to ensure we are getting the most effective management we can.

Canada has had many departments involved with the management of the seas. We have the Canadian forces, with the navy; the solicitor general with the marine aspects of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police; the old DFO as it was before this bill was conceived. Environment Canada has been doing surveys off the coast. The coast guard has been responsible for navigation and safety and keeping the sea routes open. Other departments have had peripheral concerns and interests.

The main purpose of this bill is to establish a framework to support the new oceans management regime for Canada and to consolidate the federal responsibility for Canada's oceans. The key word here is consolidation.

The other aspect of this bill that is very important is that it recognizes in domestic law Canada's jurisdiction over its maritime zones. That has been a very long time in coming.

Without wanting to sound partisan about this, the actions that were taken by the government with respect to the extension of jurisdiction beyond the 200–mile limit out to the nose and tail of the bank, which was not ours by accident of geography, is now in effect ours. Bill C–29 was passed in the House last year very quickly with the unanimous support of all parties, passed quickly by the Senate and subsequently recognized in the United Nations as being right, valid and proper.

One other thing the bill does is develop a new approach to managing the oceans and their resources. In that regard I want to pick one example. On the east coast of Newfoundland, Memorial University has what is considered by all those in the field of oceanography and marine sciences not just in Canada, not just in North America but throughout the world truly a centre of excellence.

It has scientific laboratories. It has the venue, the Logy Bay Research Station, the sea tunnel to test various sea foils, excellence again not just in Canada but throughout the world. It is one of the few resources of that nature that exist. It contains the pilotage training simulator which I had the opportunity, with some of the members of the defence committee, to witness. Certainly the reality factor was so high that one would find it difficult not believing one was not at sea.

These are a few examples of the elements of the centre of excellence that exists at Memorial University in St. John's, Newfoundland. I am very proud to have been associated with that over the years with some of my other colleagues and would hopefully continue to do so.

I want to address another aspect of this which is under the purview of ocean management and is certainly very much involved. This has to do with a statement made earlier by the member for Kindersley—Lloydminster, I think half in jest but I know with an element of seriousness. Because of that I felt constrained to respond to the concerns he raised in all seriousness.

I remind the House that in 1992 the cod fishery, after a bad year in 1991 because of ice that persisted all year, essentially had to be declared a failure. The previous government implemented a program called the northern cod assistance and recovery program to last for two years from 1992 with the hope that the northern cod stock would return. Regrettably, as we all know in the House, this has not happened.

This is a matter of fact. It is generally not known that the previous government—I make this point to make another point—had made no allowance for a replacement for that program in the event the northern cod had not recovered and said so. The minister of the day in St. John's indicated to the Evening Telegram that the government could not really be expected to continue to provide the kind of compensation that was involved should the NCARP program not succeed.

When we became government we found that the budget and the books did not account for any money in the program to look after the failure of that program should the northern code not return. It was through the compassion of this government and the work of many of us in Atlantic Canada, spearheaded by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and many of his colleagues in cabinet, that only new money was found in the first budget: $1.9 billion for the Atlantic strategy program, TAGS, as it is referred to. That program is not a perfect program but there are 39,000 people who depend on TAGS in the hopes the cod fishery will return.

Mr. Hermanson: The program is a failure.

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, I just heard the hon. member repeat himself. I am glad he did because members of his party have stood up in the House and suggested this program is no good and it should be scrapped.

Ms. Catterall: The Reform Party?

Mr. Mifflin: The Reform Party. Reform Party members have actually stood in this House and said that program should be scrapped. The only thing I have to say to the hon. member or other hon. members from that side of the House is if they believe this should be the case and they want to revisit Atlantic Canada I suggest they be really up front with Atlantic Canadians and make the point they are making here, that they do not agree with the TAGS program and that it should be scrapped.

I have another concern as an Atlantic Canadian which is related to oceans policy because it is related to the well–being of Atlantic Canadians: the Reform Party's attitude toward the regional program that we rely on so heavily, the ACOA program. Again, members of the other party—I am not sure about the member for Kindersley—Lloydminster—have been very vociferous in saying that we should scrap the ACOA program while naming some of the people that have benefited. What audacity.

I can give two examples of successes in my riding. For one example I have to quote the name and for the second example my constituent would prefer that I do not use his name but he will recognize the business of which I speak.

The White Hills in Clarenville is a world class skiing resort. Through the negotiation of $2.9 million, mostly ACOA money, it has been able to do with the resort what would not have been possible thereby bringing many people, not just from Newfoundland but from eastern Canada, St. Pierre et Miquelon to come visit that area and to spread their money in the distribution centre of Clarenville, thereby benefiting from it.

Second, I have a young man in my riding who without government help established a lumber business not many years ago. Through recent assistance by ACOA of not much money, he was able to develop the new piece of equipment which allowed him to export three times what he was exporting without this ACOA grant.

I do not need any lectures from the Reform Party about what we should be doing for Atlantic Canadians. One of the things that we are doing for Atlantic Canadians includes those factors which are contained in Bill C–98, oceans management.

• (1315)

Instead of decrying members on this side and decrying the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and his colleagues for trying to use these programs beneficially through consolidation and more effective measures, they should be getting on their feet to congratulate them.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise to speak to the bill and to the issues raised by the hon. member who just spoke. He was talking about the supposed benefits of the ACOA program, more government subsidies and so on.

I should like to tell the hon. member what I discovered in my recent trip to the Atlantic provinces and what some of the fishermen are saying. I do not claim it was an exhaustive trip, but I did find interesting some of the things they mentioned about the efforts that should be made by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to decentralize and to provide a better service to fishermen.

When I was in Antigonish they told me that a few short years ago they had two employees of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans who took the time to deliver tags for their lobster traps right to their boats. Now there are 37 employees working out of some office and the fishermen have to go to Halifax to get their tags. This is not a streamlining of services. This is not a slimmed down bureaucracy. If the minister were keen on providing a better service at a better price and more cost efficiently, there would be widespread support.

The reason there is so much cynicism about the bill as one step of many similar steps is that the bureaucracy continues to increase and service continues to go down. Fishermen on the west coast and on the east coast are having difficulty finding a DFO person on the enforcement side in the field. Yet there are many people who seem to be stuck in an office and not providing services.

User fees will be allowed under the bill. The fishermen are saying that they do not mind paying user fees for the government services they use. However the government, not just in this department but in other departments too, continues to expand the requirements placed on the backs of fishermen, farmers and business people. The government continues to expand and charge the people. In other words it becomes a user pay bureaucracy.

The businesses have no say in what services are provided. The government continues to throw more people and more money at a problem and then doubles the fees. It is not a user fee for a finite service. It is just: "Let us tax these poor guys, call it a user fee or a licence fee, jack them up and see if they go out of business".

If the government were sincere about helping out Atlantic Canadians and British Columbia fishermen with the Fisheries Act there are a couple of things it could do. It could provide services in the field.

I have an article from the Vancouver Sun about the DFO. It states that John Fraser's report on the Fraser River sockeye indicated that the DFO nearly destroyed the salmon fishery in British Columbia last year through mismanagement and a shocking lack of enforcement.

If the government wants to re-establish some credibility with west coast fishermen at all levels, whether sports, aboriginal or commercial fishermen, it would have some enforcement people in the field to make sure the rules are enforced. It has no credibility on the west coast.

On the east coast it is a similar problem. Through successive years of federal government mismanagement it has managed to pretty well destroy certain parts of that valuable fishery. The people on the east coast do not run around saying: "Thank you, Mr. Tobin, for the turbot", even though we are all glad that the pillaging of that resource is not going on any longer.

What they are really saying is thanks to the federal government for destroying what used to be one of the backbones of the Canadian economy and still is, through no help from the federal government, an important part of a maritimer's life.

If the government wanted to help it could get off the backs and out of the pockets of fishermen and let them get on with life. It is not only fishermen when we talk about ACOA grants. I heard a member from the maritimes make a statement the other day: "Thank goodness for regional development grants. They are the way to prosperity. We will get more regional grants".

If that were the case the maritime provinces would be the most prosperous provinces in the world. The trouble is the government has not yet caught on to the basic economic fact of what is best to promote business, to promote diversity and to promote fellows like the hon. member was mentioning who want to export around the world. We should say to that person: "Listen, I will offer you low tax rates because I am not wasting your money. I will offer you less government regulations so that you can have a chance to put a business together easily. I will make sure that the Department of the Environment does not take three years to do a study when you want to start a mine and that there will be rapid approval processes".

Why not co-ordinate with the provincial governments so it is not overlapped and driven from Ottawa instead of being driven from the provinces where it should be? Then perhaps those people would have a chance to diversify, to get out in the world and do what they want to do? They used to be able to do it before the federal government stepped in and started kicking butt. If it would allow people in the maritime provinces to exert their free enterprise spirit, to go back to the roots that made them strong and the most vibrant part of Canada at that time, we would see a prosperous maritimes.

If we continue with expanding ACOA, giving more grants and having a bureaucracy in the DFO that will not even deliver the tags but will sit back and ask for more user fees, it is hopeless. The government seems to have lost its sense of direction.

MINING EXPLORATION

Mr. Bernard Deshaies (Abitibi, BQ) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider revitalizing investment in exploration in Canada and in Quebec by providing for fiscal incentives, including flow-through shares.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on June 5, I had the pleasure of speaking to Motion M-292 tabled by my colleague, the hon. member for Timiskaming—French River, which dealt with mining incentives to help the industry replenish its ore reserves quickly enough.

Without consulting each other, my colleague and I tabled in this House similar motions on mining. This shows that there are many stakeholders urging the government and the Minister of Finance to analyze all possible scenarios and to adopt a policy to revitalize mining exploration.

• (1325)

[English]

Ms. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order and apologize for interrupting my colleague who is speaking on his private member's motion. However, I wanted to clarify that the deferral of the vote is to 6 p.m. on Monday.

The Deputy Speaker: It is so noted.

Mr. Deshaies: Mr. Speaker, that is the message I wish to convey today through this motion, which says:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider revitalizing investment in exploration in Canada and in Quebec by providing for fiscal incentives, including flow-through shares.

We have noted for a long time how little mining exploration is done in both Quebec and Canada. Therefore, we must act quickly to revitalize mining exploration throughout this country in order to replenish ore reserves in this industry. This situation is mainly due to the fact that junior mining companies, which underpin mining exploration, cannot raise enough public funds to carry out their exploration work, while major companies, which have the money needed for exploration, spend an increasingly important part of their exploration budget in developing countries.

The advantage is that those countries already have listed minable sites, while Canada offers few new deposits ready for mining. I remind the House that the committee on natural resources held hearings on this matter last fall and made nine recommendations that were supported by all the parties represented on this committee.

Unfortunately, the government decided to disregard all the work done by the committee and all the evidence we heard there. That is how this government operates. It has given the fifth report of the committee entitled "Lifting Canadian Mining Off the Rocks" the following response: "Keeping Canadian Mining on the Rocks".

I doubt that, by rejecting almost all of the recommendations in this report, the ministers, both of finance and of natural resources, were really aware of the true effect of their decisions on mining exploration in Canada and in Quebec.

All the stakeholders in mining exploration are disappointed that this government did not agree with any of their recommendations, that were based on their expertise and knowledge of mining. I would like to remind the government that more than a quarter of Canadian trade is based on the natural resource sector and that it is time that the government saw the mining industry as an important means of ensuring economic development in our society by achieving the national priorities, which are, according to the Liberal government, employment and growth.

Mines that will be closing in a few years as a result of the depletion of their reserves will not be replaced if new sites are not discovered. This will cause major layoffs and will have a very negative impact on the Canadian economy, especially in mining regions, where metal processing, transportation and other infrastructures will be hard hit.

An immediate response is needed if we are to reverse this trend by the year 2000, since it takes five to seven years on average between the discovery of a mine and start up of production. Failing this, the industry will gradually disappear. Renewal of the reserves is urgently needed; the mining industry is facing one of the hardest challenges it has had to deal with in many years.

As a result of the shift of mining investment to other countries, Canada's known mineral reserves have decreased. In 1992, 28 mines closed and only 8 opened. There are many reasons for this, but the trend must be reversed or the industry will be totally gone within twenty years.

Base metal reserves have been decreasing since 1980 and are unlikely to be replaced at an adequate rate in the near future. The industry has done its part. On numerous occasions it has voiced its concerns to the Government of Canada, which rather than facilitating the process of adapting to the new international competition, particularly from third world countries, has in fact added to the problems by allowing the investment climate in the mining sector to deteriorate compared to the competition.

The industry is working hard to ensure its survival. The economic and political context has not kept pace in order to encourage the industry to remain in Canada. Declining mining investments in our country are linked to a number of growing concerns.

To name but a few of those concerns: heavy financial burdens, compared to the countries of the south of course, particularly taxes and charges unrelated to profits; uncertainty and delays in environmental assessment and approval procedures; regulatory overlap between levels of government and between departments, creating needless difficulties; reduced access; uncertainty about tenure of mineral titles; and lastly, increased financial requirements to guarantee restoration.

For there to be any recovery in the mining industry, an incentive plan must be promoted for mining exploration in Canada, similar but better controlled than the one in place in the 1980s.

Even if base metal reserves are in decline, there is still immense geological potential in Canada, Quebec in particular. The recent opening of the Louvicourt Mine in my riding confirms the potential of the mining industry in Quebec and Abitibi and the expertise of those who discovered, developed and financed the mine and those who now operate it.

It also confirms that governments were right to create the flow–through share system, which helped to finance the initial exploration work leading to the discovery of the mine in 1989.

This particular mine, with $300 million invested to bring it to the production stage, will provide more than 350 direct jobs for the next fifteen years at least. It is the result of a joint effort during the eighties by the federal and Quebec governments to encourage mineral exploration on sites of former mines that were no longer in production and thus deemed unlikely to have sufficient potential as a source of major new discoveries.

New technologies and adequate funding were instrumental in discovering this copper, zinc, gold and silver mine, whose mineral extraction capacity is assessed at 4,000 tonnes per day, while recent finds near the site may extend the lifespan of this mine to 25 years. Its potential classifies Louvicourt as a world class mine.

Three more major projects will start up in my region in the next two years, thanks to the same flow–through shares from the eighties, and I am referring to the Grevet, Raglan and Troilus projects. Raglan in northern Quebec is becoming the largest potential site for copper ore in Canada.

The role of mineral exploration is to find other Louvicourts or Raglans. The average lifespan of a mine is about 11 years, and since it takes between five and ten years from the discovery of a mine to the production stage, we must start today to find the mines of the year 2000.

Many world class mines remain to be discovered in Quebec. This is clear from the examples I just mentioned. Only a small portion of Quebec's territory has been developed, and we could discover mines of this calibre, in practically any mining region in Quebec and Canada.

We have the human and technological resources to make further discoveries. For some years, however, the amount of exploration has been insufficient to renew mineral reserves because of competition from those same Third World countries and insufficient levels of public funding. The discovery of new mines is synonymous with economic development.

Louvicourt and Raglan are a clear indication that the federal government should increase tax incentives, already provided by the Quebec government, for preliminary mineral exploration in order to replace base metal reserves which are running out in this country.

The lack of mineral exploration in Canada is particularly disturbing, considering the general uncertainty as to Canada's commitment to encouraging mineral exploration and mining operations within its territory.

The uncertainty rises from the fact that regulations for access to sites are becoming increasingly restrictive, while environmental regulations or criteria are subject to duplication or diverging interpretations. In addition, obtaining an operating permit has become an increasingly lengthy process.

• (1335)

Exploration companies can no longer be sure that their exploration rights automatically include mining rights. The impression is that they have the right to engage in exploration, but until they have spent millions of dollars to identify an economically viable ore body, they do not know whether they will be able to extract ore and under what conditions.

In this context, there are three ways in which we could deal with the problem: re–establish public financing of mining exploration; improve the efficiency of exploration and make Canada more attractive to investors in the mining sector by improving fiscal, environmental and access regulations.

The flow–through share system has shown over the years that, at least in Quebec, it has made a significant contribution to the discovery of a number of mines. If we consider the 26 base metal or precious metal mines that were in production in Quebec in 1994, flow–through shares were either entirely or partly responsible for financing the discovery of 14 of these mines. Still in the case of base or precious metals, this applies to the discovery of nine out of ten mining projects now in the development or pre–production stage.

Considering these discoveries, the flow–through share system has shown it is worthwhile for governments, since it generates major economic spinoffs.

Already in September 1982, a report on the Canadian mineral industry identified five areas of urgency requiring immediate government intervention; there was urgency then, they said. They were: preventing further erosion of Canada's economic competitiveness in certain key areas of mineral production, including those of copper and nickel; halting and reversing the depletion of mineral reserves; finding new ideas and developing technologies, policies and programs to encourage greater efficiency in mining exploration; reversing the apparent trend of mining investors, including Canadian multinationals, to drop Canada in favour of countries in Latin America, Asia or the Pacific and other areas of development in the world where resources are plentiful; and, finally, generally creating a political and regulatory context better suited to maintain industry viability and stimulate investment in mining exploration.

After 13 years of work by various committees on natural resources and others and with similar conclusions for problems which do not seem to have been resolved and after two federal governments, we are at practically the same point, hence the urgency and the need to act.

If Canada remains at the forefront in the metals market, it is due to the low cost of its mining operations attibutable in large measure to the high level of industry productivity.

The Canadian mineral industry therefore managed to increase its productivity significantly through the rationalization necessitated by the recession in the 1980s.

All of the sectors of the mining industry have significantly increased their productivity by adopting new technologies and mining methods, developed, for the most part, in Canada.

We must therefore support the industry's effort so as to avoid a decline in mine reserves and prepare new deposits for mining to replace those that will eventually be used up.

For many years, the Association des prospecteurs du Québec has been calling in vain for three measures that would promote mining exploration: extension of the expenditure period to 12 months in the year following the year in which the equity was raised and harmonization by Ottawa; a federal measure whereby only the capital gain over and above the net purchase cost would be taxable, something the PDAC is also calling for—Quebec already has a similar measure—; and greater deductibility of exploration expenses federally—the rate is currently 100 per cent federally and 175 per cent in Quebec.

Carrying part of work funded in one year over to the next would not mean any additional expense to the public purse.

To administer this measure, the Association des prospecteurs du Québec proposes a trust mechanism under a mandate conferred by the governments on private sector organizations, which would ensure technical and financial expenditures were justified. The users would pay the costs of the trust.

• (1340)

I have just given a long list of measures which would assist the mining industry and which would meet the demands of various groups. Not all are easy to implement in these times of severe government cutbacks.

However, a large number of them would not cost the public anything and could be very profitable in the medium run. The government must learn to distinguish between measures which involve expenditures and measures which yield dividends for the public purse.

It is essential to restore a climate conducive to mining investment in Canada and in Quebec. According to Natural Resources Canada, data dating back to June 1994 indicate that Canada's investment in exploration barely reaches 17 per cent of world spending in that field, while it was 23 per cent in 1991. We have good grounds to believe that within five years, if nothing is done to create a favourable climate for mining investment in Canada, this figure could drop to 10 per cent.

Such data clearly suggest that Canada must do something fast to reverse this trend. The various levels of government will have to work together to improve fiscal and environmental regulations, as well as regulations governing access to land for the mining exploration industry.

The mining industry can still contribute to the economic development of a country, as many South American countries which rely on the expertise and the financing of Canada to develop their economies have discovered. They know how to attract mining and exploration companies.

The present outflow of exploration funds and the selling of our expertise to foreign countries will lead, in Canada in the years to come, to a reduction of employment in the mining industry and in associated industries like transportation, and therefore to a reduction of the share of the mining sector in the Canadian GNP.

I hope that the measures I just proposed, as well as those proposed by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Natural Resources will be considered and implemented as soon as possible. In Canada and Quebec, we have the mining potential, the technical know–how and the money to allow our mining industry to increase its economic contribution, but the government has to be willing to do its part.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address the House concerning this motion that the government should consider revitalizing investment in mining exploration in Canada by providing fiscal incentives.

[English]

Let me begin by thanking the hon. member for Abitibi for bringing this matter before the House. The Government of Canada acknowledges that it is important for all Canadians to recognize that mining will continue to be a key sector of the Canadian economy for generations to come.

[Translation]

On behalf of the Minister of Natural Resources, I am pleased to have this opportunity to be able to tell the House about the measures that the government is presently taking to maintain or increase the economic and social benefits Canadians derive from the mineral and mining exploration sectors.

[English]

Mining directly contributes $20 billion to the national economy every year and creates more than 300,000 jobs for some 115 communities throughout Canada. It has significant benefits in almost every other sector of our economy. How many Canadians know, for example, that toothpaste has five minerals in it or that sunscreen contains zinc? How many Canadians think of the mining industry when they add salt to their food or when they switch on their computers or start their cars?

Simply put, without mining and minerals many of the things we take for granted today would not exist. The World Bank recently released a new report ranking all countries on the basis of total wealth. That report ranked Canada as the second wealthiest nation in the world when taking into account our vast natural resources.

Mineral exploration is fundamental to a healthy mining sector. We are witnessing a significant improvement in the fortunes of the Canadian mining industry, thanks in part to recent increases in spending on mineral exploration. Total exploration expenditures for 1994 were $630 million. This total represents an increase of $150 million, or 32 per cent compared to exploration expenditures in 1993. Moreover, the favourable trend is continuing, and spending could approach $675 million in the current year.

The amount of flow through share financing to support mineral exploration in Canada has been on the rise since 1991, when it totalled $40 million. This indicates the increasingly positive prospects for the mining industry in Canada. Flow through shares financing totalled $80 million in 1994 and is projected to be between $80 million and $90 million this year.

There are other facts that demonstrate a turnaround for the industry. This year it is expected that 14 new mines will be opened and that 11 mines will be reopened, representing a net gain of some 700 new jobs. This year could be one of the best years for mining since 1981 in terms of mine openings. Preliminary data indicates the outlook for 1996 may be even brighter. In addition, figures concerning Canada's base metal reserves have been increasing recently. The Voisey Bay nickel discovery in Labrador has been cited as one of the world's richest. There has been tremendous interest and investment in diamond exploration activities. These are just a few of the highlights of healthy recent activity by the industry that is stimulating a number of benefits and jobs in particular.

Let me now turn to the role of the federal government in the mining and minerals sector. The Government of Canada made some very difficult choices in the budget, which were made for the benefit of the country in the long term and did not include any new tax incentives for any sector of the Canadian economy, including mining.

Although we cannot afford any new incentive programs, Canada is still one of the most generous countries in the world when it comes to encouraging mining exploration activities. At the federal level all exploration and preproduction development expenses are fully deductible. In recognition of the special needs and risks of resource development, the flow through share financing instrument allows those deductions to be transferred to individual investors.

Provincial governments, as the resource owners, also have an important role to play in encouraging mineral exploration. Over the past few years a number of them have taken steps to promote exploration activities by introducing new tax incentives. Since the provinces have primary responsibility for determining the pace of activity within their jurisdictions, these steps are highly appropriate, in my view.

We believe the mining industry has a strong future in Canada, but we are also aware the industry faces challenges. During the last federal election the Liberal Party was the only political party to release a detailed plan outlining its commitment to the mining industry. That commitment still stands.

Working closely with the provinces, we will continue to support and encourage the mining sector in Quebec and in every other province and territory across Canada. One of the best ways to do this is to reduce the long term structural impediment to mineral investment. Many of these impediments were identified by the Whitehorse mining initiative, an unprecedented multi–stakeholder initiative that led to a common vision for Canada's mining industry through shared principles and goals. The federal government was a full participant in this 18–month exercise.

To help develop an action plan to address the Whitehorse Mining Initiative issues that fell within federal jurisdiction, the Minister of Natural Resources has established an advisory committee composed of representatives from the mining industry, labour, aboriginal and environmental groups. One of the committee's first tasks will be to provide commentary and advice on the sustainable development and minerals metals issues paper that was released for discussion in September in Vancouver.

The Government of Canada has already taken several steps to address the most fundamental industry concerns. For example, in the 1994 budget we introduced a deduction for mine reclamation trust fund contributions. In "Building a More Innovative Economy", our government-wide plan for economic growth and job creation, we identified six major sectors of the economy that will benefit from substantive long term improvements to the federal regulatory regime. One of the six sectors is the Canadian mining industry.

Mining sector areas under active consideration include changes to the administration of the Fisheries Act, land use and related decision making, the definition of waste, regulatory regimes north of 60, regulatory impact analysis, and toxic management. As well, important improvements on the issues of overlap and duplication may be achieved through the harmonization initiative of the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment.

We believe that the less costly and more efficient regulatory regime that we are trying to achieve will lead to an improved investment climate that is respectful of sustainable development principles. I emphasize our commitment to environmental protection will not be compromised.

The Government of Canada is already making an effective contribution to improve the conditions that are required to ensure that exploration activity will continue to rise in this country. The harmonization of environmental assessment regimes between federal and provincial orders of government and regulatory reform measures through the "Building a More Innovative Economy" initiatives are real and meaningful efforts to reduce overlap and duplication. The goal is to provide stable and predictable conditions that will attract more investment for mineral exploration and for economic activity throughout Canada. The result is that this activity will stimulate new opportunities in Canada and help to put more Canadians back to work.

The Government of Canada is confident that the prospects for mining in Canada will continue to improve and that mining will realize the full potential of Canada's rich geology in a manner that is consistent with the principles of sustainable development. As a result Canadians will be able to enjoy the many benefits that come from a strong mining industry for many generations to come.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to follow the parliamentary secretary. Obviously there is no time for a major intervention.

I find it interesting that one of the other initiatives of the federal government in response to how to keep mining off the rocks was that the standing committee made about 20 recommendations last year that an all-party committee agreed would help to spur on the mining industry within Canada, and the government chose to ignore every single one. They were good words, but I do not think there is a lot of proof in the pudding.

We are here to address the motion of the hon. member for Abitibi:

> That, in the opinion of the House, the government should consider revitalizing investment in exploration in Canada and in Quebec by providing for fiscal incentives, including flow through shares.

In my capacity as the party critic for natural resources, it is a privilege to speak to this issue.

Flow through shares are one way to subsidize industry. They cost the taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars a few years ago, with only a very few positive results.

We in the Reform Party have called for a reduction in government subsidies to business. We feel that if it is in the market's interest to explore for more oil, gas, diamonds, coal, or whatever it is, the market will marshal the funds necessary to go ahead and do the exploration.

What is the role of the federal government in this regard? Does it have a role? I believe it does. It remains for the federal government to provide a regulatory regime for industry that clears the way for industry to go ahead with sustainable development.

I will clarify what I mean by sustainable development. Development means we want to develop our natural resources. It does not mean preservation; it means sustainable development. Development is a key word. Canadians depend on natural resources for a huge proportion of our jobs, our income, and our standard of living. Sustainable means we want to continue to develop them for decades to come, and in order to do that we have to deal very carefully with our environment. This requires a balance between the two.

A Price Waterhouse study released yesterday dealing with British Columbia's forest practices code illustrates how this balance is fairing in Canada. Enforcing the new code will cost the economy 46,000 jobs in British Columbia. This shows that Canada is losing its balance when it comes to sustainability versus development.

In our concern for sustainability, I believe we are bordering on hysteria and catering to preservationists instead of people concerned with sustainable development. We are stifling development in our country. This is not the intention of the concept of sustainable development.

I met yesterday with representatives of the mining association and listened to the problems they are encountering in their industry. I will give the House one example. They told me that mining companies are warned before any exploration takes place that federal environmental regulators will take a minimum of three years to approve their application for a mine. Instead of getting one permit for one mine, a company must go to every federal and provincial department, official, and bureaucrat in North America to get separate permits to develop what should be a straightforward process. This all takes a minimum of three years. In other countries the same process takes half that time.

Is it any wonder that the mining companies I am familiar with, especially in the British Columbia area, have put so many of their resources into Chile and other countries where they have friendlier and more receptive governments?

The old way of doing business was to assist companies by subsidizing them. Subsidies insulated companies from the market. In the case of flow through shares, in some cases they caused exploration to take place where that was costly, unnecessary and unproductive. This is what the Department of Finance said in its report on the subject in October 1994.

The new way of doing business is to encourage development in an environmentally sustainable way. That requires balance between our concern for the environment on the one hand and our desire and necessity to explore and develop our resources for the benefit of all Canadians.

If sectors of the industry are suffering in Canada, it is not the fault of the federal government for not subsidizing it. The fault lies in a regulatory regime, at least partially, that needs streamlining and co-ordination between different federal and provincial jurisdictions.

The second thing we need, and I do not want to elaborate on this too much, is a tax regime in Canada that is competitive with other nations. We also need, and this is very important, to resolve our disagreements over land use and tenure. We need to resolve that with our aboriginal people so we can move forward and establish stable environmental standards, land use standards and a tax regime that is predictable so that mining companies feel comfortable and confident in investing in our Canadian future.

How many times have we heard industry say that if you just get off my back as far as taxes go, get out of my hair as far as regulations and unnecessary duplication go, I will create jobs and opportunities in this country that will make your head spin. We hear that time and again. They do not need or want a subsidy.

I am surprised and I might almost say astonished that this particular motion would come from the member for Abitibi. Let me paraphrase what he says. He says he wants the federal government to pour money into subsidies for industry in Canada and in Quebec. I am surprised, because the member for Abitibi is a member of the Bloc Quebecois, which as we all know is a political party with only one purpose, and that is to destroy Canada as we know it by taking Quebec out of Confederation. It is even more astonishing since natural resources, by our own Constitution, is and should be in the purview of the provincial government. Not only that, but in the middle of his own campaign to destroy the federal government, the member stands up in the House and asks that the federal government subsidize more industry in Quebec.

I hope the member understands that people from my riding are frustrated by this kind of behaviour. This is a good illustration of Quebec's separatist movement, which lives in a world of illusion, a fairy tale where one wants to enjoy the best of both worlds.

The separatists have always been of two minds on the subject of independence. It reminds me of someone who wants to have his own place, his own car, his own life, but he wants his parents to pay for it.

With a motion like the member has put forward, I wonder if the member is really a sovereignist at heart at all. If he really believed in independence he would be asking the federal government to get out of Quebec, not subsidize the industry there. Perhaps the member secretly depends on the family and he does not really want out of it; he just wants his own apartment.

I believe that most Quebecers take a more mature view of life and of our country. They recognize that the Canadian house is big enough for the entire Canadian family to live together in happiness and prosperity.

The Reform Party agrees with the member for Abitibi in calling for change. Change is necessary; we all recognize that. However, we are calling for a new Canada, not a separate nation of Quebec. We are calling for a new Canada, a Canada built on equality but a Canada with a smaller federal government role, not a larger one, where all regions can be satisfied with a less oppressive federal fiscal framework.

I reiterate to the House and my constituents that I am anxious that Quebec remain an equal partner within Canada.

Last spring I went down to Montreal. I caught one of the last games played in the old Montreal Forum. As we were wandering around in the old part of Montreal before the game and we were talking to people, they were very friendly. A couple of times people came up to me on the corner—I guess I obviously was looking for something at the time—and offered to help us out and give us directions and so on. I was very impressed. I thought that was a typically Canadian thing to do. If you see somebody in trouble you want to help out. In my travels and in talking to many people I have found that Canadians are basically the same everywhere.

• (1400)

The more I talk to francophones the more I realize they have the same goals and aspirations as people elsewhere in Canada. They want good jobs with good incomes, safe streets, a fair taxation system. They want less government bureaucracy in their lives. They want much the same things as people everywhere else. We share common values and interests. The language we speak is really of secondary importance to those major things.

Language is a code. We can speak English or French. We can use Morse code or a computer language. We can do what we like in that area. It is just a method of communication. What is important is what we are communicating, the content of our communication, the core values we have regardless of the language we use.

I believe that as Canadians we want to continue to communicate with one another. Quebecers have given their time and energy to building homes, industries, towns and cities that are among the best on the entire planet. During the world wars and in our peacekeeping duties they have spilled their own blood to carry Canadian values around the world. They see that Canada is the best place in the world in which to live. I am confident they are going to vote no on October 30.

In closing, we do not support any motions that call for more subsidies. That is the old market distorting way of doing business. We would welcome a motion from the Bloc calling for a better balance between sustainability and development in Canada. That is supportable everywhere. Most of all, regardless of where we are in Canada, we invite Quebecers, including Bloc members, to join hands with Canadians, whether we are English Canadians, Japanese, Italian or of whatever descent to build a new and united Canada together.

[Translation]

Mr. René Canuel (Matapédia—Matane, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Reform member had a lot to say about the Bloc, but I just want to make a quick comment. He said that Quebecers are polite and that is true. We are extremely nice and polite and we know that.

However, I do not agree with the member when he says that language is a secondary issue. Language is a reflection of one's culture on the North American continent, and it is certainly not a secondary issue for Quebecers.

I cannot help but wonder: If language is a secondary issue for the member, that means he attaches little importance to us; consequently, why does he want us to remain part of Canada? The only true reason I can find is of an economic nature. This is why we are important to western and atlantic provinces, and why they want us to remain part of Canada. I just figured out why they do not want us to become sovereign.

There is no doubt in my mind that natural resources are, for a future country like Quebec but also Canada, a very important economic tool.

A country that has no natural resources or that does not pay proper attention to their development will, sooner or later, experience serious problems in the context of global competition.

Of course, its economy will be seriously affected, but one must remember that a country's natural resources are an asset for the whole community, not only for some individuals or large corporations.

Natural resources in both Quebec and in Canada belong to their respective communities. If they are developed for the well–being of the people, they are central to development.

Not only do they create jobs, but they also greatly contribute to economic growth.

• (1405)

When our raw materials are transformed here into finished products, they create a very important collective wealth. One must never forget that a job created in the natural resource sector has a multiplying effect on the whole economy, as long as we are not only raw material suppliers, as we have been too often in forestry. We ship wood from the Matapedia area to Montreal and Toronto, then finished wood products are shipped back to us.

In the mining sector, the discovery of minable deposits, or exploration, is at the very beginning of this potential chain. But for that chain to be started, we should, as my colleague for Abitibi suggested, consider revitalizing investment in exploration in Canada, notably by providing for fiscal incentives, including flow–through shares. Quebec is a good example.

To generate every possible benefit, natural resources development planning must be consistent and, surely, ongoing. It would be wrong to think that we can leave this to the private sector alone, as some trends of thought would have it. It is necessary for governments, through their tax system, and flow–through shares among other incentives, to foster investment in exploration. In Canada, over the past few decades, we have seen a clear decline in the exploration and the processing of our natural resources, particularly in mining. We are now making a fresh start. All the better.

Several issues are at the root of the problems facing Quebec and all of Canada in this major sector of our economy. First and not the least is the constant fluctuation of the global markets, which is indeed a very sensitive issue. Sudden fluctuations of the world economy have greatly affected the development of our natural resources. When the prices of natural resources go up and down like in a roller coaster, massive investment in that industry does not seem very attractive.

The other problem has to do, of course, with the general economic slowdown. When the demand is decreasing, exploration and transformation also slow down. Another important element is the inefficiency of exploration incentives. The current tax system is not in sync with the real objectives. We must change it, for example by providing flow–through shares.

Most of the stakeholders in the mining industry we have met during the hearings of the Standing Committee on Natural Resources agree that the current measures are not very efficient. Also, they do not meet their goal, which is to promote exploration and discovery of new deposits.

Some stakeholders think that the current measures only reward the big corporations, who can unfortunately deduct part of their operating costs from their income tax. The inefficiency of current tax measures is only increased by all the red tape due to the federal government infringing upon an exclusively provincial area of jurisdiction, as enshrined in the constitution.

Because of the lack of program co–ordination in this field as in many others, developers as well as producers waste a lot of time and energy. Having to go constantly from one level of government to the other to get authorizations, to ensure compliance with existing policies or to adjust to the different tax standards of each government, to try to understand and, especially, to make people understand is far from productive for businesses. This waste of time is reflected in substantial losses.

In the Bloc Quebecois, we wish that once and for all the federal government would fully recognize the jurisdiction of Quebec and the other provinces over natural resources. We want Ottawa to give the provinces control over natural resources and to truly encourage investment in exploration through tax incentives such as the flow–through shares, for example, in co–operation with the provinces.

I do not understand the federal government's attitude. Why is it trying so hard to take over resource management from Quebec and the other provinces? Why is it always sticking its nose in areas where it has no business? Why is it not working with the provinces instead of competing with them, and, moreover, using our money, our tax dollars to do so?

Why is it not adjusting the federal tax system in co–operation with the provinces to make it more responsive to the real needs of the industry? This is what we want to know. Is it because, as certain federalist big guns have said, those of us from Quebec and the provinces are incapable of doing the work or simply of delivering?

On the contrary, we, Quebecers, are perfectly capable of managing our own natural resources. Our social and political institutions have a long democratic tradition. Our people are well educated, and we can count on a multitude of workers capable of doing all the jobs in natural resource exploration and processing.

We have very abundant natural resources. Over the years, Quebec has acquired the ability to act as it sees fit in organizing development, and its tax system strongly supports its industry.

With the help of adjusted fiscal programs and so–called flow–through shares, Quebec has been able to further diversify its economy in areas such as culture, research and processing.

Quebec has changed over the last thirty years, and we can no longer tolerate that our natural resources be practically given away, as was unfortunately the case in the past.

Through our tax system, we have encouraged Quebecers to invest in their own province. The experience of the development of Northern Quebec has left indelible marks. Hopefully, we will never again see foreign industries shut down towns and villages, and abandon entire regions. As Quebecers, our success in the area of natural resources certainly no longer depends on foreign investors or on federalism.

On the contrary, our success is the result of our imagination, our initiative, our actions, our creativity, our decisions, our efforts and the desire of Quebecers to play an active role in their own economy.

The tax measures introduced by successive Quebec governments have played a very important role, and all of Canada readily recognizes it.

Moreover, these tax measures and our own successes have helped to reduce our dependency toward foreign investors. While in the rest of Canada, the federal government begged foreign investors to develop natural resources, we, in Quebec, took control of our destiny. At present, the French–speaking Quebecers control more than half of the industrial and commercial corporations in Quebec. This is remarkable. This is almost twice as much as 30 years ago. In Canada, we see the opposite happening.

During these 30 years, a growing number of Canadian owned companies have fallen into foreign investors hands. Any country that lets foreigners extract its natural resources is no longer a master in its own house.

Finally, I know very well that all these requests I just made will not amount to much. Even if it would have us believe otherwise the present government is very centralizing.

We of the Bloc Quebecois want our neighbour, Canada, to remain very strong, especially in the mining area, since it will be one of our economic partners after October 30.

The Deputy Speaker: Dear colleagues, since no other member wants to speak and since the motion has not been declared a votable item, the hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

CRIMINAL CODE

The House resumed from June 6 consideration of the motion that Bill C–277, an act to amend the Criminal Code (genital mutilation of female persons), be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–277 is technically an amendment to the Criminal Code of Canada dealing with the subject of female genital mutilation. This issue raises a wide variety of concerns: legal, medical, immigration and multicultural. All of these issues must be addressed when dealing with Bill C–277.

The most important issue the bill raises is that of clashing cultural values. How tolerant is a multicultural country like Canada supposed to be in accepting the cultural values of immigrants? As a general rule, Canada has been one of the most tolerant nations in accepting and encouraging differing value systems.

However, this acceptance has not and cannot be absolute. For example, Canada has not accepted polygamy as an acceptable way of life, even though it is common practice in many nations. Some might argue our refusal to accept polygamy is discriminatory. My response to such criticism is simple. If you do not like the rules we play by in Canada, do not come to our country.

Hundreds of thousands of immigrants and refugees come to our nation every year to start a new and better life, but when they come to our country they agree to play by our rules. Our rules say one cannot have more than one spouse and, more important, that one does not mutilate little girls. Female circumcision is just that, mutilation.

There is no religion in the world that prescribes female circumcision as part of its doctrine. It is rather a cultural tradition in some countries in northern and eastern Africa. Because Canada accepts immigrants from all over the world, it is an issue that now is a concern for Canadian law makers.

During the first hour of debate on this bill, members from all parties provided examples of why this is an issue in Canada. While I will not repeat the examples, suffice it to say there appears to be a body of evidence that female genital mutilation is taking place in Canada today. While there appears to be a fairly substantial body of evidence that female genital mutilation is occurring in Canada, there has never been a prosecution of anyone involved in such a procedure. Why?

The bill presented to the House by my colleague from Quebec would make anyone who commits genital mutilation guilty of an indictable offence. As well, anyone who aids, abets, counsels or procures the performance of female genital mutilation would be similarly guilty of an indictable offence.

The members from the government who spoke on the bill believe more counselling is needed and if criminal charges are necessary they can be covered by existing legislation.

What better way of counselling anyone who comes from a culture that practises female genital mutilation than by having a section in the Criminal Code by which if anyone commits female genital mutilation or even aids, abets, counsels or procures such an act he or she is guilty of a serious crime?

If we are serious about eliminating this practice that is the message we should be sending to these communities. I ask the government members who say current legislation already covers this act why there has never been a prosecution of such an act in Canada. If there ever is a prosecution under the assault causing bodily harm provisions of the Criminal Code, the defence would be arguing there never was any criminal intent to cause bodily harm.

By making this a specific offence, as laid out in Bill C–277, all the crown would have to prove is that those charged knowingly participated in female genital mutilation.

I have to agree with the members for Calgary Southeast and Bellechasse who called for an increased maximum sentence. If, as Liberal members suggest, charges could be laid under the assault causing bodily harm provisions of the code, the maximum penalty for committing this specific crime of female genital mutilation should be the same as the 10–year maximum that exists for assault causing bodily harm.

Let us not make any bones about it, female genital mutilation is a serious offence committed against young girls in the 10 to 12–year range. It is, in effect, extreme child abuse.

While I am generally reluctant to give the provincial legislatures any advice on how to run their affairs, I will make an exception here. I strongly believe that once Parliament passes Bill C–277 or similar legislation the provinces should make amendments to their child protection acts. These amendments should make the reporting of female genital mutilation mandatory for those employed in health, education and social service professions.

It is important the House send a clear and strong message to everyone in Canada that anyone involved in the practice of female genital mutilation is committing a serious crime. However, I believe that before we get to that stage, Bill C–277 should be given a complete hearing at the committee stage. I would like someone to appear before the justice committee and explain why female genital mutilation should not be criminalized. I would like to be there and hear somebody attempt to defend this practice. I would like to hear someone explain to Canadian parliamentarians why such acts should be allowed to continue in Canada.

However, I have a sneaking suspicion the committee would be unable to find anyone who would publicly justify female genital mutilation. How does one possibly defend the indefensible?

While I believe the issue should be reviewed by the committee, I will not even attempt to give the pretence that my mind can be changed. Female genital mutilation is a violent sexual assault committed against young children under the pretence of a cultural value.

Whether it is a traditional culture value is irrelevant. Can anyone imagine if descendants of the Aztec or Mayan cultures came to Canada and wanted to revive the old cultural tradition of human sacrifice? How about the old tradition of 17th century North Americans of burning women suspected of being witches at the stake? Of course Canadians would never support such things. It is outrageous to even think about it, as is the ritualistic, violent sexual assault of little girls. Some cultural traditions deserve to be extinguished. This is one of them.

Bill C–277 is a good step in making sure this practice never gains a foothold in our country. By supporting Bill C–277 we send a message to those communities that still practise this terrible tradition that such acts will not be tolerated in Canada.

I am happy I do not share the guilt members opposite seem to be racked with when dealing with cross–cultural conflicts. I take pride in having this opportunity to denounce the barbaric act of female genital mutilation and I will stand with those members who support this legislation at second and third reading.

• (1110)

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by congratulating my colleague, the hon. member for Québec, for her courage and tenacity. Courage because she rose to demand new legislation on the practice of genital mutilation. Tenacity, because she continued to push for her bill despite a negative response from the Minister of Justice, since she was convinced that it was both appropriate and necessary.

I am therefore pleased to speak in this debate in support of Bill C–277, since I share the belief of my colleague and the large majority of women and men across Canada and in Quebec that the current legislation must be clarified and reinforced in order to protect women from these barbaric acts.

I share her conviction that the Minister of Justice's great sense of responsibility will lead him to concur that such a modification to the Criminal Code will be beneficial and to revise the decision he reached in April 1994.

The Minister of Justice's decision not to criminalize excision was based on two arguments: charges may be laid against those practising excision under the present provisions of the legislation, and the intent is to focus on prevention.

I feel that those two arguments are too weak to justify the decision not to make any changes to the Criminal Code. I have nothing against prevention and information, far from it; one cannot be against what is right, but as Machiavelli said many, many years ago, virtue alone has no effect on man unless it is reinforced by a degree of deterrence.

Prevention is fine, but above all specific legislation needs to be passed to prohibit the practice of mutilating the genitals of women and girls. After all, what is there to prevent after the harm has been done?

At present, the Criminal Code prohibits anyone from assaulting, causing bodily harm to, or killing another human being. The minister contends that these provisions are enough to prohibit all kinds of genital mutilation. I think not, because this legislation is too vague and does not deal specifically enough with excision. A person who performs or causes this kind of mutilation to be performed could use religious and particularly cultural arguments to justify this practice. Legislation such as the Canadian Multiculturalism Act and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms require that the various cultures be recognized and promoted.

It so happens that genital mutilation is a standard in many cultures, including Africa and Asia.

I do not think we all have to be lawyers to understand that the existing legislation is not as efficient as the minister would have us believe. Several provisions are likely to discourage a crown prosecutor from preferring charges or a judge from convicting to the full extent of the law in such instances, however few they may be.

Education and prevention are fine, but that is just not enough. Monitoring needs to be instituted to find, denounce and, more importantly, effectively punish offenders.

Action is required. Existing provisions do not prevent such acts from being committed. Also, one can seriously question the effectiveness of a prevention policy consisting merely of information. The only choice left is for the legislator to make a special law to unequivocally criminalize the practice of such mutilations.

Bill C–277 is not that complex. It does not call for a complete overhaul of the system. It is just a few lines long. And let me quote the proposed amendment to be added after section 244. It reads as follows:

> A person who:
> (a) excises or otherwise mutilates, in whole or in part, the labia majora, labia minora or clitoris of a female person; or
> (b) aids, abets, counsels or procures the performance by another person of any of the acts described in paragraph (a) is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years.

• (1115)

That is all. Two small paragraphs. That is all we need to settle this matter once and for all. I do not understand why the minister is reluctant to pass a bill that is so short but that would reinforce the current Criminal Code and make it much more of a deterrent.

Allow me to speak of this issue in a little more detail. According to studies published in 1993–94, between 85 million and 114 million of the women alive at that time had undergone genital mutilation.

According to some figures, the number of genital mutilation cases has increased by 2 million a year in nearly 40 countries in Africa, Asia and the Middle East. These procedures are performed on girls aged 4 to 10 on average. That is appalling.

Although impressive, these figures do not say anything about the trauma experienced by these girls, most of whom are quite young. They do not say anything about the pain suffered both during and after these mutilations or on the health problems many of the victims will face for the rest of their lives.

Often performed in unsanitary conditions by people without any real medical knowledge, these mutilations can have many adverse consequences, including haemorrhages, incontinence, abscesses, infections, traumas, shock and infertility.

Those who perform these procedures use improperly sterilized tools, if not plain kitchen knives. According to a document from the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, sugar, eggs, thorns and palm ribs are also used.

Very painful and often performed without anaesthesia, these irreversible procedures often result in traumas as well as sexual and psychological complications for the victims.

I do not think I need to continue describing this practice to give members a good understanding of what we are dealing with.

This practice is clearly unacceptable and should never be condoned. We must also ensure that those who perform these procedures are severely punished. Unfortunately, as I pointed out earlier, current legal provisions do not have enough teeth to be 100 per cent effective. We must ensure that this practice is no longer used in our society. The current legislation does not achieve that goal; prevention alone is not enough. However, Bill C–277 would certainly do it.

We could talk for a long time about the benefits and the merits of such a bill. But what is important is to understand that, in a country that claims to be democratic, these religious, cultural or other traditions are indefensible and reprehensible. As a self respecting society claiming to protect its individual members, it is immoral to condone such shameful atrocities.

Yet, and unfortunately so, this is what the Minister of Justice did by rejecting the suggestion to amend the Criminal Code so as to explicitly prohibit excision.

Bill C–277, which was introduced by the hon. member for Québec, provides an opportunity to correct the situation, once and for all, in a simple and efficient manner. France, Great Britain and Sweden have already outlawed that practice, while Norway and several American states have strengthened their legislation to that effect. The time has come for us to take concrete action. It must be made clear to Canadians and those who come to our country that genital mutilation is not only unacceptable as a matter of principle, but also not accepted and severely punished, since it is in fact a crime.

Mr. Stan Dromisky (Thunder Bay—Atikokan, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to address the House regarding Bill C–277, an act to amend the Criminal Code as it pertains to the genital mutilation of female persons, proposed by the hon. member for Québec.

The bill aims to make persons who perform female genital mutilation or who aid, abet, counsel or procure the performance by another person of female genital mutilation guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years.

I state from the outset my personal repulsion of this practice. It is without a doubt a practice which causes great harm. However, we must not allow our disgust with the practice to cloud our reasoning about the member's proposed bill as an effective means of addressing this problem.

As for the cultural practices in other lands it is out of our scope to dictate what should or should not be included in their criminal codes. Societies practising female genital mutilation will change their behaviour only on understanding that the intent behind their action can be achieved by other less harmful means.

Female genital mutilation is a practice which inflicts harm on an estimated 85 million to 115 million girls and women, with about two million girls being subjected to this ritual annually worldwide.

There is no doubt that the practice can prove very harmful to the health of a baby girl and eventually of the woman. There is an indisputable medical link between female genital mutilation and a myriad of short and long term health consequences. Some have already been mentioned such as severe haemorrhaging, shock, infections, infertility, urine retention, sexual dysfunction, difficulties with child birth and even death.

As I mentioned earlier, this well intentioned bill poses certain problems. The Minister of Justice indicated in March he was of the opinion that an amendment to the Criminal Code was not necessary at this time. The minister informed members of the House that there are those who are knowledgeably involved who believe amending the Criminal Code at this time could inadvertently drive the practice even further underground, and the government agrees. Instead the government prefers to engage in a comprehensive educational campaign which outlines the health risk of the procedure and the criminality of the practice.

All hon. members should be made aware the Criminal Code of Canada does have a provision which could cover those who practice female genital mutilation. Presently sections of the code which apply include assault causing bodily harm, section 267, unlawfully causing bodily harm, section 269, and aggravated assault, section 268, all of which are indictable offences with maximum sentences of between 10 and 14 years. Section 268 refers to the situation in which a person wounds, maims, disfigures or endangers the life of the complainant.

There are other sections of the Criminal Code which could be used to prosecute either the person performing the procedure or the parents for their part in arranging for it to be carried out. Also, a recent amendment to the code aims to address situations in which a Canadian resident is taken from the country with the purpose of committing an act against him or her which would ordinarily be an offence if committed in Canada. This section of the code provides for a maximum sentence of five years for an indictable offence.

Over and above existing Criminal Code provisions, the hon. member should know Ontario and Quebec have child protection laws which allow for a child to be taken into the custody of the province should reasonable suspicion exist that she may be subjected to female genital mutilation either in Canada or abroad. It is apparent that the Canadian Criminal Code already provides for the necessary measures to prosecute those persons perpetrating female genital mutilation.

Instead we must concentrate on educating the public but we must also educate the police, crown attorneys and the medical professions by informing them that female genital mutilation constitutes criminal behaviour and as such must be dealt with accordingly. We will work together and we must work together with the above stakeholders in order to ensure existing laws are enforced in this respect.

On the practice of female genital mutilation from a global perspective, I firmly believe we must not lose sight of the fact that denouncing the practice can make some of us feel better and self–righteous but certainly does not solve the problem worldwide.

The director general to the World Health Organization's global commission on women's health indicates that the purpose of the organization should not be to criticize and condemn; however, nor should we remain passive.

We know female genital mutilation is painful and can have dire health consequences. However, we must also take into account that human behaviours and cultural values, no matter how senseless or harmful they appear in light of our personal and cultural perspectives, do have a meaning for those who practice them.

The key is to convince people they can give up a certain practice without compromising the important ideals cherished by their cultures. Also instrumental is the need to impart on adherence of the practice the great health risk that can result from this diabolical practice.

Parents across the globe are similar in that ultimately they want what is in the best interests of their children. If they are presented with credible options, an alternative to female genital mutilation in a way that takes into account their own social, cultural and economic environments, we will then be able to find a global solution.

I thank the member for Quebec for bringing this crucial issue to the attention of the House.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, let me ask you this question: If the justice minister were a woman, do you not think that we would already have a bill amending the Criminal Code and explicitly prohibiting the genital mutilation of female persons?

Were it not for the initiative of the hon. member for Québec, women would still be waiting for a bill to protect the victims of such a barbaric and cruel practice. Genital mutilation of female persons is one of the most harmful forms of violence against young girls and it is a terrible violation of their fundamental right to physical integrity.

Just thinking of such an atrocity totally overwhelms me with horror and disgust and I must warn the Minister of Justice that he is likely to find the description I am about to give extremely disturbing. Perhaps after hearing it he will better understand the kind of butchery being practised throughout the world, including Canada and Quebec.

There are three forms of mutilation carried out. I will present them in order of degree. The first, removal of the prepuce of the clitoris; the second, excision, which involves removing the entire clitoris and often the adjacent portions of the labia minora; the third, infibulation, which involves excising the entire clitoris, the labia minora and a portion of the labia majora.

When infibulation is performed, both sides of the vulva are closed over the vagina, leaving a small opening for the passage of urine and menstrual blood. In infibulation, the vaginal orifice is closed either with thorns or catgut sutures. The gaping raw edges of the labia majora are held together until scar tissue forms, thus closing up the vagina except for a narrow orifice which is kept open with a small piece of wood or reed.

The child's legs are then bound together. The little girl is immobilized for several weeks or until the tissues have healed. To enable infibulated women to have sexual relations, it is necessary to open the orifice with an incision which is further enlarged when they give birth. Often they are sewn up again afterwards, at the husband's request.

There is none so deaf as those who will not hear. The Minister of Justice was definitely not listening when in December 1994, on the tragic anniversary of the massacre at the École Polytechnique, I and several of my colleagues emphatically condemned this odious practice.

This barbaric procedure has now been imported to Canada and Quebec. Our doctors are seeing an increasing number of young girls with health problems related to genital mutilation. It will soon be one year since we last discussed this in the House, and so far the Minister of Justice has done nothing to stop this practice. I hope that he will at least support the representations of my colleague, the hon. member for Québec, who has taken the trouble to table a bill prohibiting genital mutilation.

The Minister of Justice lately mentioned a series of bills tabled by his government to help victims, and the list goes: C–37, C–41, C–42 and C–45, and so forth. An impressive body of legislation, whose effectiveness remains to be seen.

The agenda of the Department of Justice is quite full. But I warn the minister that: "Grasp all, lose all". Some of the legislative measures are so far off the goal set by the government that we might be led to believe that the Minister of Justice has undertaken a Sisyphean task.

In November 1994, the Quebec Minister of Justice, Paul Bégin, demanded that his federal counterpart prohibit genital mutilation and amend the Criminal Code accordingly. Sweden, Belgium, Norway, the United Kingdom and some American states have already passed legislation prohibiting genital mutilation.

The Minister of Justice had the gall to answer that the sections of the Criminal Code dealing with assault were sufficient to condemn a person guilty of practising excision. Genital mutilation is much more than just assault, it is torture, butchery and an unqualifiable violation of a human person.

The House managed to pass, on the double, a bill to protect victims and facilitate the arrest of the guilty parties. Thanks to the support of the official opposition, Bill C–104 on DNA passed through all stages on the same day, June 22 of this year. The Minister of Justice is always willing to play Lancelot when he knows that a bill will get unanimous support. It is easy to preach for virtue. It is something else to make political hay out of it.

Where is the fearless Lancelot in today's debate? He is dragging his feet, he is consulting. Last summer our Don Quixote of public security thought that it would be useful to organize an information session on mutilation of women's genital organs for interested members. Guests of the Minister of Justice were Eunadie Johnson and Fadumo Dirie, cochairpersons of the Ontario task force on the prevention of genital mutilation of female persons.

The minister expected that Mrs. Johnson and Mrs. Dirie would concur with his views on the risk of unilateral legislation dealing specifically with genital mutilation. He was reluctant to introduce a bill because he thought such an action would push that practice further underground.

But, lo and behold, both guests answered yes to the question of whether a specific piece of legislation would send a clear message to communities which practise mutilation. A criminal code amendment would demonstrate that our society considers that practice unacceptable and that if it is deemed acceptable in other countries, it is not so in Canada or in Quebec.

After the meeting, the Minister of Justice admitted he was not so sure any more about his position. Today, the bill before the House is not a government bill, but a bill introduced by one of my Bloc Quebecois colleagues. That speaks for itself. On this side of the House, we dare to act according to our beliefs. I urged the Minister of Justice to at least support the bill presented by the hon. member for Québec, if he did not have the courage to introduce an amendment to the Criminal Code.

I request the same thing from all members. We should rise above partisanship and indeed walk the talk as we began to do some time ago with private members' bills.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

(Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a committee.)

[English]

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I think you would find unanimous consent to suspend the sitting until twelve o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is there unanimous consent to suspend the House until twelve o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

(The sitting of the House was suspended at 11.37 a.m.)

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 12 p.m.

CANADA TRANSPORTATION ACT

On the Order:

June 20, 1995—The Minister of Transport—Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Transport of Bill C–101, An Act to continue the National Transportation Agency as the Canadian Transportation Agency, to consolidate and revise the National Transportation Act, 1987 and the Railway Act and to amend or repeal other Acts as a consequence.

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That Bill C–101, An Act to continue the National Transportation Agency as the Canadian Transportation Agency, to consolidate and revise the National Transportation Act, 1987 and the Railway Act and to amend or repeal other Acts as a consequence, be referred forthwith to the Standing Committee on Transport.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before I recognize the hon. Minister of Transport to begin this debate I remind the House that under this standing order, members, including the minister, will have 10 minutes to make their interventions without questions or comments.

[Translation]

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, the government's vision for the future of transportation is clear and attainable. Our commitment is to take Canadian transportation into the 21st century on a more viable, integrated and competitive footing.

We are commercializing federal airports, the air navigation system, Canadian National Railways, Marine Atlantic and the department's Motor Vehicle Test Centre.

We have introduced a new international air transportation policy and concluded a landmark Canada/U.S. bilateral air services agreement opening up the skies with our biggest trading partner.

The government will unveil this fall details of the new national marine and ports policy. This policy will set the stage for a more efficient, competitive and fiscally prudent marine transportation and port system and eliminate subsidies except where constitutional obligations require us to continue to pay for services.

We have already eliminated most transportation subsidies and greatly reduced the financial burden of Canadian taxpayers.

On June 20, we introduced Bill C–101, to enact a new Canada Transportation Act. The reason for introducing this legislation last spring was to encourage meaningful dialogue between industry and the government. We have had extensive consultation with CN and CP, other railway companies, shippers, and representatives of other transportation modes.

We have considered reports by the Standing Committee on Transport and, most recently, the recommandations of Task Force on Commercialization led by Mr. Nault, the member for Kenora—Rainy River, now the Parliamentary Secretary for the Minister of Labour.

The rail elements of the legislative package complement our strategy to commercialize CN, but they are far broader than that initiative. They are about enhancing the long term viability of the entire Canadian rail industry. This bill will affect the operations of CN, CP and some 30 other railways that currently operate in Canada, and it will also benefit shippers.

[English]

Some shippers expect levels of rail service to be dictated by law rather than by the significant negotiating leverage they have in the market. They talk about competition but they insist on regulatory protection.

The extraordinary rights shippers had won through the National Transportation Act of 1987, the so–called competitive access rights, are retained. The NTA 1987 included the right to have rail rates regulated under certain conditions. It also included the right to final offer arbitration for a wide variety of disputes between shippers and the railways. This protectionism has benefited Canadian shippers and there has been a reduction in rail freight prices but there has also been a substantial erosion of CN and CP revenues.

Bill C–101 takes aim at regulatory red tape by shortening the length of the arbitration process by one–third, from 90 to 60 days. The bill extends competitive access rights to shippers located on any federally regulated rail line sold to a provincially based rail operator. U.S. shippers in the United States do not enjoy similar provisions.

While we have protected shipper rights we have made amendments to give more precise direction to the regulatory agency in its decision making process. The government's view is that regulated solutions should only be a last resort.

A shipper demand with which we did not agree was for the provision of mandatory running rights for provincially regulated railways. Unlimited running rights would undermine a major objective of the bill which is to foster the growth of a vigorous short line industry across Canada.

• (1205)

Every short line operator in Canada stated that unrestricted running rights were undesirable with the exception of one operator. In the United States, where unrestricted running rights are not available, a thriving short line industry has developed based solely on commercial agreements. There are hundreds of voluntary running right agreements now in effect in Canada, letting the marketplace decide.

The Canadian Pulp and Paper Association, the Western Canadian Shippers Coalition, the Canadian Industrial Transportation League and the Canadian Manufacturers Association have all been lobbying hard against certain elements of Bill C–101. Apparently they believe in competition based on protectionism, an interesting approach for the CMA which in the past aggressively supported open, competitive free markets.

Bill C–101 will modernize and streamline rail regulation to enhance the viability of our major carriers and thereby attempt to ensure rail freight service from coast to coast. Both CN and CP will benefit from a new, transparent, well defined rationalization process that focuses on the sale of underused lines to other operators. The process will be free of archaic, adversarial and lengthy regulatory proceedings and government interference.

Shippers should benefit from more efficient, lower cost rail service and the entry of new participants in the railroad industry. The legislative package will clean up outdated regulations. It will reduce the number of matters which need to be brought to the agency by the railways by about 200 to some 40. For example, 10,000 confidential contracts per year will no longer need to be filed with the agency. This should reduce railways' administrative costs. It will help attract capital back to an industry that has suffered during the economic downturn by shippers to other transportation modes, particularly trucks.

Some provincial legislatures, B.C. and Nova Scotia among others, have recently passed legislation which significantly reduces provincial taxation on railways. The New Brunswick government has put in place a very simple mechanism for the establishment of a provincial short line requiring only an agreement between the transportation minister and the perspective railway.

The Ontario government has indicated its willingness to encourage the creation of short lines by repealing current statutory provisions that have so far discouraged short line operators setting up in that province.

Bill C–101 also removes unnecessary regulation of other transport modes. In future applicants to operate Canadian air services will have to meet minimum financial requirements as well as our stringent safety requirements before they can obtain a licence.

[Translation]

In the wake of deregulation of other modes, access to final offer arbitration has been extended to our northern marine shippers and operators of rail passenger and commuter rail services who must negotiate with mainline carriers for track usage and other services.

The new legislation will put in place a policy that is consistent, transparent and fair and will enhance competition. Canada's transportation system must be modern, dynamic and as unrestricted as possible while maintaining the world class safety record we have earned over the years.

I ask members of all parties to join with me and support the motion to refer Bill C–101 to the Standing Committee on Transport before second reading. This will give the committee an early opportunity to study the bill with its usual care and diligence.

The proposed Canada Transportation Act is one more step this government is taking towards modernizing Canada's transportation sector. It will enable Canada and Canadian businesses to compete worldwide in the 21st century.

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on Bill C–101, whose primary objective is to modernize rail transportation legislation, redefine the mandate of the National Transportation Agency and further deregulate air transportation.

As we estimate that nearly 75 per cent of this bill concerns rail transportation, you will understand this important subject will be the focus of our intervention.

• (1210)

For that reason, as far as the Bloc Quebecois is concerned, Bill C–101 will need definite improvements. I can assure the minister that it will be possible to work much more effectively if there is some kind of openness on the part of his colleagues on the Standing Committee on Transport—and I am talking here about his colleagues representing the Liberal majority.

One of the first points that has to be criticized is clause 89, which says that the bill applies to any railway, whether or not set up under the authority of an Act of Parliament, that is "owned, controlled, leased or operated by a company wholly or partly within legislative authority of Parliament".

This means that Bill C–101 applies to any SLR, which stands for short line railway, owned or controlled by a national railway, whether it be CN or CP. We recently saw an example of a short line controlled by CN in the La Tuque, Abitibi and Saguenay–Lac–Saint–Jean area.

Moreover, these railways are declared to be works for the general benefit of Canada. You will understand that, in the current referendum debate, our party will want to change that all–encompassing approach which includes everything that can be for the general benefit of Canada.

We will also ask for clarifications about clause 90, which authorizes Parliament to pass legislation declaring any railway owned by a company registered under a federal or provincial statute to be a work for the general benefit of Canada. In these circumstances, provincial railway acts, like the one we have in Quebec, no longer apply and the company is regulated by the federal government. I am sure you realize this is totally unacceptable to us.

Moreover, in clause 99, the agency is not required to conduct an environmental study before authorizing the construction of a railway line. Again, Quebec is on the leading edge as far as the environment is concerned. Therefore, we will have to obtain amendments to clause 99.

Clause 104 of the bill says that if an owner's land is divided as a result of the construction of a railway line, the owner must pay for the construction and maintenance of a crossing. We think this is ridiculous. Why would the owner of the land have to pay when it is the railway company that is using the land? The railway company should pay.

Clause 113 provides that rates and conditions of service established by the agency must be commercially fair and reasonable. We think that this provision is there to please railway companies which often have had to buy equipment to service a client without benefitting from a contract that was long enough to allow the company to write off the cost of such equipment.

The list could go on but, since this is only a ten minute speech, I would not have enough time to say all I want to say in this, my first speech since the House reconvened in September.

Bill C–101 will have an effect on Quebec with regard to the new process for transferring or discontinuing the operation of a railway line. I have had the opportunity before to say in this House that the abandonment of railway lines used to be almost automatically approved by the National Transportation Agency. Now, the company will have to demonstrate that it took all the necessary measures to offer the railway line on the market and if nobody is interested—We see the beginning of a solution, but it will have to be improved on.

Of course, we received, from many shippers, requests for clarification of this legislation or for changes to it, in particular, in relation to the introduction of running rights for short line railways, provided that reciprocity not be given to main railway carriers.

I therefore open the door to shippers for an alliance with our party, the Bloc Quebecois. They will have an opportunity to defend their views in the Standing Committee on Transport.

• (1215)

I would like, of course, to conclude my remarks by referring to the referendum. It goes without saying that when Quebec has full power, it will not have to rely on a national transportation agency staffed with friends of the party in power. Even though the composition of the National Transportation Agency has been reduced from nine members to three, we are still caught in the same vicious circle of having to deal with friends of the government.

I do not want to be disrespectful to Mr. Rivard, a very competent lawyer from Quebec City who was appointed by the Conservatives, but I can predict today, October 2, that Mr. Rivard's mandate on the National Transportation Agency will probably not be renewed and that we will see, as was the case with the members of the Port of Quebec's board of directors, some good friends of the government, some Liberals of good standing, appointed to head the National Transportation Agency.

So this is just shifting the problem. Our party will of course keep on denouncing such partisan appointments.

Mr. Nunez: Patronage.

Mr. Guimond: Such patronage. I thank my hon. colleague for Bourassa for suggesting the word patronage. So, the only way out is sovereignty, otherwise Quebec will remain a rebellious minority within the Canadian federation, constantly waiting with the no side for a no which would mean a yes, and vice versa. I do not know what, nor when nor where. If not Quebec, finally in touch with its identity and its potential, will become a country.

There are in fact two countries: yours, Canada, and ours, Quebec. There really are two countries north of the 45th parallel: one which is frantically searching for its identity—Canada—and the other, which can and should no longer deny itself—Quebec. Yes, in order to reach its full potential, Quebec must be sovereign. Quebec deserves to be sovereign because it is made up of a people that must not only survive, but grow.

Saying no means denying us the means to develop in the way we want to. It means continuing to mortgage what we have, and continuing to complain. By saying yes, we will make others respect us and we will stop being crushed. Just like so many other Quebec ridings, Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans will say: "Yes, we are ready and we will win".

[English]

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, when Bill C–89 was in committee I was told by the government's underwriters, Nesbitt Burns, Scotia McLeod and Goldman Sachs, that CN Rail had an accumulated debt of approximately $2.5 billion and that in order for CN to achieve an investment grade bond rating of BBB it would have to reduce its debt load to $1.5 billion.

They then went on to explain that CN had excess cash reserves of $300 million to $400 million as a result of recent subsidiary company sales and actual cash reserves, plus $400 million to $600 million in non–rail real estate assets. At the upper end of these figures was the amount by which the underwriters were telling us the debt had to be reduced. The lower value of these figures indicated that the government might be faced with a cost of up to $300 million in order to reach the debt reduction target that was stable.

It was the stated plan of the government to purchase CN's non–rail real estate assets. In response to my question on how the value would be set, government officials who also appeared before the committee testified that a full appraisal would be completed and that would set the price the taxpayers had to pay to purchase the assets from the company which they already owned.

The wording of the debt reduction clause in Bill C–89 concerned me in that it allowed the Minister of Transport to reduce CN's debt by any amount he chose. I attempted to have the legislation amended to tighten this arbitrary power of the minister but the amendment was defeated.

On May 17, 1995 I wrote to the minister requesting answers to a number of questions which were not clearly answered by the minister in committee. One of the most important questions was the amount of money the minister was to give to CN to reduce its debt. In his response the minister stated: "The government will undertake only the minimum, if any, debt reduction necessary to facilitate an investment grade rating of CN's debt".

My concerns about the minister's real debt reduction plans were well founded. On August 28, 1995 the government announced that it would be injecting $1.4 billion into CN Rail to reduce its debt. This amount includes a $500 million payment for real estate assets with a book value of $235 million and no appraisals to the contrary forthcoming.

The government pushed Bill C–89 through the House and into committee after first reading. I supported this with the understanding this was meant to make it easier to examine and amend the bill in committee where it is theoretically less partisan. This turned out not to be the case.

I presented many amendments, none of which was accepted in spite of little argument against them. One of my amendments dealing with Atlantic Canada did have the support of one Liberal on the committee but was defeated by a tie breaking vote by the committee chairman.

Given the lack of co–operation that we were led to believe this procedure of sending legislation to committee after first reading would provide, coupled with the deception that took place on the debt reduction, I would be very reluctant to trust Liberal intentions on transport issues in the future.

When Bill C–101 was first proposed I was approached by the parliamentary secretary to the minister seeking my co–operation in not only sending it to committee after first reading, but reducing the first reading debate time to one hour. At that point I had not yet received a copy of the bill nor was I aware of its contents. He informed me that it was not available yet but it was fairly straightforward and simple, essentially nothing more than enabling legislation allowing necessary changes to occur on an as needed basis. We now all know that Bill C–101 is a massive piece of legislation with major ramifications for both the rail and shipping industries.

It seems that this deception also continued into the summer. In a telephone conversation with the chair of the Standing Committee on Transport, I agreed to request submissions from interested parties over the summer as long as it did not restrict anyone's access to testifying before the committee in the fall. I was assured it would not and that the intent was only to allow us to obtain some of the material during the summer instead of having it all bunched together when we returned in September.

Subsequent to this, several affected groups complained to me about the tight timetable for getting their submissions to the committee. I obtained a copy of the notice sent out from the transport committee under the signature of the chair advising that if they wished to appear before the standing committee regarding Bill C–101 they must send in 25 copies of their submissions to the committee not later than August 31.

At the end of August I sent the following fax to the committee chair:

> It has recently been brought to my attention that the notice sent out to interested parties regarding Bill C–101 is written in such a way that has caused many of them to believe that August 31 is a cut off after which we will not accept any submissions. It also implies that if they do not submit a written submission within that time frame, they will not be allowed to appear before the standing committee on this issue.
> Neither of these positions were agreed to by myself either as a regular committee member representing the Reform Party or as a member of the transport steering committee. You and I discussed early submissions by telephone and I agreed that it was not a bad idea to request early submissions to be made so that we might be able to review some of them during the summer. As it has turned out, if any such submissions were made, I have not received a copy of them. When I gave my agreement to this early start, it was with the clear understanding that this early submission request would not impede any party's right to appear before the committee.
> I trust that this is a misunderstanding on the part of concerned parties and anyone wishing to appear before the committee and/or provide written submission may still do so. After all, we are attempting to determine all the facts and concerns available. Surely, we will not do anything to impede this information gathering process.

The reaction I received from the chair's office is interesting. Through follow up inquiries my office was informed by an assistant in the chair's office that they were preparing a response to my letter which I finally received on September 26.

Verbally and later in writing we have been informed that there has been a tremendous response which makes me curious why these were not forwarded to me as a committee member. I did receive a huge stack of submissions when Parliament reconvened, the very situation summer submissions were meant to avoid.

We have also been told that all stakeholders interested in appearing before the committee are welcome and not subject to a deadline. They advised that 800 letters were sent out, too many for a second letter to retract the false message that had been received and it was up to us to notify any parties concerned with the previously stated deadline and tell them it was not in effect.

As far as the bill is concerned it is long past the time that Canada's archaic rail legislation was revisited. To continue with the existing legislation is simply to ensure economic failure which will affect rail companies and shippers alike. We must move quickly to a market driven competitive system able to compete with the U.S. companies unencumbered by restrictive and uneconomical government regulations.

• (1225)

In the late 1970s the American rail industry was suffering from many of the same problems currently faced by the Canadian rail companies. In 1980 the U.S. Congress passed the Staggers act which deregulated the industry. Since that time the American rail industry has prospered.

Bill C–101 is a half Staggers bill which addresses some parts of the need to simplify rail line abandonment but does not address many of the other necessary components for rail industry prosperity with proper consideration for shipper needs.

The rail industry is quick to point out that we cannot compare ourselves directly to the United States because of differing taxation and labour laws. While that is not incorrect, our approach would be to harmonize these differences instead of bowing to them as unsolvable and tinkering with our problems instead of dealing with them head on.

Rail transportation is essential to get Canadian goods to their markets and to get supplies and materials to Canadian companies. Likewise, economic survival of these same Canadian companies is essential to the rail companies.

Many years ago I remember seeing a cartoon dealing with nuclear war. A single picture showed the president of Russia and the president of the United States both with their heads in guillotines each holding the release rope of the other. If either of them released the rope the blade would fall which would cause the other to release his rope in the ultimate no win situation. That is similar to what would happen in Bill C–101 if the legislation does not consider both sides fairly and pushes them into hard adversarial roles.

Shippers' products must be able to compete internationally with those of their competitors from the United States. A significant component in their cost structure is transportation. If their cost component for transportation is substantially higher than that of their American competitors, shippers are operating under a severe handicap. The potential is that these shippers will use the American shipping system affecting the Canadian economy through job losses not only in the rail sector but at Canadian ports as well, moving their operations to the United States, or folding their operations if they are unable to market their products at a profit.

The first thing the bill should examine is the reduction or removal of unreasonable cost factors to rail companies. This includes such items as federal fuel taxes, lengthy capital cost allowance terms, application and renewal fees and cabinet authority on rail line abandonment.

We must also address problems at the provincial level. Provincial fuel and property taxation as well as labour legislation impact on the competitiveness of federal rail lines and their ability to divest themselves of low density lines without loss of that rail infrastructure. This issue will not be resolved by ignoring it.

The other main problem with the bill is the lack of a clear sense of direction. The ultimate goal of rail deregulation is to establish a market driven and market regulated industry which can compete with the United States. I recognize this may be a huge single step but Bill C–101 not only fails to allow the market to be the final arbiter over price decisions, it also attempts to block access to the present arbiter through clauses like 27(2) and 34(1).

I could provide much more detail on the deficiencies of this bill and solutions for the problems faced by both the rail industry and Canadian shippers, but the action of the Liberal government to eliminate second reading debate severely restricts the amount of time available.

Be assured I will deal with these solutions in detail at committee hearings and I will ensure that all interested parties have the opportunity to bring their concerns before their elected representatives. I call on the Liberal members to co–operate with this process and agree to deal with the needs of the Canadian transportation industry instead of their own partisan agenda.

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let me assure the hon. Reform Party critic that it is the intention of the government and the committee to get some positive and constructive comments from the Reform members who seem to always criticize and have absolutely nothing good to say about anything.

I rise today to lend my support for Bill C–101 and the Minister of Transport's motion to refer Bill C–101 to the Standing Committee on Transport before second reading.

This is an important bill. Transportation touches all our daily lives and has far reaching ramifications in today's business world. The government is advancing a comprehensive program and a vision to overhaul the large unwieldy framework of regulations, outright ownership and specific involvement in transportation particularly as it pertains to rail. While the bill deals with all modes, there is no doubt that the most talked about provisions deal with the rail industry, so I will address myself to that aspect in particular in these remarks.

In this regard I see the 30 or so railways now operating in this country as being at a critical juncture. CN and CP are two mainline carriers that dominate the rail freight sector and have, as have other railways, managed to weather the recent economic downturn.

• (1230)

CN and CP have done this by introducing new marketing initiatives and operations more closely tailored to the 25,000 shippers they serve. They have also expanded intermodal links with the trucking industry and have implemented new technology and operating methods.

Stringent cost cutting measures have been taken and since 1983 CN and CP have abandoned 20 per cent of their rail lines. Total employment has decreased by 40 per cent.

To move into the 21st century, however, I believe CN and CP must further adjust to changing trends, increased competition and the need to reduce costs. CN and CP cost cutting efforts have been stifled by the regulatory hurdles they must jump in order to tailor their rail line networks to their core markets. While the Minister of Transport has made reference to the proposed rail line rationalization process, I will build on his comments.

Like shippers' rights, rail line rationalization can be controversial. I will first set the issue in the context of the current rail environment. The main line rail network is vastly over built. Even after efforts by both railways in recent years to reduce trackage, 84 per cent of CN and CP traffic travels on one–third of the network.

The adversarial nature and the length of the process can deter the sale of underutilized lines to short lines and some say can lead to the downgrading of a marginal line on purpose. A line must be uneconomic or near so for abandonment to proceed. It is the creation of short lines that we wish to foster in the legislation now before us.

The process for sale of a rail line under current legislation can be long and drawn out. In one instance the owner and the potential purchaser had agreed to the sale, in other words the continuance of a line, but under the existing NTA process with its convoluted regulatory approvals the prerequisite abandonment proceedings took two years with a cost of $10 million per year to CP before the sale could be finalized.

In the U.S. the sale of a line, not an abandonment, to another operator can be accomplished in as little as seven days. Purchasers are required only to prove public need and that they have the financial capability to purchase and operate the line.

The most important means by which the federal government can help our rail carriers to reduce their cost is through regulatory reform, and that is what we intend to do.

The new proposed Bill C–101 will do this and will focus on the encouraging of the sale of rail lines to other rail operators. The process will require a railway to set out for all interested parties its intention for its network in a three–year rolling plan.

The owner railway will not be allowed to abandon a line unless it has made every effort to negotiate the sale of the line for rail purposes. The negotiating phase has a finite limit of seven months. This phase could take as little as two months if there is clearly no buyer interest.

If no private sector buyer comes forward, governments at each level will in turn have 15 days to exercise an option to buy for public purposes. They will have had ample notice of the possibility through the plan at the start of the whole process.

No abandonment of a rail line will take place unless no one, neither the private sector nor governments, is interested in acquiring that line.

The process advanced in Bill C–101 is not as radical as that adopted in the United States but is instead a made in Canada approach that gives every interested party ample opportunity to acquire the line. It allows CN and CP to rationalize their track within a specified time frame. It allows for a more planned approach to the future of the Canadian rail system, which will be a benefit to the railways, shippers and communities alike. It also promotes the creation of a short line industry which will benefit all and which is key to keeping the most extensive network possible.

The experience in the United States under its deregulated environment has shown the high potential for rail lines to be acquired by short lines, providing hundreds of jobs.

Today there are over 500 short lines in the U.S., of which 263 were created since 1980. Conversely, there are only 12 Canadian short lines in operation. I believe under our proposed new regulatory process many more will emerge. Short line railways typically operate under a less burdensome cost structure than the main line railways and pass much of the savings on to their customers.

• (1235)

In addition, through more focused marketing and closer tailoring of services to customer needs, short lines can both recover traffic previously lost by the main line railway and generate traffic that was not previously present.

It is in the interest of main line carriers to sell to other railways rather than to abandon. The main lines get both the proceeds from the sale and a new partner that can act as both a generator and a feeder of traffic.

The proposed legislation not only eases exit but makes getting into the railway business less onerous. In future all railways under federal jurisdiction will simply require a certificate of fitness to either operate or perhaps even to construct a railway. Shippers and railways agree this is a significant improvement over the process now in place.

While no one can guarantee continued rail service in every corner of the country, the law will create the right environment so that wherever possible service should be maintained it will be maintained.

Rail is the only mode of transportation in Canada whose business decisions can be easily and often delayed, varied and sometimes even reversed by public authorities. Everything from sales to bookkeeping is subject to regulatory permission, sanction or appeal, with some regulations dating back to the turn of the century.

Under the proposed legislation, treatment of the rail freight industry will be brought more in line with other Canadian transportation businesses and U.S. rail counterparts, thereby enhancing competitiveness.

Transportation has historically been highly and intricately regulated. I was amazed at the mass of the build up on the economic side. For rail alone it filled over 1,000 pages of statutes spread over eight different acts.

With the passage of Bill C–101 we have the opportunity to help our railways, large and small, and ultimately their customers in their efforts to improve competitiveness.

Under the proposed amendment to the Transport Act, regulation of non–safety matters will be condensed into just over 100 pages. This reduction in volume alone will make the regulatory burden less onerous and costly, fostering a more commercially oriented basis for the provision of rail service. It will also make the legislation governing transportation much more logical and understandable.

I hope I have not given the impression that the bill is good only for the railways. On reflection I believe listeners will recognize that what I have outlined for the railways can easily be seen to benefit shippers as well. Once the railways have their house in order, the benefits will surely flow to their customers.

The Minister of Transport has made it clear that the bill preserves key rights now enjoyed by the shippers. A balance between the needs of shippers and railways must be found or our railways will continue to suffer. That outcome ultimately will not serve their customers either.

The sweeping nature of the regulatory housecleaning for all transportation modes will necessarily have an effect on the National Transportation Agency. The proposed legislation defines a streamlined and more focused regulatory body and renames it the Canadian Transportation Agency. Its role and powers will be clarified and brought into line with the reform of rail regulation and changes to the other transportation modes.

In future the agency will concentrate on core quasi–judicial and administrative functions such as the issuing of licences and the setting of regulated rail rates. Regulation is always a poor substitute for market discipline. We need regulation only when there are no practical transportation alternatives.

The federal government is aggressively examining the way it does business on all fronts. It is regulating only where needed and leaving the private sector to activities it can do better and at less cost to taxpayers. Regulatory reform in the transportation sector is one very important part of all these efforts.

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux–Montagnes, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is said that the road to hell is paved with good intentions, and the same goes for Bill C–101, which revises the National Transportation Act, especially with regard to rail transport. It is this issue that I will address.

The intention announced by the government in this bill is a good one. In a nutshell, its purpose is to modernize, streamline and deregulate. No one can criticize this, as no one is against virtue. Unfortunately, as is its habit, the government could not resist its usual temptation, which is to encroach on provincial jurisdiction, with an added bonus in that this bill significantly increases its opportunities to engage in patronage.

• (1240)

Plain common sense and efficiency concerns should have led lawmakers to split the rail network clearly and willingly without exception between national railways under federal jurisdiction and intraprovincial railways under provincial jurisdiction. But this would have been too simple, too logical. And how could they resist grabbing a few more powers that should normally come under provincial jurisdiction? That is just unthinkable.

Under this bill, intraprovincial and other short line railways in which national railways have an interest will come under federal jurisdiction. In addition, Ottawa will still have the right to place any short line railway under federal jurisdiction.

Therefore, depending on where their capital comes from and on Ottawa's wishes, intraprovincial short lines will come under two different jurisdictions. How logical can you get?

Clauses 140 through 146 dealing with the abandonment and sale of railway lines could, in return for some improvements, facilitate the establishment of more short line railways, which should revive our dying rail network. From now on—and this is great—, rail companies will have to prepare three year plans specifying which lines they intend to continue operating, which they intend to sell, and which they wish to abandon. When this provision is fully in effect, short line railway companies will be able to determine which lines they are interested in and to plan accordingly. It seems, however, unrealistic to hope that these plans will be of any use for 1996.

Another thing: some of the deadlines set for potential buyers to make up their minds are surprisingly short. If no private buyer is interested, the company must offer the railway line to the governments. Do you know how many days public authorities will have to make a decision? Exactly fifteen days. This is totally unrealistic.

Finally, it means no more public hearings, where people could explain why a specific line should be kept in service for the benefit of the public, and should therefore be bought by a government, when there is no interested private buyer, given the market conditions. Indeed, how will public authorities have the time to hold hearings and consult the public before making a decision, if they only have 15 days, not to mention the fact that people will also not have time to prepare submissions?

Obviously, the federal government could not care less about the development of those regions which could be affected by the foreseeable reduction in railway services.

I said at the beginning that Bill C–101 provides interesting opportunities for lobbyists and those who rely on patronage. The National Transportation Agency, which will now be called the Canadian Transportation Agency, currently includes nine permanent members and must provide national representation. Under Bill C–101, the agency will only consist of three members and will not have to ensure national representation. The reduction in the number of members will obviously make it easier to lobby and to exert political pressure. I am not making accusations, I am just stating the obvious.

Let me summarize my position. I criticize Bill C–101 for a number of reasons. One is the fact that intraprovincial short line railways are not clearly and unhesitatingly left under provincial jurisdiction. There is also the lack of provisions to truly promote the establishment of regional railways and thus help put the rail transport industry back on track. Another flaw is the fact that, for all intents and purposes, public hearings are excluded, since the unrealistic short time frame given to public authorities to decide whether or not to buy does not allow them to hold such hearings. Finally, there is the composition of the new Canadian Transportation Agency.

These are the four aspects which we will try to improve on through our amendments in committee.

In conclusion, the time had certainly come to streamline the railway legislation and to reduce the responsibilities of the agency. However, the priority given to unstated political motives, over the rational objectives stated, once again results in the government partly missing the target. My colleague, the hon. member for Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, and myself will propose, in committee, amendments designed to put this exceedingly political legislation back on track.

• (1245)

I am most willing, however, to admit that I should be thanking the Minister of Transport instead of criticizing him. Thanking him, yes, for providing new evidence that under the federal system Quebec has no hope whatsoever of one day seeing an end to the subordination of the logic of public interest to political interests. This will be possible only in a sovereign Quebec.

[English]

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege to enter the debate on Bill C–101, a rather large omnibus bill.

I was interested to hear the hon. parliamentary secretary suggest that it was a straightforward, simple and small bill. This is not a small bill. It has at least 120 pages and it is a rather far reaching and overarching bill that covers the three modes of transportation in Canada.

The bill makes some progress toward levelling the playing field, especially in the railway sector with the United States. It makes it easier to abandon some short rail lines, which is an important issue. It also makes it easier to establish short lines under provincial control.

There are some positive developments taking place in the legislation that we need to recognize. However it seems the chief purpose of the bill is not so much to enhance the investor interest in the particular railways but rather to facilitate the selling of CN Rail or the privatization of the Canadian National Railway.

The bill continues to treat railways as a service rather than as a business. The bill is clearly not about rail renewal. Canada remains 15 years behind the American system. Instead of levelling the playing field for the U.S., the federal government has chosen to deregulate in a piecemeal fashion rather than in a consistent, logical pattern.

Bill C–101 fails to ensure true competition between the railways. The competitive line rates and final offer arbitration provisions only highlight an artificial competition that benefits neither shippers nor the railways in the long run. Under both these options the ultimate arbiter of freight prices is the National Transportation Agency rather than the marketplace.

In other words, competitive line rates and final offer arbitration are actually a hidden form of price regulation or managed competition. The bill has no guaranteed access provision or even study regarding the rail infrastructure in terms of further development and competitiveness in the industry.

In spite of these sorts of statements the whole business of transportation and shippers needs to recognize they need each other to sustain the economy that is there. The railway business exists to support shippers and shippers need the railway to send their materials and products to market. Each needs the other to be successful.

Let me list a couple of the major shippers that use the railway system rather extensively. I refer in particular to the Western Canadian Shippers' Coalition, which includes companies like Agrium Inc., Alberta Forest Products Association, the Canadian Oilseed Processsors Association, Canpotex Limited, the Council of Forest Industries, Luscar Ltd., Manalta Coal Ltd., Novacor Chemicals Ltd., Potash Corporation of Saskatchewan, Sherrit Inc. and Sultran Limited. These companies are significant customers of the Canadian railroad system. The products shipped tend to be bulk in nature and must travel substantial distances to distant markets.

For many products highway transport does not present an effective, competitive alternative to rail transportation and water transport is not a practical alternative. Hence for the majority of the transportation requirements of industries like the ones named the only economical way of accessing the markets is through the railway.

There is a need for the railroad system to be reformed. There is excess track. There are impediments to the productivity improvements and there are too many threats to the profitability and long term viability of the railroads.

We must admit there have been improvements in the last couple of years in the productivity of railways and the net revenues of both CN and CP have increased. These rationalizations, however, should not jeopardize the benefits of competition in the railway industry. I will refer to that in just a moment.

• (1250)

In the meantime we need to indicate as well that the Canadian railway system is not like the American system. The American system has many more railroads, to begin with. The distances to market are shorter. They have an extensively developed highway system and inland water routes. Therefore it is not valid to argue that Canada should have a regulatory system directly comparable to that of the United States.

We should recognize that rails are not like the trucking industry. Trucking regulations restrict vehicles by the availability of trucking services and limit shippers' freedom of choice. Accordingly the deregulation of major carriers has a pro–competitive result. We should also recognize that the capitalization required in that area is not nearly as great as it is in the railway business.

Railway regulation protects captive shippers against the excessive monopoly power of the railway. Herein lies the crux of the issue. The imposition of statutory provisions which limit or deter accessibility to the competitive access provision will be anti–competitive by permitting the railroads to more rapidly and more extensively exploit their monopoly power.

We come back to the business of competitiveness. Are the railroads competitive? The conclusion of the group of industries we referred to before is:

> It has become apparent to railway customers during the past eight years that Canada's railways have refused to compete for rail traffic which would become available by virtue of a customer's utilization of the competitive line rate provisions.

Page 131 of the National Transportation Act Review Commission report states:

> CN and CP Rail have effectively declined to compete with each other through CLRs and as a result the provision is largely inoperative in Canada.

It is suggested that the failure of railways to compete through CLRs should now be shifted and, rather than be treated under the Transport Act, should now become subject to the provisions of the Competition Act.

There is a provision in Bill C–101 that there be an appeal to the National Transportation Agency. However shippers will have to prove that they suffer from significant prejudice. It is interesting that significant prejudice is not defined. Neither is suffering.

If this phrase is not defined in the bill it lends itself to all kinds of problems. First, it is difficult for shippers to be able to prove what is happening. Second, because that is difficult there will be a defence and the result will be extensive litigation proceedings that mitigate against the expeditious and objective determination of relief. That is precisely what is needed to get this business going and to get the economy rolling along smoothly.

Those terms are not defined in the bill. They have never been used in transportation legislation before. Consequently there would be very little, if anything, to go on in the way of precedent. The agency serves as a price regulator.

Another part the agency deals with is that the rates shall be commercially fair and reasonable. These words are used in the bill but are not defined. Hence they are likely to result in uncertainty, delay and contention which reduce the effectiveness of the level of service and competitive access provisions.

A further provision in the bill states that the clarification of these kinds of terms would come from the governor in council and does not help at all. It will introduce into the decision facing the council the politics of the day in preference to the economic considerations existing in the marketplace.

A further development is that a complaint, if one is issued by a shipper against the transportation agency, should not be vexatious or frivolous. These terms are not defined.

It is a very difficult situation. It is all very well to talk about the agency as being able to act as the final arbiter and to get agreements in place, but the result will be that litigation of one kind or another will come into play and the courts will become the arbiter.

• (1255)

There are two other parts of the bill that also need to be looked at: the idea of the interchange and the interswitch. These words have to be defined as well as the words limited running rights.

While the provisions of the bill go far they do not go far enough. Neither do they create a regulatory system which will provide an economic system that will look after the interests of transportation and shippers, so that together they can both meet their needs and we as Canadians will benefit from sound transportation and manufacturing systems that can deliver their products easily to the marketplace.

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to enter into the debate on the Bill C–101, amendments to the National Transportation Act, now called the Canada Transportation Act.

The bill is to be referred to committee after first reading. I believe opposition members as well as the public in general will have ample opportunity for input into how the bill could possibly be amended in other ways. This shows the dedication the government has toward making the system of government more open and more visible by allowing people to be directly involved in legislation that affects them.

This is basically another bill that realizes that governments should be steerers and not rowers of the economy. What do I mean by that? Basically most people have come to the conclusion that the government should act as a referee, a regulatory agency, but not be directly involved in the actual operation of businesses.

The Oshawa Municipal Airport is in my riding. I am constantly reminded the airport is operated by the city of Oshawa and why that is not the best interest of the local economy.

I will deal with two aspects of the legislation, both of which deal with air travel. It is surprising that previous speakers thought this was entirely a railway bill. It involves all sectors of transportation in Canada, not the least of which is air transportation.

I cannot underestimate the value of the whole transportation sector to Canada. Canada is the third largest country in the world geographically and yet we have one of the smallest population bases. It does not take long to realize that transportation has a major impact on how we develop our country.

I will talk about the north which we seem to have ignored. We have mostly spoken about transportation systems that occur in the southern parts of our country. In a recent study the Royal Bank discovered that Canadians were the second wealthiest people in the world if we take into account natural resources.

I do not have to tell members or other Canadians that we cannot quite see where that fits into our bank account at the end of the week. Very few of us feel that we have been able to access those resources so that we spread the wealth across the country. The transportation sector is one major aspect of why in some ways Canada has not been able to access all its natural resources to the benefit of all its people.

Industries such as tourism, metal extraction and forestry are big factions that use the transportation networks. Due to the regulatory burdens that often occur in this area, northerners often feel victimized by the transportation sector. Let me illustrate this by a very simple analogy.

Last summer I visited Kenora which some people do not consider as being north. Certainly it is in northern Ontario. I was surprised to discover that the cost of air fare to and from Kenora was twice as much as it would have cost me to go to London, England, and back. When I saw the bill come up for debate, I was very interested in why such things occur.

I discovered a very interesting aspect of the old National Transportation Act. Basically it divided Canada in half and not consistently in half either. It took the 50th parallel from Newfoundland to the Ontario–Manitoba border, then took the 53rd parallel in Manitoba and Saskatchewan and the 55th parallel in Alberta and British Columbia and created a designated area. What did that mean? It means we treated businesses in the northern part of our country differently than we did in the southern part.

• (1300)

Here are some of the aspects of competition that occurred in the airline areas in northern Canada. A test was used called reverse onus. Basically it allowed interested parties such as air carriers and communities to argue that the licensing of new services could lead to a significant decrease or instability in domestic service already provided.

Basically this meant a barrier to new carriers that wanted to compete with existing airlines. It also created in my mind artificial monopolies. Many people in the north suspect that these artificial monopolies acted as impediments to transportation in northern regions.

Bill C–101 serves to do away with that aspect. It allows the competition that exists in the southern parts of the country to apply in the north. Hopefully this will eventually result in lowering air fares to some of our northern communities.

Every once in a while we feel there is inappropriate business activity in the area of monopoly. This act also provides for a review of the fair pricing schedules of some of the airlines in the north, such that we could even affect a rollback if it were thought the monopoly that sometimes occurred due to the small number of users and smaller communities could be rolled back if gouging and price fixing et cetera had occurred.

Another aspect of the act which has not been mentioned to date is consumer protection. I am sure members are aware of the horror stories of people who travel south or even within our country. They buy airline tickets and show up at the airport on the day of reckoning and suddenly discover the airline has gone out of business. There has been no real mechanism for some of these people to get their money back. I am sure members are aware of horror stories of retired people who have saved for the trip of their lifetime to travel around the world and who discover they were jilted by the airline system for whatever reason and lost their money.

This legislation provides for a system whereby new carriers will have to be approved not only from a technical point of view as to whether they can fly planes but also from a financial one. These airlines will have to submit financial statements, et cetera, to show their fiscal ability to conduct their business. This can be nothing but good for consumers.

These two aspects as they affect air transportation in Canada are nothing but positive. It is one more step in the government's agenda of realizing we can do things better by making our regulatory framework simpler and more easily understood and, similarly, allowing small and medium size businesses to do what businesses do best, to compete in an open and fair market.

At the same time, the government realizes there is a need to protect consumers from possible unwarranted business activity and has put that in this legislation as well. There is an underpinning protection for the consumer and an ability to allow the industry to fully compete. Hopefully the benefits to this will be transportation at no financial risk to the general public. More important, hopefully it will reduce the cost of air fare in northern communities.

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part today in the debate on Bill C–101, known as the Canada Transportation Act.

This long awaited bill is the outcome of numerous independent and government studies concluding that the Canadian government must take steps to restore the viability of Canada's railway industry. The most recent of these studies was conducted by the National Transportation Act Review Commission. In 1993 it wrote: If Canada is not prepared to pay the price of serious deterioration in the rail sector as the decade progresses, it is indispensable that carriers be authorized and encouraged to make the changes necessary to becoming competitive.

The Commission also said that Canadian railways will be unable to contribute to making the national economy more competitive without major changes to their cost structures.

The Bill the government is proposing to us today was therefore long awaited. Essentially, its objectives are to modernize railway legislation, to redefine the mandate of the National Transportation Agency and to rename it the Canadian Transportation Agency, and to further deregulate the airline industry.

Although some of the proposed changes had been requested for some time, other proposals miss their target because these measures are incomplete.

For instance, one of the main provisions of this bill is to allow large national corporations like Canadian National and Canadian Pacific to get rid of rail lines that are no longer viable. Potential buyers would create so–called short line railways.

This has been very successful in the United States. In fact, like us, the Americans have had to revamp their legislation and regulations on railway transportation. They did so in 1980, when they passed the Staggers Act. One of the measures included in the bill was the development of short line railways. Since the Staggers Act was passed, more than 250 short line railways have started operating in the United States. This proliferation of regional railway companies made it possible to recycle more than half of the surplus rail lines abandoned by the large railway companies. According to information provided by Canadian Pacific, these short line railways, and I quote: "co–operate with the main rail carriers to provide efficient transportation for shippers located along lines with a lower traffic density".

In Canada, railway overcapacity is a major problem. In fact, according to CP Rail and I quote: "more than half—53 per cent, to be exact—of the 20,000 kilometres of CP Rail tracks in Canada carry only 5 per cent of railway traffic. The situation is similar at CN".

The railway company adds: "As far as CP's system is concerned, we are looking at more than 10,000 kilometres of rail that bring in insufficient revenue and on which millions of dollars in land taxes must be paid. —Establishing short line railways is one way of resolving the excess capacity problem. With their smaller cost structures, these railways are able to provide services that are not viable for larger railways".

The government claims to want to foster the establishment of short lines. In the background paper on this bill, the Canada Transportation Act, the government states that the new process was designed to encourage the sale or lease of rail lines to short line railways.

To this end, the government suggests that major railway companies develop a three–year plan in which they identify how they intend to dispose of their railway lines. CN and CP will be required to put up for sale those lines they no longer want to operate before they can abandon them.

• (1310)

Interested short line railways will have five months to come to an agreement with the national company, after which time, if no short line railway has come forward and no agreement was reached by the parties, the government, whether municipal, provincial or federal, will be entitled to exercise the option of operating the line. And, if no interest is expressed by any government, the company will then be allowed to just abandon the line.

This is a simpler procedure than the one in place until now. It has the advantage of fostering the establishment of local and regional rail transport companies. However, the government went only halfway, failing to stimulate the development of these short line railways which could become major players in regional development. Moreover, the process provided in the bill to allow national railway companies to dispose of their railway lines is flawed in a number of ways.

For instance, the establishment of short line railways will require huge capital investments on the part of those interested in such a venture. However, the federal government does not include any measure to facilitate the funding of these new ventures, unlike what the Americans did with the Staggers Act. For example, the government could have included loan protection measures to help establish these short lines.

Also, it appears that, between the time when this bill is proclaimed and the time when CN and CP's three–year plans are available, there will be a gap during which railway companies will be able to divest themselves of part of their surplus lines, without any interested party having time to review the potential of these lines, or find the required capital to buy or rent them.

Finally, the bill provides that, if no company is interested in operating a line declared to be surplus, or if no agreement is reached between the potential buyer and the railway company, governments will only have 15 days to decide whether or not to acquire that line. Such a deadline is definitely not reasonable, in my opinion. In imposing such a short time frame, the federal government adversely affects the regions, since they will simply not have time to inform their officials of the situation that will then prevail. These three flaws in the bill could jeopardize the establishment of short line railways. The government must make appropriate changes before the bill is passed.

As for airline transportation, the government is proposing a measure which gives me great concern. I am referring to clause 70(2), which reads:

> The Minister may, in writing to the Agency, designate any Canadian as eligible to hold a scheduled international licence and, while the designation remains in force, that Canadian remains so eligible.

That clause must be repealed. Indeed, it is common knowledge that this government favours Canadian Airlines, at the expense of Air Canada, which is based in Montreal. To grant the Minister of Transport the discretionary power to decide who can hold an international licence when a transportation agency was established for that purpose is just plain unthinkable.

Air service licensing should be open and impartial. The licensing process must not be subject to pressure from lobbyists, like it was last winter, when the Liberal government granted Air Canada only partial access to Hong Kong, while Canadian was granted unlimited access to the U.S., designated secondary carrier for Frankfurt as well as licensed to service Vietnam, the Philippines and Malaysia.

As the official opposition's critic for Canadian heritage, I am baffled by the fact that this bill gives such discretionary power to the Minister of Transport. I am afraid that this could create a dangerous precedent and become standard practice in all federal departments.

It worries me to think that such power could be given to, say, the Minister of Canadian Heritage or the Minister of Industry regarding the CRTC. Imagine for a moment what could happen in Canada if, just by sending a memo to the CRTC, either of these ministers could make people eligible to hold a telecommunications or broadcasting licence. One can easily infer that, given such power, the government would not have had to issue an order in council to favour Power DirecTv.

• (1315)

Consequently, the Prime Minister's son–in–law would not have had to appear before the CRTC and American T.V. would have flooded the Canadian airwaves.

Giving discretionary power to a minister jeopardizes collective good and interests. That is why I ask the government again to delete clause 70(2) from Bill C–101.

[English]

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to the motion to refer Bill C–101 to committee prior to second reading.

This massive document is supposed to be the first step in moving toward a rail system that will survive into the 21st century. It falls a little short. The rail transportation system has undergone major changes in the past decades but nothing compared to what is needed to ensure its future contributions to Canada's transportation needs.

The end of the Crow signalled the end of federal government subsidization of the railway companies. The rail companies must now be wholly dependent upon consumers paying for their services which is a novel idea in a country that has historically fostered government dependency.

We commend the Liberal government for realizing that changes must take place in the rail industry, however there must be more than just a realization that changes must be made. Tinkering with the rail system will not get to the route of the problem.

In the spring session we saw a number of bills rammed through the House without proper analysis.

Bill C–89, the commercialization of CN Rail, was sent to committee directly following first reading. In theory this should have allowed the committee to seriously examine the legislation and make amendments prior to second reading. In practice, this was smoke and mirrors and referral to committee was a ploy to allow rapid passage of the bill by short circuiting debate.

There should have been an opportunity to analyse the bill in detail but that never happened. The Liberal majority had no interest in even debating proposed amendments, much less giving them serious consideration. It now appears that Bill C–101 may be following the same fast track taken by Bill C–89.

Other bills that followed a similar process in the spring session were Bill C–64 on employment equity and Bill C–69 on electoral boundaries. There were some amendments on that one but they were only Liberal amendments and then it was fast tracked through. Another was Bill C–91, reorganization of the Federal Business Development Bank, and on and on.

The Reform Party will not be conned again into supporting this devious strategy. Bill C–101 has enormous implications for rail transportation in this country and it deserves serious assessment which it will not get if the government spirits it away to one of its neutered committees where the Liberals and the Bloc can, as usual, collude. They do not have to take seriously or even consider the smallest changes which we in the real opposition might propose.

The Reform Party has categorically stated numerous times that distortions in the marketplace caused by subsidies and regulations must be removed. Although subsidies to the rail companies ended with the death of the Crow, many of the regulations will remain in place.

I will briefly outline a number of concerns that Reform has with Bill C–101 with regard specifically to the agricultural sector. The legislation as it now stands calls for statutory review of the freight rate cap four years after the act comes into force. It will then be determined by the minister whether or not to repeal the cap and move toward a more market oriented system. It has been suggested that because a cap is a double edged sword, rail companies will automatically charge the maximum freight allowed for as long as they can.

The Reform Party supports the move away from a regulated system toward a system where freight rates are freely negotiated between shippers and carriers. Having a maximum rate does little in the way of promoting efficiencies in the industry.

• (1320)

We accept the need for a transition period between regulated rates and those determined through competition. This should be accomplished in the shortest possible time. Four years as originally proposed is ample, more than ample.

A less regulated system will allow for more efficient rail transportation. Rail line rationalization of high cost, low volume branch lines will permit an overall reduction of system costs. Several grain companies and farmer owned groups are already preparing for this type of system by building high throughput elevators on economically viable rail lines.

With respect to the creation of short lines, these should operate without government funding in locations where they will provide a viable cost effective alternative to other means of transportation. Short lines must be allowed to compete with other carriers on a level economic playing field. If they cannot compete, then they should not exist.

There are competitive short lines in Canada. The line operated by Railtex between Truro and Sydney, Nova Scotia, the Cape Breton and Central Nova Scotia railway carries coal, steel and general freight. Last year it had a profit of more than $3 million which was shared among the owners and employees. A second success story is the 70–mile Goderich–Exeter railway, also operated by Railtex.

Efficient cost conscious short lines work even when they are grain dependent. A couple of good examples are the little Southern Rails Co–Operative in southern Saskatchewan and the 114–mile Northeast Kansas and Missouri line south of the border.

A glaring fault in Bill C–101 is that under the proposed process for discontinuance, a railway company abandoning a branch line will be able to stifle competition by refusing to negotiate seriously with prospective buyers who want to operate a short line, notwithstanding section 144(3) which is window dressing. Canadian taxpayers, having financed these branch lines through the rehabilitation program in the 1970s and 1980s, have a very legitimate stake in this process.

In order for a competitive transportation system to develop, cumbersome regulations and restraints must be lifted in all sectors. This is very evident in the marketing and transporting of grain. A large number of producers and shippers close to the United States no longer want to be held captive by Canadian rail companies. Many farmers in southwestern Saskatchewan want to see more Canadian grain shipped on the U.S. rail system in order to take advantage of the efficient and economical elevation and terminal facilities south of the border. This would indirectly result in a more competitive environment for Canadian railways especially where, as in my riding, one carrier has a monopoly.

In summary, there are a number of stakeholders with legitimate concerns about the proposed legislation. It is essential that these concerns be heard, reviewed and assessed accordingly. If the referral process to committee is just more smoke and mirrors on the part of the Liberals, then there is very little reason for the bill to go to committee.

The Reform Party wants the consideration of legislation to be meaningful and open to all stakeholders. It therefore opposes the fast track ploy.

Mr. Wayne Easter (Malpeque, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on Bill C–101, the Canada transportation act.

It is important to note that the opportunity to speak on this bill prior to its going to committee is different from what the previous speaker from the Reform Party has indicated. It has really given the public a greater opportunity to put forward its concerns and to hopefully have them addressed and acted on.

• (1325)

Since the House was informed under Standing Order 73(1) of the intention to refer the bill to committee before second reading, there have been a lot of letters and submissions coming in to members of Parliament from provincial governments, organizations and individuals. I have found them in the main to be well thought out and well researched. This gives us the opportunity to investigate their concerns and apply some forethought to the bill from a number of different perspectives.

Today I will address my remarks to some of the points being raised in some of those submissions, particularly points relative to the grain transportation industry and its impact on agriculture.

Mr. Morrison: In P.E.I.

Mr. Easter: The member from Reform indicates in P.E.I. I have found the people from the prairies continue to come to some of us who did live out there for a while because they cannot get the kind of response they want through the Reform and they naturally have to come to the Liberals in other areas of the country.

I bring these points up partly because of my past experience in this area and my identification of transportation as extremely important to the development of agriculture and the development of this country.

During extensive hearings last spring the subcommittee on grain transportation which I chair, in reviewing the impact on agriculture of changes to the WGTA, ARFAA, MRFA and feed freight assistance, we heard a lot that relates to some of the Canadian transportation act points. We are currently awaiting a response from the government on some 14 recommendations.

The minister was able to highlight the positive aspects of the legislation. I will try to highlight those aspects of the legislation which may require adjusting and amendment.

In April Transport Canada briefed the provinces on the impending transport legislation. The four objectives outlined at that time were: one, allow the railways to dispose of surplus trackage by offering lines for sale to short line railways prior to initiating abandonment; two, maintain provisions in NTA 1987, which have improved bargaining of shippers and extend these provisions to shippers served by short line rails; three, provide for limited running rights for short line railways over CN and CP lines; and four, reduce regulatory controls on CN and CP providing the railways more freedom to manage. These objectives are sound but we must ensure the legislation actually meets these objectives.

In a submission by the ministers of transportation for the three prairie provinces on Bill C–101, they claim the legislation does not meet these objectives. Although I will raise a number of points discussed by the prairie governments, I also want to indicate that a number of other submissions from prairie pools, UGG, NFU and others have raised similar concerns. I will table them to ensure the committee looks at them and considers them seriously.

Having been a farm leader, it is very important for the committee to develop an understanding of the people who are most affected by these changes. I encourage the standing committee to get out of Ottawa, get away from the bureaucracy and go where the people are to hear their concerns relative to this bill. It is only in that way the committee will really understand the impact of this bill including how it will affect the lives of people especially those in the agricultural community.

The three prairie provinces are specific in addressing their concerns the first of which is the role of the National Transportation Agency. The three prairie governments indicate in their submission: "Bill C–101 significantly changes the scope and authority of the NTA. The Canadian transportation agency will no longer have the authority to initiate enquiries". The prairie governments' submission continues: "The result is greater restrictions on shipper access to the agency and a weakening of legislative provisions intended to address and/or redress situations where competition is weak or absent".

The committee has to go out to the prairies so it can understand where the prairie governments are coming from on that point of view and in order to get some balance so that there is fairness to the railways and to the communities and players involved.

It is critical that the committee study these concerns to determine the possible amendments that may be required to address any shortcomings in the creation of the Canadian Transportation Agency.

The second point is rail line abandonment. Prairie provincial governments in their submission outline their concerns as follows:

> Bill C–101 allows a railway to change its three–year plan without providing advance notice. A railway could indicate its intention to continue operating all of its lines and modify its plan each time it decides to sell or abandon a line. This would provide interested buyers only a minimum of 60 days to consider purchasing the line. This may not be sufficient time to develop a business plan and arrange suitable financing.

That point should be looked at by the committee to ensure the public has the time and that part of the bill does not jeopardize efficiencies in the system. Bill C–101 must ensure the issues of notice and disinvestment by the major railways are addressed.

The third point is legislative review. The prairie provinces and others have outlined that the review at the end of the four year period must address three specific issues besides the overview provided in the legislation: review financial performance of federal railways; assess the new line conveyance and abandonment procedures; assess provisions affecting the development and viability of short line railways. Those are important points.

The subcommittee tabled its report in June. Included were a number of recommendations. A very important recommendation relates to short lines which really could create some efficiencies in western Canada and could ensure that if the short line were brought into place on lines targeted for abandonment, the farmers would have to haul their grain longer distances as abandonment would likely cause.

Some key points raised in the report are: one, the appointing of an independent ombudsman to monitor freight rates; two, process of consultations with all affected parties prior to major decisions respecting grain handling and transportation; three, that there be appointed a consultant to undertake a special study to identify rail lines potentially operable by short line railways; four, that federal and provincial ministers meet to consider alternatives for approving branch line takeovers; five, that the cost benefit review of the NTA of grain dependent lines take into account total transportation efficiencies.

I want to review the points in the act that the committee has to give serious concern to regarding submissions coming from the agriculture community, particularly the west. I will not elaborate on the points but simply indicate the clauses. Clauses 27.2, 34 and 113 require extensive investigation by the committee.

I hope the committee gives serious consideration to travelling. It should go out and develop an understanding. This bill has major implications. It can develop our future in a positive or a negative way. The government wants to develop it as positively as possible. To best do that we need input from the people most seriously affected.

[Translation]

Mr. Réjean Lefebvre (Champlain, BQ): Mr. Speaker, like my colleagues for Blainville—Deux–Montagnes and Rimouski, I think this bill lacks both transparency and clarity. This is why I will vote against it.

In introducing Bill C–101, the government said it had three goals. First, it was to modernize legislation on rail transportation. Second, it was to redefine the mandate of the National Transportation Agency, which, in the future, would be called the Canadian Transportation Agency. Third, it was to further deregulate air transportation.

• (1335)

With your permission, I will start with this last point, which, I must admit, causes me considerable concern. Clause 70 of the bill specifically provides that the minister must give his approval for the Agency to issue a licence to operate a scheduled international service.

Thus, the minister is given full discretionary power in the issue or non issue of licences. This is a lot of power. I do not want to impute motives to the minister, but we have to admit that, in certain circumstances, a minister might well act a little less than rigorously and risk striking a nasty blow to this government's integrity and transparency.

By way of example, we might recall the awarding of international air links and the treatment given Air Canada and Canadian Airlines International in this area. Is there some bias in favour of Canadian? I do not know. All I know is that these two companies do not compete on an equal footing.

That same clause stipulates that the minister shall also issue the same type of authorization to all non–Canadians wishing to hold this same type of licence. At this time, with Quebec sovereignty imminent, we have doubts about the minister's ability to remain impartial despite all his good intentions. What guarantee do we have that Quebecers will be treated with the same concern for fairness and equality as anyone else? Might there not be another repetition of the double standard to which the federal government has accustomed us Quebecers ever since 1867?

This is important. Last winter we were all in a position to see what solely political considerations and powerful lobby groups can accomplish, how they can influence government decisions. Keep in mind how Air Canada and Canadian Airlines contracts were awarded. Moreover, can we have any certainty that the minister's decisions will place public interest above everything else and, if so, how can we have that certainty?

The government would have been far wiser to have taken advantage of the opportunity available in this bill to mandate the Agency to assess proposals from carriers and to decide on allocation of international routes through an impartial public quasi judicial process.

Bill C–101 also affects the railways, and some of its provisions would benefit from a review. Clause 90 is a perfectly beautiful example of flexible federalism. While this government is unceasingly singing the praises of Canada with this bill, it is once again exhibiting an extremely unhealthy tendency to interfere in provincial jurisdictions. This government's flexible federalism means that the provinces give in and the federal government invades their jurisdictions.

Take the short line railways, for instance, which are a purely provincial matter. Nevertheless, clause 90 of the bill authorizes Parliament to pass legislation declaring any railway, including short line railways, a work for the general benefit of Canada. Basically, this means that provincial legislation no longer applies and that the company is regulated by the federal government.

While Quebec is doing everything in its power to encourage the creation of short line railways, the federal government, with its continuing tendency to interfere with the business and jurisdictions of the provinces, is doing everything it can to discourage or prevent Quebec investors from investing in short line railways.

• (1340)

Clauses 140 to 146 refer to the sale of railway lines. We read that potential investors have only 60 days to indicate their interest.

Sixty days to indicate their interest, to make an assessment of and collect, the capital required to purchase the lines available. This is hardly encouragement, unless it is supposed to encourage them to drop their plans.

As a member from a region—the riding of Champlain—where railways are practically non–existent, I think I can say that this government gives no consideration to the development of the regions which, you may recall, were severely affected by the abandonment of branch lines. The federal government is letting the regions die a slow death.

While the Quebec government supports decentralization to the regions, the federal government is interested in the regions only insofar as that they give it an opportunity to interfere in areas under the jurisdiction of Quebec.

As I read this bill, I wondered whether the Minister of Transport consulted his colleague, the Minister of the Environment, when the bill was being prepared. At a time when the Quebec government invests millions of dollars so people will "think green", when Quebec schools teach our children at an increasingly younger age about protecting the environment, the bill before the House today does not provide that the agency shall conduct an environmental study before authorizing the construction of a railway line. Why give more power to the auditor general under Bill C–83, if we cannot even ensure protection of the environment in an area relating to transportation?

Is it not our duty as lawmakers to protect the future of our planet and, therefore, any legislation that could have an effect on the environment should contain clauses to ensure this protection.

I cannot support this bill because it is unclear. It is totally vague. Is this government's trademark not its lack of clarity? The fog settles in without clarifying anything about the new Canadian transfer. And yet, the government was saying a few months ago that this was the key that would unlock Quebec's claims. The same was said about unemployment insurance reform.

One thing is sure, Quebecers know the sort of society a yes vote will take them into. Whereas a no vote does not reveal what sort of Canada we will be in. No doubt it will be a foggy Canada, because discussions on this keep being put off.

For these reasons, I will vote against Bill C–101.

[English]

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to address the motion to refer Bill C–101 to the Standing Committee on Transport prior to second reading. As we are all aware, in the past a number of bills have been sent to committee prior to second reading. Bill C–45, Bill C–64, Bill C–89 and Bill C–91 are a few of the bills which have gone through that process.

Originally Reformers supported this new process since we believed the government when it said MPs would play a much greater role in shaping legislation within committee. However, committee reform has come to represent yet another broken promise within the Liberal red ink book. That faulty document states that MPs will receive a greater role in drafting legislation through committees. It goes on to say that committees will also be given greater influence over government expenditures.

It will come as no surprise to anyone who has sat on a committee that none of these things has come to pass. In most cases the opposite is true; the role of MPs at committee has been diminished or their efforts have been deliberately obstructed by Liberal committee members.

The best example of this is the fiasco which arose over the committee hearings surrounding Bill C–64, an act respecting employment equity. As I mentioned earlier, this bill was sent to committee prior to second reading under the premise that it could be more easily studied there and amendments could be brought forward and discussed at length.

However the proceedings were completely mismanaged and the whole examination of the bill was so skewed in favour of the government's position that Reformers boycotted the hearings. For instance, only four of the fifty witnesses to be called before the committee were accepted from the list submitted by the Reform Party.

Furthermore, debate on each clause within the bill was limited to five minutes. This meagre five–minute allotment included the introduction of amendments, debate on the amendments and time to ask questions of departmental officials. Government members of the committee refused to accept amendments printed in only one of the official languages, and it is reported that numerous voting irregularities occurred. This was the new and improved committee process we were promised in the red book.

Before referring Bill C–64 to committee prior to second reading on December 12, 1994, the minister of human resources stated that the process represented: "innovation on the part of the government to turn over a bill after first reading to a committee so it can help in the actual drafting of the bill".

As we have heard, MPs from my party were allowed almost no input in the final drafting of Bill C–64. However the futility of committees is not constrained to that one example. If we turn to Bill C–89, a piece of legislation that would see the privatization of CN Rail, we can also point to instances whereby opposition MPs were simply ignored with respect to amending legislation.

The Reform Party put forward a number of non–partisan amendments to the bill that were in the best interests of the Canadian National Railway, the industry and the taxpayer. Again these amendments were ignored and the bill was ultimately fast tracked with no amendments being introduced. MPs who were promised input into the legislative process were thwarted.

Further, it comes as no surprise that the government fast tracked Bill C–89 and is now attempting to do the same with Bill C–101. Bill C–89 permits shares of CN Rail to go on sale this fall. Bill C–101 is an attempt to bring the Canadian rail industry into a more competitive position with respect to its U.S. counterparts. Bill C–101 attempts to make it easier to establish short line railways and abandon lines. It reduces the number of regulations and taxes imposed on the rail industry. Should Bill C–101 be fast tracked, CN Rail shares will look more inviting to potential investors.

In all, Bill C–101 is a huge piece of legislation which shippers, railways and provinces have serious concerns over. All these parties have a right to be heard and that right should not be denied because the government wants to ensure CN Rail shares will sell this fall.

In August the minister of agriculture stated that the legislative process surrounding Bill C–101 would be open and amendment friendly. However, as I understand it, the Standing Committee on Transport has imposed arbitrary deadlines for submissions by stakeholders.

Further, I am told that while submissions have been received by the committee, the committee has yet to make them available to committee members. Why should we believe the minister of agriculture or anyone else with respect to the promises of openness and thoroughness at the committee stage?

The minister of human resources promised the same in relation to Bill C–64 and Reform MPs were shut out of that process as well. The government is long on promises, awarding MPs greater powers at committee stage. However it is short on delivering on promises, as we have already seen in a number of bills.

Therefore it will come as no surprise to members of the Chamber that I cannot support the government's motion to refer the bill to committee prior to second reading. Reformers will not assist in fast tracking such an important piece of legislation to spruce up CN Rail's profile for sale of its shares this fall. Reformers will not help the government limit access to committee hearings under any circumstances.

All parties affected by Bill C–101 have a right to come forward and be heard. We gave the government the benefit of the doubt and supported its promises of parliamentary reform through the committee reform system. It has done nothing to revamp the process and its promises amounted to nothing but so much Liberal hot air, of which we have had enough in the Chamber, let alone at committee.

I guess committee reform will just have to be added to the long list of Liberal broken promises. Accordingly I will not support the motion presently under debate.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to Bill C–101 respecting the Canada Transportation Act. In my capacity as chairperson of SCOT I had originally planned to speak to the bill after committee review. I believe it is my first duty to hear and evaluate the concerns and issues raised by various stakeholders who may be affected by the legislation to ensure an effective legislative process.

Speaking of process, I was listening very carefully to the misleading statements made by the member for Kootenay West—Revelstoke and felt compelled to respond. A full seven minutes of the ten–minute slot allotted to the member to speak to Bill C–101 were devoted to procedural matters that were not at all relevant to the substance of the bill. Plain and simple, the member chose to play politics, something the third party promised not to do when elected to the House.

Bill C–101 was introduced in the House by the Minister of Transport on June 20. Privileged to be the chairperson of the Standing Committee on Transport, I attempted with the consensus of committee members, as stated in my letter to the stakeholders dated July 17, 1995, to "solicit written submissions throughout the remainder of July and August in order to ensure that you and other stakeholders have ample opportunity to apprise committee members of your concerns prior to formal consideration of the legislation in the fall".

In other words, I first appealed to the opposition members of both parties to proceed with a pre–study of the bill. The notion was flatly rejected. Step two was to make an appeal to the stakeholders, as previously stated, to send along their written submissions to give committee members, especially members of the third party, an idea of the concerns raised by stakeholders as early in the process as possible.

I asked them to prepare not 25 copies as alleged by the member for Kootenay West—Revelstoke earlier this day but 15 copies, if possible, to cut down on committee expenses, something else the third party preaches ad nauseam. We also asked that submissions be sent in both official languages. Unfortunately many were not. Therefore, before the clerk could circulate the submissions, we had to have them translated and that takes time.

Mr. Stinson: No.

Mr. Keyes: Tell your colleague from Kootenay West—Revelstoke that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I understand that at all times matters of importance bring out strong views and strong feelings. However I remind all members to make their interventions through the Chair.

Mr. Keyes: There was no secret agenda to hold back submissions as the hon. member for the third party has suggested. I explained all this to the member verbally last week. I went over there, sat down, explained it all to him, and then I followed it up with a formal letter addressing each and every one of the concerns he raised in the House today.

That did not satisfy the member opposite, not at all. Finally and quite frankly the chairperson, committee members, the government—

Mr. Fontana: And the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Keyes: And the parliamentary secretary, the member for London East. We are doing our level best to produce effective legislation.

Because of my appeal to the stakeholders backed by the consensus of the committee in July, our committee clerk has received over 70 written submissions and close to 100 requests to appear before the Standing Committee on Transport. We have done our homework.

• (1355)

I assure the House and all my colleagues that, as I stated in my letter to the member for Kootenay West—Revelstoke, every stakeholder who has contacted the committee clerk to appear before the Standing Committee on Transport is being provided with the opportunity to do so with or without a written submission.

We look forward to working on Bill C–101 as put forward by the Minister of Transport to create the effective legislation the country needs to go into the next century with a transportation system that will be unmatched by any other country in the world.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to commence, albeit briefly, debate on the bill. I recognize that in only a few minutes we will be adjourning to commence proceedings under Standing Order 31.

However, in the few moments afforded me, I want to talk about the bill in question respecting the Canada Transportation Act.

I guess it is now time for question period.

The Speaker: We always welcome astute comments.

FLEETWOOD TRAILERS

Mr. John O'Reilly (Victoria—Haliburton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to announce that the Fleetwood trailer facility in the town of Lindsay, Ontario, has won the customer satisfaction award for the fourth consecutive year.

The Prowler trailer plant competes against 15 other factories in North America every year and it is the only facility located in Canada. Its rating was over 95 per cent.

It was my pleasure to present a Canadian flag to our friendly American vice–president of operations who attended from California to help congratulate the Lindsay plant employees on their championship.

I say congratulations to the Lindsay management and employees on their success.

FIGHT AGAINST AIDS

Mr. Maurice Dumas (Argenteuil—Papineau, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, 40,000 people, including 25,000 in Montreal, took part in the walk against AIDS. The purpose of this third Farha Foundation walk–a–thon was to collect funds for those organizations that assist and support people with AIDS.

With serenity and respect, the procession observed a minute of silence to pay tribute to AIDS victims so that no one will forget them or forget that this disease is still causing too many tragedies.

Saint–Exupéry used to say that everyone was responsible for all. The walkers showed this kind of solidarity. As for the federal government, it is still waiting to assume its responsibilities and take real action against this disease. Will the federal government finally listen to reason? It is worth repeating that "everyone is responsible for all".

COMMUNITIES IN BLOOM

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the city of Quesnel, British Columbia, in my riding of Cariboo—Chilcotin was a finalist last weekend in the Canada–wide competition called "Communities in Bloom".

Each year proud community minded citizens across the country are pleased to show off their towns and cities to the judges. The finalists were judged on the quality of their green space, the diversity and originality of landscape, general tidiness, environmental awareness, and the level of community involvement.

The people of Quesnel are very proud of the natural beauty of their city at the confluence of the Quesnel and Fraser Rivers. They have worked hard to make it beautiful for themselves and very attractive to all visitors.

I am proud that Quesnel was awarded the prize for originality in floral plantings.

I ask my colleagues to join me in warmly congratulating the citizens of Quesnel for this outstanding achievement.

SUPREME COURT

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the recent decision of the Supreme Court of Canada to overturn legislation passed by the House regarding the advertising of tobacco products is the latest evidence of a shifting balance of power away from Parliament toward the unelected and unaccountable Supreme Court.

In this and other decisions the court has extended the rights of individual citizens to business corporations as presumed legal individuals. This presumption has transformed the charter from a guarantor of individual rights to a political lever that allows corporations to evade the legitimate regulatory actions of a democratically elected government and House of Commons.

In addition, the court has also in some cases interpreted laws or extended them in ways deliberately not articulated by Parliament at the time the law was passed. This growing shift in power toward the court requires new measures to improve the accountability of the court.

I call on the government to consider a royal commission to propose measures that would add transparency to and wider participation in the process of selecting Supreme Court judges in a manner consistent with our parliamentary system of government.

NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Andy Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, once again New Brunswick is on the cutting edge of the emerging new economy. It is leading in the area of making governments more user friendly and making it easier for Canadian businesses to compete in the global economy.

The federal and provincial governments will combine efforts on trade promotion and will share information on export programs. The program being announced today in Fredericton is to be known as "Trade Team New Brunswick", the first of its kind in Canada. This program will simplify the process of helping exporters develop new markets.

Under the trade team concept an entrepreneur will be able to get information on both governments' programs from any economic agency of either level of government. The trade team concept is a result of ten months of work by eight different government agencies.

I congratulate Premier Frank McKenna and the federal Minister for International Trade on this great achievement. I also extend my best wishes to the Canadian Exporters Association which is meeting in my riding today for its 52nd annual conference.

FEDERATION OF STEREA HELLAS

Mr. John Cannis (Scarborough Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to welcome a group visiting the nation's capital region today.

The Federation of Sterea Hellas represents over 15,000 Canadians who descended from the central part of Greece known as Roumeli. The federation is involved in many worthwhile projects and is primarily concerned with issues of an ethnocultural nature.

This year the federation has unanimously decided to recognize the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada for his longstanding commitment and service to our nation. It also commends him on his efforts of national unity, world peace and his undying belief in democracy and human rights.

I wholeheartedly support the federation in its decision and congratulate the Prime Minister on this well deserved recognition.

I also extend a warm welcome to the federation, its president, Mr. Constantin Bikas, and Mr. Chris Geronikolos. I hope their stay in Ottawa will be an enjoyable and informative one.

JOSEPH RICHOT

Mr. Reg Alcock (Winnipeg South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, representatives from all political parties gathered this morning in the rotunda of the Manitoba legislature to unveil a plaque to commemorate Father Noël Joseph Richot.

Father Richot was an adviser to Louis Riel and led the delegation that negotiated the terms of the Red River Colony's entry into confederation. Through his arguments, the colony obtained provincial status and bilingual and bicultural institutions. Father Richot worked to expand the francophone population in Manitoba.

With this 125th anniversary of Manitoba's entry into confederation, it is appropriate to honour Father Richot at the Manitoba legislature, a provincial institution he helped create.

FÉDÉRATION DES FEMMES DU QUÉBEC

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, a majority of members of the Fédération des femmes du Québec support sovereignty. An exceptional proportion of 83 per cent of them have said yes to change. Each day, more and more women consider Quebec's sovereignty as a prerequisite to the progress of equity and justice in our society.

• (1405)

Whether it is for pay equity, parental leave, preventative withdrawal of work or child care services or to prevent regressive federal reforms of old age pensions and unemployment insurance, the women of the Fédération des femmes du Québec are convinced that only a sovereign Quebec will fulfil their needs.

The Bloc Quebecois invites all Quebec women to participate actively in the debate on Quebec's future.

PEARSON AIRPORT

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this fall is an anniversary of sorts for the Liberal government. It will be two years since the controversial cancelling of the Pearson airport contract.

For two years the government has claimed the process was corrupt and yet for the same two years it has not produced one substantive piece of evidence demonstrating its alleged corruption.

For two years the government has claimed it was not a good financial deal for Canadians in spite of government documentation to the contrary, and yet for the same two years it has not come up with an alternative plan.

For two years the government has claimed that failure to pass Bill C–22 has resulted in its inability to deal with the problem in spite of the fact there is no injunction standing in its way and the Pearson Development Corporation has not requested specific performance in its court action.

Witnesses under oath at the Senate inquiry made allegations which indicate the cancellation of Pearson is nothing more than a snit by the Prime Minister against the principal partner in the deal who had the audacity to donate to the Prime Minister's main opponent in his leadership campaign.

After two years the Liberals should not be celebrating; they should hang their heads in shame.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Jag Bhaduria (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville, Ind. Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday's official announcement confirming October 30 as the date of the Quebec referendum brings us a step closer to the certainty that the people of Quebec will overwhelmingly vote to stay in a united Canada.

I thank Premier Parizeau for giving the citizens of Quebec the opportunity to decisively say yes to a united Canada. Each and every eligible voter now has the opportunity to reject the false premises and unrealistic expectations of the separatist movement in Quebec. The destiny of millions of Canadians is now in their hands. I am convinced they will choose the no option.

Having spent the past four weekends in Quebec meeting with numerous committee organizations, I believe a stronger and united Canada will emerge on October 31. I urge every member of the House to work toward achieving a united Canada. Our efforts will make a difference in keeping Canada together.

CANADA

Ms. Bonnie Brown (Oakville—Milton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, school children from around the world love contests, and last June Canadian school children got their chance to enter one.

At the request of cartoonist Ben Wicks newspapers from across Canada and the Schoolnet asked our children to depict how they felt about their country. They could submit letters, poems, drawings or paintings.

The response was overwhelming. More than 50,000 replies were received and 300 were selected for a new book called Dear Canada/Cher Canada—A Love Letter to My Country.

Today Mr. Wicks and 20 children from across Canada are in Ottawa to launch this book. The proceeds from the sale will go to needy mothers and children in Haiti and to the Boys and Girls Clubs of Canada.

Through this book the children of Canada are telling us what the rest of the world already knows, that Canada is the best country in the world.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

The Speaker: Colleagues, Mr. Wicks and the children are here. I would ask them to stand and be recognized by Parliament.

NATIONAL INFRASTRUCTURE PROGRAM

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the national infrastructure program put in place by our government will soon be two years old. All regions of this country have enjoyed the significant benefits of this program, which not only made it possible to modernize municipal facilities but also created an impressive number of jobs.

In Quebec, this program created over 25,000 new jobs in connection with 1,882 projects. To date, in excess of $436 million was injected into the various projects by federal, provincial and municipal governments.

• (1410)

The national infrastructure program also showed that the various levels of government can co–operate when they really want to. It is a good example of a successful and effective program, and we are quite proud of it.

QUEBEC ECONOMY

Mr. Mauril Bélanger (Ottawa—Vanier, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Parti Quebecois Premier made use of something said by one of the executives of the Bank of Montreal to reaffirm his confidence in the economic future of an independent Quebec. It is paradoxical, to say the least, to see the head of the Parti Quebecois using the words of a representative of the Bank of Montreal to support his separatist pretensions. In June 1994, the same man was publicly inviting Quebecers who did business with the Bank of Montreal to pull out of the institution because its chief economist had dared to say that the election of the Parti Quebecois would make the money markets extremely nervous.

This is a fine example of the separatists' double standard. If you make a statement in favour of Quebec independence one day, you are quoted publicly. Then, another day, if you say something against separation, you become the target of the PQ's big guns. So much for intellectual impartiality.

JOB CREATION

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, historically Quebec has been the biggest loser by far when it comes to federal expenditures for job creation. A study commissioned by the Bélanger–Campeau Commission concluded that the current level of federal expenditures for job creation in Quebec is far below the average. Since statistics have been available, Quebec has not received its share of funding from Ottawa aimed at bolstering the economy, whereas Ontario has had the lion's share in terms of federal purchases of goods and services, capital investments, research and development, defence spending, I could go on and on.

With the cuts that were announced in the last federal budget not only will development continue in Ontario, but Quebec will not even receive the amount of social transfers it was receiving in the past. That is an excellent reason for a yes vote this coming October 30.

ADAMS RIVER BRIDGE

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, three weeks ago the Adams River bridge was torched by an arsonist during the Gustafsen Lake confrontation, also with Shuswap Indians, forcing some 90 residents previously blockaded by the Adams Lake Indian Band to use a temporary ferry as their sole access to every service from medical health to the mail.

The Department of Fisheries and Oceans has said the salmon resource will prevent bridge demolition and reconstruction until mid–August 1996. Because the court ruled the private road belongs to the Adams Lake Indian Band, nobody knows who owns the bridge and therefore who has the responsibility to rebuild it.

I will present a petition today from Indian Point residents that the government buy out their homes at the assessed value.

On behalf of Adams Lake residents, mostly seniors seeking peaceful retirement, whose lives have been so terribly disrupted by federal and provincial government mismanagement, I urge the minister to buy out their homes now.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Paul DeVillers (Simcoe North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the three countries that are party to the North American Free Trade Agreement have not yet been invited to comment officially on an independent Quebec's membership in NAFTA, and yet already anxiety is being felt in government headquarters in Quebec City. Today's Globe and Mail reveals that the Parti Quebecois government has prepared a list of 31 different subjects or areas for negotiation with the future partners before an independent Quebec joins NAFTA.

This list of preferential acts and regulations Quebec currently enjoys as a province of Canada would no longer be covered by the terms of the present agreement should Quebec separate. Quebec would be best assured of protecting these various sectors of activity by remaining in Canada, and this is what the people will say on October 30.

STUDIES COMMISSIONED BY THE QUEBEC GOVERNMENT

Mr. Raymond Bonin (Nickel Belt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what we now call the Le Hir studies will not go unnoticed in the current referendum debate. After delivering separatist tinted studies and after hiding studies that did not fit with PQ orthodoxy, the minister responsible for reworking information has just tabled in one fell swoop the last 26 studies he commissioned.

Furthermore, these studies are available for consultation only at government offices. Anyone wanting a copy pays 25 cents a page.

• (1415)

The people of Quebec have already amply paid for these separatist propaganda studies. The Parti Quebecois government's attempt to impose an information tax on them is unacceptable.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, the Prime Minister refused to take part in a four-way public debate on the political future of Quebec and asked the official opposition to give him one good reason to vote Yes on October 30. Here is one good reason among many others, and I am referring to Ottawa's ongoing under-investment in research and development spending in Quebec, which is otherwise a preferred way to create new jobs. I may recall that Quebec receives only 18.6 per cent of federal funding, as opposed to 50 per cent for Ontario.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister. What explanation does he have for the fact that the federal government is depriving Quebec of its fair share of research and development and has done so for nearly 20 years?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Quebec receives more than its share of research and development funding. The figures quoted by the Leader of the Opposition assume that money spent within the national capital area only benefits Ontario, while in my riding, I have 1,700 people who work in research and development institutions on the Ottawa side.

This is the wrong way to look at spending. In fact, when we exclude the National Capital area, we see that nearly 30 per cent of research and development spending goes to Quebec, which represents only 24.9 per cent of the population.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, if we exclude Ottawa, if we forget that Ottawa is in Ontario, if we overlook the fact that jobs created on the Ontario side benefit Ontario, that taxes are paid in Ontario, that contracts are awarded in Ontario and that research networks are created in Ontario, then he is right. However, Ottawa will not go away.

It so happens that Quebec receives only 13.8 per cent of Ottawa's research and development spending in its laboratories within the national capital area. Only 13 per cent is done in Quebec and the rest on the Ontario side.

Will the Prime Minister, and my question is directed to him since he is ultimately responsible—since he will not go on television, he can at least answer me here—will the Prime Minister—unless he sends his ineffable minister who just replied—will the Prime Minister at least admit that the federal government systematically discriminates against Quebec when distributing funding for research among its own laboratories?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think the Leader of the Opposition is getting a bit upset. The answers given by the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs were quite clear.

Here in the national capital, some people live in Quebec and work on this side of the river, while some people on this side of the river work on the other side. The minister just said that in his riding, Hull—Aylmer, on that side, 1,700 residents work on research and development in laboratories on this side, in the national capital. If we exclude the national capital, in other words, if we compare Quebec with the other provinces, Quebec receives more than its share.

It has 24 per cent of the population and receives 30 per cent. That is clear, if we compare Quebec with Saskatchewan and Ontario with Quebec. Here in the national capital, we share and share alike. We have lived together for more than a century and will continue to live together for another hundred years.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, all but a few—three, four or five—research centres are located on the Ontario side. Dozens of federal research centres are located in Ontario. The Prime Minister should at least acknowledge this basic truth, which is that Quebec has always been denied its fair share in research and development. Many have acknowledged this before him, so he could make a gesture today and admit it.

• (1420)

We know that Quebec receives federal help on social assistance, unemployment insurance and equalization, but this spending does not create jobs or stimulate the Quebec economy in any way.

Does the Prime Minister admit that Ottawa's chronic underinvestment in research and development, which creates jobs, is the reason why Quebec is so dependent on unproductive federal contributions?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Canada developed in such a way that today, for example, the aeronautical industry is concentrated in Quebec. It could have been elsewhere in Canada, but that is the way things turned out.

Some sectors are concentrated in Quebec, some in Ontario, some in other provinces, so that Canada manages to develop in an equitable way. But there is always room for improvement.

I am not saying that Canada cannot be improved; it can always be improved. But one should not separate from a country simply because of petty quarrels on approximate budget levels on one side or another. One can find all kinds of justifications. For example, Quebec naturally receives money for national ports but, because it is in the middle of the Prairies, we have not yet dug a river in Saskatchewan so that we can give that province its share of the national ports budget. That province does not receive anything for national ports but it does not complain about it.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, what an extraordinary leap of logic.

The federal government is about to sign with GM, in Ontario, a major contract worth as much as $2 billion for the acquisition of armoured vehicles. Despite the intergovernmental affairs minister's attempt to reassure Oerlikon in Quebec, a GM spokesperson clearly indicated that Oerlikon was not a contender for the armoured turrets subcontract, in spite of the fact that Oerlikon is the Canadian center of excellence for this kind of work.

Given that, in the past 15 years, Quebec has been shortchanged by at least $10 billion in the distribution of federal military expenditures, why would the Prime Minister not give Quebecers the assurance that they will get their fair share of the economic and technological benefits associated with the generous contract which was awarded to General Motors instead of Oerlikon?

Hon. David Michael Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, to date, no contract has been signed with General Motors, and the question of content will be addressed as part of the contract negotiations.

As for Oerlikon, there have been discussions between officials of my department, other departments and General Motors to examine the possibility of including Oerlikon in GM's plans for manufacturing armoured personnel carriers.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Canadian Prime Ministers have been promising for decades to remedy the situation. Yet, no corrective action has ever been taken.

How can the defence minister explain the statement he made about this contract on Radio–Canada's television program Enjeux, that the federal government cannot afford to be fair to Quebec? How does he justify making such a statement?

[English]

Hon. David Mr. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is not unusual but the hon. member has taken the words I used on that television program entirely out of context. What I stated was that the mandate of the Canadian Armed Forces is to deliver its services in the fastest, most efficient way possible.

We have to do that sometimes without having regard to the expenditures of national defence being equitable in every single region. Part of that problem harks back to the second world war when a disproportionate amount of Canadian forces infrastructure and spending was in the Atlantic provinces because it was a staging area for war. This has tended to disfavour certain regions.

• (1425)

In spite of that, in the 1994–95 fiscal year 20 per cent of military spending and 27 per cent of the capital expenditures were made in the province of Quebec.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

Media reports today maintain that documents received from the Department of National Defence through access to information have been falsified. One of these documents had entire sections deleted and the Department of National Defence did not indicate any omissions but presented it as an accurate copy of the original. Another document had not only been edited but entire sections had been rewritten in order to misrepresent statements which were damaging to the Department of National Defence in the original.

I demand that the Minister of National Defence explain the actions of his department to Canadians.

Hon. David Mr. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in a review of certain access to information requests made of the department, it was discovered that certain errors and omissions had occurred. Immediately when that was made known to senior officials, I was informed. An investigation has ensued. The information commissioner has also been informed and we would like to know why this state of events has occurred.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on Friday the Prime Minister assured the House and all Canadians that the government takes responsibility for making sure that the Somalia commission has all the facts. Today's revelations call into question the government's commitment. The Department of National Defence has turned over mountains of material to the commission.

If the Department of National Defence is capable of falsifying documents to the media, how can Canadians be sure it is not altering evidence to the commission of inquiry in a similar fashion?

Hon. David Mr. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): I certainly do not accept the premise in the hon. member's question.

It is quite obvious that some erroneous thing has happened which is being investigated. Certainly we stand by what we have said repeatedly and what the Prime Minister said Friday, that all documentation will be made available and all co–operation will be given by the Department of National Defence to the inquiry.

We would like to know why these omissions did occur. We acted responsibly by informing the information commissioner. As soon as we know why this happened we will certainly make that public.

It was the department officials themselves once they found the errors who called in the person who had originally made the request. They were quite open and honest about this particular mistake that had occurred.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Defence has consistently expressed confidence in his department officials despite recurring charges of mismanagement, poor judgment and misconduct.

Another internal inquiry is utterly unacceptable. The DND hierarchy is absolutely unable to investigate itself. The evidence of these documents suggests possible criminal behaviour.

Will the minister treat this as a criminal matter within his department which is separate from the Somalia inquiry and immediately call in the RCMP to investigate the Department of National Defence?

Hon. David Mr. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would not preclude any measure that might be taken with respect to this matter. Initially we are investigating it ourselves. Should it warrant investigation by an outside agency such as the RCMP, that will be done.

CFB CHATHAM

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Defence.

In order to lessen the consequences of the closure of the base in Chatham, New Brunswick, the minister forced the bidders for the program of refurbishment of armoured vehicles to do the work in Chatham, where there is no expertise in the field. Yet, in Saint–Jean, Quebec, the government closed the Military College, reduced the staff and the activities of the base, with dire consequences for the region's economy, but offered no compensation whatsoever.

How does the minister justify, on the one hand, compensating Chatham for the losses while, on the other, refusing to give Oerlikon of Saint–Jean the same incentives he gave GM, and this despite the fact that Oerlikon has unique expertise in the area of gun turrets?

• (1430)

Hon. David Mr. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the armoured personnel carrier contract, the refurbishment of the old carriers and the direction of part of that work to Chatham—and the hon. member conveniently forgot to mention that most of the work on the refurbishment would be done at the defence workshops in the east end of Montreal—do not constitute any reparation or compensation for base closures. We have categorically ruled that out.

If we can assist a community, whether it is Chatham, Saint–Jean, Quebec, Calgary or anywhere else where base closures have been announced, by directing or encouraging suppliers to do business with a base or make purchases or manufacture in certain regions, then we would do so.

What we have said because of all of the closures—the one at Chatham being the most devastating in terms of its regional impact—is that any contractor who wishes to carry out a small part of the work of refurbishment would have to stipulate that the work be done in Chatham, New Brunswick. I think that is fair and equitable.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I did not forget the whole business of refurbishing the armoured vehicles, but I remind the minister that he specified that contracts would be in Chatham, whether there is expertise there or not.

Should I understand that when it comes to Ontario and New Brunswick the Minister of National Defence does not hesitate to compensate for closures, protect jobs and even create new ones, whereas for Quebec there is no maintenance work provided for the old armoured vehicles? The Prime Minister wants us to give him good reasons to vote yes, here is one.

[English]

Hon. David Mr. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quick to criticize the government, especially on defence reductions.

First, I have to remind the hon. member that it was his party in the last election that called for a 25 per cent reduction in defence spending.

Second, the hon. member has the Canadian forces base Valcartier near his constituency. He conveniently forgets to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that actually defence expenditures at Valcartier have been increased in the last couple of years when other regions have suffered.

Third, he conveniently forgets to say that the majority of the refurbishment work is to be done in an area of very high unemployment, the east end of Montreal, because the defence workshops there are the most able to perform that work. He does not tell us all of that.

1996 CENSUS

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry says that a question on race is included in the 1996 census because a specific question on racial origin would be beneficial for a wide range of purposes.

However, question 19 is inconsistent as it confuses race, nationality and geographic location. It would allow the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to claim to be a visible minority because of his Latin American birth.

Can any minister advise the House of one purpose this question will benefit other than providing targets for the government's employment equity program?

Hon. Jon Gerrard (Secretary of State (Science, Research and Development), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question. Every five years Statistics Canada gathers important information to allow the government to fulfil its programs and commitments to Canadians.

In this context, the questions which have been developed for the 1996 census are eminently reasonable and sensible.

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Canadians filling out this question will have the option of stating whether they are one of the following nationalities: Chinese, Filipino, Japanese or Korean. However, most immigrants, or descendants of immigrants from these countries, consider themselves to be proud Canadians but they cannot indicate that.

Is the government prepared to stop the practice of creating hyphenated Canadians by adding another nationality to the list, Canadian?

Hon. Jon Gerrard (Secretary of State (Science, Research and Development), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has omitted to read question 17. Question 17 asks to which ethnic or cultural group does this person's ancestors belong. In Question 17, one of the answers is Canadian.

• (1435)

Question 19 is different. I point out that the census document will quite clearly allow people to show that they are of Canadian origin.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance, who is responsible for regional development in Quebec.

When it was first announced that the Canadian space agency would be located in Saint–Hubert, we were told that federal aerospace research would be conducted in Quebec. However, aerospace research centres, which have a combined budget of close to $45 million, have remained in Ottawa.

Does the Minister of Finance, who is responsible for regional development in Quebec, agree that maintaining space research activities in Ottawa, rather than centralizing them in Saint–Hubert, close to the space agency, favours Ontario at the expense of Quebec?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the aerospace industry employs over 32,000 people in Quebec, thanks to the federal programs in that sector. The fact is that the agency is there. It is not in Ottawa. As a Montrealer, the hon. member should know that there is a great deal of work in research and development. The agency is located in her riding. The member should be very proud of that and she should know that there is a lot of R and D being conducted, that a lot of work is being contracted out, and that many jobs were created thanks to federal activities in her riding.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how can the minister claim that Quebec was treated fairly by the federal government regarding federal research centres, considering that these centres employ only 3,000 people in Quebec, compared to 11,000, or almost four times more, in Ontario? Is this not another good reason to vote Yes?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Quebec's pharmaceutical industry exists thanks to federal programs. The aerospace industry exists thanks to federal programs. As for the computer industry as a whole, Quebec entrepreneurs are successful in these sectors thanks to federal programs.

If we look at R and D grants, Quebec gets over 40 per cent thanks to federal programs. The truth is that the federal government has built on the enormous capabilities of our entrepreneurs and, instead of criticizing us, the hon. member should take pride in their success.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, billions of dollars are required to finish construction of Canada's information highway. Right now those billions of dollars are stuck at the U.S. border. The reason they are stuck there is because of archaic foreign ownership restrictions that have been upheld by the government. Even its own advisory council is asking for change.

When will the government do something for consumers instead of catering to special interests and bring that much needed investment into the country?

Hon. Jon Gerrard (Secretary of State (Science, Research and Development), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the hon. member has highlighted the importance of developing the information highway in Canada. It is important to note that it is recognized in the telecommunications area that our structure in terms of foreign investment is appropriate. They are looking at and have recommended changes in other areas.

Quite frankly we think the investment potential is here. It is a very exciting investment for the Canadian area and it is occurring with the existing rules in the area of telecommunications.

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we have heard those speeches for two years in this place. If they keep up with this kind of attitude, the information highway will become an information goat path in Canada.

Thousands of jobs are waiting to be created in the country. Why is the government stifling the creation of all those jobs, those 21st century jobs, by maintaining 19th century protectionist policies?

Hon. Jon Gerrard (Secretary of State (Science, Research and Development), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform the hon. member that Canada's telecommunications infrastructure and programs are seen as among the leaders in the world.

● (1440)

We are moving very quickly to open up a very competitive environment. Investment in this area is increasing dramatically and the investment in research and development, which has been the particular question today, is very substantial. It looks like a bright future.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance, responsible for regional development in Quebec.

The Prime Minister asked us to find good reasons to vote Yes in the referendum, and here is another one. Research and development is a fundamental tool for developing the economy and employment in Quebec. Ever since statistics became available, Quebec has never had its fair share of federal spending in this area.

Will the Minister of Finance, who is responsible for regional development in Quebec, admit that the federal government has done nothing in the past two years to redress a long standing injustice with respect to research and development in federal laboratories, which leaves Quebec with a meagre 15.8 per cent of the R&D budget although it represents 25 per cent of the population?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately for the hon. member, these figures are entirely inaccurate. They are not correct.

In the past ten years, the federal government built ten new research centres in Quebec.

An hon. member: Really?

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Yes, really. Furthermore, six research institutions were established jointly with the province. All these institutions are involved in areas that are vital to the development of Quebec and Canada: biotechnology, energy, the environment, aerospace, optics, and many more.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, no mistake, it is absolutely too good to be true.

A study released in 1992 reported and I quote: "Moreover, research and development expenditures by the federal government in Quebec must account for a fairer share than the disgraceful 13 per cent they now represent". The author of that study—the Prime Minister says Le Hir—no, no, if you just look to your left you will see the author, the Minister of Finance, who was quoted in the June 8 1992 papers as saying so. He is the author.

It was the Minister of Finance who wrote "the disgraceful 13 per cent", when he was—

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: I am sure that we are getting to the question right now.

Mr. Duceppe: Yes. It is far from being too good to be true, nothing has changed. Is this not, based on the words of the minister himself, a good reason to vote yes?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, that was written when we were not in government. We have made a complete change in direction since then.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member, the one quoting Le Hir, for at last quoting someone credible.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mrs. Bonnie Hickey (St. John's East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, day after day we hear Reform members criticize regional economic development especially in Atlantic Canada. I am an Atlantic Canadian and I would like to know the facts.

My question is for the minister responsible for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. Can the minister tell the House and my constituents what ACOA's success rate is, what concrete benefits it brings to the region and what is his response to the criticism from the third party?

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the government committed itself both in the throne speech and in subsequent budgets to developing strong regional economies.

Regional development agencies by their very nature are decentralized institutions committed to working with the private sector, provincial governments, universities and other community organizations.

In Atlantic Canada, ACOA has been able to facilitate the private sector and its success rate is approximately 94 per cent.

I said to committee members that there are bound to be setbacks. There will probably be setbacks in the future, but at a success rate of 94 per cent when the federal government contributes one dollar under that particular agency it generates $4.20.

IPPERWASH

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the criminal element in Ipperwash has led insurance companies to declare that the whole area of Ipperwash is an area of insurrection and rebellion. The solicitor general has decided to pass the buck and lay blame at the feet of the Ontario Provincial Police.

Now the provincial police is on a heightened state of alert because of a potential land grab by militant natives at the 2,000–acre Pinery Provincial Park this Thanksgiving weekend.

Will the solicitor general declare these renegades a national security threat and deal with them immediately? When will the minister put the safety of Canadians ahead of the interests of thugs and criminals?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the matter is clearly under the jurisdiction of the Ontario provincial government through its police of local jurisdiction, the Ontario Provincial Police.

If the Ontario government through the Ontario Provincial Police feels that it needs assistance, there are recognized procedures in place to request such assistance. If a request is made it will be given very active and immediate consideration.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the solicitor general should do his job and make sure that the law is applied equally. Ipperwash is just one example of organized criminals getting out of control.

Since he does not believe it is a national security threat, how about the biker wars in Montreal and Toronto? These wars are being waged over the control of the drug trade, gun smuggling, prostitution and other contraband. The pipeline for this contraband is Akwesasne, Oka and Kanesatake.

If he does not believe this is a national security threat, will the solicitor general tell Canadians what is a national security threat, what is organized crime, and his reasons for not acting?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, under our Constitution the administration of justice is a provincial responsibility. The federal government cannot simply walk in and tell the Ontario Provincial Police or the Quebec provincial police to leave and let somebody else do their job. If they feel they need assistance there are provisions in place for that assistance to be requested and, if so, it will be responded to in a quick and effective way.

We are there to help law enforcement across the country. We want to see the laws enforced in an equitable and firm way across the country, but we are not in a position to tell, like the hon. member, that we do not think the Ontario Provincial Police or the Quebec provincial police can do its job. I am sure he should have, as a former member of a local police force, more respect for and confidence in similar police forces across the country.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Natural Resources. Since the last federal election, Quebec has been awarded only 13 per cent of the research and development contracts of the Department of Natural Resources. Turning the clock back a little, Quebec has received under 10 per cent of research and development contracts for the past six years, a shortfall for the Quebec laboratory industry and Quebec researchers of tens of millions of dollars. Another good reason, Mr. Prime Minister, for a yes vote.

Because the Minister of Natural Resources has long been aware of the situation, what steps has she taken to ensure that Quebec obtains its full share of research and development contracts from her department?

[English]

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let me provide the hon. member this afternoon with some very good reasons why Quebecers should vote to stay in Canada.

In the Department of Natural Resources we have a substantial presence in the province of Quebec. Let me share with the hon. member some examples: our annual contribution to Forintek Canada, which recently established its eastern office in Quebec City; funding provided to the Centre canadien de fushion magnétique; the establishment of the Canadian Centre for Geomatics in Sherbrooke; and let us not forget the work done at the Varennes laboratories pertaining to energy efficiency and alternative energy.

The financial infusion of my department into Quebec is strategic and represents targeted investments that will ensure not only Quebec's long term economic future but the future of our nation.

• (1450)

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, that only amounts to 13 per cent, which is peanuts. You know very well that Quebec is being had all down the line.

The Speaker: Dear colleague, you must always address the Chair.

Mrs. Tremblay: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

So the minister knows very well that Quebec has been had all down the line in research and development. Ten or thirteen per cent is far from our share. She could give us a long list; we would not be impressed.

My supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. Mr. Prime Minister, how do you justify—

Mr. Bouchard: No, no. "How does the Prime Minister justify"—

Mrs. Tremblay: Pardon me. I should address you, Mr. Speaker. I got it wrong. I am all mixed up today.

How does the Prime Minister justify his minister and his government's inaction in a matter in which Quebec is clearly wronged?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Natural Resources clearly showed a few minutes ago that she was not at all mixed up.

In Canada, we always try for a balance in all areas possible, but it is mathematically impossible for the proportions to be the same in each area for each province. Some provinces are smaller, some are bigger. It depends on circumstances. On the whole, however, the distribution of laboratories, research and development in Canada has been very fair. When I visit Quebec, I realize some sectors have benefited enormously from research and development in Canada. Aeronautics, as I said earlier, is concentrated in Quebec. In the Montreal region, Canadair is expanding considerably. Pratt & Whitney is another of the major specialty firms. It has gained a reputation for manufacturing engines not only in Canada, but throughout America.

So we do a lot and we will do even more in the future, that is certain, because once the situation in Canada becomes extremely stable, as it will on October 31, Canada will enjoy a new period of prosperity, and we will be able to share even more.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the federal government subsidizes VIA Rail to the tune of over $800,000 a day.

Last spring VIA ran a 50 per cent off special. The consequences of this action were twofold. First, privately run bus companies were forced to lay off workers due to the fact they could not compete with twice subsidized rates. Second, the Canadian taxpayer ended up paying for the 50 per cent cuts. Now VIA is at it again offering 50 per cent off rates for the winter and the fall.

My question is for the Minister of Transport. When will he do the responsible thing and put an end to this grotesque abuse of taxpayers' dollars?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the future of passenger rail in the country is certainly in doubt. When we look at what the hon. member has just suggested in terms of the overall subsidy paid to VIA Rail and to other non-VIA passenger services, we have to be extremely careful about how we will handle the very strong demand on Canadian taxpayers for a subsidy.

Surely even the hon. member would agree that since VIA is running trains on a number of corridors throughout the country we should try to keep them as full as possible and try to avoid as much of a drain as possible on Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, once again the government is competing against the private sector and using taxpayers' dollars to do so. There is only one way to deal with the situation: privatize VIA Rail and end the squandering of public funds.

When will the Minister of Transport make the logical and ethical decision and introduce legislation that will commence the privatization of VIA Rail?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated that as the budget called for last year Transport Canada is looking at all its activities and all areas in which we have subsidies.

I am glad to see the hon. member believes we should be eliminating subsidies. I hope he will speak to some of his colleagues who are having second thoughts about some of the subsidies that have been eliminated so far.

I assure the hon. member that we will be taking into account the need to look at the future of VIA.

• (1455)

Now that the province of Ontario, the province of Quebec and the Government of Canada have made public the report on high speed rail, we believe the time has come to look very carefully at what the future of VIA and other passenger services in the country should be. Certainly, as has been the case in the past, we will be looking at privatization as one of those options.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE

Mr. Julian Reed (Halton—Peel, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

Canadians expect a lot from Canada Customs in its responsibility for our international border. On the one hand we expect it to keep our streets and communities safe from smuggled guns, drugs and pornography. On the other hand we expect customs to speed the passage of tourists and goods into Canada because tourism and trade mean jobs in this country.

What is the Minister of National Revenue doing to improve service at Canada's borders?

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member is quite right that we do expect a lot from Canada Customs. Indeed it performs very well. It is one of the best customs services in the world.

Recently we worked on the accord between the President of the United States, Mr. Clinton, and the Prime Minister of Canada with respect to making the border easier for people who are regular travellers and those who pose no great risk to either country.

We have instituted a number of programs, CANPASS for the airports, CANPASS for rail and land traffic, CANPASS for boats, which allow people to get across the border substantially faster than before. At the same time it frees up resources for special teams where we feel there are areas of higher risk. It is this weeding out areas of higher risk from those of lower risk which we think will be the future of our services.

FORESTRY

Mr. René Canuel (Matapédia—Matane, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Natural Resources.

In a letter to the Minister of Natural Resources, a group of Quebec organizations, including the Union des municipalités du Québec, is demanding $80 million from the federal government to compensate for its complete withdrawal from the funding of the private forestry sector by April 1996.

Does the Minister of Natural Resources intend to agree to the Quebec partners' request and to compensate the thousands of Quebec forestry workers abandoned by the federal government?

[English]

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member well knows because of his interest in the forestry sector in Quebec, it was the previous government that decided to cancel FRDA, federal–provincial forest resource development agreements. Because of the sorry state of the finances of the nation left to us by the previous government, we had no choice but to confirm that decision of the previous government. Therefore FRDA will expire across the nation as their due dates come upon us.

Let me say that because of program review my department had to reassess its priorities. The Department of Natural Resources is not a department of regional economic development. It is primarily a department of science and technology. We are working very closely with our provincial counterparts and industry to ensure the forestry sector has the science and technology base it needs to compete with the best in the world.

Point of Order

LAC BARRIÈRE

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the investigator working with the commission de la jeunesse into allegations of sexual abuse at Lac Barrière reserve is expected to present a draft report to the band today.

The total cost of this is anticipated to exceed $300,000. There is concern that the investigator will provide a copy to the band but present only a verbal whitewash to the public. A verbal report is not good enough.

Could the minister assure the House that the public will get a written report rather than the most expensive speech it has ever paid for?

The Speaker: The hon. member for Leeds—Grenville.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

The Minister of Justice must have been very encouraged when close to 300 guns of various descriptions were voluntarily turned in recently to authorities in Ottawa–Carleton in exchange for free triple A baseball tickets.

• (1500)

Would the Minister of Justice consider some similar form of gun amnesty on a national scale as a way of flushing out unused and unwanted guns in our society?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, may I first of all acknowledge the hon. member's interest in the whole area of gun amnesty. I am grateful to him for his focus on that subject.

The government is fully aware of the value a gun amnesty can provide. Unused guns for which people no longer have a purpose and illegal guns could be turned in without consequence and without questions being asked. An amnesty can only make communities safer.

I can tell the hon. member that the government is considering an amnesty coincidental with the proclamation of Bill C–68 when that occurs.

Once again I am grateful to the hon. member for raising this point again.

NUCLEAR TESTING

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs. It has to do with the fact that the Government of France has proceeded with another nuclear test in the Pacific.

Given the government's oft–stated desire to have Canada be more of a part of the Pacific rim, I wonder if the government is prepared to show solidarity with the opinions of the governments and the peoples of the Pacific rim and call in the French ambassador and tell him just how objectionable the Canadian people and the Canadian government find this continued nuclear testing.

Will the minister tell the House today not just what he is going to say but what the government is going to do about France continually flouting the opinion of the international community on this and the future of the planet?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the view expressed by the hon. member.

The test is the second in a series of tests France has announced. I have expressed our regret on behalf of the Government of Canada. We hope that by 1996 all countries that have the capacity to have nuclear armament will cease these tests. In the meantime I believe our position is well known by the Canadian public, by the French authorities and by the public at large. I do not think the hon. member should be excited today since this was announced some time ago and we missed his first reactions when the first test took place.

POINTS OF ORDER

MEMBER FOR MARKHAM—WHITCHURCH—STOUFFVILLE

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my point of order is very brief.

We have agreed in this House to stand by your rulings. You have ruled that signs and symbols are not to be worn on the lapel. I draw to your attention the fact that the member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville has such a device. Today he was even on camera when he made a statement. I think it would be correct for you to censure him.

The Speaker: I did not see the sign. I cannot see it from here.

Mr. Jag Bhaduria (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville, Ind. Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the sign I am holding reads "One Canada".

We have from time to time worn a lapel symbol which shows the unity of the country. It is not advertising something. From time to time we do display our support for good causes. This sign is a sign that we believe in a united country and—

The Speaker: Colleagues, you usually leave these things to my discretion. Would you mind if I took time to have a look at this particular sign.

I would point out to hon. members that your Speaker would be hard pressed to have members who carry the identification of a member of Parliament on their lapels remove them. I would be hard pressed to have those members who wear them remove the Canadian flag pins. I would not in any way be able to indicate all possible things you could or could not wear on your lapels.

• (1505)

I have listened to the hon. member's point of order. I said that I would look at it and take it under advisement. If necessary, I will get back to the House.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to two petitions.

* * *

PRIVATE MEMBER'S MOTION M–4

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I wonder if I could have the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw my private member's Motion M–4 from the Order Paper. At this time the matter seems to be redundant. It has been a considerably long time since I submitted the motion.

I would ask for unanimous consent of the House to withdraw it.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

(Motion withdrawn.)

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

NATURAL RESOURCES

Mr. Gordon Kirkby (Prince Albert—Churchill River, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present in both official languages the seventh report of the Standing Committee on Natural Resources in relation to Bill C–71, an act to amend the Explosives Act, without amendments.

MOTION M–404 WITHDRAWN

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, if you ask, I think you will find the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw Motion M–404 in the name of the hon. member for Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans and replace it with Motion M–494 in the name of the hon. member for Verchères on the Order Paper and especially on the House's priority list. I think we will have the unanimous consent of the House for this proposal.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have the unanimous consent of the House?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The House has heard the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

(Motion withdrawn.)

[English]

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, just one small item in connection with that matter. Motion No. 494 in the name of the hon. member for Verchères should be transferred into the name of the hon. member for Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans. That would be part of the same order.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Do we still have unanimous consent for the change?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PETITIONS

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I wish to present a petition which has been circulating all across Canada. This petition has been signed by a number of Canadians from British Columbia.

The petitioners would like to draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession which has not been recognized for its value to our society. They also state that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families that make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically, ill or the aged.

• (1510)

The petitioners therefore pray and call upon Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families that decide to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill, or the aged.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions to present today.

The first petition, duly certified by the clerk of petitions, is from a group of B.C. citizens, including many in my riding of Okanagan—Shuswap, asking Parliament to stop the native land claim negotiations and to start treating native Indians exactly the same as all other Canadians.

ADAMS LAKE

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is my sad duty to present a petition duly certified by the clerk of petitions from the residents trapped on the far side of Adams Lake where they can no longer have access to their homes safely and reliably due to government mismanagement.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

Mrs. Bonnie Hickey (St. John's East, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to present two petitions to the House.

In the first petition, students from St. Michael's High School in Bell Island call on Parliament not to cut CIDA's funding for its public participation program.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

Mrs. Bonnie Hickey (St. John's East, Lib.): Madam Speaker, the second petition is from the Tenants' Action Association from Brophy Place, Hunt's Lane and Kelly Street in St. John's who call on Parliament to retain the Canada assistance plan in its present form.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, consistent with Standing Order 36, I wish to present three petitions from my constituency.

The first petition asks and petitions Parliament not to amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the charter of rights and freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the human rights code to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase of sexual orientation.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, the second petition asks Parliament to ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, the third petition petitions Parliament to act immediately to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would suggest that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANADA TRANSPORTATION ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I had just started to make my remarks a few moments before two o'clock. Before I got into full flight I was interrupted for question period. I want to resume where I left off by applauding the Minister of Transport for bringing forward Bill C–101.

Bill C–101 is there to modernize Canada's transportation system. This task has not been easy to undertake but this minister is up to it. He is certainly someone who is not afraid of these challenges and of dealing with issues involving our transportation sector. Transport is one of the largest if not the largest departments of the Government of Canada.

The constituency of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell has a number of rail lines running through it. The Ottawa to Montreal CN rail line obviously runs through through Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. Perhaps I should not say obviously but virtually the only way of getting between the two cities is to travel through my riding. The train goes through such communities as Alexandria, Maxville and others between Ottawa and Montreal.

• (1515)

Some years ago I was very concerned because of a fear that CN would attempt to close down the rail line between Ottawa and Montreal.

[Translation]

This fear was justified as one CN document called for the closing of the rail line between the communities of Glen Robertson and Ottawa in Ontario, so that there would no longer have been a railway line for VIA passenger trains between Ottawa and Montreal, except if VIA had wanted to acquire the line abandoned by CN.

[English]

The second concern in my constituency was that if the line was abandoned there would not be enough interest or possibility of converting part of what was left of that line into a short line railroad.

This was particularly disconcerting at the time because we had at one point an NDP government in Ontario, although luckily we are rid of it now. I invite my colleague from Winnipeg to listen to this attentively because he will realize the damage that government was doing in Ontario.

It passed the successor rights bill. If someone wanted to start a short line railroad, if the previous company had four people doing the job—it did not matter that it only needed one to do the task in that short four, five or ten-mile piece of railroad—that person was forced to hire the amount of people who were there under the previous regime because of those so-called successor rights.

This was done probably in good faith in an attempt to protect jobs. What the government was really doing was making everybody lose their jobs because if the short line railroad was not viable, it could not be operated at all. Therefore everyone lost their employment rather than some of them keeping it.

Maybe that made sense at the time or prima facie may have made sense. Maybe it was some dictate from the socialist agenda and seemed reasonable in that respect.

In any case, there could not be a short line railroad in Ontario. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport, who is very knowledgeable on these issues, will be discussing this issue with the member for Winnipeg, Bird's Hill and will be briefing him and straightening him out so that he fully understands this issue. I have good reason to believe he is doing that as we speak.

The bill we have today will address a number of issues. It will address provincial running rights. It will address rail line rationalization and short line railways, as I have been discussing, rail transportation issues generally, and economic regulation regarding grain and rail. VIA Rail issues will be addressed along with mergers and acquisition, air transport and a number of other important topics related to the transport industry.

I end by expressing a note of sadness regarding one issue. I know the member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke shares my view in this. He and I have discussed this issue before.

A couple of years ago there were plans whereby CN and CP wanted to jointly own the rail line linking Coteau junction and a location in northern Ontario, the Montreal to North Bay rail line.

[Translation]

Now I notice that negotiations between CN and CP broke off and this joint ownership of the rail line will not come to be.

• (1520)

The reason why I am concerned about this is that, in my view, to ensure its long term viability, traffic should be increased on this particular railway line. I viewed favourably this effort on the part of the two railway companies to jointly own the line.

I am disappointed that the whole thing seems to have failed. To conclude, I urge CN and CP to combine their efforts again so that this line connecting eastern and western Canada that the people of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell benefit from can be saved in the medium term and even the long term.

[English]

I am pleased to have had the opportunity to participate in this debate. I ask all colleagues to support this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Rocheleau (Trois-Rivières, BQ): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak today on Bill C-101 to amend the National Transportation Act, 1987. As the member representing Trois-Rivières, I would just like to point out that our region, Trois-Rivières in particular, makes extensive use of the railway system, with the northern part of the Mauricie using the CN, and the southern part, including the city of Trois-Rivières, mainly using CP.

It is obvious that the government is trying to harmonize this legislation to draw attention to the bill to privatize CN and make its acquisition more appealing to potential buyers.

Many of the amendments in connection with the National Transportation Agency are designed to remedy regulatory deficiencies which hinder CN and CP's profitability and cause operating deficits that these companies have to absorb in order to maintain existing lines.

It may seem commendable to strive to improve on the National Transportation Agency so that both companies can become profitable, but at the same time it is dangerous to try both to achieve these objectives through more flexible regulations for operators like CN and CP and preserve the intent of the law, which is to protect public transportation. It is dangerous to change the perspective of the legislation which is intended to foster the use of public transportation, and particularly rail transportation, for the development of people and businesses.

The role of the National Transportation Agency should be to ensure proper balance between the CN and CP monopolies, commercial users and passengers. Since this bill is only at first stage, we can assume that heated discussions will take place when it is reviewed by the transport committee, which will hear many witnesses who will debate these amendments, including railway unions, commercial users and railway companies. These groups will not all agree with the new mandate that this bill proposes for the National Transportation Agency.

In that respect, I want to mention some of the concerns that will surely be raised by various stakeholders during the hearings which will be held regarding this legislation.

First, there is the ability for shippers to call upon the National Transportation Agency to block a rail monopoly. I am referring here to the approach used by Canadian Pulp and Paper Association, but the same could apply to all shippers of raw materials, such as the mining and forest industries which, by nature, ship enormous quantities of materials, usually from remote areas located far from the main industrial centres.

The 1987 act allowed commercial users of railway companies to call upon the agency to circumvent CN and CP's excessive monopoly power. These provisions are maintained, but new hurdles will limit the ability of shipping companies to use them.

Indeed, the shipper will now have to prove that he will suffer a serious prejudice in order to convince the agency to keep CN or CP from unduly raising its prices. We are not saying that the industry should not pay its fair share for the transportation of its products. The problem is that the notion of serious prejudice is not defined in Bill C–101, thus leaving open the possibility that a shipper may resort to political or court action to win his case before the National Transportation Agency.

• (1525)

It is difficult for the industry to prove the degree to which an increase in rates would be harmful to it, and more difficult still to prove that there would be serious prejudice or material injury.

It is vital to discuss what is meant by serious prejudice; otherwise it can be anticipated that too often the decision will have to be made in the courts, after time–consuming discussions have failed.

I would also like to discuss the issue of competitiveness in remote regions. It is essential that all regions have access to a competitive and affordable rail system in Canada that will permit them to compete in the export market.

How will the new changes to the National Transportation Act allowing rail carriers to raise charges or simply discontinue unprofitable branch lines take regional economic realities into consideration by spreading operating costs over the entire system instead of dividing it up into more profitable and less profitable branch lines?

For too long now, the cost of developing remote regions has been calculated without taking into account on the positive side of the ledger the development natural resources confer to the more urbanized regions.

Here again, the concept of serious prejudice might be sustained provided it is given a fairly precise definition in order to prevent rail rates from being raised, thus cancelling out the profitability of industries dependent on this mode of transportation, without any consideration of the wages earned by workers in these industries.

Another provision, which will probably raise questions, deals with agency membership. The bill proposes to cut from nine to three the number of members of the National Transportation Agency. This reduction could lead to a lack of understanding of regional issues across Canada and, in turn, to a misappreciation of any significant risk that shippers may be at a disadvantage because of the monopoly enjoyed by CN and CP.

It will be more difficult for shippers to draw attention to their needs and their regions if the agency is composed of three members instead of nine. Listening to witnesses at the hearings held by the Standing Committee on Transport will surely help us strike a balance between a reduced agency of three members and an expanded agency of nine members.

My comments will also deal with the establishment of short–line railways. The financial difficulties experienced by CN and CP in recent years have led to the recent establishment of short–line railways.

Since these small organizations enjoy higher profits, smaller management and fewer constraints in the distribution of work through their collective agreements, we will see more and more of them. Unfortunately, the phrase "short line railway" is not defined anywhere in this bill. Furthermore, in many clauses of this bill, it is unclear whether short line railway operators should be regarded as railway operators or simply as shippers.

Clauses 130 through 137 of this bill concern the identification of competitive lines. In the past, railway operators had their own systems and, already, the two antagonists do not like the idea of using the lines of their competition in return for fair compensation.

Public interest requires better co–operation in the management of CN and CP. For example, CP could pay a price to use CN's tracks, and vice versa, without the tracks' owners being able to prevent such an arrangement.

This would promote free competition, while also giving a more accurate idea of the actual costs of transportation in a particular region.

Since my time is running out, I will immediately move on to the issue of regional development. In the past, under the act governing the agency, railway companies wanting to close or abandon a line had to comply with an elaborate process. Now, these companies will only have to announce their intention to dispose of a line.

• (1530)

The new process to transfer and discontinue the operation of railway lines will be very quick: a 60-day notice, a 15-day period for each level of authority, for a maximum of 105 days. This time frame will allow railway companies to dispose of their lines very quickly, without having to justify their decision on either economic grounds or grounds of public interest.

However, this new transfer and discontinuation process hardly encourages the establishment of short line railways. It is difficult if not impossible to find a potential buyer in just 60 days. Quebec, and the same goes for any other province, will have only 15 days to decide whether to buy a line and continue to provide the existing service to the public.

I can only hope that this time the government will have the vision it has been lacking so far and think in terms of the future, including the interests of Quebec. In this case, as in others, we find no reasons to vote no but many reasons to vote yes, and I hope Quebecers realize this.

[English]

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Madam Speaker, it is interesting to notice how the members of the Bloc Quebecois are using every opportunity in the House of Commons to make the point about why they think their fellow citizens in Quebec should vote yes in the coming referendum. I was interested in question period today when they were going on and on about alleged injustices to Quebec. It struck me that if the people of Quebec vote yes they are going to have a heck of a lot less of what the Bloc Quebecois was complaining they were not getting enough of.

The same is true with respect to transportation matters. I heard people in the Bloc refer today to the privatization of CN. I can say with some certainty that if there is a yes vote in Quebec the provision in Bill C–89 guaranteeing that the headquarters of this new privatized CN will be in Montreal will not continue very long past a yes vote. At least if I have anything to do with it, it will not. I imagine that would be true for a lot of western Canadians, particularly people I represent, who from the very beginning felt that if CN was to be restructured in such a radical way, the headquarters of CN should be in western Canada, in particular in Winnipeg, because most of the traffic this new privatized CN will be directing will be in western Canada. This is just by way of making that point to the Bloc.

There are two things I want to get on the record with respect to Bill C–101. I do not think I have to tell anyone in the House that I am in general opposed to the overall agenda of the government with respect to Bill C–101, the privatization of CN, the deregulation of the transportation system, going back to fights we had in the House against the former transport minister, Don Mazankowski, and going back before that.

Sometimes people tend to forget, in particular people in Winnipeg, that this deregulation business really started under a former Liberal Minister of Transport, now the Minister of Human Resources Development. There is a tendency to blame the origins of this agenda on the Conservatives when it goes back beyond that to this fascination the then Minister of Transport, the member for Winnipeg South Centre, had with deregulation at that time, prior to the defeat of the Trudeau government.

I was interested to hear some of the things members said. The point I want to make here, and I do not think it has been made to this point, at least not to my satisfaction, is the process by which we are doing this, if I understand the origins of this procedure by which we refer matters to committee before second reading.

I had a lot to do with parliamentary reform in previous Parliaments and we considered this at one point. The goal of that procedure as it was first imagined was it would be applied to bills of a non–partisan nature. It would not be available to the government alone. It could only be done with some kind of agreement in the House and therefore it would be a mechanism whereby parties could say this is a bill they do not really have much to fight about in, so they want to take it into committee and go over the details.

I have noticed something that may be related to the fact that this procedure was adopted, I believe, after the beginning of this new Parliament when the government only had to deal with rookies on the opposition side in committee. This has now become a procedure available to the government whenever it wants to use it, not something that requires a certain amount of co–operation on the part of the opposition. In my judgment, this goes against the spirit of the reform intent. When I say reform I do not mean Reform Party, but reform in the best sense of the word, reform of the House of Commons. This procedure has become a kind of a fast track procedure. In my judgment it is not being used for the intention for which it was originally designed.

We have here a massive bill which represents a major reorientation of the way transportation decisions are made with respect to rail line abandonment, the creation of short line railways, relationships between shippers and the railway companies, a whole host of things, all of which deserve a major second reading debate. We are reconceptualizing the transportation system of the country. We should be having a debate about that, in which I would want to argue very strongly and at length, hopefully being open to questions from colleagues in the House.

Instead we have this very prescribed, circumscribed three-hour debate in which people have only ten-minute speeches, after which the whole thing is whisked off to committee. There is never really any significant debate on the principle of the bill. That is fine if there is agreement to do so and if it is the kind of legislation that lends itself to that procedure.

With respect to my Bloc and Reform colleagues, they let the government get away with something when they agreed to move ahead with this kind of procedure. They allowed it to go into the standing orders without the kinds of safeguards that should have been required. There should have been some provision that there had to be opposition agreement in order for this procedure to be followed. I believe their inexperience did not stand them in very good stead in that respect.

I want to register once more my opposition to this bill. My opposition has been longstanding to an agenda of which this bill is the latest stage. I know my Reform colleagues were saying earlier that it does not go far enough, that it should be absolute, utter I suppose, comprehensive, total deregulation. However, I think deregulation has not served the country particularly well. It certainly has not served the transportation system very well. It certainly has not served my constituents very well, those who work at the railway and others, and the economic spin-off that used to exist in Winnipeg as a result of the presence of railway jobs there.

A couple of weeks ago another 266 people were laid off in the CN shops in Transcona. This is a far cry from the kinds of promises made during the 1993 election campaign by members opposite about how the many terrible things that were happening under the Tories would cease if only a Liberal government were elected: NAFTA would not go through, Winnipeg would be returned to its former glory as a transportation centre, rail jobs would return from Montreal and Edmonton, and no one would ever be laid off again. That is not the way it has turned out. We have a Liberal government doing what no Conservative government ever contemplated in public, privatizing CN Rail and devastating the community I come from.

We see here an intention on the part of the government and the railway together to basically dismantle CN Rail as we have known it and to have basically tracks and trains, that is it. Maintenance, repair, stores and all kinds of other things the railway used to do for itself will all be contracted out, pieced off here, there and everywhere. As a result a lot more good paying jobs will be lost. In the end this is also about good paying jobs. It is not just about railways.

I listened earlier to the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, the government whip, talking about the impediment to short line railways. One of the reasons for successor rights was to make sure that short line railways are not used as a way of union busting, are not used as a way of laying people off and then hiring them back at half of what they used to make. I do not think that is such a bad sentiment. I do not think that is something for which the NDP government in Ontario or anywhere else should have to apologize.

Those good paying jobs are disappearing. I do not think that is good for Canada. It is not good for the middle class, which is being eroded at both ends. It is not good for the revenues of the government. It is part of the reason we have a deficit, because a lot of the good paying jobs are going, and with them the ability to pay the kind of income tax that would help pay off the deficit.

Mr. Reg Alcock (Winnipeg South, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it is always a joy to rise in the House and follow the member for Winnipeg—Birds Hill. Excuse me, it is Winnipeg Transcona; I apologize for that. I would not want to confuse him with the member for Birds Hill, who is a Liberal and represents his constituents very ably and helps them understand the needs of doing business in the 20th century and not the 19th century, as the member for Winnipeg Transcona does.

It is passing strange to me how the NDP, once a leader in social justice, has become a conservative party, simply refusing to accept any kind of change or acknowledge that any kind of improvement should take place anywhere, anytime.

Like the previous member, I want to briefly comment on the process. I am delighted that the government has chosen to go this route with this bill. I am astounded at the remarks from the Reform Party, which seems to be opposed to this.

In this Parliament since the new government arrived in 1993, we changed the rules of the House in a manner that allows the people of Canada to participate in important debates on public policy prior to the government's making up its mind finally on a piece of legislation. It is an opening up and an inviting into the process, rather than a fast tracking, as the member for Winnipeg Transcona would have us believe.

I think the minister has done a great deal in a very short period of time to deal with the regulatory burden that has been imposed on the country, some of it for good reasons and some of it perhaps we have outgrown. I think we owe the minister a vote of thanks for allowing this debate to take place in this fashion and for steering this debate.

We have the member for Hamilton West, the chair of the transportation committee, well known to the House and very experienced on these matters. I am assured he will give people right across the country an opportunity to come before the committee and put on the table their issues on this very important matter.

The parliamentary secretary, the member for London East, has been working tirelessly to see that members of the House are informed on this issue and are responding to issues that have been raised by constituents right across the country.

I want to comment on an earlier change this minister has brought in, the changes in the WGTA, which represented a stepping back from subsidy and regulation on the part of the government. Two days ago in my home town of Winnipeg there was an announcement by Schneider's that it will open a very large, two million hogs a year, meat processing plant. At last we are doing what western Canadians have been calling for for a long time. We are taking the false subsidies out of the rate structure and we are allowing the development of secondary processing in the prairies, where it should have been for a long time. We are all very pleased about that, and we are pleased it is this government that finally has the courage to challenge the burden that has been imposed by regulation.

I am not saying all regulation is wrong; it is not. Whenever there are imperfect markets, whenever monopolies exist or whenever the public good needs to be protected, there is a need for government to act in a manner that attempts to level the playing field between competing interests. That is what this is all about.

The government has said that while it has owned the CNR it has imposed burdens on the railway for reasons other than the commercial interests of the railway. In an environment where change is taking place so rapidly now and where there has been such a tremendous evolution in transportation, it is time to revisit that. It is time to ask whether these regulations are serving the purpose for which they were intended.

• (1545)

As chair of the western and northern caucus I can tell the House that we take great interest in the particular matter. Transportation is vital to all regions of Canada, but nowhere is that seen as vividly as it is in western Canada with its tremendous distances and sparse populations.

In addressing Bill C–101 this afternoon I cannot emphasize too strongly the importance of rail transportation to western and northern Canada. Commodities such as coal, sulphur, grain and petrochemicals must be shipped substantial distances from points of origin in western and northern Canada to markets around the globe. For most of these movements highway transportation does not present an effective competitive alternative to rail transportation and inland water transport is non–existent. For the great majority of the transportation requirements of western Canadian industry rail is the only realistic way of accessing export markets.

Canadian railways rely heavily on resource based products for their revenues. Intermodal traffic handled by the railways is highly truck competitive and has limited profitability. The eastern Canadian operations of the railways by their own public statements have not been profitable in recent years. Railways accordingly look for their profitability to the resource based industries of western Canada. It is essential that we do not endeavour to solve the financial problems of railways by creating a bigger problem, namely to give railways greater leverage to increase freight rates in western Canada and thereby impair the ability of western Canadian industry to compete on a long term basis in world markets.

There is widespread agreement on the need for railway reform in the country. Railways are burdened with excess track and impediments to productivity improvements. Bill C–101 will permit CN and CP to sell or abandon unprofitable trackage without regulatory intervention and will encourage lower cost short line railway operations to be developed. We believe this makes good economic sense and the legislation is to be commended for enabling railways to become more cost efficient.

There is widespread agreement in the House that the encouragement of a competitive railway environment in Canada is the best way to achieve efficient and cost effective rail service. This, however, is not achieved by complete deregulation as some would allege because there are many industries in western Canada that are essentially captive to rail transportation.

Railway regulation has historically served a different purpose than the regulation of other modes of transport. Trucking regulation restricted available trucking services and limited the freedom of choice of consumers. The deregulation of that industry had a pro–competitive result.

Railway regulation has served a different purpose. It protects captive shippers against the excessive monopoly power of the railways. Legislative provisions which give competitive options to railway customers promote competition. It is the stated policy of the government that those provisions, called the shipper relief provisions, will remain untouched in the present legislation. We are in full agreement with that approach.

I do have grave concerns, however, with certain sections of the proposed legislation that will make it more difficult for railway customers to obtain access to the Canadian transportation agency should the need arise. These barriers to agency access are counterproductive to a competitive railway environment and are unnecessary based on the experience of the last eight years.

The shipper relief provisions have been used by railway customers on only a handful of occasions. Their principal benefit has been to provide railway customers with some bargaining leverage in negotiating rates and service agreements with the railways. In this regard they have been particularly successful, as virtually thousands of rate and service agreements have been entered into between rail carriers and their customers and only when agreements could not be reached has recourse to the agency been required. Accordingly there is no need to construct barriers or fences to prevent their continued utilization. This will only have the effect of impairing their efficiency and making it more difficult for commercial arrangements to be concluded.

Section 113 of the proposed legislation provides that all rates set by the agency must be commercially fair and reasonable, while as a general principle no one could reasonably argue that rates should not be commercially fair and reasonable. The problem is that there is no definition of what is commercially fair and reasonable in the current bill.

Subsection 34(1) will enable the agency to order the payment of compensation for any loss or delay as a result of a proceeding which is found to be frivolous or vexatious. While this again does not appear to be unreasonable on the face of it, I am not aware of any pressing reason for its inclusion in the legislation. There is no history of frivolous or vexatious applications being filed with the agency and should a proceeding be initiated the agency has the jurisdiction to assess costs against an offending party.

I am concerned that this provision could operate as a deterrent to a railway customer who has a valid proceeding to advance before the agency. The chilling effect of a large damage award, should the application be unsuccessful, could well cause a railway customer not to proceed with a valid application.

A further area which I know the committee will consider concerns the running rights provisions. The provision to allow railways to sell or abandon lines will lead to, it is hoped by many, the creation of a great many short line railways. Absent the right to run as was originally proposed to the first competitive interchange where they can receive two bids for their cost of transportation and short line railways will remain captive in a less free environment than they currently have.

I appreciate very much the opportunity to speak on the bill. I know the committee will take the time to hear from many Canadians who are very concerned as we move to a new environment for rail transportation in the country.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I rise today on behalf of the constituents of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt to voice our complete agreement with the assessment of Bill C–101 as stated by my Reform Party colleague from Kootenay West—Revelstoke.

During the last election campaign the Liberals outlined in their infamous red book how they were to do business differently. Does the House remember that? They could hardly control themselves describing how they would do business differently once they seized the reins of power.

The Deputy Prime Minister was so reckless as to claim the Liberals would replace the goods and services tax within a year of coming into power or she would resign. The GST is alive and well and the Deputy Prime Minister shows no signs whatsoever of voluntarily resigning her seat as she promised to do. Is this what Canadians are supposed to buy as doing business differently?

My constituents are asking: "Different from what?" This type of shenanigans is the same as the shenanigans of the Mulroney government. They are all doing business differently and we all know what the people did with Mr. Mulroney's party and its way of doing business differently.

What are we looking for? What are we looking at? We are looking at failed promises. The Liberals promised major changes to the MP pension plan. They gave us minor changes which do not reflect private sector pension plan standards.

The Liberals promised they would empower individual members of Parliament through an increase in the use of free votes. My goodness, free votes in the House of Commons. The Liberals have reneged on that promise by enforcing a heavy handed control of voting on their own party members.

The point I am leading to is simple. In the view of the motion being forwarded by the government at this time, there is no way we on this side of the House can trust the Liberal government. Neither should the Canadian public. The Reform Party's transport critic is quite right in the stand he has taken. British Columbians rely on railway transportation. B.C. has relied on railway transportation since the time of Confederation. Mining and forestry constitute a substantial portion of the economy in British Columbia.

We have contacted many companies in British Columbia respecting the bill. Our solicitations for input have caused an avalanche of information to flow to our offices. Detailed amendments to the bill keep coming in from many industry sources. All these companies make it very clear they feel strongly that Bill C–101 is vital to maintain and enhance competition in Canadian railways.

• (1555)

However there exists a danger that the Liberals intend to use the bill as a baby step in the right direction. Canadian railways are infected with exorbitant taxes and regulations which have created an unlevel playing field between us and our major trading partner. If there is anything the federal government can do to improve Canada's competitive advantage in terms of land transportation policies, these companies would have us do it.

We all agree that the major accomplishment of Bill C–101 of establishing a clear redefined process for line abandonment is desirable. This would enable railways to establish short line routes to be governed under provincial legislation.

The major flaw in the bill is that the free market is prevented from establishing prices. The Liberals intended the railways to continue to be treated as a service rather than as a business. They will continue through the bill to allow the transportation agency to regulate prices.

The Liberals are once again attempting to use policy as a means of regional development. It is a shame. Canadian businesses are sick and tired of this treatment being used on policy which affects their livelihood. The bill gives cabinet the authority to decide which rail lines will be abandoned in the next few years.

The Liberals are sealing their exclusive right to use these abandonments as policy footballs in their pre–election campaign. There is no reason for the bill to be sent to the committee directly following first reading.

Such a move is only convenient to the Liberal political agenda. We on this side of the House have seen many times in the past what this kind of request from the government benches really means. The Liberals would have us believe that this manoeuvre is another example of doing business differently, using the Grits terms. However we know differently. The Liberals are only interested in facilitating CN's share offering due this fall.

The Liberals are circumventing access to the committee hearings. The committee, suffering from a bad case of Liberal dictatorship, has already affixed arbitrary deadlines for submissions from stakeholders.

These deadlines were adopted by the committee as a result of the domination of Liberal Party membership on the committee. We all know what happens to Liberal Party members who do not vote the way of the Liberal Party intelligentsia or the way they are told to vote. We have seen it before in the House.

On this side of the House we know that the committee has received numerous submissions over the summer. We also know that the committee promised to circulate the submissions so that all hon. members could take them into consideration.

Finally we know that none of the submissions have been circulated. We know that the Liberals are doing business differently. I remember the last government. I cannot see the difference. Do you see the difference, Mr. Speaker?

Here is the different way of doing business that Canadians are seeing. Bill C–89 and Bill C–91 were fast tracked through this place by the Liberals. At that time the Liberals said that it would provide a more amendable process or something like that. Both those legislative proposals were passed without a single amendment. That is doing business differently. They do not allow any amendments whatsoever. It would be laughable if it did not concern important legislation regarding the interest of Canadian stakeholders.

I strongly urge the House not to vote for Bill C–101 which requires due process. Let us make sure this piece of legislation gets the due process this place should give it.

• (1600)

The Speaker: I would point out to hon. members that the Speaker, as a rule, does not answer questions. I know hon. members will know that.

Mr. Glen McKinnon (Brandon—Souris, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I intend to share my 10 minutes with my colleague from Souris—Moose Mountain.

The Reform Party insists on dealing with only the process and not the content of Bill C–101. From our perspective here on the government side, we feel we are complying with the new rule changes that were initiated by the government. We intend to fulfil those changes.

Bill C–101 has had some interesting background. It attempts to reduce the National Transportation Agency to some degree, from a full complement of nine members down to three full time and three part time. We are also hoping to reduce the number of employees within that agency from 500 down to 200. We feel this is a move that will initiate and respect our drive for efficiencies within the system.

The structure of the rail industry in particular and the laws that regulate it hark back to a time when Canada was a self–contained internal market. That time has passed. Canada's growth and the opportunities of our people now depend on the ability of our industries to embrace and meet the needs of global markets. Rail transportation is strategically important for our exporters as the means that will keep us in those markets. A viable rail industry, one that can attract new capital and one that is sensitive to shippers' needs, is crucial.

For many years the focus of the law has been on the network of the two large railways and ways to prevent these two companies from changing this network. The law was seen as a mechanism to prevent abandonment and also to reduce service. The focus was not on alternative ways to deliver local rail service.

As I read this bill, I am sensing that there are provisions whereby rail abandonment, if it does occur, will be done on a much different basis. There will be respect for the fact that the economics of abandonment must be addressed and that there must have been efforts put in place by the two major lines to actually show that they have attempted to sell such railways in terms of setting up short lines.

The Canada transportation act encourages these main lines to restructure in a way that promotes the establishment of new rail initiatives and alternative short lines. In the future the law will set in place a process that will allow private sector interests or regional officials to intercede to take over lines they consider important for regional rail transportation.

The framework under the new Canada transportation act sees our rail industry and its future viability as crucial for long term growth. It also encourages new participation at the local and regional level to preserve rail service.

The Canada transportation act is good for Canada because it reflects what a modern Canada needs. It is a framework law that recognizes the global nature of markets and the strategic importance of transportation, particularly rail transportation.

Mr. Bernie Collins (Souris—Moose Mountain, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was one of the nine members of Parliament who voted in opposition to Bill C–68. I want to go on the record here today as indicating to the House that there was no action taken against any of us for the position we took relative to that vote some time ago. Maybe that will clarify the minds of some of the members of the Reform Party who said that we were going to be held in some disdain for the stands we took. Such was not the case.

With regard to the bill before us today, the federal government is committed to a safe, efficient, affordable, and competitive transportation system for Canada. This legislation is part of the modernization process that is already under way.

• (1605)

The constituents in my riding welcome a modernization and an increase in efficiency in the system. They have a lot at stake in this legislation. The entire riding's economy rises and falls on the relative wellness of the grain industry. Many changes have taken place in the grain farming industry in the past year. There is a period of very dramatic adjustment that our farming community is embracing and dealing with at this moment. The Canada transportation act is one more adjustment. Hence, we must be very careful as we proceed.

I am concerned about short line rails in the expansion. I am concerned about shippers so that they have some degree of knowledge that they are going to be protected and that their rights are preserved in this new competitive arrangement under the new act. That is why I am pleased that this bill is now being referred to committee. This will give the committee and the public ample opportunity to review and debate the merits of each of the aspects of the bill.

In my riding there are many groups with very good ideas, constructive criticisms, and suggestions for changing and fine-tuning on this bill. They want to look at these very carefully and consider the impact of the bill for the long term. This can take place on a detailed level in committee.

I know that this bill addresses the entire spectrum of transportation issues, from rail to air to marine. In particular, my concern is the modernization and increased efficiencies of the rail sector. The legislation cuts red tape and eliminates administrative costs. It restricts government involvement in the day to day affairs of the rail industry.

Rail is the most highly regulated mode of transport in Canada. The act reduces the number of actions that require regulatory agency involvement from almost 200 to 40. This is in line with the federal government's commitment to streamline operations, eliminate duplication, and improve the way we deliver service.

The legislation makes it easier for short line operators to take over lines by making the process more commercially oriented, less adversarial, and more conducive to the sale or lease of surplus lines to newcomers.

The legislation also contains details to preserve shipper rights and protections. There is a lot of heated debate in this area. This is what our government wants to hear. We want those people affected by these changes to come forward at the committee stage and contribute to the final version of the bill.

The CTA is one more step the government has taken toward the modernizing of Canada's transport sector. It enables Canada and Canadian businesses to compete in the 21st century. That, along with our concern for the actions of the agriculture sector, can contribute to a more sufficient and efficient system that is foremost in the world.

The Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Speaker: Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

The Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the division on the question now before the House stands deferred until 6 p.m. today, at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

REGULATIONS ACT

On the Order: Government Orders:

April 26, 1995—The Minister of Justice—Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs of Bill C–84, an act to provide for the review, registration, publication and parliamentary scrutiny of regulations and other documents and to make consequential and related amendments to other acts.

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.) Mr. Speaker, I move:

That Bill C–84, an act to provide for the review, registration, publication and parliamentary scrutiny of regulations and other documents and to make consequential and related amendments to other acts, be referred forthwith to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs following first reading, pursuant to Standing Order 73(1).

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C–84, which is intended as a new regulations act, should go to the committee, and members should have the opportunity, before the House decides in principle on this approach to regulation, to discuss its terms.

It may seem that the legislation that governs the making of regulations in government is a technical or a dry subject, but in fact it will surprise some of the members to know that indeed there is a great deal of interest in this subject. There is a great deal of interest among Canadians because that process, the process by which subordinate legislation is made, has a direct effect on the way business is done in this country, on the productivity, on the competitiveness of business.

This proposed legislation is intended to increase the productivity and the competitiveness of our economy, which this government believes it will do.

I also observe this motion and the regulations act, which is being sent to committee after first reading, is another good example of the value of Standing Order 73(1) of the House of Commons, which was sponsored by my hon. colleague the House leader at the opening of this Parliament.

The new regulations act to which I speak today is intended to replace the Statutory Instruments Act, which for almost 25 years now has governed the Canadian system of making regulations. Bill C–84 offers important improvements to that outdated piece of legislation, intending to streamline and reduce delays in the process by which regulations are made at the federal level in Canada.

The legislative reform is an important part of the regulatory reform, part of the innovative economy initiative of my colleague, the Minister of Industry. This legislation is intended to support the bold, innovative, imaginative measures he is taking to strengthen Canada's economy.

There can be no doubt about the need for change in the process by which regulations are made. Problems are created by the current regulatory process. They have been identified many times in the past. There have been repeated calls for legislative improvements, most recently during the government–wide regulatory reviews of 1992–93.

Permit me to touch on some of the key elements of this bill. First, it is intended to provide a simpler and more principled definition of what a regulation is in modern government so that the scope of the act will be more clearly understood, so that its application will be more readily determined.

Second, an effort has been made in drafting Bill C–84 to use plainer language, to more directly communicate its meaning to those persons who use it and who invoke the process.

Third, the statute divides regulatory documents into different categories and provides for different kinds of review, depending upon what category a document falls into.

• (1615)

Fourth, it provides for a revised exemption power that will now be subject to an express public interest consideration.

Fifth, Bill C–84 codifies and I believe clarifies the law by expressly authorizing incorporation by reference, whether on international or other standards that are intended to be included in Canadian regulations, always subject to an express requirement that whatever is incorporated by reference should be made readily accessible to members of the public or any other interested party who wishes to have them.

Sixth, Bill C–84 contemplates a modernized process allowing for the creation of an electronic registry of regulations while at the same time maintaining government accountability for regulations through parliamentary scrutiny.

[Translation]

We know that in order to reform the Statutory Instruments Act, a balance must be struck between the interests of the various stakeholders. The new legislation is to streamline and expedite the making of regulations. Yet, this will be done without overlooking the requirement for advance notification, public representations and a thorough parliamentary scrutiny of any related mandatory legislation.

That is why I believe it is important to note that the changes sought by the Regulations Act are, for the most part, material amendments that leave the essence of the current process unchanged. These amendments are designed to remove ambiguities, simplify steps as required and generally modernize the regulatory process.

But first and foremost the purpose of the new Regulations Act is to maintain and strengthen the objectives and basic principles of the Statutory Instruments Act, which contains the legal safeguards required to make binding regulations. These objectives include the rule of law, transparency, the publication of regulations and the monitoring of the executive by Parliament as part of its legislative power.

[English]

While the Statutory Instruments Act has generally served Canadians well over the last two decades, over time the regulatory process has come to be viewed both inside and beyond government as an impediment to the timely and efficient making and repeal of federal regulations. The current operation of the Statutory Instruments Act makes it difficult for federal regulators to respond in a timely manner to changing needs with new and improved regulations because the regulatory process is too cumbersome and time consuming. This is of concern to all Canadians, particularly Canadian business because these regimes are not well tailored to evolving circumstances.

Unnecessary delays in modernizing and improving regulatory schemes can also reduce our ability to respond quickly and effectively to new developments in areas such as health and safety, environmental regulation, international trade or federal–provincial relations. Outdated and inappropriate regulatory schemes can also undermine respect for the law, economic growth and competitiveness. They can also complicate the working relationship between the government and the private sector.

We believe that the new act will improve the capacity of government to respond quickly and effectively to changing circumstances, reduce the overall volume of regulations and provide for an expedited process. It will allow us to incorporate important documents by reference. It will do all of that without reducing the role of Parliament in overseeing government as it makes subordinate law.

In moving today that this proposed statute now go to committee for consideration, I express the government's conviction that it represents a significant improvement in Canadian law. I know it will receive the usual balanced and insightful commentary from my colleagues in other parties. I look forward enthusiastically to my own involvement in that important process.

[Translation]

Mr. Richard Bélisle (La Prairie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak on Bill C–84.

First of all, let me say that this bill will effect changes in more than 60 acts or bills currently before this House. Its passage will therefore have a very major impact on federal legislation.

Bill C–84 seeks to replace the old Statutory Instruments Act with a new Regulations Act completely consolidated and revised. Like the act it seeks to replace, the bill sets out the principles and administrative procedures that will govern the four steps involved in drafting new regulations: preparation, passage, enactment and publication of regulations passed under federal statutes.

The bill also confirms the reviewing power of the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations, ensures better control by Parliament and maintains governmental responsibility over the regulatory process.

In short, Bill C–84 provides, first, a simpler definition of "regulation", second, an expedited process for regulations that do not require legal review, third, a revision of the bases for exempting regulations from the regulatory process, and, fourth, a modernization of the regulatory process by providing for consultation, registration and publication by electronic means.

Bill C–84 therefore aims at modernizing the current act and correcting the problems encountered with the present regulatory process.

I will now review some major items in Bill C–84 that I find very important. First of all, the definition of "regulation" is simpler and more principled than the current term "statutory instruments" found in Section 2. This legislation also specifies that regulations also include all kinds of lists and guidelines, putting an end to an ambiguity in the current act.

It seems also that publication by electronic means will shortly become an addition to regular printing of the Canada Gazette, but it might be possible for the government to eliminate the printed copy of the Canada Gazette by publishing only by electronic means.

In this case, why not include a reference to the printing, even though that might involve limited editions? Bill C–84 eliminates the requirement of printing a specific number of copies of regulations during the regulatory process, allowing for substantial savings, even in the absence of electronic means.

One can only wonder why goals in the areas of security, health and the environment are specifically mentioned like in Bill C–62. Is it yet another backhanded way of intruding into provincial jurisdictions? Criteria concerning the use of this exemption power of the governor in council are not crystal clear.

Why not extend the prohibition in clause 64 concerning the Defence Production Act to other federal statutes with a significant impact on health and the environment such as big economic development projects like pipelines, Hibernia, nuclear plants and so on? To be able to answer that question, we need to have the complete list of exempted regulations and of other regulations that could be exempted later on if Bill C–84 is passed.

It also seems unthinkable that clause 11(4) should provide that no regulation is invalid because it was not published. We need more openness in this government. Regulations have force of law and should always be published in the Canada Gazette. This bill does provide that no penalty can be imposed for a violation of unpublished regulations. We think that people in Canada and Quebec have the absolute right to know which regulations are in force. Why make regulations if there is no penalty when they are disobeyed?

Sometimes, groups or businesses will only find out about regulations when the quarterly index is published.

As a matter of fact, this bill introduces a publication and distribution system for regulations that can be tailored to fit every single case. Clause 15 should simply be dropped, in our opinion.

This new regulatory process would allow the federal government to withdraw gradually from regulating certain industries through the incorporation by reference of private or international standards.

• (1625)

Clause 16(5) provides that an amendment made by a business or a foreign government could have force of law in Canada as soon as it is announced. This in spite of the fact that the amendment is not published as a regulation in The Canada Gazette or in both official languages, particularly in French where American standards are concerned. Considering the context of free trade in North America and eventually in both Americas, this may jeopardize the position of the French language.

The purpose of having a regulation incorporate material by reference is twofold. First of all, to remove the requirement for the federal government to regulate every aspect of the sector concerned. Second, to take advantage of the expertise of Canadian, American and international organizations that set standards which, sooner or later, will have to be adopted by Canadian industry. In fact, industry is being asked to regulate itself. Incorporation by reference means that standards can be updated directly by the agencies or governments concerned, while the federal government in Canada is not obliged to adopt them.

This "privatization" and "internationalization" of business and industrial regulations, probably on the basis of American and international standards, opens the door to the adoption of standards that are drafted exclusively in English.

Even if the code is available in French, in accordance with clause 16(2), what assurance do we have that subsequent amendments will be published in French by the American association or, simultaneously, by the Canadian regulatory authority? Clause 17 on accessibility is not, in our view, a sufficient guarantee in this regard.

It is possible to conclude that a number of documents incorporated by reference in a regulation with force of law in Canada will be neither published nor available in French from the regulatory authority. Will Quebecers have access to regulations wholly in French only after Quebec attains sovereignty? One must wonder.

We are also proposing an amendment to clause 25 in the form of a new paragraph (3) requiring the government to submit the draft regulations to the regulatory committee at the same time as it tables its bills in the House of Commons.

Also, subparagraph 26(g)(i) authorizing the making of secret regulations concerning the conduct of federal–provincial affairs must be struck out. Bill C–84 is suggesting here that provinces, like foreign countries, are enemies of the federal government. This same precaution probably does not even exist in European legislation for the Fifteen.

How can an atmosphere of harmony, consensus and co–operation between federal and provincial governments be created when even regulations call for secrecy in federal–provincial affairs? Is such a clause necessary in international relations today? We feel that the defence of Canada is the only part of 26(g) fully justified today.

Bill C–84 uses the French expression "autorité réglementante" and there is no such word in French as "réglementante". The expression that should be used instead is "autorité réglementaire" to designate the institutions, departments, organizations and commissions with regulatory authority, in keeping with the definition found in the 1990 edition of Trésor de la langue française.

In conclusion, we agree that Bill C–84 is modernizing the existing regulatory process provided by the Regulations Act and deserves our support, but let us support it only after the government has adopted the many amendments we have mentioned today.

[English]

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to join in debate with my colleagues on Bill C–84. This is not a discussion on criminology so it will be a nice articulation of the points today.

Bill C–84 is an act to provide for the review, registration, publication and parliamentary scrutiny of regulations and other documents and to make consequential and related amendments to other acts.

Mr. O'Reilly: He is a legend in his own mind.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Why is it, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot stand up in the House—

• (1630)

The Speaker: After hearing those opening remarks, I had to check to see it was really the member for Fraser Valley West. I invite him to debate.

Mr. Simmons: He has your number.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, it is pretty bad when even the Speaker has your number.

It is the Reform Party's intention to oppose this bill, not because of the legislative intent of the bill, but instead we oppose the bill because of what we feel are substantive flaws in the act put forward by the Minister of Justice. In addition, there is equal weight in our opposition to this document because of clauses which are not in this act.

Make no mistake, Reform members on this side of the House are just as intent to see that the regulatory process in Canada functions in an efficient manner. Clearly this bill constitutes the other half of the government's effort at regulatory reform.

In fairness and in stark contrast with the conclusions reached concerning Bill C–62, the government has put forward a bill which attempts to tidy up the regulatory process and replace the Statutory Instruments Act. Yet for the reasons which follow, this initiative, like so many others in the Liberal red book, is long on promise and short on substance.

This act should have been forwarded to the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations and not, as has been done, to another government operations committee. You need not take my word for it. It should be self–evident to even the most partisan of members that the words "parliamentary scrutiny of regulations" contained in the act's title should have made referral academic. The hon. government member from Scarborough—Rouge River said as much in committee on May 18.

My esteemed colleagues on the government side of the House might argue that no precedent or provision exists for such a referral. However, in a letter from the committee clerk to members of the scrutiny of regulations committee there are indeed well documented procedures. In addition, Standing Order 73(1) would allow the government to make such a referral.

With all due respect, the fact that it was not referred to the appropriate committee leads me to believe there may be something untoward in the government's intention on the bill in the first place.

Also I refer to the fact that the Reform Party would oppose this bill for what it is not. In this case and as members from the scrutiny of regulations committee will point out, there is no statutory disallowance procedure put forward.

One way Parliament ensures that regulations are reviewed is through the scrutiny of regulations committee. You will hear me refer to that committee again and again in this speech. Its work is as germane to this debate as is Bill C–84 itself.

The Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations has had power since 1986 under Standing Order 123 to recommend that a regulation be disallowed. Let me assure colleagues that this is done in the rarest of situations and usually as a result of a government department exceeding its authority.

The recommendation by the committee under Standing Order 123 is just that, a recommendation. It is up to the minister responsible to address the disallowance. Sadly there is nothing which obliges him to act upon the committee recommendation to disallow a regulation. Further, the disallowance procedure does not apply to regulation made outside of governor in council or by a minister.

Throughout the life of the previous Parliament, the then opposition Liberals on the scrutiny committee saw the shortcomings of this situation presented to them. In a 1992 report released by the Subcommittee on Regulations and Competitiveness, they requested that the disallowance procedure be replaced on a statutory footing.

The government responded that such a measure was not necessary. The Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn stated that it was inappropriate to proceed with legislation until the effect of the experimental rules could be assessed. It is 1995, a full nine years of experimenting and the only thing that has changed is that the Liberals are now in power. I ask hon. members on the government side to join with me and amend this bill accordingly so that all regulations and deleted legislation is subjected to full and effective parliamentary review.

The definition of a regulation contained in clause 2(1) contains the phrase "are of general application". This open ended catch all is likely to be the source of debate for many years to come. Granted, when placed alongside the dual version of what exists in the Statutory Instruments Act the government has tidied up the definition somewhat.

However in practice the definition could exclude a departmental order which is specific in its nature. For example the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development makes an order with respect to the Sechelt Indian Band concerning licensing. The question then arises whether the order is considered a regulation which is subject to examination as it represents a specific rather than a general application. This is significant because it does represent an anomaly over what presently exists. It is my hope the situation will be clarified by the government at some point in the debate stage.

In addition clause 5(1) modifies the exemption guidelines which are presently set out in section 27 of the Statutory Instruments Act. The problem is that the guidelines in section 27 appear to be replaced with a general discretion. The only check in place is that an order to exempt is itself a regulation and therefore is subject to review.

Clearly this so–called safeguard is subject to interpretation and as such should be considered suspect as it departs from previous practices. The point here is that the Reform Party and Canadians are fundamentally opposed to any kind of exemption power. Somewhere along the way an exemption power has the potential to be abused.

In no way am I trying to question the sincerity with which this Liberal government has put forward this bill. I would never do that. Yet if a government with less integrity were to come into the House and for which we have an ethics counsellor—if members over there remember the ethics counsellor who, as I keep repeating in the House, is about as busy as the Maytag repairman—would it exempt on the basis of a connection to the cabinet? Perhaps not, though I say the potential is there.

Clauses 6(1), 6(2) and 7 are at the heart of the government's initiative to speed up the regulatory process. This effort should be applauded. The clauses could have a disastrous effect on the regulatory process and I will explain why.

The clauses I referred to are supposed to ensure that each regulatory authority, for instance the minister or a government department, is responsible for drafting their respective regulations. Only then can they be submitted to the privy council office of justice for advice. This is thought to be an improvement over the Statutory Instruments Act because in past practices the privy council office drafted and reviewed its work on behalf of most regulatory authorities. It did after all have the most expertise in this area but unfortunately this situation represented a conflict of interest.

Bill C–84 attempts to address that conflict of interest by taking the drafting responsibility away from the privy council office of justice and entrenching it with the relevant minister or department. In doing this the government is turning over the drafting responsibility to legal departments which heretofore have had limited or non–existent experience in the drafting of such regulations. The result is likely that poorer quality drafts will be submitted to the privy council office of justice. In turn, that office will probably end up doing the drafting from scratch.

Again, the clauses represent a good intention but fail to consider the reality of the regulatory process.

I again call on my colleagues in the House to enhance the provisions of this bill. This can best be accomplished by placing a statutory disallowance procedure in the bill. There will be ample opportunity to discuss and review this request, but I ask my colleagues from the government side, especially those who sit on the regulations committee, to push for an amendment in this regard. Many of them pushed for this in opposition and to do any less now would be indefensible.

Mr. Paul DeVillers (Simcoe North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak in support of Bill C–84. This bill is about improving the regulatory process to the benefit of all Canadians.

The limitations and particularly the delays created in the existing system result in hidden but very real costs to all Canadians. These are in the form of increased expenditures of revenues spent in enforcing outdated and inappropriate regulations and in reducing competitiveness in the global marketplace.

The reforms proposed in the new regulations act will improve the regulatory system without in any way sacrificing its basic objectives. The government's improved capacity to update regulatory standards faster will promote the public interest by ensuring that health and safety standards are current and take into account evolving technologies.

I would like to spend a few moments now dealing with the provision of Bill C–84 which deals with incorporation by reference. This is incorporation by reference of international standards and other material into regulations. This is an important element in achieving the objectives of our regulatory reform.

It is important to understand that these provisions do not create a new regulatory technique. Incorporation by reference is a legal technique that is currently being widely used by governments in Canada. It is a legal technique whose legitimacy has been recognized by the Supreme Court of Canada. It is a legal technique that is widely employed in Europe and has been advocated by the Standards Council of Canada and many international bodies, including the International Standards Organization of Geneva.

Incorporation of materials into regulations particularly as they are amended from time to time is an important way for government to promote the goals of international and interprovincial harmonization of regulatory standards. I stress that such harmonization does not mean that Canadian standards will be lowered. In many cases the standards adopted will be higher.

Reliance on the expertise and timeliness of international and interprovincial standards writing organizations whose material is typically incorporated on this basis is of significant value in promoting Canadian competitiveness, particularly in the context of rapid technological change. The usefulness of this technique in promoting Canadian competitiveness was recognized in the 1993 report of the finance subcommittee on regulations and competitiveness.

[Translation]

The provisions of the new legislation, which authorize departments with regulatory power to develop and revise documents incorporated by reference, also provide the important opportunity to quickly revise and improve regulations. This form of incorporation is limited to documents that are essentially technical and the rules of conduct on substance, established by the departments, remain subject to the entire regulatory process.

I stress once again that, in this area, we will not be amending the legislation in use, we will be codifying and clarifying. It has existed for years, and the new legislation simply incorporates the current practice.

• (1645)

However, we are proposing a significant improvement to this practice, because the provisions of the new Regulations Act establish the express statutory requirement for departments with regulatory power to ensure the accessibility of the documents incorporated.

To ensure effective parliamentary control over the technical standards incorporated, the new Regulations Act provides that the Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations be supplied ex officio with all the regulations.

Consequently, this committee could at any time call for, revise and comment on the regulations into which documents have been incorporated and by so doing review the documents in question. The documents, which are periodically revised, are made available in the form they are in at the time of the request.

[English]

Like the rest of the new regulations act, provisions relating to incorporation by reference strike what we believe to be the right balance between the need to streamline and speed up the regulatory process and the objectives of ensuring the legality and accessibility of regulations and providing necessary oversight by Parliament.

The regulatory process is already overburdened. We cannot afford to bring into the process documents that are not currently subject to it. The bill will facilitate use of a legitimate technique that offers opportunities for achieving the flexibility we need without sacrificing legality, accessibility, or parliamentary accountability. For those reasons I urge the committee to review the bill and I urge the House to ultimately pass the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased—well, maybe not exactly pleased—to speak to Bill C–84 now before the House.

I listened earlier to the Minister of Justice when he addressed the Chair to refer this bill to a parliamentary committee. I will come back to this issue in a little while, but for now, let me say that we know the party now in office, the Liberal Party, and the somewhat contradictory objectives it is pursuing by introducing all the bills we have seen lately. First, there was Bill C–43, the infamous bill on lobbyists on Parliament Hill. In that bill, the government stated its intention—probably because of the Pearson Airport fiasco—to have an ethics counsellor, someone to oversee everything.

Soon after, they introduced Bill C–62, which I call the standard substitution bill. That bill allowed civil servants to act on impulse, to give in to pressure by their colleagues, and often by friends of the government, as is still the case, and to change some statutory standards. That was what Bill C–62 was all about. Now, we are considering Bill C–84, an act to repeal the Statutory Instruments Act.

We, in the Bloc Quebecois, know that progress must be made, and the Liberals are not stupid. They talk about great principles, things like "increased efficiency", "something good", something close to the citizens, close to the governed. Let us examine this bill closely. It does contain interesting provisions that we cannot approve blindly.

Let us take, for example, this legislation by reference. The Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations is having problems with Revenue Canada about the incorporation by reference of material in a regulation. We could have specified in the appropriate provision that these incorporations by reference also include material provided—as clause 16(1)(c) says—by a government.

• (1650)

Can we incorporate in our legislation regulations passed by a foreign government? It is possible. It is possible when, for example, we want to figure out the income of a person, someone who has done his military service in the United States or in another country and is entitled, in that country, to compensation for his involvement in the armed forces. We could possibly refer to regulations or legislation from abroad. But we should specify it. Here we are faced with total uncertainty; we are not sure.

And what happens if the regulations to be incorporated by referral are amended? There again, we do not know. To come back to my example, are we to amend our regulations every time the State Department in the United States raises the pension payable to American veterans? Will we have to amend our regulations? If so, I start to doubt the efficiency of this process.

This bill was motivated by good intentions, that could hardly be challenged. Everybody is in favour of efficiency. Yet, it starts by undermining the principles which, ever since the Bill of Rights of 1688, in England, have been part of the regulatory practices of our constitutional monarchy.

As they say in Latin delegatus non potest delegare, you cannot delegate something which has been delegated to you. However, this is what the bill does. After some 300 years of implementation of past regulations. I agree that we should make some changes, we all want changes, especially if they are for the best, but are we going to sub–sub–sub–delegate regulatory powers to the most junior clerk, hired last week, that would have an interest—I know that we must always assume that things are done in good faith—in, for example, changing a regulation to benefit someone in his family, one of his friends? There is no limit to sub–delegation under Bill C–84.

This is dangerous, especially when we refer to Bill C–62 on measure substitution. Although it started with good intentions, I think the government is about to shoot through the bottom of its own boat, which will sink. The bills of the justice minister are always like that. They always state fine principles. We have seen it with the gun control bill. The principle was noble, the principle was laudable, but watch out when it comes up in front of the courts. The government wants to relieve the courts' backlog, but this type of legislation will not help.

There is already too much pressure on the courts, and the government keeps introducing bills that are based on principles but not so much on reality.

At the beginning of my speech, I said that this bill should have been referred to another committee. The Minister of Justice said that it should be referred to a committee of members who would examine its scope. We have a Standing Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations which has existed for at least 25 years. It is composed of experts, and God knows the Liberals form the majority on that committee. Are they afraid of themselves?

There are Liberal MPs and Liberal senators on that committee. We know that all bills are sent to the Senate for review after they are adopted in the House. We asked the Solicitor General of Canada: Why not refer Bill C–84 to the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations, where sixteen MPs and senators spend a lot of time studying regulations? They would be the most competent people to evaluate the scope of this bill.

The solicitor general thought it was a wonderful idea, an extraordinary idea, but that there was no precedent in this House where a bill was referred to a joint committee.

• (1655)

But that is exactly what a precedent is all about; it is a first. If a precedent is not a first, it is not a precedent. Why is the minister so adamant in refusing to refer this bill to a committee which knows the subject, which does that kind of work year in and year out and which reviews thousands of regulations of all kinds annually, from the diameter of nickels to the disposal of toilet waste from airplanes.

There are all kinds of regulations and we study them all. And then we become incompetent overnight because there is no precedent? Another proof of this government's inability to go off the beaten path. The government keeps its eyes on its narrow path and fails to see anything outside of it. Therefore, I would ask the minister to show some common sense and ask his colleague, the Solicitor General of Canada, in the name of all Canadians and for the sake of our regulations, to actually set a precedent. Now is the time to act. Next year, it will be too late. The work will have been done. Otherwise, I will ask him to define "precedent".

This was my point. Finally, if this government is trying to be effective, why does it not give a response immediately, within the time frame set out in the Standing Orders? When the committee presents a report on amendments to regulations to the minister, why does he ask for two or three extensions and why does the committee have to go on writing for two years, finally giving up in desperation for lack of results? If at least the minister responded to the committee report, things would improve, and there would be greater effectiveness.

[English]

Mr. Harbance Singh Dhaliwal (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Madam Speaker, when I was asked to speak on Bill C–84 I was quite interested and enthusiastic, just as the member for Fraser Valley West was.

This bill affects small and medium size businesses. It is an important bill. As a business person, I have experienced the regulations at all levels of government that do not make sense today.

Bill C–84 replaces the Statutory Instruments Act, which is almost 25 years old. We have not had a serious look at it in 25 years. That is a long time. It was probably outdated 10 years ago. It is something we should have looked at a long time ago. Unfortunately, in government and in politics legislation that should be reviewed frequently is often not because there is no political pressure to review it. I hope we will look at opportunities to review legislation more often and add some sort of sunset clause so that we can modernize regulations on a regular basis.

I was disappointed to hear that the opposition is not going to support the bill. They should actually be congratulating the Minister of Justice for putting the bill before a parliamentary committee before second reading, where the principles of the bill can be examined. This is something members of the third party have often asked for. They want more participation. They want greater opportunities for members of Parliament to be involved in discussions of the bills. This is a great opportunity. Since members across the way asked for it, I thought they would be very enthusiastic and would congratulate the minister for giving that opportunity. Instead, the member for Fraser Valley West was very articulate in talking about the fact that he was not in favour of the bill.

• (1700)

This bill is 25 years old. It is complex, cumbersome, and a real burden to Canadians. The minister is saying we want to simplify and modernize it. We want to make sure that it makes sense for today. What do we hear from the opposition members? They cannot support it; they are not in favour of it. Are they not in favour of simplifying the bill? Are they not in favour of modernizing the bill? Are they not in favour of making sure that committees can do their work and look at this bill?

We often hear in the House about how we have to simplify regulations. We often hear how a lot of the legislation does not make sense for today and that we need to have common sense. Here the minister is providing that opportunity and the opposition members are saying they do not agree with it.

I and many other members have been confronted with a regulation that often makes no sense for today. We then go to some of the bureaucrats and tell them this does not make sense in today's business climate, in today's environment and in today's technology. Often some of the bureaucrats agree with us but tell us their hands are tied because the regulation is very old and has not been reviewed and therefore they have to comply with the regulation.

This is a very good opportunity for all members of Parliament to participate in the changes that are required to have an environment that is efficient. I know the members from the third party often talk about creating greater efficiencies and an environment for businesses so they can have a cost saving.

In terms of the environment, I toured a company in my own riding, Pacific Meadows, that is involved in the recycling of metal. It informs me that there are certain regulations that impede its opportunity to recycle.

Often when government forms regulations it throws this huge net out there and catches, just as it does in the fishing industry, something it does not intend to catch. It becomes an impediment for small and medium size companies to do their business. The net was cast out to cover all sorts of things but not intended to catch some businesses. That is why we need the opportunity, on a regular basis, to review the regulatory process and regulations to ensure that it makes sense for today's environment in terms of international trade, changes in the environment, and changes in the health care area. All those areas have to be taken into consideration. The present act does not take those things into consideration.

This bill will go a long way to ensuring that we have a simplified, modernized bill. I do not know how anybody can be against simplifying something. We have come to a new age of communications and electronics. One of the things this bill proposes is that we have an electronic registry where forms will be filled out electronically so that we can become more efficient and more cost effective. I believe that will go a long way.

I hope the members across the way will realize that small and medium size businesses all over this country will be disappointed with the stand they have taken to vote against modernizing a regulatory process when business people all over this country know we have to improve the way our regulatory process works. I think Canadians across this country will applaud the government and the Minister of Justice for bringing this legislation forward to modernize and simplify our regulations.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Madam Speaker, Bill C–84 is an attempt to create confusion in Canadian regulations. There is certainly no indication that this bill will lead to any improvement.

• (1705)

As my colleagues already pointed out, the bill will in fact allow the government to hide its operational mistakes and waste. It will make it easier for public servants and government officials to circumvent Parliament. My colleagues already explained that it is creating confusion in the regulatory process.

This is one of the reasons why we will vote against the bill. Contrary to what my colleague just said, I do not even believe it is an important bill. It was merely introduced to keep the House busy, to avoid dealing with the real issues, the real problems. This bill will not help job creation. We know full well that this bill, like a number of other insignificant ones, is being introduced to keep the House occupied and avoid any debate on sovereignty or the future of Canada. It allows the government to procrastinate and wait until after the referendum to make cuts in Quebec. Social programs will be drastically cut.

Next year, cuts will be more drastic than this year. This year, $650 million will be cut in social programs. Next year, it could be $1.2 billion and maybe more. The following years, it will be $2 to $3 billion a year. These are the real problems. They affect Canadians and Quebecers who would like their elected representatives to address these problems. And yet, here we are in this House talking about a piece of legislation which deals with regulations and does not even improve the situation, creates confusion and gives bureaucrats more powers to impose regulations which might not be beneficial to small business and business people.

As far as the real issues are concerned, this government has a tendency to table legislation in keeping with a political philosophy which is increasingly more right wing, favouring cuts and the centralization of powers. What is happening to social programs clearly shows that this government has no respect for the ordinary citizen. When it makes huge cuts in social programs and reduces UI accessibility, these are the real issues.

Why not talk about that, rather than about regulations which, for all intent and purposes, are without any importance? It is because we are waiting until October 30, to see whether Quebec will vote for sovereignty. Personally, I hope that Quebecers will realize that federalism is no longer profitable, that Quebec contributes more and more to a central government which is less and less effective, and Bill C–84 proves it, because again it creates confusion. It is inconsistent and does not even abide by the Official Languages Act.

We are giving powers to officials without making them responsible to Parliament. This is what Canada is offering the people of Quebec. Here we have a government which is less and less effective, which creates confusion and which despises Quebec. When we talk about cuts in social programs worth billions of dollars per year, when we talk about cuts in unemployment insurance, we are talking about things which impact on ordinary people. Also, the government has shown that it intends to reduce old age pensions. These are real problems, real issues which worry people, at least in Quebec, and here we are, today, talking about regulations, something that nobody understands.

Reading through the bill, one cannot see its purposes nor its basis, except perhaps to keep us busy here, in the House, talking for hours on end about this worthless jumble. The real questions are being avoided, or postponed to the end of October.

This bill is another example of the federal government's tendency to centralize, of its policy shift to the right. This is serious, because the trend was already evident throughout North America, in Alberta, in Ontario, but now it reaches into the federal government. It will soon make itself felt in cuts to unemployment insurance and social programs, and many Quebecers will end up on welfare.

Federalism is not profitable for Quebec any more. From now on, Quebec will see itself paying more and more every year into the federal system while receiving less and less. Incidentally, Quebec has not been receiving its due share from all federal departments for a very long time now. We did receive a lot of money through equalization payments and unemployment insurance benefits, but that will change in the next few years. Quebec will get less and less and pay more and more.

In the case of unemployment insurance, the federal government stopped contributing to it in 1990, employees and employers paying for it entirely. This year, in 1995, the federal government took from the UI program some $5 billion that will be used to other ends than unemployment insurance payments. Not only are they not giving money for those who lost their jobs, they are limiting access to UI benefits. Next year, in Quebec, two thirds of the people who will claim unemployment insurance benefits will be declared ineligible.

It has already been estimated that 40,000 unemployed will have to go on welfare. These are the real issues that concern people. But, this week, in the House, we will be talking about regulations which do not make sense and only show that the government does not know where it is going. This government is not addressing fondamental concerns, because in the debate on sovereignty, it has nothing to offer to Quebec; therefore, it is avoiding dealing with issues.

In Quebec, we want to give confidence to Quebecers and to encourage them to take their destiny into their own hands after October 30. We want to give real hope to employers, to ensure equity and justice. This bill concerns the justice department. However, the best way for Quebecers to get real justice at home is for Quebec to become sovereign.

[English]

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to take part in the debate this afternoon.

Madam Speaker, when you and I were both elected in 1988, among all of us who came into Parliament that year there were probably a number of things we wanted to do here as parliamentarians. A number of issues were of tremendous interest to us: the question of the future of our wonderful country, the unity of Canada, the continued thriving of one united Canada, and issues relating to matters very close to my heart such as making sure that violence against women is eradicated soon.

• (1715)

It is a safe bet to say that the majority of members of Parliament whenever they were elected do not necessarily become passionate over tissues like Bill C–84, the Regulations Act. Yet these matters are very important.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands will take part in the debate a little later. I think this is something the hon. member understands full well. From his years as a high school student when he wrote a paper about the pipeline debate in the House the hon. member has been very interested in and perhaps one of the most knowledgeable members of the House on questions of process.

When we talk about regulations and the Regulations Act we are really talking about process, if I might wax somewhat hyperbolic, read in tooth and claw, as I am sure the hon. member from Kingston and the Islands would agree.

It is not the stuff of which romantic novels or poems are written. It is not the stuff of overweening rhetoric, but it is the stuff of the day to day operation of government. Most particularly it is the stuff of the day to day operation of good government.

What are the objectives of the bill? There are a number of objectives. It will simplify and streamline the regulation making process because it will clarify existing legal uncertainties in the regulatory field. That sentence probably does not strike huge chords of interest in the populous in general. It probably does not strike huge chords of interest in my colleagues on the opposite side in any of the opposition parties. I would hazard a guess that, fond as I know my colleagues on this side of the House are of me, it probably is not striking huge chords of interest in the member from Miramichi, for example. I do not think it is striking huge chords of interest in my friend from Saskatchewan.

Mr. Milliken: Not at present.

Ms. Clancy: Not at present. That is all right too because this is the stuff of good government. It also is the stuff of promise keeping. One of the major promises in our red book in 1993 was to simplify and streamline the red tape that affected small business and this act will do just that. For example, it will replace the antiquated and misunderstood phrase statutory instrument with the word regulation.

In my time practising law, teaching law and commenting on the law in the media before I came to this place, there was the idea that we had to demystify the processes of law and government for most Canadians. It is certainly of great importance that we demystify those processes for those Canadians working in the area of small business.

The legislation will modernize the regulatory process for the information age by providing a legislative framework for the electronic publication of regulations and for public comment, the electronic medium. That is yet another milestone for us on the information highway, an area in which the hon. Minister of Industry and the hon. Secretary of State for Science and Technology have served us so well in recent days.

The act will make regulations more responsive to public concerns by improving the scrutiny role of the Joint Committee on the Scrutiny of Regulations.

• (1720)

It was not necessarily one of those committees that members of Parliament from either side of the House rushed to join, but it was one very important to the smooth functioning of good government. One of the reasons the government is in power is that historically and currently we offer good government to Canadians.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Ms. Clancy: One of the ways we do it is by not electing empty barrels.

By streamlining and simplifying the regulatory process and making it more accessible to the public, the act supports government efforts to make government more transparent and open to Canadians, again a fulfilment of a red book process.

The legislation also supports the government's agenda of promoting economic growth and job creation through a streamlined and expedited regulatory process that will improve the capacity of departments to respond rapidly to the changing circumstances of the global economy.

One thing I find when I go back to my riding and talk with people in small business is the question of not knowing what is expected of them. The passage of the bill will make the problem much less onerous for Canadian operators of small businesses.

I think of those people who opened small businesses in the city of Halifax. I think in particular of those people who are the most common openers of small business in the country, women. Women start more small businesses in Canada than men do. They tend to stay at it longer and they tend in the long run to be more successful.

One of the problems I hear from women when I go to meetings encouraging women entrepreneurs, talking with them about small business and the relationship between government and small business, is a fear to get into these areas because they are not sure what is expected of them. They feel they will have to pay accountants and lawyers large amounts of money to interpret government policy to make sure that their businesses are staying within the realms of government regulation.

The bill will go a long way to easing those fears, to opening up for entrepreneurs the ideas of government policy and to telling them exactly what is expected of them.

The whole point of good government is to make the country an even better place, an even more liveable place for the people who live in it. I listened to my colleague from Quebec a few minutes ago. He made the point over and over again that the federal government had nothing to offer to the people of Quebec. I do not believe that, Madam Speaker. I know that you do not believe it. More important, the people of Quebec do not believe it either.

Recently I had the very good fortune to travel right across the country. This summer I did it twice, once by stopping off in various places with the immigration committee and listening to people—my hon. colleague from Bourassa was with me on that trip—and once again by returning from the fourth women's conference in Beijing via Vancouver and Calgary to Ottawa.

The ties that bind us together never cease to amaze me, whether we are from Quebec or the maritimes, the north or the west; whether we are from Southwest Nova or Kingston and the Islands; whether we are from the beautiful province of British Columbia; whether we are from the north or the prairies; or whether we are from that beautiful province that is every bit as much my country as it is yours, the province of Quebec.

It is good government that this government offers Canadians. It is good government that will keep Canadians together. It is acts like this one in their plainness that give us good government.

• (1725)

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Madam Speaker, although in favour of the updating of the Regulations Act to address the problem of the current regulatory process, the Bloc Quebecois cannot and will not enter this venture blindly.

As it is, Bill C–84 does not give all the safeguards we should expect. First, clause 5 provides that the Governor in Council may exempt regulations from the application of the regulatory process provided that the public interest is respected.

According to the same clause, the public interest includes achieving goals relating to safety, health, the environment and sustainable development and reducing regulatory costs and delays. Why are the objectives of safety, health and the environment mentioned? Is the government trying in a underhanded manner to extend the federal jurisdiction over the environment sector? Is the government once more trying to create unnecessary and expensive overlaps?

Mr. Boudria: Come on!

Mr. Milliken: Nothing of the such.

Mr. Nunez: That is what the bill says, dear colleague.

Does this government want to take over provincial areas of jurisdiction? Is this what they call flexible federalism? For me we are going backwards instead. Another attempt to pull a fast one on the provinces. This bill also questions the publication of regulations. This bill calls into question many other aspects. It is left to the Clerk of the Privy Council to decide whether all regulations should be published in the Canada Gazette as is now the case or in any other venue as he sees fit, either in special interest magazines or through electronic means.

What openness. Only the people and organizations directly concerned could have easy access to the regulations. This procedure fosters inequalities between people and between small businesses and large corporations, which, unlike small businesses, can afford lobbyists to keep a close eye on what the government is doing.

This kind of action is unconscionable. The clerk must be required to publish an official notice in the Canada Gazette. And to better spread the information, he may order that the regulations be published in a different venue. I have no problem with that. That is progress, that is transparency, and not a double standard policy where the government tries to hide some information. But there is worse than that in this bill.

This bill is indefensible, especially the clause that indicates that failure to publish a regulation does not invalidate it. That is where the shoe pinches. The government must at least be honest; people have the right to know which regulations are in effect. The official publication of the regulation must validate it. How could it be otherwise, if we want to ensure equity to the people in general?

To some extent, this bill allows for the privatization of commercial and industrial regulations, probably based on American standards, which opens the door to the introduction of standards written only in English.

• (1730)

Who will be responsible for translating an American code on screw and bolt strength requirements for the aircraft industry, for example? If such a code were available in French, what guarantee do we have that subsequent changes will be published in French by the American association?

By providing few guarantees, Canada is using co–operating agencies or countries to impose upon us standards and frameworks that do not concern us. With this legislation, in particular clause 19, the federal government is trying, little by little, to minimize the Quebec culture by eroding our identity.

In its opinion, there is only one multicultural Canadian culture expressing itself in several languages, including French, but mainly in English.

Parliament scrutiny of the regulatory process is maintained in its existing form. The government should have taken the opportunity given by this act to improve distribution of regulations to all members of Parliament. The legislation should provide for the right of every member to have access to regulations through electronic means or at least through a printed copy. The whole body of federal legislation must be available. Yet, at present, members of Parliament do not have access to this work instrument.

In conclusion, I would like to point out another anomaly the government is not correcting in this legislation. As soon as a bill is introduced in the House, the government has regulations drafted. If members had access to draft regulations when legislation is debated, we would avoid a loss of time in basic discussion and we would be in a better position to assess the impact of new regulations.

For all these reasons, I will vote against this legislation in its present form, but I will vote yes in the upcoming Quebec referendum.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of the hon. member for Bourassa, because it contained many good ideas. I hope he will sit on the Standing Committee on Government Operations, to which this bill will be referred. He will then have the opportunity to move amendments because, as he knows very well, the government introduced this bill and moved that it be referred to committee today, before second reading, so that he and other members on the standing committee can move all kinds of amendments. That is part and parcel of the new procedure introduced by the government at the beginning of this session of Parliament, and I certainly hope the hon. member will be on the committee with his ideas and amendments.

[English]

I think it is an extremely important procedure that is being followed on this bill. The bill has some deficiencies, some of which were pointed out by the hon. member in his speech, which cause me concern. I am sure the members of the committee will want to take a very careful look at it.

As a member of the scrutiny of regulations committee who has been working in this area for about two years now, I have my own concerns about this bill. I am sorry that it is not being referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Scrutiny of Regulations, which has some expertise in this area among the members of the committee who have worked on this. Many of the members of the committee have worked on it a good deal longer than I have and are far more knowledgeable. I am sorry they are not going to have the opportunity to deal with it as a committee.

• (1735)

On the other hand, I strongly suspect some of us will attend the odd meeting of the government operations committee and make known our views in respect of certain aspects of this bill, which I hope will help the minister as he deals with it in committee and will help make the bill a better one for everybody in Parliament.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Bring Mary back.

Mr. Milliken: I know the hon. members want to hear more from the hon. member for Halifax, the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I too regret that her speech was limited to 10 minutes. I was enjoying her speech. I also note her reference to hon. members opposite as barrels. I am sure they were enjoying that.

Mr. Stinson: At least we are full barrels, not empty like the government.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member says that they are full barrels. I am not sure what they are full of.

I would like to deal with a few of the proposals in the bill. Rather than being distracted by the comments from the other side, I would prefer to stick to my own views on this bill today.

I praise the minister for agreeing to allow the bill to be referred to committee before second reading. I believe it gives the committee maximum scope, notwithstanding the criticisms we have heard from the other side about this, to effect change to this bill should it find the provisions in the bill are unsatisfactory.

We know from the previous speaker's comments that the bill purports to repeal the Statutory Instruments Act and replace the definition of statutory instruments with a new definition of regulation. It allows among its provisions for the incorporation by reference of regulations or of descriptions in other documents promulgated by other organizations or other governments.

I know the hon. member for Bourassa in his remarks referred to clause 16 of the bill, which says that a regulation may incorporate by reference material produced by a person or body other than the regulatory authority, including a personal body such as an industrial or trade organization and a government agency or international body. He expressed some concern about that.

In clause 19 of the bill it says "Material does not become a regulation for the purposes of this act because it is incorporated by reference in a regulation". I have a slight concern, because a regulation is referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Scrutiny of Regulations. Will the material incorporated by reference also be referred to that committee? I believe it is important that it be so referred. If clause 19 will be argued as a means for saying that it is not before the committee, I would have concerns. That is a point that should be clarified in the course of the committee proceedings on this bill.

Clause 25 of the bill, which refers regulations to committees, does constitute an improvement over the existing law. There are certain statutory instruments currently now adopted that do not come before the scrutiny of regulations committee. The definition contained in this act widens the scope of the committee's work to allow it to see more than was otherwise the case.

I have attempted through questioning to elicit the lists of the kinds of things that would not now be referred to the committee, but without a lot of success. I fully anticipate the government operations committee in the course of its deliberations on this bill will be able to get that information. I am looking forward to seeing the list and I will review it of course with some care.

The fact that there is a wider definition of those things being referred is significant. I believe it represents an advance in the law. I am surprised to hear the hon. member for Bourassa —and his colleagues, the hon. members for Québec–Est and Chambly, expressing negative views on this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Boudria: Very negative.

Mr. Milliken: Very negative, as the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell is saying.

This is not necessary, because the bill is a good bill, with good ideas. There have been a lot of changes in this area of the law, and that is important. This is a renewal, and that is why it is important, because nothing was done in this area for many years.

[English]

The changes the government is proposing in simplifying the whole regulatory process one hopes—it is a hope that is fervent on my part, but I am not sure I am fully expecting it to be fulfilled—will result in more efficient use of the regulatory process.

• (1740)

As a member of the scrutiny of regulations committee, one of the criticisms I have of the current process is the slowness with which things move. I know that citizens I run into who are operating businesses find it passing strange that it takes the government so long to make changes to regulations that are shown to be out of date and inapplicable in the circumstances.

I did not bring any horror stories with me today. I have not had a recent incident. However, I am aware that over the years members of the public have complained that a regulation is out of date, should have been changed, the standards in the industry have changed dramatically and the regulation no longer reflects industrial practice and is simply not enforced because nobody is obeying the regulation. Yet nobody gets around to making changes to it. Part of the reason no one gets around to making these changes is because of the time it takes to get changes effected in government regulations. It is a process that takes months or years. Because of that we have suffered.

The regulatory regime in Canada is nowhere near as good as it should be. It could be improved drastically if change could be effected more quickly. This bill will allow that. To that extent, it is a beneficial change. We may want to look at the ways it allows it, we may want to look at the safeguards built into the process, but the fact is that the bill does allow more efficiency. For that reason alone, I think it is worth supporting.

I am surprised to hear my colleague from Bourassa say that he will not vote for the bill at this stage when we are not approving it in principle. We are simply referring the bill to committee before second reading. I know what has happened. He has listened to somebody else in his party who decided that the party should vote against it and he is going along with that. If he had argued in the right places I think he could have convinced his leader and the other members of his party that they should be supporting the bill.

I am not sure of the position of the Reform Party. Unfortunately, I missed their speaker on this bill. I understand that the Reform Party is also opposed to the bill.

Mr. Stinson: You missed more than that.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member says that I missed more than that. I did miss more than that, but I understand there was only one speech made by the Reform Party on this bill. I do not know who made the speech. I suspect it was one of the members who is sitting here now. I am sorry I missed it. I am sure I would have enjoyed it. Whether it would have illumined me on the subject of the bill is another matter. Perhaps the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, when he makes his speech, will be able to comment on the pearls of wisdom, or otherwise, we heard from the Reform Party earlier this afternoon.

I thank the minister again and praise him for bringing forward the bill. I believe it is important to have a look at this area of the law. This bill will allow the committee responsible to do that. I only hope that the members of the scrutiny of regulations committee will have an opportunity to have some input on the bill during the course of committee deliberations.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak, albeit briefly, on this bill.

[Translation]

Today, once again, we have seen that the Liberal government is in favour of this democratic evolution, this modernization of the legislation, and we can see too that the two parties on the other side want to maintain the status quo. It is clear. Obviously, this is not surprising on the part of the Reform Party, because we know that these people are much like a species that disappeared millions of years ago, and I do not think it is necessary to mention the species we are talking about. However, we are a bit surprised by the hon. members from the Bloc Quebecois, because they claim they want progress, they want change.

Oh, well. Sometimes, they change things by going backwards, but I must say that I am a bit surprised to see that they are in favour of the motion before the House today. The motion now before the House is interesting, because we are not passing this bill. We are only talking about the House referring the bill to a parliamentary committee without first having approved it.

• (1745)

I could have read the exact motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 73(1), Bill C–84 would be referred to the Standing Committee on Government Operations before second reading. The bill deals with the registration, publication and parliamentary scrutiny of regulations.

In other words, we are not asking members to tell us today if they are in favour or against the bill. The only thing the government is asking the House is for this bill to be discussed in committee, without first getting approval in principle at second reading stage.

So, we are not asking members opposite for their approval. We are asking for a parliamentary committee to consider this bill beforehand, to determine if we should approve it, with or without amendments. In other words, we want to find ways to improve the way we do things.

The member for Bourassa and others are in favour of the status quo. They are against progressive, flexible federalism as we see it on this side of the House. They are uncompromising, they are dead set on keeping the status quo and they refuse to let this bill go through.

You can see how our colleagues opposite are acting. They are very partisan and show a total lack of objectivity. We heard the member for Bourassa say in his speech that he thought the government could use this bill—and keep in mind that we are not voting on the bill, but only referring it to a committee for prior study—that this bill could be used against the French culture. Imagine that, we are talking here about a bill aimed at modernizing the regulations review process. Is the member not going too far?

[English]

The bill will do a number of things such as replace the rather antiquated and misunderstood phrase statutory instruments with something a little more modern like regulations. Some of these terms confuse the best of us.

A moment ago I was saying to my colleague, the parliamentary secretary, that the term statutory instruments was about as clear as a term used sometimes in real estate known as incorporeal hereditament. My colleague, the member for Victoria—Haliburton, who I think is a real estate agent by training, will know what I am referring to. It is another way of describing curtain rods and such. It can mean more than curtain rods, but that is the thrust of the debate. I am told it can also mean sump pumps and the like.

We have some terms in law that are confusing at the best of times. In this process we are studying at committee level the Regulations Act to modernize it. There could be places in the bill where the committee will offer changes or modifications to better the bill before it asks the House for approval in principle.

The important and operative point to remember is that the only matter being sought of the House right now is whether the bill should be studied in committee, not should it be approved in principle first and referred to a committee which is the normal way of doing business. Today that is not even being sought.

What do we hear from across the way but systematic obstruction that we are familiar with? Those members are married to the status quo. They want no improvement in the federation, no improvement in our laws and no modernization.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has informed us that he is very much interested in the issue, as he should be, because he is learned in the law. He will no doubt have an important contribution to make to that effect in committee.

• (1750)

The Standing Committee on Government Operations is very ably chaired by the hon. member for Fundy Royal. He is also a very well known lawyer and will be able to deal with the issue along with other members of the committee who will be studying the bill.

An hon. member: How many lawyers are there?

Mr. Boudria: A member across the way is asking how many lawyers are on the committee. I think it is a grand total of one.

Mr. Stinson: That is too many.

Mr. Boudria: A member across says that is too many to deal with statutory instruments. Perhaps we can have the benefit of the wisdom of the member who has made these utterances. In committee he will no doubt enlighten the rest of us on how to proceed with modernizing the statutory instruments of Canada.

I am sure the hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau will be listening attentively. He too is learned in the law and will be listening to the immense contribution of the member across the way so he can inform us on how to better the statutory instruments or the regulations made pursuant to the laws of the land.

I know the hon. member across the way is just champing at the bit. I know he will make a profound discourse on the subject. My colleagues and I are all waiting anxiously to hear the comments of the hon. member across the way in the Reform Party who is heckling at the present time and who is obviously very anxious to participate in this very important debate this afternoon.

I want him to tell us exactly what the position of his party is with regard to referring the bill before second reading for a full study prior to approval in principle in the House of Commons and why it is his party is choosing to behave in that way, if not simply to say that it has no interest in making things in the House better or more modern.

[Translation]

I will say, in conclusion, that it is not too late for the member for Bourassa, the member for Drummond and others to change their mind and to vote in favour of this motion to refer the bill to committee before second reading.

In doing so, we are showing our intention, our desire, collectively and individually, to improve the laws of Canada. We will see in a few moments if the members for Bourassa, Mercier, Drummond and our other colleagues opposite are in favour of the status quo or if they are in favour of improvement. We will see in a few moments. But let us not hold our breath, because it is quite likely that these people will want the status quo because it suits their purpose in the current debate.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Call in the members.

The division on the motion is deferred until 6 p.m., at the request of the government whip.

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I think you would find unanimous consent to suspend the sitting of the House until 6 p.m. when the bells will start their 15–minute sounding.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is the House in agreement to suspend until six o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

(The sitting of the House was suspended at 5.55 p.m.)

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 6 p.m.

PETITIONS

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to rise in the House today to present a petition from the constituents of Hamilton—Wentworth. They call on Parliament to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act, to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and to adopt all the necessary measures to recognize the full equality of same sex relationships in federal law.

• (1010)

INCOME TAX

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition that has been circulating all across Canada. This petition has been signed by a number of Canadians in my own riding of Mississauga South.

The petitioners would like to draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession which has not been recognized for its value to our society. They also state that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families that make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill and the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call on Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families that decide to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill and the aged.

THE SENATE

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Madam Speaker, I stand pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present two petitions.

The first is on behalf of constituents from Regina—Lumsden and other parts of Saskatchewan who are unhappy with the fact that the Senate is unelected and unaccountable, and is nothing but a home for recipients of Liberal and Tory patronage which cost Canadians $54 million a year.

The petitioners call on the House of Commons to undertake a constitutional amendment to abolish the Senate. I am happy to present this petition on behalf of my constituents.

BOVINE SOMATOTROPIN

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Madam Speaker, the second petition is from a number of constituents from Regina—Lumsden as well as from citizens in other parts of Saskatchewan like Fort Qu'Appelle and Saskatoon.

The petitioners are opposed to the approval of the synthetic bovine growth hormone known as BGH or BST, a drug injected into cows to increase milk production. They call on Parliament to take steps to keep BGH out of Canada through legislating a moratorium or stoppage on BGH use and sale until the year 2000 and examining the outstanding health and economic questions through independent and transparent review.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry, that was pretty close to debate.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Madam Speaker, having consulted with the Bloc whip and the chief government whip, I think you will find there is unanimous consent for me to move:

That Private Members' Business will be dispensed with today, Tuesday, October 3 and that at 5.30 p.m. the time be called 6.30 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The House has heard the member's motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would request that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CULTURAL PROPERTY EXPORT AND IMPORT ACT

The House resumed from October 2 consideration of the motion that Bill C–93, an act to amend the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, the other day I had the opportunity to speak on a Reform amendment to this bill. I must admit my remarks were somewhat hurried and I was unable to review certain material before I was able to make those remarks.

Today, having had ample opportunity to reflect on the excellent material available in support of the bill put out by the office of the minister and the department, I want to again praise the minister for introducing Bill C–93. It is a very good bill. It has been earnestly sought after by members of the cultural community who appreciate the very significant donations made to galleries, museums, archives and libraries by donors who own valuable cultural treasures.

The department estimates that $60 million a year is donated to Canadian institutions. These very significant gifts are of possible tax benefit to the donor who may claim a deduction in respect to the value of the gift. I note the deduction that can be claimed in each case is only half the value. It is not the full value. It is substantially less than that. The part which is eligible as a tax credit therefore is much more modest than has been suggested in some of the remarks made by hon. members opposite.

• (1015)

Donors, museums, galleries and professional associations have lobbied for the right to appeal the determination made by the review board which currently makes determinations of value, and this bill gives that right. It is only fair, it is only just and I think the bill deserves the support of all hon. members, particularly when we look at the substantial value of the gifts made to these institutions. Without these kinds of gifts many of these institutions would not be able to acquire the very substantial works of art they now receive.

I submit this is a fair and reasonable way of proceeding and I urge all hon. members to support the bill in light of the facts and figures I have been able to bring to the attention of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the division on the motion now before the House stands deferred until five o'clock today, at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to reintroduce my motion which I understand now has the unanimous consent of the House. I move:

That Private Members' Business be dispensed with today, Tuesday, October 3, and that furthermore when the time of 5.30 p.m. comes that it be deemed to be 6.30 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

(Motion agreed to.)

OCEANS ACT

The House resumed from October 2 consideration of the motion that Bill C–98, an act respecting the oceans of Canada, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it is the first time I have spoken from the left side of my chair instead of the right side and perhaps my left leaning ideology may come out a little stronger in this speech than it has in the last speeches I have made in the Chamber.

• (1020)

I hope the bill finds a very broad degree of support by members on all sides of the House. It clearly establishes the framework of a piece of legislation, a commitment given by the government as espoused by no less than the Prime Minister to get a focus in government on the development and management of oceans and ocean policy.

The bill has been a long time in coming and has been awaited with much anticipation by many individuals and organizations dealing with the marine environment. The Canadian Wildlife Fund and many other organizations have pushed for many years for the government to come in with a piece of legislation that would consolidate the administration of all governmental activities related to oceans as well as ensure the number one prerogative and prerequisite of this policy be conservation.

If measures taken by governments respecting management of oceans and oceans policy did not pass the fundamental test of being environmentally sound, they would not be passed.

The bill affirms the commitment of the government to a new approach to oceans management. The preamble clearly outlines the government's commitment to manage the oceans in a sustainable, environmental and ecologically sound fashion.

The bill consolidates and gives impact and full effect to the laws of Canada, not just marine laws but environmental laws in our 200–mile limit. It goes through a whole bunch of definitions of the contiguous zone, the coastal zone, the 200–mile economic zone and all of those things.

In essence it puts in a single piece of legislation the regulatory legislative framework for us to act in the best interests of those who rely on our marine resource for a living. It directs government as to how it should deal with the marine environment.

Part II of the act tries to consolidate a lot of governmental activity with respect to the oceans. I have been critical about the way the government has handled the oceans generally. I have been critical for fairly good reason.

Over the years governments have come to see the ocean as a place to exploit a resource called fish. We can see this very clearly by the difficulties we have on both coasts, more poignantly perhaps on the east coast with the collapse of the ground fishery and over 100,000 people without employment. Coastal communities are dying and a way of life unique to that part of Canada is perhaps facing extinction.

It is all because governments have not been able to deal comprehensively in policy with that ocean resource. Current legislation almost ignores that there is an interrelationship between various policy arms of the government with respect to the health of the ocean resource.

It also ignores that there is an ecology within the ocean that deals with living and non–living organisms. In the last number of years Canada has worked aggressively at the United Nations. It has been one of the states that has promoted to a great extent and has perhaps been the lead nation on some of the major conservation efforts with the United Nations law of the sea.

Canada has talked a lot about the need for some international regimes to deal with oceans, to deal with those fringe areas, straddling stocks, highly migratory stocks. However, there are other issues in the law of the sea convention that Canada had some difficulty with, deep ocean bed mining, for example.

How do we reconcile ourselves as a state to that? Whose resource is this to manage? When we get on to the continental shelf there are laws dealing with our proprietary right and our management responsibilities in the water column. Perhaps they are less clear about which level of government has jurisdiction or whether the Canadian government has any legal jurisdiction for the sea bed for minerals or deep ocean mining.

There has been much debate in the last year with the Americans about sedentary species when dealing with the continental shelf. Who has management rights of those species? Who has the right of first exploitation and who has the responsibility to manage? The act seeks to consolidate in a fairly substantial way all the various issues, programs and legislation.

• (1025)

I am pleased with the direction the bill has taken. I am pleased that it gives primary responsibility for co–ordination of the application of these pieces of legislation and regulations to the minister of fisheries. However, being from Missouri, I am yet to be convinced the bill goes as far as it should to ensure a sharp edge to the sword in the management and policy development dealing with our marine resources.

I am a bit confused that in the bill we give the minister of fisheries primary responsibility for co–ordination. I would rather see a direct line of accountability for the administration of some of the acts which still fall under the purview of other departments and other ministers.

I think back to the dispute we had not long ago when two ministers worked very well together in dealing with the turbot dispute with the European Union, more particularly and poignantly with the Spanish fleet decimating a straddling stock. We almost saw another stock going into the record book as being extinct as a commercial and viable stock on our east coast.

We had the good fortune at that time to have the Minister of Foreign Affairs and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans working together on a co–ordinated and combined approach to resolve and put together the Canadian position, making sure the Canadian position was put to the international community very strongly and firmly and that it was accepted by the international community. As a result of that close working relationship, sharing the same goals, we were able to save a species and defuse a difficult international situation that had arisen with respect to the turbot allocation on the east coast.

I am extremely pleased the bill is going to committee. As chairman of the committee, I want the committee to look at whether there are some pieces of legislation currently outside the direct jurisdiction of the minister, although the minister may have the responsibility for co–ordination, where we possibly can make a case that those pieces of legislation and programs should be more properly moved over to the minister of fisheries.

When we talk about downsizing and government and operational review we must look at what makes sense. The policy as stated in the preamble of the bill is one I heartily support and I hope it will be supported by all members of the House.

Part III of the bill talks about the minister of fisheries having primary responsibility for ocean research. It is an absolute given. There is more than fish in our oceans. There is more benefit than exploiting the stocks in our oceans. Ocean science in itself is a generator of wealth and employment which can be exported on our east and west coasts and in the labs of central Canada.

I want to make sure that when the bill is passed the minister of fisheries, as stated in part III, has the tools at his disposal to ensure there is proper direction and proper resources applied to the whole area of marine and ocean science.

In my riding of Dartmouth I am lucky to have the Bedford Institute of Oceanography, a world class centre for oceans research. In excess of 12,000 people produce good products. There is partnering by the scientific community employed by the government and the scientific community in the Halifax—Dartmouth area. Some of that technology is being exported around the world.

In that facility the geological survey is doing incredible work. The work of the labs on the east and west coasts is leading science around the world. People from educational and academic institutions and other governments around the world come to see how we do our research in Canada.

I get concerned, however, that lab is not under the direction of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. It is under the direction of the Minister of Natural Resources. It is not the primary objective or job of that department to ensure that deep ocean science has a pre–eminent position in terms of allocation of departmental resources.

• (1030)

At the same time, we have provisions dealing with deep ocean dumping, which seems to me should more likely be over with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Currently, although there would be a requirement in this act to see the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans as the lead, it does not hand that particular responsibility over to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

We have a chance through committee to show two things. One is that the committee can work. I have an incredibly good committee, and I am very proud as chairman to say that most of the work we do is non–partisan. Sometimes we fall prey to the fact that we are practitioners of the political profession and sometimes we become partisan.

As a chair of a committee I want to let everybody in this place know that I believe there is a proper role for a committee to play with respect to examining legislation. I am hoping that when this bill passes second reading and gets to the committee we in the committee will do a fairly exhaustive review of this bill and will be able to come back with a bill that is true to the principles and if necessary strengthens the hand of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Madam Speaker, we have talked in the House about Bill C–98 and the problems we have with it. The problem is that along with the consolidation of government regulations this bill also opens the door for the government to increase what it euphemistically calls access fees, but which we all know is a tax on fishermen. We know that the plans are to raise taxes 400 per cent on a segment of our society that can least afford it.

The minister had a choice. The minister knew his budget was going to be cut and he had a choice. He could cut spending, he could deal with the bloated bureaucracy here in Ottawa and in other parts of Canada where they have these ivory towers, or he could raise access fees or taxes on fishermen. He chose to go after the fishermen. As I said earlier, these are people in our country who can least afford to pay a massive increase at this point in time.

Let us talk about access for a minute. I think that is an interesting subject, given this government is supporting an aboriginal fishing strategy on both coasts that allows special access to a resource based on race. The aboriginal fishing strategy, this government policy, sets people apart. It treats them differently, gives them different rules to live by and creates a gulf between people. It creates a mentality of us versus them. It creates divisions in our society that we do not need and we have not seen before but which are growing as a result of government policies such as this.

Not only does this set people apart by race, not only does it give different treatment to Canadians on the basis of their racial origin but it is profoundly anti–democratic at its very roots. The cornerstone of democracy is that all people within a democracy can expect equal treatment before the eyes of the law. They can expect to be treated the same as all other citizens in the democracy, in the country. This is no longer the case in Canada. We now treat people differently.

I suggest this is playing to a deeply rooted sense of tribalism. I suggest that both of these cannot co–exist within a democracy, this idea of tribalism where you have people who suggest they have special rights and should be treated differently, on whatever basis, whether it is racial origin or whether it is sexual preference, it does not matter, you name it. It is the cornerstone of democracy that we do not treat people differently, that everybody gets the same treatment in the eyes of the law. That is not happening here.

The fishermen on the west coast and east coast who are being asked to pay a massive increase for access to the resource look across the way and see their neighbours and fellow Canadians getting access to the same resource on a completely different basis. It is fundamentally unacceptable, I would suggest that in a democracy we proceed with that kind of policy.

We will hear members opposite say "the courts made us do it". I suggest very strongly that there is no basis in law, no basis in our Constitution. There is not one legal case that has said the aboriginal people of Canada should have special access to any resources on a commercial basis. It is completely unsupported. But these members opposite, other members before them and other fisheries ministers have said that the Sparrow decision is what has created this aboriginal fishing strategy. It is faulty and not supported. I would suggest that government following this policy is just creating divisions in our society that we do not need.

I would ask how the minister and this government can, under Bill C–98, contemplate and suggest that they are going to raise access fees to ordinary Canadian fishermen who remain in the commercial sector by some 400 per cent while at the same time they support and maintain an aboriginal fishing strategy that provides access to the resource on a completely different basis.

I suggest that what the government is doing here is not supported in the industry. It certainly is not supported from the point of view of the Atlantic Canadian fishermen I have had the opportunity to meet in recent weeks. I believe there are many members on the opposite benches who are going to have a difficult time going back to their constituents to explain why they are supporting this bill in its present form because their constituents do not support it. Their constituents are very unhappy with what the government is proposing.

In closing, I would like to say that the Reform Party is opposed to Bill C–98. We are opposed because we see the minister increasing taxes on fishermen rather than cutting his own budget and his own spending. We know there are significant cuts that can be made within DFO at the top, which would probably increase the efficiency of the organization by 400 per cent. This would get the whole fishery on a more economically sustainable basis. It is unthinkable that we continue to pump the kind of money into DFO that we do based on the value of the fishery.

I know the members opposite, particularly the member for Dartmouth and the member for South West Nova, are going to have difficulties in their ridings when they go back and try to explain to their constituents and the fishermen who live in their communities why they are supporting this legislation.

I am here today on behalf of the Reform Party to say we are not supporting this legislation. We will not support these kinds of massive tax increases wherever we find them. This bill is fundamentally flawed because of this very important move by the government to increase those fees.

Mr. John Maloney (Erie, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise today to speak to Bill C–98, an act respecting the oceans of Canada. I welcome the opportunity to chat for a few minutes about why I support the bill before us.

I think it is clear to everyone at this point that there is a great need to move away from what the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology called the haphazard, ad hoc and short term measures currently employed in the management of our ocean resources. The patchwork quilt strategy is ineffective and inefficient. The national advisory board called for Canada to develop a proactive oceans policy that allows for us to plan for the future instead of just responding to crises as they arise.

• (1040)

Our ocean resources are far too important in this country. We need a management process that works better and serves the interests of all of us in the long term. We cannot afford to continue to make decisions on the management of our fisheries or the management of our other marine resources in isolation from those having to do with shipping or those having to do with environmental protection, and vice versa. Decisions on one have an impact on all others.

We need to bring all these elements together under one roof. This legislation will accomplish that by asserting our national jurisdiction over a 12–mile contiguous zone in which all our national laws regarding fiscal, immigration, customs and environmental matters will apply while at the same time creating an exclusive economic zone to assert our right to protect and manage all our resources out to a 200–mile limit, including all fish and also including all other resources.

This bill will also extend our authority out over the continental shelf. Bill C–29, passed by the House last year, established our right to protect and manage the so–called straddling stocks of fish that move in and out of the current 200–mile limit. This legislation will reinforce that measure by exerting our authority over the continental shelf itself and the resources found on the shelf.

Canada has always been a world leader in matters to do with the wise management of our ocean resources. We were one of the primary movers urging the UN to focus on the importance of this issue. Successive governments have made the case to our international partners that ocean states can and should have the right to control and protect their coastal waters. We have 250,000 kilometres of coastline, more than anyone else in the world. As such, it has always been in our national interest to seek recognition of our rights in the waters immediately off our shores.

The second thing this legislation does is to put overall responsibility for the creation of oceans management strategy in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. We can proceed in a more organized and cost efficient manner to deliver oceans programs in a more coherent manner. The goal is sustainable development of these vast stretches of our waters. We want to exploit the oceans for ourselves, but we also want to make sure that in doing so we do not damage them for future generations of Canadians or for current and future generations of people in other countries.

Eight years ago the concept of sustainable development was first introduced in a report of the World Commission on Environment and Development chaired by the current Prime Minister of Norway, Mrs. Gro Harlem Brundtland. The principles of the Brundtland report are supported in theory at least by almost every nation in the world.

The previous government agreed with the principles in the Brundtland report and in fact made a commitment to bring in a Canada oceans act. However, no such legislation was ever introduced by that government. I congratulate this government for doing so.

Under the terms of this legislation we have before us, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans will be responsible for the development and enforcement of a new oceans management strategy. It is going to be done with a different approach from that used in the past. It is the government's stated intention to work in partnership with oceans industries and the people in them, the various resource extraction industries and the people involved there, with environmental groups and indeed with anyone who has an interest to come up with the best plan possible.

An example given of this kind of partnership is the Fisheries Resource Conservation Council which brings together industry, educators and governments to advise on conservation in the Atlantic. The council has played an instrumental role in helping the government move to the fishery of the future. The government wants to expand this kind of partnership because it believes that these kinds of partnership approaches will bring the best results. That includes using the best scientific information from as many sources as possible.

It is not going to be a matter of the federal government determining everything itself. It is going to work with other levels of government, the private sector, educators, scientists, environmental groups and all interested parties to make sure that Canada remains on the cutting edge of research and knowledge in this critical area and more important, that Canada uses that knowledge to make the right decisions about how best to manage our ocean resources.

Hon. colleagues will also know that the government has already moved to integrate the coast guard into the department of fisheries. I think this move makes a lot of sense. Bringing together these two fleets of ships and aircraft will save the government money. This is always good news for taxpayers. It is very welcome news for my constituents in the riding of Erie. More than that, it also gives them the opportunity to use all their vessels and aircraft for both purposes, that is fisheries and resource management as well as the traditional coast guard duties of search and rescue, ice breaking service, marine weather warnings, patrolling our coastal waters and so on.

• (1045)

In addition, the regional offices of both will be consolidated into an enlarged and improved service which means further savings and a much better co–ordination of all activities that have to do with our ocean waters.

Provision is also made in the act to allow the minister of fisheries to carry out scientific research in support of the ocean management strategy. It gives the minister the legal right to produce charts, reports and scientific data and to provide that information to those groups, organizations and individuals who have an interest in these issues. Also included is a new authority to provide guidelines under which foreign vessels can conduct scientific research in Canadian waters.

For the first time the act will give government, following discussions and advice from scientists and other interested parties, a new authority to create protected marine areas, to safeguard ocean biodiversity and to safeguard endangered species.

We all know that our oceans, particularly in our coastal communities, face a great deal of environmental stress as well as the depletion of the ocean resources through the destruction of habitats essential to the survival and growth of certain species. We need to protect these areas from further destruction. I welcome the inclusion of this provision in the act and encourage the minister to use it when scientific evidence demonstrates that it is necessary.

The point has been made by others that passing the legislation by itself does not guarantee that our oceans will be safe from all environmental damage or resource depletion for all time. If it were that simple, I am sure we would have passed a law against the common cold many years ago.

The bill puts a framework in place that will help us reach those goals. It also makes clear that we have to promote our own strategy with all the countries in the world that share oceans with us. In other words we have to make it clear that each of us is responsible for protecting them.

I urge the government and the minister to continue to make Canada's voice heard on issues such as ocean dumping, conservation of straddling stocks, the proper management of our coastal zones, circumpolar management and all other issues that have an impact on the oceans of the world.

The legislation gives us as a nation the opportunity to lead by example, to demonstrate to the world that Canadians care deeply about their ocean resources, that we want to preserve and protect them and that we are willing to put our money where our mouth is by taking long term action to do so. The oceans act signals a renewal of Canada's leadership in ocean management. I am proud of this initiative asserting Canada's role as a world leader.

Before I conclude I should like to address one point raised by the previous Reform speaker on cost recovery. The oceans act authorizes the minister to fix fees, to recover the cost of services and activities provided for under the act, for example ice breaking, traffic management and hydrographic charts. Access fees for commercial fishermen are established under section 8 of the fisheries act, not under the oceans act. The two pieces of legislation are entirely distinct.

I hope every member of the House will consider the legislation as a very positive step in the right direction and give it their support. I certainly do.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure today to speak on Bill C–98, the oceans act, an act to ratify the UN Convention on the Law of the Sea.

I will mention what I agree with and what I disagree with. I will give some constructive suggestions to make our oceans better, to improve our resource management and to ensure we have safe, clean oceans with viable populations of flora and fauna within those oceans for now and forever more.

Unfortunately we will create another level of bureaucracy with this act. There are aspects of it that actually improve, streamline and make the system more efficient, for example with the amalgamation of the coast guard. We completely agree with that. However we have created in the oceans management strategy a whole new level of bureaucracy to monitor people monitoring other people when in effect we should just be acting.

Unfortunately we continually study, report and analyse aspects not only within this ministry but within many others when the actual facts are already there, waiting to be dealt with. Sadly with this bill we see the same situation. Historically we can see the consequences of continuing to act, continuing to report and continuing to study.

We have seen the decimation of our oceans and the fish populations within them. The disaster on the east coast has been a profound tragedy for all people living in the maritimes. On the west coast unfortunately the fish stocks are facing an impending disaster. For years the west coast fisheries of many species have been decimated. The reason is not El Niño, not mackerel, not warm water, although they can have a contributing effect. The primary reason for the decimation of fish stocks on the west coast is poaching, poaching and poaching. That is the cold, hard reality of what has happened on the west coast. It also happened on the east coast before.

Unfortunately the ministry has been unwilling and unable to deal with it. It is not because DFO officers did not want to enforce the law but because middle management bureaucracy meddled in the ability of the DFO officers to enforce the laws which protect the environment and species for generations to come. These individuals are hiding behind their ethnic origins and using the aboriginal fishing strategy to poach and pillage our fish stock. Those are the facts.

The colour or race of persons do not matter. If they are poachers, they are poachers and they should be dealt with in the same way as other people. This ministry has been unwilling and unable to do that. We see aboriginal people poaching up and down the Fraser River. DFO officers are unwilling to enforce the law because they are afraid of being shot. On Vancouver Island Vietnamese people have been decimating the shellfish stocks in full view of other people and the DFO officers have been unable to deal with it. They have been told by the bureaucratic masters above them that they should leave well enough alone.

There are too many nets in the water. Seiners are going out into the straits of Juan de Fuca and are vacuuming the oceans. The DFO must take a leadership role to decrease the number of nets.

The aboriginal fishing strategy is a disaster. Furthermore it is illegal. Court cases in the B.C. Supreme Court have determined that it is illegal. The Sparrow case my hon. friend mentioned proved there was no legal jurisdiction for the AFS.

We should have one commercial fishing strategy for all people. It does not serve the law–abiding aboriginal people who care about and fish the resource. Nor does it serve anybody else to allow people within their community to hide behind the AFS and poach fish. The ministry has put people who are some of the biggest poachers in British Columbia in charge of the aboriginal fishing strategy. The aboriginal people know that and they are quite angry at the DFO for doing it.

As I said before, there is widespread poaching of shellfish. Widespread poaching of abalone was stopped in 1989, but everyone who lives on Vancouver Island knows that abalone is being poached.

Companies continue to dump their garbage into the oceans on the west coast and on the east coast. The ministry has been unable and unwilling to deal with it. It should be working closely with the Ministry of the Environment to develop a system to identify the people who are polluting our oceans, to enforce the law and to penalize them. Furthermore, so that it does not cost taxpayers money, the government should levy the costs for cleaning up the dumping and the pollution on the shoulders of the groups or companies that are doing it. It should not cost the taxpayer any money whatsoever to do that. The full cost and beyond should be borne by the polluters themselves.

• (1055)

I also encourage the Ministry of Fisheries and Oceans to work closely with the Ministry of the Environment and various universities across the country that are doing very interesting research in the oceans. They are also developing systems with strong commercial properties that can be sold internationally.

We as a country can be a leader in areas such as aquaculture, resource management, fisheries and oceans management. All we need to do is have the courage to identify these sectors, promote them and capitalize on them for our economy and our country. We have been far too lame and non–aggressive in this area.

I suggest that we do the following. We should give DFO officers more autonomy and stop letting them be hamstrung by middle management. I strongly encourage the minister to look at what is happening in middle management. Some of them are telling him what he wants to hear, not what is actually occurring.

When the minister went to the west coast he did a very good thing by sitting down with the DFO officers and speaking with them in a forthcoming fashion. I think he found that productive. I know they did. I strongly encourage him to continue the practice.

The sad byproduct of that meeting unfortunately is that some of the DFO officers have been penalized for being forthcoming and as a result have been removed from their positions at great cost to the ministry and at great cost to the fisheries. This is completely unfair.

We must make enforcement a priority. We must allow DFO officers to continue to do their job. We must allow them to enforce the law as it is written and arrest and penalize anybody who poaches regardless of whom they happen to be.

I put forth to the minister about a month and a half ago a new idea by which we can improve our fish stocks and generate funds for the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. It involved using salmon hatcheries.

A recent study indicated that salmon hatcheries, many of which are inefficient, do not need to exist. I gave the minister a way for the department to pay for the hatcheries and to earn revenues from them. They would become self–sustaining and would not be a lodestone around the taxpayer's neck.

I hope he pays careful attention to it. A model of it will be on the Sooke River in my riding of Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca. It is a well thought out plan and will make the hatchery self–sustaining in the future.

The hon. minister should look at new ways to manage our oceans and new ways to increase our jurisdiction beyond the 200–mile zone. The reality is that we cannot even manage our oceans in the 2–mile zone, let alone the 200–mile zone. We have to show more courage in this way. I am hoping with the amalgamation of the coast guard we can use the coast guard more effectively to arrest individuals who are poaching.

I warn once again that a lot of people are coming over from the United States of America to poach in B.C. waters because their waters are completely closed to fishing. The DFO has been completely unable to do anything about that.

The officers should also be given the ability to work overtime and the ability to do night patrols and weekend patrols when a lot of poaching occurs.

There are ways in which to generate money from something like this, so it will not cost the ministry more money. I strongly encourage the minister to look at these matters. My colleagues and I would be more than happy to help him in the endeavour to have one fishery for generations to come.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak on Bill C–98 respecting the oceans act. It implements many of the key recommendations in last year's report called "Opportunities from our Oceans" by the committee on oceans and coasts of the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology.

As government members opposite have already noted, this piece of legislation does three things to implement a strategy to better manage the environment and resources of Canada's oceans. First, the act establishes Canadian sovereignty over the ocean areas and resources of a 24–nautical mile contiguous zone and a 200–mile exclusive economic zone, in accordance with the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, which Canada signed in 1982 but never ratified. Second, the act develops and implements a national oceans strategy based on the sustainable development and integrated management of oceans and coastal activities and resources; this would include establishing protected marine areas. Finally, the act provides for the powers, duties, functions, and responsibilities of the Minister of Fisheries to manage Canada's oceans.

This is an important bill which could move us forward toward managing both our natural resources and our fishery in a manner that is more sustainable for future generations. The idea of an oceans act is certainly overdue. I am supportive of the bill in general and pleased that Canada will finally implement one of the key provisions of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea.

There are areas where the act could be improved. I wish to focus my remarks today on some of those improvements and on the fact that other legislation the government has on the Order Paper may limit the effectiveness of Bill C–98.

Clause 35 of the bill allows for the minister to establish protected marine areas. However, the bill states that these areas are only for the conservation and protection of fishery resources and their habitat. These protected areas should not be limited just to the fishery. The act should also be broader so that the protected marine areas protect other endangered species and different habitats and ecosystems, not just the fishery. This would recognize the importance of biodiversity in the complex ocean environment. There should also be no take zones within these areas.

The environment minister's proposed endangered species legislation will only protect 4 per cent of Canada's total land base. A broadening of the protected marine areas therefore would signal that even if the government does not intend to protect endangered species in most of the country, at least it will protect them in our oceans.

This shows that when we look at what the government is doing to protect the environment, it is important not to look at this legislation in isolation from other government statements and initiatives on the environment.

Last week I listened to government members opposite talk about how wonderful things in this bill would lead us toward sustainable development and how the bill's regulation would extend our jurisdiction to manage and protect ocean resources and our environment. They seem to be blissfully unaware that just last week the Minister for International Trade, a minister in their own government, said that Canada will have to cede its sovereignty and environmental standards to achieve freer world trade and that the environment will increasingly be subject to harmonization under international trade agreements. So which is it? Will Bill C–98 be used to protect and sustain our oceans, or will the environment of our oceans be sacrificed on the altar of free trade?

As they talked about sustainable development and environmental regulations, the Liberal members also seemed to be unaware that their government has introduced two pieces of legislation, Bill C–62 and Bill C–83. Those bills could effectively gut the regulations in this bill and therefore prevent us from knowing if the government's oceans management strategy will ever lead us to sustainability.

Just to remind members opposite, Bill C–62 is the regulatory efficiency act and it does two things. It allows the government to sign compliance agreements with business, waiving the terms of compliance with designated regulations. It also allows designated regulations to be administered by any government, Canadian or foreign, or by any other person.

The proposed oceans act states that existing Canadian laws will apply to the exclusive economic zone. This would include the two most important federal environmental protection laws on the books, the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act and the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. Since these laws are effected mainly through their regulations, how can Canada exercise environmental jurisdiction over its oceans if Bill C–62 effectively guts the regulations of CEAA and CEPA and gives the power of environmental regulation to private corporations or indeed foreign governments?

There are also parts of Bill C–98 that simply will not work without the regulations. I refer specifically to clause 16, which establishes the fishing zones of Canada; to clause 25, which establishes the outer limit of the exclusive economic zones and makes regulations concerning a marine structure and the application of federal and provincial laws and to clause 35, which establishes protected marine areas.

• (1105)

It is technically possible that compliance agreements under Bill C–62 would replace some of these regulations. In short, Bill C–62 allows the possibility that the federal power in Bill C–98 could be administered by other authorities including other provincial and national governments.

As my final point I would like to mention that Bill C–83, which establishes a commissioner of the environment and sustainability within the Office of the Auditor General, could also limit how effective Bill C–98 will be.

I spoke at length about this bill two weeks ago and how the environment committee recommended that the environmental auditor be given the mandate to evaluate whether government policy was leading us toward sustainability. Government members opposite did not lift a finger to defend the committee's report. You may remember that the government completely ignored the important recommendations of the committee's report; 11 out of 17 of those recommendations were completely ignored.

Now clause 30 in Bill C–98 bases the national oceans management strategy on two principles, sustainable development and the integrated management activities in Canada's sovereign waters. How are we going to know if the management strategy developed under Bill C–98 is sustainable, effective, or even desirable if the new environmental commissioner cannot look at policy established by the government?

The powers of the minister under the oceans management strategy in clauses 32, 33, and part III of this bill illustrate the clear need for an independent environmental auditor who can act as a watchdog and examine whether policies and actions are meeting environmentally sustainable goals.

In conclusion, although I welcome the intent and objectives contained in Bill C–98, its passage is not enough to protect the resources and marine environment off our coasts. If the government were really serious about protecting our natural environment, about ensuring sustainable development strategies, about preserving and enhancing environmental protection regulations, about pollution prevention and about protecting biodiversity and endangered species, it would do a number of things in addition to passing Bill C–98.

The government would amend Bill C–83 so that the environmental commissioner could evaluate policy. It would immediately withdraw Bill C–62 from the Order Paper so that environmental legislation already on the books in this country is not gutted. It would bring in real effective endangered species legislation protecting habitats and it would implement the excellent recommendation in the environment committee's latest report, a review of CEPA entitled: "It's About Our Health! Towards Pollution Prevention". May this latest report of the committee fare better in the hands of the government than the last one.

He said: Madam Speaker, for the benefit of members present who may not be entirely familiar with this bill and for the benefit of those thousands of Canadians earnestly watching this on television wondering what on earth this is all about, we are talking about the affirmative action bill of this Parliament. It is officially entitled employment equity.

What this bill purports to do is primarily to the public service, but any private companies of 100 employees or more doing business with the federal government are going to be going through substantially more hoops than they have in the past in meeting quotas for employment.

The amendments the Speaker has mentioned all have to do with three separate and distinct criteria. They are to remove the effects of this bill from application to the private sector.

• (1115)

If it is the Liberal government's intent to foist employment equity or affirmative action on the operations of the Government of Canada there is little the opposition can do because the government is going to do what it wants to do. However this should be carefully considered as it applies to the private sector. Private sector employers have enough trouble these days without adding one more hurdle for them to overcome.

I would also point out that the private sector by and large is light years ahead of the government in its relationship with minority groups. Much of what is done by the private sector is done in enlightened self–interest. There is nothing wrong with enlightened self–interest. A company will hire from those available the very best people it can get. They should not be acquired by a quota system, no matter how that quota system is comfortably or carefully disguised as employment equity. It is still affirmative action. It is still reverse discrimination. It still purports to set out that people are able to get jobs, advancement or opportunities based on human characteristics rather than merit.

The other amendments I have proposed that we will be discussing, which we would ask the government to consider carefully, are that the sole criteria for advancement or employment be merit. It should be understood that although there are items in the bill that purport to say that merit has not been taken out, we think it would be improved if we were to explicitly say that yes, the Government of Canada understands, appreciates and affirms that merit will be the sole criteria on which people will be hired, on which people will be promoted and any distinction within the employment will be based solely on merit.

The Speaker mentioned quite a number of amendments. Most of those amendments are consequential amendments that have to do with making sure that if there is an amendment, for example, to clause 3(2)(i) that those amendments follow through. Most of them really do not have any consequence. We are talking about just three major philosophical ideas in all of these amendments.

The third is that there is quite a convoluted procedure whereby people must identify themselves to the responsible officer to make sure that the employment equity or affirmative action targets or quotas are met. The person from the government comes in and says: "Hi, I am from the government. I am here to help you", snicker, snicker. The person comes in and says: "I am from the government, I am your employment equity or affirmative action officer and I am checking to see if you are in compliance".

Suppose this person goes into a room and everybody working in the room is black. There are 20 people working in the room. The person from the government looks at a piece of paper and notes that everyone has identified themselves as Canadians. They have not said that they are black; they have not said that they are yellow, white or green or whatever colour they might be. They have said: "We are Canadians". Technically they would not be in compliance.

This gives the compliance officer the chance to use some common sense and say: "Wait a minute, these people are definitely in compliance with the spirit of the law, if not with the letter of the law". It gives the compliance officer a little bit of flexibility.

These are the three major thrusts of the amendments we would ask the House to carefully consider before automatically saying: "We are not going to consider any of these amendments".

That concludes my short remarks on Bill C–64 at this time. We will have a lot more to say on this subject when it is debated at third reading.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am often shocked by the simple analysis of how our society works and sometimes does not work for the people.

• (1120)

Madam Speaker, I would like to thank you for this chance to demonstrate the merits of the Liberal approach to employment equity and to expose the destructive nature of the proposed amendment.

The effect of Motion No. 1 would be to exclude the private sector altogether from the act. This would be tantamount to repealing the existing Employment Equity Act. It is not acceptable to the government.

The motion begs a very important question because it speaks to the type of work that members of Parliament do in committees and whether they are or are not listening to what people have to say.

Did hon. members opposite hear what the business community had to say about employment equity during the hearings of the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development? Perhaps I can use this occasion to refresh their memories. The strongest proponents of the legislation were also those organizations representing some of Canada's largest employers, including the Canadian Bankers Association, the Canadian Association of Broadcasters and Canadian National.

Banks alone employ nearly one–third of all federally regulated private sector employees. W.J. Lomax of the Canadian Bankers Association, like many others who testified, stated at the hearings that employment equity "has stimulated fundamental reviews and enhancements in the bank's human resources policies and practices which have benefited everyone. It has helped us lay the foundation for managing an increasingly diverse workforce, something every employer of choice in the 1990s wants to do well".

The friends of business are speaking out against business. I have heard hon. members across the way offer their curious understanding of life in the Canadian workplace and employment equity. Here we have a party that tells the world that it is in favour of equality. It claims it is in favour of hiring on merit. It tells us to seed opportunity for all and yet attacks a piece of legislation that has helped employers clear away impediments for all Canadians.

I am going to take this opportunity to dispel some of the myths the Reform Party has been stating. The first speaker on its behalf said certain things that are not quite accurate. What does the bill not do? The bill specifically states that it does not require employers to hire unqualified people. That is what the bill says.

It also says that it does not require the federal public service to set aside merit principles. That is what this bill says. It exempts employers with less than 100 employees. The hon. member should listen to this: It does not create a rigid quota system and it makes clear this program must never cause undue hardship on an employer.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): That's Liberal arrogance.

Mr. Grubel: Very Orwellian.

Mr. Bevilacqua: Madam Speaker, I hear some heckling on the other side. Obviously the Reform Party has a great deal of difficulty dealing with the facts when they are presented as clearly and concisely as they have been this morning.

Canadians understand. The Reform Party couches its intentions in elegant language but the people of Canada, the visible minorities, the average Canadian, young people understand what the Reform Party is all about. Its members may think they are pulling the wool over people's eyes. However, the fact is that everyone is waking up to the reality and the type of meanspirited outlook the Reform Party day in and day out demonstrates in the House.

Madam Speaker, let me continue to enlighten the members opposite on the key issues of why employment equity builds a fairer and more just society for everyone. The Reform Party's position implies that people from designated groups choose greater unemployment, they choose lower wages, they look for more uncertainty as employees. They invite it. That is what visible minorities, aboriginal Canadians and women want. They want to make less than everybody else. That is what the Reform Party would like Canadians to believe.

• (1125)

Canadians are more reasonable. They understand that employment equity is not about favouring one group. It is the realization that in our society there is something called systemic discrimination, that people sometimes have to overcome insurmountable barriers to find work and move ahead.

The thoughts I have expressed today arise from rational discussion in every single part of the country. When people look at the statistics and at the fact that women make less than men in comparable positions and that aboriginals are being shut out of employment opportunities, they tell the government that employment equity makes sense.

Mr. Grubel: Indian affairs is doing it.

Mr. Bevilacqua: I am somewhat surprised that the Reform Party would stoop this low—

Mr. Grubel: Equal opportunity.

Mr. Bevilacqua: —and not allow Canadians from the designated groups their right to a job and to prosper like every other Canadian.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): I wonder why Ontario cancelled?

Mr. Grubel: It is because we do not like racism.

Mr. Bevilacqua: Madam Speaker, I am one member who is going to expose the Reform Party for exactly what it is—

Mr. Grubel: You are racist.

Mr. Bevilacqua: —a backward party.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his comments, please.

Mr. Grubel: Madam Speaker, I am sorry. I was carried away in the heat of debate. I withdraw the remark. Is the hon. member going to identify the groups on the basis of colour?

Mr. Bevilacqua: Madam Speaker, this type of behaviour in the House which has become synonymous with Reform Party members is quite shocking. In my six or seven years as a member of Parliament—

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): I guess we do not like social engineering, do we?

Mr. Bevilacqua: —nobody has ever used that term to describe me. While I accept the apology, I think Canadians will understand that the term used by the hon. member was unparliamentary and unbecoming of a parliamentarian.

Mr. Grubel: Are you going to identify the minorities on the basis of their colour?

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Madam Speaker, as this is the first time I have an opportunity to rise in this House, I wish to welcome you back. You can, of course, appreciate that we have no intention of supporting the motions and amendments put forward by the Reform Party, and certainly not those aimed at exempting the private sector from the application of the Employment Equity Act.

With your permission, I would like to say that if we find ourselves with such amendments, it is undoubtedly because the Reform Party does not understand what employment equity is. What is being proposed through this bill and through various amendments is something that has been requested by a number of Canadians, especially those who submitted briefs to the Abella Commission and asked us to ensure not only that the Employment Equity Act has a greater impact on the private sector but also that it applies to the public service in general, which is what Bill C-64 will achieve.

• (1130)

We found it difficult to understand the position put forward by the Reform Party. How can they say on the one hand that the new jobs in Canada are created by the private sector, especially by small business, and claim on the other hand that the private sector should be exempted from employment equity?

Tabling a motion like the one put forward by our friends from the Reform Party is to consciously deny that greater equality in Canada and Quebec can be achieved through the private sector.

I would be tempted to say that it takes a whole lot of nerve to rise in this place and make this kind of remark.

What is most disturbing about such a position is the line we were given—and will keep hearing throughout the debate today I guess—about white people—those the Reform calls the silent majority—being discriminated against.

It will come as no surprise to you, Madam Speaker, to learn that the committee met with officials of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, who told us that 55 per cent of available jobs were held by people with the traditional white, able–bodied and non native profile, while only 45 per cent of the workforce actually fits this description. This results in a situation where individuals who belong to what the Reform Party calls the silent majority are holding 55 per cent of the jobs, when in fact they represent 45 per cent of the workforce. And they would have us believe that there is reverse discrimination?

The truth of the matter is that, deep down, the Reform Party does not believe in employment equity. It does not believe that, on the job market as we know it today, certain people find it particularly difficult to find a place for themselves, and these are women, people with disabilities, native people and members of a visible minority. I think that the Reform Party should have the courage to say that it does not believe these people are subject to any particular form of discrimination and that it does not believe that it is our duty to ensure the four classes of persons referred to in this bill can find a place not available to them at present.

When we look at statistics, there is cause for rejoicing but also cause for concern. On the bright side—and I am sure this will please the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Health—women's labour force attachment did increase. You can see for yourself, statistics all say the same thing.

This is also true, to a lesser extent, of people with disabilities, who probably account for 7 or 8 per cent of the workforce, while making up 15 per cent of the overall population.

If you look at the situation of aboriginal peoples and members of visible minorities, you see that very little progress has been made since 1986 when the act was first implemented. There are still enormous problems which, it must be recognized, are often related to culture. However, the fact remains that there are groups which are significantly under–represented in the workforce, particularly aboriginal and disabled people, as well as members of visible minorities.

We know, of course, what the Reform Party thinks of aboriginal peoples, and we will get back to that issue later on during the debate.

The Bloc supports this bill and is particularly pleased that it also applies to the public service. Indeed, it was somewhat of a paradox to ask private sector employers to make efforts and produce annual reports, to meet objectives and related deadlines, without asking the public service to meet the same objectives and expectations. That approach was rather questionable. So, we are pleased to see that the government will impose the same employment equity objective on 300 crown corporations and on all the departments through Treasury Board.

• (1135)

We are not saying the bill cannot be improved; in fact, we will discuss that issue when we look at the motions proposed by the Bloc. We have a number of concerns, particularly as regards the establishment of employment equity review tribunals.

We were hoping the bill would include provisions providing for the establishment of an employment equity review tribunal on the basis of the actual representation of the designated groups. As regards this issue, it must be said that the government was particularly narrow-minded and stubborn in its approach, from the very beginning.

Members have an opportunity to participate in the debate today and I hope that Reform members will display the dignity and open mindedness that should guide every parliamentarian.

[English]

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I want to address Motions Nos. 8, 9 and 10.

It is interesting that in speaking for the first time on this bill at report stage I have just come from a meeting of the human rights committee. The committee is reviewing the process of the national strategy for the integration of persons with disabilities.

One of the key statistics presented at that meeting was that over 70 per cent of people with disabilities are not even in the labour force, that employment is a major factor in keeping close to 50 per cent of persons with disabilities below $10,000 in incomes in a year. These are people who happen to have a disability. It does not mean they have no ability.

Employment equity goes to the very heart of why people in our country with substantial ability have not had an equal opportunity to participate in the labour force, in the economy and to be considered full, equal citizens in the matter of employment.

One only needs to look at the recent edition of Canadian Social Trends at an article on the employment of people with disabilities. More than half of young people with disabilities were unemployed.

If we look at any of the designated groups, we know that as a society we have not been colour blind. We have not been blind to disabilities. We have not been blind to race and ethnic origins. We have not been blind to gender when it comes to employment.

Bill C–64 is about getting rid of all blinders that have somehow made us incapable of seeing the abilities of these people to contribute through employment, to earn and to be self–sufficient through employment.

Let me speak to Motions Nos. 8, 9 and 10. They go to the heart of how we as a society monitor and how employers monitor how well they are doing in taking their blinders off when it comes to employment, promotion and training opportunities and being fully equal opportunity employers.

I have great concern over these motions. I do not understand how members of the House and the public should no longer receive an annual report from the minister consolidating information that employers have already collected as required by the Employment Equity Act. It is not only the reception of that information by the minister, it is the public awareness of that information and the awareness of that information by Parliament that allows us to make good public policies.

The impact of the amendments in Motions Nos. 8, 9 and 10 would be extremely damaging to Bill C–64. If implemented they would remove the most effective tools we have to monitor employment equity performance of individual private sector employers. More to the point, they would eliminate the means for Parliament to chart progress in achieving workplace equality and to ensure accountability.

The annual reporting requirement is as much about motivation as it is monitoring. We heard from numerous witnesses before the human rights committee about their experience over the last seven years with the Employment Equity Act. They said the Employment Equity Act had led them to take a look at their hiring practices, to improve their hiring practices and to eliminate discriminatory practices of which they had not been aware. Many of them said to us it had substantially improved their human resources management and the quality of their workforce.

The reporting which the Reform Party seeks to eliminate allows employers the chance to see how they measure up against other employers. The information forms part of the criteria for targeting the advice and assistance to employers that human resources development will offer in strengthening those employers' employment equity programs. Far from being heavy handed, the reports are an invaluable instrument to help government work more co–operatively, effectively and constructively with the private sector.

Furthermore, the annual reports improve the functioning of our labour market by providing detailed information to organizations whose purpose is to place members of designated groups and other Canadians and improve their opportunity to participate in the workforce. These organizations use the information to assist their clients in targeting their job search and training programs.

Equally critical, they have been of paramount importance in enabling legislators to assess the appropriateness of provisions of the act and the practical operation of employment equity legislation in the real working world. Many of the changes the bill before us makes to the Employment Equity Act, which has been in place since 1987, are the result of the experience over those seven to eight years and of the information received not only by the minister but by Parliament and by the public as to how the previous legislation was working.

The yearly reports are our window into the workplace providing data for research and evaluation of employment equity principles and methods. The insights we gain from this annual procedure are as useful to us as they are to Canadian employers, to labour and to members of designated groups. The major change in the bill is to include the Public Service of Canada. I hesitate to say that most segments of the private sector are doing better than the Government of Canada in their employment of people who have traditionally been disadvantaged in their employment advancement and training. We as a government have a great deal to learn from the private sector and we learn it largely through reports from the private sector.

They serve another useful function. The minister's annual employment equity report is a major tool for public education on the principles and progress of employment equity in Canada, a major tool for keeping us accountable for our progress in allowing all Canadians to participate fully in all segments of society.

Annual reports on measures taken and results achieved have been crucial as monitoring and motivational, dare I say self–motivational, measures in the private sector since 1986. They have recorded the steady progress the private sector has made in achieving a more equitable and representative Canadian workforce.

They have however also focused our attention on areas of weakness, reinforcing the need for the new employment equity legislation we have before us today. Anyone who questions the need for these provisions in Bill C–64 need look no further than the latest statistics. Annual reports indicate that despite significant progress for some individuals in the designated groups much more remains to be done. I referred to some of those statistics this morning. I expect fully to refer to more for the other designated groups as this debate proceeds.

The reports show that even for those members of the designated groups that were employed, most did not see the same wage gains and promotion opportunities of other Canadians. Women, aboriginal peoples, persons with disabilities and members of visible minorities continue to find themselves on the bottom rung of the economic and social ladder.

Until we see parity in the workplace there will be an ongoing need for reporting to measure progress and to further progress. I therefore urge the House to reject the amendments put forward. Perhaps we sometimes do not like what we see when we report on ourselves but it is important that we look in the mirror and improve the situation.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure today to speak on Motions Nos. 8, 9 and 10 of Bill C–64 which deals with the employment equity issue.

I would like to say at the outset that the impassioned speech by the deputy whip illustrates many of the concerns we in this party have. We want to ensure that all people in this country have equal opportunity to become the best they can become for themselves and also their families.

We are particularly concerned in the Reform Party about those individuals who are on the lower socioeconomic strata within our society, to identify why they are there and to give those people the tools and the opportunities that will enable them to stand on their own two feet and become economically self–sustaining so that they and their families can enjoy happier, more fruitful and productive lives.

Employment equity does not do this. It is in fact highly discriminatory. It says to a group of people who are identified by the government that they cannot compete because of the colour of their skin, because of their gender, because of their religious background or wherever they came from. That is what it says. It is a government designation. It is also insulting.

As a person who is made up of many different ethnic groups, and I am speaking for other people who are also from different ethnic groups, it is insulting to be told you are going to be hired on the basis of the colour of your skin. What does it say to that person? It says you cannot compete on the basis of merit, on the basis of your skills, on the basis of your qualities; therefore we in the government are going to do it for you. That, I submit to anybody, regardless of where they come from, is an insult.

Employment equity is social engineering at its worst. It is the government meddling in areas it ought not to meddle in. As I said before, it is insulting to all minority groups.

We know that governments cannot legislate on how people think. They must legislate against the expression of people's prejudices. We cannot legislate against what people think. We cannot legislate to the prejudices they hold within their heart. However, governments must legislate against the expression of those prejudices. That is the role of government: to ensure that those prejudices are not in the realm of employment, are not in the realm of living in a peaceful society within the beautiful country we have.

The role of government, instead of employment equity which is really employment inequity, is in effect providing a level playing field for all people. The deputy whip just mentioned that the people in the lower socioeconomic groups are finding it extraordinarily difficult to get on their own two feet. That is absolutely true. So how do we address the problem? We ensure that prejudices are not being expressed in the workforce. We also ensure that those individuals have the opportunities to become the best they can become. Give them the skills training or provide them with the opportunities for skills training. Provide them with the opportunities for education. Provide them with the abilities to get a job. Provide them and everybody else with a strong economy.

We must also as a government and as a country enforce anti–discriminatory laws. Those must be enforced strongly, and where discrimination occurs it must be quashed. That is the role of government.

People do not realize that employment equity is highly destructive to the soul of a country. Nobody takes into consideration those people who are being jumped over for a promotion because of the colour of their skin. You cannot say to somebody from a minority group that they are going to get a job over somebody else who is a Caucasian, for example. Nobody takes into consideration what that does to the Caucasian person. It is discriminatory to that person or whoever might be in their seat.

The only objective measure in getting a job is merit and merit alone. Anything else is discrimination. The social engineering this government wants to do is discriminatory in the highest extent. When I spoke about what it does to Canadian society, the government may not have been aware of how divisive this policy is. I have received many letters in my riding. I do not know who they are from but many individuals have said "God bless you for saying that employment equity is divisive".

What employment equity is doing is saying to people who are being jumped over for jobs and promotions that they are not getting them because of characteristics that have absolutely nothing to do with merit. The characteristics that governments would apply to employment equity to ensure that subgroupings of people will get jobs have nothing to do with merit. Colour, gender, religious affiliation have nothing to do with merit and everything to do with discrimination. It is by its very nature discriminatory.

I hope we will not follow through with this. I hope the government supports these motions and helps to develop more sense and sensibility over an issue that is very sensitive.

I would reiterate that we in this party are very sensitive to the individuals who are the most dispossessed in our society. We want to create a stronger economy so they can fulfil their potential. We want to ensure that people will get the proper education. We want to ensure they get the skills necessary to stand on their own feet. We want to ensure they and their children are going to live in a safe environment.

I hope the government will join with us in ultimately putting aside and eliminating employment equity, which says to people and to companies that we need a certain number of quotas of these groupings of individuals because the law says it must be so, rather than advancing those people on the basis of merit. It also is highly destructive to an economy. If you advance people on the basis of characteristics other than merit, you actually weaken the economy ultimately.

Employment equity is prejudicial. It is discriminatory. I hope this government throws it away, as has been done in other parts of the world, such as in California and in Ontario.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I rise in the House today to debate Motions 15, 16 and 17 put forth by the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest with respect to Bill C–64.

When we consider the number of amendments the members of the Reform Party have presented to the House on this bill, it is clear that their attempt is to weaken the effectiveness of the Employment Equity Act.

[Translation]

Canadians often wonder whether there are differences between political ideologies. I would encourage them to listen to this debate because they will see that there are enormous differences. My colleague has just made the claim that this program is divisive. It can be divisive, yes, particularly when it is claimed that this was its intended purpose, when the reasons such a program was created are ignored.

• (1155)

[English]

It is regrettable that the employment equity legislation is not looked upon by my colleagues from the Reform Party as it is intended to be. They do not see that it will make this nation a fairer one in the way in which we treat Canadians. The unfairness and the divisiveness occurs when people suggest that is what it does. This legislation is something we should be proud of, not something we should be running away from.

With regard to Motions Nos. 15, 16 and 17, the hon. member is calling upon the government to eliminate provisions that are integral to administering the act's monetary penalty system. To do so would automatically eliminate the benefits inherent in such a system. It would be like telling the referees at a hockey game that they can call penalties but they cannot put anyone in the penalty box. Without these provisions it would be impossible to ensure that those private sector employees subject to the act fulfill their obligations with regard to reporting requirements. It should be noted that the monetary penalty system only applies in cases of non–compliance with the reporting requirements in the act.

Motion No. 15 calls for the deletion of clause 38. Clause 38 gives employers the option of either paying the assessed penalty or asking for an independent third party review, namely by an employment equity tribunal. Clause 38 provides employers with access to an open and fair appeal.

Motion No. 16 calls for the deletion of clause 39. This clause combines the appeal and review mechanisms. An employer can apply for the tribunal to review the assessed penalty or the commission can take further action if an employer has neither paid the assessment on time nor asked for a review.

Motion No. 17 calls for the deletion of clause 40. This clause is necessary to enable the commission to take a negligent employer to federal court to collect an unpaid assessment. If we remove the ability to take this action it will mean removing the possibility of applying a just penalty to employers who are in contravention.

[Translation]

I would like to stress once again that the system of monetary penalties applies only in cases of non–compliance with the reporting requirements. Only then. To date the only mechanism available to us for ensuring compliance with the reporting requirement has been recourse to criminal proceedings, an unwieldy process.

This system costs less and is less unwieldy and easier on everyone concerned. For the reporting requirement to make any sense the statute must include an enforcement mechanism. It is totally illogical to set out monetary penalties without any means of implementing those penalties.

If the government were to adopt the proposed amendments under those circumstances, the reporting requirement would be unenforceable. This is why I cannot support the hon. member's motions.

I would ask my colleagues in the Reform Party to look at the government's intentions and motivation not just with open minds but with open eyes as well. The intent is not to divide but to ensure representation for the under–represented, to ensure that they are taken into account. We are all aware that in the present system those who are not as strong as others are not always treated in a fair and equitable manner.

[English]

Mr. Rey D. Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to debate the motions before us.

• (1200)

By way of introduction I call on the attention particularly of the Reform Party, which participated in the committee on human rights and the status of disabled persons, the committee I had the privilege to chair and the committee that looked into this issue. The members of the Reform Party on that committee have to admit as a matter of truth that the vast majority of witnesses who appeared before our committee were truly in support of the Employment Equity Act.

In other words, we strengthened what exists to include a wider coverage of the public sector and we instituted an enforcement mechanism.

We have called our report "Employment Equity: A Commitment to Merit" to give a very clear message. I submit the Reform Party has to be reminded that the cross–section of witnesses regardless of their position on legislated employment equity all agreed on at least four points, all of which we agree with. The skills and abilities to perform a job are essential. Fairness in employment practices is a necessity. Elimination of employment barriers helps ensure applicants can compete on an equal footing. In principle employment equity and therefore a realization of diversity is crucial.

However we believe Canada, a country committed to social justice, must have these sentiments in policy. What better way to show that than to put these sentiments, that commitment, into a piece of law? That is the ultimate sense of a commitment to fairness and equality. We have succeeded in having a committee which included the participation of members of the Reform Party.

If I honestly believed the motions we are now debating would clearly improve and strengthen this act I would support them but I think we can see these are only attempts to emasculate this piece of legislation. I feel they are trying to mislead Canadians. No one is being discriminated against in this employment equity law. We would only ensure that discrimination does not happen. In other words, we have the force of law. If only employers would comply with the principle of equity, and the vast majority do, then there would be nothing to fear.

Here we have enshrined in our Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms equality for all. However, even the charter in a subsection of section 15 ensures we must have the ability as the Government of Canada to adopt policies and programs and to pass legislation that give teeth to the principle of equality for these disadvantaged groups: women, people with disabilities, people of First Nations and people designated as visible minorities.

I am really disheartened the members opposite could not see that we must have a centrepiece for our social equity, this piece of legislation on employment equity. This is really looked on as a hallmark by the people of the world, making Canada a unique nation where we exalt the importance of excellence in human endeavour while at the same time being committed to disallowing a retreat from that. This is not about reverse discrimination. This is not about redressing the injustices of the past. This is ensuring once and for all the injustices of the past do not recur.

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak to the motions put forward by the Reform Party on Bill C–64. This bill concerns me very much. The government certainly has Canadians' best interests at heart in this bill. It is attempting to redress problems in the workplace.

• (1205)

However, I find myself giving some qualified support to Motions Nos. 8, 9 and 10 and Motions Nos. 15 to 17. These motions would eliminate clauses 18, 19 and 20 from the bill which are basically targeted toward private sector employers.

I have great respect for colleagues on all sides of the House who have spoken on this subject because it is a subject we all feel very deeply about. I have serious reservations about implementing an employment equity program first for government employees and then extending it by whatever means to private sector employees.

The problems with clauses 18, 19 and 20 are they require very elaborate reporting from private sector employers about their equity programs and as addressed in Motions Nos. 15 to 17, provide penalties if they do not comply.

Private sector employers are required to give salary ranges of their employees who are in the designated group, the degree of representation of these designated persons, and it goes on about various subdivisions in order to give the government an opportunity to establish whether private sector employers are fulfilling the intentions of the act in their employment practices.

While the act unequivocally says decision by merit will be the underlying principle, unfortunately the way it is phrased it gives discretion to bureaucrats to determine whether an employer is fulfilling the obligations as described in clauses 18, 19 and 20. This sets us on a dangerous course for our social liberties as a country. However well intended we are, this does create the opportunity for bureaucracies to determine what private employers are doing.

I hate to use the extreme case, but we would have a situation akin to big brother. Any bureaucrat may interpret the legislation. No matter how well phrased, there is an opportunity for interpretation. Unfortunately there could be a degree of political correctness, although I hate to use that term as well. There could be a mindset in the bureaucracy of a less generous interpretation of how private sector employers are treating visible minorities, women, the disabled and other designated groups.

This becomes very crucial when penalty is added. This is covered by Motions Nos. 15 to 17. Clause 36 of the act provides for a penalty of up to $10,000 for a first violation and $50,000 for a repeated or for continued violations. These violations involve failure to report or failure to fully meet the criteria in other legislation.

I have great difficulty with that because when we apply penalties the misdemeanour should be very clear. It should never be open to interpretation. It is my fear that as the bill is written it does put an unfortunate and undue obligation on private sector employers.

I recently came from the private sector and I can assure members that while the public sector may be behind in its treatment and hiring of designated groups, most private sector employers I know hire on merit and certainly try to represent all groups that come forward, and not in a discriminatory fashion.

• (1210)

It is very dangerous to think we can legislate away discrimination.

Hon. Ethel Blondin–Andrew (Secretary of State (Training and Youth), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I find myself increasingly frustrated by the many roadblocks the Reform Party is attempting to erect to circumvent this important piece of legislation. This piece of legislation is good for Canada and for all Canadians. As parliamentarians we have an opportunity to do the right thing and this legislation will do that.

For all who believe in the principles of democracy and the noble ideals of this institution, the Employment Equity Act is a welcome reminder of the values we hold dear as a nation. It is an affirmation that Canadians are just and honourable people who passionately believe in fairness and dignity for all.

To those of us who are members of the designated groups, employment equity is about human decency and democracy. It is not about inequity. It is not about getting more than your fair share. It is about equity. It is the freedom to exercise our constitutionally guaranteed rights to participate in the political process and to make contributions to the economic and cultural fabric of Canada.

My expertise on this matter lies in my life and professional work experience and growing up in a northern aboriginal community where the chances were far greater that I would walk the halls of a penitentiary than the corridors of Parliament. That is why the Reform Party's damaging amendments disturb me so deeply. They would seriously weaken the intent and impact of the legislation.

Of all the ill conceived amendments proposed by my hon. colleague, none concerns me more than Motion No. 6. If adopted this amendment would diminish Bill C–64 by deleting the aboriginal employers exemption in clause 7. It would remove the provision that allows an employer engaged primarily in promoting and serving the interests of aboriginal peoples to give preference in employment to aboriginal peoples unless that preference constitutes a discriminatory practice under the Canadian Human Rights Act.

In practical terms this means the act would not allow municipal bands on Indian reserves to give preference to the hiring of aboriginal peoples, perhaps the most disadvantaged of the groups the legislation is attempting to assist.

It is a well known fact that many non–aboriginal peoples work in and around large populated areas of aboriginal people. That has been historically so and still is in some cases. It should be the intent of all parliamentarians to change that and make accessible employment opportunities and training in other labour market related areas available for aboriginal peoples. There is nothing wrong with that.

Indian band councils that employ more than 100 workers are subject to the Employment Equity Act. I want to be clear that this provision does not relieve aboriginal employers of the obligation to hire aboriginal women and/or persons with disabilities.

I remind the House that aboriginal peoples of Canada have a unique constitutional status affirmed in section 35. These agreements are done through the British parliamentary system as we have it here. These agreements are recognized nationally and internationally. This status demands special consideration for measures aimed at enhancing their cultural, economic and political autonomy. It rejects no one.

Historically, as I have stated, many aboriginal communities and populations have been served by non–aboriginal people, and well in many cases. There have been problems but that is not the issue. The issue is fairness.

Perhaps most important, this motion goes against the very grain of the Liberal commitment to self–government. We are determined to give greater autonomy to aboriginal communities and to put the running of aboriginal affairs in aboriginal peoples' hands. Why not? We have struggled with it as governments for 125 years. There are many problems. The aboriginal people should have the opportunity to serve themselves and to serve themselves well. They should at least have the opportunity to make their own decisions.

• (1215)

Clause 7 of Bill C–64 supports the aspirations of aboriginal communities for economic self–sufficiency and self–determination. It simply confirms that aboriginal organizations may hire only aboriginals, provided such a hiring is justified under the Canadian Human Rights Act.

I must confess that I am very surprised that the Reform Party would take the position it has on Motion No. 6. One can only assume it is based on a profound lack of awareness of the plight of aboriginal peoples in the country. It is no secret that members on the opposite side of the Chamber are not in favour of employment equity. We know that. However, from my reading of their minority report, it appears that they still believe the Canadian Human Rights Commission has an important role to play.

There is a certain irony in the Reform's proposition. First is the fact that the commission's chair, Max Yalden, expressed his support for clause 7 when he appeared before the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons. In response to a specific question about the exemption he said:

> I think that aboriginal groups are a particularly disadvantaged group, a special group. The idea that native groups would, in their very special and particular situation, have a preferential hiring policy is not unreasonable.

There is another technical reason why clause 7 cannot be removed from the act. It is to ensure consistency with the Canadian Human Rights Act. I can only conclude, as did the commissioners in the Canadian Human Rights Commission annual report last year, that occasionally the tone of the opposition to employment equity seems more than a little shrill.

Thus far I have outlined the logical and legal arguments to reject the Reform Party's proposal. Far more potent are the facts of everyday life for the aboriginal peoples of the country. Discrimination is not an abstract, philosophical concept for disadvantaged Canadians. Abuse of power by a privileged few is the daily reality for members of the designated groups, particularly if they are aboriginal.

I challenge the hon. member to test the merits of his motion on members of aboriginal communities, especially those who are unemployed. Unemployment is very high. On some reserves where there are few employment opportunities the unemployment rate can rise as high as 95 per cent.

Tragically, aboriginal peoples account for the most disturbing rate of suicide. It is five times the national average. Let us think of the communities of Pangnirtung, the Whitedog reserve and Shamattawa, some communities in which we have seen many young people commit suicide. Not only do my people have the highest rates of suicide in the country but they are the highest in the world.

At the other end of the scale aboriginal people have the lowest incomes in Canada. Almost one–half of all aboriginal adults have incomes of less than $10,000. Not coincidentally they face far more crowded housing conditions. Twenty–nine per cent of non–reserve aboriginals live in housing with more than one person per room, compared with just 2 per cent of the general population. The rate is 31 per cent for Inuit people.

There is a corresponding high welfare dependency rate as well. It is 43 per cent on reserves, or almost five times the national population, and over 50 per cent among the off reserve population.

I am sure the Reform Party knows we share its view that it is better for people to be working. It is better for aboriginal people to become independent and self–sustaining than to be on welfare. It is better that we make these opportunities available than to slam doors in their faces so that progress cannot be made where help is needed.

• (1220)

Young aboriginal people are the most likely to drop out of school, to become teenage parents and to abuse substances such as alcohol, drugs and even solvents. With only 3 per cent of aboriginal teens completing high school, they have the highest illiteracy rates and lowest incomes in the country. Not surprisingly, more graduate from juvenile courts than from colleges or universities.

I would never deny the successes. We have made some progress. I am willing to stand here and admit there has been progress. However it is not enough, not at this point.

We have many graduates coming out of universities and colleges. For those who manage to rise above the daunting disadvantages, the thousands of aboriginal men and women who acquire university degrees and professional skills each year, employment opportunities still do not match their availability. The unemployment rate of aboriginal peoples with university degrees is nearly double that of white males with university educations.

That is a fact. That is the truth. It is undeniable. Those highly skilled and highly trained individuals are desperately needed in their communities. That is why the act exempts aboriginal organizations from provisions which might prohibit them from hiring these invaluable employees.

In conclusion, it is a lamentable commentary on Canadian society that the odds are stacked against far too many aboriginal people. With Bill C–64 we can start to turn the statistics around. Centuries of inappropriate and damaging policies developed and administered predominantly by non–aboriginals have taught us that it is time to let the Indian, Inuit and Metis people take control of their own destiny.

That is why we need clause 7 in Bill C–64. The focus of federal policies is on seizing opportunities. The agents of change are individuals because we are convinced that with the right support individuals can help themselves. That philosophy is at the heart of the aboriginal employers' exemption clause. A majority of Canadians recognize—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. It is with the greatest of reluctance that I interrupt the minister, but at this stage of debate the allocation is for 10 minutes. I would seek the guidance of the House.

Mr. Keyes: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Could we have the consent of the House for the minister to wrap up her remarks on this matter in a couple of minutes?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It might be helpful if the minister could give the Chair some indication of how much longer she would need to conclude her remarks. If it is less than a minute, is there unanimous consent for the minister to conclude her remarks?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to all members of the House for allowing me to complete my remarks.

A majority of Canadians recognize the terrible plight of aboriginal peoples and realize that for constitutional, social and moral reasons special efforts are necessary to reverse their misfortune.

I am proud that I count myself among them. I urge all like minded members of the House to defeat the draconian motion to ensure that we remain the majority and do the right thing by leaving the doors of opportunity open for aboriginal peoples.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. This morning the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan proposed, in relation to Private Members' Business today, that private members' hour not be proceeded with, with the intention of having his motion that was to be debated this afternoon dropped to the bottom of the order of precedence.

I understand there is some misunderstanding concerning what he meant this morning. I think Your Honour would find that it was clear to all, except perhaps the Table and the Chair, the intention as discussed this morning was that the item would drop to the bottom of the order of precedence and we would proceed with private members' hour tomorrow in the usual way.

I simply rise to clarify that point and if consent of the House is required, to seek it.

• (1225)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I thank the hon. parliamentary secretary for his clarification. We all understood that the point raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan with regard to the Private Members' Business listed for later this day was that it be dropped to the bottom of the order of precedence. I would seek the agreement of the House. Is that correct?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): And so ordered.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of the amendment of my colleague from Edmonton Southwest to delete application of the bill in the private sector and to speak not only in favour of the amendment but against the employment equity notion and concept completely.

One of the things that frustrated me this morning in listening to the debate was that very few government members are looking at the issues and countering the points of view presented against employment equity. Rather they have chosen to be meanspirited. They have chosen to Reform bash and make this a party issue. I take exception to that. I take exception to the member for York North who rose in his place earlier today and called the Reform Party meanspirited.

I come from the private sector. I have run businesses for 25 years. I have hired and fired many people, male and female, and have had people work for me of various colours and of various ethnic backgrounds. I think I am a tough taskmaster but I am not meanspirited. I am an employer with a heart and with compassion. I believe in paying people a good day's wage for a good day's work.

I am against the government–union philosophy that once people get a job in government they cannot be let go and have a right to work. That is not correct. It is not available in the private sector. Also it is unacceptable in the private sector to have government intrude into our lives with more and more regulations.

Employment equity does that very thing. It tries to get into the lives of corporations and tries to dictate to them whom they have to hire and why they have to hire them. It is doing nothing more than social and economic engineering which this party stands against.

It is not meanspirited to be against employment equity. It is not meanspirited to point out to the member for York North that we believe the best person available for the job should be hired for the job. If those best people are 10 black people, then they should be hired. If it is 10 white people, then they should be hired. If it is 10 native Indians, then they should be hired.

If the government tells the employer that he has to hire based on a quota because the demographics of the census it has taken say that Canada is made up of certain colours and certain percentages of people that his business has to hire on that basis, then it is basically forcing corporations in a lot of cases to hire people who are not as qualified.

Mr. Keyes: Nonsense.

Mr. Silye: I hear the member opposite say: "Nonsense". My argument is that whether people are male, female, black, white, yellow, red or green as the member for Edmonton Southwest said, it does not matter. They should apply for the job. If they have the training and the qualifications they will get hired.

The employer should be free to hire. Is that not freedom? Is that not freedom of choice? Is that not in the charter of rights? What rights do employers have?

We are trying to make a better system for the country. We are trying to encourage people. It is equal opportunity that is important. It is on equal opportunity that certain members of the government are missing the point. They fail to see that we are looking for introducing and encouraging businesses to hire the best person for the job but to give the black, the white, the Indian, the yellow or whatever race, equal opportunity to be interviewed for the job. That is the kind of legislation we need to protect people. Those are the kinds of regulations that perhaps we could introduce into our system to make sure that everybody has an equal opportunity. If they do not, then they are discriminated against and then we should do something about it.

• (1230)

Employers cannot be legislated to hire certain types of people because of quotas. That is not meanspirited. That is right spirited. That is trying to put the heart and the mind in the right place to do the right thing for the right people, both employers and employees.

The government is interfering once again in corporate Canada by bringing in regulations and red tape it has no business doing. Government is better off doing other things, such as balancing the budget and getting us out of debt. That is the problem. Government wants to add to it at 3 per cent of GDP per year. The deficit is not the problem, the debt is. Legislation such as this is going to make it more difficult and more inefficient for corporations to operate and function.

In my years as an employer in the private sector, I have interviewed and hired a lot of people who are disadvantaged. I have hired people who were mentally handicapped. They did a good job in delivering internal documentation. Our encouraging them, working with them and seeing them grow in spirit, heart and mind was an encouragement and a boost for all of us. I did not need legislation to do that. Nobody ordered me to hire this gentleman.

In a company I still own, there is currently an individual who is physically handicapped. He is short and one leg is shorter than the other. He is just one heck of a good draftsman. He is a great spirit around the office and fun to have. I have hired males, females, francophones. I have hired a Czechoslovakian who can barely speak English. Nobody ordered me to do this.

I am saying this as a representative of the private sector, which I believe I am. I am about the average of the private sector. Certainly there are some people in the private sector who would take advantage of the rules but I would say the majority of people, which I represent, do not need legislation like this to tell them whom to hire and why to hire them. They are going to look for competent people, people who are going to fit into the mould of their corporations and their companies.

To have this arbitrary law that says that you must now, Mr. Silye, interview people of this nature and this type because of the census is wrong. It says this is the only classification you can look for, when perhaps the very types of people I am being ordered to hire do not have the training or the background to do that particular job.

Let us stick to the issues. Let us not bash the Liberal Party, the Reform Party. Let us talk about the merits and the demerits, the pluses and the minuses of employment equity. That is a debate. That is what the people are here to hear. That is what Canadians want to know about. Is it a good thing or is it a bad thing?

I stand today in my place to say I think it is a bad thing. If other hon. members feel it is a good thing, let them say why they think it is good. Let me say why I think it is bad. Let us not get into Reform bashing and the meanspirited kind of crap that is going on which leads to unparliamentary language. Let us just stick to the issue.

One of the biggest weaknesses of the government's argument and that of the individuals who represent employment equity is that in the name of introducing equity and equality they are, and I hope they can see this, introducing a form of inequality, a form of inequity that discriminates reversely against the very discrimination they claim they are trying to avoid.

It is the same with the Income Tax Act which is convoluted, complicated and confusing. In the name of clarification, in the name of fairness, in the name of equity the government has introduced 1,000 plus pages of rulings and amendments to clarify the Income Tax Act. By adding another 1,000 pages is that clarifying it or is that confusing it even more? It is making it worse and worse and worse. It is the same kind of thing that is going on with this bill. By preaching and supporting employment equity the Liberals are introducing more legislation, more rules that make it more confusing, more convoluted, more complicated. It is a detriment to business. It is a detriment to the hard working citizens of the country who want to move forward and get on with the job of stimulating the economy. At every turn another government law comes in with more red tape, more regulations, more rules to follow, more auditors. Now we are going to have people auditors.

• (1235)

It is bad enough that Revenue Canada is checking our books every frigging month. It is bad enough that Revenue Canada is interpreting the rules for the government because we need money.

Let me remind all those people at Revenue Canada it is not the deficit that is the problem. Let me remind the Government of Canada it is not the deficit that is the problem. The debt is the problem and the government is adding to it. High taxes are the problem and the government is adding to that. It is bad regulations, lousy rules like this, terrible laws like this which are the problem. The government is not listening. It is continually adding to the problem.

I understand it is in the hearts of Liberals. I know they believe what they are saying comes from the heart and they feel it is helping Canadians. I believe when they say they are trying to eliminate discrimination that they are honest and sincere about it. But I am saying that in so doing they are not really eliminating discrimination, they are introducing a new form of discrimination. That is what is wrong. That is what I ask the government to reconsider.

This amendment deals with the private sector. I hope members opposite will agree it has been a good employer, has promoted the economy. Eighty–five per cent of revenue generated in tax dollars comes from the private sector. At least leave it alone.

If the government really believes in the legislation, then just apply it to the government sector. It can do what it wants with the bureaucracy. That is their baby. Do it, try it and see the inequities that will be introduced. But please support the amendment because it leaves one sector of the economy that can function viably well and will not in any way deter or detract from the intent of the bill. I know how the private sector thinks, acts and deals. It usually hires the best person regardless of race, colour, creed or whatever.

If the government is intent on introducing employment equity, go ahead and do it in the public sector. Go ahead and do it with the bureaucrats and watch the uprising that will occur. I know a lot of people in the bureaucracy are not happy with the form of affirmative action that is taking place right now.

I am asking the government to reconsider its opposition to the amendment and do something constructive. It can have it both ways. By accepting this amendment it can go ahead with the bill, if it is just applied to the public sector and leave the private sector alone. Then we will see which will end up being right.

I believe the bill is an intrusion into our lives. It is an intrusion which the government does not need to make. It is an intrusion it would be better off to avoid and leave alone. I believe that employers can be trusted. I know that for the most part private sector employers, the vast majority, can be trusted.

Mr. Speaker, I know you have a great interest in hockey. Does it discriminate against players from all over the world? No. It sought to change the rules, to bring in the best hockey players in the world. We have a National Hockey League that has every nationality playing on it. Was there employment equity introduced in that profession? No. We do not need employment equity. I stand against employment equity. I stand for this amendment and for equal opportunity for all.

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, over the summer I spent my time in my riding of Windsor—St. Clair which is the centre of my universe.

I returned to this session of Parliament with a renewed commitment to employment equity. I am convinced more than ever that Bill C–64 is the right thing for Canada right now. I am concerned though, after meeting with my constituents over the summer recess, that there is a great deal of misunderstanding about both the intent and the implications of our improved employment equity legislation.

Distortions have resulted from a misinterpretation and frankly, a misrepresentation of the facts by a few. I have discovered that once these misconceptions are straightened out and the legislation fully understood, it gains widespread support. It seems to be essential that these misconceptions be corrected on the floor of the House.

I specifically want to address several of the arguments raised in the Reform Party's minority report. I am particularly concerned about the attitude that report reflects, the "I'm all right, I have got mine, Jack" attitude. I have mine so everyone else can go to hell. That is the tone of the Reform Party's minority report. The idea in it is that I got ahead and so everyone else should just try to get there on their own. I do not owe it to anybody to help them or to assist them or to do anything.

It is disingenuous for a woman to suggest that because she is successful, got there on her own, she owes nothing to her sisters who came before her. It is disingenuous for any of us to suggest that anyone can get to this job, can become an accountant, can become a banker or can become a painter. It is disingenuous, false and deludes the Canadian public.

The idea that as Canadians we should not acknowledge and address systemic inequities and that in promoting that view it is okay to promulgate misinformation and to promote misconceptions is anathema to the government.

The first assumption I would like to address is the assumption that women, persons with disabilities, members of visible minorities and aboriginal people are somehow enjoying special privileges that compensate for their disadvantage and that are way ahead of the general population. Informed individuals know that nothing could be further from the truth.

The 1995 United Nations human development report concluded that it is still an unequal world. Canada in practice is still in many respects an unequal country. Canadian employers agree with this.

A witness representing the Manitoba telephone system told members of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons the following:

> There is very little evidence in the workforce to suggest that in the absence of affirmative measures or some intervention equality will indeed occur. We live in a society that prefers some values, some characteristics over others. The kind of legislation that employment equity represents is an appropriate intervention in the flow of business decision making.

That was stated by the private sector.

There was also the suggestion that the current Employment Equity Act has been so effective that it has eliminated employment problems for members of the designated groups. The facts speak for themselves.

The 1984 annual report on the Employment Equity Act, a copy of which all members of Parliament received, concluded that a number of Canadian companies covered by the legislation have yet to completely satisfy its intent. Of the 343 employers in the report, four employers had no female employees; 74 did not employ a single aboriginal person; 65 did not have persons with disabilities on staff; 28 employed no members of visible minority groups. This was the situation nearly eight years after the current act was proclaimed into force in August 1986.

Like other government members here today, I certainly applaud the progress that has been made over the years but I think all members will agree that we have some distance to go.

Let us look at the suggestion that the market automatically solves inequities without government intervention, a suggestion that was heard from the last speaker. That theory was clearly addressed in the recently released United Nations report, the most exhaustive examination of the issue of inequality for women in our time. It was prepared by an international team of eminent consultants and stated:

> The free workings of economic and political processes are unlikely to deliver equality of opportunity because of the prevailing inequities in power structures. When such structural barriers exist, government intervention is necessary, both through comprehensive policy reforms and through a series of affirmative actions.

I remind the House that Canada is the number one nation in the world in its human development index ranking according to the UN. However, when we look at it closer and consider women's economic positions in our society, our country drops from number one to number nine.

To add insult to injury, there are some who use women, members of visible minority groups, aboriginals and persons with disabilities as scapegoats as if we were somehow to blame for the stresses resulting from our rapidly changing economy.

We are in the midst of one of the most momentous transitions in human history. In the span of this century we have shifted through the agricultural and industrial eras and are hurtling fast forward to the information age and the knowledge economy. If the general population finds itself a victim in this vortex, imagine how much greater the impact is on Canadians who are members of minority groups, on women, on persons with disabilities.

• (1245)

It is not fair to suggest, as the Reform minority report does, that statistical data are skewed to make the case for employment equity. Canada's statistics and its statistical analyses are the best in world, so much so that our data is sought after by governments and by academics everywhere. It is true that no statistics are perfect, including those for gross domestic product, unemployment, or demographics. But does the Reform Party seriously suggest that we should abandon the pursuit of social justice and abandon the pursuit of economic growth just because there are numerous ways to read the numbers?

Incredibly, the Reform Party report also asserts that employment equity somehow hurts designated groups. It suggests that designation "carries with it a presumption of racial and gender inferiority". I would like to hear the Reform Party stand before Women in Trades and Technology, who organized a letter writing campaign in support of Bill C–64, and say that. Letters to the human resources minister urged the government to go further. Many letters stated that much work needs to be done to urge, coerce, educate, and assist employers and unions to increase and enhance women's opportunities to train and work in their industries.

These women are asking the government to modify policy and program interventions to support and encourage true equality in the workplace. They are not alone. In case somebody thinks they are alone, let me remind the Reform Party and this House that women are 52 per cent of the population.

The vast majority of witnesses before the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons fully endorsed the direction of our new legislation. They recognize that treating people differently in order to achieve equality has nothing to do with inferiority. It has everything to do with ensuring each and every job applicant has an equal chance to prove his or her abilities.

Recently I saw a cartoon that showed a monkey, a seal, an elephant and a dog being told by a circus job interviewer: "For a just selection, everyone has to take the same examination. Now please, I would like each of you to climb that tree". The idea that there is some ideal to which we all must conform is ridiculous. It is also discriminatory, and Canadians will not put up with it. If this legislation does nothing else, it will finally put some of these outdated and damaging beliefs to rest. It will ensure that yet another generation does not adopt the hardened attitudes held by their elders and perpetuate systemic and overt discrimination.

Employment equity is a guarantee that every little girl and every little boy will grow up in this country secure in the knowledge that each can pursue his or her dreams, that they will some day work in a world that is fair, that is equal, that is free of racial slurs and unwanted pats on the backside, where doors are always open instead of being inaccessible. They will be assured of being citizens of a Canada where they can have a fighting chance of achieving their personal career goals.

Is that intrusive? Is it really so much to ask? Today's working Canadians and tomorrow's future parents, taxpayers, and employees expect no less. The hon. members of this House must not let them down.

I am convinced that Bill C–64 is the next logical step in our nation's progress. I am anxious to get on with the job.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House to speak to report stage of Bill C–64, in particular the motions being given today by the third party, the Reform Party.

Some of what I have heard here in the House troubles me a great deal, which is why I thought it only appropriate that I rise and try to put down some of the myths that are being put forward by the third party through these motions. I was likewise distressed with a colleague of mine, the member for Hamilton—Wentworth.

• (1250)

We heard, and I will quote as closely as I can, the member for Hamilton—Wentworth say that the bureaucracy should not be intervening in the matters of private enterprise. We heard that the government is being intrusive, according to the member for Calgary Centre, and I will try to quote him as closely as I can: "I have chosen as a member myself to be meanspirited, but the government is trying to get into the face and get into the lives of private enterprise". Those are pretty meanspirited remarks coming from the member for Calgary Centre.

It is the job of government to ensure that things are done as properly as they can be, as we work as a team for Canada and what is in the best interests of the people of this great land. For example, when we talk about getting in the face of private enterprise, as the member for Calgary Centre has mentioned, yes, the government in matters of transportation got into the face of the transportation sector when it came to the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence Seaway system.

Would we have a national airline if the government did not intervene? Would we have a national system of airports if the government did not intervene? Would we have a Trans–Canada Highway if the government did not intervene? Would there be a stretch of road of Trans–Canada Highway between Sault Ste. Marie and Winnipeg? Of course not. Why would we build that chunk of road? Who would use that chunk of road? Very few people would use that chunk of road. Naturally private enterprises would say they are not going to build that chunk of road, it does not make any sense.

The government is here to provide the vision in order to make things happen that we know are going to be in the best interests of Canadians, not tomorrow, maybe not next week, but in the long term in the best interests of Canadians.

I will try to explain why I believe the third party amendments, the motions, and the remarks of my colleague from Hamilton—Wentworth are quite frankly outrageous and misdirected and are totally lacking in fact.

The first myth I want to touch on is that employment equity is about hiring the unqualified. We heard the hon. member for Calgary Centre take us down that road. The simple fact is that Bill C–64 does not oblige an employer to hire an unqualified person. It does not do that. Why carry the myth? It is quite explicit in fact on that point.

Let me quote Mona Katawne of the Manitoba Telephone System who testified before the standing committee on the issue. She stated: "There is no evidence that hiring from among the designated group members is a lowering of qualifications. In fact the evidence is to the contrary. There are people from the designated groups who are both available to work and qualified to work."

The fact is that our economy has surpluses of qualified people from all designated groups for many of the jobs that are out there. However, this myth persists because of misinformation, because there is a lack of looking at the facts.

A perfect example is the Gallup poll which appeared in the December 23, 1993, Toronto Star, just after we were elected to this place. The headline blared that 74 per cent opposed job equity programs. Let us take a look at the actual question that was asked: Do you believe government should actively attempt to hire more women and minority group members for management positions, or should government take no action whatsoever and hire new employees based solely on their qualifications? The question unfairly focused on people to choose between actively attempting to hire more women and minority group members and hiring based on qualifications. It is amazing, quite frankly, that only 74 per cent chose qualifications.

Employment equity means broadening access to all qualified people. It means giving people the chance to become better qualified.

The second myth I want to touch on is that employment equity is about redressing the wrongs of the past. When this issue has come up with constituents, I have heard people ask why today's young white males have to pay for the sins of their fathers and grandfathers. I trust that I am not the only member of Parliament who has heard that remark. The short answer is they should not. Employment equity is about today's reality, today's problems, not yesterday's.

• (1255)

The simple fact is that in 1993 white men without disabilities made up nearly 55 per cent of all workers newly hired, even though they only made up 45 per cent of the labour market. On virtually any scale people in the designated groups fare poorly in today's labour market. The issue is not what happened in 1955 or in 1925 but what is happening in 1995. There are still barriers to full participation by members of the designated groups. The goal is to end those barriers, not to create a new discrimination against someone else.

Let us look at one specific group that fares especially poorly in our labour market: people with disabilities. Only about 60 per cent of adults with disabilities are in the labour market at all. They have unemployment rates that are almost double the national average. That costs us all.

The Canadian Association for Community Living did a study that looked at people with mental handicaps. They calculated the loss to our economy from the large scale segregation of these people from our economy in terms of lost tax revenue due to unemployment, social assistance costs and lost consumption. They found that the cost to Canada's employment of keeping these people out of society is $4.6 billion a year. That is today's problem, not yesterday's problem.

The final myth I want to touch on is the issue of goals and quotas. We have said it before and I will say it again: the bill expressly prohibits the imposition of quotas. The goal setting that Bill C–64 calls for is driven by flexible targets based on real business assessments of what is doable. Those goals are tools that measure success in breaking down the barriers. In fact, business witnesses who appeared before the standing committee agreed. They have no problem with this approach.

If the hon. member for Calgary Centre had heard what went on at the standing committee he too would realize that. Do not get me wrong. The hon. member for Calgary Centre may be the jewel in the crown when it comes to employing people. He may have it right. But there are a lot of employers out there who have it wrong and the hon. member has to come to terms with that.

Bill C–64 is not designated to create a numbers mentality. Employers who adopt that mentality and attempt to short circuit the process do no one any benefit. The intent is to create a climate that encourages employers to build a better, fairer workplace through rethinking how their current processes work in practice and developing better ones.

It would be easy for the government to do as the Reform Party suggests: to step back and do nothing to address the very real barriers in our labour market today. But it will not. The costs to our economy and our society are simply too high. Millions of Canadians are not prepared to accept a system that says do not do anything and let private enterprise take care of itself. They are not prepared to accept the notion that the response to the very real economic uncertainty faced by many workers is to set group against group.

Canadians are not asking for special privileges here. Most witnesses representing designated groups made that very clear. They are asking for strong efforts to push companies to end barriers to full participation. In doing so it does not help to have the ill–informed comments made by members of the third party on this issue. They have chosen to see the world as a zero sum game where any gain by a person who is in a designated group must be at the expense of someone else. They have chosen to fan the flames of intolerance rather than trying to find the solutions that address the very real needs of more than half of Canada's workforce. It means we define merit in terms that are clear, relevant and legitimate, in terms that demonstrate we recognize diversity and the different conditions under which people live and work.

Bill C–64 is about creating that kind of plan in workplaces right across the federally regulated sector based on overcoming myths through action. Who said there are none so blind as those who will not see?

I appeal to the third party to overcome these myths I have addressed. I appeal to the Reform Party to withdraw its motions. It would be the right thing to do.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I just found out there is a positive aspect of being moved one more seat to the left. I am a little closer to the Speaker's plane of view. I appreciate being recognized in this very important debate.

This is one of the issues that really galvanizes what our party stands for. It also makes strikingly clear what lies at the heart of the Reform Party. I have very strong views when it comes to employment equity, affirmative action and government striking the fundamental policy framework that we expect our bureaucrats, our departments, our crown agencies and those businesses within the federal realm of regulation in setting the parameters of the type of behaviour we expect them to follow.

This is not the first time employment equity has been debated in the House. In the last Parliament on a number of occasions, be they private members' bills or motions put forward on days to eliminate racial discrimination, members put on record what they believed about employment equity.

In the last Parliament we may have differed substantially on our economic approaches and policies and on our social policies but there was almost a unanimity of agreement with the New Democratic Party and with the Conservative Party when it was in government about a couple of fundamental facts about Canadian society.

One was that systemic discrimination unfortunately does exist. It exists in the federal workplace. It exists in the provincial workplace and it exists in the private sector. Anybody who would get up in the Chamber and indicate they believe there is no such thing as systemic discrimination clearly is from another planet or has been living with their head in the sand for longer than I have been on this earth.

Systemic discrimination is as real as the air we breathe and is as alive today as the people who sit in these chairs. More than once I have talked from the perspective of an MP who represents the largest indigenous black community in Canada, in Preston, North Preston, East Preston, Cherry Brook, Lake Loon. Those communities have been established in Nova Scotia a lot longer than the community I was born in, New Waterford. Most people in Nova Scotia see New Waterford as more of a Nova Scotian community than the Prestons which were founded by blacks from other parts of the globe over hundreds of years.

Preston community is six kilometres outside the boundaries of my city. My city has an unemployment rate of anywhere from 7.5 to 8.5 per cent. In the almost entirely black community, a ghettoized situation from 250 years ago, there are unemployment rates upward of 80 per cent in the winter.

One of the first things I did in 1988 after I was elected to represent the good people of the riding of Dartmouth was go to the Speaker of the day. I asked the Speaker, Mr. Fraser, whether it was possible to use some of my budget to get a survey done. Our budgets were more restrictive.

• (1305)

I explained what I wanted to do. I had gone to the bureaucrats. They are good people, not racists, not bigots. I asked them what information they had with respect to unemployment levels in the black community. They said they did not have any. Why not? How can there be federal programs such as skills training, job development and re–entry programs that are supposed to help those groups most dislocated from labour if there are no statistics about the degree of the problem in a particular community?

Bureaucracies knew there were problems but did not want to quantify them. We spent $15,000 out of my budget and we quantified. There were no startling revelations except that finally somebody white in a position of authority said that the facts are the facts and they are indisputable. It was only then that bureaucracies felt comfortable trying to address the problems of barriers to entry and participation by visible minorities in my area.

I am saddened to say that seven years later I am worn down from my efforts of trying to battle systemic discrimination. Daily it becomes more systemic and rooted in the way bureaucracies operate.

The bill does not seek to tell employers they have to hire a black person or a native Canadian or a Cape Bretoner, which I am, if they are not qualified. It sets down a framework and sets out a policy objective that says: "If everybody in your organization looks like me, speaks like me and acts like me, they are more likely to hire somebody who looks like me, acts like me and speaks like me". That is not individual racism; it is the way life is in most organizations.

The bill seeks to build on the previous employment equity legislation passed in 1986 and say we have come a long way but we have a mighty long way to go yet. We cannot succumb to the insane attitudes of some on the loony right of the political spectrum and say, as the member from Windsor said: "I am all right Jack. What is your problem?"

I will tell the House what some of the problems are. A good businessman came to my office a week and a half ago. He operates without a line of credit at the bank and employs 17 to 20 people in the winter. He finances his operation through a finance company at 28.8 per cent interest. He cannot access capital through the regular sources. He has been shying away from the sheriff for 20 years. He is a black businessman. There are barriers to his access to capital from banks.

Seven years ago when we did the study the banks were angry because I fingered the banks and said there was systemic discrimination in their lending practices. They wailed. The facts coming to my office told me it was that way. How could an individual that resilient, who could operate from a line of credit from a finance company and who had no cash flow to work with stay in business? That was the best entrepreneur I ever saw.

Just think what would have happened if he was a white entrepreneur who had access to capital from the banks. Banks such as the Royal Bank have recognized that when we talk about systemic discrimination we are not pointing a finger at individuals; we are stating facts based on statistics and we must work aggressively within a policy framework to deal with it.

This bill simply sets out the framework. It says the government is still very much concerned that its crown agencies and corporations may not be working as hard as they should to ensure there are no barriers to participation in the federal public service, crown corporations and the private sector which is federally regulated, to ensure the people who do the hiring, the people in power, recognize they may have to work a little harder. If we deal on the other side of it with the people in the labour market, maybe the young black who wants to be an entrepreneur does not understand he could be welcomed as a client of the bank. He also has his own barriers to participation in the equity market or the labour market.

Sometimes that extra effort is made to say: "We will hire 12 people and we have to make sure we do not send it just to the community college". The community college in my area does not have the proper participation of minority groups. It is not proportional. If employers say they have made a commitment to hire qualified individuals, and it is all about the merit principle, they must recognize that by past practices there may be some groups in society that do not feel they are wanted at the door and do not make the application.

Employers, because they have set it out as their policy to encourage qualified members of minority groups to participate, must make sure that instead of going just to the community college they also go to the Dartmouth East Black Learners Centre and say: "We need people with these skills. Are there some people you can send for us to look at?"

That is what this bill is about. It is about setting a direction. It is about setting a goal. It is about a process whereby we remind ourselves that systemic discrimination does exist and that we can do something about it to ensure individuals are not discriminated against based on colour, language, gender, sexual orientation or any of those other things that really should not make a difference.

I hope some of the misinformation from the Reform Party's minority report is put to the test. This is not about special treatment. This is about equal treatment and equal access. The bill does not solve the problem but it is another small step in the right direction toward allowing everyone regardless of colour, race or language to develop to the fullness of their potential. Governments are setting the tone and the direction to remove the obstacles to that full participation.

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the fourth United Nations world conference on women concluded recently. I was there as a delegate. I learned that many developed and developing countries look to Canada for leadership in issues of justice, equality and human rights.

I want to place Bill C–64 in that same international context. I want to look at our international obligations and how Bill C–64 will help us meet them. I want to consider some relevant international experiences with employment equity. I want to show the bill puts teeth in our commitment to equality and shows a leadership badly needed around the world.

First I will discuss recent landmarks in understanding this issue. On August 17 the United Nations development program released its sixth human development report. Apart from the overall assessment, the report focuses on the situation facing women around the world.

I am certain every member of the House took pride when once again Canada earned the highest ranking on the human development index. It is the third year running. It told the world what Canadians already know, that this country offers a quality of life that is second to none.

I know each one of us also saw that we placed ninth on the gender related development index. Our track record on the place of women in society is not so good. Why that low? One of the factors is the economic gap between men and women. Money talks, and in Canada right now that means men shout while women whisper. Some in the House say there are very good reasons for this gap. They say we should just stand aside while the market works its mysterious forces. This is not what the authors of the United Nations human development report say. They point out that trickle down theories and laissez–faire approaches do not work particularly well to raise the economic status of women:

> The free workings of economic and political processes are unlikely to deliver equality of opportunity because of prevailing inequities in power structures. When such structural barriers exist, government intervention is necessary both through comprehensive policy reforms and through a series of affirmative actions.

The government understands the need for real action. This bill addresses that need by making markets work better. It will help women enter occupations that traditionally have excluded them. It will help women make their way from lower wage occupational ghettos.

• (1315)

In 1993 in British Columbia women in full time occupations earned 67 per cent less than men. In 1993 in British Columbia women who had post–secondary education earned less than men with a grade 10 education. In 1993 in British Columbia, 99 per cent of secretaries and stenographers were women, but they still earned 79 per cent less than male stenographers and secretaries.

We need this bill to remove the glass ceiling that still restricts women in many workplaces. It will do the same for aboriginal people, persons with disabilities and members of visible minorities.

Bill C–64 is consistent with our international obligations. For many years Canada has been a signatory to international agreements on discrimination, human rights, women's rights and labour force issues. Let me touch on a few of these.

The United Nations has a number of conventions that cover equality issues. The convention on the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women commits us to pursue the equality of the sexes. Article 24 reads:

> States Parties undertake to adopt all necessary measures at the national level aimed at achieving the full realization of the rights recognized in the present Convention.

This includes modifying, and I quote again from the United Nations:

> —the social and cultural patterns of conduct of men and women, with a view to achieving the elimination of prejudices and customary and all other practices which are based on the idea of the inferiority or the superiority of either of the sexes or on stereotyped roles for men and women.

Bill C–64 begins to take those steps.

A similar commitment exists as a result of the United Nations International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. Article 7 touches on that. It says that states parties to the covenant recognize the right to "equal opportunity for everyone to be promoted in his employment to an appropriate higher level, subject to no consideration other than those of seniority and competence".

Thirty–eight per cent of Canadian persons with disabilities find it difficult to achieve promotion in the workplace.

This bill is about finding and removing the barriers that prevent designated members from realizing their legitimate aspirations in the workplace of this country. Equal opportunity means removing barriers so people can get to the starting gate equally.

There are many conventions I can talk about: the international covenant on civil and political rights; the international covenant on the elimination of all forms of racial discrimination; and a number of international labour organization conventions.

Article 2 of the international labour convention says:

> Members must undertake to declare and pursue a national policy designed to promote equality of opportunity in respect of employment and occupation.

It says that each member must undertake to enact such legislation as may be calculated to secure acceptance and observance of the policy. This is what we are doing here with this bill.

Canada must take its international commitments seriously. We negotiate, we sign, we lead, we ratify these agreements with the intention of living up to them, or else why do we do it? It is certainly true with conventions on human rights and workplace issues.

We can and we do point with pride to Bill C–64 and the existing Employment Equity Act, because as a predecessor it is an example of how this government wants to work to make equality of opportunity a real goal, not just something airy–fairy that we just talk about.

Canada is not alone in this process. Other countries have signed these conventions and many are dealing with the same issues we are dealing with here today.

For example, Australia is a country with which we have much in common. We are both senior members of the Commonwealth. We share similar constitutional and legal traditions. We both have significant aboriginal and visible minority populations. Persons with disabilities have become prominent advocates for their own cause. Women are taking a lead in society. Like Canada, Australia has an employment equity act too. Like us, they recognize an obligation to break down barriers and they are doing so.

Let us look at The Netherlands. The celebration of the 50th anniversary of its liberation by Canadian soldiers has reminded us of our close ties with The Netherlands. When the Dutch government looked for a legislated approach to promote the full integration of their immigrants into the labour force, where do you think they turned? Which country do you think provided a model of effective and appropriate legislation? Canada.

Examples such as that show why Canada can attend international conferences with real pride. Regardless of the issue we can point to initiatives we have taken at home, co–operation with other countries and a commitment to results. This is true on workplace issues as well as human rights issues. We have much to do in Canada, however. This country has consistently tried to do more than meet a minimum standard. We have been motivated by the caring and tolerance of our society to do better.

• (1320)

We realize that equality of opportunity means much more than the absence of formal discrimination. It means building a climate that encourages everyone to participate in our society and our economy. That is becoming a lesson to the world. Many countries are coming to grips with equality issues. We are leaders. They look to us for leadership.

Canada has a distinguished history in human rights in the rest of the world. Countries that are looking for effective ways to improve human rights within their own borders are also looking to Canada. Countries that want to recognize their growing multicultural nature are looking to Canada. I saw over and over in Beijing how everyone turned to Canada for leadership. Everyone felt that Canada is the country in the world they all want to aspire to become.

The Canadian approach to employment equity is a real contribution to the international community. It starts with the idea that all Canadians share a commitment to opportunity and a willingness to find solutions. It speaks to the finest qualities in our national spirit. Passing this bill will send an important message to a world that needs more of this spirit and looks to Canada to lead the way.

Mrs. Karen Kraft Sloan (York—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in the 1980s Judge Abella coined the phrase employment equity because she rejected the term affirmative action. Employment equity is a Canadian concept.

There are a lot of myths surrounding the issue of employment equity, as some of my colleagues have already pointed out. The recent publicity surrounding the affirmative action policies in the United States and employment equity in the recent election has led some people to some inaccurate conclusions. They get the impression from the media that suddenly Americans, including the U.S. Supreme Court, are turning against affirmative action en masse. A vocal few seem ready to jump on the bandwagon, asking: "If the Americans are not going to keep it, why should we?"

Before everyone falls for the myth that fairness in the workplace has fallen into disfavour all across North America, let me quickly review the facts. The real story is that programs that affirm employment equity are alive and well on both sides of the border. The most compelling argument for employment equity is that people actually want it.

Let us look at the situation in Ontario, where roughly two-thirds of businesses responding to a poll just after the recent election reported they are in favour of reforming or keeping that province's employment equity law as it is. Only 8 per cent said they would cease implementing employment equity initiatives if the law is repealed, with 69 per cent saying that it would not have any impact on their company's equity plans. That sentiment is reflected in comments by the director of human resources policy for the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. Ian Howcroft was reported as saying that many of their members have already started employment equity initiatives and that he believes most of them will continue.

Many members of the private sector are strong proponents of employment equity. They recognize the benefits to their corporation, benefits in terms of improving quality of working life in their organization and in real financial benefits. Unlike the members of the Reform Party, these corporations are moving their companies into the 21st century. The Reform Party members think we should still live in the 1950s world of Ozzie and Harriet.

Mr. Milliken: 1850s.

Mrs. Kraft Sloan: Part of the misunderstanding of the bill arises from the myths created in the recent Ontario election. Employment equity is not about quotas. Moreover, this bill specifically states that employers are not required to hire unqualified members or create new positions to satisfy the legislation's requirements.

The federal legislation takes a human resource planning approach to employment equity, relying on consultation and negotiation to achieve workplace goals. I know about this approach firsthand, as I worked as a consultant to the Ontario universities in developing training materials for employment equity.

Another prevalent and incorrect assumption is that the federal employment equity is a carbon copy of American affirmative action policy and furthermore that Americans are now rejecting it out of hand. Neither belief is true. Let us start with the most controversial features of the U.S. affirmative action program, set asides. Set asides require that a specific percentage of government contract funds go to minority contractors. These are mandatory preferences dictated by law. Polls show that although most Americans favour affirmative action, they are opposed to this kind of preferential treatment. I want to set the record straight on this point. There is absolutely no equivalent to set asides in the Canadian approach to employment equity. They simply do not exist and have never existed.

• (1325)

Let us look at the recent U.S. Supreme Court decision on affirmative action. Some people have a vague notion that this decision somehow struck down federal affirmative action programs, but let us look again. First, this decision was about set asides, which do not exist in Canada. Moreover, the Supreme Court decision did not strike down any federal laws or dismantle contracting policies, nor did it decide they were unconstitutional. The court simply requires federal affirmative action programs to meet the same standards of review already in place for state and municipal affirmative action programs, namely that the program serve a compelling interest and that it be narrowly tailored to achieve that purpose.

The bottom line is that no program was struck down by this decision. On the contrary, seven out of the nine justices confirmed that sometimes affirmative action is indeed required to counter the effects of systemic discrimination.

President Clinton pointed out that leading economists and distinguished American business leaders report their companies are stronger and their profits larger because of the advantages of workforce diversity. They insist that regardless of legislation they will pursue affirmative action because it is the key to future economic success in the global marketplace. Indeed, as I stated earlier, it is the Canadian corporations and the private sector that are very strong proponents of employment equity. The Reform Party purports to be a party for business special interest groups, so why can it not listen to the leaders in the private sector?

Seeking solutions to employment inequality is precisely what Bill C–64 is about. The objective of our legislation is to ensure equality and justice for all. Canadians have an unwavering faith in values of fairness and equity. We believe heart and soul that there should be no discrepancy between our words and our deeds. We are determined that our constitutionally guaranteed rights should be a daily fact of life for every child, woman and man in this country. Equality and equity is the very foundation of our nation.

It is in fact because of our employment equity legislation that we are on the leading edge in preparing this country for the unparalleled demands of the 21st century global economy. While we still have more to do in ensuring that all Canadians achieve their potential, our experience with employment equity has made us a world leader in the field, acting as a role model for other nations designing equity legislation. That is not rhetoric, but a reality of which every Canadian can be proud.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was not really going to participate in this debate today in light of the excellent interventions by a number of my colleagues. Then the hon. member for Calgary Centre got into the act and started spouting the most unbelievable nonsense, so I felt it was necessary to correct some of the statements he made. Really, I was shocked. He worked himself into a real lather in the course of his speech about the evils of employment equity, which I thought most Canadians accepted.

I have some quotes which I think are going to leave him speechless. He will wish he had not spoken. He pretended he was speaking on behalf of the entire private sector in Canada in speaking to this set of amendments moved by his colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest.

I am surprised that a relatively enlightened member of the Reform Party would propose the amendments the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest has proposed. One suspects that his leader told him this was caucus policy and since he is the critic he had better propose the amendments, so he did. I am sure in his heart of hearts he wishes he did not have to put forward such ridiculous amendments. What he is really doing is gutting this bill. He is taking out all references in the bill to the private sector.

The private sector has lived with this legislation now for many years and has functioned with it. I have spoken with constituents of mine who are bound by this legislation, not because it is binding on them specifically but because if they wish to contract with the federal government they are required to comply with it. They have been in compliance for some years, with some initial discomfort but not significant. They have found that their workplace has improved as a result of their compliance with this legislation. That has been the experience of most of the private sector employers affected by this legislation who have found that compliance is not all that difficult. Not only is it not difficult, it results in a better working environment in the places where it has been applied.

• (1330)

The hon. member for Edmonton Southwest must know this experience. He is a man of affairs; he has travelled around and has some businesses in the country. He must know the hon. member for Calgary Centre was talking through his hat this morning when he spouted the nonsense about the act being a bad thing for the private sector in Canada and one that stops job creation in the country. Quite frankly that is absolute rubbish.

Mr. McClelland: He said that it was not necessary.

Mr. Milliken: I hear the hon. member. That may be so because so many have complied with the rules already. Why not leave the rules in place? If everyone is complying and the rules are in place, fine, it does not do any harm to have them there. Yet the hon. member for Calgary Centre spouted absolute rubbish. He suggested that we did not need the bill at all and that we should scrap it. That is what these amendments do and I am not in favour of the amendments.

City police forces, national chartered banks, multinational computer companies and more and more Canadian employers are enjoying the benefits of workplace inclusiveness and fairness, with good reason. Margaret Wente wrote in the Globe and Mail that employment equity programs were "spreading, not shrinking. Their biggest boosters are powerful, middle aged white men—.They need diversity in their work forces, not to remedy past injustices but to be more successful".

The business argument for employment equity is straightforward. As our population becomes more racially diverse, it is essential that a company's workforce reflects the market it wants to sell to. This is increasingly true in the international marketplace. Business organizations ranging from B.C. Hydro to North American Life Assurance and the Bank of Montreal realize this reality and fully endorse equal opportunity employment. Many of those employers appeared before the committee. The hon. member for Winnipeg North who is chair of the committee heard those witnesses. He has spoken about it and will continue to speak about it in the course of the discussion on the bill.

They and other progressive employers have instituted employment equity programs in their workplaces not out of benevolence but out of good business sense. They have discovered that the best argument for employment equity is the bottom line.

Black & McDonald, the Toronto based mechanical and electrical services contractor, is an example in point. Many of the people hired as maintenance mechanics and building supervisors over the past few years were recent immigrants due as much to a skill shortage in Canada as to the firm's employment equity efforts. The company reports that the performance of this division has improved dramatically, which it credits to its highly skilled, hard working visible minority employees and the market potential they represent. More and more satisfied customers have resulted in more and more contracts for Black & McDonald.

A recent Conference Board of Canada study found that half the employers surveyed capitalized on Canada's ethnocultural diversity to expand their market share. That trend will only increase. By 2001 visible minorities should form 48 per cent of the consumer market in Toronto, 20 per cent in Montreal, and 39 per cent in Vancouver. Firms that fail to act quickly will be left behind in a country experiencing huge population growth among designated groups.

Upwards of three–quarters of new entrants into the workforce by the turn of the next century, which is only five years from now, will be members of the designated groups. At a time when human capital far outweighs location or physical resources, it is imperative that employers maximize their people potential in the workplace.

Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce chairman Al Flood put it very well when he said:

> The issue of underemployed intellectual capital is a major one for Canadian business in a competitive global society. A business in a complex, changing world needs more than one point of view. Those diverse views will only flourish in an environment uncontaminated by notions of ability based on gender, race, religion and so on.

The key word in that quote is ability because employment equity is really about assuring equal opportunities to individuals qualified to do the job. We are not talking, as the previous speaker said, about quotas. We are talking about ability, about assuring equal opportunities to qualified individuals. It is no coincidence then that half of all CIBC managers are women. Canada's banks have one of the best records in the economy for building diversity into their workforce. Yet never do we hear that such progress comes at someone else's expense.

• (1335)

While I am on the subject of someone else's expense I quote again from the little green book of the Reform. I have a quote here from the hon. member for Beaver River that will be instructive. Perhaps it explains in part the silly amendments of the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest. She said: "Women are just trying to lift themselves up to the detriment and expense of men". This is what the hon. member for Beaver River says. I presume she believes this nonsense. I suspect what happened is that she has been sitting there listening to her seatmate, the hon. member for Calgary Southwest, telling her that is what happens.

When the hon. member for Halifax or the hon. member for Nepean start speaking to me about lifting themselves up or changing their roles, I do not feel it is at my expense. I have never felt that it was at my expense. I am sure my male colleagues on this side of the House would share that view.

Our female colleagues are not getting additional rights at our expense. If they get any additional rights we are all improved by them. There is not a finite supply of rights. Rights are created because individuals are there. Because individuals get rights does not mean the rights of someone else are necessarily diminished. Some may feel that way, but I suggest it is not true that they are necessarily diminished. The extension of the rights granted by this legislation have benefited all our society enormously.

I do not know when the hon. member for Beaver River made this quote. Unfortunately the little green book, or "The Gospel According to Preston Manning and the Reform Party" as its other title reads, does not tell us when the quotation was made. Nevertheless the words are written down and I am sure the hon. member for Beaver River could not explain them away.

Another very short quote from her is: "I am basically a Tory". I do not know why she is in the Reform Party if she is basically a Tory. She should help the hon. member for Saint John. Then we have a famous quote of her leader, the hon. member for Calgary Southwest: "Deborah Grey is the prairie Margaret Thatcher". What a fire that is.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. I know the member is a very experienced member, but from time to time the Chair must remind members of certain rules of the House.

Although he might be quoting from a text, those words are still attributed to whoever has the floor in the House. I would encourage the member to refer to member's ridings as the tradition and the rules of the House call for and not by proper names.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I was being very careful only to use the proper name when it was in the quote. I was being very careful not to use it in any other sense. That is why I said the hon. member for Calgary Southwest used the words: "Deborah Grey is the prairie Margaret Thatcher". I do not think he said at the time that the hon. member for Beaver River was the prairie Margaret Thatcher. That is all I was doing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): On that point, I am of the understanding at this time that when any member in the House reads a quote it is just as attributable to that person as if he or she were saying it.

If I have erred I will gladly come back to the House and make that correction before all my peers, my colleagues here. However I am of the understanding at this time that any quote is attributed as if the person himself or herself is saying it. I will come back to the House if necessary.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, that is fine. I accept the admonition. I have finished my quotes in any event.

Those with the most experience with employment equity are usually its staunchest defenders. With nearly two decades of equity programs in the workplace Sun Life Assurance vice–president Lucy Greene says: "It is just part of our thinking. It is good business sense. Everybody should be doing it".

Few would agree more than Troy Peck, a 25–year old administrative assistant with the planning department of the city of Vancouver. His employer adopted employment equity in 1976 when Troy was still a little boy with a spinal tumour whose future employment prospects did not look promising. Thanks to employment equity this qualified young man who uses a wheelchair found his job on the basis of merit. Troy told the Vancouver Province this past summer:

> Employment equity gives you the chance not to be automatically dismissed as an applicant because of your disability. It gives you the chance to show you are skilled and able to perform.

• (1340)

That is all any member of the designated groups is asking of the House. They just want an opportunity to prove that talent comes in all kinds of packages. They ask us to remember that what is important is not the package but the gift inside it. Our gift to future generations in the country must be the assurance that we will give every last young woman and man that chance. With Bill C–64 unamended we can do exactly that.

I urge hon. members of the Reform Party to withdraw these amendments and proceed with the bill as it stands.

Mr. John Maloney (Erie, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to rise in the House to speak in support of Bill C–64, the Employment Equity Act.

The fourth United Nations world conference of women concluded recently. An event like that has many benefits for Canada. One is that it gives us an international context to assess how well Canada has done and how far we have to go.

During my remarks today I want to place Bill C–64 in that same international context and to look at our international obligations and how Bill C–64 will help us to meet them. I want to consider some relevant international experiences with employment equity. I want to show that the bill puts teeth in our commitment to equality and shows the kind of leadership that is badly needed around the world.

Let me begin by discussing a recent landmark in understanding the issue. On August 17 the United Nations development program released its sixth human development report. In addition to its overall assessment the report focuses on the situation facing women around the world.

I am certain that every member of the House took pride when once again Canada earned the highest ranking on the human development index. It told the world what Canadians already knew so well, that this country offers a quality of life that is second to none.

However I am certain each of us knows that Canada placed ninth on the gender related development index. Our track record on the place of women in society is not good enough. One might ask why it is that low. One factor is the economic gap between women and men. Money talks and in Canada right now that means men shout while women whisper.

Some in the House say there are very good reasons for this gap. They say we should just stand aside while the market works in its mysterious way. That is not what the authors of the United Nations human development report says. They point out that trickle down theories and laissez–faire approaches do not work particularly well to raise the economic status of women. I quote:

> The free workings of economic and political processes are unlikely to deliver equality of opportunity because of prevailing inequities in power structures. When such structural barriers exist, government intervention is necessary, both through comprehensive policy reforms and through a series of affirmative actions.

The government understands the need for real action. The bill will help address that need by making markets work better. It will help women enter occupations that traditionally have excluded them. It will do the same for aboriginal peoples, persons with disabilities and members of visible minorities.

Bill C–64 is consistent with our international obligations. For many years Canada has been a signatory to international agreements on discrimination, human rights, women's rights and labour force issues. Let me touch on a few of them.

The UN has a number of conventions that cover equality issues. The convention on the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women commits us to pursue the equality of the sexes. Article 24 reads:

> State parties undertake to adopt all necessary measures at the national level aimed at achieving full realization of the rights recognized in the present Convention.

This includes modifying:

> —the social and cultural patterns of conduct of men and women, with a view to achieving the elimination of prejudices and customs and all other practices which are based on the idea of the inferiority or the superiority of either of the sexes or on stereotyped roles for men and women.

● (1345)

To do that means taking real steps such as an active program of the type we have introduced in Bill C–64.

A similar commitment exists as a result of the UN's International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. Article 7 touches on conditions of work. It reads that states that are party to the covenant recognize the right to:

> Equal opportunity for everyone to be promoted in his employment to an appropriate higher level subject to no considerations other than those of seniority and competence.

This bill is about finding and removing the barriers that prevent designated group members from realizing their legitimate aspirations in the workplace, the barriers that still prevent people in designated groups from competing fairly for promotions they want.

There are other similar conventions that our country has signed and ratified over time. I will just name a few: the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights; the International Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination; and a number of international labour organization conventions.

I would like to refer to the second article of ILO Convention No. 111 concerning discrimination in respect of employment and occupation which states:

> Members undertake to declare and pursue a national policy designed to promote equality of opportunity in respect of employment and occupation.

Article 3 of the same convention states:

> —each member undertakes to enact such legislation as may be calculated to secure acceptance and observance of those policy.

Canada takes its international commitments seriously. We negotiate, sign and ratify these agreements with the intention of living up to them fully. That is certainly true with conventions on human rights and workplace issues such as these.

We can and do point with pride to Bill C–64 and the existing Employment Equity Act as its predecessor as an example of the government at work to make the equality of opportunity we all want a real goal. Canada is not alone in this process. Other countries have signed these conventions and many are dealing with many of the same issues in society and the economy as we are.

For example, Australia is a country with which we have much in common. We are both senior members of the Commonwealth. We share similar constitutional and legal traditions. We both have significant aboriginal and visible minority populations. Persons with disabilities have become prominent advocates for their own cause. Women are taking on leading positions in society. Like Canada, Australia has an employment equity act. Like us, it recognizes an obligation to break down barriers and it is doing so.

Another interesting case is that of the Netherlands. The celebration of the 50th anniversary of its liberation by Canadian soldiers has reminded us of our close ties. It reminds us of the many Dutch people who have made new homes here over the years.

When the Dutch government looked for a legislated approach to promote the full integration of its immigrants into the labour force and therefore society, where did it turn? Which country provided a model of effective and appropriate legislation? The answer is Canada.

Examples such as that show why Canada can attend international conferences with real pride. Regardless of the issue, we can point to initiatives we have taken at home, co–operation with other countries and a commitment to results. Certainly that is true on workplace issues and on human rights issues.

While we have much to do, Canada has consistently tried to do more to meet some minimum standard. We have been motivated by the caring and tolerance of a society to do better. We realize that equality of opportunity means much more than the absence of formal discrimination. It means building a climate that encourages everyone to participate in our society and our economy.

That is becoming a lesson to the world. Many countries are coming to grips with equality issues. They know we are leaders. Canada has a distinguished history in human rights in the international community. Countries that are looking for effective ways to improve human rights within their own borders are looking to Canada. Countries that want to recognize their growing multicultural nature are looking to Canada.

The Canadian approach to employment equity is a real contribution to the international community. It starts with the idea that all Canadians share a commitment to opportunity and the willingness to find solutions. It speaks to the finest qualities in our national spirit.

Passing this bill will send an important message to a world that needs more of this spirit.

Mr. Brent St. Denis (Algoma, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in offering my comments on Bill C–64 and the report of the standing committee, I want to go back to the fall of 1993.

[Translation]

At the time, Canada was in the middle of an election campaign, and the Liberal Party published a campaign program in which it formulated its commitments.

• (1350)

This campaign document explained the philosophy behind these commitments. At the beginning of the red book, our leader, the man Canadians chose as their Prime Minister, set the tone for a program I was proud to defend.

This is what he said, and I quote: "The result is a Liberal plan for Canada firmly anchored in the principle that governing is about people, and that government must be judged by its effectiveness in promoting human dignity, justice, fairness, and opportunity. This is our approach, and this election is about presenting that choice to Canadians".

[English]

Consider those words: "Our platform was one of jobs and growth but it was not a narrow economic platform. It spoke to a vision of society in which growth reaches everyone. It spoke to a vision of society in which everyone has opportunities in practice, not just in theory".

On this side of the House when we think about the kind of Canada that we are engaged in building, we see a united people building a great country. We see a Canada with opportunity for all. Our Canada would have a strong and sustainable economy. Our economic pie would grow bigger through the skill, commitment and innovation of Canadian workers. From the chief executive officer to the newest employee, everyone would help create the opportunities of tomorrow. The government would work with them to take on the challenges that markets alone cannot.

[Translation]

The workplace, always according to the Liberal vision, must reflect the diversity of the population. It must never raise barriers to prevent someone from doing a job of which he or she is proud and participating fully in the development of this country. The Canadian workplace should emulate the best of what can be found in the rest of the world.

[English]

That competitive economy would exist hand in hand with a tolerant and generous society. It would live with the golden rule that exists in all faiths that I have seen. Our culture, our race, our sex, none of these would be a barrier to friendship or to contribution. We would learn from each other and grow richer in the process.

In our vision of Canada people would resolve differences in a spirit of goodwill. They would know that a reasonable people can usually find common ground to work out agreements. Our Canada would be one that builds on our traditional core values of equality, justice and fair shares of the opportunities that build better lives and a better country. It would recognize, as the red book did, that we exist in this society together and not apart.

Canadians are far more than individuals driven by impersonal economic forces and narrow self–interest. We support and are supported by our families, our communities and our country. That has always been true. From the earliest days of human settlement here we have always worked best when we have worked together. It remains true to this day.

The Liberal vision of Canada mirrors the aspirations Canadians have for our country. We want to live together in progress and in peace. In a troubled world Canadians recognize just how much we have accomplished in reaching for this vision. Our ranking in the United Nations human development report is a tribute to that.

Still we know we have more to do. The situation of aboriginal people or our lower ranking on the equality of women in the UN report testify to what more we must do.

Employment equity is a basic part of making our vision real. It recognizes that equality of opportunity is a goal that we have not yet reached. It brings us closer to the ideal caring society that I believe we all want.

[Translation]

In other words, if the concept of employment equity did not exist, we would have to invent it. In fact, it is an essential step towards ensuring that all Canadians have equal opportunities, are aware of that fact and take full advantage of this equality.

[English]

Certainly there has been progress both in numbers and attitudes. For example, the Bank of Montreal's president and chief operating officer, Tony Comper, noted that representation had increased significantly in that bank between 1993 and 1994. However, what was every bit as important was the extent to which employees of that bank have bought into the equity process. They have come to understand that diversity is a business plus in our times.

• (1355)

The same is true at Union Gas in southwestern Ontario. A company with a traditional workforce of technical and office workers has built a very successful equity program. Why? Because the company has been committed to making it a success. It trains staff on issues that arise in a diverse workforce so they can understand the new expectations of customers, co–workers and the company. It builds bridges, not walls, between employees in the name of equity.

Let me quote the company's human resources manager, Maureen Ghettes: "We often look at the cost of something and not the benefit. The cost of an employee who is not interested in working with a certain group or who does not take time to understand an accent is far greater".

These business people are telling us that employment equity is both a strategic social investment and an economic investment. It is consistent with the kind of targeted action the government has adopted across its agenda. It is an action we need more of.

As the red book pointed out and as our experience tells us, people in the designated groups still have a long way to go. In the years since the original Employment Equity Act was passed progress has been slow for women, people with disabilities, aboriginal people and members of visible minority groups.

The standing committee heard from many groups with personal stories of barriers that have not given way despite years of trying. Representatives of the Filipino Technical and Professional Association of Manitoba describe the experiences of well–trained people whose credentials were simply dismissed on arriving in Canada. These people were not even given partial credit toward professional and technical designations despite their training and years of experience.

[Translation]

Spokespersons for the disabled described the professional ghettos to which persons with a mental deficiency are confined. They explained the problems encountered by even the best trained people who suffer from other disabilities. There may be various reasons why it is difficult for this group of workers to find a job.

[English]

All of these groups are telling us that they believe in Canada. They believe this country and its citizens have the generosity of spirit to see what needs to be done and to do it. They are asking for us to continue the great mission of diversity that has enriched this country from its beginnings.

The Speaker: It is almost two o'clock. The hon. member will have the floor when we come back to debate. It being 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members.

NATIONAL FAMILY WEEK

Mrs. Rose–Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, for 12 years now in the week leading up to Thanksgiving, Canadians have made a special effort to celebrate National Family Week.

This year, from October 2 to October 8, all Canadians will be encouraged to look inward and to contemplate the fundamental importance of our families and the relationships we have with the loved ones around us. This year's theme "Families are Forever: Enjoy Family Times" builds on the concept that families, like precious jewels, are forever and need to be enjoyed, treasured and celebrated.

The family unit is an essential building block of all societies. The ties that bind us to each other are reflections of the ties that keep the greater family, the global community, together. During this National Family Week and indeed all year long we should enjoy the time we spend with our family members and enjoy the memories of good family ties.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux–Montagnes, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the federal Department of Industry has made a complete list of pressure tactics Ottawa could use to persuade the automotive industry to campaign for the No side.

To convince Hyundai, it is hinted that the government might want to recover the federal contribution for the construction of the plant in Bromont. To convince GM, there would be a reference to the $110 million loan approved by Ottawa for the Boisbriand plant. To convince other parties, there would be references to federal programs to help industry and facilitate access to the U.S. market.

It seems that the people they are counting on to do the job include Yves Landry of Chrysler Corporation, identified as the spokesperson for the automotive industry, and Maureen Darkes, the Canadian President of General Motors who is responsible for the Boisbriand plant. Leaders of the automotive industry should not give in to this federal blackmail.

NUCLEAR TESTING

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, many Canadians are outraged by the continuing French nuclear tests in the South Pacific and are demanding our government take a stand. While other countries have strongly condemned the French behaviour, the Liberal government reaction has been pathetically weak.

Instead of recalling our ambassador from France for consultation as the Reform Party demanded, the government lamely expressed its regret and yesterday the Minister of Foreign Affairs told a member of the House that the nuclear tests were nothing to get excited about.

Instead of standing up to France, the Minister of Foreign Affairs has chosen the path of appeasement over principles, just like the leader of the Bloc Quebecois did on this same issue.

Unlike the government and the official opposition, the Reform Party does stand up for its principles and will continue to condemn the French nuclear testing because the people of Canada demand it.

NUCLEAR TESTING

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are extremely disappointed at the weak response our government has taken with the Government of France on nuclear weapons testing in the South Pacific.

Last week I had the opportunity to address the Council of Europe to convey the unhappiness of Canadians with France for undertaking these tests. Delegations from Canada, Australia, Japan and Mexico condemned France for its actions.

Today I am calling on Canadians to boycott products from France such as wines, perfumes, bottled water, cheeses and clothing until the French stop testing nuclear devices. A boycott will pressure French business to lobby French President Chirac to end testing sooner.

The government and Canadians must take a firmer stand on this issue. It is incredible that on the 50th anniversary of the bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki France should resume nuclear testing. It is equally incredible that the Liberal government has been silent on this issue which impacts negatively on world peace and on our environment.

COMMUNITIES IN BLOOM

Mr. Gary Pillitteri (Niagara Falls, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Ontario Parks Association through its Communities in Bloom program has announced that Niagara–on–the–Lake, a town which I am proud to represent federally, has been named prettiest small town in Ontario.

Competing in the category for communities with a population of between 5,000 and 30,000, Niagara–on–the–Lake prevailed over places such as Coburg, Collingwood, Dryden and Elliot Lake.

What struck the judges was the originality of the town's landscaping. For this, much of the credit is due to the town's parks and recreation department and to its residents.

Now Niagara–on–the–Lake will be concentrating its efforts on achieving the national title, due to be announced in Ottawa next fall. This is calling for the active participation of the town's residents, who I am sure will rise to the challenge.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. John Finlay (Oxford, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, all of us have a role to play in protecting our environment. The federal government is in a position to create policy which will protect the Canadian environment and the environment of our neighbours.

This past July the Minister of the Environment introduced measures to protect the environment of lakes, rivers and wetlands across North America by banning lead shot under the authority of the Migratory Birds Convention Act.

Lead shot, which can be fatal when ingested by water fowl, is released into the Canadian environment by water fowl hunters at between 1,500 and 2,000 tonnes per year. This action taken by the minister will end the poisoning of our waters and will protect important species in our ecosystem. This measure will not only save our environment, it is one small step toward maintaining biodiversity and giving future generations an environment they can live with.

MINING

Mr. Brent St. Denis (Algoma, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Canada's mining sector continues to provide jobs, investment and the impetus for new technological development. Canada's mining companies and mine workers are among the best in the world when it comes to efficient, cost effective and safe mining practices. Important for all Canadians, environmental concerns have become a high priority for Canada's mining industry.

Government red tape is a big problem. As a member of the government's rural caucus and especially as a northern Ontario

MP, I emphasize the importance of streamlining the regulatory process which faces the mining industry.

The current system creates unneeded duplication, slows the approval process and wastes both industry and government time and money.

I am pleased the government has recommended that the process be made to serve Canadians, not hinder them, and that we have agreed with industry, aboriginal and environmental groups and others about what needs to be done.

I ask my colleagues to support action which will lead to the streamlining of the regulatory process and I call on provincial governments to co-operate to ensure that both senior levels of government work together to make regulatory efficiency a priority.

AGRICULTURAL RESEARCH

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the 1995 federal budget announced the closing of the La Pocatière agri-food research centre, the only centre specializing in research in sheep farming, with sheep production in full expansion.

Neither Quebec nor the regional community was consulted about the closure, which was hidden away in the appendices to the budget. The comité de survie de la ferme expérimentale thought it had succeeded in extracting a moratorium, enabling it to revive agricultural research in the cradle of farming research in Quebec.

Unfortunately, despite the minister's promise, the department has begun to remove the centre's equipment, in spite of the community action. Data provided by the federal government reveal that Quebec receives less than 15 per cent of the federal department of agriculture's spending on research and development.

Does the agriculture minister believe, just like the defence minister, that he cannot afford the luxury of treating Quebec equitably? This is another good reason for Quebecers to vote yes.

GOVERNMENT GRANTS

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in his February 1994 budget speech the Minister of Finance stated: "Fiscal reality requires that the government review its policy on the funding of interest groups".

In a letter to the President of the Treasury Board, the Minister of Natural Resources agreed that grants should be given only to those groups that provide important services to the Canadian public.

I give some of the results of this promise. Natural resources gave a grant of $35,000 to the United States Department of Energy, $5,000 to Sears, $70,000 to Superior Propane, $40,000 to the Saskatchewan Trucking Association and $5,000 to the Omineca Ski Club.

In total natural resources approved grants of $282 million. Canadians are fed up with the Liberals buying favours with taxpayers' money and this outrage must stop.

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Gar Knutson (Elgin—Norfolk, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today I rise in the House to add the federal riding of Elgin—Norfolk to the important debate on national unity. Recently I had the opportunity to meet with a constituent of mine, Mr. Tom Savage of Port Stanley, Ontario.

Mr. Savage, an artist, has created a national unity T-shirt. This shirt truly represents all of Canada: a large red maple leaf with a fleur de lys of Quebec and the sacred hoop of the First Nations.

In the wake of the crisis in both Ipperwash Beach and Gustafsen Lake and the constant debate on the Quebec referendum, Mr. Savage is one of many Canadians who feel Canada includes Quebec and aboriginals.

It is frightening to envision the possibility of Canada's breaking up and therefore I commend the work of Tom Savage and hope that more Canadians step forward to voice their concerns. There is no room for complacency. It is time for all Canadians who together form our cultural mosaic to embrace our differences and stand united. This will ensure a strong and prosperous future for all of Canada.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Robert Bertrand (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the separatist leaders spent much of last week frightening seniors by claiming that, the day after a no vote in the referendum, their pensions would be cut.

The federal government is being financially responsible by reviewing all its programs to see how they may be made more efficient and less costly. The PQ government and its separatist allies, on the other hand, continue to promise the world ignoring the fact that an independent Quebec will face a deficit of between $7 billion and $15 billion in the first year.

Seniors, like the rest of the people in this country, prefer a government that states its intentions clearly over one that irresponsibly wastes money it does not have just to win its referendum. Seniors will say no on October 30 to the campaign of fear by the PQ and the Bloc.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Bernard Patry (Pierrefonds—Dollard, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there are some paradoxes in politics that cannot be ignored. Last Sunday, like thousands of other Quebecers, I saw the new Yes signs spring up in my riding.

Two of them in particular caught my attention. The first one showed a nice big flower as the promise of a healthy environment. The second one showed the peace sign which, in my opinion, speaks for itself.

While separatists were busy putting up their signs, a horrible drama was unfolding on the other side of the world as France set off its second nuclear explosion.

• (1410)

While the whole planet is mobilizing against these nuclear tests, Quebec separatists remain silent to avoid endangering the support France has promised them and continue to post their flower and peace signs.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, Senator Lise Bacon took offence at the treatment of Standard Life chief executive Claude Garcia by the Quebec government. Mr. Garcia became an instant celebrity at the start of the referendum campaign when he said: "We must not only win, we must crush". The Quebec government then remembered that Standard Life had been awarded important contracts without tenders and decided to issue a call for tenders, as should be done in any case.

Instead of taking offence, Mrs. Bacon should feel stifled as part of the No side, as Quebec businesspeople have been targeted by the Operation Unity centre and blackmailed by the federal government. Mrs. Bacon's principles are quite elastic. Why does she not in turn denounce the unacceptable practices used by her own side?

JUSTICE

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday it was discovered that two of the most notorious, violent criminals in Calgary have been on parole for over a year after serving seven of their twenty–two and twenty–nine year sentences.

Since the parole board gave them a second chance, one of them is now back in custody for assaulting his girlfriend.

S. O. 31

When the Reform Party asked for amendments to Bill C–45 which would make dangerous violent offenders like Jean–Luc Dipietro and Oresto Panacui serve the full term for their original sentence plus the full term for the offence they committed while on parole, the Liberal government said no way and voted the amendment down.

Jean–Luc Dipietro and Oresto Panacui did not deserve to be released. Their criminal records include attempted murder, kidnapping, escaping custody, robbery and family violence—prime candidates for parole according to the parole board and the government.

Bill C–45 was the government's opportunity to really get tough on criminals but it refused to do it. The people of this country deserve and demand better.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette–Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the chairperson of the Centrale de l'enseignement du Québec, Lorraine Pagé, just sent a letter to members of her union, asking them to support the Yes side and make a financial contribution to the sovereignist campaign.

This invitation by the CEQ to subsidize the Yes side comes less than one week after Bombardier was lambasted by Quebec's separatists, including union leaders, for asking its employees to support the No side.

It seems more and more obvious that an independent Quebec will be a Quebec split in half, in that the right to freedom of speech and freedom of association will only be granted to those who support separatism and the PQ government. Quebecers do not want that kind of a country and they will vote No.

YOUNG TRAINEES PROGRAM

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government has long recognized the need to provide more help and support to young dropouts and unemployed. Through the federal program for young trainees, 12 young people from my riding of Saint–Denis are currently participating in a training program that will teach them the job of inspector of mechanical products.

Thanks to this initiative, these young people, whose future was said to be bleak, have an opportunity to fully develop their potential. Our government is proud to endorse this project, because it meets the real needs of young Quebecers and Canadians by helping the unemployed and the dropouts. Our young people need this kind of initiatives, not a separatist dream which, quite obviously, would be a dead end.

MAITLAND, NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. John Murphy (Annapolis Valley—Hants, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to offer my sincere congratulations to the citizens of the village of Maitland in my riding of Annapolis Valley—Hants.

At a ceremony last July Maitland was designated as Nova Scotia's first heritage conservation district. This past Saturday Maitland was again recognized, this time as the recipient of the Elaine Burke award, an honour which recognizes community achievement in active living and environmental citizenship.

The citizens of Maitland have shown both pride in their heritage and a desire to build on their rich history in a positive and healthy fashion. I believe this pride in community is representative of the attitudes of people throughout my riding and indeed the province of Nova Scotia.

• (1415)

I would ask all members to join me in congratulating the village of Maitland on this well-deserved recognition.

INDUSTRY CANADA

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, today it was reported in La Presse that a secret document was sent last March to the Privy Council's Operation Unity centre. It seems that Industry Canada made a list of Quebec companies, sector by sector, in anticipation of the referendum debate. Ottawa identifies the levers—that is the word they used—it intends to use to urge business people to campaign for the No side, referring to various federal subsidies and contracts, especially in the aerospace and defence sectors.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Does he approve of the fact that a federal department, at the request of Operation Unity, made a list of the heads of large corporations in Quebec for the obvious purpose of blackmailing them and enrolling them on the No side in the referendum campaign?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think it is entirely normal that government officials should be able to inform ministers and the government of economic activities in Quebec that receive assistance from the Canadian government. That is all part of the basic argument. The purpose is not to blackmail anyone at all, in fact quite the opposite. It is so we can tell people that they can get ahead in Canada and that many industries in Quebec need the central government, to access its funding programs as well as to find markets abroad.

I think it is perfectly normal that the Minister of Industry should know what is going on in the industrial sector in the province of Quebec at a time when a referendum is to be held, so that he can tell the Prime Minister, the ministers, members of Parliament and the public what the Canadian government is doing for Quebecers.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the government forgot to mention that these documents include analyses of the political positions of certain heads of corporations in connection with the current debate, hence the importance of the use of the term "levers" in connection with the way they will behave during the referendum debate.

Does the Prime Minister not think there is something indecent about the fact that, when making this list of Quebec businesses, his government referred not only to subsidies that had already been paid under federal contracts but also to future subsidies that are now being negotiated?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think it only makes sense for a minister to want to know what is going on in his department. Members rise in the House every day to ask questions, and if a minister has the misfortune to say he does not know exactly what is going on in his department, he is accused of incompetence. I am not going to rise in the House now and tell my Minister of Industry that he is incompetent, when he is making sure that we have all the information relevant to the referendum debate in Quebec.

Quebecers ought to know that what we can offer them now is something concrete, but the Bloc Quebecois and the Parti Quebecois are trying to make people believe in a hypothetical situation it will be impossible to realize. We are telling Quebecers in concrete terms what we are doing for them, and they are very glad to know about it.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, what connection is there between a minister's jurisdiction and the political opinions of the business people with whom he has dealings? And why this excuse we are hearing today, that the minister has to know what is going on in his department, when he is much more concerned about the political views of the heads of Quebec companies? I think it is pretty obvious that this is an exercise in twisting the arms of business people in Quebec.

I ask the Prime Minister to admit that with this list, his government has a tool to blackmail Quebec business leaders who, as long as they are under the present federal system, will depend on contracts and subsidies from Ottawa.

• (1420)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am of course glad to see the Leader of the Opposition has conceded that the No side will win and the Yes side will lose. If he felt confident, he would have said that all this did not matter and that on October 30 they would no longer have dealings with the Canadian government and businessmen would no longer have to deal with the Canadian government. I wonder why he is so scared; is it because he realizes he will lose?

However, I think it is rather surprising that the leader of the Bloc Quebecois should criticize us, when his leader, the leader of the Parti Quebecois, fired every single official representing the Quebec government abroad who did not swear an oath of allegiance to the cause of separation.

When we see the kind of threats they make against people who are now speaking out in favour of the No side, as in the case of the chief executive of an insurance company who has been told he may lose his contracts because he is a federalist, I think the Leader of the Opposition is hardly in a position to criticize us for trying to find out who receives subsidies and in what sector, so that members and people on the No side can go to the ridings and explain to people that the Canadian government provides a good service to all Quebecers.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we were well aware of how strongly allergic the Prime Minister was to the competitive bidding process in the Power DirecTv case involving his son–in–law. It will be remembered that he appeared to be extremely allergic in that instance. But it is completely normal for the government of Quebec to use a competitive bidding process.

It is also important for Quebecers to know the true colours of the federal government right before making a decision. The Privy Council's Operation Unity centre has taken the trouble to collect information on Quebec companies, their directors, their past and future contracts and grants, so as to be able to pressure them to be on the No side of the referendum. We know that a number of federal government bodies and departments possess confidential information on a number of Canadians and Canadian organizations.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Can he tell us whether some of the information in the hands of other federal bodies or departments has been acquired by the Operation Unity centre to create other files to be used for the same purposes as the first?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the allegations of the hon. member for Roberval are unfounded. The document produced examines the industrial sectors in the province of Quebec, sector by sector. There are 20 or 21 in all. In each, we look at the economic situation and the effect of federal government funding.

It also looks at what effect separation would have on each of the industrial sectors in the province of Quebec, and in each case the conclusion is clear: separation would have harmful economic effects on the economic sectors of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister's conclusion and the conclusions of his document are not even the same. He has not read it. True, this document was requested by the Prime Minister.

When the minister states that these are unfounded allegations, I would like him to explain, to us and to all Quebecers, the following. While the Operation Unity centre was literally collecting secret information contained in Department of Industry documents for the purposes of bringing pressure to bear during the referendum, why would it have deprived itself of information held by other organizations and departments other than Industry on thousands of Quebecers and Quebec organizations? Why would it not have done so when it has collected similar information from Industry in such a shameful manner?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Roberval continues to make unfounded allegations which are not justified by the document. I shall send him copies of the report on the various industrial sectors in which the conclusion is that separation would be harmful for Quebec. He will then see that this is the case in the majority of sectors.

• (1425)

When he says these are unnecessary documents, that is totally ridiculous, and I do not hesitate to say so, because the conclusions of the report clearly indicate the effects of separation on major industrial sectors in Quebec, essential information for the referendum. It comes as no surprise to me that the opposition has not read it, because it does not fall in line with their conclusions, but it is unfortunately the truth. Separation would be extremely costly for most industrial sectors of Quebec.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday Canadians learned that not only had officials at the Department of National Defence been falsifying documents but that former Airborne Commander Peter Kenward ordered videotape evidence destroyed.

Shortly after the destruction of the videotapes, Kenward was promoted to full colonel. The minister has already admitted that the chief of defence staff would not consider his reservations about this promotion and he did not interfere because he says that the promotion was a responsibility of the chief.

I want the minister to clarify his position. When did he learn that Colonel Kenward had ordered the destruction of evidence? Was it before or after the promotion?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as a former member of the armed forces, I am sure the hon. member will be aware that following passage of the 1952 National Defence Act an order in council was passed.

It is now found in Queen's Regulations and Orders 11.01(2). It states:

> The promotion of a member to any rank lower than that of brigadier-general requires the approval of the Chief of Defence Staff.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister knew that the evidence had been destroyed. Therefore he is "complicit" in concealing that fact from the Canadian people.

The minister knew of this cover-up. He knew of the promotion, yet he did nothing. How can he justify this gross error of judgment?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, from time to time you caution hon. members about the language they use in the House. I would caution the hon. member. If he said this outside the House, it might be actionable.

Second, because of the reservations the chief of defence staff had about the promotion and its delay pending certain investigations, out of courtesy he brought it to my attention. When he brought it to my attention, I expressed reservations that the promotion should go ahead. I reminded the chief of the defence staff that it was his responsibility to deal with these promotions and that it was up to him to decide whether or not to proceed.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is not the prerogative of anyone within the military to impede an investigation and to destroy evidence.

Canadians are gravely concerned that the minister, who is ultimately responsible, has allowed tampering with evidence as an acceptable tool for office management at the senior levels of the national defence department.

These revelations undermine public confidence in the military and they destroy any shred of credibility still clinging to the minister. My question does not touch on the Somalia inquiry but goes right to the heart of the minister's mismanagement. Given that the minister acknowledges to the Canadian people that his department is out of control, will he do the honourable thing and resign?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I might ask the hon. member if he would refrain from bordering on abusing the privileges of the member of Parliament for Don Valley East and the Minister of National Defence. I believe that is what he has done in his question, when there is a close reading of the question.

I would like to tell him that the chief of defence staff will be making a public statement this afternoon and will deal with all these matters because they are under his purview.

I would like to ask the hon. member whether he expects the Minister of National Defence to have the governor in council rescind an order in council that was passed 43 years ago designed to prevent political interference in the promotion of officers of the armed forces. Does he want to turn the clock back?

INDUSTRY CANADA

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

With respect to the aerospace industry, it is clear from the secret document prepared by Industry Canada for the Operation Unity centre that the federal government intends to use the defence industry productivity program to put pressure on this industry in Quebec by withholding funds earmarked for the support of new projects in 1995.

Will the Prime Minister confirm that the federal government is currently negotiating with Bombardier to establish a financial support program to help Bombardier sell regional jets?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, again, these are unfounded allegations. Clearly, whenever subsidies are granted, the government always considers which industries could use them and for what purpose. The stated objectives are profitability and job creation, and these objectives are those set by the federal government for industrial development in Canada.

Is the opposition suggesting that we not look for ways to stimulate employment in Quebec? The burden of proof rests with opposition members. They are making allegations based on incorrect information and faulty analysis. Instead, they should share with us the burden of developing Quebec's economy as best we can.

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Obviously, Mr. Speaker, the minister did not read the document.

Does the Prime Minister not find it odd that information on negotiations between Bombardier and the government can be found in an Operation Unity document designed to put pressure on Quebec businesses to make them vote No?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, ever since I became a member of Cabinet and even a member of Parliament, the Canadian aerospace industry has always relied on federal assistance for its development.

I myself was Minister of Industry many years ago. When Canadair was shut down by the American company General Dynamics, the Canadian government took it over to put it back on its feet. It has now become Quebec's largest industry and biggest employer. The Canadian government wants to ensure that Canadair can go ahead with its aircraft development project.

The development of regional aircraft by Canadair has been a government concern for many years, and we are trying to help this industry. In fact, in the past twelve months, we had the opportunity to help it start producing this aircraft which I feel is destined to have a great future, thanks to the aeronautics policies put in place by the Canadian government, which does a great deal for workers in that sector of Quebec's economy. That is why they will want to remain in Canada.

PENSIONS

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

The minister will not tell us when he will release his long overdue reform of the Canada pension plan but perhaps he will share with us what he is planning to do.

Through access to information we have obtained a briefing note by a senior policy analyst in HRD. She states that the Canada pension plan is financially unsustainable. She recommends that the minister either cut seniors' pensions or raise taxes to pay for the shortfall.

Will the minister promise seniors that he will not cut their pensions? And, will he promise taxpayers that he will not raise their taxes? Yes or no.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly take the hon. member's representation to my colleague, the Minister of Finance, which I know he will be thrilled to receive.

As far as the briefing note is concerned, it is very difficult to keep track of a variety of briefing notes. I repeat to the hon. member that we made it very clear in last year's budget we have a very strong commitment to maintaining the sustainability of the pension programs for seniors. We recognize, however, as a responsible government that in the future as the demographics of the country change there has to be new financing for the Canada pension plan. The Minister of Finance must meet with his colleagues, the other ministers of finance, later this year to discuss how that refinancing would take place.

• (1435)

That is the reason it is very important we engage in a serious review of how we can ensure the continued maintenance of a good, effective, sustainable pension program for Canadians.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I acknowledge the hon. member's response and would like to continue with a supplementary question.

Reform believes that pension reform can be done without cutting seniors' pensions and without raising payroll taxes. In his letter last week the chief actuary for finance recommended that the government either raise taxes or cut benefits in order to save the Canada pension plan.

Will the minister reject the advice of the chief actuary, refuse to cut seniors' pensions and refuse to raise payroll taxes?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would be very interested in receiving a more complete and thorough presentation from the Reform Party on its proposals for the Canada pension plan.

When I looked at the proposals that came forward from the seminar or meeting the Reform Party held a couple of weeks ago in Halifax, I noticed that if we had followed its recommendations there would have been substantial reduced pension benefits for 800,000 disabled Canadians, 600,000 widows and 1.8 million pensioners.

I hope that is not the position of the hon. member.

INDUSTRY CANADA

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In a secret document prepared by Industry Canada for the Operation Unity Centre, we learn that Bombardier asked Ottawa for funding, as part of the defence industry productivity program, which, as Industry Canada itself indicated, would be difficult to provide. The assistance sought concerned the joint Canadair–de Havilland global express airplane project.

How does the Prime Minister justify a request for financial assistance of this magnitude being in a strategy file intended for use in pressuring business in the referendum debate?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think I am going to have to explain this whole thing all over again. The Department of Industry document sets out clearly the position of the various industrial sectors. It indicates the effect separation would have on these sectors. It also indicates, in some cases, the amount of the financial assistance sought by certain firms.

This is common practice, and one the government is familiar with. Many companies follow this practice each year; that is, they apply for funding. We have to respond to these applications for assistance each year, and it is usual for this type of information to appear in an Industry Canada document.

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have the impression we are not talking about the same document and that the minister does not even have access to the document we are talking about. Are we to understand that one of the new criteria Ottawa has established for obtaining federal assistance under DIPP is a favourable recommendation from the Operation Unity Centre for services rendered?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, clearly the answer is no. Government funding is provided, once again, according to the contribution a firm or an industry makes to the Quebec economy. It is provided on the basis of job creation. It almost always is public and is therefore subject to the government's public accounts.

This funding must be approved by the members of Parliament and the House and is therefore granted objectively. Once again, the opposition's allegations are unfounded.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the negotiations on the harmonization of environmental management in Canada have been placed totally on hold. With each day the environment minister's version of events gets even more outlandish. She insists that Alberta scuttled the deal, but Alberta says that the minister's fear of decentralization is to blame. What is more disturbing is that Alberta's environment minister was practically called a racist in the House.

• (1440)

Why has the minister put this deal on hold and when will she apologize to Alberta Minister Ty Lund for her inflammatory comments?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I merely repeated in the House what the minister said at the meeting in Haines Junction when he said that he would be very happy if Canada had environmental jurisdiction in Alberta in the area of parks, that we could have their parks and their Indians. That comment has not been refuted by the minister.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, what is more at issue here is the fact that these talks have been scuttled by the minister, regardless of reason. Whether it is the Irving Whale or whether it is the environmental harmonization agreement, the minister is always looking for new ways to pass the buck, and heaven help those who disagree with her. I am sure the Minister of Natural Resources certainly knows what I am talking about. She is in favour of the provinces and supports their attempts by her sympathies with harmonization.

My supplementary question is for the Minister of Natural Resources or the Deputy Prime Minister. What do they plan to do to get these talks back on track?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the claim of the hon. member that somehow I have misrepresented what Ty Lund said is absolutely false.

She got up on her first question and made a statement and I answered that statement. I said that Mr. Lund had not denied making the comment, which was heard by at least 10 people, to the effect that Canada's role in environment in Alberta should be restricted to national parks and their Indians.

I would suggest that the hon. member, rather than trying to find another red herring, should stand in the House and apologize for her claim that I misrepresented Ty Lund's remarks.

INDUSTRY CANADA

Mr. Yves Rocheleau (Trois–Rivières, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

A secret document prepared by Industry Canada for Operation Unity says that, without the federal defence contract for the manufacture of ammunition, SNC–Lavalin subsidiary SNC–IT will have to close its doors.

Will the Prime Minister admit that linking the survival of a business to the awarding of a federal contract in an effort to put pressure on its leader amounts to blackmail?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, again, the opposition's allegations are very close to being unparliamentary. They do this because they have no arguments to support their views.

Speaking of documents, our document is available under the Access to Information Act. But what about the Le Hir studies, the hidden studies? When the Parti Quebecois and its little brother, the Bloc Quebecois, conduct studies that are inconsistent with their conclusions, what do they do? The same thing they did with the Georges Mathews and Bernier studies: they hide them.

In this case, the information is available. This information helps us determine whether our subsidies can create jobs in Quebec. We have the public interest at heart. But in their case, the question is whether hiding the studies that are inconsistent with their conclusions is in the interest of Quebecers who will vote on October 30.

Mr. Yves Rocheleau (Trois-Rivières, BQ): Mr. Speaker, could we have answers that come not from an armchair quarterback but from someone who is well briefed on the issue?

How can the Prime Minister let Operation Unity take 680 SNC-IT employees hostage by linking the awarding of a defence contract for the manufacture of ammunition to the referendum position of SNC bosses?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the allegation is totally false, and everyone knows that this industry is dependent on a Canadian government contract. That is the way it is. This industry has been in existence since the end of the second world war, since the war.

Of course, if the Canadian government does not buy ammunition from an ammunition producer, I wonder who will.

• (1445)

It is quite normal for us to know this. If, in analyzing Quebec industries, the minister realizes that a business is completely dependent on the Canadian defence budget, I think it is quite normal for him to know this so that we can find out exactly what role the Canadian government plays in Quebec. In this case, it is fundamental.

Without the Canadian government, without a defence department that buys ammunition from this industry, it would have to close its doors. But, since there is a Canadian government that has Quebecers' interests at heart, we continue to buy ammunition from this business.

LAND MINES

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

The subject of banning land mines was recently discussed at an international conference in Vienna. In view of the fact that land mines that are now being discovered in Bosnia have a similar design and technology as those manufactured here in Canada, will the minister give the House his assurance that no land mines are now manufactured in Canada? More important, will he assure this House this technology has not been exported outside of our borders?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can give this assurance to the hon. member. Indeed, I have been informed that no such mines have been manufactured in Canada since 1992. In fact, none have been allowed to be exported since 1987.

I can give the member the assurance since I am the minister and am looking at all of these export permits that I have not authorized and I will not authorize any of these exports.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in 1981 Tejinderpal Singh and four accomplices attacked and hijacked an Indian airlines flight out of Delhi and forced it to land in Pakistan. Tried and convicted for air piracy in Pakistan, they received life sentences. After being paroled, Singh made his way to Canada where he lied about his background when he claimed refugee status. However, his true identity was uncovered and he was arrested but has since been released.

When in opposition the Liberals criticized the previous Tory government for its handling of the Muhammad Issa Muhammad case. I ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, will this Liberal government handle the Tejinderpal Singh case differently?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let me first congratulate my hon. friend, who was recently appointed as the critic for citizenship and immigration. She will no doubt find it a very interesting portfolio. I know we will miss her predecessor very much.

One of the matters before the government is to try to deal with the subject matter in a fair and competent manner. This we will ensure not only in this particular case but throughout the program.

If members look at some of the things we have tried to do in the last year and a half with respect to the IRB, removals and trying to make the system much fairer and more competent, I think members will agree there have been improvements. However, that is not to suggest this department or any other one is going to speak from perfection.

I look forward to having her comments, her advice and her counsel along the way.

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, there are nine other terrorists who were convicted of hijacking Air India aeroplanes. All have been released from prison in Pakistan and all are intent on coming to Canada. Two other members of this group are presently in Canada.

With the new powers recently conveyed upon him, will the minister assure this House that these convicted hijackers will be removed from this country as expeditiously as possible?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we will look to that new law to provide us with any vehicles and tools with which to deal with individuals who are undesirable and I might add, the same law this party fought us tooth and nail on.

OPERATION UNITY CENTRE

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In its letter entitled Business and Unity, the Privy Council urges the business community to campaign for the No side. We also know from a document submitted to the Minister of Labour that the Operation Unity Center's activities even include writing speeches for politicians and other persons whose names were unfortunately blanked out in the document.

• (1450)

Does the Prime Minister confirm the news that the Operation Unity Center is also the organization in charge of preparing speeches for certain members of the business community?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, clearly, our referendum strategy calls upon all resources available to us in Quebec to try and convince Quebecers that it is in their interest to vote No.

Now, I also read in La Presse what is happening. The CEQ, a pro–sovereignty union, is sending letters to all its members asking them to send money and to vote Yes. What is the difference between that organization and a business that needs to create jobs in a province and make profits and that realizes that its economic viability is dependent upon Quebec being part of a larger entity, namely Canada? Why should people who think it is in their best interest to do so not fight for federalism, just as the CEQ has no qualms soliciting money from its members and asking them to vote Yes?

Clearly, what we are doing can be justified and is in the best interests of Quebecers.

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the minister for finally admitting something before this House. That is a first.

I would also like him to know that Ms. Pagé writes her own speeches and that, when she writes to her members, she has been given a mandate by the rank and file to do so. Perhaps he is the one who wrote Mr. Garcia's speech. This remains to be confirmed in another question.

What does the Prime Minister call it when a government agency gathers information on business people, identifies ways of pressuring some of them and goes as far as telling them what to say?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I find it is quite normal to ask for other people's input when writing a speech. Information can be sought under the Access to Information Act. Any citizen can request information from government departments.

So, when a citizen contacts a department and says: "I have a speech to make. Can you provide me with some information?" and that information is available, it is in keeping with our government's policy of openness to provide as much information as possible to all citizens, and Quebecers in particular at this time when they are about to make a decision that will affect their future for many years to come. In order to make the right choice, they must be fully aware of what the Government of Canada does for Quebec's industries, greatly helping them to develop and break into new markets so that jobs can be created for Quebecers within Canada.

LAC BARRIERE RESERVE

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the investigator looking into allegations of sexual abuse at the Lac Barriere Reserve was expected to present his report by August 31. I have in my possession a work plan to confirm this fact.

Can the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development tell the House if the written report is complete or when it will be completed?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, earlier this year there was an allegation raised in the House by one of the Reform members of sexual assault at Barriere Lake, which is an Algonquin reserve northwest of Montreal. As a result, a memorandum of agreement dated April 1995 was signed by Health Canada, the Province of Quebec Youth Protection Directorate, the band and DIAND was a fourth party but not a signatory.

A consultant came in from Winnipeg with a staff of five or six. Quebec allocated two or three people. Workshops were done, translations, healings. There were 14 to 19 recommendations. The question is whether the report will be made public. The answer is certainly. Certainly it will be made public. There will have to be some protection, as the hon. member knows, because youth are involved here. That was the full intent of the exercise.

• (1455)

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the reserve is near Maniwaki and this study has had $300,000 spent on it. That is my understanding.

The concern is that there be a written report made available to the band members and to the public. Could the minister please confirm that the written report will be made available, and will he tell us when?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is consumed with the second question. I believe I answered it in the first answer.

Some hon. members: When?

The Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox.

YOUTH

Mr. Larry McCormick (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, here in Ontario the Harris government has slashed funds for job creation programs. Republicans in the U.S. have cut funding for their youth oriented Americorps.

Can the Secretary of State for Training and Youth tell Canadians specifically what action our government is taking to make sure our young people remain a priority of this government?

Hon. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Secretary of State (Training and Youth), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, our youth are the future of Canada and they remain a priority of this government. In fact, this government has increased funding by 7.9 per cent and has earmarked $236 million for youth initiatives this year.

An early sign of success is that we exceeded estimates this summer for employment. We helped over 220,000 young people find jobs. That includes 40,000 jobs directly created by federal initiatives.

In the United States it costs $22,000 U.S. per participant. In Canada we do it for half of that; it is $10,000 per participant. We are well on our way and we are very committed.

DEFENCE INDUSTRY CONVERSION

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

In its red book, the government pledged to develop a defence industry conversion strategy. Two years later, we are still waiting for that strategy and for a review of the defence industry productivity program.

Are we to understand that the government did not follow through on its commitment because, instead of meeting the real needs of the industry, it is more concerned by the stand, on the referendum issue, taken by business leaders in that sector? This is shameful.

[English]

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the whole question of conversion of various defence industries to peacetime purposes has been going on for some time.

The program the hon. member refers to is obviously a very important one in Quebec. Over the years a rather major defence industry has built up in that province and a lot of funds were invested in the defence sector.

The challenge that is facing the industries in Quebec is the same as that facing defence based industries anywhere else in Canada, which is to make that conversion. The Minister of Industry has indicated to my hon. friend on a number of occasions that we are always looking forward to opportunities to be able to assist industries in Quebec and elsewhere to make that conversion from defence production to civilian purposes.

ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSITIES AND COLLEGES OF CANADA

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, grants given to the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada have risen sharply in recent years. In 1994–95 it was given $10,600, but suddenly this year it received $262,000, an increase of 2,300 per cent.

Given that the Treasury Board is responsible for overseeing millions of dollars worth of grants, can the minister explain the sudden increase in money given to the AUCC?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, all grants are examined in the framework of providing funds that help in the education system in this case, or in whatever other areas, to help Canadians and to do it in the most efficient and effective manner. Each department takes on that responsibility. I am sure that was done in this case and was fully examined when these grants were made.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food.

The 1995 budget proposed a $1.6 billion ex gratia payment to offset the decline in farmland prices that would result from cutting the Crow benefit. Later the minister made three basic changes to that budget policy by deleting land seeded to forage crops, by deciding to include renters and by deciding that those renters would pay income tax on their payments.

• (1500)

What was the rationale for these changes and how are these decisions consistent with the original budget allocation?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the references the hon. member makes to later changes after the announcement in the budget are a bit misplaced. All of the items he referred to were covered in our budget documents and then covered very specifically in a series of consultations I conducted with farm leaders across western Canada in the months immediately following the budget.

We highlighted in the budget what the principal issues were but we wanted to leave a window for consultation with farm leaders and farm organizations to make sure we had the benefit of their best advice in program design. Virtually every design decision we have taken with respect to the $1.6 billion payment has been guided by the very valuable input and advice of the leadership of western farm organizations.

GREAT LAKES

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

My interest in Great Lakes pollution took a great leap forward when I discovered it was causing decreased sexuality in males. My question to the minister is simple. What is she doing to protect the Great Lakes ecosystem and future generations of Adams?

The Speaker: I am not sure that relates to the specific functions of the Minister of the Environment but I will permit her to answer.

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to comment on the nefarious effects of Great Lakes pollution on male sexual reproduction. As a result of activities in the Great Lakes for the first time we did manage to spot another endangered species—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Copps: I mean an endangered species. The peregrine falcon was found nesting in a couple of buildings in Toronto and Hamilton.

We have also been specific in being able to delist Collingwood as one of the 17 hot spots in Canada of the 43 areas of concern. We have restored about 8 per cent of the beneficial uses and we have been able to work on improvements at 17 sewage treatment plants. Nine plants are moving to improve their phosphorous removal capability.

I understand the hon. member's interest specifically in male sexuality but I will tell him that with the clean–up of the Great Lakes I think we start with herring gull eggs on up.

The Speaker: This concludes question period.

I have been given written notice of a question of privilege from the hon. member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville. I am prepared to hear that now.

PRIVILEGE

MEMBER FOR MARKHAM—WHITCHURCH—STOUFFVILLE

Mr. Jag Bhaduria (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville, Ind. Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on a point of privilege regarding the point of order raised yesterday by the hon. member for Elk Island.

Specifically the member was concerned that a lapel pin I was wearing in the House was inappropriate.

The pin in question was nothing more than an insignia encompassing the map of Canada, the Canadian flag and the provincial flag of Quebec. Additionally the words "One Canada—uni et indivisible" were on the pin.

Mr. Speaker, while I share your concern—

The Speaker: Let me understand. The hon. member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville is raising a point of privilege that arises out of a point of order. Is that correct?

Mr. Bhaduria: That is correct, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: In the rules of the House, as far as I understand them, we cannot raise a point of privilege out of a point of order. Unless the member can find another vehicle for raising his point of privilege I will move on to another matter.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY ACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C–64, an act respecting employment equity, as reported (with amendment) from the committee.

Mr. Brent St. Denis (Algoma, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, just before question period I had commented on a number of groups and associations that represent various minorities. They believe in the bill. To them and to the employers who took part in the process the bill combines our social and economic visions in a fair and reasonable way.

Bill C–64 is a project for our entire society. It is based on partnerships. It is based on reaching for our highest ideals and turning them into a daily reality for all Canadians regardless of heritage, gender or disability. It is based on our truest sense of self as a people. Business, unions and designated groups agree we have found a direction for equity that is consistent with the best features of Canadian life.

The Business Council of British Columbia said during a recent round of consultations: "Employers alone cannot achieve employment equity. Employers want to be part of the solution in partnership with government, unions and employee representatives, educational institutions and designated group organizations".

The council is right. I know when I leave this place I will be pleased to know I helped with a piece of legislation that strengthens our economy and our society. It is simply one more step toward the kind of Canada we should all want to leave to our children and our grandchildren.

[Translation]

In my introduction, I used a quote from the red book, and I will conclude by doing the same.

"We hope to ensure equal opportunities, so as to provide a decent standard of living to more Canadian families, as well as dignity and respect, in a country where social harmony prevails".

Equal opportunities for all. This is the Liberal Party's objective for Canada. This objective is at the heart of our vision of what our country should be.

Mr. Mac Harb (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to show how Canada is a leader when it comes to employment equity.

Bill C–64 is a made in Canada legislative measure which meets the specific needs of the workplace in our country.

I am proud to say that our government does not follow the American trend of criticizing employment equity. We should not be overly influenced by what goes on south of the border, since many problems which arise under American law do not occur in Canada.

Given our history, our constitution and our social context, we do not do things the way the Americans do. I should add that the progress made so far tells us that we often make the right decisions.

Let me offer this brief overview of the Employment Equity Act, an act that is unique in the world. It is distinctly Canadian.

Our legislation is firmly grounded in this country's Constitution. In Canada every individual has the right to equality before and under the law, and equal protection and benefit of the law.

As we have said in the red book, the Liberal Party plan for Canada, we want a country where we all see ourselves as contributors and participants, not liabilities and dependants. We are committed to a Canada characterized by integrity, compassion and competence.

The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms recognizes that special consideration and the accommodation of differences are necessary to realize true equality under the law. Different treatment is not a departure from equality. It is essential however to achieve it.

The Grand Chief of the Assembly of First Nations, Ovide Mercredi, explained it well when he told the Standing Committee on Human Rights and Status of Disabled Persons: "I think sometimes people, white people in particular, forget that this is their society and it is not easy for others to get into it".

This legislation is designed precisely to build bridges between potential and opportunity.

[Translation]

In Canada, employment equity is proactive and positive. It is intended to prevent discrimination. It is designed to eliminate obstacles to employment for disadvantaged Canadians, through intelligent management of human resources making it easier for the new labour force of the 21st century to enter the job market.

Our legislation encourages consultation between employers and workers to find solutions for problems arising at the workplace.

Our approach is based on conciliation rather than use of the courts, because this is the Canadian approach. The aim of the federal government is to educate and help employers by creating employment opportunities enjoyed by all members of the labour force for members of designated groups.

[English]

Another central feature of our system is our firm belief in flexible targets businesses can reasonably achieve. In both our original Employment Equity Act and in the current bill to replace it we have purposely sought the views of employers, unions and members of the designated groups.

We have listened and learned, recognizing we must strike the right balance, ensuring the law will not solve one set of problems for employees by creating another problem for employers.

That is why Bill C–64 has been specifically designed to minimize the regulatory burden. It also makes programs more cost effective and enforcement measures much more efficient.

The bonus for Canadian companies is when everyone's best interests are served there is a direct improvement to the bottom line.

[Translation]

In fact, employment equity is not hard to sell. According to the Business Council of British Columbia in its testimony before the standing committee studying Bill C–64, the four designated groups make up 60 per cent of Canada's population. As employment equity programs are implemented, it went on to say, the labour force will better reflect the diversity of the Canadian people with all the social and economic advantages this comprises. Our experience with employment equity proves that, when a solution is practical for business and protects human dignity, everyone benefits.

• (1515)

Employment equity helps fill the gaps in our economic development and therefore it strengthens our economy as a whole.

[English]

The newspapers are full of stories about business executives extolling the virtues of employment equity. For example, Dan Branda, chief executive officer of Hewlett–Packard Canada told a Globe and Mail reporter that diversity:

> —is an absolute business imperative because it gives us the edge in attracting the best and the brightest people. It positions us as an employer of choice and will help us in competing in a market that is becoming increasing diverse and global.

The chief executive officer of the Canadian Occidental Petroleum, Bernard Isautier said:

> Diversity is a source of competitive advantage. Canada is a country with a respect for differences, for different cultures, for different opinions and respect in general for the individual. That makes Canadians particularly well received when they deal with foreign countries. I think Canada should capitalize more on these capacities.

No one would agree more than the young woman who is able to pursue a career in the trades, the young aboriginal student who sees his post–secondary studies lead to full employment in industry, the Asian engineer who is able to use her skills to improve production processes to make a firm more competitive or the disabled adult who gains financial and social independence, enjoying the dignity and security that comes with a salary.

This legislation is a recommitment of the government to equality for all Canadians. With Bill C–64 we are continuing our tradition of international leadership in the area of employment equity, while choosing to lead rather than be led. In these changing times our responsibility is making the most of the opportunities that change represents. In the process we are creating a more united nation and building a more innovative economy.

Most of all, we are putting into practice the very values that make each of us so proud to be a Canadian: fairness, justice and equality for all.

The Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred. The recorded division will also apply to Motions Nos. 6, 8, 9, 10, 15, 16 and 17.

We are now going to Group No. 2, without Motion No. 3. Miss Grey, seconded by Mr. White moves that Bill C–64, in clause 4 be amended by replacing line 10, on page 4, with the following: "(3) Members of".

• (1520)

In view of the fact that the member whose motion this was to have been is not present in the House for whatever reason, we will now proceed to group three.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.) moved:

Motion No. 5

That Bill C–64, in Clause 6, be amended by replacing line 9, on page 6, with the following:

"(b) to hire or promote any but the best qualified persons;".

He said: Mr. Speaker, this section of Bill C–64, the Employment Equity Act, otherwise known as affirmative action, goes right back to the start and I would merely add to earlier comments I made. I should put this in some context for members in the House who, unfortunately, were not here earlier today to hear my initial comments on the bill and for those many thousands of Canadians watching on television.

Bill C–64 is the Employment Equity Act brought forward by the Liberal government. Employment equity is a phrase coined by Judge Abella about 12 or 13 years ago in the full understanding that affirmative action would never sell in Canada. To make it politically correct it was given a new name and it became employment equity rather than affirmative action.

Here we are with affirmative action in the guise of employment equity.

Ms. Clancy: Wrong, absolutely wrong.

Mr. McClelland (Edmonton Southwest): I hear wails of outrage from members opposite. I can understand that. However the foundation on which this bill rests is faulty. It is false. The foundation is that somehow or other Canadians are a mean, regressive, racist, discriminating people. Canadians are nothing of the sort. We are not that. We do not need the federal government creating more paperwork, more book work, in order to do what it feels, I am sure, is the right thing, to prevent discrimination in the workplace.

When debate on third reading unfolds we will make it abundantly clear that no such discrimination exists in the workplace. The workplace, particularly outside the federal government, is progressive. Industry leads. It is a totally unnecessary law.

I know we are all going to have an opportunity to say what we wish to say about Bill C–64 when it comes to third reading and I will leave my introductory comments at that.

Ms. Jean Augustine (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to address some of the fears and misconceptions which the Reform Party member is taking advantage of in this motion on best qualified.

These are anxious times for many Canadians. The economy, while improving, is no longer as assured as it once was. Jobs are not as permanent as once expected. Canada's labour force has experienced swings as traditional industries shed workers, while new ones arise with different skill needs. There is a sense that the economic pie is not growing as much as we would like it to.

• (1525)

The government understands that families face social pressures that were largely absent a generation ago. Young people grow up surrounded by issues from which they cannot be sheltered. There is a sense that our society is more troubled than it once was.

The federal government is pursuing an agenda that is addressing those issues. However, we recognize there are a lot of ways people respond to those different kinds of uncertainty. One is backlash against people who are perceived as part of the problem. Any groups that are seen to be by some as pushing for too much or getting an undeserved share of too limited resources face an angry response.

I think this is the real motivation behind the Reform Party's introduction of this motion on best qualified.

However, the truth is often far different than those stories would indicate. Unfortunately, lots of people are having trouble finding good work. In fact, people from the designated groups under employment equity are more likely to experience those problems that other persons.

Employment equity is not about preferential treatment. The simple fact is that Bill C–64 does not oblige an employer to hire an unqualified person. It is quite explicit on that point.

Let me quote Mona Katawne of Manitoba Telephone System who testified before the standing committee. She said:

> There is no evidence that hiring from among the designated group members is a lowering of qualifications; in fact, the evidence is to the contrary. There are people from the designated groups who are both available to work and qualified to work.

The fact is that our economy has surpluses of highly qualified people from all designated groups for many of the jobs that are out there.

However, this myth of preferential treatment persists because of misinformation. A perfect example is the Gallup poll that appeared in the December 23, 1993 Toronto Star. The headlines blared that 74 per cent oppose job equity programs. Let us take a look at the actual question. What was the question? It was:

> Do you believe government should actively attempt to hire more women and minority group members for management positions, or should government take no action whatsoever and hire new employees based solely on their qualifications?

With such a question the response was what the headlines blared. The question unfairly forced people to choose between actively attempting to hire more women and minority group members and hiring based on qualifications. I am not surprised that 74 per cent, when asked such a question, chose qualifications.

Employment equity means broadening access to all qualified people. It means giving people the chance to become better qualified.

On virtually any scale people in the designated groups fare poorly in today's labour market. I want to underscore that point. There are still barriers to full participation by members of the designated groups. The goal of this legislation is to end those barriers, not to create a new discrimination against someone else. It is to end those barriers.

Let us look at one specific group that fares especially poorly in our labour market and that is people with disabilities. Only about 60 per cent of adults with disabilities are in the labour market at all. They have unemployment rates that are almost double the national average and that costs us all as Canadians.

The Canadian Association for Community Living did a study that looked at people with mental disabilities. They calculated the loss to our economy of large scale segregation of these people from our economy in terms of lost tax revenue due to unemployment, social assistance costs and lost consumption. They found that the cost to Canada's economy of keeping these people out of society in many ways is about $4.6 billion a year.

• (1530)

We must reject those attacks on employment equity and defeat the motion. It is important that those of us who come here responsibly realize and recognize the demands of society, the demands that are before us and do what Canadians expect of all of us in the House. They expect us to be caring, compassionate, responsible individuals ready to meet the needs of society, ready to ensure that equity and equality exist in society.

Mr. Larry McCormick (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to address the motion put forward by the hon. member to amend clause 6.

Let me say at the outset that clause 6 was included in the bill to dispel certain myths about employment equity. One such myth is that employment equity means hiring unqualified people. According to this myth employment equity requires employers to lower their standards and change their job requirements to accommodate inferior candidates.

This notion is absolutely false. It is pure nonsense. It is the complete misunderstanding of what employment equity is about and it is extremely degrading to members of designated groups.

We have included clause 6 in the bill to make it perfectly clear to everyone, so there can be no mistake. However the change proposed by the hon. member is unacceptable. Although it adds nothing of substance to the bill, it creates a host of additional problems by including the new notion of best qualified.

The first problem is obvious. What does best qualified mean? How do we determine best? Best according to whose definition? I do not deny that sometimes it may be possible to establish a very sophisticated, completely objective method to determine a best candidate, but too often best simply ends up meaning someone just like me. In these situations best becomes another excuse to create barriers. We do not need more barriers.

Who is best? Is the candidate with the most university degrees always the best? Let us say we are talking about hiring a cook or a manual labourer. Book learning is not the main qualification for the job. Obviously skill is. Is the candidate with a master's degree in law better qualified than the high school graduate, even though the degree has nothing to do with the job at all? Or, have we created just another barrier? I repeat that we do not need more barriers.

The government stands firm about employment equity. It does not require any employer to hire unqualified individuals. However it asks employers to look actively for qualified applicants in places they might not have previously looked. It asks them to find qualified workers in designated groups that have been overlooked and consider them along with other qualified candidates. It asks them to eliminate barriers in these processes, but it does not dictate the outcome of the hiring and the promotion decision. It certainly never asks them to hire someone who is not qualified.

Sometimes certain employers go further. Sometimes a big hearted employer will find and train people who have not had a chance. They will see to it that these people become qualified. Let us make no mistake. These employers do not have to do it. The law does not require it. However they find it brings their companies unexpected benefits.

I will tell a story about one such employer. Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, a crown corporation, recently instituted a special pilot program for four young people with intellectual disabilities. Three of the four have Down's syndrome. These four individuals were carefully trained for the company for temporary photocopying, filing and messenger jobs. They were always willing and co–operative. They were extremely proud of their new found independence and their success in this work. Their families were grateful that the responsibility for their children was being shared.

• (1535)

It is most interesting that although the four people required extra supervision they unexpectedly brought much happiness and compassion into the workplace. Though their lot in life was different they never complained. Their happiness and gratitude were contagious. They caused very beautiful qualities to blossom in their fellow workers who were touched and inspired by their innocence, simplicity and gratitude.

These four individuals brought a great deal of joy to the workplace. The project's participants, supervisors and workers received one of CMHC president's excellence awards in 1994. Though they may not have been the best qualified for the job according to traditional standards, they performed their job with enthusiasm and in doing it brought something special to the workplace. They made it a better workplace for everyone.

Sometimes the whole is more than just the sum of the parts. In looking for excellence we sometimes find it in the most unexpected places. We sometimes achieve it in the most unexpected ways. This is one lesson of employment equity. I would not want to tie in any way the hands of an employer who wants to undertake an innovative program such as the one at CMHC.

I frankly do not know what the full impact of including best qualified in this section might be. I fear, however, that it would ultimately constrain the efforts of employers who will look for best in new areas and for best in the sum total of the parts. For these reasons I cannot support the motion.

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to follow on the hon. member's comments with respect to the word best and the concept of best qualified which Reform is seeking to introduce into the legislation. It strikes me that it could have a twist, an irony of resulting in imposing on the private sector a ridiculous standard. The word best is very hard to define. The prior speaker indicated that he thought the language itself was problematic.

If we use the term best qualified then we would have to look somewhere for a definition of it. I briefly looked in the Oxford dictionary and it states that the word best can be an adjective, a noun or an adverb. It is defined as follows: "excelling all others, inherent or relative to some standard, the most appropriate, advantageous, desirable, or in a person, the kindest, the greatest in size or quantity", and so on.

I wonder how the Reform Party will explain that kind of an imposition of regulation on the private sector. Which of those definitions should we choose? Are we asking employers to hire the biggest person, the kindest person, the most appropriate person? If the job involves answering the telephone, do we need a Ph.D. in communications, or would a graduate certificate from a business college suffice? Could we use someone who has a physical disability to answer the telephone?

My view and the view of many people on this side of the House is that the imposition of the term best qualified is ridiculous in this context. How can we legislate a definition of best, a word that could have different grammatical forms?

All this goes back to the fundamental Reform position which is absurd in my view. Government is not here to create barriers. Government sometimes has to act to take away the barriers, to intervene on behalf of our citizens to remove barriers in different situations: barriers in the legal system and barriers in employment.

Reform has stated today: "The only criteria on which people should be hired or promoted is merit. Anything else is discrimination".

• (1540)

Testosterone levels are a little high on the Reform benches today. The concept of discrimination is dealt with under the Canadian Human Rights Act. If Reformers would bother to read that act, they would see that their definition of discrimination does not hold water.

The Canadian Human Rights Act specifically allows special programs designed to reduce the disadvantage suffered by groups or individuals when those disadvantages are based on race, national or ethnic origin, sex, disability and other characteristics such as accidents of one's birth or accidents of one's life. These programs are allowed under that statute and under the Constitution of Canada.

I know it upsets them to mention the charter of rights and freedoms because they do not like it. However I would like to draw the attention of hon. members to the law of the land, section 15(2) of the charter which deals with the right to equality before and under the law and to equal protection and benefit for all individuals.

Subsection 15(2) of the charter states:

> Subsection (1) does not preclude any law, program or activity that has as its object the amelioration of conditions of disadvantaged individuals or groups including those that are disadvantaged because of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

That is part of the country's Constitution. It means that equality means more than just treating everyone identically. It means that equality also requires special measures and the accommodation of differences. That is what employment equity seeks to do, to achieve equality in the workplace through the accommodation of differences, through the elimination of barriers, through outreach recruiting programs, but not through hiring the unqualified. This is not discrimination by any stretch of the imagination.

We fully support hiring on the basis of merit. Nobody is disputing that point. However Reformers have created a strawman. They call it discrimination. They set it up and then they knock it down.

That is why section 6 is included in the act. Section 6 is there because employment equity does not require any employer to hire someone who is unqualified. That is what section 6 does.

How much clearer can we be? Reform repeatedly insists on raising this spectre. I want to be perfectly clear that employment equity is by no stretch of the imagination discrimination. It is perfectly compatible with the Canadian Human Rights Act and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. If Reform members object then we should let their objection be against the foundations of the country and not against Employment Equity Act.

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have heard Reform members say that we should be hiring on the basis of merit. That is what the legislation is all about. It is what it has been all about for over eight years now.

It is about getting rid of barriers in the system that have prevented people from being hired, from being promoted, from being given job opportunity regardless of merit. Colour of their skin, aboriginal origin, disability and gender have all acted against people of merit and kept them from getting jobs. That is exactly what the legislation is about.

We disagree that the Reform Party does not want to accept the reality of life for over 60 per cent of Canadians who have not been given opportunity, despite their merit, despite their ability, despite the contribution they have to make. The legislation and the pre-existing Employment Equity Act are all about making merit and only merit the criteria on which hiring takes place.

I welcome the motion. It gives me an opportunity to clarify what the bill tries to do. It is an employment equity act. It is not an employment preference act. It is about creating equality in the workplace. It is about fairness. It is about removing employment barriers which blind us to the merit of individuals to provide all with the opportunity to compete fairly for jobs. It is about hiring qualified people to do the job, not only those who fit an image that for a long time we as a society and managers in our society have seen as the kind of person most likely to succeed.

Let me read what Bill C-64 says in this regard. The bill states that the obligation to implement employment equity does not require an employer to hire or promote unqualified persons. That is very clear, notwithstanding the comments that have been made about employment equity requiring somebody to hire somebody just because they are female or are black or Oriental or aboriginal or just because they use a wheelchair.

Members can refer to the existing paragraph 6(b) for confirmation. We want to create a level playing field for all workers. That is why we insist on the equal consideration of all qualified applicants. We believe that every individual, regardless of race, gender, or disability, must have a fair opportunity to prove his or her abilities and be given a fair chance to contribute to the Canadian workplace.

For far too long a large segment of our society has not been allowed to contribute to the Canadian economy the abilities they have. As we face an increasingly competitive global marketplace, we cannot afford not to use the full talents of all our people.

Bill C-64 is not about dictating to employers the result of an individual recruitment decision. It is about encouraging employers to assess their entire approach to employment, to make sure they do not either consciously or inadvertently create barriers to capable job candidates. Let me repeat that: capable job candidates.

There is no doubt those barriers do exist. I believe my hon. colleague underestimates the prevalence of systemic although unconscious discrimination in the workplace. It is as insidious as it is invisible. Countless well qualified men and women members of the designated groups have not obtained positions or promotions because of their race, their physical attributes, or their gender. To dispute this is to deny mountains of reports that consistently paint a picture of workplace injustice. To deny this is to deny the real daily, painful experience and frustration of millions of Canadians who are not allowed to contribute consistent with their ability.

Systemic discrimination is no longer acceptable. With this legislation we are encouraging employers to create the conditions in which no segment of the population will be discriminated against or excluded in job competitions. Only in this way can we be assured those selected will be the most capable of doing the task.

I hope my hon. colleague understands this bill establishes a floor, a foundation from which employers can build a more equitable and representative workforce. They can only do that by getting rid of barriers that have kept women, people of colour, aboriginal people, and people with disabilities largely in the lowest paying jobs.

The point of the act is not to tell employers how to go about the details of their business. This House is not interested in the micro-management of the affairs of business. Employers have made it clear they do not need nor want the hand of government in their internal operations. That is why this amendment is so out of place. The impact of the Reform Party's amendment would be to get into the business of telling companies how to run their businesses.

Best by whose definition? Best by the definition that has taken the category of clerks in the public service, the lowest paid and probably the least qualified in many cases. Eighty-five per cent of them are women. But in the top ranks of that lowest category, guess who rises? It is not the women, who are 84 per cent of the employees, but the men.

• (1550)

We have had employment equity not by legislation but by policy in the federal government for over a decade. Still barely 18 per cent of our management category are women.

Maybe Reform Party members would like to make the argument that women are inherently less qualified and that is why they have not risen to the top. Well, I would love to see them try to justify that argument.

Maybe they have not read the reports that say that equally or better qualified black males in the country earn up to 20 per cent less than white males. Maybe they have not seen the reports that document how the disabled are kept out of employment and if they do get employment it is often temporary, short term and low paying.

Maybe Reform members want preferential treatment for less than half of our population to continue. Maybe they do not want everybody to have an equal opportunity. Well, this government does. We believe that we have an extremely talented population and it is going to be essential to our competitiveness that we use every bit of talent this country possesses. We have to get rid of the blinkers and blinders that have kept both government and the private sector from giving opportunities to people based solely on their merit. We have to get rid of the perception of gender that says women cannot do certain kinds of jobs or certainly cannot do them as well as men.

I do not know a man who is competent or capable who is not prepared to compete on an equal playing field with any woman in Canadian society. Those who want to continue preferential treatment must have something to fear, and they all seem to be concentrated in the Reform Party.

This country has prided itself on equality of opportunity. This is another step forward in equality of opportunity. The Reform Party keeps referring to social engineering. Well, it is social engineering when 90 per cent of those who rise to the top represent less than half of the population. That is social engineering. It is unconscionable. It is a waste of the talents and energy of the majority of the Canadian population.

No, I do not have all the answers. But I do know that I do not want to walk into the banks of this country and tell them very precisely that they must hire only the best qualified, which then government would be constrained to define in the legislation so they could apply my definition to every single hiring process, which happens by the hundreds of thousands in the banks of this country every year. No, I do not want to operate that way. Yet that is the way the amendment from the Reform Party would have us operate.

I urge the House to reject the amendment and I urge us to get on with the business of hiring people in the country based on merit and not on their gender, race, disability, or aboriginal origin.

Mr. Harbance Singh Dhaliwal (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to speak on the bill and maybe share with my colleagues some of my own experiences in this area.

I can tell the House that Bill C–64 is very progressive because it is the way corporations and large businesses are going. As members of the board of directors of B.C. Hydro, we adopted a theme and a vision for the corporation that the workforce of the corporation should reflect the community it serves.

The bankers have said it is the right way to go. Let me read to the House what the Canadian bankers have stated on employment equity: "It has stimulated fundamental reviews and enhancement in the bank's human resource policies and practices, which have benefited everyone. It has helped us lay the foundation for managing an increasingly diverse workforce, something every employer of choice in the 1990s wants to do well."

• (1555)

Whether it is West Coast Energy, the banks, or any other corporation, they have recognized that the future workforce is going to be diverse. They have to plan for that diverse workforce. They have to ensure that the future workforce has the skills. Employment equity takes the barriers down. It takes away those barriers that do exist. And they do exist.

I remember when I was about 18 years old I used to work in a sawmill at Crown Zellerbach. I noticed that out of a very large workforce of 2,000 to 2,500 it did not reflect what every other sawmill reflected. It came to my attention that the personnel manager at that time was discriminating. He was discriminating against hiring visible minorities.

I had a job there. I got a job and I could have said I have my job, I do not have to worry about this. But it did not reflect the community. People who would apply there from visible minority groups and who had the qualifications would not get hired.

I remember I was 18 years old and I made an appointment with the vice–president of the corporation. I went there and said he had a personnel manager who discriminates against certain groups and is not hiring them. Of course they were very defensive and said that it was not true, but in fact it was true. It was true.

Even though the vice–president of the corporation at that time did not admit that, the personnel manager was let go. Lo and behold, over the next two or three years we saw quite a different hiring procedure, quite a different way in which people were hired.

There are barriers all the time. There are barriers against the disabled. I know that. My own father unfortunately lost his vision around 22 or 23 years ago, when he was a young man of 40. When that happens to someone who is close to you, you realize the barriers that exist for them, the barriers in their daily life, never mind the barriers of trying to get employment, trying to make sure that you are fulfilling your daily life, the things we take for granted.

This employment equity bill recognizes that barriers exist against certain groups. We want to have a plan to reduce those barriers just as we do in this House. We want to ensure for example that more women are represented in the House. Is it wrong to plan to do things in a better way to improve their representation in the House? Is that wrong? That is right.

There are ways we can do things to take away those barriers, to reduce those barriers. That is what the employment equity bill is all about. It recognizes that barriers exist and that we want both in the public sector and in the private sector to lay out a plan. Maybe it is their hiring procedure. They have to look at how they hire.

For example, the aboriginal community has been left out, and we have to work hard to include them. Look at the social problems in the aboriginal community. I have gone through the streets of Vancouver with a policeman and walked through some of the most difficult areas there. We know that we have neglected our job, that we have not done it, because we see so many of them with drug and alcohol problems, with tremendous social problems. They have been left out. They have not been able to participate in the benefits and in the economy.

First we must recognize those barriers exist. All of this is a plan to see how we can tear down those barriers, reduce those barriers by saying we are not doing things the right way. Maybe we are not hiring in the right way. Maybe we are not planning, maybe we are not training. All of these things are very important.

It is also beneficial and profitable for the corporation. As someone who was an employer, I know how important it is to make sure you have a diverse workforce because in the global economy that diverse workforce will be a great advantage to you. It will provide new sources of energy, different ways of looking at things and it will open doors when we trade in the international community and in the global economy. We have to recognize that as an asset. We have to recognize that our diverse population is a tremendous asset. We have to recognize that in all our corporations and companies the diverse population should be reflected in those institutions and in our private sector corporations.

• (1600)

This is an excellent bill. When the members of the Reform really have a good look at this bill they will support it. It will make sure we do things better, that we include people, that we make sure we have a good reflection of what this country is all about in all our institutions, in our private corporations as well as our public corporations.

The Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 5. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 78, the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

We will now turn to Group No. 4, Motion No. 7.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ) moved:

Motion No. 7

That Bill C–64, in Clause 15, be amended by replacing lines 14 to 27, on page 10, with the following:

"(b) the preparation of the employer's employment equity plan.

(2) Where the employees are represented by a bargaining agent, the bargaining agent shall participate in a consultation under subsection (1).

(3) A consultation under subsection (1) is not a form of co–management.

(4) The employer and its employees' representatives must implement and revise the employment equity plan jointly."

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am tempted to say that this is one of the best motions you will see during your career, and I am rather confident at this point that even the government will support it.

We spent a lot of time reviewing Bill C–64, which was referred to our committee at second reading. This motion essentially provides that employment equity must be based on a joint effort, so as to ensure that it is effective and that the prescribed objectives are reflected in the workplace.

Any organization that has been successful in promoting employment equity has managed to do so because the employer's and the employees' representatives got together and agreed on certain objectives.

This amendment seeks to ensure that employees' representatives can participate in the preparation and implementation of the employment equity plan. As you know, the Bloc Quebecois is very much in favour of employment equity.

The problem that we found when we reviewed this bill, and the parliamentary secretary should pay attention since his support would be helpful, is that there is no clear provision to ensure that workers will be involved in the implementation of the plan.

The bill only includes a rather vague provision on the implementation of employment equity plans, and the parliamentary secretary cannot claim to ignore the fact that the clause did not receive much support.

Indeed, the parliamentary secretary surely remembers that, when union officials appeared before the committee, they expressed a great deal of concern about clauses 14 and 15 dealing with the consultation process. Clause 15 refers to a consultation, but it does so in general terms; there is no mandatory or compulsory process.

• (1605)

It is very important to understand the purpose of the amendment, and I think the Reform Party will agree that an employment equity policy is not feasible without the consent of all parties within a company.

That is definitely the purpose of this amendment. Companies and workers even came to see us to compare notes. They told us that in the Canada Labour Code, a provision required the policy on sexual harassment to be posted. What kind of action or measures should be part of an employer's policy against sexual harassment? A number of unions came to see us and said that ideally, to promote employment equity each employee should receive the employment equity plan. The plan would be available in the company and be posted in public rooms and areas.

We can never stress enough the importance of consultation and consensus in achieving this goal. We were, and still are, afraid that if we as parliamentarians, if the House of Commons does not adopt this amendment, the bill will again suffer a degree of imbalance and there would be a definite bias towards the employer and a tendency to be less forthcoming to the representatives of the workers.

I may recall that this bill will make the Canadian Human Rights Commission responsible for monitoring employment equity. In case of violations of this legislation, the commission may establish an employment equity review tribunal.

This is a major innovation. Unfortunately, the tribunal will not include labour representatives. What also bothers us in this bill is that because there will be an employment equity review tribunal consisting of three people, there will be no right of appeal. This is quite a decision, and I see Mr. Speaker, that you share my reservations and that is your social conscience speaking out.

My point is that there are few instances under our justice system when there is no right of appeal. In most cases, whether we are talking about criminal law or an administrative tribunal, it is a foregone conclusion, and the hon. member for Lotbinière is aware of this, that the person who appears before a tribunal always has the possibility of launching an appeal.

In this case, there is a clear imbalance which the amendments of the Bloc Quebecois are meant to correct, and I am confident that the government majority will support this view. As for the Reform Party, knowing what they are like, I never felt very confident about their support.

It would be very interesting at this time, for continuation of the debate, if the parliamentary secretary would rise and agree with me that the bill would be improved by acceptance of the Bloc Quebecois amendments, which I would remind you would ensure that negotiating agents, if present in a company, would be involved in more than just the drafting process, through the employer's possibility of consulting them. These consultations, however, are often optional rather than mandatory.

With our amendments, there would be an obligation not only to consult the workers' representatives, the negotiating agents, but also to involve them in the implementation process. Consultation is equally important during implementation, when an employment equity plan has been agreed upon, as it often has to be lived with for two, three or four years. There may be staff turnover, but the basic objectives remain.

We on this side of the House are of the belief that the way to meet the objectives, and to ensure that the plan is what both management and labour want, is to require the employer's representative, who may make his views known in a tribunal specifically designed for that purpose, to remedy any existing imbalance, and to ensure not only that workers and their representatives are consulted on an optional basis, but rather that their participation in the implementation process is mandatory.

As you know, the implementation process is, in concrete terms, the way the objectives will be met after concrete agreement on an employment equity program is reached. This is something no legislator can put into the wording of a statute, because it is part of the internal dynamics of a company. It is a bit like a marriage contract. You may well say: "Who does he think he is, talking of marriage?"

But you would be wrong in that, Mr. Speaker, because I have many examples around me of what marriage is, and I know that marriage is a matter of trust. It is a matter of an undertaking between two individuals, whether of the same sex or of opposite sexes, who have chosen to forge a link of trust. For employment equity to be a viable entity, for it to be realistic, there must be trust and understanding involving all parties concerned. And by all parties concerned I mean of course the negotiating agents, if present in the company, and the representatives of the employer.

I would be extremely disappointed—having invested a great deal of energy, working hard on the committee, as the government is well aware, the parliamentary secretary as well—extremely disappointed if ever these amendments were struck down. I must admit that my confidence in this government would be seriously compromised in future if that happened.

Mr. Mac Harb (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to express our reservations concerning the amendment presented by my colleague. Like my colleagues I do, however, appreciate what my colleague and his party, the Bloc Quebecois, are attempting to do with a view to improving Bill C–64.

Examining the motion, I find it goes a bit too far. Its intentions are probably honourable, but if we look at it in detail, the amendment is not practical. What is being proposed in this amendment is to create a prerequisite that both groups, employers and employees, establish equity plans.

[English]

This proposed change to the legislation would create a requirement for employer and employee representatives to implement and revise employment equity plans jointly.

I can appreciate that my colleagues believe it is essential to have labour input for the planning and application of employment equity in the workplace. I assure them that within the existing legislation provisions have been made to ensure there will be consultation and collaboration between the parties in the preparation, implementation and revisions of companies' employment equity plans.

The bill was amended by the standing committee as a result of input from the Bloc Quebecois. It was the previous speaker who encouraged the committee to include this provision.

Clause 15 of Bill C–64 acknowledges that collaboration between management and labour is necessary if changes sought by employment equity are to come about. It signals that success in achieving an employment equity workforce requires the active collaboration of labour and employers to eliminate artificial barriers to members of the designated groups. However, we must not confuse representation with responsibility. Collaboration is not co–management for very good reasons.

If implemented this amendment could seriously compromise the prerogatives of management to implement employment equity at the work site as it sees fit.

• (1615)

The employer must have the final say over the way employment equity affects the workplace because it is ultimately the employer who is legally responsible for the act's implementation. Only management is accountable for meeting the obligations set out in this legislation. It would be patently unfair to impose that responsibility on management if it was forced to share all decision making with its employee representatives.

There are several other good reasons this motion must be defeated. Among them is the fact that the proposed amendment would only preserve the co–management limitations for the initial preparation of an employment equity plan. This provision would be removed for the implementation and revision phases of the employment equity plans. Further and perhaps of greatest consequence, the amendment could lead to a requirement for negotiation between labour and management rather than a consultation.

I can assure the House that we are not prepared to see employment equity used as a bargaining chip in contract talks and negotiations. A bargaining agent might refuse to co–operate, perhaps motivated by reasons that have absolutely nothing to do with the goals of employment equity and thereby bring the implementation of a workplace plan to a halt. We will not have this critical piece of legislation compromised by the vagaries of union–management talks in negotiations.

Another important consideration is that employment equity is an integral part of human resources management. Company after company testified before the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons and told us what an important tool employment equity has become in their overall business plans.

The sort of regime proposed by the Bloc Quebecois might provide unions with an opportunity to exercise direct influence in areas that remain the sole prerogatives of management, such as recruitment.

I have several other fundamental problems with this motion, which is obviously very flawed. Let us look at the reality that the collaboration requirement cannot be the subject of a direction by the human rights commission or an order by a tribunal. Clearly a true spirit of co–operation has to come about spontaneously. It cannot be forced or coerced.

Aside from that, there is the fact that the primary reason the government decided against making this collaboration the subject of a direction or order is that there is no provision in the act for a tribunal to make orders against a bargaining agent.

Collaboration requires two parties working together. It would be discriminatory to enforce this provision against only one of those parties, that is, the employer. It is worth noting that the proposed amendment will also reduce the consultation requirement that exists in Bill C–64.

In the amendment there no longer has to be consultation about the implementation or revision of an employment equity plan. That consultation requirement can be the subject of a direction by the commission or an order by a tribunal. I must say I find it surprising that the Bloc would recommend deleting these crucial provisions and replacing them with weaker provisions that cannot be the subject of a direction or order.

For these reasons, it simply does not make sense to seriously entertain this motion. The government is satisfied with the clause the way it now stands as amended in committee.

Again I want to thank the Bloc for its contribution in committee in this regard. I believe our willingness to accommodate the Bloc's concerns is testament to the goodwill we see in this House. But we must not be tempted by good intentions to push the process too far. To go further is inadvisable.

Our approach to this issue is not arbitrary nor is our amendment despotic. It is simply realistic. Management has the final responsibility for all employer obligations under the bill and will be answerable to the Canadian Human Rights Commission if the obligations are not met. Therefore final decision making must continue to belong to management.

I trust that this explanation satisfies the House that this motion must be rejected. I urge my colleagues to do precisely that.

• (1620)

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. I am rising to speak in support of my colleague's motion.

Members present all know that this legislation is going to go through come hell or high water, so the very least we can try to do is make it better. This motion by my hon. colleague does make it better. It ensures that the workers, the people who are intimately involved in this, have a say in what goes on.

As long as we are going to have this employment equity or affirmative action, the very least we can do is try to make sure it is going to work. The motion put forward by my colleague from the Bloc will go a long way in helping to ensure that it does work. Therefore, I rise to make the point that we are in support of this motion.

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can hardly stay on my feet after that. It is phenomenal.

The hon. member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve has made a great contribution to this legislation at committee. Although I am not a permanent member of that committee, I do have some interest in this particular legislation. I sat in on that committee a couple of times and was very encouraged by his participation.

I do have some reservations about this motion but not because I am not sympathetic to union–sided labour requests. In fact I am very sympathetic to their concerns. However, it seems to me this section is not necessary in order to get co–operation between management and trade unions or employee unions in this context. Any employment equity plan could and should and indeed probably will be the subject of a collective agreement.

The problem I have with this is in legislating union involvement as opposed to leaving the balance between management and unions the way it is so that management retains the prerogative in terms of recruitment.

It seems to me that clause 15, which the member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve had a hand in establishing at committee, sets out the necessary collaboration between management and labour. However, the problem is that ultimately, because management has the prerogative to hire, only management can have the responsibility under the scheme of this act.

I would be afraid that if we create a scheme where management and union are both responsible, then effectively we undermine our ability to enforce employment equity through management. We cannot simultaneously undermine management and promote a scheme that would make labour responsible for management activities. It seems to me this is an integral part of human resources management and an important part of the general Canadian way of doing business.

Only the employer has the final decision on who to hire, promote, train or terminate. The hon. member should be conscious of the importance of that within this bill because it allows us to maintain the balance between management and labour. There is no disagreement here. We need the unions to participate fully, but we cannot upset the balance by forcing them to co–design a program or to consider them co–responsible with employers or we are going to undermine the system.

I would like to remind my colleague that workforces of employers are often represented by more than one union. This happens frequently, for instance, in Windsor, Ontario where I am from. If all union representatives were expected to co–manage the preparation, implementation and revision of this kind of plan there could be a situation of protracted delays in implementation, increased costs to employers and possible deterioration in labour–management relations.

To my good friend from the Reform Party, I would like to point out the cost of this to government would be phenomenal. If unions as well as employers were to submit reports and the human resources ministry required to make the reports public, there would be significant additional costs incurred. Since the human resources development ministry is required to make reports public, every expansion requires a greater budget for copying and distribution to interested parties across the country.

It is because of the Canadian people and in their interests that the Employment Equity Act is where it is today. It is a viable and effective tool for human resources management. I think we should let it continue to work the way it is, working co–operatively between management and unions. This has been done successfully in most employment equity activities for over a decade. Employers should continue to strive to get the input of interested parties in this valuable process, but let it be part of the collective bargaining system rather than something we enforce.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by associating myself most strongly with the cogent and competent comments of my colleague. I would continue the alliterative strain by naming her, but that of course would be unparliamentary, so I would merely congratulate the member for Windsor—St. Clair.

I want to say that I congratulate as well the member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve because I know he has worked very hard on the committee. However I think his amendments in this particular vein do not go anywhere to further the spirit of the bill. It is furthering the spirit of the bill that the passage is all about. I guess I could say we want it to go through spiritus intactus, because this is a very important piece of legislation. It is important because it is broadly misunderstood in more than one area.

I heard earlier today, before leaving the House to go to committee, people equate employment equity and affirmative action. I want to talk about that first of all because employment equity and affirmative action are not the same thing. Indeed, if I could go into employment equity, especially today, when we have all been visited by members and representatives of the Canadian Medical Association, a medical metaphor might be appropriate. When I say that employment equity is preventive, affirmative action is curative.

I might add that affirmative action is something that is enshrined in our Constitution, in our charter of rights and freedoms. Employment equity too has a very respectable and respected history in the House and indeed in the legislatures of a number of the provinces.

When I hear employment equity attacked I constantly hear it attacked on the basis of a new disadvantaged group. I want to make it very clear that I am not speaking now with tongue in cheek. I am not being sarcastic. I am, if anything, being plaintive. As I stand here in the House of Commons in this fall of 1995 I am a little tired of hearing that white males in this society are some sort of endangered species. White males still get 60 per cent of the jobs in this country. Name the profession, name the job category, name the area and they still do better than anybody else.

Just look at the Chamber when it is full. Look at it tonight when we have the vote. Who are the overwhelming members of this Chamber in all parties? White males, and fond I am of most of you. However there is no question that it does not reflect the demographic picture of this country.

First, if the House were to reflect this country demographically, 52 per cent of the seats would be taken up by females first and foremost. We are slowly but surely getting to that point.

• (1630)

An hon. member: Right on.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I apologize. There appears to be some problem with the ventilation system in the Chamber. I am not responsible for the noise I assure you.

The Deputy Speaker: The member has a good point but I would ask her if she would please not use the term "you" except when referring to whomever happens to be in the chair. I am sure the noise will diminish.

Ms. Clancy: I apologize, Mr. Speaker. At any rate I have used this phrase in a somewhat humorous vein but I will use it in truth here in this Chamber.

A number of my colleagues in debates on gender equality, employment equity or in whatever particular area you want said to me: "There are women's groups, where are the men's groups?" I say not at all in jest there is a men's group and it is called western civilization. That is the men's group.

If you go to any legislative assembly in the western world with the exception of two of the Scandinavian nations, the majority of elected members are white males. This is not to say that white males do not do a good job. Sure they do. But it is not the only face to be represented. Nor is it the only face to be represented on television stations, in radio stations, in fire stations, in whatever areas of employment, particularly those that come under the purview of the federal government.

It was my great pleasure and to my great benefit in the area of education that in the last Parliament I was the vice–chair of the committee that reviewed the employment equity legislation. I listened to a number of well–meaning white males who came before the committee and bragged. For example, in one organization—I will not name it but it has something to do with horses and red coats—in 24 years of an employment equity program it had added to the very highest echelons something like 20 women. Mr. Speaker, I think you will sympathize with me that I found that statistic a little wanting, not to say a little daunting as well.

There is not a homogeneous culture in this country. There are any number of phrases that can be used to describe the beautiful face of Canada. The one that I heard most in my childhood was a vertical mosaic. I still like that one. I think it speaks very well to us.

We have used the phrase multiculturalism over the years and I like that one too. I like the fact, no, I love the fact that in this House of Commons today we see represented a variety, a rainbow of races, religious backgrounds, creeds and so on. That is the face of Canada. Our sorrow, our tragedy and our fault as legislators is that the rainbow is not represented the way it should be in the employment categories in those various institutions that fall within the federal purview.

When we dealt with employment equity in that committee in the last Parliament the big problem was enforcement and teeth. This bill is going to change that. This bill is going to make employment equity a reality.

I can only say that those people who fear it—and I am prepared to explain the difference between affirmative action and employment equity if they have a problem—do not really understand it. There is nothing to fear in allowing, encouraging and promoting the participation in the fullest sense of the word of all Canadians. It is our country. It belongs to all of us. Everyone should have equality of opportunity.

• (1635)

I do not for one instant think that anyone on either side of the House would be prepared to stand and deny that he or she agrees with equality of opportunity. That is something that all of us, no matter what our political stripe, agree with.

Consequently, if one agrees with that, then they must support this legislation. This legislation is not about special rights. It is not about saying to people they deserve something better because they are different. It is saying: "You deserve your share of the Canadian dream. You deserve equality of opportunity. You deserve to have systemic discrimination, unnatural barriers removed so that with your training and your ability no matter what your skin colour, your gender, your religious background, your regional background, et cetera, you have the same road ahead of you as any other Canadian".

As we stand here and go forward in these pre-referendum days, Canadians are looking to us as legislators to talk about what this country really means. All of us know that what it really means is fairness, a sense of justice and an opportunity even for people who do not know what they are talking about to speak.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is part of the government. I would hope she would stay for just a few moments because I want to back up some of what she just said.

There are some things she could do as a government member that ought to be done with regard to a certain problem that has developed literally outside the doors of this Chamber. As we all know, a construction program is going on outside. Fuller Construction has a renovation job. It has subcontracted to another contractor who has in turn subcontracted some more to a unit run by Ray Wolf. He apparently made the mistake of having a 32-year old female engineer named Ms. Raney in charge of the project. The intermediate contractor forced Mr. Wolf to quit the job because he was using a female engineer.

Since the hon. member is part of the government I would hope she is listening to this and will do what she can to intervene to make certain this injustice is corrected.

I realize the interim construction company is headed by someone from the Middle East who has a different view of the role of women than some of the rest of Canadian society. However, we live under Canadian law. These are the Canadian Houses of Parliament his company is working on. Surely there could be more ability to recognize people on merit rather than to discriminate against them because a company chooses to use a female engineer.

I do not want to say very much more about this legislation. I am just so angry this kind of thing can happen here on the grounds of Parliament Hill that I wanted to make sure it was raised after someone who has been a firm and loud protector of the equality of women as is the member for Halifax who preceded me.

I was hoping I could add some fire to her usual ability to get things done that would have her take on this case and see if the minister of public works cannot correct this great injustice which has no place in the Parliament of Canada or in this country.

• (1640)

Mr. Peter Thalheimer (Timmins—Chapleau, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to say at the outset that the Bloc's recommendations have resulted in improvements to Bill C-64. My hon. colleague from Hochelaga—Maisonneuve contributed to the work of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons. His dedication to employment equity has added to the legislation.

I have to admit I was somewhat surprised to see Motion No. 7 put forward by the opposition. The Bloc Quebecois has already raised this issue in committee and the committee has gone a considerable way to accommodate it. The hon. member persuaded the committee to accept a requirement that employers and labour must collaborate in the preparation, implementation and revision of the employment equity plan.

Let me begin by reminding the House the existing act only calls for consultation between the employer and worker representatives. Bill C–64 would go further, ensuring that employees through their unions or employee representatives will have considerably more input to their company's equity plan when the plan is developed, implemented and revised. We saw the merit of this approach and have endorsed it. However, the proposed amendment to the bill goes too far and is not advisable. Allow me to explain why.

This amendment would preserve the employer's sole responsibility to prepare its employment equity plan in consultation with employee representatives. However, if adopted this motion would import a government imposed requirement for co–management rather than collaboration between the employer and employee representatives in the implementation and revision of employment equity plans.

This poses some potentially serious problems since the obligations set out in the act are imposed on employers alone. A bargaining agent might very well refuse to co–operate, perhaps motivated by reasons that have nothing to do with employment equity, and could bring the implementation of employment equity to a standstill, potentially putting the employer in a situation of non–compliance.

Furthermore, since employment equity is an integral part of human resource management this sort of regime might provide unions with an opportunity to exercise direct influence in areas that have usually remained the sole prerogative of management such as hiring and promotion.

Surely my hon. colleague will recognize that management should have the final responsibility for all employer obligations under the bill and would be held accountable if those responsibilities are not met. It is only reasonable, therefore, that final decision making continue to belong to management in this area.

For the benefit of all employers and worker representatives and for the good of workplace relations, I must recommend the House not accept the proposed amendment.

Mr. Murray Calder (Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to say at the outset that I endorse the principle of labour–management consultation and co–operation on matters relating to the workplace under federal jurisdiction.

We all know that working together brings out the best results for all concerned. This is what we are trying to achieve in the wording of clause 15 of Bill C–64 as it has been reported back from the standing committee.

Let me read the introductory portion of what clause 15 currently says:

> Every employer shall consult with its employees' representatives by inviting the representatives to provide their views—

Bill C–64 also explicitly recognizes the role of bargaining agents in the workplace. I quote further from clause 15:

> Where employees are represented by a bargaining agent, the bargaining agent shall participate in a consultation under subsection (1).

The above provisions underline the kind of environment we all want to have in the workplace.

• (1645)

We do not want management to be making arbitrary decisions without addressing the interests of employees. We want the employees to be fully involved in all matters that involve them, be they health and safety issues or employment equity issues.

We want to have a policy of inclusion followed, not one of exclusion. We believe that everyone in the workplace should have the opportunity to put forward their ideas and views. In line with the entire spirit of employment equity is the elimination of barriers.

The standing committee recognized the value of this type of consultation when it reviewed the bill introduced at first reading. The testimony they heard from the witnesses at their hearings led them to strengthen the provisions. The provisions currently in the bill have already been strengthened from what was originally proposed. All one has to do is to read further in clause 15:

> Every employer and its employees' representatives shall collaborate in the preparation, implementation and revision of the employer's employment equity plan.

The standing committee added the concept of collaboration. This goes beyond the concept of consultation. However the standing committee recognized that the concept of collaboration could not interfere with employers' obligations under the act.

It is for the individual employer who has specific obligations under the act that there are provisions for non–compliance when the employer fails to meet these obligations. That is why there is a very important provision at the end of clause 15:

> Consultation under subsection (1) and collaboration under subsection (3) are not forms of co–management.

We need to recognize the responsibility for implementing employment equity in the workplace is that of management. The current wording of the bill provides for this. That is why I have so many problems with the wording of Motion No. 7. We have to be very careful in considering the implications of the proposed amendment.

If adopted the amendment would require the employer and its employees' representatives to implement and revise the employment equity plan jointly. In a perfect world perhaps this would work, but we must recognize that we are still trying to achieve a perfect world, as my colleagues from the Reform Party tell me on a daily basis. This is one reason there is need for an employment equity act and this is one reason the proposed amendment goes too far.

A number of problems would result if the motion were adopted and the act subsequently proclaimed into law. Employers could try to evade their responsibilities by saying that progress is being stalled by an unco–operative bargaining agent. Presumably there would be a call for a compliance officer to intervene, but there are no enforceable obligations on bargaining agents in the legislation. There would be nothing a compliance officer could do in a case where there are bad relations between labour and management, perhaps as a result or in connection with an industrial dispute.

Employment equity is related to the human resources management field and to the hiring and promotion processes. These are traditionally considered to be areas reserved for management. We have to recognize this reality.

• (1650)

Again I reinforce the purpose of the act as set out in section 2:

> The purpose of this act is to achieve equality in the workplace so that no person shall be denied employment opportunities or benefits for reasons unrelated to ability and, in the fulfilment of that goal, to correct the conditions of disadvantage in employment experienced by women, aboriginal peoples, persons with disabilities and members of visible minorities by giving effect to the principle that employment equity means more than treating persons in the same way but also requires special measures and the accommodation of differences.

In summary the purpose of the act is to achieve equality in the workplace and to correct the conditions and disadvantages experienced by certain groups. Bill C–64, as currently worded, provides the appropriate balance between employee participation, management powers and obligations. That is why we should not adopt the motion.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the question to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment is as follows: the hon. member for Davenport—nuclear tests.

[English]

Mr. Rey D. Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak to Motion No. 7 that is before us.

I congratulate the member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve who has been an excellent member of the committee on human rights which I had the privilege of chairing and which looked into the bill before the House today. The member made a lot of useful contributions to the committee. I am glad he affixed his signature to the majority report.

There are still sentiments the member would like to continue to advance. I respect his need to see to it that employees' representatives be at the management table. Although he indicated that the amendment would not result in co–management, I think there are grave doubts and concerns about the amendment. That is why the majority of committee members saw to it that it would not happen.

Why was that? It was because one of the underlying principles of the bill was a balanced approach to the setting of plans and the implementation of the employment equity plan. In that so–called balanced approach we must ensure that as we invoke obligations for employers we do not provide them with unnecessary onerous and impractical burdens. Were the employees to be given this right despite the disclaimer it is very conceivable that it would be construed as a co–management approach. Certainly we feel it will add a real burden for businesses in particular.

In recognition of the contribution of the member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve we amended the bill to see to it that employers and employees collaborate and consult in the preparation of the plan. We would have liked to have seen the employees' representatives being in on the co–management approach. In the spirit of co–operation at committee level we saw to it that employers would provide information to the employees about the purpose of the employment equity measures of the bill that will be undertaken in the implementation of a given employment equity plan.

The committee also made the point that the bill would not require public availability of employment equity plans which, to be effective, would contain confidential and proprietary information on the part of businesses. Every member of the House would like to see to it that we do not divulge what businesses feel are their proprietary properties and therefore necessary to ensure their competitive advantage in the business world.

• (1655)

We feel we must reject the amendment. In effect it would take the prerogative of management from employers. It would impose an impractical burden on them. Since the act in its totality imposes that legal obligation only on employers for failure to set and adopt an employment equity plan, it is only fair this kind of responsibility rests solely with employers where the legal obligation rests.

I can conceive of one possibility, for example. In the process of the joint approach to the development of the plan the bargaining agent for the employees, for reasons not related to the implementation of the equity plan, could stall or delay the finalization of the plan for reasons other than those related to the employment equity plan. It would delay what we would like to have happen. On that basis we have to continue to retain the prerogative of the act to give the obligation, responsibility and privilege to employers.

Briefly, again to put into context the motion before us, why is it important that we not overburden employers? In the beginning the employment equity concept in Canada started as a consequence of bias, of prejudice against employees. Those instances happened before the sixties and in the sixties the practice was recognized. Human rights legislation was enacted to potentially correct the biases and discrimination.

Those approaches proved to be insufficient and so came the second phase in the evolution of the concept, that systemic barriers exist in the system; unintended bias one may call it, systemic discrimination, but not without malice.

To solve the problem of systemic barriers it is important to get the full co–operation of employers on the business side. It is important that we do not introduce any kind of provision in the act that businesses will see as an additional burden.

Canada should be proud today that in so far as the employment equity legislation is concerned we nearly have unanimous support from the business community at large. We should thank that community for its confidence in the initiative of the government. We should continue to recognize that privilege. If we work on a co–operative and collaborative basis, we will achieve more. Canada is unique in that regard. I can sense the hon. member is now agreeing to the arguments I am proposing.

We welcome the contribution of the member, but I feel we should reject the motion for the reasons I have indicated. We need the full provisions of the employment equity law in Canada and we need to reinforce it very strongly. Now that we have extended the coverage and now that we have invoked an enforcement mechanism, the world is looking to us as a model. Contrary to an earlier amendment from the third party, we have embarked upon a new milestone, the further evolution of the concept of employment equity.

As I said earlier in the debate on another motion, the committee in its wisdom respecting employment equity made a commitment to merit. I think even Mr. Speaker is smiling at the beauty of this report.

I ask members to reject this motion.

CULTURAL PROPERTY EXPORT AND IMPORT ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–93, an act to amend the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

The Deputy Speaker: It being 5 p.m. the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the motion at second reading stage of Bill C–93, an act to amend the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act.

Call in the members.

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

NUCLEAR TESTS

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in September I asked the Minister of Foreign Affairs whether in light of the French government's decision to resume nuclear tests he would call for a boycott of products made in France. The minister replied that although he deplores France's decision to test, it is more important that next year France sign the comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty.

• (1730)

Last May in Geneva, 25 years after the nuclear non-proliferation treaty was signed, 178 nations voted to extend it and make it forever illegal for any member country beyond the original five nuclear powers to develop nuclear weapons. In return, nuclear powers would sign a permanent test ban treaty next year, a first step in dismantling their nuclear arsenals as required under the non-proliferation treaty.

While negotiations for a comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty are under way, France has embarked on a course of action that threatens to destabilize this important treaty process. When these actions are combined with a reopened debate in the United States on whether nuclear tests below 500 pounds of explosives should be allowed under the proposed treaty, you can see why non-nuclear nations are wondering whether nuclear powers are truly committed to a comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty and the eventual elimination of their nuclear arsenals.

The government of President Chirac argues that the principal reason the present tests are necessary is to provide data for developing nuclear test simulation software. I repeat: nuclear test simulation software. By contrast, in 1991 President

François Mitterrand ordered that nuclear test simulation software be developed without further tests. In addition, the American and British governments have already developed nuclear test simulation capabilities. The fact that the technology for nuclear test simulation already exists renders current tests by France unnecessary.

As we talk in this chamber, the O.J. Simpson trial and other recent murder trials command more attention than the actions taken by the French government, which threaten the comprehensive test ban treaty process and the South Pacific environment. Such actions should not just be deplored, they ought to be forcefully criticized, as the Australian and Japanese governments have done.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs ought to call in the ambassador for France and ask that the French government stop all further tests. If this is unsuccessful, Canadians can register their disapproval by simply boycotting products made in France, from wines to perfumes, from cheese to fashion, from cars to tourism.

In Sweden the voluntary actions of citizens have resulted, I am told, in an 80 per cent reduction in the sale of French wines. Canadians as consumers can express their disapproval too. It is the only weapon we have as citizens to convey our sentiments about a primitive use of power or about an action that is best described as the pornography of power.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Davenport for reminding the public of the importance of this subject.

With respect to French nuclear testing, the Government of Canada has expressed its view on the matter in a clear and unambiguous manner. We deplore the resumption of these tests and have made our position known to France in no uncertain terms. When China resumed its tests earlier this year, we also expressed our views on that matter.

Our position is clear. We call on all nuclear weapons states to stop these tests. We call for a speedy progress toward the signature of a comprehensive test ban treaty, the CTBT, which is the best way to ensure the end of all tests for all time.

Canada's position with respect to nuclear testing is not a recent one. This is a bedrock policy that we have had since the days of former Prime Minister Trudeau when he set out the strategy calling for the suffocation of nuclear arsenals. The hon. member was here at the time and helped to develop this policy.

We are one of the few countries in the world that has the capability yet has decided as a matter of policy not to develop nuclear weapons. We have also chosen not to have any nuclear armed weapons stationed on our soil.

Having succeeded in getting the non–proliferation treaty extended for an indefinite period we are now working very hard to ensure a truly comprehensive verifiable nuclear weapon test ban, the CTBT, is signed by June 1996.

We are very heartened to learn that so far three of the five nuclear weapons states, the U.S., the U.K. and France, have come out supporting a zero option CTBT, which the hon. member will be pleased to hear. This means a treaty which will allow no nuclear explosions whatsoever.

Again I congratulate the hon. member for helping Canada develop our policy in banning all nuclear weapons from this planet.

The Deputy Speaker: The House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

VIOLENCE ON TELEVISION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in Winnipeg last week I had the privilege of taking part in the CRTC's regional consultations on violence on television, violence which, I believe, has a negative impact on our children.

[English]

Parents need better information and better tools to ensure they can make wise decisions with respect to the kinds of programs they want their children to watch.

The industry must continue to self regulate. A standardized classification system is needed. New technology, for example the V–chip, could also be extremely helpful to parents. Media literacy for parents and children is required.

[Translation]

I would urge hon. members to work together to ensure that television becomes a positive tool for us and especially for our children.

ROY ROMANOW

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Roy Romanow, who also took part in the strong–arm tactics against Quebec when the Constitution was patriated unilaterally in 1982, has stated that francophones in Saskatchewan may lose the governance of their schools if the Yes side wins in the referendum in Quebec.

Condescending and irresponsible, that kind of statement is typical of a man who would stop at nothing to impose his views.

In the past, Mr. Romanow has shown that to be the case. He has no respect for francophones or Quebec. The question now is, whether his attitude reflects the views of Canada today.

If it does, if the survival of francophones outside Quebec depends solely on the presence of Quebec within Canada, the Canadian ideal of equality in diversity has ceased to exist. If that is the case, respect for our most fundamental rights no longer exists. Too bad for Canadians who still had a dream.

WOOD BISON TRAIL

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate a Canadian company on a noteworthy accomplishment.

Syncrude Canada, a mining company and major contributor to the economy in Canada, has just opened a nature trail north of Fort McMurray that reflects the mining industry's commitment to Canada and our environment. In the spirit of co–operation and responsibility, the Wood Bison Trail was opened by the premier of Alberta at a ceremony attended by 4,300 spectators.

Most notable is the trail's entrance which is marked by a native carving of bison that stretches 30 feet in the air. It is called the Bison Gateway and was sculptured by the native artist Brian Clark. This monument marks Syncrude's $2 million reclamation project on a mined out area around Wood Bison Trail. As further evidence to this commitment a herd of wood bison has been reintroduced to the area after being extinct for hundreds of years.

I congratulate everyone involved in this project. It is an example of what can be accomplished when government, industry, environment and native groups work together to harvest our resource wealth and leave the area productive for future generations.

INNU COMMUNITY RELOCATION

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I had the opportunity to meet with an

Innu delegation making representations with regard to the relocation of its community from Davis Inlet to Little Sango Pond.

The delegation informed me that on February 25, 1994 the Innu people received a statement of political commitment from the ministers of Indian affairs, health, justice, as well as the Solicitor General of Canada. Through these ministers the Government of Canada agreed to support the relocation subject to a number of conditions. The delegation has informed me that these conditions have now been met and the community is anxious for a favourable federal cabinet decision that will begin the process of its relocation.

Today I want to put on the public record that I am completely supportive of the Innu relocation to Little Sango Pond. They have satisfied the terms and conditions required and it would seem that the federal government has a clear obligation to respect its commitments as set down in February 1994.

PRIME MINISTER OF IRELAND

Mr. Pat O'Brien (London—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, recently the Prime Minister of Ireland, Mr. John Bruton and his wife, Finola Bruton, visited Canada. Mr. Bruton, whose title in Irish is Taoiseach, visited several cities, including Ottawa.

As a Canadian member of Parliament of Irish descent, I was honoured to be invited along with several of my colleagues by our Prime Minister to meet and dine with Prime Minister Bruton.

In his excellent comments that evening Mr. Bruton praised Canada as a nation of diverse peoples who have learned to respect our differences and live together in peace.

As the people of Quebec prepare to vote in the referendum on October 30, it is the fervent hope of other Canadians that Quebecers will choose to remain a very important and cherished partner in a united Canada.

STAND UP FOR CANADA

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, tonight at the National Press Club, Canadian recording artists the True Grit Band will be making their debut performance of "Stand Up For Canada", a song celebrating Canadian unity written by Mr. Jim Chapman, a talk show host at CKSL News Radio in London, Ontario. This world premier performance will be recorded for posterity by the nation's music station MuchMusic.

It should be noted that this song was brought to the True Grit Band's attention by my patriotic colleague and percussionist, the hon. member for London East.

"Stand Up For Canada" is a creative expression of the pride possessed by Canadians from sea to sea to sea. The song is sung by the members for Madawaska—Victoria, Halton Peel and Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. Instrumentals are provided by the members for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Sault Ste. Marie, Lincoln, Sarnia—Lambton and yours truly from Hamilton West.

I ask all my hon. colleagues in the House to show support for our great nation and "Stand Up For Canada".

JACK GATECLIFF

Mr. Walt Lastewka (St. Catharines, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on November 20, St. Catharines' well known sportswriter, Jack Gatecliff, will be inducted into the Hockey Hall of Fame.

Better known as the Gate, Jack Gatecliff is best known for his constant friendly smile and personable nature. He is also a hockey historian who has dedicated his life to writing about the sport.

In 1950 Jack began writing for the St. Catharines Standard, a five times a week column called "Through the Sports Gate". He officially retired as sports editor in 1991, more than 10,000 columns later.

His love of sports shone through in every article he wrote and he still contributes to the Standard on a regular basis. As a hockey player Jack played with the Junior A team in St. Catharines. As a writer he spent countless hours covering Canada's two national sports, lacrosse and hockey. For years Jack Gatecliff kept St. Catharines' sports fans up to date.

I know my colleagues in the House join me in congratulating Jack Gatecliff on his induction into the Hockey Hall of Fame.

LAURENT BEAUDOIN

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in the current referendum debate, Bombardier President Laurent Beaudoin should recognize Quebec's contribution to the success of his company instead of hinting that it might leave the province if the Yes side wins.

Such comments are insulting, not only to the sovereignists but to all Quebecers who contributed to the success of Bombardier and were proud of it.

We should remember that government backing, with the support of Quebec taxpayers, was a major ingredient of that success.

I would ask Mr. Beaudoin, who heads Bombardier, a symbol of Quebec entrepreneurship, to put his talents at the service of his compatriots, whatever the outcome.

SWIM FOR LIFE

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, sometimes one outstanding act of courage and commitment stands out and brings to prominence national issues as no spoken or written word can. Such is the case of the completion of a 20–day marathon swim by Fin Donnelly of Coquitlam who on September 24 completed a mammoth swim down the Fraser River. He completed the arduous 1,325 kilometre journey in 20 days.

Fin Donnelly's "Swim For Life" was a personal campaign to raise awareness about environmental abuse of the Fraser River and the need to protect this unique waterway. In his 20–day journey Fin kept up a gruelling pace in spite of personal and natural obstacles.

In dedicating his swim to the need to preserve our waters against pollution abuse, Fin has challenged individuals, businesses and governments that may be part of the problem to become part of the solution.

I join with my constituents in recognizing this young man's courage and commitment in preserving one of Canada's great natural resources, the Fraser River.

FRENCH LANGUAGE

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, recently the Saint–Jean Baptiste Society said that if Quebec did not start protecting the French language, francophone Quebecers would become a minority.

Language is one of the most important aspects of a culture. The richness of the French language is recognized throughout the world. For many centuries, French was spoken not only in France, but in many other countries as well. In fact, French was the language of diplomacy.

Today, in Canada, there are thousands of French immersion courses. In my riding, in Vancouver East, Hastings School offers French immersion courses. When I visited the school, I was surprised at the level of language knowledge and comprehension among sixth and seventh grade students.

I believe in a bilingual and united Canada. We must keep it that way.

S. O. 31

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Comité des Québecois et Québécoises pour le non has had to give in and prepare the budget for year one of an independent Quebec, having realized that, despite repeated calls for it by the general public and the business community, the Quebec separatists were still refusing to put any figure on their plans for separation.

The first year budget as presented yesterday represents a scientific update of what the leader of the Parti Quebecois had presented in 1973.

From it we learn that an independent Quebec will inherit a deficit of $15.6 billion, minimum. Quebec workers will therefore find themselves having to pay at least $3,000 in additional taxes annually.

Quebec's separatists refuse to talk about the costs of separation. We shall do it for them, since the public has a right to know. On October 30, the answer to the project for separation will be No.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Martin Cauchon (Outremont, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the PQ leader found out that not all mayors concerned with the day to day administration of their municipalities will commit lightly to any project without finding out first what the costs and impacts will be.

The mayor of Montmagny, Jean–Claude Croteau, took advantage of the presence of the PQ Premier in his region to invite him to indicate in advance what the offer of partnership to be made to Canada the day after a yes vote would be.

The supporters of separation refuse to make that offer of partnership public, because they know full well that an economic and political union between an independent Quebec and Canada is impossible. The only real option they are pursuing is separation. The rest is just another example of smoke and mirrors to confuse the public.

QUEBEC–CANADA ECONOMIC UNION

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the leaders of the federalist side would have Quebecers believe that English Canada could manage without a partnership agreement with a sovereign Quebec.

The economic reality is that Quebec is the second–ranking partner of English Canada, far ahead of Japan and Germany.

• (1410)

The economic reality is that Quebecers purchase $420 million worth of fish and other food products from the Atlantic provinces every year. That there are $850 million worth of oil and natural gas sold to Quebec by Alberta. There is Bay Street, the financial heart of Toronto, which would lose $2.8 billion in insurance and financial services business. And there are the $1.3 billion worth of car and truck purchases from the Ontario automobile industry by Quebec.

Yet they are trying to make us believe that a partnership is not in the interests of Quebec and the rest of Canada. Really, now.

[English]

LIBERAL PARTY

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay tribute to the opposition in the House. People may think I am talking about the Bloc or the Reformers. No, I am talking about the Liberals. If it looks like opposition, talks like opposition and smells like opposition, then it must be opposition.

The Liberals have pretty well abdicated leadership and have vacated the role of promoting real solutions to Canada's problems. The Reformers on the other hand are acting like government by proposing real, workable, common sense solutions.

It was the Reform Party which proposed a clear response to the Quebec referendum. The Liberals caught up about a week later. We have urged since the beginning that it is most important to set real targets on balancing the budget. We hope they will catch up soon.

The Liberals spend more time criticizing Reformers than they spend promoting their own proposed legislation because they do not seem to have any. The most significant evidence is that they are now filibustering their own bills. While the important issues of the nation go unnoticed, the Liberals are talking endlessly on the few trivial bills now before the House.

The Liberals may not be ready to govern but the Reformers are.

LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition told journalists candidly that he is not ruling out the idea of one day being the premier of Quebec.

Is there some connection between his statement and the comments made two days ago by the PQ Premier? He repeated yesterday, for the second day in a row that he is beginning to feel the years and that he is opening the door to his successors.

Is this some new trick, a change in direction or simply a message the Leader of the Opposition is sending to militant Quebec separatists to get them to prepare for the days after the referendum? Regardless of what happens with the political career of the leader of the Bloc Quebecois, we must not lose sight of the fact that his primary objective is Quebec's separation. Our response to that will be no.

LEADER OF THE ACTION DÉMOCRATIQUE DU QUÉBEC

Mr. Robert Bertrand (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the Action démocratique du Québec was in the Outaouais region yesterday. He tried to convince people that the partnership between an independent Quebec and Canada would be guaranteed the day after Quebec's separation.

The separatist leader of the ADQ justified his confidence in such an agreement by stressing that it was simply good common sense.

Earlier in the day, the separatist leader touched on the future of federal public servants in an independent Quebec and said that nobody would be dropped for a period of two years.

The people in the Outaouais have good common sense and know very well that separatist promises will bring them nothing. This is why they will vote no on October 30.

HOCKEY

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, nothing defines Canadians more than their love for the game of hockey and its colourful heroes who have brought so much joy to so many.

Long before words like arbitration and agent became part of the game's vocabulary, names like Bathgate, Howe, Mahovlich, Beliveau, Kelly and Richard were being claimed by runny nosed shinny players on rinks across Canada. I know because I was one of them, as were many of my colleagues in the House.

We may have lost our breakaway speed, but we will always remember the smooth stickhandling of a Jean Beliveau, the sure slapshot of Frank Mahovlich, the fierce intensity of Henri "Pocket Rocket" Richard, the clutch goal of Paul Henderson, the sharp elbows of Gordie Howe, the tenacity of Ted Lindsay, and the feared hip check of Pierre Pilote.

I am sorry Mr. Meeker, but I only remember how you taught the game on TV.

These individuals personify character, class and charisma. Most important, they made it fun for us to be kids. For that I thank these gentlemen.

INDUSTRY CANADA

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, now we know that to get applause from all sides of this House, you have to play hockey.

In its secret document prepared for Operation Unity, the federal Department of Industry made a list of Quebec companies, indicating subsidies they had received or will receive from Ottawa. And all for the sole purpose of urging business leaders to support the No side. By strange coincidence, yesterday senior executives of one of the companies targeted by Industry Canada, Spar Aerospace, urged employees at the plant in Sainte–Anne–de–Bellevue to vote No.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister. How can he go on claiming that Industry Canada's secret document is a routine economic report, when it actually lists the political views of top business leaders?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government has a responsibility to ensure that jobs are created in Canada and that jobs are kept. That is our responsibility. And as politicians it is very important for us to know what we are doing for businesses in Quebec, because the important thing is to keep those salaries and jobs in Quebec.

I was once Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and that was quite a few years ago. When Canadair was closing its doors, which would have had a disastrous impact on Spar Industries, we managed to save Canadair. When General Dynamics was leaving Canada, as Minister of Industry I took action, and today, Canadair is the best company in Quebec. And Canadair buys services from Spar. We want those jobs to be kept. This is very important.

In fact, the workers themselves admitted as much, because when I left politics, members of the Canadair employees' union asked me to work for them, and they told me: "You are aware of our needs. When we needed you, you were there. We want you to keep working for us". I am concerned about workers' wages, about high tech jobs for Quebec and ensuring that the markets will still be there, not only in Canada but throughout the world, for the benefit of the economy and the people of Quebec, especially in the Montreal region.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am still looking for the connection the government seems to see between job creation and examining political views of business leaders. The document we are tabling today contains an analysis, an assessment of the likelihood of influencing members of the Kruger family. That is going a bit too far and has no connection with jobs.

In the same secret document prepared by Industry Canada, we read, and I quote:

[English]

"The threat of cutting support for world class industrial facilities such as Pratt and Whitney, Spar Aerospace, and Canadian Marconi might bring reaction and support for the federalist cause".

[Translation]

How can the leader of the government keep denying that Operation Unity is actually blackmailing companies like Spar by threatening to cut off federal subsidies for research and development unless they speak out on behalf of the No side?

[English]

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is the duty of the government to make sure everybody understands what this is all about. This is all about a party dedicated to destroying Canada. You do not break up a country that easily anywhere in the world.

• (1420)

Our preoccupation is very simple. We want to keep the country together. We can have industries in Quebec, we can have industries in Ontario and the rest of Canada that can compete in the world. It is our duty to tell that to Quebecers, because if they vote yes and there is a separatist government there can be no guarantee they will be able to have the same types of operations in Quebec.

The leaders of the unions can talk, but the owners of a company do not know what they talk about.

[Translation]

What does Mr. Beaudoin want? He wants to maintain the number of jobs Quebecers have with Bombardier in Quebec. That is his concern. He is doing this first of all for the sake of the workers, their salaries and the shareholders, and it is his responsibility to do so.

If we can help people tell workers in Quebec that they are taking a risk by voting Yes, it is our duty to tell them that, in their own interests and those of their families, they should vote to stay in the best country in the world: Canada.

[English]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the first duty of any government, federal or otherwise, is to respect democracy, to let people enjoy their freedom of opinion.

Democracy calls for the respect of the freedom of those people, whether business people or anybody in Canada, to be free to express their opinions and not be forced to be federalists because of blackmail. It is not very noble to be federalists because we are blackmailed.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister admit that what the vice–president of Spar Aerospace told his employees yesterday is a direct result of this conscription exercise in which Ottawa is pushing business people to support the No side?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, everyone has a right to express his opinions, including heads of companies. And they have an obligation to tell their employees—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): Yes, they have an obligation to say so.

Mr. Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe): Not by using blackmail.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): Mr. Speaker, since when is the truth blackmail? Since when is telling people that their economic and political future is at risk blackmail?

We are telling the truth. We are not looking for trick questions with "virages and mirages". We want to tell Quebecers the truth. We have proved in Canada that we can live together, even if we do not all speak the same language or have the same colour skin. I am delighted to see the best example of what we can do in Canada in our gallery today: hockey players who worked as a team.

[English]

They have proven they can become the best in the world, French and English, but all of them proud Canadians.

• (1425)

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is distressing to note that the Prime Minister is prepared to use every means to ensure his truth wins, including standing behind documents that advocate blackmailing business.

The Prime Minister persists in claiming this is perfectly normal. Imagine, it is perfectly normal for Industry Canada to keep the political opinions of the heads of Quebec business on file. The Prime Minister thinks it is perfectly normal for a government document to describe ways to armtwist Quebec businesses into voting the way the Prime Minister wants them to.

When the Industry Canada document identifies the political affiliation of a number of heads of Quebec businesses, when it lists the subsidies granted them, when funding cuts to Spar, Pratt & Whitney or Canadian Marconi are threatened, how can this still be claimed to be a simple matter of economics and not a political matter for the special unit of the Prime Minister's office?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, quite frankly, the people in the Bloc Quebecois are really desperate. Two days ago we were being accused of giving Quebec nothing for research and development.

Do you recall, hon. members, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. members: Yes.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): We were not doing enough. Now we are doing too much, because we told the people of Quebec that these industries developed thanks to the presence of the federal government. The federal government has been giving subsidies to these businesses for 25 years. They are not being given because of an upcoming referendum. Twenty–five years ago we developed these programs of assistance to industry, which have resulted, in certain sectors, in Quebec workers being able today to sell their products worldwide.

This is why the heads of business who succeeded, with the help of the federal government, in developing these businesses want to keep them for the benefit of people working there.

Mr. Beaudouin probably has a pretty solid bank account, but if a disaster strikes, it will not be he who suffers, it will be the the families of people working in his plants. These are the people we want to protect, rather than leap into the void in the adventure that these folks here are proposing for Quebec. Quebecers know they are living in Canada, the best country in the world, and on October 30, they will vote for Canada.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister would like to talk research and development, he should take note and acknowledge before the cameras and before this House that the document prepared by his officials confirms the figures quoted by the official opposition last week to the effect that only 17 per cent of all research and development is done in Quebec, when the figure should be much higher than that. It should be at least 30 per cent.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it is not desperation when we call for candour and a clear statement from the Prime Minister, an admission he should be making.

Some hon. members: Oh, Oh.

The Speaker: The question please.

Mr. Gauthier: In a democratic society such as ours, how can the Prime Minister find it normal and try to tell the House that a group of officials in the federal government's Special Operations Unit, connected with his office, is systematically violating the charter of rights and freedoms by classifying the heads of Quebec businesses according to their political affiliation?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, our request was not very complicated. We simply asked officials to tell us the truth about federal involvement in Quebec businesses.

• (1430)

It is very important for them to know, because we want people to know the truth. We did not do as the Bloc Quebecois and the Parti Quebecois did and say: "We will come up with a winning question". Not a real question, a winning question. They did not want to tell Quebecers they are separatists. The leader of the Bloc Quebecois, the Leader of the Opposition, told the Americans, because they do not understand what the word "souverainiste" means, and besides, it is not in the French dictionary—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): It is in the new Quebec dictionary which has not been approved by the Académie Française.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): For the first year, because we silenced them a few times recently.

The leader of the Bloc Quebecois said to the Americans: "I am a separatist". But he did not have the courage to go to Lac–Saint–Jean or Trois–Rivières or Rouyn–Noranda or Montreal and say: "I am a separatist". Everyone knows I am a Canadian and that I will still be one on October 31.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Both the Canadian people and our armed forces deserve better than the culture of cover–up which has taken hold of the Department of National Defence. It seems that every day we discover new evidence of deception within the DND hierarchy. Access to information documents are forged. Police investigations are obstructed. Evidence is destroyed.

We have warned the Minister of National Defence repeatedly, yet he has adopted a hear no evil, see no evil attitude and continually expresses confidence in his senior officials. Canadians have lost confidence.

When will the Prime Minister recognize the chronic systematic failure of the leadership in the Department of National Defence?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think Canada is very well served by a very good Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is just like the defence minister. He is hiding behind camouflage. The failure is in leadership and it begins at the top.

The most basic principle of parliamentary democracy requires the minister to take responsibility for the decisions of his officials.

Why should we be surprised when officers in the Canadian forces chain of command begin passing the buck? This is an example set by the minister.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Who is calling the shots in the Department of National Defence? When will he appoint a minister who will take responsibility for the defence department?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member, the critic for the third party, he is suggesting there have been cover–ups.

Let me just tell him, his party and the House that it was this government that commissioned the inquiry into the Somalia events and the deployment of the Canadian forces. It was this government that made all the documents, every single document related to that inquiry, open to the public. It was this government that made available and encouraged members of the Canadian forces to appear in front of the commission and to do everything they could to bring light to the commission.

This government has not just been open; it has been terribly open.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, terrible is the correct response for sure.

I remind the parliamentary secretary that external inquiries are not the question. It is the question of the internal inquiries where cover–ups, corruption and mismanagement are the daily practice at DND.

The Prime Minister knows the Canadian Armed Forces has served the country with honour. He knows that his minister has lost the respect of Canadians and has entirely lost control of his department.

Why does the Prime Minister refuse to demand the resignation of the Minister of National Defence who consistently demonstrates poor judgment and flees not only from his responsibilities but from questions in the House.

• (1435)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think the parliamentary secretary very eloquently explained the situation.

When we formed the government there was this problem which was created before we came into government that was causing a lot of problems. We decided to get to the bottom of it.

There were some very difficult decisions to be made. For example, when we had to decide to dismantle the airborne regiment it was not easy to do. I think it was the right decision. Now all the files are available to everybody and an inquiry has been named that will look at every document.

It is public. The press is there. How can we be more open than that? All the documents are there.

The incident in Somalia occurred before we formed the government but there was a desire by the public to get to the bottom of it and the commission will get to the bottom of it. It will make recommendations. If there is some need for changes in the way decisions are made in defence, we will change them. But so far so good.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): Yes, yes. There is an inquiry and the minister has made available everything required by the commissioners. It is a public inquiry and we will wait for the results. After that if there is a need for changes we will make them, but first we will let the inquiry do its job.

The Speaker: I would ask colleagues to keep the questions and the answers short.

INDUSTRY CANADA

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in the secret Industry Canada document it is stated that Oerlikon will likely adopt a federalist position in private, but that its public position will be determined by its head office instead. We also know that the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs has recently been in touch with that company.

Can the minister assure us that neither he nor any member of his staff has used the fallout benefits from the armoured vehicle construction contracts to pressure Oerlikon to position itself on the No side, as recommended in the secret Industry Canada document?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the only communication between myself and Oerlikon has been one letter in which I forwarded to them, with General Motors' permission, a letter from GM stating that there would be discussions between the two companies to see whether it would be possible for Oerlikon to take part in the General Motors contracts.

That is all there was to it, and the allegations of the opposition are once again based on dreaming, obviously in technicolour, and without any basis in fact.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, no, the dreams were in black and white, a printed black and white document from the Department of Industry, a secret document. He might read it from time to time. It would be helpful to us if he took time off from his dreaming to read something once in a while. How can the minister explain that Ottawa continues to put off clarifying its intentions concerning the regional benefits of the contract to purchase armoured vehicles, while as long ago as March Oerlikon was being clearly identified in a secret Industry Canada document as a possible subcontractor for the tank turrets?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, once again the opposition is mixing all kinds of issues together. Oerlikon and General Motors will be discussing their plans to perhaps enable Oerlikon to obtain subcontracts from General Motors.

But to give you an idea of what is really in the Department of Industry document referred to, I will read you some excerpts. For example, in the aeronautics sector, what the "secret" Department of Industry document says is as follows: The generally stable climate and the availability of funding programs are what have been responsible for the industry's continued growth. The threat of separation might offer the companies an opportunity for out of province consolidation and restructuring.

• (1440)

That is what the document has to say about companies in the aeronautical sector. I might mention other sectors, but the conclusion is that this document states very clearly that separation will cost Quebecers dearly in all of the province's industrial sectors.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the destruction of the two videotapes by Colonel Kenward is clear evidence of a violation or an obstruction of justice.

Colonel Kenward's promotion is an exoneration of wrongdoing determined by the most senior members of our military and viewed by many as a cover–up. Clearly an external inquiry into the operation of the entire military apparatus beyond the mandate of the present hearings is justified to reassure Canadians that the integrity of our military is beyond question and functioning within the confines of law.

Will the Prime Minister authorize such a broad and all encompassing inquiry?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the issue of promotion of the officer in question, I have to tell the hon. member and the House there is a system in place that has existed for 43 years.

That system essentially is that the chief of the defence staff is responsible for promoting officers and non-commissioned ranks up to the rank of colonel. The minister is responsible for all general officers' promotions.

The system is in place to prevent political interference. It works and it worked on this occasion. If the hon. member is suggesting that we politicize the system of promotion then I suggest he is suggesting the wrong thing. The Canadian forces would not agree. The House would not approve it and the Canadian public would be appalled.

He would be the first one to scream if this were the case and I would be there to join him.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this is another incident of preferential treatment under the law for certain Canadians. The destruction of evidence by Colonel Kenward is clearly a violation of the law. His exoneration by military brass rather than through due process places our rule of law in disrepute.

Could the Prime Minister explain to the House why this senior military officer was promoted rather than held accountable for his actions? Why do we not all stand equal before the law?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I ask the hon. member in asking questions to make sure he has his facts correct.

I remind the House of something that came out yesterday. Had he watched the press conference by the chief of the defence staff, he may have discovered that he was not entirely correct in his question.

The senior judge in the Canadian forces, the judge advocate general, on the recommendation of the chief of the defence staff and the commander of land forces, did a special inquiry and concluded that the officer in question did nothing illegal.

With respect to being open, I have to tell the hon. member who talked about destroyed tapes that these were copies. The original tape is now answering to our question and a previous question about transparency.

In addition to all the things the Prime Minister and I mentioned, the particular tape is also available to the commission of inquiry.

INDUSTRY CANADA

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs.

The secret document intended for Operation Unity reveals that top executives at CAE Electronics, a subsidiary of the parent company in Toronto, strongly support federalism in private. It also indicates that they will publicly follow in the footsteps of their Bombardier and Marconi counterparts.

Can the minister, who is obviously well aware of the referendum position of potential government contractors, tell us what contract he has set aside for CAE Electronics should its executives come out publicly in favour of the No side?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the opposition is repeating—in the hope of making it come true—the allegation that there is a link between the analysis of various industrial sectors in the Industry Canada document and federal subsidies to these industries.

• (1445)

There is clearly no link between the two. What the report correctly describes is the fact that a great many Quebec industries are dependent on various federal subsidies and that if Quebec separates from the rest of Canada, many Quebec businesses will go bankrupt. That is simple. That is clear. That is transparent.

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how does the minister explain the fact that this document clearly identifies CAE Electronics as the only potential contractor in Quebec for the maintenance of the four used British submarines, which the government is about to acquire at a cost of over $1 billion?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, perhaps we should wait until we buy them before deciding who will maintain them.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister has accused the Alberta environment minister of racism.

What he actually said was: "If there's something like the expansion of the ski hill in a national park, that's your jurisdiction, not mine. And if it's something on an Indian reserve, that yours, not mine—if we're not going to work in the spirit of trust and co–operation we've got a major problem".

We have a major problem. When will this minister apologize to Ty Lund for her misrepresentation of his remarks?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in June Ty Lund gave an interview to Vicki Barnett of a newspaper in Alberta in which he said, and this is his quote in June in reference to the meeting that took place: "Referring to federal minister Copps, Lund said, 'Come on, lady, if you want to come to Alberta and see what's happening with Indian reserves and logging, we would have had it shut down and charged them a long time ago. Where have you been? In our last meeting with Sheila Copps—she's an interesting lady—she was giving me the gears for trying to get into a harmonization. She sput and sputtered about that one and she said to me, 'You don't look after our lands'. Lund is leading the charge which would see the province have complete responsibility for Alberta land while Ottawa would oversee national parks and Indian reserves".

Those were the comments of Mr. Lund in a newspaper interview in June.

Mr. Solberg: So what?

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): Apologize.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, those comments are absolutely true. That is the jurisdiction of the federal government. Why does she not live up to it and make sure it is abided by?

She accuses the provincial minister of saying this and exactly this: "You can have the national parks and the Indians. We want to look after all the rest". That simply is not true. He did not say that. Regardless of what comments may have been taken out of context in that news article, why will she not—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Miss Grey: Mr. Speaker, I read from a transcript, not a newspaper article.

Ms. Clancy: Table it.

Miss Grey: When will the minister admit that is simply not what he said and when will she retract these remarks and get these talks back on track?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the other day the member claimed that I had misrepresented the views of Mr. Lund. Mr. Lund has never denied making the remarks at a private meeting with nine other ministers at which I heard very specifically the comments he made.

It is a sad day when the member for Beaver River gets up in the House and repeats the position of the Alberta government that the Government of Canada has no place in Alberta other than to deal with Indian reserves and national parks.

Surely the Canadian people support a national government that will establish national environmental standards and give some national leadership. Surely she understands that the point I was making to Ty Lund, when I would not cave in to his blatant threat to tell me to get out of the province, was specifically because I believe, and the Government of Canada believes, that the people of Canada expect Canadian environmental leadership.

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs.

The secret document prepared for Operation Unity shows that the federal government is set to spend $5.6 billion on the potential acquisition of defence equipment, including armoured vehicles, submarines and helicopters. According to the document, these equipment acquisition contracts could have a profound impact on Quebec businesses. The document identifies eight Quebec businesses likely to benefit economically and outlines the political views of their top executives.

How should we describe the federal government's behaviour in dangling in front of some businesses generous contracts in return for their support for the No side? Is this not pure blackmail?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, again, the opposition's allegations are totally unfounded.

Yesterday, the Leader of the Opposition made comments to the press, which were reported by Hugh Winsor and which indicate that there is absolutely nothing to support his allegations and no evidence whatsoever that any company has been subjected to pressure.

In fact, as far as the defence industry is concerned, the report points out that companies such as Expro and SNC–IT that are very dependent on federal ammunition contracts could be forced to close their doors, while the companies that now rely on support and service contracts could be compelled to move part of their operations.

I have here a whole list of excerpts from the report pointing to the main conclusion, namely, that separation would create very serious economic problems in Quebec and eliminate a great many jobs. I am willing to show the hon. member for Roberval, who requested it yesterday, the proof that the vast majority of the industries identified in the report, the proof that Quebec's separation would be an element—

Mr. Jean-Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, again, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs did not answer the question at all. I did not talk about defence supplies but about defence equipment. He did not say anything about that.

Here is my supplementary: As the secret document prepared in March refers to defence contracts in the next three months, how does the minister explain that they have not yet confirmed the benefits from the equipment acquisition contracts? The government is probably saving this lever to put pressure on some Quebec businesses.

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, again, we gave very clear answers to those questions. Quebec receives a proportion of capital defence spending that is much higher than its percentage of the population.

Again, page after page of the document in question shows that the separation they want would hurt Quebec employees as well as investments and the various industries in Quebec. Again, the document he is quoting from is the best proof that, on October 30, Quebecers will vote No to separation to preserve the economic benefits from their association with Canada.

VIETNAM

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

The Vietnamese government has now scheduled a retrial of nine religious, academic and cultural leaders in Vietnam who were previously condemned to prison. Will the minister convey to the Vietnamese government that a favourable result of this judicial review will have a positive influence on relations between Canada and Vietnam?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out the hon. member's important contribution to the defence of rights and freedoms. I think that his question is a suggestion to the government, and we accept it as such. I hope that Vietnamese authorities will take it into account in a positive way.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in a speech in 1991 the Minister for Human Resources Development worried about the concerns and anxieties of Canadians over future levels of funding for the Canada pension plan. In the past four years those concerns have not gone away, they have only gotten worse. The minister has had two years to address these concerns, but he has failed to do so.

Will the minister end the speculation and uncertainty for Canadian seniors, deliver on his promise to reform the Canada pension plan and announce here and now a specific date for reforms of the Canada pension plan?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has been waiting since 1991, she might want to wait a few days longer.

I understand the concern of the hon. member. We all share a very deep interest in ensuring that Canadians in retirement have effective and sustainable pension programs. The government is very committed to it because it authored the major old age pension and income security programs. That is why in the last budget we underlined once again our strong commitment to maintain and strengthen those programs and to enhance them.

To prepare ourselves for that, the Minister of Finance in working with my department is preparing a paper that will outline for Canadians the choices and options we will have to face in the Canada pension plan in order to ensure that we can sustain its financing over the next years to meet the very large growth in the number of Canadians that will be retiring. We are working on that as well as we can. When the paper is right and ready we will present it, certainly to the hon. member. We will also present it to every other Canadian.

Mrs. Brown (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the minister that the Reform Party is ready to go. Just watch for October 11 next week when we will be making our announcement.

Two weeks ago the Minister of Human Resources Development stated the Canada pension plan is not in a state of collapse. However, the chief actuary in the finance department last week wrote in a letter: "The Canada pension plan fund is expected to be exhausted by the year 2015".

My question is for the Minister of Finance. When it comes to the status of the Canada pension plan, who does he believe, the HRD minister or his chief actuary?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I happen to believe the minister of HRD. I also happen to believe the chief actuary because their opinions are the same.

The chief actuary did say that if action were not taken on the Canada pension plan that major financial problems would ensue. The minister of HRD has made it very clear that the government intends to take such action. Meetings have already been held with the officials. There will be meetings with provincial finance ministers. That is where the changes have to take place.

I look forward to hearing the Reform Party's suggestions. I hope they are a little bit better than the budget it came out with last year. However it is something we work on with the provinces. The minister of HRD and I will be doing that together.

INDUSTRY CANADA

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. On September 22 the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs stated in this House that his government was not carrying out any studies on overlap, just analyses. A fine distinction. The secret Industry Canada document confirms the existence of factual analyses on overlap, and I quote: For further details on duplication and overlap, refer to analyses.

Now that we have confirmation that such analyses on duplication and overlap do exist, does the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs plan to make them public before the referendum?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I shall repeat my position, because it is true; the unity group within my Department has carried out no analysis whatsoever on duplication and overlap, and has carried out no study whatsoever on duplication and overlap.

We do have a process to reduce and eliminate duplication and overlap, and this has led to the signature of a number of action plans by the first ministers. So, that is a process which does exist. I greatly regret that the present Parti Quebecois government has refused to help us eliminate duplication. But the truth is: no studies of that type have been carried out for us.

SAUGEEN FIRST NATION

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the chief of the Saugeen First Nation signed a declaration claiming authority over 300 kilometres of shoreline up to 11 kilometres out into the water around Bruce Peninsula.

Chief Kahgee claimed sovereign status under international law. The chief said he will start today to implement fishing season quotas, issue commercial and sports licences, and analyse resources. The department of Indian affairs has known about this for over three years.

Can the minister tell the House his plans to prevent this subversion of the legitimate authority of the Government of Canada?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if a claim has been issued it has not come to my desk. Anyone can issue a claim in Canada. If it is by writ, it winds up with the Minister of Justice. If it is a claim, the member knows there is a process, and if it is a legitimate grievance then it is negotiated.

In 1993 in the Nadjiwon case the Ontario provincial court found that the Saugeen Ojibway have a right of access to and use of their traditional fishing ground around the Bruce Peninsula. The provincial court did not find a right of ownership. If there is an issue there, I am sure in due course it will be decided by a court.

I think the hon. member is doing a disservice to a court system and a claim system we have in Canada that provides for due process and not political brownie points.

The Speaker: This will bring to close the question period.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

The Speaker: I wish to draw the attention of hon. members to the presence in the gallery of His Royal Highness Price Saud Al–Faisal Al Saud, Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Speaker: Notwithstanding Standing Order 31 a little earlier, some 16 months ago I started an initiative to recognize our distinguished citizens in Canada. To that end, I have invited some men who have in part given us our identity as a nation. There are very few of us in the Chamber who have not at one time wished that we could put on these people's shoes and do what they do. They are among our most talented Canadians.

An hon. member: Skates.

The Speaker: No, their shoes too.

Because I want to applaud them as you will, I ask you please not to applaud until I call them by name. I want them to stand and remain standing. When they are all standing we want to give them the kind of recognition they deserve for the great service they have done for our nation.

I call on Mr. Andy Bathgate, Mr. Jean Béliveau, Mr. Paul Henderson, Mr. Gordie Howe, Mr. Red Kelly, Mr. Ted Lindsay, Mr. Frank Mahovlich, Mr. Howie Meeker, Mr. Pierre Pilote, Mr. Henri Richard.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1505)

The Speaker: My colleagues, in your name I have invited our guests to be in the reading room. I invite you to a small reception where you may meet them. I know you will want their autographs and will want to take pictures. That will be in the reading room after question period.

POINTS OF ORDER

TABLING OF DOCUMENT

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this arises out of question period. I would like to table, for the House's information and for the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, the transcript of the actual meeting and the actual remarks made in that meeting by the Hon. Ty Lund, Minister of the Environment for Alberta.

The Speaker: The tabling of any document demands the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Yes.

Some hon. members: No.

The Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

Miss Grey: Mr. Speaker, I just thought that if an actual document was quoted from in question period I was duty bound to table it, which was what I was trying to do.

The Speaker: That is not the case.

BILL S-9

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order relating to a finance committee meeting I attended yesterday, an excellent committee, as I am reminded. This committee dealt with Bill S-9, a Senate bill referred to the committee and on which we heard evidence.

During the evidence in the committee meeting it became clear that the bill imposes expenditures on the Government of Canada. The amount of money involved per year, as was pointed out in the committee and which evidence I could lay before you, Mr. Speaker, involves perhaps hundreds of millions of dollars. It was part of budgetary provisions dating back to 1992, budget papers from 1992 and 1993. A provision of the bill also is retroactive to November 10, 1988, which requires an expenditure of public funds.

Mr. Speaker, I refer you to two decisions made in this Chamber and contained in the books of Speaker Lamoureux, which are truly the decisions that mark the difference between the powers of the Commons and the powers of the Senate. I do not have the decisions of Justice Lamoureux before me, but one of them is on page 174 and the other 175.

The decision on page 174 was made on November 12, 1969 when the Senate approved a bill for the dissolution of the Dominion Coal Corporation at that time. An MP by the name of Baldwin stood in the Chamber and objected that this involved an expenditure of public funds.

The Speaker at the time set aside a period in which he heard arguments as to whether it was an expenditure of public funds. After listening to the arguments he said no, this bill must come in as per Standing Order 62 at that time, which is Standing Order 79(1) today, which is that royal recommendation is required for any expenditure of public money.

The second decision was made on June 12, 1972, again by Speaker Lamoureux. It was the same instance where a government bill came through the Senate. An objection was launched at that time that although the bill did not involve an immediate expenditure of public funds, it committed the government to an expenditure in the future.

The ruling at that time was that yes, according to Standing Order 63, presently Standing Order 80(1) under Beauchesne's sixth edition, if a bill involves an expenditure of money then it cannot be brought in through the Senate.

My objection is according to Standing order 79(1), which says quite clearly that it is the crown that demands, the Commons that grants and the Senate that accedes to that grant, it is the prerogative of the House of Commons, not the Senate, and it must be done with royal recommendation by the executive, by the crown. It cannot be done through the Senate. Standing Order 80(1) states quite clearly that the Senate's only role is to accede to such a request. It cannot even amend such a request.

The evidence is quite clear that on the one hand the expenditure of public money involved is that it reduces by 50 per cent the tax on any profits made by U.S. multinationals in Canada. That is the expenditure, approximately $130 million to $135 million per year. This is supported, incidentally, by the Reform Party and the Bloc wholeheartedly.

The expenditure involves in the last clause of the bill a retroactive provision in the case of payments that involve the payment by the Government of Canada of a tax credit for anybody who was subjected to the estate tax in the United States. If people who had property of over $600,000 in the U.S. are subjected to the estate tax, Canada will provide a tax credit to offset that on their foreign based income. That is dated back to November 10, 1988, which would impose an immediate expenditure on the Government of Canada. The rest of it would impose an expenditure, a loss in tax expenditures for all time to come.

Mr. Speaker, it is not that the bill would be defeated by your ruling, because all of the political parties in this Chamber support the bill. I am saying this violates the privileges of the Canadian House of Commons as seen in precedent and as seen in our standing orders. This should come back and be presented in the correct manner.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, with great respect to the hon. member's very able argument, I think he has misconstrued the point in Standing Orders 79 and 80 of the House of Commons.

Standing order 79(1) reads:

> This House shall not adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to the House by a message from the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address or bill is proposed.

He is quite correct in stating that is the case.

Bill S–9, an act to amend the Canada–U.S. tax convention, is not a bill for appropriating any part of the public revenue or for any tax or impost. What it does is change the effect of the taxation laws of Canada through the application of various rules under this tax convention, which may result in the refund of revenues already received by the Government of Canada. This is not an expenditure of government funds; this is a refund of money that was collected from Canadian citizens pursuant to the tax laws of Canada, which are being amended by this tax convention because similar moneys were taken from these persons as a result of the application of the tax laws of the United States.

Everyone in the House is aware that tax conventions exist for the purpose of avoiding double taxation on the citizens of the two countries involved in the convention.

The hon. member has misconstrued the repayment of tax revenues already received as appropriations of public money. That was not the intention either of the standing order or of the constitutional practice in this regard. In support of that submission I refer Your Honour to citation 599 of Beauchesne's sixth edition:

> If any motion, whether in the House or in a committee, requires, but fails to receive, the recommendation of the Crown, it is the duty of the Speaker to announce that no question can be proposed upon the motion, or declare the bill out of order, or to say that the problem may be rectified by the proposer obtaining a Royal Recommendation.

• (1515)

I do not disagree with that. Citation 600 states:

> The principle that the sanction of the Crown must be given to every grant of money drawn for the public revenue applies equally to the taxation levied to provide that revenue.

In other words, a royal recommendation is required on a bill to impose a tax on the subject—and this bill does not; there is no dispute on that—and any bill to authorize the expenditure of public funds.

There is no expenditure authorized. What is authorized here is different. It is a refund of taxation which has been taken from the subject that is being changed by virtue of the application of the tax treaty. The tax treaty was ratified in the other place in the form of this bill which has been sent to the House for concurrence and the committee was very properly studying concurrence in the bill.

In my experience, and I have watched this kind of procedure for some time, tax conventions are almost invariably introduced as bills in the other place. Many of those tax conventions as a result of their passage involve repayment of money to Canadian citizens. In my experience there has not been a royal recommendation attached to any of those bills. There could not have been, or they would not have been introduced in the other place first.

They are introduced there because it is permissible to introduce technical bills of that kind in the Senate, the ones that do not require royal recommendation. That has been done in this case. In my experience it has been the invariable practice with respect to tax convention implementation legislation. I submit there is nothing irregular in this procedure. The hon. member has simply misconstrued the notion of refund of taxation as an expenditure of public funds. I submit they are not the same.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order.

The hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls referred to Standing Order 80 which would preclude a Senate bill coming to the finance committee if it dealt with aids and supplies. This is not an aid or supply.

As the hon. parliamentary secretary has indicated, it has been the custom of the House for as long as I can recall to have tax treaty amendments of which there have been probably 70 or 80 in the past decade and a half originate in the Senate. I commend the Senate for the excellent job it has done in dealing with these very complicated and detailed pieces of legislation. It is not an area where those who have not done a lot of work and a lot of study are really capable of assessing the implications.

I concur with the hon. parliamentary secretary. This is not an aid or supply. This has been our tradition. It has worked very well. This is an excellent piece of legislation, supported by all members of the House.

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of the New Democratic Party on this point of order.

The New Democratic Party agrees with the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls who raised the matter of Bill S–9 being a bill that will cause a great deal of expenditure from the treasury to people retroactively, in particular to people who have a great deal of wealth to start with.

There is an assumption that the New Democratic Party supports Bill S–9. I make it perfectly clear that the bill is an unfair bill for taxpayers. The New Democratic Party does not support it. I support the contention of the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls with respect to having the bill reviewed by Your Honour to see if it is in order.

• (1520)

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I have a letter in front of me from the Minister of Finance in which he refers to the subject matter my friend from Gander—Grand Falls raised as a cost presumably to the taxpayers of Canada. He pegs that cost at $125 million for 1995–96 and $145 million for 1996–97.

We are not dealing with petty cash here. We are dealing with a significant amount of taxpayers' dollars. What ordinary Canadians want to know is if it is such an important piece of legislation, why is it coming via the unelected Senate of Canada? Since when does an unelected group of men and women down the hall from this elected Chamber introduce legislation that will have the result of withdrawing from the public purse $125 million this year and $145 million next year?

Surely that moral and legal right ought to be that of the government of the day. It is the government that should be setting public policy, not unelected senators.

I lend my support to the member who raised this point. If it is the government's wish, and I understand the government is supporting this initiative, why bring in the back door what they do not have the courage to bring in through the front door?

Let us have an honest debate in the House of Commons. Let us have them introduce it as a government bill. Let us debate it at second reading. Let us send it to the committee. Let us have the courage as elected people to call a spade a spade.

The minister refers to it as a cost in his letter. It must be a cost because it will cost you and I and every other taxpayer close to $300 million over the next two years.

The Speaker: As a general rule I do not want to get into a debate on a point of order. The parliamentary secretary has spoken once. I appreciate the interventions that have taken place.

This is a very important point of order that has come before the House. I wonder if members would give me a day or two to do the research on my own, to have a look at it. Then I will come back to the House at that time with a decision and we will see where we are going from there. I would prefer to do that.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I want to answer the allegations made by the hon. member for York South—Weston. Not that I am seeking to defend the other place in my comments, but it is very important that he recognize this is a government bill.

The bill was introduced by the government in the other place. It is sponsored in the House by the Minister of Finance. It was debated at second reading in the House, referred to committee and will be debated at third reading in the House. It is a government bill. It is going through the same process that every other government bill goes through in the House.

The Speaker: I thank all hon. members for their interventions. I will apprise myself of the situation. If members will give me time to look at it, I will come back to the House with a decision.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

FINANCE

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to table before the House the 18th report of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance.

The report deals with Bill C–9, the bill just mentioned in the House. It was passed unanimously by the committee yesterday.

I thank members of all parties who were there and who assisted us so diligently in our work.

JUSTICE AND LEGAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the 10th report of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, being the first report of the subcommittee on national security.

Pursuant to Standing Order 108(2) the committee has agreed to the first report of the subcommittee on national security on the subject of document and personnel security.

Pursuant to Standing Order 109 the committee requests a comprehensive response to the report within 150 days.

INDUSTRY

Mr. John Godfrey (Don Valley West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the eighth report of the Standing Committee on Industry.

The report relates to the Canadian Tourism Commission and follows on discussions the committee held with commission officials in March of this year.

The Canadian Tourism Commission was created by order in council in January 1995 and has recently submitted to the industry committee its charter and 1995–96 business plan.

The committee intends to continue monitoring the commission's progress over the coming months.

PROCEDURE AND HOUSE AFFAIRS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the 88th report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs in relation to the committee's consideration of the objections filed in accordance with the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act. The committee respectfully requests that the deadline be extended to November 30, 1995.

If the House gives its consent I would move that the 88th report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs be concurred in.

PETITIONS

VIOLENCE

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the petitioners believe that violence and abuse in society need to be reduced, in fact if possible to be eliminated. They also believe that they affect young children in a very negative kind of way and do not see any need for violence and abuse to inform, educate or entertain.

I had the honour just over a week ago to address the CRTC hearings on this very topic and again today in the House. I am pleased to support the petition.

LAND MINES

Mrs. Jane Stewart (Brant, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to present a petition to the House that has been signed by hundreds of Canadians and continues to be circulated across the country.

The petitioners understand that more than 100 million anti–personnel land mines are laid around the world and indiscriminately kill or maim between 1,000 and 2,000 men, women and children every month. They understand that land mines impoverish communities by denying access to land and impede social and economic post–conflict reconstruction.

Therefore they petition Parliament to legislate the prohibition in Canada of the use, production, stockpiling, sale, trade and transfer of all anti–personnel land mines; to work for an international convention banning these activities; and to ask the Canadian government to increase its contributions to the United Nations for assistance in land mine clearance and for programs that would rehabilitate mine victims.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition which has been circulating across Canada. The petition has been signed by a number of Canadians from Surrey and Langley, B.C.

• (1530)

The petitioners would like to draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession which has not been recognized for its value to our society. They also state that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families that make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill, or the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call upon Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families that decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill, or the aged.

VIETNAM

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 405 Canadian citizens of Vietnamese origin. They pray for the intervention of Parliament to help in securing the release of religious, cultural and academic leaders now under detention, arrest or imprisonment in Vietnam.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Bill Graham (Rosedale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by over 150 Canadians from my riding in Rosedale and from as far away as Vancouver. They call upon Parliament to create an environment of justice and equality in Canada by amending the human rights act to prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation.

STUDENT ASSOCIATION FEES

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege to present two petitions today.

The first is from students who draw to the attention of the House that professional organization and union dues are obligatory and are therefore deductible under the Income Tax Act whereas the student association fees they are required to pay are not deductible. They call upon Parliament to amend the Income Tax Act to allow students to deduct their fees as other professionals do from their employment income.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is signed by over 400 people. They remind Parliament that discrimination which occurs daily against lesbian, gay and bisexual Canadians is unacceptable in a country known for its commitment to human rights and equality. They call upon Parliament to act quickly to amend the human rights act to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and to recognize the equality of same sex relationships.

POLLUTION PROGRAMS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have three separate petitions to present today.

The first is from 57 petitioners who request that Parliament institute complete recycling, waste reduction, energy and resource conservation, clean up and zero pollution programs.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is from 220 signatories from Ontario and Quebec. They request that Parliament legislate a more effective, productive and cost efficient method of unemployment relief, a policy of paying from these funds three million people $1,200 per year to work at entry level positions in understaffed public and private institutions.

THE ECONOMY

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the third petition has 34 signatories who call upon Parliament to redesign, restructure, reorganize or replace ineffective government structures and systems if needed in order to address the poor state of our national economic, social and environmental health in a timely and cost efficient manner.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all Notices of Motion for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand.

The Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY ACT

The House resumed from October 3 consideration of Bill C–64, an act respecting employment equity, as reported (with amendments) from the committee; and of Motion No. 7.

Mr. McClelland: Mr. Speaker, after consultation with the Liberals, the Bloc and the New Democratic Party yesterday, we agreed and would seek unanimous agreement to amend clause 25 which will be debated as part of group 5, with an amendment already given to—

The Deputy Speaker: Will the member please excuse the Chair. The member probably thought the debate was over yesterday. Other speakers wish to speak. We will have to deal with his point when the other speakers are finished on the earlier group of motions.

• (1535)

[Translation]

Mr. Ménard: Mr. Speaker, when we left off, you were about to put the question on the last motion that had been debated, which happened to be mine. Do you still intend to do that or are we proceeding with a new group of motions?

The Deputy Speaker: To assist the hon. member, we are still on group No. 4. I believe he already spoke to this group of motions, if I remember correctly. Does the hon. member wish to speak again to this question? If he does, we will need the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Ménard: When the debate was adjourned, you were about to put the question on Motion No. 7, which happens to be mine. If there are still members who wish to speak to this motion, I would be glad to listen to them. I was just wondering when the vote would be.

The Deputy Speaker: As I said before, there are no members who wish to speak, so we will have the vote later on.

[English]

Ms. Skoke: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I understand the hon. member was first on the speaking order and that I would speak second, if that pleases Your Honour.

The Deputy Speaker: The Chair was given a list of three people wishing to speak. The hon. member for Central Nova was the first on the list. Does she wish to cede her place to the hon. member for Rosedale?

Ms. Skoke: Yes.

Mr. Bill Graham (Rosedale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Central Nova for ceding her place to enable me to attend to other business later this afternoon.

Equal access to job opportunities is a principle Canadians adopted several years ago. Other nations think highly of us because we do more than pay lip service to equality. We take proactive steps to make equality a reality in the everyday lives of our citizens.

[Translation]

Bill C–64 will do much to expand opportunities for genuine equality in the workplace for women, aboriginal peoples, persons with disabilities and members of visible minorities.

It is our responsibility to ensure that this legislation achieves this important goal whenever possible.

That is why, like many of my colleagues who spoke earlier, I have a serious problem with Motion No. 7 introduced by the hon. member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve.

[English]

The hon. member's motion takes the need for co–operation in implementing the Employment Equity Act to an extreme that I do not believe would achieve the desired result. The government's perspective is to do what is necessary to implement and administer Bill C–64 in the most productive way possible but responsibility for implementation administration must remain with employers. They are the ones who ultimately have to answer to the commission if they fail to meet their responsibilities.

Let us consider what would happen if we adopted the hon. member's motion and moved from the bill's current requirements for collaboration between employers and employees to what might be called a co–management arrangement. For one thing, it would reduce the bill's requirement for consultation. The hon. member's motion if adopted would mean that there is no longer any need to consult regarding implementation or revision of employment equity plans.

Bill C–64 as it presently stands allows the commission or a tribunal to order consultation. I find it surprising that the hon. member who is seeking to enrich and improve the bill would want to delete provisions regarding consultations and replace them with weaker provisions that would not be subject to a direction or order. I would ask him and the party he represents to reconsider the bill from that perspective. It seems to me and to the government that the amendment as proposed actually weakens rather than strengthens the bill, contrary to the avowed intent of the hon. member.

Another Canadian characteristic that makes us the envy of others is our willingness to work together for the collective good of all our citizens. Voluntary collaboration and co–operation are innate qualities of being Canadian. I know many of us in the House seek and strive to enshrine those principles in all the work we do. I have every confidence that management and labour will collaborate to ensure the most effective implementation of employment equity plans. Why should they not? It surely is to the advantage of both.

It is in creating plans and legislation of this kind that one achieves an appropriate balance between the needs of labour and the needs of management. In doing so we have created a labour–management relations atmosphere which is beneficial to both parties. That is what we seek to achieve in this bill.

As my colleagues before me have said, we have already deliberated over the Bloc's concerns in committee. The government feels that having given these concerns due consideration, we are satisfied with the way the provisions now stand.

I remind the hon. member that the Employment Equity Act is designed to help move us closer to true equality in the workplace. It is not designed to change other aspects of employer–employee relationships. However, that would be the unfortunate result if we adopted the hon. member's motion.

The way the bill now stands, collaboration is a requirement. The ultimate responsibility for making decisions however lies with employers and that is the way it should be. There is a difference between the requirement for collaboration and discussion and the ultimate responsibility for the decision which surely must be taken by employers who have both the financial and managerial responsibility for ensuring that those decisions are properly carried out.

Hon. members know from their own experiences that we put much more effort into something when the effort is willingly given and not obtained through coercion. One cannot legislate co–operation and a positive attitude. We have seen that in the workplace and we are trying to strive to avoid confrontational situations in the workplace.

Positive co–operation comes about because the parties involved bring the right attitude to the task at hand. That is what the current provisions in the bill will achieve. They will create an atmosphere within which collaboration, co–operation and discussion will take place.

They will not seek however to create what the member's amendment seeks to create which is a sort of co–management regime that would by its very nature lead to strife between those on the management side with their responsibilities and those on the labour side with their responsibilities. It would totally confuse the two roles which both parties properly play in the workplace and would substitute, instead of this atmosphere of co–operation and collaboration, an atmosphere of mistrust between the two parties between which it is very important to establish good working relationships.

[Translation]

I wish to thank the hon. member for his contribution to this debate. Unfortunately, for the reasons I just mentioned, I cannot support Motion No. 7.

[English]

Ms. Roseanne Skoke (Central Nova, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to address this honourable House today with respect to Motion No. 7 brought forward by the hon. member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve.

The government appreciates the hon. member's input into Bill C–64. However, we are concerned that his motion would have an effect that would not be beneficial to the administration of the Employment Equity Act. The way the motion reads, if it were to be adopted, it would in essence establish an employer–employee co–management arrangement under the act.

Members of the Bloc raised this issue in committee and the government was responsive and flexible in giving it due consideration. However, if we adopted the motion before us it might very well have negative ramifications in the way employment equity is administered. Responsibility must be clear in this regard.

• (1545)

Nevertheless I hasten to add that the intent of the legislation before us is not to create situations where management is imposing employment equity on workers without their input. This is not the intent at all. On the contrary, the current act encourages and requires productive consultations between employer and employee representatives. As I said previously, the government appreciates constructive suggestions. That is why we listened and accepted recommendations made in committee.

The effect of those recommendations is that Bill C–64 now requires collaboration between employer and employee representatives when preparing, implementing and revising employment equity plans.

However, the key aspect of this arrangement is collaboration, not co–management. The responsibility for making final decisions must remain with employers. After all, they are the ones who must answer to the commission regarding implementation of the act. Hon. members will agree that the person who is held responsible for an action must retain the ability to make final decisions.

The government is trying to send a clear message here. For employment equity to be fair and effective, a co–operative effort in implementing its principles is required by both management and labour. The emphasis is very much the same, emphasis the government takes in its own relationships with other governments, the private sector, community organizations and so on. I am referring to the concept of partnership, a productive effort by all concerned to reach the same goal. That is exactly what came through in committee regarding the issue: collaboration, yes; co–management, no.

I remind the hon. member that adoption of his motion is not as simple as he may think. It would have widespread implications because the act does not have a provision which allows a tribunal to issue orders against a bargaining agent. In other words, collaboration requires just that, the two parties work together to reach a common goal voluntarily. Enforced collaboration is an oxymoron and experience shows that it makes for unproductive relationships.

Management must have final responsibility for its obligations under Bill C–64. It is management that must answer to the commission if it fails to meet its obligations under the act. It is unacceptable to adopt a situation wherein the employer is held responsible but does not have the ultimate authority to address that responsibility.

The government does not wish Bill C–64 to alter the framework of labour relations in a fundamental manner. That is not the purpose of the legislation before the House. Its purpose is to help move Canada toward true equality in the workplace. This is a step of which all Canadians should be very proud. Passage of Bill C–64 will enshrine in law the principle of equality for all Canadians. It will help to lay down a level playing field for those in the designated groups, specifically women, aboriginal people, persons with disabilities and members of visible minorities.

Bill C–64 also fulfils the government's pre–election commitment to strengthen the existing Employment Equity Act by extending coverage to virtually the entire public service. I believe hon. colleagues should also agree that fairness dictates that all Canadians have due access to employment opportunities. Therefore we must implement this legislation in a manner that will encourage co–operation and goodwill on the part of both employers and employees.

We thank the hon. member for his input. However, the government is satisfied with the bill's emphasis on collaboration. We are not prepared to move toward co–management. For that reason I cannot support the member's Motion No. 7.

• (1550)

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to rise during debate to discuss Motion No. 7.

The hon. member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve and his colleagues have made some eloquent points on behalf of this amendment, both here and previously in committee. That is the reason the government has already amended the original bill. That amendment made sense. To accept this amendment does not.

I want to take a few minutes to underline some of the essential elements in the government's approach to government equity to show why I will not be able to vote for this motion.

Two years ago at this very moment, almost every one of us was engaged in one of the most important federal election campaigns of our time. I was proud to campaign under the banner of a party and a leader with a clear plan. Our red book was a blueprint for action. It was no wish list. It was based on years of listening to Canadians and an active policy development process. It was a comprehensive approach grounded in a realistic perspective on what government can do.

As we well know by now, one of the commitments we made was to strengthen the Employment Equity Act. The old government had the information. It knew what needed to happen but it chose not to act. We said that it was time to move on this issue and we have with Bill C–64.

The red book was more than just a series of individual commitments. It was based on a sense of how Canada works best. Part of that was our understanding that business and government are not adversaries. We need each other. Canada needs a strong business community. We need an attractive business climate. A government that operates in an intelligent and strategic way fosters that kind of community in that kind of climate.

In essence we let business people do their work without reasonable interference from government and we look for ways to build productive partnerships. That has been our approach to employment equity. We know that voluntary efforts at equity simply have not worked, therefore legislation is needed but not heavy handed approaches.

Many of my colleagues have spoken of the willingness of the federally regulated business community to work with us on equity. I need not repeat the points they have made. One basic reason they are doing so is that we have adopted a human resource planning model for this legislation. We have designed this process to maximize co–operation. We also designed the process to maximize co–operation in the workplace.

Unions most certainly do have a place in this process. Unions do care. The labour organizations that made presentations to the committee stressed their commitment to social justice. We understand their contribution to workplace attitudes toward equity programs. We appreciate their concerns about making employment equity work well, given issues such as seniority rights.

For all those reasons, government members on the committee decided to amend the bill, to underline the requirement for consultation with bargaining agents. The government understood the need to ensure that consultation was real and the bill, as it has come to us from committee, requires collaborations.

This is an important step. To go further is to make a mistake. To require employers to share authority with unions in some kind of co–management regime is to blur accountability. At the end of the day employers in law and in fact are responsible to the government for their achievements in employment equity. Unions are not.

The plan we offered to Canadians in 1993 did not envision the federal government shaking up the framework of federal labour relations. We believe that businesses understand the approach we have laid out for employment equity. We also believe they understand that getting unions on side makes sense in a human resources planning model. We believe that they will pursue collaboration in the spirit that is set out in this bill as it is before us now.

However, the government sees no need to force a process on employers that may simply not work for any number of local reasons. We hope they will take on partnerships for employment equity but we will let them decided based on their own situations. I have a great deal of faith that the businesses and federal government employers covered by this legislation will see as we do. They will capitalize on this opportunity to break down the barriers that may deny them the best from their workers or those who could be. I think they will do the right thing and they will do it in the way that works best.

• (1555)

The bill has already moved to underline the need for collaboration. It retains the emphasis on employer accountability. That is the right balance. It is the approach I will continue to support.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

And more than five members having risen:

The Deputy Speaker: A recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

[English]

Group No. 5, the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest, on a point of order.

Mr. McClelland: Mr. Speaker, after consultation with Liberal members, the Bloc and the New Democratic Party, I would ask for unanimous consent to amend my motion. The amendment has been put together in consultation with the government and will improve my motion.

The table officers are already in possession of the amendment, so we would ask unanimous consent at this time to replace the motion.

The Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to accept the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.) moved, by unanimous consent:

That Bill C–64, in clause 25, be amended by adding after line 30, on page 18, the following:

"1.1 Where

(a) an employer has been informed of a non–compliance by a compliance officer under subsection (1) and the finding of non–compliance is based, in whole or in part, on the apparent under–representation of the aboriginal peoples, members of visible minorities or persons with disabilities in the employer's work force, as reflected in the employer's work force analysis conducted pursuant to paragraph 9(1)(a), and

(b) the employer believes that the apparent under–representation is attributable to the decision of employees who may be members of the designated groups concerned not to identify themselves as such or not to agree to be identified by the employer under subsection 9(2), the employer may inform the compliance officer of such.

(1.2) Where the employer satisfies the compliance officer that the finding of non–compliance is attributable, in whole or in part, to the reason described in paragraph (1.1)(b) and that the employer has made all reasonable efforts to implement the employment equity, the compliance officer shall take the reason into account in exercising any powers under this section.

(1.3) In satisfying the compliance officer under subsection (1.2) that the finding of non–compliance is attributable, in whole or in part, to the reason mentioned in paragraph (1.1)(b), the employer must do so by means other than the identification of individual employees in its work force that the employer believes are members of designated groups who have not identified themselves as such, or agreed to be identified by the employer as such, under subsection 9(2)."

He said: Mr. Speaker, those thousands of Canadians watching this on television have just seen that we really do earn our keep from time to time.

The amendment speaks to the fact we live in the land of employment equity or affirmative action. Because this is the first time today in which we are going to be speaking to Bill C–64, I should bring to the attention of those hundreds of thousands of Canadians glued to their television sets wondering what is going on that this bill is the affirmative action or employment equity bill.

• (1600)

Employment equity is a phrase coined by Judge Abella about 15 years ago to describe affirmative action because there were people who felt that affirmative action really did not find a lot of popularity in the land. So we are living with employment equity.

Bill C–64 would expand the notion of affirmative action in the federal workforce to everyone covered by the Treasury Board and to any company in the private sector doing business with the Government of Canada with 100 employees or more.

On the face of it, who would argue with the notion of affirmative action or employment equity—except that employment or any advantage or anything in our society based on race or on quotas is inherently discriminatory.

One of the very first articles in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms speaks to the notion of all Canadians being equal. Then the next paragraph says except those Canadians who are in specific designated groups and these Canadians may be assisted at the expense of the equality of everyone by special advantages. If that were not in the charter this amendment would certainly not see the light of day, because it would be against the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

That is the kind of anomaly we have to understand and somehow work around. Here we have the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms which says this kind of discrimination should not exist in our land, and then we say we will allow this kind of discrimination. The net result is that we have affirmative action laws. We have a system whereby people are able to gain promotion or gain employment or advantages of some description based on a quota.

As members know, today we are speaking to the amendments. We are supposed to be keeping our comments closely related to the amendment before us. The amendment I am speaking to relates to the responsibilities of the compliance officer.

We are now living in a country that is under the rule of employment equity or affirmative action. That means that certain employers, including the federal government, and certainly all of the private sector employers who have 100 employees or more, will wake up one day to a knock on the door.

The knock on the door will be from the compliance officer who is representing the federal government. The compliance officer will have significant powers to be able to delve into the affairs of the company to see if the employer is in compliance with the legislation, and the employer must prove it.

This is where race questions come in on the forthcoming census. This is why the questions about race have to be asked. The compliance officer will say that according to the last census, in a certain geographic area there are a certain number of green people, a certain number of yellow people, a certain number of people who speak this language and that language, and therefore the employer must employ people in the same proportion as the people in that community and they will be given quotas.

The employer will say that normally they hire the best people; it does not matter who they are or what their education is, what their sex is, they are hired on merit. The compliance officer will say they will have to take affirmative action into the mix, that they cannot just hire on merit any more, they have to look at both of the equations. Then the employer says come in and have a look around and see what we have.

Let us say that in a room there are 20 people working, and every one of them is from a visible minority or from some other designated group. The compliance officer looks at his list and says it says on the sheet that they do not have anybody who self–identifies as one of the disadvantaged groups. If you look around, my God, everybody in the place is in the designated group.

• (1605)

The problem is that we Canadians do not get up in the morning and ask what part of what victim group we are in and look for the support of the state to get anywhere in my life, seeking advantages that are not common to everybody.

In the purview of the House of Commons there are 1,700 employees. Recently, people were asked to voluntarily identify themselves as to what designated group they fall into. Only 50 people said they fell into one of these designated groups. Only 30 per cent of the people responded. That is not the kind of people Canadians are. We do not respond to that. We do not want a constitution or laws based on race. We want laws based on the equality of all individuals.

In any event, we have this legislation and we have pointed out the error, the problem, or the hole in it. The government looked at it and very wisely assumed our counsel and said we had a good point.

We do not like the legislation and we will vote against it. If we can improve it we will try because when we wake up in the morning it will be in the driveway.

I visited my brother–in–law a few years ago. He was looking at a new motorcycle and he had the brochure on the kitchen table. His wife came home, saw the brochure, and went ballistic. He asked her why she got so mad and she said "Because the brochure is on the kitchen table today and tomorrow the motorcycle will be in the driveway". That is the same story on this legislation. Today the brochure is on the table and tomorrow the legislation will be in the driveway, and there is nothing we can do about it. The government has its massive majority and it is going to push the legislation through come hell or high water. We must try to make it better in any little way we can.

Giving credit where credit is due, the government saw that the amendment improved the legislation and it made an amendment that improved the amendment we submitted. We end up with better legislation, which is how the House works from time to time.

I am speaking in support of the amendment, which will make this draconian legislation a little less draconian, perhaps a bit better. There is a ray of sunshine and light that comes into the House from time to time.

Mr. Rey D. Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thought I would yield to my hon. colleague from Toronto. However, I thank her for the privilege.

Speaking very briefly to this amendment, I would like to refute some of the misinterpretations, though not done with malice, by the hon. member.

He indicated in his opening remarks that while subsection 15(1) talks about the equality of all Canadians, in essence he argued that subsection 15(2) negates this by saying that we are not equal because of race. That to me is a misinterpretation of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I have more faith in the framers, fathers, and parents of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I think what section 15 tells us is that we should have equal benefit and protection of the law, all Canadians on an equal basis, irrespective of race, disability, origin, or gender. At the same time, subsection 15(2) deals with disadvantaged people, as visible minorities may be, people of First Nations origin, women, and persons with disabilities.

In subsection 15(2) the framers of our charter of rights and freedoms were trying to prevent possible dilatory tactics on the part of people who would complain that government can introduce legislation that will address those very disadvantages. They are not being given advantages; they are only being restored to equality. They are disadvantaged, so we must restore them to equality. They are not being restored to superiority. I think that has to be made very clear to all Canadians.

Therefore subsections 15(1) and (2) demonstrate the ingenuity of Canadians.

In his opening remarks the hon. member indicated that quota is a way of giving advantages. For the same reason, it is not. On a very close reading of the bill itself, quota is prohibited. How clear can we be? The law as proposed and tabled in the House states that no one may impose a quota, not even the enforcement officer. We have to forget about this being quotas.

Certainly the member in trying to sustain his argument about quotas indicated those people in this disadvantaged group are to be employed in the proportion they exist in the population in the community. That is wrong. That is not what the bill states. The bill states that it is in proportion to the available qualified people. Why not? Why would one argue against the qualification of others only because of colour, disability, origin or gender? The bill states that it is in proportion to the number of qualified people, again sustaining the principle of equality.

On the point of census on race, as I indicated to the media, we have nothing to be ashamed of when we are asked that we should say that we are Canadians. The census is one taken among Canadians. Therefore it is a given that this is a census of Canadians. If we are asked about our origins and our heritage, we should be proud. I am proud to be a Filipino Canadian. The Jews are proud to be Jewish Canadians. Ukrainians are proud because they are Canadians as well. We are proud of our heritage. That is what our nation has taught us. It has given us self–confidence, self–worth and dignity.

On the motion itself, I agree with the hon. member that this is an example of co–operation taking place in the House. It is also a clear example that the government, when it sees a good amendment, tries to improve on it and makes it even better. We deal in this amendment, which was reached by consensus by all parties in the House, with non–fulfilment of the employment equity plan as a consequence of a poor identification that is based on self–identification.

I call to the House's attention that with this improved amendment we have also sustained another principle, confidentiality. I see the member who originally proposed the motion is smiling. I think this is what reconciliation is all about. We should be able to have a new principle without killing another principle. We should have one principle strengthen the other. Here we are preserving the principle of confidentiality.

Why does the government agree to this amendment, which was also refined by the government? It is because we heard witnesses acknowledge the limitations of the self–identification system. However, witnesses have also told the committee that we must retain the privacy and confidentiality of information. Obviously, we have to reconcile these two views.

We were not shown any other method by which to identify except by coercion. We agreed at the committee level that coercion would do more harm than good. Therefore, in the absence of an alternative tool, in the absence of limitation, the committee initiated that we should retain the self–identification approach. However, at the same time, the committee proposed that there be more openness on the part of employers to hold employer and employee meetings on a regular basis so that there would be a feeling of rapport between employees and employers. At the same time information sessions must be held by the employers to inform employees of the importance of identifying themselves so we can truly monitor the progress of employment equity in a given workplace.

As well, the committee recommended that managers in those businesses be given special training to enable them to be more persuasive of the need for self–identification.

On the issue of self–identification, in the spirit of this act it is very critical that the process be held in a climate or atmosphere of trust and confidentiality. It can only be accomplished if we truly convince employees that the purpose of self–identification is to ensure employment equity in the workplace. Nobody would disagree with that kind of approach.

On that note, I am pleased we have been able to arrive at the motion proposed by the member for Edmonton Southwest that has refined by the government. It is a classic example that the government always listens to good proposals whether they come from the opposition or from its own members.

The Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 11A. I understand the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest has a question about whether the text of the motion is the same in the two official languages. Does he wish to rise on a point of order?

Mr. McClelland: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The table officers are presently looking into it. There seems to be some concern that the French text is not the same as the English text. We need to have that clarified.

The Deputy Speaker: There seems to be a problem with the translation of the last part of the motion. Since the original motion was in English perhaps, if it is acceptable to the member and the rest of the members in the House, we could take it as the one that will apply. Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

• (1620)

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton Southwest has heard Motion No. 11A. Is it in accord with his understanding of the motion that was moved by unanimous consent?

Mr. McClelland: Yes, it is, Mr. Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

(Motion No. 11A agreed to.)

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): moved

Motion No. 13

That Bill C–64, in Clause 28, be amended by adding after line 31, on page 20, the following:

"(4.1) Where the President of the Panel appoints one or more persons as members of a Tribunal, the President shall make reasonable efforts to appoint persons

(a) from designated groups in a proportion that reflects their representation in the Canadian population as a whole; and

(b) who, in the opinion of the President, are highly knowledgeable about employment equity or have substantial experience in this area."

Motion No. 14

That Bill C–64, in Clause 28, be amended by adding after line 31, on page 20, the following:

"(4.1) Where the President of the Panel appoints one or more persons as members of a Tribunal, the President shall make reasonable efforts to appoint persons

(a) from designated groups in a proportion that reflects their representation in the Canadian population as a whole; or

(b) who, in the opinion of the President, are highly knowledgeable about employment equity or have substantial experience in this area."

He said: Mr. Speaker, for your information, my colleague is Mr. Deshaies, and I thank him for supporting the motion.

I would simply like to say what it is about. One of the innovations in this bill, which has earned the support of the official opposition, is that the Canadian Human Rights Commission will be made specifically responsible for enforcing the Employment Equity Act. No doubt, for those not familiar with employment equity, it would be useful to point out that it involves making arrangements to ensure that four categories of people in our society: women, persons with disabilities, aboriginal peoples and members of visible minorities may finally take their rightful place in the labour market.

One of the means the bill proposes is the obligation, which applies to both the private sector and the public sector—making the public sector subject to the provisions of the bill is another one of its innovations—meaning that, once the bill receives royal assent, 300,000 other Canadians and Quebecers will be covered by employment equity.

Another obligation under this bill is that of preparing an employment equity plan, which is to be submitted the following June to the director responsible for the program at Human Resources Development Canada. It will be up to the Minister of Human Resources Development to combine all the plans submitted by both the private and public sectors.

The reason I say this is very important is because, when plans are missing, when an employer fails to submit an employment equity plan within the required time period and fails to make all reasonable efforts—the expression used in the bill—to achieve the employment equity objectives he set for himself, then a course of redress is possible. That is where the amendment enters in.

• (1625)

For the first time since the Employment Equity Act was assented to, that is since 1986, the human rights commissioner will be able, on request and as he sees fit during summary proceedings where there has been an admission of guilt, to establish an employment equity review tribunal.

This is an extremely important body for enforcing the act because there is no provision for a right of appeal. The commissioner will therefore have the responsibility of creating a committee from whose decisions there may be no appeal, as the hon. parliamentary secretary who is so fascinated by these questions is aware. In other words, decisions will be final and binding.

The Bloc's amendment, which I believe is a well thought out amendment, will certainly gain government support, since this government is beginning to feel more and more alone.

The amendment will consist in ensuring that the three administrative officers called upon to hear the case will come from designated groups.

We feel that this is important, that there must be a correlation, a link, between what it is felt that this act represents and those who will be bringing down a decision in one of these administrative proceedings.

These are the reasons it is so vital for this bill to be amended and for the commission members not to be already in the employ of the Human Rights Commission. The Human Rights Commission employees do a good job, no denying; they are well informed about the various statutes concerning human rights, but they have never brought down decisions relating to employment equity. We on this side of the House would like to see a specific clause in this bill devoted to the Human Rights Commission's ability to select from among the general population people to represent women, the disabled, visible minorities and, of course, aboriginal people.

We feel that it will be far more worthwhile for this tribunal not to require any exceptional procedures and for it to be flexible. The only thing that will be exceptional will be the right of appeal, as I have already stated. The principles of natural justice will have to apply, but should a tribunal decision be found to have been in error, there would still be the possibility of applying for an appeal to be heard in the Federal Court of Appeal.

Basically, we think it would be useful to amend the bill so that the commissioners who sit on these tribunals are members of the groups for whom we are trying to ensure representation.

I must say I regret, and I say this with my usual frankness, that the government was not very receptive to this amendment in committee. Now you know my philosophy: I always do everything out in the open. I told the government I would introduce an amendment, and they have not been very receptive.

I hope that between consideration in committee and the debate we are having today, the government will have reconsidered, because this is supported by representatives of the cultural communities who appeared before the committee and by the unions.

I may recall that this amendment would not involve additional expenditures, since in any case, it does not change what the bill now prescribes, which is the presence of three commissioners whose remuneration shall be paid by the Canadian Human Rights Commission.

• (1630)

Since the government has maintained the same designation procedure and did not feel it was necessary to add another category, the groups are still the same, in other words, women, aboriginal peoples, persons with disabilities and visible minorities. In committee we discussed the relevance of adding a fifth or sixth category but concluded that we did not have enough information on other groups in society that might experience specific discrimination in the workplace.

Since the designated groups were maintained and are still designated on the basis of self–designation, I think it makes sense to take the same approach when administrative authorities are asked to hand down rulings, that is, when an employment equity review tribunal is appointed.

I have the impression, and I say this with the utmost caution, that this is also an amendment the Reform Party would like to see. Again, and we cannot repeat this often enough, this will not involve any additional budgetary expenditures, since the composition of the employment equity review tribunal remains the same when a tribunal is established at the request of the human rights commissioner, since according to the bill, establishment of a tribunal may be requested by either the employer or the Canadian Human Rights Commission.

We feel this amendment will considerably improve the bill. I hope it will receive the support of a majority of the members in this House.

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let me first say that I am proud, as a Quebecer and a Canadian, of the major step forward we are about to take in matters of equality and human rights with the passing of this bill on employment equity.

I would also like to thank our colleague for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve for his strong and sincere commitment to human rights and to promoting equality and equity for all of Canada's citizens.

I thank him for his ongoing efforts in this regard, both on the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled People and here in the House of Commons. He continues to express his commitment with the motions he is putting before the House today in order to further improve this bill on employment equity.

With the motions we are debating, that is, Motions Nos. 13 and 14, he is proposing that the people appointed to an employment equity review tribunal themselves represent designated groups or have knowledge or particular experience in this area.

Given the legislation it applies to, the motion is highly justifiable in theory. However, it seems fairly clear to us, as some of my colleagues have already mentioned, with all due respect to my colleague, that it is literally inapplicable in practice. For the information of my fellow members, I think it would be useful to first look at the nature and the function of this tribunal and to put it in the context of the logic of this bill so we can understand when and how it intervenes and how it is made up. First, when does it intervene?

The employment equity review tribunal takes action following an intervention by a compliance officer with an employer governed by the act. When should a compliance officer audit an employer? When there is a need to determine if an employer fulfils his or her obligations under the act.

Who decides if an audit must be conducted? Again, this decision is made by the Canadian Human Rights Commission, to which the bill gives the authority to enforce the act and monitor employers' compliance.

Clause 22 of the bill provides that the commission is responsible for the enforcement of the obligations imposed on employers by the sections that concern them.

The human rights commission determines if a given employer is complying with the employment equity requirements outlined in the act.

• (1635)

To assume this responsibility, the commission may designate a person to conduct compliance audits of employers on its behalf. This person is the compliance officer referred to in clause 23. If the audit reveals that the employer failed to fulfil any of his or her obligations, the compliance officer tries to reach an agreement with the employer to implement the corrective measures required.

However, if the compliance officer and the employer cannot come to an agreement, the commission may order the employer to correct the situation. During the time limits set out in clause 27, the employer can challenge the commission's decision by asking the president of the human rights tribunal panel to conduct a review, again under clause 27. As for the commission, it has the same recourse if the employer does not comply with its decision within the prescribed deadline.

It is at this point that, in either case, the employment equity review tribunal becomes involved. Under clause 28, the tribunal consists of one member of the human rights tribunal panel appointed by the president of that panel. In more complex cases, the president can appoint a tribunal of three members.

The most basic arithmetic shows that the first part of Motions Nos. 13 and 14 tabled by the member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve are unnecessary since, in most cases, the tribunal would consist of only one person. Indeed, we cannot see how a single person could represent designated groups in a proportion that reflects their representation in the Canadian population as a whole.

The member supports his argument by saying that the tribunal will often consist of more than one member if Motion No. 12 is carried, in addition to those cases where the president will deem appropriate to appoint three people. But again, the number of members would still be too small to ensure significant representation of designated groups.

Even if we implement the idea of a degree of representation for designated groups, we will unnecessarily complicate the already complex task of the president of the panel, while also, in some cases, casting a doubt regarding the impartiality of this judicial process. In short, that part of the motion would create more problems than it would solve.

The second part of the motion is definitely more reasonable and easier to implement. It provides that, in the opinion of the president, the persons appointed as members of an employment equity review tribunal are highly knowledgeable about employment equity, or have substantial experience in this area. The government has already said it agrees with that idea. The standing committee which reviewed the bill passed an amendment requiring that, when appointing tribunals, the president of the panel take into account the knowledge and experience of people in the area of employment equity.

I believe that the amendment proposed by the committee is quite similar to the one tabled by the hon. member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve. Moreover, the same clause, specifically clause 28(7), provides that the president of the panel may hire persons having technical or special knowledge to assist or advise a tribunal. Clearly, the bill already provides sufficient guarantees that the tribunal will rely on sound knowledge in the area of employment equity. Consequently, in my opinion, the amendment proposed by the hon. member is absolutely not necessary.

The Deputy Speaker: Before recognizing the hon. member for London—Middlesex, it is my duty to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake—Indian Affairs.

[English]

Mr. Pat O'Brien (London—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I begin my remarks by thanking the hon. member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve for his proposed amendment. Clearly he has heard an argument that was made during the hearings of the committee that he believes has merit. Having said that, I will not vote in favour of his amendment. I believe the essential goal of the amendment has already been captured in the change which the committee made to Bill C-64.

• (1640)

The standing committee achieved the appropriate balance in the legislation. It responded to the essence of the points it heard on the issue. It did so in a way that is consistent with the spirit of the bill. There are many practical reasons why going further simply will not work.

We have often heard that justice must not only be done, it must be seen to be done. That should apply in the work of the new employment equity review tribunals. If we want the system to work as well as it must, then we should want the most competent persons to hear cases.

That becomes even more important when we understand how complex the cases that will come before these tribunals can be. They will often involve equity and human rights considerations. They will consider real world business practices and human resource management approaches. They will involve a careful assessment and balancing of needs and priorities. That demands a reasonable level of expertise in the members of a tribunal. Yet, as many witnesses pointed out, some members of the Canadian human rights tribunal panel have not necessarily had any real knowledge of employment equity issues in the past. They have not necessarily come in to cases with any expertise in workplace issues.

Some employer and labour representatives said this was no place for on the job training and yet that is what they have seen. They cited examples in which the individuals hearing cases clearly knew far less than the people appearing before them. The result was frustration, added cost and some doubt as to whether a truly just decision could be rendered. In the same vein, representatives of designated groups saw a need for tribunal members who were truly aware of their situation. They were concerned that tribunal members would not understand the barrier they faced and the need for action.

When we look at the committee's report we see that witnesses offered many suggestions on how to improve this state of affairs. This proposed amendment draws on some of those ideas.

The committee took a different course. I think it was a better course. It chose to amend Bill C–64 by requiring the president of the Canadian human rights tribunal panel to give due consideration to the expertise of individuals he or she might appoint to employment equity review tribunals. That amendment would give the president of the panel a clear direction without tying his or her hands.

In a way, that decision is consistent with the direction of the entire bill. The emphasis is on reasonable efforts to place qualified people in this role. It does not set a quota. It does not incorporate the labour relations based model into the process. It does not assume that there should be representatives of perspectives that are in probable opposition to each other. Moreover, it permits a flexible approach where appropriate. The goal is to appoint tribunal members who understand the issues and who can rule on them fairly.

Not only are there sound philosophical reasons for the House to support the committee's approach and to reject the amendment, there are sound practical reasons to do so as well. One of the most important pertains to the size of the tribunals. Tribunals do not have seven or nine people on them who can be chosen to fill certain quota needs. A tribunal will have either three or just one person.

If three persons are hearing a case, and that was the preference of the committee as hon. members may recall, how will the representation issues be resolved? That problem becomes unsolvable if a one person tribunal is established. Hon. members should remember that one person tribunals may often be appointed in less complex cases. In those instances, representation of designated groups, expertise and experience simply cannot be achieved in a fashion that most people will see as fair.

Clearly it is not possible to make a system of proportional representation work well for three people and it simply cannot work for one person. It is far better to concentrate on expertise and experience. In any event, representation is taking care of itself.

When Keith Norton, the president of the Canadian human rights tribunal panel, appeared before the standing committee he agreed that the tribunal should have membership from all walks of life. It would be similar to what we see happening across the judiciary. It is growing more and more representative of society all the time.

The committee has done its work and has done it very well. I commend its members for that work. Because of that direction I do not think we should support this amendment.

The Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 13. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the motion is deferred.

[English]

The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions at the report stage of the bill now before the House.

Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

The Deputy Speaker: Having heard the request from the chief government whip, the vote will be deferred until five o'clock.

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that only slightly over ten minutes are left, instead of pursuing other government business perhaps the House would give its consent to suspend for 12 minutes.

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to suspend the House for 12 minutes?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

(The sitting of the House was suspended at 4.47 p.m.)

Government Orders

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 5.01 p.m.

The Deputy Speaker: The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions on Bill C–64. The first question will be on Motion No. 1.

Call in the members.

(The House divided on Motion No. 1, which was negatived on the following division:)

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

MINING EXPLORATION AND DEVELOPMENT

The House resumed from June 5 consideration of the motion.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Government Services, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to rise in the House tonight to speak on Motion M-292 which reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider implementing a new program of mining incentives which would encourage exploration and development in Canada.

[Translation]

But before going any further, I would like to state some very important facts, for the benefit of our viewers. First of all, Canada is the third largest mining country in the world, extracting about 60 metals and minerals, including zinc, uranium, potash and gold. The mining industry provides employment for approximately 335,000 Canadians in 150 communities. Mining companies in Northern Ontario have created 18,000 direct jobs in the metal industry and 5,000 in the non metallic minerals industry. I am very proud to say that the Williams mine, in Marathon, in the riding of Cochrane—Superior, is the largest gold mine in Canada.

There are, however, many barriers to the survival of the mining industry. First of all, mining exploration is a temporary land use that disrupts small areas for a very short time period. Once the mineral deposit is depleted, cleanup procedures are undertaken and land can be used for other purposes. Unfortunately, land use issues are fraught with uncertainty because of the development of new parks and native land claims, some of which are being negotiated as we speak.

The industry is facing new difficulties since countries like Chile, Argentina and Mexico are upgrading their economies and taking steps to attract mining exploration and, thus, investors.

• (1740)

In 1993, Canadian companies with budgets over $1 million invested nearly $260 million, or half their budgets, in exploration outside of Canada. This represents an increase over 1992, when these companies devoted 40 percent of their exploration budgets abroad.

Why is that? First of all, at the natural resources committee hearings last year, the Canadian mining industry informed us of the stringent environmental standards—that is the first problem—and the slow licensing process as well. The second problem is non-unionized labour in Latin America and Mexico. Because of this, wages are extremely low; also, the standard of living is lower in these countries than here. Investors enjoy a much higher return on their investments down there than in Canada.

Since the licensing and environmental assessment processes are under federal and provincial jurisdiction, they are characterized by duplication and delay. We need at least $900 million to $1 billion a year in exploration capital in Canada to rebuild our ore reserves which have dropped dangerously.

We must bear in mind that, from 1990 to 1994, while 44 mines shut down operations in Canada, only 24 were opened.

[English]

If we want mining exploration to continue and to keep investors interested, there should be incentives from the government. We need a new program of mining incentives that will encourage exploration and development, encourage Canadian companies to keep investing in their country. That will permit the industry to help stabilize the economy and create employment.

Last year, as I mentioned a while ago, the committee for natural resources issued a report after its very long hearings. The report says:

> Canada needs to remove existing structural impediments to the achievement of a sound mineral investment climate. These have been identified as: the tax burden on the industry, particularly the one imposed by non-profit taxes; the inefficiencies of the current environmental regulatory regime; and the uncertainty surrounding land use policies and security to mineral title.

Another recommendation coming from the report is that the government has to work with mining communities and the provincial governments to establish those crucial partnerships to work together to ensure that we have a viable mining industry in Canada.

There is a great need for the harmonization of environmental guidelines. As it is today, the federal government's guidelines differ from those of many of the provinces. This simply adds complexity to opening new mines.

The mining companies are not asking for grants but they want a level playing field and a tax system that is truly competitive with the rest of the world. There should be security of land tenure and a certainty of continuity in the rules of the game in terms of issuing permits and doing environmental assessments.

After extensive hearings the Standing Committee on Natural Resources have recommended nine key points on mining incentives. These points were also present in the Whitehorse mining initiative report.

I would like to emphasize a few of those recommendations. First, change the adjusted cost base of flowthrough shares from zero to the actual costs of the shares for five years only, to kickstart mining exploration again.

Flowthrough shares would provide a less costly means of raising equity based financing for exploration and development by facilitating a widespread share issue. Flowthrough shares allow access to a broad range of investors while minimizing the impact on corporate management and control.

• (1745)

Second, there should also be harmonization in the federal and provincial environmental guidelines. Co–operation agreements should be established among the jurisdictions for the development, administration and enforcement of environmental standards to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of the regulatory system and to reduce unnecessary industry regulatory compliance costs.

A new mining project should be subject to only one timely environmental assessment by a single lead agency with only one set of recommendations that meet all the requirements. We should try to conciliate conserving the environment with the creation of employment.

Third, we should amend the Income Tax Act to defer taxation of income generated by mine reclamation trusts until the funds within these trusts are finally allocated for reclamation purposes. Reclamation funds should be treated also like RRSPs.

Therefore I support Motion No. 292 by my colleague from Timiskaming. I insist at the same time that we should provide a newer direction for our mining industry and ensure that it continues to make a strong contribution to the Canadian economy.

[Translation]

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like, first of all, to thank or congratulate the hon. member for Timiskaming—French River for tabling this motion, and introducing it in the House on June 5 of this year. This motion reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider implementing a new program of mining incentives which would encourage exploration and development in Canada.

When he talked on his motion, the hon. member mentioned in this House that in the area of mining, there was a substantial increase in exploration throughout Canada in 1994. However, this is not the opinion expressed by the Association des prospecteurs du Québec in a letter dated March 30, addressed to the Minister of Finance.

The letter said in particular that the government does not seem to realize that there is currently in Canada a lack of exploration which is mortgaging the future of the whole Canadian mining industry. The letter also said that it was urgent to try to replenish our mineral reserves. If we neglect to do that it will have an impact on a whole economic activity which is directly or indirectly connected with the mining and smelting industry in Canada.

I would like to say that we should make a distinction between mining exploration itself, where there was substantial growth in 1994 compared to 1993, and activities dependent on mining exploration, which also grew in 1994. We should mention, however, that despite this strong growth, we are a long way from the levels which existed in the early 1980s.

This being said, we can realize the scope of what the hon. member for Timiskaming—French River was saying and I quote: "Despite this, major problems and impediments still exist to a sound and sustainable mining sector in this country." It is in this context that the hon. member was asking the House to press the government to implement a program of incentives which would encourage exploration and development in the mining sector in Canada.

Of course, there is no reason why we should oppose this motion, even though it seems to be nothing but an expression of intent. However, assuming that the House of Commons agrees to this motion at the time of the vote, what will it give us that we do not have already?

The problem is not that Motion M–292 is inappropriate, but that it is not sufficient to solve the mining problem in Canada. In its report on the Canadian mining industry that was tabled before Parliament in December 1994, the Standing Committee on Natural Resources made a series of recommendations that all committee members, whatever their party affiliation, agreed on.

Of these recommendations, there are two that I will now outline for you. First, recommendation No. 3 which says: "That the federal government introduce a mineral exploration incentive by modifying the Income Tax Act to incorporate a change in the adjusted cost base of flow–through shares from a value of zero to the actual cost of the shares".

Then, recommendation No. 4, which everybody agreed on: "That in order to enhance the effectiveness of exploration work financed by means of flow–through shares, the federal government enable the exploration activity funded through such shares to be carried out over a period of one full year after financing".

• (1750)

The problem with the motion of the member for Timiskaming—French River is that, as it stands currently, it would do nothing concrete to stimulate mining exploration. It would be insufficient, in itself, to ensure implementation of the recommendations of the Standing Committee on Natural Resources, that the hon. member moving this motion is a member of.

If I brought to the attention of the House the committee recommendations that deal with flow–through shares, it is because my colleague from Abitibi also moved before Parliament a motion, Motion M–247, that has the same objective as Motion M–292, but would have a more obvious impact on mining exploration.

I do not intend to deal at length with the motion moved by my hon. colleague from Abitibi, but rather on the one moved by the hon. member for Timiskaming—French River. However, since both motions are very similar, I think it is relevant to speak to both. I would like to indicate that members of the Bloc Quebecois will support motion M–292 inasmuch as it is not at cross purposes with motion M–427 which we will also all support.

I will not dwell at length on the positive impact tax incentives could have on the mining industry, since my colleague from Abitibi covered that very well, but I would like to mention that this kind of incentive has proved to be useful in Quebec, more particularly with small mining companies, which have a positive impact on local economies through their exploration operations.

The hon. member for Timiskaming—French River has given lots of figures, which my colleague opposite repeated a moment ago, to demonstrate the importance of mining in Canada and describe the Canadian position in mining exploration throughout the world in several sectors.

Despite all those figures, the government does not seem to get the point that the mining industry is one of the strongest foundations of the Canadian economy and deserves more than lip service. If motion M–292 carries, it will have a positive impact because we will at least know which way the government is heading as regards the development of our mining industry. And if the motion of the hon. member for Abitibi is agreed to, the mining industry will be able to know how the government intends to reach its goal.

In the time remaining, I would like to comment on statements made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East in reaction to remarks made by the hon. member for Abitibi on his motion. The hon. member for Fraser Valley East said among other things, and I quote:

[English]

"I am surprised and I might almost say astonished that this particular motion would come from the hon. member for Abitibi". Let me paraphrase what he says. He wants the federal government to pour money into subsidies for industry in Canada and in Quebec.

My colleague did not seem to understand the difference that exists between a federalist in Quebec and a sovereignist. A federalist in Quebec effectively always asks for more power and money. Sovereignists in Quebec do not want that at all. They want all the power and no money. We fully understand that being a minority in a majority means that we will fight forever, day after day, for bits of power and morsels of rights. We do not want bits of power and morsels of rights. We want all the power and all the rights. However, as long as we are in Confederation we will ask for our fair share of the federal expenses.

I will quote again the hon. member for Fraser Valley East: "I am surprised because the hon. member for Abitibi is a member of the Bloc Quebecois which, as we all know, is a political party with only one purpose and that is to destroy Canada as we know it by taking Quebec out of Confederation". That is a very strange affirmation.

Most Canadians actually believe, concerning Quebec of course, that we are a bunch of troublemakers, that we receive much more money from Canada than we put in, and that if the economic situation in Canada goes bad it is partly due to the political instability in Quebec. If those three assumptions are right and if people really believe them, the sovereignty of Quebec should be seen by most Canadians as a good way to solve a problem once and for all and save money, providing that we assume our fair share of the Canadian debt. That is exactly what we intend to do.

We are not a problem; we are the solution to a problem. If the no vote wins in Quebec we are back to square one. It will be 15 years of political debate to the next referendum, and I am sure nobody wants that. We do not want to destroy Canada. We simply think that Canadians should be able to run their country the way they want, without having to please Quebec at each moment, and that Quebec should be allowed to do the same.

• (1755)

My friend from Fraser Valley East continued: "I hope the member understands that people from my riding are frustrated by this kind of behaviour". I am frustrated too. I fully understand what frustration means, but the only way to put an end to that frustration is to support the sovereignty of Quebec.

A certain amount of Canadians believe that we are sovereignists because we hate Canadians. This is absolutely not true. We love Canadians but love has absolutely nothing to do with politics. I love my father very much; that is love. However I would never let my father run my business; that is politics.

I have worked everywhere in Canada: Edmonton, Toronto, southern Ontario, Regina, Saskatchewan and Saint John, New Brunswick. I have also worked in the United States: Texas, Florida, West Point and New York. I fully agree with the Prime Minister of Canada. If I were an immigrant from anywhere in the world trying to find a new country in which to live, Canada would be my first choice. However I am not an immigrant trying to find a new country in which to live. I already have a country. My country is Quebec.

Mr. Robert Bertrand (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise today to speak on the motion put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Timiskaming—French River, which urges the government to consider implementing incentives to promote mining exploration and development in Canada.

Canada extends over some 10 million square kilometres and is one of the richest countries in the world in terms of natural resources. Its mining industry was ranked amongst the best in the world in many areas of mineral production. Mining has always played a major role in the Canadian economy, which is hardly surprising, since Canada is one of the biggest producers and exporters of non–fuel mineral resources.

Statistics for 1992 show that the non–fuel mineral resource industry accounted for a little over 4 per cent of the Gross Domestic Product and almost 3 per cent of employment. Also, these statistics indicate that the total value of the non–fuel mineral resource production for 1992 reach $14.6 billion, which is 41 per cent of overall mineral production in Canada. It is important, also, to remember that Canada produces a little over 60 minerals. Except for phosphorus, manganese, bauxite and chrome, our country can meet its own needs in terms of minerals.

Statistics on exploration also speak volumes. Non–fuel mineral resource exports reached $23 billion, a little over 15 per cent of total exports for Canada. During the same period, the value of our non–fuel mineral resource imports was estimated at $13.2 billion, for a trade surplus of over $9.8 billion. All these statistics reflect the outstanding progress made by the Canadian mining industry.

Technological innovation also has something to do with the boom enjoyed by this industry. However, the industry did not escape from the upheaval caused by the recession during the late 1980s and the early 1990s. Mining was hard hit during this period. But since 1993, it is recovering nicely. All of us in this House recognize that several irritants are still preventing Canada's mining industry from hitting its stride.

• (1800)

This is why I wholeheartedly support the motion put forward by the hon. member for Timiskaming—French River, whom I wish to congratulate for this excellent initiative, especially since my hon. colleague showed, in the eloquent speech he made when he introduced his motion, that he is very much aware of the current codition of federal finances.

[English]

This motion has nothing to do with tax breaks, grants, or subsidies. Its only goal is to bring the government to consider measures that would not cost a lot of money to the Canadian taxpayer but will go a long way to ensure a brighter future to the Canadian mining industry and to the mining communities across Canada.

In its report of December 1994 entitled "Lifting Canadian Mining Off the Rocks", the House of Commons Standing Committee on Natural Resources proposed nine recommendations. Some of those recommendations would cost money if implemented, while others would emphasize collaboration and partnership that would alleviate some problems for the industry. Here are some of the recommendations.

Recommendation number three: "That the federal government introduce a mineral exploration incentive by modifying the Income Tax Act to incorporate a change in the adjusted cost base of flow through shares from a value of zero to the actual cost of the shares, that this new fiscal measure incorporate a cap on a given company's take–up of the tax benefit, and that the new incentive vehicle be in place for a maximum duration of five years".

Recommendation number four: "That in order to enhance the effectiveness of exploration work financed by means of flow through shares, the federal government enable the exploration activity funded through such shares to be carried out over a period of one full year after financing".

Recommendation number seven: "That once initial steps have been taken to improve the investment climate in Canadian mining, the federal government, its provincial and territorial counterparts, and the domestic mining industry develop through consultation an integrated approach to communicate the positive features of the Canadian mining sector to potential investors".

In May 1995 the Minister of Natural Resources responded very favourably to the report of the Standing Committee on Natural Resources on mining. She stated: "The Government of Canada remains committed to fostering a modern environmentally responsible mining industry that contributes significantly to Canada's economic growth and job creation. We are committed to ensuring in conjunction with provincial governments and the Canadian mining industry that there is a positive environment for investment in mineral exploration in Canada".

A month earlier in Miami, Florida at the investing in the Americas conference, the Minister of Natural Resources stated in her speech to the conference: "The Government of Canada recognizes the importance of the mining industry, its contribution to economic growth and jobs, and the challenges it faces".

During the last Canadian federal election the Liberal Party of Canada was the only political party to release a detailed policy outlining its commitment to the mining industry. This commitment has not wavered. We are proud of our mining industry and we believe its present and future prospects are excellent.

[Translation]

From the statements made by the Minister of Natural Resources, one can only conclude that the federal government is acting in good faith in this matter and, particularly, that it is prepared to help the mining industry, in co–operation with all the other stakeholders.

It even seems fairly clear that our government is already responding to the request made in today's motion, with the intention of keeping government initiatives in the mining industry in line with the present fiscal situation.

This approach was clearly expressed in the response the government gave to the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Natural Resources entitled "Lifting Canadian Mining off the Rocks", which was tabled in the House by the hon. Anne McLellan, Minister of Natural Resources, on May 8, and I quote: "While mining remains a priority of this government, budgetary conditions also require that new ways be sought to deliver quality programs and services at a lower cost. To this end, the federal approach will be to exercise a role that complements that of the provinces and provides a national co–ordination capacity, where required, so that government policies and strategies have the most favourable impact on mining in Canada".

Heads of the mining industry in Canada are quite aware that the federal government cannot do it all on its own and offer a miracle cure for the ills of the mining industry. However, they can count on the federal government's co–operation and total support.

Already in 1994, in its action plan entitled "Building a More Innovative Economy", the federal government had announced its intention to implement a number of measures concerning the regulations governing the climate for investors. Improvements are being considered in the following areas: decisions regarding land use; definition of garbage and recycling; regulatory systems north of the 60th parallel; better evaluation of environmental and economic factors in the review of the impact of new regulations—

The Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, the member's time has now expired.

[English]

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, as a former prospector and mining consultant I am especially pleased at this opportunity to comment on Motion No. 292.

Hon. members should be concerned that after adjusting for inflation, domestic mining exploration expenditures for 1992 valued at $385 million were at the lowest levels since 1967. Despite increases in the past two years, they remain substantially below levels of the $800 million yearly it will take to maintain required reserves.

It is painfully obvious that mineral exploration and therefore the Canadian mining industry is in serious trouble. The question of course is what do we do to correct this sorry fact.

I want to ask my hon. colleagues what they think makes prospectors like myself tramp around in the bush for months on end looking for solid indications that a chunk of northern Ontario muskeg and rock or a Windy Craggy on the mountainside in British Columbia has enough concentration of minerals that it could be developed into an economically viable mine.

Men like me go prospecting in the Canadian bush because we love it. Bad weather and tough living conditions do not stop us. Worried mothers or lonesome housewives do not stop us. Not even the low prices of the minerals we are seeking can stop us, because we know the world needs those minerals and it will only be a matter of time before prices rebound to profitable levels.

Only one thing has stopped me and other prospectors in Canada, the irrational, short sighted, muddle headed, counterproductive, feeble minded policies of the federal Government of Canada: outrageous taxes, conflicting rules, red tape so endless that it routinely takes three years to get environmental approval for a new mine in Canada, compared to six months in countries like Chile and elsewhere else in the world.

Let me spell out some details regarding what I have labelled as outrageous taxes. I want to be perfectly clear that I believe that everybody who is making more than they need to live decently should pay taxes. That includes profitable mining companies. However, Canadian businesses and industry must face a host of taxes that are not based on profit.

One glaring example is tax imposed on gasoline, an absolute necessity for mine exploration. Taxes account for half of our Canadian costs for gasoline. This government recently increased that tax by another half a cent per litre. That is a tax that must be paid regardless of whether a mining company is in full or profitable production or merely struggling to complete its first program of diamond drilling.

By contrast, Mexico, our partner in the North American free trade agreement, is far more realistic about what gas taxes can do to their economy. In Canadian cents per Canadian litre of gasoline during 1994, Canada's base price for gasoline was 26 cents, whereas Mexico's base price was 44.5 cents. Yes, that is right, Mexican gasoline, excluding tax, was nearly 20 cents a litre more than our price. The Mexican government taxes gasoline like the essential commodity it is, rather than following the wrong headed policy of the Canadian government, which zaps consumers and businesses by doubling the price by the time it reaches the gas pump.

The final result for 1994 was that our NAFTA partner had gasoline prices of 48.9 cents a litre versus the Canadian average of 52.2 cents a litre. That is a big difference.

The federal government for the past many years has taxed gasoline like it was champagne in order to pay for high spending federal programs that allow the federal government to meddle in every sector of our economy, including direct grants to businesses and industry, which still cannot make Canadian costs competitive. Compared to our new NAFTA partner, that is the kind of thing I mean when I say that it is the muddle headed contrary federal government policies that have stopped mining exploration in Canada.

Another example of outrageous taxation is the application of the large corporation tax to mining companies that may have only one mine they are struggling to bring into production. Still another tax I believe is wrong taxes the interest on money that mining companies must place in trust to ensure proper clean–up of the environment in the form of mine reclamation funds. When a mine starts up the principal has to raise a fortune in preproduction costs. Part of that cost is setting aside sufficient funds to ensure that the environment is returned to a safe and useable condition when the mine shuts down. Creation of the mine reclamation trust fund is being legislated by the provinces, but the federal government is requiring even single mining operations just getting started to treat the interest from the mine reclamation fund as annual income and to pay tax on it right from the first year. Instead, I believe mine reclamation funds should be treated like an RRSP.

Another way in which the present tax system is unfair to mining development lies in the treatment of shares. I am very much in favour of flow through shares, especially for non–diversified or junior mining companies, which may not have revenue against which they can use the deductions available. It is good to let deductions available at the front end flow through the investor who just buys the shares, but I see no justification for requiring that the adjusted cost base of those same flow-through shares must be regarded as zero, whereas the adjusted cost base for other shares is the actual cost of those shares.

The hon. member from the Bloc Quebecois has looked at the national mining industry, which despite these awful federal policies managed to create $16.34 billion of total mineral production in the year of 1992, $15 billion for 1993, and $16.29 billion for 1994. Even though the hon. member claims he wants to get out of Canada, he is proposing that the federal government introduce a new program of mining incentives to encourage prospectors to return from countries such as Chile, Brazil, Indonesia, and wherever else Canadian prospectors have found government policies they can live with.

The last thing a prospector wants is yet another batch of federal red tape to try to figure out. What is basically wrong with government starting such an incentive program? For one thing, governments cannot predict very accurately when the international price of gold or any other mineral may suddenly climb substantially.

In 1983 the price of gold was $350 U.S. per troy ounce, and mining exploration was relatively flat. In 1985 the Tory government introduced the $100,000 lifetime capital gains deduction. In 1987 gold was selling for $500 U.S. per troy ounce. Throw in the additional government incentives like the mining exploration depletion allowance, and small wonder that in 1987 over $1.2 billion was poured into mining and mineral exploration here in Canada. It went predominantly to precious metals rather than the base metals, which are more essential to our economy.

Who can say whether the policies of flow through shares, the lifetime capital gains deduction, the increased price of gold, or the MEDA program was responsible for the influx of the exploration dollars in the mid–1980s?

Government programs are by their very nature crude tools. Communist countries learned that they cannot entrust management of their economies to some central brain trust. It is far better to make as few government rules as is consistent with ensuring sustainable resource development and generally leave the field of natural resources to provincial jurisdiction.

• (1815)

Another significant factor preventing people from investing in Canada today is our many conflicting rules, especially regarding the environment. The Reform Party believes that environmental concerns must be part of sustainable resource development right from the initial planning stages. We see absolutely no valid reason that federal and provincial regulations should not be harmonized right across Canada. Instead, the present federal Minister of the Environment has scuttled harmonization negotiations with the Council of Canadian Ministers of the Environment because she wants to be the star performer instead of merely a member of the chorus.

The 1993 report of the Committee on Competitiveness of the Resource Industries pointed out:

> The applicant has no way of knowing at the onset of the approval process what the regulations will be, the amount of time that the approval process will take, what it will ultimately cost, or what the outcome will finally be.

I definitely agree. It is time for government to get its act together.

Mr. Paul Steckle (Huron—Bruce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise this evening and speak in support of Motion No. 292 which was put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Timiskaming—French River.

The hon. member and I have much in common when it comes to sport shooting and matters pertaining to our great Canadian outdoors. We also share similar views when it comes to mining issues.

I congratulate my government colleague for submitting this motion to the House. Mining is a very important activity in northern Ontario. It is crucial to the economy there as well as in many other areas. Also, the fact that he is representing his constituents' concerns really matters. It should be the first and most important duty for us all.

As a member from southwestern Ontario, home of Canada's largest salt mine, I am pleased to speak in favour of the motion. I too recognize the importance of mining to the Canadian economy. The motion states:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider implementing a new program of mining incentives which would encourage exploration and development in Canada.

That is certainly consistent with our red book. I refer to the October 15, 1993 mining policy announced by the hon. member for Sudbury, now the Minister of Health:

> The mining industry is a vital part of the Canadian economy. Not only is it the lifeblood of over 150 communities, but it accounts for 330,000 jobs. A Liberal government will offer the leadership needed to ensure a strong future for Canadian mining.

One of the recommendations made in this policy is a direct connection to today's motion. Our policy proposed to undertake a comprehensive review of income tax laws with provincial and territorial governments, industry and other interested parties to ensure that the financial assurance mechanisms are complemented by federal tax policies and to provide policy support to help mining and mineral service industries expand their competitive advantage in foreign markets.

This is an important motion, especially in light of today's condition of the mining industry. It is facing a future of uncertainty. Public policy initiatives are needed to sustain the industry as a world class producer of mineral and metal products and to stimulate investment in mineral exploration and development in Canada.

I speak of an industry which accounts for 2.7 per cent of total national employment, one in which depleting reserves and mine closures outnumber mine openings, one which represents $23.6 billion or 17 per cent of total Canadian exports, and one which contributed $10.8 billion to the mineral trade balance. It is an industry in which the total value of mineral production was $14.6 billion, or $35.4 billion if fuel minerals were added. It is an industry which represents one of the highest industrial wages paid in Canada: $847 per week in some of Canada's most isolated communities.

As a result of these challenges, we need an enhanced commitment from the federal government especially in the area of exploration stimulation which will attract sufficient levels of exploration investment to ensure that the economic growth rate and the level of Canadian mineral reserves will not continue to decline.

Our mining industry is a world leader in technology innovation and information. We must always strive to keep it that way. As members know, mineral exploration and for nearly a decade mineral reserves have been on a decline as the developing world attracts mineral investment away from Canada. They do this through aggressive marketing, joint ventures and legislative and policy changes.

• (1820)

The competitiveness of Canadian mining in the 1990s is plagued by uncertainty. There are disincentives now in the mineral investment climate that are discouraging proper investment levels which are needed to maintain a reserve base.

These factors include mineral taxation, exploration incentives, environmental assessment, land access, aboriginal land claims, mine reclamation deductions and security of mineral tenure. The mineral potential in Canada is as inviting as any other country in the world. However we cannot maintain our position as a world leader among mineral producing nations unless steps are taken to reduce the doubts.

I am sure all members from both sides of the House understand full well the implications of inadequate incentives for primary mineral exploration. Without ample exploration the mineral reserves necessary to replace what is being mined today will not be found. For many reasons, exploration levels have dropped dramatically since the mid–1980s. We all realize there is no quick fix for this problem nor do governments currently have the financial capacity to intervene in a significant way.

Along with an exploration incentive program as called for in the votable motion being debated today, there also must be an overall competitive and supportive investment climate. This will create the proper framework in which mining can thrive and this will in turn promote exploration.

We must work hard to find solutions. We must work hard to keep mining in Canada. While world demand for minerals is increasing, Canada's share of world mineral supply is declining and mining investment capital is leaving Canada for other parts of the world.

The mining industry has worked hard to reduce costs, improve its environmental and safety performance and increase productivity through technological innovation and upgrading of worker skills. Yet today the industry faces its toughest challenge of all to keep mining in Canada.

According to the Mining Association of Canada, in 1992 there were 28 closures or temporary shutdowns of mines compared with only eight openings, meaning a net loss of 5,800 jobs. From 1981 to 1991 there was a decline of nearly 40 per cent in investment levels in the sector. Between 1986 and 1991 Canada failed to attract a single new mining project with a capital cost of more than $250 million. By contrast, Latin America had five. These facts make support of my colleague's motion so important. It centres on the encouragement of exploration. This is crucial.

We know that investing in exploration and development is the only way to ensure a future for mining in Canada but from 1991 to 1992 more than 150 companies worldwide reduced spending on Canadian projects by 30 per cent. In 1987 Canadian companies spent 81 per cent of their exploration budget in Canada. In 1992 that number went down to 61 per cent. In contrast, over $7 billion has been committed to exploration and development in Chile, Mexico, Venezuela, Argentina and Bolivia.

It is ironic that Canada is the biggest foreign investor in mineral exploration in Chile with over 40 Canadian companies involved. The average government approval for a mining operation takes six months in Chile as opposed to three years in Canada. When Chile is admitted to the NAFTA agreement, what chilling effect will this have on Canadian mines?

Earlier in this Parliament, the Standing Committee on Natural Resources conducted extensive hearings with all the stakeholders. The result was nine key recommendations on mining incentives which my colleague from Timiskaming—French River has outlined.

Canada has the resources, skilled workforce, infrastructure and commitment to environment and technology to support a prosperous mining industry today and in the future. But without a strong co–operative effort to keep mining here, this may well be the last generation of miners in Canada. As future mining activities shift to other countries, the decline of Canadian mining would have a devastating impact on over one million Canadians living in mining communities or working in businesses related to the mining industry.

Through this motion, it shows we urgently need a national mining strategy with policies and actions that will reverse current trends. Mining is important to Canada and we must support Motion No. 292. Canada has always counted on its mining industry to be a key foundation for export driven growth.

Today mining is a $20 billion industry in Canada. We must keep it growing and thriving. I am certainly supporting this motion and I urge all hon. members to do the same.

• (1825)

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to enter the debate on Motion No. 292 in the name of the hon. member for Timiskaming—French River who from time to time is my seatmate. I am sure his constituents in mining communities such as Kirkland Lake, Cobalt and Haileybury are very proud of his initiatives in the House in support of the mining sector.

Over time as Canadians became more involved in the service sector they have forgotten some of their roots that go back in our history over the last 200 or 300 years. The mining sector was a very important part of it.

We all consume goods and products that come out of mining. We are either consumers or work directly in mining or do both. Invariably during the day we consume some products that actually started off in the mining sector.

I will refer to some of the statistics: 4.2 per cent of our GDP is accounted for by the mining sector and 14.6 per cent of Canada's entire export trade is related to the mining sector. It directly employs 327,000 people. These are some of the positive statistics and I will now refer to some negative ones.

From 1991 to 1992, 150 companies in Canada reduced their worldwide expenditures in our mining sector by 30 per cent. There were reductions of expenditures from $430 million to $302 million. In 1987 Canadian companies spent 81 per cent of their exploration budgets in Canada. By 1992 that had declined to only 61 per cent. As the previous member mentioned, ironically Canada and Canadian companies are now the biggest investors in Chile. Over 40 companies are involved.

What is happening to our mining sector? Our own companies are leaving. Why is that? In one word it is taxation in spite of interjections by members of the third party. It was surprising when I heard the hon. member from the third party talk about flow through shares. I have listened to that party constantly talk a flat tax or tax changes which would eliminate flow through shares. We can see that Reform Party members are basically speaking out of both sides of their mouths at the same time.

Taxation has created confusion. When people are investing in industry, confusion is one thing that forces capital to leave the country. Capital likes certainty and taxation and administration in Canada have created tremendous confusion. With that an outflow of capital has been created.

Mining is a very significant capital intensive industry. Within the industry each job represents $100,000 of investment in capital. Many of the taxes the mining sector faces have nothing to do with income. Once again in spite of the intervention by the member from the third party, many of the taxes relate to provincial jurisdiction and not federal. A more mature attitude would be to realize that tax administration in the mining sector is outdated, outmoded and in dire need of change.

Let me explain some of the taxes so members will understand why the mining sector is having such difficulty. First there is a significant insidious tax, what I would call a capital tax. Many industries in Canada are subjected to it. Basically a capital tax is just that, a tax on the capital invested in a business.

Perhaps that sounds reasonable to some people, but when we take it to the next step we discover that a capital tax also involves a tax on employed capital like bank loans. For instance, the more debt one has, the more taxes one pays With a capital intensive industry like mining clearly this is a very retrogressive tax. The tax is administered by provincial jurisdictions.

I have had some discussions with my colleagues in the Bloc. The problem across the country is that there are all kinds of tax administrations in each province. It is very difficult for a multinational corporation to understand the best place to run a mine based on tax administration in an individual province.

• (1830)

Another aspect that has created great consternation and a great deal of uncertainty in the mining sector has been the whole concept of a resource allowance. Let me try to explain resource allowance in a very short period of time.

The provincial governments levy what are called royalty taxes. Royalty taxes are somewhat closer to a profit type tax because essentially they are oriented on production. There are royalty taxes in the oil and gas sector. There are royalty taxes in the mining sector, basically based on the amount of extraction that takes place.

What the federal government attempts to do is to try to make some kind of recognition that mining companies are subject to these royalty taxes. Some people might ask why not simply allow them as a tax deduction? Some people have suggested that as a way to amend the taxation of mining companies.

The problem we have, and getting back once again to the speaker from the Reform Party, is that each province calculates royalty taxes differently. There is a different administration in British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan. There is a totally different one in Ontario and also in Quebec.

What the federal government attempts to do is develop a formula which will allow some kind of methodology of calculating what would be a uniform royalty tax across all mining sectors. The problem is it has become so unbelievably complicated to calculate what a resource allowance is.

We have had the spectacle of the Gulf case. That company was able to argue effectively under the tax laws for a totally different interpretation of resource allowances than did the federal government. The federal government's bottom line was a loss of over $1 billion worth of tax revenue.

This has created further consternation within the tax administration system and it is continuing to be a problem. Mainly it is a problem because governments cannot sit down together and work things out in a reasonable and harmonious fashion.

That is not the end of the problems of the mining sector. There are all kinds of other non–profit taxes which take place within the mining sector. The hon. member has mentioned gasoline taxes because he basically likes to criticize the federal government, but we also have other forms of taxes, not the least of which is energy taxes.

The mining sector is a huge consumer of electricity. Most of these electrical utilities are administered by provincial administrations. Quite frankly, they have been mismanaged over the years. At one time Canada had a very attractive energy rate making it a cheaper place to undertake mining in North America. That competitive advantage has been lost over the last 20 years through what I consider to be different types of practices and basically mismanaging that resource. As a consequence, our mining sector faces some of the highest energy rates of any mining operation in North America.

This reminds me of a story. I was once in the jungles of Peru, long before I started this job. Somebody said: "Canada is the third largest country in the world geologically, with a small but well educated population. Why is it Canada cannot manage its resources effectively and be a world leader?"

We are seeing how people within governments, no matter what public administration is involved, federal or provincial, are basically out to kill the golden goose.

Another area that is a federal concern is payroll taxes. I do not have to tell most members that the increases in UI rates and Canada pension plan rates have had a tremendous impact on the mining sector because it is capital intensive and also uses a lot of labour.

• (1835)

I believe the various governments sat down in November 1994 and signed an agreement, the Whitehorse mining initiative. I will read one section of that concerning the area of taxation: "to establish a tax regime that is seen to be simple, pragmatic, fair, including an overall greater reliance on profit–based taxes as opposed to non–profit–related taxes and charges". I think this is a great objective. This agreement has been signed not only by our Minister of Natural Resources but most of the provincial natural resources ministers. The problem is we have a lot of talk but we do not have much action.

I am very supportive of the motion by the member for Timiskaming—French River who has brought this to our attention. I could go on and on about how tax administration should be different. We must move forward quickly to address the concerns of the mining sector.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, on September 27, days after the standoffs concluded at Gustafsen Lake and Ipperwash, Ontario, I rose in the House to question the minister of Indian affairs about what should happen next. Obviously the issues raised in grievance by those occupying land and the concerns expressed by many who had not been occupying land had not been addressed and the frustration of aboriginal people concerning land was still outstanding.

I continue to believe that the federal government's approach to land claims and self–government, an approach that is slow, confusing and filled with uncertainties, is the first area of concern that needs to be dealt with if the frustrations and anxieties are ever to be reduced. Indian leaders throughout Canada and through the Assembly of First Nations have said for many years that the anger among the people of their communities had to be addressed quickly or it would boil over.

During the second week of September when I called on the minister to get involved in the specifics of Ipperwash and Gustafsen Lake I said the only way to deal with the slow and uncertain nature of how land claim disputes are currently settled was with the understanding and intervention of the federal minister of Indian affairs. Only he has the authority to make the necessary changes. Only he has the jurisdiction to address the issues in a way that will adequately address the problems outlined by so many. Obviously those closest to the issue are the ones who should be consulted first, and those who work in the field must be consulted as well.

It comes as no surprise then to learn that the latest annual report of the Indian claims commission published this summer calls for the development and implementation of a new land claims policy and process. Here is the group caught in the middle between the bands and the government, receiving the applications, hearing and judging the evidence, and presenting the recommendations. Here is a group that does the work saying that it should be replaced, saying the workload is increasing dramatically and the ability of the existing commission to respond is limited, saying it is wrong for the government to have a process in place that allows the federal government to be a judge in claims against itself.

The commission stated: "Everything we have learned as a commission to date indicates that it is imperative to commence the process of reform immediately. It is imperative that an independent claims body be established to perform at least the initial assessment of the validity of First Nations land claims in Canada".

Upon reading the commission's report the editors of the Montreal Gazette had this to say: "It is important that aboriginal communities establish a solid land base. From it, economic development and self–government can follow. In its red book of campaign promises the Liberal Party said the current process is simply not working and promised to set up an independent claims commission. It should do so sooner rather than later".

That was my sentiment when I first asked the minister if it was his intention to establish a new process in policy.

That was my intention when I said I did not believe it would be in Canada's best interest to have First Nation's people from all across the country who may have legitimate land claims occupying land and leaving the resolution of those disputes to the local police. Land issues are not police matters. They are matters of critical concern to all Canadians and only the minister can deal with them. Therefore I was disappointed when the minister said he had to consult further. I hope he has now had the time to talk to the chiefs.

Will the government take the first step to relieve the anxieties over the land claims process and establish the new, independent commission called for by the Indian Claims Commission in its 1994–95 annual report?

Mr. John English (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to the question raised by the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake on September 27 regarding the 1994–95 report of the Indian Claims Commission and its first recommendation which called for the establishment of a new, independent land claims policy and process.

The work the Indian Claims Commission is currently doing in the area of claims is commendable. The minister has the highest respect for this effort.

The Liberal Party of Canada's election platform states:

> A Liberal government will implement major changes to the current approach. A Liberal government will be prepared to create, in co–operation with aboriginal peoples, an independent claims commission to speed up and facilitate the resolution of all claims. The commission would not preclude direct negotiations.

Let me assure the House that the government is committed to building new partnerships with aboriginal peoples based on trust and mutual respect. The resolution of land claims is an important part of this initiative.

The federal government is committed to increasing the rate of land claim settlements. We are seeking innovative ways to resolve the impediments that slow this process. There has been, however, significant progress in resolving claims, including 44 specific claim settlements as well as five comprehensive claim settlements since the government took office.

The minister has invited substantive commentary from First Nations and First Nation organizations on concrete proposals for change and is awaiting further guidance from aboriginal people and others. The government in co–operation with First Nations needs to think through how the claims policies could be overhauled within the climate of restraint that affects us all. The recent report of Justice Hamilton will assist in this regard.

It is important all Canadians understand and respect this process as it benefits all Canadians.

PEACEKEEPERS IN FORMER YUGOSLAVIA

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Madam Speaker, allow me first of all to apologize to the representatives from the Bloc Quebecois and the Reform Party for notifying them of this morning's ministerial statement on such short notice. This decision was made only late yesterday. The United Nations will announce a substantial reduction in its forces in the former Yugoslavia, and I thought that a statement should be made here in this House before the UN makes its announcement today.

I should point out that I was under no obligation to make a statement in this House, but I thought that, even on such short notice, the opposition parties, who have always been involved and who have always had the opportunity to express their views on the peacekeeping forces deployed in the former Yugoslavia, would appreciate this opportunity to participate in a parliamentary debate and express for the record their reactions and, I hope, their support for the government's decision.

Allow me to say that the situation in Bosnia has changed considerably in the past few weeks. The UN having concluded that it no longer needs all authorized UNPROFOR contingents, it has asked some contributing countries to reduce their forces and others to withdraw theirs.

These cuts and reassignments will affect some 9,000 soldiers. UNPROFOR strength will drop from 21,000 to 15,000, while the rapid reaction force added to the UN contingent will lose some 3,000 members.

Canadian Forces elements are among those that the UN feels are no longer needed in Bosnia. The details of this decision will be announced today by the Secretary–General of the United Nations.

The Canadian battalion now in Bosnia will therefore not be replaced when its current six month mandate expires in November. A parliamentary debate was held when this battalion was deployed; some members expressed their support for this action while others stated that we should withdraw from the former Yugoslavia. The return of this battalion that will not be replaced should, I presume, satisfy Reform members who told us at the time that we should substantially reduce the number of Canadian troops in Bosnia.

I should, however, point out that Canada will maintain a presence in the region, as Canadian military observers and Canadian personnel at the UN force headquarters will remain in Zagreb and Sarajevo. Canadian troops now assigned to NATO operations in the Adriatic Sea, whose job is to monitor the no–fly zone in Bosnia, will not be affected by this reduction either.

[English]

If current efforts to reach a peace agreement are successful the region will enter a new phase. Canada will contribute to reconstruction efforts in the former Yugoslavia. Once a settlement has been reached Canada will be there, if necessary, in the new force with our allies to help implement the peace under the authority of the United Nations and as part of Canada's continuing commitment to Europe.

Canada has been in the former Yugoslavia for three and a half years, since the beginning of peacekeeping in the region. Canadians have served with distinction in land, sea and air operations. We will continue to be involved with 13 military observers and one ship with a crew of 212 personnel. We will be involved in the Sarajevo air bridge with one aircraft and 45 personnel. We will also have six people in the AWACs aircraft and 50 people in headquarters.

I pay tribute to the courage and integrity of thousands of Canadian forces personnel who have served with honour under the Canadian and UN flags. I pay special homage to those who have paid the supreme sacrifice in the service of peace. I express on behalf of all Canadians appreciation to those who will continue to participate in the UN efforts to forge a lasting peace in the area.

[Translation]

I wish to thank this House for allowing us to make this short statement, which also gives the opposition parties an opportunity to express their views.

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate on Bosnia this morning on behalf of the Bloc Quebecois.

I would like to point out, however, that, as the minister indicated, we received a copy of the ministerial statement only half an hour ago. I think this is unreasonably short notice.

• (1010)

This rather high handed approach speaks volumes about the government's lack of respect for even the most fundamental parliamentary procedures. It is customary in Parliament for the minister to send out a copy of his statement at least one day ahead. This is typical of the foreign affairs minister.

In 1990, this very minister had the gall to claim that federalism acts as a shield to protect individual freedoms. There is cause for concern when we hear this kind of falsehood. It was the Liberal government that did not hesitate to implement the War Measures Act in 1970, using an alleged danger of insurrection in Quebec to trample the rights and freedoms of several hundred Quebecers.

One can rightly be outraged to hear such the remarks from this minister, who told the Bélanger–Campeau commission that abuse of fundamental rights by the government is more likely in countries with a single level of government. This is the same man who made outrageous remarks during a recent trip to New York, drawing a parallel between the former Yugoslavia and the highly democratic process under way in Quebec to achieve sovereignty.

What did the minister mean when he said: "We have not started killing another yet, and I hope that what is going on in the former Yugoslavia will never happen in Canada"? The Minister of Foreign Affairs and the Government of Canada should be ashamed of making such insinuations. This kind of irresponsible behaviour on the part of the minister says a lot about the No side: intolerance, abuse, insults.

At any rate, it is with a feeling of having done our duty that we learned this morning that the Canadian battalion deployed in Bosnia will not be replaced when its mandate ends in November. If the work done by our peacekeepers is starting to pay off, it is precisely because we steadfastly assumed our responsibilities as the official opposition the whole time.

When there was strong pressure to withdraw our troops, abandoning the civilian population over there in a state of destitution and insecurity, as the Reform Party suggested for instance, we, Bloc members, felt that it was our humanitarian duty to stay on location.

As the Leader of the Opposition said as early as January 1994, we had to bear in mind that we had to take on, to the best of our abilities, our fair share of the tasks that arise out of our belief in the democratic values of peace and justice. Today, we can see the concrete result of this. There is every indication that the conflict in Bosnia can be resolved through negotiations instead of violence and massacres. On behalf of the Bloc Quebecois, I wish to pay tribute to the courage and sacrifice of all our military personnel, some of whom gave their lives so that peace could prevail.

[English]

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I make my comments from the national opposition standpoint.

After three and a half years of excellent service our peacekeepers are finally coming home from Bosnia. That is just great. They deserve hearty congratulations for a job well done. During these years our peacekeepers have had to operate under the most difficult of circumstances but they always fulfilled their duties with distinction.

All our troops who have served in the former Yugoslavia have the thanks of the Canadian people and Parliament. To the families of those who were killed in the service of peace, we also pay our deepest respects.

For over a year now the Reform Party has been asking for this day to happen. I refer directly to the statement. I believe there is a coded message in that statement. I draw to the attention of the minister that the last debate in the House occurred on March 29, which was a six–month mandate. That mandate expired at the end of September of this year. Somehow it has been extended to November without consulting the House.

• (1015)

The minister commented that we will be part of a new force. There is no detail of what this new force might be. There is no suggestion of what the criteria might be under which we would participate. There are a lot of questions Canadians are asking. They want the questions answered and the criteria established in the House.

The questions include cost, length of the commitment and whether there is peace to keep. Is there a mandate for our troops when they go? Most important, they want to know if we will be part of the decision making, not like with the former Yugoslavia where the contact group was one thing and we more or less put up our hands and said we would go along with what was decided.

We have to look at the UN and the reforms. I know the minister is interested in that. We have to look at the mismanagement that has occurred and the serious doubts we have about UN missions, Somalia, the former Yugoslavia and now Haiti where there appear to be serious problems in terms of conducting the mandate. We have to establish those criteria.

The government has mismanaged the whole affair. I find it difficult since we received the statement only 15 minutes ago. However the minister has said he is not responsible for that.

The debates in the House have brought serious questions forward. I do not believe they have been heard. This summer during a critical time there was a lack of leadership. The minister was unavailable for comment. The Prime Minister was found in a canoe somewhere and gave some very general comments which I found to be very insulting to me as a parliamentarian and to Canadians.

The Reform Party thanks our troops. We demand from Parliament that it set some criteria before we become the 911 UN call number. We must do it in Parliament and not simply in cabinet. We want to return the confidence of the people of Canada to peacekeeping and to the management and leadership the government should be showing.

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, I apologize. I forgot to table the letter during my original statement. I should like to table the letter we received from Kofi Annan, the undersecretary general for peacekeeping operations, outlining the decisions of the UN addressed to us. It will be of interest to all parliamentarians.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Does the minister have unanimous consent to table the letter?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS IMPLEMENTATION ACT, 1995

Hon. Lawrence MacAulay (for the Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–105, an act to implement a convention between Canada and the Republic of Latvia, a convention between Canada and the Republic of Estonia, a convention between Canada and the Republic of Trinidad and Tobago and a protocol between Canada and the Republic of Hungary, for the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of fiscal evasion with respect to taxes on income.

PETITIONS

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I wish to present a petition circulating across Canada. It is signed by a number of Canadians from the Oakville, Burlington and Mississauga areas of Ontario.

The petitioners draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession which has not been recognized for its value to our society. They also state the Income Tax Act discriminates against families that make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call on Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families that decide to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or aged.

CFB CALGARY

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present to the House a petition containing the signatures of 7,953 people, part of a larger petition of nearly 10,000 signatures, mainly from people in the city of Calgary.

These residents are opposed to the closing of CFB Calgary and are increasingly concerned as they learn that the move of CFB Calgary to Edmonton will not save taxpayer dollars. The move is not designed to do so.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I wish to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 33(2), because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended by 16 minutes.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

WITNESS PROTECTION PROGRAM ACT

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.) moved that Bill C–78, an act to provide for the establishment and operation of a program to enable certain persons to receive protection in relation to certain inquiries, investigations or prosecutions, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to open debate on Bill C–78, the witness protection program act, and to ask for its approval on second reading.

The bill creates for the first time a statutory foundation for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police source witness protection program. I am sure all members realize the importance of witness and source protection. Governments must be able to help ensure the safety and security of persons who assist police and prosecutors in their efforts to crack down on crime.

Experience shows that witnesses or sources who provide evidence or who assist in police investigations at risk of harm to themselves or their families are often among the most effective tools our justice system has against crime, especially organized crime.

The intent of the witness protection program act is to ensure our federal witness protection program offers the best possible protection to potential witnesses and sources.

• (1025)

[Translation]

The proposed changes to the act will make the current RCMP source witness protection program—which has been in effect since 1984 as a strictly administrative program—more transparent and more efficient, by providing sound statutory and regulatory authority.

[English]

In short, we are creating a witness protection program which for the first time will have a legislative base. This will have the important effect of placing the RCMP source witness protection program more in the public domain.

I know this was a major concern of my colleague, the member for Scarborough West, when he put forward his private member's bill on witness protection. His bill provided a useful basis for discussion of the issues leading to Bill C–78. I again thank him for his efforts.

Under the bill there will now be clear accountability for the operation of the RCMP source witness protection program. While the identities of sources and witnesses will remain secret, the selection criteria, the decision making process and the scope and the extent of the protection to be provided will be transparent and clear. This will help ensure that both applicants who enter the program and the RCMP which operates it have a clear understanding of their respective rights and obligations as well as the extent and scope of the protection to be provided.

[Translation]

This should also prevent any misunderstanding between the RCMP and those it seeks to protect. Overall, the changes to the RCMP source witness protection program will meet the needs of police departments, as well as those of witnesses and sources requiring protection.

[English]

The proposed changes will ensure clearly defined admission criteria for witnesses, the consistent handling of cases across the country, and the clear setting out of the responsibilities and obligations both of the administrators of the program and of the individuals entering it. The bill will also ensure a more defined management structure within the RCMP for the daily operation of the program, thereby increasing accountability.

Furthermore the bill will ensure a complaints procedure is in place and that the commissioner of the RCMP will submit to the solicitor general an annual report on the operation of the program which then must be tabled in the House.

Provincial and municipal law enforcement agencies will still, as they have done in the past, be able to participate in the RCMP source witness protection program on a cost recovery basis. However the bill is not intended to replace other witness protection programs run by provincial police forces and by some municipal police forces.

In keeping with the government's program of fiscal restraint, the changes to the RCMP source witness protection program arising out of the bill will be funded out of existing resources.

When the government was elected it made a commitment to a safe homes, safe streets agenda. Since taking office we have been honouring that commitment. We have introduced Bill C–45 to bring about an updating of our corrections and parole system. This bill has now been passed by the House and is being studied in the other place.

We have created a system using the Canadian Police Information Centre data banks to help screen out sexual abusers as potential employees and volunteers working with children. We have established also using the CPIC data banks a national flagging system to help provincial crown attorneys to make more frequent and more effective use of the dangerous offender provisions of the Criminal Code as an instrument to protect the public better from dangerous high risk offenders.

We have introduced comprehensive gun control proposals, proposals adopted by the House and under study in the other place. We have created a national crime prevention council. We have passed amendments to the Young Offenders Act. We have passed Bill C–41 to reform the sentencing process. We have passed legislation that would prevent extreme intoxication from being used as a defence to excuse violence and other serious crimes. We have passed legislation that permits a provincial court judge to issue a warrant allowing police to obtain body samples from suspects for forensic DNA analysis.

The Witness Protection Program Act is another important component in our overall effort to improve the safety and security of all Canadians. I urge all hon. members to support Bill C–78. In this respect I thank the hon. Reform Party member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley when she was solicitor general critic for having expressed her support of the bill. Therefore I look forward to and I ask for similar support from all other members of the House to ensure speedy passage of Bill C–78.

[Translation]

Mr. François Langlois (Bellechasse, BQ): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise on behalf of the official opposition to discuss Bill C–78, which was just tabled by the solicitor general.

It is somewhat surprising that, for all intents and purposes, Bill C–78 is similar to a bill considered by the House on September 26, namely Bill C–206, which introduced by the hon. member for Scarborough West and given first reading on February 1.

Indeed, a comparison of both bills shows that there is very little difference between Bill C–78, which is before us today, and Bill C–206, which has already gone through second reading in this House.

The only changes that I could find, and they are not major, are that compensation of witnesses may be better under bill C–78. Also—and to my mind this is not an improvement—under this bill, the RCMP commissioner will now have to make the necessary arrangements with witnesses, or their counsel, to ensure their protection. Under Bill C–206, as considered on September 26, the solicitor general had the authority to reach agreements with witnesses. That, of course, made it easier, under our parliamentary system, to ensure control of government activities through ministerial accountability.

This, I feel, is an issue which the committee will have to look at again. In terms of the principles involved, there is not much difference between the solicitor general's position and the one which I express on behalf of the official opposition. Nevertheless, we will have to take another look at this issue and decide who should be responsible for the arrangements made. I understand that it can be argued that the RCMP commissioner is ultimately accountable to the solicitor general who, in turn, is accountable to this House, which means that the House will have a say in the process. I will come back to this point.

• (1035)

Before getting into the heart of the matter, I would like to begin by stating that the contribution by the hon. member for Scarborough West, not only in introducing Bill C–206 but also in taking part in all aspects of the work of Parliament, particularly in the justice and legal affairs committee, ought to ensure that he will have the opportunity in the very near future of having his point of view heard on legal issues within that committee.

Now, having made that remark, and having voiced these few reservations, I must, nevertheless, express my pleasure at the care the government has taken with this issue of witness protection. I believe that the government's wishes will result in a change in Canadian law.

We must admit that we lagged considerably behind our American neighbours, who have had witness protection legislation applying to all 50 states of the union for 25 years now. That legislation is is well known by the general public, which is thus aware of its rights.

Here, we do have some legislation in this regard, but it is not as well known and is administered by the RCMP in some cases, by the OPP or the Sûreté du Québec in others, but always sporadically and piecemeal, which does nothing to help the general public understand the system.

In a law–abiding society, I do not believe that we can settle for a piecemeal approach, with decisions depending on the whims of whoever is responsible for policing at a specific time. I feel that instead we need to have legislation that will apply all across Canada and will therefore incorporate in the rules of law those principles we wish to be seen in our public law. This will improve the situation of witnesses, particularly in criminal cases, and more particularly in cases involving serious crimes.

It is my opinion that this will put an end to the application, in a sometimes sequential manner and without any controls, though it was done in good faith, of procedures about which there might be witness confusion as to which policies apply to them. From now on it will be clear, and attorneys will be able to inform witnesses of the protection programs available to them by law. This transparency in application of the law cannot help but be beneficial to the community at large.

As I just pointed out, there should be one set of criteria for everyone, and the public should be aware of those criteria.

Now, how should witness protection be structured and how should it be monitored? Should the courts monitor witness protection or should it be left up to the RCMP commissioner or the minister?

Some will probably argue that monitoring by the courts would involve a certain amount of publicity which may not be desirable in this case, because often the purpose of the witness protection program is to allow the witness, who has put his life on the line many times, to hide behind a new identity so that he can start a new life.

If there is monitoring by the judiciary, every precaution must be taken to avoid undue publicity or releasing names, which could be disastrous and even do the opposite of what the bill introduced by the government is intended to do.

There could, however, be a form of monitoring by Parliament. I have been, and still am, a member of the Sub–Committee on National Security, and I submit that this would probably be the ideal venue for reviewing, either from time to time or on an ongoing basis, as deemed appropriate by the committee, the entire witness protection system and its implementation by the RCMP.

The expertise of the Sub–Committee on National Security—which I would like to see become a standing committee of this House—would ensure that parliamentarians would be able to monitor the actions of the police in this respect, both discreetly and effectively, I would hope.

• (1040)

Those are some of the issues. I hope that in committee we will have an opportunity to hear witnesses, and we may be able to clarify certain points during clause by clause consideration.

In serious cases involving drug trafficking and organized crime, for instance, often the very survival of the witnesses is at stake. Under our legal system, the crown's case is usually based on the testimony of witnesses as opposed to confessions by the accused. That is the whole point of protecting witnesses. There are no spontaneous confessions. We live in a country that respects its citizens. We have reached a level in our civilization where we can treat people with respect. We cannot force people to confess. The crown often has to introduce circumstantial evidence by calling witnesses, and these witnesses must be protected.

The crown never knows, during the bail hearing, the preliminary hearing or, later, the trial—all of which may, or may not be, part of the process—whether it can count on these witnesses at a given time. We have to protect witnesses and we also have to protect the evidence that may be collected at some time or other. The very fact that courts across the country have a huge backlog of cases means that preserving evidence is a serious problem in Canada. Evidence collected at a previous stage may often no longer be valid at a subsequent stage if the witness is nowhere to be found. So, in addition to protecting witnesses, we must also protect the evidence.

The Crown prosecutors' big concern is whether they can keep their witnesses until the time of the trial. They wonder whether the witnesses will answer their questions properly, once on the stand. Time is often the Crown's greatest enemy in a criminal trial. Witnesses' memory is inversely proportional to the length of the proceedings. It is perhaps even directly proportional, that is, it fails as proceedings go on or the risk of failure increases. It is a bit like cigarettes. The risk increases with use.

At the moment, there are no ways to deal with this, since witnesses' memories often fail in criminal cases. People at home can see on TV what happens when witnesses do not want to remember anything or when they cannot remember anything, all the pressure that can be brought to bear on people who want to help in the cause of justice, but are unable to because of constraints imposed on them.

So Bill C–78 will remedy this to some extent. It should not be considered a magic formula, a miracle solution. I am one of those who believe that, in politics, nothing happens magically or gets done immediately, we progress by taking one small step at a time in the right direction. I consider this bill, Bill C–78, one such step and, in using it, we will see what sort of contribution it makes to changing criminal law, protecting witnesses and safeguarding justice in criminal matters.

I also think there are two times, in particular, when witnesses need help. Before the trial, naturally. At that point, witnesses' material security must be looked after, and they must be given effective protection. In some instances, they literally have to be hidden for their own protection—I hope it is with their approval—so they may give proper testimony, which will give a court of law the opportunity to assess the quality of the testimony and decide whether the Crown has presented beyond any reasonable doubt the necessary evidence. We must not forget that, under our system, the burden of proof is on the Crown. And the burden is enormous. The slightest failure in this regard inevitably leads to the acquittal of the accused.

• (1045)

In the case of heinous crimes—I will address drugs and organized crime later—the mere disappearance of witnesses can raise a reasonable doubt. Often, if witnesses, who may or may not show up in court, disappear, the prosecution will simply have to rise and tell the court that they have no evidence to offer. This can only lead to an acquittal since there is no evidence. We must then provide protection for witnesses before the trial.

Protecting witnesses before the trial is not enough, however, we must also protect them after the trial, after the verdict, whether it is a verdict of guilty or not guilty, because there is no guarantee that the testimony of a witness protected under the provisions of Bill C–78 will be enough to convict someone. The bill must allow witness protection authorities to assure witnesses that if they testify at the trial, they will be protected whether the accused is found guilty or not guilty, because witnesses' safety cannot be compromised whatever the verdict.

I mentioned it earlier but it always bears repeating: In some cases, because of our legislation—I am not questioning our Criminal Code in any way—because of the presumption of innocence and the resulting reasonable doubt, there may be an acquittal even if the witness is protected. We must therefore provide for the reintegration of those witnesses who have secured convictions or who have failed to do so through no fault of their own because of the way the evidence was reviewed.

In closing, I wish to express my support for Bill C–78 at second reading and to issue a warning against what we too often see in some courts of law that are probably trying to proceed too quickly. A famous trial recently held in Canada showed us that the prosecution is often much too eager to plea–bargain with some witnesses to get them to testify against their codefendants, an arrangement through which a person pleads guilty to a lesser offence or an offence included in a more serious offence in return for a lighter sentence and a promise to testify against targeted people for whom the prosecution wants stiffer sentences.

In some cases, this practice is quite commendable; in other cases, it is, in my opinion, quite reprehensible. And I do not think that good judgment can be guaranteed by a bill. I call on the solicitor general, on provincial attorney generals, who must deal with these issues practically every day, to use as much common sense as possible when plea–bargaining with witnesses, many of whom are corrupt, who will testify against codefendants in return for a more lenient sentence. This practice deserves a serious examination. It must be the subject of wide criticism and of a broad national debate.

What do we expect from our judicial system? Our judicial system does not make enough room for victims. We, of course, give the accused all the benefits provided by our laws, by our charter of rights and freedoms. We must, however, give victims in criminal cases the importance they deserve. As we heard several times in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, victims of crime very often feel left out. A crime has been committed but the victims are the least of our concerns. It is all well and good to be concerned about witness protection. I nonetheless think that people who have lost a loved one—be it a spouse, a child, a friend or a relative—to murder are entitled to some compassion.

• (1050)

On these words, I will ask the government to provide protection, to provide much greater compensation for victims.

[English]

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I believe I have 40 minutes. If so, I will be sharing my time with the member for Fraser Valley West.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Does the hon. member have unanimous consent of the House to share his 40 minutes as first speaker?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Thompson: Madam Speaker, at the outset I congratulate the member for Scarborough West for initiating this topic through his private member's bill. It needed to be done and it brought the attention of the government to the fact there was a shortfall in our system regarding the protection of witnesses.

It is unfortunate that such members are no longer part of the justice committee. He is a member who contributed much, who understood much about legislation and who was able to formulate this kind of initiative. I am sure he would be able to do more in the future. However, since he does not co–operate with his Liberal caucus when voting on some bills, he will no longer be serving on the justice committee. It is a shame that we have that situation in Canada, but unfortunately that is the way it will be with the Liberal government. However I am sure the hon. colleague will be contributing as much as possible in the future along these lines.

We must protect our witnesses if we are to combat crime. I do not think anyone would deny that. The colleague from the Bloc mentioned the words common sense, which are the two key words. We must protect our witnesses and we must do it in a common sense manner. We have to take many things into consideration when we are doing it.

We all know the importance of witnesses when it comes to fighting crime. It is much easier when we have good witnesses to help put away criminals that need to be put away. We also know it is foolish to enter into any kind of special agreement with individuals. We only need to look to the latest court case involving Mr. Bernardo and Ms. Homolka. Providing for and doing what we did for the witness, Karla Homolka, in that case was a criminal act in itself. We need to be cautious when doing these kinds of activities, which could make it very possible that someone who is guilty of an offence would be let off the hook under a protection act for witnesses. We need to be careful about that.

There are a lot of crazies out there in the world who are in it for the dollars. They are willing to eliminate witnesses. We know they are out there. We know we have some in the prisons today. I talked to one inmate not too long ago in British Columbia who was there for eliminating a couple of witnesses; he was a paid hit man. We know there are more of them out there. We know that organized crime is becoming more and more active with the bombings that we see going on throughout Montreal and other parts of the country and with the smuggling that is taking place only an hour's drive from here, which occurs on a regular basis. When we know that kind of organized crime is active then we have to be very careful when we bring forward witnesses that may crunch organized crime. We certainly must have some kind of protection in place, because the criminals would be willing to eliminate the witnesses rather quickly to protect the huge industry that exists.

It is unfortunate that we have a government, a solicitor general and a minister of justice who sit back and watch these kinds of activities go on and do not seem willing to get involved or do much about them. It is a shame when we pick up the paper and read about bombings taking place in Canada by terrorists, thugs and organized criminals, and we have a government that sits back and the best it can come up with is that it is a provincial matter and we should not get involved. It is a very poor attitude and a real lack of intestinal fortitude when it comes to saying that we will take the bull by the horns and make our streets and our communities safer.

It is unfortunate the solicitor general alluded in his speech to all the wonderful things the Liberal government has done through Bills C–45, C–41, C–37 and C–68, to name a few. That just is not so. The House knows and all the people across Canada know that a number of things were attempted with the particular bills to make them better, to put the victim first. We also know that in every instance when there was a motion put forward in Bill C–45, which was simply geared to making things better for the victims of our country, the government turned them down and did not vote for one of them, not one.

It is silly for the minister to stand in his place to try to convince Canadians that he is doing a wonderful job when he turns down such things as mandatory restitution and then says that mandatory restitution is taken care of in Bill C–41. That is just not so.

The government is saying that it is up to a judge: if the judge wants to order it then he can do so and then things will take place and the restitution will happen. That just is not the case. We know that judges today can tell people that they will have to make restitution, but it does not mean anything. There is no enforcement. We cannot get blood out of a rock.

When we suggest that we will take part of the money we will pay them when they are in the penitentiary to put to the use of victims it is turned down. I guess it makes too much sense. It is something Canadians want.

Governments in the past 30 years are used to passing all kinds of legislation: if the people want it, do not do it, and if the people do not want it then make sure we do it. GST and all these other things apply to that.

It is unfortunate that during his speech the solicitor general alluded to the fact that these other bills were contributing to the safety of Canadians. He mentioned Bill C–37, the improvements to the Young Offenders Act. If Bill C–37 was such a wonderful improvement, I wonder if someone on the other side of the House could tell me why the Minister of Justice asked the members of the justice committee to put on their parachutes and fly around the country. They are flying all over Canada and are asking people once again what they would like to do with young offenders. They are spending lots of money going through a process that is totally unnecessary.

If we put each member on the justice committee on a street corner in any city to talk to the grassroots, the people who are closest to these crimes, about what should be done with the Young Offenders Act, I am quite certain they would get an answer. For a fact thousands and thousands of letters have been received from across the country telling the minister and others what to do with the Young Offenders Act. We have had petitions galore, with millions of signatures suggesting that we get rid of the Young Offenders Act or fix it. It has been ignored. Bill C–37 did not address that.

The government went through the process of getting Bill C–37 passed and then it turned around and sent the justice committee across the country to ask people what to do about young offenders.

To stand in the House and say "we did it, we got Bill C–37, aren't we wonderful" is just a bunch of baloney. I am really tired of hearing people in the House saying what a wonderful job the government is doing in fighting crime and keeping its red book commitment. That is not so. There is so much more the government could do but it does not dare.

• (1100)

I will admit that Bill C–78 makes total sense. It is something Canadians want. I congratulate the government for at least bringing forward one bill that will protect the right individuals, potential victims and witnesses rather than criminals.

The rights of criminals have always been up front, first and foremost. That has been the biggest worry for the government over the past 30 years, particularly in the last few years since the charter of rights has come into being. It must protect the criminal. There seems to be such a terrible amount of emphasis on that. It becomes really sickening. With Bill C–78 I say that at last we have something concrete and will protect the right people.

I should like to put a proposal to the government. When it is doing legislation in the future, the first thing to be written down in the legislation should be the word victim, the law–abiding people, the ones we need to look after. They are the most important people and criminals should be put somewhere else. Yes, nobody denies that we should look after the basic rights of the criminal. But, for crying out loud, we must remember the victims and do what can be done in all legislation to protect them.

Liberals stand in the House to tell us about the wonderful gun legislation. Somebody tell me what kind of balance is 17 pages which address the criminal versus 160 pages which go after law–abiding people. The document is so thick we cannot carry more than three or four. It is so expensive that we cannot order very many for our constituents to look at because of the cost. That document is full of regulations and all kinds of things law–abiding people are expected to do.

In the meantime there are individuals running around the country who are armed better than most military units. I see nothing being done about the real problems, but I constantly see all kinds of legislation coming forward that is not doing what it could for victims and law–abiding people. Instead the government concentrates on making certain that things are done right according to the charter so that the criminals are forever looked after. Canadians are getting tired of it.

I will conclude and turn it over to my colleague for Fraser Valley West by saying that Bill C–78 is the kind of bill we are most happy to support. I thank the government for bringing it forward. Once again, I thank my colleague for Scarborough West, the initiator of the whole idea. I hope we will see more legislation that says victims come first and not the criminals.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak on Bill C–78 today. As my colleague for Wild Rose said, it is one of the few pieces of legislation we have seen in the criminal justice system today from the Liberal government which actually directly and successfully address a concern we have in our society, the protection of witnesses.

The protection of witnesses is actually quite an informal program today managed by the RCMP. Certainly there is no overriding national program that looks after the interests of the victim.

Regardless of what the government says, it is necessary to take the country back from the criminal element. Time and time again I hear that crime is not on the increase. I would denounce that theory of the government. We only have to stand in a circle of friends anywhere in the country and ask who has been the victim of a crime. I am not just talking about serious sexual crimes or the high profile crimes we see in Vancouver, Toronto and so on. I am talking about major everyday crime: break and enters, stolen vehicles and so on.

• (1105)

We have to somehow get to the nub of the issue. We have to get back to punishment for disobeying laws. That includes actually getting the criminal incarcerated.

A victims protection act gives confidence to those out there who are intimidated by the process. It gives them some confidence of protection. I can think of several instances in my community which I have been involved with where intimidation was a very large part of an exercise of the criminal.

I can think of a lady named Joan who was sexually assaulted by a pretty hardened individual who had spent more time on the inside than on the outside. He has been in and out of parole board hearings. Every time he gets out he commits another crime and goes back in.

This time good old Karel sexually assaulted Joan with a weapon. The weapon was a needle with cocaine in it. Joan was 63 years old. All through the process, through the court hearings and so on when I was there with Joan, the individual was intimidating her by way of looks and other things that were done. The intimidation was there.

Not only did it happen in the courtroom but subsequent to his incarceration when he was in Vancouver remand waiting for his little trip to the regional psychiatric centre, good old Karel started to send threatening letters to Joan. It just brought home to me very clearly why witnesses need protection. Joan had no one to look after her.

We finally got the letters stopped. Imagine, he was in Vancouver remand for such a horrendous crime and used stamps paid for by the taxpayer to threaten the very person he attacked. That is the kind of thing going on.

Hopefully Bill C–78 will do something about those sorts of things. There are other people who need protection. Joan was not only a witness but was a victim at the same time. There are people who see things today and are just plain afraid to take that step forward because of the intimidation.

Along with my colleague from Wild Rose, I spent some time yesterday with the mayor of Cornwall who has some serious problems in that community. There are serious criminal activities. He is a pretty sure and very responsible individual. I am certain that with the intimidation he has been under, the threats and so on, there are times that people like him who want to stand up for their community and provide public service but are being threatened by gangs and organized crime need formal protection.

The mayor of Cornwall and other brave individuals who are willing to stand up and be counted and people who witness the crimes that are going on down there right off the reserves need the protection. They need the confidence they will get the protection.

The witness protection program will strengthen the existing RCMP source witness protection program. Hopefully the process will be formalized so that both the witness and the RCMP know and understand it. It is a loose program today. People do not understand their rights.

• (1110)

Victims rights do not discontinue with such things as witness protection programs. There are all kinds of other things which also need attention as far as victims rights go. There will be a victims rights bill in the House of Commons this year. Within that bill there are things that have to be addressed.

For instance, victims should have the right to give oral and written statements at parole board hearings. Today they are at times allowed a written statement but in many cases the statements are vetted. I have seen victims' statements in sentencing hearings of murder cases. I am not a lawyer but I attend these cases when my riding is involved. I was at one where the victim's statement was actually vetted which is wrong. The Liberal government has to understand that victims should have the right to have oral and written statements put forward.

There are other things about the criminal justice system that have just got to be said. It is about the intimidation of witnesses. I am looking here at a document produced by a colleague on the government side concerning judicial review decisions of people who were sentenced to death. That sentence was revoked and put into the current life sentence, which is 25 years, and now under section 745 the sentencing decision is being reduced further. That is appalling. It is truly appalling to be reducing these sentences.

Let me give two examples in which I was involved. Dwight Lucas was sentenced to 20 years for a non–capital murder. That was reduced to 16 years. An individual from Quebec has had his 25–year sentence for killing a police officer reduced to 15 years. At the time of the killing the individual would have been put to death but they said: "No, we will make it 25 years". Now, after time has gone by, the individual's sentence has been reduced to 15 years. That is wrong. These people are out on the streets and ultimately, when other crimes are committed, witnesses are going to need protection against the very people we are letting out who should not have been let out in the first place.

The thinking over there is truly convoluted. It does not wash with the greater portion of people. The government thinks it is right. What is it going to take to convince the Liberal government that its laws in the criminal justice system are just too liberal?

It will take a removal of the government in the next election. For those folk who are listening, it will come down to some very specific issues in the next election: the economy, the criminal justice system and just how democratic or undemocratic the process in the House of Commons actually is.

Mr. Thompson: The pensions.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): The MPs pensions, my colleague from Wild Rose said. That will always be an issue. Since he has mentioned it, I did wear my piggy tie for those who are still involved in the MPs pension plan, just so people would notice. I had not thought of that until they raised it.

• (1115)

There are times when we have to use a crook to catch a crook and we have to use the information they have as witnesses. Yes, unfortunately some of those individuals get off from their crimes and some of those people have to be under a witness protection act. I suppose the end justifies the means in that case. However there are a lot more people out there today witnessing crimes who are just too intimidated to do anything about it. All I ask is that the Liberal government follow through with a thorough witness protection act and regulations that are well meaning and protect the witness.

We do not need rhetoric such as we heard on the Young Offenders Act when government members said they had made great changes. They did not. We do not need rhetoric like that. We need to do Bill C–78 right. We need to protect the good people who want to come forward.

Members opposite are enjoying this. They say that they do things right. If they are doing things so right, why are there so many victims? If they are doing things right, why are there so many complaints about the Young Offenders Act, which was absolutely boggled by the Liberal government? If they are absolutely right about what they are doing, why is it that down in Cornwall the government does not have the courage of its convictions to go on to the reserve and end the crime wave? Why is that? If they are doing things right, why is that? That kept them quiet for a moment.

What is wrong is the government is very long on rhetoric and very short on dealing with the actual problems. It does not have the courage to go on to the reservations to deal with the crime rate. Meanwhile the people off reserve are suffering from the crime wave. Where do they think the drugs are coming from that are in the schools in Cornwall? They know where they are coming from. Where do they think the guns are coming from?

This is not something we dreamed up. We were down there listening. The government is not listening. It should get up the courage to go on to some of the reservations and deal with organized crime. That the government is doing something is hogwash. It is doing nothing.

I am glad we had this little chat, but it is more than a little chat members opposite need. People who are listening to this debate will understand that there is a big difference between being long on rhetoric and short on action. This will haunt the Liberal Party in the next election. The treatment that victims are getting today from government legislation is abysmal. That is why there are groups like Victims of Violence, CRY and CAVEAT. They are springing up all across the country. They know that the legislation the government puts through is wrong.

I have a few notes about Bill C–45.

• (1120)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I remind the member we are discussing Bill C–78.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, I got carried away, because none of the bills they have put forward so far are any good. I am surprised that Bill C–78 is something I can agree with.

When we talk about compensation for crimes, the government comes up with things like 30 per cent of their income for room and board. What the government does not come up with is what kind of income they are getting. Government members say it is $5.61 a day, but they discount the fact that they get GST rebates, old age pension, CPP and the guaranteed income supplement. They discount that.

There is nothing more that can be said. I would agree with Bill C–78, but the Young Offenders Act, Bill C–45, Bill C–41 and all these other acts are abysmally poor. We cannot deal with the problems in the criminal justice system by dealing with one Bill C–78, which is only a small portion of what is needed, and by working in a very poor fashion on the other bills. They should not take credit for something until they do it 100 per cent right, not 3 per cent right.

What more can we say? The only way to get through their thick heads is to replace them, and that we will do in the next election.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I rise to participate in the debate following the remarks of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West. I will try to draw the debate back to the bill before us, instead of the scatter gun treatment we have had all over the place on all the other legislation the hon. member says he does not like. When he gets a good bill he does not know what to say; he is almost tongue tied. I sympathize with him, but I want to address my remarks to Bill C–78, the witness protection program act, which is the one we are debating in the House of Commons today.

The purpose of Bill C–78 is to establish a solid legislative and regulatory basis for the RCMP source witness protection program. This is necessary to ensure that our national witness protection program offers the best protection possible to potential sources and witnesses. Given the importance of the program and the fact that we are strengthening it and making it more open and accountable, it would be useful to provide the House with a brief historical overview of the RCMP source witness protection program and some background that went into the development of the witness protection program act.

I am sorry the hon. members find this so amusing. I do not think it is.

Historically witness protection programs are most closely associated with the investigation of organized crime. The term organized crime covers a broad range of criminal activity, including large scale drug trafficking, murder, serious assault, money laundering, extortion and robbery.

I wish hon. members would restrain themselves. They seem to treat serious legislation as a joke. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West in his remarks did not talk about the bill, and I did not find his remarks amusing.

The hon. member says that the speech was written for me. I am assisting the solicitor general in my capacity as his parliamentary secretary today. I am trying to impart information to the House concerning the bill so that hon. members perhaps will make more enlightened comments later. I wish the hon. member for Fraser Valley West had not split his time. He could have made his remarks after mine and would have benefited from listening.

As often as not, the crimes committed by these organized groups go hand in hand with the use of fear and intimidation to ensure the silence of potential witnesses and informants.

• (1125)

Using a broad definition of organized crime, it can be said that at the present time approximately 50 per cent of RCMP source witness protection program cases deal with organized crime. However witness protection today has a broader application. The disturbing trend in recent years has been the use of fear and intimidation by lone criminals. These people are willing to go to any lengths to avoid conviction or to extract retribution from witnesses. As a result a growing number of people need protection as a result of their role in cases that have nothing to do with organized crime.

To deal with the growing need for witness and source protection, and in response to increased enforcement priority placed on fighting major national and international drug trafficking organizations, the RCMP source witness protection program was started in 1984. Although originally intended for the use of the RCMP alone, the program now provides protective services to provincial and municipal police forces across Canada. While many police forces rely entirely on the RCMP for witness protection services, some of the larger police departments have formed their own witness protection units. These larger police services usually come to the RCMP for assistance in cases where federal help is needed to facilitate a change of identity for a witness or an informant.

Most people entering the RCMP source witness protection program in the mid–1980s were associated with major drug trafficking activities. However, as I mentioned a moment ago, this has changed of late. Today a growing proportion of people entering the program have been involved in Criminal Code offences such as murder and serious assault. Since starting the source witness protection program the RCMP has built up an infrastructure of experienced members and contacts. RCMP members are available in every province and territory to support witness relocations and protection, to obtain secure identity changes, and to help obtain the necessary provincial documents to authenticate those changes.

At headquarters in Ottawa RCMP members have developed national RCMP witness protection policy procedures and contacts to facilitate the changes that must be made within numerous federal government data banks when a witness or an informant receives a new identity.

The annual cost of the RCMP witness protection program is $3.4 million. As my learned friend, the solicitor general, has already pointed out, no additional costs are expected as a result of the legislation. The average cost per case is $30,000 and approximately 60 per cent of cases cost less than $20,000.

At any given time there are approximately 80 to 100 people, including family members, in the program. The success of the RCMP source witness protection program speaks for itself. Of the large number of witnesses, informants and their families who have been relocated since the program began, none has come to any harm. It is difficult to establish precise conviction statistics for cases involving protected witnesses. However, based on available data, approximately 85 per cent to 90 per cent of cases involving witness protection result in convictions, usually because of the testimony of the protected person.

From my brief remarks I am sure the hon. members can appreciate how important the witness source protection program is as a law enforcement tool. There is no more devastating evidence than the firsthand testimony of a trusted accomplice exposing the inner workings of a criminal organization or that of a witness who has seen a serious crime take place and can identify the perpetrators. Whether a witness or an informant, these individuals are invaluable assets of the police and the judicial system.

[Translation]

That is why it is our responsibility, as legislators, to do everything possible to ensure that our national witness protection program is as efficient and effective as it can be. It is for this purpose that the government is introducing this bill.

• (1130)

The proposed legislation was drafted in consultation with all major stakeholders and after all issues had been thoroughly examined. In my view, it is particularly important to point out that police forces across the country were consulted. In 1992, a questionnaire was sent out to about 400 municipal and provincial police forces in the country.

Our goal was to assess how much protection witnesses were afforded, determine the types of offences being committed and the nature of the protection provided, examine the problems facing service users and recommend improvements. We also conducted a comprehensive review of witness protection programs in place in other countries, particularly the U.S., United Kingdom and Australia.

Bill C–78 incorporates the results of the analysis performed on the data collected and the lessons drawn from this extensive research. In short, this bill is the result of many years of research and effort and it will ensure that our national witness protection program remains modern and effective. Under the provisions of the bill, our program will continue to provide safe and effective support to witnesses under protection while at the same time remaining open and transparent.

Witness protection in itself will not check violent crime or organized crime. But it is nonetheless a major element of the investigative techniques available to law enforcement officials and a tool very useful to police in fighting against organized crime and major criminal activity in Canada. We must therefore make sure that it remains such a tool.

The solicitor general has already given the House the broad outlines of the bill and proposed changes to the RCMP's sources–witness protection program. All hon. members will agree that the need for such changes is crystal–clear. In conlusion then, I would like to echo the closing remarks made by the solicitor general and urge all hon. members to ensure the speedy passage of Bill C–78.

[English]

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on Bill C–78. I sought the opportunity because over the past 15 years I have been active as a lawyer in the criminal justice system. As a lawyer I have worked with witnesses in court, as a defence counsel, as a crown prosecutor for the provincial Government of Ontario and as a crown prosecutor for the federal government.

On other occasions I have worked as counsel for witnesses who were involved in witness protection programs. I have had the opportunity to see firsthand what happens to a person, particularly a member of the public, who becomes a witness and to people in the past who became involved in our less formal former witness protection program. I have also seen what happens when a witness is intimidated or when an accused person or a person involved in crime attempts to intimidate a witness.

It is now past the time when we should come forward and set out some clear legislation, some clear rules and clear guidelines and regulations to deal with persons who find themselves in the very delicate and very dangerous position of being a witness and being subject to duress and penalty from those who would seek to quiet them.

Criminals have successfully utilized fear and intimidation of potential witnesses to avoid prosecution and punishment for their criminal acts. Individuals will go to great lengths to avoid conviction or to exact violent retribution from witnesses. We have recognized this. We have worked with this in the system for a long time. We now recognize that enforcement agencies need the support and the assistance of the public to further their investigations and to achieve success in their efforts to bring criminals to justice.

That support would not be forthcoming in the absence of programs designed to ensure the safety of those citizens prepared to get involved by providing information or testifying against criminals.

Witnesses are the ultimate public servants. They are people without whom we could not operate our criminal justice system and without whom we could not bring criminals to the courts and to justice. Witnesses fall into several categories. There are witnesses who are paid to be witnesses and who receive salaries for that, public servants, police officers, investigators at Revenue Canada or at Canada Customs, investigators in various forms of activities that could result in criminal prosecutions. These people are accustomed to dealing with criminals. They also have a role in life that allows them within the system to have the protection of their office and the protection of their job.

On the other end of the spectrum there are ordinary citizens who by coincidence or accident find themselves witnesses to crimes: somebody is walking down the street and they see a bank robber getting away or they witness a car accident in which one of the drivers was criminally negligent or drunk.

Some members of the public become witnesses by virtue of their status as victims of crime. These witnesses by and large come forward and provide a tremendous public service with little concern for their own personal safety as a result of their testimony.

Witnesses who may have been involved with organized crime or other forms of criminal activity and who come forward, as much as they may want to come forward, have their lives affected adversely. These are people who live under threat, people who live in fear of some kind of punishment from those they would seek to accuse or witness against.

There are also witnesses we seek out, we being the government or the agency doing the investigation. These witnesses fall into the general loose category of informants, paid informants or sources. It is an unfortunate fact of life that sometimes we have to go to criminals to bring criminals to justice. Sometimes we have to go to people involved in an activity to have their assistance in bringing to justice the main perpetrators.

The legislation is intended to cover these people and to protect them in the event their lives are in danger. The legislation will cover agents who participate in investigations as well as informants.

The witness protection program act defines a witness as a person who has given or who has agreed to give information or evidence or has agreed to participate in a matter relating to an inquiry or the investigation or prosecution of an offence whose security is at risk as a result. Also included in the definition are persons who may require protection due to their relationship to or association with the people previously mentioned.

We are talking about people who by accident or on purpose become involved in an investigation and who are under duress from those who would be investigated as a result. Protection under the act can include relocation, accommodation, change of identity, counselling, financial support for those people or for any other purpose in order to ensure their security and to facilitate their re–establishment or their becoming self–sufficient. It covers a wide range of services that can be provided.

• (1140)

Not everyone involved in the witness protection program will live a secret existence in the future. They may simply require counselling or assistance to get on with their lives after the trauma of having dealt with this.

We know from previous speakers that the annual cost of the protection program is $3.4 million and that there will be no additional costs as a result of the legislation.

The legislation clearly defines what is expected of the government and what is expected of the witnesses as a result of this program. In the past there has been a problem because our program has been informal and because the program has been allowed to change with particular circumstances.

As a result there have been complaints from those who are protected and from the RCMP which administers the program that people's expectations are not being met and that the RCMP needs assistance in defining how far it can go and what it should do to protect the witness.

The new legislation will ensure a clear defined admission policy for witnesses, consistent treatment of cases across the country, a clear setting out of responsibilities and obligations of administrators of the plan and protectees entering the program, and a more defined management structure within the RCMP for the daily operation of the program, thereby increasing accountability.

This is an important section. I recall dealing with a witness who was under protection and who was having difficulty within the system making contact with someone to assist her or to give some answers on some information she required. Even as a lawyer it was a bit of a nightmare trying to get through the maze of administration to find someone who could assist her with her problem. The more clearly defined management structure within the RCMP will assist to straighten that out.

A complaints procedure will be in place and the commissioner of the RCMP will submit to the solicitor general an annual report on the operation of the program.

During 1994 and 1995 we have provided protective services to 70 new witnesses, 30 of whom were referred by other agencies. The $3.4 million we are spending annually on the program will not increase as a result of the change in administration but the money will be spent more effectively. It will be spent more clearly on guaranteeing the safety of the witnesses.

It is important for the public to understand and appreciate that the witness protection program operates across the country, but it does not operate in a vacuum. In devising the statute and in setting out the scheme in the act we have consulted all the provinces and territories.

When someone applies for the program or when a decision is made to admit an applicant to the program, the following factors will be taken into consideration: the potential contribution the witness or source can make toward a police investigation; the nature of the offence under investigation; the nature of the risk to the individual; what alternate methods of protection are available; the danger to the community if the individual is admitted to the program; the potential effects on any family arrangements; the likelihood of the individual's being able to adjust; their maturity, their ability to make judgments and other personal characteristics; the cost of maintaining the individual in the program; and other factors the commissioner of the RCMP finds relevant.

It is important that there be a clear, defined decision making process to admit an individual into the program. In serious cases such as those requiring a change of identity or an admission of a foreign applicant, the decision to admit an individual will be made only by the assistant commissioner in charge of the program. A decision to terminate protection must also be made by the assistant commissioner.

This is only part of the Liberal safe streets, safe neighbourhoods program. Obviously we need statutes like this. No matter how much serious crime there is, we know there always will be crime and there always will be a need to protect people.

When we are protecting people we need to be able to say to Canadians we are protecting people worthy of protection, that we are protecting people when there is a serious risk and that we have a clearly defined methodology for doing it. As the economy becomes healthier, as we work toward the creation of jobs and the creation of prosperous communities, we will find there will be less and less violent crime on our streets.

• (1145)

Those who would seek to encourage Canadians to believe that violent crime is increasing at the present time are being disingenuous because we know statistically and from crime reports that is not the case.

The bill is not a response to the fearmongering that exists in certain quarters of society. It is a practical, concrete response to a need to clearly define and assist the criminal justice system in witness protection. It is a practical, pragmatic response to a situation we have been able to identify. It is part of the ongoing Liberal government plan for safe streets and safe communities in Canada.

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Madam Speaker, I extend my gratitude to the Solicitor General of Canada for establishing a legislative base for the RCMP's source and witness protection program. I also assure him of my total support.

It is another useful and effective tool for our law enforcement officials. It will reduce crime and make Canada a safer place for everyone.

Our various colleagues in the House have defined the extent and content of the bill. I found the interventions of my colleagues very interesting. I particularly refer to the previous intervention by my colleague from Windsor.

As my hon. colleague and the solicitor general have said, in the past criminals have successfully used fear and intimidation of potential witnesses to avoid prosecution and punishment for their crimes. Enforcement agencies need the support and assistance of the public to further their investigations to successfully bring criminals to justice.

[Translation]

The bill under examination today is aimed at improving the RCMP's witness and informant protection program, making it more effective and more open. Its intent is to protect those who assist our police forces in criminal investigations, particularly when organized crime is involved.

It is an acknowledged fact that the contribution of informants and witnesses is often essential in resolving certain criminal investigations. The Quebec Minister of Public Security, for instance, stated only a few days ago that the most effective means of curtailing the war between motorcycle gangs in Quebec is to recruit informants and witnesses. Those who co–operate with law enforcement agencies occasionally place themselves in dangerous positions as far as their personal safety is concerned, and we owe it to them to provide the best possible protection.

In the past, some participants in the old sources and witnesses program have complained that they did not get the benefits they had been promised. This will not happen any longer, because the changes proposed today will ensure the application of clear and uniform criteria across the country.

[English]

The changes proposed by the witness protection program act will help ensure that both the applicants who enter the program and the RCMP which operates it have a clear understanding of their rights and obligations. The legislative initiative defines a range of protective services and benefits that can be provided. It makes the program more transparent and more accountable.

The process of how one gets into the program has been clearly defined.

A decision to admit an applicant to the RCMP SWPP, as it is called, will be based on the following factors: the potential contribution the witness source can make toward a particular police investigation; the nature of the offence under investigation; the nature of the risk to the individual; alternative methods of protection that are available; danger to the community if the individual is admitted to the program; the potential effects on any family relationships; the likelihood of the individual being able to adjust to the program, that is the maturity of that individual, the maturity of their judgment and other personal characteristics, as well as the cost of maintaining the individual in the program; and any other factor the commissioner of the RCMP may deem relevant.

Under the witness protection act there will be a clear decision making process to admit an individual into the program. In serious cases such as those requiring a change of identity or admission of a foreign applicant, the decision to admit an individual can only be made by the assistant commissioner in charge of the program. A decision to terminate protection must also be made by the assistant commissioner. In less serious cases the decision to admit an individual can be taken at the chief superintendent level. There are protections built into the legislation.

I am proud to say that more than any previous administration the government is committed to reducing violence in our society, specifically violence against women and crime motivated by hatred or bias against any of the vulnerable groups, particularly those which are listed in section 15 of the charter.

Violence is not a phenomenon that can be encompassed or dealt with in one big bold stroke. It is a complex problem with multiple causes and multiple effects. It touches all levels of society and all regions of the country. The whole program was worked out with all regions of the country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific to the Arctic, and that includes Quebec in the portrait. That is why the government is taking a comprehensive approach involving several federal departments.

In the past year a whole series of measures have been tabled by ministers, reinforcing our commitment to address the problem of violence. As the solicitor general has said, the government has instituted many new measures to make our homes and our streets safer. Members will recall that in our red book, safe homes and safe streets was one of our major undertakings and a commitment which we have met with great sincerity and alacrity.

I mention a few measures which are extremely important to women: measures against criminal harassment, commonly called the anti–stalking law; the firearms control legislation; the reform of the sentencing process; and the reform of the Young Offenders Act.

[Translation]

These widely varying initiatives have one common goal: to reduce violence and crime in our society. That objective is set out clearly in the federal gender equality plan, moreover, prepared under the auspices of the commission on the status of women, reporting to me as secretary of state, and tabled early this summer. Cabinet has been solidly behind this undertaking.

The federal plan also calls for the Canadian government to undertake a comparative analysis by gender of all of these initiatives. A similar endorsement was given at the fourth international congress for women in Beijing. This comparative analysis by gender indicates how policies affect men and women differently. I must say that I see this as an eminently logical undertaking.

In some cases, these differences are central to policy and play a determinant role in its application. In others they have a minor impact and are only one of a series of factors that must be taken into consideration.

[English]

In the spirit of the federal plan for gender equality we must ensure that the specific needs of women who qualify are considered in the application of the RCMP sources and witness protection program. We have a tendency to think of the world of criminals and organized crime as a man's world, but that is not entirely true. Unfortunately hundreds of women are in contact with this violent world and many are dreaming of getting out of it, just like the men, if only they could do so safely.

• (1155)

These women could become vital sources of information for police and prosecutors. However they are vulnerable to fear, to intimidation and blackmail. They have to think not only about their own personal safety but in most cases they also have to be concerned with the protection of their children.

Women should know that under section 2 of the witness protection program act, protection may include relocation for themselves and their families, accommodation and change of identity, as well as counselling and financial support. The objective of the program is to ensure the safety and the security of citizens, women and men, who assist police in their efforts to crack down on criminals. We all know this is a needed program and a needed access to information.

The program will help them to re–establish in a new location and will support them until they become self–sufficient if they fulfil the criteria I outlined earlier in my remarks.

All citizens who contribute to eradicating crime and violence from our society deserve our gratitude and support. We know that crime is on the decrease. Notwithstanding we will always have some individuals in society who will engage in abhorrent behaviour. We will always have those who will act outside the law in their selfish, personal interests. However initiatives such as this one will help to ensure society can be a caring, safe and just.

In some cases contributions that witnesses will bring to the court on very dangerous criminals call for extraordinary courage. We want those citizens who have demonstrated their concern for safety and security in the home, in the marketplace and on our streets to receive the best possible protection. No other program has been so comprehensive or so considerate of the needs of our citizenry. That is why I support the solicitor general's initiative.

I hope that all my colleagues in the House, particularly those who have been expressing their concerns on individual cases, will look at this collective undertaking, support it wholeheartedly and join in ensuring a speedy passage of Bill C–78.

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to speak today on Bill C–78 which is really about public safety. This must be very rewarding for my colleague from Scarborough West considering his diligence in bringing this vital matter to the government's attention. His efforts in this regard are certainly commendable.

The debate on private member's bill last spring and the previous fall showed great evidence of support on both sides of the House for the bill and for what he was trying to do. The debate on Bill C–206 demonstrated there is really a clear need for a legislated protection program for witnesses and sources in criminal cases.

It seems that demonstrated there was a clear desire by members of Parliament for such a program. One of the reasons for the desire and the need for the legislative program is that there have been some problems in the past. For example, at times there have been misunderstandings between the police and a witness or a source about what the agreement was between them, or what the roles of each was and what their responsibilities were. It is important that the bill clarify some of the rights, responsibilities and obligations on both sides in these matters.

In my view the solicitor general is to be commended for responding to an obvious need to bring about changes to the decade old program. Many people may not realize there is a witness protection program within the RCMP that has been active and operating for quite a few years. Also many programs are operated by municipal and provincial police forces across the country.

The solicitor general is to be commended for responding to the obvious need to bring about changes to this decade old program. We see his response today in Bill C–78, which is now before us. The bill is really another plank in the government's efforts to deal with crime.

I will give some examples of how we have dealt with crime in various ways over the past couple of years. There have been amendments to the Young Offenders Act. I am looking forward to attending a forum in my area in Dartmouth next Thursday, where we will be discussing youth issues and issues related to the Young Offenders Act. It is being put on by CBC radio and I am looking forward to attending to discuss some of the issues arising out of past amendments and concerns of the public about the Young Offenders Act.

We have also had Bill C–45, which provided for reform of the corrections process and issues of conditional release. We all recognize that we had very speedy passage of the bill to provide for the use of DNA evidence in criminal proceedings.

All these things are planks in the efforts of the government to deal with crime. We are working steadily to fulfil our goal of ensuring that Canadians live in safe homes and safe streets.

Upon passage of Bill C–78 Canadians will have a witness protection program that will serve them well, because it will provide a legislated program that will operate more efficiently, more effectively, but will not cost taxpayers more money. I am sure that in my riding of Halifax West the taxpayers will be in favour of that part of the bill.

The whole area of witness protection is particularly important in places like Nova Scotia, as it is across the country. However in Nova Scotia the area where it will be most often used will be in drug enforcement. Our province is a key offloading area for drugs coming from South America, the Caribbean, and the eastern coast of the United States because of the fact that Nova Scotia is a peninsula with so much coastline and many little coves. This makes it picturesque and beautiful to visit, and I recommend that all members and Canadians who are interested should visit us and see our beautiful province. However it also provides an opportunity for drug smugglers to offload their product because it is difficult to detect them and difficult for the RCMP or other police forces to cover all those inlets and bays.

The witness protection program is also used in areas of crime, including homicides and prostitution, which are also of great concern. If we can help in those investigations and the prosecution of cases of that nature with the bill, it is certainly worth pursuing.

I checked with one of the local RCMP offices in my riding and I was told that the existing witness protection program had been used there about 25 times in the past 20 years. Obviously it is not used constantly, but it provides a very important tool for police in investigation and prosecution for criminal offences.

It seems to me that in the future those who must turn to the witness protection program, like the approximately 70 Canadians who did so last year, will benefit from a number of programs provided by the bill. I believe members would agree that all Canadians would benefit from the improvements.

In many respects we are talking about trying to fight organized crime. Yes, there other kinds of crime involved, individual crimes. We can readily see how the witness protection program can deal with problems of organized crime. With that kind of an organized group there is much more need for witness protection.

In that sense one of the best ways to fight organized crime is with information that sources and witnesses can provide if they do not feel they are at risk of being killed, injured or maimed if they give evidence or assist the police in some other way. The bill is important in all those respects.

Another key element of the bill will be a clearly defined admission process and criteria so that not just anybody can qualify under the program. It is very clear from the RCMP or other police forces that want to make use of the RCMP program what the rules are, what the procedures are, and who can be admitted and how. This is very important.

The RCMP has a responsibility after the bill becomes law to thoroughly examine the applicant's suitability for the program in a variety of ways. That means not only the potential contribution the applicant can make toward an investigation, but the RCMP will also look closely at the individual, at the risk involved to that individual, what might be the risk of danger or harm coming to him, the impact on the person or his or her family, as well as the ability of the individual to adjust to the program. I suppose that could be a problem in some cases, depending on the kind of individual being dealt with. All those factors are obviously important in determining who should be admitted to the program.

Interestingly the protection of witnesses and sources does not mean just relocation, as we assume, and change of identity. It also means counselling or other kinds of support. I turn to the bill for a moment to read to the House the definition of protection in Bill C–78:

> "protection", in respect of a protectee, may include relocation, accommodation and change of identity as well as counselling and financial support for those or any other purposes in order to ensure the security of the protectee or to facilitate the protectee's re–establishment or becoming self–sufficient;

We see there are a variety of kinds of protection that can be provided and are necessary. Under the bill the RCMP is required to look at alternate methods of protection.

We talk about the kind of counselling support that a witness may need or a source may need and we think of prostitution involving children, for instance. While there is a basic need for protection in the sense of protection from violence of the child, there will probably be a need for counselling for a child who has been involved in prostitution and the violence and the intimidation associated with that activity.

We can all recognize how difficult and frightening it has to be for people to come forward who have been a witness or a source and have been involved in some way in a matter of this sort. It has to be terrifying, particularly if they are fearing for their lives and in some cases for their family or someone else who may be close to them. That is why the definition of witness in Bill C–78 includes those who might have evidence or will give evidence in the future, as well as those who might be at risk themselves, for instance their family.

The source witness protection program must, and with Bill C–78 it will, make it easier for people with information that may help investigations to come forward without fear for their own safety and the safety of their families. That to me is key. We are not only talking about the safety of their families, but by extension if we can get them to feel freer about coming forward and being witnesses or sources then it is the safety of all our families we are talking about here. The success of the program and of our crime fighting efforts in general depends on sources and witnesses and the information they can provide. Their safety is of paramount importance, which is why I am so pleased to support the bill.

The bill provides one important item that we do not have at the present and is needed. As we can see in the bill of the member for Scarborough West and the debate around that bill over the past year or so, we need consistency in how each case is dealt with. With the bill every case across the country will be dealt with in a consistent manner, which is a big improvement.

The bill will not replace other witness protection programs that exist across the country. I mentioned that provincial forces and municipal forces have their own programs. They will continue to operate. Those law enforcement agencies will continue to be able to participate in the RCMP source witness protection program, but they will now be able to do so with much more accountability and transparency in the process.

Another important area in the bill solves some potential problems in the present system in the area of accountability and transparency, which we need to have more of in this process. The bill makes the administration of the program much more transparent and accountable. It goes through the commissioner of the RCMP to the minister and to the House of Commons. It provides for clearer lines of authority within the RCMP structure. That makes unquestionably for a more efficient administration.

The commissioner is required to make an annual report on the operation of the program, a full report indicating what kinds of problems they face, what amounts have been paid out, the number of witnesses who have been protected in various ways, and so forth. He must make that report annually to the solicitor general. The solicitor general will then table the annual report before Parliament so that members of the House have the opportunity to scrutinize the report. Therefore it makes the whole system accountable to the House of Commons and through the House of Commons to the public.

The annual reporting requirement will mean that information will be available to members and the public on the cost and the number of people involved in the program. It will be much clearer. It is very important for both parties to the agreements where a witness is being protected that both the witness and the RCMP or other police force have a clear understanding of what the agreement and what the responsibilities and obligations of both parties to the agreement will be.

This will provide for transparency and accountability with regard to the responsibilities and obligations for both the applicants and the RCMP as administrators of the program. These protection agreements and the obligations of applicants and administrators to fulfil these agreements will provide further transparency and accountability to the program.

All these factors lead to public safety. All these factors are providing a greater feeling of security, a greater sense of safety in coming forward for the witness.

If persons have heard about other witnesses in the past who perhaps did not feel they were treated properly, did not feel that the police had lived up to their part of the bargain in protecting a person, they will obviously be less likely to come forward. However, if we can clarify the rules, if we can have clear agreements between the RCMP or another police force and the witness that provide for the rights and obligations of both and what is going to happen for them, we will not have people saying that they did not get treated properly by the police. They can go to the agreement itself and look at what is on paper.

It is kind of like good fences making good neighbours. A good agreement with clearly specified rules on who is to do what provides for a good relationship between the two sides. I think it will add to people feeling freer about coming forward to the system and providing their information.

To review some of the issues we have talked about how in the past criminals have successfully used fear and intimidation to scare witnesses to keep them away from the police so that they will not bring evidence forward. This program is very important, because individuals involved in organized crime will go to great lengths to try to ensure that a witness or a source will not come forward. As I said, it can be a terrifying experience. They can certainly sometimes threaten and exact violent retribution from the witnesses.

Enforcement agencies need the support and assistance of the public. We are talking here about the public in more than one way. We are talking about the individual who is a witness. In some cases when a witness is relocated he or she may require assistance from the public in that regard to find a new location. I am not sure exactly how that would work, but it may require it in some regard. To achieve success in bringing criminals to justice and to further investigations, the police do need that kind of information and they need people to come forward.

The legislation will cover agents who are involved in investigations, not only in the trials but throughout the whole process, which is why I was pleased to see the definitions I mentioned earlier. Not only is the person who has given evidence in the past covered, but so is a person who has agreed to give evidence or information in the future. In any case where because of taking part in some way in an inquiry, investigation or in the prosecution of an offence a person's security may be at risk, the person is covered by the legislation.

I talked about protection and how it can include relocation, accommodation, change of identity, counselling, financial support or any other requirement needed to ensure the security of the protectees as they are called, or to facilitate re–establishment or becoming self–sufficient in a new location with a new identity.

Let us think about a witness who has been totally innocent, has not been involved in crime at all, but happens to be a witness to a serious crime. I am reminded of the movie "Witness" in which a young boy was a witness to a crime and had to be protected. In a case where someone is totally innocent it must be a bewildering experience to be called upon to be a protected witness, fearing for one's life; having to change identity and home; and being away from family and friends. It has to be a very difficult and bewildering experience.

Interestingly the annual cost will not go up as a result of the program and if it goes down that is fine. It is an important program and will vary each year depending on how many people are being protected. The annual cost is $3.4 million. There are no additional costs expected as a result of introducing the legislation. The average cost per case is $30,000 but approximately 60 per cent of cases cost less than $20,000. If that can bring people who are involved in organized crime or other serious crimes to justice then it is well worth the money. I am confident that all Canadians, and certainly those in my riding of Halifax West, would support that and would certainly support the intent of the bill.

The changes proposed in the witness protection program act will give the RCMP's source witness protection program a solid legislative and regulatory basis. This is lacking in the existing program. It is important that we provide it and therefore I urge members to support this important bill.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have a few moments to speak to Bill C–78, the source witness protection program bill.

There are two or three perspectives I will touch on. My colleagues have touched on most of the technical aspects of the bill and all parties in the House are apparently supporting it. Therefore there is nobody really nibbling at the corners. I am certainly not going to do that. It is a good bill, as has been recognized by colleagues.

There are two or three perspectives that should be brought out in discussion. I want first to pay some tribute to police officers across the country who over the past many years have informally provided protection for witnesses. They have done it in many ways, often not at taxpayers' expense.

This is something that has not been recognized very much in the history of law enforcement in Canada and North America. It was very real over the past decades when no public moneys were formally available to protect witnesses that police officers had to use their cars, their garages, their basements, freebies from the motel outside town, and all kinds of different devices to make sure the witness who was scared to death got a chance to get into the courtroom, give the evidence, get out and survive in the face of great risks. I pay tribute to all those policemen, many of whom were Mounties. This was not confined just to the federal police force but also to provincial and municipal forces across the country.

That history is not written; it is all unwritten. It is anecdotal now to the extent that these policemen and former policemen get a chance to talk about it. It is an unwritten part of our Canadian criminal justice history. I wanted to note it here and pay tribute to the many who made the system work.

Starting in 1984 the Royal Canadian Mounted Police began a witness protection program that provided some kind of framework for witness protection albeit not recognized in statute. That was in the face of the growing threat from organized crime which developed post–war. Also as was mentioned earlier, there were threats from individuals who while they might not have been part of an organized crime group apparently were not prepared to stop at anything in trying to preclude their conviction.

There have been many bad stories in relation to that as part of our criminal justice history but there have also been many good stories. With the growth and public knowledge of the availability of a witness protection program in many parts of the world, there began to be some confusion about what a witness might be entitled to have: a free bus ride, a free taxi ride, a free room or some accommodation, money, protection and a new identity.

Over time the field became more and more confused. It was not so much on the part of the police, as they were simply doing their very best to deliver evidence to the courtroom door for the prosecutors. It was more so for the witnesses who from time to time and place to place became confused about exactly what the protection was composed of.

Some witnesses were more accommodating than others; some wanted more than others. It became more difficult for the police to manage. There might often be cases where when the process was over, the evidence had been given hopefully ending in a successful prosecution, witnesses felt they did not have the protection they thought they were to have. Maybe they made it difficult for the police involved. Maybe they went to the local newspaper, the local media. It became confusing and embarrassing for some. Something had to be done.

The first positive signs I saw in the House was the research and the bill produced by our colleague, the member for Scarborough West. That was quite a credible exercise. A private member's bill was passed in the House at second reading and referred to the justice committee. At about that time the Ministry of the Solicitor General indicated it would want to have a bill similar in nature. Our colleague essentially acquiesced and the solicitor general has presented the bill which apparently has support from all sides of the House.

The last perspective I want to address very briefly is that the bill will help us better manage the safe streets policy the Liberal Party has adopted. It will better manage the costs. The program will be codified. It will probably show up as a cost item in the estimates and the parliamentary authorizations as a specific category rather than being buried as it was in part previously.

The bill will help us better manage what we are doing in the safe streets policy. It will result in better prosecutions. The crown attorneys will know what the infrastructure will be for their witnesses if there has to be a witness protection program extension. It will result in better criminal procedure, a better understanding both on the part of witnesses and the people who manage the witness protection program of what they have to deliver.

• (1225)

It is a three–way street. We have the public that wants to see the benefits of a better managed system. We have the witnesses who need to know what they can expect, who will know what they have the right to ask for and require in terms of protection. It will assist the police better in knowing what the deliverables should be and what the deliverables are, both to the crown which is gathering the evidence and to the witness.

I congratulate both the solicitor general and the hon. member for Scarborough West for their contributions in this regard.

The Deputy Speaker: Before recognizing the hon. member for Scarborough West who has so much history with this issue, would the hon. member find it acceptable, as another member came out of a meeting to speak, to have the hon. member for Dartmouth speak first?

Mr. Wappel: Mr. Speaker, it would be my delight to hear what the hon. member for Dartmouth has to say.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague.

This is an important bill, particularly for the hon. member from Scarborough who so kindly gave up his spot for me to speak. I congratulate him on the work he has done in laying the groundwork for this type of legislation.

Many times in the past the legislative procedure and process of the House of Commons have given reason for the public and members of this place to be cynical and sceptical about what it is the backbench can do, what it is independent members can do with respect to setting the legislative agenda. I acknowledge up front the work the hon. member for Scarborough West has done in ensuring this important piece of legislation was put before the House.

It is quite rare for a private member's bill to be debated and actually get beyond the pro forma number of required hours once it is drawn and actually get passed. The fact that the hon. member for Scarborough West got the bill to second reading and caused it to come forward is not only a testament to the way Parliament can work. It is also a personal testament to how the member sticks to it. All members owe him a debt of gratitude.

There are very few times when a piece of government legislation comes forward which is supported by all sides of the House. It appears the legislation is supported by all sides of the House. Perhaps the government and the House leadership on our side will take a close look and find, when legislation comes from the backbenches of either side of this place, that it is better legislation. They might want to free us up a bit more to do that type of job.

In the last number of years I have found that my opinions on justice, law and order have gone from what would have been considered to be a liberal left position to a more realistic, responsive position when it deals with some aspects of the criminal justice system. That has happened over the seven years I have been a member of Parliament because of my interaction with the criminal justice system on behalf of my constituents. I have viewed it from afar and have watched cases unfold. I have dealt with people who have been victims of crime. I have dealt with the law enforcement agencies and people in the judiciary.

As we start to understand that, when we deal with the criminal justice system, just as we have to be flexible in other areas of public policy such as social policy and fiscal matters, we have to be extremely flexible and reasonable when we deal with the criminal justice system.

The system must be responsive to the needs of the community. Clearly the area of witness protection is one of those areas where there was a responsibility, a requirement by government, to come forward and recognize we had to statutize programs that currently existed at the federal level with the RCMP.

I am concerned that sometimes we direct the limited resources we have for law enforcement into areas that simply are not able to deal with the problem in as effective a manner as is required. The area of witness protection has concerned me for a number of years. I will deal with the reasons for that.

In my area, which is not that dissimilar from most urban areas across Canada, there is a lot of urban crime. There are a lot of crimes specifically against children. The hon. member for Scarborough West has been on his feet in the House more times than any other member dealing with some of these issues.

In my riding we have had to suffer through a disproportionate number of our young children from 13 years old to 16 years old being drawn into prostitution. I claim no moral high ground in dealing with these issues, but I am a parent and I represent an area where there are many kids who have been plucked from their turbulent years in puberty and thrown into a world that can only be described as a world of terror. They are plucked out of their schools; they are taken from the downtowns, from the shopping malls, by people who can only be described as the worst criminals in Canadian society. They are pimps that befriend primarily young girls, draw them into a life of crime, of drug addiction and literally sexual slavery. At 14, 15 or 16 years old these children have lost their youth and have been violated in the worst possible ways.

However there has been a problem in the criminal justice system in dealing effectively with that situation. There has been a problem in the judiciary in applying the strictness of fines and of penalties the public demands and that should be applied. There has been a problem in the prosecution because it has been extremely difficult to offer the level of protection to those young girls, the victims of crime, but also the witnesses to crimes that happen to themselves and to others in that circumstance.

They come forward with the certainty that if they give testimony in a court of law against these monsters walking the streets one of two things will happen. Either the criminal justice system would deal with a conviction in such a light manner that 6 months or 12 months later the individual is back out on the street doing the same thing with young kids again, or there would be threats to the personal safety of the individual who came forward as a victim and a witness to the crime as well as threats to their families.

I relate something that happened about three years ago which marked me forever. It was late on a Friday afternoon. There were far too many calls to return and I was tired after a week up here. My secretary said I had to take a phone call.

It was a mother who was more than distraught. She was beaten by a system that could not respond to what she saw as her child's need, a mother despondent because she did not think she could help her child. Her 15–year old daughter had been lured into prostitution at the age of 13. At one point the daughter said she had made the break and she did not want to do that any more. Two days later a van showed up in front of her house with her pimps or the part of the international criminal element that deals with street prostitution of juveniles. They had their buddies and they parked outside.

Within two or three days the daughter told her mother she had to go back to Toronto, back on the street. The mother begged her and beseeched her not to do it. Her child had been raped, abused, beaten and threatened with death. She had seen some of her friends beaten close to death by this criminal element, these monsters, these pimps. Why would she go back to a life like that? She feared for her own personal safety and did not believe the criminal justice system could afford her the protection necessary to put those demons away.

• (1235)

Outside her own personal safety she went back to the street out of the fear for the safety of her family and knowing full well that she might be a statistic, and maybe she is today. I hope not. She did not want her mother to suddenly turn around one morning while she was by herself in her kitchen and be confronted by thugs who would beat and perhaps sexually assault her. That is why that child went back to the street.

About a year later the mother called me and said: "My daughter has called and she cannot stand any more. She has been beaten, tortured, sexually assaulted and she is getting out. She is in Niagara Falls and I want to bring her home. We have to get her out of there. She has broken away from her pimp and I cannot get anybody to help".

I thought of my 11–year old daughter and my God, I hope that if I am ever in a situation like that somebody would at least do their best to take my child out of that danger.

It took a lot of phone calls, a lot more than it should have taken, before I could get somebody to act. The child was turning 16 on a Monday of a long weekend and the law enforcement agency said: "We can bring her back but what do we do with her? Where do we put her? These people will be back. Is she prepared to testify? If she is not, what do we do with her?" I spent until 11 p.m. that night trying to find a safe haven for that victim of crime and potential witness against the perpetrators of the crime.

The bill begins to address some of the real issues facing law enforcement agencies, the judicial system and certainly facing the victims of crime and individuals who can come forward and give testimony in a court of law, knowing full well that if they do there are resources and programs available by statute that will assist in their protection and that of their families.

Every year we spend a lot of money to put somebody in jail. We spend a lot of money when we have to send law enforcement agencies and police officers to pursue criminals. We must put money into a program that will say to witnesses that if they come forward and tell their stories, we will do our very best in a very regulated statutory fashion with a program that has financing to protect them and their families against intimidation or, God forbid, physical violence or even death.

In my riding a young lady involved in prostitution broke away and wanted to stop. She wanted the people who had stolen her life to be dealt with by the criminal justice system. She was to give evidence against a gang of criminals operating right across Canada and in the northeastern U.S. She was to testify. A strong message to all those other victims of that type of crime was sent when she was found murdered before the testimony could be given. The individual she was to testify against is currently awaiting trial on murder charges.

I wish that were the only case I could relate. There are more cases in which young girls or women who have decided to get out of prostitution and turn evidence have had to live a life from one hell to another, a life on the run, not knowing when a car stops in front of them whether somebody will put a bullet in their head. That is reality street in a town of only 65,000 people. It is happening in Toronto, in Scarborough, in western Canada and in small town Canada.

The bill starts down the right road. It does the right things. It tells us there is a program and there will be rules to the program. The program will have a dollar allocation. Currently the RCMP deals with that in its own programs because it has the budget.

This is the type of legislation the Canadian public wants. It wants to give the necessary resources to government agencies and to the criminal justice system for it to work. They want the resources to be targeted in a way that we alleviate as much as we can the criminal element from our streets while at the same time give protection and statutized, regularized program protection to those willing to come forward and confront elements in our society truly from the dark side of humanity.

I speak for the victims of crime who are potential witnesses to their victimization. I encourage the government and all members to continue to work, like the member for Scarborough West has worked, to identify to government and Parliament the types of programs through which we can come together and ensure the limited resources of government can be directed toward law enforcement and the criminal justice system. They should be directed in a fashion that allows us to attain the goal of safer streets and that those willing to participate to help us have safer streets are afforded the protection required.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I knew my decision to yield the floor to my hon. friend from Dartmouth would be the correct one. His speech was peppered with his usual enthusiasm, a very interesting case study of why we need the program. I also thank all the speakers on the bill who mentioned my name in a positive light today. It is such a refreshing change and I really appreciate it.

I will talk about the history of witness protection and how I developed an interest in the subject to let Canadians know a bit about the need for a legislated witness protection program.

About three years ago when I was the official opposition critic for the solicitor general a gentleman came into my office. He was fearful, nervous, literally looking over his shoulder in apprehension. He was also very frustrated. He was a witness and an informant to a serious crime. He had in his view co–operated with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in an investigation. In his opinion he had been offered certain protection and certain financial incentives which would help him to relocate and get away from the wrath of those he had reported to the authorities.

Unfortunately because nothing was in writing or because there was no real mechanism provided, there was a dispute about what had been agreed on and how long the protection would be afforded. Suffice it to say he felt abandoned. He felt adrift. He felt at the mercy of those he had informed on.

It was a courageous thing for him to do. These were vicious people. He feared for his family, his wife and children, not just for himself; perhaps more for his wife and family than for himself.

I could see why he was in fear but why was he frustrated? He had gone to the RCMP and did not seem to get any redress there. He had gone to his local police department and did not get redress there. He had gone to the Ontario Provincial Police and did not get redress there. He went to his local member of Parliament. His local member of Parliament was unable to help, not because his local member of Parliament did not want to help but because we were now entering into the nether world of witness protection in Canada.

• (1245)

He went to the minister of the day who along with his officials begrudgingly admitted there was such a program but they were not about to talk about it. They were not about to discuss it. They were not about to give details and they certainly were not about to talk about his case.

In desperation he came to me, the official opposition critic for the solicitor general. That piqued my interest in the subject and I began to investigate. I found that since 1970 a federal witness protection program has been run by the U.S. marshall service in the United States. Prosecutors in the United States have said that the program was one of the most effective assets they utilized in law enforcement.

The population of the United States of America probably approaches 300 million people now. That U.S. witness protection program currently protects approximately 500 witnesses per year, which is not a very large number of witnesses considering the size of the population.

That says it is used in extreme circumstances for extreme cases. In a way that is good because there is only so much money. Generally speaking it has a fairly good success rate in solving crimes except the most dastardly kinds of crimes, the ones where people do not think twice about snuffing out a life in order that the person not be a witness in a proceeding against them.

I am talking about drug related offences. I am talking about organized crime. I am talking about gang warfare. The last thing those people are worried about is the value of a single human life. It is simply a matter of money. Nowadays one can get somebody to kill another for virtually a song. What a sad commentary in general on society.

I began to work on a witness protection bill for Canada because what I found out about this nether world of witness protection was that first, no one would talk about it. Hardly anyone would acknowledge that it existed and there was no legislative base for it.

As a lawyer, this concerned me. How can the law enforcement agencies give a person a new passport? How can they give someone a new social insurance number? How can they give someone new background documents and resumes of work that never existed to get the person back into the workforce with no legal basis to do so? It worried me that our law enforcement agencies with the best of motives to protect witnesses might be doing something contrary to the law by issuing these kinds of papers and these kinds of new identities without a legislative base.

I felt they needed this legislative base. I discussed this with the solicitor general of the day. Thousands of people across Canada presented petitions to the government of the day asking that a national witness protection program be brought forward. In a response to one of those petitions, the Hon. Doug Lewis, the minister at that time had this to say:

> Witness protection is indeed a very important function of law enforcement and, equally, a crucial service to witnesses who are at risk of retribution as a result of giving testimony in court.
> It is accurate to say that, presently, there is not a national, legislated program as exists in the United States, for example. My officials are currently examining the state of witness protection in Canada, which necessitates consideration of the witness protection requirements of not only the law enforcement community, but also the witnesses themselves. Also, integral to this process is a review of the efficacy of the legislated program and its application in Canada.
> Bearing in mind the complexity of this issue, a thorough review is required before a decision can be reached on the best possible witness protection program for Canadians.
> Rest assured that your views, particularly your request for a legislated program, are being given serious consideration and I would like to thank the petitioners for expressing their views on this matter.

That was a very nice response but I was getting the same feeling as John Doe who had come into my office of being pushed from pillar to post, study after study. Yes, there is no legislative program. Yes, it is a good idea. Yes, we need it, but we have to study it.

• (1250)

What changed? There was an election and with the election the appointment of a new solicitor general, the hon. member for Windsor West. Very shortly after becoming Solicitor General of Canada, among the various other initiatives that he came up with, the solicitor general recognized the merit and the need for a legislated witness protection program which would be offered nationally.

In consultation with his officials, he very kindly sat down with me and discussed my bill and the work that I had done up to that point. Of course the solicitor general has more resources than an ordinary member of Parliament. He did everything that was required of him. He talked to the U.S. marshall service, found out about the flaws and the pitfalls of the program. He talked to the various solicitors general of the provinces to see how the program could be most effective in a federal system where we pass the criminal laws, but they are enforced by the provinces.

He did not drag his feet. After having done the work and keeping me informed at all times so that I was convinced that the work was proceeding, he brought forward the legislation, Bill C–78.

In my judgment the bill is historic from a number of perspectives. Not only will it go a long way in protecting witnesses and informants in the future but it will help solve crimes.

Between 1980 and 1992 there have been 1,455 unsolved murders in the country. That is an incredible statistic. Never mind 1,455 murders, but 1,455 unsolved murders. No doubt there are people out there who know who was the perpetrator in many of these murders but they fear for their lives or they fear for their families' lives. They fear to come forward because they have no way of knowing they will be protected. Because of the nether world, the shadowy world of witness protection before the bill, people were not aware of it. They did not know whom to approach.

Did the House know that right now there are approximately 15 police forces across the country that offer witness protection; the RCMP, the OPP, the metropolitan Toronto police, some other police forces? Each has its own program with different rules, different standards, different budgets.

What good is it to a person who witnesses a murder, shall we say in Sudbury, if the metropolitan Toronto police has a witness protection program? That budget is for the residents of that city. What good is it in Calgary if the OPP has a witness protection program?

The key is that it has to be a national program because our criminal law is national. We have a national police force, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, which has a presence in every province and territory. It has a witness protection program so it is only logical that it administer a national witness protection program and the bill provides precisely for that.

It provides that those other police forces or any police force can contract through the RCMP to provide protection for witnesses in investigations that it is conducting. This is good financially as well because those police forces can budget for witness protection. They can pay the RCMP for the services it will be giving, but then they will have the expertise and uniformity that the RCMP will offer under the bill.

To me that is a very positive thing. I believe we will be able to solve crimes when we are able to offer proper legislated witness protection to people across Canada.

• (1255)

Goodness knows, there are enough crimes that need solving. Hopefully we will get people to come forward and offer their evidence in exchange for being protected from those very vile people in society who do not care about snuffing out people's lives.

The hon. member for Dartmouth used a descriptive term for these people. He called them demons. In order for us to exorcise our demons from society, our criminal demons, this will be one of the excellent tools we can use in that regard.

The bill is deceptively short considering what it is going to do. It only has 24 relatively short paragraphs. Perhaps we lose sight of the fact that sometimes shorter is better. It is deceptively short yet not lacking in anything.

When I drafted Bill C–206 I spent a lot of time thinking about all the different angles. I thought I had them all covered. I was very gratified when the House unanimously approved it at second reading. However, as is probably most often the case, the bureaucrats examined the bill and found certain things that were not in it and put them into a recommendation to the solicitor general. He, to his credit, accepted those recommendations. Bill C–78 is an improvement on my Bill C–206 and covers ground that is not covered in my bill.

One other thing I want to mention is the use to which the witness protection program has been put. For example, in 1986 approximately $500,000 a year was being spent by the RCMP on witness protection in all of Canada. In 1993 that amount has ballooned to $3,800,000. This is money well spent because it is money used for solving crimes perpetrated in Canada, crimes that might otherwise go unsolved. That demonstrates to me the efficacy of a national witness protection program and the need for Bill C–78.

One thing that was lacking before was openness, light shining on the witness protection program, publicity about the witness protection program. The program has been ongoing for quite some time. I am very pleased to note in clause 16 of Bill C–78 something that was not contained in my private member's bill but is very important, an annual report.

The commissioner of the RCMP, who will be in charge of the legislated national witness program, will file a report with the minister. That in itself is very important, as the minister will be apprised of what is going on with witness protection, how much it is costing, how many witnesses there are and its success rate in solving crimes.

The minister has gone further because not only will he receive the report but the clause provides that the minister shall—not may, not think about, but shall—cause a copy of the report to be laid before the House of Commons. We in the House of Commons and the people of Canada whom we represent will have an opportunity on a yearly basis to hear about the witness protection program and thereby publicize it, to examine how much is being spent on it, to know how many people are being protected by it and to understand how many crimes are being solved by the use of the witness protection program as a tool of law enforcement.

To me this is important because it will publicize the program. It will give people an opportunity to come forward and say they saw something, know something or heard something and say they will come forward if they have protection in the circumstances. It will be for the commissioner to decide whether or not in the circumstances of the particular case witness protection should be afforded. That is as it should be because it is a tool for law enforcement to use for the protection of witnesses who will help to solve crimes.

• (1300)

All in all, Bill C–78 is an excellent bill. I am delighted to support it. I am delighted that it apparently has all–party support. That indicates to me that it will receive quick passage through the House of Commons so we can get on with the legislated witness protection program, get on with publicizing it, get on with solving crimes and get on with trying to find the perpetrators of the 1,455 unsolved murders between 1980 and 1992.

There are a couple of areas in the bill on which I would like some clarification. Hopefully these will be clarified by the officials in their appearance before the committee when the bill is studied at committee.

I draw specific attention to a lack of a provision to authorize emergency steps. For example, if the commissioner believes that there is some urgent need to protect someone to get them out of harm's way before the technicalities of the bill kick in, it would seem that there should be some sort of mechanism specifically provided in the bill for that purpose.

The bill will help Canadians. It will protect Canadians. It will help solve crimes. That is fairly obvious because of the all–party support the bill is receiving. Members on all sides of the House of all different political persuasions and of all types of views on justice issues recognize that witnesses and informants need to be protected if we are to help solve and fight crime.

It is refreshing to see that there is such unanimity on such an issue in the House. Canadians can feel reassured that the House of Commons cares about them, cares about their personal safety, cares about the fact that crime exists and must be controlled and eradicated, and cares about the fact that witnesses and people who come forward to help in the enforcement of the law will be protected by society in a legislated way, in an open way, not in some quiet and shadowy backroom without possibility of appeal, without possibility of redress in the event that there is some misunderstanding.

By the way, that is another good point. There will be written reasons given by the commissioner if people are turned down so they are not left out there with their heads spinning, unable to comprehend why the system did not protect them.

I support the bill. I am very grateful the House supports the bill. I am grateful to the minister for bringing it forward. As I began, I am grateful for all the kind comments that have been made about me by members of the House.

[Translation]

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first I want to thank RCMP officers for the consistently good work they do for Canadians. I am satisfied that they will continue to have operational control over this program.

The protection of witnesses is one of the most useful and efficient tools to fight crime. In order to be effective, witness protection programs must provide the best possible protection to likely sources and witnesses. This is precisely what the Witness Protection Program Act seeks to do.

The proposed changes to the legislation will allow sources and witnesses participating in the program to fully understand the terms and conditions under which they will be protected. As well, the decisions and the measures taken by the authority responsible for the program, namely the RCMP, will be more transparent. This will result in a more transparent and efficient operation of the program, while also contributing to the government's efforts to implement the act and thus stop crime, particularly organized crime.

• (1305)

The proposed changes in the Witness Protection Program Act will provide sound statutory and regulatory authority to the RCMP program by establishing a federally legislated witness protection program.

The new legislation will provide the following: clearly defined eligibility criteria for witnesses; identical treatment all across the country; a clear statement on the responsibilities and obligations of program officials and participants; a better defined management structure within the RCMP regarding the daily operation of the programs, so as to strengthen accountability; a complaint settlement process as well as the presentation, by the RCMP commissioner, of an annual report to the solicitor general on the operation of the program.

The RCMP source witness protection program was established in 1984 to meet the specific needs of that police force regarding the protection of sources and witnesses. Other witness protection programs are run by a number of provinces and municipalities.

Police departments using these programs also rely on the RCMP source witness protection program, under a cost recovery system, and this will continue to be the case. The RCMP helps other protection programs by obtaining I.D. documents delivered by the federal government—including passports and social insurance cards—when a name change is necessary, or by facilitating the relocation of witnesses in another province.

During the 1994–95 fiscal year, the RCMP was able, through its source witness protection program, to provide protection services to 70 new clients. In 30 of these cases, the services were provided at the request of other organizations. The RCMP currently allocates $3.4 million annually to witness protection activities.

The changes made to the RCMP source witness protection program will not result in additional spending. The program will continue to be financed with current resources.

The provinces and territories were consulted and they support the proposed changes in the Witness Protection Program Act.

When a decision is made to admit an applicant to the RCMP's source witness protection program, the following factors will be taken into consideration: the potential contribution that the witness or source can make toward a particular police investigation, the nature of the offence under investigation, the nature of the risk to the individual, what alternate methods of protection are available, the danger to the community if the individual is admitted to the program, the potential effects on any family arrangements, the likelihood of the individual being able to adjust, their maturity, their ability to make judgments and other personal characteristics, the cost of maintaining the individual in the program and other factors as the commissioner of the RCMP may find to be relevant.

Under the Witness Protection Program Act, there will be a clear and defined decision making process to admit an individual into the program. In serious cases, such as those requiring a change of identity or admission of a foreign national, the decision to admit an individual will be made only by the assistant commissioner in charge of the program. A decision to terminate protection must also be made by the assistant commissioner.

In less serious cases, the decision to protect an individual may be made by someone at the chief superintendent level.

Finally, the changes introduced in the Witness Protection Program Act were drafted following consultations with the RCMP and various police forces across the country who were asked to contribute their views. These changes will help make the RCMP's source witness protection program more open.

I am very pleased that the House has agreed to support this important bill, and I hope it will be passed very shortly.

The Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question.

Some hon. members: Question.

The Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

EXPLOSIVES ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–71, an act to amend the Explosives Act, as reported (without amendment) from the committee.

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (for the Minister of Natural Resources) moved that the bill be concurred in.

(Motion agreed to.)

The Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Goodale (for the Minister of Natural Resources) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of Bill C–71, an act to amend the Explosives Act. Today I will address some of the concerns members opposite have raised during the second reading debate and I will emphasize the major points government members raised during that debate.

Let me begin by thanking members opposite for expressing support from their respective parties for Bill C–71 during the debate on second reading of the proposed legislation.

I note from Hansard that during the debate the hon. member for Matapédia—Matane asked what is the use of marking explosives if we do not monitor them. My response is that we do. Canada's explosives inspectors are doing an excellent job of monitoring legally licensed makers, distributors and users of explosives in the country.

There are concerns about how terrorists and biker gangs get their explosives. Terrorists typically purchase stolen explosives on the black market, or they make their own if they have the expertise, as was the case in the horrific bombing of the Oklahoma City federal building this summer.

Sources for stolen explosives include explosives obtained from break–ins and thefts from storage magazines on construction sites, in mines and quarries. Naturally these incidents fall within the jurisdiction of Canada's police agencies. In any case I submit to the House that it is not a common occurrence in the country. The mere fact that it can happen does not require a maze of restrictive and unnecessary regulations from any government, least of all the Government of Canada.

Furthermore, explosives that are used or intended for use in criminal activities are never purchased from legitimate vendors licensed under the terms of existing federal explosives legislation. That is because legitimate vendors must keep accurate and complete transaction records for all explosives they sell. These records, coupled with the records of police security checks that are required under the terms of the existing Explosives Act, could easily provide a clear paper trail of evidence to anyone who used legally obtained explosives to commit a crime.

Let me return to the issues that are more closely related to the proposed legislation before the House. With respect to the length of time it has taken to submit the amendment to Parliament, I want to make a few points.

Officials at Natural Resources Canada have indicated to me that shortly before the Montreal convention on the marking of plastic explosives was signed in 1991 they joined their colleagues from national defence, customs, and transport to prepare a memorandum to cabinet regarding the proposed amendments to the Explosives Act. As members of the House may recall, there were significant changes in the structure of federal government departments in mid–1993. Shortly thereafter a federal election was held, resulting in even more significant change. Since then the Government of Canada has been working hard to put Canada on a positive new course for the future, to revitalize employment opportunities for all Canadians, to attack major issues such as the deficit and debt and, in short, to get Canada moving again. The government is delivering the good government that Canadians wanted and deserved. In addition we are making excellent progress to reach a number of positive public policy objectives.

• (1315)

Hon. members will know we have faced tremendous challenges to deliver on our promises to Canadians and that the Government of Canada has worked hard to manage our priorities since 1993 in order to succeed. I hardly think this debate is the appropriate forum to trot out the list of our accomplishments but if members opposite wish me to do so I will be more than happy to.

Departmental officials had to review their work to prepare their memorandum to cabinet concerning the amendments to the Explosives Act we have before us today. Consequently the officials made the necessary revisions to meet the demands of a new government. The officials have done an excellent job.

The 1991 convention signed in Montreal represents an international agreement to combine efforts among nations to reduce the risk of any further aircraft bombings. Participation in this effort is viewed by Canada as an essential element in the continuing battle against terrorism.

Like all international agreements, the convention on marking of plastic explosives is based on trust among signatory nations. Canada respects this spirit. Canada is known around the world as a leader in encouraging progress to increase the trust among nations that leads to progressive international conventions.

We have every intention of living up to all of our international obligations in the hopes that other countries will follow our example. This is not a blind trust; this is the essence of good leadership.

At present there is no way to detect plastic explosives in airports, while conventional explosives materials can be detected by equipment at our airports. The act proposes the marking of plastic explosives by adding a chemical which would be detected by equipment in Canada's international airports and thus ward off the threat of terrorism.

The amendment would allow Canada to be among the first nations to ratify an international convention requested by the United Nations and co–ordinated by the international civil aviation organization with respect to the marking of plastic explosives.

The convention was signed in March 1991 by 40 countries, and 14 countries have already ratified the convention since April 1992. Five of these nations, Norway, Spain, Switzerland, Slovakia and the Czech Republic, are producer states where plastic explosives are manufactured.

Given that Canada is a world leader in vapour detection technology, Canadian equipment manufacturers will be able to take advantage of international market opportunities for their vapour detection technology as more and more countries ratify the convention.

Plastic explosives have emerged as a weapon of choice among terrorist groups for bombing aircraft and other targets such as public buildings because this type of explosive is small, powerful, stable, malleable and, most important, difficult to detect.

If plastic explosives are marked or tagged with a substance that can be detected by equipment at Canadian airports, it is quite likely that terrorists would be discouraged from attempting any attacks in Canada using plastic explosives.

The convention on the marking of plastic explosives requires states to ensure the marking of plastic explosives to enhance their detectability. The convention also requires controls over the import, export, possession and transfer of marked plastic explosives and the destruction of most unmarked plastic explosives.

Let me remind the House about the main features of the convention. Only plastic explosives as defined in the convention are required to be marked. Existing unmarked commercial stocks of plastic explosives are to be destroyed within three years. An international explosives technical commission will be created to assess technical developments.

The cost of Canadian participation in such a commission will be low and the convention will come in force after 35 states including the 5 producer states have ratified it. Canada is one of the world's producer states and by passing the proposed legislation before the House today Canada will be among the first countries to ratify the important convention.

Looking at other departments, the military has agreed it can except perhaps in times of emergency observe all of the terms of the convention. Priority will be given to the use of unmarked stocks of plastic explosives in the military stock of explosives materials. As always, tight security of storage facilities will be maintained. In addition, tight accounting procedures regarding the use of all stocks will also be maintained.

• (1320)

Transport Canada, responsible for the operation of detection equipment at Canadian airports, has indicated current technology can detect the marked plastic explosives.

The extra cost of producing detectable plastic explosives is expected to be negligible. This is primarily due to the relatively low volumes of plastic explosives manufactured in Canada. The industry has been working in co–operation with organizations involved in the effort to develop substances to mark plastic explosives for the purpose of detection. Therefore the industry acknowledges the impact of extra costs will not be that serious.

In addition, given the low volumes of plastic explosives compared with the volumes of conventional industrial explosives, the challenge of enforcing the provisions of this proposed amendment and by extension the international convention will not pose a significant problem or cost to the respective regulatory bodies.

Canada's position as a leader in the development of vapour detection technology will be enhanced as a result of the ratification of the international convention. Increased foreign market penetration by Canadian equipment manufacturers is virtually a certainty. Therefore the proclamation of the amendment has the potential to help stimulate job creation and contribute to Canada's future economic growth and trade.

The amendment to the Explosives Act demonstrates the Government of Canada's commitment to good government. We are determined to contribute to the health and safety of passengers on aircraft. We are committed to working with our international partners to do whatever we can to stop the threat of terrorism in our skies and around the globe.

The amendment to the Explosives Act will send a signal to terrorists everywhere that Canada will not be an easy target for their deadly campaigns of violence. In the process, Canadian manufacturers of vapour detection equipment will be able to take advantage of significant marketing opportunities. As a result, the proposed amendment to the Explosives Act will contribute to two major federal goals: job creation and Canadian economic growth. Moreover the passage of the amendment will protect the health and safety of all Canadians.

I thank members opposite for their support in passing important legislation. I urge all members of the House to give speedy passage to the amendment.

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to rise today to speak as well on Bill C-71, an act to amend the Explosives Act. There is of course already an Explosives Act, which this bill will amend, and the aim of the earlier legislation was, as a general rule, to ensure public and worker safety.

This legislation governed the composition, quality and characteristics of standard explosives as well as their manufacture, import, sale, purchase, possession and storage. It covered pyrotechnic devices, that is, the products used for fireworks.

The new legislation brought before us today will require the incorporation of a detectable additive in plastic explosives to enable the governor in council to approve regulations on the possession, transfer and destruction of unmarked plastic explosives. The aim is to thwart terrorism, as my colleague mentioned, and to enable Canada to ratify the Convention on the Marking of Plastic Explosives for the Purpose of Detection, concluded in Montreal on March 1, 1991.

The bill would also prohibit, among other things, the manufacture, stockpiling, possession, transfer, transport, import and export of unmarked plastic explosives, except in the instances provided by the convention and for military purposes of vital importance clearly specified in the legislation.

What is the Montreal Convention? I am asking the question for the benefit of Canadians watching us. The convention was signed in March 1991 at the headquarters of the International Civil Aviation Organization by the members of this organization. Its aim is to control the proliferation of plastic explosives used in terrorist attacks.

It covers unmarked plastic explosives, that is, explosives that do not contain a substance permitting easy detection and it requires signatory countries and producing countries, such as Canada, to mark plastic explosives, except those used for research purposes or by the police and the military.

• (1325)

The bill proposes marking plastic explosives through the incorporation of a chemical that could be picked up by the detection equipment installed at international airports in Canada to counteract the threat of terrorism.

Generally speaking, Bill C-71 meets the main requirements of the Convention. It appears to meet all of the obligations in it. First, the bill prohibits the production of unmarked plastic explosives, except in the instances provided. Then it announces regulations governing the transportation and possession of unmarked plastic explosives. Finally, it provides measures for unmarked plastic explosives produced or owned prior to the date the present bill comes into effect, as my colleague stated just before me.

Clearly, plastic explosives are the preferred weapon of terrorists, for the very reason that they are hard to detect. One need only think of recent terrorist incidents mentioned previously by my colleagues and remembered by many, such as the one involving Pan Am flight 103 from London, which exploded over Lockerbie, Scotland, a few years ago, or UTA flight 772, that crashed in Africa not too long ago. More than 440 people were killed in these two incidents. One might also think of the Air-India tragedy, another terrorist attack where a 747 that had taken off in Canada blew up over the Atlantic, south of the Republic of Ireland, killing everyone on board.

We must make sure that plastic explosives can be detected in airports. That is what this bill is about. Of course, the Bloc Quebecois reaffirms its support. Especially since, based on information we received, production costs for the manufacturers, most of them private enterprises, will increase only marginally as a result of this decision.

However, we nonetheless have some concerns about this bill. First, while the convention was signed on March 1, 1991, no bill was introduced until now, nearly five years later. This obviously reflects a glaring lack of efficiency on the part of the government in an area directly related to public safety. It took less time to set up a unity Canada group. I think this is indicative of a glaring lack of efficiency that should be pointed out.

Of course, the goal in itself is commendable and we support it but how effective will the bill really be? First of all, not all countries signed the convention or belong to the International Civil Aviation Organization. This means that terrorists will still be able to obtain explosives in non member countries where plastic explosives will remain unmarked.

We put a question to our hon. colleague who said that, as far as terrorist groups were concerned, Canada could not say who did or did not sell explosives to them. We stress the fact that the federal government is not clear, as our colleague just indicated, that explosives are obtained in part on the black market. We did not need to be told that. We already knew that this was the case. We also knew that some of them are home made. But who on the black market supplies terrorists? Who are the people operating this black market? These questions remain unanswered.

In many regards, Canada is like a sieve for contraband goods. I am thinking about drugs in particular. It is well known that, in a way, Canada is the North American entry point for drugs and certainly for part of the weapons smuggled into the continent. It is a fact that certain groups are currently using this channel and that, in many cases, they are more heavily armed than the police and even the Canadian armed forces.

• (1330)

One wonders what specific measures will be taken in this bill to counteract such effects. Canada has problems controlling liquor and tobacco smuggling. It is therefore extremely difficult to imagine that a bill such as this one, in spite of all its positive measures, will effectively prevent the smuggling of explosives.

Explosives manufactured for military purposes are totally exempt from marking requirements, and we can understand that. Obviously, military people do not want to make their arms easy to detect; that would make no sense. Nevertheless, there is the possibility of leaks.

One can also think of the motorcycle gang war currently going in the Montreal region, another reason to be cautious in this regard. In recent months, there have been numerous victims, mostly gang members, but also innocent people.

Incidentally, I want to thank a group, the Oir Rachaim Tasher Yesheva Jewish congregation, in Boisbriand, for immediately coming to the help of injured persons during one incident. The compassion and the support shown by that community deserve to be mentioned.

As regards the gang war, I also want to stress the work of the hon. member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve who helped start a petition in his riding, asking for anti–gang legislation, and who organized, for the benefit of many Montreal area MPs meetings with police officers of the city, including Mr. Sangollo, who is the assistant to the chief of police, Mr. Duchesneau. These officers gave us an idea of who these motorcycle gangs are and what is organized crime.

We were clearly told about the need for anti–gang legislation. The House should seriously consider such legislation. I am well aware that this would not be easy, since we would have to specifically define what constitutes a criminal gang.

That is not an easy thing to do. We must, of course, take the charter of rights and freedoms into account, but I think we must eventually find or come as close as possible to finding the exact words we need to counter the real damage done by these gangs. When I talk about these gangs, I am talking not only about criminal bikers but also about the mafia, the Chinese triads, the Japanese yakuza and the Russian mafia that is now spreading to all industrialized countries and especially to Canada since the collapse of the Soviet Union.

I think that this bill as it now stands certainly deserves to be supported because it is a step in the right direction, but I think it is not nearly enough, under the circumstances, to restore the feeling of safety that Canadians may have lost or are now losing.

I would like to close by repeating a few words that my colleague from Matapédia—Matane said in his first speech on this bill, because they are words of wisdom. My colleague said this: "You can mark the explosives you make as much as you want, but unless you take real measures against violence, organized gangs and terrorism, you are simply wasting your time".

[English]

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure today to rise in the House to address third reading debate on Bill C–71, an act to amend the Explosives Act.

I am happy to inform the House that my party is supporting Bill C–71. I will not go on at great length to discuss the bill because of that support. It is good to see legislation come forward in the House which is required and which we can support because so often legislation has been flawed.

My one criticism of the business of the House has been that we have had to deal with a lot of rather inconsequential legislation. While Bill C–71 is important, all members of the House would have passed the bill rather quickly. It has not received much obstruction. It seems odd that we are spending so much time on these bills of little consequence when there are issues like the national debt and deficit to deal with. UI reform is needed. Health care reform is needed. Those areas are being ignored by the government.

• (1335)

I notice the minister of agriculture is present in the House. Certainly there are agriculture issues which need to be brought to the front burner. We encourage members on the opposite side of the House to bring forward those very pressing issues.

Yes, we will give support to the common sense bills brought before the House like Bill C–71, but let us see a little more substance. Let us see a little more meat to deal with.

The bill to amend the Explosives Act will allow Canada to formally participate in an international convention on the marking of plastic explosives for the purpose of detection, a very worthwhile cause. The purpose of the convention is to make sure that as many plastic explosives in the world as possible are able to be detected by legal authorities mostly in airports to stop terrorism.

We all use airports, except perhaps the members from Ottawa who I am sure stay home all the time. We recognize the importance of safety and the importance of being able to detect explosives so that our air traffic continues to be safe. It is an anti–terrorism bill. Therefore I can give my hearty endorsement to the piece of legislation.

After the Air India tragedy and the PanAm bombing over Lockerbie, Scotland in the late 1980s, the United Nations passed two separate resolutions both in 1989. One was passed by the security council and the other by the general assembly. These resolutions urged the International Civil Aviation Organization, another U, body to intensify its work on an international regime for the marking of plastic explosives for the purpose of detection.

Out of those resolutions was born the convention I have already mentioned. It was put forward in Montreal in 1991 and was signed by 100 nations. Although Canada signed as well it did not have the legal authority to ratify it. The bill will grant Canada the ability to formally ratify the convention, another reason to endorse the legislation.

For the last four years research has been ongoing to consult with the industry and develop an appropriate chemical marker. It has been developed in labs in New Jersey. Now is the time to move forward.

Unfortunately the convention will not take effect until 35 nations become signatories, 5 of them producer nations. Five nations which produce plastic explosives need to sign this agreement. I understand that five producer countries have signed, among them Slovakia, Switzerland, Norway, the Czech Republic and Spain. Canada will be the sixth producer country to sign. This still means that only 13 countries including Canada will have legally ratified the convention. That is a long way from the 35 that are needed to actually put the wishes of the convention into reality.

I agree that the ordinary terrorist without international connections will be harder pressed to obtain material that will escape detection devices. Therefore the convention is a positive thing.

Interestingly the United States has signed the convention but as yet has not introduced legislation to ratify it. We talked with the explosives industry organization in Washington, the Institute of the Makers of Explosives. It endorses the convention and said that the Federal Aviation Administration, the lead agency in America dealing with the issue, may introduce legislation soon to ratify it but nothing has been done to date.

We have not had an incident for a long time like the Lockerbie incident or the Air India disaster. The urgency unfortunately has died down somewhat and the issue has probably taken a lower priority. I hope it will not take another tragedy to bring the issue to the world stage once more.

For whatever reasons the convention is not in force right now and therefore it really is not relevant right now. Probably until the United States recognizes it, no significant countries will join in ratifying the law.

The amendment to our own act will continue to be irrelevant until we do something on a political level to bring the United States into the game. Until that happens nothing will ever get done and airline passengers all over the world will be at greater risk from the plastic explosives going undetected in aeroplanes.

A couple of weeks ago the member for Fraser Valley East called on the Minister of Natural Resources to urge her American counterparts to do something about it, to urge them to go ahead and ratify the convention so that other nations would come on board. My colleague has since received a letter from the minister saying that the Americans are already working on legislation implying that there is no need to address the problem.

We would reply that the Americans have been working on it for years with no action. The minister needs to express her concerns directly on a political level to her American counterpart and we are calling on her again today to do that. We want the minister to call her American counterpart and bring him up to speed on the issue. We urge the United States to move on the issue and formally approve the convention so that we can keep terrorism where it belongs. Of course it does not belong at all.

The minister also promised in her letter to participate in an American study that will examine the cost and benefits of marking conventional explosives that are being used in the biker bombings in Montreal to see whether it would be cost effective to identify all explosives and not just plastic explosives. We are pleased to hear that Canada will take part in this study and we look forward to the results.

I support Bill C–71. My colleagues support Bill C–71. It will not set the world on its head but it is a step in the right direction and is worthy of our support. It is certainly a shame that the government is not moving ahead with a Canadian agenda but instead is keeping to housekeeping legislation like this which we could have moved through even more rapidly than it is going through the House.

I appreciate the opportunity to speak to the legislation and look forward to its speedy passage.

Ms. Roseanne Skoke (Central Nova, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Explosives Act is an act of public and worker safety which regulates the composition, quality and character of explosives in addition to their manufacture, importation, sale, purchase, possession and storage. It also controls the use of fireworks.

The amendment is necessary to require the incorporation of a detectable additive in plastic explosives coupled with a provision to enable the governor in council to make regulations to control unmarked plastic explosives. This will hinder terrorism and will enable Canada to ratify the ICAO convention on the marking of plastic explosives for the purpose of detection.

The principal provisions of the bill are worth noting: to require the marking of most plastic explosives for the purpose of detection; to prohibit the manufacture, storage, possession, transfer of possession, transportation, import and export of unmarked plastic explosives, except as may be permitted by the terms of the convention or required by overriding military necessity; and to empower the governor in council to make regulations governing the possession, transfer and disposal of any unmarked plastic explosives.

The passage of the legislation will vault Canada ahead of the U.S. as the only producer state in the Americas to have ratified the convention.

Many questions have been asked with respect to the Explosives Act. Some of those questions are technical; others relate to policy and still others are legal questions. I intend to address those questions today.

One technical question asked is will the addition of a detection agent be effective in combating terrorism in disguise? The answer is yes. The proposed detection agents are of such character they can be detected by bomb detection equipment of current technology and use in Canada. This would render marked plastic explosives an undesirable choice for assembling bombs. A second benefit from tagging plastic explosives is that detection of illegal stockpiles will be simplified.

Another technical question often asked is will the presence of the detection agent compromise the performance or safety of plastic explosives? The answer is no. Only one type of plastic explosive, a military version known as C–4, is manufactured in small quantities in Canada. The safety and performance characteristics of the marked version have been verified by the manufacturer, the military and the Canadian Explosives Research Laboratory.

Another technical question asked is will there be a problem in using the existing stocks of unmarked plastic explosives? The answer is no. Small existing stocks of unmarked plastic explosives in Canada coupled with ample grace periods of three years for the public and fifteen years for the military police to use up or destroy these stocks were judged to be satisfactory during consultations with all concerned parties.

• (1345)

Another technical question often asked is whether explosives technology is advancing so rapidly that this initiative will soon be rendered obsolete. The answer is no. Explosives technology is stable at this time. In North America, plastic explosives are implicated in very few bombs targeted at aircraft. Prohibitions against the import, export and transfer of unmarked plastic explosives will discourage terrorists from using Canada as a location to plant bombs on aircraft.

Many policy questions have been raised as well. One question often asked is who may manufacture, possess and use plastic explosives in Canada and how will the legislation affect their activities. Plastic explosives in the form of military demolition charges are manufactured in small quantities on an as required basis by Les produits chimiques Expro in Valleyfield, Quebec. This manufacturer is authorized by its factory licence, which is issued pursuant to the Explosives Act and regulations. Sale and distribution of this product is limited to the military, as well as police explosives disposal units.

Commercial plastic explosives in sheet form are legally imported from the U.S. by companies engaged in hardening metal surfaces and explosives welding. The sole Canadian manufacturer does not expect any problems. Importers of commercial plastic explosives in sheet form, however, may experience difficulties in locating suppliers of marked product.

Another policy question often asked is whether these new restrictions will affect competitiveness. The answer is no. It is estimated that the cost associated with incorporating the additive will increase selling prices by no more than 1.25 per cent. It is quite possible that the Canadian manufacturer could realize a competitive advantage in international markets by being fast off the mark in offering marked products.

Another policy question often asked is if this initiative is connected in any way to the new proposed gun control legislation. The answer is no. This initiative is the result of an agreement signed in March 1991 and has no connection whatsoever to the gun control legislation recently tabled.

Often legal questions are asked with respect to the act. One question often asked is why the act is to come into force by order in council. It is specifically provided that the act will come into force on a day to be set by the order of the governor in council to ensure that the grace periods provided for in the convention will be respected. This will enable us to make the date of coming into force of the act coincide with that of the coming into force of the convention.

Another legal question often asked is when the convention will come into force. It is impossible to predict when the convention will come into force. Section 3 of article 13 of the convention provides that the convention will come into force on the 60th day following the date of deposit of the 35th instrument of ratification by a state, provided that at least five states have declared they are producer states. Should 35 instruments of ratification be deposited before the deposit of their instruments by five producer states, the convention will come into force on the 60th day following the date of deposit of the instrument of ratification of the fifth producer state.

Another legal question often asked is what happens to the definition of detection agent if the technical annex is amended. This is not a problem. The word convention is defined to refer to the convention as amended from time to time. This means that the definition of detection agent is ambulatory. It will follow any amendment in the technical annex to the convention.

A further legal question often asked is what happens to the definition of plastic explosives if the convention is amended. Amendments to the definition of plastic explosives in the convention would not be automatically reflected in the Explosives Act because we repeated the definition instead of referring to it. We would have to amend the definition in the Explosives Act in order to have it follow an amendment to that found in the convention. However, from a practical point of view this should not be a problem. The definition of plastic explosives is standard. Furthermore it is unlikely that the convention itself will be amended. The only amendments contemplated are to the technical annex.

• (1350)

In addition to the technical questions, the policy questions, and the legal questions, we have what we refer to as miscellaneous questions. It is often asked why it took nearly five years from the March 1991 signing of the convention to table the bill. Initial MOU development, which began shortly after the signing of the convention, involved considerable consultation with DND, Canada Customs, and Transport Canada. Additional time was lost in 1993 when there was a change in government prior to the tabling and approval of the memorandum to cabinet. It required a second consultation and resubmission of the MC.

I support the Explosives Act. As a member of the natural resources committee I recommend Bill C–71, the Explosives Act, at report stage to this honourable House.

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to enter the debate on Bill C–71, an act to amend the Explosives Act.

When I read over the act I notice some very specific benefits for Canada, specifically in the area of vapour detection. Our government is very interested in promoting scientific and technological devices to expand our knowledge base and to increase employment. It is very interesting that Canada is a world leader in this type of technology.

I am very pleased to speak in favour of the bill. I note this is a UN convention. It basically restores our commitment to the United Nations and to other countries to detect plastic explosives and prevent their exportation throughout the world.

There have been a few classic examples of plastic explosives being used by terrorists both in and out of Canada. Many of us can remember the Air India disaster and numerous other cases where terrorists have used plastic explosives and the death and dismemberment of many innocent people has resulted. The bill basically addresses that issue with the objective of detecting and stamping out the use of plastic explosives for that very purpose.

It is necessary that the bill be brought into place to recognize our commitment to the United Nations and to recognize the need to deal with terrorist activities. I note that Canada is also a producer of plastic explosives, but the main consumer of them in Canada is our own military. I understand the Canadian military has approximately a 10–year supply of plastic explosives. I am very happy to see that we have made a provision in the act for a 15–year moratorium to allow the inventory of unmarked plastic explosives to be brought down while the new replacements have this detection device included.

Heathrow International Airport uses canines and detection devices to control the exportation of firearms and dangerous substances. We have developed a whole technology to do that. The world does that very well. However we must always be on guard for the development of new types technology. Plastic explosives and small component devices can be exported very easily.

I support Bill C–71 and the effect it will have in the industrial sector in creating jobs for Canadians.

NATIONAL FAMILY WEEK

Ms. Roseanne Skoke (Central Nova, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are celebrating national family week in Canada. The family is the basic institution of life and the solid foundation upon which our forefathers built this great nation.

The protection of families, family life and family values must be a priority with the government. The conventional terms of debate in matters of political, economic and legal issues tend to focus on individual rights and the rights of the state, not the rights of the family. This is unfortunate and must change, for the family is the most important reality in our lives.

This weekend families celebrate Thanksgiving in Canada and give thanks to God for our great country, for our families and friends. Happy Thanksgiving to my constituents of Central Nova.

CANADA–QUEBEC ECONOMIC UNION

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, if we choose sovereignty, we shall be able to make choices in keeping with our own values and priorities. By offering to associate ourselves with the rest of Canada in a partnership, we shall be able also to make shared decisions with our neighbours. The proposed partnership agreement with the rest of Canada is a winning combination.

It is a good combination of autonomy and co–operation. It enables us to take advantage of the elements we have built together—the Canadian currency, the Canadian economic space—and to finally give up squabbling over areas in which our interests are divergent. A vote for change means a vote for ourselves, for the people of Quebec, above and beyond party lines. A Yes vote means finally standing up for our convictions, voting for what we are and what we want to be.

AIR DISASTERS

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to voice my deep concern for the nine Canadians whose helicopter crashed yesterday heading home from Kumtor gold mine in Russia, where they were struggling to bring a new mine into production.

Throughout history the lure of gold has prompted prospectors to face incredible hardships, often only with a packhorse, a pick, a shovel, or a gold pan. The helicopter serves as the modern prospector's packhorse, so all of us in the mining industry can readily sympathize when an accident involves these vehicles.

Gold has its own way of calling us, so precious and fundamental in value. Despite the very real hardships involved, the search for gold will continue to beckon Canadian prospectors and mine developers to snowy mountain tops around the world. Meanwhile, our prayers and good wishes go out to all 15 people on board, as well as to their families.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, today's Auditor General of Canada report reaffirms what New Democrats have been telling Canadians for years, that the high real interest rate policy is the major reason for our massive debt, not social program spending.

High real interest rates hurt the economy, drive up debt and kill jobs. If the federal debt of $546 billion is a mortgage, Canadians are becoming tenants in their own homes, because 46 per cent of the debt is held by foreigners.

Canada's net foreign indebtedness is by far the highest among major industrialized countries. Even Italy has a foreign debt of less than 12 per cent.

New Democrats have called the Liberal government's high interest rate policy a disaster and the auditor general agrees. High interest rates have created nearly one–third of our debt. More debt should be held by the Bank of Canada. Social program spending has not contributed significantly to Canada's debt.

In view of this evidence, will the Liberals now create a fair economic policy for Canadians, rather than one for foreign investors?

NATIONAL PARKS AND HISTORICAL SITES

Mr. Andy Mitchell (Parry Sound—Muskoka, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to acknowledge and thank the hard working men and women who staff our national parks and historical sites.

As Canadians we can be very proud of the quality of our Parks Canada facilities and the quality of service that is provided by a dedicated staff of professionals, men and women who are committed to what are undoubtedly some of Canada's greatest natural resources, our parks and historical sites. These represent an important part of Canadian identity from coast to coast to coast.

In Parry Sound—Muskoka, Parks Canada has responsibility for Georgian Bay Island National Park in the west of my riding and Bethune Memorial House in Gravenhurst. Both facilities have fine reputations and attract visitors from around the world, adding significantly to our local tourist economy.

I congratulate the Parks Canada staff for its fine work on our behalf and for maintaining our resources to the highest standard. Specifically I acknowledge the dedication of Mike Walton, Mary Ellen Corcelli and her staff who are responsible for Bethune House and Georgian Bay National Park.

WORLD TEACHERS DAY

Mr. Mauril Bélanger (Ottawa—Vanier, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on October 4, 1966, a special intergovernmental conference adopted the UNESCO recommendation on the status of teachers. Thirty years have passed since the adoption of that historical document, and today we mark the anniversary by inaugurating World Teachers Day.

Just by pure happenstance, on the very day we are marking the vital contribution of our teachers, the permanent campus of la Cité collégiale will be holding its official opening ceremonies in Ottawa. Its teachers and students can be proud of the fact that theirs is the first French–language college of applied arts and technology in Ontario.

I would like to take this opportunity, therefore, to offer my thanks and congratulations to all of the men and women in the educational field for their ongoing efforts to provide Canadian youth with the opportunity to realize their full potential.

My best wishes to all teachers for a happy international day, and to la Cité collégiale for a long life.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, earlier this year I toured the head offices of Canada Post Corporation here in Ottawa.

I found Canada Post to be a thoroughly modern distribution organization, the equal of any in the world. Its track and trace system for managing mail flow is said to be state of the art and Canada Post is selling the technology worldwide.

Ensuring timely and cost effective mail delivery to all Canadians is no small challenge. Doing so in the midst of a revolution in communications and at a profit is the challenge that Canada Post faces.

For a time, closing rural post offices was seen as a way for Canada Post to meet this challenge, but this avenue was closed with the decision by the Minister of Public Works and Government Services to impose a moratorium on the closure of small rural post offices. That decision has proven to be enlightened. It has refocused the energies of Canada Post and allowed the corporation to discover that its more than 19,000 outlets are not liabilities but important assets. Now it is time to broaden the range of services which Canada Post provides, especially to rural Canadians.

As other countries have discovered, the possibilities are endless and endlessly exciting.

THE NATIONAL DEBT

Mr. Maurice Godin (Châteauguay, BQ): Mr. Speaker, every day, owing to Canada's enormous debt, a federalist legacy, we see the extent to which interest rates and monetary policy are determined by our southern neighbour's central bank and by international financial markets.

On May 16, 1994, even Canada's finance minister acknowledged this dependence on financial markets, and I quote: "Canada's debt, especially its foreign debt, undermines the sovereignty of this country. Our sovereignty suffers when we have to keep our interest rates high—even if our rate of inflation is among the lowest in the world—in order to attract foreign investment".

Due to Canada's dependence on foreign investment, it is clear that if the finance minister ignores his obligations as the manager of this debt by refusing to negotiate a new economic partnership with Quebec, national and foreign markets will call him in to order.

HEALTH CARE

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the politically artificial October 15 deadline imposed by the health minister on the provinces is rapidly approaching.

Why was it imposed? Some provinces have dared to reform their health care system in the best interests of their residents by offering them choice. Alberta, for example, by addressing the chronic problems in its health care system, may be penalized $7 million annually.

Now there are indications that the minister may be backtracking on her original edict. Officials in her department have stated that October 15 is only the date when they will determine whether some provinces are violating provisions of the Canada Health Act. Financial penalties may be some months down the road.

It is clear the minister's line in the sand is being blown away; blown away by the wind of reform and innovation; blown away by the need for a new Canadian federalism.

WATERLOO

Mr. Andrew Telegdi (Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to inform the House that Ville de Waterloo, Quebec and the city of Waterloo, Ontario have agreed to formally twin their respective communities.

The aim of the twinning is to promote social, cultural, economic, historic and sports exchanges in order to strengthen existing ties of friendship and provide a framework for mutually beneficial exchanges of information and experiences.

Representatives of the two Waterloos first met in Ottawa during the Spicer commission hearings. I had the honour to be a participant as a municipal councillor.

Ville de Waterloo will be hosted by my community this weekend during Oktoberfest, the largest Bavarian festival outside of Munich. On Monday, Thanksgiving weekend, the mayors of the two Waterloos will be part of the Oktoberfest parade that will be televised nationally.

To mayors Bernard Provencher and Brian Turnbull, along with their respective councils and communities, we offer our congratulations for their initiatives in promoting goodwill and understanding among Canadians.

My colleague from Kitchener and I invite all members of the House and Canadians to come to Kitchener–Waterloo for Oktoberfest.

LEADER OF THE ACTION DÉMOCRATIQUE DU QUÉBEC

Mr. Bernard Patry (Pierrefonds—Dollard, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the separatist leader of the Action démocratique du Québec asked Quebecers to support his plan for Quebec's separation because it was based on the same approach as the common sense revolution of Mike Harris.

This statement by the leader of the ADQ openly contradicted what was said recently by the leader of the PQ about the new government in Ontario. I may recall that recently, the Péquiste leader said in an interview with Le Soleil, and I quote: "Ralph Klein and Mike Harris did not take the bull by the horns. They took the public by the horns".

The Yes side should stop adding to the confusion and contradictory statements around the referendum and the future of Quebec. They can make as many clever moves as they want, but the public knows perfectly well that the real issue is separation, and on October 30, the answer will be no.

LEADER OF THE ACTION DÉMOCRATIQUE DU QUÉBEC

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the statement by the separatist leader of the Action démocratique du Québec, which referred to an independent Quebec on the Ontario model proposed by Mike Harris, was not only a contradiction of what was said by his boss, the leader of the Parti Quebecois, it was also a denial of the position taken by the Leader of the Bloc Quebecois.

The Leader of the Official Opposition has already said that the approach and policies of the Conservative Government in Ontario would not be applied to Quebec, and I quote: "I find it disturbing, and many people in Quebec are afraid of this model of society".

It has become increasingly clear that the three leaders on the Yes side cannot agree on the kind of society they want to offer to Quebecers. The people of Quebec are very wary of these contradictions, and that is why they will elect to stay in Canada by voting no on October 30.

CANADIAN DOLLAR

Mr. Réjean Lefebvre (Champlain, BQ): Mr. Speaker, strangely enough, some supporters of the No side are still questioning the right of a sovereign Quebec to use the Canadian dollar. The decision as to which currency can be used as legal tender on a sovereign country's territory can only be made by that country. Even the United States has no control over transactions made in U.S. dollars outside its borders. It must also be understood that if Quebecers stop using the Canadian dollar, this will have a very negative effect on its value.

As for the monetary policy, Mr. Johnson must be the only one who thinks that it is controlled by Parliament, as he stated yesterday. In Canada as in most industrialized countries, the central bank must be independent from the political powers in order to ensure its immunity from political influence and vagaries.

JUSTICE

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, here we go again. The Liberal government's failure to deal effectively with terrorism by a few aboriginal thugs in the past is continuing to cause a breakdown in law and order.

• (1410)

These terrorists know that the justice minister and the solicitor general follow the politically correct agenda that will not bring the full force of the law to bear for legal action.

Canadians, including law-abiding aboriginal people, are disgusted that the government has two legal systems in place. Word has been received that other terrorist actions will take place, that a few more hotheads are planning to take over land they do not own and have no claim to, land to which they have no history.

Let the government know that the law-abiding people of Canada are watching, that they want to see all laws enforced. Canadians are watching for the government to quit the politically correct attitude and bring the full force of the law down on all those who threaten Canadians.

LEADER OF ACTION DÉMOCRATIQUE DU QUÉBEC

Mr. Robert Bertrand (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the separatist leader of the ADQ has added to the rumours about the PQ Premier's leadership that have been circulating for several days among Quebec separatists.

In his conversation with reporters yesterday, the leader of the ADQ warned that, should the No side win the October 30 referendum, we must expect "a redeployment of Quebec's nationalist forces".

Although tour organizers tried to minimize the importance of that statement and urged reporters not to publish it, the leader of the ADQ nonetheless allowed himself to speculate publicly on the political future of the PQ Premier.

The political ambitions of some separatist leaders must not derail the debate in which Quebecers have been invited to participate.

The only true question is Quebec's separation, to which our answer is No.

FRANCOPHONES OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette-Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on September 14, the Bloc Quebecois critic on Canadian heritage issued a press release in which she stated that the federal government had failed in its effort to protect and promote French language in Canada.

In making such a statement, the separatist opposition is looking for a way to make people forget that its separation project means that French speaking people outside Quebec will be left to fend for themselves.

We, the Canadian government, really care about that community. Thanks to the concerted efforts of our government and the Ontario government, the 200,000 French speaking residents of eastern Ontario now have the largest French speaking technical college outside Quebec.

This afternoon, the Prime Minister will personally attend the official opening ceremony of the Cité collégiale. This is yet another example of the efforts made by the Canadian government to promote the use of French from coast to coast.

IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEE BOARD

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the bleeding heart mentality of the Liberal government has penetrated the Immigration and Refugee Board, appeal division. Its decision to allow Satpal Singh Jhatoo, a convicted murderer, to stay in Canada is reprehensible. The board says the killer is remorseful. It says the killer is unlikely to reoffend, so it let him stay.

It does not matter that he beat a mother of six to death with a baseball bat, doused her body in gasoline and set it on fire. It does not matter that before being sentenced to life for this horrible crime he was convicted of aggravated assault when he stabbed a man in the neck.

It does not matter that he violated parole. It does not matter that he was caught smoking pot while on parole. It does not matter that he received day parole after only seven years in prison.

It does not matter that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has the means and the power to declare this criminal a danger to the public and have him deported. It does not matter to the bleeding heart Liberals, but it does matter to Canadians.

ROYAL BANK

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Royal Bank is our largest financial institution. It is part of the general banking industry that has been requesting increased access to other financial service sectors within our country so that, as it says, it can more effectively compete in a new globalized trading system.

Canadians have paid the price of reduced competition in the securities business and now there is the possibility of encroachment into the area of insurance.

This bank now chooses to display the flag of the United States in some of its branches.

• (1415)

While I understand this is a promotional campaign, Canadians are nevertheless insulted by this intrusion of foreign symbolism into what has been until now a historically Canadian institution. This is especially true since it has been Canadians who have paid the price in many countless ways of supporting it.

MANPOWER TRAINING

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in a unanimous decision, the Société québécoise de développement de la main-d'oeuvre, which brings together business and employee representatives, yesterday denounced federal encroachment, in the form of Bill C-96, in the area of manpower training. This public organization is asking the government to stop setting up new parallel structures and to refrain from further intrusion into Quebec jurisdiction.

I ask the Prime Minister if he acknowledges that, with Bill C-96, Ottawa is acquiring the means to meddle further in manpower training and will therefore increase overlap and waste to the detriment of the unemployed and Quebec's jurisdiction?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, obviously the Leader of the Opposition has not taken the time to read the bill. There are no new powers given to the human resources department, as he may well recall.

The human resources department is an amalgamation of four other departments to provide a more effective delivery of services across Canada. The powers under article 6 were also contained within the existing departments. Over the past year they have allowed us to have almost 50,000 different contracts and agreements with a wide variety of groups, including the province of Quebec and the Government of Quebec in order to better assist Quebec workers to get back to work and to help with training. We have done that in a very co-operative way.

I hope the hon. Leader of the Opposition will not go off on another wild goose chase but will look at the legislation and see there are no new powers. We are simply trying to make a more efficient delivery of what the government wants to do which is help people get back to work.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the Prime Minister and his minister that the Société québécoise de développement de la main-d'oeuvre is a non partisan organization, which brings together all stakeholders in Quebec, which knows how to read bills, and which saw in this one a dangerous encroachment upon Quebec's jurisdiction.

I would ask the Prime Minister whether he acknowledges that, with this bill, his government is going against the very broad consensus in Quebec in favour of repatriating financial responsibility for manpower training?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Human Resources Development said it clearly a few seconds ago. He said that the bill before Parliament at this moment is aimed at amalgamating government agencies that were under different departments, and the powers delegated to the minister at this moment are exactly the same as those in previous legislation.

At this point, with all the provinces, including Quebec, we are trying to make administrative arrangements to reduce duplication. The minister, in fact, signed a number of agreements with the Government of Quebec over this past summer.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the government cannot minimize what is going on. It is an unprecedented assault on all legislative fronts, which is aimed specifically at giving the federal government the means to meddle once and for all throughout an area of Quebec jurisdiction, messing things up further than they already are at the moment.

I would remind the Prime Minister that the Société québécoise de développement de la main-d'oeuvre's denunciation of the federal bill was unanimous and had the support of Ghislain Dufour, president of the Conseil du patronat and a member of the no camp.

Does the Prime Minister consider the position taken by his federalist ally a mere caprice as well and will he also sweep him away with a wave of his hand?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is quite a pleasant about face. Yesterday, I was being criticized for forcing all businessmen to be on my side. There are some who do not agree with us. That is what democracy is all about.

• (1420)

I am not asking everyone to be on our side. At the moment, we are trying to give the Minister of Human Resources Development the legislative means to ensure programs are better co–ordinated. At present, we are trying with the provinces, including Quebec, to find ways to decentralize and administer them so that Canadians may benefit directly from them.

I do not think our plan is to build a bigger public service in Ottawa. We proved that recently by cutting 45,000 public service positions in the federal government. If we were here to build empires, we would not be laying off 15 per cent of the workforce.

If we can deliver services to people better than we do at the moment, we are always ready to look at the options, but our objective is to ensure that regions in Canada with more unemployed receive essentially the same benefits as regions that are well off.

Our job, as the Government of Canada, is to ensure that well off regions and prosperous citizens are able to help those, across Canada, in the Maritimes as in Quebec, who are, unfortunately, in the difficult situation of being out of work at the moment.

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

Yesterday, the Société québécoise de developpement de la main–d'oeuvre strongly denounced Bill C–96, saying: Quebec alone will hold the responsibility for manpower adjustment and trade training policies on its territory and will therefore repatriate the budgets allocated by the federal government for these programs in Quebec.

Will the minister agree that the federal government's plans confer upon it the possibility of entering directly into an agreement with any individual or organization of its choice, thereby turning its back on the consensus of the partners making up the SQDM and their priorities and on the unemployed of Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Mercier knows better than that because she has been carefully following many of the developments and initiatives we have taken.

Under the existing legislative authority which would simply be ratified in the new bill we have an agreement with the Government of Quebec to provide assistance to older workers who have been displaced from their jobs.

We buy annuities. Last year we helped close to 2,000 workers in Quebec. It simply gives us the authority to purchase those annuities to help those older workers retain some income when they cannot get a job.

It seems the hon. member for Mercier is telling the federal government that we cannot work with the Government of Quebec, we cannot help older workers, we cannot buy annuities and we cannot help people who are displaced from their jobs. It is an advocacy of a do nothing approach to helping people who do not have jobs.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, after a careful and most thorough examination, we find no previous legislation which gave legal and constitutional power to the government to sign agreements directly with individuals and organizations. This is what we are denouncing.

Does the minister acknowledge that all he has to offer Quebecers is an agreement which Daniel Johnson himself labelled, as did the present Minister of Labour, a bargain basement agreement and refused to sign because it did not correspond in the least to the consensus in Quebec.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has made a very gross error in factual information. She said that somehow we are acquiring new powers. The legislation simply confirms existing mandates under the jurisdiction of Parliament on things like the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Department of Labour Act.

As a result, last year under existing authorities which will simply be confirmed by the new act, we signed close to 10,000 contracts with not for profit organizations. We signed 9,300 contracts with private firms. We had 2,800 contracts with public sector organizations and municipalities. We even have a number of contracts with the Government of Quebec which we have signed. For example, when the Hyundai plant in Bromont was going down we worked closely with the Government of Quebec to collaborate and help displaced workers.

• (1425)

We are already doing those things under existing authority. We are simply trying to have administrative simplification and cohesion so we can provide better service to the people of Quebec.

PEACEKEEPING

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, after years of peacekeeping under very difficult circumstances our ground troops are finally coming home from Bosnia. Our troops have done the very best job possible and all Canadians are extremely proud of them.

While the government blasted the Reform Party for suggesting a withdrawal, when the UN told it the same thing last night it immediately fell into line. Now that our troops are coming home will the Prime Minister guarantee that before Canada commits to any future missions Parliament will be allowed to establish a clear set of criteria for all future military commitments?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Canadian soldiers in the former Yugoslavia for the last three years have performed an excellent duty. That is recognized by everybody.

The United Nations decided the battalion in Visoko is not needed any more because it is within an area completely controlled by the Bosnian government. We will repatriate its members with pleasure and thank them for a job extremely well done.

We were there because the UN asked us to be there. Now the UN says they do not need to be there any more, and so we will bring the troops back to Canada.

For the first time ever we have had debate on this in the House of Commons. I have seen the Reform Party change its position two or three times since the beginning. For our part we have always been behind the UN and behind the Canadian soldiers who are considered the best there.

Now the mission is over. We are happy. The troops will be back in Canada with the satisfaction of having accomplished an excellent job in Visoko. We are all proud of them in Canada.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the mandate in Bosnia disappeared months ago. We have been calling for the withdrawal for months now. Canadians are demanding to know before they commit to these sorts of missions what they will cost.

They want to know how long we will be there. They want to know whether we can deliver the mandate being given to us. They want to know whether we will be part of the decision making process or whether we will simply be followers.

Can the Prime Minister tell Canadians the government has learned a lesson from this mission and that it will promise to let Parliament be involved and have a free vote on developing criteria for peacekeeping?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the mandate we accepted in February after a debate in the House of Commons was until the end of this month.

We respected the mandate. The UN now says it does not need the Canadian troops because it wants to reduce the number. We are happy because if we bring them back to Canada they will be better off.

Canada is always available when people are in very difficult circumstances, when there is misery and when people have been killed to protect families, children and so on. We have always been there. We will do it again and there will be a debate in the House of Commons.

The peacekeeping mission was created by the Canadian government. The peacekeepers who are so well known in the world were created by Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson, my predecessor as leader of the Liberal Party. It was done at the time of the war of Great Britain and France against Egypt. He had the guts for the good of the peace of the world to say to the British and the French that war had to stop.

It is in the tradition of Lester B. Pearson that we are making our decision in relation to the UN.

• (1430)

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I think this is typical of how the government reacts to issues. It is in the past. It lives in the past. It gives us a history lesson. What we really need to do is look to the future. The 21st century is coming. It is going to be different. The old line politics will not work any more.

The government is trying to claim victory on the backs of a decision made by the UN. It is about time that it admitted that we need these criteria, that people are demanding these criteria, and that people are really interested in this.

I wonder if the Prime Minister will be just like the last government and do things in secret and then try to somehow rubberstamp them by bringing them here after the decision is made.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can see how desperate they are.

The member talks about the past. Yes, the past was last week when the Minister of Foreign Affairs made a very important speech at the United Nations recommending the modernization of the United Nations. What the hon. member should do to complete his education is read the speech of the minister.

MANPOWER TRAINING

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Human Resources Development.

Clearly the minister is about to make the same mistake with Bill C-96 as the Minister of Industry in the case of Bill C-88 on interprovincial trade, by unilaterally assuming powers that negate the responsibilities of the provinces. I may recall that after scoffing at the objections of the official opposition, the Minister of Industry had to acknowledge his mistake and back down.

If the minister does not intend to go over the heads of the provinces, why does he use clause 6 and clause 20 of the bill to acquire the means to do so? It is there in black and white.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have done quite the opposite.

As I have said in the House before, when the minister of employment was given her new task I immediately wrote and suggested that we negotiate the whole question of the labour market issues in Quebec with a view to taking a look at 75 per cent of the programming we do in that province and developing a different set of authorities, joint planning, and transferring certain responsibilities. The answer from the minister of employment was no, she did not even want to talk about it.

I tried again. I wrote back to her and said let us do a joint study between the SQDM, the Government of Quebec and my government on duplication and overlap. I made the offer, saying that we would jointly pay for it. Again the minister of employment refused to answer.

My point is I cannot force the minister of employment in Quebec to co-operate with me. I would like to have that co-operation. I want to work out how we can get a better delineation of responsibilities. I urge the hon. member to go back and talk to the minister of employment in Quebec and ask her when she is ready to co-operate. As soon as she says yes, I will be there.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, apparently the minister would like to be Canada's minister of education. Would the minister agree he is taking the means to circumvent the provincial governments because he wants to establish a national strategy for intervening in manpower issues, which may be acceptable to other provinces but flagrantly contradicts the general consensus expressed many times on this matter in Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is quite the contrary again. The member should know, because he has been in the House now for two years, that what we have arranged is a very good, co-operative arrangement in the area of student assistance. We have the Canada student loans program. Quebec has its own program.

When we reformed our program this summer and brought in programs to provide specific grants for disabled students and students with high income needs that would enable them to go school earlier, we transferred that money directly to the province of Quebec so it could offer the same programs to its own students. Now that is the notion of flexible federalism: not a takeover, but a way of working in co-operation.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question speaks to the mismanagement at the highest level at the Department of National Defence and is directed to the Prime Minister.

• (1435)

Every day we have seen another leadership crisis in the Department of National Defence. The minister and the CDS are publicly at war. These are Liberal problems, and the government uses the inquiry to justify inaction. The Canadian Armed Forces are demoralized, dispirited, and cannot wait until June 1996 for the government to act.

Why is the government failing to deal with these daily scandals at the Department of National Defence?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if there is any demoralization of the Canadian forces I can assure you it is aided and abetted by the irrelevant questions that are put forward by the members of the third party.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Defence has mishandled de Chastelain, Kenward, Vernon, Labbé, and it goes on and on and on every single day.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister. The Liberal government has done nothing to correct the leadership problems at DND. The Prime Minister's confidence in his Minister of National Defence and the Chief of Defence Staff is misplaced. Will the Prime Minister solve the leadership problem and demand the resignation of the Chief of Defence Staff and his Minister of National Defence?

[Translation]

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have confidence in the Minister of National Defence and the Chief of Defence Staff. We are now discussing a problem that arose in Somalia before we formed the government. We will try to get to the bottom of this. We took the initiative to have an inquiry on the subject, and I think that so far, the minister, the Chief of Defence Staff and particularly the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Defence are all doing an excellent job.

MANPOWER TRAINING

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely incredible to see the Minister of Human Resources Development talk about the Quebec government's refusal to co–operate on manpower issues when at this very moment, he has a bill in which he assumes powers he never had before, which constitute an incredible and unprecedented invasion of the jurisdiction of the Government of Quebec over manpower. So much so that it was even criticized by hard core federalists in Quebec. You can only go so far.

Would the Minister of Human Resources Development agree that this bill marks the first time the federal government acquires the legal authority to go directly over the head of the Government of Quebec? Will he admit it?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is being a little silly, frankly.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: I would ask all hon. members to please choose their words carefully.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will rephrase it to say the hon. member has strayed substantially from the line of logic and reason.

I simply quote to him clause 6 of the bill. It is in black and white: "The powers, duties and functions of the minister extend and include matters over which Parliament has jurisdiction". That is the existing act. There is no difference. Nothing has changed. Nothing is altered. Nothing is amended. Everything is the same. We simply are able to work out the kinds of agreements and arrangements with provinces that the department of labour, the department of employment and immigration, the department of welfare, parts of the department that used to be in citizenship have all done over the past 30, 40, 50 years. Nothing has changed. We are working on the legislative base that exists. We are simply consolidating the powers because the department has been consolidated.

• (1440)

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is really too bad that the Minister of Human Resources Development should stoop to name–calling, the logic of the weak, the logic of those who have nothing to say. He would be better off answering the question. We would rather have answers than arrogance. Quebecers would appreciate that.

I will direct my question to the Prime Minister, and maybe then I will get an answer. Would the Prime Minister agree that the bill introduced by his Minister of Human Resources Development is a perfect illustration of the federalism by administrative agreement he is proposing to Quebecers, in other words: first step, Ottawa assumes all powers over a given jurisdiction; second step, it asks the provinces to come and beg to have these powers back, and third, I am sorry to add, he calls them names when they do?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the minister just explained very clearly something that is quite straightforward. A number of departments were amalgamated to put all human resources together. The powers given to the minister are the same as they were in each department separately.

The bill clearly says that no new powers have been given to the minister. What we are trying to do is use certain decisions and administrative agreements, which will necessary vary from province to province because some are more interested than others, as a way to make adjustments appropriate to the needs and wishes of each province.

This is federalism at its most flexible, and there is no—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): Especially since they keep saying we are empire building. Again, I want to say that we have just cut 45,000 jobs within the federal government. That is not because we want more power and more bureaucrats. The minister eliminated 5,000 jobs in his own department to make his operations even more effective and less costly for the people of this country. We are accused of empire building, when we are being extremely accommodating.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the IMF said yesterday that the government should move faster to reduce the federal deficit to safeguard economic growth. The Auditor General of Canada said today that longer term targets for debt should be identified beyond the two–year rolling targets that have been put forth by the Minister of Finance.

Will the Minister of Finance commit to the House that he will introduce legislation to assure Canadians and the IMF that the debt will finally be controlled?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development— Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the IMF in its report was quite complimentary of the actions the government has taken. The report of the Auditor General of Canada was equally complimentary of the actions we have taken, both in terms of deficit reduction and in terms of the publication of information.

I have made it very clear that the process that was employed by the previous government, which was to simply set a series of long term targets, most of which occurred after an election and were never attained, was not a process we were going to follow, that in fact the series of rolling two–year targets was far more beneficial. As a result of that the government has consistently hit every single target it has set.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the IMF wants to know when the debt is going to be under control. The Auditor General of Canada wants to know when it is going to be under control. Canadians want to know when it is going to be under control.

I ask the Minister of Finance if he knows, beyond his two–year rolling targets, when the deficit will be eliminated.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development— Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, control is a condition of credibility. The government has re–established the credibility of government in terms of its projections and what it does. Control arises when a government very clearly not only hits its targets but in fact brings forth balanced legislation, a balanced program to do what it set out to do.

• (1445)

Our goal is deficit reduction but let us never forget that deficit reduction is an ingredient of this government's number one goal which is to make sure that more and more Canadians are working. That is what we are going to do instead of engaging in the slash and burn destructive policies of the Reform.

FEDERAL DEBT

Mr. Richard Bélisle (La Prairie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The auditor general just tabled his second quarterly report. With the federal debt approaching $600 billion, he feels that Parliament and the Canadian public need more information, particularly regarding the size of the debt and the choices taxpayers will have to make.

Will the Prime Minister admit that, by waiting for the referendum to be held before giving the bad news about cuts to social programs, he is unduly delaying a public debate on the choices to be made, as requested by the auditor general?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the auditor general fully agrees with us that, before this debate can take place—and we are all in favour of this debate—there should at least be statistical data and figures available. He made this quite clear. Last year's figures are not ready yet. As soon as they are and as soon as we get an invitation from the committee, we will gladly go before the committee.

Having said that, I would like to mention what the auditor general asked us to do. He asked us to produce an annual financial statement, and we did. He asked us to provide the public with more information on our tax expenditures, and we did. He asked us to produce an annual economic update; we did so for our first two budgets and will do so again this time around.

Mr. Richard Bélisle (La Prairie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

The auditor general also contends that our choices are becoming increasingly difficult.

My question is for the Minister of Finance. Will the Minister of Finance admit that this statement by the auditor general explains his government's strategy, which consists in hiding all the bad news until after the Quebec referendum?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Hide, Mr. Speaker? Tell us what a sovereign Quebec's debt level will be. Tell us how much higher interest rates will be in a sovereign Quebec. Tell us how much higher taxes will be in a sovereign Quebec? Let us lay all the cards on the table. Tell us the truth. He should tell us the truth, Mr. Speaker, about the negative impact of independence in Quebec.

CFB SHEARWATER

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

In the budget of two years ago, measures were announced regarding the downsizing of Canadian Forces Base Shearwater which resulted in the loss of about 700 jobs. Through perseverance and hard work that community has adjusted. However, new and unnamed DND sources are now being quoted in the media as saying that the Department of National Defence intends to completely close that base down this fall which would result in the loss of an additional 1,400 jobs.

I ask the minister to remove the anxiety these recent rumours have caused to that community by stating clearly that these latest rumours bear no relationship to the plans this government has for CFB Shearwater.

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Dartmouth for his question.

As announced in the 1994 budget, the operation at Canadian Forces Base Shearwater has been integrated with Canadian Forces Base Halifax across the harbour. Certain parts of the operation, strictly air, are being moved to Canadian Forces Base Greenwood.

Savings have been effected essentially by reducing the air operation at Shearwater from a full airport operation, as the hon. member knows, to a heliport operation. This is a very viable operation as it turns out and there are no plans to move it.

In summary, I am advised there are no plans to close the Shearwater site at this time.

IPPERWASH

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the solicitor general.

• (1450)

Last night the radical native squatters burned down another building at Camp Ipperwash to continue their reign of terror against the people of Bosanquet. The police and town fire department refused to attend because previous threats of violence were made against them.

For the last two years the town council of Bosanquet has been demanding that the federal government do something to restore law and order. Why is the minister not responding to the requests of the town council? Why does he continue to cater to thugs who thumb their noses at the laws of this country?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there are established procedures for the federal government to provide assistance to local law enforcement authorities.

It is very simple. If Ontario feels it cannot handle the situation and asks the federal government for assistance, it will give a prompt and effective response to the request. The road of action is very clear. We are not catering to thugs. As I said, if Ontario wants federal government assistance then the means of making that request are very much in place.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am sick to death of hearing about jurisdiction from the minister. Furthermore, I am saddened by the fact that this minister does not have the guts to protect Canadians—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: My colleagues, many times we are carried away on the spur of the moment and sometimes we use terms that could in other circumstances be judged to be unparliamentary.

I ask the hon. member to please refrain from that type of language and I ask him to please put his question.

Mr. Hanger: Will the solicitor general order the RCMP into the area to assist the OPP in putting an end to this rebellion or else will he go to Bosanquet and explain to the people why he will not act?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I said very clearly that I and the federal government are ready to act. All that is required is for the town council to go to the Ontario government and if the Ontario government says it cannot handle the matter, then we are ready to step in. If my hon. friend does not realize that simple fact, then he is not doing his job.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Two days ago in this House, the Prime Minister stated, and I quote: "Information can be sought under the Access to Information Act. Any citizen can request information from government departments".

After inviting the official opposition to use the Access to Information Act, how does the Prime Minister explain the fact that, in the past seven months, the Privy Council has systematically turned down every single request submitted by the official opposition under the Access to Information Act?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Privy Council receives requests, as provided for in the act. Some documents cannot be released under the act, under the regulations. This act was passed by Parliament. Internal communications between ministers, in any government, are not made available to people from outside. That is normal. The Privy Council is, however, instructed to release what must be released under the act.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, again, the government has a perfect score: 17 out of 17 requests for information have been turned down. Not a bad average.

In that case, why does the Prime Minister refuse to release the studies on overlap and duplication, whose existence was confirmed in the secret Industry Canada document? That much is clear.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs gave a more than adequate explanation on this matter a few days ago in this House.
